That, Mr. Chairman, is the policy of the state of New York. What I anticipated has happened: the counterpart of this bill has been thrown out by the legislature of that state. In view of this, why on earth should we pass a measure giving authority to build a bridge half way? This bridge has been up in the air for some time. It started by trying to get on top of one of the other bridges; and under this bill the promoters are asking for authority to place their structure within 250 feet of the other bridge. Is that something that this parliament should authorize? I submit, Mr. Chairman, that you had better think it over again.

An hon. MEMBER: Where do you want the bridge?

Mr. CHAPLIN: My hon. friend need not say very much. His bridge on the St. Lawrence will probably fail the same as this one.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the title carry?

Mr. CHAPLIN: On division.

Bill reported.

ST. CLAIR TRANSIT COMPANY

Mr. SPEAKER: I have been asked to revert to the first number of private bills. Bill No. 23. If there is unanimous consent this bill will be now taken up.

The house resumed from March 19, consideration in committee of Bill No. 23 to incorporate the St. Clair Transit Company—Mr. Goodison—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When this bill was last before the committee we were considering clause 4.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Mr. Chairman, when this clause was before us a few days ago I made some comments on the fact that it provided for shares of no par value. I know that is becoming a rather common practice by many large corporations, but it seems to me it is not proper in the case of a public company of this description. I think that a corporation which proposes to build a bridge for public use at an expenditure of a large sum of money should have a substantial capital. If this section were agreed to the shares would be of nominal or no par value, and the promoters could sell them at any price they pleased. I think we ought to adopt the old practice of having a specific amount of capital provided for this enterprise, divided into shares of $100 each. Therefore in accordance with the notice I gave of an amendment for this purpose which appears in votes and proceedings of March 21, I beg to move:

That the whole of section 4 be struck out and replaced by the following:

4. The capital stock of the company shall be two million dollars, divided into shares of one hundred dollars each, and may be called up by the directors from time to time as they deem necessary.

I think this amendment will be to the advantage of the company, because I suppose they intend issuing a large amount of bonds as provided for in this bill. If so, they must have some substantial capital behind them.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Chairman, I notice that in bill No. 14, which is similar in character to this measure, there is a clause providing that Canadian labour and Canadian materials shall be used as far as practicable. I desire to add as section 22 the following:

The employment of labour in the construction, maintenance and supervision of the said bridge shall be subject to the terms and conditions of the fair wage clauses set forth in the order in council No. 1206 of June 7, 1922 and any amendments thereto, and so far as it may be practical to do so, Canadian materials and labour must be used in the construction of the said bridge, and a certified statement shall be sent weekly to the Department of Labour giving the names and addresses of firms supplying materials and the quantity thereof.

The CHAIRMAN: The same point arises here as was under consideration previously. Notice of motion of this amendment should have been given, but if the hon. member obtains the unanimous consent of the committee the clause may be added. Otherwise notice must be given regularly. Is it the unanimous wish of the committee that the motion be presented?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The CHAIRMAN: I am afraid the hon. member will have to give notice.

Mr. HEAPS: I give notice that at the next sitting I shall put the motion.

Motion stands.

Section agreed to.

Sections 5 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

On section 8—Powers.

Mr. COOTE: This section provides that the bridge shall not interfere with navigation. Is provision made for proper supervision of the construction by governmental authority to ensure that such interference will not take place? This is an important point.

Mr. CANNON: The plans will have to be approved by the governor in council.

Mr. COOTE: Is that provision in the bill?

Mr. CANNON: Yes, in section 10. Moreover there is the general law providing for all such questions.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What provision is there in regard to the time of commencement and completion of the work?

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend might read section 19.

Section agreed to.

Sections 9 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

On section 12—Power to issue shares as paid up stock in payment of acquired properties.

Mr. IRVINE: In the votes and proceedings of the 22nd instant I gave notice that I intended moving an amendment to this section, as follows:

That all the words after the word "directors" in the eighth line of section 12 be struck out and the following substituted therefor:—"but no such issue or allotment of shares as fully or partly paid up shall be valid or binding upon the company

(a) Unless before any such issue or allotment of shares shall have been made as fully or partly paid up otherwise than in cash, the company shall have filed in the office of the Secretary of State a contract in writing, duly executed by the parties thereto, setting forth the considerations other than cash for which the company is about to issue and allot such shares as fully or partly paid up; nor

(b) Unless in each and every case in whch the company shall allot or issue shares upon the footing that the whole or some part thereof shall be credited as paid for a consideration other than cash, such consideration shall be received and credited by the company at not more than its then actual value;

(c) And, in case the foregoing provisons of this section are not complied wth, the holders of the shares so issued shall be liable to the company and to its creditors to the amount of the par value of the shares held by them respectively."

In support of this amendment I would point out that this company is hereby undertaking a public service, and while I do not believe that parliament intends preventing a reasonable return on investment, it is our duty, I take it, to see that the legislation giving this bridge company its legal authority to operate should properly safeguard the public interest. Stock manipulation in particular should be carefully guarded against. The substance of the amendment I have just moved will be found in the English Companies Act, and it protects the public against manipulation of stock, at least to some extent. I have much pleasure in moving the amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Kellner).

The CHAIRMAN: The notice of motion which appears in the votes and proceedings in relation to this amendment indicates the hon. member's intention to move it on the third reading. I do not know whether that fact properly precludes its acceptance at the present time.

Mr. CAHAN: The notice does not say on the third reading. The notice in connection with the other bill refers to the third reading, but this notice does not.

Mr. IRVINE: In connection with Bill No. 14 I gave notice of a motion substantially the same as the motion my hon. friend (Mr. Heaps) has moved. It was not necessary, therefore, that I should move it in connection with clause 4.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: As I read the notice in connection with bill No. 23, the reference is to section 4; there seems to be no notice regarding section 12.

Mr. CAHAN: It provides that all the words after the word "directors," in the eighth line of section 12, shall be struck out "and the following substituted therefor."

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That is right.

The CHAIRMAN: The notice I have says, on the third reading. There is another notice here having regard to section 4.

Mr. IRVINE: You will observe that section 12 of Bill No. 14 and section 12 of Bill No. 23 are identical, and I propose to move the same amendment to each of these bills. An hon. gentleman has just moved an amendment to Bill No. 14 which does practically what my amendment is intended to do, and I cannot move that amendment until the bill comes up for third reading. In the other case, however, this notice of motion is not confined to the third reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN: Did my hon. friend give notice of the motion which he has just made with respect to Bill No. 23?

Mr. IRVINE: Yes. If the chairman will look in the votes and proceedings for Thursday March 22, he will observe the notice on the second page.

Upon the yeas and nays being called for:

The CHAIRMAN: In my opinion the nays have it. I have been asked to read the amendment again, although I thought everyone heard it read by the hon. member who moved it.

Mr. IRVINE: I object to that; I think we all know what the amendment is.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. gentleman's objection should be sustained.

Mr. NEILL: I rise to a point of order. We do not know what we are voting on.

Yeas, 58; Nays, 58.

The CHAIRMAN: The result of the vote is a tie, and in order to leave the question open and give another opportunity to have the amendment moved on third reading, I will vote against the amendment.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. IRVINE: I rise to a point of order. Some hon. gentlemen opposite voted who were not in the house when the question was put.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If my hon. friend refers to me, I did not vote.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the point is not well taken. We are now in committee, while the point raised by my hon. friend would apply to the house with the speaker in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, I did not vote for the reason that I did not hear the amendment read. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin refused to allow me to hear it read, so I did not vote. Possibly he might have received my vote if he had been a little more generous in allowing me to hear what he moved.

Mr. ARTHURS: As a matter of fact the question was read twice, apparently to allow certain hon. gentlemen to vote.

The CHAIRMAN: I think I should not allow that statement to go unchallenged. The clerk assistant came to the table and appealed to me to have hon. gentlemen resume their seats; he became mixed up because they did not resume their seats when he finished counting the row.

Mr. IRVINE: Do I understand that without giving notice I will have the liberty of moving this amendment again on the third reading of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. CANNON: If you give notice.

Mr. BOYS: Under the rule I do not believe that can be done. The rule distinctly states that unless notice has been given in respect of the third reading, an amendment cannot be made. The proper course would be to refer the bill back to the committee, with instructions to make such an amendment. I think in fairness to the hon. member he should be told now that he should let this stand as a notice of motion in amendment that he will move on the third reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN: If the committee are agreeable this will stand as a notice of motion.

Mr. CAHAN: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I submit that the committee cannot authorize that amendment to be moved on the third reading unless notice is given.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George is quite right. If the hon. gentleman wishes to move an amendment on the third reading he should give a new notice which should appear in the votes and proceedings.

Mr. IRVINE: Then I will give a fresh notice of motion.

Section 12 agreed to.

Section 13 agreed to.

On section 14—Tolls chargeable.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I have had occasion already to point out to the house and to the committee in connection with these bills that the approval of tolls is to be made by the governor general in council. I have also pointed out already that in some cases for thirty years—

An hon. MEMBER: Louder.

Mr. CHAPLIN: If you will make less noise with your conversation you will be able to hear me. For thirty years the governor in council has failed to do its duty.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I resent that imputation. I asked my hon. friend the other night if there had ever been a reference to the governor in council and he replied none had been made.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That is no point of order. It is a statement of fact.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is the statement of fact.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The bill itself declares that the owners of the bridge must get their tolls approved by the governor in council. What I stated before and state again is this —the governor in council failed to approve of one set of tolls. That is plain now, and that is what I wish to convey to the house.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is quite a different statement.

Mr. CHAPLIN: No other authority than the federal government has to do with this bridge, and they have to approve of these tolls. In the other charter that was being sought, the Solicitor General, at my suggestion, inserted some words that made it necessary for the people who owned that charter to get the government's approval. In the other bill he also put in the word "previously". Why does he not do the same thing here if the desire is to pass a bill that is going to be of any value? We have had experience before of the failure of the governor in council to do its duty.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CANNON: If my hon. friend will allow me—it might shorten his speech—the word "previously" is in the clause.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Will the Solicitor General be kind enough to show me where the word "previously" is in that section?

Mr. CANNON: If my hon. friend will read the clause he will find it there.

Mr. COOTE: Turn on the light, then the hon. member may be able to see it.

Mr. DUNNING: That will not help him

Mr. CHAPLIN: Does my hon. friend say it is in clause 14?

Mr. GOODISON: It is the second word in line four, section 14.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It is not in the copy of the bill that I have.

Mr. CANNON: I suggest that my hon. friend get a copy of the reprinted bill.

Mr. MANION: Where are the reprinted bills? There are none in our file.

Mr. CANNON: In the reprinted bill the word "previously" appears. The two bills were amended in order to meet my hon. friend's own suggestion.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The Solicitor General is quite right.

Section agreed to.

Section 15 agreed to.

On section 16—Assets and liabilities of amalgamated companies.

An hon. MEMBER: Give us some light.

Mr. CHAPLIN: You will not get much light on this bill.

Section agreed to.

Sections 17 and 18 agreed to.

On section 19—Time for commencement and completion of bridge.

Mr. CAHAN: I want to call attention to a peculiar provision in connection with this section—that, if within the time limit the bridge is built only one-quarter of the way across the river, the powers granted the company cease except as regards that part of the undertaking which has already been completed. It strikes me as a very peculiar provision with regard to the building of the bridge across an international river, but I presume no amendment can be made at the present time without notice.

Section agreed to.

On section 20—When property, etc., to be conveyed to the Dominion.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I should like to have an explanation of these words:

When the corporate obligations and stock of the company and of any of the companies mentioned in sections fifteen, sixteen, seventeen and eighteen of this act, with which this company shall join or unite in the construction of said bridge, have been retired, in the manner prescribed in their by-laws, then such bridge and the approaches thereto and all appurtenant structures, property, property rights and franchises, so far as the same are located within the United States, shall be conveyed by the said company, its successors and assigns, without cost or expense to the state of Michigan as the legislature of said state may designate, and so far as the same is situated within the Dominion of Canada shall be conveyed, without cost or expense, to the Dominion of Canada—

Does that mean any addition to the capital stock in the way of money, or does it mean the actual cost of the stock transfer? What does it mean?

Mr. CAHAN: As I pointed out before when a similar bill was before the house this clause is a perfect farce. Not only is it farcical but it is deceptive. It says that at some time the mortgage bonds outstanding may be redeemed by means of receipts from tolls, and the stock may be retired by means of these receipts, and then, when this is accomplished the American part of the bridge shall be conveyed to the state of Michigan and the Canadian part to the Dominion of Canada. Now what are the conditions? First this company, under this clause, may pay up its entire capital of $2,500,000 under a provision whereby it can transfer any asset of any value to the company and issue therefore its stock as fully paid up. Therefore the $2,500,000 of capital stock in this company may, under the advice of any competent legal counsel, be issued for practically no actual value at all —a thousand dollars or one hundred dollars, or some nominal value, will pay up the stock. Then there is another provision in the bill that the stock must be paid off at the price fixed by the by-laws of the company. That is, assuming that each share of $100 par value was actually paid up in cash, the directors, by their resolution and of their own will, may provide that the stock which costs $100 in cash, even if paid up in cash, shall be redeemed at $100, $200, $300, $400 or any price they see fit. So that the proposal now held out that this public utility undertaking, after it has earned sufficient to redeem these mortgage bonds, and after it has earned sufficient to retire its capital stock, shall be handed over and become the property of the Dominion of Canada, is entirely farcical and deceptive, because it leads to the impression that, after the actual cash invested in the bridge is paid off out of the tolls of the company, it would then become the property of the Dominion government. Then to further mislead, it seems to me, those who drafted this bill have added at the end of section 20:

Provided always that the period for payment of the obligations of the companies and the retirement of their capital stock and any extension thereof and the provision of the companies' by-laws in respect thereof shall have been previously approved by the governor in council.

If it were made clear that the by-laws which indicated the price at which the stock was to be redeemed should be approved by the governor in council, there might be then some semblance of restraint upon the price which would be set upon the stock by the by-law; but this clause merely relates to the period for payment. That is, the company may make by-laws with respect to the period for payment, and that such by-laws must be approved by the governor in council. But by-laws dealing with the prices to be paid are not, under that act, subject to the approval of the governor in council. I called attention to that fact before. I cannot propose an amendment now; but it seems to me that this whole clause should be struck out; that we should not be parties to a farcical and deceptive section such as is inserted in this bill, which offers no opportunity to the government to exercise a proper discretion, and which really holds out the suggestion that this bridge will one day become the public property of the Dominion of Canada, while it rests entirely with the directors of the company to designate and fix the price at which it shall become the property of the Dominion.

Mr. CANNON: How could the directors fix the price of their stock?

Mr. CAHAN: By by-law.

Mr. CANNON: If my hon. friend will read the section he will see that all these by-laws are subject to the approval of the governor in council.

Mr. CAHAN: Which section?

Mr. CANNON: The section the hon. member is discussing.

Mr. CAHAN: No. I will read it again. Any person who can read English intelligently will doubt the construction placed upon it by the Solicitor General. The clause reads:

Provided always that the period for payment of the obligations of the companies and the retirement of their capital stock—

That is dealing with the period of time.

—and any extension thereof and the provision of the companies' by-laws in respect thereof—

Mr. CANNON: That is exactly what I said.

Mr. CAHAN (Reading):

—in respect thereof—

That is in respect of that period and nothing else.

Mr. CANNON: Not at all. It is in respect of the retirement.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. CAHAN: If it is to be in respect of the retirement, it should be made clear.

Mr. CANNON: It is clear.

Mr. CAHAN: It is not clear. I would suggest that any court that has this section before it will declare that the words "in respect thereof" apply back to the word "period," and whoever drafted that, in my opinion, intentionally made it apply to the period and not to the by-laws fixing the price, in order that it might deceive the unwary reader of the section to which I have made reference. If it is to apply to the by-laws in reference to the terms on which retirement of the stock shall be made, that should be expressed in clear English.

Mr. CANNON: Notwithstanding the limited intelligence which my hon. friend has been kind enough to credit me with—

Mr. CAHAN: I was not reflecting on the hon. member's intelligence.

Mr. CANNON: —if any members of the committee will read the clause, they will see that the words—

By-laws in respect thereof—

—must be used in connection with the words previously used. The words before the word "by-laws" govern not only the period, the point which my hon. friend has stressed, but also the retirement and indeed the whole matter of the retirement. The clause states that any by-law passed by the company in connection with both the period and the retirement will be subject to approval by the governor in council. My hon. friend has mentioned that this clause is drafted in such a way as to deceive parliament. I have great respect for my hon. friend; but the committee which examined this clause was satisfied with it, and I am quite sure none of those who sat on the committee had any intention of being deceived or of enacting any legislation which was against the public interest. It is easy for my hon. friend to use strong language; but I would ask members of the committee to examine this clause with care and caution and they will come to the conclusion that the clause is not as bad as my hon. friend would have the committee believe it to be.

Mr. BOYS: Supposing the by-law is not approved by the governor in council, what is the effect?

Mr. CANNON: If it is not approved, it is not valid; it has no force.

Mr. BOYS: That being so, there would be no by-law under which the country could ever become the possessor of this bridge.

Mr. CANNON: Except that the governor in council has the power, not only to approve any tolls which are to be charged before they are chargeable and collectible, but to revise the tolls so that should the company keep on doing its business, without having any intention of turning over the bridge to the country, the governor in council has absolute power to see that no tolls are collected by the company.

Mr. BOYS: We are not at the moment discussing the tolls. There is in this bill a clause that seems to be important from the standpoint of the country. Under clause 20 the country may some fine day become possessor of this bridge. The first part of the clause states:

When the corporate obligations and stock of the company and of any of the companies mentioned in sections 15, 16, 17 and 18 of this act, with which this company shall join or unite in the construction of said bridge, have been retired, in the manner prescribed in their by-laws—

Supposing the manner prescribed in the by-laws is not satisfactory to the governor in council, the country would never get the bridge. I suppose the last five or six lines are inserted as a saving clause, but I submit that, instead of having a saving clause, it affords no relief, because if the provisions of the by-law are not satisfactory to the governor in council, the by-law under which acquisition might take place would never be approved. Therefore the whole matter, instead of to some extent being in the hands of parliament, is absolutely in the hands of the company. The only relief is under the last few lines of the clause. The position is that the company may pass a by-law providing for acquisition, but because of the action of the governor in council, the by-law is not valid and therefore we have no legislation which will result in acquisition. I submit that there should be inserted in this clause some provision which, apart from the arbitrary exercise of authority on the part of the directors will give the country some power and authority over this bridge, which cannot be nullified. If this clause continued—

If the by-law of the company is found unsatisfactory to the governor in council, the governor in council shall have power to make such amendments as it may think appropriate in the premises.

—that would afford some relief. As the matter stands now, the whole thing is in the hands of the company. They could pass an extreme by-law which would never be approved and the country would never get the bridge.

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend forgets one essential feature. If the company passes a by-law such as he has described, unacceptable to the governor in council, the governor in council will not accept the by-law. The governor in council, however, has an absolute power controlling the tolls, and the governor in council can, through that power, put the company in such a position that it will have either to turn over its property to the government or operate the bridge without charging any tolls. What would be the interest of the shareholders of the company to continue doing business on that basis?

Mr. BOYS: Does my hon. friend suggest to the committee that the only way of getting relief is by coercive measures? Surely that is not the way to handle the matter. We have an opportunity to put this right now. Let us do it in our legislation. Do not let us do it by saying to the company: If you do not do what we want, we will take you by the throat; we will deprive you of tolls which at the time we thought were reasonable; we will give you only half the tolls. Surely it is our duty to deal with the matter now when we have it in our hands. One of the strong arguments before the committee was that this was not a profit-making proposition; that they wanted only reasonable tolls sufficient to pay off the indebtedness, and that ultimately the bridge would become the property of Canada and the United States. If the proposition made by the Solicitor General is the only answer, it is a very weak one, namely, that if you do not do what we want, we will take you by the throat and bring you to time.

Mr. CANNON: Sanctions to legislative enactments are always an infringement of private liberty. How can you give any sanction to legislation without in some way restricting individual liberty? Every sanction to a law is coercion.

Mr. MANION: The Solicitor General argues that this clause has the meaning which is desired by hon. members on this side who have spoken. If the clause has that meaning, as he claims, what objection can there be to making that clear? Surely parliament is not for the purpose of putting up all kinds of protection for private corporations, and no protection for the people of Canada and for the government. Let us make the clause clear, so that its effect, as claimed by the Solicitor General, will be absolutely understood, not only by the house, but by the courts of Canada, if the question should ever be taken to the courts. I appeal to the Solicitor General, in justice to the people of Canada, to make this clause absolutely clear. He says that it means what hon.

members on this side desire it to mean; they say that it does not. I was not in for the whole debate previous to this, but surely it is a fair demand to make that the clause shall be absolutely clear so that no mistake can be made in regard to it. That seems to be an absolutely fair and honest demand to make of the government on behalf of the people of Canada.

Mr. CANNON: I submit that the clause is clear. My hon. friend might try and agree with the other hon. gentlemen on his side who have spoken in order to bring forth an argument that we can well understand. My hon. friend says he speaks on behalf of the public generally. The hon. gentleman who spoke before says that we should not coerce a private company.

Mr. MANION: I did not say I was speaking on behalf of the people, although I do speak for them just as much as my hon. friend the Solicitor General. My point was that the Solicitor general says that this clause is clear. My friends on this side, who are both lawyers, say that it is not clear. Then what objection has the Solicitor General to making it clear? That is what I would like to know. If, as he claims, it has the desired meaning, why not make that so clear that an ordinary layman like myself could make no mistake about it?

Mr. BOYS: I am not arguing that it is not clear. Quite the reverse. I say that it is very clear that the country has no relief whatever under the provisions.

Mr. CAHAN: I wish to say in reply to the Solicitor General, for whose opinion I have great respect, that having read this clause in the clear light of day, which is coming in now, there is no doubt in my mind that a court will construe the words "and the provision of the companies' bylaws in respect thereof" as referring solely to the period for the payment of the obligations of the company and the retirement of their capital stock; and any extension thereof. That is not an extension of the capital stock; it is an extension of the period for the retiremet of the capital stock, and I venture to say that if it came before a court of law my hon. friend would argue that case from my point of view with very great success indeed.

Mr. PETTIT: I think it is perfectly plain that the different clauses of the bill make the location of the bridge and its plans and tolls all subject to the governor in council. Then under this clause the payment of its obligations and the retirement of its stock, and the provisions of the companies' bylaws with respect thereto, must first be approved by the governor in council.

QUESTIONS

BOUNDARY WATERS TREATY

Mr. RYCKMAN:

1. Does the treaty of 1909 between His Majesty the King and the United States of America relating to boundary waters, under articles 3 and 8 or any other provision thereof, give to the government of the Dominion of Canada power to conclude an agreement with the United States relating to works, improvements or obstructions in the St. Lawrence river (known commonly as the St. Lawrence Great Waterways Development), without the approval of the parliament of Canada?
2. If such power exists, will it be exercised without such approval first obtained?
3. Has the International Joint Commission, established under the said treaty, any jurisdiction or authority to decide finally any question relating to such works, improvements, or obstructions in favour of the United States, and against the position taken by the Dominion of Canada in the event of possible disagreement between the two countries?
4. If so, what are the powers of the said commission in that behalf?

Mr. SPEAKER: In my opinion this question is irregular. Bourinot says:

While explanations of the intentions of the government or of a minister may be asked, their opinion on a matter of policy or of law is not a proper subject of inquiry.

In my humble judgment this question should be redrafted.

Question dropped.

JOLIETTE POST OFFICE BURGLARY

On the question being called:

Mr. MANION:

1. Regarding the burglary of the post office at Joliette on February 29th last through which $1,200 was lost, is it true that the door was opened with a key?
2. Is it so that the safe or vault was opened by means of the combination?
3. If so, who among the employees knew this combination?
4. What move is being made to punish those concerned?

Mr. MANION: It has been pointed out to me by the Post Office Department that if this question is answered at the present time it will, as the matter is now under investigation, cast reflections on those who may be innocent. As I have no desire to do that, I will for the time being drop the question.

Question dropped.

GUION ISLAND LIGHTHOUSE INSPECTOR

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South):

1. Who was inspector of construction of the Guion island lighthouse?
2. By whose recommendation was such inspector appointed?
3. What remuneration was paid to him for his services?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. Alex. McKinnon, Gabarus, N.S.
2. D. D. Boyd, St. Peters, N.S.
3. $313,60.

MATANE-STE. ANNE DES MONTS MAIL SERVICE

Mr. CAHAN:

1. Who has the contract for the carrying of mails between Matane and Ste. Anne des Monts, Quebec?
2. When was the present contract made?
3. Were public tenders invited therefor?
4. If so, who put in tenders therefor and what was the amount of each tender?
5. Is the person who now holds the contract a British subject?
6. If so, how long has he been a British subject?

Mr. VENIOT:

1. Frank Pezzullo.
2. Contract awarded on 15 July, 1924.
3. Yes.
4. Francois Dechaines, Ste. Felicite, $6,500, tender (subsequently withdrawn); Eudore Roy, Cap Chat, $7,000, tender (subsequently increased to $8,000); George Dion, Ste. Anne des Monts, $8,000; Francois Imbault, Matane, $8,000; Romeo St. Laurent, Matane, $8,700; J. B. Tremblay, Grosses Roches, $9,000; Edmond Leclerc, Ste. CAP CHAT—WHARF

Mr. CAHAN:

1. Has the Department of Marine and Fisheries or any other department of government made a contract for the construction of a wharf at Cap Chat, county of Gaspe, in the province of Quebec?
2. With whom was said contract made?
3. What was the amount of the contract?
4. Who has supervised the expenditures?
5. What amount has been paid to the contractor to date?
6. If no contract was made for the construction of this wharf, what amount has been expended thereon by the government to date?

Mr. ELLIOTT (for Mr. Cardin):

1. A contract has been awarded for an extension to the wharf.
2. Ludger Lemieux, Limitée, Ste. Marie, Beauce, P.Q.
3. Approximately $31,800 (unit prices).
4. Inspector of construction, Urbain Cretien, Cap Chat, under direction of district engineer P. E. Amiot, Rimouski, P.Q.
5. Nil.
6. Answered by No. 1.

SUGAR LOAF—POSTMASTER

Mr. JOHNSTONE:

1. Who is now the postmaster at Sugar Loaf, Cape North, Victoria county?
2. How long has the present postmaster held office?
3. By whom was he recommended?
4. What are his qualifications?

Mr. VENIOT:

1. Alex. D. Wilkie is acting postmaster.
2. Temporarily in charge since 20th December, 1927.
3. By retiring postmaster, Wilson J. Gwinn.
4. Satisfactory up to the present.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

EXPORT OF ELECTRIC POWER

Mr. WHITE (London):

1. What the the names and locations of exporters of electric power, to the United States, in each of the years 1922, 1923, 1924, 1925, 1926, 1927?
2. What horse-power is each company licensed to export?
3. What horse-power and kilowatt hours were exported by each company in each year?
4. What excise has been, or is to be collected, from each of the exporters in the various years?

NATURAL RESOURCES OF PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, in the best interests of confederation, and the economic development of western Canada, the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta should be granted their natural resources free from restrictions within the legislative competence of the parliament of Canada with provisions for the maintenance and administration of school lands and school land endowment funds for educational purposes according to the laws of the respective provinces, but in compliance with the letter and spirit of the constitution, and that the claims of these provinces to compensation for loss for lands and resources alienated, and the claims of any other provinces in connection with this subject should be investigated with a view to satisfactorly and equitable adjustment.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order which, I think, is of interest to all the members of the house in connection with an important matter of procedure. The hon. gentleman who moves this resolution gave notice, according to the rules of the house, on Thursday, January 26, 1928, as Your Honour may see by reference to the votes and proceedings of that day, the very first day of the opening of the house. The resolution remained on the order paper until Wednesday of last week, when it appeared with a material alteration. The words, but in compliance with the letter and spirit of the constitution.

which up to that date appeared in the resolution before the words, with provisions for the maintenance and administration of the school lands endowment fund, according to the laws of the respective provinces, were transferred and inserted after this passage, thus changing substantially the meaning of the resolution.

I do not complain of this change, I think the new resolution is better than the old, and it is more acceptable to me, but I submit that, according to the rules of the house, this alteration could not be effected without giving due notice in the votes and proceedings. On this point permit me to quote to Your Honour, Bourinot. At page 299 he says:

[Mr. Hanson.]

A motion on the order paper must be in accordance with the notice of the votes; and, should a member desire to substitute another, or alter its terms, he must first obtain the leave of the house.

The hon. mover of the resolution should have given notice of the alteration. And the new resolution, as altered, should appear on the order paper after the other resolutions which would have precedence over it.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, I remember an occasion when a resolution of mine, which I had written out, was misprinted in an important particular. I called the attention of the Clerk of the house to the fact that it was a misprint, and on the following day due correction was made. In this case certain words, by mere accident apparently, have been printed in one part of the paragraph that should have been printed in the other, and I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman who is moving the resolution intended it to be in its present form. Therefore it seems to me the alteration might be regarded as a misprint which the hon. member should be allowed to correct and still retain his place on the order paper.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will my hon. friend permit a question? Does he agree with me that this alteration does change the meaning of the resolution in a substantial way?

Mr. CAHAN: Until I hear the discussion of it my opinion is that I shall have to support the resolution in its present form. I would not have voted for it in its earlier form.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. CAHAN: But I still think, from the explanation I have heard, that the alteration is a mere accident, and I think that when such a misprint is made the house should be very tolerant and not insist on a technical objection of this kind.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the resolution as it is now framed, I feel encouraged by the statement made by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) that it is now in such form as to be acceptable to him. I am also glad to have a similar intimation from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). That is certainly making progress. Perhaps the Minister of Justice thinks that others may be favourably disposed towards the motion to such an extent that it might carry; therefore he interferes on a point of order to prevent its discussion.

The members of this house, sir, were prevented from discussing this question in the session of 1926 by a double-barrelled arrangement under which the government referred the question to the supreme court for a declaration as to the validity of certain legislation and also prevented discussion by a government resolution. In the session of 1927 the house was also prevented from discussing this important matter because it was still sub judice. Therefore I am not surprised at this further exhibition of want of courage on the part of the government in raising what seems to me to be a very minor objection.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think my hon. friend should limit himself to the point of order.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Well, I suppose I will have a further opportunity sometime of paying my compliments to the hon minister.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It will be reciprocal.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I am very glad to see that he is a little touchy on the point. Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the intention of the motion and what it deals with is not materially affected by the addition of the words, "school lands". Those words are added, I admit, but I consider they must necessarily be incorporated in the words following, namely, "school lands endowment fund". Also, the addition of the words, "for educational purposes" is implied with respect to the administration of the school lands of the respective provinces, which everybody knows are for educational purposes and never for anything else. I see no material difference in the resolution as now framed and as it stood when first introduced. There are precedents for the acceptance of such a motion in its changed form; I am quite sure that statement is correct. I believe a change was made in a motion introduced two or three years ago by my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), and the motion thus amended came up within forty-eight hours after the change was made. Moreover, it was allowed to be debated. In this matter hon. members have had five or six days' notice of the motion in its present form. You, Mr. Speaker, called the motion last Wednesday and I allowed it to stand; perhaps the time was not opportune to debate this point of order until the motion was actually put. I submit that the house has had ample opportunity to consider it. This is not a case of springing something on anyone; it is not a matter of giving forty-eight hours' notice; hon. gentlemen have had six days' notice of the motion in the form in which it now appears. The motion has been on the order paper in this form since last Wednesday and I urge that I be given the right to proceed to discuss it. However, I am in the hands of the house.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that it has not been an infrequent practice on the part of hon. members to correct or change motions, and the present motion has been but slightly altered. The change consists very largely in a correction which, I think I can say, was called to the attention of my hon. friend—a correction regarding the words referred to which should have been inserted in the first instance in the order in which they now appear. It has not been the practice of the house to refuse hon. members the privilege of changing their motions in such a manner. As my hon. friend has observed, I changed a motion two or three years ago. I did not do so with any intent to deceive the house but in perfect good faith, and after consultation with some of the officers having to do with these questions. There was no question then about my right to make the change. As I say, it is not as if something were being done to mislead the house, as for instance in the case of changing a record; it is simply a question of adjusting a motion which was put frankly on the order paper several days ago. The motion in its present form has been on the order paper several days, and while the rule cited by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) might be stretched to bear the interpretation he gives it in his point of order, I submit that the house would find it hopeless to carry on its business if every rule were construed strictly technically. For example, a question arose the other day on a point of order regarding the right of a member to speak. Every member has a right to speak on every bill, and, in committee as often as he likes; he may speak also on the second and third readings of the bill. Suppose, however, every member exercised that right, is it not obvious that the business of the house would be seriously delayed? I submit, therefore, that in the absence of a definite and specific rule of a mandatory character the ordinary practice followed in the house should govern in this case.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I can cite a precedent of quite recent date which appears to be apt. A few weeks ago I put a notice of motion in the votes and proceedings and ultimately it reached the orders of the day. It appeared one day and was left off the next. On inquiry I was told that this was due to the fact that there was a new rule under which a member may have only one notice of motion on the order paper at any time, and inasmuch as I had a motion already in my name the second one was invalid. I said that I would get another member to father the second resolution; he put his name to it instead of mine and this was thought acceptable. It could not be said that the substitution of one member's name for another at the beginning of a motion was a material alteration in the motion itself. I was satisfied with the statement that the next day the motion would appear in the other member's name, but afterwards I was informed by the Clerk, who in the meantime had consulted the authorities, that it would be necessary for the other member to give the ordinary notice in the votes and proceedings in the regular way. That was done and the motion was in consequence delayed to that extent. This, I think, is perfectly parallel to the question now under dicussion.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): With all respect to my hon. friend I must question the aptness of his illustration. Last year we provided that a member might have only one notice of motion on the order paper at one time. The reason was that sometimes at the beginning of the session a member would put half a dozen different motions on the order paper and thus block the way for other members. The new rule was intended to give everyone an equal chance. In this case, however, it seems to me that the Minister of Justice is stretching the rule too far. We all know that mere verbal changes in notices of motion have been made ever since we were members of this house and no question has been raised. The notice of motion which the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) wishes to move at the present moment is drawn in the exact terms of a resolution passed by the Conservative party at its convention in October last, and only inadvertently did the motion as originally worded fail to conform with that resolution. We all have known of notices of motion, changed verbally, having been allowed to remain on the order paper. If the point raised by the Minister of Justice is regarded as well taken it will mean that any motion which is altered immaterially will be placed at the bottom of the list, and I submit that this will constitute a rather stringent interpretation of the spirit of the rule. I have no doubt that the hon. member consulted the Clerk, as most of us have done in similar circumstances, and I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that he be allowed to go on with the motion.

Hon. LUCIEN CANNON (Solicitor General): We should ask ourselves two questions: first, whether there is a rule covering this case—and there is a rule, standing order 45—and, secondly, whether the motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) is the same notice of motion which has appeared on the order paper for some considerable time. If it is the same notice of motion the arguments brought forward by hon. gentlemen opposite apply; if it is not the same notice of motion then standing order 45 must apply and a new notice be given. And this new notice of motion must be treated as if it were a new notice in relation to some other question, and must occupy on the order paper the rank which in that event it would have received. Is this notice of motion now on the order paper the same notice of motion which was first put on the paper by my hon. friend at the beginning of the session? I humbly submit, Your Honour, that it is not. What are the changes? They are two in number. By the first change the notice of motion now before the house applies not only to public school funds but also to school lands and that is not a matter of small moment; it is a change of some importance. The second change is that the words, "In compliance with the spirit and letter of the constitution" in the first notice of motion applied to federal legislation alone, while in the new notice of motion those words apply to both federal legislation and provincial legislation. Undoubtly those two changes have been made in the resolution standing in the name of my hon. friend.

The third question is whether these changes are material or whether they result simply from a misprint, and I would say that in my opinion if you add to a resolution words which extend its scope from public funds to public lands you introduce a material change. I also submit that if you wish to say that the spirit and letter of the constitution will apply not only to one set of legislation, that is federal legislation, but also to provincial legislation, which will include the legislation passed in three western provinces, you introduce a material change. The best argument in support of my contention lies in the words of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), who preluded his remarks by saying that we were simply facing a misprint. He afterwards added that as a consequence of the changes introduced by the hon. member he, who would have voted against the resolution as it stood in the first instance, would now support it.

So, Your Honour, believing that these changes are material, I submit that standing order 45 applies.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (South Vancouver): Rule 363 provides:

A modification of a notice of motion standing upon the notice paper is permitted, if the amended notice does not exceed the scope of the original notice.

I submit that the scope of a resolution is not limited to the substance or to the words.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend is not reading a rule; he is quoting the words of May.

Mr. STEVENS: He is quoting an authority.

Mr. LADNER: I am reading from an authority which is accepted by most of us as being equal to May.

Mr. CANNON: If the scope is not extended, my hon. friend is perfectly right.

Mr. LADNER: I can only handle one point at a time, and at present I am reading rule 363 from Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms.

Mr. DUNNING: It is not a rule.

Mr. LADNER: It is a reference which I think should have some meaning in our procedure. After having compared the original notice of motion with that now before us, my contention is that the alterations in the form of the motion, in the wording as well as in the addition of the words "school lands," taking the scope of the notice of motion into consideration, still keep it within that scope. Then I refer the Solicitor General to reference 391:

No motion of which notice has been given shall be made in a form differing from that of the notice, except with the unanimous consent of the house or upon a regular renewal of notice.

I submit that those two references were never contemplated to include alterations of such little importance, as far as the subject matter is concerned, as those alterations in the notice of motion given by the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards). Certainly if we are to be tied up in knots by technicalities of this kind many of the proceedings of the house, not only of private members but of the government as well, might be seriously hampered.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do any other gentlemen desire to speak on the question?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I would like to add one word, with your kind permission. I am not at all deceived by the arguments of the Solicitor General, which have some point to them. The very fact that the Solicitor General, the Minister of Justice and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George all say that the changes are material must be taken into consideration, of course. However, I still adhere to my former statement that I do not think they are material to the objects plainly indicated in the resolution. I understand the object of the government all right; they are running true to form in trying to prevent a discussion of this matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I mean exactly what I say. I have just this to say, Mr. Speaker: He who fights and runs away will live to fight another day.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): Before you give your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the house that the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington is not debarred from doing what he wishes to do in a proper way under the rules, but by doing it in this manner he succeeds in gaining precedence over twenty other hon. members of the house who have resolutions on the order paper and who have a right to discuss those resolutions before my hon. friend can discuss his resolution, he having altered his notice of motion since it was placed on the order paper.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): That is true if the statement preceding it is held to be correct by Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George plainly stated that he could not support the resolution as it first appeared, but that in its present form he could support it. Surely that is evidence that a very material change has taken place in the resolution. I suggest that the question is one of the rights of the other members of the house who have on this order paper regular notices of motion which they have a right to discuss in advance of the resolution proposed by my hon. friend.

Mr. SPEAKER: What is the rule of the house? Standing order 45 reads as follows:

Forty-eight hours' notice. . . .

In Great Britain only twenty-four hours' notice is required, but in Canada it is forty-eight hours.

. . . . shall be given of a motion for leave to present a bill, resolution or address, for the appointment of any committee, or for placing a question on the order paper, but this rule shall not apply to bills after their introduction, or to private bills, or to the times of meeting or adjournment of the house. Such notice shall be laid on the table before six o'clock, p.m., and be printed in the votes and proceedings of that day.

I saw this motion when it was first printed in the votes and proceedings, and I saw it again on Saturday as it now appears on the order paper. I found a modification in the motion—in fact I think I discussed the other day with the hon. member himself (Mr. Edwards), not the question of the modification because I had not perused it at the time, but something in connection with the motion. My attention was not drawn to the alteration. It is true that according to paragraph 363 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, as stated by an hon. member, a modification of a notice of motion may be permitted. That paragraph reads as follows:

A modification of a notice of motion standing upon the notice paper is permitted, if the amended notice does not exceed the scope of the original notice.

The above reference is taken from May, 13th edition, page 234, where the following is found:

A modification of a notice of motion standing upon the notice paper is permitted, if the amended notice does not exceed the scope of the original notice.

The next sentence however reads as follows:

If a motion is proposed, which differs materially from the terms of the notice, it can only be made with the consent of the house, or upon a renewal of the notice.

If the consent of the house was unanimous there would be no objection, I suppose, to the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington proceeding, because when the house give unanimous consent in a matter involving the rules, that becomes the law of the house. In this case there is not unanimous consent; objection is taken. Is that objection well founded? In other words is the motion on the order paper at the present time the same as the one of which notice was given in the votes and proceedings? I may say that the wording is such that I had to read the two motions over several times in order to discover where the difference was.

There are two reasons, in my humble judgment, why this proposed resolution as now redrafted is beyond the scope of the notice given in the votes and proceedings.

First, by stating that provision should be made for the administration of "school lands" in addition to school lands endowment funds, the mover has materially changed the conditions on which the proposed grant of their natural resources should, in his opinion, be made to the interested provinces.

Secondly, the words "but in compliance with the letter and spirit of the constitution," were placed in the first draft so as to apply to the granting of the natural resources to the prairie provinces; whilst in the second draft these words have been moved further down and made to apply to the administration of school land endowment funds for educational purposes. There is a material difference between the two propositions.

The difference is such that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan)—who is a lawyer of outstanding ability known not only in Montreal but throughout Canada, and I may say North America—said that if the original motion which appeared in the votes and proceedings was moved to-day he would vote against it but that in its latter form he would support it. I am only making this reference to show that evidently there has been a material change in the resolution. However, if the house were willing to give unanimous consent to the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington, personally I would be pleased to listen to the debate. But strictly speaking, and according to the rules of the house, this motion is out of order.

I will quote in support of my ruling, May, 13th edition, page 234; Blackmore, page 212; Redlich, second volume, pages 216 and 217, and a footnote; and Bourinot, 4th edition, page 299. Bourinot is very clear on the matter. He says:

A motion on the order paper must be in accordance with the notice in the votes; and, should a member desire to substitute another, or alter its terms, he must first obtain the leave of the house.

Under the circumstances I cannot do otherwise than rule that the point of order is well taken.

May I say this to hon. members: All the authorities state that when an alteration is proposed to be made to a motion the mover should inform the Speaker himself. In the present case I was informed only by what I read on the order paper. It is true that as regards technical changes a member may address himself to the Clerk or one of the officials who draft motions for members, but when a material change is made I should be informed of it. By failure to do this the hon. member loses his turn whilst if he had notified me the other day I would have told him at once that such alterations involved the loss by him of his place on the order paper.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): If you will kindly permit me, Mr. Speaker, I should be very sorry if you thought for a moment that there was any intention on my part to manifest any disrespect towards you.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not say that disrespect enters at all into the question.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): I really did not consider the change to be material. However, I conform to your ruling at once, and I will ask the Clerk to strike the motion off the order paper.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. gentleman want to drop the motion?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is there anything else to do?

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. gentleman have leave to withdraw his motion?

Motion withdrawn.

INTERNATIONAL PEACE

MOTION FOR THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENT

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the time has come for the establishment of a government department for the promotion of peace and international understanding.

She said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak to this motion asking for the establishment of a department to work for peace and international understanding, I assume that all hon. members in this chamber are anxious to bring security to our country, and that any differences we have in the matter relate to the methods to be employed in bringing about peace rather than to any doubt as to the desirability of securing peace. I conclude that we all want to have security at home and friendship abroad. At one time almost everyone, possibly indeed everyone, had confidence in military preparedness and war as methods of bringing about security and of settling international differences. But I think that no one will now deny that that confidence in military preparedness and in war which used to be so complete has been very much shaken. Still while some to-day have simply scrapped the old way and have found a new method, and are relying upon the development of good will as the greatest security that we could find, there are others who, while they have not perfect confidence in war or in preparedness for war, still think of these methods as the best to adopt. Then there are others of our citizens and of citizens of the world who stand between the two ideas and are not quite sure in which faith to rely. The last war with its frightful loss of life and treasure caused all of us to think of this subject as one of very great importance. Not only did Canada lose sixty thousand of her very best men, but the world lost ten million of its best men, and if we are going to view this question from the point of view of humanity we must consider that loss of ten million young men a dead loss and one that will cause concern to every citizen in the world, including the citizens of Canada.

The cost of the last war was greater than that of any previous war, although all wars and all preparations for wars in the past have been exceedingly costly. So great has been the cost of preparing for and carrying out wars that in the first twenty years of the twentieth century, fourteen countries spent the fantastic sum of $61,000,000,000 in preparation for and carrying out war. England alone to-day spends on war or preparation for war fourteen shillings out of every twenty shillings of her national expenditure. The United States spend 82 cents out of every dollar on war or preparation for war. The total debt of the United States prior to the war was $1,125,000,000 and to-day it stands at between $18,000,000,000 and $19,000,000,000. How much greater even that that—and that is a terrific increase—must be the increase in the debt of such countries as France and Germany because of the war? In Canada the exact figures are not available, but certainly more than fifty cents out of every dollar of our national expenditure go to pay for wars past and preparation for wars to come. Some claim—and they may have figures to substantiate their claim, but I do not have them under my hand—that two-thirds of every dollar of Canada's expenditure goes for this purpose. When one thinks of these figures, the amount of money involved alone, one thinks of what the spending of this money for the good of the people could have done. I have not any doubt at all that had the one fantastic sum I mentioned of $61,000,000,000 been spent to bring knowledge, a high standard of living and happiness to the common peoples of the world, wars would by now not be necessary. The house, however, may not agree with me in that. More and more people are coming to believe, and even people in high places are stating quite fearlessly, that they believe security must come by means other than military preparedness. There are many statesmen one could quote, but I am going to confine myself to very brief quotations. The first one is Field Marshal Sir William Robertson, who was Chief of the Imperial General Staff from 1915 to 1918. That is, he was a military man trained in military tactics, and indeed he must have been a very successful one to have filled that position in those stressful years

In speaking of war—I am quoting from The U.F.A. of December 15, 1927, and this report appeared also in the daily press of a few days previous—he said:

> War has become a wholly detestable thing, and is almost, if not quite, as disastrous to victors as to vanquished.
> Never in history were preparations so complete or so widespread as during the fifty or sixty years previous to 1914, and yet never were wars so frequent as in that period.

A little later on in the same speech he is reported to have said:

> Every man and woman should energetically support all efforts made for devising some more sensible and humane way of composing international differences than the destructive and futile methods upon which reliance has hitherto been unsuccessfully placed.
> That is the only conclusion I can reach after a military career covering on Sunday next, a period of exactly fifty years.

So that this great British gentleman, who had been trained in a military school for fifty years, comes to the conclusion, speaking first, I suppose, for British men and women, and afterwards for all men and women, that they should set themselves to the task of finding some other and better way of settling international disputes.

Every one was sorry and grieved at the death quite recently of Field Marshal Haig. I wonder if we are willing to honour his memory by heeding his words. On one occasion he said:

> I urge you to a crusade having for its object the freeing of the whole world from the devastating scourge of war.

I might mention too such outstanding work for a new international spirit as was done in Great Britain by E. D. Morrell, now gone, and as has been done by Lord Robert Cecil, Ramsay MacDonald and the Right Hon. Arthur Ponsonby. These are all men of high standing in British public life and they all take the stand that we shall not get security through military preparedness; that we are simply wasting money, and that military preparedness cannot bring about the thing we are seeking for, namely, security at home and goodwill and friendship abroad.

Whatever may be the opinion of members of this house as to the degree of military preparedness necessary, or as to the advisability of disarmament, I think every hon. member will agree that such things as ignorance, suspicion and fear must be got rid of before we can have permanent peace. While it is true that other things cause war, these three, ignorance, suspicion and fear, leave the common people of all countries the prey to the propagandist in the hours of crisis. It makes them willing to bear these crushing burdens of debt caused by armaments, because, through lack of knowledge, they are led to believe that they must endure this staggering taxation in order to bring security to themselves in their own country. We have not in Canada, and indeed not to any extent anywhere in the world, studied constructively the art of making peace or the technique of peace. I think the technique of war has been studied by some of the most astute minds in all countries; but had the same amount of energy, had the same wealth, had the same knowledge of the psychology of the people been used to promote peace as has been and is yet being used in Canada to promote preparedness for war—because I am afraid it is still being done—we would to-day be far on our way towards the settlement of international disputes by some method other than war, and it would be true to-day that the institution of war in Canada would not be the respected institution it is. No one can doubt that in Canada the institution of war is a most respected one which the "best people" like very much. I have noticed that these people, when questioned, do not admit it; but in following the votes of money and the comments in the house on the subject of war, one cannot help concluding that the institution of war is still a respected one. I view this condition with alarm.

I do not however question the patriotism of those people in the house and in the country who believe that that is the way to be a patriotic citizen. I grant quite freely that they are patriotic people and they are working for what they believe is the best thing for their country. I simply question their wisdom, not their patriotism. On the other hand, often in the past in this house, the patriotism of people like myself and those who think with me has been questioned. They think we are not patriotic, that we do not love our country. One might ask, what is patriotism? Surely it is loyalty to a group; but sometimes we forget that we owe loyalty to many groups. We cannot have too much loyalty, either absolutely or in comparison with the loyalty of other peoples. But we can have too much loyalty to one group, forgetting the other groups to which we also belong. We are more and more coming to know that everyone of us belongs to that group which is known as humanity, and that we do owe a very great loyalty to that largest group of all—humanity. For Canadians, for a Britisher, for a citizen who is a member of the British commonwealth of nations, it should not be difficult to build a larger loyalty out of our present loyalties, because our loyalties have grown to include not only our own country and the mother country, but a group of countries which cover a large part of the surface of the earth. Surely then we ought to be willing, and mentally and spiritually able, to take the lead in the world in developing a still larger loyalty that will not stop until it has included the whole shrinking world. It is worthy of note, too, that patriotism is not an innate thing; it is cultivated, and it will be just what we train it to be. If we train the children and the young people of this country to view patriotism as a very much bigger thing than we have thought of it in the past, then within one generation, if we set about it with decision and a desire to win, we shall have a new patriotism, which, while not making light of the love of our own country, will expand to cover the needs of all countries.

Canada's position geographically makes her a country that is important in the history of the world at this moment. Geographically we belong to one continent. Politically we belong to another continent. There is no good reason why we cannot be the interpreter of the one continent to the other. Then, too, the Canadian mind is used to a large framework. Canada is a large, if not too thickly populated, country, and the Canadian mind can move with ease from Halifax to Vancouver, surely with much more ease than the European mind can move over the same distance. That should make it easy for us to give the world a lead in learning to cover mentally a larger space. The international mind is really nothing more than a mind that does not stop at the borders of one's own country, but bridges that gap that lies between one's own country and other countries, and bridges it sympathetically.

Canada is young. As countries go, we are merely a youth, and youth always looks to the future. In looking to the future, and not to the present, we must all realize that we need to build the security of the world on something more stable than military preparedness. We have had since the end of the great war a very great many memorials to the brave who gave their lives in the service of their country during that awful conflict. My own personal opinion is that many of the memorials which are supposed to lead us to think of the service and love and devotion of those who died simply glorify the institution of war. I think that the formation of a peace department would be a fitting commemoration of the devotion and sacrifice of the 60,000 Canadians who died, if we remember what was said during the war and directly after, fighting a war that was to end war. We have at the front of this building a tower which is called a peace tower. I was greatly interested in going through it and looking over it carefully, and my conclusion was that it is a very equisite piece of work, but that it is misnamed. No one who looks over it carefully can call it a peace chamber. It so clearly, one might almost say so brazenly, though beautifully, glorifies the institution of war. That sort of thing will never lead the young men and young women of Canada to think of new methods. It will simply lead them to think of the glory of the old; and it is not a fair way of putting the thing up to the young people of Canada, because the truth of war is not told, only the glory of war, not the misery, not the death, not the disease, not the broken hearts, not the shattered lives. Nothing of that is told at all; it is just the glory of war. I wonder who named the tower the peace tower. It is a queer idea of peace. A name will not bring us peace, I am sure of that.

Canada since the world war has been drawn more and more into world currents. There is an evidence of that in our appointing ambassadors to the different countries of the world. We have also been given a place on the council of the league of nations. All these things show that we are, whether we like it or not, becoming citizens of the world. But up until now very little of anything has been done by the Canadian people or the Canadian government to prepare Canadians for the new responsibilities which are ours. A department of peace would act as a focus or centre for peace thinking and peace activities. While there are some engaged in peace thinking and peace activities at the present time in Canada, they are scattered, and they have no help from—well, I will leave it at that: they have no help. They are the rank and file of the people, many of them, and it is hard for them to get the knowledge they desire. There has been no lead given in peace activities in Canada, with one or two notable exceptions which I shall mention later.

I believe that under the British North America Act the Dominion government has jurisdiction over war and peace in so far as control rests in Canada. It is therefore the business of the Dominion government, rather than of the provincial governments to help the people to find some new way of settling international disputes. Canada has a long and indeed a very honourable history in the settling of disputes through conciliation, and the most noted of all is the Rush-Bagot treaty which was made at the end of the war of 1812-

14. In the histories which I studied and from which I taught this treaty was given some prominence. To be exact, I think some sixteen pages were devoted to the history of the war and two paragraphs to the peace, but still two paragraphs was something. They told, and told sympathetically, of the importance of the Rush-Bagot treaty, which disarmed the border line between Canada and the United States, which from that time on has been an example in peaceful settlement to the whole world. But in the new histories now used in Ontario, a copy of which I now hold in my hand, as many pages are devoted to the war, but there is not one single line devoted to the Rush-Bagot treaty; it is not even mentioned. I am not familiar with the history texts used in the other provinces, but the children in the schools of Ontario reading these histories do not know anything about the Rush-Bagot treaty, do not know anything about the greatest incident of that period of the history of United States and Canada, because no one will doubt that the peace treaty was much more important than the war. This treaty shows that Canada in the past has been interested in finding new methods rather than relying on the old. In the case of the Rush-Bagot treaty we prepared for peace, and we had peace. I think that is logical. The old idea that if you prepare for war you will have peace is a fallacy. If you prepare for war you will have war, and if you prepare for peace you will have peace.

The International Joint Commission, which has been in existence for some seventeen years and has settled over twenty differences between Canada and the United States, has been mentioned twice, just lately, in far-flung parts of the world. I am quoting from an editorial that appeared in the Citizen of March 1, 1928:

> Recently Charles Evans Hughes spoke of conciliation between Canada and the United States at the Pan-American Conference in Havana, where he submitted the plan of the International Joint Commission as a model method of maintaining peaceful relations between neighbouring countries. A few days later, the League of Nations security committee at Geneva listened with keen interest to a description of the working of the commission. The Canadian member of the committee Dr. W. A. Riddell, told how this model scheme of conciliation has worked successfully in dealing with over twenty cases in the last seventeen years. He recommended the adoption of simlar permanent boards of conciliation between other nations whose frontiers adjoin.

The editorial continues:

> Dr. Riddell urged that security could be increased more by disarmament than by miltary measures.

[Miss Macphail.]

I want the government to tell us if Dr. Riddell was speaking on their behalf. If so, are not the words which he used in Geneva and the action of the government in straight contradiction? If it is true that security comes through disarmament, then why is it that our military estimates have been increased from eleven million dollars in 1925 to eighteen million dollars this year? An explanation is due the country. The hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) recently addressed the Ottawa branch of the League of Nations Association and gave expression of his views. He said:

> The only way of securing peace is by what is usually called moral disarmament, and that moral disarmament can be obtained only when a strong public opinon, the opinion in the shops, in the factories, on the farms, in the universities, in the schools, when opinion everywhere is deeply and intimately convinced that war is a calamity and the worst of all calamities.

These are noble words, and I feel that the hon. minister believes in their truth. So I am going to suggest to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that for the good of Canada and the good of the world he request the Minister of Justice and the Minister of National Defence to exchange portfolios. I anticipate the Prime Minister will say that he does not want to form a new department. Personally I am quite willing to accept a department of defence through security and goodwill, with the hon. Minister of Justice at its head, if he is allowed to do what he wants to do. In looking over the personnel of the cabinet I have often been puzzled to discover who are the military members. Who are they? They all look so peaceable that I am amazed at what is happening. It is quite clear that some of the ministers are pushing things from the military side. There is no excuse—if there is, I shall be glad to hear it—for the increase in our military estimates, and for the aggressive development of war psychology in the Dominion.

I do not wish dogmatically to lay down what a department of peace might do, but I hope I shall not tire the house too much by offering a few suggestions as to the work of such a department. I would have suggested by resolution a peace bureau either in the Department of External Affairs or the Department of Secretary of State, but I did not wish it to be shoved off into a corner while a department to bring security through military measures was given a better place. Already we have a full-fledged department of war, although I notice that in the debate on the motion of the hon. member for Wetaski-win (Mr. Irvine) the Minister of National Defence said that his department is not preparing for war, but for peace; that really he is a minister of peace. I am glad to hear it, but in the face of the activities of his department I regret to say there is nothing on which I can rest my belief, much as I should like to accept his declaration.

A department of peace should be twofold in character. First, it should have general supervision of an extensive program for peace throughout Canada. Secondly, it should cultivate friendly relations with other countries by promoting our knowledge of other people with regard to their cultural, moral and social achievements. This would be very interesting to Canadians, and we have very much to learn along this line. Then, too, it should encourage the work of international institutions, including the League of Nations, and make known their work to our people, so that we would be made acquainted with all the machinery that has been set up in any part of the world for finding new methods of settling international difficulties. I think that such a department should also study the causes of war, and by frank discussion present evidence revealing the wastefulness and ineffectiveness of war. It might also make clear to our people some of our own mannerisms that offend the sensibilities of other nations. I do think we have a British superiority complex which must be very offensive to other nations, and cannot be making any contribution to the harmony of the world. This department would quite naturally work in cooperation with all agencies that wanted the data and other material which it would collect. It would develop the will to peace through education by working with peace societies, schools, churches, labour associations, women's, farmers' and social clubs, and any other Canadian agencies whose efforts in the direction of peace could be made more effective by such co-operation. The department could also prepare a list of speakers, who, while not employed by the government, could, through the department, be made available for addressing public meetings—speakers who were authorities on some one phase of this great question. Our government departments issue booklets, pamphlets, posters and films, and there seems to be no good reason why a department of peace could not use the same means to make known to the Canadian people the truths regarding peace and war.

And how little money it would cost the government to make a gift of books for the promotion of peace. These books could be issued to our public and school libraries. We have Rhodes scholarships in this country. We might establish peace scholarships on a somewhat similar plan, allotting a scholarship to each province. The Rhodes scholarships I think are confined to young men, but I would want these peace scholarships available to young women as well. The winners of these scholarships would go abroad each year to study along lines which would make them better world citizens and at the same time better citizens of Canada.

It has occurred to me—I do not claim any originality for the idea—that we might very well establish a yearly peace award for the best work done in the cause of peace. This award I suggest should be given by the government and might be confined to Canadians or be made open to the citizens of any country. The award would not be confined necessarily to the greatest contribution scholastically to the peace of the world, but to the best work to this end along any line.

We have a military college where young men are prepared to be warriors. Why not establish a college to train young men in promoting peaceful understandings throughout the world? This would be far better work and those engaged in it would become much better citizens, with all respect to the graduates from the military college. Then instead of making grants for the training of cadets in summer camps—and but for these grants the cadet movement would not continue for another five years—the government might use the money to much better purpose for the establishment of summer schools to promote the study of international friendship. I imagine a great many Canadians would be glad to get together for a few weeks to secure a better understanding than they possess today of the problems of the world. In fact I should think that the work of this department would be very interesting; it would be unlimited, adventurous and wholly positive rather than destructive as is military training at the present time. Such a department would call to the highest in us; it would call out our mental and spiritual attributes, challenging them, rather than the physical, which is on the lowest possible plane.

My words this afternoon may seem quite futile; all words on this subject may seem futile. But what are disarmament conferences, even conferences of the League of Nations, conferences to promote good will, unless they are backed by a conviction on the part of the peoples of the world, the common people, the rank and file of the nations? It is my opinion—it may or may not be right—that the common people of Canada, certainly the farmers, and I believe the common people generally, are exceedingly concerned that the government, and we working together with the government, shall strive to find some new way of settling international disputes. The common people are sick of war; they are tired of the glorification of it. The swank that goes with it to-day does not carry much force in the country. In international politics, as in everything else, the misfortune is that our aim is too low. The real crime after all is low aim, and by aiming high the government or any international body will call out the latent idealism of the common people. And after all the latent idealism of the common people is the greatest force for peace in the world to-day.

In closing I would ask the government not to consider the matter lightly, because it is not a trivial subject; it includes within itself all others and is the most important subject facing mankind to-day. If we do not find some new way there is nothing surer than that, if we keep on for another twenty-five years as we have been going since 1918, we shall have another war whether we like it or not. Nothing can prevent it if we keep preparing for war.

Mr. T. W. BIRD (Nelson): I have very much pleasure in supporting the motion. Sometimes when we try to appraise the fruits of the great war our hearts ache at the seeming dearth of results, but I think we shall all agree that one fruit of the war of a moral nature was of extreme value to us, and that was the reaction in the minds of people everywhere against the very idea of war. That, to me, is the most solid result of the war, but apart from that I cannot see anything except results which are almost too pathetic to mention. That, however, was a solid gain—the reaction of civilization against the very conception of war. But that reaction was of a diffuse character, existing in the minds of people as a fleeting sentiment, tending as the years have gone by to evaporate. With succeeding years, as I apprehend, it will tend to disperse more speedily until the only substantial fruit of war will have vanished. I think it is the duty of every civilized people somehow before it is too late to crystallize that widespread sentiment against war into something that will make it effective. This is the duty we owe to our brave men who to-day sleep beneath a foreign sod. There is nothing on earth we can do for them but that—to bring this idea to a focus.

We all agree that the spectral evil of war is largely psychological in character. As Emerson once said, it is a thought that has created these armaments and it is a thought that will disperse them. But how is this thought to emerge which is going to displace the devilish thought that created war? There is no other way of creating that thought except by the organized effort of a nation's intelligence, and it is our duty, especially as legislators, to see that that superseding thought shall make itself felt. It cannot be done by spasmodic effort; it cannot be done by the efforts of individuals; it cannot be done by the churches alone. They are all doing their best. The only effective effort can be made by a nation in its organized capacity, by parliament.

There are very many practical ways in which a government bureau of some kind could bring the nation's sentiment with respect to war to bear effectively upon world peace. In the first place such a bureau might very well undertake to purge the sources of our information in regard to international matters. The press of the world has many very outstanding qualities which we all admire, but as a medium of international information it has ceased to claim the trust of intelligent people. The necessities of war are responsible very largely for this psychology on the part of the people and the feeling that they can no longer trust the ordinary channels of international information. One thing we all regret is the fact that the various agencies by which international information was conveyed to us during the war received an almost fatal moral twist. The supposed necessities of war impelled the authorities to use the press not to enlighten but to drug the people. I remember two or three years ago going through the archives of Canada and seeing under a glass cover a medal representing the sinking of the Lusitania. I was given to understand that this medal had been actually struck by the German people during the war to commemorate that atrocity. Some time afterwards, however, travelling on the train, I fell into conversation with a gentleman who at one time had occupied a prominent position in the government of Canada and he informed me that the medal had been struck for propaganda purposes. Whether or not that is true we know that during the war the intelligence of the people was drugged by very similar methods, so the privately owned press no longer has the confidence of intelligent people with respect to international matters. It seems to me that a government organization could fulfil a very useful purpose in cleansing the channels of information with respect to international affairs. As we all know, an increasing interest is being taken in the possibilities of the radio, and I am sure the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself is not slow in sensing the great possibilities of that method of dispensing information. Here, right to our hands, is a means almost providential whereby the government, through a proper organization, could keep the people from one end of Canada to the other accurately informed upon current international affairs. Thus there would be gradually created a thought which would ultimately displace the diabolic thought which will otherwise very soon lead to another world catastrophe.

Another means of activity which might very well be made use of is education. While that is not especially a function of this government, through various means of co-operation I think such a bureau could be made useful in working with the provincial educational authorities to expurgate our school books of those elements which build up in our children a phychology with regard to war which in all ages has proved to be as tinder waiting for the opportune spark. One of the things which has been and is being wrongly taught in our schools is the subject of history, and I think we can all remember to our regret the twist which our minds received during the elementary period of our education with regard to important facts in history. Personally, I was always taught that France was the traditional enemy of England, and that every school child in England had that fact drilled into his consciousness. I was also taught that Germany was the traditional friend of England, and that teaching remained in the British school books until 1914. With respect to almost everything of an international character, our children have received the wrong slant; history has been taught inaccurately, perhaps not with respect to the facts but certainly with respect to the emphasis. Wrong emphases have been placed, and the expected result has been achieved. I was reading the other day about that famous incident in history when King Charles I lost his head in 1649. That fact has entered into our school books and our system of education to an extent of which it was not worthy. On the other hand, just four years earlier an Englishman introduced into English agriculture that very humble vegetable the swede turnip, but do you think English school children ever heard anything about the introduction of the swede turnip? They heard about the head of Charles I but the turnip was worth a great deal more than the head of that king, because the head of King Charles I brought nothing but trouble to English politics, while we are told that the swede turnip in succeeding years was the means of helping England win the battles of Waterloo and Trafalgar. I just mention that to illustrate the manner in which history has been twisted for purely chauvinistic purposes, and I think a bureau of this kind could very well start to work in co-operation with our provinces to correct some of these false ideas. I wish I had time to enter into that phase of the question a little more fully because I believe it lies at the very roots of the menace of war.

Let me refer very briefly to another job which faces parliament, and to deal with which parliament should have a proper agent. I have already referred to this false patriotism which has grown up in Canadian hearts and which, to our sorrow, very frequently finds its characteristic expression. Viscount Cecil recently said that the prime causes of war were, first, a traditional officialism, and secondly, chauvinism, or a false and narrow patriotism. Chauvinism is not confined to any one class; it is something of which we are all guilty in a greater or less degree and it is something of which our hearts and minds must be purged before the world can be made safe against the menace of war. I sometimes think of the way in which we make use of our national anthem, that hymn which means so much to the British people; I think sometimes we carry things a little too far through our habit of using that hymn upon many occasions and for many purposes in connection with which its use was never intended. I am also afraid that our national flag is many times used in a manner unworthy of its glorious symbolism. That flag should not be the symbol of anything narrow, anything national in the chauvinistic sense. What is the flag of which we are so proud? That flag represents a Roman gibbet thrice superimposed upon a square of coloured bunting. We all know what took place on that Roman gibbet; we all know of the scene that was enacted there, and we have no right to make that the symbol of a narrow nationalism, because it was the symbol of a universalism, the spirit which is against war and for human co-operation. I see no hope for the future of civilization if we allow our patriotism to become narrow. We have a great many Canadian poets still living, and there is a great opportunity for some of them to write something for Canada, perhaps not to supersede the hymns we already have, but to represent the spirit of Canada as that spirit has been maintained since the great war; something to represent the broad outlook of the average Canadian with regard to world affairs. As it is, I should rather have a single line of one of the lyrics of Lampman, Campbell, Scott, or any of our Canadian poets, than a lot of the doggerel that passes as patriotic song. After all, I want my children to get something of the spirit that some of our own poets have put into their simple lines that speak of the Canadian spirit as it has grown up amongst the beautiful objects of Canadian scenery. There is a great scope in Canada for building up the type of patriotism that will be an example to the wide world. We have all the conditions, both material and moral, which will make for a new type of feeling with respect to our country.

Such a bureau, if I may so term it, would have the effect of declaring what Canada's moral attitude is on the question of peace. Simply because here and there you have sentiments eloquently expressed does not mean to say that we as a people have taken a moral stand on the question. We heard a lot before the war about the will to power, an attitude that had got beyond mere sentiment and ideas and had embodied itself into a national attitude. It is fully time that we Canadians should cease to talk sentimentally about peace, or even go further to expound our ideals about peace, and that we should assume once and for all a moral attitude on the question—that we should have the will to peace. And how can we do it unless we organize the wealth of intelligence we have at our command?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): Mr. Speaker, I wish to support this resolution because I believe the time has come for Canada and the empire to find means of preserving peace by outlawing war in place of the old method of being prepared for war as a means of national safety. The time is now ripe for the outlawry of war and violence, and this nation cannot spend a few thousand dollars any better than in fostering the idea of peace by educational methods and propaganda that will in the end reach the hearts and minds of the common people to the extent that governments will have to change their minds in regard to preparation as a means of national security. War again, if carried on by any nation which has no scruples about winning by any means whatsoever, will be more likely to win in the future by the slaughter of the innocents than by contests between trained armies. This fact alone should, I think, make it imperative to educate the electors of all countries rather than attempt to bring about the outlawry of war by governments who are more than likely to represent the big interests, the money lenders and others interested in big business.

The fact is that war has been robbed of its glory by mechanization. The glamour of battle no longer exists. War is nothing more now than butchery on a wholesale scale, and the common people, women and children as well as men, are the sufferers. For this reason it ought to be considered the logical thing to do to outlaw the whole business of war. The flame of war is fed by national budgets and it is time that Canada worked to douche that flame and lead in the cause of peace through education. Our estimates to-day are illogical in face of the position that we have taken on the League of Nations, and I hope that we shall consider this. The position is so illogical as to be untenable. What we want to do now is to remove as far as possible all machinery that makes for war and create instead an institution to foster peace. I believe Canada is in just such a position that any move on her part in this direction will have an effect on other nations, and, being a part of the British Empire, we may well by this means set an example that will be a precedent to other nations and will help to move forward the cause of international co-operation.

According to the Free Press of Winnipeg of September 7 last, an associated press cable from Geneva states that a concerted attempt to revise the Geneva protocol stands forth as a possibility in the League of Nations. Van Brooklands of the Netherlands actually introduced a resolution calling for a revival of the principles of that protocol, with the serious discussion thereof, to the end that an attempt be made to outlaw war. Canada has nothing to fear in moving in this way. Our civilization has reached a point of advance by which we may measure the degree of its peril when its survival depends on the willingness of the great masses of the citizens of all nations to stand loyally together as comrades in this great venture. I look upon the League of Nations to-day as the symbol of that great outstanding fact. Co-operation has become a world-wide necessity of the present age. The downfall of civilization is the alternative to co-operation, according to the opinion to-day of many great men writing in the greatest journals and magazines. H. G. Wells says that it is a race between co-operation and ruin. The progress of civilization does not consist, as some would have us believe, in a gradual advance to a point of safety. It consists rather in a growing perception of the common risk, and a growing willingness on the part of the common people in all countries to face this together. Co-operative effort of the nations is needed and it calls for leadership and valour to initiate and take part in a movement such as this resolution calls for. I am glad to see that the common sense of the people of Great Britain and the United States has prevailed on both governments to cut down on their war expenditures for this year.

Civilization has advanced scientifically, we must admit, and it has advanced behind the shelter of big guns, but we are face to face now with the time when big guns will not avail to protect civilization. We have to face the fact that the advance of our civilization will be along lines of co-operation, or, to give it a clearer definition, a sympathetic feeling for the rights of all others through co-operation. The advance of civilization and the safety of mankind lie in the unity of that great resolve to co-operate, and it is time now that we in Canada went forward in the cause of peace and education. No other nation on earth to-day is so advantageously situated to establish a system of education that will wean the viewpoint of the common people away from preparedness through great armaments and great guns to a system of education and co-operation.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I want to occupy the attention of the house for only a very few minutes, and it is because the mover of the resolution (Miss Macphail) in her address has felt it necessary to discuss along with this resolution the matter of national defence. I thank the hon. member very sincerely for the suggestion she has made as to the exchange of portfolios, but apparently I am not, according to the evening newspapers, likely to achieve such an exchange; so in view of the fact that I am still in the position to which I have been called by His Excellency, I want to say just a word or two with regard to the general subject matter, and more particularly as it concerns my department.

The hon. member opened by stating that there were three different classes in the world, and three different opinions held, with regard to the matter of national security. One was the class which regarded armament as being the only method of achieving national security; another was the class which looked altogether towards peace and disarmament as the only method of attaining that end, and the third class was made up of those who were irresolute between those two opinions. She did, I think, leave out what I consider to be a very important class, the one to which I myself belong, and that is the class which believes in both those methods as a means of achieving national security, namely, that we must seek to maintain our national position by taking all reasonable means to preserve our security against attack by force, and at the same time work along the lines which she and others have suggested to bring about the situation where defence forces will not be needed. I believe that two-fold view is the position taken my many countries of the world to-day. I believe that it is the position of Canada. I believe that is the position of many men and women who, from the bottom of their hearts—just as deeply as my hon. friend does—feel that war is anything but a glorious thing, that war is the last resort, that war is one thing we want to get rid of just as quickly as possible. But while they are striving in every way possible to get rid of war, they realize that we live in a practical world, a world where we must take reasonable steps to maintain national security even while we seek to attain our ideals of international peace. The effect of our ministers preaching the gospel in the city of Ottawa Sunday after Sunday is not I think effaced by the fact that we have to maintain a police force which protects those ministers, and once in a while might have to protect the church as well. That is the attitude I take with regard to these matters, and it has been and will be my endeavour, so long as I occupy the portfolio of defence, to stress the second phase of the work of preserving national security just as much as the first, and to contribute in any way I possibly can to a removal of the causes of war. But when we remember that as far back as the sixteenth century there was a scheme for the confederation of Europe which was to do away with war; when we remember the holy alliance entered into in the early part of the nineteenth century, the conferences of Berlin and Vienna, and the Hague conferences—a great forward step in the peace of nations—and that war nevertheless came, it seems to me we still have to maintain national security by way of defence forces to a moderate degree. Perhaps the most concentrated and sustained effort ever made in the history of the world has been made in the last ten years in an endeavour to do away with this monster, war, and I do believe that the nations to-day have their attention focused on that objective more than ever before; but at the same time defence forces have to be maintained until that object is achieved.

I want to allude just for a moment to the reference of my hon. friend who moved this resolution to the matter of an increase in the defence estimates. I know I shall have an opportunity later, when the house goes into committee to discuss this matter more fully, but I want to remind the house now that the defence estimates as laid on the table to-day, covering the militia and naval services, amount to less than one million dollars more than estimates for these same services in 1913-14 and in 1914-15. I want to remind the house also of this, that the dollar in 1913-14 purchased and provided a good deal more in the way of clothing and equipment and supplies than the dollar does to-day. In 1913-14 there were trained at camp and at headquarters over 60,000 men, while the estimates this year provide for the training of something like 33,000 men. In 1913-14 we provided, I think, for sixteen days training in a number of the services; to-day we are providing for twelve days training. So I can assure my hon. friends that more is not being done than seems to be absolutely necessary if we are to maintain even a modest and efficient defence force.

My hon. frined the mover of the resolution deplored the fact that sufficient attention was not being paid in this country to the promotion of peace. I thoroughly agree that the education of the people of this country, of the everyday people like those of us who are here, is most desirable. Everything possible should be done to bring to the knowledge of the citizens of this country what is sought to be accomplished in connection with the league of nations; in connection with the Washington conference, which was continued in Europe last summer; in connection with the preparatory commission which is now considering the matter of disarmament; in connection with the Locarno pact; in connection with the Geneva protocol, which was mentioned by my hon. friend a few moments ago—it is eminently desirable that all these things be brought to the attention of our people.

One reference made by the mover of the resolution is of interest particularly to members of this house and to citizens of this country generally. She deplored the fact that in the peace tower which surmounts this building we have nothing but things which glorify war. I feel sure that my hon. friend has visited that tower, and I hope that all hon. members have seen it. If they have not, I feel they owe it to themselves, as well as to the memory of those who are commemorated there, to see it. I want to say to you, Mr. Speaker, that I do not think there can be found in this country or elsewhere anything which has less of the glorification of war than the interior of that chamber. As one enters it, one is struck by the beauty but also by the solemnity and the sadness of the place. Facing you as you go in is the altar stone presented by the people of England, on which will rest nothing to glorify war, but a book in which will be inscribed the names of some sixty-four thousand citizens of Canada who gave their lives, and over that altar will be burning perpetually a light in their remembrance. On the wall you will see panels depicting different scenes. in the war. Very little to glorify war will be found there. One picture I remember represents Ypres, the ruins of the Cloth Hall in the foreground, with the personnel trekking their way to the front line—no glory, nothing but weariness, nothing but stress and strain. The next scene is one of trench life, and hon. members of this house know enough of that or have heard sufficiently vivid descriptions of it to make it unnecessary for me to dwell on it. Next is a village from which are coming refugees, and through which is passing a Highland battalion on its way up to duty in the front line. Next a working party engaged in the dismal task of digging trenches; next Sanctuary Wood, of sacred memory to Canada, with St. Eloi craters and ruined houses; next, the basilica of Albert with the leaning statue of the virgin; next the tower of Mount St. Eloi partly destroyed; next Passchendaele, with its mud and misery; next a picture of the medical corps at work with ambulances and stretcher cases, and at last a representation of ships returning to Canada leaving behind them a field of crosses watched over by a soldier resting on his arms reversed. Nothing very much suggestive of the glories of war, but something which my hon. friend might well use in any address she makes to point to the horrors of war, and to strengthen the desire and prove the necessity of getting rid of it as quickly as possible. True, one of the windows represents the call to arms; but another represents the assembly of remembrance; the third represents the thing for which my hon. friend is looking,—the dawn of peace. I say that that memorial tower has more in it perhaps than many sermons and many addresses that might be delivered at peace conferences to influence people to find as quickly as possible a method to achieve the result which not only my hon. friends who spoke a few minutes ago seek, but which we all seek. And then, as if to express the very antithesis of glorification of war, I find under a window this moving inscription from Kipling:

Nor was their agony brief, or once only imposed on them. The wounded, the war-spent, the sick received no exemption; Being cured, they returned and endured and achieved our redemption.

The sentiment of the resolution and the spirit back of it appeals, I think, to us all. The only question is how best the object can be attained. Towards that object not only our friends who have just spoken, not only this country, but practically all the countries of the world are working, and it is the duty of those of us in Canada to give the heartiest support we can in furthering that work, in doing our best to spread abroad among the nations our desire for peace, our desire that international questions may be settled by reason and not by force, and to educate our boys and girls and our citizens generally to look towards the day when arbitration, conciliation and co-operation will be accepted as the recognized means of maintaining national security.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, my main reason for taking part in this debate is that unfortunately, and I know unfairly, some of our friends in the house have a tendency to suggest, if not to state expressly, that those of us who realize conditions as they exist in the world to-day, who realize that something in the shape of a national defence force is necessary, and who advocate a certain degree of national defence, are therefore advocates of war and believers in militarism. I think, sir, that suggestion is unfair, because it seems to me that it may be said, in one broad sentence, that every sane man and woman abhors war. Anyone who has seen war at close range must realize something of the horrors of that catastrophe. Long before I ever had that personal experience I did have an abhorrence of war, and even as a child I remember wondering why civilized nations that had long ago outlawed duelling —the idea that men might settle their personal disputes by guns or rapiers—could not in some way outlaw war. To-day there is a strong feeling among the civilized nations of the world that that outlawing of war should take place; but the fact remains that we cannot by ideals rule the world as a whole, that, for example, there are some tens of millions of Russians and hundreds of millions of Chinese who are not as civilized as we are, and of whom we do not know in what direction they may happen to march if they choose to march.

In view of that fact, and of the further fact that throughout the world to-day there are leagues and counter-leagues; that there are countries, such as Poland for instance, who fear they may be attacked by their eastern or western neighbours; that to-day Baltic and Balkan nations are quarrelling more or less among themselves, and that another such incident as the Sarajevo murder might plunge the world into a war in which we might be forced to take part—in view of all these things, I say our sanest course is to preserve something in the shape of a nucleus for national defence. To charge that those who believe in such a course advocate war is just as ridiculous as to assert that because you believe in a police force you therefore advocate murder, arson, robbery, rape and all other crimes that a police force is maintained to prevent.

When we look at the clouds upon the European horizon, when we remember that we did not want war in 1914 but were forced into it by circumstances over which we had no control, I say it is only right that we should have something in the shape of a national defence force. I do not believe in great armaments. I am entirely of the opinion so well expressed by Sir Edward Grey in the story of his life, a life dedicated to the prevention of war in every possible way. He was the most able and most outstanding peace lover in the parliament of Great Britain, a man who for twenty-five years did everything in his power to prevent war, and yet who at last in 1914 realized that England could not keep out of the struggle that was then impending, and so joined those members of the cabinet who believed that Great Britain should uphold the sanctity of treaties and help the world against aggression by Germany. After all that experience Sir Edward Grey does take the attitude that great armaments inevitably lead to war. I entirely agree with him. But no one can charge that Canada is leading the way towards great armaments, for this country, whether under our party or the Liberal party, has simply preserved the nucleus of a defence force. That is a necessity for any self-respecting nation. I think Canada spends on her defence force the lowest amount of probably any country in the world.

Mr. RALSTON: Per capita.

Mr. MANION: That is what I mean. As to the principle behind the resolution, of doing everything we can to bring about "moral disarmament," as expressed by the Minister of Justice, that condition whereby there will not be wars between nations and our sons will not be forced to become cannon fodder, I am behind it wholeheartedly, because if there is anything that is abhorrent to parents it is the thought that their children, instead of growing up into good, quiet, peace-loving men and women, may be killed in a war precipitated by some incident in Europe over which we have no control. Parents hate the mere idea of war more intensely than do their fellow-citzens who are not so fortunate as to have children to educate and cherish. God forbid that there should ever be another war in which Canada will have to take part; I hope such a misfortune will never befall us. At the same time a nation like this must, in my opinion, preserve something of a nucleus of defence around which may be built up, should such an unhappy event ever overtake us, a force adequate for the defence of the country. It is easy to express the hope that we shall never again be obliged to participate in a war; no one cherishes this hope more sincerely than I. But we have not yet reached that utopia in which the nations of the world have absolutely outlawed war. I am entirely in favour of the principle underlying the resolution, but I believe that we can accomplish just as much towards peace by means of the voluntary associations that exist today and by the advocacy of peace on the part of all those engaged in public life, to whatever side of politics they belong.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I am very glad that so far the discussion has maintained a tone of toleration. We are perhaps coming to the point where we may discuss matters of this character without accusing one another of hypocrisy, of lack of patriotism or of having some ulterior motive in view. But I think we should be very clear in our thinking on questions such as this. Undoubtedly we all desire peace; we may begin on that assumption. And I am sure there is no one in favour of this resolution who thinks of accusing the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), or the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion), or anybody else of desiring war. That is not the point at issue. Rather, we are challenging the assumption that the way to secure peace is by force of arms or military defence. That is an arguable point. The hon. member for Fort William points out that the time has come when we no longer permit duelling as a means of settling personal affairs; it has been ruled out. And there is a bill before the house at the present time, presented by the senate, which will make it next to impossible for any of us to keep arms in our homes even though we may have the most pacific intentions. Further, we are certainly not permitted to wear side arms or to carry concealed weapons, nor have we done so for a number of years.

All the arguments that may be brought forward for the retention of armed forces on a national scale used to be brought forward for the retention of personal arms for the sake of personal defence. But we have passed beyond that stage and have recognized that it is not conducive to peace that individuals should be allowed to bear arms. I take it that we are advancing very rapidly to that same position in relation to international affairs. The hon. member for Fort William suggests that all the nations are not as civilized as we are. I am not quite so sure of that. He also urges that we ought to be armed in order to be protected against the Chinese. I ask him, do the Chinese ever invade any other country?

Mr. BROWN: They did in former times.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not aware of it.

Mr. BROWN: What about the Mongolian invasion of Europe?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am fairly familiar with the history of the east and I cannot recall the Chinese ever having invaded other countries; I am not going back to the Mongols, who overran China. I do not think we need prepare to fight the Chinese. The hon. member suggested also that we should be prepared against an attack from the Russians. Now it is only within the last few weeks that the Russians have made proposals for a general disarmament; and what have we said? We have said, to use the English phrase, "You are talking with your tongue in your cheek, because you have not given up your arms." Surely what we say to the Russians may be applied equally to ourselves: we cannot very well talk general disarmament until we are prepared also to disarm.

I confess that the motion of the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) may seem rather idealistic, and perhaps that is the worst charge that can be brought against it. But on the other hand it may equally be said, it seems to me, that the attempt to secure peace by force of arms is a policy of stupidity. It has been tried century after century, it has cost countless millions of lives and countless treasure, and it has been proved absolutely futile. It has absolutely failed as a method of achieving peace. Surely we all recognize that fact. Then why not try something else? It has sometimes been said that it is necessary to keep an army to put down the rising flames of discontent and to bring order out of international chaos. Well, if one fire extinguisher has failed repeatedly to work, why should we forever rely upon it? If it has failed again and again in times of crisis, why not try some other kind of fire extinguisher? It could not be worse than the last.

I am happy to associate myself with the member for Southeast Grey in the advocacy of her resolution even though it may appear somewhat idealistic. Suppose we heard that Germany or France or Japan were proposing to take action along this line: I am sure we should all consider it laudable. But if we heard that some Russian or German militarists in Europe frowned upon such a resolution, our comment would be—that shows the power of militarism in those countries. Why can we not have imagination enough to understand that our action will be construed in much the same way and that the moral effect of action along the lines suggested by the resolution will far outreach any small material expenditure that may be involved? I suppose the government, like all governments, want to be assured that they are acting in harmony with public opinion. I think I can say that large sections of public opinion, in this matter at any rate, are far in advance of governmental action. I do not for a moment suggest that the mere organization of a department of peace will prevent war; I should not like to be so understood. Fundamentally, wars in these modern days arise from economic conflicts, and the best intentions of the best departments we may set up will not in themselves prevent future wars. We shall have to make fundamental economic changes before we can obviate war. But there is not the slightest doubt that the ignorance, suspicion and fear to which the hon. member for Southeast Grey has referred are played upon in the time of crisis. The powerful interests which are able to use the machinery of the great powers are able to play upon national sentiment, on the ignorance of one nation or the other, on the fact that we have opprobrious names for people of nationalities other than our own. Thus war can be readily engineered. It seems to me that if we had some agency of this kind it would go a long way at least to retard the onrush of war.

The Minister of National Defence suggested that there was nothing in the peace tower to glorify war. I do not intend to enter upon a discussion of that point, because I fancy a matter of that kind depends very largely upon one's personal reactions. The minister did quote from some passage, however, in which it was suggested that these fallen soldiers had "achieved our redemption." That is the very point at issue. However heroically our men died at the front I cannot concede that this is true. I am willing to give the soldiers all credit for their heroism, and I will go as far as anyone in trying to see that those who came back get fair play because they were called to take that heroic position. But I absolutely refuse to say that they achieved our redemption or the redemption of the world. On the whole the war was a ghastly failure; it absolutely failed to achieve any of the high objects which were held before us at that time, and I think we should frankly admit that situation. I know very well there are some who are very sensitive with regard to that matter, men and women who have lost their loved ones at the front; they feel like asking, "Well, was their sacrifice in vain?" Personally I do not think any act of heroism is altogether in vain.

Mr. RALSTON: Will my hon. friend permit a question? Does he think the achievement of the covenant of the League of Nations was a failure?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, the achievement of the covenant of the League of Nations was not altogether a failure; I would say that to a very large extent it was a reaction brought about by the horrors of war.

Mr. RALSTON: It grew out of the war, did it not?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would not say so.

Mr. RALSTON: Does my hon. friend know that it is part of the Peace treaty?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes. There were a great many forces in the world developing along that line. Again, of course, this is a matter of judgment, but I cannot help believing that the cause of peace would have made just as rapid progress had it not been set back by the terrible experience of those four years and the years immediately preceding the war.

The Minister of National Defence has introduced the matter of the estimates. It is undoubtedly true that compared with many European countries our expenditure per capita is low, but at the same time I would point out that in relation to the other expenses of Canada the cost is high. I hold in my hand a little pamphlet on Canadian taxation which I received the other day, published by the Citizens' Research Institute. I think the items contained herein are correct. The total expenditure for the Dominion of Canada outside "trading operations" is given as $329,382,561, or a per capita total of $35.08. Now let us see how that amount is distributed.

The debt charges, which are very largely due to the last war, take $14 out of that $35.08; military and naval expenditures, including soldiers' civil re-establishment, pensions and so on, amount to $6.46. For provincial subsidies the amount is $1.33; subsidies and subventions, mail and steamship services, 11 cents; public works, including maintenance, rent of public buildings, lighthouses, ocean and river service and so on, $1.90; railways, canals and highways, with the exception of the deficits on the Canadian National Railways, 44 cents; administration of justice, 71 cents; immigration and colonization, 28 cents; agriculture, fisheries and mines, $1.04; lands and parks 45 cents, or a total for all these latter items of only $6.26.

Mr. RALSTON: Would my hon. friend read the item to which he has referred as the military item.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The military and naval item, as I said, includes soldiers' civil re-establishment, pensions and so on.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not trying to mislead the house in any way.

Mr. RALSTON: I thought my hon. friend referred to the army alone.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am trying in this instance to show the enormous amount spent either directly or indirectly in connection with military expenditures in contrast with the amount spent on other items. That is my purpose.

Now, I think we have gone a little far afield in this discussion. The resolution asks that a department be established for the promotion of peace. Nothing was said, except by way of comparison, by the hon. member for Southeast Grey with regard to our national defence estimates; that has been introduced since. The Minister of National Defence takes the ground that he is quite willing that peace should be promoted. Since he is willing that we should work for the promotion of peace, I ask him if he is willing that we should give for this purpose even one-tenth of what is spent for the army and navy and air force? Is he willing to give for the promotion of peace one-tenth of the $19,000,000 which is being expended specifically for those three forces? I am not entering into the rather academic question whether or not we should maintain a certain armament while we attempt to promote peace, or whether or not it is possible for us to promote peace while retaining an army. Leaving that aside for the moment, since the minister is, I have no doubt sincerely, in favour of peace education, is he willing that we spend one-tenth—yes, this year even the one-hundredth part—of what we are spending now upon the army and naval and air forces on a department to promote peace? Is that an unfair or an extravagant thing to ask? The member for Fort William says: Leave it to voluntary agencies. Would he suggest that the defence of the country be left to voluntary agencies? I do not think so. The Minister of National Defence will agree that if we are to have efficiency we must have things organized; if we are to really do good work we must have resources at our command. If the question of peace is to have its due place in the minds of the people of Canada, and in the world at large, we must be prepared to dignify it by giving it a place side by side with our other governmental activities.

I was glad that the member for Southeast Grey suggested one line of activity that may readily be carried out. I remember three or four years ago having the pleasure of introducing to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice a deputation of university students, who came asking that the government enter into a plan of establishing a certain number of international scholarships. Their idea was along the lines suggested by the member for Southeast Grey, that we might send some of our best men abroad to study affairs in Europe and Asia, students who would learn something of the various peoples and their conditions, and come back and give us the result of their knowledge and experience; and on the other hand that we in Canada should invite people from other nations to send us, some of their brightest young men, to study at our universities, investigate our national affairs, and go back to carry their new viewpoint to other parts of the world. A great many members of this house are very much afraid of Russian communism. I do not intend to enter into that question—I do not happen to be a member of the communist party, nor am I particularly sympathetic with a great many things in their program—but there is at least one thing they are doing that I think is worthy of emulation by other nations. They have established in Russia, I am told, a great university, a sort of international university; to that institution they invite a considerable number of the brightest students from all the countries of Europe, who for two or three years are given free tuition in order that they may understand the Russian system and go back to spread that knowledge throughout the world. Some of the members of this house think that is a dangerous proceeding; I am speaking merely of methods. Can we conceive of any better method than that? Why should we not adopt some such plain of having students come to us from other countries to learn what the spirit of the Anglo-Saxon people is, and to tell our own people something of what they find in other countries, and thus help to allay the prejudices which now exist? I do not think those proposals are extravagant, and I do not concede that they are altogether too idealistic.

I am glad that there has been established an institute of Pacific Relations. I am glad that a few men went over the seas to Honolulu last year, including I believe Sir Arthur Currie, to study the Pacific problem. I think it was a splendid thing to do. I should like to put that movement on a more permanent basis, to enable such conferences to be held much more frequently and the results of them to be much more widely diffused. All this kind of thing could be done if we had some sort of department, or a bureau in one of the existing departments, specifically charged with doing this kind of work; and further, this work placed in charge of a man who is enthusiastic for peace and who has a broad vision of what is possible in the world to-day.

We must try to realize the changes that have taken place in recent years. In the old days each state was largely independent. The attitude was that of keen rivalry, and the only court of appeal was that of war. At that time undoubtedly the policy was preparedness—preparedness along military lines, preparedness along psychological lines—because we regarded all strangers as enemies. Did you ever think, Mr. Speaker, that every stranger is a potential friend or a potential enemy? Which he will be in practice depends very largely on the way we regard him. It is easy enough to look out on the world and see all these nations encircling us as glaring enemies. But it is also possible to look out on the world and realize that other nations are potential friends of ours, and willing to enter into friendly co-operation with us. In the old days peace was simply an armed truce, and the only way we could think of maintaining peace was by defensive alliances. But to-day all that is changed. We have already developed economic interdependence. There is a growing sense of the world's solidarity. In the scientific world we have stepped over international boundaries. Any great medical achievement in one country is rapidly carried to other countries, and we rejoice in it. Culture is becoming international; literary, artistic and religious movements sweep rapidly over international boundaries. But there is a development that has not been so clearly understood, and that is that class and group conflicts are also world-wide in character. To-day the great industrialists and financiers have their interests in different parts of the world, and hardly recognize international boundaries. The great financiers are international in their outlook. In fact, labour man as I am, I would say it is not impossible that the development of international finance may one of these days prove to be the very surest way of effecting some sort of world solidarity. The process is going on; but I ask, are we in our political institutions keeping pace with the economic and scientific developments going on round about us? We still maintain our narrow nationalistic institutions. I do not want to do away with our national culture or anything of the kind, but I ask that our national institutions adapt themselves to the new condition; that instead of being isolated from other nations we remember that the old economic barriers have broken down; that we must co-operate with other nations and in so doing change our methods as well. Instead of relying on being fully armed against other people we should cultivate an understanding and interpretation of different points of view through which alone we shall be able to solve the complicated economic problems that come to us in our larger world relations.

I hope that we shall not be diverted in this discussion by the question whether or not we should sweep away to-day all our national defence. I do not want to discuss that at this time; there will be other oportunities. I should like to concentrate on the motion of the hon. member for Southeast Grey and ask that we proceed now to institute something in the nature of a department of peace.

An hon. MEMBER: Time.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, I believe my time has nearly expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am about to close. I ask that we proceed to institute something in the nature of a department of peace; and I think that the Minister of National Defence, if I may appeal to him, would not be very inconsistent if he would accept my suggested proposal that one one-hundredth part of the expenditure now being made for the army and the naval and the air forces be devoted this year to such a new department. If I might appeal to the Prime Minister, I should like to urge that it would be no mean ambition for Canada that we, situated as we are beside a peaceful neighbour, should set the pace in this matter. We are already occupying an exalted position in the assembly and council of the League of Nations. We are already making our voice heard over there for peace. But let us not use empty phrases. Let us implement what we say at Geneva by endeavouring actually to carry out an educational propaganda at home. We are in a position to take a lead along that line. The very fact that we have so relatively small a military establishment to maintain makes it possible for us to extend along other lines, and there could be no fitter time than the present for doing so. I should like to think that the jubilee of confederation, of which we made so much less than a year ago, might be celebrated in some way that would leave tangible results—results that would mean much to the world at large. Whether or not all are prepared to go the whole way in the matter of national disarmament, at least let us set up such a department as is proposed and thus pay real tribute to the principle that lies behind the resolution.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has made an appeal to me to say a word on behalf of the government and more particularly has emphasized the importance of Canada taking a lead in these matters which tend towards peace and the promotion of international understanding, this might be an opportune time for me to make what few remarks I had thought of making in the course of this debate. May I first of all say that any resolution brought into this house and having as its objective the great purpose of promoting peace and international understanding, is certain of a sympathetic reception at the hands not of one political party but, I believe, of all parties in this chamber? The debate which has thus far taken place would indicate that such is the case, and I think the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) who has introduced the resolution, may feel assured that whatever differences of view there may be as to the particular method which she suggests as the one to be aimed at immediately for the promotion of peace and international understanding, there is no difference of view as to the desirability of the large objective being attained in the most effective manner possible.

We are indebted to her for having emphasized anew the importance of ridding the world, if that is possible, of a war mentality and substituting therefor a peace mentality. But that is not a work that is a matter of days or years; it is perhaps the largest educational effort in which mankind as a whole can be engaged. We cannot emphasize too often the horrors of war, the losses of war, not only the material losses but the losses to nations and to the world in human life, in morals and in all that we hold dearest in civilization. But it is important, when speaking on the subject of war, its futility, awfulness, and hideousness, that we distinguish between those who are responsible for provoking wars and the services of those who seek to defeat their efforts. That distinction is not kept sufficiently in mind. In the course of the debate one might gather from some of the remarks that have been made, that there were in this chamber those who believed that war was something that some were prepared to endorse, something that, in a direct or indirect way, had been endorsed by the nations that took part in the recent war, and that because nothing good, as has been said, comes out of war, that therefore the efforts of those who sought to oppose the forces which were responsible for the war in the first instance were of themselves of no account. If we pause for a moment to consider the situation and to realize the distinction that should be drawn, when we come to speak of war, between those who are responsible for provoking war and those who seek to overthrow and overturn the forces that bring about war, we shall realize that in the recent great international world strife, had the situation not proven to be what it was on the part of those who opposed the forces responsible for war, we would not this evening be spending our time in this house of parliament debating the question at all. I believe as firmly as I am standing here that if the peoples of the British Empire, Belgium, France, Italy, the United States and the other allied and associated countries that participated in the war had not taken the part which they did, had not opposed the enemy as they did oppose him, there would not be in these countries to-day men and women in a position to stand up and become the advocates of the merits of peace. We should all be in the position of nations that had been overcome by a people who held with respect to peace and progress a point of view diametrically opposite to the one which we hold. We must distinguish, in discussing war, between the forces that are responsible for war and those whose aim and purpose it is to prevent those forces from getting control. I remember very well a passage that appears in one of the writings of that celebrated scientist, Pasteur, and which to my mind vividly portrays the situation:

Two contrary laws seem to be wrestling with each other nowadays: the one, a law of blood and of death, ever imagining new means of destruction, and forcing nations to be constantly ready for the battlefield—the other, a law of peace, work and health, ever evolving new means of delivering man from the scourges which beset him. The one seeks violent conquests, the other the relief of humanity. The latter places one human life above any victory; while the former would sacrifice hundreds of thousands of lives to the ambition of one. Which of these two laws shall ultimately prevail God alone knows.

The great scientist who uttered those words expressed a profound truth, namely, that through the whole of human society there run these two contrary forces: those who are striving for the preservation of peace, health and work, and those who are following some law of blood and of death, and who are ever ready to make conquest serve ends which are their own. These laws are in conflict with each other and unless those who are prepared to support the law of peace, health and work, are ready to support it by means that are effective enough to overthrow the force of blood and death, then the latter and not the former will triumph. This truth I think it is essential for us to keep in mind when we discuss the question of war and preparation for war.

May I say to the hon. member for Southeast Grey that the one exception I have to take to her resolution is that I think it takes too limited a view of how the great objective which she has in mind is to be attained, too limited a view of how peace and international understanding may best be promoted. I say that instead of one department of the government being established for that specific purpose, every department of the government should have the promotion of peace and international understanding as its aim. Every department, bar none, should have as its aim the promotion of peace and international understanding, and not only every department of the government, but I would add the government as a whole and parliament as a whole. It is not a business merely for one department of the administration; it is a part of the supreme duty of all. May I say that even in regard to the Department of National Defence, I make no exception; its duty, I maintain, is to help make war impossible. It is not a department of national offence; it is a department of national defence. Defence, not offence, is its object. It is a department that aims not to promote or develop in any way any conception of war, but rather to take such measures that, if the time should ever come when we shall again be compelled to make further sacrifice because of those who hold an opposite view to those of us, who cherish peace ideals, we shall be in a position effectively to maintain and hold our own. May I say with respect to the minister in charge of the administration of the Department of National Defence, that when it became my privilege as well as my duty to advise His Excellency the Governor General as to whom he should call to take control of that department, I advised His Excellency to call the hon. member who now sits for the constituency of Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston). Why? Because I believed that he had a record second to none of gallantry in the defence of his country, and also because I believed that having gone through that great war from its beginning to its close, and having served as he did on the field of battle, there was no man in this country who was likely to be more understanding and more sympathetic with the men who had fought on the battlefield or who would be more anxious to avert another war, and further because I believed that in the administration of the affairs of the Department of National Defence he would see to it that any measures that were taken would be of a character that would be effective for the purpose in view, and would be carried out above all else in a manner that would serve the highest interest of his fellowmen and of this country.

My hon. friend from Southeast Grey pays the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) a compliment and says that she would be content to have him at the head of the Department of National Defence. May I remind her that under the British system of government the cabinet is a unit in all matters of policy, and whether the Minister of Justice sits where he sits to-day as Minister of Justice, or were to sit as the head of the Department of National Defence, the policy of the government would still remain as one, and he along with others would be jointly responsible exactly as he is to-day. As a government we have a collective responsibility for the policy of national defence.

I do not wish to-night to go into the question of the estimates. My colleague the Minister of National Defence has already indicated to the house certain features, but I might repeat in one word what he has said, namely, that if we confine the comparison to the militia and the naval forces, the amount which we are asking parliament to provide this year is the equivalent of what was being asked prior to the period of 1914. Will anyone in this house suggest, having the knowledge we all have of the development of aerial navigation and the possibilities of aerial attack and aerial defence, that it is not wholly essential that this country, in common with all other countries of the world, should develop an air force? Is there anyone who has followed modern scientific development or has attempted to forecast the possible developments that will take place in the agencies of communication and transportation who does not feel that the air force is likely to play a part second to none in the future? I believe that this parliament will say that a country like Canada, with the vast distances which we have here to traverse, and incidentally to defend in case of attack at any time, is justified both for military and civil reasons in paying very special attention to the development of air forces and aerial navigation and that the addition which parliament is being asked to vote in that connection will be voted with good grace.

There is, I believe, an additional amount to pay for the cost of two new torpedo boat destroyers. If these destroyers were to be an addition to the present equipment of the naval forces, I would say that there might be some ground for taking exception to that expenditure, but actually they are in the nature of replacements of two vessels that are practically out of commission, and the alternative of the government, if we were not to drop this service altogether, was either to borrow vessels from the old country, or purchase our own vessels and ourselves own and control what we feel to be essential. I believe the members of this house will feel that Canada will wish to pay for her own vessels, and to control and manage them herself, and be under no obligation to any other government than her own for what she does in that regard. That covers the essential features with regard to any additional outlays from the point of view of national defence.

Now take the other departments of the government, and here again I wish to emphasize to my hon. friend that every department of the government is vitally interested in the promotion of peace and international understanding. Take, for instance, the departments that have to do with the development of our natural resources. How far are these resources likely to be developed in time of war? We have had an opportunity to judge, and we know that every department of government that has been concerned with the economic development of the country suffered during the period of the war, and it is to their interest to try in any way they possibly can to prevent war developing. The Department of Agriculture, the Department of Marine and Fisheries, the Department of the Interior and Mines, the Department of Immigration and Colonization, the Department of Trade and Commerce—all these departments are interested in seeking in an active way wherever they can to promote international understanding, because their relations are more or less of an international character, particularly those which are concerned with the development of our commerce and our trade.

Then there are other departments of the government which in a primary and immediate way have to do with the development of peace. I am still trying to point out to my hon. friend that I am entirely sympathetic with the object she has in view, that I even sympathize with her view that there should be a department of the government to devote attention to these matters, but I contend that one department of the government specially given over to the promotion of peace and international goodwill cannot compare with the broader conception, which is to my mind the essential one, namely that all departments of the government should keep that great objective very much in view.

Miss MACPHAIL: If that is a better way of bringing about permanent peace, if what is everybody's business is the business that is best done, which is not a fact, the logical thing to do would be to disband the Department of National Defence and let all the other departments work together in the interest of national defence.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend has not distinguished sufficiently between all the activities of the nation. The nation is a many-sided concern, and the departments of government simply correspond to the various needs of the nation. The Department of National Defence specializes more particularly, especially in these days, in those activities which have to do with defence on the mechanical side, if you will. The other departments have to do in a constructive way with the promotion of the larger objectives of international understanding in connection with their particular work. I was going to refer especially to two or three of the departments. The Department of Justice, for instance, has to do with the promotion of peace and international understanding. It is a department which lays emphasis on the appeal to reason rather than the appeal to force, and that, after all, is fundamental in matters which have to do with the promotion of peace and good will. The Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment and Health is a department which has to do with the promotion of peace. My hon. friend shakes her head. She will I think agree with me that, in connection with the League of Nations, one of the main objectives is to obtain as far as possible international co-operation on matters of health, and in so doing to promote an international understanding which is conducive to bringing together those elements in the different countries which are aiming at the great objective of maintaining the law of peace, work and health among the nations of the world.

But let me mention another department—the Department of Labour. I submit that that department is essentially interested in promoting peace and international goodwill. I was much impressed by what my hon. friend said this afternoon with respect to the educational aspect of her resolution. She stressed, I think rightly and very eloquently and forcibly, the importance of the right idea being spread abroad. She made mention, very much to the point, of the change that in some particulars had come over history as taught in the schools. She made particular reference to the Rush-Bagot treaty and what it signified. I agree entirely with her that education along the right lines is all-important and very necessary, and it is in this connection that I wish to speak particularly of the work of the Department of Labour.

The one great objective that I believe my hon. friend, in common with others who are seeking an international understanding, wishes to attain is the settlement of international differences by conciliation, by arbitration and by investigation rather than by force. Now, what is the fundamental idea in the legislation which this parliament has enacted and which the Department of Labour seeks to carry out with respect to industrial disputes? The fundamental idea underlying that legislation is that the resort to the strike or the lock-out, which is a form of coercion, is not as effective and is not as much to the interest of the parties immediately concerned or of society as a whole as is the method of conciliation, of arbitration and investigation. As my hon. friend knows, having regard to the total numbers of our population, the record of Canada in the matter of industrial peace is higher than that of any other country in the world.

Mr. HEAPS: If the Prime Minister will permit me, will he agree to that very form of arbitration in regard to international disputes?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am coming to that; my hon. friend is running ahead of me a little. I am trying to point out that the Department of Labour has inculcated in the minds of our people the wisdom of using the method of conciliation, arbitration and investigation, as contrasted with the method of coercion, as the most effective means of bringing about justice in industrial disputes. That is in large part the work of the Department of Labour, and that work has influenced not only the people of this country but the peoples of many countries with respect to matters with which their lives are intimately associated.

Now, may I answer my hon. friend? If the method of industrial conciliation, arbitration and investigation has proved a better method to bring about industrial peace than the method of coercion—the principles being identical, the reasons being the same in all particulars—I say that this same method applied to international relations ought to succeed infinitely better than the method of force and coercion. The fact that in Canada we have demonstrated so effectively the importance of industrial conciliation, arbitration and investigation in bringing about and maintaining industrial peace and industrial justice, gives a reason why, as a country, we should seek to do exactly what my hon. friend said in the course of her remarks we should do namely, lead the other nations forward in the same path. For my part, and speaking as a member of the government, I wish to say in regard to international questions that Canada stands, and has stood, for the promotion of conciliation and arbitration as a means of settling international differences. In my reference to the Department of Labour I hope I have made clear to my hon. friend what I have in mind about the limitation that I see with respect to her resolution, which suggests one department of the government for the purpose of having primarily as its objective the promotion of peace and international good will. I say that every department of the government should have that objective in view, and that we have already gone much further along that line than is generally conceded.

But may I go a step further? There is another department of the government which, I believe, even more than any I have mentioned, has had specifically in view the promotion of peace and international good will, and that is the Department of External Affairs. That is one of the most recently created departments of the government service. The objective of that department in practically all its work is that very thing—the endeavour to maintain and to further as far as possible friendly international relations and in different ways to promote international understanding. My hon. friend in her remarks this afternoon said she thought it all-important that we should seek to develop an international mind. Here again I am in entire accord with her point of view. I think an international mind is obviously the objective we should have in view in dealing with questions that affect not only our own country but other countries as well. If my hon. friend will look at the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs she will see there a list of the number of conferences at which Canada has been represented. All these conferences tend to further the objective she has in view. At each one of them Canada's representation has helped to bring to the fore the Canadian point of view, and to contribute towards that ideal of international understanding which her motion seeks to promote. Before going over the list of the conferences, let me mention one that will come first to the minds of every one present.

This government and this parliament have identified themselves in a very real and immediate way with the League of Nations. Now, the League of Nations stands for the promotion of peace and international understanding. If it does not stand for that it does not stand for anything. Everything we do in connection with the League of Nations we are doing along lines that are promoting the very objective the resolution before the house is intended to promote. For years past Canada has been represented each year at the assembly of the League of Nations; in addition to that a member of the administration of this country has been the president of the league. Canada to-day is represented on the council of the league by a minister of the crown of its government. So I say to my hon. friend, Canada is doing the very thing that she suggests and that my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre suggests should be done by this country, namely, taking the lead in these great matters that make for international understanding. From the part which we have taken in the League of Nations we have certainly set an example to this continent of the desirability of nations sharing in international relations calculated to lead to a better international understanding. Were there a department dealing especially with the promotion of peace and international understanding, the work of the League of Nations would be referred at once to that department. To-day that work is carried on through the Department of External Affairs.

Associated with the League of Nations is the International Labour Conference, another organization which co-operates with the league for the purpose of promoting international understanding on such great questions as standards of working and living conditions and of organization in various branches of national life which tend to place the nations more upon an equal footing and to remove those differences which, in such large measure, are responsible for international friction and international unrest. We have gone wholeheartedly into the work of the International Labour Office as well as into all branches of the work of the league, and this, I submit, is a sign of the development which has taken place in recent years and which should be emphasized when we are discussing the position Canada is taking on these questions.

Let me now refer to some of the conferences that have been held: the International Economic Conference, the Naval Disarmament Conference, the Imperial Educational Conference, the Conference on Communications and Transit, the International Horticultural Congress, the International Conference on Weights and Measures, the Imperial Agricultural Research Conference, the International Radio-Telegraph Conference and the Congress of the International Statistical Institute. I confess that each time the government is asked to send some member or members of the public service or some other representatives to one or other of these conferences the question arises, are we justified in asking parliament to vote the amount required to meet the expense? And how do we justify our action in coming to parliament for the purpose? We justify it on the very ground on which my hon. friend this afternoon supported her resolution, namely, that it is important that this country, in common with other countries, should make its contribution, with respect to matters wherein it may be able to lend aid or provide information which is likely to be helpful. We have therefore, as opportunity has arisen, consciously and deliberately sought to further this means of creating an international spirit within our own country and of making our contribution to international problems as they have presented themselves.

I might mention another direction in which we have endeavoured to promote peace and international understanding. We have undertaken to establish legations in different countries. Last year, as hon. members know, we opened a legation at Washington. We were opposed to a considerable degree in our endeavour to do this; we were told that we were making a mistake; it seemed to be the impression in some quarters that we were pursuing an unwise course. That fortunately was not the view of the House of Commons as a whole. The legation has been opened and has now been in existence for over a year. The house will agree, I think, that the decision to have a personal representative of this government and country at Washington, with a personal representative of the United States in Ottawa, has gone a long way towards furthering international good will between the two countries. In being about to take a similar step with regard to one of the countries of Europe and another country in the orient, we are but proceeding in an identical direction. We are endeavouring by personal contact to make more intelligible to the citizens of other countries on other continents the point of view of the Dominion of Canada respecting matters of concern to ourselves and to them. In this particular, I submit, the government is furthering the main objective of the resolution now under consideration.

I might go further. I might point to another instance—indeed, it was mentioned by my hon. friend this afternoon—in which this Dominion, in conjunction with the neighbouring republic, has set an example of the means by which peace and international understanding can best be promoted. We have between Canada and the United States an International Joint Commission to which, over a period of twenty years or more, have been referred many questions any one of which was liable to create discord between the two countries. If we omit the first two questions which were referred to that commission and on which there was not a unanimous finding, it may be said, I think truly, that on every question referred for its consideration—and these questions have all presented considerable difficulties—there has been a unanimous agreement on the part of the commissioners, an agreement which has served to prevent anything in the nature of friction developing between this portion of the British Empire and the United States. The work of the International Joint Commission represents, on the part of this continent, a contribution to the civilization of the world of greater significance than the peoples of the world have yet begun to imagine. We, on this continent, have shown conclusively that the processes of investigation, of conciliation and of arbitration can be effective not only as a means of promoting peace, but also as a means of curtailing materially the expenses incidental to any preparation for possible war.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does the Prime Minister really think that the commission would have been as effective if there had been forts along the border or warships on the lakes?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am inclined to think that what has made the whole organization effective is the fundamental idea underlying it, just as is the case with respect to the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. There remains, through strikes and lockouts, in industrial disputes the possible use of force and coercion but the superiority of the principle of conciliation and investigation has clearly demonstrated itself. As a saying of Cicero has it: Oh, great is the power of truth which of itself so easily defends itself. I believe it is the recognition of this principle which has led to the success of the International Joint Commission: the process of investigation has been instrumental in bringing to light the essential facts and information in every case, and the justice of every finding has thereby demonstrated itself.

A great deal more should be made of the work of the International Joint Commission. As the hon. member for Southeast Grey observed this afternoon, greater note should be taken of the significance of the Rush-Bagot agreement. I agree entirely that the men who were wise enough to limit armaments on the great lakes and to prevent competitive arming on the part of this country and the United States have saved this continent vast sums of money and possibly averted a war as a consequence of such competition. I believe that as time goes on, as the example of this continent becomes better known in other parts of the world, forts will be dismantled elsewhere and their places taken by tribunals of arbitration such as we have found so effective here.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Prime Minister realizes, of course, that in our case it was not a matter of dismantling forts and abandoning ships. In order to be perfectly fair, should he not take that fact into account? My question if I may repeat it, was this: Would these two countries have been so successful in arbitration if we had had armaments to fall back upon in the event of arbitration failing?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to evade the question, the importance of which I fully realize. But it is an extremely difficult question to answer. As to what might have occurred had armaments been maintained, no one can say. What I said a moment ago was that, had there been on this continent international competition in arms and armaments, we might have had a war. On the other hand, I am not prepared to say that notwithstanding the armaments, if the idea of international arbitration had presented itself, its superiority to armaments as a means of settling international difficulties would not have been apparent. At all events, we on this continent have an object lesson as to the importance of that method of dealing with international difference.

Here again I might say how heartily I agree with the hon. member for Southeast Grey in stressing the importance of directing attention to all these matters through every possible agency. Her remarks might well be addressed to every educational department of every province in the Dominion. The hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) asked if a department of the kind she had suggested could not co-operate with the provincial governments to have presented in the text books a different view from that which exists to-day. I doubt very much whether the provincial governments would be prepared, in matters pertaining particularly to their educational departments, to listen to suggestions from the federal government. They desire to keep these matters within their own purview, but I would say that every influence that can be exerted and every force that can be brought to bear upon these departments of education should be exerted to see that ideals of peace and international goodwill such as we cherish are set forth as much as possible in the text books used in our schools.

I have pointed out that the resolution of my hon. friend suggests something altogether too limited to gain the great objective she has in view. As I have already said, I think every department of the government should have as a supreme aim in all its activities the furtherance of peace and international goodwill. May I now say to her that assuming the administration were to establish a new department to-morrow with the object she has in mind, there would remain back of that department what is back of the work of every other department of government, namely the purpose of the administration itself. It is not by the name or the organization of a department that anything can be effected with respect to international goodwill or the furtherance of peace; the vital point is the spirit and attitude on the part of the government in administering the affairs of the country generally. As I proceed I intend to say a few words which I hope will be sufficient to illustrate what I mean, but just now I want to make, if I can, that one idea clear, namely that back of all the affairs of administration lies the general point of view of those who are guiding the affairs of the country. If that point of view is a militarist or jingoist point of view, you may have all the departments in creation and call them by whatever names you wish without, so far as the promotion of peace is concerned, effectively working towards the end you have in view. If on the other hand you have an administration actuated by motives of peace and international goodwill, an administration seeking at every turn to further ideals of peace and international understanding with respect to all matters which may develop, whether in the departments or on the floor of parliament, then the name of the particular department which you may have comes to be something wholly secondary in importance.

I should like now to give an illustration. I think my hon. friend was in the house in 1922 and will recall the communication which came to this country with reference to a certain disturbance which had arisen in the near east. This country was advised that the British government had decided to resist the inroads of the Turks upon Europe, and we were asked whether or not Canada was ready to join with the British government in that policy, and also if we intended or were willing to be represented by a contingent. As I have said, that communication came to the country first; it came to the government after the country had been advised of it. That is a phase of the incident to which I need not refer at the moment beyond recalling it to the minds of hon. gentlemen. However, the point of the communication was that the cabinet of Great Britain had decided to take that action and we were asked as a Dominion, along with the other dominions, whether we were ready to send military and naval forces to join in resisting this inroad of the Turks upon Europe, upon Greece I think in particular. What was the position taken by this government at that time? We replied that before committing Canada to any participation in another European war we would wish to summon parliament, have all the facts of the case presented and allow parliament to decide whether or not contingents or naval forces should leave our shores to participate in another war. What was the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite at that time with respect to the position we took? We were met with the charge that we had not responded as we should have responded to the call; we were told that the moment we received that call the answer of the administration should have been "Ready, aye, ready" and that we should have made it plain that we were prepared to send contingents to Europe. It so happens that the facts have since come to light more clearly than they were perceived at the moment the government received the communication. What are the facts as they have come to be known to the world? In brief, they are that the British cabinet as a whole had never considered the communication which was sent to the government of Canada and which was published broadcast in the press at that time. Not only the British cabinet as a whole had not considered that appeal, but leading members of the government and leading public men in England took the position that it was one of the most dangerous appeals that had ever been made by any government in any part of the world. More than that, we were told that but for the action of Canada in taking the position which she did at that time in asking that the facts be first brought out and that the parliament of Canada should have its say before contingents were sent abroad, a second great European conflict might have taken place.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Some hon. gentlemen opposite question that statement; let me give them my authority for what I say. I thought that point had come to be generally conceded, but if hon. gentlemen opposite are in any doubt I will give them the words of one or two British statesmen of whose verdict I think they will approve. I intend to quote two gentlemen, each of whom has been prime minister of Great Britain, each of whom has since passed away, but each of whom though being dead, yet speaks to us through his utterances as recorded. What were the words of the late Andrew Bonar Law, who if I recall correctly was a member of that very administration? I quote from an English newspaper, the Newcastle Journal of November 8, 1922, in which reference is made to a speech by the late Mr. Bonar Law. These are his words in regard to the so-called Chanak incident, and with respect to the communication sent at the time to the dominions:

> Towards the end of September a manifesto suddenly appeared in the newspapers. I read it with amazement. There was no consultation with the dominions, and this extraordinary manifesto was issued with the knowledge of three or four members only of the cabinet.
> To suddenly throw, as a bolt from the blue, this appeal for help when not one of the dominions had the remotest idea that there was any idea of it, and when it was well known that their help could not come in time to be of any assistance in the crisis, was to risk, in my opinion one of the greatest assets of this empire. It was to take a risk with our dominions which no wise man would have taken, and which, I think, was not more foolish than it was wrong.

Then I have here the words of the late Lord Oxford and Asquith. What did he say, as reported in a Canadian Press cable to Canada of October 8, 1922, which appeared in most of our daily papers? This report of his speech at Dumfries on the evening of October 7th, 1922, reads as follows:

> "There is every reason to believe," said Mr. Asquith, "that a week ago to-day this country, single-handed, was on the brink of an unnecessary war."

Then referring to the manifesto he said:

> "All this strident rhetoric, this flag-waving and bugle-blowing, were wholly inexplicable unless the prospect of war, at any rate, was well in sight."
> Mr. Asquith said he could not remember a more illtimed and discreditable incident in the whole of his public life. The effect was what might have been expected: The French and Italians, who were holding the neutral lines with the British, were withdrawn.
> "In our great dominions," said Mr. Asquith, "were statesmen sagacious enough—let us be thankful for it—who before they committed their countries to war, required more information as to what they would be fighting for and as to how and why it had become necessary to fight at all."

May I remind the house that at the time the manifesto was issued, Australia and New Zealand each signified their intention of sending forces to join with the British forces in the event of war, and that Canada alone stood out in seeking information and asking that her parliament be advised before the people of this country were committed to participation in another war. I quote further from the report as follows:

> Referring to the question of the freedom of the straits, Mr. Asquith said the Black sea powers, particularly Russia, had just as much concern therein as Great Britain had. Moreover, the Kemalists themselves declared they were quite willing to accept the principle of the freedom of the straits. He said he saw no reason why they should not mean what they say. "What an issue that would have been to let loose the hazard of the horrors of war," Mr. Asquith exclaimed.
> "Let no one be simple minded enough," said Mr. Asquith, "to suppose that the hostilities would have been confined to Chanak. Such a war would probably have involved the greater part of the Asiatic continent nearest Mesopotamia and Palestine, and possibly Egypt and other countries, with the possibility of an infinite repercussion throughout the Moslem world."

Then may I give to my hon. friends opposite the opinion of one who I think was well informed at the time, but who no one for a moment will say is an advocate of the present administration, much less of myself. I refer to Lieut.-Colonel John Bayne Maclean, of MacLean's Magazine. What did that paper have to say with reference to this matter? Colonel Maclean, the editor, under his own name, in the issue of MacLean's

Magazine of November 15, 1922, published an article headed:

"Did Canada Stop Near East War? Refusal to Take Precipitous Action Saving Factor; Sane Thinking Essential to Peace."

The second paragraph of this article reads:

We were recently asked by cable to answer at once by cable that we were ready to embark on another and greater war.

Some men, not Canadians, who have unusually good sources of world-wide information, whose judgment is generally sound and whose views are held in hgh esteem, are positive that had our Premier succumbed to the Lloyd George-Churchill demands, preceded as they were by propaganda and scheming for Canadian participation, the British Empire would undoubtedly have been at war now with Turkey, Russia and perhaps India, Afghanistan, Persia, and God knows who else or what the end would have been.

That was the opinion at that time of Colonel Maclean, and he had sources of information which I do not hesitate to say from what I have since learned were pretty reliable. The view which he there expressed I have been told in Great Britain on very high authority was not very far from the mark as to what might have followed had Canada not taken the position which she then did.

I wish to say to my hon. friend that if this incident proves anything, it proves above all else that the spirit and the purpose and the attitude of an administration on this great question of peace and international understanding is more important than any of the lesser matters of departmental administration or departmental propaganda. The Chanak incident is only one of a number of incidents which have come up in the course of recent years, and all of which have served to disclose the essential importance of the attitude of an administration.

Take the treaty of Lausanne a year or two later. This government was confronted with a request to ratify the treaty of Lausanne. If we had accepted the view that our opponents took at the time we would have signed a treaty in the negotiation of which we were not represented, which had not been signed by any representatives of Canada authorized by this government or parliament, and we would have now been committed to the obligations growing out of that treaty. We took the position that not having been asked to participate in the negotiation of that treaty and not having been represented, neither should we be asked to sign the treaty nor this parliament be asked to approve of it, which would be essential for its ratification.

Let me go a step further. This administration in 1926 having these matters in mind, brought into this house a resolution to the effect that with respect to all treaties in the future, especially those that involved military or economic sanctions, no government of Canada should have the power to commit this country without first bringing the treaties to parliament and having them approved there. I say to my hon. friend that these larger policies are the all-important essential factors in seeking the promotion of peace and international good will.

Let me read the last paragraph of a resolution which I introduced into this house on June 21, 1926 and which was subsequently passed. It refers to a resolution of the imperial conference of 1923:

This house approves of the procedure proposed for the negotiation, signature and ratification of treaties and conventions, and considers further that before His Majesty's Canadian ministers advise ratification of a treaty or convention affecting Canada, or signify acceptance of any treaty, convention or agreement involving military or economic sanctions, the approval of the parliament of Canada should be secured.

In other words, our method of promoting peace and international understanding with respect to these very large affairs which come before the nation in its international dealings, is to lay down the doctrine that before this country shall be committed to obligations under a treaty involving military or economic sanctions, that treaty shall first of all be submitted to and approved by this parliament. These are policies that transcend the work of government departments; they reach down to the work of parliament itself.

I may say to my hon. friend that within the last few months the government was asked, with respect to a treaty that was being negotiated between Great Britain and Egypt, whether we would become a party to that treaty. The terms of that treaty are known, they have been published. They involved military sanctions, and they contemplated military alliances. What was the reply of the government to that question? It was that we did not believe that so far as Canada was concerned the parliament of Canada would approve such a course; that if Britain and Egypt could work out a treaty as between themselves along the lines proposed, well and good; but that so far as Canada was concerned, we did not feel that it was in the interests of the British Empire itself or in the interests of the larger peace which it was hoped the treaty would serve, that this country should be asked to become a party to it; and the British government immediately accepted our view in reference thereto.

I say to my hon. friend that questions of international relations have to be considered more and more as they arise, and depend for their solution, whether from the point of view of peace or from the point of view of war, largely on the view of the administration in office.

May I say this as a last word to my hon. friend: it is because great policies of the kind can be worked out only by administrations that in matters of this nature are strong enough to hold their own, that I appeal so strongly to her and to those about her to see the wisdom of and at all times to realize the importance of having men and women who feel and think alike on these great questions, economic questions and questions of peace and war, so unite their forces that in matters of this kind they may find themselves in the position where they will have the final word.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, to my great regret, I have missed most of this debate. All that I have heard is a part of the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and the observations of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). With a good deal of the remarks made by the right hon. gentleman I fully agree; but it does not seem to me that he has conclusively answered the object of this motion. As to the inspiration of the policy pursued heretofore by the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues, they are without doubt sincerely peaceful. The right hon. gentleman has a fine record of a peaceful policy ever since he took office, and no doubt what he has gained in the confidence of the people of Canada is largely due to that fact. It is certainly so in the province of Quebec. But the fact that a government has peaceful designs, the fact that an administration has in certain matters of international policy given evidence that it is not prepared to be dragged or to drag the country into war ventures or into dangers of war, does not do away with the position taken by the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail).

The Prime Minister is right when he says —and this is nothing new; it has always been that way—that throughout the world there is a current of thought working for peace and a current of thought working for war. The question is: Are governments, and parliaments, and peoples, to take practical, effective means at this time to help the current of peace, in order to counteract the influence for war when the next danger of war comes? This after all is the position. The Prime Minister says that the hon. member for Southeast Grey has minimized the importance of the question, because she suggests the creation of a certain department to promote peace. He says that all departments of government are interested in preserving peace. But likewise, all departments of government are interested in seeing that the trade of the country is carried on properly. Nevertheless, a department of trade has been created in order to give better assistance to matters of trade and the public interest in trade. The same thing is true in regard to public works, agriculture, labour, and so on. A war department has also been created in the past, and it is still maintained in spite of the peaceful disposition of mind of the government. The Prime Minister thinks there is a strong argument in the fact that the department is called the Department of National Defence. But all the war policies of all countries were prepared under pretence of defence.

The Prime Minister has spoken of the spirit which prevailed prior to the last war. He has vaguely divided the world as between countries bent on war and countries resisting the spirit of war. I think the right hon. gentleman must have known the state of affairs in Europe better than is indicated by his remarks on this point. He should have known —and that was the tragedy of the situation— that in every country in Europe, in Germany as well as France, in Russia as well as Italy, the immense majority of the population, the immense majority of the trading people, the farming people, all people of good will to whatever class they belonged, were opposed to war. But they were led gradually, by the false policies which had been prevalent during the twenty-five years prior to the war, to the conviction, justified or unjustified—I am not passing judgment on that point now—that their country, each of them, was threatened with an attack one of these days, and therefore, that their government was justified in arming the nation to the teeth so as to be prepared to stand the test when war came. It was as true in Germany as in England, in France as in Italy, in Russia as in Austria. But in every one of those countries there were a few people who were bent on war and who worked steadily on two or three factors of war. One of those factors was that sense of fear which Mr. Bertrand Russell so well described during the war as being the main moral cause which brought most of the countries into the whirlpool. The second was economic rivalry between the various nations. It brought some people in England to this view, for example, as I was told by a high-minded Englishman at the beginning of the war: "We are bent on destroying Germany because she is getting better than us at our own game." Then there was the spirit of national hatred and rivalry which was carefully worked on by warmongers, whether they belonged to diplomatic circles, to war organizations or to trade associations. Prejudice was raised in Germany against Russia, in France against Germany, in England against Germany, in Russia against Germany, so that many people of Germany came to have a feeling that they were "encircled" by all the peoples who surrounded them and that their government was justified, nay, was compelled, in taking the first opportunity to strike a blow. I do not say that those suspicions were equally justified. But this was the growing state of mind in Europe, as I could follow it, from time to time, during the fifteen years that preceded the war. I could see the war wave rising steadily in every one of those countries, in England and France as well as in Germany and Italy. It is a falsification of history and popular psychology to pretend that the world was and is divided between nations who want war and nations who want peace. No. There are in every country causes which make for war and causes which make for peace; and it is the highest duty of every government to its own nation and to humanity to take whatever means may be in the hands of political power to strengthen the elements of peace in every country and to minimize the dangers of war. Each country can do that by itself, within itself, and not for its neighbours. We in Canada cannot render either the German, English, Italian or Polish peoples more peaceful than they are; but perhaps we can do something to end here what was done during the war for the purposes of war. Perhaps we can do something to demilitarize or demobilize the minds and souls of the youth of Canada. Perhaps we can accomplish something to develop ideas of peace, to appeal to the highest ideals of humanity as well as to the most selfish interests of any class in this country by demonstrating to them that war is hell, as General Sherman described it, that it is destructive of every moral, social and political principle of order that makes up a nation.

I take the motion presented by the hon. member for Southeast Grey as offering to the government of Canada, responsible as it is for the welfare of the people at large, an opportunity to help those forces of peace to work for the benefit of the future generations of this country. This generation will probably escape the next war, but if we do not take advantage of the present currents of thought in this country, as elsewhere, to strengthen the forces of peace, the next generation will be caught in the turmoil of war, just as the past generation was caught. Was there any sensible man living in the fall, let us say, of 1913 in Canada, who imagined that this country would be drawn into the horrors of war within little more than six months? When both parties and all members of parliament appealed to their electors in the previous election, would any single one of them, no matter to what party he belonged, have dared appeal to the people and tell them that in the next parliament, without coming back to the people for a war mandate, they would squander the money of the people of Canada and shed the blood of the youth of Canada in torrents to wage war in Europe? Where is the man, be he Tory or Grit, French or English, who would have dared appeal to the people of Canada during the elections of 1911 upon a war policy? But thanks to the same kind of propaganda to which the right hon. the Prime Minister has referred in connection with the small incident at Chanak, war causes were so manipulated in this country, as well as in every country in Europe for the few months, not to say years, that preceded the war—for many years in Europe, and for several months in Canada—that when the time came, people did not know the real causes of the war, did not know the real causes of rivalry between the two great coalitions in Europe. They simply believed what they were told, and they gave their blood and their treasure—to what purpose? To help one set of nations in Europe get the better of another set, until the next time when the first set, or some new coalition, might have its chance again. That has been the story of Europe for the last four centuries, and so long as the governments in every country in the world do not devote themselves to the work of salvation which the hon. member for Southeast Grey advocates for Canada, it will be the same story over again. Are we going to preserve the youth of this country from being drawn into the next war as happened to our youth in the last war? Shall we not now take the measures to arouse all the forces of education and enlightenment, and enlist the goodwill of all classes of people, so that when the next time comes, if the government of that day is peacefully disposed, as the Prime Minister is, it will be approved in its refusal to share in the war, or if it is disposed towards war, will be prevented from dragging Canada into the struggle?

The right hon. gentleman has spoken of the work accomplished by his own department. Well and good; but he will permit me, I trust, to tell him that no matter what department of external affairs he may have, no matter what may be the number of the representatives of Canada accredited to governments abroad, history should teach him that wars have been made by diplomats even more than by military men. Heaven knows I am anti-militaristic enough; but you must give the devil his due. I really believe that, some acting from a high sense of honour and others from a lower sense of selfishness, military men in the last century have been less responsible for wars and the horrors of war, in which they were mainly the executioners of politicians and diplomats, than those diplomats and politicians themselves. You may have ministers plenipotentiary accredited to all the countries of the world; but if you have not prepared your foreign policy in advance by the proper education of public opinion in your own country, then, when the next crisis comes, when the next time comes to stampede public opinion and the government of this country into a war, your ministers plenipotentiary will be war agents, just as some of the ambassadors of Russia and France, of Germany and England were in the ten years which preceded the last war.

With regard to the distinction between war preparation and peace preparation, I must confess that I cannot stop at the point where the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre stopped this evening. Of course I understand his position. He wanted to remain within the precincts of the resolution; but if we are really sincere when we say that we are bent on peace, when we proclaim that we do not want to be dragged into wars in the future, we must here and now, as the right-thinking and the practical-acting pacifists are doing in every other country in the world, reverse the old Roman maxim, Si vis pacem, para bellum; and as Christians who believe in the God of peace, we must at last, after two thousand years of affronted Christianity, proclaim: Si vis pacem, para pacem. Governments should devote at least as much energy and as much propaganda to creating a public opinion in favour of peace as they do to winning an election upon this or that point of fiscal policy or upon the building of a particular branch line of railway. If we are really sincere in our proclamations of the love of peace, we must work for peace, we must organize for peace, and we must create the machinery to help the people who are working for peace.

In the matter of education, the right hon. gentleman has said, and quite properly, that the provincial governments would not like the federal government to impose—I do not think he used that word, but that was the effect —upon them a policy of peaceful education. But did this or any other government stop at the idea of helping provincial governments in the matter, for instance, of road building? Did it ever stop at helping the provincial governments in promoting health? Health is essentially a matter relating to the person, a matter of concern to the municipal and provincial organizations; and yet we have carried on and are still carrying on propaganda for the maintenance of health, and we are helping the provincial governments in that regard. Why? Because this government is loaded with a national responsibility for the welfare of all the people of Canada. Well, if it is proper for this government to help provincial governments in keeping the people of the various provinces, who are the people of Canada at large, in good health, why should it be improper for this government to help provincial governments in a propaganda for peace? It is not necessary that schools of peace be established; but if such a department as the hon. member for Southeast Grey suggests were established—not necessarily involving a new portfolio, because I think we are already afflicted with too many of them; I think the Prime Minister and all previous prime ministers have sometimes found the number of portfolios too great, though at certain times they have not enough; and if it were not for the fact that we have so many provinces we could divide the number of our ministers into two and perhaps govern this "huge" country better with six or eight ministers, which would be about the same as they have in the United States with their population of 120,000,000, —why could not the Prime Minister himself, with his peaceful disposition, and with his fine record in the diplomatic world and in inter-imperial relations since 1921, take advantage of the proposal of the hon. member for Southeast Grey and create within his own department a subdepartment for the promotion of peace? That in itself, if advertised to the world, and advertised to the British world first, would have that very effect upon the general tendency of the policies of the various British countries which the Prime Minister's attitude on the Chanak affair had in one single instance. Moreover, magnified as it would necessarily be by the megaphone of the English press, it would reach the League of Nations with a far more potential voice than the simple announcement of the adoption of any policy by our representative there.

Talking of matters of fiscal readjustment, for my part I have lauded, and I repeat my laudation, the attitude taken by Senator Dandurand when, on the proposals prepared by Sir George Paish for the establishment of fiscal peace, he stated that the government of which he is a member was the first and the only one since the war that had worked towards the reduction of fiscal tariffs. Likewise, if the government of Canada could announce at the next meeting of the council of the league that it has established, under the direction of the Prime Minister of Canada, in the very department which has to deal with inter-imperial and external affairs, a special department having for its avowed object, proclaimed by the parliament of Canada, the education of our people in thoughts of peace, of purposes of peace, of policies of peace, it would go a much longer way than the remarks made by the right hon. gentleman that the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Agriculture are all peaceable men devoted to works of peace. Of course, everybody knows that. But this would be a new departure and a striking one. You may say that it would be only advertisement and bluff. But we have to take democracies as they are. In the old days, policies, especially international policies, were made by those few men selected from the classes that produced the diplomats of the old school. In those days any definite policy was transmitted from generation to generation, and it developed more or less scientifically in chancelleries and embassies behind closed doors. Now you have to take democracy as it is. It was pretended during the last war that Canada was called upon to shed the blood of five hundred thousand of her sons in order to save democracy. Now that you have made democracy safer than it was before, or otherwise, are you going to take it into your confidence? Are you going to lend the instrument of government to help the democracies of the world save themselves from the ventures imposed upon them by unscrupulous diplomats, by warmongers and by individuals who for the sake of increasing their dividends are prepared to cover the earth with blood, as was done in the last war? Therefore, either from the point of view of national interests or of our inter-British relations—I will not use the word interimperial, because when we talk about peace, the very words, imperial and imperialism, are hateful, and as a matter of fact are contrary to peace—I say, if in the development of our national spirit, in the development of our inter-British relations and in the development of our new-rising relations with the world, we want to make our mark, how can we do it? Shall it be by our great civilization? No; let us be modest. Shall it be by the development of our artistic work, by the superiority of our literary genius? No; again I say, let us be modest. In this respect we are still at least fifty years behind the country to the south of us and many centuries behind those great seats of civilization in Europe. But in our primary state of development—a young nation scarcely out of the cradle, but full of resolve to itself and to its future generations in its desire to help the cause of humanity at large—we can modestly but firmly demonstrate that in what we are doing we are working for peace.

[Mr. Bourassa.]

The right hon. gentleman has referred to our peaceful relations with the great country to the south of us; and well he did. But I must confess that I am somewhat tired of that theme, for I have heard it so many times in the last fifty years. Why not now make something practical out of it? It has been demonstrated for over a century that a small nation, containing at present no greater population that the cities of New York and Chicago together, could live at peace with its neighbour to the south, the most powerful now of all nations on earth. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has put a very proper question to the Prime Minister. Does the Prime Minister believe that our relations with the United States would be what they are if they had not been absolutely disconnected with any war design or preparation? The question was absolutely accurate, and the answer is obvious. Your International Joint Commission, or any joint body of lawyers or diplomats or engineers, would never have accomplished anything between the two countries if the American government and the American people, with their pride and their democratic spirit of dominance, had thought: Here is a peaceful body, but behind it there is a single fort. The United States have ceased looking upon Canada with a feeling of enmity from the time they first found out that the British government and the British nation, as has been told repeatedly by some of their leading statesmen, would never spend a pound sterling to defend Canada from the United States, and that the people of Canada were courageous enough, as well as modest enough, to take the situation as it was and to deal with their American neighbours in the best manner possible. We have been able to deal fruitfully with the United States since we have demonstrated to the world that we will not and cannot fight against that nation.

Well now, is it not the natural outcome of that long standing lesson, a century old, that we should now tell the world that what we have done in the cause of peace on the North American continent we are prepared to do in maintaining the peace of the world, the pax mundi—first, through our association with other nations that commune with us in the same principles of government, in establishing peace between ourselves, in imposing, if necessary, a peaceful policy upon the warmongers of London, but also in imposing upon ourselves a peaceful policy in our relations with the rest of the world? It is there that I think my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre remained within the mark.

I have thought over these matters for many years; I have discussed them with some of the most enlightened and thoughtful men of Europe and America, and I have come now to this deep-seated conviction,—that the only manner in which Canada can assure its peace, as far as anything human can be assured, is by disarming totally and absolutely as against the world. There is no powerful country on earth that we could resist with such armed forces as we could muster unless we had help from the United States. I have been taken to task very often for having stated this view, but I may well shelter myself under the authority of every foreign secretary of the king of England for a century past. Every time I have been in London during the last twenty-six years I have interrogated some of the men who had upon their shoulders, or who had had in the past, or would have in the future, the responsibility of peace or war for that great nation; and every one of them without exception, Conservative, Liberal or Labour, has always told me: "In regard to the United States there is no change of policy in England; there cannot be; we must rely upon the Monroe doctrine for the preservation of what remains to us of British possessions in America. And far better for you Canadians to realize it."

Secondly, we should take advantage of that situation and proclaim to the world, at Geneva and elsewhere, that when we talk peace we mean peace, when we talk disarmament we are ready to disarm, and when we discuss arbitration we are prepared to arbitrate every time. Let us proclaim to the world that we are determined on every occasion to resort to peaceful arbitration on the principles of justice and equity. It may be contended that this has failed sometimes. Well, it may fail once in a while. But do you suppose that you will secure greater benefits from arbitration and run the risk of war to any less extent by talking peace and at the same time preparing for war, upon however small a scale? Why continue the childish policy of a defence too weak to protect Canada against any conceivable enemy and at the same time just strong enough to inculcate in the national mind, through cadet organizations and through military training, a military spirit which will be ready to assert itself when the next war breaks out?

I respect the views of all sincere men. I respect the views of those who believe that Canada should participate in all wars in which the empire may be engaged. Such people are imperialists rather than Canadians, but I respect their views just the same. I even respect the views, illogical though they are, of those who style themselves as Canadians and hold that Canada should make herself a close partner in all the quarrels and all the ventures of England, just or unjust, as once was said in this house by the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding. As I say, I respect the opinions of all such people. At the same time I am bound to say I rely more upon the policy which enabled Canada to emerge from that half defined state in which she struggled for so many years previous to confederation—the safe policy that shaped the course of this Dominion in matters relating to Canada and Great Britain on the one hand and Canada and the United States on the other, the policy proclaimed by Macdonald and Cartier at the opening of confederation. And what was that policy? It was this: that for all practical purposes Canada was a neutral country. Some people are scandalised when we speak of Canada's neutrality. But this parliament has erected on the grounds on which this house stands a monument to one of the founders of confederation, D'Arcy McGee, whose motto or, to use a modern Americanism, whose slogan when he appealed to the people of Canada hon. gentlemen may remember. He opposed tooth and nail the militia bill presented in 1862 by the Cartier-Macdonald government, who were defeated on the issue. He said, "If we want to help Canada and the British Empire the only way by which we can do so is to proclaim our neutrality to the world and have it understood not only by British governments but by every foreign country as well." The same principle was propounded in Washington, two or three years ago by Mr. Johnson, the leader of the Labour party in Dublin. And it is the policy which eventually will be accepted.

I had the advantage of meeting in London last year some gentlemen who have much to do in influencing public opinion in England, and they are exceedingly anxious to have this idea generally accepted. Without having the impertinence to make the statement publicly, they desire that the dominions should proclaim their wish to stand neutral in every crisis in which their territory is not directly attacked. By this means not only would there be developed in Canada a mentality making for peace, but those who advocate peace in England would be encouraged. It would strengthen the position of men who suffered during the war in the interests of peace, men who were gaoled because they would not worship at the shrine of the war god, but who to-day are among the most revered public servants of the British people. These men stood firmly by their ideal against the passions of war, and if we want to help them in promoting peace, instead of assisting the other element—to which the right hon. the Prime Minister referred in relation to the Chanak affair—let us honestly and loyally proclaim a policy of peaceful neutrality and arbitration in all cases, not drawing that fine distinction of arbitration in cases where the honour of the country is not involved. Of course, the warmongers have always invoked these reservations; it has always been possible to arouse the passions of the people and make them believe that the honour of the nation was at stake, just as in the medieval ages it was possible to arouse the passions of any knight and make him believe that he was bound to fight to redeem his honour and that the tribunals of the land did not exist for noblemen.

I claim that this is the only policy that can serve as a basis for readjustment of our economic problems, for the solution of our population problem. Let us proclaim that policy boldly and create a mechanism which will facilitate the work of those who are interested in the development of this Dominion both east and west, in Ontario, in Quebec, in British Columbia and in Nova Scotia. In the last five years I have met a number of people engaged in such work, and I say, knowingly, that they expect us to create such a mechanism as will serve to concentrate the best efforts of those who are seeking to promote peace. Then we could abolish our immigration policy, and save the millions which are voted every year. Canada would then become a spot on earth to which the eyes of men and women the world over would turn when in search of some place in which to raise a family peacefully. This would be our best immigration advertisement; it would attract from every country in the world people of peaceful disposition and would teach mankind an object lesson worth all the billions we spent in the last war. It would help in settling those problems the solution of which was postponed after the Napoleonic wars—the problems which were at issue during the Thirty Years war, during the Hundred Years war, and indeed ever since Christianity came into the world. The great misfortune of the race has been that so many Christians have been satisfied with individual religion, with a kind of selfish and narrow Christianity, helpful to the individual soul, but fruitless to promote the good of society at large.

Let us institute a bold policy for peace, and Canada's name will rank higher than it does at the present time, with all our pretences to greatness because of our mines which we cannot exploit, of our forests which we sell to the Americans for the reason that there is not sufficient Canadian money to develop these resources. To-day there are grave problems associated with our population question. Great industrial and railway companies are obliged to go to foreign lands and bring in a practically enslaved labour to do work for which Canada has not a sufficient population.

Mr. Speaker, I may have spoken in some heat and I hope that hon. members will pardon me. But this is a subject which is dear to my heart. Time was when I advocated this peace policy mainly for the good of my country. To-day I still think of my country, but also of the four boys I have at home, whom I am prepared to sacrifice at any time for the welfare of Canada, but whom I am not prepared to offer as a sacrifice to be slaughtered in Asia or in Europe to serve the sordid ends of any foreign government or of any organized plutocracy. Therefore, as the father of a family, as a Canadian and as a lover of his country, and of all that is great in British institutions and under the British flag, I support with all my heart the motion of the hon. member for Southeast Grey, which motion could be carried out practically if the government were sincerely desirous of doing for the cause of peace what it does for so many other causes, worthy though they are but certainly not worthier than this.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the brief time remaining I should like to say a few words on the resolution now before the house. I have been in my seat since three o'clock listening to every word uttered on this subject; I listened with a great deal of interest to the mover of the resolution (Miss Macphail), and as she and those who immediately followed her proceeded to unfold their views, I found myself almost entirely in harmony with what they said. With some details, some observations, perhaps I could not exactly agree, but with the spirit which actuated the speech of the hon. member and those who immediately followed her I found myself in comparative harmony. So far as the resolution is concerned I see no great objection to it. Perhaps only one part of it might be called into question, and that is the practical side, the question of the actual establishment of such a department of government. That feature might be discussed, but as to the motive behind the resolution there can be no difference of opinion.

My hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Bourassa) and who in a three-quarters of an hour address made a most impassioned plea, suggested toward the close of his remarks that he had persuaded himself that he alone was standing against an embattled world, including everyone around him, with perhaps one or two exceptions, resisting some attempt to turn Canada into a gory monster looking for war. I think my hon. friend intoxicates himself with the intensity of his feelings. Of course one must admire his eloquence, but frankly, as far as the question of peace is concerned—peace in this house, in this country and in the world as a whole—I think his contribution was not remarkable for its peaceful nature. I ask him and this house most seriously to consider this fact. Twice during his address of three-quarters of an hour—

Mr. BOURASSA: Forty minutes.

Mr. STEVENS: No, three-quarters of an hour. Twice in that length of time he indicated that the last war was preceded by months of careful propaganda as far as Canada was concerned; by years of such work in the case of England, and by many, many years in the case of other European countries. In language which could not be mistaken he indicated that those in control of affairs in England and in Canada were responsible for taking 500,000 of Canada's sons and placing them at the disposal of warring powers in Europe. He added these words, "the warmongers of London." Did the hon. member do even fair justice to the then leaders of the British government, the late Lord Oxford and Asquith, the Prime Minister; to Sir Edward Grey, now Earl Grey, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; to Sir Robert Borden, the leader of the Canadian government, or to the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier? I well recall the session of seven days in August, 1914, when the members of parliament of Canada were called to Ottawa, meeting not in this chamber but in the old chamber on the site of the present building. In his quiet, dignified and cultured manner, and obviously moved to the depths of his heart, Sir Robert Borden presented to the house the facts behind the action taken by his government. I recall the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, that venerable figure, rising in his place on this side of the house. Who will say that either of those two gentlemen were warmongers?

Mr. BOURASSA: Mr. Speaker, I must protest—

Mr. STEVENS: Will my hon. friend allow me to finish? Who will justify the contention that either of those great leaders or the leaders to whom I have referred in England willed the war? No one will say it.

Mr. BOURASSA: I rise to a point of order. No hon. gentleman has the right to put in my mouth statements or sentiments which were not at all in my mind, and to which I did not give expression. I did not make the slightest connection between the word "warmonger" and any of the leaders of any country, including Canada. I said that governments were carried away and stampeded—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. STEVENS: Surely my hon. friend does not wish to make another speech.

Mr. BOURASSA: I wish to prevent any hon. gentleman from falsifying my statements.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not going to occupy my time protesting against that interjection. I simply asked this house to consider carefully whether any man, I care not who he is, is justified in casting aspersions upon the leaders of Great Britain and the leaders of Canada. After all, it is the leaders of the country who lead, and my hon. friend repeatedly said that they were led into this and they were led into that, and that the result of the leading was the sacrifice of 500,000 of Canada's sons.

Mr. BOURASSA: That is right.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. member says that is right. I ask again, is it a contribution to the spirit of peace to pillory these men, the great men of our own country and of Great Britain, men who stand among the greatest in the world? Knowing them as I do and as hon. gentlemen opposite know them, I cannot see how anything can be said but that they were men who willed peace and not war. I shall not follow the remarks of the hon. gentleman further.

I also regret the latter part of the address of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), although with the major portion of his remarks I am heartily in accord. I found myself, as I think others around me found themselves, desirous of according to the right hon. gentleman that meed of credit and praise which a courageous and frank statement deserves. But my right hon. friend spoiled it all by two references in the latter part of his speech, in the first of which he introduced a matter which I think had been better left out of this discussion. Until that time I think we all had been earnestly seeking to find some formula, if I may use the word, through which Canada could express to the world in a sensible and proper way its peaceful desires. Then the Prime Minister introduced, as an illustration of his position, the question of the appointment of Canadian ministers in Tokyo and Paris. That places us at a disadvantage; we are unable to debate that question here, although we intend to debate it later. There are phases of that question which offer room for marked differences of opinion, and I am sorry indeed that it was introduced at all.

I was even more sorry when the Prime Minister raised that controversial question of the Turkish crisis of 1922. He read despatches from British papers, quoting the words of Bonar Law and Lord Asquith, and I think there could have been no other object than to attract to himself in relation to this incident the notice of the world—years later, when we are far removed from the incident and safely past it—and to show that it was he and his decision alone that prevented the outbreak of a new European war. Again that is a subject which might be open to controversy, but I do not wish to enter into a discussion of these subjects to-night.

With the exception of those two references and some of the statements made by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), I find myself very largely in accord with what has been said. However, I wish to say a word or two with regard to some of the suggestions which have been made, particularly looking to the practical side of the question. For instance, a good deal of emphasis has been laid upon the desirability of establishing some method or setting up some machinery for educating the people of Canada. The hon. member for Labelle, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the hon. member for Southeast Grey and others, have laid stress on that point. But I notice that all this emphasizes the fact that public opinion is opposed to war and prone to peace, and would stand by the principles of peace if it were not led astray by its leaders. Now there is no need, to my mind, of educating the people of Canada to peace. We are a peace-loving people to-day. The hon. member for Labelle did give utterance to one very obvious truth, and it was this: What public man could go before the people of Canada and make an appeal on war policy? He would get no support; that is obvious. The people of Canada need no educating in the desirability of peace. And so I would point out that it is not so much the expenditure of public money to educate the people to a sentiment of peace that is required; it is an intelligent direction of our affairs along peaceful lines. The question arises, are we doing that? I rather compliment the Prime Minister upon a large portion of his remarks directed to this end. We have, as a nation, unquestionably directed the general trend of our public administration along peaceful lines. The very fact that for a hundred years we have lived in absolute peace with our neighbours to the south is without doubt one ofthe outstanding illustrations to modern civilization of how two nations can live at peace. Furthermore, to carry on Canada's century-old national trend to deal with international affairs by a process of arbitration is undoubtedly an expression of the genius of the people of this country.

Another suggestion was made that Canada should disarm. I want to call the attention of hon. members to the fact that Canada is not now armed in the sense that a nation is armed. We ought to keep that clearly in our minds. It is obvious to one who gives a moment's thought to it that we have no armament. On neither of our shores have we any batteries of artillery. We have a couple of small ships that serve for little more than coastguard vessels; I doubt if they can effectively carry out that purpose. Our forces are insignificant. But we must also bear in mind that just so long as there are people in the community who will resist the law, any government—it matters not what government it is or what its stripe may be—must have some arm or force or power, call it police force if you like, to enforce its laws. Whether that is done by a police force or with the support of a very moderate militia establishment does not make very much difference, but you must have some support of that character. I will deal in a moment with the theoretical side of the question.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) suggested that we should promote an exchange of students. I direct the attention of the house to the fact that we are carrying on that work now, and carrying it on very effectively. Canada does exchange students with France and with Great Britain—I do not know whether we do so with other countries, but we certainly do with those two—and in that respect we are carrying on a very useful work.

The hon. member pointed out that science and art had overleaped, as he said, international boundaries and were themselves international. Certainly they are—so is commerce and so is finance. It is because of the establishment of a growing confidence between nation and nation that these things are becoming more and more international rather than matters limited and peculiar to various nations. And so the great cause of peace, if you like to call it that, is progressing. Progressing how? Progressing along lines established by commerce, by art, by science, and I hope and trust—in fact I am sure—by a moral sense of responsibility, among nations, and among men, which is underlying it all.

It seems to me that we have lost sight of one thought: Peace will never be brought about by propaganda. Take the member for Labelle—and I am sorry that he has left his seat. It would be a considerable time before he and I could agree upon some line of propaganda for a peace society or a peace department for Canada. I submit that it is an impracticable thing. I could not agree with his premises; he would not agree with mine. It is not so much a question of education or propaganda. Peace is based upon a will for peace, just as war comes out of a will for war. This country is not saturated or impregnated with a desire for or rather a will for war. Our people of all classes have absolutely the will for peace, and as long as we can give expression to that in our legislation, in our administration, in our public sentiment, so long shall we promote the cause of peace.

One other thought, sir, and then I take my seat. You will never bring about peace—and I say this with the greatest of sincerity and with the utmost reverence, not in any sense for the sake of show but rather from a deep conviction of its truth—you will never get peace in this world by philosophical dissertations about it, by propaganda. There is only one method I know of and that is by promoting the principles of the Prince of Peace; that is the way in which peace will be brought to the world. And while undoubtedly we are very often guilty of a disregard of these great and sacred principles, I find there is a great conflict in my own mind, and I know there is in the mind and the heart of almost every man and woman I meet, in endeavouring to reconcile these principles of peace with the problems of everyday life. It is very easy and very simple to give utterance to platitudinous arguments and expressions about peace, but it is a very different thing to harmonize these ideas with one's duty day by day in the administration of public affairs or even in the direction of one's private life.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, March 27, 1928

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill No. 152, respecting The Great Lakes and Atlantic Canal and Power Company, Limited.—Mr. Denis (Joliette).

ESTIMATES FOR 1928-1929

A message from His Excellency the Governor General, transmitting estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1929, was presented by Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee on railways and shipping.

CONSCIENCE MONEY

On motions being called:

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in the special mail of yesterday the Finance Minister and Receiver General received the following letter:

March 25, 1928.

Enclosed find conscience money totalling $35, including interest. Please take good care to speak of this in the house as soon as you get it, so it will be mentioned in the newspapers, and the sender can know before Easter that you received the money safely.

Mr. STEVENS: He does not trust the Minister of Finance.

Mr. ROBB: It looks bad for the minister.

INDUSTRIAL AND INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON CIVIL SERVICE COUNCILS

Mr. C. R. McINTOSH (North Battleford) presented the second report of the committee on industrial and international relations, as follows:

Your committee has had before it Bill No. 4. an act to amend the Civil Service Act (Councils), referred to the committee on February 10, 1928. Having considered the bill and examined a number of witnesses on the subject matter involved, your committee beg leave to report as follows:

1. That whereas the majority of the witnesses heard were of the opinion that further consideration should be given to the details of the constitution of national civil service councils;

And whereas the government is prepared to establish such councils;

And whereas the objects of the bill may be attained by order in council;

2. That this committee endorses the principle of the establishment by the government of a national civil service council, composed of representatives of the government and the organized civil service in equal numbers, to consider and advise the government upon matters of mutual concern to the government and civil servants in their respective capacities as employer and employees, also as to the establishing of any other consultative and advisory machinery that may be required.

3. That, as the form of constitution for such a council, covering its scope and functions, can best be determined by joint agreement between the parties concerned, this committee recommends the setting up by the government of a drafting committee representing both the government and the civil service organizations, for the said purposes, provided that any such constitutions so drafted shall be subject to the approval of the governor in council; and

4. That after the said constitution has been drafted and approved in the manner set forth the national civil service council should be established forthwith by the government.

5. In view of the above recommendations your committee recommend that Bill No. 4 be not further proceeded with.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

On the motion of Hon. Charles Marcil (Bonaventure) the first report of the joint committee on the printing of parliament was concurred in.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

RATIFICATION OF ARRANGEMENT WITH HOLDERS OF CANADIAN NORTHERN DEBENTURE STOCK

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That the scheme of arrangement with holders of the five per cent income charge convertible debenture stock of the Canadian Northern Railway be ratified and confirmed, and that the governor in council be authorized to guarantee the principal and interest of the new securities to be issued in pursuance therewith not exceeding in aggregate face value such an amount as may by the governor in council be considered sufficient to raise $22,689,575.32; the proceeds to be deposited to the credit of the Minister of Finance in trust, to be released by the minister in such amounts as are required to carry out the provisions of the scheme.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

I might mention, Mr. Speaker, that this resolution is to provide for taking care of maturities in May. The purpose of the bill is to approve and give effect to the scheme of arrangement and compromise between the Canadian Northern Railway Company and the holders of its five per cent income charge convertible debenture stock. This stock is secured by trust deed dated May 6, 1910, supplemented by trust deed dated May 17, 1915. The trustees are the British Empire Trust Company, London, England, and the National Trust Company, Toronto. The due date is the 6th of May, 1930. The interest is payable at five per cent or such less rate, if any, as the net earnings of the railways concerned shall be sufficient to pay. The amount outstanding is $24,137,846.08, and 94 per cent of this amount is $22,689,575.32. The sale of securities shall be by competitive bids, but in view of the fact that time is the essence and will be very limited, provision is made for temporary financing.

If hon. gentlemen desire, we could take up this resolution now and give the bill its first reading, and then let it stand over until Thursday.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. SPEAKER: Except by unanimous consent, this motion is not debatable. Standing order 38 provides:

The following motions are debatable:
Every motion—
(a) standing on the order of proceedings for the day (except government notices of motion for the house to go into committee at a later date).

Mr. ROBB: If I could have unanimous consent, we might go into committee now and pass the resolution, and then introduce the bill. Then hon. gentlemen will be in a better position to discuss it.

Motion as amended agreed to, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This time I rise, Mr. Chairman, to support my hon. friend the minister. This is a very old subject. The stock was issued, not to carry interest unless interest was actually earned, but the time is coming when the obligation will have to be met. My hon. friends are perfectly right in meeting it, but in this connection I want to draw one little matter to the attention of the committee. The longer these things run generally the more people want, and I very well recollect, when in 1926 authority was given for negotiations to be entered into with the bankers through whom the business had been handled, the indignation of my hon. friends opposite on returning to office and the manner in which they cancelled the arrangement that had been effected. Now, this is what actually did happen. The first offer was on the basis of the 40-year stock and carried interest at 4½ per cent. That interest was not to start to run until May 6, 1930. The governing rate of interest in the market at that time—and I give my hon. friend, not my figures, but the figures of the gentlemen who were dealing with this matter and recommending it to their clients—was 4⅞ per cent. The discount value of those securities was on that basis, that is, the difference between 4½ per cent and 4⅞ per cent, or 93.42. But the securities had to run along from 1926 to 1930 without bearing any interest at all; so a further discount had to be made, which reduced the sum of money which the shareholders would receive under the arrangement to 80. Well, they have every reason to be pleased that my hon. friends stopped the arrangement, because it simply means that today they are getting a million and a half dollars more. The offer which we are now considering is a cash offer which becomes quickly payable. But the only fair way to arrive at its value would be to assume that it was made at the same time as the former offer and to apply the same discounts. Applying those same discounts—and that is going to the very furthest point in case of the proposition—this cash offer would be reduced, so that the value on the market at that time would be only 86, or six points above the offer which my hon. friend cancelled. In other words, it represents on the whole twenty-five million dollars an increase of a million and a half. I am not saying that it will cost the country an extra one and a half million dollars, I am merely pointing out the fact that the shareholders get that much more. It may not cost the country that much more. Why? Simply because the rate of interest in the meantime has gone down. We cannot say exactly what the rate will be, for it depends entirely upon the American market, as we were told in the banking and commerce committee by the department's representative who in giving evidence on this question of the rate of interest chargeable by the government under the legislation of 1914 said that it was reduced from time to time having regard to the rate of interest charged in New York. None of us can say exactly what that will be, but it does show clearly that the former settlement was proper, that the liability was a real liability—everybody knew it—and that the shareholders as a matter of fact are getting, as I say, one and a half million dollars more than they would have received under the former arrangement, and their circular shows it.

Mr. ROBB: I am glad, Mr. Chairman, to have the assurance of my hon. friend that there is no difference of opinion as to the justice of meeting these bonds. It is one of the railway cases which has arisen out of the changed condition from poverty to prosperity. When we discuss the bill in committee I shall be very glad to deal with the relative merits of the two propositions, and to tell my hon. friend why the government at that time did not authorize the settlement which was said to have been arrived at.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 153, respecting the Canadian National Railways and respecting the Canadian Northern Railway Company five per cent Income Charge Convertible Debenture Stock.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND VETERANS' WELFARE

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment and Health) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that the Department of Health and of Soldiers Civil Re-establishment be amalgamated in a single department to be called the Department of National Health and Veterans' Welfare, presided over by a minister of the crown; that the powers and duties of the minister be defined; and provision be made for the appointment of a deputy minister, the making of regulations, and the employment of such other officers, clerks, and employees as may be deemed necessary.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

LOWER EAR FALLS STORAGE DAM

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) (for the Minister of the Interior) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that the agreement between the Dominion of Canada, the province of Ontario and the province of Manitoba respecting the construction of a dam for the purposes of conservation, regulation and power, at Lower Ear falls at the outlet of Lac Seul in the province of Ontario, be ratified and confirmed, and that the governor in council be authorized to carry out the provisions thereof whereby the Dominion assumes three-fifths of the capital cost of the dam, estimated at $700,000, and the payment of interest and cost of operation and maintenance for certain limited periods.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

YUKON QUARTZ MINING ACT AMENDMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) (for the Minister of the Interior) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that the Yukon Quartz Mining Act be amended to provide for the payment of an annual royalty on the profits of mines in the Yukon Territory, exceeding the sum of $10,000 annually, in place of the royalty at present imposed upon sales of the products of the mines, and to prescribe the rates of royalty to be paid upon the said anual profits.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

BRITISH COLUMBIA LANDS

LEGISLATION TO GIVE EFFECT TO REPORT OF MR. JUSTICE MARTIN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. S. F. TOLMIE (Victoria): Is it the intention of the government to introduce legislation at this session to carry out the recommendations of Commissioner Martin in connection with the return of British Columbia lands?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Perhaps my hon. friend will allow the question to stand until the Minister of the Interior is in the house. I think he will be satisfied with the reply which the minister will make.

RADIO—CANCELLATION OF LICENSE

INTERNATIONAL BIBLE STUDENTS' ASSOCIATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): I wish to ask the Minister of Marine a question based on a number of communications I have received. In these communications exception is taken to the anticipated action of the minister in cancelling broadcasting privileges hitherto enjoyed by the International Bible Students' Association. My question is: Does the minister intend cancelling these privileges, and, if so, why?

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): I am not in a position to make any pronouncement to-day on the matter. The question is still under consideration and I may be able to make a definite statement to-morrow regarding it.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Thank you.

TRANSPORTATION OF COAL

REDUCED RATE FROM MARITIME PROVINCES TO CENTRAL CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS CANTLEY (Pictou): In the absence of the Minister of the Interior, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Railways based on a telegram I have received from Stellarton, Nova Scotia. This telegram reads:

Conditions as to work were never worse than at present in Pictou county coalfields. From first of April, 1927, until August 31, 1927, pits averaged only 19⅔ days per month; from that until the end of year fairly steady. January, February, March, 1928 to date average 14⅓ days per month with no prospects for future.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is out of order to read telegrams inasmuch as they emanate from outside and the house has no assurance of their veracity. The rule, which is laid down in Bourinot, is well known. The hon. member may ask a question based on information he has.

Mr. CANTLEY: In that case, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Railways whether he is now prepared to put in force the rate mentioned by the Minister of the Interior on Monday of last week in these words:

The movement of Nova Scotia coal is now under consideration, chiefly by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning), as it is a railway matter.

Will the rate be put into force at once?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I gathered from the telegram as my hon. friend read it that it is similar to one I have received personally and which I immediately forwarded to the management of the Canadian National Railways for their consideration as to whether anything further could be done as requested. I am quite satisfied that the national railway management is doing all it can to help to provide work for Nova Scotia miners in the banking of coal for railway use; and, as my hon. friend knows, Nova Scotia coal is now used on the Canadian National Railways as far north as Cochrane and as far west as Belleville. Regarding the general question to which my hon. friend makes reference, it is true that the Minister of Mines asked me to help in investigating the possible application to Nova Scotia of a test movement similar to that which has been inaugurated in relation to Alberta. I have conveyed my views to the Minister of Mines and he is, I know, working on the matter. I cannot state definitely what the outcome will be, but I know that he is giving the subject his attention at the present time.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. T. MacNUTT (Colchester): May I ask the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler) whether I may expect the return to a question asked by me a month ago—on February 22nd, to be exact? It was passed as an order for return. Has the answer to the question been lost in transit?

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of National Revenue): I will inquire and report tomorrow.

INTERIM SUPPLY

ONE-SIXTH VOTE

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. ROBB moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $37,198,026.71, being one-sixth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted as set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1929, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1929.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Before this motion for interim supply carries, we shall have to have the usual understanding. The minister saw me on Saturday in reference to the matter and I consulted my leader, who saw no objection to it. So far as we are concerned, therefore, we are not opposing the motion but the matter must, of course, be dealt with on the usual terms; that is to say, the vote, which is for two months, is not to be taken as in any way hampering the fullest and freest discussion in the house and the fullest right to object to any or all items. And that right covers more than what appears on paper because the vote, although passed, is passed under this agreement. It is passed for the purpose of providing for necessary payments that have to be made. The civil service must be carried on and existing obligations met, but no new work can be commenced, so that any item may be moved to be struck out which ordinarily could be struck out when considered in the usual course.

Mr. ROBB: That is a fair understanding, and the usual procedure.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committe of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. ROBB moved:

Resolved that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1929, the sum of $37,198,026.71 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is subject, of course, to the same arrangement.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in. Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 154, for grantaing to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1929.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This bill, of course, is subject to the same arrangement which was made in committee on the resolution.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the house is aware, we adjourn on Friday over Easter, and I am told that the upper house which also adjourns on Friday may not reassemble until the latter part of April. Hon. members will recall that a few days ago I tabled further supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1928, involving items of a number of departments and totalling $3,306,347.02. Included therein were the European war and active militia pensions, amounting to $1,600,000. With the unanimous consent of the house I would like to advance these further supplementary estimates so that we may pay them before the end of the fiscal year. I therefore move that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): I would like to ask the minister if he intends to ask the house to vote any other item than that covering these pensions?

Mr. ROBB: Yes. As soon as this is through we will take up similar supplementary estimates for the Department of Railways and Canals, covering the Maritime Freight Rates Act and certain advances to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Marine and Fisheries — contingencies — further amount required, $8,000.

Mr. STEVENS: We ought to have some explanation about this.

Mr. ROBB: This is to provide for unforeseen expenditures of the fisheries branch of the department, more particularly as regards the expenses in connection with departmental officials and employees who were engaged in the Royal Fisheries Commission.

Item agreed to.

National Defence — contingencies — further amount required, $10,000.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What is the explanation of this item?

Mr. ROBB: This sum is required mainly because of the expansion of the work in connection with the air service. It has been necessary to employ several new clerks and stenographers for whom provision was not made in the civil government estimates. The outlay for telegraphs, telephones and travelling expenses was not estimated in the main estimates. The details given are: To pay of temporary employees, $5,000; telegrams and telephones, $4,000; travelling expenses, $1,000.

Item agreed to.

[Mr Robb.]

Public Archives — contingencies — further amount required, $6,888.70.

Item agreed to.

Secretary of State—contingencies—further amount required, $5,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Will the minister give some explanation as to why this amount is required?

Mr. RINFRET: When the revision of the statutes was rendered necessary new forms for application under the Companies Act and other acts were required. This sum is necessary for the printing of these special forms in connection with the revision of the statutes.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: No part of this amount is needed to pay the salaries of a greater staff?

Mr. RINFRET: No. it is merely to pay for the printing.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): We see the lips of ministers moving when they are giving their explanations but that is all that registers in this corner of the house. Will the Secretary of State speak a little louder, because down here we have not heard a word he has said.

Mr. RINFRET: I had explained, and I am delighted to explain again for the benefit of my hon. friends in that corner of the chamber, that the revision of the statutes made necessary the printing of new forms for certain acts that are under the administration of the Secretary of State, namely the Companies Act. There is also the printing of the Guide to Relative Precedence in Ottawa and in the provincial capitals.

Mr. GEARY: Has the money been spent in connection with these items?

Mr. RINFRET: It is in process of being spent.

Mr. GEARY: You have got a good start.

Mr. RINFRET: As to the printing which is being done in the printing bureau, the item is really a bookkeeping item. The amount will be outstanding between the printing bureau and the department. The work that is being done outside is in the process of being delivered to the department.

Mr. GEARY: These are not estimates at all, they are overdrafts.

Mr. ROBB: It is the customary thing. At the end of every fiscal year we have such amounts.

Mr. STEVENS: It is an evil practice.

Item agreed to.

Department of Agriculture—Fruit branch—further amount required, $35,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: We should have an explanation of this item.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This item was occasioned by the additional cost due to the new policy of grading and inspecting fruit for export, from which source $60,000 was obtained in inspection fees. That amount, however, went directly into the treasury. The cost was borne out of our vote, consequently we need an additional $35,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Did the minister not ask for a sufficient amount last year when we passed the original estimates?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We had no means of judging how much the work was going to cost and being the first year it was an estimate purely and simply. A great deal more grading was done in connection with fruit for home consumption than was anticipated.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON. I think perhaps the explanation should come from the Minister of Finance. How was it that the Minister of Agriculture got ahead of him to the extent of $35,000?

Mr. ROBB: That is quite easy of explanation. I got ahead of the Minister of Agriculture when he was preparing his estimates, at least I think I did.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But he comes back.

Mr. STEVENS: He is a good horse trader.

Mr. GEARY: Are these items being charged up against the surplus?

Mr. ROBB: I hope not.

Mr. MANION: All the expenditures are.

Mr. ROBB: This was provided for in estimating the budget requirements.

Item agreed to.

Pensions—European war and active militia —further amount required, $1,600,000.

Mr. MANION: Would the minister explain this item because this seems rather a large amount for a supplementary-supplementary.

Mr. ROBB: The department reports that the provision in the main estimates will be inadequate and the above additional amount will be required. The expenditure to February 29, 1928, was $35,026,421.21, leaving a balance of $1,973,578.79 available for the month of March. The expenditure for the month of February amounted to $3,273,333.78. My hon. friend is quite aware that there are pension revisions going on from time to time, and I imagine that the present item is the result of granting a greater pension allowance in some cases.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the minister tell us how much of that goes to pensions? How much of the vote of $1,600,000 goes to the soldiers, how much of it goes in other expenditures, and how much of it goes to an investigation here or an investigation there?

Mr. ROBB: I think it is safe to say that all of it goes to pensions. My hon. friend will note carefully the wording of the item: For the European war and active militia pensions.

Mr. STEVENS: That covers a multitude of sins.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That covers everything.

Mr. ROBB: It is the result of revisions of pensions by the pension board from time to time.

Mr. MANION: How much of a supplementary of this kind did we have last year?

Mr. ROBB: I have not that information.

Mr. MANION: I should like, if possible, to have further details with regard to this $1,600,000. This is a large amount of money.

Mr. ROBB: It is a large amount of money.

Mr. MANION: I should like to have some further details than just a general statement.

Hon. JAMES H. KING: (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment): I did not come prepared with a complete statement, but this amount of money is required for pensions, not for administration expenses. The latter are taken care of by another vote, as are also treatment expenses. The amount required here is undoubtedly for pensions. We find that each year we have come to parliament asking for a supplementary vote for pensions.

Mr. MANION: How much was it last year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think over a million dollars last year. It is an unknown quantity. We have not yet reached the peak in the matter of pensions. More applications are coming in. We received many new applications last year, and then there have been increases in pension.

Mr. MANION: I certainly would be the last to object to what is necessary for pensions, but it seems to me that we ought to be able to get a little closer to our estimates than practically $2,000,000 in a case of this sort. That is what strikes me. I am not objecting to the money being used for necessary pensions, but I hope that the minister next year will get a little closer to his estimates. I cannot work out the percentage of increase while on my feet but it is too large in the case of an estimate of this kind. I hope that next year the minister will make a closer estimate and that we shall not be asked for another couple of million dollars for a supplementary-supplementary such as this.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Approximately what amount is for European war pensions and how much for the active militia?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This amount is for European war pensions and also the active militia, further amount required.

Mr. ADSHEAD: What is the approximate amount of each?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The item for militia pensions is very small. The main amount is for European war pensions.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Then why not strike out the words "active miltia?"

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They are included in the pension payment but the amount is very small. I have not the figures with me but I can assure my hon. friends opposite that it is very difficult to estimate our pension bill from year to year. It is changing and we have not yet reached the peak. I think it has been the policy of the department and the desire of the government not to appropriate huge sums of money or more than is required, but rather to vote, as has been done each year, a supplementary item at the end of the year covering the deficit.

Mr. McGIBBON: The minister ought to come to parliament with a little more information than that. He says: I think this and I think that; I can assure this and I can assure that. When it is all boiled down, he is not giving us any information at all. It is ridiculous that the Board of Pension Commissioners—and I do not blame the minister altogether for this—should not be able to make a more definite estimate.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not think so.

Mr. McGIBBON: I think it is. They come before the pension committee making certain suggestions and they claim to be able to tell us almost exactly what they are going to cost. If they can forecast the cost of these increased expenditures, they have the normal expenditures stabilized, so how is it they are two or three million dollars out? Are the expenses of the Hunter commission included in this?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. McGIBBON: We hope to run across them somewhere, because we should like to discuss the commission.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is quite right. We should have a little more detailed information on this item. I observe one item covering European war pensions short on account of retroactive awards. How can a government provide for retroactive awards?

Mr. STEVENS: How much is that?

Mr. ROBB: About $115,000. It is not exactly fair to blame the minister or the department for estimating short. When these estimates come before the treasury board, it is natural that we hold them down to the last dollar based upon the previous year's experience. The pension board are in operation all the time; they increase these pensions from time to time, and that is why there is a shortage at the end of the year. We can pay this only by the authority of parliament. My friends are quite right in stating that more detailed information should be given.

Mr. STEVENS: That is the point. We are not complaining about paying out legitimately money for pensions. The minister has given us one item. He must have under his hand an explanation of this appropriation. Can he give us the other items?

Mr. ROBB: That is all the information I have.

Mr. STEVENS: When the cabinet prepared these supplementary estimates they had before them from each department the details and the reasons why these supplementaries were required. Parliament is entitled to an explanation such as the minister has received from the different departments. This is a large item and we are entitled to know definitely what it consists of.

Mr. MANION: Retroactive awards take place every year. I presume from the second year onward there have been retroactive awards. Again and again pensions are demanded and refused for a year or two; then they are granted and the commission grants the retroactive effect. Therefore some such figure as that should be included in the estimates each year. This item might be held over for a little while in order to see if the minister cannot give us more information and we can go on with some of the smaller items.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Those who prepared this amount of $1,600,000 for insertion in the supplementary estimates must have had some information and details on which they based the amount. Either that is the case or they just guessed at the amount and said: We will ask for $1,600,000; we do not know whether it will be that much or $10,000,000. I assume they had some definite information on which they based this amount and the committee is entitled to know what that definite information is. I should also like to know how much will be paid out in the fiscal year ending the last of this month in actual money in pensions to soldiers and how much by way of administration.

Mr. ROBB: I shall have the question of my hon. friend noted, and we will endeavour to get the information. I should like to have it myself. A moment ago I said that of this amount $115,000 was for retroactive awards. I find that $115,000 is in another item. I suggest that this item stand until the minister endeavours to obtain some more information.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Will the minister let us have the figures as to how much is for European war and how much for active militia?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Will letting the item stand injure any interested soldier?

Mr. ROBB: We will pick it up again before we go out of committee.

Item stands.

Railways and Canals—chargeable to income—canals—Sault Ste. Marie—compassionate allowance to the widow of the late William H. Tilley, who was drowned while on duty at the canal, September 23, 1916, $1,000.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Why is this payment being made more than eleven years after it was incurred?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I can speak only of my connection with it. The facts were brought to my attention during the past year and on reviewing them I thought the widow, who is now seventy-three years of age, was entitled to some consideration on account of the death of her husband under these tragic circumstances. I am therefore recommending the payment. I had not heard of the matter until this last year.

Item agreed to.

Welland canal—Compassionate allowance to Stanley Sleck, minor son of Mrs. Marcelle Sleck, who was accidentially injured on the Welland canal bridge in the city of St. Catharines on May 28, 1927, and for payment of said allowance to F. E. Hetherington (solicitor) as trustee for and on behalf of the said Stanley Sleck, $1,000.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Will that $1,000 be the amount Mrs. Slack will receive, or will the solicitor's fees be deducted from that?

Mr. DUNNING: In connection with this boy I took a personal interest in the disposition of the moneys. I can assure my hon friend the solicitor in the case gave his services either freely or at a very nominal figure, I forget which, and a trust arrangement has been made so that the education of the boy will be provided for out of this sum of money.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: There does not seem to be a fair comparison between this item and the previous one. The previous item allows $1,000 for the death of an adult. This item allows $1,000 for an injury to a minor son. Just how serious was the injury?

Mr. DUNNING: It was necessary to amputate the boy's foot.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Do I understand that the government feels itself responsible for that injury to the boy?

Mr. DUNNING: No. The allowance is a purely compassionate one. There is no admission of responsibility. The circumstances were such that the term compassionate allowance is the best I can use to explain the matter.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): My reason for asking the question is that if any responsibility in any way attaches to the government or to the department over which my hon. friend presides, $1,000 is no compensation at all.

Mr. DUNNING: I can assure my hon. friend that any case where even the remotest responsibility attaches to the department always receives my most sympathetic consideration. I do not want to discuss the details of this case, but I can assure my hon. friend that the boy was injured on the swing bridge, and he had no business to be where he was. The case has been settled very satisfactorily from the point of view of all those people in the district who took an interest in the case.

Mr. McGIBBON: It is one more humane act on the part of the minister.

Mr. DUNNING: I would not say that, but rather on the part of parliament.

Item agreed to.

Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada —maintenance and operation — additional amount required, $15,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Would the minister explain this?

Mr. DUNNING: This further sum of money is required due to two major hearings by the board. One of them was the general rates inquiry, which occupied sittings throughout Canada during 113 days. The record comprised 13,500 pages, and the additional expenditure involved covers evidence, $5,731.50; translation, $1,117.25; printing, $2,652.20; additional travelling expenses, $2,716.30. That comes out of the $15,000 chargeable directly to extra expense incurred in winding up the general rates inquiry. There was also an extensive inquiry into the affairs of the Bell Telephone Company, which included extra expense in taking evidence, printing, and so forth, to the extent of sixteen volumes of the records of the board, costing about $2,695.50. That makes up the amount which we are asking here.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was the total vote?

Mr. DUNNING: In the main estimates of last year?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: I have not that before me.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The money has gone anyway.

Item agreed to.

Ocean and river service—miscellaneous and unforeseen expenses—further amount required, $500.

Mr. STEVENS: What is this for?

Mr. CARDIN: This is required to cover small unforeseen expenditures, such as legal fees and small repairs to wharves which we control.

Item agreed to.

To provide for the establishment of a patrol service to investigate the conditions of navigation in Hudson strait and Hudson bay—further amount required, $200,000.

Mr. CAHAN: This is to provide for the establishment of a patrol service to investigate the conditions of navigation in Hudson strait and Hudson bay. At the last session of parliament a sum was voted for this patrol service which has been continued during the autumn months up until the present time. The department must now have very complete reports with regard to the conditions which were encountered in the Hudson bay and strait during the autumn and early winter, and I submit that parliament is entitled to know the facts as they are within the knowledge of the department over which the Minister of Marine presides. I think we should have some statement to the house in regard to the matter.

Mr. CARDIN: The report of the officer in charge is practically completed, and I shall be in a position in the course of a few days to table it. The printing of the report is practically completed.

Mr MANION: What was the amount in last year's estimates for this work?

Mr. CARDIN. The amount last year was $850,000.

Mr. MANION: That was all used, plus this $200,000?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. MANION: That makes a little over $1,000,000.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, $1,050,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why should not that be looked after in the usual way by governor general's warrants? Is no attempt at all being made to keep down departmental expense? Are they allowed to overdraw just as much as they want? This is a big overdraft, $200,000, with a main vote of over $800,000.

Mr. ROBB: It is not the fault of the department that we did not put through governor general's warrants. When the matter was called to the attention of the department, it was so near the time of the assembling of parliament that we thought, and I think quite properly, that parliament should vote the money.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It does, in any event, whether it is done by way of governor general's warrants or not. I understand that this money has been paid. Where did it come from? By what legerdemain have we got $200,000 from nothing?

Mr. CARDIN: Most of the accounts remain to be paid. Certain wages have been paid out of some other votes, and we want to reimburse them.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was quite sure that that would be the answer. We have departmental juggling between one vote and another for the purpose of running along. I do not know which is the worse, to take money voted for one purpose and use it for another purpose, so as to get along without governor general's warrants, or to pay these overdrafts openly and above board.

Mr. STEVENS: Was not one of these camps or posts destroyed by fire?

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Mr. STEVENS: I heard that one camp had been destroyed by fire.

Mr. DUNNING. I think my hon. friend is referring to one of the buildings at the old port of Nelson which was burned a couple of months ago; the fire was reported in the press.

Mr. STEVENS: It was one of the patrol camps, I understand.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is wrong there.

Mr. STEVENS: I am very glad to know it.

Mr. ARTHURS: As this amount involves altogether an expenditure of over $1,000,000, I think we should have some details of the expenditures.

Mr. CARDIN: I shall be glad to give the committee a complete list of all the expenditures under the vote of $850,000 of last year when we come to the main estimates.

Mr. KAISER: Does this include the expenditure on the aeroplanes?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. KAISER: Are we getting any reports from them?

Mr. CARDIN: The report is practically completed and will be tabled in the course of a few days.

Item agreed to.

River St Lawrence ship channel—maintenance and operating dredging fleet — further amount required, $400,000.

Mr. CAHAN: In connection with this vote for the river St. Lawrence ship channel, and in order that the minister may prepare himself somewhat for the discussion on the estimates for the ensuing year, I wish to call the attention of the committee to certain facts in regard to navigation through the ship channel of the St. Lawrence river. When the later work was undertaken some time ago, it was the intention of the government, as stated, to make a depth of 35 feet for navigation up to and into the harbour of Montreal. From the engineering reports which are now available, it appears that the prevailing levels in Montreal harbour are now about three feet lower than they were at the time when the datum was established for the 35 foot depth. This lowering of the water level in the Montreal harbour is alleged to be due largely to the diversion of water through the Chicago drainage canal, to some extent to a decrease in run-off, and to the channel dredging at various points which facilitates the more rapid flow of the river. If there is a decrease in depth of three feet in comparison with the datum fixed at the time this work was projected, and if the dredging of the river facilitates a more rapid flow of the water, it would appear that the expenditure which we are making on the development of that river is not resulting in the advantages which were estimated at the time this later project was undertaken.

There is no doubt that the navigation depth of 35 feet in the channel will merely meet the existing requirements. For instance, I have before me a statement of the vessels which now make their destination at Montreal during the season of navigation, and I will read it into Hansard:

Vessel	Gross tons	Draught
Canadian Pacific ss.
Montrose	16,402	27′ 6″
Melita	15,183	34′ 4″
Montcalm	16,418	27′ 6″
Minnedosa	14,000	34′ 4″
Metagama	12,400	27′ 7″
Montclare	16,314	27′ 6″
Robt. Reford Co.
Athenia	13,465	27′ 8½″
Letitia	13,475	27′ 8½″
Alaunia	14,030	32′ 2″
Antonia	13,867	29′ 5″
Andania	13,950	29′ 5½″
Ascania	14,013	30′ 11″
Aurania	13,984	30′ 11½″
Ausonia	13,912	30′ 11″
White Star Line
Doric	16,484	33′ 11½″
Regina	16,500	33′ 11½″
Albertic	18,940	30′ 10″
Megantic	14,878	27′ 6″
Calgaric	16,063	32′ 7½″

In the season which we are approaching the new White Star liner Laurentic of 19,000 tons will come to Montreal. The new Canadian Pacific liners, the Duchess of Athol and the Duchess of Bedford, each of 20,000 tons, will also come into the St. Lawrence trade.

Mr. BOYS: What is their draught?

Mr. CAHAN: I have not their actual draught, but I am told it will exceed the draught of any of the ships which I have already mentioned.

Mr. DUFF: Did those vessels enumerated in the list enter the port of Montreal last year?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes. I am not dealing with the ships that made their destination at Quebec. The Empress of Australia, of 22,000 tons, is now compelled to make her final destination at Quebec, being unable to come up the river to Montreal. The number of these ships which are now able to come to Montreal, at some seasons of the year, owing to the decrease in the depth of the river, are compelled to enter the port with depleted cargoes, and to sail again only partially loaded. So the reduced depth in the river means a very great loss indeed to the shipping companies, and also to the traders and merchants of Montreal who are compelled to pay a higher freight rate when ships are not able to take a full cargo.

This 35-foot channel which we are projecting will not be, under present conditions, a 35-foot channel at all. Furthermore, I notice in their report that the engineers, who have been studying the development of the navigation on the St. Lawrence river and Great Lakes, suggest that compensating works should be provided in lakes Ontario and Erie and at other places to restore the levels of lakes Michigan and Huron, and lakes Erie and Ontario further down, which have been lowered by the diversions already made at Chicago and elsewhere. Engineers with whom I have come in contact, who are not partisans of one scheme or another, but who have studied this question, advise me that the construction of these so-called compensating works as proposed, either in connection with the levels of lakes Michigan and Huron or the levels of lakes Erie and Ontario lower down, will still further tend to decrease the depth of water in the harbour of Montreal. So the construction of these compensating works further west will tend to decrease the depth of water actually available for navigation at those seasons of the year when a certain depth is requisite for the shipping of Montreal. Therefore I sugest that when we come to deal with the main estimates in which there is an extra appropriation of something like $1,000,000 under item 220 for the construction and regulating of retaining dams in the St. Lawrence river, and a further appropriation under item 216 of $373,000 for the maintenance and operation of a dredging fleet, we should have a full and complete statement from the minister regarding the works which are now in progress, the extent to which the government proposes to carry on these works, the result with respect to the depth of water available for navigation in the harbour of Montreal and in the river, and some evidence, if it is available, to reassure us that the work of dredging which is being carried on is not actually resulting in further depleting the water which is required in the harbour of Montreal at certain seasons of the year to accommodate shipping which makes its destination there. I do not expect the minister to go into the larger question of the diversion at Chicago which has resulted in such serious loss to Montreal, because I infer that this is a matter which will be dealt with by the Prime Minister or some other member of the cabinet when we are discussing the St. Lawrence navigation scheme which has been suggested by the board of engineers. But I do call the attention of the government as such to the fact that there is an opinion, clearly expressed and apparently well substantiated by the facts, that the projects of compensatory works which have been suggested in connection with the St. Lawrence waterways scheme, the larger scheme will simply result in robbing Peter to pay Paul: they will diminish the depth avaliable for navigation in the port of Montreal in order to create and retain a greater depth of water in lakes Ontario, Erie, Huron and Michigan. The desire to ascertain the facts—a legitimate desire on the part of those interested in shipping in Montreal—is so great that, I suggest, the minister should prepare himself to give us a clear and definite statement regarding these matters when the estimates for the year are brought down. I do not wish to prolong the discussion on this point, but I thought it wise to call the attention of the minister and of the government to these facts.

Mr. POWER: The solution of the difficulties suggested by my hon. friend (Mr. Cahan) would seem to me to be a very easy one: if the boats cannot go to Montreal, let them stop at Quebec. For fifty years or more we have been endeavouring to interfere with the course of nature by dredging the channel between Quebec and Montreal. As the hon. member himself says, it is extremely doubtful whether these dredging works have served the purpose which it was sought to attain when the dredging was begun. We have had, first, an agitation for a twenty-five foot channel to Montreal, then for a thirty foot channel and now for one of thirty-five feet. People who understand these things have stated very definitely that there is a limit to which one can dig in a river such as the St. Lawrence; it is stated that increased dredging tends to allow the water to run off more rapidly than it would otherwise.

An hon. MEMBER: The sea will flow back.

Mr. POWER: The sea flows back up as far as Quebec, I may tell my hon. friend, and not as far as Montreal. That is one of the natural advantages with which Providence has endowed Quebec. When ships of draught such as mentioned by my hon. friend—ships of thirty and thirty-two feet—are proceeding in a narrow channel with only perhaps from six inches to a foot of water between the keel of the vessel and the bottom, there is a natural tendency to drag from the sides of this narrow channel all the silt and mud and so constantly to refill that portion which has been dredged. This, I think, has been stated by engineers to be one of the reasons why it is almost impossible to maintain a constant depth of thirty-five feet in this channel. Then, owing to the advance of settlement in the upper reaches of the river and the lack of storage facilities always due to vegetation and forests, we find that every spring the water runs off much more rapidly. This is, of course, far more noticeable in the smaller rivers which serve as feeders to the main body, the St. Lawrence river; but the same action is felt in the St. Lawrence also. It is true, perhaps, that the Chicago diversion has had some effect, but generally speaking it will be found, I think, that the principal reason why the St. Lawrence is lower at certain seasons of the year now than it was formerly is that the land has been cleared at the head waters which flow into the river, so that naturally the water flows off much more rapidly.

I had not intended taking part in this discussion, but I want to assure my hon. friend that there is being constructed at Quebec a magnificent port capable of accommodating all the vessels of the type he mentions, and many more, some up to forty feet, and if the hon. gentleman will be prepared to accept, as the lot of the harbour of Montreal, the lot which Providence no doubt intended for it, that of receiving only smaller vessels, and leaving to Quebec the lot of receiving the larger vessels, not asking parliament to intervene in the workings of nature, then possibly we might all get along better.

Mr. CANTLEY: I have not the slightest objection to the hon. member (Mr. Power) having the mail boats stop at his Indian village, but I want to point out that the depth of water in the St. Lawrence is a matter of considerable importance to Nova Scotia. We cannot unload, at Quebec, coal from Nova Scotia destined for Montreal; we must get the boats to Montreal.

Mr. POWER: I do not think any of the small vessels carrying coal—vessels of ten, twelve and fifteen thousand tons—will have any difficulty reaching Montreal. It is the large transatlantic vessels having a draft of twenty-eight and thirty feet which will find it difficult as they have done in the past.

Mr. CANTLEY: I quite understand that. I may tell the hon. gentleman that I have landed from ocean liners at Quebec and I have also gone up to Montreal on liners and on coal boats. The difference in cost between transporting coal in vessels of eight and ten thousand tons capacity and in vessels of twenty thousand tons is very material.

Mr. POWER: Are there any vessels of twenty thousand tons transporting coal from Nova Scotia to Montreal at the present time?

Mr. CANTLEY: No, but there ought to be. Before boats of that size will be constructed for the trade the people who will have to operate the boats must know that the required water will be provided and maintained. We have coal boats to-day of 27 and 28 feet draft, and even they are in trouble. I wish to point out to the house that this is not entirely a matter of providing water for the mail boats; there are other interests involved, the only advantage we in Nova Scotia receive from the whole St. Lawrence scheme of navigation is the opportunity to send our coal to Montreal. Hon. members must not think that the city of Quebec and the city of Montreal are the only places interested in the navigation of the upper reaches of the St. Lawrence river.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Will the minister explain whether this amount is for the general dredging fund or if it is ear-marked for any particular object, because there is a certain section of this country even above Quebec and Montreal which is interested in the development of the St. Lawrence.

Mr. CARDIN: This amount is intended for the general work of deepening the St. Lawrence channel, and in part it is necessary at present because we have increased the salaries of the men working on the dredges and tugs connected with this work. Last year we provided for an increase to a certain class of navigators employed on what we call the Dominion steamers, those ships which are used for the maintenance of the lighthouses, but having made that increase which was provided for in the main estimates we thought it would be only fair and just to extend it to all the men working on the dredges and tugs which are used in this work.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: What part of this $400,000 is accounted for by increased salaries?

Mr. CARDIN: They account for $100,000. In addition, certain units of the fleet required extensive and unexpected overhauls during the year, which necessitated further unforeseen expenditures approximating $300,000, which this proposed supplementary appropriation covers.

In connection with the main point raised by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, speaking offhand I might say that the engineers of the department in charge of the work are under the impression that we can deepen the channel of the St. Lawrence river profitably for some time to come; we have not reached the point as yet where dredging ceases to be profiable. We can deepen the channel to 35 feet without seriously interfering with the water in the port of Montreal and without causing a greater or more rapid flow of the water in the river. As a matter of fact, the first program which was undertaken to deepen the channel to 30 feet is practically completed, and in the course of probably seven years we will have the channel 35 feet deep from Montreal down. I might emphasize that fact, that the engineers state that we can dredge the channel to a depth of 35 feet without interfering with the water in the port of Montreal. I am not quite clear on the matter, but it seems to me that the deepening of the water in the port of Montreal is a matter under the control of the Montreal harbour commission rather than the Department of Marine and Fisheries. I am not quite sure, but that is my impression at present. In the main estimates to which my hon. friend has referred we are providing for an expenditure of about $1,000,000 for the construction of submerged dams below Montreal, with a view to raising the water in that port and removing the necessity for further dredging. The engineers have reported that if we could construct two or three submerged dams, one below Montreal and one in the vicinity of lake St. Peter, we would raise the level of the water in the port of Montreal by nearly two feet. Of course, when we come to the discussion of the main estimates I will be in a position to give all these details which have been asked for by my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George.

With regard to the safety of navigation between Quebec and Montreal, I may say that navigation on that section of the river is quite as safe as navigation from Quebec down to the gulf, and in fact the accidents are not so numerous in the section of the river from Quebec to Montreal as they are from Montreal down to the gulf. The channel is very safe, and I have said before that the insurance people are not fair with regard to the St. Lawrence route. I maintain that the rates are too high, because the risks are no greater on the St. Lawrence river than on any other water course in the world. The government of Canada have spent large sums to establish buoys and lighthouses on this route, and I am sure it was a source of great comfort to the Canadian people when a high officer of the American government stated last year that the St. Lawrence route was the best inland route existing in the world. I think the money spent in deepening the St. Lawrence as much as can be done profitably is a wise expenditure, because up to the present navigation on that river has proven very beneficial to the country at large. It has helped develop one of the greatest ports in the world, and the benefits which have been derived by Montreal and by the whole country will amply justify the expenditure which has been made in that connection.

As far as the refilling is concerned, there is none to speak of. The nature of the soil which composes the bed of the river is such that when the dredging is done practically no refilling takes place, and the money we are expending now in deepening that channel is amply justified by the benefits which have been derived.

Then the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George referred to the lowering of the water by three feet in the port of Montreal. I am not prepared to agree that that is the situation. If my memory serves me right, certain engineers have contended that the diversion at Chicago does not very much affect Montreal. It may be affected in some way but at the most it will be a matter of a very few inches That, however, is a matter which is not quite clear, and there are expert opinions on both sides. At all events, may I repeat that I will be very glad to gather all the information in the department and give it to my hon. friend and to the house when we come to the main estimates.

Mr. POWER: Just a word to correct what was probably a slip on the part of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. He made perhaps somewhat invidious comparisons between the casualty rate of vessels below and above Quebec. In that connection

I would simply say that if anything happens to the vessels below Quebec it is not due to a lack of water in the channel, and there never has been any complaint that it was impossible to load vessels at Quebec to their full capacity. Possibly if the same amount of money had been expended in connection with lighthouses and other aids to navigation between Quebec and the sea as has been expended in dredging and similar work between Montreal and Quebec, the accidents would be much less numerous. With reference to the question of refill that, as the minister has said, is a matter of opinion, and as neither of us is a navigator or an engineer—

Mr. DUNNING: You are a navigator.

Mr. POWER: I am not a navigator on this occasion. Possibly as neither of us is an engineer or a navigator both our theories may be wrong. The passage of the vessel through the mud and silt is of a nature to draw those materials from the sides into the centre of the channel, particularly in places where the channel is so very narrow that sometimes two or three ships cannot pass abreast.

Mr. STEVENS: What do they do, do they jump over each other?

Mr. POWER: They almost jump over each other. It is apparent to everyone that vessels of such weight and displacement must inevitably draw silt from the sides of the channel; but in the case of what may be regarded as the floor of the channel, if the material is so hard that none will be drawn up, I submit it must be too costly to dredge. In either case I very respectfully submit to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that he should make out a somewhat stronger case, and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) should have something more to say, before endeavouring to take away from Quebec the few ships which make that port their terminus.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Will the minister tell me if any part of this vote is to be applied to dredging between Kingston and Montreal, or is all to be spent below Montreal?

Mr. CARDIN: All below Montreal. The St. Lawrence above Montreal is under the control of the Department of Public Works.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): This item would not in any way affect the determination of where the terminal is going to be?

Mr. ROBB: Not at all.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Is it possible for the minister to give us some further information with respect to the increases in wages? To the crews of what vessels do these increases apply, and what is the nature of the work the men are doing?

Mr. CARDIN: The house will recall that last year I asked for a certain amount to equalize the pay received by the captains, engineers and crews of all our vessels. The officers and men of our vessels in British Columbia were receiving higher pay than the rates received by the officers and men on our vessels in eastern Canada, and particularly on vessels employed on the St. Lawrence. I asked for a certain amount for the purpose of increasing the salaries of the men working on what we call the Dominion steamers and it was granted. The Dominion steamers are supposed to look after the maintenance of the lighthouses and buoys on the St. Lawrence river. After these increases in salaries had been granted representations were made to us that the wages of the captains, engineers and crews of the dredges and tugs used on the St. Lawrence channel should also be increased to the same rates. We thought this request was absolutely justified, and we decided to increase all salaries on the dredges and tugs working on the St. Lawrence river. That is the reason for the increase granted to the officers and men of these ships operating on the St. Lawrence.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The increase was granted in order to bring their pay up to the British Columbia rates?

Mr. CARDIN: Precisely.

Mr. McQUARRIE: These men do not come under the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. CARDIN: Under the law the captains, engineers and crews are not under the control of the Civil Service Commission. The majority of them are part time employees.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Are they temporary employees?

Mr. CARDIN: They are seasonal employees.

Mr. McQUARRIE: We have the same thing in British Columbia, and there is quite an agitation in that province on the part of these employees to be placed under the Civil Service Commission so that they would enjoy the advantages of superannuation, and other benefits. Has that matter been considered by the minister?

Mr. CARDIN: Representations have been made to the department that the captains and engineers particularly on these boats should be given the advantage of the Superannuation Act, but the matter has not been decided yet; it is under consideration.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Why the captains and engineers and not the rest of the men employed on these vessels?

Mr. CARDIN: The captains and engineers, in a sense, are more permanent employees than the ordinary sailor. After a vessel has been laid up for the winter, very often these officers look after it and direct the repairs which may be required while the ship is laid up. That is why a distinction is made between these classes of employees.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I know that in British Columbia some of the men have been in the employ of the government for ten or fifteen years, and are still temporary employees. They are not entitled to any superannuation.

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Mr. McQUARRIE: They are not entitled to annual holidays which are allowed, I think, to the captains and the engineers. The ordinary sailor does not receive the same consideration at all that the captain or the engineer does. I suppose there is the same agitation in the east that there is in the west with respect to the matters of which I have spoken. I must say that with us there has been quite a strong demand that these men be placed under the Civil Service Commission. Another matter that has come up relates to certain men employed on these vessels having to work on Sundays. Does the same condition prevail in the east as in the west in that connection?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. POWER: They work seven days in the week.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Contrary to the provisions of the order in council, without being allowed anything extra for working on Sunday?

Mr. CARDIN: No, they are paid by the month.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Has the attention of the minister been directed to the order in council in that connection, which provides that no man shall be employed on Sunday without being allowed off on another day or given compensation?

[Mr. McQuarrie.]

Mr. MANION: Is it true, as some people claim, that the Sundays are longer in British Columbia than they are in Quebec?

Mr. McQUARRIE: I do not know why they should be. Is the minister willing to discuss that matter?

Mr. CARDIN: I am not in a position to discuss the matter to-day.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I notice that with us, all these matters come under the Public Works department?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Down in the east they come under the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Does that only apply to the St. Lawrence?

Mr. CARDIN: Well, the jurisdiction of the Department of Marine and Fisheries extends only to the channel of the St. Lawrence from Montreal down to the gulf. The rest of the St. Lawrence is under the control of the Department of Public Works; and in British Columbia, as well as in the maritime provinces, that department looks after the dredging of the channels, the care of the wharves, and everything else.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Do the vessels engaged in dredging look after the lighthouses and buoys on the St. Lawrence river?

Mr. CARDIN: No. We have special steamers, called Dominion steamers, that look after the maintenance of the lighthouses and the providing of them with supplies. This appropriation relates only to the dredging fleet.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): That is why I am asking the question. The minister said that he had to increase the pay of the captains and others who look after the lighthouses and buoys.

Mr. CARDIN: Their salaries were increased.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Has this money already been paid?

Mr. CARDIN: Practically as far as salaries are concerned. Certain accounts for supplies and materials have not been paid.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Last year we voted $1,500,000 for this item and the increase is $400,000, or quite a large percentage. I am not objecting to the expenditure of the money if it was required for the purposes of the St.

Lawrence, but I should like to know how the department manages to spend such a large sum in excess of the amount voted by parliament. The minister said on the previous item that the money had not been spent; that there were accounts to pay. As regards this item he says that the amount has practically all been paid out. It is quite evident that the work of dredging the St. Lawrence is done in the summer and it was stopped some three or four months ago at least. Therefore I should like to know why, the Minister of Finance knowing that, the Department of Marine and Fisheries should get such a large amount without a governor general's warrant to cover this sum which they have expended in excess of the amount voted by parliament.

Mr. CARDIN: Frankly, I am not quite clear as to the exact procedure which is followed by the accountants and other officers of the department, but I understand, as was indicated by my good friend a moment ago, they are taking an amount which is appropriated in one place and transferring it to another vote. Of course accounts for supplies and materials are not paid; payment has been delayed on these, but salaries have been paid out of money provided in some other vote.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: How much do the unpaid accounts amount to under this item?

Mr. CARDIN: I could not say at the moment.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Perhaps the Minister of Finance will explain how they are able, without a governor general's warrant, to spend this sum of money over and above the estimate voted by parliament.

Mr. ROBB: I am really unable to explain, but I repeat the statement made a moment ago that they urged the granting of a governor general's warrant after parliament had been called. We thought it was proper that they should wait until parliament met.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: This item of $400,000 is a large item and the department must have known long ago they had overrun the amount voted by parliament. This cannot have happened in the last few days or just before parliament opened.

Mr. CARDIN: I may add by way of explanation that in an item that is voted by the house for certain things, an amount is included for wages and the balance is for materials. Probably the amount which was provided for materials and supplies was used for wages and we may be short on the money necessary to pay for materials and supplies. Sometimes we may provide a certain amount we expect will be required for the repair of a boat and we discover later that the amount is not sufficient. That may be a reason why at certain times we have not enough money.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am not objecting to the expenditure. I suppose it was spent for purposes of the St. Lawrence river. I am objecting to the fact that the vote of parliament of last year has been over-expended by such a large sum as $400,000 apparently without any reference to the Department of Finance, or without the obtaining of a governor general's warrant.

Item agreed to.

Fisheries—salaries and disbursements of fishery officers and guardians, fisheries patrol and fisheries protection services—further amount required, $50,000.

Mr. STEVENS: What is this for?

Mr. CARDIN: Owing to unusually intensive salmon fishing in British Columbia where 2,252 more licenses for fishing were issued than in the previous year, it became necessary to use more boats and to employ more assistants than was expected; also particularly in the maritime provinces it was found essential to spend more than was expected in safeguarding sport and commercial fisheries. The expenditure at the end of February was practically $850,000; at least $60,000 will be required to meet the March accounts, making a total of $910,000, or $50,000 more than the appropriation.

Item agreed to.

Labour — Annuities Act — further amount required, $15,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: We ought to have an explanation of this item.

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Minister of Labour): This is chiefly due to increased business in selling annuities. This carries with it increased help and increased commissions. We have increased the business this year by 145 per cent and consequently the commissions have also increased somewhat.

Mr. CHAPLIN: How much does 145 per cent mean in dollars? What is the business this year?

Mr. HEENAN: Over three million dollars.

Mr. HEAPS: How many people took out annuities last year?

Mr. HEENAN: I am not quite sure of the number last year. It was about one thousand altogether.

Mr. HEAPS: What was the total amount of money these people paid to the government?

Mr. HEENAN: I am not sure of that.

Mr. HEAPS: I want to find out how much it cost to get the business. This sum of $15,000 seems quite an amount of money to pay for it.

Mr. HEENAN: This is not all for commissions. Travelling expenses and expenses of that nature are included.

Mr. HEAPS: It was part of the cost of getting the business?

Mr. HEENAN: Yes.

Mr. CHAPLIN: There must be some basis of profit in this business. What amount of profit would be made to justify the payment of $15,000 of expenses?

Mr. HEENAN: There are no profits made at all on the annuities. The system is run practically at cost, the government paying for the administration.

Mr. CHAPLIN: There must be something to balance the expenses of the proposition.

Mr. HEENAN: The government bears all the expenses.

Mr. CHAPLIN: If that is the position, then the sooner the government gets out of the business the better.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think when the minister brings down his estimates and has his explanation before him he will find that the rates were based upon the actuarial rates as applicable in Great Britain and other places. The general feeling has been that the rates have been a little too high, and that we are not doing nearly as much business as we ought to be doing, and that the government is making a profit out of it, but I personally do not know.

Mr. GEARY: Is there any loading of the premium for expenses?

Mr. HEENAN: No.

Mr. HEAPS: I would ask the minister, when he brings down his estimates, to provide the committee with the information we have asked for this afternoon.

Mr. HEENAN: Yes. I should just like to make it clear that we do not load the premium for the expenses. The government bears the cost.

Mr. GEARY: What was the total estimate last year for which this is a supplementary?

[Mr. Heenan.]

Mr. HEENAN: The amount last year was $25,000.

Mr. GEARY: This amount is for acquiring new business?

Mr. HEENAN: Yes, practically.

Mr. GEARY: It has nothing to do with carrying the old business?

Mr. HEENAN: No.

Mr. GEARY: How do you carry the old business?

Mr. HEENAN: I did not expect this matter to come up to-day; I would prefer to give a full explanation when the main estimates are under consideration. There are accounts in hand unpaid amounting to $3,200; advertising, $4,500; salaries $2,500; commissions to agents, $5,000.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): What is the scale of commissions paid to agents?

Mr. HEENAN: One per cent on one kind of annuity and two per cent on another. We have been paying one per cent for years to the postmasters.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Have you agents in addition to the postmasters who are devoting all their time to this work?

Mr HEENAN: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): And you pay them on a commission basis?

Mr. HEENAN: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): And no salary?

Mr. HEENAN: We have trained a few returned soldiers in the office giving them $120 or $125 a month while training and afterwards they go out and solicit business on commission.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I quite approve of the extension of the government annuity system. How many men are now working on commission and where are they working? Do they cover the whole of Canada?

Mr. HEENAN: We have one at Quebec, Vancouver, Regina, Winnipeg, two or three in Toronto, and two in Montreal. We are gradually extending the system.

Item agreed to.

Indians—New Brunswick — relief — further amount required, $3,000; medical attendance and medicines—further amount required, $3,000.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I notice under several of these items an amount for the relief of destitute Indians. Has there been a general epidemic among the Indians all over the Dominion of Canada during the last year, or is this just the usual vote? Do we have to give this relief every year?

Mr. ROBB: As my hon. friend knows, the Indians are the wards of the government, and we have to meet their requirements as they come along from time to time. I know that in preparing the estimates we keep the amount down as low as possible. The explanation I have before me, in the absence of the minister, is that this further amount is required for medical attendance due to the fact that the appropriation of $32,700 already granted is inadequate.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Perhaps my question might better come under item 392.

Item agreed to.

Prince Edward Island—medical attendance and medicines—further amount required, $800.

Mr. QUINN: Does this means that the Indian population of Prince Edward Island is growing? The general population of the island is not. Why this increased appropriation for the Indians?

Mr. ROBB: The explanation I have before me from the department is that the amount already granted for medical attendance and medicine has been exhausted, and this further amount is required to meet the expenses for the balance of the year. I have no information as to the numbers of the Indian population on the island, but my colleague the minister will be prepared to give that information when we come to the main estimates.

Mr. QUINN: There seems to be no policy of retrenchment on the part of the government. Every year the amounts voted under these and other heads are increasing. If this government is in earnest in adopting a policy of retrenchment, it might as well begin here.

Item agreed to.

Ontario and Quebec—hospitals and medical attendance—further amount required, $8,000; repairs to roads and bridges and drainage—further amount required, $2,000.

Mr. QUINN: I register the same objection against this item. The Indian population is not increasing in Ontario and Quebec, and why should there be an increase in the vote?

Mr. ROBB: The memorandum I have before me states that $8,000 is required to complete the plant and build an ice house in connection with the hospital which is being constructed on the Six Nations reserve. The amount of $19,030 has already been voted for this purpose. The amount of $2,000 is required to compensate the Indians for lands that have been taken in connection with the construction of a highway through the Caughnawaga reserve.

Item agreed to.

Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and Northwest Territories—supplies for destitute Indians—further amount required, $40,000; hospitals, medical attendance and medicines — further amount required, $30,000.

Mr. QUINN: I register the same objection here against increasing the votes in this or any other branch of the government.

Mr. ROBB: The appropriation of $163,450 for providing supplies for destitute Indians has been exhausted, and a further amount of $40,000 is required for this purpose. An appropriation of $35,000 was voted to establish a hospital at Isle a la Crosse, but owing to difficulties of operating in that remote region the cost has exceeded the appropriation, and the department estimates that $30,000 is required to complete the work.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Is this vote for destitute Indians something that we are up against every year? Are we up against the same thing so far as the Indians of the west are concerned, or have we to make an appropriation every year for destitute Indians in the prairie provinces and British Columbia? If it is an unusual case, what has brought it about?

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) is not present, but as I am somewhat familiar with the situation which arises in the northern part of the prairie provinces, I may be permitted to answer my hon. friend. He will notice that this vote also includes the Northwest Territories. While within the prairie provinces this destitution on the part of the Indians cannot be said to be of regular occurrence, there may be in any area a greater or less degree of it, depending sometimes upon the extent of forest or prairie fires, sometimes upon the movement of game, and upon other factors. When I was at Churchill last summer I saw a band of Chipewayan Indians—probably the furthest north Indians we have. They were in pretty poor shape, the preceding winter having been bad for them, and they were anxiously awaiting the incoming Hudson bay steamer in order to get the wherewithal to carry along. In fact the Hudson's Bay Company had given them a considerable credit in advance. They are not a very provident people. I am not now speaking of the British Columbia tribes; the hon.

members from that province know that the situation there is somewhat different. But in the Northwest Territories and the extreme north of the prairie provinces they are not nearly as self-sustaining as the Indians further south in the same provinces.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Do they provide food for themselves by raising corn?

Mr. DUNNING: Not that far north; they do nothing in the way of farming or tillage. In the southern parts of the prairie provinces the Indians engage in farming quite extensively under the Department of Indian Affairs; but the northern tribes live in a primitive fashion, hunting and fishing, and do not put aside from a season of plenty anything to provide for a season of scarcity. You may have destitution in one tribe, and another tribe fifty miles away may be enjoying plenty during the same season.

Mr. STEVENS: I wish to draw the attenof the Minister of Finance to a rather striking feature of this vote. I am not complaining of providing the necessary funds to look after these destitute Indians. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) suggests, and I have no doubt in perfectly good faith, that there may be a bad season when the vote would be overtaxed. In this case we are dealing with a supplementary estimate of $40,000 for supplies to destitute Indians. If the minister will turn to next year's estimates he will find that the department has provided for an increase in that vote of $40,000. In other words, as soon as parliament grants assistance for a year, that amount is carried in as the minimum for next year, and at the end of next year the department comes along for a further increase, and I suppose it goes on indefinitely. That is one of the things that governments must watch. The Minister of Finance and the Minister of Railways and their colleagues will, I know, agree with me that after all it is the duty of parliament to criticize these things.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Mr. STEVENS: Here we are faced with a glaring example of what I have referred to. The department does not know what it will require next year any better than it knew last year, but it puts in this vote an additional $40,000 for supplies to destitute Indians, which is the exact amount it is now asking in the supplementaries for the present year; and under hospitals the department has asked for an additional $20,000 for next year. I think the minister ought to be prepared to reduce that vote when we come to it, because it looks to me as if we were just providing a basis for the continued increase of these items.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend speaks quite sympathetically with respect to the government's duty in relation to the various departments. Those of us who are members of the treasury board have occasion to watch the kind of thing to which he refers. But I might point out that there is criticism from two angles. A little while ago there was criticism with respect to the $1,600,000 asked for pensions. I am in a position to speak with knowledge that that $1,600,000 vote comes about by reason of the treasury board last year having taken precisely the attitude that my hon. friend says, and I think very properly, we should take in endeavouring to hold these votes down. The same is true with regard to the item now before us. I may say by way of explanation, in order that we may be fair to all departments, that the treasury board of the present government in reviewing the estimates looks back over the experience of the preceding five years in connection with each one of these votes. I presume that when we come to the main estimate to which my hon. friend refers my colleague will be here and will be able to give him full information about it. But I thought it would be of interest to the committee to know that in dealing with the estimates generally the treasury board takes that course.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What is the Indian population?

Mr. ROBB: I have not those figures. They will be available on the main estimates.

Item agreed to.

British Columbia—relief to destitute Indians —further amount required, $5,000; medical attendance, medicines and hospitals—further amount required, $15,000.

Mr. ROBB: The additional amount of $5,000 required for relief is to supplement the vote of $45,000 already granted which, it is explained, is inadequate. The amount of $106,700 already granted for medical attendance is insufficient, and the department states that $15,000 additional will be required.

Mr. CANTLEY: Mr. Chairman, may I ask how the Indians in Nova Scotia are looked after? Nothing is here provided for them.

Mr. ROBB: There are no Indians in Nova Scotia.

Mr. CANTLEY: Kedus, ukwis Micmac soolajookun welos putawa sesmogun castome tamawa seowwn—Yes, yes my son Micmac needs his food, tea, sugar, molasses, tobacco, many things.

Item agreed to.

Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment—unemployment relief—further amount required, $200,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that this item is absolutely necessary, and I have no doubt also that if I had been here at the time I would have found that representations were made that the assistance afforded by the main estimates was entirely inadequate. But I think the committee should get some explanation as to where this unemployment exists, and in what lines of activity.

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment): This item is to assist pensioners who are out of employment. It has been voted from year to year, and a supplementary is not unknown; in fact each year the vote has been supplemented because over expended. The expenditures have been made largely in Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Edmonton and Vancouver. Last year about $400,000 was expended. We expect it will run very nearly the same this year. In addition to the vote of $250,000 we are asking for a supplementary of $200,000. I understand that on March 1 this year we had just $50,000 left, which will probably take us through.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Out of this supplementary?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes; that will probably take us through to the end of March, when the relief ceases for the year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps my hon. friend will explain that item a little more clearly. In the first place he had a vote of $250,000 in the main estimates, and that is all spent?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then we have a supplementary of $200,000 of which $150,000 has already been spent—

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: —and $50,000 left to clean up this month. Will my hon. friend tell me where he got the $150,000 which he paid out in advance of this vote?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is carried in the books of the department. This is a vote for an expenditure already made.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is carried in the books, but how? It must be an overdraft.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Where did the money come from to afford that overdraft? It must have come from the treasury board. Then we shall have to ask the treasury board under what system moneys can be made available and kept available without a vote or a governor general's warrant. I ask as a matter of curiosity.

Mr. ROBB: I take my colleague's word that the amount is paid, although I really do not know personally. However, I will be frank with the committee and agree that it is not good business to include a relief vote in your estimates, to dazzle the eyes of the public from one end of Canada to the other, and for that reason we will pursue the same policy this year and keep the vote as low as possible, trusting to parliament when we come back.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend with his inimitable smile is dodging the issue. Where did he get that $150,000? There was neither vote nor warrant for it. Of course, if he had got a warrant for it there would be no question of dazzling the eyes of the unemployed.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The $250,000 voted in the main estimates in all probability provided the funds to carry us well into January. After the house opens it is not possible to have a warrant, and that would explain the vote.

Mr. MANION: I would suggest that in future, in dealing with unemployment of this nature, the government should hold a secret session to discuss the question, because I remember only recently when some of us mentioned the fact that there was unemployment in the country we were accused of being unpatriotic and were told that we were not only driving people out of the country but preventing prospective immigrants from coming to Canada. If the government wants to be consistent they should have some other way of covering these votes than the method they are now adopting. I suggest that next year, when the unemployment vote comes up, unless the government wish us to apply the tu quoque argument to them and charge them with a want of patriotism for implying that there is such a thing as unemployment in Canada, they should adopt a secret method of having the money voted in the house.

Mr. CHAPLIN: They are covering up the payments pretty well.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): They might have the relief vote printed in the Chinese language.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Is the unemployment relief applicable to pensioners or to returned soldiers generally?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It applies largely to pensioners.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Is it denied to soldiers who are not pensioners?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is applied to unemployed disabled ex-members of the forces, pensioners, to provide shelter, fuel, food, clothing and so forth. It goes largely to pensioners although there may be exceptions; an ex-member of the force who is down and out might be given relief.

Mr. ADSHEAD: It is not applicable to ordinary returned men who are out of employment? I know returned soldiers who are out of work and if this applies to them I want to put them in touch with it.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It does not apply to them.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I would suggest that the minister use his influence with, say, the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) to give employment to returned soldiers, as he is supposed to do under the act, and not turn them down and give the preference to those who have not served at all, as he has done and is doing right along.

Mr. VENIOT: As my hon. friend did in his time.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, in 1921 when you were a member of the government.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Not at all.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, you did.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): If the Postmaster General's authority for other statements is no better than his authority for this one, he is not on very safe ground.

Mr. VENIOT: I am on safe ground.

Mr. POWER: Did you have a pull with the government?

Item agreed to.

Unforeseen expenses—further amount required, $25,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: What are governor general's warrants for? In our time they covered unforeseen expenses. It is all right to put unforeseen expenses in the estimates because there are always contingencies arising which you cannot anticipate; but these and unforeseen expenses turn up during the year. Governor general's warrants are for unforeseen necessary expenses, but not for moneys borrowed from the bank, parliament afterwards being asked to pass a vote.

Mr. ROBB: When I explain what this is my hon. friend will appreciate the necessity for the vote. This is an additional amount required to pay outstanding accounts, largely in connection with overseas visitors whom I need not mention. Most of the accounts have been incurred since parliament assembled.

Mr. STEVENS: Under the item in the main estimates it is provided that the expenditure under "unforeseen expenses" shall be under order in council on the recommendation of the treasury board, a detailed statement to be laid before parliament within fifteen days of "the next session." The amount was $110,000 last year.

Mr. ROBB: The details have been tabled.

Item agreed to.

Canada Grain Act—further amount required, $175,000.

Mr. STEVENS: I trust the minister will have a pretty complete explanation to make of this item, but before he speaks I will call attention to the main vote. Last year the vote was $1,500,000 and we have a vote now of $175,000. I notice that the main estimates this year have been increased by $355,000.

Mr. DUNNING: Business is growing.

Mr. STEVENS: I presume it is but the item is a large one and the increases predicted for next year are considerable. The whole subject deserves a fair explanation.

Mr. MALCOLM: The treasury board did not give all the money we asked for and the additional amount is required for this reason: The estimated requirements of the Board of Grain Commissioners had been reduced by $150,000, but the crop of last year as all hon. members know, was rather more difficult to handle than formerly. There was a good deal of damp grain, and the number of moisture testing machines that had to be installed, as well as the extra men who were employed to handle the crop, undoubtedly increased the cost of administration of the Canada Grain Act. There will be no profit, no money returned from last year's vote. The fees probably will not quite meet the expenses of administering the act, and I doubt whether there will be very much change next year. More service has been demanded each passing year, and with more tough grain and a greater demand for grain drying the cost of administering the Canada Grain Act will increase The total amount asked for was $1,654,600; there was voted $1,504,000. Up to January 31 we had expended $1,421,000 and had available on that date only $82,000. We estimate February and March to take about $258,000, which, less the amount we have available, means that we require $175,838.

Mr. MILLAR: I would like to ask the minister if he has the figures to show whether the grain is carrying itself, whether the fees equal the amount voted.

Mr. MALCOLM: This year there will be a deficit; the fees will not equal the vote.

Mr. McGIBBON: Is it the policy of the department to make the fees cover the cost of operation?

Mr. MALCOLM: Yes, and in the past there has been a substantial surplus although we have never charged interest on the elevators or on any of the equipment. There has been a substantial profit but not of late years.

Mr. McGIBBON: Does that include the interest on the capital invested in the elevators?

Mr. MALCOLM: I think so.

Item agreed to.

Governor General's warrants—restoration, old examining warehouse, Montreal, $150,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was the extreme urgency in connection with that old warehouse?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The old examining warehouse was destroyed by fire and it was necessary to replace it as speedily as possible.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Was there no insurance on the building?

Mr ELLIOTT: No.

Item agreed to.

To cover unprovided items, 1926-27, as per Auditor General's report, vol. I, page 3, 1926-27, $222,657.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Will the minister please explain this item?

Mr. ROBB: This is an interesting list, and I observe that one of my colleagues has run away because he did not want to be called upon to explain the first item, which comes under the Department of Agriculture —"International Institute of Agriculture, $3.70." I imagine this is to provide for overdrafts. The remainder of the list is as follows:

Dominion lands; shortage in salaries in Canadian National parks vote, $7,102.59.

Fisheries; shortage in vote for expenses of International Fisheries Commission, $505.80.

Legislation; shortage for expenses of members attending first part of session and for contingencies in printing, $12,164.42.

Lighthouse and coast service; shortage in vote for maintenance and repairs to lighthouses, $30,772.29.

National Defence; shortage in votes for topographical surveys, transport and freight, $2,757.44.

Penitentiaries; shortage in votes for Manitoba and British Columbia penitentiaries; increased number of inmates, $53,515.92.

Pensions; European war pensions, shortage on account of retroactive awards, $115,047.68.

Post Office; shortage in appropriation for miscellaneous outside services, $230.39.

Scientific institutions; shortage in vote for the topographical survey, $361.08.

Public Works, capital; shortage in vote for construction of Esquimalt dry dock, $195.69.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I quite understand that this is chiefly a bookkeeping item to adjust the accounts which have been taken care of, but I am rather puzzled as to why some of these larger amounts were not known before parliament prorogued last year. The smaller items are quite understandable, but does not the minister think some of the larger items must have been known when the house was in session last year, and that they might have been provided for them in the supplementaries?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is only making it more difficult for me to resist the demands which will be made in preparing the estimates this year.

Item agreed to.

Pensions—European war and active militia —further amount required, $1,600,000.

Mr KING (Kootenay): This amount will be paid directly to the pensioners or to their dependants; none of it will be used for administration. I think in our legislation last year we brought to the pension board a number of cases which formerly had not been entitled to attention, and many pensions were made retroactive. During 1925-26 the house voted $1,000,000 for this purpose in the supplementary estimates, and in 1926-27, $500,000. I do not know that it is possible to estimate exactly what the amount will be, but I think it has been the desire of parliament that these pensions should be fair and reasonable. They should not be excessive, but they should meet the situation, and this supplementary item will take care of them for this year. I repeat that none of this money will be used for administration; if hon. members will turn to page 8 of the report of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment a statement will be found showing the cost of administration, under the various headings.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The minister has made a wordy statement, but I cannot make out one word of explanation in it.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): What would my hon. friend like to know?

Mr. CHAPLIN: I would like to know what this $1,600,000 will be used for?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It will be spent in paying pensions to the pensioners or their dependants. That is the explanation.

Item agreed to.

Railways—Maritime Freight Rates Act:

Amount required to provide for payment of the difference, estimated by the Board of Railway Commissioners and certified by the said board to the Minister of Railways and Canals, occurring on account of the application of the Maritime Freight Rates Act, between the tariff tolls and the normal tolls (referred to in section 9 of the said act) on all traffic moved during the period July 1, 1927, to December 31, 1927, under the tariffs approved, by the following companies:—

Atlantic Quebec & Western Railway, $9,974.20; Canada & Gulf Terminal Railway, $890.39; Canadian Pacific Railway, including Fredericton & Grand Lake Coal and Railway Co., New Brunswick Coal and Railway Company, $130,962.64; Cumberland Railway & Coal Co., $13.597.03; Dominion Atlantic Railway, $86,971.71; Maritime Coal Railway & Power Co., $10,980.96; Quebec Oriental Railway Co., $4,905.52; Sydney & Louisburg Railway, $150,408; Témiscouata Railway, $12,964.11—total $421,654.56.

Mr. GARDINER: Will the minister give us an explanation of this amount? Is this for the six months period?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I had the estimate drawn in what I thought was a self-explanatory fashion, but possibly a word of explanation is necessary. The passing of the Maritime Freight Rates Act at the last session involved the making of payments by the government to the Canadian National Railway under one section, and to the other railways operating within this territory under another section of the act. No provision was made last session for the six months of 1927 commencing July 1 and ending December 31; it was not possible to deal with it at the time the bill finally went through the house. All the railways have been complaining, that we compelled them by this legislation, in the first instance, to bear the 20 per cent reduction themselves for a year, and hence they are out upon the amount represented by that reduction. In order to meet that situation, or at least to meet it more nearly than is now the case, we propose to bring down estimates for the fiscal year 1928-29 providing for the amounts which we estimate will be required upon the certificate of the railway commission for the calendar year 1928, in order that the railways may be paid these amounts more promptly and not compelled to carry such a large amount as is seen here. I have before me the certificate of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada with respect to the amounts we are now discussing. It reads as follows:

February 27, 1928.

DEAR SIR,—

Pursuant to the authority contained in your letter to me, dated February 14, 1928, you will please find hereto attached the certificate which, under the provisions of the Maritime Freight Rates Act, 1927, s. 9 ss. 3, the Board of Railway Commissioners is directed to forward to the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals at the end of each calendar year in respect of the difference between the normal tolls and the tariff tolls on all traffic moved by railway companies owning or operating lines of railway in, or extending into the select territory, as defined by the act.

I am also directed to forward herewith two copies of the detailed statements filed by the said railway companies respectively in support of their claims.

Mr. GEARY: Is that letter dated February 27th?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, February 27, 1928.

Mr. GEARY: Was that the first intimation the minister had of that amount?

Mr. DUNNING: I wrote to the Board of Railway Commissioners—I have not a copy of my letter here—asking them for a submission as soon as possible. Under the law they were compelled to certify as soon as possible after the close of the calendar year, and of course the length of time involved in the year 1927 was from the 1st of July to the 31st of December only. I wrote to them asking when I could expect this certified statement to enable me to put before the House of Commons the necessary estimates and have the money voted.

Mr. GEARY: How did that amount come to the knowledge of the Minister of Finance so as to enable him to make up his supposed surplus in preparing his budget speech?

Mr. DUNNING: I can assure my hon. friend that the Minister of Finance made allowance for it. I think I can go further, and say that the Minister of Finance was very conservative in his statement regarding his surplus, as the end of the fiscal year will reveal.

Mr. GEARY: There was some information available.

Mr. DUNNING: It is just an estimate of course.

Mr. KAISER: In the item there are a number of railways mentioned. Are these railways branches of the Canadian national railway system or are they privately owned roads?

Mr. DUNNING: The lines in the vote we are now dealing with are not branches of the Canadian National Railways at all. They are all railways included in section 9 of the Maritime Freight Rates Act, which reads as follows:

> Other companies owning or operating lines of railway in or extending into the select territory may file with the board tariffs of tolls respecting freight movements similar to the preferred movements, meeting the statutory rates referred to in section seven of this act.

My hon. friend will remember that last session we made provision not only for the Canadian National Railway, but for all the other railway companies operating within the area in which these special rates apply, to have the right to meet and reduce the rates if they desire to do so and come under the provisions of the act with respect to the 20 per cent.

Mr. KAISER: Was it ever the understanding that if any of these railways made application, parliament was to make up that particular difference?

Mr. DUNNING: That is what the law, which was passed unanimously last session, says.

Mr. McGIBBON: Were there any railways that did not take advantage of the provision?

Mr. DUNNING: I believe they are all under it now. There was some reluctance on the part of some of them, and they did not all come under it on the first of July, on account of the fact which I mentioned previously, that they were compelled to carry the 20 per cent themselves and to be out the interest on it until parliament voted the money. I think they may now be said to be all in.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Is the amount of $3,471,400.87 the actual amount which the Dominion government will have to pay for a period of six months because we reduced the freight rates to the maritimes 20 per cent?

Mr. DUNNING: No; I should make that clear. Perhaps if my hon. friend would wait until he reads the next item, which deals with the Canadian National Railway, the explanation will be a little clearer than it would be at this stage when I am dealing with railways other than the Canadian National.

Mr. GARDINER: If the minister would file the certificate from the Board of Railway Commissioners hon. members would have an opportunity of looking at it.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend means more than the certificate; he means the amounts as well.

Mr. GARDINER: I mean both. When this legislation was before the house last year it was pointed out by the minister that the cost to the country of this reduction would be something like $2,400,000. Has the minister any information in regard to the amount of tonnage moved in the six months period dealt with, compared with previous six months periods?

Mr. DUNNING: I do not like to differ from my hon. friend as to what I estimated last year, but my memory is that I stated that we estimated close to 2½ million dollars for the Canadian National Railway for the whole year due to the 20 per cent reduction, and approximately half a million for the Canadian Pacific Railway. I think that is what I said. In any event, the experience of the first six months would indicate $1,350,000 for that period. If my hon. friend will add together the two amounts in votes 404 and 405 he will arrive at the total cost to Canada of the 20 per cent reduction under the Maritime Freight Rates Act for a period of six months.

Mr. CANTLEY: On all lines?

Mr. DUNNING: On all lines. Of course I must qualify that by saying that not all lines came in by the first of July.

Mr. KAISER: Will the same condition obtain year after year?

Mr. DUNNING: So long as the Maritime Freight Rates Act remains on the statute books, so long will these payments be made year by year in exactly the terms set forth in the estimates now before the committee. The estimate is worded to follow accurately in every particular the language of the statute.

Mr. KAISER: At the present time there is a certain tonnage. That tonnage means so much money. Supposing the tonnage increases and the railways earn more money, shall we have to go on paying these deficits?

Mr. DUNNING: Will my hon. friend allow this question to stand until we come to the Canadian National vote? It is much easier to deal with the general deficit on eastern lines under the vote which relates to it. In connection with the other railways all that the government does, when authorized by parliament, is to pay the 20 per cent; but in connection with the Canadian National we pay under the terms of the act two amounts: first, the amount represented by the 20 per cent freight reduction, and, second, the deficit on the eastern lines which are segregated for accounting purposes under the act. I will come to that when we reach the next two items.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does the Board of Railway Commissioners undertake a scrutiny of the accounts submitted to them in connection with this 20 per cent reduction?

Mr. DUNNING: They undertake a detailed audit. In fact I have had to provide for more staff for them in order to carry this out.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Can the minister tell the committee whether the original statements submitted to the railway commission by the railways have been accepted in full? Is the amount contained in these estimates the actual amount submitted by the railways?

Mr. DUNNING: I am afraid I cannot say that accurately.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

NIAGARA FALLS MEMORIAL BRIDGE COMPANY

Mr. G. H. PETTIT (Welland) moved the third reading of bill No. 14, to incorporate the Niagara Falls Memorial Bridge Company.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): I beg to move, in amendment, Mr. Speaker:

That the said bill be not now read a third time, but be referred back to the committee of the whole with instructions to amend it so as to insert the following in substitution of section 20 of said bill:—

The employment of labour in the construction, maintenance and supervision of the said bridge shall be subject to the terms and conditions of the fair wage clauses set forth in the order in Council, No. 1206, of June 7th, 1922, and any amendments thereto, and so far as it may be practical to do so, Canadian materials and labour must be used in the construction of the said bridge, and a certified statement shall be sent weekly to the Department of Labour giving the names and addresses of firms supplying materials and the quantity thereof.

As the house was proceeding to divide on the amendment of Mr. Heaps:

Mr. SPEAKER: I must say that when I put the question a moment ago and called for the yeas and nays, I thought the nays had it. I have since been informed by the promoter of the bill that he has no objection to the amendment, so if the house is also agreeable to accepting the amendment, no vote need be taken.

Mr. ROBB: I may say on behalf of the government that we have no objection.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question now is on the main motion as amended.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, the question being proposed that Bill No. 14, to incorporate the Niagara Falls Memorial Bridge Company be now read a third time, I move in amendment thereto, seconded by the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Kellner):

That the said bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred to the committee of the whole for the purpose of amending it by striking out from section 12 of said bill all words after the word, "directors", in the eighth line of the said section 12 and by inserting in place thereof the words following:

"but no such issue or allotment of shares as fully or partly paid up shall be valid or binding upon the company

(a) Unless before any such issue or allotment of shares shall have been made as fully or partly paid up otherwise than in cash, the company shall have filed in the office of the Secretary of State a contract in writing, duly executed by the parties thereto, setting forth the considerations other than cash for which the company is about to issue and allot such shares as fully or partly paid up; nor

(b) Unless in each and every case in which the company shall allot or issue shares upon the footing that the whole or some part thereof shall be credited as paid for a consideration other than cash, such consideration shall be received and credited by the company at not more than its then actual cash value;

(c) And, in case the foregoing provisions of this section are not complied with, the holders of the shares so issued shall be liable to the company and to its creditors to the amount of the par value of the shares held by them respectively."

If hon. members will look at section 12 of the bill as it is now before the house they will find that it reads:

The directors may issue as paid-up stock shares of the capital stock of the company in payment for any businesses, franchises, undertakings, rights, powers, privileges, letters patent, inventions, real estate, stocks, assets and other properties which the company may lawfully acquire, and may, for such considerations, allot and hand over such shares to any person or corporation, or its shareholders or directors; and any such issue or allotment of stock shall be binding upon the company and such stock shall not be assessable for calls, nor shall the holder thereof be liable in any way thereon; or the company may pay therefor wholly or partly in paid-up shares or wholly or partly in debentures, as may be agreed upon.

It is clear that this clause gives power to the company to allocate stock to individuals for certain considerations other than cash. Those considerations other than cash may be very much overvalued. My amendment merely provides: first, that a statement of the contract between the parties concerned and the company shall be filed with the Secretary of State specifying such considerations; next, that a definite value shall be placed upon the considerations by the company; and, third, that if such value appears to be excessive the holders of the shares so overvalued shall be liable to the company. Considering the extent to which stock has been watered in the past generation or so, and in view of the general public objection to the practice, I think that this parliament would be remiss in its duty if it failed to check this sort of thing as far as it could. Passed in its original form the bill would open the door to all kinds of stock watering and stock manipulation. I therefore urge the house to accept my amendment. It does not prevent the company from proceeding with its business but it sees to it that the company shall conduct business in a proper legal manner.

Mr. DUNNING: The house a few moments ago resolved to go into committee to do a certain thing. The house has not yet been in committee and—

Mr. SPEAKER: I may tell the hon. member that by the notices given I know there are four amendments to be moved and I think that the house should dispose of these before going into committee. the moment the house decides the points raised by said amendments it will go into committee.

Mr. DUNNING: If the house, having decided to go into committee on one amendment, declines to do so on the next, does that estop consideration in committee of that first motion?

Mr. SPEAKER: No; after these amendments are disposed of, the order of the house to refer the bill back to the committee will operate.

Mr. KAISER: May I ask the mover of the amendment whether it has been drawn up by a legal gentleman?

Mr. IRVINE: Is that a question?

Mr. KAISER: Are we being asked to pronounce upon an amendment covering matters which, in my opinion at any rate, the hon. gentleman knows nothing of? I protest against the house being fed on infantile material such as this. Are we going to upset a proposition which has been considered by men capable of studying it, and carry an amendment coming from a gentleman whom I consider to be absolutely incapable even of understanding it?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. KAISER: I ask—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member has referred in unparliamentary terms to certain members in this corner of the house. I myself have not spoken on the bill; had I done so, possibly I might have incurred the hon. gentleman's displeasure. He says that members in this corner are incapable—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —of understanding or dealing with such matters. I submit that it is not in keeping with the dignity of the house that certain members should be spoken of in these terms. We are all presumably quite capable of considering the business that comes before the house and the hon. member ought not to refer in the way he has done to hon. members with regard to a motion which is introduced in all seriousness and which the mover has every right to propose.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: May I correct my hon. friend? No reference was made to members in any particular corner of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: From what I heard of the remarks of the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Kaiser) I did not infer that he was criticising any hon. member in the way suggested. However, I appeal to the Easter spirit and ask hon. members to discuss dispassionately a purely private bill.

Mr. KAISER: I had no thought of including all hon. gentlemen in that corner in the statement I made and I would especially exclude the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), whom most of us regard as a well versed man. I only wish I knew half as much as he thinks he does—

Mr. GARDINER: I rise to a point of order—

Mr. KAISER: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member has made a certain reference to members in this corner and he has used language which in my judgment is not parliamentary. He says that an hon. member is incapable of passing on the question now before the house, I ask that the expression be withdrawn as unparliamentary.

Mr. SPEAKER: In the course of thirty-two years I have heard some severe expressions used in debate, and I must say that I do not consider the remarks of the hon. member for Ontario unparliamentary. There is nothing in what he says that discredits any hon. member.

Mr. IRVINE: May I be permitted to answer this almighty mind?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. KAISER: I asked the hon. gentleman a question. I simply wanted to know whether the amendment has been submitted to a legal or a financial mind; that is all.

Mr. IRVINE: If the hon. member were as brilliant as he would have the house believe he would know at once, without consulting anyone, whether the amendment had been drawn up by a lawyer. No doubt he would be perfectly satisfied if I assured him that the amendment had received legal approval, but I would ask the hon. gentleman to use his own judgment and to consider the amendment on its own merits. Where is his intelligence? Let him apply it to the clause in question and he will discover that the member to whom he has referred slightingly knows just as much as he does, and perhaps a little more. I do not ask anyone to tell me whether a clause is properly drawn or not; I use my own intelligence.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member has exhausted his right to speak. I allowed him to speak as he was replying to a question, but having replied he may not go further.

Mr. IRVINE: This is the answer. I can assure my hon. friend that this clause was drawn—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

[Mr. Kaiser.]

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman having already made that statement, the incident is therefore closed.

Mr. IRVINE: I have not answered the question yet.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): At the risk of being placed in the infantile class by my hon. friend from Ontario (Mr. Kaiser), I wish to state that I have read and considered this amendment on two previous occasions, and I agree entirely with the way in which it is drawn both from a legal and from a financial point of view. This measure is one with which I have no particular concern; I am as anxious as other members may be, coming from various parts of this Dominion, to see measures passed by this house providing for such international communication across the St. Lawrence river wherever it may be required. I do not think I am in a position to judge as to whether this particular measure should be passed on that ground, but I endorse it from the fact that it has been before the private bills committee. They have heard the evidence and have reported to this house that a bill of this character should be passed.

Mr. DIONNE: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CAHAN: This is a bill to incorporate a public service company; it does not incorporate an ordinary trading company, and in respect of every public service or public utility company of this character, coming before the house I insist upon my right as a member of this house to ensure, so far as my voice and my vote may do so, that it shall be organized on a cash basis, and that it shall not be a company which may be watered to any extent which may be desired by the promoters. I think the time has come in this country when we are bound to adopt such a policy as that.

There is no reason in the world why the promoters of this bill need or should be authorized to transfer to the company a single bit of property in payment of its shares. They should subscribe the capital of the company and that capital should be paid up as it is required; they should use that capital when it is paid up to acquire only such property as is necessary to carry out the undertaking which they have in view. The tolls of the company should be subject to the control of the governor in council, as is the case in the present instance, as the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) pointed out in a previous discussion. Furthermore, he has given us the assurance that with respect to these tolls the governor in council will exercise its right to refer these matters for decision to the Board of Railway Commissioners which is competent to hear the evidence and revise the tolls from time to time. But these tolls should be based upon the traffic of a company such as this, upon the income of such a company in respect of its capital which has been paid up, either in money or in actual money's worth.

Therefore I say I am in favour of this amendment, first because in respect of every incorporated company, which we now have in the province of Quebec and in respect of every bond issue by a company under the Companies Act, parliament has insisted that the company shall file, with the provincial secretary in the case of a Quebec company and with the Secretary of State of Canada in the case of a company incorporated under the Companies Act of Canada, a contract showing how, to what extent and for what consideration every share issued has been paid, if paid otherwise than in cash. That enables the government, by a reference to the Secretary of State, to know exactly on what financial basis the company is organized, and it enables any other person interested to ascertain the same fact in the same way. Therefore that section of this measure is in accord with the best legislative precedents which have been established by parliament, and those precedents should be adhered to in the present case.

Then take the next point. The contract should be filed, and if property must necessarily be acquired by an issue of stock, which I regard as unnecessary and inexpedient in the case of a company of this kind, that property should be acquired at something approximating its real or market value. In the incorporation of utility companies such as tramway companies—and in its larger aspect this is a tramway company—in the incorporation of transportation companies of this kind we should insist upon such legislative enactments as will prevent the watering of the stock of such companies.

Mr. PETTIT: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman started to discuss the amendment to section 12, but it strikes me, as I think it must have struck every other hon. member of the house, that he is dealing with everything but the amendment.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Speaker, in order that it may be clear that I am adhering strictly to this amendment, I call your attention to subsection (a) of the amendment and the words immediately preceding it:

—but no such issue or allotment of shares as fully or partly paid up shall be valid or binding upon the company

(a) Unless before any such issue or allotment of shares shall have been made as fully or partly paid up otherwise than in cash, the company shall have filed in the office of the Secretary of State a contract in writing, duly executed by the parties thereto, setting forth the considerations other than cash for which the company is about to issue and allot such shares as fully or partly paid up.

I have dealt with that much. Now, secondly:

Now if you allow the company to issue its paid-up stock for a mere consideration without regard to that principle, by purchasing a bit of land for $500 and turning it in for $2,500,000, or any such scheme as that, then you depart from the principle and policy that should govern parliament in respect of the incorporation of every public utility company of the kind which is organized for carrying on a transportation service in this country.

Mr. DUNNING: Would my hon. friend permit a question? I am very sympathetic with his line of argument, but who would determine the actual cash value for the purposes of this subsection?

Mr. CAHAN: The board of directors who are taking the property would have to assume that risk, and if they turned in property of a nominal or purely fictitious value, then the result would be that the shareholders would be liable not only to the creditors of the company but to the call of its board of directors for the difference between the actual value of the property which they turned in and the par value of the stock which was issued therefor. That is a matter which has come before the courts time and time again, and it is that principle upon which I am relying. That principle applies in respect of every company incorporated in England for any purpose whatsoever. That principle applies to every company incorporated under the Companies Act of the province of Quebec, with which I am more familiar; and I say that that is a proper principle to apply in a country as highly developed as ours with respect to the incorporation of public utility companies the success of which is absolutely assured from the start, as the success of this one is. We have had questions arising in the city of Montreal with regard to the rates or tolls that should be charged by public lighting companies, by waterworks companies, and the rest; and it is impossible I say for the public utilities commission, which has to decide what the rates and tolls shall be, to decide that question of rates or tolls without considering at the same time the capital stock of the company upon which a fair return, or income, or profit should be paid. In order that they may determine what is a fair return or income or dividend to the stockholders of that company, it should be assured from the start that that stock when issued represents money or money value. I think that is a fair principle. If we were incorporating a company in some new part of our northwest where the enterprise was purely speculative, I should probably adopt the policy which was adopted by this parliament many years ago with respect to allowing these companies to pay up for a consideration other than cash or cash value. The question of speculation then enters into it, and to induce men to engage in an enterprise in a new and unsettled country you have to offer probably larger rewards. Before the committee who considered this bill, the promoters said, and the clear inference from the evidence was, that the traffic was awaiting the construction of this bridge, and that that traffic would ensure an adequate recompense or return or revenue upon the entire cost of the bridge almost from the day it was opened. Such being the case, I am myself opposed to any stock watering in connection with this enterprise, or to the enactment of a measure that will permit stock watering and stock jobbing to be carried through.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is on the amendment. Those in favour of the amendment will please say "aye."

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. J. ETIENNE DUSSAULT (Levis): (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to delay the vote, but I ask that the amendment of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) be read in French.

And the amendment having been read in French, the house divided on the amendment (Mr. Irvine) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. GARDINER: I wish to raise a point of order arising out of the vote. The Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) was in his seat and did not vote. The hon. member was not paired and I ask that his vote be recorded.

Mr. FORKE: I might explain. I have no objection to voting; but as I was not in the house when the matter was under discussion, I do not know what it was about and, as a matter of conscience, I do not care about voting in regard to something which I do not understand.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The minister is not the only one who did not understand what he was voting for.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule is that members who are present when a motion is read must vote if they are in the house whilst the division is being taken. But when an hon. member declares that he does not know what the amendment is about, he is excused from voting. That is the practice followed in the British House of Commons.

SUPPLY

The house again in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Railways—Maritime Freight Rates Act

Amount required to provide for payment of the difference, estimated by the Board of Railway Commissioners and certified by the said board to the Minister of Railways and Canals, occurring on account of the application of the Maritime Freight Rates Act, between the tariff tolls and the normal tolls (referred to in section 9 of the said act) on all traffic moved during the period July 1, 1927, to December 31, 1927, under the tariffs approved, by the following companies:—

Atlantic Quebec & Western Railway	$ 9,974 20
Canada & Gulf Terminal Railway	890 39
Canadian Pacific Railway, including Fredericton & Grand Lake Coal and Railway Co., New Brunswick Coal and Railway Company	130,962 64
Cumberland Railway & Coal Co.	13,597 03
Dominion Atlantic Railway	86,971 71
Maritime Coal Railway & Power Co.	10,980 96
Quebec Oriental Railway Co.	4,905 52
Sydney & Louisburg Railway	150,408 00
Témiscouata Railway	12,964 11

Mr. DUNNING: This is the item which was discussed for some time before recess and I think it might be carried now.

Mr. GARDINER: Before six oclock I pointed out to the Minister of Railways that last year he made a certain estimate as to what this maritime freight rates discount would cost. The minister this afternoon stated that his estimate was approximately $2,000,000 for the Canadian National, $500,000 for the Canadian Pacific, and another sum, probably about $500,000, for the other lines. During the recess I took the opportunity of looking up Hansard and at page 1878 of last year's Hansard I find that the minister stated during the debate that in his judgment the total amount that would be required to meet this maritime freight rates discount would be approximately $2,500,000. The minister did state that he did not want to be held down to that figure; and consequently I merely make this statement so that the estimate will be put on Hansard.

Mr. MacLAREN: Is there any charge submitted by the Kent Northern railway?

Mr. DUNNING: I explained before the recess that there was some reluctance on the part especially of the smaller lines to come under the provisions of the law because they would be compelled to carry themselves the 20 per cent reduction until payment was made. Some of them did not come under the law immediately. The Kent Northern has not yet come under the provisions of the act.

Item agreed to.

Amount required to provide for payment to the Canadian National Railway Company of the portion of the deficit in receipts and revenues of the eastern lines, as defined in the Maritime Freight Rates Act, occurring within the period of July 1, 1927, to December 31, 1927, on account of the application of the said act, $931,809.89.

Mr. GARDINER: Has the minister any information as to the tonnage moved during the six months which this estimate covers, as compared with the previous six months?

Mr. DUNNING: It would be impossible to go into this matter upon a tonnage basis. The 20 per cent reduction has a relation to the rate charged by the railway company; it has no relation at all to the tons of freight of the various classes carried. The statement of the Board of Railway Commissioners with reference to this matter, as supplied to me, is a monthly statement with respect to each company.

I think the member for South Toronto asked before recess regarding the checkup by the Board of Railway Commissioners. I have made inquiries of the officials of the board during the recess, and they inform me that the certificate which they are now giving is of necessity an E. & O.E. certificate, because they have not yet had an opportunity of making that thorough audit which the terms of the act require. The E. & O.E. provision, of coure, will permit of the necessary adjustments being made with respect to next year's payments under the same act. I am informed, however, that there is every indication that the amounts are correct. After all, the check-up, in a gross sense, is fairly easy for the reason that as regards the freight moving under the various preferred movements, if you take the aggregate revenue received by the railway company for these various classes of freight and then apply the provisions of the act with respect to the 20 per cent—in gross, I say—it can be easily calculated; but manifestly there must be a proper audit made in order to make sure that no railway company is padding its books, let us say. I do not accuse any railway company of doing that, but obviously the necessary care must be taken by the audit staff of the Board of Railway Commissioners in that connection. I can give the figures in connection with each railway concerned for each of the six months now under review, if that is desired by any member of the committee.

With respect to the item under discussion, I want to draw the attention of the committee to the fact that in accordance with the terms of the act itself, this item comprises only that part of the eastern lines deficit which is chargeable to the 20 per cent reduction. The next item gives the balance of the deficit on the eastern lines.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is that right? I think my hon. friend is putting the cart before the horse. The item refers to the deficit on those lines irrespective of the 20 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: No,—"less the portion of such deficit occurring on account of the application of the said act." The reason for presenting it in this manner is so that the house will be able to see from year to year what is the actual result of the application of the Maritime Freight Rates Act to the traffic covered by it. If business increases at all, the item we are now discussing, 405, amounting to $931,809.89, will naturally increase also, but if the ordinary laws of railway operation work out, an increase in that item, due to an increase in tonnage and an increase in traffic, should give a decrease in the deficit in item 406. One cannot say that it will follow naturally, but I am placing it before the house in this form so that the house will have a true conception each year of how the act is working in all particulars.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Was not the minister incorrect in stating that this deficit applies to the whole of the eastern section of the Canadian National Railway? I think it applies only to that section of the Canadian National Railway from Levis to Halifax, not the whole eastern section.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is correct except for the fact that where I used the term "eastern lines" I meant eastern lines as defined in the Maritime Freight Rates Act. It is important that that distinction should be drawn. The area defined in the act is the area east of Levis and Diamond Junction.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have not been objecting at all to the item because I assume that the estimates for this year will go to the special committee, where we shall have an opportunity of going into the manner in which these matters are checked up. But my hon. friend will have to do more than merely certify in gross, and we ought not to have in the future any E. & O. E. statements.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The only safe way is not to handle it in gross. There is only one way of doing it, and that is to check it on the billings. The Board of Railway Commissioners have duplicates of all the billings, and there should be no bulk about it at all. The minister ought to have before the committee the officials of the board who are dealing with this question, because it is a very important one.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is quite right respecting the nature of the audit. I would merely ask the committee to remember that the statute came into effect only on the first of July last, and we had to ask the Board of Railway Commissioners to set up the necessary organization to make the kind of check to which my hon. friend refers. When I said a moment ago that one could look at it in the gross, I did not mean to suggest that the railway commission was using that method, but simply that an idea could be gained by the average individual of what the 20 per cent reduction would amount to if he knew the gross revenue from the movements under review. My hon. friend suggests that the item in the main estimates similar to this might go to the special committee. I really had not thought of sending it there, because it is not a Canadian National Railway item; it is an item under the statute which must be considered in the departmental estimates. If there is any desire to inquire into its application in the specal committee, I shall be very happy to have that done there, but I would not like formally to pick out this item from the departmental estimates and send it to the special committee.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not care how it is done so long as the committee have a chance to find out how the checking is done and that a proper check is kept.

Mr. GARDINER: Can the minister give us any information as to whether this 20 per cent reduction has increased the movement of freight in this area?

Mr. DUNNING: With the experience we have up to date it has been difficult to answer that question positively. My estimate last year, as my hon. friend pointed out, was about two million and a half dollars, based upon the experience of the then current year. Putting the figures together which we have before us to-night, he will notice that it is running practically in accordance with that estimate. But I must qualify it by the fact that some of the smaller roads did not come under the provisions of the act promptly after July 1. I am informed by maritime members that there is better business down there, which will show us an increase in traffic; but that can only be a general statement. I cannot for a moment give the figures of the tonnage, but I will bear in mind when the main estimates are before the house, when I think possibly I shall be able to give some information in that regard.

Item agreed to.

Amount required to provide for payment to the Canadian National Railway Company of the deficit in receipts and revenues of the eastern lines, as defined in the Maritime Freight Rates Act, occurring within the period July 1, 1927, to December 31, 1927, less the portion of such deficit occurring on account of the application of the said act, $2,117,936.42.

Mr. GARDINER: Is this an operating deficit?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not familiar with the legislation, but I apprehend that this is the operating deficit as the result of the legislation.

Mr. DUNNING: This item is not the result of the legislation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why is it done in this way?

Mr. DUNNING: The legislation provides for its being done this way, but this amount is not the result of the legislation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend has not caught my point. In other words, the legislation did not create this deficit; but the legislation provides for the deficit to be thus reported.

Mr. DUNNING: That is it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does it go to the extent of saying that the deficit is thus to be paid?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then we will have it up twice; we will have it up again in connection with the major statement.

Mr. DUNNING: No, it is a receipt in the major account.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We can look into it just as well in that connection.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Canadian Government Merchant Marine—Loan to Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited, repayable on demand with interest at a rate to be fixed by the governor in council, upon such terms and conditions as the governor in council may determine, and to be applied in payment of:—

Deficits in operation of the company and of the vessels under the company's control during the nine months' period ended December 31, 1927, and working capital requirements, $1,000,00.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think this should be dealt with here at all. It certainly should be referred to the special committee now.

Mr. DUNNING: I have an explanation to make in that regard. As my hon. friend states, this is an item which in the ordinary course of events would be referred to the special committee on Canadian National railways and shipping. But the fiscal year of the government ends on March 31. This estimate was prepared only a day or two ago, has not been before the committee, and cannot get there prior to the end of the fiscal year. I may say that the whole matter of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine will be dealt with by that committee on the main estimates. These we have already tabled. But in connection with this item, the close approach of the end of the fiscal year compels me to present it to the committee of the whole house.

It will be remembered that at the last session no vote was taken for deficit purposes. If my memory serves me correctly, I think there was a vote in the neighbourhood of something like $18,000 for capital requirements, but the showing of the previous year caused the management to believe that possibly they might get along without a deficit during the year 1927. Experience, however, indicates an expected deficit in operation of $559,000. In addition to that there has been a gradual impairment of the working capital from year to year since 1922, in which year the Canadian Government Merchant Marine received from the government working capital to the extent of $930,000. Deficits from time to time have whittled that down until it is now about $84,000—an insufficient amount of working capital. For that reason, and in order to bring the working capital up to the necessities of the business, the balance of this vote of $1,000,000 amounting to $440,000, is asked for.

The condition of the merchant marine during the last few years can be indicated by the following figures: In 1923-24 there was a deficit of $1,829,000,—I am omitting the odd hundreds—in 1924-25 it was $1,416,000; in 1925-26, $595,000; 1926-27, $44,000; and as I indicated a few minutes ago, this year it is estimated to be $559,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Will the minister be good enough to tell us how the tonnage compares to-day with that of three or four years ago?

Mr. DUNNING: There has been a steady adjustment in that regard, reviewed by the committee from year to year. Only those ships suitable for the service have been retained, but I cannot give my hon. friend a comparison, for instance, between 1927 and 1926. I can, of course, undertake that everything in that regard will be subject to review by the special committee.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: All I am trying to understand is whether the deficit has been reduced by the management getting new markets, or simply because the tonnage has been reduced.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. DUNNING: There is no doubt that the reduction in tonnage has not had any material effect in reducing the deficit, for the ships disposed of were for the most part not in use. In any case where it was found to be impracticable to apply the ships to good business purposes they were in the course of time sold. In general I may tell my hon. friend that I am encouraged by the progress which is being made in this connection. It is needless for me at this time to go into the experience of other countries in this regard; it does not do us much good to take comfort from the sorrows of others; but it is a fact that while our government-owned mercantile marine is not entirely a bonanza, it is at least doing a great deal better than any similarly owned mercantile marine that I know of. And it is performing a real service in connection with Canada's trade, a service which I hope will increase as time goes on.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has there been any change in the working year of the merchant marine?

Mr. DUNNING: We are this year changing it to the calendar year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thought it was always so.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): Mr. Chairman, this vote of one million dollars is apparently to cover a deficit for nine months' operation, and if you add to that another 25 per cent you have a very large deficit. I am confining myself strictly to the freight boats which are being operated by the government and am not referring at all to the West Indies services, the new ships for those services not yet being in operation. Let me say at the outset that the criticism of the leading shipping paper in the world, Fair Play of England—I am sorry I have not a copy under my hand—without being able carefully to analyze the accounts, tells a totally different tale from that which is put forward by the government. With regard to these boats, I make the following statement without fear of contradiction, and if I am contradicted I am perfectly willing to submit the matter to any firm of experienced shipping auditors or chartered accountants in the old country who are familiar with this business. I say that the Canadian merchant marine, if wound up to-day, would be found to have cost the country $125,000,000. And what are the ships doing? To-day they are operating in competition with privately owned ships in every quarter of the globe, going east and west and north and south

They are competing with privately owned English shipping concerns who are thoroughly familiar with the operation of steamships, and these concerns are paying, as the merchant marine boats are not. The government merchant marine steamers are carrying cargo from the east to various American ports and cutting rates in opposition to the established lines. What are they doing with regard to the Australian, the South African and the New Zealand trade? There are private companies that have been operating in those waters for years, and in comes the merchant marine and cuts rates, to which it has not agreed. The merchant marine is running voyage after voyage at an absolute loss, and I maintain, as I have always done, that the government operation of steamers cannot be profitable. I contend, therefore, that the sooner the operation of the merchant marine is discontinued the better it will be for the taxpayers of the country, who will have less to pay.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall appreciate it if my hon. friend will let me have that criticism of the accounts to which he refers in order that we may submit it to the management and have them appear before the special committee prepared to deal with that criticism, thus enabling the members of the committee, and the house later on if necessary to ascertain the facts, whatever they may be. With regard to the cost to the country, which my hon. friend says would be something in the neighbourhood of $125,000,000 if the merchant marine were wound up now, I do not want to revive the acrimony of past debates in that connection. I am endeavouring to deal as well as I can with the merchant marine as this government found it and as it has since been carried on by the management of the Canadian National Railways. The major portion of the loss certainly cannot be said to be chargeable to the present management of the merchant marine. I prefer to remain on a business plane in discussing the question and not to go back to the origin of the merchant marine, discussing what we have been compelled to do with it. Such a debate might involve a good deal of argument, some of it acrimonious, which would get us nowhere. The country knows perfectly well that we have the ships. They were built under war conditions, as similar ships were built, and while I may have quarrelled with the policy at the time, I do not think that this is the time to discuss that policy or to exchange recriminations regarding it. We are dealing with the conditions that now exist. I do not think that the Canadian people would be satisfied to have their government owned ships disposed of at the present time, and I will state why. The people of Canada, rightly or wrongly, now own a great railway transportation system and the operation of shipping in connection with that system is a very important factor indeed. The chief competitor of our Canadian National Railway system, the Canadian Pacific Railway, has gone very extensively into the shipping business—extensively and, I believe, successfully. At any rate the shipping controlled both by the Canadian Pacific Railway and by the Canadian National system is to-day a valuable contributor to the traffic of the railways operated by these two companies, and I do not think there is immediately before us the prospect of completely closing out the merchant marine. We are providing, not through the government merchant marine, it is true, but by special legislation, for the management of the Canadian National Railways to operate a Canada-West Indies steamship service which will, of course, form a part of the same general shipping arrangement which contributes to the success of our railways. I do agree, however, that we should scrutinize with the utmost care this institution which belongs to us and which is operated by the Canadian National railway system; and, I repeat, I shall be very much pleased, as the government will be, to have any criticism either of the presentation of accounts or of the system itself in time to permit us to put it before the management and ask them to appear before the special committee prepared to deal with it thoroughly and in detail.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): No doubt it is pleasing to the house to hear of the wonderful traffic which the merchant marine is bringing to the railways, but I would ask the minister this question: If these ships are withdrawn does he think the traffic will lose at all? I maintain that private interests would bring in a good deal more traffic because, by reason of the fact that the merchant marine is operating in competition with them, private shipping companies are not favouring our railways. I say, therefore, that the minister would get just as much traffic if not more from the private companies. My judgment, based on observation, is that the merchant marine does not increase the traffic of the railways.

Mr. DUNNING: That is, of course, a matter of opinion which could not be determined by actual test. I am sorry I cannot agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. CANTLEY: There is evidently one branch of the service which is not contributing much to the Canadian roads, and that is the service operating from Australia and New Zealand direct to New York. It is not contributing to the building up of traffic on our railways.

Mr. DUNNING: Is my hon. friend quite sure of his facts?

Mr. CANTLEY: I think so. I understand that the boats from the far east, from Australia and New Zealand, are carrying cargo through the Panama canal and unloading at New York before coming up to Canadian ports. After discharging the bulk of their cargo at Boston or Philadelphia or New York they then come to Canadian ports.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): We read in every newspaper of the movement of ships from South Africa, Australia and New Zealand to New York, where they discharge; they do not land here first.

Mr. DUNNING: That may be so, and I suggest to my hon. friends that they examine the management before the special committee as to the reason why these boats from the far east call at American ports, if they do. I have no personal knowledge of it but I know that my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Black) studies these matters and presumably he knows whereof he speaks. But I also presume that the management will have some pretty good business reasons to offer as to why the boats make these calls, if they do.

Mr. STEVENS: When the special committee reassembles after the Easter recess the minister might have the management submit a statement regarding the voyages of the various ships. Such a statement should be easily compiled. The complaint which my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Cantley) has voiced I have also heard frequently, that is, that the Canadian government marine ships operate between two foreign ports and not directly between Canadian ports and other parts of the world. I may remind the minister that the Canadian people and this parliament, in so far as it sanctioned the original construction of the ships, had in mind the utilization of the merchant marine for the development of Canadian trade. That was really the only justification for the policy, and any departure from that policy ought to be fully explained and defended, if it can be, by the management before the special committee. This, I suggest, could best be done by having submitted to the committee a report showing the various voyages during the last year at least.

Mr. DUNNING: I will undertake that that information will be placed before the special committee when these matters are under discussion, as well as any other information which may help the committee to get an understanding of the whole situation. I think we should look into it very clearly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend should do more than that; there is not much use looking into it when it has been done. There is a real business reason why he should get these other amounts through and get that indebtedness out of the way, but of this vote $441,000 is for new capital. Why treat that as last year's business? You want that capital for the future, and my hon. friend would be well advised to let this whole item go to the committee. Certainly there is no excuse for trying to crowd the item through; this is merely a government subsidiary and there is no business reason for hurrying payment of that $559,000. That can be borrowed, so I would suggest that since we have let these other items go through the minister should take this item and send it to the committee.

Mr. DUNNING: I should like to meet my hon. friend on that, but I would point out that the item is properly in the supplementary estimates for the current fiscal year. It relates to the last fiscal year of the merchant marine, and certainly should be payable to them out of money available in this fiscal year. The money has been borrowed and is chargeable in their accounts in that way, and I would ask my hon. friend to reconsider his request.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As my hon. friend knows, the supplementary estimates are often passed months after the fiscal year is ended, so there can be no trouble about that. If anyone would be hurt it would be different, but this will not injure anyone; it is merely a matter of bookkeeping.

Mr. DUNNING: I am afraid no one would be helped either, because I would have to come back with a supplementary item identical to this, and even though I brought it in during the new fiscal year it would remain a supplementary for this year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Send this one item to the committee.

Mr. DUNNING: That would mean the introduction of another supply bill at a later date for 1927-28. I suggest to my hon. friend that it would be an unnecessary complication.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As I see it, the committee should know everything about this new capital. I am willing to take my hon. friend's word for it now that he has had a loss which he knows nothing about and which he did not think would occur; we will take his word for that at once, but at the same time he says they need something which they have been getting along very well without for some considerable time, and they need it as a supplement to the past year. What has new working capital to do with the past year?

Mr. DUNNING: It has been borrowed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Whose overdraft was that?

Mr. DUNNING: The Canadian Government Merchant Marine.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If the Canadian Government Merchant Marine have already borrowed it from the bank willy-nilly, so far as we are concerned it makes no difference whether it goes over or not. The bank can afford to let it stand out a little while.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, may I appeal to my hon. friend to allow this item to go through on the assurance of my colleague that the fullest inquiry will be made when it comes before the committee with the other items? I should like to get this properly cleared up before the end of this fiscal year, for one reason, and for another reason the bills are now all printed and ready.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If my hon. friend tells me that it will help him in his work I am quite satisfied, so long as it is thoroughly understood that we still have a string on the item.

Mr. DUNNING: Absolutely.

Mr. CANTLEY: Will the minister tell us how many of the boats are laid up, and where they are laid up?

Mr. DUNNING: I am compelled to speak without definite information, but I know of only one which is laid up. The Canadian Raider is laid up at Port Burwell.

Mr. GEARY: Before the item passes would the minister tell me if a supplementary estimate is the place where he is going to put items 405 and 406 from year to year? I think there was some conversation about it which I could not hear, but under the statute I believe these should go in the railway estimates.

Mr. DUNNING: It is not the intention in future years to bring in supplementary estimates for items 405 and 406. These will appear as items in the main estimates of the Department of Railways and Canals in accordance with the statute, which I will cite to my hon. friend. With regard to other companies section 9 applies, but with regard to the Canadian National Railways the statute states that in the event of any deficit occurring in any railway fiscal year in respect of the eastern lines, the amount of such deficit shall be included in a separate item in the estimates submitted to parliament for or on behalf of the Canadian National Railways at the first session of parliament thereafter. Now I have my hon. friend's point, which I did not see before. I was very anxious, and the government were very anxious, to present to parliament the whole picture in connection with the Maritime Freight Rates Act, and the manner in which it was working. Consequently that is all placed on one page in this fashion, and I think it would be well to continue that practice in future estimates, while it is not the intention to bring these items down in the form of supplementary estimates. I would point out that in a certain sense the wording of this estimate does amend the statute, because the statute intends to have the full year expire, then to have an audit take place, after which the railway commission certifies to the result. By following that practice the railway companies are out that amount of money for a considerable period of time, while by introducing an estimate worded in this fashion it will be possible to make payment by the government closer to the time at which the expenditure is incurred by the railways. That is the objective in view.

Mr. GEARY: I am not questioning the desirability of doing that; I am only pointing out that it is not according to the statute which was passed last year, and I suggest that the procedure be definitely decided upon. Perhaps you will amend the statute, but I am simply pointing out that it should be done in order.

Mr. STEVENS: There is nothing of this nature in the main estimates for this year, so far as I can see.

Mr. DUNNING: The railway estimates are not in the main estimates; they were tabled to-day as a separate estimate.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps the loss on the Canadian Raider is already looked after in that $441,000?

Mr. DUNNING: We do not regard the Canadian Raider as lost.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is it damaged?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Have you any estimate of the damage?

Mr. DUNNING: It will be taken care of by that famous insurance fund but there seems to be a good deal of hope that it will not be lost.

WAYS AND MEANS

SUPPLY BILL

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. ROBB moved:

Resolved that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1928, the sum of $7,777,747.89 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 155, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1928.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

SICKNESS AND ACCIDENT INSURANCE

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION BY BANKING AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE OF OPERATIONS OF CANADIAN COMPANIES.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on March 19th the house was considering a motion introduced on February 16th by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) that the committee on industrial and international relations be authorized to investigate and report on insurance against unemployment, sickness and invalidity. On that occasion the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) moved, seconded by Mr. Dickie:

That the said resolution be amended by adding the following:

"That the said committee be authorized to investigate and report on the operations of companies carrying on sickness and accident insurance business in Canada."

I took some exception to referring this matter to the committee on industrial and international relations, and suggested that if my hon. friends were willing I would facilitate its reference to the committee on banking and commerce. By unanimous consent I would therefore move:

That the committee on banking and commerce be authorized to investigate and report on the operations of companies carrying on sickness and accident insurance business in Canada.

Mr. SPENCE: Did not the hon. member for New Westminster withdraw his amendment? I think he did.

Mr. ROBB: He did, but he desires now that it should go to the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: This resolution can only be moved by leave of the house. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF, 1927, AMENDMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Just before the committee rose at the last sitting, Mr. Robb moved that the following be substituted for item 219b:

Customs tarif—219b. Formaldehyde containing not more than 15 per centum of alcohol: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not think there is any need to detain the committee at any length in regard to this item, as the matter has been pretty clearly placed before the minister. I have but one suggestion to make, if the minister would give it consideration, namely, inasmuch as the one company—and there is only one company of this kind in Canada—has on hand necessarily a large quantity of raw material, I understand something like 12,000 cords of hardwood, some consideration might be given as to the time when this would come into force and effect, say a year, or something of that character. We have done this in other cases; for instance, we have specified in the tariff that certain items shall be effective only after a certain time or shall come into force at a certain time. Would the minister consider that suggestion? I presume it is not necessary for me to remind him of the very small effect that this tariff has upon the value of formaldehyde in the small quantities in which it is sold, but the very serious effect it has on the whole upon this one company.

Mr. ROBB: Representations have been made to me on behalf of the company that, as stated by the hon. member for Vancouver

Centre, they have now in stock some 11,000 or 12,000 cords of hardwood, which apparently is used for this purpose. They also represent that the distribution for this year has already been made so that this change will not affect the price of their material. That being the case, if we extend the time the distribution for next year would also be made before parliament met again, and it seems to me that we might very well stand by our decision of a few days ago and put the item through as it is now.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—267b. Crude petroleum not in its natural state .725 specific gravity or heavier at 60 degrees temperature, when imported by oil refiners to be refined in their own factories: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free; on and after the 1st July, 1931, per gallon: British preferential tariff, 3/10c., intermediate tariff 4/10c., general tariff, ½c.

Mr. ROBB: I wish to move an amendment to meet some technical objections that were made to this item as it was originally presented. I understand this meets with the concurrence of the parties who asked me to make this change and also of some who were offering opposition. Neither of them was altogether satisfied, but I think the resolution is pretty fair. As it was before there was a question as to certain points of specific gravity which would have been lost altogether. Therefore I move that item 267b be struck out of the resolutions. We are inserting a new resolution.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. ROBB: I beg to move that the following item, enumerations and rates of duty be inserted in schedule A to the customs tariff:

Customs tariff—272b. Crude petroleum not in its natural state, .725 specific gravity or heavier but not heavier than .770 specific gravity at 60 degrees temperature, when imported by oil refiners to be refined in their own factories until July 1, 1931; British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is no duty imposed until the first of July, 1931?

Mr. ROBB: No. After that it goes where it was before.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: It will have to be dealt with then?

Mr. ROBB: No, it goes back to where it is under the old item.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—526. Household blankets wholly of cotton, not to include horse blankets, automobile or steamer rugs, nor similar articles: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 22½ per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

Mr. HEAPS: I wish to say a word in connection with the tariff in general. The other night, when we were discussing this question in the house, we were assured that the tariff was given to the manufacturers in order to afford some protection to labour employed in industry. I said that if such were the case we in this corner of the house could have a certain amount of sympathy for protection. On looking at the papers this evening I find that the workers employed in one of the most highly protected industries in this country are out on strike because they have had three reductions in pay in the past six months. I am now referring to the automobile industry. Men employed in the automobile industry at Oshawa are out on strike because some of them have refused to accept a further cut in their wages. If such be the case, the whole idea on which protection is based falls to the ground. I suggest to the minister, in view of the protection that parliament gives to the automobile industry and of the fact that automobile manufacturers in Canada are continually reducing the wages of men employed in that industry, lowering the standard of their living, and compelling them, in the case I have mentioned, to go out on strike within the past day or two, that the house should take some action in the matter and refuse to continue to give to such industries the protection we have been giving them.

Mr. GEARY: I do not think my hon. friend has proved his case by what he has said. If I remember rightly, there was a reduction in the protection on this very article not long ago which I might with just as much confidence put forward as an argument why they had to reduce wages, but I do not know anything, nor does my hon. friend, about what the circumstances in that particular factory are. I have a great deal of sympathy with what he says about wages, whether in that particular industry or in any other. My contention is—I am not going to argue it now, but it is well supported—that the great thing that will go—I hate to repeat words that I have already uttered—towards the making of security in industrial life and to the fixing of a living wage is this very factor of protection. It is an agent of great potency in producing that particular result. That is the general statement I make, but I do not attempt to bolster it up by any reference to the industry which my hon. friend mentions, nor do I think that his reference to that industry proves the other side of the case. If there is any way in which we can, by means of the tariff or otherwise, protect the worker more than he is protected now in his security of employment, I am all for doing anything that would help to bring that about.

Mr. MANION: Anyone who has followed industrial conditions in England during the last few years since the war realizes that practically the only industries in England which are at all successful to-day, both from the point of view of the industry itself and of the workers engaged in it, are those to which England has given the safeguarding of industries protection, which amounts to 33⅓ per cent. Just a day or so ago I was reading an article in the National Review which I have on my desk upstairs, written by an English manufacturer of the cheaper types of china, and he points out that previous to the war he was selling this crockery throughout the whole world. He had his own market in England, he had the Australian, the South American and the Indian market. Because of the low cost of manufacturing in England he was able to maintain his place in these markets, but to-day, because of the low wages being paid in Czechoslovakia, Germany, Japan, and a number of other countries in comparison with those paid in free trade England he cannot even compete in his own market in England; he has lost altogether the Australian, the Indian and the South American market, and the only hope for his industry to continue and give work to the people engaged in it and afford him a chance to succeed is that it shall receive, as other industries have received, the safeguarding of industries protection. I say with the utmost respect for the opinion of my hon. friend (Mr. Heaps), because I am quite sure he is sincere in his support of the workingman, that anyone who gives this question any thought must realize that the goods produced in the countries of Europe that have lower standards of living and lower wage scales must to a certain extent be kept out of those countries where higher wages and better standards of living prevail if the industries in those latter countries are to compete. Look over the different industries of England to-day and you will find that practically the only ones that are successful are those that are receiving the 33⅓ per cent protection under the Safeguarding of Industries Act, and they are the only ones that are able to compete in the markets of the world because of the lower wages and lower standards of living prevailing in other countries.

Mr. HEAPS: I would point out to the hon. member that one of the highest protected countries in the world is Japan, and not only has it a high protective tariff, but a 200 per cent anti-dumping law which is put into effect against American goods.

Mr. MANION: But it is one of the lower standard of living countries.

Mr. HEAPS: That merely goes to prove that protection does not of necessity raise the standard of living, or it would be high in Japan. What we have to contend with in this country in the automobile business is the competition not of Japan or of Czechoslovakia but of the United States, where wages are higher than they are in Canada. The point I raised was that when parliament gives great concessions to certain industries and protects them the way it does, those industries owe something to the workers employed in them. But what protection has General Motors of Oshawa given to the men employed in that industry? Two years ago they treated their employees in a very miserable way. They got them to come to Ottawa in a huge delegation, and when I moved amongst these men I found that hardly any of them knew why they had come here. Parliament gives to that industry a protection which is worth a great deal to the industry, and that being the case the industry owes something to the men and women engaged in it. But what has happened? We find by this evening's paper the men have had two cuts in wages, and they refuse to accept a third. The wages they are receiving now are lower than are being paid in the same industry in the United States. When they were here these men told me that they were working under conditions that were far from the best, that they were receiving from 42½ to 75 cents an hour, the average being not much over 50 cents an hour—considerably below a living wage; yet the stock of that company, because of the flourishing condition of the industry, attributable in some degree to the high protection it enjoys to-day, is now over 200, and it may be worth only one-tenth of that.

Mr. GEARY: You are speaking now of General Motors in the United States.

Mr. HEAPS: The Oshawa company is a subsidiary, and it also is enjoying a great deal of prosperity, as is manifested by the additions it has made to its buildings at Oshawa in the last few months. Why should parliament protect an industry of that character? If we have any lever to use over such an industry, I say that it should be used when they are taking away from the workers something which they have no right at all to take away. The question of what is happening in other countries, the tariffs of Czechoslovakia, Australia and Japan, do not enter into this question at all. This is a question of one particular industry in Canada which is enjoying a high degree of protection, the gift of this parliament, yet it takes that gift to further its own interest at the expense of its employees. If that is the case I believe parliament would be justified at the very first opportunity in expressing its strong disapproval of the action which the management of that company has taken toward the men it employs.

Mr. MANION: I just wish to say that I was not arguing in regard to that particular case at all. The hon. gentleman when he was speaking previously had said that if this is the way the Oshawa industry is treating its employees, all that argument about protection protecting the working man is wiped out. It was a general argument I was making. I was not speaking of this particular case because I have a great deal of sympathy with the remarks of the hon. gentleman in that regard. I was speaking of protection in general.

Mr. McGIBBON: It does seem to me that those people who pretend to represent labour in this house have a very meagre knowledge of the requirements of labour in this country. There is no question at all that what this country wants to-day is work. All you have to do is to survey the industries of this country, and find out where that work can be got. I would ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Heaps) what he would do if all the industries of this country were closed down. Where would labour go then? Does he want a still bigger army marching across the border into the American republic to get work in one of the highest protected countries in the world? That is what has been happening in this country for a number of years.

Mr. POWER: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I think we are getting far away from the subject of cotton blankets. I am always glad to hear my hon. friend from Muskoka-Ontario because he is so very sincere about everything, and I have no objection to listening to my hon. friends from Winnipeg and Fort William, but really this debate is becoming too much enlarged.

Mr. McGIBBON: I think the hon. member is a little mixed in his point of order. I would tell the hon. member for North Winnipeg that a few years ago hundreds of men were employed in my constituency but to-day their jobs have disappeared.

Mr. POWER: Mr. Chairman, I should like your ruling on my point of order—that the discussion has wandered far afield from the resolution before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not think the hon. gentleman's point is well taken. The hon. member who has the floor is discussing the principle of protection, and the item now before the committee provides for protection of 15, 22½ and 27½ per cent.

Mr. McGIBBON: I contend, Mr. Chairman, that if it were not for the principle of protection—which, I admit, is inadequately applied—there would be no work here at all. If the hon. member for North Winnipeg had his policy put into force, our working men would not have any jobs at decent wages.

Mr. HEAPS: Why?

Mr. McGIBBON: Because there would not be any work except for the agricultural classes. What happened a few years ago to our leather industry? Factories were closed, and to-day those workmen are gaining a livelihood in the United States. What happened to the glass industry when the Libby-Owens Company went out of business? Not only did their workmen lose their jobs, but men in the bush were also adversely affected. For instance, in my riding two lumber firms were supplying that company with all their rough lumber for making boxes, and naturally when the glass industry went out of business the men back in the bush lost their jobs. The same can be said of the automobile industry. It is true the government tinkered with the tariff on automobiles two years ago, and then modified their action, but to-day there are five thousand fewer jobs in the automobile industry than there were at that time. Is that the kind of policy the member for North Winnipeg wants to establish in this country? Does he want to destroy completely every chance of our working men getting jobs. I have a great deal of sympathy with him when he advocates raising the working man's wages; but the first thing the Canadian working man wants is a job.

Mr. SANDERSON: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. McGIBBON: Yes, if it is not too hard.

Mr. SANDERSON: I understood him to say that five thousand employees in the automobile industry are out of jobs to-day for the reason that the tariff on automobiles was lowered two years ago. Is that what he said?

Mr. McGIBBON: Yes, that is correct with regard to the industries auxiliary to the automobile industry.

Mr. SANDERSON: All I can say is that my hon. friend does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. McGIBBON: Of course we all have to bow to the wisdom of the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson). We know that after he has spoken there is nothing more to do than pronounce the doxology.

Mr. SANDERSON: My hon. friend never talks wisdom at all.

Mr. McGIBBON: Those are not my figures, they are the figures of the industry.

Mr. SANDERSON: And yet he believes them.

Mr. McGIBBON: Those figures have been proven to be correct. It would be well for the hon. member to post himself on the primary things he presumes to talk about.

Mr. SANDERSON: I am just as well posted as my hon. friend.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. McGIBBON: My point is that the working men of this country must have jobs, and until they get them our population is not going to increase. Every man who is not a parasite wants to work at a reasonable wage. For the life of me I cannot see how you are going to close down industries and cause unemployment and still keep our working people in the Dominion. You cannot do it, as our experience during the last five years amply proves. The exodus will continue at that rate as long as we pursue our present policy. What protection does primarily is to protect the working man to the extent that it protects his job. If you destroy his job what are you going to do? In my own village industries have been destroyed and their buildings torn down, although for forty years they were employing hundreds of men. Do hon. members think that that is not a serious matter? Are not our working people a national asset? I say again, as long as you pursue this policy that is what will happen. Take the agricultural implement industry: last year we imported thirty millions dollars' worth of agricultural implements. If those implements had been manufactured in Canada there would have been work for the people that our friends from Winnipeg are supposed to represent, and do not.

Mr. HEAPS: It is not simply a supposition; we do represent Winnipeg.

Mr. McGIBBON: You think you do.

Mr. HEAPS: No, we do. If you think we do not, come to Winnipeg North and Winnipeg North Centre and see for yourself.

Mr. McGIBBON: North Winnipeg is not the whole Dominion. That is the fault with the members for Winnipeg,—

Mr. HEAPS: Neither is Muskoka.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. McGIBBON: —they seem to think the whole Dominion is contained in that small circle. I can tell him that the members for Winnipeg do not represent the sentiment of labour throughout Canada. Whether they represent Winnipeg or not I do not know. I presume they did represent it in 1921 when they agitated and brought on a strike.

Mr. HEAPS: May I state, Mr. Chairman, that since 1921 I have been five times elected to public office.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The discussion is getting very far away from the item before the committee.

Mr. McGIBBON: I do not know how many times the hon. member wants to speak; he makes a speech every time he interrupts. But I think there are many members in this house who represent labour a great deal more accurately than do the members for Winnipeg. Winnipeg, as I said, is not the whole Dominion, and all Canadian labour is not centred there—in fact a very small part of it. On behalf of the labouring people of my riding and of the other ridings that are represented by my colleagues, I want to say that the government is not protecting sufficiently the labouring man's job. There should be greater protection, rather than less. I am not speaking in the interests of the manufacturers, but in the interests of the labouring people. As long as we continue a policy that takes away jobs from our working men and drives them out of the country, then I say the Dominion is worse off to that extent. In to-day's paper I read that Canada and Mexico have been supplying the United States with practically all their immigrants. Within the last six months fifty thousand Canadians have migrated across the line. How long can this country stand such a drain? We are losing the very best of our native-born, the educated, the ambitious, the industrious. When I am home not a week passes that I have not to make out medical certificates for the very best people in my riding; they are going to the United States. I contend that nothing but an adequate protective policy will provide work and keep our people at home. We have tried everything else more or less. Now give us a fair protective policy for the working men of this country and see what we can do.

Mr. KENNEDY: I believe this item was held over so that the minister might consider whether or not horse blankets would be given a lower tariff.

Mr. ROBB: Yes; and as soon as this item is passed I will bring in the other.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—526a. Horse blankets or horse clothing of any material: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 22½ per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

Mr. MANION: What is the decrease in the tariff?

Mr. ROBB: The present rates, under four classifications, are 30, 35, 35 and 35. Under the British preference the rates are 20, 25, 27½ and 22½.

Mr. MANION: The present tariff just brought in is not the same as the tariff which we have passed?

Mr. ROBB: No; this is to bring it in line with the other.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—438b. Automobiles for conveying passengers only, n.o.p., valued at retail at place of production, when new, with standard equipment complete at not more than $1,200 each; motor cars or motor trucks (not for railways or tramways) for carrying goods only; motorcycles; chassis for motor vehicles specified in this item: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: This is something entirely new; the minister should explain it.

Mr. EULER: This is designed to correct what seems to be an unfair discrimination arising out of the legislation of 1926, at which time automobiles valued at $1,200 or less could be imported at 20 per cent whereas cars valued higher than $1,200 were still subject to a duty of 27½ per cent. Under the law as it stands, an automobile which is manufactured in Detroit is transported through the western states on its way to Winnipeg, that being the shortest route. The car might be worth $1,200 in Detroit, or perhaps a little less, but when it enters Winnipeg, for purposes of duty the freight is added, thus bringing it into the class that would pay the 27½ per cent duty. In that case there is a discrimination to the extent that the man who imports a car at Windsor has to pay a duty of only 20 per cent as compared with a duty of 27½ per cent imposed upon the western Canadian importer. This amendment is intended to remedy that situation. I should add that while this fixes the rate at 20 per cent—because the value of the car for duty purposes is to be taken as at the point of production, say at Detroit—the 20 per cent will be paid on the value plus freight at the point it enters Canada.

Mr. MANION: The point that strikes me is that this will be a discrimination against the Canadian railways. Previously the man importing the same car at Windsor from Detroit brought it over the Canadian railways and paid 20 per cent, whereas if the car were transported by American railways through Minneapolis and St. Paul to Winnipeg the duty was increased above 20 per cent owing to the extra freight. What the minister is doing is to encourage people in western Canada particularly to import over American railways. It seems to me that this amendment will operate to the profit of the American railways and to the disadvantage of the Canadian roads.

Mr. EULER: There is some force in what my hon. friend says, and the same thing occurred to me. But if the car came from some distant point inland in the United States and were brought to Windsor the freight would be considerably increased.

Mr. MANION: That does not apply in the summer when there is traffic by boat, and I am not sure that it is true of the rail haul.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think the minister is overlooking the fact that there is competition.

Mr. EULER: It frequently happens that a man wants a car on short notice and he might cross the line from British Columbia, say, to Seattle or Portland.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): It is the duty of the customs department to collect revenue and not to direct railway traffic in this country. The railways can be trusted to get their share of the business and it is not for us to use the tariff to force people to ship their goods over one railway instead of another.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Does my hon. friend think that the government should change the tariff to induce people to ship goods by American railways instead of by Canadian?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): No. All we ask is that the government remove a distinct discrimination which to-day exists against western Canada whereby the Canadian in the west pays 27½ per cent duty while the eastern man pays 20 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: I would ask hon. members to bear in mind the fact that the Canadian railways now enjoy a considerable automobile business which is not altogether Canadian.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Is the duty always paid on freight?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—705a. Settlers' effects, viz:—Machines and implements for agricultural purposes moved by mechanical power; and motor vehicles, valued at not more than one thousand dollars, and boats for fishing purposes if actually owned abroad by the settler for at least six months before his removal to Canada, and subject to regulations prescribed by the Minister of National Revenue. Provided that in respect to motor vehicles valued in excess of one thousand dollars duty shall be payable only on the amount in excess of one thousand dollars. Provided further that the said machines, vehicles, implements and boats may not be so entered unless brought by the settler on his first arrival, and shall not be sold or otherwise disposed of without payment of duty until after twelve months' actual use in Canada: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is this a concession to people who are coming in or is it an extra burden?

Mr. EULER: Under the law as it stands, under certain conditions, the effects of settlers coming into Canada are free of duty. That includes automobiles valued at $1,000 or less at present. If the car is valued at more than $1,000, however, it becomes immediately dutiable for the full amount, so you have this situation: A car valued at $1,000 comes in free, whereas a car valued at $1,050 pays a tax on the entire amount. If it is fair to exempt entirely an automobile valued at $1,0000 or less it seems to me fair to exempt $1,000 of any sum greater than that. This is designed to correct that situation.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is that all that is in the change?

Mr. EULER: That is all it means.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. E. J. Young.]

INCOME WAR TAX ACT AMENDMENT

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Income War Tax Act, and to provide:

1. That the schedule of rates of income tax pertaining to individuals be reduced for the year 1927 and thereof by twenty per centum.
2. That the income tax of companies for the year 1927 and thereafter by eight per centum.
3. That allowance for exhaustion of mining lands, oil and gas wells and timber limits be afforded to and apportioned between lessee and lessor.
4. That the income from the operation of ships owned or operated by a non-resident person or corporation be exempt from taxation, provided that the country of residence grants an equivalent exemption in favour of a person or corporation resident in Canada.
5. That $500.00 exemption be given persons supporting dependents twenty-one years of age and over, incapable of self-support on account of mental or physical infirmity.
6. That upon election by the trustee controlling a superannuation pension fund or plan to have the investment income exempt from taxation the contributions by employees shall not be exempt.
7. That provision be made for procuring information as to payments made from the source of payment.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Will the minister please explain paragraph 3?

Mr. ROBB: I have a rather long memorandum on that. The substantial principle established under the income tax law is that mineral royalties received by the fee owner and the profits made by the operating lessee of the mineral rights above the cost of operation are income. Under the statutory allowance for depletion it cannot be twice credited, Once to the fee owner and once to the lessee; the depletion belongs as of right to the fee owner.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In other words, what you really mean is that the depletion goes to the owner of the property and not to the lessee.

Mr. ROBB: That is the law at present.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the change?

Mr. ROBB: To give the depletion to the lessee, who is the real operator; or they may agree on it.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Under the amendment it is to be apportioned. Do you mean to divide it between the two?

Mr. ROBB: In many cases the lessor is the crown, and they may agree upon what the depletion may be.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 156, to amend the Income War Tax Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read a second time?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): At the next sitting.

Mr. ROBB: If there is no objection we might put through the sales tax resolutions and introduce the bill to be founded on them.

Mr. STEVENS: I wanted to ask one or two questions but the matters to which they relate are not very serious.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That would take a few minutes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think an explanation of the meaning of the language used in the resolutions would occupy some time.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Wednesday, March 28, 1928

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Fourth report of the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization.—Mr. Kay.

First report of the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. Cahill.

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION COMMITTEE

On motion of Mr. Kay, the fourth report of the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization was concurred in.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I beg to lay on the table of the house:

Copy of the slavery convention adopted by the League of Nations at Geneva on September 25, 1926.

Copy of the second opium conference convention protocol of the League of Nations, signed at Geneva on February 19, 1925.

Copy of international sanitary conference, signed at Paris on June 21, 1926.

These copies are in both French and English.

QUESTIONS

BRITISH COLUMBIA COAL—FREIGHT RATE

Mr. NEILL:

Whereas order in council No. 439, approved 16th March, 1928, for reasons stated therein provides for a test movement of coal in full trainloads from Alberta to Ontario, the difference between the set rate of $6.75 per ton and what the Board of Railway Commissioners may determine to be a reasonable rate, to be paid by a vote in the estimates, and

Whereas the reasons stated in said order in council apply equally to coal mined in the province of British Columbia;

1. Will the government extend the provisions of said order in council to coal mined in British Columbia at the same rate as above mentioned, subject to a pro rata increase for the extra distance?

2. Whereas a number of British Columbia coal mines are situated on Vancouver island, and not in a position to readily ship by rail but well situated to ship by water, would the government grant them the same possible advantages as offered to railway shippers, by providing an equivalently proportionately low set rate for the transportation of coal in shiploads from Vancouver island to Montreal in the boats of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): An order in council was passed on the 13th February, 1926, (P.C. 225) referring to the Board of Railway Commissioners certain questions relating to costs and rates for transportation of Alberta coal. To assist in definitely determining the questions so submitted with a view to ascertaining the possibility of Alberta domestic coal supplanting foreign household fuel in the Ontario market, it has been deemed necessary, as provided by order in council of March 16th, 1928, (P.C. 439) to carry out an actual test movement. Those engaged in coal operations in British Columbia have not made representation as to getting into the eastern market.

PENITENTIARY GUARDS—CLASSIFICATION

Mr. LADNER:

1. Are penitentiary guards classified as civil servants under the Civil Service Act and as civil servants under civil service jurisdiction?

*GOVERNMENT VESSELS—USE OF CANADIAN COAL

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland):

1. What reason can the government give for not supplying information in a return tabled on the 6th March, 1928, as sessional papers No. 162, requesting them to specify what proportion of United States coal and what proportion of Canadian coal was used by the Department of National Revenue on government steamers on the Atlantic coast Service during 1927 and up to the present in 1928?

2. Is the government unable to ascertain what proportion was United States and what proportion Canadian coal, of the 3,623 and 282/2,000 tons supplied for the use of the Department of National Revenue on government steamers on the Atlantic coast service during 1927 and up to the present in 1928?

3. Did the government, or any department of the government, issue instructions to captains of ships (who were authorized to purchase coal for the use of the Department of National Revenue on government steamers on the Atlantic coast service during 1927 and up to the present in 1928) to purchase all Canadian coal?

Mr. EULER: Mr. Speaker, the department has no records with regard to the information asked for, but I may say that instructions have been given to all masters of vessels in the preventive service that they use Canadian coal wherever it is possible to do so. As a matter of fact, out of about thirty vessels only one has used American coal. This boat was built for service on the great lakes, and is equipped with force draught furnaces, which apparently makes it necessary to use American coal.

5. In each of the years and places mentioned in question one, how much was paid in wages to persons engaged in doing the work?

6. What persons were employed on the work in each year and place, and on whose recommendation were they so employed?

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

ENTERPRISE, ONTARIO POST OFFICE

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac):

For a copy of all correspondence memoranda, reports and other documents, in any way relating to the appointment of the present postmaster at Enterprise, Ontario.

ODESSA, ONTARIO POST OFFICE

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac):

For a copy of all correspondence memoranda, reports and other documents, in any way relating to the appointment of the present postmaster at Odessa, Ontario.

MR. WILLIAM P. MANZEROLLE

Mr. HANSON:

For a copy of all correspondence, memoranda, writings and papers relative to the dismissal of William P. Manzerolle from the position of subcollector of customs at Shippigan, New Brunswick.

VANCOUVER HARBOUR COMMISSION

On the motion of Mr. Manion:

For a copy of the budget submitted to the Department of Marine and Fisheries of the late Vancouver harbour commission, by R. E. Beattie, of the Vancouver harbour board, in the summer of 1924.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps my hon. friend will allow the motion to stand until the Minister of Marine (Mr. Cardin) is in his seat. In the meantime I would direct his attention to an obvious error. "The late Vancouver Harbour Commission, by R. E. Beattie", evidently should read "The Vancouver Harbour Commission, by the late R. E. Beattie". The word "late" is in the wrong place.

Mr. MANION: It is merely a verbal error.

Motion stands.

INTERNATIONAL PEACE

MOTION FOR THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENT

The house resumed, from Monday, March 26, consideration of the proposed motion of Miss Macphail:

That, in the opinion of this house, the time has come for the establishment of a government department for the promotion of peace and international understanding.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The mover of the resolution was, I believe, agreeable to having the matter rest at the point it had reached and not have the house divide upon it. In view of what was stated to be the government's attitude in a general way towards the proposal, perhaps my hon. friend will be prepared to withdraw the motion. I hope it will not be necessary to divide upon it.

Miss MACPHAIL: I am satisfied not to have the house divide on the question, but I am not satisfied with the attitude of the government.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): I rise, not to suggest that we should divide on the motion, but, if it is to be withdrawn, to say a few words before the matter is disposed of. I was exceedingly interested on Monday in listening to what the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) had to say on the subject. The resolution proposes the establishment of a government department for the promotion of peace and international understanding, and notwithstanding some of the things that are sometimes said by members of this house, I do not think there is an hon. member who is not in sympathy with the spirit and the purpose behind the motion. Who is there in this house who would suggest that we are not all for the promotion of peace and international understanding? But the great problem is, how best can this be brought about? We on this side of the house are certainly as anxious as those on the other side that we should always have peace in this country. I say that advisedly. I have discussed the question on many platforms and I wish to emphasize that statement here, because this house may be interested to know that in the last election my opponents, not publicly but privately, from house to house, went about trying to persuade people "not to vote for Perley", for the reason that if the Conservatives came into power this country would be at war with Turkey or some other nation within a few months. That was one of the weapons used by my opponents, and I daresay it may have been used in other counties as well. I am therefore glad of this opportunity to express, as I did on every platform in Argenteuil, the opinion that we have all had enough of war. Our boys went to the front, as did the boys from all other parts of this great empire as well as from other countries, and they did so with the conviction that they were waging war to end war. This was the belief voiced in after-dinner speeches in London, where I was at the time, and no doubt in other places, at meetings in the Guildhall and elsewhere. And many of us really believed that this would be the happy outcome of the war.

Now some people may say that we are not all equally desirous of stopping war. I rather think that the hon. lady who moved the resolution (Miss Macphail) had it in mind that perhaps she was more for peace than most of us. I can assure her this is not so. I was on the other side of the water all through the war, and although I was debarred by age from taking part as a fighting man, I was at the same time in a position to see and to know, and to have brought home to me as fully as it was brought home to anyone else who was not fighting, the horrors and the evils of this dreadful business. I learned then that whoever participates in war loses, no matter who wins. I hope the hon. member for Southeast Grey will not suggest that we did not do our duty in opposing the schemes and plans of the Germans at that time, because it is quite evident to me, as it must be to everyone, that the Germans really contemplated imposing their will, their ideas and their methods upon the rest of mankind. Nor would this country have escaped had they won out. And the fact that they did not win out within the first few weeks of the war was almost a miracle. Indeed, I understand from the best military authorities that the Germans simply overreached themselves in those first few weeks. They went too far; they spread their forces too thin over France; otherwise they might have accomplished their object.

The hon. member referred the other day to the vast cost of the war and she suggested how much we could have done with the money in other directions for the improvement of the social position of our people. Certainly; we are all agreed on that. But while trying to avoid war in the future, let us be thankful that we were able to frustrate the plans of the Germans who wanted to enslave the whole world and that, in consequence of our share in the war, we are now able to meet in this free parliament of ours and discuss peace and the best way to promote it.

Almost the whole of the discussion so far has been along the line of governmental action. There are two phases to this question; one is the government and the other is the people, and I am coming to the question of how we can best educate the people that they may understand these questions as we do who are in public life. I was very much interested in the debate which took place the other afternoon and evening; it started out with the most kindly words and feelings on both sides of the house and again I wish to compliment the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) for the tone and spirit of his words on that occasion. I am sorry that before the debate was concluded, however, I was forced to wonder whether we were not going at this question of peace in a fighting sprit, because my right hon. friend the Prime Minister brought into his speech a great many things which were not germane to the discussion. He did not seem to be able to refrain from introducing into his speech matters as to which there is at lease a political difference of opinion, and on which there might be even controversy. Why the occasion of a discussion on a motion such as this should be used by the Prime Minister to introduce matters which have been already discussed many times in this house I do not know, unless it was with the idea of hitting a blow at us on this side of the house. For instance, the right hon. gentleman referred to the Chanak incident, about which he read some extracts, among them one from a speech made by a gentleman whom I am proud to say was a friend of mine. I refer to Mr. Bonar Law, and I am glad to know that his son is in this city just now; it is a pleasure to see him here. The Prime Minister quoted Mr. Bonar Law in regard to the Chanak incident; I am sure no higher authority could be found, but what had that to do with this peace motion? Whether or not some members of the British government sent out a despatch without the knowledge of their confreres in the government is beside this question, and I wondered what my right hon. friend would say as to the joint responsibility of the cabinet with regard to all questions, when he drew the line as between certain members of the cabinet and the cabinet as a whole. He took to himself the glory for having stopped this European war. Well, Mr. Speaker, I hope he did, but I do not see the proof of it and I did not see that those quotations proved anything. I am not questioning the action he took at that time; I was not in the house then and I cannot discuss it now, but in his speech the other night I failed to find anyhing to prove his claim that he stopped this European war.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend is crediting me with too much; I quoted from the remarks of one of his own friends.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I think if the right hon. gentleman will read his own speech he will find that he took to himself the credit for having stopped this war. At any rate, be that as it may, that question has been discussed many times; it is a past incident, and I fail to see what it has to do with the subject under discussion at present.

Then my right hon. friend made a reference to a matter in connection with which I certainly disagree with him; I refer to his claim that the appointment of a minister to Japan is a step in the direction of peace. He brought that forward as one of his reasons for saying that this is a peaceful government, ready to do everything possible in the direction of peace. Far be it from me to say that this government is not doing everything it can to help the cause of peace; I believe it is, as we all are, but I do not agree with the suggestion that the appointment of a minister to Japan is a step in that direction. That is something which we may discuss on another occasion, and I merely refer to it now to show that the right hon. gentleman might well have left out these matters about which there might be some controversy or difference of opinion, in view of the general tone of this debate. My own feeling is that we should have a joint foreign service for the empire, in which we should have our share. In such an organization Canadian boys would have an opportunity equal to that of boys from England or Scotland; we might have a Canadian in the position of ambassador for the British commonwealth in Japan, representing all parts of this empire. I do not think we can have half a dozen ministers in Tokyo representing the British Empire and still maintain that empire permanently, as I for one want it maintained. I believe that the appointment which has been made by the government is a step in the direction of independence. I am not going to argue that now; I mention it simply because I do not think the Prime Minister should have brought it up.

As one of the results of the war we have to-day that organization known as the League of Nations. All through history men have been trying to find a way to settle all kinds of difficulties without fighting; we know very well that putting a stop to duels and the carrying of side arms by individuals was not brought about in a moment but was the growth of years. To-day we are looking forward to the day when nations will settle all their troubles and problems without fighting, but we must not be in a hurry; we must not become impatient, because we cannot bring this result about by a wave of the hand or a nod of the head. I am not going to spend a lot of time explaining to this house what the League of Nations is or what it has done, because you all know that as well as I do. I have been one of the delegates to the assembly of that league, as have my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) and other Canadians. I think they will agree with me when I say that the worst friends of the League of Nations are those persons who believe and say that the league can accomplish everything. The League of Nations has done a great deal; but it cannot stop all wars now. If it is allowed to develop and if it receives the support, the help and the good will of all nations, some day it may be in a position to stop all wars. To-day it can stop many wars and has already done so, but I am not going to refer to these instances at this time. In addition to that, the League of Nations has considered questions such as slavery, public health and other social problems, and has done a great deal to ameliorate conditions of this kind.

Further than that, the international labour office is a part of its organization and so these questions regarding labour all over the world are discussed from year to year and attempts are made to help the people who work so that they may do so under sanitary conditions, and may receive decent wages for their labour. Now when I went to Geneva as delegate from Canada I must confess that I was very doubtful as to how much the League of Nations could accomplish. I was not very sure whether we were spending money wisely in supporting the league and sending every year our contribution from Canada. However, as a result of what I saw there I am firmly of the opinion that the League of Nations should get our full measure of support, as well as that of every good thinking person and every good-wishing government in this world. I feel that if nothing more were accomplished than the opportunity given the delegates from all parts of the world to sit around a table and discuss the questions that arise, the money that we pay to the support of the league every year is money well spent. We all know how much easier it is to come to an arrangement in business by sitting down face to face with a man and talking things over with him. Half an hour of discussion under these circumstances is better than perhaps a month of correspondence. That applies to the people of the world in the matter of discussions at the League of Nations in exactly the same way.

May I give a further illustration of what I mean? I was a member of the committee which had to decide on the proportion of the expenses of the league to be borne by each country. Now there were forty-five men sitting round that table, each delegate representing a different country, and I do not know that you could suggest any question more knotty, more likely to end in misunderstanding, and as to which there would be greater difficulty in coming to an agreement, than this question of the distribution of the expenses of the league. We met many times and often it looked as though we should never arrive at a settlement. My old friend, Sir Herbert Ames, who was the financial director of the league, was present at every meeting. He was interested in getting this question settled on a fair basis. He was not particularly anxious as to what percentage each country should contribute so long as he got the money he needed. But Sir Herbert sat there and helped us in his suave way by contributing all the information he possibly could. Now as I say, it looked to me sometimes as though we should never arrive at any settlement. At the table where I sat I had on one side of me the delegate from Great Britain, and on the other side a man from Chili. Opposite me there was a man from Bulgaria, and a man from China. Some of us may have had the idea—some of you still may have it—that in the case of the delegates of some of the countries represented, like the Balkans, you might not care to meet them anywhere unarmed. We found that any such idea was completely erroneous. I was not able to exchange much conversation with the delegate from Bulgaria, who sat opposite me, but we passed each other cigarettes and endeavoured to be as friendly as we could. May I say that I found that every man who spoke on the question of the distribution of expenses was acting in good faith, was putting forward and supporting the position of his own country just as I was doing on behalf of Canada; I saw no signs among those delegates of any desire to take advantage of anybody else. After discussing this question at many meetings we at last came to a vote on various items as to which a difference of opinion existed. The decision reached was not unanimous, but the minority accepted the situation, and when we went with our report on the distribution of expenses to the assembly of the league that report was accepted and passed. The plan was only a tentative one, it was only intended to apply for a year or two. Later the matter was again taken up and discussed and a permanent arrangement arrived at. I feel that it is only fair that I should contribute this expression of opinion with respect to the work of the League of Nations.

Now, I wish to say a few words upon the question of action by the people, or endeavour to have them understand better the issues involved. The hon. member for Southeast Grey made one suggestion during her speech that particularly appealed to me. The hon. member, as reported at page 1697 of Hansard, said:

> And how little money it would cost the government to make a gift of books for the promotion of peace. These books could be issued to our public and school libraries. We have Rhodes scholarships in this country. We might establish peace scholarships on a somewhat similar plan, allotting a scholarship to each province.

I believe, sir, that we should back up the League of Nations. The government places in the estimates every year the amount required to pay our share of the league's expenses, we on this side of the house are happy to support them in so doing. Canadian governments representing both political parties have sent delegates to the assemblies of the League of Nations, and I think I am within the mark in saying that on the whole the men we sent there bore themselves well and created a good impression in the assembly itself and at Geneva. In my opinion something should be done to help the people of this country, and the people of other countries as well, to understand this question. Something should be done to bring before them the objects of the League of Nations and the benefits which it seeks to bring about so that they will thoroughly grasp the questions at issue and stand behind their governments in supporting the league to the utmost. The suggestion of the hon. member for Southeast Grey is very much in line with that idea. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) said that we ought to rely a good deal on voluntary organizations in the matter of educational work. May I point out to the Prime Minister and the government that there is in Canada a voluntary organization called the League of Nations Society. This society has been formed for what purpose? For the purpose of augmenting the numbers of those who support the league, of getting new members to join, and of distributing throughout this country information about the league. It is striving to teach the men, women and children of this city and of this country the objects of the league, pointing out what the league has accomplished and what it hopes to be able to carry out in the future. In other words, that is the organization through which we may hope to obtain the peace and understanding to which the motion refers. In Great Britain they have an exactly similar society called the League of Nations Union which has done splendid work and which has been strongly supported by the people of that country. The League of Nations Union had at its head in the first place Lord Robert Cecil, now Lord Cecil, about whom I need not say very much in this house as his name is well-known throughout the world. He was the most living force in the early years after the war in getting the League of Nations well started and the people of Great Britain to understand its usefulness. He was head of the League of Nations Union until he became a member of the government and since then Professor Gilbert Murray has been at its head. Both of these gentlemen were at Geneva the year I was there and both of them are almost crusaders for peace and for the idea of stopping wars between nations. In Great Britain this League of Nations Union has been very successful; it has a very large membership: some important men have been identified with it and have gone about the country speaking on its behalf. The other day one of them, Colonel Carnegie, was here speaking at the Chateau Laurier and the Minister of Justice and I were both present among others listening to him telling about the work of the league and what their hopes for it were.

We have in this country the counterpart of the League of Nations Union in this organization called the League of Nations Society of which Sir Robert Borden was originally the head, and over which Sir George Foster now presides. That organization has been endeavouring to put into force exactly the ideas which the hon. member for Southeast Grey spoke of in this quotation I have read in regard to the schools. It has had prepared a pamphlet without bias, without anything in it to offend any person no matter what his race or religion may be, and it hopes to have this pamphlet distributed through the schools in order that the children may learn about the work of the League of Nations. I may say to the Prime Minister that this society has done everything possible to put, and I believe has succeeded in putting, its endeavours on a basis that no one objects to, so that nobody can criticize or find fault with any of the various pamphlets the society has distributed or the ideas it has promulgated. That being the case, may I ask the hon. member for Southeast Grey whether she does not think the government might use this League of Nations Society, an organization all ready at their hand, for the purpose of bringing about a better distribution of ideas and information which I believe we ought to have spread throughout the country about the league if we are going to be able to support it as strongly as we should?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On the representations of that very society the government has included in the estimates for this year a vote of something like $2,250 to aid the society in the work of which he has spoken.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I realize this and I am very glad of it. I am prepared to support it when it comes up in the house. I could not resist the opportunity of giving the house my ideas regarding the distribution throughout the country of information about the work of the league. Governmental action is all very well; the government do and should ask the Governor General to sanction estimates to pay the expenses of the League of Nations; the government do and should send delegates to the assembly and arrange for the gentleman who is a member of the council of the league to attend that body. Now it was said the other day quite truly that the people have the spirit of peace. No one could get up on a platform to-day and argue in favour of war. But although they have the spirit of peace, they require to be informed as to the best way of bringing about peace, and I say that the best instrument for peace that at present exists is the League of Nations. Therefore I feel that the men, women and children of Canada and of every other country supporting the League of Nations should be provided with the fullest information about its activities and the good which it is doing. The action of the government in inserting in the estimates something for the League of Nations Society is to my mind a wise one. I hope they will consider the matter further and do more in that direction.

Just how the idea of the hon. member for Southeast Grey in regard to the schools can be carried out, I am not sure. That is a matter for the provinces. Each province must decide for itself, whether it will distribute any leaflet at all, and if it decides to do so, it has then to determine what leaflet or papers it will distribute. The little leaflet of the League of Nations Society has been prepared in such a way that I believe it is acceptable to all races and all religions. Therefore it is hoped that the different provinces may see their way to distribute the same leaflet to the various schools within their borders. The hon. member for Southeast Grey must remember that the Dominion government has no power in regard to a matter of this kind. It comes entirely within the purview of the provinces. I want to thank the house for the patience with which they have listened to my few remarks on this subject about which I am just as much interested as the hon. member for Southeast Grey, although we may not quite agree as to the best method of bringing about what we want. We want no more wars, we want peace always, but I am afraid we cannot expect to get exactly that for some little time. Therefore let us support the League of Nations and its ideas as strongly as we can as being the only organization of its kind the world has ever seen, or at any rate the only one we have at present, and one that has already done a great deal of good in the way of bringing about that peace among nations which we all desire.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I think the house is to be congratulated on the remarks made by the last speaker (Sir George Perley). His observations on the League of Nations, while perhaps not so spectacular as some of the speeches that have been made during the debate on the resolution, have contained more practical and fruitful suggestions regarding the ideals of the resolution than many of the speeches made the other day on this question. There has been sometimes a little reluctance in this house to pass votes for the expenditure of the League of Nations, and I hope that the remarks of the hon. member for Argenteuil will be borne in mind and will prevent any opposition to that vote when it comes down.

Although I would not like to go to the extent of preventing the motion being dropped, I am opposed to dropping it. We have already spent a great deal of time in discussing it. Either the object of the resolution is desirable and necessary, in which case the resolution should be passed or at least pressed to a vote, or else it is unnecessary and its introduction was useless. I am not at all in favour of bringing up these discussions which last for a long time and which end later on in the resolution being withdrawn. Either resolutions of this kind have a purpose, or they do not have a purpose, and if this resolution has a purpose—

Mr. FORKE: What about the sermon on Sunday? Do we take a vote on that?

Mr. NEILL: The Minister of Immigration asks me about the sermon. I will ask him to direct his attention to answering a question which I asked him six weeks ago, to which I have not got an answer yet.

Mr. FORKE: I will answer it to-morrow.

Mr. NEILL: That is what you said six weeks ago.

Mr. FORKE: That is no answer to my question, however.

Mr. NEILL: If we are to deal only with the academic suggestion that peace is more desirable than war, that is all very well, but it does not get us very far, and it is so absolutely obvious that everyone in this house and in Canada is in favour of peace rather than war that there is no necessity to assert it by means of a resolution in this house. As a matter of fact, the resolution does not assert that, if you will read it carefully. The discussion has wandered off into abstract phases of the question of peace and war, and entirely departed from the terms of the resolution, to which I would draw the attention of the house.

The resolution asks this house to declare that the time has come for the establishment of a government peace department, with all that that involves—a minister, a deputy minister, an assistant deputy minister, and so on all the way down. That, and only that, is what we are asked to do. We certainly would not grudge the expense of such a department, large as it would be, if it would be effective, but I maintain that it would not really be effective.

What is the object of this department when it is put into operation? It is to "promote peace and international understanding". Very good. Well, it cannot be the promotion of peace in Canada, because we have peace in Canada, and there is no need to talk peace in Canada. It therefore must be confined to the promotion of peace with our international neighbours, more particularly, I presume, those in Europe. Let us picture to ourselves that we have got this department established, and that we have appointed a minister, with a deputy minister and all his following behind him. We will say that the Minister of Immigration is at the head of such a department, and that it is his duty to promote international understanding and friendly relations with countries abroad, and so he goes to London and Paris and Berlin. How would he be treated there? He would be treated with the greatest courtesy and politeness, I know, but the idea that would immediately occur to these governments, and which would be conveyed to him, would be that his efforts would be best carried out through the established machinery for that identical purpose, the machinery named by the hon. member for Argenteuil, the League of Nations. It is proposed that we set up a boy to help do a man's work, when that man is apparently fully qualified, as qualified as we can make him at present at any rate, to do that work. But we are to set up a piffling little department to replace the efforts of our representatives in the League of Nations. Would the head of this department be present at and address the League of Nations? Not necessarily, because we have there our own representatives who engage in discussions, as so well said by the hon. member for Argenteuil, that lead to better understandings among the various nations of the world.

I agree with the hon. member for Argenteuil that this resolution had far better have taken the line of a strong endorsation of Canada's entrance into the League of Nations and a strong endorsation that Canada should remain a member of it, holding up both hands of our representatives there to push forward the objects of peace and international understanding among the nations of the world. That, I think, would have been more effective than to put forward this resolution that we should start, and necessarily in a small way as compared with the League of Nations, a government department of our own to promote peace, with the consequences of sending a man over there to be a sort of fifth wheel to the coach in promoting peace and understanding, when we already have larger and more effective machinery right at our hand in the League of Nations.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (Toronto West Centre): Having regard to the hunger of many friends of hon. gentlemen opposite for public office, it is rather surprising, Mr. Speaker, that the government is not ready to create this new department. It would take care of a great many of the faithful, at very excellent salaries, and make one more opening for some aspiring member, like the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) perhaps, to become a minister, and then there would be also a deputy minister, with all the usual string down to the stenographer, the messenger, and the office boy. We can catch a beautiful vision of how the government would be able, by creating this department, to satisfy a great many of its friends who are clamouring for more of the sweets of office, and so I think we must give credit to the government for its renunciation of this opportunity to look after so many of its friends. It is not like the government at all, and just why they seek to escape this opportunity I do not know. At the same time it is encouraging to note that a chance to add greatly to the expenditures of the country is resisted.

Mr. CHAPLIN: They may change their minds.

Mr. HOCKEN: That remains to be seen, but after what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has said I fancy there is not much likelihood of that.

I think every member of the house will give to the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) credit for sincerity, even though we do not agree with her resolution as being necessary. While many of us may think she is wrong in a great many of her views, I think the impression she has left upon the house ever since she came here has been that she is firmly convinced that her views are right and should be put into effect. It is a good thing to have independent members like that in the house. I am sometimes one of those, and I think the member for Southeast Grey has contributed materially to the excellent spirit that pervades the parliament of Canada. But at the same time I think the gesture she proposes —because it cannot be anything more than that—is rather a futile one in any attempt to promote peace. I do not know anybody in Canada who wants war. There is no war spirit in Canada; there never has been since I was born. All the wars that we have been engaged in have been those which threatened the empire, and believing that the destruction of the empire is analogous to the destruction of civilization we have felt it our duty on more than one occasion—although the empire was only partly threatened in 1900—to organize contingents and send them abroad to serve with the imperial army for the preservation of the empire. Well, Mr. Speaker, I hope that that will always be the spirit of Canada. I do not say that because I am a subject of the king, although that is one reason; I say it because I firmly believe that the strongest agency for peace in the world to-day is the British Empire. I am quite certain that the imperial statesmen have no desire for another war; they are showing evidence of that almost every day in proposing reductions of armaments. I am equally certain that none of the dominions desire war, least of all Canada. We have never had a war on our own account since 1812. We have lived for over one hundred years in amity beside a great nation with an overwhelming population, and through all these years we have grown to be a peaceable people, desiring peace and ensuing it. So I do not think it is necessary for us as a parliament, or as a people, specifically to go on record as being opposed to war. Our whole history attests that without any necessity of our passing a formal resolution in this house.

But, Mr. Speaker, when I survey our situation as a dominion of the empire, I come to the conclusion that there is no likelihood at all of our becoming involved in war on our own account, that so far as we participate in any war in the future we must take the lead from the imperial government. I can easily imagine Great Britain embarking in a war that would not require the assistance of the dominions, or of the cause being such that the dominions should say: We will not take part in it. But I feel sure that this country as a whole will be sympathetic towards all military operations that may be conducted by Great Britain.

[Mr. Hocken.]

I recall, sir, last year an incident in which my hon. friend took a small part, and the hon member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) took a large part, when the troubles arose in China. The cry then of a certain section of the people of Canada and of practically the whole soviet government of Russia was: Hands off China! I heard my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre make a speech in Montreal on that theme in which he was associated with many foreigners of different nationalities. Well, what happened on that occasion? This country stood in line with Great Britain—not to enter into war, but our moral suport was with Britain and against the forces of disruption and agitation then operating in China at the instigation of the soviet government. Their part then in fomenting trouble has since been proved as fully as anything can be proved. But the British government, with a wisdom to be admired by every reasonable, peace-loving person, took certain military precautions to protect their nationals in that country. I need not traverse the whole subject, Mr. Speaker; I merely point out that as a result of the policy laid down and carried out by the imperial statesmen, China has ultimately been brought to a comparatively pacific state. Of course I am not familiar with all the steps that were taken; I base my information on what has appeared in the newspapers, but as the lawyers say, the only thing that counts is the verdict; and the verdict on Britain's maintaining her position in China is all to the good, and the stand she took must be admired by every person who desires peace. Because, what would have happened if Britain had adopted the cry of hands off China? The soviet government would have had a free hand, and might have succeeded in starting—what they undoubtedly attempted there—a revolution that they hoped would spread throughout the world and make the Third Internationale the supreme arbiter of the destinies of mankind. We cannot survey that and other world crises without feeling confident that the men who steered us safely through such trials and perplexities are not going to lead us into disaster. So I say that this Dominion, pacific as it is, and a part of the most pacific power in the world, will be safe in keeping herself from being embroiled in any warlike operations by taking a lead from those men who have such a large experience in statesmanship, and possess facilities for knowing what is happening in every part of the world, the secret as well as the open things.

I am not at all alarmed, Mr. Speaker, at the prospect of the growth of a war spirit in Canada. As I say, I have been here quite a while; I have never discovered such a spirit. If it is in evidence at all it would be manifest, I suppose, in the size of our active militia. But our militia force has never been very large. It was scarcely large enough to repel the incipient invasion that was attempted in 1866. There is no desire now, and there never was, on the part of the people of Canada to embark upon war. In many Canadian homes another war is feared with all the intensity that arises from the losses that were sustained in the last war. Our taxpayers are carrying a burden that reminds them of the war every time the Minister of Finance, through his subordinates, sends them a tax paper. Surely these are sufficient deterrents.

But there is another and still stronger guarantee of peace—the spirit of our people. We are trying to build up a great country, to develop the immeasurable resources that Providence has bestowed upon us. It is a peaceful task and one that engages all our energies, leaving no room for the development of a war spirit. We have no armament manufacturers in the Dominion; at least, I do not know of any. Not that we are incapable of producing armaments, sir, as the late war disclosed. When occasion required it, this country was able to engage successfully in that work. We have the initiative and the genius to defend ourselves, and we have the spirit, when necessary. But the underlying sentiment of the people of Canada is a desire, aye, a passion for peace, and that is very much better, as I think my hon. friend for Southeast Grey will admit, and much more effective than would be the creation of another department of government. The government of this country properly must submit to public sentiment, and any government returned to power here would hesitate to defy that sentiment. Therefore, while the people desire peace so strongly this or any other government would certainly carry out their wishes in that respect.

After all, it is not a government that makes a nation; it is the man and the woman. The individual man and woman doing his or her part to the best of his or her ability day by day is what makes a nation great, prosperous and respected; and with all that is before us nothing could be more unlikely than that there should develop in this Dominion anything that might be said to approach a warlike spirit. The people of this country are determined to live in peace with all nations if possible. I do not think, however, that as a people we are prepared to accept peace at any price. It is, of course, always possible to have peace. If one surrenders one's convictions politically you will have political peace; if one surrenders one's loyalty or one's convictions as regards self preservation there can be national peace. But peace at any price I regard as an absolute disaster and I am unable to appreciate the spirit of those passive resisters who would take no part in defending their country. I do not think they are numerous in Canada; they are confined to a very small circle. Nor do I say that these people lack courage. But they have a idea that no matter what happens they should turn the other cheek. Now I want to live in harmony with everyone but I am not one of those who turn the other cheek always. I do not think a man is just right unless he is willing to defend his convictions, and a people are not right unless they are willing and able to defend their country. So that peace at any price is not to be thought of. The mother country could have had peace on the occasion of the great war by violating its treaty with Belgium, but that is not the kind of stuff the British people are made of. They entered into an engagement, to which the German kaiser was a party, and when he violated the treaty there was nothing for honourable people to do but to say, "You must observe that treaty or we will assist those whom you threaten." Peace at any price would have saved the British nation something like thirty billions of dollars and a million lives—for a time. But it would ultimately have resulted in the subjection of that nation to the Germans, and that would have been worse both for Great Britain and for Canada, worse than the loss of sixty-five thousand lives we suffered, the million lives lost to Britain, and the vast material treasure wasted in the war. After all, to live your own life and have your own liberty is the greatest thing in the world, that that is what we were fighting for in 1914. We were fighting for that great civilizing agency, the British Empire, in 1900.

I want to pay my compliment to the Prime Minister for his effective reply to this resolution. He pointed out to us, what I think was most convincing, that all departments of government, not only those created specifically for peaceful purposes, like that of the Minister of Labour and the Department of External Affairs, but the whole government, constitute an agency for peace, desiring it, seeking it and willing to have reasonable arbitration in cases of difficulty in order to maintain permanent peace in the country. And that I think is the right policy. That, to my mind, is much better than to have one department set aside which might have some difficulty in securing cooperation at all times, to do a work which ought to be the work of every minister of the government. It is the joint responsibility of the cabinet to maintain the peace and prosperity of the country; that responsibility rests on every minister and through him upon the individual voter. That being the case, I think the motion is rather futile. I do not intend that statement at all as a reflection on the hon. member for Southeast Grey, but it does not get us anywhere, and I do not think it could.

If I understood the Prime Minister correctly, he suggested that the appointment of an ambassador to Washington was one of the peaceful agencies. I do not believe that the appointment of Mr. Massey to Washington will produce war; I am not at all afraid of that. But we had one hundred years of peace before we had an ambassador at Washington. I do not think we can do much better than that, and I am rather disposed to put less value on the appointment of ambassadors than does the Prime Minister. What I think we should endeavour to avoid is to have our own representatives come in conflict, and create confusion, with the ambassadors of the Imperial government. Our affairs have been well looked after. They may be more intimately looked after now, and as to that time will tell. But I do not think our past history will prove that the appointment of an ambassador to Washington was necessary to maintain peace between the two countries.

I believe, with my hon. friend from Argenteuil (Sir George Perley), that the League of Nations is a very interesting attempt to bring about some method by which arbitration will be adopted and permanent peace finally established. I have not that implicit faith in its possibilities that some people have. At the same time I think a man would be somewhat rash and unwise who attempted to discredit the possibilities that lie within that organization. It is all in the future. There have been instances of disagreement and there probably will be others. While it costs a good deal of money, I presume that is divided up among the different countries, and it is a mere bagatelle compared with the propaganda which is spread throughout the world as a result of the creation of that body. Propaganda for peace is being carried on by the League of Nations perhaps more successfully than it could be carried on by any other agency, and certainly better than could be done by any one nation. Consequently there is a great deal to be hoped for from the work of that organization.

As I have already said, we have had one hundred years of peace with the United States. My explanation of that, sir, is that it is due to the fact that we know each other, to the intimate association of Americans with Canadians, the travel to and fro, the social connection between the two nations, the fraternal and even sporting relations which exist. In all the details of our lives we are associated with the United States in some way or other. We take their money and erect great factories to provide work and subsistence for our people; we welcome delegates to their conventions in this country as brothers. There is a community of interest between the people on the one side and the people on the other side of the boundary line. But there is one other thing which I think contributes to that result, although perhaps hon. gentlemen opposite will not agree with me. I offer my opinion with some hesitation, but I think a common language has had as much to do with the maintenance of peace between these two countries as anything else. It is a common language which has made our commercial and social relationships so intimate. Such a condition could not exist if we had different languages on each side of the border, and I am convinced that as time goes on and the English language is spread throughout the world at the rate it has been spreading for the last fifty years particularly, the possibility of permanent peace will be greatly enhanced. It is not that the English language is any better than any other language; I am not offering that argument, but it has become the language of commerce, and commerce has a great deal to do with peace between nations. If it were possible to organize a United States of Europe, with a common language, many of the jealousies which now exist would disappear. I know I am suggesting something which is impossible, but those jealousies are created by a lack of knowledge of the other countries.

Mr. CAHAN: May I ask a question? Is the English language the language of commerce in America, north and south, at the present time? Certainly it is not.

Mr. HOCKEN: I disagree with my hon. friend, but he may have his opinion while I have mine. I say the 120,000,000 people to our south speak English almost entirely, and I do not think my hon. friend can question that statement.

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly not, but the language of commerce with other nations is the language of the nation with which you deal.

Mr. HOCKEN: And more and more that is becoming the English language.

Mr. CAHAN: Not a bit of it.

Mr. HOCKEN: If you knew as much about commerce as I do you would agree with me.

Mr. CAHAN: If you knew as much about those states as I do you would not make that statement.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): We certainly need a department of peace here.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. HOCKEN: Let me conclude with this statement: It is the intimate knowledge of each other which is most likely to bring about that era of permanent peace which we all so much desire. I quite agree with my hon. friend from Southeast Grey in her desire and passion for peace, but I am unable to see how that end will be advanced by the creation of a new department of government.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Since this question of peace now before the house enables us to air our own idiosyncrasies in the parliament of Canada, I presume I may add a few words to this peaceful discussion. We are all in sympathy with the efforts made to secure peace in this country and thoughout the world, but I entirely agree with the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that the organization of a special department of government will do and can do little to promote peace in this country or in the world. The object and purport of the resolution, in a general sense, is acceptable to the whole house, but in its present form, calling for the organization of a new department, I certainly could not approve of it and would have to vote against it.

Among my earliest memories are stories which I heard in my childhood, stories of the Indian Mutiny and of Williams of Kars. Then there were the stories concerning my own grandfather, who was the commander of a British ship, and of his only son who was a lieutenant with him fighting in the Crimean war. The later military incidents which interested me were the war pictures in the Illustrated London News and in the newspapers containing from day to day the despatches relating to the Franco-German war; the baptism of fire of the Prince Imperial; the siege of Sedan; the communist occupation and domination of Paris. I later remember going each night to the post office when the mail arrived late, as was often the case in the country village where I lived as a lad, to obtain the latest news of that memorable siege of Plevna, in which every boy of that time took an interest either on one side or the other. Even before that I remember the Canadian boys coming back from the war between the North and the South, in which many of them had enlisted, and from then until the last great war we have had many wars of different kinds. We must recognize the fact that there is an instinct in human nature which insists that men and nations shall fight for the causes which they regard as sacred.

I have had a lot to do with boys; I have brought up two families of boys, yet I have had a perfect contempt for the robust boy who would not fight for his rights at school if those rights were unjustly infringed upon by a neighbour. I find in my experience of life that there are matters of honour and dishonour in connection with which every man in this house would lay down his life rather than sacrifice what he might regard as his own honour, his dignity and his rights as a man. I pray God for peace for Canada, but I pray God that Canada and Canadians may not be so oblivious to their rights as a nation and as a people that in a sacred cause they would refuse to lay down their lives for their country if necessary. Therefore, while we are for peace and while we should exert every effort to maintain peace, I hope the boys and girls of this country will be also taught by their fathers and mothers, as I was taught, that there are sacred causes in which the value of a man's life is as nothing, and that it should be sacrificed, if need be, for the cause of his country, to maintain the rights of his country's government. The maintenance of peace and the preservation of our national life go together, the two principles must be taught together, if we are to become a strong, valiant, self-reliant, Canadian nation, and I think the one element must be emphasized in our teaching as well as the other.

I regret some of the side issues brought in by my hon. friend who has just spoken (Mr. Hocken). I regret that he has brought in the question of language, brought in the idea that the spread of the English language is necessary to promote the cause of peace. I doubt it much. Take the great continent of South America, which is expanding even more rapidly than we are expanding here on the northern half of this continent. Great nations are developing there, nations with courts of law which. I sometimes think, ours do not excel; nations with fine educational institutions and great libraries. In the little city of Bogota, the capital of Colombia, 8,500 feet up in the sky, there is a library with which I do not believe any library in Canada can quite compare. Take their educated men. Whether it be law, whether it be medicine, whether it be literary attainment or commercial endeavour, many of them are superior to us in education and culture—education and culture obtained through a different language and under a southern sky, and with which ours may hardly compare; and we are not likely to wipe out the languages which the peoples of these races learned at their mother's knee and imbibed with their mother's milk.

Mr. HOCKEN: I did not sugest any such thing, if the hon. member will allow me to say so.

Mr. CAHAN: You are not likely to wipe out the Spanish language south of the Rio Grande, or the Portuguese language in Brazil, or the French language in Canada.

Mr. HOCKEN: All right, now you have got that off your chest.

Mr. CAHAN: Well I intend to get it off my chest every time my hon. friend endeavours, as a representative Canadian, as a representative of the Conservative party in this house, to make it appear that his is the idea which should prevail in this country.

Mr. HOCKEN: I made no reflection on the French language. My only statement was that English was becoming the language of commerce, that is all.

Mr. CAHAN: English is becoming the language of internal commerce in America if you call the United States, America.

Mr. HOCKEN: No, I say all over the world.

Mr. CAHAN: All over the world it is not so. The greatest asset this country has in the way of developing trade with South and Central America—to which I firmly believe a great part of our attention should be directed, because the future well being which we may attain in Canada through industrial and commercial endeavour will undoubtedly be attained through commerical intercourse with that southern continent—the greatest asset we have in promoting that trade is the fact that we have 3,000,000 of educated French speaking people in Canada to help to carry it on. Their facility in acquiring other languages is a great asset, and the commercial language of the world is not one language. The commercial company or undertaking that wishes to carry on international trade must be in a position to carry on that trade in the language of the people with whom it seeks to deal. Moreover a knowledge of more than one language—as we experience in this house, and as we must experience in this country—enables us to understand the thought and mentality of other people in a manner otherwise impossible. And if we want peace and unity in this country—which is more desirable for us than peace and unity in Europe—the best way of promoting it is for English Canadians, so far as possible, at least to learn to read the two languages which prevail in this country in order that they may understand the mentality of the French-speaking people who are our confreres and our brother Canadians, and whose cooperation is absolutely necessary if we are to attain the ideals which we all have in common, if we are to develop a great, stable, Canadian nationality.

One other remark—and I may as well use the phrase of my hon. friend and "get it off my chest"—and it is this: The League of Nations is an instrument for promoting the peace of the world. In that respect it should have our cordial cooperation as a parliament, and particularly our cordial cooperation as Canadians. But the League of Nations covenant imposes upon the Canadian government and the Canadian people grave responsibilities that we ought, from time to time, to reconsider and discuss. I wish to suggest to the Prime Minister that with regard to the doings of the League of Nations and the action of the delegates whom we send from time to time, either to Geneva to participate in the assembly or to take part in the council of the league, or to serve upon its various committees and at the conferences which are called by that great body, the government should annually clearly enunciate to us what objects it has in view and how far it cordially assents to the resolutions passed from time to time. There are some resolutions adopted from time to time—I am not going to go into that question now—which impose upon this country grave duties and responsibilities, and which I sometimes fear may impose too great a burden upon the government and the people of this country.

I have expressed myself with more ardour than I intended. Because as you all know I am a most peaceful member of the house in every way. It is only when my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) and I—who are the best of friends, and I am sure, drawn together by a bond of mutual respect that could not be shattered—are drawn into personal controversies across the floor of the house that our inherited Irish temper gets the advantage of us. Otherwise I am a most peaceful citizen, as my hon. friend is. But to resume a rather disjunctive statement, we are in entire sympathy with the member for Southeast Grey. The mentalities of men and women, however, are very divergent; the experiences of life in the case of men and women are very different. I am in cordial sympathy with all the efforts of the member for Southeast Grey, in the way of social reform and have an esteem and respect for her that I do not now care to express. But I was brought up in a different atmosphere, trained in business and public affairs in an entirely different way, schooled by entirely different experiences of life, and I must take rather divergent views on many questions from those which she entertains. We are glad the hon. member has brought forward this resolution. Expressed in the form in which it is I would have to vote against it, although I am entirely in sympathy with the object she has in view.

There is, however, another side to this subject. Twenty centuries of Christian teaching have not wiped out war. Human nature remains to-day very like it was in the days of the Roman and Greek civilizations. The times are coming, although I believe I may not live to see them, when great conflicts will arise on the Pacific, when the commonwealth with which we are associated will again be in danger. There are times coming which will again try men's souls, when the parliament and people of Canada will again be called upon by this country, by the spirit of devotion to country which is born within them, to take part in great conflicts, and we shall undoubtedly take part in them. Therefore do not let us, as members of the parliament of Canada, imagine that wars have been abolished forever. They may be no nearer being abolished to-day than they were two thousand years ago. But let us train our people to a devotion to the cause of peace, a desire to promote peace. Let us impose upon our government, if imposition is necessary, the will to peace. Let us watch our Department of External Affairs, the Department of Trade and Commerce and every other department through which we come into contact with other countries, so that we may make sure that we always maintain high-minded and honourable dealings with the nation to the south of us and with all other nations with which we come into contact. But having done that, when the crisis comes and the vital national interests of Canada are again at stake and can be defended only by war, let us pray God that our children and our children's children will be as prepared to fight for this country as the children of this generation have been prepared to do their full duty for their country and for their king.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take part in this debate; but considering the great latitude which it has assumed and the many subjects which have been discussed under the motion, I thought I might say something. After all this is only a theoretical discussion. As nearly every speaker has said, there is in Canada no war party, there never has been and it is not likely there ever will be. Consequently as we hear these discussions with more or less the same speeches delivered year after year on a subject that is of practically no interest to Canada, as there is not and never has been any fear of war abroad, are we not bound to conclude that this is a great deal of waste of time and money? While I was listening to the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) in which he pronounced one of his tirades on the people of Canada in general, I could not help wondering whether, after all, if we have to listen to many such speeches, it was really worth while winning the war. I should like to remind him that had it not been for the forces that fought in the allied army in the last war, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would not be able to stand up in this house and deliver such a speech. They fought for his liberty, for his freedom of speech, and for the liberty of the people of this country. Had they not successfully fought, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would be to-day jumping at the command of a German sergeant-major rather than rising to speak at the sanction of the Speaker of the House of Commons.

I agree with the last speaker, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), that much as we may hope and pray for peace in this country, we cannot change the disposition of the people overnight, as happened to Saul of Tarsus, and create a different heaven and a different earth. Therefore the wise people of this country, the wise people of the world to-day are the people who will pray and work for peace and yet be ready for war if it comes. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) referred the other night to England's preparation for war before the last disaster of 1914. I wonder if he knows what position and condition England was in at that time. Had England been properly prepared for the last war, do hon. members think it would ever have occurred? All we have to do is to cast our minds back on the records of this very house. What did we listen to in 1913 and 1914 when the naval debate was in progress? Hon. members in this very chamber or the chamber that preceded it, laughed at the possibility of war, although everybody who knew the inside workings of Germany and the preparations going on in that country knew that war could not be long postponed. What was happening in Germany during those times? She had for years been preparing for war. She had built her strategic railways right up to the very borders of Belgium. She had brought her army in 1912 into a state of perfection. The Kiel canal was to be finished in 1913. France was the only country that, seeming to realize her danger, had reorganized her army, but it would not be at its perfection until 1915, and it is no secret that the military men in England and France predicted that war would come, and that it would come between two definite periods—and it did. Lord Roberts, Sir William Robertson, and many others held that opinion. What was the condition of Great Britain, France and Germany when war broke out? Germany was able to throw into battle 130 divisions inside of sixty days if necessary. France was the next best prepared.

Mr. BROWN: Might we have the discussion confined to the resolution instead of having recited the history of many years ago?

Mr. McGIBBON: France, as I said, was the next best prepared. She had only seventy-five divisions; Russia had only fifty, and Great Britain, that the hon. member for Labelle said had made such great preparations, had only six. That was the condition in which Great Britain found herself at the outbreak of hostilities in 1914. It is a matter of common knowledge in history that had Great Britain, France and Russia at that time had armies equal to meet the emergency which was and had been confronting them for some years, no war would have broken out on that occasion and that great catastrophe would have been averted.

It is always well not to get far away from earth, because heaven is a long way from some of us; we have to stay here and face the practical things of life. As the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George stated, human nature is to-day pretty much what it was before and we cannot deny that fact. What is there to-day that will draw the vast crowds and gates that a prize fight will? Is there on earth anything else that will do it? Human nature from the dawn of time has had the same instincts and will continue to have them. People will fight for the preservation of their life and liberty whenever necessary. In making that statement I do not mean to infer that people want to do this; but there is always a class that will override the liberties and rights of others, and there are on the other hand people who have manhood enough about them to defend their liberties and rights when they are so overridden.

I am not just sure of my ground here, but I rather think I am right when I say that when the message came to this country in connection with the Chanak incident, which we all realize now was more or less of a blunder, information was sought as to whether or not Canada was willing to stand by her treaties. Was not that behind it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, no reference to that.

Mr. McGIBBON: Did we not have a treaty with Turkey?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was not referred to.

Mr. McGIBBON: But was not that behind it? Was not that the spirit of it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think so.

Mr. McGIBBON: Was it not necessarily based on that hypothesis?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not at all.

Mr. McGIBBON: Was not that treaty being violated?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. McGIBBON: I take the Prime Minister's word for it because I have not been able to look up the matter although I was inclined to the view that the treaty was being violated and that a request came to this house whether we were willing to abide by the treaty which we had signed. However I accept the correction of the Prime Minister if I am wrong. The Prime Minister said that on that occasion he practically saved the peace of the world or at all events, peace so far as Canada and the empire was concerned. I should like to ask him what he did when a much greater opportunity arose in connection with the treaty of Locarno, a treaty which to my mind surpasses every other effort that has ever been made to preserve the peace of Europe This country stood aside and refused to take any action at all in connection with that pact. I asked the Prime Minister across the floor of the house two sessions ago whether the government were going to take any action in connection with that pact. He gave me an evasive answer, and finally the government did what we knew from the first they would do—they refused to take any action at all.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. McGIBBON: The Minister of Justice says, "hear, hear," I agree with him to this extent, that we should not be held responsible for any treaties to which we are not a party and about which we have not been consulted, but for the life of me I cannot see how this country is going to go on as a nation within a nation, so to speak, a nation within the British Empire, and not to some extent at least share the responsibilities of that empire. I think the time is coming, and it must inevitably come, as pointed out by Sir Robert Borden during the war and during the imperial conferences following the war, when we must have joint responsibility as well as joint freedom of action. One must go with the other, and if we are going to work for peace, I agree with those who have said here this afternoon that the greatest agency for peace in the world to-day, or that has ever existed in the world, is the British Empire, and if this country is desirous of securing the peace of the world, there is the channel along which we should work. I say again that in my opinion if the British Empire as a whole had got behind the Locarno pact, that action would have been one of the greatest influences for the peace of Europe and one of the greatest opportunities to work for peace that has ever been presented in my time at least.

The hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) says that she is opposed to force, or at least I inferred that from her remarks. I had in my hand yesterday, although I have not got it at the moment, an extract from one of her speeches delivered in the city of Regina in which she said that the only thing to do with this government was to take it by the throat and hold it up against the wall and make it do things. I wonder if that requires any force, or is this government so weak, metaphorically speaking, that all you have to do is to threaten it and it will collapse.

I have a great deal of sympathy, Mr. Speaker, with the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston). He is a man whom I think we all respect and admire, and those who know him best, I believe, think the most of him. I have a great deal of sympathy with him in the position in which he finds himself. He is administering a responsible department, and he has practically on two or three sides of him a hostile following. Although he is not in the house at the moment, I want to assure him that in any reasonable measures he takes towards perfecting that department and bringing it up to standard, so to speak, so that it will be ready for any emergency that may come—and God forbid that it may come—he will have my support. I believe that as a self-respecting nation we should make adequate preparation for any emergency that may overtake us. I hope that this parliament will never again exhibit the spectacle that it presented before the outbreak of war, when speaker after speaker in this house got up and ridiculed the possibility of this country ever being drawn into a European war.

So far as the participation of Canada is concerned, I do not think there is any danger of this country having to send troops out of Canada without the sanction of parliament. I believe from the facts that it would be absolutely impossible. I think the Prime Minister will agree with me that should any such emergency arise, there would be no money available for the purpose of sending out troops, and consequently parliament would have to be called and the money voted before any such action could be taken. But I do think that this and any other self-respecting country should lay the foundations sufficiently well that around a skeleton of a military defence organization we could build up the forces nececssary for self-protection in time of emergency.

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): Mr. Speaker, I shall not occupy the time of the house for more than two or three minutes. I merely wish to enter my protest against one or two expressions which have been used by previous speakers. But before doing so, I want to say that I stand where I believe every other member of this house stands, and where I believe every citizen of the Dominion of Canada stands, in absolute unanimity in regard to the spirit which prompted this resolution. I do not think there is any division of opinion in Canada at all on that, and I do not think there ever has been, at least not for one hundred years.

In regard to the establishment of a special government department, with all the usual machinery from minister, deputy minister, and so on down, I do not think that is necessary, and I am confirmed in that view by the fact that our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has succeeded in stopping one or two wars himself. I think, therefore, that instead of a whole new department being created, if the Prime Minister had as his able assistants the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) and the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), forming a committee of three, they would cause all the crowned heads of all the countries in the world to tremble at the very thought of bringing on a war. So, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that such a department is at all necessary.

I cannot agree with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken) that if such a department were formed, the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) should receive the portfolio as minister of peace. With all due regard and respect for the hon. member for Saskatoon, in my humble opinion he has no qualifications whatsoever for that position, I would suggest —I know he will not take this as disrespectful from me—that if the government, following their usual course of unwisdom, should provide such a department, unquestionably the gentleman who should be appointed as minister of peace, and who well deserves the honour, because he is a recent recruit to that side of the house is the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown). The hon. member for Lisgar approves that, and by his vociferous applause indicates that in his own mind he is perfectly qualified for the post.

The two points which I wish to deal with are these. In referring to the statement made by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) I hope no one will misinterpret my attitude towards him. I beg to assure you, Mr. Speaker, and the house that I entertain no feeling of animus or hostility towards the hon. member.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I am glad that that sentiment meets with the approval of my friends opposite. On the contrary, I pity the hon. member. And, Mr. Speaker, as you know, pity is akin to love. I say at once that the grand passion has not up to the present reached an embarrassing stage so far as I am concerned, and I have an idea that it has not yet inconvenienced the hon. member. But I protest against his use of the expression "warmongers". There are no warmongers in Canada, and there never have been. There are no warmongers in England. I would venture to say if there is any difference in the degree of zeal of hon. members for peace, then the palm must be given to those who actually participated in the war—to the hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) and to other hon. gentlemen. None are more determined against war and none are more inclined for peace than they. They know what war means much better than those of us who stayed on this side. There is no sentiment for war in this country. It does seem to me that there is a disposition on the part of some hon. members rather to create an impression throughout the country that there are members in this house and people throughout the Dominion who are trying continually to drive Canada into war, and that those hon. members who are creating that impression should be put upon a pedestal and lauded to the skies as particular and heaven-sent apostles of peace.

The other expression to which I take exception was uttered by the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail). She said the peace tower was erected for the glorification of war. Why, sir, you might just as well say that the statues surrounding this building to Mackenzie, Cartier, McGee, Macdonald and Laurier were for the glorification of politics. Not at all. They were placed there by men of all shades of politics to do just honour to great Canadians who had made sacrifices and given to their country worthy service. Is the statue in yonder entrance to the memory of Baker, once a member of this house, erected there in order that the boys and the girls and the men and women of Canada who come to see the parliament buildings of their country should have a higher regard for war than for peace? Not at all. The memorial was placed there because his fellow-members of parliament were proud of the course he pursued. And so with the peace tower. To suggest that it was erected for the glorification of war is an insult to the country and to parliament. It is intended for no such purpose. It is intended to bring to the minds of visitors to this country that we who are today enjoying certain privileges have not forgotten the great sacrifices which many of our sons and brothers made in that great struggle from 1914 to 1918. That is what it is there for. Sir, I have a son who took part in the war. Fortunately he came back. Had it been otherwise I would still be proud indeed that my country did not forget him, but inscribed his name on the glorious roll of the book of remembrance deposited in that tower.

It strikes me as expressing a very perverted idea, to say the least, to refer to yonder tower and the memorials being erected there in the honour of the boys who gave their lives in the great struggle as the glorification of war. The person who entertained such a view would have to fold up the Union Jack, because it has always been associated with the struggles of Great Britain and the dominions—not merely our struggles in time of war, but also our struggles and achievements in times of peace. Why should we erect memorials to those who have written their names on the book of fame in times of peace for great achievements in science, literature and art, and forget or refuse to recognize those who have given their lives in war time in doing what they conceived to be their duty in defence of their country? Quite properly we erect such memorials, but in commemorating those who have fallen on the battlefield we do not glorify war. They did not become soldiers because they wanted to slaughter their fellow men; they fought for their country from a high sense of duty and willingly sacrified their lives in its defence.

I object strongly to the hon. member's suggestion that we have erected the peace tower as a glorification of war. It seems to me it is tantamount to imputing to this house and to the country a lack of appreciation of the value of peace. Nay, sir, it goes further than that, it is indirectly an assertion that the men in whose memory it is erected went overseas and engaged in a slaughter that was congenial to them. The assertion can mean nothing else. The marble brought from the battlefields of Belgium and France and the stones brought from the old country. all so beautifully combined, will never, I am sure, in any sense appeal to us as a glorification of human slaughter in war, but will remain for all time to come to tell future generations of Canadians that between 1914 and 1918 Canada had sons who were worthy of their glorious ancestors.

Mr. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, it has been my privilege to occupy a seat in this house for some years. During that time I have heard many resolutions discussed, some at great length and others not so extensively, but I do not think I ever remember a resolution having as its basis such a unity of sentiment as that upon which this resolution is based.

The object of the resolution is the promotion of peace and international understanding. Well, whatever may have been conditions in years gone by, I am sure that at the present time there is but one thought, one desire, one aspiration on the part of the Canadian people, and that is the promotion of peace and international good will. We have in this country, of course, many organizations: we have, for example, the parliament of Canada. Now I venture to say that there cannot be found either in this house or in the senate one member who is not earnestly in favour of the promotion of peace and international good will. We might also go through the nine legislatures of the provinces and I am sure we should find the same condition, the same sentiment actuating the members of those bodies. We might take our municipal councils and all other organizations and find the same spirit prevailing. Take the schools, the thousands of our teachers in Canada: I am sure that not one of them is promoting anything but a desire for peace and international good will.

Assuming, then, that we are all agreed upon the necessity and the desirability of the sentiment embodied in this resolution, it becomes a question of method, a question of how we can best promote and strengthen the sentiment which we all hold in common. As I have said, there is no one I know of who is opposed to this sentiment. Therefore, so far as our internal affairs are concerned, it does not appear that there is necessity for any organization to promote this sentiment in Canada. Nor does there appear to be any danger that Canada is to be involved in the near or in the remote future in any war originating on this continent. If there is any danger from war we are agreed, I think, that it must come from Europe, where there are many divisions, where there are deep-rooted prejudices, where there are misunderstandings —small countries adjoining one another in close rivalry, where there exist old feuds, old quarrels and differences of language and race, which differences are very strong, very keen and sometimes very bitter. A department organized in Canada such as is suggested by this resolution would have very little if any influence upon the situation over there. It would have no influence which we cannot exert through the existing organizations we have in this country. As has been pointed out by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), we have a Department of External Affairs whose very title reminds us that it deals with our international relations; and as far as we know this department is discharging its duty, is working well, is promoting international good will and friendship. And the appointment of ambassadors or representatives in these foreign countries cannot, I submit, but have some effect.

Then, of course, we have over and above all these, as pointed out, the League of Nations, the greatest effort that has ever been made in human history for the establishment of international good will and the making impossible of war. We all wish that organization success. It is young; it is a new experiment; it is perhaps the only partnership in which so many nations are united with one common purpose and one common object. I repeat, therefore, that we wish it well, for it is an organization through which we can exert the greatest measure of influence in our common effort for the promotion of peace and good will. That organization is endeavouring to hold up an ideal to the world. I do not think that its proceedings are well enough known to the people at large, and I quite approve of the suggestion that has been made that they should be studied more carefully by the members of this house, that they should form the subject of debate, and that there should be a greater dissemination of this information through the schools of the country.

I submit that everything at the present time tends in the direction of peace and international good will. The experience of the recent war has but one lesson for the world, and that is the failure of war, the horror of it, and the desirability of finding some other method for the solution of international difficulties. The nations are engaged in an endeavour to bring about a large measure of disarmament; they are more and more invoking the method of arbitration for the settlement of international disputes. Commerce is more and more becoming world-wide. Our communications by radio, our rapid transportation systems, are all calculated to promote peace, to bring about better understanding and to make for the object expressed in this resolution. It comes back, therefore, to the question of method and whether we shall for the present allow these influences that are undoubtedly at work to develop, to see how far they may be successful. Such an organization as we might set up under the terms of this resolution would, I think, have very little influence in Europe. I do not think it would have any influence whatever beyond the influence we are able to exert through existing institutions. Therefore, while quite agreeing with the spirit of the resolution, I submit that the method suggested is not calculated to promote the high purpose which the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) has in view.

It is well that from time to time we should have discussions such as this. No matter how firmly we believe anything, it is worth while sometimes to restate our convictions, to reaffirm them, to make them known to the world. It does not appear at present that any practical result can come from such an organization as is proposed by the resolution. I am glad that we have had this discussion; I know members of the house are better informed and that we are more firmly resolved, if that be possible, to do everything in our power for the promotion of peace and international understanding. On this continent we are particularly fortunate in that we have no warlike aspirations; the United States have no such desires, and while we have had many questions which in other countries might have led to acute differences of opinion and perhaps to war, by friendly methods we have been able to settle those disputes. I think we have set an example to the world in this respect, and I think Canada occupies the peculiar position of an interpreter between the conflicting ideas and institutions of the old and new worlds.

We have had a very thorough discussion on this question, Mr. Speaker, and I do not think I can add anything of value to it. I simply wish to state that while I am absolutely in sympathy with the object of the resolution I do not think the establishment of a separate department of this government would contribute anything substantial or really worth while to the purpose of the mover of the resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. member shall have leave to withdraw her motion?

Miss AGNES MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Of course this reply will close the debate.

Miss MACPHAIL: I had not thought of carrying on the debate to-day, but since it has been carried on I hope I may be allowed to say a few words before asking the house to permit the withdrawal of the motion. It is apparent that there is peace and peace, because with some of the sentiments which have been expressed to-day I find myself in very strong opposition. If they were peace speeches that is not the sort of peace I am seeking. I was almost alarmed on Monday when all the parties in this house were endorsing almost everything in the resolution; I thought times had changed, but I feel more at home to-day.

While we believe we are always right and while we have a superiority complex that nothing can puncture, there is no use talking peace. Of course that goes to show that we should have a department which will try to teach us the truth with regard to our own position. I respect the mentality and the views, or at least the views, of everyone in this house, but I certainly do not understand how they arrive at some of their conclusions. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) dragged in the Crimean war, perhaps unhappily. I believe it was Lord Salisbury of England who said long after the Crimean war that England had backed the wrong horse. I suppose a lot of people died because England backed the wrong horse, but if anyone had said so at the time there would have been a great hullabaloo; they would have been unpatriotic. The hon. member also said that on this subject women have different views from men; I hope to heaven he is right. That should be a good argument why the women of his province should be given the franchise. Half the people of Canada are women and there seems no good reason why the voice of the women in regard to peace and war should not be expressed in this house, and also through the actions of the government. We do believe that women have a different point of view in regard to war; women place human life on a higher plane than men have placed it in the past, because women have suffered more that life may be.

I want to say just a word with regard to the statement made by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), who dealt with what I thought about the boys who went overseas. I can say what I think; I will not ask the hon. member to interpret my mind for me. I will take second place to no one in the respect, the honour and the love I hold for the boys who willingly sacrificed themselves between 1914 and 1918, and I want the sacrifice they made to be crystallized into such action as will prevent the same thing happening again. I certainly do not intend to reflect upon the men themselves or upon their relatives and friends, whose hearts were torn and bleeding and who naturally sought to do the thing that has always been done when they commemorated in marble and stone the brave acts of the men of this country. If that were all they did I should wholly agree with it, but other than that I cannot qualify the statement which I made the other day. I believe I spoke the truth, although others may not so believe.

Then for a moment I would like to refer to the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I am wondering to-day how he likes the company he is in. Everyone who spoke to-day considered that the Prime Minister made a very good speech. I have heard him make good speeches, but I did not consider that to be one of them. The statement of the government, through the Minister of National Defence and the Prime Minister, is something like this: "We want security, and we are trying to win it in two ways; through education, which we leave to all the departments, and through military preparedness, which we carefully organize and put under the direction of one of the ablest men, if not the most able man, in the cabinet. But the idea that security can be obtained by wiping out suspicion, fear, and ignorance we leave to everybody, and what is everybody's business will be well done." That was the argument advanced by those gentlemen. The Prime Minister said my view was narrow, that I should not have asked for a department to promote peace because that was a narrow or limited view. The Prime Minister's idea that all the departments will promote peace is so broad that it is flat. The Prime Minister is a sensible and clever man, and he knows as well as I do that what is left to all the departments will not be done by any. He might have said equally well, "Why have a department of Justice?" Surely the Prime Minister is not going to say that all the departments of the government are not striving for law and order. If that is the case, why have a Department of Justice with a minister at its head?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would ask my hon. friend if she would wish a special department for law and order? That is the very point I was making.

Miss MACPHAIL: What is the Department of Justice for? We have a department for law and order. I would say that the spirit of the government is in favour of law and order, so why have that department? All the departments are interested in agriculture, especially at election time, yet we have a department to promote the welfare of agriculture. All the departments are interested in labour, yet we have a Department of Labour. I am afraid that argument does not hold water.

The Prime Minister also stated that I said I would be satisfied if the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) were at the head of the department suggested, and he asked if I realized that he would be bound by the solidarity of the government. If the Prime Minister reads my speech he will find that I said I would be satisfied to have the Minister of Justice at the head of this department if he were free of the cabinet; I was not taking a chance in the world.

For military preparedness we will spend $18,000,000 this year; for the League of Nations $2,000 and for the Inter-parliamentary Union about $200, or some such small amount. We will spend a total of $2,200 for peace, the thing which is everybody's business, in support of which 245 members raise their voices while they give their votes and influence for military preparedness and the security obtained in that way. I am going to suggest to the Prime Minister again, and to the government, that they listen to the suggestion made by the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) that we would be satisfied for the time being if one hundredth part of the amount that is spent for military preparedness this year be expended in promoting international peace and good will. That would give us this year the sum of $18,000. Then if someone were placed in charge of the expenditure of that sum of money who really believe in the idea of achieving security through better international understanding, very much could be accomplished even during the present year. Some of the statements made in the house to-day, as well as some that were uttered on Monday, make me think that a deep knowledge of the causes of war and of the part the nations of the world have played in bringing about war, is very much needed in Canada. It certainly is not true that our cause is always right. If it were we never could go wrong, and we need never worry. But it is not true, it cannot be true, that an individual is always right. The same is true of some gentlemen to my right who have spoken to-day—they are not always right. Neither can a nation be always right. Why do we not look at this matter in a commonsense sort of way?

I enjoyed the address of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart). It was a very kindly address, and in it the hon. member said that the schools are promoting peace. I wish that statement were true. I do not think it could be true unless our schools had most exceptional teachers. The text books at present in use do not tend to promote peace. During the last half dozen years the churches have been awakening to the importance of this matter and I think they are now striving to promote peace. But until we can get the people in the several provinces of Canada to demand from their governments that the text books used in the schools be absolutely fair, I do not believe the cause of peace will advance very far. If only the Dominion government were willing —they are not at the moment, and in the present temper of the house I am not sure that I want them to set up a department—but if they were willing set up a department to promote peace energetically, we could make a great advance in the desired direction. Soon we should have action on the part of the provincial governments to see that the text books used in the schools are absolutely fair and impartial and that the statements they contain are absolutely accurate.

We have had, I believe, a valuable discussion and it has done some good. It has disclosed that we do not all look at the question of peace in the same light and it also denotes that public opinion in this country is pretty strongly in favour of peace. Had this resolution been introduced seven or even five years ago, I fancy it would not have been met in the same kind manner that it has now. I ask to be allowed to withdraw the motion, hoping that in the recess the government may see fit to set up some agency, possibly in the Department of External Affairs, to acquaint the people of Canada with the steps which they have taken to bring about international peace and good will. Even these facts are not known to the Canadian people. If the government do not see fit to do anything in the direction indicated between now and next session, the question can be reintroduced in some other form.

[Miss Macphail.]

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. member have leave to withdraw the motion?

Motion withdrawn.

ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following letter:

Ottawa, March 28, 1928.

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General will proceed to the Senate chamber to-morrow, Thursday, 29th of March, at 6 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

JAMES F. CROWDY,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

PENALTY OF THE LASH

PROPOSED INFLICTION AT BEGINNING RATHER THAN END OF IMPRISONMENT

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, when a judge imposes the penalty of the lash in addition to a term of imprisonment, the full penalty of the lash should be inflicted at the beginning rather than at or near the end of the term of imprisonment.

He said: I think I am entitled to the sympathy of the house—

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I beg to refer you, sir, to the votes and proceedings of January 30th last in which it will be found that the motion is worded differently from the manner in which it appears here.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The motion which appears in the votes and proceedings on the date in question reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, when a judge imposes the penalty of the lash in addition to a term of imprisonment, the full penalty and the lash should be inflicted at the beginning rather than at or near the end of the term of imprisonment.

The wording of the present motion has been changed, the word "of" having been substituted for the word "and". I submit that is a material change in the sense of the resolution. As originally worded the motion was utter nonsense; now there is some sense in it. I do not believe that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George could vote for the motion as originally worded, and I do not say that he would do so now. At least the motion is more sensible in form, and it is possible to commend it to the consideration of the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General who were deeply concerned with changes in the wording of certain resolutions a short time ago. I should also like to commend it to the Minister of Railways, if he were here, and point out to him that it is his duty to get up and speak on behalf of those who have motions lower down on the order paper and see that they are not unfairly superseded. As I say, the resolution has been materially changed. Manifestly it would be utterly impossible to inflict the full penalty and the lash at the beginning of a sentence. If a man were sentenced to three years imprisonment and the lash he could not be given the full penalty and the lash at the beginning of his term; he could not receive the lash and undergo three years' imprisonment at the same time. So far as I am concerned, I should be quite willing not to press the matter if I could divest my mind of any possible thought that the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General would favour the hon. member for Lisgar even if they were not disposed to favour me.

Mr. BROWN: The hon. member for Frontenac-Addington has correctly stated the facts. This resolution is not exactly in the form in which it first appeared. I put the resolution on the order paper very early in the session, and did not read it until some considerable time afterwards. Then I noticed that the word "and" appeared instead of the word "of" in the document which I had sent to the Clerk of the House. I did not change it for a considerable time. I thought probably the best way would be to wait until the resolution was moved in the house and then make a correction of what was very obviously a printer's error. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that any member who could not see that that was obviously a printer's error is lacking in ordinary intelligence. The hon. member for Frontenac-Addington either has not that sufficient intelligence, or else he credits me with very little ability to express my thoughts in plain English. The fact that this argument has been raised reminds me of a certain class of people that lived in the east about 1,900 years ago. They were spoken of as "scribes, pharisees and hypocrites." They were people who were supposed—

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order, please.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I do not think the accusation means anything with respect to this side of the house, but still I had entertained the idea—

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not hear the phrase employed by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BROWN: I said I was reminded of a class of people who, 1,900 years ago were spoken of as "scribes, pharisees and hypocrites," and their distinguishing characteristic was their regard for the exact letter of the law.

Mr. SPEAKER: Although it is far fetched, yet the hon. gentleman is too familiar with parliamentary rules to use such expressions, Bourinot is very clear on the subject.

As to the point of order, I do not think it is necessary to argue it at any further length. The hon. member for Frontenac-Addington said that he did not press it. There is evidently a misprint; the word "and" should be "of". Now that the word "of" is substituted, we will let the matter stand at that.

Mr. BROWN: At this late stage in the afternoon I would not have thought of proceeding with this motion were it not for the fact that I do not expect to be here when the next private members' day comes, and consequently my motion would go off the order paper altogether, so that I should not have an opportunity of presenting what seems to me to be a most important resolution, because if we were able to have a proper discussion, indeed if I had only half an hour to speak, I think I could show that there is a necessity for taking action and for amending our law in this regard. In the nature of the case I must shorten my speech very materially. I wish it to be understood in the first place that I am not dealing with the question of corporal punishment as such. I am neither supporting nor opposing the idea of inflicting the lash. I want the house to fix their attention entirely upon the one point and that is that when the lash is administered as a part of the penalty, the full penalty of the lash should be administered at the beginning rather than at the close of the sentence. This was brought to my notice because of an item that appeared in a newspaper last fall. The item reads:

> Convicted of holding up and robbing a branch of the Bank of Nova Scotia at Campbellville, Ontario, last month while under arms, and stealing $1,100, Jack Walker, Arthur Williams and Clarence Thomas were to-day sentenced to 15 years in the Portsmouth penitentiary. For participation in the same crime, William Duncan was given 10 years in the penitentiary.
> The men, who are all from Toronto, will, with the exception of Walker, receive 20 lashes. Ten of these will be given one month after they enter the prison, and the other ten one month before the expiration of their sentence. Walker, who has already been sentenced to 40 lashes in connection with another robbery, will not be lashed.

I am not objecting to the idea that is held that society should protect itself from the criminally minded. Society owes it to itself to protect itself from the criminal, but that idea is not inconsistent with the idea tha we should do all that lies in our power to reform the criminal, to make him again a useful member of society. There is one class of effenders against which we have decreed, whether rightly or wrongly, that we can protect ourselves only by taking away the life of the criminal. That is a subject all by itself that I will not deal with. There is another class that it has been thought we can protect ourselves against only by shutting them up for the period of their natural lives. These are important matters to deal with but they are not the subject of our immediate discussion.

If we put aside these classes and those offences for which a monetary fine is deemed adequate penalty, there remains that large class of offences that are punished by a term of imprisonment longer or shorter, with or without hard labour, and with or without corporal punishment. From one point of view it is more important that we should have a proper method of dealing with this class than with the others for the reason that, having paid the penalty for their offences, they are again returned to society. It is a matter of primary importance to us that these men who are again returned to society, if they are to become good citizens, if they are again to occupy useful places in the community, should come back to us in an attitude of mind that will lead them to feel that society is their friend and not their enemy. That is all-important, and therefore I wish to emphasize that aspect of the question—the welfare of society. I am not unmindful of the interests of the individual. I am not unmindful of the tragic consequences to the human being who gives himself to a life of crime. I am not unmindful of the duty of the state to co-operate as far as possible with all those other agencies that are seeking to bring about the reformation of the criminal. But when we look at the matter from the standpoint of society, or of the individual, what folly it is to pursue a course that is calculated to nullify all the influences that are brought to bear upon a man during the time of his imprisonment and turn him out again upon society worse than when he went in!

I have been looking up the Auditor-General's reports, and I find that we spend large sums of money annually on our penitentiaries. We spend money for chaplains, trade instructors, teachers of various kinds. That is a very proper expenditure; but again I ask: Is it not folly for us to spend money in an endeavour to promote the moral and spiritual welfare of the prisoner and then follow a course that is calculated to nullify all those influences? The fact that we spend that money constitutes on our part a recognition that we have obligations to the prisoner and to society. We may be under an obligation to visit retribution on the prisoner, but we are under an obligation to seek to bring about his reform so that he can again become a useful citizen. When a man is sentenced to a long term of imprisonment, with the lash if you like, and when that penalty is inflicted upon him at the beginning of the imprisonment, I can understand there is a possibility of that man coming to a sense of the error of his ways. Yes, Mr. Speaker, with all reverence I can understand such a man saying: "Father, I have sinned against heaven and before Thee", and I can understand the possibility, during his term of imprisonment, of his yielding to the influences that are brought to bear upon him when he knows that he has already endured and suffered the penalty that was imposed upon him. But can anyone who has given a moment's thought to the matter believe that it is possible for a man to respond to any influences for good when he has that sentence hanging over him? He must go out from prison embittered. He feels that his hand is against every man and every man's hand is against him, or that every man's hand is against him and therefore his hand is against every man. It is not long before he comes into contact with criminal associates; he commits a burglarly; he goes armed although he does not intend to commit murder, but he is prepared to commit murder if necessary to accomplish his purpose and the end of the tragedy is the scaffold.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Would the hon. member allow me to ask a question?

Mr. BROWN: No. I have only a few minutes to speak. I have had to shorten my speech very much already. I said that such a man must go out embittered in his whole attitude towards society. I have discussed this matter with a number of people who have expressed themselves in hearty sympathy with the proposal I have made. Indeed I have not heard a single dissenting word. I took the matter up with the chaplain of one of our penitentiaries, and he expressed himself as in perfect accord with me, and gave me two other reasons why we should adopt the course that I am now urging. One was that the presence of such a prisoner in a penal institution was a menace to the well-being of the institution; his whole attitude was a menace. He so feared the punishment of the lash that he was prepared to do anything to escape that penalty, and consequently was always looking for a way of escape, with danger to the guards. The other reason he gave me was this. He pointed out to me that by good conduct a prisoner might be granted as much as ten days in a month off his sentence. You see then the absurdity of saying to a prisoner, "If your conduct is good, you will be released sooner, but at the same time that will bring you just that much nearer the time when the remainder of the penalty of the lash will be inflicted on you." I think it is absolutely absurd.

I should like to have quoted from the Winnipeg Tribune, which took notice of my motion when it was first put on the order paper, and in which Mr. Justice Fullerton and Mr. Justice Stubbs expressed themselves as in favour of the principle I am advocating. The particular case that brought this matter to my attention was an appeal in which the judge sustained the sentence of imprisonment, but reversed that part of the sentence that inflicted the lash at the end of the term of imprisonment, and he expressed himself in very strong terms as disapproving of the lash.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that circumstances have compelled me to omit much that I wished to say. I think that a great many things were said in the previous discussion which might just as well have been left unsaid, but before I sit down I am going to ask the Minister of Justice to consider the matter very seriously, and even at this late date to bring in an amendment to the criminal code that will give effect to the purpose I have in view. I am sorry that under the circumstances I can do no more than I have done. The fault is not mine, but that of a large number of previous speakers who spoke at considerable length.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, March 29, 1928

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Second report of the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. Cahill.

Second and third reports of the select standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Hay.

INDUSTRIAL AND INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

Mr. C. R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. Bell), that the second report of the select standing committee on industrial and international relations be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

ATHABASKA ELECTION

REPORTS OF HON. MR. JUSTICE CLARKE

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River) moved:

That the interim and final reports respectively of the Hon. Mr. Justice Clarke, commissioner appointed to inquire into the alleged existence of corrupt or illegal practices in the election held in the electoral district of Athabaska, in the province of Alberta, on the 29th of October, 1925, which reports were laid on the table of the house on December 15, 1926, be referred to the select standing committee on privileges and elections.

He said: It may be proper at this stage that I should survey briefly the incidents that have led up to this motion. On March 18, 1926, as the result of a petition from electors in the district of Athabaska, this house passed a motion approving the appointment of a commissioner to conduct an investigation into the alleged fraud, corruption, perjury, forgery, ballot-stuffing and other misdemeanours that took place during that election. The Hon. Mr. Justice Clarke, a reputable and well known member of the bench, was appointed on July 10, 1926, to undertake the investigation. Mr. Justice Clarke submitted two reports, an interim and a final. The interim report included statements or allegations that corrupt and illegal practices had extensively prevailed, and specifically designated a large number of polls, twelve or more, where stuffing of ballot boxes and the forging of returns and other documents had occurred. The report, however, contained no specific recommendation to the government; it simply presented the finding. This and the final report have never been considered by parliament nor acted upon.

Surely it is the duty of members of this house to protect the rights and privileges of the people of this country during elections. It certainly is not our duty to evade our responsibility in preventing, so far as we can, a recurrence of the sort of thing that prevailed so extensively in Athabaska. I have no hesitation in declaring to you, Mr. Speaker, that in my opinion the very existence of democracy itself and the continuance of responsible government in this country will depend entirely upon our determination to stamp out, at its very inception, any attempt at practices of this nature in elections in Canada.

The purpose of this motion is to have these two reports referred to the committee on privileges and elections in order that after a thorough examination of them provision may be made, either by amendments to the Election Act, by amendments to the criminal code, or by amendments in any other direction that may prevent a recurrence of disgusting performances of the kind that took place in Athabaska.

A motion similar to this passed the house on February 15 of last year, but I regret to say the committee never met. I inquired of the clerk of committees recently and found that, from the moment the committee was appointed on February 15 to the end of the session, they could not secure a quorum. Meetings of the committee were called on March 2, 3, and 8 of last year, and about twelve or thirteen members attended; at that time, however, a quorum of the committee consisted of fifteen. At the request of the members who attended, the chairman introduced a motion into this house on March 8 asking that the quorum be reduced. At first that motion stood over at the request of the then leader of the opposition for further consideration, and no action was taken by the chairman. On March 29, some twenty-one days later, the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Kellner) moved that the quorum be reduced, and although the Minister of Justice objected briefly the motion was adopted. I regret to say that although the quorum was reduced to nine members, still the committee could not hold a meeting.

I am not going to impute motives; I am not going to suggest that this was a deliberately engineered business in order to prevent a discussion of this matter. Frankly, I cannot find it within me to believe that any hon. members of this house or of the government would consent for one moment to any such action. Therefore I can only reassure myself by assuming that the reason was the occupation of the members in other committees which were then sitting.

Additional reasons for asking the house to pass the motion will be realized readily when I say that by the report of Mr. Justice Clarke it was found that the returning officer himself could neither write nor read. Think of it, Mr. Speaker; the returning officer for an electoral district of this country unable to write or read. In some cases the registrars refused to send out the voters' lists, and the candidate who contested that constituency from our group had less than 100 of the 235 lists on polling day. Ballots were cast by men who had been long dead; in one case a ballot was cast in the name of a man who had been dead for twelve years, while in another case a ballot was cast in the name of a man who had been dead three years. Many people voted who had never resided in the district, and in other cases people voted who had resided in the district some several years before, but who had left from three to seven years prior to the date of the election. At least three polls were held in a forest reserve, where people were neither living nor permitted to live under the laws of this country. Very briefly, that is a recitation of some of the reasons why I feel satisfied that this house will pass this motion, in justice to itself and to the people of this country.

On February 15 of last year a fairly representative debate took place on a similar motion, and at that time the Minister of Justice used these words:

I am in favour of the motion, and I may also say that if, as a result of this being referred to the committee on privileges and elections, some way may be found to prevent electoral corruption as it seems to have prevailed in that election, I and those who sit with me on this side of the house will be only too glad to associate with my hon. friend in that respect.

The then leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) said:

If this be so, what is the reason? Has the government taken no action in the matter? Has the government quietly taken the position that having referred the matter to the local Attorney General their duty is at an end?

The hon. gentleman was dealing at that time with the question of the punishment of those who had offended against the electoral and criminal laws in respect of that election. Speaking on behalf of the Conservative party, the hon. member accepted the motion. The Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon), who took part in the discussion, said:

A question has been brought before the house by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy), and I have no doubt that every member of this house, no matter to which party he may belong, is of the one opinion, and that is that every man who has been implicated in electoral frauds should be prosecuted without mercy, and that justice should prevail.

Further, he went on to say:

In conclusion, when these two reports are laid before the committee on privileges and elections, I believe that every member sitting on that committee will be moved by one common spirit, and that is to try and devise means of preventing any such things happening in the future as were proved to have happened in that constituency in the election of 1925.

The hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett), now leader of the opposition, said:

The first matter that should be considered is: What recommendation can the committee make with respect to amending the election laws of this country so as to prevent a repetition of those conditions? The second is also a matter of some importance as it touches the position of the civil servants of this country. Shall a civil servant who has been convicted of a crime or who admits the commission of a crime and has secured immunity by reason of his confession, continue in office?

The reference of the hon. member was to a statement which was made in this house that the government had allowed to continue in office postmasters, land agents and other civil servants who had been found guilty by Mr. Justice Clarke of the most wilful forms of deliberate ballot stuffing, forgery, perjury and fraud in that election. That was the position taken by the hon. member for west Calgary (Mr. Bennett), who went on to say:

Shall the public service acts of this country not be amended so as to provide that by reason of any confession of that character he shall at once vacate his position?

This house should use its every effort to stop that sort of thing because, if we do not prevent it, our very democratic institutions are destroyed and responsible government has indeed become valueless in this country. That is the reason that the motion made this afternoon by the hon. member meets with my approval—

I have nothing further to say, Mr. Speaker, except that I feel satisfied that the members of this house will come to the same decision with the same unanimity of opinion, to see that the matter is cleaned up as far as it can be cleaned up by a committee of this house. I feel that they will be as unanimous this year as was the case last year, and I will leave the matter to the house.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): I wish to say a few words in support of the motion which has been made by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland). I do so very willingly, because the election in Athabaska took place in the fair province of Alberta, of which I am very proud to be one of the representatives. Since such things have happened in Athabaska and also in Peace River, outsiders might think that the elections in Alberta are conducted on a very questionable basis, but I want to say to this house that I do not know of any province in this wide Dominion where elections are usually conducted more cleanly than in that province. The districts of Athabaska and Peace River happen to be outlying districts, and certain practices entered into those elections which I hope will be checked. It is with the hope of cleaning up conditions in the future that we now ask that this report of Mr. Justice Clarke be sent to the committee on privileges and elections.

I am glad to support this motion, because I think a great wrong was done to an hon. gentleman who now sits in this house, who was a member from 1921 to 1925, who did excellent work for this country and for his constituency, and who was prevented by questionable practices from coming back to parliament in 1925. It has been shown very clearly indeed, through the investigation which took place, that had this gentleman been accorded anything like fair treatment, he would have received a big majority in the election of 1925, and would have been returned again. Instead of that someone else took his place. It was well known at the time that conditions in Athabaska were in a very bad state, and that things had occurred of such a character as to cause any self-respecting citizen to blush at the very thought of them. I should like to point out that the hon. member who did come down in 1925 happened to sit on the government side, and there was no demand for an investigation from hon. gentlemen supporting the government. I am fully convinced, however, that had that member been sitting in any other part of the house, the government would have speedily caused an investigation to be held. Under the circumstances it became the duty of hon. members sitting on this side to support the recommendations and petitions forwarded to Ottawa asking that an investigation be made. With these petitions before the house an investigation was in due course ordered and it took place, first of all under Mr. Justice Beck, and later on under Mr. Justice Clarke. In the course of that investigation revelations of a most amazing characater were made, amongst them incidents like the following: Many witnesses, including deputy returning officers, fled the country rather than face justice. Vote plugging became quite general. Cheques were paid on forged endorsations. Some cheques were made out to fictitious officials. A certain poll clerk was appointed who could neither read nor write; and as the hon. member who preceded me said, even the returning officer was in the same extraordinary position. Switching and substitution of ballots was practised. Fictitious polls were held in districts where there were no settlers. Ballot boxes were freely plugged, and so on ad infinitum. In the election of 1926 the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Kellner) came back to parliament with a large majority owing to the fact that the investigation had taken place in the meantime. So that there is not the slightest doubt but that the hon. member to whom I refer would not have been kept away previously had there been fair dealing in the constituency of Athabaska.

As the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) said, a motion was adopted referring the report of Mr. Justice Clarke to the committee on privileges and elections. The report was referred to that committee but a quorum could not be obtained at any of the meetings, so that it was not considered. I for one am not going to make any charges with respect to those members who did not turn up at the meetings of that committee. I take it for granted that every hon. member here wants to wipe out the disgrace of the reprehensible doings which took place in Athabaska in 1925. I do not suppose there is a single hon. member who is satisfied to permit that blemish on our reputation to remain. I can only say, like my hon. friend who preceded me, that there must have been so many committees sitting at the time that a quorum could not be obtained by the committee on privilege and elections. I therefore earnestly hope that not only will the house vote in favour of the committee on privileges and elections considering this report, but that the members who form that committee will make a point of seeing that a quorum is obtained, that the report is duly considered, and such action taken as will wipe out this disgraceful episode in the political life of Canada.

Mr. IRVINE: Who composed the committee?

Mr. SPENCER: The Clerk can tell you that. May I say that if a robbery occurs in the community, the police are not satisfied until the thieves are arrested and punished. But this is a case where the worst kind of robbery was committed, the robbery of their franchise from hundreds and hundreds of people, and yet very little has been done up to the present time to correct the situation and punish the offenders.

I wish to say also that certain civil servants, occupying minor positions it is true, were found guilty in the investigation which took place, but are still holding their positions under the government. I point out also that during the last twelve months some three or four hundred postmasters and mail carriers have been dismissed for alleged political partisanship. But none of these parties have been found guilty of criminal conduct, at least that is my information, for which they could be punished under the law. In the present case individuals were proven guilty before the court of conduct of the most disgraceful character, and yet some of them are still retained in the service of the country. It is not fair to the great rank and file of civil servants who are doing splendid work for Canada, that guilty parties should be retained in their positions just as if nothing had happened.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Would the hon. gentleman tell us to what department these guilty parties belong?

Mr. SPENCER: They are connected with certain post offices in Athabaska.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not the one at Lac la Biche, for the official there was dismissed.

Mr. SPENCER: The one at Frog Lake.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That was Bowtell, but he is out of the country.

Mr. SPENCER: I believe Mrs. Bowtell is in the post office.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But she was not implicated in wrongdoing.

Mr. SPENCER: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is news to me. I know there were some twelve or fifteen officials who were dismissed promptly.

Mr. SPENCER: As to the charge against Mrs. Bowtell, I will leave the hon. member for Athabaska to give full particulars.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I should like to have the names. I can tell the hon. member that some twelve or fifteen of them were dismissed as soon as they were named.

Mr. SPENCER: I believe the hon. minister will find that the employee in question cashed cheques and received money that were not intended for her. Referring to the rules of the house, I find on page 234 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, second edition, standing order 79, bribery and elections, which reads:

If it shall appear that any member hath been elected and returned a member of this house, or endeavoured so to be, by bribery, or any other corrupt practices, this house will proceed with the utmost severity against all such persons as shall have been wilfully concerned in such bribery or other corrupt practices.

The note on that reads:

This standing order has nothing to do with the different laws which fully provide for the trial and punishment of corrupt practices at elections, but it reiterates the house's privilege to deal with offences of bribery and corruption after they have been proved before the competent courts. Where there have been special reports concerning bribery or riots at elections, the conduct of returning officers; undue influence and intimidation; the alteration of the poll, the absence, misconduct or perjury of witnesses; defects or uncertainty in the law; the propriety of suspending the writ; or any other exceptional circumstances—the house has taken such measures as were required by law or usage or as appeared suitable to the occasion. It has been usual in such cases to order a copy of the judgment delivered by the judge and the minutes of evidence to be laid before the house.

Not only following out that rule, but calling upon what has often been referred to as the highest court of justice, namely, this house, I think it is within our power to pass the report to the committee on privileges and elections and to have the matter thoroughly threshed out.

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto): Mr. Speaker, the story of the Athabaska election of 1925 is amazing; it is almost incredible in its details of corrupt practices. We are all accustomed to the story of elections being conducted more or less crookedly, with some buying and selling of votes, some infractions of the Dominion Elections Act, and that sort of thing; with that I do not for the moment propose to deal. There are those in every party who do that sort of thing and I am not saying at the moment that the party to which I belong is any better or any worse than any other. My purpose in addressing the house at this moment is not to deal with that phase of the subject. These matters, peccadilloes, if you like to call them, minor bits of corruption, can be dealt with under the existing machinery. But the questions that arise from a consideration of the report of the commissioner, Mr. Justice Clarke, are far wider than that.

Briefly, there are two matters which I think we should touch upon. One of them which has already been dealt with by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer), is the question of retaining civil servants in the government employ when they have been reported on as having been guilty of corrupt practices during an election, no matter whether they have been by the judge granted immunity or not. The Minister of the Interior seems to believe that there was no such case in connection with this election.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If there was, I am not aware of it. I know that in every case that came to my notice the employee was promptly dismissed.

Mr. GEARY: If he does become aware of such a case I am sure he will exercise the proper function and have that man or woman got rid of. There is, however, a larger question than that which arises and that is the question of the organization and control of the machinery which has to do with the conduct of elections generally in this country. I cannot forbear from quoting just a line here and there from the report of Mr. Justice Clarke which deals not with the ordinary things that we hear of in elections, such as the buying and selling of votes, or impersonation which I am sure the officers of the law do their best on all occasions to stamp out, but with the larger question of the organization and control of the machinery in connection with elections. He says in regard to Reita lake poll:

I find that what purports to be the voters' list for this poll and to be signed by Thomas J. Cardinal as registrar, and returned with the election papers, contains 73 names, and that not more than ten persons were entitled to vote in this division.

He says further:

I find that the poll book is a forgery as no votes were polled.

Still there was a large majority given in favour of the candidate, Cross, who was declared elected. He says in regard to Bates poll:

> The voters' list for this poll certified by Peter Peterson as registrar contains two hundred names. Less than ten voters resided in the polling division, which is a reserve.

In regard to Cushing poll, this is what he says:

> No voters' list for this poll can be found.

But an election was carried on and a large majority returned in favour of Mr. Cross, the successful candidate. In regard to this poll he states further:

> The poll book indicates that there were 194 names on the voters' list but there appear to have been only four qualified voters in the polling division.

He also states:

> In fact no poll was held and no person voted.

In regard to Prairie Lake poll, he says:

> There are no qualified voters in this polling division but a voters' list was prepared containing 59 names.

Mr. Cross again got the great majority of these. In regard to Parenteau poll, he says:

> The voters' list for this poll was manufactured at Harry Bowtell's house and signed as registered by Mrs. Rose A. Preece, a sister of Mrs. Harry Bowtell.

It never went through the proper proceedings for its initiation and completion. So, as one goes through the list, one finds that all these matters have to do not with the ordinary political corruption as one understands it in reference to an election, but with the organization and preparation by government officials of the preliminaries for an election. There was a stamp which must never leave the registrar's hands, but the registrar was a hundred miles away from where the stamp was. The registrar was at Lac la Biche and the ballots were printed in Edmonton, more than one hundred miles distant. The stamp was sent to Edmonton where somebody used it to stamp the ballots. The commissioner says in regard to Margu poll:

> Harris prepared a voters' list the night before the election from the names furnished by Lawler and that constituted the list for this division. It contained 35 names.

At Lac la Biche poll the same thing happened, and so with the others. I will not go through the list, but my point in reciting what the house has already heard is that those are matters which have to do with the functions of the chief electoral officers in getting ready for the holding of an election and preparing the machinery for holding it. The hon. member who now sits for Athabaska (Mr. Kellner) was robbed of his seat. He stayed at home during that winter and there came down in his place a man who sat here and voted as a representative of the people of this country whereas he really represented nobody at all. The constituency of Athabaska was not represented during the session of 1926. As the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) has said, you rob this country of the very essence of responsible government if you allow people to sit on the benches of parliament who do not represent anybody but who, by something that has been allowed to be done perhaps through a fault in the act, are sitting here in fact.

Last year this report was before the government; it was laid on the table of the house. If I remember rightly it came to the Solicitor General on the 19th October and, as was his duty, he sent it forward to the Secretary of State with an intimation that the provincial attorney general be communicated with, with a view to punishing those found guilty. He added at the bottom of his communication in effect: Make haste in the matter because my letter being dated the 19th instant, the period of one year allowed by the statute for the prosecution of these offences will expire in ten days. That had to go through the hands of the Secretary of State and out to the government of Alberta, to be acted on within ten days. The delay was not the fault of the Solicitor General; I have no doubt he dealt with the matter as expeditiously as possible; but the government could not have rested with the conviction that it was doing its full duty in forwarding within ten days of the expiration of the time for prosecution of these offences a communication to the attorney general requesting him to take action. If I make complaint at all of the government in reference to this matter it is this, that it had before it all this material, that it had before it the motion my hon. friend from Bow River has cited which was passed last year referring the matter to the privileges and elections committee, that it had before it the fact that the committee had not met and discussed the matter referred to them, and still, so far as I can learn, the government has not thought it its duty to take the place, so to speak, of the committee, to take into consideration all the facts brought out in the report of Mr. Justice Clarke, and to bring down to this house some initial action of its own in regard to the matter.

If we cannot in some way or other do better in the matter of the control and operation of elections than we did in Athabaska, then the lookout is pretty poor for any one of us, particularly if you do not happen to be a candidate of a government that is in power, with some opportunity to get close to the election machinery, if any one would do such a thing. We have no right to assume that a similar election may not be carried on when this house next goes to the country, and it may be done in, say, ten or twenty constituencies instead of just one. Now is the time, with this instance before us, to take action to prevent the recurrence of practices of this kind. It is not enough merely to punish those who are caught at their evil work, although that is very well, and the more stiffly we punish those who are guilty, the better for all of us and the better for the country. Let them learn once for all that practices of that kind will not be tolerated, and that swift and sure punishment will follow anything of that sort. But these examples lose their effect if they are allowed to sink too far into the past, and the farther away we get from the election and the dimmer the memory of the evil practices in the Athabaska election, the less effect any action taken in regard to it will have. Let us have action taken now. It has been long enough coming, and let us act while the memory of these things is still fresh in the minds particularly of my hon. friends from Alberta. Let us see to it, having this example before us, that some means are devised to bring the election act into harmony with the desire of everybody, that this sort of thing shall not be tolerated any longer in this country.

I entirely agree with the motion, Mr. Speaker. I support it and trust that the government will take so much interest in the committee on privileges and elections that they will with their powers, so to speak, of whip and spur and whatever else they may have in the way of organization or control of committees, not neglect, to see that this matter receive consideration and be properly dealt with, and a report brought in early enough to enable the house to take action upon it during this session.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I may say immediately, Mr. Speaker, that I have no objection to the motion of my hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland), and that we on this side of the house will certainly support the reference of this report to the privileges and elections committee, and if as a result of the work of that committee any amendments may be suggested that will have for their effect the improvement of our electoral law, and that will make it more difficult for people who are liable to commit illegal practices at elections to do so, we shall be only too pleased to support any amendments which might be proposed in that regard.

With regard to this particular case, I think it is well that I should state what has actually happened. By chapter 51 of the revised statutes of Canada, parliament adopted an address asking the governor in council to appoint a commissioner to inquire into the existence of any corrupt or illegal practices which might have taken place in that election. Mr. Justice Clarke was finally appointed, and he made the investigation which the statute required him to carry out. He made two reports, an interim report and a final report. Under the law he had to report to the Governor General the evidence taken, and what he had found concerning the matter referred to him, and he did so. He had to report the names of all persons whom he found to have been guilty of any corrupt or illegal practices at the election, with the particulars thereof, and he did so. The law, section 30 of chapter 51, provides that:

> Every such report shall be submitted to parliament: (a) within fourteen days after such report is made, if parliament is sitting at the expiration of the said period of fourteen days; or (b) if parliament is not then sitting, within fourteen days from the time of the next meeting of parliament after such report is made.

The two reports were submitted to parliament according to law.

There is a duty placed upon the Attorney General of Canada under the statutes. Section 31 of chapter 51 provides:

> Whenever it appears by the report of the commissioners under this act that any person named by them has been guilty of a corrupt or illegal practice and has not been furnished by them with a certificate of indemnity, such report with the evidence taken by the commissioners, shall be laid before the Attorney General of Canada, who shall, if in his opinion there is sufficient evidence available for a prosecution, certify such opinion to the Secretary of State, who shall thereupon communicate the report with the evidence to the lieutenant governor of the province in which the election was held.

And section 32 says:

> The Attorney General of Canada shall instruct counsel to assist in any prosecution which is thereon instituted by the local authorities charged with the administration of justice.

The interim report, the first report, submitted by Mr. Justice Clarke, was received by my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr.

Cannon), who was then acting Attorney General of Canada, during my absence, I believe, at the Imperial conference. Having read the evidence, the officers of the department, because, after all, it is a departmental affair, made their report to him, and he signed the following certificate:

> The undersigned has the honour to inform you that the Hon. Mr. Justice Clarke, the commissioner appointed to inquire into the alleged existence of corrupt or illegal practices in the elections holden in the electoral district of Athabaska, in the province of Alberta, on the 29th of October, 1925, has laid before him his interim report, together with the evidence taken by the commissioners upon which such report is based.
> The undersigned is of opinion that there is sufficient evidence available for prosecution against William A. Deyl, William (Bill) Lawler, H. M. Barton, and Harry Bowtell, named in the said report, and he hereby certifies such opinion to you accordingly in accordance with the provisions of section 31 of the Corrupt Practices Enquiries Act, revised statutes of Canada, 1906, chapter 8.
> It is to be observed that the matter is of some urgency in view of the fact that the time for prosecution expires at the end of one year from the 29th October, 1925. Report and evidence herewith.
> Dated at Ottawa, this nineteenth day of October, 1926.
> (Sgd.) LUCIEN CANNON,
> Acting Attorney General of Canada.

This was sent to the Secretary of State, as the law provides, and the Secretary of State acknowledged its receipt, and informed my hon. friend that the necessary action had been taken in reference thereto. I find in the record the letter of the secretary to the Lieutenant Governor of Alberta acknowledging receipt of a letter from the attorney general stating that he had taken action and that warrants had been issued against those parties who had not received a certificate of indemnity from the investigating judge. After the final report was received I, as Attorney General of Canada, issued another certificate to the Secretary of State in these terms:

> The undersigned is of opinion that there is sufficient evidence available for prosecution against Isaac Gagnon, William A. Deyl, William (Bill) Lawler, H. M. Barton, W. R. Jex and W. E. Proctor, named in the said final report, and he hereby certifies such opinion to you accordingly.

This was sent to the Secretary of State, and he forwarded it with the evidence and other papers which the law requires to the authorities in Alberta.

Now my friend from Battle River (Mr. Spencer) cited Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms to the effect that the house has the right and authority to proceed against men who have committed illegal practices at an election. There is no doubt of that. But parliament in its wisdom has decided that the provincial authorities can more effectively deal with such a matter, and it is their duty to do so. I have not the slightest doubt that the local authorities of Alberta have done everything which they could do to prosecute those who were guilty of any illegal practices at that election.

My hon. friend from South Toronto (Mr. Geary) has just said that if the committee on privileges and elections did not do anything it was the duty of the government to take action. I beg respectfully to say to him that usually the government is charged with doing too much, with trespassing upon the jurisdiction of parliament, and that in this particular instance the law makes it the work of parliament altogether. It is parliament that directs investigation to be made, and the law says the report shall be submitted to parliament. If there is anything to do it is for parliament to decide; and as far as we are concerned, I repeat, we shall be only too pleased to do anything which the committee recommends in that respect. I do not know whether my friend from South Toronto is not himself a member of the privileges and elections committee. Surely he would not suggest that we should do what the law says he himself ought to do in that respect.

Mr. GEARY: If I may interrupt the hon. Minister of Justice—I merely suggested that failing action by the committee, with all the information contained in this report before the government, they might very well consider it with a view to taking such steps to revise the Elections Act as might seem necessary and wise in the circumstances.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have no doubt that, although the Elections Act has been revised many times, it may be still further improved, and I for one think that prior to the next general election something might be done in this direction; all the wisdom of parliament might be conscripted for the purpose of devising such amendments as would improve and strengthen the present act in this respect.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Is not this a question of administration rather than of law?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is really a question for parliament to decide what would be the best electoral law to prevent frauds.

Mr. CAMPBELL: But at the present time it is a matter of enforcing the law which you have.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Absolutely. But what had to be done has been done. I do not know what has been the result of the prosecutions instituted by the province of Alberta. My friends may know better than I do in that respect. We have received no report.

Mr. CAHAN: Was the department of the Minister of Justice represented?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I stated in parliament that we should be only too pleased to appoint counsel to help in any proceedings which might be instituted against those who were charged with fraud and other illegal practices at the election. We never were requested to help and, as I have stated already, it is for the local authorities to take proceedings. We were advised that they had actually issued warrants against the guilty parties.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will my hon. friend kindly tell the house in how many prosecutions which he initiated in this way he was successful; what were the convictions, and against whom?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I never initiated any proceedings in that respect.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend asserted that certain prosecutions had taken place.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I assume they took place.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not know.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was going to ask my hon. friend if he knew how many convictions had been secured.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not know.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend does not know. Can he tell the house how many of those convicted have been let out?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not know.

Mr. McGIBBON: What about Baldy Robb?

Mr. LAPOINTE: We have done what the law stated we should do. As Attorney General of Canada I have certified to the Secretary of State the names of those persons whom I thought should be prosecuted. It was not either for me or the Secretary of State to issue warrants; the law provides that those warrants shall be issued by the provincial authorities. The provincial authorities have acknowledged receipt of our certificate and told us that they were issuing warrants.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is not giving the house a very good—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is it a question?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I beg my hon. friend's pardon; I thought he was through.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not wish to deprive the hon. gentleman of his privilege of asking a question, but I do not think the hon. Minister of Justice has concluded his remarks.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I beg my hon. friend's pardon, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I shall not deprive the house any longer of the pleasure of listening to my hon. friend, whom we are all so pleased to welcome back. May I add once again that I will support the motion of my hon. friend. I am prepared to help him in any way which might improve the election methods of Canada.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): Mr. Speaker, in the first instance may I thank my hon. friend for his very kindly reference to myself. He is always delightfully amiable and it always affords me great pleasure to have anything to do with him. But, sir, I want to direct the attention of the house to one or two things. Some way and somehow we have had delay in punishing election crimes that have never yet, so far as I know, been equalled in iniquity in this country. That delay in the first instance was brought about by my hon. friends opposite. The Minister of Justice said: This is not a matter for the house, it is a matter for the commissioner to deal with. Why? Because when this house wanted to become seized of this iniquity, when we wanted to see that the right thing was done, and done at once, the government with its supporters saw to it that it was not done, they saw to it that action was held up. The government, through its chief officer, is so much interested in seeing that the right thing is done that it does not know to-day who is being prosecuted, who is being convicted, or whether anybody has been convicted at all. That is where the matter rests. In answer to my question the Minister of Justice says, "I do not know who was convicted". I asked him explicitly whether anybody was convicted, and if so whether that person was still confined or had been let out; but he does not know. Why, the government knows less about the matter than any man on the street knows, because everyone is aware that Baldy Robb was sent out with the government's blessing.

An hon. MEMBER: That was another matter.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is the same election.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend seems to know all about Baldy Robb. Does he think that Baldy Robb was connected with this particular election?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, but it is of the same stripe.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is another election.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is the same general election, absolutely. Now is there no duty on the part of the government to see that the laws of this Dominion are carried out?

Mr. CANNON: Before my hon. friend leaves Baldy Robb I would suggest, if he wants to know the reason, that he had better inquire of his own leader.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is a suggestion the hon. gentleman can safely make in the absence of my hon. leader.

Mr. CANNON: I give you warning.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have no doubt my leader will look after himself very well if my hon. friend puts the question to him. But is there no responsibility on the government to see to it that the laws, not of the provinces but of the Dominion, are respected? I submit there is. The Minister of Justice says that no counsel was retained by the Dominion in this prosecution; he declares it was not asked for. But the statute does not imply that he should wait to be asked. Section 32 reads:

> The Attorney General of Canada shall instruct counsel to assist in any prosecution which is thereon instituted by the local authorities charged with the administration of justice.

The Attorney General was not to wait until he was asked; he was then and there to instruct counsel. Why? Simply to ensure that a proper procedure should be followed and that the matter should be properly pressed. It was his duty to see to it that the laws of parliament were observed. It is idle to say that the government have done all that they could or ought to do in connection with this whole question. If they say they have then they admit that they are indeed impotent to do anything that should be done to punish election frauds. I got up merely for the purpose of pointing this out. My hon. friends were under an obligation to take steps to see that misdemeanour was punished, and not to throw the whole responsibility on the local authorities. Section 32 of our own act declares that counsel must be appointed.

Mr. LAPOINTE: When there are proceedings.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But my hon. friend does not know whether there were any proceedings.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Has my hon. friend read the report?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have just quoted the section. It is a question for my hon. friend to ascertain whether there were proceedings or not.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend does not know about any proceedings having been taken, and he appointed no counsel. If he is content to leave it there, I am.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): I regret exceedingly that my leader is not here to-day. This is a question which he has studied closely and he is much interested to see that justice is done and that parliament shall do something to remedy the iniquities of the election in question. It is all very well for the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), to say that this is a matter for parliament. Of course it is a matter for parliament. But hon. gentlemen opposite have a very nice way of shedding their responsibility on to parliament when they want to, and at other times doing things and then bringing them to parliament for ratification afterwards. Who are in the majority on the committee on privileges and elections?

Mr. LAPOINTE: We are blamed if we do and we are blamed if we don't.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The government have a majority on this committee. The Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) are both members of the committee and therefore, by reason of their position in this house, they have a greater responsibility in relation to the work of the committee on privileges and elections than any other single member could have. I submit, therefore, that it is a most extraordinary thing that in a matter of this sort the privileges and elections committee could not get a meeting together last year, and it seems to me that the responsibility rests on the government, with a majority in the house, to see that there shall be a meeting of the committee to consider the question.

I want to say a few words regarding another matter which is associated with this question. One of the candidates in the election, Mr. Geauvreau, was not returned his deposit. According to the figures given by the returning officer he did not receive half as many votes as the man who was elected, but I submit that this is a case where some consideration ought to be given to this man by reason of the extraordinary circumstances of the election. Who knows how many votes were cast in the election? I say, no one knows.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Was he a third candidate?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Yes, he was a third candidate. But I say no one knows how many votes were cast at the election. I want to read a few extracts from the report of Mr. Justice Clarke, and I could read many others of a similar kind. I took the statement with reference to Cold Lake poll No. 212a, at page 2 of the report:

> The list contains 402 names, which is more than double the number of persons qualified to vote.

Then poll No. 212(a) (2), another section of the foregoing poll:

> The poll book and statement of the poll show 73 to have voted, as follows: 54 for Cross, 3 for Geauvreau 16 for Kellner. I find that approximately 27 of the persons named in the poll book as having voted did not vote, and most of them are unknown.

At page 3 of the report, in connection with Reita Lake poll No. 220, there appears the following:

> I find that what purports to be the voter's list for this poll and to be signed by Thomas J. Cardinal as registrar, and returned with the election papers contains 73 names, and that not more than ten persons were entitled to vote in this division; that no such person as Thomas J. Cardinal is known in the neighbourhood.

And further down on the same page:

> I find that the poll book is a forgery as no votes were polled and no poll was held.

Under these circumstances it is rather unfair that any one of the candidates in that election should lose his deposit. I understand that Mr. Geauvreau has made a claim to the Auditor General for the return of his deposit. On the face of the return, in accordance with the law, the Auditor General could not very well return him his deposit, but I submit to the government that this is a matter which they might very well consider from another point of view altogether.

Mr. LAPOINTE: How many votes did he poll?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: We do not know. Who knows? Do you know? I submit that is a very unfair question.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I mean, on the return as it is.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The Minister of Justice is well aware that no one knows.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I mean, on the return as made.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: He polled only 643, according to the return. From the evidence given before Mr. Justice Clarke is that any proof as to how many votes he polled? I submit there is no proof whatever, and I suggest to the Minister of Justice that he consider this matter.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I admit that is a fair argument for my hon. friend to make.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I think in all fairness, under these circumstances, something should be done. I do not think the Auditor General can do it, but I think this parliament and this government should see that an amount is placed in the estimates to provide for the return of his deposit to this man, because there was really no election actually held in that constituency.

Mr. D. F. KELLNER (Athabaska): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak I wish to support the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Sir George Perley). I also agree that no one could tell in any way how many votes were polled in this election, and I might also point out that if it were so very easy to poll votes which did not exist it might be equally easy to destroy some of the legitimate votes which were polled. While my opponent in that election, Mr. Geauvreau, only polled some 645 votes, it is quite reasonable to suppose that some of the other votes might have been polled close to a river, and that the ballot box containing perhaps some further votes for him disappeared therein. Therefore I think in all fairness that his application for the return of his deposit should be considered.

I want to join with some of the statements which have been made in regard to an investigation by the committee to see if something cannot be done in connection with the plugging of lists, the holding of polls in districts where no one lives and the return of supposed votes in districts and in polls where no votes were cast, and beyond that I wish to introduce a few other matters which none of the previous speakers has brought up for consideration. In the first place, if you refer to section 50, sub-section 4, of the Dominion Elections Act, you will see that it provides that the printer shall file an affidavit giving the number of ballot papers printed, and also containing the statement that no other ballot papers were printed. In this particular election an affidavit was filed by the printer giving the number of ballots printed, but a peculiar thing which happened in that election was that there were two sets of ballots. On some of the ballots my own name was incorrectly spelled, as was the name of the Conservative candidate, while on the remainder of the ballots our names were spelled correctly. No reference to that was made in the affidavit. I think it reasonable to say that if you can make a slight error in the spelling of a candidate's name there is no limit to the distance you can go in that direction. For instance, if during an election it is presumed to be correct to mis-spell the name of a candidate, why could you not transpose all the letters of his name so that no one would know who was meant? As an example, supposing you transposed the first and last letters of the name of the Prime Minister.

We must also recall that the printer is required to make an affidavit stating the number of ballots printed, the amount of paper used and the disposition which was made of the balance of the paper. If some 15,000 or 20,000 ballots were printed on which the names were incorrectly spelled; if these ballots were sent out for general use in the election and were not included in the affidavit, how could an affidavit be made giving the amount of the paper used and the disposition made of the balance?

Then I pass from that question to the requirement that the returning officer stamp the ballots. That section of the act is very clear and very drastic; it provides that the returning officer must stamp each and every ballot used, and that anyone not being a returning officer, having in his possession any stamp, imitation or counterfeit, is guilty of an indictable offence. In this particular case, as was stated by a previous speaker, the returning officer lived in Lac la Biche, while the ballots were stamped by a man in Edmonton; they were never sent to Lac la Biche, and the returning officer did not even know who printed them. Is that in conformity with the requirements of the act, or is that something for a committee of this house to deal with?

Provision is also made with regard to the distribution of the ballot. In this particular case it was shown that the ballots were sent out by automobile, by mail and I presume by every other conceivable method which could be made use of. For instance, we are prepared to prove, if it has not been done already and I am not sure whether it came up in the investigation, that two or three men in automobiles went from poll to poll asking the returning officer if he had all the ballots he required, and if he had not they gave him some. I am sure the Minister of Justice is reasonably familiar with the provisions of the act, and I wonder if he thinks that is carrying out the provisions of that act or whether it is an additional reason for referring this question to the committee, with the understanding that these various sections will be definitely decided upon, so that in the future we may have some sort of ruling or authority to follow? I just wish to read a part of what Judge Clarke says with regard to that particular matter, which will be found at page 8 of his report:

> The office of the returning officer was at Lac la Biche and the ballots were printed in Edmonton, more than one hundred miles distant. Instead of coming to Edmonton with the stamp or having the ballots sent to Lac la Biche to be stamped before they were bound up in pads suitable for delivery the stamp was sent to William R. Wilson of Edmonton, for the purpose of having him stamp the ballots on behalf of the returning officer, which he did, and then returned the stamp to the returning officer. There is nothing to indicate any wrong doing in connection with the printing, stamping or distribution of the ballots except that the stamping was done by Wilson and not by the returning officer.
> Section 51 (f) of the act makes it an offence punishable with severe penalties for anyone not being a returning officer to have the stamp in his possession, and I am asked to find Wilson guilty of that offence. With some doubt I have come to the conclusion that I should not do so. It is true that Wilson did, in a sense, have possession of the stamp, but he held it for the returning officer, in whose possession I think it could be fairly said to be, and having regard to the different senses in which the word "possession" is used, and the severe penalties attached to the offence I think it is not the intention of the act that such possession as Wilson had was an offence.

I presume that if another case is brought up under this act this judgment by Mr. Justice Clarke will be cited as a precedent, and this is what it amounts to: Supposing in the Peace River country you had a returning officer living up in the Pouce Coupe country. He could send that stamp down to Baldy Robb and say, "You stamp all the ballots you require and send them out as you please." Or the returning officer might live up in the Athabaska constituency say at Lac la Biche; he could send the stamp down to that mutual friend of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) and myself, Mr. Bowtell, and say,

"Harry, you stamp them and send them out." As far as I can see there is no way of keeping any track of the number of ballots sent out or where they are sent, and I am sure the election act never anticipated anything of that kind.

I might refer to another clause in the act which provides that in the event of any civil servant, or anyone else for that matter, being proven guilty, or pleading guilty to an offence under this act, in addition to other penalties, he shall not be permitted to hold any office within the nomination of the crown. When that was mentioned a minute ago the Minister of the Interior stated that some fifteen government officials had been discharged following the discussion of this matter in the house last year. I am afraid that he would have a hard time trying to find that number of officials that had been discharged. I believe the services of one were dispensed with; I believe the Minister of the Interior did discharge the land agent at Lac la Biche. Outside of that I do not think there were any. I am pretty sure I would know it if what the Minister of the Interior states is correct. I repeat, there was but a single civil servant discharged in the constituency.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I ask my hon. friend who were the government employees who were before Judge Clarke or who were in any way implicated? I am really interested in getting this information because any of those in my department who were proved guilty are certainly not in the employ of the department to-day.

Mr. KELLNER: I could not give the minister that information offhand. I do not think it would be a difficult matter to find out, and if I were getting the information I should have to have assistance of the department. However, I am quite sure there is quite a number of them.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is hardly fair for my hon. friend to make assertions of that kind unless he is prepared to back them up with evidence. In acting as I did I acted according to the evidence taken by Mr. Justice Clarke. If there are any guilty parties in my department—and I do not know of any—they will be dismissed forthwith.

Mr. KELLNER: I can give the names of some and what disposition was made of their cases, and will do so in a moment. First of all I should like to offer a few comments on the assertions which various ministers made last year, to the effect that they were in favour of cleaning up this matter. If we are to take the statements of the ministers, they are very much in favour of getting rid of those civil servants who were guilty of the offences in question, and I suppose they will go further and say that they are not in favour of employing any of the others who were implicated. The Minister of the Interior said that the postmaster at Lac la Biche had been discharged. Now I want to deal in some detail with the post office at that place, and show what took place there. I am glad that the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) is here because he will be able to correct me if I err in any statement I may make. The postmaster at Lac la Biche was not discharged. There was, however, a case against him of having incited one of the witnesses in the investigation to perjury, and we felt quite sure that we could convict him on that charge. I was probably a little indiscreet because at a meeting I said that if he were left in the office I was going to see whether we could not persuade the government to proceed against him on the charge referred to. Almost immediately he resigned. I do not know whether his resignation was because of that statement or whether it was merely a coincidence. Anyway he resigned.

Mr. VENIOT: That was at Lac la Biche?

Mr. KELLNER: Yes, Lac la Biche.

Mr. VENIOT: That postmaster resigned on request after investigation was made.

Mr. KELLNER: I was citing the information which I think I obtained from the Civil Service Commission. If he was fired, so much the better.

Mr. VENIOT: The Civil Service Commission had nothing whatever to do with his resignation.

Mr. KELLNER: The Postmaster General is evidently trying to get me to say something I have no intention of saying. I did not say they had anything to do with the investigation. I said the Civil Service Commission advertised the position and they did. There were three applicants. One was ruled out as ineligible because he did not reside within the district. That cut the number down to two. One of these was Clovis Hamel, son of the former postmaster, P. D. Hamel. The other was a man by the name of J. L. Lavoie. The latter had been a bank teller for three or four years, and had considerable business experience. At the time the Civil Service Commission had the position under review, I submitted the evidence which had been given in the case of the Lac la Biche polls. That covered both polls. Clovis Hamel, who was making application for the position of postmaster, was the deputy returning officer in one poll. When we started to investigate the happenings at the Lac la Biche polls we hoped to prove that a large number of voters, after voting in one poll, had gone over and polled their votes at the other booth. Unfortunately when we got the election returns the poll book for one of the Lac la Biche polls was missing. Now the responsibility for destroying that book was sought to be placed on Isaac Gagnon who had been returning officer, the man whose name has already been mentioned here as being unable to read or write. I consider the attempt to fasten this charge on the late Mr. Gagnon was the most despicable thing I have ever seen in my life. I do not for a moment believe that Mr. Gagnon destroyed that poll book; I think that some persons who are now occupying positions under the government destroyed it. However, that is only my personal opinion. Mr. Lavoie made application for this position, and after the Civil Service Commission had given due consideration to the application, he was appointed. A little later on the Post Office Department refused to accept the appointment, and then there was only one applicant left, namely, Clovis Hamel, the son of P. D. Hamel who had been fired. The result was that Clovis Hamel was made postmaster. Clovis also got the appointment of land agent, and P. D. was never relieved of his position as telegraph operator. So here is what the government accomplished in that case: They took the post office and the land office away from the father and gave them to the son. As regards the position of telegraph operator, P. D. Hamel had the position before and he still holds it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Does my hon. friend now say that Clovis Hamel had been proven guilty of any misconduct?

Mr. KELLNER: No, I do not say that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is what I want to get from my hon. friend. You do not say that?

Mr. KELLNER: I will make it very plain to the minister. Here is what took place: We submitted—perhaps I had better say I submitted—the evidence to the Civil Service Commission covering the investigation, but we could not prove what we started out to prove owing to one poll book at Lac la Biche having disappeared. In the case of the other poll we did prove that they had taken ballots for quite a number of persons, sixteen or eighteen people, that never voted. In the poll, where Clovis Hamel was deputy returning officer, we did prove that one man, who was in the town of Waterways on election day, was recorded as having voted. Of course he could not have voted in Lac la Biche when he was in Waterways. The minister will know that well enough. Another man who operates a store—he is a Serbian, I think, and I am satisfied is not a citizen of Canada—voted although his name was not on the voters' list. He was not challenged and did not have someone to verify his identity as the act requires. There were two charges against Clovis Hamel which the evidence will prove at any time. Now Judge Clarke makes no comment on them in the report. I think the minister will admit that where there were such offences, an infraction of the law covering merely two or three votes would be hardly worth mentioning.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is just what I want to bring out. My hon. friend has mentioned what I have contended all the time, that not a word was said about it in Judge Clarke's report. My statement is now, and has been all the time, that every one of the cases mentioned in Judge Clarke's report has been dealt with. And may I say further: If my hon. friend will prove his contention when this investigation goes on—as I hope it will; no one hopes it more than I do—every one of the people who have been found guilty of offences will be punished. I want to say this with reference to my hon. friend—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): All right. I will make a statement later.

Mr. KELLNER: The Speaker will give me extra time for this interruption. I was just thinking that the Minister of the Interior should have directed his remarks to the Minister of Public Works in regard to Mr. P. D. Hamel, in connection with his occupying the position of telegraph operator there. He is not arguing that he was discharged from that position.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am speaking of my own department.

Mr. KELLNER: That, however, is what took place. You have the post office, the sub-land agency and the telegraph office in the same building they were always in, and you have the same officers operating them with the exception that now the father is working for the son instead of the son working for the father.

I will pass from that to the case of the Heinsburg post office and I want to read a little extract in connection with that from

Mr. Justice Clarke's report. On page 6 of the report Mr. Justice Clarke has this to say:

I find that the said William Robertson and W. L. Crook by reason of each aiding in the commission of the offence and each having an intention in common with the other to prosecute an unlawful purpose are both guilty of forging 66 ballots and the poll book.

Let us remember that the poll clerk in that poll is W. L. Crook. He was an official at the poll known as Parenteau during that election. Tributary to his home is a post office known as the Heinsburg post office of which a Mr. L. Coombe was the postmaster. He was a returned man who had spent about four years in the war and had been discharged. This is a small post office and the income is very little, but it was certainly a position valued by that man. He had been running the office for several years and last summer he was notified that the office was to be taken from him and that the new appointee would be Mrs. W. L. Crook, wife of this poll clerk. The matter was brought to my attention along with a petition signed, I am told, by every patron of that office with the exception of the Crook family, requesting that Coombe be retained as postmaster. Here you have the position. Every single patron of the post office, with the exception of W. L. Crook and his family, were satisfied with the man who was in charge of it. I thought this was something that must have been put over without the knowledge of the government so I wrote to the Postmaster General giving him all the details. The Postmaster General wrote me back saying: Yes, Mrs. Crook is the wife of W. L. Crook; but do you think that is any reason why she should be disqualified from taking this office? That is the answer of the Postmaster General. I thought surely the government are not all of that opinion, so I wrote to the Prime Minister and told him about the matter. The Prime Minister replied saying: Yes, I have investigated this case, but the petition was largely a protest against the office being moved. Regardless of whether it was a protest against the office being moved or whether she is qualified or not, is the government going to excuse things like that by giving a postmastership to the wife of a man to whom they cannot give it, and taking it away from a returned soldier, a man who has gone out and defended this country, in order to give it to a woman by the name of Crook and, I presume, crooked by nature, if we are to judge from the evidence we have before us? That is the whole question.

I pass from that to Frog Lake poll. The Minister of the Interior said a minute ago that Harry Bowtell was not in the country at the moment. If he is not, that is news to me, because I am sure he was a short time ago. He may have left the country now, but if so his wife is still running the post office. Harry Bowtell has the honour of being mentioned in this report just a little more frequently than anyone else who is mentioned in it. I will read a few of the comments that Mr. Justice Clarke makes. On page 3 of the report I find this:

I find that the said Martin Grasdal, Harry Bowtell, Ernest Vasey and Peter Peterson are guilty of a conspiracy to commit an indictable offence in respect of the matters aforesaid.

Turning over to the next page I find this:

Harry Bowtell is guilty of abetting in the commission of the said offences in violation of section 51.

On the next page we have this:

The deputy returning officer, Peter Peterson, says that he was also registrar for this polling division, and got a voters' list with the ballot box on the morning of election day from Harry Bowtell, which he signed as registrar. The poll book indicates that there were 194 names on the voters' list, but there appear to have been only four qualified voters in the polling division.

A little further on the commissioner says:

In fact no poll was held and no person voted; the ballots were marked and put in the box by the said Peter Peterson at the instance of the said Harry Bowtell.

Turning over to another page I find that he again speaks of Harry Bowtell in these words:

--and that Harry Bowtell was guilty of abetting in the commission of such offences by reason whereof both of them became disqualified from voting at any election of a member to serve in the House of Commons for a term of seven years.

There are two other references to him, but I want to present the one in connection with Mrs. Bowtell. I find this on page 13 of the report:

In connection with this poll, a cheque was issued by the Auditor General to Thomas J. Cardinal for $24.26 for his services as registrar. No such person existed. The cheque was obtained by Emma A. Bowtell, wife of Harry Bowtell, the postmaster at Frog Lake, and she endorsed on it the name of Thomas J. Cardinal and obtained payment and appropriated the proceeds to her own use, and I find her guilty of forgery in respect thereof.

I should like to stop there long enough to ask the Minister of Justice if that is one of the cases the provincial government would have to prosecute?

Mr. LAPOINTE: He was given a certificate of indemnity by the judge. Nothing could be done against him.

Mr. KELLNER: That remark from the Minister of Justice is not in keeping with the high position he occupies. How could a judge give anyone a certificate to preclude a prosecution against that person for forgery? It cannot be done.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend's question was misunderstood by the Minister of Justice. He was answering in regard to Mr. Harry Bowtell. The hon. member was asking a question about Mrs. Bowtell.

Mr. KELLNER: The minister made a remark a little earlier in the afternoon that these prosecutions should be carried on by the provincial government and in his remarks I thought I detected a little complaint, or possibly something stronger, that the provincial government had not taken any action. My suggestion is this: Whose responsibility is it to prosecute in connection with this offence? Surely the Minister of Justice will not say that the provincial government should prosecute in connection with such an offence.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend is altogether wrong. The matter is one for the provincial authorities.

Mr. KELLNER: Let me quote further. Speaking of the Cushing poll the Commissioner says:

> In connection with this poll, a cheque was issued by the Auditor General to P. A. Patterson, for $40, for his services as registrar. No such person existed. The cheque was obtained by Emma A. Bowtell, already mentioned, and by her direction the name of P. A. Patterson was endorsed upon the cheque by her thirteen year old daughter, by means of which Emma A. Bowtell obtained payment and appropriated the proceeds to her own use, and I find her guilty of forgery in respect thereof.

She is the postmistress of the Frog Lake post office, or Harry Bowtell is the postmaster, and she is the postmistress—I do not know which.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I have looked up the post office guide, and I find that Harry Bowtell is still the postmaster of Frog Lake.

Mr. KELLNER: It is in the family anyway. They also have the telegraph office at that point. I am sure the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott) will be glad to know that there are still a few of these people in the employ of the government. Summing up these three cases, in Lac la Biche, the son gets the post office, and other appointments. The post office stays in the same building, it is kept by the same bunch of officials, and I am satisfied that no one could go in there to-day and detect one particle of difference from what it was before. In the case of the Heinsburg post office, you discharged a returned man who had fought for this country for several years during the war, a disabled veteran who required this little bit of support, and you give the post office to the wife of one of these ginks who was convicted. Then in the case of Frog Lake, you had both the wife and the husband. The children were not old enough, but the eldest was also convicted, and you leave them plumb alone. That is what you do, and nothing more.

Let me go a little further. I think anyone will realize that in order to submit the volume of evidence which we did submit in this investigation, it was going to cost us, and did cost us, a considerable amount of money, so I think any fair-minded person will give us credit for not being remiss in our duty if we neglected to bring in a few who should have been brought in or whose names might have been linked up with these others. I think it is fair to say that in a good many of these cases there is a preponderance of evidence, whether it was submitted before a judge or not, that should be taken into consideration. What I would like to ask the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), is this: Does he think that Charlie Cross's campaign manager could go through that election without being a party to what took place? And he is appointed a land agent at Bonnyville.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Who was his election agent? I thought it was Mr. Deyl.

Mr. KELLNER: Joe Deschene was his campaign manager.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think my hon. friend is taking some chances in laying an accusation against Mr. Deschene.

Mr. KELLNER: I have made a statement that in cases where there is a preponderance of evidence that should be considered. How could anyone be closely associated with that campaign and not know something about what was going on? Regardless of whether I am taking a chance or not, that is what took place.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend will not suggest that all the men in Athabaska who were associated with Mr. Cross—I hold no brief for Mr. Cross, as my hon. friend well knows—would be guilty of wrongdoing.

Mr. KELLNER: No, I am not making any such suggestion as that at all, and I do not for the life of me see how the minister can imagine that I am. I am trying to be fair in this, and I am arguing that anybody who was actively associated with that election, either as a candidate, or as taking part in the organization of the machine that put this deal over, could hardly be considered as knowing nothing about what was going on.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am always loath to believe wrong of anyone until it is proven. I have known Mr. Deschene for a considerable number of years, and I have yet to know of him doing anything wrong.

Mr. KELLNER: I would not make any suggestion about anyone that I did not think was merited, but I cannot for the life of me conceive of any person going through that campaign as manager for the candidate and know nothing about what was going on.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is my hon. friend correct in saying that Mr. Deschene was the campaign manager? We all know that he was in that election and that he spoke in the election, but this is the first intimation that I have had that he was campaign manager.

Mr. KELLNER: I will put it this way. If the Minister of the Interior has good reasons for thinking he was not, possibly he will submit his reasons to the house, and we will decide the matter.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is all very fine, but my hon. friend is making an accusation, and I am not going to be put in that position.

Mr. KELLNER: I do not really know what you are going to do about it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend can do what he likes about it. If he has an accusation to make against Mr. Deschene, let him make it.

Mr. MANION: He is making it on his authority as a sitting member of this house.

Mr. KELLNER: My accusation, if that is what you choose to call it, has been repeated two or three times already, and there can be no doubt as to the statement I made, and outside of the Minister of the Interior, I venture to say that no one in this house will call my statement an unfair one. Seeing that our friends over there are getting so "het up" over this matter, I think I will just give them a few.

This Liberal party which we have in Canada has sunk, so far as Alberta is concerned, to possibly as low a level as any political party could sink. I have here one of the booklets which were sent all through my constituency, and I expect all over Canada, called, "Hints on Organization and Work on Polling Day". This is sent out by the National Liberal Committee, 115 Sparks street, Ottawa. I want to quote some of the instructions it gives. At page twelve, it says:

> If a friendly voter spoils his ballot, see that he gets a new one, and that the spoiled one is marked and cancelled.

Mr. CANNON: What is wrong with that? He is entitled to a ballot.

Mr. KELLNER: Is it fair to ask what would happen to the unfriendly voter? I quote again:

> Once a voter gets a ballot he has a right to use it, whether he has been sworn or not. When a friendly voter therefore gets a ballot, he should at once mark it and have it deposited into the box.

In case somebody heads him off, I suppose. It continues:

> He cannot be sworn after he gets the ballot paper. Remember this, each ballot is counted, no matter by whom cast.

I ask the Solicitor General, what is the matter with that?

Mr. CANNON: That is absolutely fair. There is nothing wrong about that.

Mr. McGIBBON: What about the suggestion contained in it?

Mr. CANNON: There is no suggestion contained in it. That is perfectly all right.

Mr. KELLNER: If these things appear to be all right to the members of this government, then certainly it is beyond my powers to point out anything that they would consider irregular, but in spite of that, I am going to give one more quotation:

> Only two agents for each candidate are entitled to be present. If possible, arrange to have all objected ballots laid aside before you argue for their rejection or validity, so that you may see how the ballots will affect the count. Examine carefully back and front, each ballot marked for an opposite candidate.

What is the inference there? Is it not this? You take the unfriendly ballots and you put them over here; you take the friendly ballots and you put them over here. Then you size up the two piles, and if the friendly ballots make the biggest pile, argue for the inclusion of the whole thing, but if the unfriendy ballots make the biggest pile, then argue that they should all be rejected. There can be no other interpretation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me address these serious words to the government. Out through that district a very large percentage of the young people are just developing into womanhood and manhood. When I was there last summer the only topic universally discussed was the fact that those who had been proved guilty of illegal practices in the Athabasca election were appointed to these positions. It seems to me that this is what the government is doing. You are saying to the young people of that country: If you go out and forge cheques to help out your party on election day, to put this stuff over, you are all right, you can get a government job; you can forge cheques, you can beat the Dominion of Canada out of money which you should not have, and nobody will say a word to you; but, on the other hand, if you do not do anything like that, even though you helped your country to fight its wars, your post office will be taken away from you and you will get no consideration at all. Now, sir, is that the impression this government wants to make on the people in that constituency?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate, but a few minutes ago when the member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) was speaking, the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) interjected a couple of remarks which to my mind, if they are to be permitted to go out to this country unchallenged, cast a more or less shameful reflection upon my hon. leader (Mr. Bennett), and I intend to ask the Solicitor General to explain them. The incident occurred when the member for West York was speaking to the effect that Baldy Robb had been sentenced to imprisonment for crooked election practices and had been shown clemency. The Solicitor General interjected these words—I took them down at the time and have since had them typed:

Mr. Cannon: Before my hon. friend leaves Baldy Robb, I would say that if he wants to know the reason he had better inquire of his own leader.

Then the member for West York replied to the effect that his leader could look after himself, and the Solicitor General retorted:

I give you warning.

Now, sir, only one possible conclusion can be drawn from those remarks of the Solicitor General, and as my hon. leader is sick in bed I feel that this shameful implication should be retracted or explained. Either the Solicitor General has said too much or he has said too little. In justice to my hon. leader I wish to ask the Solicitor General to explain what he referred to in those interjections.

Mr. CANNON: In answer to my hon. friend, I regret as much as he does the absence of the leader of the Conservative party when my friend from West York was addressing the house. If my hon. friend for West Calgary, the leader of the Conservative party, had been present I am quite sure that no reference would have been made to the case of Baldy Robb, for two obvious reasons. First, because the case of Baldy Robb has absolutely nothing whatsoever to do with the present motion. Baldy Robb was connected with the election in the constituency of Peace River, and was in no way connected with the election in the constituency of Athabaska. It goes to show that my hon. friend from West York when addressing the house should have taken more time to examine the motion, its object and its meaning. The second reason why no reference would have been made to the case of Baldy Robb is that that case was dealt with in such a manner and under such circumstances as are well known to the leader of the opposition, and he would have been the first to keep the hon. gentleman from mentioning it in the house.

As to my intention in interjecting what I did interject, I may say that I did not want to cast any shameful reflection on the character of the leader of the Conservative party. I had no such intention. Members of this house know me sufficiently well to be assured that I would have waited for the leader of the Conservative party to be present if I wanted to attack him. I have never had the habit of attacking people in their absence, but on account of the very peculiar circumstances of the case referred to by the member for West York, I thought it was just as well that I should say enough for the incident to close immediately, as it did close, and I may assure—

An hon. MEMBER: You have not said enough yet.

Mr. CANNON: —and I assure my hon. friend from Fort William that I attach no shameful interpretation in any way to the conduct of the leader of the opposition in that matter; but if he will discuss it with his own leader he will reach the same conclusion as I have, that we should not discuss it in the house.

Mr. CAHAN: Why not?

Mr. McQUARRIE: Tell us.

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) wishes to know the reason. Suffice it to say that in all cases of remission of sentence the crown exercises the royal prerogative.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so.

Mr. CANNON: That exercise of the royal prerogative is not to be debated.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so.

Mr. CANNON: Therefore when the royal prerogative was exercised in the case of Baldy Robb it was exercised for reasons that I cannot discuss here.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so; but why not explain?

Mr. CANNON: When the member for West York introduced the matter he was placing me in a position as the minister who advised in the matter of being—I would not say accused, but of being suspected of having taken a decision which I should not have taken, when as a matter of fact I acted after consulting many people and inquiring in many quarters. I cannot say any further, but in fairness to the minister in charge—

Mr. BOYS: Why did you give the warning?

Mr. CANNON: In view of the special prerogative which is exercised in such matters, in view of the parliamentary practice in similar cases, and in view of the fact that the motion before the house is in no way connected with the case of Baldy Robb, I think that incident should not have been introduced here at all.

Mr. CAHAN: If the Solicitor General will allow a question—in reference to the explanations which have been made, and which are highly honourable to the hon. gentleman, does he still make any aspersions on the leader of the opposition?

Mr. CANNON: I never made any. I want to make that very plain—I never made any.

Mr. BOYS: What was the warning for?

Mr. CANNON: The warning that I gave to my hon. friend from West York was that he should not discuss that matter at all because apparently he was not familiar with it, and I am quite sure he was not.

Mr. BOYS: Cheap.

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend may consider it cheap, but I think that what I said was said in fairness to everyone. I have no intention of casting aspersions on the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), and if my hon. friends opposite think so they are entirely under a false impression.

Mr. CAHAN: I am glad you say that.

Mr. CANNON: If I wanted to attack the leader of the opposition I certainly would not do so when he was away. I never attack any man in his absence.

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman has answered the question to his own satisfaction, but when he says that he meant to make no attack on the leader of the opposition, I wish to say that he thinks too late, because he made the attack in these very statements. And immediately upon hearing these statements from the hon. gentleman I said to myself, "Either Mr. Bennett has done something shameful or the Solicitor General has no right to make any such statements."

Mr. CANNON: Has my hon. friend concluded his remarks?

Mr. MANION: No; I am going to conclude them now.

Mr. CANNON: Well, what was I doing?

Mr. MANION: You were answering my question.

Mr. CANNON: In that case I will allow my hon. friend to conclude his remarks and then I will speak.

Mr. MANION: I will conclude very quickly. The point I am making is this: that had I not asked the Solicitor General the question I did, there would without a doubt have gone out to the whole country through the press, and rightly, the suggestion from the Solicitor General that the hon. member for West Calgary, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), had done something shameful or disgraceful in connection with the clemency shown Baldy Robb. This certainly was the only possible inference that anyone could have drawn from the Solicitor General's remarks —that if the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) did not bring to a close his observations in reference to the clemency shown Baldy Robb, he, the Solicitor General, wanted to warn him that he was going to show up the leader of the opposition. That is the only possible sense which could be read into the statement of the Solicitor General. What other conclusion could one draw from it? The hon. member for West York had been speaking of the clemency shown Baldy Robb, and he made some remark to the effect that the government had been very kind to him, or something of that sort. I do not remember the exact words. The Solicitor General then interjects the remark: "Before my hon. friend leaves Baldy Robb I would suggest, if he wants to know the reason, that he had better inquire of his own leader."

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): No royal prerogative against insinuation.

Mr. MANION: And later on the Solicitor General adds: "I give you warning." In other words—and this is the only inference—he was giving warning to the hon. member for West York that if he persisted in his remarks regarding Baldy Robb he, the Solicitor General, would show up the leader of the opposition as having been in some shameful way connected with Baldy Robb. I accept completely the Solicitor General's withdrawal but I certainly find it difficult to understand his explanation.

Hon. LUCIEN CANNON (Solicitor General): I wish to say first of all that I do not withdraw anything I said.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend withdrew his implication; he did so three or four times —the implication of guilt.

Mr. CANNON: I cannot withdraw anything I did not advance; I cannot withdraw anything I have not said. And now, as to continuing the discussion with my hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion), I do not think I can do so because my hon. friend is evidently slipping on the ground of partisanship, and these are the very last matters that should be discussed in a partisan spirit.

Mr. MANION: You should have thought of that sooner.

Mr. CANNON: I will warn my hon. friend—

Mr. MANION: Go ahead.

Mr. CANNON: I will warn my hon. friend—

Mr. MANION: A very popular pastime.

Mr. CANNON: —that when he does speak in this house I make it a rule to listen to him attentively. I do not interrupt the hon. gentleman and I ask him to accord me the same privilege.

Mr. MANION: I will not interrupt the hon. gentleman if he will be careful in his remarks about warning us in regard to our leader.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend is afraid that the words which I uttered will result in having the whole of the people of Canada think that the leader of the opposition has possibly done something shameful. I do not think my words will have any such effect. The leader of the opposition has a standing in this country—

Mr. MANION: Hear, hear.

Mr. CANNON: —as a public man and as a lawyer, and I have greater confidence, I think, in the reputation of the leader of the Tory party than my hon. friend from Fort William seems to have. Now, coming to the motion which is before the house, I may say this to my hon. friend who has just resumed his seat: The government has absolutely no objection whatsoever to the motion. Every member in this house, whether he sits on this side or on the other, will co-operate with him in order to obtain as satisfactory a result as possible from an investigation by the committee on privileges and elections into the report which has been submitted by Mr. Justice Clarke. We are at one on this question. The government does not oppose the motion; the government is willing to participate in the investigation before the committee on privileges and elections in order to assist my hon. friend in securing results. But, Mr. Speaker, there is a distinction to be drawn between the responsibility which may attach to the government in this matter and the responsibility which rests with parliament as such. The Minister of Justice is not responsible for the administration of the criminal law in Canada. This is a well known fact.

Mr. BOYS: Who is?

Mr. CANNON: I will tell my hon. friend. If an investigation is held under chapter 51, the judge having reported that offences have been committed, the prosecutions are to be instituted, not by the federal government, not by the Minister of Justice, but by the provincial government, by the attorney general.

Mr. CAHAN: Where do you find that provision?

Mr. KELLNER: Will the Solicitor General say that, cheques having been paid in the federal government's money, and it having been established that these election officials never existed, the provincial government should prosecute?

Mr. CANNON: Certainly. I have no doubt my hon. friend asks the question in perfect good faith, and I am more surprised that legal gentlemen should express a doubt on the point, as does my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), for instance, or my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Boys).

Mr. CAHAN: Doubt as to what?

Mr. CANNON: The attorney general of the province is the officer who administers justice within the province and who sees to it that prosecutions are taken. Every indictment laid before a criminal court is signed by the attorney general of the province. The attorney general of Alberta is the man who in this instance was supposed to take the prosecutions in connection with offences disclosed when the investigation was held. I do not blame the attorney general of Alberta; he probably did his duty. As a matter of fact, as appears on the file, when he received from Ottawa the documents which he was supposed to receive, the attorney general of Alberta did not complain that we had not done our duty. The attorney general of Alberta did not say to the Acting Minister of Justice, "You have not performed your duty under the act". The attorney general of Alberta reported that he was instituting proceedings, as it was his duty to do. Why should we be blamed as a government? It is altogether outside of our competence.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. CANNON: It is.

Mr. BOYS: Does the hon. member contend that the Criminal Code of Canada cannot be set in motion by the Department of Justice? He has mentioned my name, and that is why I rise. I do not suggest that the administration cannot be properly carried on by the province, but does the Solicitor General suggest for a moment that the enforcement of the criminal law cannot be set in motion by the Department of Justice of Canada?

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend knows that should a murder be committed in the House of Commons the murderer would be prosecuted not by the Minister of Justice but by the attorney general for the province of Ontario.

Mr. CAHAN: Would my hon. friend allow a question?

Mr. CANNON: That is the practice, and has been so since 1867. Criminal prosecutions are instituted by provincial authorities.

Mr. McQUARRIE: But cannot anyone lay an information?

Mr. CANNON: Certainly, but if my hon. friend went to the police station in the city of Ottawa to lay a complaint of an infringement of the criminal code, his complaint would be received and if the judge deemed fit a warrant would be issued. If that were an indictable offence, however, the case could not be brought before the criminal court without that indictment being signed by the attorney general for the province of Ontario.

Mr. BOYS: Nobody disputes that.

Mr. CANNON: Then if no one disputes that my argument is perfectly correct.

Mr. BOYS: You could set the law in motion.

Mr. CANNON: Certainly; we set the law in motion according to the act the moment the report was received. My hon. friends must be fair in this matter, as I am quite sure every hon. member wishes to be fair. This is not a partisan matter but a question of law.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The Dominion police are doing it every day.

Mr. CANNON: Certainly, but this whole matter must be considered in a spirit of fairness. We had a right to appoint a commissioner. Will my hon. friend who sits for that constituency deny that the moment he asked for a royal commission the government appointed a commissioner? We appointed one of the most distinguished jurists in the west, and placed at his disposal every posible convenience to assist him in arriving at the truth.

Mr. KELLNER: Will the minister permit me to reply to his question? The government did appoint a commisisoner, in the person of Mr. Justice Beck. I think he held the appointment until some time in June, but made no effort to hold any inquiry. That appointment was later changed to Mr. Justice Clarke, who was held up for some little time because he had no money. Mr. Justice Beck refused to go on with the inquiry because he said the government had not supplied him with funds.

Mr. CANNON: I hold no brief to defend Mr. Justice Beck; I simply state to my hon. friend that his name was mentioned in the petition addresed to this parliament. For some reason or other he was later replaced by Mr. Justice Clarke, and I am sure no one will ever say anything against Mr. Justice Clarke. The government even appointed the counsel who represented the interests of my hon. friend, and paid $3,000 for their services. Could we do more than that? The report was sent in; what did we do? There had been some delay in forwarding the report, but surely we cannot be held responsible for that. The moment the report was received we hurried the proceedings in order to be within the period set by law; we sent the documents to the proper authorities in Alberta.

Mr. KELLNER: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. CANNON: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has already spoken several times. If he desires to put a question, well and good, but he may not make a further statement.

Mr. KELLNER: I was interrupted quite frequently, and I think I should have a little leeway in this matter. Of course I submit with all grace to your ruling, but I wish to ask the Solicitor General a question. If Mr. Justice Beck had proceeded with the investigation shortly after his appointment—and his reason for not doing so was that the government had not provided him with money—that report might have been submitted earlier, and more time would have been given to those looking after the prosecutions. Is that not so?

Mr. CANNON: As far as that feature of the matter is concerned, certainly I am not going to discuss before this house whether or not Mr. Justice Beck did not act because he had no money. I doubt very much whether that was the reason, but if my hon. friend has an accusation of that kind to make against Mr. Justice Beck he can do so. I simply say that when the report was received by this government we did what we had to do; we forwarded the documents to the attorney general of Alberta, who acted as he should have acted. If my hon. friend has any complaint as to how the prosecutions were conducted he should not address them to the Minister of Justice or to this government but to the provincial government of Alberta—if any such complaints can be laid, which I doubt very much.

Mr. CAHAN: I intend to address them to this government if I am given an opportunity.

Mr. CANNON: The question was raised why certain prosecutions were not taken against people who had evidently committed infractions of the law. Again I say the responsibility for that matter lies with the attorney general of Alberta, but in fairness to him—and I wish to be fair to everyone in this matter—I must remind the house that prosecutions could not be instituted if certificates of immunity were given. That is the law. Section 27 of the Corrupt Practices Inquiries Act states:

> If any information, indictment or penal action is at any time after an inquiry pending in any court against such witness in respect of any corrupt or illegal practices committed by him previously to the time of his giving his evidence, at any election concerning which he has been so examined, the court shall, on production and proof of such certificate, stay such proceedings, and may, in its discretion, award to him any costs to which he has been put.

My hon. friend knows that certificates of immunity were granted to most of the people connected with the electoral frauds practised during that election.

Mr. ARTHURS: Why not to all the electorates?

Mr. CANNON: It was for the judge to decide; he has to exercise his discretion. Are my hon. friends going to discuss in this house the exercise of judicial discretion?

Mr. KELLNER: Such a certificate could not be issued for the offence which I cited a moment ago.

Mr. CAHAN: Was a certificate of immunity given to Mrs. Bowtell for forging a Dominion cheque, which resulted in a defalcation of Dominion funds?

Mr. CANNON: I do not think such a certificate was granted.

Mr. CAHAN: That was the issue raised by my hon. friend, which you are avoiding.

Mr. CANNON: That issue was not raised, but let us examine that case. If Mrs. Bowtell could be prosecuted, and if my hon. friend really wanted her punished, why did he not exercise his right as a citizen and lay a complaint? He could have done so.

Mr. CAHAN: Are you going to leave to private citizens the duty of prosecuting those who have been found guilty of defalcations against the Dominion government?

Mr. CANNON: The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, with his usual ability, is evidently trying to shift the ground of discussion.

Mr. CAHAN: I am not; I was protesting against the implication which I thought underlay the remarks of my hon. friend.

Mr. CANNON: The hon. member for Athabaska brought up the question of certain people who had been found guilty of infractions of the election law. In answering that I say, first, that the prosecution should be instituted by the attorney general of the province according to the law; and secondly, that in cases where certificates of immunity had been granted by the judge, in the exercise of his discretion, no prosecutions could take place.

Mr. CAHAN: With respect to corrupt electoral acts.

Mr. CANNON: As to the case of Mrs. Bowtell, or any other person, I am not sufficiently conversant with the situation to discuss it on its merits. May I add that in so far as the government is concerned we stated two years ago, we stated again last year, and we make the statement this year, that my hon. friend from Athabaska can appear before the committee on privileges and elections, and any suggestions which he can make to improve our system will be received with gratitude. We have no intention whatsoever of protecting those who may have been guilty of corrupt practices during that election. Again I repeat that this matter must be discussed in the light of the law as it exists, not in the light of what my hon. friend, or any other gentleman opposite, would like it to be. If the law is not as it should be, it becomes a matter of making the necessary amendments. I do not think any member in the house can accuse the Minister of Justice of having been derelict in his duty when he followed every clause of the Corrupt Practices Inquiries Act.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): I think the house is very glad indeed that the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon), if he did not withdraw the implication contained in his remark, as we understood it, at least assures us that he had not intended any such implication. Certainly when I heard him I felt he was making some reflection on the honour of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and I am glad to know that is not the case. Among other points raised by the hon. member for Athabaska, he called attention to—

Mr. CANNON: If my hon. friend will permit me, in order that we may argue the case with the facts before us. The Minister of Justice informs me that Mrs. Bowtell was granted a certificate of immunity.

Mr. BOYS: Not for forgery.

Mr. CAHAN: With respect to those found guilty of illegal and corrupt practices under the Elections Act the commissioner could grant a certificate of indemnity, but the hon. member for Athabaska has pointed out that in addition to those there was the case of Mrs. Bowtell who forged the endorsements on cheques issued by the government and received and applied the proceeds to her own use. Now I say to the hon. gentleman that in the case of the forgery of a Dominion cheque and the defalcation of Dominion funds the Department of Justice has, from time immemorial, undertaken the prosecution of its own officials who have forged such cheques and forged such endorsements. I know of at least ten or fifteen cases in the last thirty years where such prosecutions have been undertaken by the Department of Justice. That is the point which my hon. friend the Solicitor General is entirely avoiding. Now supposing the commissioner did hold an inquiry in connection with corrupt practices and did give a certificate of indemnity to Mrs. Bowtell. That indemnity would be no defence to the prosecution of Mrs. Bowtell for the forgery of Dominion cheques and the misappropriation of Dominion funds. I think there is no doubt about that. However, I am not going to stress the point further; I simply give that as my clear opinion.

Now chapter 51 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, provides that the commissioners shall report with respect to each election the names of all persons whom they find to have been guilty of corrupt or illegal practices therein. May I point out that "corrupt or illegal practices" has a special definition, and I do not think that the forgery of Dominion cheques and wrongful appropriation of Dominion funds comes within it. The commissioners are required to report the names. To whom are they required to report? Section 28 says that the commissioners shall from time to time report to the Governor General the evidence taken and what they find concerning the premises. The report is made to the Governor General, in reality to the government of the country, in order that such action as may be deemed necessary in the premises may be taken. The report which is made to parliament is rather a subsidiary matter, because the act proceeds to state in section 30 that every such report which has been made to the Governor General shall be submitted to parliament within fourteen days after such report is made if parliament is sitting, or if parliament is not then sitting, within fourteen days from the next meeting. So not only is the government to receive a report for its information, but parliament is also to receive the report for the same reason. The report when it is received by the government shall be laid before the Attorney General of Canada, the Minister of Justice. Now the Minister of Justice has a special duty to perform in the premises. It is his duty to examine the evidence, and if he finds sufficient evidence available for a prosecution he must certify such information to the Secretary of State, who in turn must communicate the report, with the evidence, to the lieutenant governor of the province in which the election was held. But in addition to that, the statute places a duty upon the Attorney General of Canada in respect of his office, and his official duty in the premises is expressed in section 32, which says that:

> The Attorney General of Canada shall instruct counsel to assist in any prosecution which is thereon instituted by the local authorities charged with the administration of justice.

The word "shall" is used. The Attorney General of Canada "shall" instruct counsel. It is not within his discretion to refrain from making the appointment of counsel. It is a duty incumbent upon him under the statute so to act in this matter, therefore it is his duty to ascertain the result of the transmission of this report to the lieutenant governor of the province. It is his duty to ascertain whether the attorney general or crown prosecutor or other authority in the province has undertaken to prosecute for these offences. He must keep himself informed in regard to these matters. When a prosecution is undertaken, section 32 states that the Attorney General of Canada shall instruct counsel to assist in any prosecution.

I am the last one to endeavour to impose upon the Minister of Justice any duties which do not properly belong to him. I know he often has to be and has been absent from his office performing very high and onerous duties as representative of Canada in other countries. I do not know whether or not he was absent on this occasion; I do not know who was fulfilling his functions as the acting attorney general during his absence; but I say that under the statutes the Attorney General of Canada, or whoever was acting as Attorney General of Canada, has been utterly negligent and faithless in the performance of his duties in the premises. I say that, because we have had the admission to-day that no counsel was instructed by the Department of the Attorney General of Canada. I am not making any suggestions in regard to the present incumbent; I do not know who was acting at the time; but this is a case in which the Attorney General, or the acting Attorney General of Canada for the time being, has not performed his duties under the statute. If he had performed his duties under the statute we would not have had the Solicitor General or the Attorney General, the Minister of Justice, suggesting to-day to the house that they were unaware of the results of the various prosecutions which were undertaken by the crown prosecutor in the province in question. That is my point, and I think that should have been met more fully than it has been.

Just one other point. I think we all as members of this house must recognize that a duty is placed upon the house and especially upon the government with regard to the reconsideration of the provisions of the Corrupt Practices Act, the Elections Act and the registration of voters thereunder. It is impossible, as will be admitted, for any private member to procure with any facility amendments to the public acts of Canada, especially public acts such as the Corrupt Practices Act, the Elections Act, and all the rest. But certain kinds of illegal acts which were so prevalent in the constituency of Athabaska are prevalent in our city of Montreal to an enormous extent. I drew the attention of the house to this once before when this matter came up. I pointed out that in the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George before my first election I found on the list more than two thousand fictitious names. At the last election at which I was a candidate I found more than two thousand fictitious names on the list, and at the present time, although I have not counted them, I am sure that coming in from the provincial registration and otherwise there are already on the list which would form the basis of a new revision, many hundreds of fictitious names. We all know that at elections certain gangs of men are hired in the city and men are even imported from outside to do impersonating. We know there are hundreds of impersonations of registered electors. We know that gentlemen who are late going down town after breakfast find that others have voted in their names.

Mr. HEAPS: Why have there been no prosecutions in those cases?

Mr. CAHAN: Because no individual alone has the funds or the means to prosecute a thousand people. I am not saying whether this is due to the efforts of the Liberal party or of the Conservative party; but in any of our constituencies in Montreal, in the municipal elections, largely in the provincial elections and still more largely in the federal elections, there are impersonations not by the hundred but by the thousand.

Mr. HEAPS: Is it not a fact that these men when caught have been let off with neither fine nor imprisonment? Have they not been dealt with in the most lenient fashion?

Mr. CAHAN: I think so, but perhaps I have been so much concerned with the conviction of some of them that I may not be able to give an impartial opinion. You get together an executive committee of the most honourable and honest men you can find in your constituency, men whose reputations are above reproach, men who assist, on election day in the ordinary election work of the constituency, even those who represent you at the poll. Then there are issued in the city of Montreal blanket warrants purporting to be signed by judges; in fact I have seen some myself purporting to be signed by a judge of the court of sessions. I do not know whether they are forgeries or not, but these blanket warrants have been issued by the hundred and put into the hands of police constables for the purpose of arresting early in the morning the most reputable men of the city so as to prevent them from taking part in the election. I am not accusing anybody. The Minister of Justice, I know, is as anxious as I am to put an end to that sort of thing and I believe the other members of the government are equally anxious.

But when the provincial lists in Montreal are prepared, it is impossible for me in the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George to ascertain whether proper names are going on the list. Under the provincial law people can register for St. Lawrence-St. George at Lachine; they can register ten miles out of my district on the other side of the river; they can register at Pointe aux Trembles. It would take more than my personal revenue in a year to keep track of the registration of the names of voters in my constituency on the provincial list which go automatically on the Dominion list, so that it is impossible to have any effective supervision of the list until it forms the basis of the Dominion list. In my constituency at the last revision I found more than two thousand fictitious names. That meant that I had to have two thousand individual affidavits made as to whether or not on a certain day those people were residing at the places of residence stated in the list. That meant that I had to hire men by the hundred to go out and make inquiries at those residences on that day and then make individual affidavits. That expense is placed upon me; I have to bear it myself. I am not wealthy; but that expense, which applies also to other city constituencies, is so high that at the present time in the city of Montreal no honest, respectable citizen of moderate means can afford to run a federal election and to pay his own election expenses. Those two thousand affidavits were put in, and what I did was quite fair and frank. I gave a list of the whole two thousand applications to the representative of the gentleman who was opposing me. I do not presume that he knew anything about the matter, but someone knew about it. I said to them: send out to those addresses and if you can find one of them that represents anybody who by chance is not living at that address but is living in any other part of the constituency or anywhere where under the law he has a right to vote, I will not press the objection. After a complete search, I believe there were found out of over two thousand names some fifty residents who had moved from one house in one part of the constituency to another. We sent our agents out, two and two together, to deal with these fifty or sixty residents, and we dealt with them in a satisfactory manner. But the expense of all that, and the expense of revision in my constituency, with over two thousand fictitious names and thousands more coming in at the time of revision, is so great that it costs from four to five thousand dollars at the time of the federal revision simply to supervise this nefarious work and to prevent it having full effect. I know there are members on the other side of the house who complain of exactly the same conditions. When we make prosecutions before the court of sessions, the prosecutions are delayed and delayed and delayed and finally result in nothing. Members cannot initiate one thousand or two thousand prosecutions and then employ a sufficient number of lawyers to appear at the court of sessions day after day, and week after week, and even month after month. It is a scandal that must be prevented in the future. I ask the government, through the Minister of Justice, either through this committee or some other committee, to initiate as a government undertaking, because you need the force and power of will of government to put it through, a reconsideration of our electoral law with a view to making such amendments in the law governing the revision of the electoral lists in the city of Montreal—and conditions, I have no doubt, are the same in other cities—as will give us fair and honest lists that will preclude impersonation and perjury, and enable our committees of honest and representative men to do their electoral work on election day, without being subject to arrest on false and fraudulent warrants and to confinement in the police station under the control of the police until election day is past. It is a scandal. My hon. friend from the west said that conditions out there imperilled responsible democratic government. Democratic government in the city of Montreal in federal elections is at an end, democratic representation is at an end—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Did such a state of things exist when we were using the provincial lists for federal elections? Is not the condition my hon. friend speaks of the result of that change in the method of making up the lists?

Mr. CAHAN: I daresay it is, to a very considerable extent; and remember, I am not charging the Minister of Justice, or the government with which he is associated, or even the party with which he is associated in the province of Quebec, as being responsible for the iniquities which are perpetrated. I am not charging that, but I say it is a matter in respect of which we ought, on both sides of the house, to come to some reasonable understanding, and we ought to adopt and carry through such measures as may be calculated to put an end to it. To me personally it does not matter. The greatest kindness the Minister of Justice could do to me, as he suggested the other day he should do in the public interest, would be to prevent my representing a Montreal district in this house. But I come in contact with many young men in that city—young men not only of my own race, because my race is in a minority in Montreal, but the best young men who are coming out of the Montreal universities, Liberals as well as Conservatives, and they truthfully say that in view of the conditions which now exist, it is impossible for young men to attain any eminence in the political life of this country unless they are prepared to become a part of the party machine, on one side or the other, take party funds by thousands and tens of thousands of dollars, and participate in the iniquities which are prevalent, not only one side but on both sides in that city.

Hon. E. B. RYCKMAN (East Toronto): Mr. Speaker, I think the time will not be lost that is devoted to a further consideration of this case. So important is it that I do not think that any matters which are extraneous or are related only indirectly to it should be considered by this house in this connection. The facts are that this election was the most shocking and the most astounding one ever held in the Dominion of Canada, so far as we have any information. The Baldy Robb election in Peace River was held at the same time. It is true that the man who occupied front stage in that election does not come into the inquiry which I am sure will follow this resolution; nevertheless, the fact that the things he did, and kindred things, were repeated in the Athabaska election makes it all the more necessary that we should look to the dignity of this house and our own personal honour, because that is what the question involves.

This report was laid on the table of the house on the 15th day of December, 1926. Who is in control of parliament? The Prime Minister and his cabinet. Who has to deal with a matter of this kind? The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). We come down to this very day and we find that nothing was done or even suggested during the last session of parliament in regard to this report. To-day we find that the Minister of Justice says: Oh, I am in favour of the resolution. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) says: There will be no one who will be more pleased than I if this resolution carries; and the very words of the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) were, "I have absolutely no objection whatsoever to the motion." Has it come to this, Mr. Speaker, in this parliament, that where the honour of all members is concerned it must devolve upon a private member to bring forward a resolution which will be passed unanimously by the house? There is not a member of this house who will dare to vote against this resolution.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Honour, the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the senate.

Accordingly, the house went up to the senate.

And having returned,

Mr. SPEAKER informed the house that the deputy of His Excellency the Governor

General had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name the royal assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend the Supreme Court Act.

An Act to authorize an extension of time for the completion of the Saint John and Quebec Railway between Centreville, in the county of Carleton, and Andover, in the county of Victoria, N.B.

An Act to amend the Public Printing and Stationery Act.

An Act to amend the Railway Belt Water Act.

An Act respecting the Royal Military College of Canada.

An Act to confirm a certain agreement made between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Canadian National Railway Company.

An Act to amend The Patent Act.

An Act to amend the Trade Mark and Design Act.

An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1929.

An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1928.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

ATHABASKA ELECTION

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Garland (Bow River) that the final reports of Mr. Justice Clarke with reference to the Athabaska election be referred to the select standing committee on privileges and elections.

Mr. RYCKMAN: At six o'clock I was stating that ministers without exception were now unanimously in favour of the reference of this report to the committee and action thereon. This report, as I have stated, was tabled on December 15, 1926. Ministers have taken credit for tabling the report. The report is required under the statute to be tabled. No action was taken thereon and I submit to this house that it was the manifest duty of the government in power, represented especially in a matter of this kind by the Minister of Justice, to have this report examined and action taken on it in order to maintain the honour and dignity of the crown ad especially the purity of the fountain of justice. That action was not taken, but the ministers are all ready to take it now upon the resolution of a private member, and I say that the thanks of this house and of this country are due to that private member. Why was not action taken? Simply because an examination of this report would have disclosed that the Liberal party had out-Heroded Herod in election frauds and crimes. The government of the Hon. George Ross was turned out of power in the province of Ontario by election crime, but the post-graduate work in election crimes has been done by friends of this government, Baldy Robb and Cross, who, I understand, was himself at one time an attorney general of one of the provinces. Action was not taken because the Liberal party would have been exposed and there would have been brought to the notice of the people of this country, as I say, election crimes such as had never been heard of before. Further, there was this reason why the Liberal party, the government, were anxious to avoid an investigation of these crimes: they were maintained in power at the time—so narrow was the division—by just such votes as Cross could give. No one can tell me that after this had occurred the Prime Minister did not know every candidate in the Dominion of Canada who was carrying his banner. And after all this had occurred the man who was put forward by the Liberal party as worthy of the suffrages of the people of Canada was the same man Cross.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps I may tell my hon. friend that the Liberal party did not countenance Mr. Cross as its candidate at the last election.

Mr. McGIBBON: They never repudiated him.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The Prime Minister's answer is a ready one.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I myself wrote to Mr. Cross to tell him that we would not countenance him.

Mr. RYCKMAN: We may put a question on the order paper, asking for the production of the letter. But there is no doubt that if he had been elected he would have come here and the Prime Minister would have taken the avails of his election as a good Liberal.

What amuses me is the excuses offered by the Department of Justice through its two representatives for not proceeding with this matter. Let me deal with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) first. The excuse he gives to this house is this: We did all that the law required us to do. That is the expression, verbatim, that he used. I say that in a matter of this kind he has a right to assert the inherent authority which he has of protecting the fountain of justice and the honour and dignity of this parliament and of the members thereof. But he did not do so. The excuse of the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon), is more naive; he says that the administration of justice is with the provinces. There is no legal infant who does not know that. But what we do know is that action in any matter that relates to justice in this Dominion has its inspiration and its control in the Minister of Justice of Canada. There is no question about that. He cannot tell me that there ever was a case of a major offence where the Dominion asked for action on the part of a province when the province did not act. There is no case that he can cite where a crime has been committed and the Dominion has asked for action and the province has failed to act. The provinces so understand; it is the unwritten law. It is as though the Solicitor General wanted an errand boy to do a message: he sends for the errand boy; he does not do the errand himself, but the boy does it. How ridiculous, therefore, it is for the Solicitor General to come here and say—and this is his argument—that because the administration is with the provinces the Dominion is functus in this matter, that it had nothing to do and could not even put in a request to prosecute, so that, as he puts it, the government did all that was required by law. The Minister of Justice is not required by law to remit any penalty. A man is in penitentiary, and the grace of the crown, represented by the Minister of Justice, is extended in the matter. It is therefore a thing unheard in this country, until announced in this house to-day, that the Minister of Justice cannot get action on the part of the administration in any of the provinces in connection with any criminal matter.

Just a word in conclusion. I am glad this committee is going to meet and I hope it will make a thorough investigation of this matter. They must not allow a red herring to be drawn across the trail by the statement from the other side of the house that there is some new limitation pronounced against prosecutions for forgery in this country; there is not. If this committee finds that forgery has been committed, that a criminal conspiracy has been set up or that perjury has been committed, it is open to the committee to vindicate the justice of this land and to require that the offenders be prosecuted unless there is a certificate of immunity. One must admit that exception, but even that does not go all the way. In that case the matter would be decided by the court, but no one can tell me that where such widespread crime and fraud has been committed by men of the Liberal party in an endeavour to win an election and a supporter for the present Prime Minister, it will not be found that all through the piece the criminal law of this country has been broken, and I say the offenders should be punished. I hope that out of this investigation by the committee there will come an improvement in the law, and above all an assertion by this parliament that no one can commit a crime against the sacredness of the vote without being called speedily to justice. If anyone dares oppose this resolution now I think he should rise and attempt to give his reasons, because the people of Canada are not going to allow the value which we place on the honest vote of the honest citizen to be traduced or destroyed by men such as Baldy Robb and Cross.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (Toronto West Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to speculate on what would be said on the other side of the house if Baldy Robb had been operating as an official of this party. I think there would be a somewhat different attitude over there, because there is scarcely a parallel in the political history of Canada to what took place in the constituency of Athabaska. I thought, however, I could make a little contribution which would be of interest on this question by relating some of my own experiences in an election under the direction of the present government.

It will be remembered that in 1925 the election machinery was in the hands of this government. I do not represent a bush constituency; my riding is about one mile square and contains from 65,000 to 70,000 people. One would think that under the scrutiny of so many people, with 600,000 more surrounding them, we would get an honest election.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. gentleman that the motion before the house is to refer a report by Mr. Justice Clarke, who was appointed to inquire into the alleged existence of corrupt or illegal practices in the electorial district of Athabaska, to the committee on privileges and elections. I hope the remarks which the hon. gentleman intends to make are relevant to the subject matter.

Mr. HOCKEN: I submit to your judgment, Mr. Speaker, but you allowed the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George to describe at some length the conditions existing in his own riding and his own city.

Mr. CAHILL: That was all out of order also.

Mr. HOCKEN: I was going to speak about the conditions in my own riding during the same election, and to point out that what occurred in Athabaska was not an isolated case.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): All the more reason for an investigation.

Mr. HOCKEN: Exactly. For my opponent in that election I had a man who stated that on his advice the limits of the riding were changed. He said, "I have cut the riding to my liking; I have appointed all the officials, and if I cannot win this election now I never can." I want to show the house how he used the election machinery at that time to secure his ambition.

Mr. DUNNING: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: So far the hon. gentleman is not out of order.

Mr. HOCKEN: This is what I observed: This man protested 6,400 names on the voters lists in that one riding. His method of procedure was to send canvassers around in the month of August, when many people were on their holidays; he had a force of about fifty canvassers, who would go to a house and knock on the door. If their knock was not answered the people living in that house were struck off the list as having moved away. The reports of those canvassers were taken to his headquarters and four people swore to the affidavits striking off these 6,400 names. By no possibility could those four people know anything about it of their own knowledge. I proceeded against two or three of them; I took them into the police court on the charge of perjury, but they escaped conviction on the ground that they were swearing to the best of their knowledge and belief. They had no knowledge or belief, and they made no attempt to get the facts themselves. They simply took the word of the canvassers and swore to statements made by these men.

Mr. DUNNING: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member now speaking is in order, will it not be in order also for other hon. members to relate what occurred under the War Time Elections Act, for instance? Are we to have a wholesale discussion on election matters on this motion to refer a certain report to a committee?

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion is that a report on corrupt practices and illegal acts which took place in one constituency be referred to the committee on privileges and elections. Some hon. gentlemen speaking to the motion stated what their experiences had been in their own constituencies, and endeavoured to establish that the practices complained of were not confined to Athabaska but extended to other counties, in order to strengthen the views that they were expressing. This is another instance of that, and I cannot see that the hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. HOCKEN: Well, I will proceed with the story.

Mr. SPEAKER: I suppose the hon. gentleman will come around to Athabaska.

Mr. HOCKEN: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Now the result of my opponent's actions, as I said, was to strike off 6,400 names, a fact which I did not discover until the completion of the registration. Of course I immediately endeavoured to get those names back on the list I will assume that about 2,000 of those names were properly stricken off; people had moved probably to that extent. But I was denied 4,500 votes by the tactics of my opponent. Now the expense of getting those 2,000 names, and the physical effort it called for on my part and that of my supporters, was something I never want to experience again, although it was confined to narrow geographical limits. The only redress I had, sir, was publicity. I sent my agents around the riding to examine the homes where the people whose names had been struck off lived, and I was able to discover hundreds in the course of a few days. I made it my business then to write the facts for the newspapers of our city, and proved to the people of that riding that very discreditable tactics were being employed against me. The result was a happy one for me, for notwithstanding that my opponent was a Jew, and that there are 25,000 Jews in the riding, I succeeded in getting a majority of 3,000. I may say for my Jewish constituents that they are, perhaps, the most difficult class of people to round up under a boss that I have ever discovered. They are individualists, they think for themselves; and usually, Mr. Speaker, they think right because the majority of them voted for me. I submit, however, that the tactics that were employed, and which were supported by party funds, constitute a great miscarriage of proper procedure in an election in this country.

Now as for the Athabaska election, the proceedings employed there were easier than they would be in a big city. These men went into the bush. They were not watched by the police, they could not be watched by the opposing candidate, and they had everything pretty much their own way. But the fact that the same tactics were employed in the most populous districts of the country, and in a riding which is a mile square with scarcely a vacant lot in its whole area, would indicate that the electoral methods employed by the opposite party are in need of very great and very close scrutiny. That is all the contribution I want to make. I simple desire to point out that somewhat similar tactics to those employed in Athabaska were employed even in the cities.

Mr. CAHILL: You were lucky to be able to get away with it, under the rules.

Mr. SPEAKER: The point upon which I ruled a moment ago is very clear. Bourinot employs almost the same language. At page 340 I find the following with respect to the relevancy of speeches:

> The freedom of debate requires that every member should have full liberty to state, for the information of the house, whatever he honestly thinks may aid it in forming a judgment upon any question under its consideration. But it is nevertheless the duty of the Speaker of the House (or chairman of committee), to interfere when he finds that the member's remarks are not relevant to the question before the house. On such occasions, he may very properly suppose "that the member will bring his observations to bear upon the motion before the house"; or "that he will conclude with something that will bring him within order".

Further, Bourinot says:

> The precise relevancy of an argument is not always perceptible.

In the present instance it was to be seen that the hon. member's remarks were not quite relevant, and I told him to come to the question of the Athabaska election, which he did.

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): I endeavoured to get the permission of the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon), when he was addressing the house, to ask him a question. The minister is usually extremely courteous, but possibly to-day he was a little bit excited, for which no doubt there was good reason. The question I wished to ask him was this: How would he differentiate between the cases under discussion and the fruit combine cases in 1925? I remember very well in that year, when the Hon. Mr. Murdock was Minister of Labour, a report was tabled from a Mr. Duncan, who had been appointed a commissioner to investigate certain alleged combines in connection with the fruit business. The same difficulty then arose that we hear of to-day, namely, that although Mr. Duncan in his report had found that certain crimes had been committed and recommended prosecutions, no prosecutions had taken place. The then Minister of Labour argued that those prosecutions should be brought by the provincial authorities, and that the Dominion government had nothing to do with the matter. The question was discussed many times, and from our side of the house we urged upon Mr. Murdock that he was entirely wrong and that it was incumbent upon the government to take some action in view of the Duncan report. Later on, due to the agitation from this side of the house and from the public generally, something was done. I have looked up in Hansard certain references to the matter. I am not going to quote them all because there are a great many, but on page 3230 of Hansard of 1925 I find the following:

> Alleged Fruit Combine
> On the orders of the day:
> Mr. L. J. Ladner (Vancouver South): There has appeared in the Vancouver Daily Province a headline article announcing that the government has determined to start prosecutions under the Lewis Duncan report against the alleged fruit combine. There has been no announcement in the house that I know of and I would ask the government whether there is any official authority for the statement.
> Hon. Ernest Lapointe (Minister of Justice): I am sorry the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) is not here; he is dealing with the matter. I may inform my hon. friend however that counsel has been instructed to institute proceedings.
> Mr. Ladner: Is the prosecution co-operating with the provincial governments, or is it entirely on the part of the federal authorities?
> Mr. Lapointe: Counsel is instructed to communicate with the various attorneys general interested in the matter, but I do not know whether they will take part in the proceedings independently or not.

Prosecutions were instituted; I think they were carried on by counsel appointed by the Dominion government, and some very large fines were imposed and I believe collected. It seems to me that we are faced with the same situation to-day. The Dominion government says: No; we do not have to do anything about this report; that is for the provincial authorities. The Solicitor General contended that there should be an indictment by the attorney general. The Solicitor General must know that not one out of every thousand criminal prosecutions in Canada is issued by the attorney general or on his instructions. In the first place an information is laid and the matter is investigated before a magistrate. If the accused is committed for trial an indictment is preferred by the attorney general and the attorney general carries on the prosecution.

Surely in this case the Dominion government does not have to wait until the attorney general does something. The Dominion government has police stationed all over this country. Prosecutions are taking place every day for breaches of the Revenue Act, the Narcotic Drugs Act and other matters, for instance, escapes from penitentiaries. It will always be found that such proceedings are initiated in the first place by Dominion authorities and in some cases that I know of counsel for the Dominion has appeared with counsel for the province in the conduct of the trials. In this particular case the Minister of Justice says: Oh, but many of these men and women received certificates of indemnity and they cannot be prosecuted. One case that was brought to the attention of the house is that of a certain woman who had committed forgery. The Minister of Justice would suggest that in a case like that a certificate of indemnity would protect her from being prosecuted for forgery. He might as well argue that a person who committed murder during the election, if he afterwards appeared and gave evidence on an investigation, could not be prosecuted for murder. The thing is absurd. Forgery is a crime under the criminal code; it does not come under the category set out in section 27 of the Corrupt Practices Inquiries Act. That section refers to corrupt and illegal practices and that is quite a different matter from the offence of forgery. It is most extraordinary that in a matter concerning a Dominion election where a report was brought down showing that forgery was committed, no prosecution was had and the Minister of Justice could say: Well, we wash our hands of the whole matter; we have brought this report to the attention of the provincial authorities; we are finished with it, and I do not know whether or not anything was done about the prosecution of this woman for the crime of forgery. It would be an outrageous condition of affairs if that were so, and I would remind the Minister of Justice that that is not at all his policy in connection with other matters.

Mr. LESLIE G. BELL (St. Antoine): Mr. Speaker, the only excuse that I can make for rising to speak to the motion before the house is that, being one of the younger members of parliament, one who has suffered through some of the irregularities committed under the present Dominion Elections Act, having been forced to go to the Supreme Court of Canada to defend my election in the last contest, and also as having the honour of representing one of the oldest divisions in Canada, namely, Montreal West, when certain questions are brought to the attention of the house regarding irregularities in the Athabaska election and when those irregularities cover the question of fictitious names on lists, dead men voting and other practices which are very common in the province of Quebec, I feel that I can add a few words to the question under discussion. In doing so I assume no "holier than thou" attitude. Although my last election was protested, I will give due credit to the members who occupy the front line benches opposite that this was through no action on their part.

But there exist under the present Dominion Elections Act certain practices in regard to which they are quite as well aware as other hon. members that, if we are to have honest elections in this country, some radical changes must be made. I refer particularly to the common practice in Quebec to-day of impersonation. In my last election I endeavoured to take every precaution by police protection and otherwise so that honest electors would be able to signify the way in which they wished to vote, but I found that the obstacles we had to face in my particular constituency were such as to call for immediate remedy. When the question under discussion is referred to the committee on privileges and elections, it should be dealt with immediately; a report should be brought down to the house and amendments should be made to the act. Certainly the practice which exists is not confined to the constituency of Athabaska. I have every reason to believe that my hon. friends opposite are as sincere in this matter as those who sit on this side of the house; but why is it that when a general election takes place we should have gangs of men going around, paid through some mysterious agency, so that an election in the city of Montreal costs thousands of dollars simply on account of our trying to protect ourselves against crooks—because that is the only name that can be applied to them —and to give honest electors an opportunity to register an honest vote. If the ballot is supposed to be what we consider it is, namely, an honest expression of the views of the people regarding the return of an honest government, the Dominion Elections Act must be radically amended.

When an election is called, what do we experience? The practice has been that on the day of the election certain gangs line up and they telegraph—that is the common expression used in my particular division—from one division to another. They take one particular division in the morning; in the afternoon they come over and raid another. We employ police protection to keep those men away from the polls, but how often do we succeed? That is one of the reasons why I bring this to the attention of the house; I should be remiss in my duty if I did not do so. I know it may be offered as an excuse that, though the law is there, it cannot be enforced. I disagree with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) when he says that this is a matter that concerns the provincial authorities. He knows as well as I do that when men are arrested for impersonation at election time, in some unaccountable way they get an order from the judge and they are released almost as soon as they are put in. It is this class of men that we have to deal with, and surely we can find some way of seeing that men arrested for these nefarious practices shall be shut up for election day at least. Surely we can find some way of stopping this gang warfare against the honest voters of this Dominion. I am sure the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is deeply interested in this matter, and wishes the people of Canada to retain their confidence in our election system. He must realize that as our cities grow and population increases, unless we put a stop to these illegal practices, it will mean that whenever an election is held the party with the most money will get their candidate elected. Surely we can find some remedy for the conditions that have been pointed out to the house by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland). I am glad that he has brought this question before the house, because something must be done to remedy present conditions, so that we may know, when we are elected to parliament, that we are elected by the honest votes of the citizens of Canada.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I did not intend to take any part in this debate, but as my hon. friend from St. Antoine (Mr. Bell) has made a reference in the nature of a special appeal to myself, possibly I ought to give the house certain facts relevant to the Elections Act which may help to disclose the matter in its true bearing.

My hon. friend has referred to the last general election. He will recall that the last election was conducted by hon. gentlemen opposite, by his own party, and that they were acting under the Elections Act which they themselves placed upon the statutes. The Elections Act as it is in Canada to-day is the act which was brought into this house by hon. gentlemen opposite, I think, in 1920.

Mr. McGIBBON: Was not that act first submitted to the approval of the hon. gentleman?

[Mr. L. G. Bell.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not that I am aware of, no. There was a committee of the house which considered the act, but it was a government of which the hon. gentleman was a supporter that introduced that act into parliament; and it was passed while they were in office. My hon. friend says that the act needs amendment. I agree with him in that. The act of 1920 made certain provisions which it was hoped would have the effect of remedying some of the abuses that had prevailed at election time; among other features that I recall was a clause that made the returning officers more or less permanent in their positions. But when hon. gentlemen opposite came in for the short time they were in office, a few months, they removed practically every officer and put friends of their own into those positions. So it was under their own act, administered by returning officers whom they themselves appointed, and in an election which they themselves were conducting, that the alleged deficiencies of the act were exposed.

Mr. BELL (St. Antoine): I would say that the same charges that I make would refer with equal force to the previous general election. I am not trying to imply that the government is any more responsible for these practices than is our party.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend is quite fair in his statement. I agree with the point he has put forward, namely that the Elections Act is capable of distinct improvement, and I may say that it is the intention of the government, at the next session of parliament, to propose improvements in the nature of amendments to the Elections Act. I hope that my hon. friend's objections will be among the number that will then be considered. All I wish to make plain now are the circumstances under which these difficulties that have been mentioned have arisen. Anyone coming into the house during the course of this debate would have imagined as he listened that all the saints were on the other side of the house and that all the sinners were on this side.

Mr. MANION: Was not the Athabaska election, which was really the point of discussion this afternoon, held in 1925, when my hon. friend was in power?

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is too clever. Everybody knows that.

Mr. MANION: The Prime Minister implied differently.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Like the Prime Minister, I had not intended to say anything in regard to the subject under discussion, but as it is evidently the intention of the house to occupy the greater part of this sitting in discussing this resolution, perhaps I may add a little to the information which hsa already been given to the house by the various speakers.

It is true that this is only the seventh session of parliament that it has been my privilege to attend, but during those sessions I must say that I have been generally filled with admiration for the ability of the present Solicitor General, (Mr. Cannon) to take care of himself in debate. I am sure that other members who have been in the house for the time I have must have been enlivened this afternoon at the unsuccessful attempt of the Solicitor General to extricate himself from the dilemma in which he found himself, due to his unfortunate remark in regard to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). The task was too great even for the adroit Solicitor General. It was as transparent as the smoke screen which he undertook to throw around the inaction of the government in dealing with the matters referred to in this house in connection with the resolution of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland).

I was somewhat surprised that hon. members who have advanced information in regard to what happened in the constituency of Athabaska, Peace River, Montreal and other constituencies, should speak as if that were something new in the history of elections in this country. I can remember as far back as twenty-three years ago when the first federal election was held at which a member was elected to this house from the constituency of Yukon. Up in that territory we had a great conglomerate population. No party lines had been drawn. It was the first occasion on which we had been permitted to send a member here. Feeling ran high. The government was popular in some quarters, and unpopular in others. It was never anticipated that violations of the act such as have been described here this afternoon as happening in the Athabaska constituency would appear in the Yukon in those days, and no particular precautions were taken to guard the polls or to safeguard the interest of the opposition. What happened? From a situation which seemed hopeless from the government standpoint, the government candidate was elected with hundreds of a majority to spare. How was it done? By the most unblushing stuffing of ballot boxes. At polls where there were not thirty people entitled to vote, ballot boxes were opened showing two hundred ballots marked for the government candidate, and in some of these boxes there was not even to be found a voters' list. The voters' lists were made up of fictitious names to tally with the number of marked ballots found in the boxes after they arrived in the town of Dawson. At one poll where there were not over forty residents entitled to vote a special train was run in from the Alaskan town of Skagway, filled with longshoremen and gamblers, men who had no right to vote in Canada, and they were voted and revoted until hundreds of ballots had been polled for the government candidate. That was our first experience of a Dominion election in the constituency of Yukon in 1902.

Two years went by and the general election of 1904 came on. Under the Elections Act of that day there was no provision whereby the enumerators who prepared the voters' lists were obliged to give to anyone but the deputy returning officers copies of the lists. So it was impossible for an elector to know until he went into the polling station on election day whether or not his name was on the list of voters. If it was not there he was out of luck; he had to leave without voting. These enumerators were undertaking to exercise their legal right in witholding copies of the lists, but having in mind their experience of two years before, the electors were not in a mood to leave anything to chance. So they formed committees and waited on those enumerators. Law or no law, they demanded copies of the lists, and in several instances those enumerators were induced, by proper persuasion, to produce certified copies. What happened then in the case of the great majority of enumerators?

Mr. LETELLIER: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I submit the hon. gentleman is not speaking to the motion before the house. Everyone of us on this side could say a lot about what happened in our constituencies on previous elections.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go to it.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): The balance of those enumerators, in view of what had happened to their fellows, ran for protection to the barracks of the Northwest Mounted Police at Dawson, seeking protection, as they said, from violence. The only violence that was sought to be done to them was to demand that they should give the opposition copies of the voters' lists. The officer commanding the Northwest Mounted Police, being entirely impartial and desiring only to keep the peace, was in an awkward predicament. A committee consisting of about one hundred citizens of Dawson waited on him. The committee was composed of men of both shades of politics, Liberal and Conservative, and from all walks of life, clergymen, professional men, labourers, artisans and miners. They made it quite clear to the commanding officer that they required copies of these voters' lists the election being only two days away, and they made it manifest to him that they were going to have these copies. I remember very well—

Mr. SPEAKER: I hope that the hon. member will bring his argument to bear on the motion before the house. It has reference to the Athabaska election.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I hope so, Mr. Speaker. I am stating those occurrences simply to show how necessary it has been, and is now, that the government give serious attention to the amendment and improvement of the Elections Act. I say I remember very well the words of an eminent Presbyterian divine who was a member of the committee that waited on the officer commanding the mounted police. He explained that he was not there threatening violence, that he was a man of peace, but he pointed out how necessary it was that the public should have copies of the voters' lists in view of what had occurred two years before, and he said:

> When I came into this country I did as most men, I brought with me a Winchester rifle, and I have it to-day hanging on the wall of my study. I have plenty of ammunition, and if it becomes necessary in order to get these voters' lists, I am prepared to take that rifle off the wall and use it.

The officer asked the committee to withdraw and to return later in lesser numbers. During their absence he communicated with the government candidate and made it known to him that in his opinion the lists should be produced otherwise he could not be responsible for the lives of certain people in that territory. The upshot was that the lists were produced. It was found that hundreds of opposition names had been deliberately struck off and there and then under the eyes of that committee they were put back on the lists.

To show you, sir, how far some people will go in violation of the election law, at that very same election a poll was established at a point on the Pelly river, some four hundred miles away from Dawson. Nobody lived there. It was made a polling division and a poll was supposed to be held there on election day. What was done? In anticipation of electing the government candidate, a deputy returning officer, a poll clerk and a messenger were sent off from Dawson City with ballot boxes and a supply of four hundred ballots. They went up the main trail, thence up the Pelly river for a couple of miles, and camped in a tent a few miles from the telegraph station. What were they to do? They were to wait there until election night, then come down to the telegraph station and find out how many ballots were needed to elect the government candidate; then they were to go back to their camp, make up their list, mark the necessary ballots, come into town with them, and the government candidate would be elected. But their plan did not come off. The people had been warned and two days before the election warrants were sworn out for those men charging them with conspiracy under the criminal code, and they were brought into town under arrest before they could mark their fraudulent ballots. In that way ballot box stuffing was prevented and the opposition candidate was elected. What happened then? Hon. members have expressed surprise that persons involved in the election scandal in Athabaska were not punished, but were allowed to remain in government positions. Well, in Yukon the government candidate himself, who was chiefly responsible for the scandals in those two elections, defeated in 1904, was immediately appointed by the then government to a position of responsibility and substantial remuneration as a reward for his services, as were others. Charges were laid against a large number of officials engaged in that election, and no less than fourteen were sent up for tial on charges of conspiracy. What happened to them? On orders from Ottawa the crown prosecutor nolle prosequi'd in each case and dropped the prosecution.

Though the law needs amendment yet, we do not have election scandals in Yukon any more. Why? Not because of the law, but because public opinion precludes their recurrence, and would-be crooked election officials know what would happen to them if they undertook to repeat their operations of 1902 and 1904. Public opinion is the best remedy for the situation which faces the Dominion to-day.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE

On motion of Mr. Hay the second and third reports of the select standing committee on banking and commerce were concurred in.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 157, for the relief of Sydney Franklin Lankin—Mr. Geary.

Bill No. 158, for the relief of William James Wall—Mr. Jelliff.

Bill No. 159, for the relief of George Rubin Sanderowich, otherwise known as Rubin Sanders—Mr. Geary.

QUESTIONS

REPRESENTATION OF PROVINCES—DECENNIAL READJUSTMENT

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland):

Will the government refer to the Supreme Court of Canada the question whether in making the decennial readjustment of the representation of each of the several provinces in this house, under the provisions of section 51, of the British North America Act, 1867, the population of the province of Quebec, which should be taken as the basis of such readjustment, is the population of the territorial area of said province as it existed on July 1st, 1867, or the population of the territorial area of said province as it may exist at the time at which such readjustment is made by the parliament of Canada?

Mr. LAPOINTE: In the opinion of the government no practical purpose would be served by such a reference.

MR. WILLIAM P. MANZEROLLE

Mr. HANSON:

1. Has William P. Manzerolle of Shippigan, New Brunswick, been dismissed from the position of subcollector of customs at Shippigan, New Brunswick?
2. If so, for what reason?
3. Were any charges laid against Mr. Manzerolle, and was any investigation held? If so, by whom?
4. Who asked for his dismissal?
5. Who has been apointed to his position, and who recommended his appointment?

Mr. EULER: This question was answered yesterday.

MILITIA PENSION ACT AMENDMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (for the Minister of National Defence) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

In regard to reservations from an officer's salary while in the public service of Canada; to the payment of a gratuity to a widow or children in case of death before pension may be granted; and to the payment of pensions to militiamen of His Majesty's army reserve who enlisted in the permanent force; and for additions to apply the Militia Pension Act to the Royal Canadian Navy and to that portion of the Royal Canadian Air Force comprising solely the permanent active air force of Canada.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

REPARATIONS COMMISSION REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): Is it the intention of the government to table the Friel report, and if so, when?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should prefer to have the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) answer the question. I think he wishes to make a brief statement to the house on the subject.

Mr. GEARY: Did I understand the Prime Minister to say that the Secretary of State would submit a detailed statement with regard to the claims of Canadians for reparations?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The question of reparations is many sided and there are some rather important considerations which have come before the government in connection with possible legislation which might be necessary at this session. I know the Secretary of State is anxious to proceed with the matter in a manner that will meet with the approval of the house. He does not wish to be unduly pressed; it is his intention to make a statement to the house of the present position and the intention of the government, but I should prefer to have that statement come from him rather than from myself.

CHICAGO DRAINAGE CANAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): May I ask the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) whether it is possible, before the adjournment for the Easter recess, to table the documents in respect of the diversion of water at Chicago?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): I was about to inform the house that we find it will not be possible to have the documents in shape for tabling before the recess. A day or two ago I thought it would be possible but I find that it cannot be done.

BRITISH COLUMBIA LANDS

LEGISLATION TO GIVE EFFECT TO REPORT OF MR. JUSTICE MARTIN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): I may answer an inquiry of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Tolmie), directed the other day to the government, with respect to the return of lands in British Columbia. It is the intention of the government to enter into negotiations with the British Columbia government during the recess, looking towards an agreement regarding the return of crown and railways lands to that province, and at the next session to submit that agreement for ratification if it can be consummated.

BRITISH IMMIGRANTS—MEDICAL EXAMINATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): In the absence of the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke), perhaps the Prime Minister will answer a question regarding the medical examination of British immigrants. In British despatches there is a good deal of criticism on this score. I am not asking this question by way of criticism but merely to bring the matter to the attention of the government. Is the government considering any change in this respect? If the Prime Minister is not ready to answer the question now, will he ask the Minister of Immigration to be ready to make a statement when the estimates of that department are under consideration?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am surprised to gather from my hon. friend's question that the special committee appointed by the house to look into immigration matters has not already taken up that question. My impression was that it was receiving attention. It certainly is one of the matters which the government wishes to have investigated by the committee, and if this has not already been done it will be.

Mr. MANION: I did not know it was being considered, otherwise I would not have asked the question.

HOME BANK DEPOSITORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): Has any decision been arrived at in regard to further relief to Home Bank depositors?

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The question is under consideration. If it is decided to give further relief, the fact will appear in the supplementary estimates when they are brought down.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EASTER ADJOURNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): In connection with the Easter adjournment it has been suggested that it might meet the convenience of members if to-morrow the house adjourned at six o'clock instead of sitting in the evening. It has been my experience that on the Friday evening before such an adjournment few members are present either in the city or in the house. Has the Prime Minister considered the question of adjourning at six o'clock?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): It will depend upon the progress we make between now and eleven o'clock to-night. There is some legislation we desire to complete before the Easter recess, particularly in relation to the budget. We are near the conclusion of it and if we can make reasonable progress the disposition of the government certainly will be to meet the convenience of hon. members.

THE GOVERNMENT'S LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): A few days ago the leader of the opposition inquired from the Prime Minister as to when the government would be able to announce the further legislation which they might expect to bring down this session. At that time I understood the Prime Minister to say that he would be able to make such an announcement in a few days, and as our leader is not very well and is not in the house to-day, I thought I would ask my right hon. friend when he would be able to make that announcement.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I first say to my hon. friend that personally, and speaking for this side of the house, I regret the reason of the absence of the hon. the leader of the opposition. I hope his present indisposition will speedily disappear.

In regard to the business of the session I am happy to tell my hon. friend that mention of all the legislation which the government intends to bring down this session now appears on the order paper or will appear in the votes and proceedings of to-day. I do not think it will be necessary to announce any other legislation. Of course I should like it understood that this does not apply to legislation arising out of reports of committees of this house; there will, for example, probably be some legislation arising out of the recommendations of the committee which is considering soldiers' pensions and from other committees. That is always understood. There may also be further supplementary estimates. I would not like to say that there may not arise some legislation which at present cannot be foreseen but the need for which may later on appear. Apart from these reservations I think hon. members will be able to find the remainder of the legislative program in its entirety in print in the morning.

MEDICAL TREATMENT FOR RETURNED SOLDIERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. S. F. TOLMIE (Victoria, B.C.): I wish to ask the government if they have received copies of a resolution passed unanimously at the last session of the legislature of British Columbia asking that free medical treatment, medicine and hospitalization be provided by the government for all returned soldiers who are in need of the same, and if any action is being taken thereon.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am sorry I am unable to answer at the moment my hon. friend's question, but I will direct it to the attention of the Minister of Health (Mr. King), and doubtless he will give my hon. friend an answer after the Easter recess.

HOLLINGER MINE DISASTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the thirty-nine men killed in the Hollinger mine disaster, the jury found that the fire was due to gross negligence on the part of the Hollinger management and the operating executive. I should like to ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) whether he would consider amending the criminal code in order that its provisions and penalties might more adequately cover this class of crime.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think this question is of too serious a character to be answered immediately. This could serve as a notice, and the Minister of Justice might answer it to-morrow.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I have no objection to saying that the suggestion of my hon. friend will be considered.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

RATIFICATION OF ARRANGEMENT WITH HOLDERS OF CANADIAN NORTHERN DEBENTURE STOCK

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the second reading of Bill No. 153, respecting the Canadian National Railways and respecting the Canadian Northern Railway Company five per cent income charge convertible debenture stock.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee, thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Sections 1 to 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Lost or destroyed certificates.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: What happens in this instance if the certificates do not come in within the year?

Mr. DUNNING: The usual provision with regard to furnishing indemnity for a lost certificate is included between lines 30 and 35 of the section.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: But if some of the certificates do not come in I see it is provided that the money deposited with the trustee shall be paid to the issuing company. That is the Canadian National Railways, I take it?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Are the rights of these people lost then, or can they obtain redress and have the matter straightened up afterwards?

Mr. DUNNING: The trustees are discharged, and of course the claim of the holders would be against the issuing company. This is the usual provision in England and is quite satisfactory to the holders of the bonds.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is this bill satisfactory to the holders of the bonds?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, they have accepted it.

Section agreed to.

Sections 7 to 9 agreed to

On section 10—Limit to the amount of the new securities.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: This amount to be raised is 94 per cent of the present face value of the old securities?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Section 11 agreed to.

On section 12—Proceeds of new securities to be deposited to credit of Minister of Finance in trust; accounts to be closed after three months.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the Minister of Railways explain why only three months is allowed?

Mr. DUNNING: The point involved there with respect to the moneys which may not be taken up by the holders of the shares within three months after the arrangement is completed and authorized. In other sections of the act provision is made for the discharge of the trustees, and claims of the holders from that time forward, of course, would be against the issuing company and not against the trustees.

Mr. CAHAN: That is understood, is it?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, that is understood.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I notice in another clause the trustees are discharged on the expiration of a year. In this instance the money is to be paid to the issuing company at the end of three months.

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry that I made a mistake in answering my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George. These bonds are of Canadian registry and also of British registry. We have only in each case an approximate idea of the amount required at each place where, according to the terms of the bonds, this payment may be made. This provision is merely in order to enable that to be adjusted. There is a limitation under the previous section on the amount of money which may be raised. This section, I may say, is quite satisfactory, as the whole settlement is, to the holders of the bonds.

Section agreed to.

Section 13 agreed to.

On section 14—Agreements for purchase, lease or amalgamation.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: What is the object of this clause?

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. DUNNING: It has been the objective of both the management and the government to reduce the number of companies comprised within the Canadian National system as fast as it may be practicable to do so. I do not know if it is generally known, but the Canadian National railway system comprises at the present time between ninety and one hundred companies; and whenever we are dealing with an issue of securities which has a relationship to one of the companies comprised in that system, the legal officers make a practice of examining the relationship of that company to the whole system and making the necessary legal provision to enable such forward steps as may be practicable to be taken or bring about amalgamation as time goes on.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I can quite understand that object, it seems to be quite a proper thing to do. But surely that is covered by the general act. I doubt the wisdom of inserting a clause like this in a bill of this kind for the specific purpose of arranging with the holders of these particular securities. This last clause does not seem to have anything to do with the remainder of the bill. Have the Canadian National Railways not got the power now to do this very thing? Is there no general act which gives them the power? Does not the Canadian National Railway Act give it to them?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, but the relationship to this particular trust deed is a legal one. There is an amalgamation arrangement contemplated by the trust deed in connection with this particular issue of securities for this particular company. That is why, I am advised, the legal officers thought it as well to insert here the clause of which my hon. friend has spoken and which, as he says, gives a power similar to that which the company has under the general act. The section starts with the words which relate to this particular issue of bonds:

> After payment is made to the trustees under the provisions of clause 5 of the scheme of arrangement, the National Company, the Northern Company—

And so on. The reason is that this particular trust deed which will be eliminated by this arrangement does contain provision for the amalgamation of the companies which comprise the Canadian Northern system into one company. I am sorry that I cannot elucidate the legal point any better than that.

Mr. CAHAN: It is not intended under this clause to effect any general consolidation of these lines?

Mr. DUNNING: Not any more than is provided elsewhere.

Mr. CAHAN: It is intended to keep them segregated as they were previously segregated before this financial transaction was carried through?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: That is satisfactory to me.

On the schedule.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I should like to ask in what way the holders of this stock gave their assent to this legislation.

Mr. DUNNING: I have here, Mr. Chairman, a copy of the proceedings at a meeting of the holders of the bonds held in London on the 15th day of November last under the chairmanship of Sir Gilbert Garnsey, chairman of the stockholders' committee: There is complete record of the transactions of that meeting, and resolutions were passed specifically approving of the scheme of arrangement. I may say that we have been scrupulously careful—I am speaking now for the railway company rather than for the Department of Finance; this is of course a Department of Finance matter—but so far as the railway company is concerned, we have been scrupulously careful to keep the London committee of the bondholders advised of every step that has been taken, including the contents of this bill, because we have thought it was wholly desirable that no misunderstanding should arise which would tend to impair the credit of Canada in the old land.

Mr. CAHAN: I presume that the scheme of arrangement which is being carried out is by virtue of the provisions contained in the original trust deed under which the stock was issued.

Mr. DUNNING: I would not say that.

Mr. CAHAN: Well then, in the proceedings at London did an authorized majority confirm these proceedings?—I will put it in that way.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, I will give the exact proportion in a moment, but it was in excess of the necessary proportion, I can assure my hon. friend friend of that.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Section 3 says the arrangement was passed unanimously at that meeting.

Mr. DUNNING: It was passed unanimously at the meeting. Let me quote from the proceedings of the meeting of stockholders:

Under the terms of the deed, holders of a clear majority in value of the stock for the time being outstanding must be present, in person or by proxy, in order to form a quorum at this meeting for the passing of the necessary resolutions. I am pleased to announce that the resolutions have met with the approval of the stockholders, as proxies representing a total of over £4,000,000 of stock, or over 80 per cent of the total stock outstanding, have been received in London and Montreal in support of the resolutions. In addition I have to report that a proxy for £22,000 has been received appointing a proxy other than those appointed in the forms of proxy issued by the Canadian Northern Railway Company. All these proxies are laid on the table.

My information was that between 80 and 90 per cent approved.

Mr. CAHAN: I think it is clear then that in accordance with the terms of the trust deed under which this debenture stock was issued the assent of the required majority was given to this financial arrangement?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: And I presume that the attorneys of the national railways have carefully inspected those proceedings and approved of them?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: On its face it shows that the course of procedure was regular.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Schedule agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of Bill No. 156, to amend the Income War Tax Act.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: May I say, Mr. Speaker, before you put the motion, that the next thing I think we ought to do is to take steps to reduce the temperature of this chamber? The place is too warm.

Mr. SPEAKER: I will ask the Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms to take note of that. The hon. member expresses, I think the general feeling of the members, because for days the same condition has prevailed. I will see that proper instructions are given in the matter.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I desire to take a few minutes of the time of the house in order to make a statement in regard to the second reading of this bill. The members in this corner of the house believe in the principle of income taxation and we feel that at the present time the government is going a little too far in reducing the personal income tax to the extent that is proposed in this bill. In 1926, some three years ago, there was a general reduction in the income tax; the schedule was materially reduced all round and certain further exemptions were given. Last year another reduction was made and additional exemption granted. This year it is proposed still further to reduce the income tax and also to allow further exemptions. We in this corner of the house, remembering the fact that this is a war tax act and that the different war tax acts now in existence do not produce enough revenue to take care of the expenses incidental to the war, are of opinion that the government is going, as I stated before, a little too fast in the matter. We believe the government could well give consideration to reductions in taxation in other forms which would enure to the benefit of the consumer generally. The organized farmers of Canada believe in the income tax as a fair measure of taxation. I should like to read to the house a resolution passed by the Canadian Council of Agriculture at their session of April 4, 5 and 6 of last year, dealing with the income tax. The resolution reads:

> Resolved that this council recognizing the continuing need for the maintenance of strict economy in public expenditure and for reduction in the national debt, with its heavy burden of interest, urges the Dominion government to do everything possible to serve these ends, and
> Be it further resolved that reductions in taxation, as they become possible, should take place by the reduction and removal of protective duties on imports in preference to the reduction of other indirect taxes but that the income tax ought to be maintained as one of the chief sources of public revenue. The council is of opinion that the reductions successively made in the income tax and the increase in exemptions have tended seriously to impair its equity and productivity whereas it ought to be rendered both more equitable in its incidence and more general in its application by progressive improvements in the assessment and collection of the tax. The council suggests that inquiry into the methods and machinery of income taxation in Canada and elsewhere should be conducted by the Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation with a view to the adoption of such improvements.

So far as I am aware the question of taxation has not been referred to the Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation, but I wish to state in a few words the position we are going to take on this bill. It is quite possible that the government may propose some amendments when the bill gets into committee. If those amendments are acceptable to us, we shall be delighted. If they are not acceptable to us, we desire to inform the house that while it is usual to accept the principle of a bill on the second reading, we wish to reserve our right to see what further proposals the government may make, and if they make no further proposals, then we intend to vote against the bill on the third reading.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Corporations and joint stock companies. Rate reduced.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I want to take this opportunity of saying a few words again about the present system of taxing incomes of corporations, making the corporation pay a tax and then making the individual receiving dividends from the same corporation pay another tax. I am not referring to the super taxes; I am referring only to the normal taxes. We had this question up for discussion last year, but we could not make any impression on the minister. As a matter of fact, my own idea is that the present system is very bad for business in this country, because if a man makes an investment in a business corporation he knows that not only will the profits of the company be taxed, but that afterwards any dividends he may receive from the company will also be taxed. The argument has been made that an investor receiving an income from one of the large prosperous corporations like the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, for instance, ought to pay income tax on his dividends even though the railroad company has already paid a tax on its profits. But consider how it works out in the case of a new company. We will say that a number of people are considering getting together and putting up their money for the purpose of starting a new business. They are met at once with this difficulty, that if the business is not a success they lose their money; if it is a success, then the joint stock company, under section two of this bill, will be called upon to pay income tax upon its profits, and afterwards the individual stockholder will also have to pay income tax on the dividends he receives. Considering the application of this tax in connection with an old established company rather beclouds the issue, but I want to submit that double taxation is a vicious principle, and it can never be defended. It prevents many people from going into new enterprises, because if the enterprise is not a success they lose their money, and if it is a success the government steps in and taxes them twice, once on the profits of the company and again on the dividends the stockholders receive. It is too late, I suppose, to have any change made this year, but I want to reiterate what I said last year, that I am sure it is a bad principle. All I suggest is that the individual holder of company stocks should be exempt from the normal tax on the dividends he receives from companies which themselves are paying a tax on their profits.

Mr. CAHAN: In the United States I understand that there is no double taxation of this kind. There, I am instructed, the business tax is charged. It is somewhat higher than in this country, but the individual stockholder is not charged income tax a second time upon the revenues of the company. That, I understand, is correct, is it not? That being the case, I think it is wise, as the hon. member for Argenteuil has pointed out, that we should carefully consider whether we are not in that respect doing an injustice to the Canadian stockholder. It means that in many cases the foreign resident can invest in and control Canadian enterprises simply because he is not paying in Canada a second tax upon the income of that Canadian corporation which is exacted from the Canadian resident who is also a stockholder in the company. Foreign residents are obtaining control of a large proportion of the natural resources of this country. When the democratic party in the United States had their last convention they passed a resolution, a copy of which I have in my office, urging that as a national policy the financial men of the United States should obtain control in the neighbouring foreign countries of all those sources of supply of natural products which are necessary to the promotion of industry in the United States. The United States Department of Commerce, through its present very able secretary, Mr. Hoover, has time and time again urged upon the financial interests of that country that they should go out into the world, and particularly into Canada and Mexico, and obtain control of the sources of supply of those natural products which are necessarily imported into the United States for the promotion of American industry. They have done so in this country to a very large extent. At the present time the Americans control the great bulk of our asbestos production, in which, except for South Africa, we have practically a monopoly. They have control of our nickel production. They have control of the chief industries on this Ottawa river. They control the pulp and paper industry, and they control what is one of the great natural products of this country, hydro electric power along the river. They are acquiring control of hydro electric powers in other sections of Canada, and they are using the control they exercise over companies in Canada for the purpose of preventing the carrying of the raw products of Canada through the various processes of manufacture in Canada, inasmuch as they control those raw products from their sources. They export them to the United States and use them there in the manufacture of goods which they send back into Canada for consumption. It is not a question of a protective tariff. I do not know just how we could meet it by an export tax without retaliation from the United States, but we should not encourage that process by taxing the Canadian stockholder in such industries twice while the American, who is carrying our raw products across the border to supply American industry, is free from double taxation in Canada. If the government will obtain the statistics which are available to them of the gradually increasing control which the Americans are obtaining of our raw products for manufacture, they will see that some advantage should be given by reducing the double tax on Canadians, which will induce the Canadian investor to invest more of his money in the stock of Canadian companies which are producing the raw materials in Canada. I do not know whether I have made myself clear, but the matter is really a serious one.

I know that some hon. gentlemen smile when I refer to some eight or nine years experience in Mexico, but the control by American financiers of the sources of raw material in Mexico has resulted in Mexico becoming a source of supply for other countries, and nearly the whole population of Mexico, dealing with the people generally, are simply receiving ordinary labourers' wages, while the people of other countries are enriched by converting those raw materials into manufactured articles. And that is going on in Canada, Mr. Chairman. I do not wish to deal with it now, perhaps next session I may do so, but I regard it as a matter most prejudicial to the interests of this country, and one that must be considered and met. Our financial men are buying back from foreign countries Canadian bonds which we might well sell abroad, and they are taking their money out of Canadian companies because of the double taxation which we exact from Canadian stockholders.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Perhaps the Minister of National Revenue will give us his idea on the subject, he having had a lot to do with the collection of this taxation.

Mr. EULER: I appreciate very fully the arguments advanced by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan). But I should like to make a correction. He is not entirely right with regard to the exemption of the American shareholder from double taxation. I am informed that in the case of incomes of $5,000 and over the dividends of the American shareholder are taxable just the same as in Canada; in fact more so, because in Canada as a result of protests that were made against double taxation, we did establish what is known as the family corporation, which I think has given a good deal of relief.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That is correct.

Mr. EULER: On the other hand, the American corporation is taxed 13½ per cent against our 8 per cent.

Mr. CAHAN: I admit that.

Mr. EULER: Perhaps a change should be made later on, but I do not like to speak definitely in the absence of the Minister of Finance. However, so far as this taxation is concerned, it is not very much to the disadvantage of the Canadian taxpayer.

Mr. CAHAN: I admit that the corporation tax in the United States is slightly higher than ours.

Mr. EULER: Five and a half per cent higher.

Mr. CAHAN: There is a measure before congress now I believe to reduce it, but still it will be in excess of our own. But that is an inducement to the American company to reincorporate a branch in Canada. That is the advantage which induces them to do so. Then, having established their business as a Canadian corporation, the American shareholders of Canadian companies are placed in a much better position than the Canadian stockholders of similar companies. I do not wish to be dogmatic or assertive, but I regard this matter as one which must be considered in view of the fact that year by year the sources of supply of our mineral, pulp, and timber and other raw products are coming under American control. The Americans control the product from the time it is produced in Canada in the rawest form until they send it right across the border into their own factories and by various processes of manufacture enhance its value ten, twenty, even one hundred times; then they send the manufactured products back to us, having given employment in the meantime to American labour at the expense of Canadian labour. I am not discussing this in a party sense, I am not discussing the tariff, but I am calling attention to a program endorsed by a great political convention in the United States and urged by the Secretary of Commerce of the United States time and again in official pronouncements, of which I have copies but not with me to-night. That policy has been urged upon American financiers as necessary in order to sustain for the future the various manufacturing industries of the United States which, having exhausted or partly exhausted their own sources of supply of raw materials have now to depend upon Mexico to the south and Canada to the north. It is a very serious question, and I think the double taxation of Canadian shareholders affects it very materially. I am not protesting against the measure, I am simply in all sincerity calling it to the attention of the government.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Mr. Chairman, if the government are considering seriously the alteration of this double taxation at the next session, I should like to put forward another argument why I think it is a mistake. Take a Canadian with money to invest. We all agree that it should be invested in this country. He has to consider whether he will invest the money in a company or put it into bonds. If he puts it into bonds he has only one tax to pay. But let us assume that a dozen of us here were considering taking stock in a company. Each one of us naturally would say to himself; if we go into this company together, and it makes profits, the company will have to pay income tax on those profits, and then each of us personally will have to pay income tax on our individual share of those profits; perhaps we had better put our money into bonds. I submit for the minister's consideration whether it does not militate against the development of our own resources by Canadians who have money to spare for investment.

Mr. EVANS: With regard to this proposed reduction, one would think that the income tax, which is almost the only tax by which revenue is raised in a direct way, would be fostered by the government of any country so that it might be paid by those best able to pay. Britain gives us a very good example in this line. She has been long populated to the limit, and she has had to calculate very closely the incidence of taxation. She believes that the place to look for revenue is where the money is, and not to try to collect it from those who are on the verge of penury, as is the case to-day with many of the agriculturists and wage earners of this country. In Britain it is a penny up or a penny down in the pound, according as the needs and circumstances of the country call for an advance or a reduction in the income tax. The policy of our government, it seems to me, is avowedly to put a line of cleavage more clear and distinct than ever between the idle rich and the wage earners. The same conditions apply at the present time as when the income tax was first imposed. The class for whom the war debt was incurred, that is the war profiteers, is now getting out of paying its just share, while the man who bore the brunt of battle and had to face death in the trenches is still to be taxed on his necessaries in order to furnish tax-free bonds for this same class. Moreover, he must still submit, when he purchases the necessaries of life, to prices above all comparison with those charged in other countries. Nothing is done by the government to lower the cost of living, but a substantial reduction is again made in favour of those who skyrocketed prices during the war.

Agriculture is in bad shape to-day in Canada. The farmers have had to submit to having their products set at about 50 per cent of the value which they should bear in comparison with the prices which were skyrocketed by every other concern producing in Canada during those years of anguish. Those concerns fixed their prices without let or hindrance and ran this country into debt to the tune of about two billions. So bad did the Liberal party consider the profiteering which then took place that in 1915 they insisted upon an investigation by the public accounts committee, and the scandal in connection with horses, surgical supplies, binoculars, bicycles, shovels, motor trucks and so forth, forms the subject of a pamphlet which I think Canada should blush to read at this time. This booklet is entitled "The War Contracts Scandal" and was published by the central information office of the Canadian Liberal party. It is dated Ottawa, May, 1915. And these very men whose doings were investigated are, in this budget, relieved of the payment of their just share of what I might well term their ill-gotten gain. The supplies were purchased or were not purchased—no one knows. One of the first things complained of was a bill for over $1,000,000 which, without even an order in council, was incurred for goods which were supposed to have been purchased. Those who made these war fortunes are now to be relieved of income tax, while the farmer who had to be content with a set price on wheat during those years is still to be fleeced for the sake of that one class in the country.

Adam Smith once made a statement which will bear repetition to-day:

> The subjects of every state ought to contribute towards the support of the government as nearly as possible in proportion to their respective abilities; that is, in proportion to the revenue which they respectively enjoy under the protection of the state.
> This principle cannot be challenged, though it is customarily ignored and violated by governments beholden to the specially privileged for their retention of power.

Even the large daily newspapers have commented upon this feature of the budget and some of them have spoken against this action taken by the government. The organized farmers of western Canada have long advocated the income tax as one of the means of direct taxation for raising the revenue of the country, and the organ of the United Farmers of Alberta has lately come forward with this statement against such class discrimination:

> The reduction of the income tax by a further 10 per cent on personal income and from 9 to 8 per cent on corporations, as announced by the Finance Minister in the House of Commons last week, is a starkly reactionary feature of the budget. . . The reductions in the income tax are discriminatory against the great body of Canadian citizens, and in a special sense in favour of a small body of citizens who are fortunate in having very large incomes—in favour of the class, in fact, who provide most of the campaign funds of the political parties. The estimated revenue from customs dues for the new fiscal year is $153,600,000; the estimated revenue from income tax $55,300,000. The former duties are paid by every family in the Dominion, not in proportion to their ability to pay, but in proportion to their purchases. The head of an average family in Canada, whether he be farmer, wage worker, or business or professional man of moderate means, pays a far larger sum yearly into the federal treasury through customs duties than in income tax.

This means that every struggling wage earner pays taxes on his necessaries of life, skimping his wife and family of those necessaries in order to swell the coffers of the profiteers, those who are responsible for the great burden of debt which we now have hanging over our head. The policy of this government is not to place a tax on those best able to pay it, but to find the easiest means to filch the earnings of workers in a way in which they hope they may not be caught.

No notice seems to have been taken of the protest from this corner of the house. The government smiles to-day in stoic complacency, born of a feeling of security in the knowledge of the helplessness of the class which we in this corner of the house represent.

Mr. DUNNING: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member is evidently reading a set speech.

Mr. EVANS: I am reading only parts of it which I copied from certain papers. I may inform the hon. gentleman that part of what I have read was copied from War Contract Scandals, a Liberal propagandist paper published in 1915.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): It is a good book, but this is no time to read it.

Mr. EVANS: Another quotation is from the Journal of the United Farmers of Alberta. The plea that the income tax drives capital from the country is not well founded. In fact, foreign investors to-day find in Canada a very profitable place to invest money. Some of the finest of our natural resources are passing into foreign hands because our own capitalists do not see fit, or have not enterprise enough, to invest in these resources. Indeed, if I were to comment on their attitude towards the north country it seems to me that the Canadian people and the investors themselves are practically victims of their own propaganda in running down that northern country. The result is that we are witnessing to-day the humiliating spectacle of having our natural resources pass into foreign hands. The income tax is the fairest means of raising revenue, and it should be increased rather than diminished at this time. I could not, therefore, let this matter pass without making this protest.

Mr. GLEN: I have listened with a good deal of sympathy to the speech of the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans). When the budget was introduced I spoke on the question of the income tax, and I had intended to deal with it on the preamble to this bill. But as I may not be able to be present to-morrow I may take the same latitude as most other hon. members have taken in speaking to particular items and traverse a wider area.

I take the position, Mr. Speaker, that the question of the reduction of the income tax and the corporation tax should be the subject of a pronouncement by the government as to their attitude. When I spoke on the budget no pronouncement had been made by the Minister of Finance, but I was very glad to see that the Prime Minister declared that as far as he was concerned, and perhaps as far as the government were concerned, the question of the income tax would be a matter for further consideration. I was glad of that, because I realize that any further reduction in taxation must be accounted for somehow by the government, and I realize the danger that a reduction of the income tax would leave a deficiency which must be supplied from some other source. As I then pointed out, that deficiency must be made good by indirect taxation, which would bear more heavily on the working people of this country than any other tax.

I then protested that the question of the income tax and the corporation tax has not been a matter of discussion throughout the Dominion. So far as I know the only propagandists, with the exception of those in receipt of large incomes, are a body called the Retail Trade Bureau of Canada, who apparently have sufficient money to broadcast their publications throughout the Dominion; but I take it they speak only for a particular point of view and for a particular class. When the question was discussed at the interprovincial conference the objections which might be taken were stated very meagerly, but I was interested to note that even at that conference all the premiers were not in absolute accord. If we may take it, therefore, that the subject when discussed by the provincial premiers raised some matters of dispute, we may say that they were speaking for the particular provinces which they represented, and I can say with all confidence that as far as the abolition of the reduction of the income tax is concerned, we in the west are certainly in agreement to some extent with the premier of Manitoba. At page 28 of the discussions of the Dominion-provincial conference I find the following:

> Coming to the much-disputed question of the income tax, Mr. Robb dealt with the contention that it was opposed to the spirit of the British North America Act because it was an invasion of the direct field of taxation. The income tax last year had brought in forty-eight millions of which twenty-nine millions or 69 per cent came from the corporation, 80 per cent being from Ontario and Quebec. It might be contended that those provinces were better able to pay. This, however, was not the explanation. Montreal and Toronto were the headquarters of railway corporations, banks, life and fire insurance companies and wholesale houses doing business all over the Dominion. Naturally the income tax was paid at the head office, but everybody interested in these businesses made contributions indirectly. In Quebec individual payments had been six millions and corporation payments eight millions. In Ontario the proportion had been seven to fourteen millions. In British Columbia individuals paid one hundred and twenty-seven thousand dollars and corporations two million seven hundred and four thousand dollors. While everybody might be regarded as paying something toward income tax, under the present exemptions it did not bear heavily on the average person.
> The minister declared that it was the duty of the federal government to give a lead to others in the matter of economy. Since 1923 their debt had been reducetd by one hundred and five millions, while the debts of the provinces had been materially increased. If the reputation of the country was to be maintained economy must be practised; in so far as the government could justify its position before parliament it was prepared to help the provinces.

Turning to page 35, the next reference to the income tax was made by Premier Baxter of New Brunswick, and the report goes on to say:

Premier Baxter, of New Brunswick, did not think it was practical for the Dominion to abandon the income tax field until she had got further along toward the payment of the war debt. He however suggested that an amendment might be made to section 92 of the British North America Act dealing with "direct taxation" which would once and for all do away with the conflict created unnecessarily by Privy Council judgments. As an amendment he suggested the following words: "Direct taxation by the provinces shall mean by any mode but customs and excise, on persons and things within the province."

The question was then discussed by Mr. Price, of Ontario, and the report states:

Colonel Price further suggested that with respect to the income tax the Dominion should follow the custom of Australia whereby the proceeds on personal incomes were handed to the states, and those incorporations retained by the federal authority. He suggested that the provinces should meet again, discuss the fields of taxation, and again confer with the Finance minister.

Then Premier Bracken of Manitoba submitted the following observations with respect to taxation:

2. That the entry of the Dominion government into the field of direct taxation increases the difficulty of the provinces.
3. That there is urgent need for more clearly defining the powers of the provinces to impose taxation and the taxes they can impose.
4. Section 92 of the British North America Act should be amended in order to assign specifically to the provinces certain taxes whether direct or indirect.

It is my contention, Mr. Speaker, that the reduction or elimination of the income tax has not been discussed in concrete form in any of the provinces. The only references we have had so far have really emanated from the provincial conference. While I am not taking very much exception to the amount of the reductions, I do think the government should certainly consult with the provinces as to any further reductions along that line. I think I am stating the view of most of the people in the western provinces when I say that any further reduction in the income tax will be bitterly opposed, because they realize that if one source of revenue is altogether eliminated that money will have to be made up by the tariff, which is what we have always been fighting.

So far as the corporation tax is concerned, I think there is no doubt that the government of to-day do not contemplate removing that tax altogether. They must of necessity retain it; it was born in a time of stress and trouble which has not passed as yet. The obligations incurred by the war have not been paid off, and that tax must be retained. I was rather interested to hear the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) speak with regard to corporations coming into Canada; and he also dealt with the question of the double taxation, first of the profits of the company and then of the income received by the shareholders. I must say that I have no sympathy with that argument. These corporations are coming into Canada to-day, and apparently they are not afraid of the present taxation. Only recently we find a great American corporation coming into the province of Manitoba expecting to spend $30,000,000 in the northern part of this country.

Mr. CAHAN: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. GLEN: Allow me to finish my argument and I will answer the question. Surely that corporation is not afraid of the present taxation in Canada.

Mr. CAHAN: Would my hon. friend allow me a question now? He is entirely misrepresenting me. Does he not realize that that American corporation, the Flin Flon company, will not pay double taxation, since its stockholders will not pay income tax on a single dollar of its dividends in Canada?

Mr. GLEN: I do not say this in respect of the dividends paid to residents of the United States.

Mr. CAHAN: They have the advantage over us, because they pay one tax while we pay two.

Mr. EULER: If they reside in Canada that argument will not apply.

Mr. GLEN: Surely the hon. member does not say that those persons in receipt of dividends from a corporation located in Canada are not paying income tax in their own country?

Mr. CAHAN: Many of them are not.

Mr. GLEN: If they are subject to the provisions of the income tax laws of the United States certainly they will have to pay that tax. Apart from that, however, if capital is being driven out of the United States because of taxation, it is coming into Canada and starting large projects, so evidently it is not afraid of the taxation it is likely to meet in this Dominion. Therefore I say I have no sympathy with the argument of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. The man who has an income sufficient to bring him under the provisions of the Income Tax Act certainly should make his contribution. Sometimes it is said that the farmers of the west are protesting against income tax reduction because they do not pay the income tax. There is a mighty good reason why they do not pay income tax; it is because they have not sufficient income to do so. Therefore I am taking this point of view on the general principle of income tax—that any further reductions made by this government, or any government, will be bitterly opposed by the representatives and the members from the west. The whole sentiment of the west is against it. The people out there realize that if that source of revenue is removed and has to be made up again it will certainly be done at their expense. For that reason we are very sorry indeed to see the reduction that has been made, and we do hope that we will get some clear cut expression from the Minister of Finance now while we are on this matter as to what the intentions of the government are for the future.

Mr. CAHAN: I would like to ask the minister, before this clause passes, whether in its amended form it will impose a tax on the income of the wheat pool. If it will not apply to that organization, why is not the law so amended that the wheat pool, which is one of the most profitable organizations in Canada, will pay its fair share of income tax?

Mr. EULER: The proposed legislation will not make any change with regard to the liability of the wheat pool. What that liability is we are not absolutely certain. As my hon. friend, who is a lawyer, knows, the matter is at present sub judice; it is in the courts.

Mr. CAHAN: If there has been any doubt about it in the past why should we not amend the law so as to make it apply clearly and definitely in this case?

Mr. EULER: My hon. friend surely would not want us to amend the law in this case because we had to go to court to establish the validity of the law in some other matter.

Mr. CAHAN: The minister is amending the law so as to reach a whole class of people who, it is alleged, have escaped taxation in the past. Now if the wheat pool has up to the present escaped taxation, and there is a doubt whether the law applies to them, why not make the necessary amendment, particularly as the minister is dealing with a large class of persons who, it is alleged, are escaping taxation?

Mr. MILLAR: The wheat pool do not make any profit. They are a group of farmers engaged in selling their own products.

Mr. CAHAN: There is no corporation in this country that is making a profit in that sense. The wheat pool makes its profit and distributes it amongst its members. That is exactly what occurs in any organization, whether incorporated or unincorporated.

Mr. GARDINER: For several years we have heard the argument here that the corporation income tax is too high and that it is keeping capital out of the country. I was rather interested in the remarks of the hon. member (Mr. Cahan) in that regard. Evidenly because of the fact that our corporation income tax is lower than it is in the United States, we are getting more capital from that country than our hon. friends seem to want to come in from that source. That is another huge bubble that has burst with a huge crack. I should like to say with regard to the wheat pool that there are no profits made in that organization at all. It consists of a number of farmers who have joined together in a co-operative way to sell the product of their labour, and all they get out of the wheat pool is the price received for the wheat after it has been sold. They make no profit at all. Therefore the wheat pool is not in the same position as a corporation which manufactures goods and makes a profit in its business. Co-operative organizations in the old country have been exempt from income taxation because of the fact that they are nonprofit-making concerns. Probably the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George has not yet had the opportunity of studying how these pools are organized and how they work, but if he has any idea in his head that the wheat pool is liable or should be liable for income taxation, I should like him to inform himself properly on the subject.

Mr. BROWN: There is a difference between the United Grain Growers and the wheat pool. The United Grain Growers, handling wheat as they do, make profits and do pay income tax. The wheat pool is an entirely different kind of organization, and handling wheat as it does without any profits it is entirely out of the question that it should be considered as coming within the range of taxation.

Mr. GARDINER: I would ask the minister whether there has been any collection of arrears of income tax during last year, and if so what the amount is?

Mr. EULER: There has been a very considerable collection, and if possible I will ascertain the amount.

Mr. COOTE: I want to say a word on behalf of those engaged in farming and ranching in this country in connection with the operation of the income tax as it is at present. These men are engaged in a business the profits from which are largely determined by conditions over which they have no control, very largely climatic conditions. They may incur heavy losses for a period of years, and then the following year may make a profit on which they must pay income tax, although that profit is in no case sufficient to cover the losses they sustained in previous years. I think a good many cases of actual hardship are occuring under the act as it is at present drawn and administered, and I should like to urge the minister to take into serious consideration the question of changing the income tax so that the assessment of profits may be made on the basis of three years operations at least. In connection with the question of income tax, I should like to present to the house a resolution passed at the annual convention of the Western Live Stock Growers. It reads as follows:

Whereas agriculture and its attendant industry of live stock production represent the basic industry of this Dominion and as such require the greatest attention and development and expansion;

And whereas taxation of income under the provisions of the Income War Tax Act is based on annual net profit or gratuity;

And whereas this method of taxation on a yearly return is inequitable and detrimental to the advancement of agriculture and live stock production for the following reasons,—

(a) That production of live stock as to quantity and quality is dependent upon climatic conditions.

(b) The annual expense of live stock production is often made excessive by adverse climatic conditions.

(c) The annual profit of production of live stock is controlled largely by climatic as well as by market conditions.

(d) That an annual conversion of the live stock product into cash is frequently impossible.

(e) That frequently several years of excessive yearly costs are experienced between the year of production and the year of marketing the live stock product.

(f) That the profit on conversion of the live stock product into cash in any one year is frequently the result of two or more years of preparation and expenditure.

(g) That frequently such profit is actually wiped out by the expenditures and costs of preparation of the immediately two or more preceding years.

Therefore be it resolved that the Dominion government be asked to change its present method of determining taxable income so that from the taxable income for any one year there shall be deducted the net loss if any for the immediately preceding three year period.

That resolution is exactly in line with the request which I have already made to the minister.

Before I sit down I should like again to make the suggestion which I made in the debate on the budget, namely, that the Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation should be authorized or instructed to inquire very carefully into the proposal which is made by the live stock producers that the assessment of income tax should be based on a period covering three or four years' operation. The present method is certainly working a distinct hardship on many men who are engaged in different branches of agriculture. It may be urged that this change should extend to other businesses as well. I am not prepared to express an opinion on that; I am conversant only with the agricultural industry, and I certainly think, so far as it is concerned, a change in the act is highly desirable and would be much more in the interest of the country than this continual reduction year after year in the rates of payment under the Income Tax Act.

Mr. GARDINER: Before the clause carries, will the minister give me an answer to my question?

Mr. EULER: I have not been able to get the information. The hon. member's question was as to what amount of arrears of income tax was collected in the last year. I cannot give the exact figure but it has been a substantial amount. This might throw some light on the matter, but it is not at all conclusive: Last year the Income Tax branch collected about $9,000,000 more than in the year before, although there was, as the committee knows, a reduction of ten per cent in the tax. That amount is not all attributable, of course, to the collection of arrears, although some of it is. I am sorry I have not the information, but I will get it.

Mr. GARDINER: I would ask the minister to have that information available when his estimates come before the house, because it is rather important. I should be glad if he could give us the amount of arrears collected in the last three years and any information with regard to the reasons why these amounts were in arrears.

Mr. COOTE: What is the rate of income tax on corporations in Great Britain?

Mr. EULER: Four shillings in the pound. The hon. member suggested a few minutes ago that in Canada we adopt the plan of averaging the profits of three years. That plan was in operation in Great Britain but it was abandoned. It was found not to be as workable as might appear at first glance.

Mr. FANSHER (Last Mountain): Has there been any assessment of the wheat pools, and if so, what is the amount?

Mr. ROBB: As regards the amount, the hon. member knows that under the act this is absolutely secret; that the minister is not permitted to say what the assessment would be on the wheat pool any more than on the income of any individual.

Mr. EULER: The answer to the first part of the question is yes. I am not giving the amount, but an assessment has been made.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Depletion between lessor and lessee.

Mr. HANSON: I think this is a very fair clause, as I read it, but in the case of mines where the crown in the right of the province is the lessor, will the lessee suffer any loss in relation to the matter of depletion or exhaustion?

Mr. EULER: No.

Mr. HANSON: Will the allowance all go to the lessee? This is important in New Brunswick where all mines belong to the crown and are operated on a royalty basis. Of course the operators are given a depletion allowance.

Mr. EULER: It will all go to the lessee.

Sections 5 and 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Information to be given as to payments.

Mr. HANSON: We ought to have an elaborate explanation of this clause from the minister. I have read it with care, and I am afraid the minister is going to have a great deal of trouble in carrying it out. I have some sympathy with the object he has in view; but if he is after the holder of bearer bonds, for instance, the man who cashes coupons of bearer bonds, he is going to have difficulty in collecting or even in getting information. Furthermore he is going to put a terrible burden on companies which have bond issues outstanding, all of which in the first instance are issued to bearer. They may be registered as to principal and it would be easy to make a return on that, but it is manifestly impossible for a municipality whose bonds are always issued to bearer to give the department any information.

Mr. EULER: I quite agree with the hon. member's statement that there will be great difficulty in obtaining all the information we would like to have. But by this we intend to get the power to make these inquiries and to secure information so far as we can. As the act stands now, in the case of dividends or salaries paid to employees that information must be given to the department.

Mr. HANSON: And very exact information.

Mr. EULER: Very good; but we also suspect, in fact we know that in many cases incomes are received by way of, we will say, interest or annuities, or something of that sort, which are never reported to the department. As the law stands now we have no authority to compel people to disclose information which might enable us to collect the tax, and we are taking the authority to enable us to oblige people to give us such information as we may desire. If the department suspects that in certain quarters the information is not being supplied as it should be, this will at least give us the power to secure that information if it is at all possible to get it. The hon. member will admit that, while this will not enable us to get all sources of income we might like to get, we shall at least have some power and authority to get something more than we are getting now.

Mr. HANSON: That is a confession of weakness at the start.

Mr. EULER: If the hon. member can suggest some other method of making the clause more complete and certain, I should be glad to have it.

Mr. CAHAN: The first part of subsection 5 of section 7 reads:

> All persons in whatever capacity acting, making payment of interest, royalties, rents, annuities, compensation, remuneration or other fixed or determinable amounts, such as interest upon bonds, mortgages, deeds of trust or other similar obligations—

—shall be compelled to make a return. But the second part provides that:

> All persons in whatever capacity acting—

And so on.

—making . . . . . payments under contracts, whether written or verbal, relating to the buying and selling and otherwise dealing in stocks, bonds, debentures, mortgages, hypothecs, and other similar securities—

—shall also make a return. Does that mean that every stockbroker who buys or sells stocks under a verbal or written order shall report to the government all such purchases and sales?

Mr. EULER: No.

Mr. CAHAN: I admit that the language must perhaps be broad in order to cover all the minister has in mind, but I should like him to tell us what he has in mind.

Mr. EULER: Generally speaking, what we are endeavouring to obtain is this. In the case of brokers dealing in stocks and bonds and who are making, as we know, profits which we have not been able to get at, who have a systematic scheme of making profits, we shall have authority to go in and obtain the information to tax them. It is not intended that they shall make a report of every individual sale or purchase they make. There might be a hundred or more a day, and it would be impossible.

Mr. HANSON: Are we to infer that the bond dealers are not making proper returns of their incomes?

Mr. EULER: No, it is the bond dealer's customer who may be in the business of buying and selling stocks through a broker until it has become practically his vocation, his main source of income. It is not the man who just makes an occasional profit by buying and selling of stock and bonds.

Mr. MATTHEWS: Would the minister kindly elucidate the reporting which is required under the first part of this clause? How far would he put that into effect? As the Minister knows, there are already in vogue two systems of reporting, one in England, where the payor deducts a given rate of income tax, and the other in the United States, where the report is made by the payor to the government and income tax assessed on that by the government. In Canada there seems to be no reporting except in the case of salaries, dividends, directors' fees, and that sort of thing, which are easily ascertainable. It occurs to me that the minister is broadening this clause so that all income will have to be reported. Will the minister kindly elucidate that?

Mr. EULER: It is intended to give the minister fairly wide powers. I do not think it is the intention to make everybody report. The clause says, "on such forms and at such times as the minister may prescribe." The minister is not going to be unreasonable in this matter, but where he has reason to think that it is advisable in the interests of the revenue, he can demand these returns. He might perhaps fix a certain amount. This clause at least gives the minister power to demand these returns, but of course, it is not intended to use that power in any unreasonable way.

Mr. MATTHEWS: The difficulty with the Canadian income tax is that it is not enforced. I think if the minister is going to make a provision for reporting, it should be watertight and everybody who makes payments should have to report, or else leave it alone; and the same in regard to bond coupons; the reporting should be complete, or leave it alone.

Mr. EULER: Is the hon. member advocating that in every instance the department should insist upon these reports being made? He speaks of making it watertight. Does he mean that we should exercise no discretion whatever in the matter, but insist upon every one of the persons here indicated making a report? I am simply trying to get the idea of the hon. member.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I am asking the minister what is in his mind. If I make a payment to a man, and it involves a profit, am I to report it? If so, has every payment of the kind to be reported. I think we are letting ourselves in for a great deal of trouble here. The enforcement of the income tax is the greatest problem relating to the income tax to-day. I do not think we should criticize very much the reduction in the income tax, if that reduction results in an increase in income, but when you come to the reporting I think you should either adopt it completely or leave it alone.

Mr. EULER: Something is left to the discretion of the minister, and if he does not insist on as complete a system of reporting as the house thinks there should be, I have no doubt that he will be subjected to criticism at the next session.

Mr. CAHAN: Is not the objection of the hon. member for Toronto East Centre this, that you are placing it in the control of the minister to discriminate as between those who will make returns? This clause allows the minister or the officers of his department to select a certain few. They may take the men on a certain list and enforce the provision as against them, while it is not generally enforced. It seems to me that the burden of the complaint of the member for Toronto East Centre is that you should state specifically the nature of the returns you require, and from whom they are required, and then make every person of that class make such a return, and make it applicable throughout the whole country to similar classes or persons. This section is not to apply to the broker at all, as explained by the minister. It is not to get at the broker who is escaping making a proper return. As far as the brokerage firms in this country are concerned, the minister has power now to make a thorough examination of all the books of these firms, and I have known it done time and again in the city of Montreal. What the minister is asking for here is for a return of all payments, "under contracts, whether written or verbal, relating to the buying and selling and otherwise dealing in stocks, bonds, debentures, mortgages, hypothecs, and other similar securities." I do not see why that should apply to the buying and selling of securities, any more than it should apply to the buying and selling of land, or the buying and selling of wheat, or any other commodity, but if the provision is to be that every contract relating to the buying and selling of these classes of stocks and securities shall be reported to the minister, then make the provision general so that every person who enters into contracts of that kind shall make a report, and do not allow the minister to prescribe the forms in his own discretion, and to select the people whom he is going to compel to make these returns and pay a tax on the contracts to which reference is made in this section.

Mr. ROBB: May I point out to my hon. friend that the minister now has those powers which he objects to. He has power to demand, for instance, that all salaries be reported, but he does not ask my hon. friend to report the salaries of the employees of his household. He exacts, under the power he has, the information from the large employers of labour.

Mr. CAHAN: I make a return for my employees.

Mr. ROBB: The most satisfactory source of collection as regards income tax is from the salaries, because under the act the large employers of labour are compelled to report the salaries they are paying, and companies paying dividends are compelled to report the dividends they are paying, and the department has power to audit the books to see that a proper return is made. But a certain latitude is allowed the minister because he must use reasonable discretion and not go after small employers of labour, for instance, and small concerns. This is intended to get after those who, we are satisfied from experience, are evading taxation.

Mr. CAHAN: What class of people are you getting after?

Mr. ROBB: From time to time the attention of the department may be directed to the fact that systematic attempt is being made to evade the income tax. We have had no complaint with regard to the powers the minister now has to demand information as to salaries, which powers are as wide as those now sought.

Mr. HANSON: Is it the intention of the minister under this clause to exact from small mortgagors returns of the interest payments they make? A firm of solicitors may be handling a thousand mortgages for perhaps fifty clients, involving periodical payments. Is it the intention to require everyone of those mortgagors to make out a return? If so, I see a little rebellion in some parts of the country.

Mr. EULER: I do not care to make any definite commitment in regard to it, but I would say that in a general way it is not the intention to persecute people. In the case of many of these small amounts the chances are that we would not ask for any information at all. We might perhaps fix a minimum amount to be reported. I admit, Mr. Chairman, that we are asking that the minister be given fairly wide discretionary powers, and that you have to trust him to use those powers in a wise way. He has similar powers under several other statutes. I think it is perfectly proper that these discretionary powers should be given to him.

Bill No. 166, for the relief of Frances Helen Renison.—Mr. Casselman.

Mr. G. PARENT (Quebec West): As far as I am concerned I should like it to be understood that all these bills are carried on division.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried on division.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT

PREVENTION OF SMUGGLING

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of National Revenue) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that the Customs Act, chapter 42 of the revised statutes, 1927, be amended to make provision for a more adequate enforcement of the act and the prevention of smuggling operations in the territorial waters of Canada.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT

APPOINTMENT AND SALARIES OF OFFICERS

Mr. EULER moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that the Department of National Revenue Act be amended to provide that the minister be empowered to appoint certain classes of officers with such salaries or remuneration as may be determined by the governor in council, and that a gratuity may be paid any officer on retirement in lieu of a period of leave of absence with pay, with further provisions as to filling vacanices by transfers and promotions for the betterment of the service.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Lennox.]

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT

EXEMPTIONS, PENALTIES, ENFORCEMENT

Mr. EULER moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that the Special War Revenue Act be amended by repealing the exemption on certain articles and materials, not to include permanent equipment which enters into the cost of manufacture or production of goods, and by further provisions in respect to the imposition of penalties, and for the better enforcement of the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

FEDERAL DISTRICT COMMISSION ACT, AMENDMENT

PAYMENT OF GRANT AND ISSUE AND REDEMPTION OF SECURITIES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that the Federal District Commission Act, 1927, be amended to provide,

1. That the period for the payment of the annual grant to the commission, at present fixed at sixteen years from the first day of April, 1927, be extended to thirty years from the first day of April, 1928, the said annual payment to remain at the sum of $250,000;

2. That the commission may issue securities and the governor in council may authorize the guarantee of the payment of principal and interest thereon, the proceeds to be deposited to the credit of the Minister of Finance in trust for the commission and released by the minister in his discretion for the purposes of the act;

3. That a sinking fund shall be created and maintained by the commission out of its actual annual income to provide sufficient funds to redeem such guaranteed securities as they respectively become due, and the provisions of the Expropriation Act instead of the railway act shall be made applicable to proceedings of the commission.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

ECONOMIC CONFERENCE RESOLUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): I wish to ask the Prime Minister if it is the intention of the government, after the recess, to submit to this house for approval, the resolutions passed at the Economic conference of May last, at which the government of this country was represented.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall have to consider that question and give my hon. friend a reply after the recess.

RADIO—CANCELLATION OF LICENSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): I wish to ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if the radio licenses issued to the International Bible Students have been cancelled, and if so for what reason.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): This question has been put to me several times during the week, and I am prepared now to make a declaration in regard to the matter. That declaration is very short and it is this: In the light of the information voluntarily submitted to the Department of Marine and Fisheries during the past year or more, and with a view of promoting a readjustment of radio broadcasting licenses, it has been decided not to renew the licenses to the International Bible Students.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): To how many cities does this decision apply?

Mr. CARDIN: I understand they have two licenses, one in the west and one in Toronto. This applies to both.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): Will the minister give us the reason for this action?

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): Some time ago I presented several petitions and letters asking that the license be renewed to radio station C.K.C.X. in Toronto. I have received a large number of additional letters and petitions. What action will be taken in regard to these communications? I believe a great part of the radio fans want this license renewed. April 1st is near, and it is the last day upon which I can bring the matter up before licenses are issued. Is this going to be a matter of party patronage or not?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. A question on the subject to which the hon. gentleman refers was put a moment ago and answered by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to get a reply in regard to the Toronto station.

Mr. CARDIN: Representations have been made to the department on both sides of the question.

Mr. McGIBBON: Will the minister be good enough to give us the reason for this action?

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to say—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman has spoken once.

Mr. CHURCH: I may have to move the adjournment of the house in order to present the facts on this matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman cannot move the adjournment of the house at this stage; it is against the rules.

Mr. McGIBBON: Will the minister be good enough to give us the reason for this action?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Will the minister be good enough to tell us why these licenses were cancelled?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. McGIBBON: Will the minister be kind enough to give his reasons for that action?

Mr. CARDIN: After considering all the explanations which have been made we thought it advisable to refuse a renewal of the license. The information is contained in numerous letters and protests which are on the departmental files.

Mr. McGIBBON: I submit that is no reason at all.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. This is what Bourinot says at page 314:

> While explanations of the intentions of the government or of a minister may be asked, their opinion on a matter of policy or of law is not a proper subject of inquiry.

Mr. ARTHURS: On a point of order, I submit that the minister has given no reason at all. I think we should be given the reasons for his decision.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I suggest that the question be put on the order paper and the answer thereto and the reasons can be given.

Mr. GARDINER: I suggest that the minister lay the correspondence on the table so that hon. members may become acquainted with the facts.

Mr. PARENT: Let the hon. member put his question on the order paper.

REPARATIONS COMMISSION REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) asked yesterday what is the intention of the government concerning the Friel report on reparations. I may say in reply that the government is not in a position to submit any legislation on the matter during the course of the present session. Pending the consideration of possible legislation at a later date, the government thinks it would be inadvisable to have the report tabled at present.

REPORT OF FISHERIES COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. ERNST (Queens-Lunenburg): On several occasions I have asked the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if he is able to give the house any informaton as to when the report of the royal commission investigating the fisheries of the maritime provinces will be tabled. I should like to ask the question again to-day.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): I am not in a position to give any definite answer. The commissioners are preparing the report and I expect to be in a position to table it after Easter.

ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following letter:

Ottawa, March 30, 1928.

SIR,—

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Honourable F. A. Anglin, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber to-day at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

JAMES F. CROWDY,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

IMMIGRANTS AT KINGSTON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston City): I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Immigration the following facts. Some few days ago there arrived a notice to the superintendent of the employment bureau informing him that eight immigrants classed as farm labourers would arrive in Kingston. When they arrived two were found to be experienced, one partly experienced and the others without any experience. The two experienced and the one partly experienced were placed immediately. Two others have been placed in Kingston at temporary employment; one is unemployed, and the other two are on the trek to the city of Toronto. The two temporarily employed are taking the positions of two citizens of Kingston and we believe that is a situation which should be stopped. I should like to ask the minister if such a situation will be continued or if there is any plan to rectify it.

[Mr. Parent.]

Hon. ROBERT FORKE (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): I think the house will agree with me that the question whether we can meet a situation of that kind is rather a difficult one to answer offhand. There will no doubt be unemployed people in Canada. There will be some difficulty on occasions in finding a place for all the people who come to this country. I have no knowledge of the circumstance to which the hon. member refers; but I will make inquiries in order to find out under whose auspices they came and why they have been allowed to get into the situation in which they find themselves, and should the question be repeated I will endeavour to give a definite answer.

HOME BANK DEPOSITORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. E. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if the judges of the Exchequer court have been asked for a report regarding the Home Bank. If so, has he received that report.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): The judges of the Exchequer Court are from time to time reviewing cases under the Home Bank legislation of a couple of years ago. I have asked the auditors, who, I think, have this in charge, to give a report, but I am not sure whether it has been received or not. I will look into the matter and let my hon. friend know.

ANGLO-EGYPTIAN TREATY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Has the Prime Minister any statement to make to the house with regard to the relationship between this country and Great Britain in respect to the treaty between Great Britain and Egypt?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): If my hon. friend had not asked the question which he has just asked, I was about to request the house to allow me to make a statement on a matter of public interest which arises out of a report that appears in to-day's papers to the effect that Lord Salisbury, leader in the House of Lords, of the British government, apparently entertained a different point of view with respect to Canada having been asked to become a party to the Anglo-Egyptian treaty from that which was expressed by myself in this house in the course of a debate earlier in the week. May I first of all draw the attention of the house to what Lord Salisbury himself observed, namely, that he had not seen my remarks at the time at which he was speaking and therefore he was unable to say exactly what had been said by myself in that connection? May I also add that I have not seen the despatches that have gone from Canada to Great Britain and I am therefore not in a position to know what has been represented in Great Britain with respect to the remarks which I made in this house? My remarks however are in Hansard, and with respect to what appears in the Hansard report of the debate of the other night I have nothing to alter or change in any particular. I think I can indicate very clearly where any difference in point of view that may exist has arisen, if such in fact is the case.

Lord Salisbury's remarks, as reported in the papers of yesterday and to-day, fall really under four heads. In the first part Lord Salisbury refers to the policy of Great Britain with respect to the Anglo-Egyptian treaty and remarks that it was a policy for the preservation of peace, and that in that particular the policy of the home government is the same as that of the Canadian government. There is no disagreement in any way between us on that; in fact, we are in hearty accord.

Lord Salisbury then refers to the report which was sent of my remarks on the Chanak incident. I think I had better read what Lord Salisbury says in that regard and I can then indicate whether or not there is any difference in our point of view with respect to that incident. Lord Salisbury's remarks as reported in the Canadian Press cable despatch appearing in the different papers, are as follows:

Undoubtedly, Lord Salisbury continued, relations between the component parts of the empire in respect to these high matters were a matter of some difficulty. Undoubtedly the Canadian government were asked to associate themselves with the British government at the time of the Chanak affair, and were asked whether they would be represented by a military contingent in the event of military action being required in those regions.

It was true, Lord Salisbury declared, there were no military operations, but he would not like to lay it down that the result was entirely due to the action of the Canadian government. His recollection was that there was a very strong feeling in Great Britain against military operations on that occasion, and it would not be rash to say that the strong opinions expressed here had at any rate a partial effect, just as the opinion of Canada had, in bringing that incident to the end it reached.

That is entirely the view I took with respect to the effect of Canada's representations on the Chanak appeal, if I might use that expression. I believe it was one of the factors which operated. I have never contended that it was more than that. I agree absolutely with Lord Salisbury in what he says as to the different factors that materially contributed to bring about the termination of the incident to which reference is there made.

The third part of Lord Salisbury's remarks is as follows:

The government leader continued that in regard to the Anglo-Egyptian treaty it was difficult to discuss the matter because he had not yet received the full text of Premier King's observations. He emphasized that all through the negotiations leading to the draft treaty with Egypt the dominion governments had been kept fully informed of every step taken, but the terms which the British government proposed to the Egyptian government were expressly limited to the relations between that government and Great Britain, and on the face of it did not include any of the dominion governments.

My hon. friend who has asked me a question to-day asked me a question in the house on March 9 last with respect to the Anglo-Egyptian treaty. Here is what was then said as it appears in Hansard of that date:

Mr. J. S. Woodsworth (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to ask the government if Canada has been consulted with regard to the policy of Great Britain in Egypt.

Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King (Prime Minister): I assume that my hon. friend refers to a treaty which was in the course of negotiation between Great Britain and Egypt?

Mr. Woodsworth: Yes.

Mr. Mackenzie King: The treaty to which my hon. friend has reference was a treaty being negotiated between His Majesty, as representing Great Britain and Northern Ireland, and Egypt. The Canadian government was kept informed of the progress of the negotiations.

So that thus far there is no conflict in any particular between the statements made by Lord Salisbury and those made by myself. I did state as long ago as March the 9th last that the treaty negotiated was between Great Britain and Northern Ireland, and Egypt, and that we had been kept informed of the policy of the British government with respect thereto. Let me now continue with the further remarks of Lord Salisbury:

There never was any question of asking the dominions to participate in responsibility for the results of the treaty, he said. The dominions were asked to concur in the general policy embodied in the treaty, which was a very different thing from asking them to be parties to the treaty. It had never entered the heads of the British government to ask them to be parties to the treaty.

All the dominions replied to this request and expressed themselves as satisfied with the prospect of agreement with the government of Egypt, and raised no objection whatever to the terms. The government thought it not in the public interest to publish a further paper on the subject. (The British government recently published a white paper detailing the terms of the draft treaty.)

That is all that Lord Salisbury further says with respect to the Anglo-Egyptian treaty. The concluding part of his remarks relates to the relations between the British government and the governments of the dominions. With all that Lord Salisbury says there I am in entire agreement as well, so I think the difference between us with respect to whether or not Canada was asked to become a party to the treaty now reduces itself to the point as to precisely what was the nature of the representations made to the Canadian government by the British government, how were those representations interpreted by us, and was our interpretation the right one, or were the communications capable of any other interpretation? At most the difference between us is one of the interpretation of the implications of the communications which passed.

Now, before I give the substance of the communications may I read to the house what I said in reference to the Anglo-Egyptian treaty, so that hon. members will see the exact purport of my remarks:

> I may say to my hon. friend that within the last few months the government was asked, with respect to a treaty that was being negotiated between Great Britain and Egypt, whether we would become a party to that treaty. The terms of that treaty are known, they have been published. They involved military sanctions, and they contemplated military alliances. What was the reply of the government to that question? It was that we did not believe that so far as Canada was concerned the parliament of Canada would approve such a course; that if Britain and Egypt could work out a treaty as between themselves along the lines proposed, well and good; but that so far as Canada was concerned, we did not feel that it was in the interests of the British Empire itself or in the interests of the larger peace which it was hoped the treaty would serve, that this country should be asked to become a party to it; and the British government immediately accepted our view in reference thereto.

May I direct the attention of the house to those words:

> That if Britain and Egypt could work out a treaty as between themselves along the lines proposed, well and good; but that so far as Canada was concerned, we did not feel that it was in the interests of the British Empire itself, or in the interests of the larger peace which it was hoped the treaty would serve, that this country should be asked to become a party to it.

That clearly indicates that the reference that I made as to Canada having been asked to become a party to the treaty was not to the treaty as finally drafted and presented, but to the treaty as it was at the time the negotiations were being carried on. As I have said, we were kept informed of the progress of the negotiations, and the reference that I made to Canada having been asked to become a party had reference to the treaty in its form as originally presented to us. May I say, so as to make clear why the government placed the interpretation it did upon the text which was sent to us, that at the last Imperial conference there was laid down very clearly in black and white in the report of the inter-imperial relations committee of the Imperial conference the procedure that was to be followed with respect to the negotiation, signature and ratification of treaties, and this report was accepted by the government of Great Britain and by the dominion governments as the future guide in all of these matters, and also thereafter as the source of interpretation with respect to the texts of treaties.

On November the 11th last, we received a despatch from the British government setting forth that the result of conversations between the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs for Great Britain and the Prime Minister of Egypt had been embodied in a draft treaty which was acceptable to His Majesty's government in Great Britain, and which His Majesty's government in Great Britain were prepared, if they received the concurrence of the governments of the dominions, to offer to Egypt. There was then embodied in the despatch the text of the proposed treaty, and it was drawn up as between "His Majesty the King of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India, and His Majesty the King of Egypt." There was no limitation as to the parts of the empire to which the treaty was to apply. The application of the treaty was not stated to be limited to Great Britain and Northern Ireland. Now, as I have just said, the report of the inter-imperial relations committee of the Imperial conference of 1926 provides—the reference will be found at page 19 of the report as printed by this house:

> In the case of a treaty applying to only one part of the empire it should be stated to be made by the king on behalf of that part.

I hope hon. members see the force of those words, "should be stated".

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps my right hon. friend could conveniently now give the date of the first draft treaty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The despatch that I am referring to was received on November the 11th of last year, 1927.

The report of the inter-imperial relations committee of the Imperial conference, 1926, provides that:

> In the case of a treaty applying to only one part of the empire, it should be stated to be made by the king on behalf of that part.

To the despatch of November 11 we replied on November 22, stating that the Canadian government would raise no objection to His Majesty's government in Great Britain entering into an agreement embodying the substance of the draft treaty, in appropriate form, with the government of Egypt; however, that we could not contemplate recommending to parliament that the treaty should be made applicable to Canada, nor could we undertake to participate in its signature and ratification, and we gave our reasons therefor.

On November 24 we received a despatch, saying that the British government was much obliged for the full explanation given of the position of the Canadian government in relation to the proposed treaty with Egypt.

On December 2 we received a further despatch, saying that the British government had decided to sign the proposed treaty, in view of the replies received from the various dominions; that it was being made clear that, as regards the form, the treaty should be concluded in the manner contemplated in the report of the inter-imperial relations committee of the Imperial conference, 1926, in case of a treaty made on behalf of one part of the empire, that is, that in the preamble it should be confined to Great Britain and Northern Ireland, and should be signed by a plenipotentiary holding a full power limited correspondingly.

Mr. CAHAN: Is that the Prime Minister's deduction, or is it stated in the despatch?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I am giving the substance of the despatches. Hon. members will observe that I am careful to say nothing about the treaty itself. The Imperial government has laid on the table of the British House of Commons all the documents that I think it wishes to have made public with respect to the treaty. I am confining my remarks to the exchange of communications between the British government and our own on the subject of Canada's relation to the treaty.

Mr. CAHAN: And the final form in which the treaty was executed differed from the original form submitted to the Prime Minister?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has it exactly. May I say to him that the accuracy of what I have stated from the Canadian point of view is conclusively borne out by the white paper which was laid on the table of the House of Commons of Great Britain this year, entitled Papers regarding Negotiations for a Treaty of Alliance with Egypt, a copy of which I hold in my hand. At page 9 of this white paper is the counter-draft approved by His Majesty's government July 28, 1927. The preamble reads:

> His Majesty the King of Great Britain, Ireland and the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India, and His Majesty the King of Egypt.

Then after another paragraph or two comes the following one relating to the powers:

> Have agreed to conclude a treaty for this purpose and have appointed as plenipotentiaries:

After a blank the paragraph continues:

> Who, having communicated their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed as follows:—

Then follows the text of the treaty. Now, under the interpretation set forth by the inter-imperial relations committee on treaties, a treaty, so drafted, without limitation had it been signed by a plenipotentiary, would have bound Canada along with all the other dominions. Being presented with the full text of the treaty in this form, and being asked to give our concurrence, we interpreted that Canada was asked to be a party to the treaty, and therefore in our reply we were careful to state that we could not become a party to the treaty because for reasons given we did not believe that this parliament would approve of Canada being made a party thereto.

Now, on pages 35 and 36 of the white paper to which I have already referred appears the draft treaty as it was submitted two days after our despatch, or at any rate after our despatch had gone to Great Britain, stating the position of the Canadian government. The draft is in this form:

> His Majesty the King of Great Britain, Ireland, and the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India, and His Majesty the King of Egypt,—

I am leaving out some of the intervening paragraphs in the preamble.

> Have agreed to conclude a treaty for this purpose, and have appointed as plenipotentiaries:

His Majesty the King of Great Britain, Ireland, and the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India:
for Great Britain and Northern Ireland:
The Right Honourable the Lord Lloyd, G.C.S.I., G.C.I.E., D.S.O., Member of His Most Honourable Privy Council:
His Majesty the King of Egypt:
His Excellency Abdel Khalek Sarwat Pasha, President of the Council of Ministers;
Who, having communicated their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed as follows:—

Hon. members will notice that the treaty as finally presented, signed between Great Britain and Egypt, is distinctly limited in the preamble, as should be the case when a treaty applies to only one part of the empire, by saying:

His Majesty for Great Britain and Northern Ireland

Making no reference to any other parts of the empire.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that I accept unreservedly Lord Salisbury's statement to the House of Lords that the government of Great Britain had not any intention of obliging the dominions to become a party to the treaty, or even of inviting them to do so.

Mr. CAHAN: They made a very delicate suggestion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I agree with my hon. friend, I think it was a very delicate suggestion; and I submit that, as presented to us, the documents were not capable of any other interpretation in the light of the rules laid down at the Imperial conference with respect to the negotiation, signature and ratification of treaties. But I hope the explanation which I have made will remove any possibility of difference on that point as between the British government and ourselves.

Mr. H. B. ADSHEAD (East Calgary): May I ask the Prime Minister: Egypt then is regarded as a foreign country as the treaty is made with it? Secondly, Canada is not involved in the treaty?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, Canada is not bound by the treaty.

Mr. ADSHEAD: And Egypt is a foreign country?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will have to consult some international authority on that point.

IMMIGRATION OF MINERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ROBERT FORKE (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): Mr. Speaker, while the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) was speaking in the debate on international peace last Wednesday he made the following remark as reported at page 1780 of Hansard:

The Minister of Immigration asks me about the sermon. I will ask him to direct his attention to answering a question which I asked him six weeks ago, to which I have not got an answer yet.

I replied that I would answer him to-morrow. The question that the hon. member asked me is reported in Hansard of February 13:

I would like to ask the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) a question; I see he is not in his place at the moment, but perhaps he can give me an answer to-morrow. I will first call his attention to a news item appearing in the Sunday Times, of London, England, of December 4, 1927. It consists of only one sentence, which I will read:
"Every unemployed miner in Great Britain," said Mr. H. H. Stevens, M.P., of Vancouver, who arrived in Liverpool yesterday on the Canadian Pacific liner Melita, "can be found employment in the Canadian mines, provided he is physically fit."

Also in the Daily Express of December 12, 1927, there appeared the following:

Mr. H. H. Stevens, M.P. for Vancouver, who has just arrived in England, says that every unemployed British miner could find work in the mines of Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I hesitated before answering that question because it was asked six weeks ago, and I supposed the hon. member for Comox-Alberni had made up his mind to let it drop. When he renewed it on Wednesday I thought this would be a good opportunity to let the house know some of the difficulties with which the Department of Immigration has to contend. I have no proof whatever that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) made the statement attributed to him in the newspaper reports. It may be correct or otherwise. In answer to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, I would say that he is well aware that every healthy Britisher, mentally and physically fit, can come to Canada when he has paid his passage, and the Department of Immigration—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to confine his explanation to a brief statement.

Mr. FORKE: I am almost through, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CAHAN: Don't provoke a discussion.

Mr. SPEAKER: There can be nothing controversial at the moment.

Mr. PARENT: Why ask questions if you do not want an answer?

Mr. FORKE: I am endeavouring to be as brief as possible, Mr. Speaker. I have been blamed for not answering a question asked six weeks ago and I am merely trying now to give the answer. I would point out that when the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) made that statement he knew that anyone could come in from Great Britain irrespective of the regulations of the Department of Immigration. May I say this to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill): The officials in Great Britain are kept well informed of the situation in Canada and they always endeavour as far as possible to guide immigration along the right lines.

Mr. NEILL: I am entitled to say that the minister has not quoted my question and certainly has not answered it, because my question was: would he use the means at his hand to inform the miners of Great Britain that there was no work for them in Canada?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): When speaking of the eight men who came to Kingston I forgot to mention to the minister the fact that if these eight men had arrived properly classed we had eight jobs ready for them the morning they came.

Mr. FORKE: I am not finding fault with the question.

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF, 1927, AMENDMENT

The house again in committee of ways and means Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved:

That item 267b of the customs tariff be struck out of said resolution; and that items 438b and 705a be inserted in said resolution.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is just a change to bring the resolutions into conformity with what has already been done?

Mr. ROBB: Yes just to carry out what we have already done.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. ROBB: I move:

2. Resolved, that schedule b to The Customs Tariff, being chapter forty-four of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, be amended by striking thereout tariff items 1011, 1012, 1024, 1029, the enumeration of goods, and the rates of drawback of customs duties set opposite to each of the said items, and the following items, enumerations and rates of drawback of customs duties be inserted in the said schedule b:—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the effect of this?

Mr. ROBB: This merely strikes out the items that have been corrected.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I take it that no change whatever is being made in this proposed resolution except simply to carry into effect what is already done.

Mr. ROBB: That is all.

The CHAIRMAN: It ratifies what has been done in committee.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. ROBB: I move:

3. Resolved, that any enactment founded on the foregoing resolutions shall be deemed to have come into force on the seventeenth day of February, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-eight, and to have applied to all goods mentioned in the foregoing resolutions imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that date and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that day.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is the usual clause?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is no change?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Motion agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 169, to amend the Customs Tariff.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

The SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read the second time?

Mr. ROBB: Now, Mr. Speaker, I move the second reading.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Schedule A amended.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is one matter that certainly could have been brought up previously in committee but which can now be considered under the rules. Can the minister tell me what the real reason was for putting wool on the free list?

Mr. ROBB: The item under which wool carried a duty was practically a dead letter, and has been so for years. It never has been enforced.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But is that not the type of wool we produce here, the coarse wool?

Mr. ROBB: I have not the memorandum before me, but many years ago the customs board gave a decision which practically placed that wool on the free list, and it has been on the free list ever since.

Section agreed to.

Schedules agreed to.

On the title:

Mr. HEAPS: There is one matter which I would like again to bring to the attention of the house, arising out of these tariff adjustments and also having relation to the strike which is taking place in Oshawa. I have no desire to interfere in any way with the efforts being made by the Minister of Labour to bring about a settlement of that dispute; I wish him every success, and hope he can help in an amicable adjustment as between the company and the men. However, when a concern such as the General Motors Corporation cuts wages to the extent of 40 per cent, I cannot help but protest in this house against such action. In a recent issue of the Oshawa Times the general manager of that corporation stated that the average wage of the highest paid workers in that plant is approximately $150 per month. Taking the wages on that basis, this 40 per cent cut will reduce them to not more than $100 per month for the highest paid mechanic, and you can understand the effect that will have on the lower paid workers.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): May I ask a question? Were these wages cut generally, or were they cut in some certain departments?

Mr. HEAPS: The wages have been reduced, in certain departments, but the other men and women employed in that industry feel that if this cut is accepted their wages also will be cut. One of the reasons given by the management for the reduction is that they can get lots of men to fill the positions occupied by those who have been striking, and the cut is not attributed to any lack of prosperity. I claimed last week that the General Motors Corporation was receiving considerations of a very valuable character from this house, and I state now that if an industry receiving very high protection does not treat its employees fairly, this house has the right to take this protection into consideration, and either reduce or remove it entirely.

Mr. WHITE (London): If that were done how would it affect the other manufacturers of motor cars in Canada?

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Mr. HEAPS: It might have the effect of compelling other motor car manufacturers to bring pressure to bear upon such companies to make no wage cuts.

Mr. KAISER: This company is in Oshawa, not in Winnipeg. I should like to ask the hon. member whether anyone concerned in that trouble has asked him to bring these matters before the House of Commons?

Mr. HEAPS: I am sorry to see any hon. member of this house take such a narrow view of Canadian affairs as to think that none but the member representing a particular constituency may be interested in conditions obtaining in that constituency. If I had been the member for Oshawa I should have raised this question here long ago. When the matter of the decrease in the tariff was under discussion, hon. members did not have to wait until they were told by someone else what action they should take.

Mr. KAISER: I submit that I am entitled to an answer to my question. I am interested to know whether the labouring people or the corporation in Oshawa have requested the hon. member to bring this matter before the house.

Mr. HEAPS: Certainly the employers in Oshawa have not asked me to raise this question here.

Mr. KAISER: I asked if either party requested the hon. member to bring this matter before the house.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not see that that question is relevant at all.

Mr. KAISER: It is a very simple question to answer; it requires only one word.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member who is speaking may be interrupted only with his permission.

Mr. HEAPS: When I am through the hon. member can state where he stands on this question, whether he sides with the employers or with the employees. I am not afraid to say where I stand. I was not going to deal with this question at any length, but in view of the fact that the hon. member has interrupted me I may say more than I had intended.

I remember very well, as do most other members of this house, when these same employees came to Ottawa two years ago. At that time the management looked with very kindly eyes on the workers taking the time off and paying their own expenses to come to Ottawa in protest against the tariff reductions, because they thought their livelihood was being endangered. I remember the placards which they brought along with them, and I am quite sure that the management of the company were in sympathy with the statements contained on those placards. One statement was, "British fair play for Canadians." To-day this American-owned corporation might well give British fair play to these Canadian employees. Another of the placards bore the words, "Our appeal is for our families." That is the very appeal I am making to-day, and my hon. friend from Oshawa (Mr. Kaiser) does not like to hear it made. Then another big placard stated, "The tariff threatens our livelihood." I ask the house if the tariff has done any such thing. The threat to their livelihood to-day comes from the avarice and greed of a soulless corporation. Still another placard stated, "Our living and our homes are at stake." They are at stake to-day, and who is to take the matter up in this house? In view of the conditions which exist, I think the hon. member from Oshawa might well have brought the matter up here. There was another placard which contained the appeal, "Give us a chance to live in Canada." Still another placard declared, "We may lose our jobs." They have left their jobs to-day but it was not the change in the tariff which brought that about. Now I want to quote a statement from the Oshawa Times of Tuesday, March 27, as follows:

> Representatives of the various divisions addressed the men to-day at the meeting, and advised them that they must stick together. Men from the Chevrolet and Pontiac assembly lines, who are strongest in their sympathy to the trimmers who first walked out, claimed that on their present scale of production, and through efficiency experts who had retimed their line twice, and as a consequence who had speeded up the line, had also made drastic cuts in their wages. They claimed that they now only averaged about fifteen dollars a week.

Now, what was the statement made by the management when the strike occurred? The statement issued by Mr. H. A. Brown, general manager of the Oshawa plants, was as follows —I take it from the Oshawa Times of Monday, March 26:

> Due to the present labour situation should the men refuse to return to work, the company is in a position to fill the vacancies and the production of the current months will be very little affected.

Here you have, Mr. Chairman, one of the reasons why the men who went on strike have remained on strike; the management of this corporation think they can fill the places of those who have gone on strike because of a reduction of approximately 40 per cent in their wages.

Now let me deal for a moment with the poverty of the organization known as the General Motors Corporation.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Does the hon. member think that parliament or the government should fix the wages to be paid in this or any other industry?

Mr. HEAPS: Well, parliament does a lot of fixing. I do not use that term in an offensive way or in a way that may be misunderstood, but we have legislation before us at all times in which we regulate the profits of corporations. We fix the tariff to enable an industry to pay fair profits to the shareholders and to yield a fair return on the capital invested in it. I claim that when we grant these concessions to industry or to capital we should give some consideration to the needs of the workers employed in industry. Let me quote now from an article published in a paper entitled "Profits and Wages" under date of March 15 last, which deals with the General Motors Corporation. The heading over that article is "General Motors Profits Equal Payroll for 1927." The article begins with this statement:

> The gross profit of the General Motors Corporation in 1927 exceeded the total amount distributed to its employees in wages. This extraordinary result of high-speed exploitation of labour appears in the anual report of this duPont-Morgan automobile giant. The report shows the gross profit at $328,893,359, compared with a payroll of $302,904,988.

The article goes on to say:

> The man who invested a little over $700 in General Motors at the beginning of its career is to-day receiving without any work on his part cash dividends equal to the entire yearly wage of the average worker on the payroll.
> A worker's life invested in the production of automobiles would thus have a capitalized value of $700.

Further on the article says:

> The 1927 report shows that in the last three years $324,091,580 additional capital has been invested in the business and that $212,255,382 of this has come out of excess profits, that is from profits over and above the huge cash dividends which the giant corporation has disbursed.

And then one further item:

> If you can follow your way through all this manipulation you can get some sort of an idea of what original investors are making on the money they actually contributed toward producing automobiles. For 1927 it would probably be something like 900 per cent.

I have been quoting from a statement dealing with the General Motors Corporation of which the Oshawa plants are a subsidiary, and I presume that the profits have been as large in Oshawa as in other plants on this continent. Now when we are considering the tariff from the viewpoint of the profits that can be made in an industry it is time we gave a little consideration to the position of the workers engaged in industry. For too long a time parliament has been considering the interests of the industrialists and has neglected the interests of the workers. I may be sounding a new note in this debate in connection with the matter of tariff adjustment, but it is one as to which we will hear more as time goes on. Parliament has considered the tariff in the past too much from one angle, and the workers are beginning to wonder why their interests are not considered when a budget is discussed. If I have in this particular case injected the claims of the workers in connection with the adjustment of the tariff, I believe that action will be sympathetically received by workers in the city of Oshawa as well as in other parts of the Dominion. It may be quite true that I have not received many requests from Oshawa in this particular regard, but let me say this: At Oshawa they have never had a real trades union. Organizers have gone there to organize such unions but have met with a very hostile reception from the management of the industry. I have spoken in the last few days to men who have tried to organize the workers along trades union lines but they have never succeeded. May I say that it was not union men who went out on strike but non-union workers. I hardly think any of them belong to anything in the shape of a trade union. You can understand what the condition of the men must have been, who, driven to desperation, went out on strike, and also when the rest of the workers went out on strike in sympathy with them. They went out because they felt that when the axe fell on the trimmers they would be the next to feel its weight. We can therefore understand the reason why there is not an automobile being produced to-day in the city of Oshawa at the General Motors Corporation.

Those in the labour group have often been accused of fomenting strikes among the workers of the country, and other things of that nature. Upon whom can such an accusation be laid in the present case? Will it be directed against the workers, or will this parliament be honest and place the blame where it fairly belongs? Hon. members ought to express themselves frankly in this matter. Parliament granted this automobile industry a protection which previous to 1926 amounted to 35 per cent, and it is still enjoying approximately the same amount of protection if the excise tax is taken into consideration. I want to see parliament do something for the workers in this industry. The wages of these workers were never exorbitant and yet they have been further reduced.

There is not much more I wish to say at this time, although a good deal more could be said. I rose to-day to make my protest against the cut in wages made by the General Motors Corporation, and I trust that the efforts made by the Department of Labour will result in the men going back to work at the wages they were formerly receiving.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Special War Revenue Act, chapter 179 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, and to provide:

1. That section eighty of the said act which imposes an excise tax on automobiles adaptable for passenger use be amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

"4. When goods of any class mentioned in schedule I are manufactured or produced in Canada and are for use by the manufacturer or producer thereof and not for sale, such goods shall, for the purposes of this part, be deemed to have been manufactured or produced in Canada and sold, and the sale shall be deemed to have taken place when the goods are used or appropriated for use. The minister may determine the value of the said goods for the tax."

2. That the rate of consumption or sales tax be reduced to 3 per cent and that any enactment which may be founded on this resolution No. 2, shall be deemed to have come into force on the seventeenth day of February, 1928, and to have applied to goods imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on or after that date and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that date.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the minister explain, particularly section 4?

Mr. ROBB: It is to make it more uniform. According to the memorandum which I have from the Department of National Revenue, some firms in Canada purchase chassis which are not subject to excise tax and build a passenger body thereon, the completed automobile being for the use of such persons or firms and not for sale. As section 80 quoted above imposes an excise tax only when the goods mentioned in schedules 1 and 2 are sold, the department has been unable to collect this tax from these persons when the automobiles are for their own use. If, however, they bought a completed automobile the excise tax would apply.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is to prevent any escape from the tax?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The other section, as I understand it, just puts into effect the budget resolution in regard to reducing the sales tax?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. COOTE: I wish to ask the minister a question regarding the excise tax which he removed from automobiles valued at less than $1,200. If I remember well, the promise made by the automobile manufacturers at the time was that they would not take advantage of the remission by using it in the form of protection but would pass the advantage on to the consumers. I am sure that if the minister will take the trouble to look into the matter, he will find that some of the manufacturers who signed the letter are to-day taking full advantage of that remission of excise tax on Canadian-made cars. He made a very definite statement at that time that he would compel those manufacturers to live up to that agreement. I should like to ask the minister if he will not at this session of parliament take proper means to deal with the situation in order to see that these manufacturers pass the advantage on to the consumers of automobiles?

Mr. ROBB: I have no information other than what my hon. friend has said, nor have I any complaints that the reduction has not been passed on to the purchasers. But after the session, when I have more time, I will look more carefully into the matter. My hon. friend will agree with me that, just on a bare statement, we cannot adopt legislation affecting all the different firms throughout Canada.

Mr. COOTE: In my speech on the budget I showed the automobile prices, which I think cannot be disputed and which prove beyond doubt that most of the firms who signed that letter are to-day violating their promise. They are taking advantage of the remission and in many cases they are charging the Canadian consumer 30 per cent more for a car than the price in the United States. When they do that they must be taking advantage of the remission of excise tax, and it would not take the officers of the Department of Finance very long to collect information which would convince the minister that this is being done to-day. I do not think parliament can afford to end this session until the matter has been dealt with. These firms should not be allowed to take advantage of the remission and to charge Canadian purchasers this excise tax.

Mr. ROBB: The difference in price cannot all be charged up to the excise tax which was removed. The sales tax still remains.

Mr. COOTE: But there is only a 20 per cent tariff and a sales tax of less than 5 per cent, so that they are certainly taking advantage of the remission of the excise tax. The prices which I quoted, showing the 30 per cent difference, do not include the sales tax. Those prices are all f.o.b. factory. I can assure the minister that if he will look into the situation, he will find that in nearly every case they are taking full advantage of the remission of the excise tax. It was stated in the house at the time the remission was granted that they would take advantage of it; that it was simply handing them back five per cent of protection, and the minister assured the house that if they did not pass this reduction on to the consumer, he would find means to make them do so. I hope when we return after the Easter recess he will have taken the trouble to have the officers of his department collect information which I am sure will satisfy him that these manufacturers, in the majority of cases at any rate, are taking advantage of the remission of excise tax; that they are placing the tax in their own pocket and not passing it on to the Canadian consumer at all.

Mr. ROBB: I shall this afternoon direct the attention of the Department of National Revenue to the observations of my hon. friend and ask them to check the matter up. It may take some time to do so.

Mr. EVANS: I should like to know what percentage of motor cars made in Canada is imported whether in finished or unfinished parts. I ask this question in view of statements of some of our protectionist friends this year, that owing to the reduction in duty Canadian plants are becoming simply assembling plants.

Mr. ROBB: I cannot give my hon. friend that information now. I will endeavour to get it for him.

Mr. EVANS: The value or quantity.

Mr. GARDINER: In view of the importance of the letter which was read by the Minister of Finance when the reduction was made in the tariff on automobiles, and remembering the promise he made to this house at that time, I should like to ask him whether he has taken any steps to see that the reduction of five per cent in the excise tax has been passed on to the consumer. Has any effort been made by his department or by the Department of National Revenue to see that that promise has been kept?

Mr. ROBB: All I can say in answer to my hon. friend is to repeat what I said to the hon. member for Macleod, that I had heard no complaints until I listened to the remarks he made a few moments ago.

Mr. GARDINER: My question was altogether different from his. I will repeat it. In view of the importance which was attached to the document which the minister read to the house at the time of the reduction in the automobile tax, and in view of the promises he made to the house at that time, has his department made any inquiry to see that that agreement has been lived up to? That is an altogether different question from that of the hon. member for Macleod.

Mr. ROBB: I can tell my hon. friend that we have quite enough to do without chasing after trouble. We have had no complaints.

Mr. GARDINER: This is not a question of chasing after trouble. A promise was made to the house and to the people that this matter would be closely scrutinized to see that the people got the advantage of this reduction, instead of the automobile manufacturers.

Mr. ROBB: I cannot give my hon. friend any other answer than I have given. This is a very large country, and it is reasonable to suppose that if the people, reading the proceedings of parliament, observed that that promise had been made, they would not hesitate to put in a complaint if they were not satisfied.

Mr. GARDINER: As I understand the situation at that time, it was not contemplated that the people would have to put in a complaint to get justice. The situation then was altogether different from the way the minister presents it to-day. It is very obvious that the Finance minister has not lived up to that promise, and under those circumstances he might just as well admit it. I appeal to him now to live up to the promise he made at that time.

Mr. COOTE: I would just like to direct the attention of the committee and of the Minister of Finance to the percentage of increase in the price of certain makes of cars in Canada over the prices charged in the United States; and these prices do not include any tax; they are f.o.b. factory. I have taken them from the newspapers and other publications in Canada and the United States. I quote them subject to correction, but to the best of my knowledge they are absolutely correct. Hon. members will find that I quoted these figures in my speech on the budget on March 6 (Hansard, page 1127), showing that the price of a Ford coupe is 29.1 per cent higher in Canada than in the United States; a Whippet coach 29.9 per cent higher; an Erskine coach 35.4 per cent higher; and a Chrysler coupe 29.8 per cent higher. The makers of all these cars I have mentioned signed the letter which has been referred to here to-day, and I think there is evidence enough in the figures I have quoted to convince the minister that it is necessary to deal with this subject.

In my opinion the point raised by the hon. member for Acadia was well taken. The Finance minister has plenty of men in his department to spare one to look after the interests of the public. It is pretty hard for the public to know whether or not this particular remission in the excise tax is being taken advantage of by the manufacturers, but as I remember the discussion that took place here, in 1926, and relate it to the prices now being charged by these firms, I am sure that these firms are taking advantage of the remission. Before this change was made in the excise tax, at the request of the manufacturers, as I remember very well, the prices in Canada were approximately 25 per cent higher than in the United States, and that was about as high as the Canadian manufacturers could get them unless our people were to go over the border and drive their new cars in here. But to-day the increase is approximately 30 per cent, because of the remission in the excise tax that has been made on Canadian made cars. I hope the minister will press this matter energetically. I am glad he has said that he will look into it, and I hope we may look for some action on his part when parliament resumes after the Easter recess.

Mr. FANSHER (Lambton): I am glad that the Finance minister says he will look into this matter. It has been my opinion since the very first that the manufacturers of automobiles have been taking advantage of this reduction in the excise tax. Anyone who has been closely connected with the motor car industry or has been in the agency business knows that soon after the tariff was reduced on the lower priced cars from 35 to 20 per cent there was a reduction in the price of these cars, but whereas the tariff reduction amounted to 15 per cent, the reduction in the price of the cars amounted to only 10 per cent. I think that reduction was made by the manufacturers for a purpose. Shortly after the tariff was reduced by 15 per cent the automobile manufacturers came to parliament and promised that if the excise tax were removed they would pass that reduction on to the consumer. To my mind what really happened after the excise tax was removed was that the remaining 5 per cent of the 15 per cent tariff reduction, which would have to go in the course of time in any event, was passed on to the consumer; and the reduction of the excise tax was taken advantage of by the manufacturers themselves and no corresponding reduction was made to the consumer. I remember discussing this matter at the time with some automobile agents, and they distinctly told me that following the 15 per cent tariff reduction, only a 10 per cent reduction was made in the price of cars, and they wanted to know why a still further reduction should not be made in the price. To my mind it was a plan on the part of the automobile industry to hold back the remaining five per cent in order to secure a reduction of the excise tax. If the minister looks into the matter, I am sure he will find that I am in large measure right in what I say.

Mr. ROBB: I beg to move that the following be inserted in the resolutions amending the Special War Revenue Act:

That Part II of the Special War Revenue Act, chapter 179, revised statutes of Canada, be repealed as from the 31st of December, 1927.

The explanation of this amendment is as follows: Part II of the Special War Revenue Act imposes a tax of 1 per cent upon the gross interest from loans and investments in Canada and upon the gross income from business transacted in Canada. Such tax is a deduction from the tax otherwise payable under the Income War Tax Act. There is but a small collection of revenue under this act over the amount that would otherwise be collected under the Income War Tax Act, and rather than have a multiplicity of taxes this is repealed. Further, the excess apart from Income War Tax that is collected is generally from companies that have no profits, as the tax under the Special War Revenue Act is upon the gross income or interest.

It is estimated that the reduction in revenue will not exceed $30,000. It will save a lot of bookkeeping, and probably the loss in revenue will be more than offset by the gain in respect to administration.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It has been a surprise to me that the law has remained as it is for so long. It was entirely an emergency tax, the idea of the tax being, of course, to get money at the earliest possible moment and in as large sums as possible. I think the tax was imposed in 1915.

Mr. ROBB: 1914.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It was subsequently looked after by the Income Tax Act and income derived from all lines of business carried on in Canada by those companies was immediately taxable in gross; this one per cent charge was taken from it. When the Income Tax Act came into force it was apparent that it would be absolutely unjust to keep up two sets of taxation; but on the other hand money was exceedingly scarce and the burdens of the country exceedingly great, and accordingly the old act was retained for the purpose of reaching those who otherwise would not be taxable under the Income Tax Act. Well, we have had the exemptions enlarged, and this act should have gone with those exemptions long ago. I have no doubt that what my hon. friend says is absolutely correct, that it is costing just as much in keeping this out-of-date measure upon our statutes as is collected under it.

Resolution as amended agreed to.

COPPER BOUNTIES ACT AMENDMENT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend The Copper Bounties Act, 1923, and to provide that the payment of bounties at the rate of one-half of one cent per pound on copper bars or rods, as described in the said act, be continued up to the thirtieth day of June, 1931.

Mr. ADSHEAD: How much was paid in 1927 for bounties on copper; and why is it considered necessary to extend the act for three years more?

Mr. ROBB: On the basis of the production in 1926-27 there would have been paid in bounties, at the new rate, $93,950.93, and for the ten months ending January 31, 1928, at the new rate, $50,900. This resolution is to continue the bounty for three years at the lowest rate of ½ cent per pound. It started at 1½ cents, scaling down from time to time. By 1931 we are assured that the industry will be on a solid footing.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: How many companies have been able to take advantage of this act?

Mr. ROBB: Only one, so far as I know.

Mr. ESLING: I should like to say a word, Mr. Chairman, on the very important industry to which the resolution refers. It provides for an extension of the bounty of ½ cent per pound until June 31, 1931, on copper bars and rods manufactured in Canada and sold for consumption in Canada from copper produced in Canada from ore mined in Canada. We have here an indication of some desire to encourage the creation of Canadian payrolls by the production and manufacture of one of our resources. This bounty is available to any individual or syndicate of individuals who choose to invest their capital in the construction of refineries. It is true that at the present time there is but one beneficiary, but I have been advised by well-informed operators that before the period of this extension expires there will be a very decided change, resulting in more and larger refineries being established. To-day, so far as I can learn, outside the United States there are but three copper refineries in the world. One is in Australia, another in Canada and a third in Japan.

You can readily understand what an enormous output the United States has when it is stated that 95 per cent of the world's copper supply is controlled and refined in that country. We have simply five per cent remaining for these other three refineries. The Canadian refinery is located in Trail, in the district of West Kootenay, British Columbia. It produces 10,000 tons, or 20,000,000 pounds of refined copper per year, valued at approximately $3,000,000. But in addition to the refined copper turned out at Trail, there is produced in Canada raw copper, copper matte and blister copper to the value of $12,000,000. This entire output is shipped to the United States, where it is refined. These properties are located largely on the Pacific coast. They are controlled by United States interests, and naturally those interests are quite willing to have the raw material go to the States where wages are expended in refining it.

Not only do we lose the wages paid on refining this raw material in the United States, but out of $12,000,000 worth shipped to that country $7,000,000 worth is returned to Canada for consumption here. As the United States control 95 per cent of the world output, they also control the price, and they take advantage of that control by fixing two prices, one for home consumption and the other for export, the export price being $8 per ton in excess of the domestic price. So that the copper control of the United States enables their operators to say to the world at large: That is our price; you will pay us $8 a ton in excess of what we sell for home consumption or you may leave it, just as you please.

Now, with the enormous production there you can understand that the United States has the advantage also of refining copper more cheaply. This will be readily apparent when I state that at the refinery in Trail they turn out 20,000,000 pounds per year, while in just one tankroom in the plant at Anaconda, in the States, they turn out 17,000,000 pounds in one month—a very decided difference. We all realize what wonderful activities are in progress in a mining way throughout the Dominion to-day. In fact, I think it is generally admitted that these activities have just started.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Did I understand the hon. member to say that the refinery at Trail is working at full capacity, or not?

Mr. ESLING: No. I say it refines 10,000 tons or 20,000,000 pounds a year. I say there is so much mining activity to-day that in a very short time there will be more smelters, more concentrators and more refineries in the Dominion, particularly if they are given proper encouragement. The prospects are so bright, I have been informed, that before the period expires for the payment of this bounty there will be refineries in Canada producing 100,000 tons of refined copper per annum. One hundred thousand tons of refined copper produced from ore mined and smelted in Canada would not only create an enormous payroll but would open various avenues of business and trade, and you can readily understand the prosperity that would follow. It would not only create Canadian payrolls but it would go very much farther, by enabling Canada to care for the copper and metal requirements of the British Empire. The empire to-day purchases from $40,000,000 to $50,000,000 worth of copper annually from the United States and on that purchase of forty or fifty millions is paid this excess of $8 per ton on such as is not manufactured. The last figures available of exports from the United States to various parts of the Empire are for 1926, but they are very fair indications of what the 1927 figures will show. In the year 1926 the United States exported copper to the United Kingdom to the value of $29,000,000; to Canada, $6,500,000; to British India, $846,000; to Australia, $214,000; to Hong Kong, $135,000; to British South Africa, $155,000; and the balance to other sections of the empire. You can see, therefore, the absolute hold which the copper trust of the United States has on the empire at large and you can readily understand how urgent it is that this condition should be changed, because every country over which the British flag floats pays that excess of $8 per ton. In view of what has happened in the past there is nothing in the world to prevent this copper trust from saying, "We will make it $18 instead of $8". And Canada would have to pay the toll in common with the rest of the empire. This possibility is emphasized by our experience during the war. When the allies needed copper the United States control simply said, "Our price is 31½ cents and it will have to be paid". And it was paid. The hon. leader of the opposition the other day referred to the zinc situation during the war, when the United States controlled the world's zinc supply. They then fixed the price at 44 cents per pound, and it was due entirely to the work of the research laboratory at Trail, which solved the problem of treating zinc ores, that the smelter there was able to break the combine and provide the allies with zinc at from 12 to 15 cents per pound. That result is to be attributed to research. You can go back further in the research work and other activities on the part of the Trail smelter and you have the interesting fact that that smelter perfected the process of refining lead by electricity, as a result of which Trail had the first electrolytic lead refinery in the world. Hon. gentlemen all know that the major portion of our asbestos goes to the United States as well as the greater portion of our nickle, where these products are manufactured and shipped back to us in the finished state in very large quantities. Last year there came back to the empire $1,000,000 worth of asbestos products on which wages were paid in the United States, and there was shipped to the empire at large $1,000,000 worth of Canadian nickel manufactured in the States.

Obviously, therefore, this is a very important subject. When we consider the prospects of our mineral development we can see that the result will be the establishment of smelters, concentrators and refineries, and this will mean not only more Canadian pay cheques for Canadian workmen but, if the government is so disposed, it will mean the protection of the empire's metal requirements against foreign control and price dictation.

As a result of the recent imperial conference Canada, we are told, had assumed a new constitutional status and was now an independent nation. Be that as it may, the fact remains that our geographical status is the same. Our borders are open on three sides and just so long as Canada remains within the empire we shall be absolutely and directly dependent upon the mother country for protection. You cannot get away from that. But we are becoming so carelessly indifferent to that fact that we are forgetting that to-day our security rests entirely with the British navy; and for that security and protection we contribute not one dollar to the British exchequer. It sounds well, no doubt, to be referred to as an independent nation, and it adds to our national pride to feel that we are almost a great nation. But it seems to me that it would be everlastingly to the credit of Canada if at the same time we could be stamped in the eyes of the world as a grateful nation; and I think the best way we could show our gratitude would be by protecting the empire's needs for such minerals and metals as we produce. I do not think the government would make any mistake if it formulated a policy whereby the minerals and metals of this Dominion might be conserved for the use of Canada and of the empire at large, so as to render us absolutely free from the dictation and price control of a foreign country. I am quite confident that Great Britain would co-operate and lend encouragement, and very probably other assistance, in carrying out such a policy, and I am equally confident that this house and the country generally would heartily approve of any measure which would free Canada and the empire from the price control and dictation to which it is now subjected.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Some years ago a friend of mine got me interested in a copper mine near Stewart, and he gave me a piece of information which I submit to the Minister of Finance for what it is worth. He told me that in connection with the smelting trade they were mining some copper ores near Stewart, and he said that ores could be shipped by the Panama canal to Swansea and be refined there cheaper than it could be done shipping by rail to Trail. If that be the case it would seem that there is discrimination against our own smelter at Trail, or that the rates are too high.

Mr. EVANS: May I ask the minister a question? What is the value of the product on which this bounty is paid?

Mr. ROBB: It is selling to-day at from 14 to 15 cents a pound refined, in the bar.

Mr. EVANS: What was the total value of the product on which this bounty was paid?

Mr. ROBB: I could not give my hon. friend that information, but I can tell him the bounties which have been paid since the act was passed. In round figures those sums are $14,551, $14,822, $93,263, $70,978, and about $68,000 last year. It is estimated that the bounty of one-half cent per pound will amount to about $50,900 on the same production. We are simply extending this act as it is now for another three years. The act provides a maximum of $200,000 in any one year, and does not apply on bars which are exported; they must be sold in Canada.

Mr. EVANS: What is the percentage of the bounty to the value of the production?

Mr. ROBB: I have not that information.

Mr. NEILL: Coming from British Columbia, I am naturally in favour of the extension of this bounty, which I think was started in 1923. I remember the criticism made against it at that time. It has been well said that the lines of political thought are devious, and I could not help thinking of that when I heard the hon. member for West Kootenay (Mr. Esling) tell us we should support this extension because of our gratitude to the British Empire for the protection afforded us by the British navy. According to the statement of the hon. member Canada produces about five per cent of the copper production of the world; if the United States controls 95 per cent of the production, I do not think the British navy will be materially affected by what we do in connection with a fractional part of that 5 per cent, because we are not granting a bounty on the entire Canadian production. I am not familiar with the conditions at Trail; I have never been there, but I believe it is one of the largest smelters in Canada, and if I am not mistaken it is controlled by the Canadian Pacific Railway. I must suppose that the tons there are different from the tons in other parts of British Columbia, because the hon. member stated that the output was 10,000 tons or 3,000,000 pounds.

Mr. ESLING: No, valued at $3,000,000.

Mr. NEILL: I accept the correction, but I have another point to bring up. The hon. member has told us that the body which controls the price of copper in the United States has a habit of fixing the price of copper to be used in Canada or any other place outside the United States at $8 a ton more than the United States price. I would suggest that that is a pretty liberal protection in itself for Canadian manufacturers. So to start with, we have a protection of $8 per ton if the statement of the hon. member for West Kootenay is correct, and on top of that we have this bonus ranging from one and a half cents to one-half cent per pound, or from $30 to $10 per ton, so it would seem to me that the Smelter Co. is being fairly well taken care of.

Mr. BROWN: Is this the same concern which controls the smelting of lead at Trail?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, lead and zinc.

Mr. BROWN: There are some interesting facts in that connection. There is a duty of $20 a ton on lead, and some of us were very interested to find the other day that the people who use lead in the manufacture of paint, for example, buy their lead from Trail and pay that duty. This company which furnishes the lead takes full advantage of that duty except for about ten cents per hundred, which just enables them to hold their trade. One interesting feature which we discovered is that the price paid at Montreal for the lead bought from Trail is the price of lead on the London market plus the duty, plus the freight from London to Montreal. The Montreal price has no relation to the freight rate from Trail to Montreal, except when navigation closes on the St. Lawrence and the freight from London to Montreal goes up about 25 cents a hundred because it has to be landed at Halifax. Then, almost automatically, the smelter at Trail raises the price of the lead by exactly that amount, so the whole evidence is that the lead smelter at Trail is taking the full advantage of the duty with the exception of just enough to enable them to hold the trade. Paint is used very extensively in Canada, and it would be used a great deal more if we could get it at a lower price. In view of the conditions which prevail in regard to lead, and I think I have stated them fairly, this kind of bonus or protection to an institution which is taking full advantage of the Canadian consumer does not appeal to us very strongly.

Mr. EVANS: I hope our protectionist friends will take note of that.

Mr. FANSHER (Last Mountain): With regard to this bounty on copper it is interesting to remember that just a few years ago the predecessor of the present Minister of Finance discontinued the bounty on crude petroleum because fields were being opened in Canada which would draw very heavily on the treasury of the country if the bounty were continued. I would point out that the same condition will obtain in the copper industry, because in the very near future the production of copper in this country will amount to something it is hardly possible to imagine, from the operations which are now taking place in the northern parts of some of the western provinces. In view of this fact I think it would be well for the minister to consider whether this extension should not be limited to one year, or to two years at the most.

Mr. ESLING: The amount of the bounty would not be affected by the copper production. The bounty is paid on the refined copper, and it takes two or three years to build refineries.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I should like to say just a few words in support of this resolution. It is all very well to laugh at the small production which we have obtained in Canada so far, but this smelter at Trail is one of the achievements in Canada of which we might well be proud. We only wish we had an equally large smelter in eastern Canada. Some years ago I pointed out the benefits to Canada derived from this smelter. Mention was made here to-day of a mine somewhere near Stewart. If there was a smelter near Stewart, we would be refining a great deal of lead. The Trail smelter only takes care of its own field, and the result is that the ores from such places as Stewart have to be sent to the refineries of the United States.

Mr. ADSHEAD: The statement is made that ores can be shipped from Stewart by way of the Panama canal to Swansea, Wales, at a cheaper rate than they can be shipped to Trail.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Quite true. There is a refinery near Stewart which is also American.

I should like to point out that the present production is largely due to the work of the prospector, and if you study conditions in eastern Canada and Northern Ontario and Quebec you will find the situation to be this: For some years prospectors were taught to look for gold and silver, and the result was they found no other minerals. During the last few years, however, they have been taught to search for copper, lead and zinc, and they find these minerals in great quantities in northern Ontario and Quebec. If this bounty is continued—although I am not in favour of a bounty, as of some other form of protection—we will have a smelter established in eastern Canada equal to that at Trail. Then there will be competition and a reduction in price, and in eastern Canada we shall be in a more independent position. There is no question about it. For years the International Nickel Co. has been operating round Sudbury but it has confined its work to nickel. We have tremendous fields of copper the result of persons being taught to look for them. They are now being discovered by prospectors trained in our mining schools, and the result is that in a very few years the development will be something beyond what any person in Canada can now imagine.

Mr. LAPIERRE: I concur in the remarks which have been made by the hon. member for Kingston. Few of us are aware of the tremendous possibilities in connection with the recent discoveries that have been made in northern Ontario and northern Quebec. Our copper industry is in its infancy, though in the district which I have the honour to represent we have been producing copper for forty years. We also supply 85 per cent of the world's nickel. Recently there has been discovered in the nickel fields of Ontario one of the largest copper deposits on the American continent, and one of the strange features of this discovery is that this copper was found in connection with nickel. When the nickel mine at Frood had been sunk to a depth of over 3,000 feet a tremendous body of high grade copper ore was discovered; and to-day the International Nickel Co. and the Mond Nickel Co. have entered into a development that will entail an expenditure of eighteen or twenty million dollars. It would be almost fatal to the copper industry at the present juncture if the present bounty were discontinued. If there was any time in the history of the copper industry when the bonus should be maintained it is now. There has been discovered in one mine alone, the Frood mine of the International Nickel Co., a body of high grade ore which has an estimated value to-day of over $1,000,000,000. This is only one of the mines in the district adjoining these big copper deposits. Discoveries of lead and zinc have also been made and these promise to become sources of tremendous wealth to Canada. There is no doubt that with the continuation of this bounty, you will see in the Sudbury district within a very few years, one of the largest smelters on the American continent. The International Nickel Co. have also laid the foundations for a smelter the estimated cost of which is nearly $10,000,000. They have completed their shaft, 17½ by 20 feet, to a depth of 3,044 feet, and it is the largest on the American continent. They have localized their ore bodies, and are now in a position to go ahead and develop their mines. Imagine for a moment what the effect would be on this industry if the bounty were discontinued at the present time. Copper is one of the basic metals of the world to-day and industry is continually finding new uses for it. Would it not be unwise in view of the great amount of prospecting that has been done, and the large amount of capital which has been invested in the mining industry, to remove the bounty at the present time? There is no doubt in the minds of those who are familiar with the geological formation of our great pre-Cambrian shield that the discovery of copper on this scale is only one of the many discoveries that will be made in the near future, and I am very much in favour of having this bounty continued.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I have just one comment to make and that is with respect to the somewhat singular argument that has been advanced in support of the continuation of this bounty. We have been accustomed to hear that owing to the mass production in the United States they can flood our market with cheap goods, and the Dumping Act has been applied to prevent products from the United States being sold at a lower rate than the rate at which they are sold in the domestic market. Now we are asked to provide a bounty for the copper industry and one of the reasons advanced in its support is that products from the United States are being sold here at a price which is $8 higher than the rate in the domestic market. On the one hand it seems that action must be taken to prevent the importation of articles from the United States at a lower price than is current there, and on the other we are told that we must have this bounty because we are charged an excessive price by United States smelters. I am not in favour of the bounty, although I should like to see Canadian ores refined in Canadian refineries, but some of the arguments that have been advanced are singular, to say the least.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 170, to amend the Special War Revenue Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is some other legislation in connection with this bill and it should be left in committee.

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Progress reported.

[Mr. Lapierre.]

COPPER BOUNTIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 171, to amend the Copper Bounties Act, 1923.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. ROBB moved the second reading of the bill.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): On division.

Motion agreed to on division, bill read the second time and considered in committee.

Mr. ROBB moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): On division.

Motion agreed to on division, and bill read the third time and passed.

EXPERIMENTAL FARMS STATIONS ACT AMENDMENT

The house in committee on Bill No. 10, to amend the Experimental Farms Stations Act—Mr. Motherwell—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

DAIRY INDUSTRY ACT AMENDMENT

The house in committee on Bill No. 12, to amend the Dairy Industry Act—Mr. Motherwell—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Agriculture—Health of animals, administration of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act and Meat and Canned Foods Act, and necessary buildings: $2,270,000.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I understand that the Black Rod will arrive on the scene in about seven minutes, but I promised the hon. member for Victoria that we would go into supply. Whether it is worth while to stay in supply until that momentous moment arrives, it is for the committee to say.

Mr. TOLMIE: I could not get my supply through in that time.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I had no idea until just now that we were not going to sit to-night. As requested by the hon. member for Acadia, I have had prepared a number of copies of the proposed expenditure under the various subdivisions of this vote, and while these are being distributed to hon. members, I will read the details:

Health of Animals Branch
Estimates 1928-29
Animal Contagious Diseases Division
(Field inspection, tuberculosis eradication policies, animal quarantine, inspection of animals for import and export)

Salaries of employees	$514,000
Travelling expenses	300,000
Tuberculosis compensation	702,200
Hog Cholera compensation	10,000
Glanders compensation	7,000
Mange eradication	17,000
Rentals of offices and other buildings	7,400
Printing and stationery	14,000
Miscellaneous accounts	35,000
		$1,606,600

Meat and Canned Foods Division
(Inspection of meat packing establishments, canning factories, etc.)

Salaries of employees	$550,700
Travelling expenses	25,000
Printing and stationery	10,000
Miscellaneous accounts	12,850
		$598,550

Pathological Division
(Research work in animal diseases, preparation of tuberculin, etc., diagnosis of disease from specimens)

Salaries of employees	$35,850
Travelling expenses	1,500
Miscellaneous accounts	27,500
		64,850
Total		$2,270,000

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I understood that the ex-Minister of Agriculture wanted to say something on this item, but if he is not going to speak now—

Mr. TOLMIE: I said that I could not do anything in four minutes, and that is all that is left now.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Then I would like to ask the minister what is the reason for the increase of $68,000.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This is a progressively increasing work, and naturally it requires an increasing amount of money each year, especially the eradication of bovine tuberculosis. As a result of the suspension of the export trade in cattle to Great Britain, we have been able to extend the work much more rapidly this year as we have been able to use the services of twenty-five veterinarians who had been formerly engaged in accompanying shipments of cattle exported overseas, but even with this help we are not able to keep up with the applications from the various provinces for the organization and establishment of further restricted areas for the eradication, so far as is humanly possible, of tuberculosis in cattle. It is the extension of that work that is the main reason for this increase.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In view of the large amount involved in this item and the contentious nature of the purpose for which the sum is voted, I think it will be proper for the minister at this stage to make a report to the house covering the operation of the plan to date, and giving the percentage of reduction in bovine tuberculosis wherever eradication has really occurred, as well as the total cost of the scheme if it is to be extended over the immense area of Canada. The minister will perhaps be at greater ease if I concentrate my suggestion to him in a single sentence. What I would like him to do is now to make a report to the committee on the operation, success, and future of the bovine tuberculosis eradication plan.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is under the restricted area plan. There are three plans.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Cover the whole business.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The restricted area plan was first adopted in Manitoba, at the request of the provincial Department of Agriculture there, in 1923. At first it took in just three municipalities, and the area was extended to four a year or two afterwards. That area was not only the first restricted area in Canada, but the first in the British Empire. About a year after that, a restricted area was established in the province of Quebec in the counties of Beauharnois, Huntingdon, and Chateauguay. This was extended last year as far as the Richelieu river and was further extended this year from the Richelieu river to the St. Francis river. Next, the whole province of Prince Edward Island was made a restricted area, and we found there the smallest percentage of reactors in any province of the Dominion. Only 0.59 per cent of the total cattle population of the Island reacted to the test, if I remember aright. Then about two and a half years ago, we established an area in the Fraser river valley in British Columbia. That is the source from which New Westminster and Vancouver get all their milk supply.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That statement is true in so far as the initial test is concerned.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Six municipalities in Last Mountain formed the next restricted area, and that has not been extended, although there are applications in for its enlargement. Next, we established a small area in New Brunswick about ten miles out from the city of Fredericton containing about two or three thousand cattle. A year ago this spring Prince Edward county in Ontario was organized as the first area of this nature in this province. In Nova Scotia we have practically the whole province, in hand, with the exception of Cape Breton island. Twenty-nine veterinarians have been there since last October, and will continue possibly until about July 1. It is considered that Cape Breton is sufficiently segregated from the rest of the province to avoid any risk of contagion being spread to the mainland from there. The farmers of Cape Breton island are not quite ready to ask for this service until they see how it results in the other parts of the province. I think all the information in connection with this matter is contained in very concise form in a return to an inquiry by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland).

Progress reported.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the senate.

Accordingly the house went up to the senate.

And having returned,

Mr. SPEAKER informed the house that the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name the royal assent to the following bills:

An act respecting the Canadian National Railways and respecting the Canadian Northern Railway Company five per cent income charge convertible debenture stock.

An act to amend the Income War Tax Act.

On motion of Mr. Robb the house adjourned at 6 p.m. until Tuesday, April 10.

Tuesday, April 10, 1928

The house met at three o'clock.

PETITIONS

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): I wish to add to the thirty thousand signatures I presented last session some six thousand names of persons in New Brunswick, Quebec, Manitoba, Ontario and Saskatchewan asking for the transfer to the prairie provinces of their natural resources without restrictions.

I have also been requested to present to the house a petition signed by some ten thousand men and women of the Dominion asking the parliament of Canada to enact legislation whereby it shall be constituted a crime, punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both, for any person or persons to state or publish any statement that any person or persons legally married according to the law of any province in Canada under which such marriage takes place, are not legally or lawfully married, or are living in adultery, or shall in any way make reflections upon the legality of such marriage or the legitimacy of any child or children born of such marriage.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT MERCHANT MARINE

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I lay on the table of the house the ninth annual report of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, and I wish to advise the house that I expect either to-morrow or the following day to be able to table the annual report of the Canadian National Railways.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ROBERT FORKE (Minister of Immigration and Colonization) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 187, to amend the Immigration Act.

Mr. MANION: Explain.

Mr. FORKE: This bill reads:

His Majesty by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

Section 41 of the Immigration Act, chapter 93 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, is hereby repealed.

Hon. members will remember that a similar bill was introduced into the house last session and if I recollect rightly it was carried without division but it was afterwards rejected by the senate. I do not think it is necessary for me to read the clause which has been repealed.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Had we not better reform the senate first.

Mr. FORKE: Maybe. This bill is designed to make deportation for certain causes dependent upon a conviction in Canada, under part II of the Criminal Code, relating to offences against public order, rather than upon a hearing before a board of inquiry concerning certain offences under section 41 of the Immigration Act.

Proceedings for the deportation of such undesirable classes are provided by sections 40, 42 and 43 of the act, and under those sections deportation may be carried out. It is considered that the provisions of section 41 are unnecessary, as section 40 and part II of the Criminal Code cover the case.

I do not think it is necessary to make any further explanation because all the members who were here last session will be conversant with this proposed amendment to the Immigration Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADA GRAIN ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. JAMES MALCOLM (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 188, to amend the Canada Grain Act.

Mr. MANION: Explain.

Mr. MALCOLM: The amendments proposed by this bill to the Canada Grain Act are with regard to the grading of spring wheat, oats and barley. These amendments are made upon the recommendation of the Board of Grain Commissioners after a thorough investigation and they are rendered necessary by the development of new varieties of these grains and by new conditions. It is felt that the proposed amendments will meet the existing situation and will prove of considerable benefit to the western producers.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRISONS AND REFORMATORIES ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 189, to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act.

Mr. GARDINER: Explain.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Part 9 of the Prisons and Reformatories Act applies only to the provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. The purpose of this amendment is to extend to Nova Scotia as well the application of the sections concerning the home for young women in Cloverdale, New Brunswick. Owing to a mistake, Nova Scotia was not included in the amendment of two years ago and this is for the purpose of sending young women from Nova Scotia as well to that home in New Brunswick.

Mr. BENNETT: Nova Scotia was left out in the revision, was it not?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 190, to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

He said: This bill is offering some slight amendments on matters of procedure. For instance, there are now two judges of the exchequer court, the chief justice and a puisne judge, and this bill is for the purpose of making it clear that either the president of the court or the puisne judge may exercise the power which in many statutes is conferred upon a judge of the exchequer court.

There is also a section of the act which provides that the practice and procedure in suits, actions and matters in the exchequer court shall be regulated by the practice and procedure in similar suits in His Majesty's high court of justice in England. That provision was made in 1877, and since then the practice and procedure in the high court of justice in England has been amended in many respects. This bill is for the purpose of having those same amendments apply to our exchequer court.

The bill will also give to the judges of the court the right to make general rules and orders, instead of only the chief justice as formerly.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 191, to amend the Criminal Code.

He said: This bill is for the purpose of reintroducing a bill which passed this house on three or four occasions but was rejected by the senate. It is for the purpose of repealing a clause which was inserted in the Criminal Code in the session of 1919 concerning unlawful associations, the printing of seditious books, and so forth.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INTERPROVINCIAL AND INTERNATIONAL TRAFFIC IN INTOXICATING LIQUORS

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 192, respecting interprovincial and international traffic in intoxicating liquors.

He said: This bill provides that in any province where there is in force an act in virtue of which it is unlawful to sell or have in possession intoxicating liquors without authority or permit of the government of the province or of any board, commission or other governmental agency authorized to issue such permit or grant, it shall be unlawful to import liquors otherwise than through the governmental agency, board or commission which has the control of the sale of liquor in the province.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DOMINION FOREST RESERVES AND PARKS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 193, to amend the Dominion Forest Reserves and Parks Act.

He said: The object of this amendment is merely to withdraw from the forest reserves in Manitoba and Saskatchewan certain areas which have been examined by our soil surveyors and have been approved of as fit for agricultural purposes. It is proposed to withdraw one quarter section of land from the Riding Mountain forest reserve in Manitoba, and in Saskatchewan, an area of 21 square miles from the Big River forest reserve; also 6.65 square miles from the Fort a la Corne forest reserve; one-half section from the Pasquia reserve; one half section from the Porcupine No. 2 reserve; one quarter section from the Pines reserve; 2.25 square miles from the Keppel reserve, and .63 of a square mile from the Nisbet reserve. All of these small withdrawals consist of lands which have been applied for and found suitable for settlement.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the first reading of Bill No. 194, to amend the Canadian National Railway Act.

He said: The object of this bill is to bring the Canadian government railways more completely under the jurisdiction of the railway commission than is now the case.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 168, for the relief of Daisy Myrtle McPherson.—Mr. Pettit.

GENEVA SLAVERY CONVENTION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the slavery convention signed at Geneva on the twenty-fifth of September, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-six, and which was signed, on behalf of Canada, by the Canadian representative duly authorized to that effect;

And that this house do approve of same.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as the resolution indicates, this international convention was approved by the seventh assembly of the League of Nations. It was signed by the Right Hon. Sir George Foster, under authority of an order in council of Canada, passed on August 7th, 1926. The matter was fully discussed by the Assembly of the League of Nations, and Canada's representatives were present during the discussion. The convention contains twelve articles, which may be summarized as follows:

The contracting parties undertake to prevent and to suppress the slave trade and to bring about the complete abolition of slavery in all its forms. For this purpose they shall give to one another all possible assistance and undertake to prevent compulsory or forced labour from developing into conditions analogous to slavery. Disputes arising from this convention, if not settled by direct negotiations, shall be referred to the Permanent Court of International Justice or to some other court of arbitration.

Slavery is defined as being the status or condition of a person over whom any or all of the powers attaching to the right of ownership are exercised. The slave trade includes all acts involved in the capture, acquisition, or disposal of a person with intent to reduce him to slavery or with a view to selling or exchanging him and all acts of trade or transport in slaves.

The convention will come into operation for each state on the date of the deposit of its ratification or of its accession.

It is in order that the convention may be made applicable to Canada in this formal way that the present resolution is introduced.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I cannot but feel that it is idle to ask this house to give its ratification and approval of any measure unless that measure has been printed and in the hands of hon. members for a sufficient time to enable them to study its provisions. We should be something better than mere rubber stamps in a matter of this kind. While the right hon. Prime Minister's explanation makes it abundantly clear that this is a convention to which parliament can give its assent, the fact remains that we should not be asked blindly to approve of any treaty without having had an opportunity to consider its terms and fully understand all its implications. At a later time I shall certainly avail myself of an opportunity to say something with respect to the whole procedure which is followed by this country in regard to the League of Nations, but this is not the time or place to speak of it. However, I do suggest to the Prime Minister that these treaties should be printed and in the hands of hon. members before they are asked to give their approval.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sorry my hon. friend was unavoidably absent from the house before the Easter recess. Had he been present he would recall that at that time I did lay on the table copies of this convention both in English and French. Of course I agree entirely with my hon. friend that the house should have all documents before it in order to study their terms. The conventions have been printed for some time in the proceedings of the League of Nations, and, as I say, they were formally presented to the house in printed form before the Easter vacation.

Mr. BENNETT: I am aware that the right hon. gentleman laid them on the table at the time, but I think that is not sufficient to enable members to have full knowledge of their terms. The documents should be printed and in our possession before we can be in a position to express our views thereon.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They are printed and distributed in both English and French.

Motion agreed to.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That it be resolved by the House of Commons:

That a message be sent to the senate, informing Their Honours that this house has adopted the above resolution and requesting that Their Honours will unite with this house in the approval of the above mentioned convention and that the Clerk do carry the said message to the senate;

And that this house do approve of same.

Motion agreed to.

QUEBEC HARBOUR COMMISSION

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance, for the Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to authorize a loan to the Harbour Commissioners of Quebec in an amount not exceeding $8,500,000 to carry on the construction of terminal facilities, upon approval by the governor in council of detailed plans, specifications and estimates for such works, and the deposit of debentures of the corporation to cover said loan.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

SAINT JOHN HARBOUR COMMISSION

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance, for the Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved that the moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to authorize a loan to the Harbour Commissioners of Saint John in an amount not exceeding $5,000,000 to enable the corporation to construct such terminal facilities as are necessary properly to equip the port of Saint John, upon approval by the governor in council of detailed plans, specifications and estimates for such works, and the deposit of debentures of the corporation to cover said loan.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

HALIFAX HARBOUR COMMISSION

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance, for the Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to authorize a loan to the Harbour Commissioners of Halifax in an amount not exceeding $500,000, to enable the corporation to construct such terminal facilities as are necessary to properly equip the port of Halifax, upon approval by the governor in council of detailed plans, specifications and estimates for such works and the deposit of debentures of the corporation to cover said loan.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

TORONTO TERMINALS RAILWAY COMPANY

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that the acts relating to the Toronto Terminals Railway Company be amended to provide that the amount of $7,000,000 which the Canadian National Railway Company was authorized to issue by the amending act, 1925, c. 28, may be increased to $10,500,000 to be used for the purposes therein prescribed and for defraying the cost of other railway facilities necessitated by or incidental to the construction of the said viaduct and works.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

ANGLO-EGYPTIAN TREATY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) whether or not there will be laid on the table at an early date the correspondence in connection with the treaty between Egypt and Great Britain so far as that correspondence took place with Canada.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The British government tabled, in the form of a white paper, the correspondence which they wished to have presented to the British House of Commons, and I understand from the despatches which we have received that that is all the British government wishes to have known formally to the world at large. I shall with pleasure communicate with the British government the request of my hon. friend that the correspondence between Canada and Great Britain with respect to the Anglo-Egyptian treaty be laid on the table of this house, and I much hope that the British government will give its consent to having this done.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

CORRESPONDENCE WITH WASHINGTON

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it seems fitting at this time, in view of the press despatches, that I should ask the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for some assurance as to when the correspondence between the government of Canada and the government at Washington will be tabled and also the report of the advisory committee in connection with the St. Lawrence waterway. It is now several weeks since a part at least of the correspondence took place. I think we would not be unreasonable in asking that it be now laid before the house.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Before the Easter recess I took occasion to communicate with the Secretary of State at Washington and intimated that I thought our parliament would wish to have the correspondence tabled very shortly after resuming. I suggested that it should be tabled simultaneously at Washington and at Ottawa early next week. I think I may promise my hon. friend that this will be done.

PRIVILEGE—MR. BENNETT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I hesitate to trouble the house about a personal matter, but on March 29 last, during my absence from the house, in the course of a debate that arose on a motion of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) made certain observations which are reported in Hansard as follows:

Now is there no duty on the part of the government to see that the laws of this Dominion are carried out?

Whereupon the Solicitor General is reported to have remarked:

Before my hon. friend leaves Baldy Robb I would suggest, if he wants to know the reason, that he had better inquire of his own leader.

Whereupon the hon. member for West York replied:

That is a suggestion the hon. gentleman can safely make in the absence of my hon. leader.

The Solicitor General is then reported to have said:

I give you warning.

Subsequently, during a somewhat lengthy discussion towards the close of the debate, the Solicitor General stated that he withdrew nothing that he had said.

I regard these observations as very serious reflections upon myself. If I was in any shameful or discreditable manner associated with this convicted criminal, Baldy Robb, I think I would merit the condemnation of the house. But the facts are these—and I ask my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) to follow me closely: Last summer, after the house had risen, I had occasion to visit the Minister of the Interior in his office at Ottawa in connection with a departmental matter. I do not charge my memory as to how exactly the circumstance arose, but during the course of the conversation something was said about Baldy Robb, and I thereupon observed that he had been released some time ago. The Minister of the Interior said that such was not the case—he had not been released—although as a matter of fact a statement to that effect had appeared in the public press. It transpired that the minister was correct and we had some conversation touching the matter. My recollection is that I stated I would have nothing to do with it, pointing out, however, that I had recently been in Edmonton where I had learned that a large number of people there, who had been associated with the prosecution of Robb, were of the opinion that the ends of justice had been satisfied and the law vindicated by his conviction and imprisonment, and that, having regard to the fact that his wife and family were in poor circumstances, there was no reason why, if the government deemed it a proper course to pursue and such a recommendation should be made to His Excellency, Baldy Robb should not be released on ticket-of-leave. If I remember rightly the Minister of the Interior inquired whether I would have any objection to communicating that fact to the leader of the opposition. I told him I would not. I ascertained that the leader of the opposition was absent from Ottawa, as was also the Solicitor General, and I telephoned the Minister of the Interior to that effect.

I had no communication with the Solicitor General with respect to this matter. I made no recommendations of any kind regarding the release of this convicted criminal; I left the responsibility where it belonged. I did state, however, that I would not criticize any action that might be taken in the circumstances by the law officers of the crown. This view I intimated to the Minister of the Interior, the only minister with whom I had had any discussion with reference to the question. I desire to place this matter frankly before the House, without either comment or any endeavour to draw any inference from what transpired. I feel I owe this as a duty, primarily, not so much to myself as to those with whom I am associated in this house.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am sorry the Solicitor General is not here; I know he would wish to say a word in reply to my hon. friend. But may I direct the hon. member's attention to a remark the Solicitor General made, which appears a little further on in Hansard, in which he makes it abundantly clear that he had no desire in any way, directly or indirectly, to imply that any action on the part of the hon. member was other than what everyone would wish and expect. The Solicitor General had been speaking of procedure in the remission of sentences and the propriety of discussing such matters on the floor of the house. But he made it perfectly clear that he imputed no improper motives to my hon. friend. Let me assure the hon. member, speaking not only for the Solicitor General but for every member of the government, that we all have that view and that view only.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): In connection with the release of Baldy Robb I had received a very largely signed petition from the citizens of Edmonton and vicinity, inquiring whether, inasmuch as his wife was in delicate health and he himself was not in the best of health, and inasmuch also as all others who had participated in the wrongdoing had been released, it might not be possible to secure a remission of the sentence. Hence the discussion that took place between my hon. friend and myself. Apart from that discussion I know nothing about the matter. I conveyed the impression I received from the hon. member, which was that he would have no objection if the proper officers assumed the responsibility for releasing Baldy Robb.

GOLD AND SILVER MARKING ACT AMENDMENT

The house resumed from February 10, consideration in committee of Bill No. 21, to amend the Gold and Silver Marking Act—Mr. Malcolm—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 12b—Trade mark of manufacturer to be applied.

The CHAIRMAN: When the bill was last before the house all its clauses had been carried with the exception of 12b. Shall 12b carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL BATTLEFIELDS COMMISSION

AUTHORIZATION OF GRANT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 34, to amend an act respecting the National Battlefields at Quebec.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Payment of $750,000 authorized.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the minister kindly let us know first the sums we are now paying each year, and also what new work is proposed under the increased grant?

Mr. ROBB: Very well. This explanation was given when the resolution was moved on February 10, but I will give it to my hon. friend again. Last year we paid a total of $75,000; in 1912-13 the amount was $116,500; the following year it was $145,000, and then $143,000. During the war period it ran from $34,000 to $52,000, while in 1926-27 the amount was $48,000. The commission point out that they can make their plans better by having a fixed amount for a period of ten years. The members of that commission are Sir George Garneau, Hon. A. Turgeon, Robert Bickerdike, Senator T. Chapais, N. A. Dussault, Hon. W. H. Price, Hon. L. A. Taschereau, and Dr. A. G. Doughty.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend has not told us the work which it is intended to do.

Mr. ROBB: There are numerous works and improvements contemplated; for instance, the Ross rifle factory is to be taken down and cleared away and other danger buildings around there are to be removed. That work is on capital account.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are the Martello towers being looked after?

Mr. ROBB: I do not think they enter into this scheme.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): How much has been expended to date by this commission?

Mr. ROBB: They have expended each year the amounts which I have just given, totalling $1,078,010. That is what we have given them, and in addition to that I believe they have received some voluntary contributions.

Mr. McGIBBON: Would the minister tell us what he expects this work to cost the country ultimately?

[The Chairman.]

Mr. ROBB: If my hon. friend will tell me how long the country will last I might give him an estimate. I am now giving what has been done since the first payment was made in 1912-13. Perhaps I had better read a letter which I recently received from the chairman of this commission under date of November 18, 1927, addressed to myself:

> When I met you last in Ottawa, you asked me to remind you of the suggestion which I made to the subcommittee of the Privy Council in connection with the funds voted for the National Battlefields Commission.
> At present, the ordinary expenses for administration and maintenance of the park amount to about $50,000 per year. It is estimated that when the park is finally completed the annual expense, for its administration and maintenance, will be about $75,000.
> I suggested, and I strongly commend the idea to your favourable consideration, that instead of having parliament to vote the required grant each year it be given a statutory grant of $75,000. The excess of this amount over that required for maintenance will be applied to the work of completing the laying out and construction of the park (capital expenditure) and in course of time the maintenance will increase and the capital expenditure will diminish until we arrive at the estimated final cost of up-keep of $75,000 per year.

That is their estimate, and out of this amount we are now providing they will take care of capital expenditure.

Mr. McGIBBON: Is there any revenue from it at all?

Mr. ROBB: No, it is a public park, the Plains of Abraham, as my hon. friend knows.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think any man of business would do this; it is simply an invitation to reckless expenditure of public money. This is an admirable commission; it is doing excellent work, but when you place in their hands a given sum of money per annum you are simply inviting them to spend that amount, because human nature is only human nature. Would any corporation in the conduct of its business place in the hands of its directors a given sum per annum, regardless of their requirements, for the purpose of enabling them to carry on their work? This work should be budgetted; the requirements of this commission should be submitted to the minister yearly and these requirements should be carefully considered by the government and a sufficient sum placed in the estimates each year to meet them. The moment you do business this way, as I have said, you are simply inviting them to spend that much money. You may argue otherwise; you may remark how excellent is the commission, but my experience in business and elsewhere has been that where there is a given sum of money available, human nature being what it is, that money is going to be spent by those who have control over it, and I therefore submit that the minister is wrong in adopting this method. I protest against placing a sum of money in the hands of any commission, amounting to $750,000 at the rate of $75,000 per year, by this method; if they have the money they will spend it. They are most admirable gentlemen, giving their services freely and gratuitiously for this work, but I submit that this is a wrong principle, because parliament is deprived of its power. Parliament now says, "Here is $75,000 a year for ten years; go and spend it." I protest against that method, having regard to the requirements of the public service at I know it elsewhere.

Mr. ROBB: On general principles no person can find much fault with the observations of my hon. friend, but having looked into the matter after receiving the request from the commission for further sums of money to take care of the different buildings in that vicinity and to remove the Ross rifle factory, in addition to other work, we considered that it would be cheaper to say to the commission, "You cannot have any more money than this during the next ten years." They know they are going to receive this money each year and can plan their work accordingly, so I believe it will cost the treasury less in the end. In connection with keeping track of the expenditure, I would remind my hon. friend that under the Audit Act the Minister of Finance can send in auditors at any time, and as a matter of fact I believe they have already looked over these accounts.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; I have looked over the accounts also.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can my hon. friend give us any real reason why an amount should not be voted each year in the ordinary way? I believe there has been no difficulty in the past in voting the money required.

Mr. ROBB: Under the original act they received an amount of $300,000; so money has been voted in this way before. The section of the act which is to be repealed authorized the payment of that amount to the commission.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am only speaking from memory, but I think my hon. friend will find that the $300,000 was voted for the initiation of the work and that sums of money have been voted each year since having regard on the one hand to what parliament thought should be spent and on the other hand to the real requirements of the work. I think my hon. friend will find that in some years the vote was very small, while in other years the commission received much larger sums. For example, I think the vote has gone as high as $115,000.

Mr. ROBB: The highest was $145,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And I think it has been as low as $34,000, so that each year it was a question of what parliament thought should be voted and for how much the work could be carried along. We got along pretty well in the past with that method; why not stay with it?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Of course everybody knows that this development must be completed. It is not only a national undertaking but it is an imperial undertaking. When the tercentenary of Quebec was celebrated there was a subscription not only in Canada but throughout the British Empire to buy the fields and the plains where the battles were fought which decided the fate of Canada in 1759; even school children in Canada and in the empire contributed for that purpose. The commission which was appointed to supervise the undertaking has done its work in the most admirable way. I am specially paying tribute to Sir George Garneau, the president of that commission, who has made it almost a personal affair, devoting most of his time to the work of the commission, trying to do that work as economically as possible, being there all the time, supervising everything, and giving his services freely.

Now there are some advantatges in the scheme proposed by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, and it is at the request of the commission that this change is being proposed. It is all very well to say that every year an amount may be voted in the estimates. Well I remember that a couple of years ago the Minister of Finance in his great zeal for and devotion to economy cut that item; Sir George Garneau threatened to resign because he could not go on with the work of the commission, and the minister had to reinsert the amount in the supplementary estimates.

Sir George Garneau and the commission are now proceeding to transfer the old buildings of the Ross Rifle Company, which are really an eyesore on the battlefield. They must be sure of a certain amount for a certain number of years. This method has been followed for a number of years in connection with other matters, for instance the contributions of this government to the highways of the provinces. The provinces could rely upon a certain amount as a contribution to their highways for a certain number of years. Especially with the work which the commission has in view and the work which the commission has been doing, I believe this is certainly a reasonable demand, and that it should be granted.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Chairman, I just want to say one word in regard to this matter, not because of this resolution but because the same principle has been carried out, or is being carried out, in another place, and I do not think the principle is right. For instance, you have on this order paper, number 26, under the heading of the Federal District Commission, a certain amount of money—$250,000—set aside for sixteen years. Now we are asked to change that and vote that sum for thirty years, and I do not think that is right. It is a fact beyond question that during the years of the war and the years immediately succeeding the war there were many important and necessary public works which were necessarily held up. The government took the stand then, and very properly, I think, that not one dollar would be expended for this or that public building or public work where it was possible at all to get along without the expenditure, every dollar being required for war purposes, for the purpose of meeting the expenses of the war, and for several years thereafter.

Now it occurs to me that in connection with some of these large schemes of the government they are losing sight of the fact that for a number of years a great many works which should have been carried out have been held up.

I think the principle is wrong of voting a sum of money for a period of years without having placed before parliament at least a rough idea of what it is proposed to do with the money which is being handed over. That is the principle objection. I do not think anybody objects to the work that is going on in Quebec. I believe everybody is of one mind in regard to the fixing up of that place; it is historic, and it is something which belongs to all of Canada and which everybody in Canada would like to see in proper condition and maintained properly. I simply wish to register my objection as a general principle to the voting of sums of money for a long period of years. I do not think, having regard to the works which were held up for so many years, that it is just right at the present time.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) or the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) appreciates the point we are making, that here we are committing this country in future to these payments, whereas in other cases we are able to meet the annual demands from the resources we have in our hands from time to time. In the one case we pledge our credit and tie the hands of posterity. In the one case we make a direct and fixed charge upon the revenues, regardless of what they may be. In the other case, we contemplate just such an exigency as occurred during the war, when there was no longer money for such purposes and we had to curtail expenditures. I would like to ask my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior if he would not be as well justified in asking similar sums for Banff and Jasper. We base our expenditures upon our expected revenues, and a budget is for the purpose of endeavouring to have the expenditures met by the revenues, to provide sufficient revenues to meet contemplated expenditures.

The judges' salaries are a charge upon the revenue. The interest on the public debt is a charge upon the revenue. The payment of pensions is a charge upon the revenue, by statute. Now we are adding by statute two additional charges upon the revenue, regardless of what it may be, one in Quebec and one in Ottawa. The analogy in respect to highways does not apply. In connection with highways, the money was to be paid on condition that the province expended certain sums; and if conditions in this country warranted our being able to pay the money to the provinces, because they performed their duty under the statute and thereby earned it. It is only necessary to add that conditions, financial and otherwise, in the provinces would be reflected in the revenues of the Dominion; and if the provinces are able to make the expenditures, we would be able to implement our promise.

I would think this a grave departure from the principles that underlie parliamentary government. It is taking out of the hands of this parliament for a fixed determinate number of years an annual expenditure, regardless of what financial and other conditions in the country may be. This case is in Quebec; there is another in Ottawa; it will be in another case somewhere else; the principle involved will be endeavoured to be applied by people from every part of the country, and I am sure with an equal measure of justice. Under those circumstances we can only record our protest against it, and add our tribute to what has been said by the Minister of Justice as to the work of this commission with Sir George Garneau at its head and which has become to him a labour of absorbing love. Perhaps no man has done more than he has in this matter. He says that this $75,000 is to take care of part of his capital expenditures; but he estimates that when all work is finished, the whole $75,000 will go for maintenance and expenses. However desirous we are to make this historic ground a park for all time, we should have regard to the great principle that governs appropriations of money for any public purpose, namely, that the budget should be submitted to the executive of the country and that the executive of the country should determine the extent to which it will meet those demands and whether those demands should be met, having regard to the existing resources of the country and the effect which will be caused upon the revenues generally. That is the principle for which we contend and why we protest against this legislation.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANTEEN FUNDS

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence) moved the second reading of Bill No. 39, respecting the disposal of certain canteen funds.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. RALSTON: I move that this bill be referred to the special committee on pensions and returned soldiers' problems. I discussed it with some of the members and they thought a more thorough consideration could there be given to the question of the disposal of these funds. While I am on this subject, I note that in Hansard, at page 463, I am quoted as saying that I was advised it was not necessary to enact legislation. That was a misprint. I stated that I considered it was necessary to enact legislation.

Motion agreed to.

SALE AND INSPECTION OF ROOT VEGETABLES

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 51, to regulate the sale and inspection of root vegetables.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I have grave doubts as to the constitutionality of this legislation, which affects the inspection of roots and vegetables. Clearly it deals with property and civil rights. Whether or not the provisions of section 91 of the British North America Act conferring upon parliament power to deal with matters of agriculture, is to be construed so widely as to enable it to invade entirely the field of property and civil rights in the provinces, I am not prepared at the moment to say. But I think it is my duty to direct the attention of the minister and the law officers of the crown to the provisions of the statute. Clause 3 reads:

> No person shall sell, offer, expose, or have in possession for sale potatoes, onions, turnips, artichokes, beets, carrots, parsnips or such other vegetables as may be named in the act or by the governor in council under the provisions of this act unless such vegetables comply with all provisions of this act and regulations made thereunder.

That is a very sweeping section. When the bill was first introduced I took occasion to look into the law very roughly and I certainly think the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), when he looks into it, will have some hesitancy in proposing that this parliament, because it has jurisdiction over agiculture, coordinate jurisdiction with the provinces, has power thus to destroy the whole law with respect to property and civil rights. I am merely directing attention to the matter at the moment without going into it with any degree of care. It is certainly a serious matter to say that no person shall have in his possession any vegetable, onions, potatoes, carrots, unless he has complied with the provisions of this federal statute. It will be recalled that the courts of the country with respect to egg-grading legislation held that it was ultra vires of this parliament, and I think the application of the same principle to this legislation would indicate that it was invalid. I am not in any sense discussing the merits of the measure beyond directing attention to the matter as it struck me when I read the legislation in question.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am informed by my officers that no new principle is involved except one to which I referred on the first reading of the bill and which had never been challenged. When there is any doubt, as there was in the case of the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act, we invariably ask the provinces to pass concurrent legislation so as to make our legislation strong where it would otherwise be weak. If it is found that the same situation exists with respect to this legislation, we shall have to ask the provinces to pass concurrent legislation. The new principle to which I refer, and which is not a new principle when applied to other bills, may be found in section 10 which refers to the appointment of a representative advisory board to recommend certain standards.

Mr. BENNETT: But section 3, the one to which I refer, is a new section.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on agriculture.

LIVE STOCK AND LIVE STOCK PRODUCTS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 61, to amend the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act.

He said: This is a bill in regard to which we have concurrent legislation by all the provinces. It provides for a system of voluntary grading of meats.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on agriculture.

FERTILIZER ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 72, to amend the Fertilizer Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on agriculture.

INSPECTION AND GRADING OF HAY AND STRAW

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 73, respecting the inspection and grading of hay and straw.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I suppose the minister proposes to refer this also to the select standing committee?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: We have in this country something over nine hundred federal inspectors in the Department of Agriculture, and the question is, shall this country become burdened with inspections of everything or not? We have now touched fertilizers, which have to be registered before they are sold; we have had eggs, which was declared unconstitutional; we have live stock, which is voluntary; we have vegetables, and now we are turning to hay and straw. This is the old story of the advisory board and regulations, and then inspecting officers. Once more you have cumbersome paternalism carried to a point that I think is wholly beyond what was ever intended with respect to this problem. The provinces may be able to look after their own affairs. It may be desirable to have uniform legislation. I am not going to discuss the matter beyond pointing out that every measure that we are thus placing on the statute books adds just one more burden on the taxpayer. We may talk about voluntary advisory boards, but in the end, when the provisions of this statute with respect to inspection and inspectors become operative, some political friend has to be rewarded, and there is another job given, and another charge on the public revenue. I am not saying it will be my hon. friend's particular political friends, but the political friends of the party in power, and it means a continually increasing charge upon our revenues. I asked the other evening as to the number of inspectors, and the deputy minister undertook to look the matter up, and I was amazed when it was subsequently stated that we had now over nine hundred inspectors, and I think he was greatly surprised to learn that too. Where is this going to end? It must mean a charge on the revenues of this country of nearly $2,000 per day.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: More than that.

Mr. BENNETT: I want to be very conservative. Some of the inspectors are very lightly paid. At $1,000 each, it means $1,000 a day or $365,000 a year, and at $2,000 each, it would amount to nearly three-quarters of a million a year. I think parliament should calmly and carefully investigate this matter, and I make these observations for whatever they may be worth so that if the minister is going to refer this matter to the committee, that phase of it may be considered.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend's observations would be quite in order and quite to the point were this a new bill, but long before I came into this government there was a bill of this nature under the administration of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. BENNETT: But this changes it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is changed slightly, yes. The characteristics of hay vary very much, and we are transferring to the various parts of this country the authority to make such grades as will suit the requirements of the particular province concerned.

That is decentralising, rather than centralising the power here. There were inspectors under the old law under the Department of Trade and Commerce, and before this government came into existence.

Mr. BENNETT: Not so many.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We are trying to improve a little on the old order, and I think my hon. friend will find that it is all right.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

VALIDATION OF ORDERS IN COUNCIL

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved the second reading of Bill No. 62, relating to the submission to parliament of certain regulations and orders in council.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Explain.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In 1906 certain amendments were made to the acts mentioned in this bill and in addition there was a revision of the statutes. While the Department of the Interior has been tabling the regulations, action was not taken for complete validation by resolution of parliament, and therefore there is a doubt as to the validity of the regulations that have been passed since 1906, and by this bill we are seeking to validate all these orders in council that have been passed since that time.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): The principle involved is certainly unsound in part. Part of it may be sound, but certain people may have acquired rights; in fact, in one instance that I know of rights have been acquired. The people knew the order in council was invalid—they were so advised by their lawyers—and they acted accordingly. An order in council passed in January 1928, and not being validated by both houses of parliament before December 1929, there being an intervening session of parliament, would be invalid, and would have no force or effect at all, and therefore those who proceeded on the assumption of there being no order in council would be proceeding on sound ground. For us now to validate these orders in council en bloc, without having them before us at all, is most unsound, and I submit to the minister that if he is going to validate them, they should be attached to the bill as a schedule, or at least the orders in council should be laid on the table, because it is usual in a case of this character to protect the rights that have been acquired. There are not very many of them.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Oh yes.

Mr. BENNETT: There are; I had forgotten. The Minister of Justice will appreciate this point, that in law there are no orders in council at the moment. The period of time within which they might have been validated having expired, they have no longer any validity as orders in council, and not having validity as orders in council, peoples rights are not affected thereby. I do not say all of them: I am speaking of those that require validation by both houses of parliament, and which have not been validated at the next succeeding session of parliament. Their validity as orders in council has ceased; they are invalid; they are waste paper, and those who have acquired rights, being under the impression, the proper impression, that there was no valid order in council affecting the matter, may now be prejudicially affected by this legislation because it is retroactive in every sense of the term. It gives validity to something that has become invalid. It gives force to something that had no effect, and under those circumstances I ask the minister respectfully to submit to this house, or at least to lay upon the table, the orders in council in order that we may determine to what extent we may be interfering with the rights of people that may have accrued under and by virtue of the circumstances of there being no orders in council, by reason of the necessary action to validate them as provided by the statutes not having been taken.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend is quite correct up to a certain point, but whether his argument with respect to the omission to have validation annually by parliament carries full weight may be a question. However, I am free to say that the Justice department have advised us that there is that doubt, and they have advised this means of curing it, but we are not admitting even yet that the sanction of parliament is absolutely required to validate them. But I am frank to say that that is the advice we have been given by the Justice department. I am perfectly willing to table these orders in council, but may I say to my hon. friend that there is a great number of them dealing with regulations that have been passed from 1906 on, and it will be some problem.

Mr. BENNETT: Some of them have been validated, I think.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, the officials of the department felt that their full duty was performed when these orders in council were tabled, but in the opinion of the Justice department apparently that was not complete validation, and action should have been taken by both houses of parliament with respect to these. If my hon. friend will indicated such orders in council as he desires to have produced, I shall be glad to bring them down.

Mr. BENNETT: There were a number affecting the Rocky Mountain park.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I shall be glad to bring those down.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It occurs to me that if we have been going on very comfortably since 1906 something must have happened to make it necessary for my hon. friend now to propose this legislation. The house will be absolutely in the dark unless he takes us fully into his confidence, or brings down all the orders in council. I have no doubt that somebody has put in claims, and that difficulties have arisen in the department of such a character as to make it necessary to consult the Department of Justice as to what action should be taken. If as my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior says nothing has been done since 1906, it is obvious that now we are either creating or destroying rights.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We are not creating any rights.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know as to that. Rights may from time to time be created by order in council; on the other hand, rights may have arisen as a result of the absence of orders in council. It would be the same one way or the other.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What would my hon. friend term a right?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend knows that by his orders in council and regulations he does certain definite things, which may put out of court this or that man in connection with certain matters. I am quite sure that my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) will agree absolutely with me on this principle, that whatever our powers may be, we ought not to pass legislation affecting existing rights unless the parties affected are heard, or unless they are compensated for the rights taken away. My proposal is that when we take up this legislation again the Minister of the Interior be armed with a list of all these things so we can intelligently consider what we are really doing, and whether we are violating any rights that may exist.

Mr. J. A. FRASER (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) that in the session of 1926 we passed a validating act in relation to the Railway Belts Water Act. I am at a loss to understand why it is now necessary to duplicate that legislation.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is not duplicating the legislation. I will bring down a list of the orders in council.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Chairman, as I have already pointed out to the house, the object of the bill is simply to validate certain regulations and orders in council, and before it is again taken up by the committee I shall bring down a number of those documents for inspection. I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Progress reported.

LOWER EAR FALLS STORAGE DAM

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that the agreement between the Dominion of Canada, the province of Ontario and the province of Manitoba respecting the construction of a dam for the purposes of conservation, regulation and power, at Lower Ear falls at the outlet of Lac Seul in the province of Ontario, be ratified and confirmed, and that the governor in council be authorized to carry out the provisions thereof whereby the Dominion assumes three-fifths of the capital cost of the dam, estimated at $700,000, and the payment of interest and cost of operation and maintenance for certain limited periods.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Is $700,000 the total cost or does it represent the three-fifths to be assumed by the Dominion?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, $500,000 is our responsibility in the matter. The engineers apportioned $200,000 to Ontario.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the minister kindly state the terms of the agreement?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is similar to the agreement with respect to the lake of the Woods, and the work will be controlled by the same body under the same set of circumstances, except that the Dominion government is not assuming any responsibility because this Lac Seul storage is not considered to be navigable water. Under the arrangement relative to the lake of the Woods storage, the Dominion government became responsible for one-third of the cost attributable to navigation. In this case all the costs are borne by the interested parties, namely, the power companies in the province of Manitoba and the power companies to be created in the province of Ontario. The Dominion government is not contributing anything to this particular scheme. The construction will be carried out by the Ontario government under the supervision, I believe, of its hydro engineers.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then the resolution is not quite correct when it is suggested that there will be no cost. The resolution provides that the Dominion government shall assume three-fifths of the capital cost of the dam.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, we are putting up the money; we shall have to vote $500,000. It will be repaid to the Dominion by the Manitoba power interests. We are doing this because the Dominion government owns and controls the water powers of Manitoba. All the parties are in agreement regarding the creation of this storage, and the Ontario government having passed the necessary legislation, which has received the assent, all that remains is for this parliament to carry out its part. I do not know that there are any unusual particulars in the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the agreement be attached to the bill?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Then we can discuss it in connection with the bill.

Mr. GARDINER: I presume this legislation is intended for the development of power. Will that power be under the joint control of Manitoba and Ontario, or will it be controlled by the Dominion government and Ontario?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Until such time as the Manitoba government shall have secured its natural resources the control will be under the Dominion for the power users of that province, in the same way as the lake of the Woods.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the policy of the federal government regarding power development in the prairie provinces? Is it the policy to give private interests the control of that power, or otherwise?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The policy of the government has been, whenever any application has been made for the development of any given power, first to notify the provincial government and then to keep them informed of every stage of the development. If they require the power for their own use they, of course, are given the first opportunity of securing it; if not the policy is to deal with private interests.

Mr. BENNETT: Beyond question, the agreement will be attached to the bill?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Stewart (Edmonton) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 195, an act to facilitate the provision of storage in Lac Seul in the province of Ontario, and to repeal the Lake of the Woods Regulation Act, 1921.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

YUKON QUARTZ MINING ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That the Yukon Quartz Mining Act be amended to provide for the payment of an annual royalty on the profits of mines in the Yukon territory, exceeding the sum of $10,000 annually, in place of the royalty at present imposed upon sales of the products of the mines, and to prescribe the rates of royalty to be paid upon the said annual profits.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The object of the resolution is to introduce a system of percentages to replace the present method whereby the federal government collects royalties on minerals. The rates proposed are:

Metal	Value	Royalty
Gold	$15 00 oz.	37½ cents
Silver	60 oz.	15 mills per ounce
Copper	12 lb.	30 cents per cwt.
Zinc	04 lb.	10 cents per cwt.
Lead	04 lb.	10 cents per cwt.

These are the provisions which will now apply under the Yukon Quartz Mining Act passed three years ago.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the effect of this be to put the system on the same basis as that of Ontario?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes; it is exactly the same. We are adopting the Ontario system. The difficulty in the Yukon has been that owing to the very excessive cost of operations in the outlying districts—transportation and other costs incidental to mining—it has been impossible for the companies to operate and to pay royalties, and year by year we have been extending to them a privilege in allowing them to escape payment of these royalties. Had we compelled them to pay the royalties—we have the assurance of responsible people to this effect—it would have closed down mining operations in that district; and in order to obviate that I am introducing this legislation, putting the system on precisely the same basis as that of the province of Ontario. Upon annual profits in excess of $10,000 and up to $1,000,000 the payment shall be three per cent; in excess of $1,000,000 and up to $5,000,000 five per cent; and in excess of $5,000,000 and up to $10,000,000, six per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: That is, on the price they get?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes. These are the provisions which I wish to have embodied in the bill.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the bill contain a provision fixing the rates of percentage?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes; I have just quoted them.

Mr. BENNETT: I wanted to be sure.

Mr. GARDINER: It is proposed to restrict this legislation to the Yukon. In view of the arrangement made in Manitoba with the Flin Flon, would it not be advisable to adopt the same principle there and get something out of it? Has not the government given up royalties in that big mining area for twenty years? We shall get nothing at all out of those natural resources, and if this legislation is good for the Yukon, it should be good for Manitoba.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is our intention to apply these provisions to the Northwest Territories and to the prairie provinces, but that would not apply to the exemption given the Hudson Bay Mining Company, which operates on a very restricted area—something like two miles by three. The balance of their claims, some ninety odd which are in that immediate vicinity, do not come under these exemptions.

Mr. GARDINER: Perhaps this is not in order, but will the minister explain why such a small area is exempted? What is the real reason for that exemption?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Only to induce the company to go in and operate. Perhaps my hon. friend is not aware of the fact that the old company had a very much larger area under exemption for a ten-year period, which expires in 1930. However, I will be glad to discuss this with my hon. friend on another occasion.

Mr. McGIBBON: Will the minister be good enough to tell us how these companies can pay percentages if they cannot pay royalties?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It will partially obviate the necessity of an examination of their books and accounts. The difficulty has been that had we insisted on the collection of the royalties, these large companies would have closed down immediately.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The difference is that you are giving an exemption.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is what we have been giving, and once they earn the amounts set out in the proposed act we begin to collect royalties.

Mr. McGIBBON: Then the minister will admit that if they have not paid anything under this act the department has been beaten out of some money.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, I could not admit that, because we have taken every precaution to ascertain that their reports were correct. Now it will not be necessary to check them constantly to see whether their reports are correct, and it will not be necessary to pass orders in council annually exempting them from the payment of royalties.

Mr. BENNETT: This gives me an opportunity to mention something which I had not intended to bring up, but which the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) has mentioned; I refer to the Flin Flon mine. I apprehend that the exemption in that case has been made by order in council?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: As yet that order in council has not been validated by parliament, and I was anticipating that it would be brought down together with all the papers, which would enable us to say something about it. At present we are not in a position to determine the merits or the demerits of the proposal. I may say they are principally demerits from my observations and the knowledge I have, although that is a matter of opinion.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I may say to my hon. friend that I am just as keen as anyone to get revenue, but this was a matter of arrangement with the government of Manitoba. Of course I must assume the responsibility; I am not seeking to avoid it, but we had a full discussion and consultation with the government of Manitoba, and apparently an assurance was given that unless some concession of this kind were granted or extended, this company would not invest in the property.

Mr. ADSHEAD: May I ask how you are going to arrive at the gross profits or the net profits made by these companies? Did I understand the minister to say that gold was valued at $15 an ounce?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, under the present system. Of course, it fluctuates as do all other commodities.

Mr. ADSHEAD: But the present price of gold is $20.16 an ounce. How was the figure of $15 arrived at?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I will admit there are some difficulties to be overcome, but we are abandoning that system and adopting the present method.

Mr. FRASER: Under the old system has the royalty paid on the production of the mine?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. FRASER: And now it is paid on the profit?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): But that is the very question brought up a moment ago by the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Adshead). How do you determine the profit?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In Ontario they have a very well defined method of ascertaining the profit; there are certain charges allowed the companies which are taken out of the calculation in arriving at the net profit and the gross profit. These are elements which we will discuss when the bill is in committee, but full provision is made for an accounting and an examination of the company's books.

Mr. GARLAND (Row River): Then, in effect, will the minister admit that this resolution simply prefaces the introduction of a measure of exemption from charges at present applicable to these mining companies?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It would have this effect; mining companies which are making no profits certainly would not pay a royalty, whereas if the present system were enforced the royalties would have to be paid, which would put many of the companies out of business. Where a company is not making a profit in the mining of gold, silver or lead, under our present act we have the right to collect royalties, but my hon. friend will understand that if they are not making a profit they will not stay in business very long. Ontario and Quebec have realized that and have adopted the principle of collecting a royalty on the profit.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Then does not the minister think that this whole provision would rather open the door to speculation in mining property, just as we have speculation in western lands to-day? A company may secure a holding but it is under no obligation to develop it; it does not have to pay a royalty, and this property can be held out of production.

Mr. LAPIERRE: They have to do a certain amount of development.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They do not pay any royalty unless they are producing now.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): But there is a certain annual tax. Now you are leaving it in the hands of these companies to hold the property for speculation.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think my hon. friend is wrong there. They pay no royalty under the existing act unless they carry on development work and are producing, but the difficulty is that they may be developing and producing without making a profit. They may face losses, and under the existing act we have the right to collect for every ounce of gold that they produce, as well as every ounce of zinc or every ounce of lead. We have found ourselves in this position in the Yukon, that if we enforced that provision we would put some of the companies out of business. Therefore we have suspended the royalties in order to permit the companies to carry on, and I frankly confess that I do not like that system; I do not like recommending that responsibility to the government. I would much prefer the Ontario and Quebec system, under which the company has to earn a certain profit before a royalty is collected. I think we will all agree that unless a company is earning some profit it is not in a position to pay a royalty, and that is the reason I am asking for this change.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Lapierre) interjected a remark a moment ago concerning which I would like to have some information. I would like to know if it is correct that under Dominion government leases to-day a certain development is required within a certain period of time.

Mr. LAPIERRE: That is so under the Ontario government.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am talking about the federal act.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I would like to be definite about that; there are so many different leases.

Mr. BENNETT: Some of them contain that provision.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I know some of them do, but I do not want to make any mistake in answering that question. I will secure that information, however.

Mr. GARDINER: The minister has brought up a new point which seems to be very important; he says that unless a company is making a profit the government will not collect any royalty. Will he apply the same principle to the farmer with respect to the tariff? Is not that just as logical as the proposition which is now placed before us?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Unfortunately land has never been designated as a mineral, although I believe we are accused of mining the land out west. But land, whether profit has been made or not, has always been deemed to be taxable, whether in an urban or in a rural locality. That is the only answer I can make to my hon. friend. This, I must confess, is very much under the same principle as the income tax, and under the Income Tax Act no taxes are paid unless a certain percentage of profit is earned. In some degree it is a duplication of the income tax, and to that extent I think it is fair.

Mr. GARDINER: The Minister of the Interior has said that unless a company has made a profit they will pay no tax. It is quite true that land is altogether different from minerals; but on the other hand, whether the farmer makes a profit or not in any one year, he has to pay the tariff tax. Apply the same principle. What we object to is giving to certain classes exemptions which you do not give to others.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think my hon. friend is under a misapprehension. The company pays the provincial taxes and all other taxes of every kind. They are not exempt from taxes on their property; but when they come to pay royalty on their production, then insead of its being based on a definite amount per pound or per ounce, it is based on profits. That is all the difference.

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

Mr. GARDINER: That is my point as far as the tariff is concerned; if we do not make any profit we should not pay any tariff tax, and if we do make a profit we should pay the tax.

Mr. BENNETT: The wheat pools make no profits and therefore pay no income tax, which is a proper application of the principle. The same principle is being applied here—no profits, no taxes.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Stewart (Edmonton) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 196 to amend the Yukon Quartz Mining Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

MILITIA PENSION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That the Militia Pension Act be amended,—
1. In regard to reservations from an officer's salary while in the public service of Canada; to the payment of a gratuity to a widow or children in case of death before pension may be granted; and to the payment of pensions to militiamen of His Majesty's army reserve who enlisted in the permanent force; and for additions to apply the Militia Pension Act to the royal Canadian navy and to that portion of the royal Canadian air force comprising solely the permanent active air force of Canada.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: Explain.

Mr. RALSTON: Two of the sections of the bill which is founded on this resolution are made necessary by the passing of the new Civil Service Superannuation Act and its substitution for the Civil Service Retirement Act. In this respect the title of the new act is substituted for the old one. There is a section which provides for certain cases of hardship, in that widows and children do not receive any allowance where an officer dies before having served the requisite number of years required for pension. The Civil Service Superannuation Act provides that a gratuity, one month's pay for each year of service, is payable to the widows and children of civil servants who have not served full time for pension. Under this bill the provision is for the payment of the amount which has been actually deducted from the salary.

Mr. BENNETT: With or without interest?

Mr. RALSTON: Without interest. There is also a provision to cover the cases of 149 men who were in the British army reserve. These cases were taken up before the commission with which I had something to do some years ago, and have been presented to this house from time to time. The situation was that certain men who had first served under the colours of the British army had then gone on the British army reserve and afterwards enlisted in the permanent force here. The condition of their enlistment in Canada was that they could be called up to the colours in the British army. The war came on and the Canadian authorities asked the British authorities to allow these men to serve here, which they did.

Mr. BENNETT: They having first been called up.

Mr. RALSTON: A request having been sent by the British authorities to the Canadian authorities asking that they be sent back, the Canadian authorities asked that they might be allowed to stay here. The British authorities consented that these men should be allowed to remain with the Canadian army, and they served with it. Their complaint is that by this action of the British authorities they were prevented from counting toward their service for pension their British service with the colours and in the reserve. Under the Militia Pension Act their service towards pension began to run only from the beginning of their Canadian service. It will be remembered, however, that the pay and allowance regulations of the Canadian service provided for a much higher remuneration than under British service, and also the rates of pension were very much higher. I think the view has been taken, although apparently no definite decision has been made, that possibly most of these reservists were as well off, in view of the higher rate of Canadian pension and the higher rate of pay, as if they had returned to the colours in Britain and served at the lower rate of pension and the lower rate of pay. However, it has been thought well to make an equitable adjustment of the matter, and the proposal of the bill will simply be this that these reservists be treated as if they had been permitted to go back to England when they were called up by the British authorities, and be paid by the Canadian authorities the amount of pension which they would have earned had they served with the British army during the war. Then if they continued serving after the war their service counts towards pension period under the Canadian provision.

Mr. BENNETT: I should think that was not quite enough.

Mr. RALSTON: They have the option of accepting that plan, or of counting their full Canadian service towards a Canadian pension at the higher rate. I think this puts them in exactly the same position as if they had gone back and served in the British army.

Mr. McGIBBON: Is that satisfactory to the reservist?

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot say that. All sorts of propositions have been made. I think it has even been proposed that they have both Canadian and British pensions.

Mr. BRADY: How many will be affected by this?

Mr. RALSTON: One hundred and forty-nine, at the most; but many of these will find that settlement under Canadian regulations will be better than if they had gone back and taken the British settlement. There is another provision, and it is also rather technical, but it seems to be a case which should be provided for. In July, 1919, in order that a very large number of overseas officers might be discharged from the force on fair terms, an act was passed providing that when a man completed ten years' service he would be entitled to retire under pension; and under that act many officers who had served in the Canadian expeditionary force were discharged. It applied only to those of the permanent force serving at the time the act was passed. There were a certain number who served in the Canadian expeditionary force but who in July, 1919, at the time this act was passed, had been invalided out on account of wounds and who therefore did not come under the provision of the ten-year period. It has been thought fair to provide that the act of 1919, which permitted a man who had served overseas to have a pension on ten years' service, should apply to those who, by reason of wounds, were not actually in the service at the time. That provision is in this resolution. The last two provisions are to make the regulations of the Militia Pension Act apply mutatis mutandis to the Royal Canadian Navy and to that portion of the Royal Canadian Air Force comprising solely the permanent air force of Canada.

Mr. McGIBBON: It is the intention of the minister to send this legislation to the special committee?

Mr. RALSTON: No, although I have no objection whatever. This is a service pension, not a disability pension. It is in quite a different field and would involve an examination of an entirely different act from the one that the committee has been considering.

Mr. McGIBBON: I think the option which the minister, on behalf of the people of Canada, is giving to reservists is very fair, but there is a tendency in all these pensions, under the Pension Act and in the pension committee, to gather everything and everybody within the folds of the act. If I am correctly informed, we have gathered into the act a lot of office boys, elevator boys who served as such during the war and who happened to be put into uniform, and I am credibly informed that a number of these are receiving larger pensions than the people who served over in France. I would suggest to the minister that he send this to the committee, and in order to be fair and just to everybody let us clean the whole situation up. There has been too much interweaving of the militia, the soldiers, the reservists, and practically everybody else in this country under the pension board, for the one purpose, of course, of getting a larger pension. The whole thing ought to be cleared up before the end of the session.

Mr. RALSTON: I understand my hon. friend's proposal, but I do not quite apprehend the reasons for it. In this resolution we are dealing with the Militia Pension Act, which provides for pensions for men who have given a certain amount of service in the militia. What my hon. friend is talking about is pensions to men who have suffered disabilities on account of war service. That is an entirely different thing and based on an entirely different principle. The one is to meet a lack of earning power caused by a disability incurred during the war, and the other is an award which is given to any public servant, either under the civil service or the army Pension Act or any other sort of superannuation act, after he has served a certain time, even though he is in full bodily health when discharged. Before thinking of referring this bill to the committee which has to do with returned soldiers' problems and pensions I should want to consult with the chairman of the committee. The pensions dealt with in that committee have to do with returned soldiers. It happens that these reservists who served in the war come in as well, not because of disability pensions but because of service pensions, and these reservists are asking for consideration because of British army service pension regulations, not as war pensions.

[Mr. McGibbon.]

Mr. McGIBBON: And some because the time limit and service wounds have put them out of pensions.

Mr. RALSTON: That is not brought in as a disability pension at all. As a matter of fact I do not think I have had any representation from any body of men with regard to that last class I mentioned; but men have been deprived of the benefit of the ten-year provision because they happened to be discharged on account of wounds a little before that act came into force. In this case again it is not a disability pension but a service pension which is granted.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Has the minister had any communication from officers now in our permanent service who claim that if this goes through they are not being fairly treated; in other words, that they have served in departments and are not getting the benefit of that service on joining the permanent force? Has the minister had any correspondence from any permanent officer in regard to cases of a similar nature to this?

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think I have with regard to a case of a similar nature to this. Many representations have been made in individual cases by those who have felt that the disposition of their particular case regarding pension has not been just or equitable. I have endeavoured myself to review all those cases and to give every consideration to the representations made, bearing in mind that we have to have some sort of uniform system, and keeping in view the provisions in other acts as well. I think I can say that the bill founded upon this resolution is, generally speaking, a result of that consideration.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): There is another class whose case I have for some years been bringing to the attention not only of the present minister but of previous ministers. I refer to the case of service pensioners' wives and children who have been deserted and who are now living on charity and work, whereas the pensioner is in some other country enjoying a pension paid by this country. I have asked the minister for the last three years if some change could not be made so that the wife and children, living in Canada, of such pensioner should get the benefit of that pension.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend has made representations, and exactly similar representations are made with regard to disability pensions. But it must be remembered that the pension is payable to the soldier, and it is very difficult for the pension authorities to enter the home and determine the merits of a domestic dispute and legislate and say that the pension which is payable to the soldier shall be paid to somebody else. That is a matter for the civil, not for the pension authorities.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): It is a very difficult one. The civil authorities cannot do anything about it. If the man is in the old country they cannot touch him. Month by month the pension is going out to that man, who may be living with another woman or under some unfavourable circumstances in another country, while the wife and children in Canada are without means of support. They cannot go to the Mothers' Allowance Board because they are met there with the statement: Go and find out where the man is and follow him with a civil action. There may be some legal reason why the Pension Act cannot be changed, but I do not know what it is. I think it is unfair to ask these people to take civil action.

Mr. BENNETT: Am I right in assuming that this legislation deals solely with the statutory right to pension based upon contributions made by the soldier or amounts withdrawn or withheld from his pay?

Mr. RALSTON: That depends upon whether it is an officer or a non-commissioned officer or man. There are no deductions made from a non-commissioned officer or man, as in the case of the officer.

Mr. BENNETT: This is an endeavour, then, to place the statutory pensions upon a little better basis. That is the whole story, as I understand it. There is one other point to which I should like to direct attention, and which has been touched on by the hon. members for Kingston City and Muskoka-Ontario. Not long since a case such as they mentioned came to my attention. I intended to write the department about it, but did not do so. It does occur to me that when this bill is being considered by the minister he might provide a section whereby, in the case of an order for support being made against the husband at the instance of the wife, the department would be enabled to pay the money to the wife. I think the minister could go that far. There are similar provisions in all the provinces dealing with the right of the wife to support by her husband, and if the department would take the same view that the Finance department took with regard to the Nova Scotia subsidies, when it withheld a portion of the subsidy because the province had not paid for troops that were sent down there, I think an application of the same principle in this case might bring about the result we aim at.

Mr. ADSHEAD: What provision is made for the wives of non-commissioned officers and privates in case they get in distress?

Mr. RALSTON: I have not the act before me. There are a good many provisions in it but I think the act itself provides with regard to the widows of non-commissioned officers and men for gratuities, not for pensions. Pensions are based on the fact that contributions are made by officers. No contributions are made by non-commissioned officers and men. There is no change made by this act with regard to the wives of non-commissioned officers and men.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Is there any reason why they should not come in if they are willing to contribute?

Mr. RALSTON: It has never, I think, been inquired into whether they are willing to contribute, but I should be very much surprised if they agreed to a contributory scheme.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Has the minister considered dependents other than the wife and children? I have a case in mind where a military man left his sisters, who are dependent upon him, and who had contributed largely to the funds, and they have never been able to get anything in the way of a pension. To my mind their case is in the same category as those that have been referred to this afternoon.

Mr. RALSTON: I think my hon. friend has spoken to me about that case before. Was it the case of an officer who had not served the full period required for a pension?

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I think he had served the full period.

Mr. RALSTON: There is no provision here for extending the ambit of dependants in that case. The dependants are the wife and children.

Mr. ERNST: The minister referred in the course of his remarks to civil remedies where pensions were payable and the widow, or the grass widow, I should say, was not able to obtain a proportion of the pension. Is there any serious objection to providing legislation whereby if the wife is unjustly deserted she can obtain a proportion of the pension as a matter of principle?

Mr. RALSTON: I would say immediately that the pension paying authority would then be put in the place of a court trying a question of domestic relations between husband and wife. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition mentioned a different case, where an order had already been made and the matter dealt with by a court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. ERNST: The minister misunderstands me. I did not mean that the pension board should be placed in the position of a court, but was speaking of cases where there had been an order by the court. Let us say that the divorce court in Nova Scotia grants alimony. To-day the pension cannot be attached for alimony. I have one particular case in mind where the husband is looking forward to the divorce because he will get clear of supporting his wife, whereas a proportion of his pension is going to her so long as they remain married. If the court has made an order for alimony, is there any reason why the pension paying authority should not deduct the amount from the pension?

Mr. RALSTON: The same reason, I would think, why the employer of that husband should not be called upon to recognise an order for the payment of alimony.

Mr. ERNST: You can garnishee his wages.

Mr. RALSTON: That is not simply recognising it and paying the amount without a special proceeding, and I do not think even a garnishee would apply until provision had been made so that the husband would be entitled to his maintenance. I shall be very glad to take the suggestion of the leader of the opposition into consideration, that is in cases where an order has actually been made.

Mr. ERNST: That is all I am asking.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend said where the wife had been unjustly deserted.

Mr. ERNST: I did not mean to say that, but I had in mind cases where there had been an order by the court, for alimony, for instance.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Is it clear, then, that the minister agrees that an order of the court shall be respected?

Mr. RALSTON: It is agreed that I will consider it and consult with the officers of the department about it. I have heard sometimes suggestions across the floor of this committee that undertakings have been given. Please do not understand that any undertaking has been given. I will, however, undertake to see if that can be carried out equitably, and having regard to similar legislation. I do not think we should make a special situation in regard to this act. What, for instance, is the situation with regard to the superannuation of civil servants? If an ex-civil servant deserts his wife, is the government called on to respect an order for support? I want to see about that, and to inquire into other acts of a similar nature. I shall be glad to look into the matter and consider it, and further than that I do not think the committee ought to ask me to go.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Will the minister agree to move that the committee rise so that he can consider this matter?

Mr. RALSTON: I think that is unusual.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I want to bring before him the definite case of an officer.

Mr. RALSTON: That is all right. My hon. friend can bring it up now.

Mr. KAISER: There have been a number of cases where a soldier has died within two or three years after the war and left a widow, but she is not entitled under the law to receive a pension unless it can be demonstrated that the soldier's death was due to war service. Now there are many instances where medical experts cannot positively testify that death was due to war service, and I therefore do not see anything unreasonable in my suggestion that if a soldier dies within a reasonable time, say within two or three years after returning from the war, his death should be considered due to war service. There is not a great number of these cases, and they should all be considered on the same plane. I know one or two cases where the widow is in difficulties because the husband died within a year or two—in one case within a year—after the war, and it was not clear that his death was due to war service. I think the country could well afford to regard these cases as being war casualties.

Mr. RALSTON: We all have cases similar to those to which my hon. friend refers, but they do not, I think, come within the spirit of the Militia Pension Act, which provides for pension only in the case of a definite period of service. What my hon. friend is referring to are cases which come under the Pension Act providing for pensions in case of death from war disability. Those are now being considered by the special committee, as my hon. friend knows.

Mr. KAISER: It is being considered?

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know whether the particular case which my hon. friend puts is being considered, but I shall be very much surprised if it is not, because it was brought up whenever the problems affecting ex-service men are considered.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ralston thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 197, to amend the Militia Pension Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT

PREVENTION OF SMUGGLING

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of National Revenue) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution.

That the Customs Act, chapter 42 of the revised statutes, 1927, be amended to make provision for a more adequate enforcement of the act and the prevention of smuggling operations in the territorial waters of Canada.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Explain.

Mr. EULER: The bill to be founded upon this resolution is the result of recommendations made by the royal commission with regard to smuggling, especially on the eastern coast of Canada. At all times there has been considerable doubt whether, in law, we have authority to make seizures within territorial waters of Canada beyond the three mile limit. The bill is intended to remove that doubt so far as it is possible to do so. With regard to vessels of British registry, we are extending the limit to twelve miles as well. There is also provision in the bill requiring importers to keep accurate and complete books of record of their importations. That has not been the case in the past, and in many instances it has been very difficult to establish that goods were smuggled.

Mr. BENNETT: That would not go far with bootleggers.

Mr. EULER: I am afraid not.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, perhaps the minister will be good enough to explain to the committee the recommendations made by the royal commission that will not be included in the legislation under this resolution; or, if he desires it the other way, to explain which of the recommendations will find a lodging place in the statute that he now proposes to enact.

Mr. EULER: A very considerable number of the recommendations of the royal commission are embodied in three separate bills; one to amend the excise act, which has had a third reading; another based on this resolution; and a third, the resolution for which will follow after this is disposed of.

Mr. BENNETT: This deals only with territorial waters?

Mr. EULER: That is all, except in regard to keeping complete books of record of importations.

Mr. MARCIL: Three or four years ago, Mr. Chairman, I brought this matter up in connection with the Baie de Chaleur. It has been the practice there for boats to stay outside the three mile limit and keep open bar both day and night, the fishermen getting their supplies of liquor from those boats and landing it at various points along the coast. The hon. Speaker co-operated with me in protesting against this practice, and asking for legislation to put a stop to it. I wish to congratulate the minister on this resolution, for I think no means would be too severe to put a stop to what has become a very serious abuse, leading to the demoralization of the fishermen and their families. I am sure the suggested legislation will meet with the hearty approval of people residing both in New Brunswick and Quebec.

Mr. BENNETT: It is in respect of that and similar matters that I am endeavouring to find out what the minister proposes to do. If my memory serves me correctly, His Lordship Bishop Ross wrote a letter to the royal commission in which he pointed out just what the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) has mentioned. At that time it was clear that we could not cope with the situation. Recommendations were made by the royal commission. Will the minister be good enough to explain just what he proposes to do to meet the situation? Owing to the shoal waters liquor boats anchored more than three miles from the shore of the Baie de Chaleur and the local fishermen sold their catch and with the proceeds bought strong drink, to the utter demoralization of themselves and the ruin of their families. It was felt at that time that we should consider the whole situation not only from the national, but possibly from the international standpoint also. Will the minister explain to the committee what is being done in that regard?

Mr. EULER: I regret Mr. Chairman, that I did not make myself clear on the point. As I said at the outset, there has been doubt whether we have power to seize any vessels beyond the three mile limit, although in what might be regarded as territorial waters of Canada. We want to be in a position to seize any vessel so long at is it in such waters.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the definition of territorial waters?

Mr. EULER: I do not know. I am free to admit that a difficulty may be encountered there, and the question is one that must be left to the judgment of the courts. They must say what constitutes territorial waters. I do not think anyone can say absolutely, with regard to any particular section of the coast, what comprises the territorial waters of Canada and what does not.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Will this apply to other than British vessels?

Mr. EULER: If in territorial waters of Canada, yes. With regard to Canadian vessels or vessels of British register there will be a limit of twelve miles from our own coast.

Mr. ERNST: Twelve miles off Halifax, say?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. ERNST: Where under heaven can you get a power like that?

Mr. EULER: They are our own vessels.

Mr. ERNST: But they are outside your own territorial waters.

Mr. EULER: This is entirely in harmony with the recommendation of a commission consisting of three judges. I do not know whether my hon. friend has any confidence in their opinion.

Mr. ERNST: I have not the slightest confidence in it if it applies to vessels twelve miles off Halifax. The Supreme Court of Nova Scotia in a case tried recently decided otherwise.

Mr. EULER: My hon. friend will not say that this will do any harm?

Mr. ERNST: I fancy you will find yourself in a blind alley; you will get nowhere. The courts will hold such a provision as this ultra vires.

Mr. BENNETT: Why twelve miles?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Because the United States fixed upon that limit.

Mr. EULER: For that matter, why three miles?

Mr. ERNST: That limit is for international purposes.

Mr. EULER: Well, we might have made it thirteen. As a matter of fact we thought of making it eighteen, but it was felt that twelve miles would be a fair range.

[Mr. Euler.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I presume that what the minister is really doing is following the tentative arrangement made between Great Britain and the United States?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And that gives a right of search up to twelve miles; that is my recollection. With regard to the three mile limit, the minister professes ignorance of the reason for that arbitrary limitation having been established. Surely he must know what that reason was. Every country has the right to protect its coast, and three miles was fixed upon for the reason that, at the time that limitation was established, three miles was the range of cannon. One argument advanced by the United States in relation to the twelve mile limit was that the range of shore cannon had tremendously increased, and they felt that the limit should be correspondingly extended. At any rate, whether right or wrong, the three mile limit was fixed for the reason I have stated. But my hon. friend has not answered this pertinent question: What are territorial waters so far as Canada is concerned? The minister confesses that he is unable to answer the question, and I sympathize with him in his view that the question is one for the Justice department. But has not the Minister of Justice been taken into my hon. friend's confidence in connection with the bill? I speak subject to correction, because I have been away so much, but I remember that in connection with the customs investigation Mr. O'Connor was consistently of the view that most of these waters were enclosed to us—mare clausum, over which we had sovereign rights. He thought the Baie de Chaleur was one of these, as well as the Northumberland straits. He prepared an argument in support of this view—an argument for which, by the way, he was not paid. Nor was he allowed to sue for payment. Is the minister adopting Mr. O'Connor's opinion without having paid him for it? At any rate, I think seriously we are entitled to know exactly what we are doing. Take for example lake Ontario, where there is considerable activity: I am sure the minister desires to take action there. Well, is that a territorial water of Canada?

Mr. EULER: I think it would be, to the middle of the lake.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is that understood with the United States in connection with the endeavour to put a stop to the nefarious practice there?

Mr. EULER: This is not particularly designed for the lakes; the legislation is intended to apply to the coasts.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has the minister any definition of "territorial waters"? Is there any such definition in the bill?

Mr. EULER: No, but I may say for the benefit of my hon. friend that the bill has passed the scrutiny and had the approval of the Department of Justice. I am not a legal man and candidly I do not know what might constitute territorial waters in any given case. Would my hon. friends tell us where, in their opinion, territorial water begins or ends at the mouth of the St. Lawrence, for example? Can that be decided? We must take each case as we come to it.

Mr. ERNST: I do not propose to answer the minister's question, but I ask him in all seriousness to tell us just what the purpose of this bill is. Is it intended to justify or to attempt to justify seizures beyond three miles from low water wark on the coast line, say, of Nova Scotia?

Mr. EULER: If they are hanging about the coast outside the three mile limit and we know that their object is to smuggle, we want to be able to seize them.

Mr. BENNETT: Regardless of the flag they fly?

Mr. EULER: If within territorial waters, yes.

Mr. ERNST: But what does the minister mean by "territorial waters?" The definition given in the British Territorial Waters Jurisdiction Act is, three miles from low water mark; so that within a radius of three miles around an island a ship would be within territorial waters.

Mr. EULER: That is not in accordance with the argument of my hon. friend from West York.

Mr. ERNST: It is in accordance with the findings of the court. In the case of Mason versus Coffin, in which the department made a seizure beyond the three mile limit, the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia only a few months ago held this action to have been unwarranted. It is therefore futile to pass such a law. Why does not the minister go to the British parliament and have the Territorial Waters Jurisdiction Act enlarged if he feels that the present law is not wide enough? We have no constitutional power in the matter, and if the minister is honest he will appeal to the British parliament to have the law amended. I should like to see this done, but the minister should recognize that this parliament has not the power to pass such a law as this.

Mr. CHURCH: Any improvements in the customs regulations will be in the public interest. This whole question dates back to the pioneer work done in this house by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), who was mainly responsible for the collection of $60,000,000 of customs dues which otherwise would not have been received. Has the minister endeavoured to enforce our customs regulations without seeking help from the admiralty of the United States? I noticed the other day that an armed flotilla of American boats entered the port of Walkerville, within the territorial waters of Canada, over the head of the Canadian government, and fired off guns and rifles, breaking windows, according to dispatches in various papers in the Toronto district. If the government of Canada need life-saving operations carried out on the great lakes they must at present appeal to American life-saving stations. When there is a mine disaster and 100 men or thereabouts are killed or injured, as in the case of the Hollinger mine, they have to go to Pittsburgh to get a life-saving crew. Is the government going to depend upon the United States in order to prevent smuggling in territorial waters of Canada, and appeal for assistance from American customs boats? How much longer is the government going to stand for that sort of thing? It is all very well to say that they are tightening up the regulations, but the fact is that around Windsor and elsewhere they have to rely somewhat on American craft to help them enforce their regulations. Where is this wonderful external affairs department with its admiralty. Where is the admiral, with an American invasion at Walkerville? I hope the minister will become active. I must give him credit for having been active in the past year and having tightened up the regulations, on the initiative of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. But these regulations should be enforced without help from the admiralty of the United States. I hope now that this wonderful Department of External Affairs will get busy and mobilize our fleet in the Detroit river to protect the citizens of this country instead of sending ambassadors all over the seven seas. Smuggling should be prevented by co-operation between the two governments, and we should tell the authorities of the United States that when they cross into Canadian waters they are in a dangerous position, without regard to our new status.

Mr. EULER: I have no knowledge whatever of American preventive officers or boats entering Canadian waters and firing shots on Canadian ports. If that be true I certainly think it would require some investigation and consideration. But the hon. member has confused two things. Smuggling into the United States is not smuggling until boats leave Canadian waters, and I know of no smuggling into Canadian territory at Windsor or Walkerville or other ports. It is quite true that goods, wet goods if you like, leave Canadian ports, but even if they are carried in American bottoms that is not smuggling into or out of Canada, and has nothing to do with the prevention of smuggling. When these goods enter the United States it may be smuggling, but that is not breaking a Canadian law.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Then will the minister inform the committee if there was no breach of the Canadian law when the steamer Kennedy was taken in for hovering in the Northumberland straits with $20,000 worth of Scotch whiskey belonging to a company of which the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) was president?

Mr. EULER: I made no reference to that.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): I would like the minister to refer to it.

Mr. EULER: The two cases are not at all parallel. I think we have always contended that the Northumberland straits are Canadian territorial waters, although I believe that point is contested.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): If the minister is correct in that, perhaps he will be able to inform the committee why the $20,000 worth of wet goods carried by the Kennedy was afterwards handed back?

Mr. EULER: I have no knowledge of the case; I cannot recollect the circumstances. However, it has happened in other cases that we were found to be wrong in the seizure, and naturally we had to give back the goods.

Mr. BENNETT: It was held that Northumberland straits were not territorial waters.

Mr. EULER: If we were not entitled to make the seizure we had to give back the goods.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): If my hon. friend will allow me, the records show that the question of whether or not the Northumberland straits were territorial waters was not decided; there were opinions in favour of that contention and opinions against it, and it has not been decided up to the present.

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. EULER: Perhaps I should know about this case, but I do not, and I should like to know the circumstances. Did this case come before the courts, as to whether we had power to seize that $20,000 worth of liquor?

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): No. The department had reports for and against that contention, and they decided that they would—

Mr. BENNETT: Give the prisoner the benefit of the doubt.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): And the whiskey.

Mr. EULER: I have no knowledge whatever of that case; if it were done in that way I have no doubt the departmental officials had good reasons for so doing.

Mr. ERNST: Is it honestly the considered opinion of the law officers of the crown that this parliament has power to pass laws affecting British or other ships beyond three miles from low water mark on the coast line of Canada?

Mr. EULER: Is my hon. friend referring to territorial waters?

Mr. ERNST: I am referring to the three mile limit, say three miles from the extreme point of the Nova Scotia coast. Within that three mile limit these waters are territorial, but is it the considered opinion of the law officers of the crown that we can legislate for twelve miles beyond the low water mark?

Mr. EULER: Only for ships of British registry.

Mr. ERNST: Then I venture to say that this law will be held ultra vires the first time it comes before the courts. This principle was so held by the privy council in 1897.

Mr. EULER: I can only repeat what I have already said, that the bill was drawn with the assistance of the officials of the Department of Justice.

Mr. ERNST: Then I have not a very good opinion of the law officers of the department.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely the Prime Minister is interested in this matter. If we claim the right, not as a sovereign state but as a self-governing dominion, to pass certain legislation, we cannot claim the right to place ships flying the flag of Great Britain in any different position from the ships of any other country. That is obvious, and if you now propose that a British ship can be seized within twelve miles of Nova Scotia if it carries a cargo of liquor, obviously that law must stand or fall on a determination of the question whether or not you can apply the same rule to ships flying the American flag or the Norwegian flag, and surely it is clear that you cannot do so. In addition to that, the parliament at Westminster passed the Territorial Waters Jurisdiction Act, largely because of a certain decision in which thirteen judges took part. It is a matter of interest to us that on that case sat the only Canadian who ever has been a member of the High Court of Justice in England. Those judges divided very acutely upon the question. The imperial parliament then passed this Territorial Waters Jurisdiction Act, and the jurisdiction thus defined is three miles out to sea from low water mark. In the light of that legislation, and following the decision in the Nadan case, how can this parliament pass a law with respect to any ships other than its own beyond the three mile limit?

Mr. EULER: It applies only to our own ships.

Mr. BENNETT: No; the minister was very careful to say that it applied to ships of British registry as well.

Mr. EULER: I understand that there is only one registry. I am not familiar with these legal points, but I believe there is only the British registry, and that we have no strictly Canadian registry of ships.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, we have ships registered at St. John, Halifax and Yarmouth. The minister need not offer any apologies for his lack of knowledge; he approaches his problems as few ministers do, with a very frank desire to secure the legislation he wants, and it is our duty merely to point out to him as far as possible the difficulties in the way. If we can assist him to overcome those difficulties, we have done our duty. I am now pointing out that the Territorial Waters Jurisdiction Act of England and these decisions to which I have referred clearly show that this parliament cannot possibly pass legislation which will affect ships other than Canadian ships beyond the three mile limit. If we desire to have this law apply beyond the three mile limit we should negotiate such a treaty as Great Britain negotiated with the United States, to which there was so much opposition and which a great many people in England think improper. The United States claimed that they had jurisdiction over a British ship the minute she came within the three mile limit, and that therefore they could seize the liquor cargo of the ship and do various other matters of that kind which necessitated the sealing of the liquor on the ship before she came into harbour. Finally Great Britain yielded to the establishment of the twelve mile limit. Now I say this to the minister: I do not think he is one of those who desire to get credit for something that, when he does it, he knows is no good. I have seen ministers who desired to take great kudos for what had been done in parliament, for the legislation enacted—with their tongue in their cheek, knowing very well it was just a gesture. Perhaps the minister will put this matter before the law officers of the department; for I believe no government has power to pass a law which will enable anyone to seize outside the three mile limit, a British ship registered in London, England, or in Glasgow, Scotland, having on board a cargo of liquor being smuggled into Canada.

Mr. EULER: I appreciate what my friend has said, and no doubt he is as anxious as I am to obtain the results desired. He has rather anticipated what I intended to say, that of course I will consult the law officers of the crown in regard to the matter. It may be that I am wrong in this, but I suggest to the committee that the resolution be allowed to pass, and this point can be discussed and, if necessary, an amendment inserted when the bill actually gets into committee. I think that might be regarded as satisfactory.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I think so, if the minister will take it that we are not in any sense acceding to the terms of the resolution; for that, I think, is something which we find it a little difficult to do.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Euler thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 198 to amend the Customs Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

ST. CLAIR TRANSIT COMPANY

Mr. W. T. GOODISON (West Lambton) moved the third reading of Bill No. 23, to incorporate the St. Clair Transit Company.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): I have a notice of motion in the votes and proceedings in reference to this particular bill. I beg to move in amendment:

That the said bill be not now read a third time, but be referred to the committee of the whole with instructions to amend it so as to insert the following in substitution of section 22 of said bill:—

The employment of labour in the construction, maintenance and supervision of the said bridge shall be subject to the terms and conditions of the fair wage clauses set forth in the order in council, No. 1206, of June 7, 1922, and any amendments thereto.

Canadian materials and labour must be used in the construction of the said bridge, so far as it may be practical to do so, and a certified statement shall be sent weekly to the Department of Labour giving the names and addresses of firms supplying materials and the quantity thereof.

Mr. GOODISON: I am quite willing that the hon. member's amendment be accepted.

Amendment agreed to, and the house went into committee on the bill, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 22—Labour and materials.

Mr. HEAPS: I beg to move that the following be inserted in lieu of section 22:

The employment of labour in the construction, maintenance and supervision of the said bridge shall be subject to the terms and conditions of the fair wage clauses set forth in the order in council, No. 1206, of June 7, 1922, and any amendments thereto.

Canadian materials and labour must be used in the construction of the said bridge, so far as it may be practical to do so, and a certified statement shall be sent weekly to the Department of Labour giving the names and addresses of firms supplying materials and the quantity thereof.

Mr. CHURCH: I have no objection to the amendment; I believe Canadian labour and materials should be utilized in the construction of this bridge; but I opposed this bill in the private bills committee because I believe the government of Canada should lay down a policy in regard to these international bridges. The national railways have moved the shops from Stratford where they were to Port Huron and they have spent millions of dollars in developing Port Huron, but apparently now they are satisfied to keep the through traffic and to hand over the local traffic to the promoters of this bill. Who are these promoters? Some of them are officials of the Canadian National Railways. One man is a Canadian National engineer, another a salesman, another a loan company manager, another a barber, another a lumber merchant, and so on. I oppose this bill on public policy grounds because I believe the government should lay down a policy in regard to these international bridges. The reason why the promoters have to come to parliament in connection with these bridges is because they are international, they affect navigation. We have some proposed bridges on the St. Lawrence, some on the Niagara and some on the St. Clair. What is the government going to do with regard to the general principle involved in all these bills? Where is the Minister of Railways and what is the policy of the government? Just last Thursday the governor of New York state, Mr. Smith, laid down a policy for his country. He said that these bridges are to be built by the people for the people, and that if any profits are to be made out of the tolls on these bridges, they shall revert to the state of New York. He is big enough on behalf of his government to lay down as a public policy that the profits shall not go into the pockets of private promoters but shall belong to the public. The governor of New York state has practically vetoed two bridge bills which this parliament has passed, and which are similar to the one before the chair to-night. Governor Smith is reported as follows:

"Such bridges should be built by the state or states or by one or more governmental subdivisions or by a public municipal authority similar to the port authority," the governor declared in his blanket veto of the three measures. "If such a bridge is to be built over international waters it should be constructed jointly by the United States in conjunction with the Canadian government or by the state of New York in conjunction with the Canadian province affected."

Such projects, the governor felt could be financed at lower cost by the state or federal governments, while, he added, "they are in their very nature public; to authorize privately-owned toll bridges is a step as backward as to authorize privately-owned highways, under the wording of these acts, the franchise is practically made perpetual."

"If it pays private corporations to erect these bridges," the governor's memorandum continued, "it will certainly pay the state to do it. If tolls are to be charged, the state should be the recipient of the tolls, and they should not be in excess of what is required to operate and maintain property, pay the interest on the bonds and make the necessary annual contributions to the sinking fund for their retirement."

I criticize the Canadian National Railway for surrendering this territory to private parties for private gain. This particular bridge should be made a feeder for the Canadian National's through traffic. This parliament has spent a large sum of money developing Port Huron, and Sir Henry Thornton is going to surrender this territory, where a good deal of local traffic by motor bus and motor truck could be picked up for the national railway. Everybody knows that motor truck and bus competition has been an important factor in depriving the Canadian National Railway of a large part of its earning power, and yet here we are in this parliament without a public policy, proposing to pass bills to erect two or three bridges at Sarnia, two or three more in the Niagara district, and two or three across the St. Lawrence, but if this parliament will not look after the rights of the people, the governor of the state of New York is looking after the rights of the American people. He has vetoed these bridge bills and declared that these international bridges shall belong to the people of the United States for all time to come, and that tolls shall be regulated, and that the bridges shall be under joint operation and joint control. I am very much surprised that the government railway should surrender territory in this way. Just the other day they surrendered territory which they had exclusively at Port Colborne, and they gave the Canadian Pacific Railway running rights over their system, nothwithstanding that this parliament will spend over $100,000,000 on the new Welland canal. This bill should be referred back to the private bills committee, and the Canadian National railway authorities should be brought before that committee. When this bill came before the private bills committee, the Canadian National Railways had lobbyists right in the committee room, canvassing members of the committee in favour of this private owned company which would take away the Canadian National Railway's bread and butter. The time has come for a showdown in this parliament. It is time for the Minister of Railways to declare what is the policy of the government regarding these international bridges. The government were asked in the prvate bills committee to lay down their policy, but they had nobody there to lay down a policy.

I have no objection to the amendment that is before you, Mr. Chairman. A labour clause came before the committee and I strongly supported it, but on grounds of public policy I am urging that this bill should go back to the private bills committee, where the government should announce its policy. If the policy that I have enunciated of joint operation and control of international bridges is good enough for the state of New York, it should be good enough for the state of Michigan and for the state of Ohio.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported.

BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY OF CANADA

The house in committee on Bill No. 43, respecting the Bell Telephone Company of Canada—Mr. Edwards (Ottawa)—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Power to increase capital.

Mr. CHURCH: I have given notice of an amendment to this bill, Mr. Chairman. It is now twenty minutes past eight, and I intend to talk until nine o'clock. I am surprised that this proposal of the Bell Telephone Company to increase its capital stock from $75,000,000 to $150,000,000 should meet with no protest from the committee or from this house, and particularly from the Progressives, who are supposed to be adherents of the principle of public ownership. This company is nothing but an American monopoly, which has crossed the border into Canada. It first came to parliament in 1880 and got its incorporation, under chapter 67. It came back again in 1882, and asked for amendments which were incorporated in chapter 95; in 1884 it came back again for further amendments, chapter 88; in 1892 it came back again and got further amendments, chapter 67; in 1894 it applied for further amendments, which were incorporated in chapter 108; in 1902, chapter 41, it applied for an increase in its capital stock; it came back again in 1906, and got another hand-out from this parliament, by chapter 61; in 1920, which was the last time we saw them around this chamber, by chapter 100 the company was practically given the title deeds to the country and granted a monopoly throughout the whole of Canada. As a result what happened? In the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Manitoba they established government owned telephone systems in order to be free of this masterful American monopoly. The late Sir Adam Beck proposed that the province of Ontario should establish a government owned telephone system, but corporation activity killed the proposal.

There is practically no regulation of the Bell Telephone Company. Almost every rate application that has been made by the company to the Board of Railway Commissioners has been granted in toto. The company is a law unto itself; it is supposed to own the heavens above, the earth beneath, and the waters under the earth. When the municipalities applied to the railway commission to remove the discrimination in telephone rates the commission decline to hear oral argument and told counsel to file written argument—which no doubt was put in the wastepaper basket by the so-called rate regulators. In brief, you might just as well abolish the railway act so far as effective control of this corporation is concerned and go back to the old law of supply and demand as a rate regulator.

In 1917 the Drayton-Acworth report recommended that before any applications for increased rates were granted by parliament they should be reported on by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada. Why was not that course taken in this case? Why should this company be singled out for favoured treatment? The Northern Electric Company is part and parcel of the Bell company. The Northern company has practically a monopoly in the supply of telephone apparatus and there is no regulation of its charges to the parent company. In fact, the Board of Railway Commissioners found that the Northern Electric Company was outside their jurisdiction and could not be required to submit its records for inspection in connection with the recent application of the Bell company for increased rates. The hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary) has introduced a bill this session to amend the railway act in relation to the investigation of subsidiaries of telephone or telegraph companies like the Northern Electric, and I submit that it should be passed before one line of this bill is adopted. For the information of the house let me quote from that bill:

"1. Section three hundred and seventy-five of the Railway Act, chapter one hundred and seventy of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, is amended by inserting the following subsection immediately after subsection twelve thereof:—

"(13) The board shall have jurisdiction to inquire into and investigate the affairs of any company, corporation or firm in which any telephone company or telegraph company subject to the jurisdiction of the board has, in the opinion of the board, a controlling interest as shareholders or partners, or of which such company, corporation or firm in the opinion of the board is a subsidiary, and to examine the books, accounts, vouchers and papers of the said company, corporation or firm, and for such purposes and to that extent the said company, corporation or firm shall be subject to the jurisdiction of the board."

In my opinion the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) ought to take over the hon. member's bill, because unless it is treated as a government measure there is very little prospect of its being enacted this session. I hope that before this $75,000,000 hand out to the Bell company is granted the hon. member for South Toronto will insist that his bill become law in order to confer on the Board of Railway Commissioners jurisdiction over such a company as the Northern Electric, which is purely a subsidiary of the Bell company, formed for the purpose of supplying to the parent company telephone apparatus at fabulous prices.

The government of Ontario opposed the application of the Bell Telephone company for increase of rates to which I have already referred. They were represented before the railway commission by Mr. Reid, who did well there, and he has since seen fit to write a letter to that public ownership organ, the Toronto Globe. The Globe up to a few years ago was always considered to be the mouthpiece of the Liberal party, but latterly it has been somewhat critical in its attitude towards its old-time friends. It was not the Globe that deserted the Liberal party; the Liberal party deserted Liberal principles and the Globe upheld Liberalism. The Globe is a supporter of public ownership of public utilities. I am interested in the attitude of the Liberal party towards this bill. In the late election our opponents went up and down the country charging that the Conservative party was the party of the "big interests." Where is the Liberal party to-night regarding this bill? In the railway committee did the government voice any opposition to this obnoxious measure? Did the government lay down any policy for such a hand out as this —an increase in capital from $75,000,000 to $150,000,000 by this company, with scarcely a tittle of evidence presented to the committee as to any necessity for the increase? I am not here to attack this or any other public utility. I have considerable sympathy for most of our public utility companies, for they are having a hard time to make ends meet in face of the heavy increase in taxation and the greatly enhanced cost of labour and materials; but I do say that before any such increase as is proposed by this bill is granted there should be a thorough and impartial investigation of the Bell Telephone Company and of the subsidiary Northern Electric Company by the railway commission as to the necessity for this particular increase of capital. What do they propose to do with this extra $75,000,000? Does anyone argue that if this bill passes to-night the Bell Telephone Company will devote this money to extensions? No. I venture to say that from $25,000,000 to $50,000,000 of it will be a split of common stock or just a melon to be cut up among the shareholders, paying dividends running up to $50,000,000 on all classes of stock issued, with the result that the telephone users will have to shoulder an added burden in rates on this watered stock. In the hydro-electric system the rates are based upon the actual investment in the enterprise; but when people in the cities buy, say, a quart of milk or a loaf of bread they pay not only the actual worth of that milk and bread, but also extra millions in rates represented in dividends paid out on the various common stocks of no par value.

I venture to say that when this stock is issued and placed on the market a large block of it, anywhere from ten to forty million dollars, will be common stock which will represent not a dollar put into the undertaking. The telephone users of the country will pay for it. In the past two years an application has been made to the Board of Railway Commissioners by this company for an increase in rates. This application was heard, evidence having been taken over a period of several weeks or months. On a motion made in the house in the dying hours of one session, the Minister of Railways said he would bring down a return showing the contracts of the government and the national railways with the Bell company in the matter, which contracts created a discrimination greater than any that had previously existed. The municipalities appealed to the Board of Railway Commissioners asking to have removed this unfair and altogether unjust discrimination. But what does the government of Canada do? Through the national railways the government entered into a private contract over the heads of the commission whereby the government and the national railways get certain cut rates from the Bell Telephone Company at the expense of the rest of Canada. The government itself, for its own purposes, made that private arrangement with the company for the reduction of rates, with the result that telephone users in Ontario and Quebec, through the discrimination which the company showed in favour of the government on the one hand and the Canadian National Railways on the other, were compelled to shoulder an unwarranted burden. Furthermore, the governor in council declined to hear the representatives of the municipalities; after sitting a day and a half they summarily dismissed their application.

The people of this country expect, if public rights are to be respected in this parliament, that some brakes shall be put on this monoply. In this connection I have here a letter which I think it well to read to the committee. It is written to the Globe and is signed by counsel for the Ontario government, Mr. R. A. Reid. He appeared before the railway commissioners and in this letter, dated March 26, he refers to this application, stating:

> With the sanction and approval of the Dominion government and by order of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, the telephone rates of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada were recently increased all over the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and a new and additional burden of taxation was thereby imposed upon all of these telephone users of over $2,600,000 per year.

This was the hand-out which the company got from the Board of Railway Commissioners, who are supposed to regulate these matters, but who as a matter of fact regulate nothing. Far from expecting any control of rates from this body, you might just as well repeal the Railway Act which created the board. I submit that it would be far better for freight, passengers and express if we repealed the Railway Act and reverted to the old law of supply and demand. The good old free trade law of supply and demand would be a more potent factor in regulating public service corporations than the Board of Railway Commissioners. What with that $2,600,000 and this extra $75,000,000 now asked for, the Bell Telephone Company expect to get from this parliament a grant of $77,600,000. The letter goes on:

> This increased burden of taxation upon the people was granted upon the application of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company of New York City, through the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, which it controls, and this new form of increased taxation upon the public was allowed without any legal or logical reasons being given therefor, and without any specific and definite findings being made on the most important issues and questions raised at the hearings in that rate case. The case decides nothing, except the bald grant of an increase of telephone rates; the issues will sooner or later have to be fought all over again before a new and reorganized railway commission. The present railway commission at Ottawa refused the people of Ontario and Quebec the right to argue their case in person before the board, and were supported in this treatment of the public by the government.

In doing so the Board of Railway Commissioners violated the Railway Act. They broke the law when they refused to hear representations from Montreal, Toronto and the municipalities of Ontario and Quebec, because the act—the very charter creating the commission —requires that they shall determine, take evidence and hear counsel on all sides of every case presented and upon the facts adduced render decision. So that they violated the law when they refused to hear counsel representing those opposed to this outrageous request—because it is outrageous. That is the only word that can adequately describe what this company is seeking from parliament at the present time. And it is an American trust; that is all it is; for it is owned in the United States. I have here the shareholders' book which I shall refer to in a moment. The letter goes on:

> There are now before the Dominion parliament at Ottawa for consideration two bills, one being put forward by the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, asking the permission to allow that company to increase its capital stock from $75,000,000 to $150,000,000, or an increase of $75,000,000. In truth and substance this is really an application by the American Telephone and Telegraph Company of New York, which controls the Bell Telephone Company of Canada. Now, the Bell Telephone Company of Canada is incorporated under a special statute, and must submit to have its whole affairs investigated, and an account given to the parliament of Canada of the manner in which it has dealt with all its former stock and bond issues authorized by its act of parliament.

Let me ask what became of the stock issues of 1882, 1884, 1892, 1894, 1902, 1906 and 1920. Did the railway committee ever have the facts of these sales of stock before them, to whom it was sold, the names of the directors of this company as well as the shareholders, the directors of the subsidiary companies and so on? Not one word was said in this connection before the committee last week; this application was passed with no adequate or proper investigation at all. Under the act incorporating the Bell Telephone Company of Canada the company is required to give the names of the shareholders and all the other particulars to this parliament, including all syndicates, bankers, companies and persons to whom such stock and bond issues were sold as well as particulars as to what was done with the proceeds from such sales, but this has never been done.

There is another bill now before the house which will compel the investigation of all companies owned or controlled by telegraph or telephone companies in Canada. This is a very necessary and proper bill, which I hope will be taken over and passed by the government this session. If this is not done the regulation of these companies will become a sham and a farce in this country. The first bill should not be allowed to become law unless the second bill is placed on the statute book at the same time, for obvious reasons. During the recent Bell Telephone rate case before the Board of Railway Commissioners it was conclusively proved that this company over a period of years has continually issued stock to its shareholders at the par value of $100 when that same stock was selling on the market at prices ranging from $125 to $193 per share, with the result that in addition to the dividend of 8 per cent the shareholders have benefited to the extent of the increased cash value of the stock. More stock has been issued and is still being issued from time to time than is necessary to obtain the actual money required, and to this extent financial authorities assert that the stock is watered. In order to pay dividends on this unnecessary capital the users of telephones have had to pay increased rates. This is simply making a gift to the shareholders at the expense of the treasury of the company. This practice should not be allowed to continue; a provision should be included in this bill by which the general public should be given the first opportunity to purchase any of the additional stock issued by this company at the market price. Another provision should be included to prevent the company from using any of its capital stock or bonds in the purchase of the property of any other telephone company, because such dealings usually result in the rates being increased. The company should be prevented also from using the proceeds from the sale of stock for the purchase of old, used, second hand, salvaged material which has been repaired by the Northern Electric Company and reinstalled in the plants of the Bell Telephone Company, because the property assets and values of the company are affected in this way. It seems to me that if we are to have anything done with regard to these American-owned companies another Sir Adam Beck must be found; they are calling out for such a man to-day in every province of Canada. I would that Canada had a Mussolini to wield the big stick on some of these American-owned and controlled public utilities. He has said: "A country does not belong to those who inhabit it to-day; it is an inheritance from the past, a possession for the present and a trust for the future"; yet here we are binding posterity to excessive over capitalization and being asked to permit this American concern to increase its capital stock from $75,000,000 to $150,000,000 in violation of all the laws of this country and in violation of the recommendation contained in this Drayton-Acworth report which provides that before any of these companies are permitted to increase their capital stock a report should be made by the railway commission as to the necessity for such increase.

The subsidiaries of this company are a law unto themselves; the Northern Electric Company is under no public control. Another paragraph in this letter written by Mr. Reid, who was counsel for the government of Ontario before the railway commission, deals with the Northern Electric Company. If the second bill becomes law it will be possible to go into the affairs of the Bell Telephone Company and its subsidiary concerns and to lay all the cards on the table. It will enable an investigation to be made of the prices, profits, costs, expenses and rates in connection with the Northern Electric Company as well as the charges for telephone material, apparatus and equipment supplied to the Bell Telephone Company. The Northern Electric Company is owned and controlled by the Bell Telephone Company, manufacturing all the telephone apparatus required by that company, but the Northern Electric Company charges the Bell Telephone Company such prices as it pleases for its apparatus and equipment, and there is no way of finding whether the profits and charges are reasonable or unreasonable, excessive or exorbitant. There is nothing to prevent the Northern Electric Company from raising the price of the equipment supplied to the Bell Telephone Company at any time they may see fit to do so. It has been maintained that we have no power, authority or jurisdiction which would enable us to investigate the affairs of this concern, because it is not a telephone company. This bill to which I have referred, therefore, should pass and become law.

There is another reason why it should become law. All the telephone companies of the western provinces are supplied by the same concern, the Northern Electric Company, and it becomes important for the telephone users of western Canada to know whether they are being charged excessive prices for telephone apparatus and equipment, and whether the profits made at their expense by this unregulated and uncontrolled monopoly are reasonable or unreasonable, excessive or exorbitant; and the same thing applies to the telephone companies in the maritime provinces.

I do not see any members of the Progressive party in the house. No doubt if it were about the peace department or some other academic resolution they would all be present; but when it comes to using the big stick on the Bell Telephone Company and the Northern Electric, which is selling apparatus to the municipally owned plants of Alberta, Manitoba and Saskatchewan, then there are only two or three or four Progressives in the chamber. Because they call themselves Progressives does not make them progressive. I hope they will be progressive on this bill. I see one of the Progressives, the hon. gentleman from Calgary, and I know he is for public rights and will be progressive in respect to this matter. I know that last year the junior member for Winnipeg put up a big fight on the Carillon electric light and power bill, and I think he should put up a fight on this bill also.

This particular Northern Electric Company is supplying the telephone companies of Canada with apparatus, and they hide behind a tariff wall of from 27 to 30 per cent duty on their apparatus, equipment and supplies. There is no reason why this duty should not be done away with entirely, because this duty is added to the price. The manufacture of this telephone equipment, apparatus and supplies would be no monopoly in Canada if there were no duty, and, in addition, it would allow British manufactured apparatus and equipment of a better quality, finer workmanship and superior value to come into Canada and be used by Canadians, instead of their being compelled to use obsolete and antiquated apparatus.

There should also be a public inquiry and hearings before a committee of parliament dealing with these two bills. I am surprised that the province of Ontario should submit to the Bell Telephone Company. They did that before Sir Adam Beck was dead a year. They are very active over the Ontario Temperance Act and things like that, but when it comes to appearing before a committee against this monopoly which is taking millions of dollars a year out of the pockets of the people of Ontario, why was not the government of Ontario represented? Is it due to the fact that the influence of Sir Adam Beck is lost and that what he stood for has no supporters to-day? I think you can count on your fingers all the supporters of Sir Adam's policy in Ontario. There should be a public hearing so that the telephone users and municipalities might be permitted to appear before such a committee and present their views on the methods and operations of these companies, and the manner of their dealing with stock and bond issues, their revenues, returns and accounting methods, so that they may come under more efficient and effective regulation and control by government authority. It is desirable to ascertain why there are always enormous surpluses and reserves in the Northern Electric Company, while at the same time there are large paper deficits in the Bell Telephone Company, which controls the Northern Electric and to which it pays large sums of money for apparatus and equipment, rendering periodical applications for higher telephone rates an apparent necessity.

All the apparatus, equipment and material purchased from the Northern Electric or through the Northern Electric is charged by the Bell Telephone Company to operating expenses or as a capital outlay to be paid for from the proceeds of the sale of its stock and bonds, and yet the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada and the Bell Telephone Company and the Northern Electric Company say that these things and matters are all withdrawn from any inquiry or investigation by the railway commission; that that body has no right to examine into any such transactions and is bound without question by such prices as the Northern Electric Company sees fit to charge for such apparatus, equipment and supplies. The commission did not go into this matter of financing at all. For that reason this second bill should not pass.

In conclusion I also wish to draw attention to the fact that in the United States a company known as the Western Electric, at Chicago and New York, is formed and performs the same work there for the American Telephone and Telegraph Company as the Northern Electric Company does in Canada. A labour paper published in Washington states that the American Federation of Labour are urging congress to probe the Bell Telephone Company across the border and the rates charged by this combine. This American workers' journal gives amazing facts as to how they crossed into Canada, and says that they fight labour unions. This paper, called Labor in the issue of January 21, 1928, says on page 1:

> The telephone business is virtually a monopoly. It is engaged in interstate commerce. It is a public utility, yet the United States government has exercised virtually no control over its practices. This is particularly true in regard to rates. This three-billion-dollar public utility, doing business across state lines in every state in the union, is exempt from that kind of regulation which means most to the public, rate regulation.

There is a splendid article here giving the low-down on the telephone monopoly, one of the most profitable monopolies in the world. There is a large cartoon showing the telephone monopoly with its arms stretched out over the United States and Canada and saying "Well here I am! What are you going to do about it?" The article goes on to say that the American Telephone and Telegraph Company does seventy-two per cent of the telephone business, and dominates the rest.

The hour for private bills having expired, the Speaker resumed the chair.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT

The house again in committee on Bill No. 170, to amend the Special War Revenue Act—Mr. Robb—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2.

Mr. BENNETT: What does section 2 mean? What sort of tax are you going to impose?

Mr. ROBB: This is for the better administration and collection of the tax. As I explained when the bill was in committee before, it was discovered that certain individuals imported different parts of an automobile, made it up for their own use, and thus escaped the tax which would have been paid had the automobile been manufactured in Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: But the clause states just the exact opposite of that.

Mr. ROBB: It is understood that when they bring in the parts and assemble them, they manufacture them.

Mr. BENNETT: The clause reads:

> When goods of any class mentioned in schedule I are manufactured or produced in Canada—

Those words mean exactly what they say—"manufactured or produced."

> —and are for use by the manufacturer or producer thereof and not for sale, such goods shall, for the purposes of this part, be deemed to have been manufactured or produced in Canada and sold, and the sale shall be deemed to have taken place when the goods are used or appropriated for use. The minister may determine the value of the said goods for the tax.

Think what that means. I have a factory in which I produce boots and shoes. One part of that factory produces, we will say, laces. When the lace goes into the shoe and the shoe goes out on the market, this clause applies. Surely that cannot be intended, because the operation is a completed one.

Mr. ROBB: That is not the intention.

Mr. BENNETT: But that is what the clause says.

Mr. ROBB: No. For instance, a bus company might buy a chassis and bring it in; it might buy another part—

Mr. BENNETT: Or manufacture it.

Mr. ROBB: —in Canada or import it.

Mr. BENNETT: The clause says, "manufactured or produced in Canada."

Mr. ROBB: It is not manufactured until it is assembled. They do not sell it; they use it in their own service, and they thus evade the tax which would be paid if they had bought it from a regular manufacturer. That is what this clause is intended to cover.

Mr. BENNETT: The clause says:

> When goods of any class mentioned in schedule I are manufactured or produced in Canada—

Not imported.

> —and are for use by the manufacturer or producer thereof—

That is, he is producing or manufacturing them to be used by him in his business. They make a completed product.

—and not for sale, such goods shall, for the purposes of this part, be deemed to have been manufactured or produced in Canada.

Of course they are, because the clause says that they have to be manufactured or produced in this country. The thing is nonsense; an absurdity of that kind should not be put on the statute book without the protest of any who understand the English language. Let the minister apply his common sense, as he said the other evening, as against the technical knowledge of someone else.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Should the wording not be "not manufactured in Canada"?

Mr. ROBB: A chassis is not an automobile; it is a part of an automobile. It becomes an automobile when it is assembled, and the experience of the department has been that people have been buying different parts and assembling them, and thus evading the tax.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is the sales tax?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the minister do me this one favour and look at the clause. It reads:

When goods of any class—

A chassis is goods.

—mentioned in schedule 1 are manufactured or produced in Canada—

Manufactured does not mean assembled.

—and are for use by the manufacturer or producer thereof—

That is the man who makes the chassis.

—and not for sale, such goods shall, for the purposes of this part, be deemed to have been manufactured or produced in Canada and sold—

Mr. THORSON: "And sold." That is the difference.

Mr. BENNETT:

—and the sale shall be deemed to have taken place when the goods are used or appropriated for use.

That is not the case which my hon. friend has put. A man has a factory; he manufactures one part of an automobile in one part of the factory, another part in another, and then he assembles the automobile. This clause says that this shall be deemed to be a sale of a part because the goods happen to be manufactured in Canada. As the hon. member for East Calgary has just pointed out, if you mean anything at all, you mean "not manufactured in Canada." It must be that or nothing.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why does my hon. friend not simply say—

Be deemed to have been sold.

—instead of saying—

Be deemed to have been manufactured or produced in Canada and sold.

—when they have been manufactured or produced here?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Is this what the Minister of Finance means? We will assume that an automobile manufacturer wishes to use in his business say a dozen trucks. He does not sell these trucks, but under this legislation he shall be deemed to make a sale of them when he uses them for the purpose of his business.

Mr. ROBB: That is not the intent of the clause.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): That is what I understood the minister to say.

Mr. ROBB: It covers only passenger vehicles. I repeat that it is intended to get after bus companies who buy different parts, assemble them, keep them for their own use, and under the act have heretofore evaded the tax.

Mr. BENNETT: Then let somebody prepare a clause that will cover what the minister wants.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Suppose you use the words:

When chassis of any class mentioned in schedule 1 are manufactured or produced.

The minister has admitted that chassis are goods. Suppose you use the word "chassis" instead of "goods".

Mr. EULER: There is no tax on chassis. An automobile does not become taxable until it is an automobile, which means the assembling of the chassis with the other parts.

Mr. BENNETT: Chassis are goods.

Mr. EULER: But they are not adaptable for passenger use until they are assembled with the other parts. Then they become taxable.

Mr. MANION: Suppose you left out a couple of lines and let the clause read:

When goods of any class mentioned in schedule 1 are manufactured or produced in Canada—

Leave out the part modifying that.

—such goods shall, for the purposes of this part, be deemed to have been manufactured or produced in Canada and sold.

It simply states that when they are manufactured or produced in Canada they shall be deemed to have been manufactured or produced in Canada. Why repeat that? It has no sense as it is.

Mr. EULER: The schedule applies only to automobiles adapted for passenger use. These chassis are not automobiles at all: they are only parts until they have been assembled, and that is the process of producing them. When the assembling is done, it becomes an automobile.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: People have been making these parts here; the sales tax does not apply unless there is a sale, and so long as they use them of course there is no sale.

Mr. EULER: Exactly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then all I am suggesting is that you simply say what you mean. Strike out the words, "be deemed to have been manufactured or produced in Canada," and simply say, "be deemed to have been sold." and then make the tax immediately applicable.

Mr. BENNETT: Does either the Minister of National Revenue or the Minister of Finance, think for a single moment that legislation of any value at all is being enacted when it is provided that if any goods are manufactured or produced in Canada they shall be deemed to have been manufactured or produced in Canada?

Mr. EULER: They are for the use of the manufacturer. You have to read it in conjunction with that.

Mr. BENNETT: That does not change it at all.

Mr. EULER: I do not think it makes any difference.

Mr. BENNETT: It makes all the difference in the world. You will not be able to collect duty under this section as it is.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friends are both good lawyers, and for my part I am prepared to strike out the words, "manufactured or produced in Canada," so that it will read "deemed to have been sold."

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is it.

Mr. EULER: I move to strike out in the fifteenth line the words, "manufactured or produced in Canada and."

Amendment agreed to.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. BENNETT: The word "such" in line fourteen should also be changed.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Change in number of tariff items.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the effect of this?

Mr. ROBB: It is to conform with the customs schedules.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Consumption or sales tax.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the effect of this section?

Mr. EULER: This is merely to correct an omission. Until now the wholesale licensed manufacturer who imported goods free could sell them free of sales tax, but where they were produced in Canada the sales tax applied. We want to make it clear that the sales tax applies also when he imports the goods.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Sales tax not payable on certain goods.

Mr. EULER: This provides that we shall get the sales tax on liquors that are sold and claimed to be exported but for which no landing certificates or actual proof of export can be shown. It is the recommendation of the royal commission, and I think it is quite right. We have had one case decided in our favour in the courts, although the decision may be appealed. We claim that we are entitled to sales and gallonage taxes amounting to $5,000,000 from brewers and distillers, and we want to make certain that we do not have to go into the courts to collect what we think belongs to us.

I move, Mr. Chairman, that after the word "bond" in the twentieth line the following words be inserted, "by the manufacturer thereof."

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not quite sure that I understand what the minister has in mind. I assume, in the first instance, that he does not wish to do anything to hinder the export business of Canada, and that on the other hand he wants to keep Canadian costs down so that the Canadian producer may be well equipped to meet his foreign competitor. As I understand it the position is this: Notwithstanding everything that we have been doing, the minister is still of the opinion that a great deal of liquor is illegally exported, and it is thought that we should get our tax on it.

Mr. EULER: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If that is not the case, what else can there be in it, because there is to be no tax if it is shown that the export is legal? The section says that this is not to be applied to cases where foreign landing certificates satisfactory to the minister are produced as proof that the goods have been landed at the place designated in the export entry. I take it that what that means is simply this, that that certificate would show illegal exportation, not only illegal exportation so far as the laws of Canada are concerned—the minister shakes his head. Well then, the idea is that the department is of the opinion that notwithstanding everything that has been done towards aiding the United States in connection with their enforcement, there is still a considerable quantity of liquor illegally entering that country from Canada. Am I right in that?

Mr. EULER: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If I am not right in that, what is the object of this amendment?

Mr. EULER: The words that have just been inserted, "by the manufacturer thereof," should clear the matter up. To be quite frank, the exportations of liquor now going out of Canada at Windsor or along the border to the United States are perfectly legal, but our contention is this, and this is the crux of it, that the manufacturers, the distillers or the brewers, are not the exporters. That is exactly the point upon which the case against Gooderham and Worts was fought out in the courts a week or two ago. We contend that the goods are sold in Canada to somebody who comes from the United States to, say, the port of Windsor; and because of the fact that the sale takes place in Canada it is subject to the sales tax. That is the whole story. We want to make absolutely certain that in future we can collect that sales tax. And why should we not? The exporters of liquor and beer and ale are now paying the excise tax of $9 a gallon, which they would not have to pay if they could prove that the goods were actually exported by them. Why should they not pay the gallonage tax and the sales tax? I see no reason why they should pay one and not the other. More than that, in many cases they collect the sales tax and do not turn it in to the government. They collect that sales tax for the day when they may have to pay it by process of law, and then charge it against their income, thus escaping the income tax as well. Under those circumstances I do not feel that they deserve much consideration. When they make a bona fide export sale outside the country and send the goods out under the bond of a guarantee company, as we now demand, and show proper landing certificates—we are very careful that they are genuine landing certificates—then they are exempt from this tax, as they ought to be, because it is a bona fide export sale. But with regard to sales that go across the border—and I am not trying to interfere with export trade—we do contend—and most legal men agree with us—that when that sale is made in Canada it is subject to sales tax.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That puts quite a different complexion on the matter from what I understood. My hon. friend contends that a local sale shall be taxed as such and shall not be covered up by a fictitious export entry?

Mr. EULER: Exactly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He is quite right in that of course. Is that covered all along the line? For example, take imports of Scotch whiskey, is there a tax on the sale after it arrives here?

Mr. EULER: There is a tax on all importations.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am speaking of the sales tax on the sale that takes place in Canada.

Mr. EULER: The tax is applied on the importation. It is just a single tax.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Let me put it the reverse say. There is a local tax sale here. What about the man who imports this Scotch whiskey and exports it to the United States? My hon. friend here is only getting at the manufacturers. Had he not better clean the whole thing up and get after the dealers?

Mr. EULER: We get the tax on the Scotch whiskey when it comes in.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Not if it comes in in bond.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We get the ordinary customs tax on the whiskey coming in, and we have the corresponding excise tax on the product of our own manufacturers. Now, take the case where a man brings in the whiskey and exports it, what machinery is there to cover that transaction?

Mr. EULER: We collect the duty when the whiskey comes in. We have got our revenue out of it; we are not particularly concerned after that.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Does the minister say that on goods imported and held in bond we get the excise tax?

Mr. EULER: No, when it is cleared.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What happens when goods are left in bond for a time and then exported?

Mr. EULER: I presume the hon. gentleman is refering to goods brought in in transitu.

Mr. CHAPLIN: In the case of liquor brought into a bonded warehouse at Halifax, then shipped to another bonded warehouse at Windsor, and thence shipped presumably to the United States; what happens?

Mr. EULER: I can best answer my hon. friend by stating that all those bonded warehouses are going to be discontinued; orders have already been given for the purpose.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a good answer.

Mr. EULER: There are no bonded warehouses in Ontario.

Mr. BENNETT: Section 6 provides:

Notwithstanding anything contained in the preceding subsection, the consumption or sales tax shall not be payable on goods,—
(a) exported,—

That is, exported in bond by the manufacturer thereof. The tax would still be payable upon goods—whiskeys—exported by one who had bought them and paid thereon the customs tax and the sales tax. He is a legitimate dealer and has a right to export them; but still under this section he would be liable for another sales tax, which is just what the minister says he does not desire. Is not that the position?

Mr. EULER: No. The tax applies only on the manufacture or production of goods in this country. On the importation he pays the sales tax.

Mr. BENNETT: Suppose he sells for export again.

Mr. EULER: There is no sales tax twice.

Mr. BENNETT: There should not be; but is that not the effect of the section?

Mr. SPENCER: Could not this discussion be conducted a little louder so that all members may know what is going on?

Mr. ERNST: We did not think you were interested.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What about the other paragraphs?

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Mr. EULER: They are merely re-enacted; they are already in the act.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Reductions and refunds, etc.

Mr. EULER: The Justice department is of the opinion that the following will better express what is desired, and I therefore move that this be substituted for section 7 as it stands:

7. Section ninety-one of the said Act is amended by adding to subsection one thereof the following paragraphs:—

"(d) When a manufacturer becomes licensed hereunder, of the tax paid in respect of any partly manufactured goods on hand at the date of his license, but only when such partly manufactured goods have been used in, wrought into, or attached to taxable articles manufactured for sale and sold;

(e) When a wholesaler becomes licensed hereunder, of the tax paid in respect of goods on hand at the date of the license but only when such goods are sold. The refund shall be computed at the rate of tax prevailing at the date of the license."

When a manufacturer became licensed under the act, not previously having held a license, he had to pay the sales tax. Now he becomes licensed, and when he sells after that the sales tax is collected. Therefore it might be paid twice. Consequently we allow him a refund or credit for the tax paid in the first instance.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does the main section apply for the refund or credit?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the minister added any exceptions to the sales tax this year by order in council?

Mr. EULER: None that I can recall—none whatever.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. EULER: We disposed just now of the sales tax on liquors which are evidently exported, but we have omitted to include the gallonage tax. I presume the committee will accept the following amendment:

That the following be inserted as section 8:
Subsection 3 of section 80 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

(3) Notwithstanding anything contained in this section such excise tax shall not be payable when such automobiles or cigars are exported under regulations prescribed by the minister. The tax imposed by this section shall be payable on ale, beer, porter and stout unless such goods are exported in bond by the manufacturer thereof and foreign landing certificates, satisfactory to the minister are produced as proof that said goods have been landed at the place designated in the export entry.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are we getting automobiles mixed up with illegal liquor shipments?

Mr. EULER: When automobiles are exported there is a drawback.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is there any change in regard to automobiles?

Mr. EULER: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The whole effect is to apply the gallonage to this item under which the minister thinks we have been losing revenue?

Mr. EULER: That is all.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. EULER: I have another amendment; as section 9:

That subsection one of section 106 of the said act be repealed.

In 1927 a provision was passed whereby a penalty of five per cent was imposed upon those who did not make their sales tax returns each month. We find it impossible to calculate what the penalty should be until there is actually a sales tax return. The provision is not a very practicable one, as we have discovered, and we are therefore repealing it. There are still two penalties left. In the first place we can proceed in the courts against the man who does not or will not make a monthly return; he can be fined. In addition to that there is the penalty of two-thirds of one per cent per month, or 8 per cent per annum for failure to pay so long as he does not pay. That is all. We are really reducing the penalty somewhat, but we have still the power to proceed and to fine a man for refusing or neglecting to make his returns. And of course there is the further penalty—if you care to call it a penalty—of interest at the rate of 8 per cent per annum.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This might be an appropriate occasion for the minister to let us know how he is getting on with the sales tax. We know from what has taken place in the past—I confess I am not at all up in the recent history of the matter—that some people altogether escaped paying the sales tax while the honest merchant was at an absolute disadvantage in comparison with a dishonest competitor. There was a large percentage of firms who, to say the least, were not very much troubled. My hon. friend, I know, wants to remedy that and I hope he is getting along pretty well in his endeavour. Perhaps he will tell the committee how the matter stands in regard to arrears. I refer particularly to the arrears shown in Montreal, for example, in 1926. What has my hon. friend done?

Mr. EULER: I cannot at the moment give the exact figures, but perhaps I might tell the committee what we have done or tried to do. There were considerable amounts in arrear, some dating pretty far back, running into millions, in which must be included, of course, sales tax arrears against manufacturers of liquors and beers and wines. These are now in the courts. Excluding these, there is possibly still in arrears the sum of $2,000,000. It was considerably larger than that, as a matter of fact. As I explained in the house last year, we found it very difficult promptly to collect all arrears. In some instances they had been outstanding for so long a time that some of the firms concerned had gone into bankruptcy while others were absolutely unable to pay. So that our only hope of obtaining these revenues was to nurse them along and do the best we could with them. But we do not accept the statement of any business man that he cannot pay; we do not just take that at its face value. We send in auditors and fix the amount we think he can pay, and we see to it that he does pay. That is all so far as arrears are concerned. But we have made some changes to ensure that there shall be no further accretions to the arrears. All those liable to account for sales tax must make their payment at the end of the month succeeding the one in which the sale was made. If the sale was made in July the return and payment must be made by the end of August, and if the business man does not make that return he is prosecuted. If he does not make his payment by about the middle of the month he is given notice and requested to pay, but we do not waste a great deal of time. If he does not pay by the fifteenth of the month he is promptly sued for payment. There was some objection at first; the measure was thought rather harsh. It is working out pretty well, however, and I can assure the committee that we have not made one single exception. We take action promptly and invariably with regard to what we call current arrears.

Mr. BENNETT: Within what time do you take action?

Mr. EULER: Within about fifteen days.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Is it necessary to give thirty days beyond the end of the month?

Mr. EULER: The statute provides that we must give thirty days' notice. Possibly that might be changed, but that is the present regulation. And within about fifteen days action takes place.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Let us take a concrete example of goods having been shipped in the first ten days of the month. Do you give the man thirty days' notice beyond the end of that current month? That would mean fifty days. That is altogether too long; it is longer than a reasonable business house gets even with a cash discount. Goods that are ordinarily sold are sold on from fifteen to twenty days. I submit the time is entirely too long.

Mr. EULER: As a matter of fact most of them thought it was short enough, but I am quite prepared, if the committee thinks it advisable, to make the term shorter. It is working satisfactorily now. As the act stands to-day it is provided that the tax shall be paid not later than the last day of the first month succeeding that in which the sale was made.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I have suggested a concrete example. On goods sold in the first ten days of this month, April, the tax need not be called for until thirty days after the end of April.

Mr. EULER: That is, the end of May.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Yes, and that in my opinion is ridiculous.

Mr. EULER: My hon. friend should take the month as a whole. Suppose the sale were made on the thirtieth day of April, as undoubtedly some sales will be made. It does not seem to me unreasonable to allow until the end of May, and that is only thirty days.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Most people in business pay twice a month, on the fifteenth and at the end of the month. Nearly all the merchants my hon. friend mentioned will pay that way, and that is the proper way for the department to collect the money.

Mr. EULER: Offhand I should say that if a sale is made on the thirtieth day of the month it might be rather hard to expect them to pay for the full month at the end of the thirtieth day, when perhaps they have not even made up their sales for the month.

Mr. CHAPLIN: If the minister would just follow me on the question of the fifteen days, it means that on the sales made from the first to the fifteenth of the month the money does not have to be paid until the end of the month, while on the sales made between the fifteenth and the thirtieth, the money is paid on the fifteenth of the month following.

Mr. EULER: On most seasonable goods credit is given for ninety days, and sometimes for as long as six months.

[Mr. Euler.]

Mr. CHAPLIN: I would like to know where that is done; those people will not be in business very long. Most of the goods I have anything to do with are sold on a credit of ten days.

Mr. EULER: I should like to add that 97 ports out of 149 have absolutely no current arrears at all, and in the other cases steps are taken immediately or almost immediately to ensure that the amounts are collected. I have gone on the assumption that the concern which cannot pay its current sales tax is hardly worth nursing along; the tax is fair and should be paid promptly. We have reduced the old arrears considerably, and we are proceeding fairly satisfactorily with the remainder, doing the best we can.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend does not quite get the point. This is not an ordinary matter of business at all; it is not any question of having time within which to get in your profits and look after your business and all that sort of thing. This money does not belong to the trader at all; it is received by him in trust. The money belongs to the country and should be paid at once; these accounts should not be allowed to run along at all. We have emphasized this principle time and time again. I know my hon. friend has a great many things to take care of, but I would make a suggestion to him. I do not know exactly how this is being enforced now; I do not know whether it is being enforced in the way the income tax can be looked after, simply by a certificate of non-payment with an execution issued offhand. There should be no need of going to court at all; there should be no delays of that kind. This money should be collected simply on the certificate of default, with no court standing between the people and their money. There is a great distinction between this money and ordinary commercial debts; here we have simply a trustee who collects for the people and who has no right to hold the money he collects; he should pass it on at once.

Mr. MALCOLM: I should like to make an observation in connection with this question. I think my hon. friend is rather severe when he speaks of this as trust money, it is trust money when the manufacturer collects it, but not until that is done; he holds nothing in trust until he gets it. With respect to what the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) has said, probably in his business, goods are mostly sold at ten and fifteen days, but there is a tremendous amount of business in this country which is billed at the thirty days first following. I know of a good many businesses running into millions of dollars where these are the shortest terms given a customer, and where a man collects sales tax for the Dominion of Canada without any recompense for the bookkeeping he has to do or the accounts he loses together with the sales tax. The thirty days first month following is not too long to give him. In some large businesses the terms may be ten and fifteen days, but in a great many concerns they are thirty days. In the dry goods business, selling for spring or fall delivery, and in the business in which I am engaged, the usual terms are ninety days, with the cash discount, to induce people to buy seasonal goods ahead of time. I do not think the thirty days first following is too long, taking the average of Canadian business, considering that the manufacturer collects this tax with no payment for the bookkeeping he has to do, and also taking into consideration the fact that he gets no return for his losses.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But the tax is not payable until it is collected.

Mr. MALCOLM: It would be if it were paid as rapidly as my hon. friend from Lincoln suggests.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not at all, this is not a matter of commercial credit being given or withheld. As I understand it, it is the duty of the manufacturer to pay that money when he collects it, and he collects it at once.

Mr. EULER: No, it does not matter when he collects it; he has to pay it in the time given.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then this is reasonable.

Mr. BENNETT: Nothing could better illustrate the undesirability of this tax than the discussion which has taken place this evening. It illustrates clearly that the only form of taxation which should be imposed to meet this situation is a turnover tax, if you have regard to that kind of tax at all. The point made by the hon. member for West York is one which I think might well be acted upon by the minister. Whether it be thirty days, sixty days or ninety days is not important, but he should have the power to ask for a writ of execution merely on a certificate, to receive the money which is being improperly retained in the hands of the man who has collected it.

Mr. EULER: In what court would you proceed?

Mr. BENNETT: The Supreme court of the province. The old writ of sequestration, which was issued at the instance of the crown for the purpose of gathering in all the property of a man indebted to the crown, is an illustration of the principle referred to by my hon. friend. How many cases are now outstanding; how many actions are now outstanding; how many suits have not been concluded, and how many efforts are being made to collect moneys due the crown? Over $2,000,000 is owing this country at the moment for sales tax.

Mr. EULER: There are between 500 and 600 actions pending in the courts.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend has answered my question; there are 500 or 600 actions pending in the courts. Imagine the crown with that many actions in hand to recover money belonging to the crown! The old laws of a hundred years ago permitted the crown to take immediate and summary action with respect to matters of this kind. Immediately the money is actually in the hands of the person liable to pay he should be made to pay, for he is only a trustee with respect to that money. What the Minister of Trade and Commerce said is equally true; it is not right to harass a man to pay money he has not received.

Mr. EULER: How would you distinguish? You cannot audit every statement.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely you can rely upon the honour of the man if, when the time comes to recover the money which is not paid within a given time, you simply say, "Well, we propose to issue a writ of execution which will either bring us the money or a satisfactory reason why we have not received it."

Mr. EULER: How would you know when the manufacturer or the wholesaler received the money?

Mr. BENNETT: By his own return.

Mr. EULER: He would not make a return of every individual sale. The terms may vary according to the different firms; one firm may give sixty days while another firm gives thirty, yet you must have some sort of uniformity in your system of collecting.

Mr. BENNETT: My friend has not yet grasped the point. As soon as the money is in the hands of the manufacturer it belongs to this country; that is the point. What happened during the days when I knew a little more about these things than I do at the moment? There was one firm in Toronto, for instance, which owed this country vast sums of money. I am not sure that it has not since gone into liquidation. Had there been an efficient and effective control over that matter, that condition could not have arisen, because it was a business in which they got their money right at once. I do not want to mention their business. It was practically a cash business—cash within thirty days; they got that money from their customers, and, as the minister says, they set up their reserves and that kind of thing; then when the time came that the government wanted their money, the company wanted it in their business. The way to deal with such a case is in the summary method which is at least two hundred years old, by the issue of a writ of sequestration. The Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) will remember that in New Brunswick the writ of sequestration was applied. I was a young man then and acted for the government there. The same principle could be applied here, the writ of execution where the minister is satisfied that the money has come into the hands of the company. I do not like this matter of paying five or six hundred lawyers. You recognize that lawyers all over the country are employed if they are favoured. If my information is correct, there are a vast number who should be sued, but who are not.

Mr. ROBB: There does not appear to be much difference between us on either side of the house as to the desirability of collecting the tax promptly. I think it is fair to my colleague the Minister of National Revenue to say that the arrears that we have been recently discussing and the number of lawyers employed in collecting those arrears are not due particularly to business since the minister took possession. I agree with the leader of the opposition as to the desirability of getting rid of this sales tax as rapidly as possible, and that is the policy we are proceeding upon.

Amendment agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. BENNETT: Might it not be well to consider adding a section such as has been suggested by the member for West York, and leave the bill in committee?

Mr. ROBB: I suggest that we let it come out of committee, and then if we want to amend it, we can do so on the third reading.

Mr. BENNETT: No; if it is done that way the bill would have to be reprinted.

Progress reported.

[Mr. Bennett.]

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND VETERANS' WELFARE

PROPOSED AMALGAMATION OF DEPARTMENTS OF HEALTH AND SOLDIERS' CIVIL RE-ESTABLISHMENT

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That the Department of Health and of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment be amalgamated in a single department to be called the Department of National Health and Veterans' Welfare, presided over by a minister of the crown; that the powers and duties of the minister be defined; and provision be made for the appointment of a deputy minister, the making of regulations, and the employment of such other officers, clerks, and employees as may be deemed necessary.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think the minister might make some explanation. I would like to know what the idea really is. We now have a committee with very wide powers inquiring into what ought to be done in the interests of the soldiers. Has the minister considered having this question dealt with by that committee? The soldiers' re-establishment is a long way off from being completed. It might be well for the minister to consider the advisability of getting whatever light he can on this subject from that committee, which is now functioning.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The resolution is along the line of the suggestion by His Excellency on the opening of the session, that the departments of Health and of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment be amalgamated into a single department to be known as the Department of National Health and Veterans' Welfare. The Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment came into being in 1918, with a view to assisting the men who were then returning from overseas to re-establish themselves in civil life. Shortly after the war ended the department absorbed the Military Hospitals Commission and took over its functions. A little later they took over largely the staff of the Pension board and have been functioning accordingly. The experience of the last few years would indicate that the work of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment to-day is to a great extent that of health activities in reference to those men who were disabled overseas. It is true there is still some work being carried on in the matter of re-establishment. It is proposed by this amalgamation to maintain for a time at least the veterans' bureau as a unit within the Health department, and the work will be continued probably along the lines followed from its beginning. The work of re-establishment, the work of administration as far as the Pension board is concerned, and the treatment of the vet shops, which as a matter of fact is health work, will be continued in the veterans' welfare bureau. As far as the bill itself is concerned, if when it reaches the second reading it is the view of the house that the matter is of such a character that it should be referred to the committee now dealing with soldier matters, I shall be very glad to accept that suggestion and have it so referred.

Mr. CLARK: I would like to ask the minister the reason for the word "national" coming into the name, and why change the name from "Soldiers' Re-establishment" to "Veterans' Welfare"?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think my previous remarks dealt with re-establishment. As a matter of fact the department to-day is really a welfare department dealing with pensions, hospitalization and vetcraft work, which is a form of treatment, and some consideration was given to the question of changing the title. In amalgamating the two departments we felt that if we could call the new department the Department of National Health and Veterans' Welfare, that would probably meet with the view of parliament and also of the country generally.

Mr. LADNER: Does the minister not think that the term "Veterans' Welfare" might imply some sort of charitable organization? Would it not be better to have such a name as "Soldiers' Affairs," or something more proper and dignified and indicating in a better way the real purpose of the department? After all, the department will have to carry on a good deal of work which is not really welfare work as that is understood. The term "welfare" has a popular meaning, and it seems to me both undignified and hardly applicable to the business which the government has to do with respect to ex-service men and soldiers generally. It would be far better to use a name such as—and this has just come to my mind offhand—Department of National Health and Soldiers' Affairs, or Department of Health and Soldiers' Affairs. I think the minister will find, when he gets his bill through and the measure comes before the public, that the name "Veterans' Welfare" is not as appropriate as some others.

Mr. CLARK: I concur entirely in the view of the hon. member for Vancouver South, except possibly as regards the name "Soldiers' Affairs." I see no reason for changing the present name.

Mr. LADNER: I concur in that.

Mr. CLARK: I understand this department will still embrace pensions?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. CLARK: How is that veterans' welfare? It is not a dignified name. The designation should remain as it was, because "Department of Health and Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment" is a dignified name and one generally understood by the country. I see no reason for inserting the word "national". After all no one can have any doubt that the Department of Health refers to the health of the nation. Why not insert the word "National" before "Finance", before "Trade and Commerce", before "Agriculture"? For instance, why not have the "Department of National Interior"? We might just as well have National Secretary of State and so on, as the Department of National Health. There is no distinction whatever. This department obviously applies to the health of the nation and the word "national" is superfluous. To change the name from "Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment" to "Veterans' Welfare" would not be of any assistance in dealing with soldiers' problems. The old name is one recognized by the soldiers generally and it should not be changed to a name which, as my hon. friend has just said, implies something in the nature of charity.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It does not. I think it is important to adopt the designation, "Department of National Health," because we have provincial health departments in every province. It could be called the Dominion Health Department or the National Health Department. It is different from the Interior department and other departments of government and I think the change is warranted. I cannot see any great advantage to anyone in continuing the term "Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment", which is a long, cumbersome name, and one which does not to-day represent the activities of the department, because, as I have said, the major activities are not those of re-establishment. The name does not matter so much. The proposed name has been before the public for some months now and I have not heard through the press or correspondence any objection to the term "Veterans' Welfare." It should not be intimated for a moment that that name would indicate the setting up of a charity department. That is not the intention.

Mr. LADNER: Have the public really been apprised of the term "Veteran's Welfare?" I for my part did not know of it until I heard it to-night, and I think ninety-nine per cent of the people do not know of it.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is rather surprising that my hon. friend has not taken the trouble to read His Excellency's speech, because it is set out there that such was our purpose.

Mr. LADNER: I know the source of the speech.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): One would have expected that my hon. friend, who is usually well informed, would be informed in that regard.

Mr. LADNER: Is there any objection to using the expression "Soldiers' Affairs?"

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That might be ambiguous.

Mr. LADNER: It certainly has not the implication of the term "Veterans' Welfare."

Mr. CHURCH: This amalgamation is not in the public interest. It will work out as a department of all health and no soldier. The public is disappointed at the way in which the soldier has been bandied about by this government. He was first tacked on to the Department of Militia. Then the government made a football of him, creating a new department, a Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. Sometimes the minister of that department was here; sometimes he was an absentee landlord. Now it is proposed to have a health department and to tack the soldier on to that. The government are making a political football out of him, and no economy will be effected by the proposed change. If there is to be a department it should be a department of returned soldiers. The returned soldier has not been treated as he should have been by the various governments that have represented the people of Canada. It takes months and months to get a soldier into a hospital. Some time ago I sent forward a letter from the Reverend Canon Skey, one of the leading Anglican rectors in the diocese of Toronto, requesting that some poor returned soldier who was out of his mind should be put in the Christie street hospital in my constituency. This man's wife had to go out to work. After the home had been visited on several occasions by the canon and others, it was felt that the returned soldier, who was suffering in body and mind as a result of the war, should be in the Christie street hospital. I wrote to the minister, but he was out of town. I wrote to the deputy and I received a reply that I could apply to the Board of Pension Commissioners, or some other high court of justice, or the privy council perhaps, and all that red tape before anyone had any power to take any action. We have to-day a proposed amalgamation. It seems that the returned soldier is the only agency to which the government will apply economy, although they are spending money like water in the Department of Public Works. Along the St. Lawrence river you can see a wharf almost every mile, and if anybody has not got a wharf in Ontario and Quebec he must have been derelict in his duty; but when it comes to effecting economies, the economy is always against the poor returned soldier. This wonderful Department of Health which is to be amalgamated with Soldiers Civil Re-establishment, what does it do? As a matter of fact most of the health work is done by the municipalities and by the provincial governments. It is they who maintain the hospitals, and when an epidemic comes along this government gets off scot-free and the work is shunted off on to the provinces and the municipalities. In the city of Toronto there are thousands of returned soldiers out of work, and they are going in hundreds across to the United States, having been driven out of Canada by the economic and soldier policy of this government. In my constituency and in every constituency in Toronto a soldier has to pay a dollar and join the Liberal ward association to get a job even as a temporary clerk in the post office at Christmas. Now these departments are to be amalgamated under the high sounding name of National Health and Veterans' Welfare. In my opinion this new department is nothing but camouflage, but let me tell the minister that you can fool the returned soldiers no longer. The returned soldier is becoming sick and tired of being bandied about by this government from the customs to the post office from the Department of Soldiers Civil Re-establishment to the Civil Service Commission, and having to pay a dollar and join the ward association in order to get a temporary job at Christmas. A returned soldier could not be employed in the Toronto post office at Christmas unless through a Liberal patronage committee.

The returned soldier is made a political football of in Canada, and if there is one class of people for whom a separate department should be created and maintained, no matter what the cost, it is the returned soldier. But he is the only person the government economises against to-day, at the expense of his health, at the expense of having no grave in which to rest his bones in the cemetery unless he pays a dollar and joins the ward association.

There will be no economy effected by this amalgamation. This new department is to be presided over by a minister of the crown, and no doubt it will be a nice easy department to preside over. All the minister will have to do is to attend the sittings of parliament, and then take a trip home, and let the deputy minister and the assistant deputy and a great retinue of officers and clerks carry on in the recess at the expense of the returned soldier. There will be an absentee landlord presiding over this high sounding amalgamation and conglomeration. Good-by and good night to the returned soldier if anything will be accomplished in his interests by such an innovation as this. No doubt under this new department the returned soldier will continue to get all the pick and shovel jobs, for that seems to be the favourite job which is handed out to the returned soldier, but when it comes to appointing someone to the senate, what a difference! Some young gentleman who served in the ward associations and not in the war is given the preference, and it is the same with appointments of judges. You talk about increasing the salaries of judges, but I ask what about giving some greater measure of compensation to those who risked their lives for the benefit of Canada and are now suffering in the poorhouses in the city from which I come, where they have to pass the hat around and hold tag days to get enough money to tide the returned soldiers over the winter months of the year.

Here we are considering a resolution to amalgamate the Department of Health with the Soldiers Civil Re-establishment into one single department, no doubt with a single object—to wipe the returned soldier off the map altogether. We can spend two and a half millions for the care of cattle, and millions more to put down bug and insect pests and hog cholera, but not a five dollar bill when a soldier gets sick. He goes to the hospital and cannot get medical treatment. I know dozens of men who have been turned away from the hospitals. I wrote to the chairman of the committee on pensions—I wish they were all as good as he is—regarding a deputation that was ready to come down from the city of Toronto, and I was told that the committee had no time to consider their memorandum of complaints which had been sent on to me as the representative of this soldier constituency of Toronto Northwest, which includes the Christie street hospital, asking for reforms at the hands of this parliament. The committee had no time to consider their memorandum, but we have lots of time to discuss an amalgamation that, so far as the returned soldier is concerned, will not amount to anything, and you might just as well let him depend on charity, as he has to do very largely in the district from which I come. In the city of Toronto they have had to open soup kitchens for the unemployed and appeals are being made by different missions, including the Revillie one, which are seeking money from the business men in order to provide the returned soldier with a loaf of bread and clothing to cover his body over the winter months. On the front page of a recent edition of a Toronto paper you will see an appeal signed by the secretary of one of these societies and the Poppy day Committee asking that cast off clothing be sent to such and such an office, because there are many children of returned soldiers who have not enough clothing. If there is one department that should be a department by itself, presided over by an active minister who will give all his time to the work, it should be a department that will look after the welfare of the soldiers from coast to coast. They are dying off by hundreds and thousands every year, and the economic policy that is being followed by this government is depriving them not only of a living but of a pension as well. I was told by some of the Toronto university graduates who have just returned from the Olympic games that there is hardly anybody in Germany out of work. While we are talking about peace resolutions and all of that, Germany is taking care of her veterans. In Germany the veteran does not need to work at all. Doctor Hudson, a very fine young doctor of the Varsity team, told me he talked with many men in the city of Berlin, and they told him that their soldier policy was this, that all the veterans who fought in the late war were retired on a pension. The able-bodied young men are given employment under an arrangement by which in the event of trouble they are to be ready to enlist and go to the front again, but the veterans get a pension equal to their civil pay. In Canada from 25 to 30 per cent of our returned soldiers get no pension at all. Many of them are not 100 per cent efficient and cannot get work. They are out of work to-day in the Toronto district through no fault of their own. I protest against such economy. I say it is false economy, and the public do not ask for that kind of economy. If there is one place where economy is being practiced by this government to-day, it is against the returned soldier. In my opinion the health department should be an active department by itself. This country with only one-eleventh the population of the United States has about seventeen government departments as against seven or eight active departments in the republic. I wish to protest against this amalgamation. It is not in the public interest, and first and last it is not in the interest of the returned men.

Mr. ADSHEAD: There is no one in the house who has a warmer spot in his heart for the returned men than I have, and I may be permitted to answer my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Church). The returned soldiers' committee of which I am proud to be a member is sitting on the cases of returned soldiers, and, irrespective of party, the members of that committee are endeavouring to bring in a report that will in every respect do full justice to our returned men. When we have brought in our recommendations, should the government see fit to reject them, then would be the time to condemn them in the terms which my hon. friend has employed; but until that time arrives and we have fully considered what shall be done in justice to our returned soldiers, I think such condemnation is premature.

In my opinion the title "Veterans' Welfare" savours too much of charity. Only today I received a letter from the city of Calgary asking for a small contribution to the Board of Public Welfare, which deals with charitable cases. Perhaps the returned men themselves might be able to suggest a better name. At any rate for the time being I would suggest to the minister that the title be held in abeyance until a more suitable name is forthcoming. As regards the other portion of the title of the proposed amalgamation, "National Health", I think it is wisely chosen, because there are already provincial departments of health.

Mr. MANION: I wish to support what has been said by hon. members with regard to a change of the proposed title. I do not see any advantage in the word "National"; I think it is superfluous. In my opinion the title might very well be cut down to "Department of Health and Soldiers' Re-establishment." This title would be appropriate to the two branches forming the amalgamation, and would be recognized by the soldiers themselves as a continuation of the department that has carried on in the past. I am disappointed in one feature of this proposal—it does not bring about any economy. Some time ago I pointed out that there was an increased expenditure in the two departments of some $35,000 although they are under one minister. I presumed they were united for purposes of economy, but, as is so characteristic with this government, no economy of management has resulted so far. I think the minister should decide without further discussion to pass the whole matter over to the committee dealing with returned soldiers' problems so that it may be fully considered by them.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Has any demand been made by the returned men's association for this change of title to "Veterans' Welfare"? I would suggest to the minister that the soldiers' branch of the amalgamated department being the most important, if the present title must be changed the new united department should be termed "Department of Soldiers' Re-establishment and Health."

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am desirous of getting a name that will be appropriate to a department of the character now proposed. I notice that in 1918, when Sir Robert Borden introduced the measure to bring into being the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, he stated that within a reasonable number of years it would probably go out of existence altogether. There is a feeling that we have arrived at the stage where this department could be amalgamated with the Department of Health and the two departments thus made more helpful to the whole organization. I suggest that the resolution be allowed to carry, and when the bill based thereon reaches second reading we can discuss the title and other matters pertaining to the amalgamation.

Mr. MANION: That is distinctly on the understanding that the name which appears in the resolution will be open to discussion?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I think there is something altogether wrong in this resolution, because this is not a department of national health; that is, it cannot interfere in any way with provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It covers national health matters, that is all.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Will the minister explain how he could have interfered in the recent typhoid epidemic in Montreal, which was a menace to the health of the whole Dominion? I agree that there should be a federal health department, and if it is possible so to constitute it without interfering with provincial jurisdiction, I am agreeable to its formation; but I fail to see how it can be made to function effectively. In these days an epidemic of typhoid fever or any other disease is a crime, and with all the scientific machinery now at our disposal it is inexcusable if more than a few days are required to find out the source of the epidemic. But I repeat, this Department could not interfere with provincial jurisdiction, and consequently the title "department of national health" is a misnomer. In the second place I object to the proposal to make the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment secondary to any other department of government as is being done here. When you associate it with this other department you are thinking of the enforcement of narcotic regulations and laws governing other offences and not of the real interests of the returned man. I believe also that it was promised, when the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment was formed, to keep it separate from any other department. In my opinion that department and its work should be independent of any other; nor should it be hidden under any other name. The department should be held prominently before all the people of the Dominion, and to make it an adjunct of a department of national health—to christen it at this late date a department of "veterans' welfare" —is to take a step in the wrong direction.

The work of soldier re-establishment has not diminished except to a very small degree. I do not know what departments are wiped out or are proposed to be wiped out by this bill, but I certainly think that this particular department should be kept prominently before the country. The mere fact that there is a special committee of the house to consider its affairs is sufficient proof of its importance. I therefore again emphasize the desirability of keeping it independent of any other department. I should like to know who suggested that the affairs of the returned soldiers should not be considered by a special committee or that a special committee had not the time to deal with them. The members of the committee have not taken that stand. One man is as important to us as a dozen or a hundred; the case of one man is as worthy of consideration. I think it is a mistake to proceed with this resolution; I do not believe it is popular. Some little investigation held here —I wish it had been under better auspices— may have been the reason for introducing this measure, but in my opinion the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment is important enough to give it precedence; nothing has been shown to warrant its being made secondary to any other department.

Mr. GEARY: May I add to what the last speaker has said an expression of my own feeling to the same effect. If the minister would drop this resolution for the time being and let it stand on the order paper, considering the various changes that have been suggested, I think he would be doing a wise thing. "Veterans' Welfare" is not a proper name to give the department, and the men do not want it. Why talk about veterans' welfare? They are not getting charity.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is not intended as charity.

Mr. GEARY: But the implication is there in the use of the word.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Not at all.

Mr. GEARY: Of course it is. And it is an Americanism. Veterans' welfare, like community welfare, and other terms of that sort is an Americanism, and one that carries in the public mind implications which should be avoided in connection with the veterans and their affairs. I do not suggest another word, but I do suggest that the minister would be well advised to see whether he could not think of something more appropriate. Moreover, I do not think that an important department such as this, affecting so many men, women and children, should be tacked on to any other department. If you want to have two departments presided over by one minister, well and good. It would not make any difference in expense if the two were managed under one minister, but to amalgamate the two departments would be to do something which would be resented. The fact that they were tacked on as an adjunct to some other department would not meet with the approval of the veterans, who are entitled to feel that their affairs are administered by a department concerned mainly with their interest. So far as the words "National Health" go, I do not know what national health is. It is a wide term that might be applied to the people of Canada as a whole rather than to the people of any particular province or city. But if you were to speak of city health I do not know that anyone would understand you, unless perhaps you had in mind something having to do with drains or sewers or public undertakings of that sort. It is sufficient to have a "department of health"; you need not limit nor extend the term. Certainly you do not so by prefixing the word "national." If the minister would take the matter under advisement with a view to meeting some of the objections that have been advanced, I think it would be satisfactory for the moment.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I suggest that we pass the resolution and allow the bill to have its first reading, and on the second reading of the bill the question could be discussed. If it were the wish of the committee then to change the name it could be done. The resolution deals merely with the amalgamation, which is a proposal of the government, and which I have no doubt will receive the support of the house.

Mr. LADNER: If we pass the resolution as it stands do we not thereby adopt the name?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The name could be changed in committee on the bill.

Mr. LADNER: Why not change it now?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Not to-night.

Mr. CLARK: If what the minister says is correct, and if he desires the resolution to carry to-night, then he should have gone further and proposed the elimination of the words "to be called the Department of National Health and Veterans' Welfare." Then the resolution would read:

> That the Department of Health and of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment be amalgamated in a single department presided over by a minister of the crown.

If that were done the name could be chosen in committee on the bill. If however the minister insists, as apparently he is insisting, on the retention of the words I have quoted, then it is no longer a question with him of finding a suitable name, inasmuch as he is asking us to endorse the proposed title, which we are not prepared to do. I feel there is unanimity in the committee in opposition to the present name. Furthermore, the hon. member for Fort William has raised a vital point which has not been referred to by the minister. I assumed, when there was to be an amalgamation of two very important departments, that the result would be greater efficiency and considerable economy. But apparently no economy can be effected; rather, an increase in expenditures will be the result. I see the minister shakes his head, but the suggestion has been made twice by the hon. member for Fort William and has never been controverted by anyone on the other side of the house. Indeed, the hon. member says that the estimates show it. It seems obvious that if no economy is to be effected there is no advantage in amalgamating the departments. Surely greater efficiency can be secured in connection with soldier re-establishment in a single department than in one which embraces two departments. This I consider a very vital matter and the minister has not discussed it. When I made some remarks a little while ago the minister said that the word "national" was necessary inasmuch as there were departments of health in the provinces. It is true there are provincial departments of health. But there are departments of agriculture in the various provinces. Why not introduce a bill to change the name of the Department of Agriculture to that of "the Department of National Agriculture" so as to distinguish it from the provincial departments? If the minister's suggestion is sound it must mean that the provincial departments of health are overshadowing that of the Dominion. It must mean that, and surely it is a sign of weakness when we have to add the word "national" to bring to the attention of the people the fact that there is a Department of Health in Ottawa. Why not also introduce an act to change the name of the Prime Minister to that of "National Prime Minister?" There are prime ministers in the provinces also?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. CLARK: Why not? It is the same principle. That applies to all the departments, and I suggest that if the minister is sincere in his desire to pass this resolution, these words should be dropped. He should also justify the amalgamation of these two departments by showing that some economy will be effected and that greater efficiency will result.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The question of the name is open for discussion, and as I said before it is my desire to secure a name which will be suitable and which will properly indicate the functions of these two departments. I wish now to establish the principle of amalgamation. In regard to economies, these will result very considerably in the work of administration. It is true that the estimates which have been tabled do not show these economies, because the estimates were made up prior to the work of reorganization and amalgamation. That will be made plain when the estimates come up, and possibly on the second reading of this bill.

Mr. MANION: Does the minister suggest that when the estimates are being dealt with some reductions will be made?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, if the house thinks it wise; as yet we do not know what the economies will be, because the reorganization is not complete. We know that a considerable saving will be made in our audit branch, but a reorganization of this character takes a very considerable time. If it is the desire of the committee we might amend the resolution by striking out the words "National Health and Veterans' Welfare" for the present, and when the bill is in committee a name will be substituted which we trust will meet with the approval of members on both sides. I think we are all in agreement that if we accept the principle of amalgamation it is desirable to secure a name which will appeal to those interested in the work to be done.

Mr. KAISER: I have every sympathy with any and every effort put forth by the Dominion of Canada to make the path of our returned soldiers easier, yet I think that the government should begin to see the importance of national health. During the greater part of my life I have been connected with public health work, and I claim that our country has not even a vision of what can be done by an aggressive, well conducted and well versed department of health. Canada to-day spends about 35 cents per capita on public health, while in order to have efficient service an expenditure of about $2.50 per capita is required. That simply shows the great gap between what we are endeavouring to do now and what might be done. I have been very much impressed by the remarks with regard to the recent epidemic in the city of Montreal. If the Dominion government had had a means of marshalling the forces of the country to grapple with that epidemic, the very serious situation which existed never would have come about. We should have a department of epidemiology. The infant mortality and maternal deaths in this country are simply startling; there is sufficient work in either of these branches of the work to call for aggressive action. I would prefer to see the Department of Health absolutely separate, to take over the matter of national health in line with what other countries are doing. I think there is sufficient work in this Dominion to keep that department busy if they would only buckle down to it.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I am glad the minister has agreed to leave out for the present the suggested name of this new department, because it does not ask us who vote for the legislation to commit ourselves to that name as would be the case otherwise. The objections which have been raised are very strong; at all events, they appeal to me as being such, but I am not prepared to accept the idea of amalgamation, and I wish to express my opposition to that. From the standpoint of the amount of money which necessarily must be expended in looking after the soldiers of this country and from the standpoint of the number of individuals directly or indirectly involved, which would include the women and children connected with returned or disabled soldiers, this department should stand alone. It should be a separate department with a minister and a deputy minister of its own. Under this proposed resolution the deputy will be deputy minister of Health and deputy minister of Veterans' Welfare. As far as the deputy minister of Health is concerned I do not think we could do better than the gentleman who occupies that position at present; he is certainly a very competent man, a medical man as you would naturally expect. I do not wish to place any limitation on his ability; probably he would efficiently fill the position of deputy minister of Militia or deputy minister of Veterans' Welfare, but it does seem to me that he will be more at home and more in his element while acting as deputy minister of Health than he would be in acting as deputy minister of Veterans' Welfare.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Why?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): For very obvious reasons. He has been trained along medical lines, and for that reason is a very competent deputy minister of Health.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Does my hon. friend know that the deputy minister has had very considerable war experience and military training?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): That may be, but he is not going to live forever; I suppose he has no eternal lease on life, and I am discussing the principle now. I am not saying that the present deputy minister of Health might not make a competent deputy minister of Veterans' Welfare, but I do say that a man whose whole training has been along medical lines would be more in his element in directing the affairs of the Department of Health, while a man who has had experience along military lines or who had been closely identified with soldier problems would be more at home as deputy minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. If there are any individuals in the Dominion of Canada who are entitled to special consideration it is those who fought and were disabled in the war. I have no objection to the gentleman who occupies the position of Minister of Health also bearing the title of Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, but I do say there should be two distinct and separate departments, one dealing with soldier problems and one with health, each with a deputy minister. We owe that to the men who have sacrificed so much, and to their dependants.

who in many cases must be considered indirectly as wards of the nation. I merely wish to say that while the minister apparently thinks we should adopt the idea of amalgamation, I wish to express my opposition to the idea. I do not think it is a wise one. There should be two distinct departments, and there should be a deputy minister for soldiers' problems and a deputy minister of Health as well.

Mr. GEARY: I suppose the question will be open later?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes. The resolution will bring in a bill, and the principle of the bill will be under discussion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Before we further consider the suggestion of the name, I wonder what is the real reason for the change? I do not think we have got it from the minister. Has the minister, for example, any reports that there will be better service, greater consideration given to that which is by all odds the more important department of the two, that of soldiers' re-establishment, which spends infinitely more money and requires infinitely more time than the activities which can be followed by a Dominion department of health? If we have any such reports, I think we should know what they are and who make them. At all events, at some considerable expense to the department of re-establishment there has been an investigation or a series of investigations made, I think, quite near where I come from, West York, and we have the Hunter and McGregor combination working there. Have they brought in recommendations for this?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Not affecting this proposal.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Have they made any recommendations showing how better service can be given to the returned soldiers?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the minister let us have any reports there may be showing that there will be better service to the soldiers?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There was a report a short time ago showing the nature of the work of the department. Anyone taking the time to read that report will realize that ninety to ninety-five per cent of the work of that department is health work. Then there was an investigation made some time ago by Mr. G. W. Scott, submitted on the 29th of October, in which he deals with the proposed amalgamation, and it is shown in that report that there would be an advantage in the matter of economy and in the matter of efficiency in the amalgamation proposed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Would the minister read the material sections?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There are a number of recommendations. The recommendation dealing with pensions is one of them.

Mr. GEARY: It has nothing to do with pensions here.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, except that we will carry the work of pensions under the new amalgamation, as we do now. The general recommendations made by Mr. Scott—we cannot cover the situation fully unless we go more thoroughly into the report—are as follows:

(a) Giving to the Board of Pension Commissioners such staff as will enable them to function fully as an entirely separate body for the purpose of deciding upon the eligibility of pensioners and their dependants and calculating pensions payable.

And then he deals with transferring certain activities to the Department of Finance, and goes on to say:

(c) All other activities now directed by the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment should be transferred to the Department of Health.

(d) An official of the Department of Health should be appointed as secretary of the Board of Pension Commissioners.

Those are the recommendations which Mr. Scott made. In dealing with the affairs of the department, I think you will find he shows that the work is largely of the nature of treatment or health work, and the work of the vetcraft can be considered as a form of treatment; but on the whole that the amalgamation will be an advantage in the matter of administration, and also would lead to very considerable economy.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Who is Mr. Scott?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): He is associated with Ross & Company, of Montreal, auditors.

Mr. CLARK: Whose is the other report?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The annual report of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, the report, which will bear out my statement.

Mr. CLARK: Will the minister read the report which recommends this amalgamation?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Of the D.S.C.R?

Mr. CLARK: Yes.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No; that shows the number of cases, the number of clinics, the number of cases being re-established year by year, and as I say, it will show that 90 to 95 per cent of that work is health work among the men.

Mr. CLARK: I am glad the minister has cleared up this last point, because when he spoke first it sounded as though 95 per cent of the work of the two departments was health.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, I did not mean that.

Progress reported.

At 11 o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, April 11, 1928

The house met at three o'clock.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ANNUAL REPORT TABLED

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I desire to lay on the table the annual report, in English and French, of the Canadian National Railway system; also a statement, in English and French, of revenues and expenses regarding the eastern lines, as defined in the Maritime Freight Rates Act of 1927, for the six months ending December 31, 1927.

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 199, to amend the Dominion Lands Act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Explain.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The purpose of this amendment is to permit the extension of the homesteading privilege to others than those mentioned in the amendment of 1925. It is to extend the privilege of granting a second homestead to those who have proven up prior to January 1, 1928. This is being done in order to meet the request of a large number of people in the prairie provinces who think that this privilege should be extended to allow farmers and their families to move into the northern portions of the district, and the father of the family to secure a second homestead.

The other amendment is a minor one with respect to school lands.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

56103—122½

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 200 to amend the Insurance Act (lapsed policies).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CHURCH: The object of this amendment is to require annually a sworn statement by insurance companies of their lapsed policies. Of the new business written annually, forty to fifty per cent is lapsed, surrendered or confiscated. This bill gives the superintendent of insurance power not only to check up the revenues, but also to protect the policy holders who have paid in less than three years' premiums, and who at present lose all the premiums they have paid in if they should happen to be out of work and are unable to continue paying the premiums. This will be a protection both to the public and the government.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVILEGE—MR. DUFF

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): I desire, Mr. Speaker, to speak to a question of privilege. I have been interested in public affairs in this country for some thirty-three years, and during that time I have always been ready, when my opponents met me on the political platform or elsewhere, to extend to them the courtesies which I expected from them. Yesterday afternoon, when the resolution of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler) was under discussion, dealing with proposed amendments to the Customs Act, the hon. member for West Hamilton (Mr. Bell) in my absence arose in his place and made certain statements. Those statements will be found at page 1892 of Hansard of yesterday. First, the hon. member said:

> Then will the minister inform the committee if there was no breach of the Canadian law when the steamer Kennedy was taken in for hovering in the Northumberland straits with $20,000 worth of Scotch whiskey belonging to a company of which the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough was president?

A little further on will be found the second statement:

> If the minister is correct in that, perhaps he will be able to inform the committee why the $20,000 worth of wet goods carried by the Kennedy was afterwards handed back?

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I said a moment ago, I was not in the house yesterday to answer those statements. If they are true, I would have nothing more to say; if they are untrue, then the language permissible to me under the rules is not sufficiently strong to express my indignation. Of course, I regret that the hon. member is not in his place, and I would gladly wait for him to take his seat if I were not afraid that my hon. friend the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler) will not within the next fortnight or month be in a position to go on with the legislation amending the Customs Act which is now before the house. Consequently I feel that in fairness to myself I must deal with this matter immediately.

Two years ago, during the course of the general election, the hon. gentleman addressed a public meeting in my home town of Lunenburg, where he had full opportunity to deal with the Kennedy matter, but seated with him on the platform were prominent Conservatives of the locality, and throughout his speech he never once dealt with smuggling, boot-legging and rum-running on the Atlantic or Pacific coast; he confined himself entirely to what had been taking place on the Quebec border. That shows the courage of the hon. gentleman. Yesterday he said:

—the steamer Kennedy was taken in for hovering in the Northumberland straits—

I deny absolutely that the steamer Kennedy was taken into Pictou for hovering in the Northumberland straits during any period. There is no such vessel as the steamer Kennedy.

An hon. MEMBER: The W. C. Kennedy.

Mr. DUFF: Don't worry; I am coming to it; take your medicine. There was a schooner called the W. C. Kennedy—and this is not the first time that a few of my Tory friends have referred to it. It was brought up before the special committee of this house which investigated the customs department in the session of 1926. It was also brought up by some more of my Conservative friends before the customs commission, and last year I had the privilege of coming to Ottawa, at the country's expense, and giving evidence before the commission with regard to the W. C. Kennedy.

It is quite true that I had the schooner W. C. Kennedy built in the year 1920 for parties in Newfoundland, but as they could not take delivery of her I formed a company to take over the boat. She is a little three-masted schooner. If I remember correctly, I sold the W. C. Kennedy in 1923, about six months before she was illegally seized—mark you, not legally, but illegally seized—in Northumberland straits, nine and a half miles east by south of Pictou island. At the time of this illegal seizure I had no interest whatever in the schooner, and I had nothing whatever to do with paying the deposit of $400, which I have been accused of doing, not openly by a few individuals but surreptitiously.

Now, sir, the really serious charge is that I was president of a company which owned $20,000 worth of scotch whiskey, or, to put it in the words of the hon. member for West Hamilton:

—$20,000 worth of Scotch whiskey belonging to a company of which the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough was president.

I say that this statement is not true. Perhaps under the rules I cannot characterize it as false, but I do say that it is absolutely untrue; there is not a scintilla of truth in it. I never was an officer of any company or any body of individuals that purchased Scotch whiskey or liquor of any kind to smuggle into Canada. I was never the president of, nor had I any connection with, any company that smuggled liquor into Canada. I never had any connection with any person who either purchased, smuggled or sold or handled whiskey or any other liquor in Canada. Before the commission in Ottawa I made a sworn statement that I never bought liquors, that I never smuggled liquors to sell, and that I never sold liquors. Under the circumstances I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is grossly unfair for any hon. gentleman to get up on the floor and make such unfounded statements in respect to another member which cannot be proven, as was done by the hon. member for West Hamilton, in respect to myself.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. SPEAKER: In order to facilitate the business of the house, I suppose I might call the numbers of these bills and make one motion for their first reading. By unanimous consent I will do so.

It is moved by Mr. Jacobs, seconded by Mr. Wellington Hay, that Bills 167, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, and 186 be now read the first time.

Motion agreed to on division.

FIRST READING—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 167, for the relief of Katie Abramovitch.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 172, for the relief of Claire Ellen Burke.—Mr. Anderson (Toronto).

Bill No. 173, for the relief of George Edgar Gooderham.—Mr. Young (Toronto).

Bill No. 174, for the relief of Pearl Hazel Clement.—Mr. Arthurs.

Bill No. 175, for the relief of John Arthur Towers Irvine.—Mr. Church.

Bill No. 176, for the relief of William Henry King.—Mr. Clark.

Bill No. 177, for the relief of John Pepper.—Mr. Garland (Carleton).

Bill No. 178, for the relief of Caroline Mildred Potter.—Mr. Edwards (Waterloo).

Bill No. 179, for the relief of Fanny Alrheta Schaefer.—Mr. Clark.

Bill No. 180, for the relief of Ivy Ethel James Sergent.—Mr. Robinson.

Bill No. 181, for the relief of Angelo Spadafore.—Mr. Garland (Carleton).

Bill No. 182, for the relief of Lena Zimmerman Staples.—Mr. Hocken.

Bill No. 183, for the relief of Audie Bertha Stewart.—Mr. Pettit.

Bill No. 184, for the relief of Gertrude Aileen VanderVoort.—Mr. Casselman.

Bill No. 185, for the relief of Roy James Vollans.—Mr. McPhee.

Bill No. 186, for the relief of John Young.—Mr. Clark.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

ALBERTA COAL LANDS—PATENTS

Mr. ADSHEAD:

1. How many acres of coal lands are there in the province of Alberta to which patents in fee simple have been issued?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):

1. The area of coal mining rights disposed of by sale in the province of Alberta for which patents in fee simple were issued is 238,008.47 acres.

In addition, under rights conveyed with surface on old short form patent for 12,533,-340 acres.

PARLIAMENTARY RESTAURANT—OUTSTANDING ACCOUNTS

Mr. BANCROFT:

1. What is the amount of outstanding accounts for meals supplied in parliamentary restaurant previous to January 1, 1928?

2. By whom are these amounts owed, and what is the amount of indebtedness in each case?

Mr. SPEAKER: This question should be dropped, as the gentlemen—not now members of the house, I am pleased to say—who owed the restaurant certain amounts have discharged their indebetedness, on the principle that the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom.

Dropped.

LIGHTSHIP NO. 24—COAL

*Mr. SMITH (Cumberland):

1. What emergency necessitated lightship No. 24 fueling approximately 70 tons of American coal at Halifax, Nova Scotia, on 26th November, 1927?

2. Was Canadian coal not available in Nova Scotia on that date?

3. What price was paid for the American coal suplied?

Mr. CARDIN: Mr. Speaker, this is the answer to the question:

1. The necessity of getting the lightship back on her station at the earliest possible moment.

2. Canadian coal was doubtless available at several points in Nova Scotia at that time.

3. $7.50 per ton.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES—RESEARCH BUREAU

Mr. ESLING:

1. Have any specific achievements in metallurgy been recorded to the credit of the research bureau of the Dominion Department of Mines during the past ten years?

2. If so: (a) what were the nature of such achievements; (b) are any of such achievements in commercial use in Canada; (c) if so, where?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):

1. Yes. The Department of Mines has contributed very materially to the development and application of the flotation method for the concentration and separation of the minerals in complex sulphide ores, and to determining the best treatment method for specific ores; to the beneficiation of iron ores; to the cyanidation of gold ores and the treatment of refractory gold ores; to the development and application of a new process for the treatment of ilmenite ore; to the production of electrolytic iron from pyrrhotite and pyrite ores with elemental sulphur as a by-product; to the preparation and utilization of non-metallic minerals.

2. (a) The separation of chalcopyrite and pyrite; (b) Yes; (c) Eustis mine, Eustis, Que.; Britannia mine, Howe Sound, B.C.

(a) The separation of chalcopyrite, zinc blende and pyrite; (b) No; (c) Investigation now in progress to produce three commercial products, a copper, a zinc and a pyrite concentrate from the Aldermac mine ore.

(a) The separation of galena and zinc blende; (b) Yes; (c) Tetrault mine, Notre Dame des Anges, Que.; Dunwell mine, Stewart, B.C. Investigations have been conducted on ores of Reader mine, Calumet I., Que.; Geneva mine, Geneva, Ont., a number of the Slocan mines B.C., Monarch and Kicking Horse mines, Field B.C.; Malaspina mine, Powell river, B.C.; Yankee Girl mine, Ymir, B.C., and many others.

(a) The separation of chalcopyrite from pyrrhotite and pyrite; (b) Yes; (c) Hidden Creek mine, Anyox, B.C. Was at the Huntington mine, Eastman, Que. Will be at the Horne mine, Noranda, Que.

(a) The separation of chalcopyrite, galena and zinc blende; (b) No; (c) Investigation has shown that it is now possible to concentrate the difficult ore of the Stirling mine, Cape Breton, N.S.

(a) The separation of chalcopyrite, zinc blende, and iron sulphide; (b) Yes; (c) Flin Flon mine, N.W. Manitoba. Investigations have been conducted and are in progress on ores of the Sherritt-Gordon mine, N. W. Manitoba, and the Amulet, Aldermac, and Abana mines in western Quebec, which will probably be in the production stage within the next few years.

(a) The separation of cholcopyrite, pentlandite, and iron sulphide; (b) Yes; (c) To some extent at Coniston and Copper Cliff from the copper-nickel ores of the Sudbury district.

(a) Concentration of molybdenite ores; (b) No; (c) Was at the Moss Mine, Quyon, Que. Investigations were carried out on every variety of molybdenite occurrence in Canada.

(a) The concentration of galena from iron pyrite and calcite; (b) No; (c) Was at the Frontenac mine, Perth Road, Ont. Other investigations on lead ores include the Alma mine, Camborne, B.C., and the Ogema mine, Dorion, Ont.

(a) The concentration of sphalerite in zinc ores; (b) No; (c) Investigations have been conducted on zinc ores from the Abana and Aldermac mines and other zinc properties.

(a) The treatment of refractory gold ores; (b) Yes; (c) Argonaut mine, Argonaut, Ont.; Gold Hill mine, Boston Creek, Ont.; Central Manitoba mines, East Central Manitoba.; Rex mine, Herb Lake, Manitoba. Investigations have been conducted on ores from the Reno mine, Ymir, B.C.; Cadwallader Creek, B.C.; Matachewan, Kirkland lake, and many others.

(a) The flotation of the mineral sulphides containing the precious metal values in the tailings from cyanide plants; (b) No; (c) Has been tried out with success on the tailings from the Kirkland lake milling plants.

(a) The treatment of ilmenite ore for the separation of the iron and titanium content to produce a high grade titanium oxide for pigment and other purposes; (b) No; (c) Semi-commercial plant is operating in England on Canadian ilmenite. Commercial plant to be built in Montreal in the near future.

In the preparation and utilization of non-metallic minerals the following contributions have been made:

(a) The concentration of graphite by flotation methods; (b) Yes; (c) Guenette, Quebec. Black Donald mine, near Calabogie, Ont.

(a) The elimination of impurities from sandstone and silica sands; (b) Yes; (c) Canada Glass Products, East Templeton, Que., and other occurrences of sandstone and silica sands in the Dominion.

(a) The concentration of garnetiferous gneisses and schists for the production of abrasives; (b) No; (c) Plant operated near Bancroft for some time. Many occurrences in Ontario and Quebec have been investigated

(a) The separation of china clay and silica sands; (b) No; (c) Process developed for the Huberdeau deposits, St. Remi, Quebec.

(a) The preparation of volcanic ash; (b) Yes; (c) Waldeck, Sask.

The preparation of many other non-metallic minerals has been investigated, such as calcite, barite, celestite, fluorspar, mica, soapstone, bentonite, etc. Experimental test and research work must always be ahead of commercial application and hence quite a number of achievements listed above have not yet been put to commercial use.

The importance of the experimental test and research work conducted is recognized by the mine operators and consulting engineers, who make the fullest use of it and are constantly seeking advice on the treatment of ores and on their milling problems.

HOMESTEAD ENTRY—GEORGE MARTIN

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac):

1. Was the N.E. ¼ 24-5-27 W. 2nd M. leased to one George Martin?
2. Did the said lease expire in October, 1927?
3. Did Mr. J. M. Roberts, Secretary, Department of Interior, Ottawa, advise any person or persons on March 1, 1928, that this land was to be thrown open for homestead entry?
4. Were posting notices giving date when this land would become available for entry sent out by Mr. J. A. Reid, agent of Dominion lands at Moose Jaw, on March 10, 1928?
5. Did Mr. J. A. Reid on or about March 15th notify any person that he had instructions from Ottawa to reserve this land pending further advice?
6. Why has this land been withdrawn?
7. Is it the policy of the government to give the preference to returned soldiers applying for homestead entry on such lands?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):

1. Yes.
2. Yes.

3. Yes.
4. Yes.
5. Yes.
6. In order that the department might make another investigation as to the character of the land, a question having arisen as to its suitability for agricultural purposes.
7. Yes. Under the provisions of subsection 3 of section 7 of the Dominion Lands Act. (Chapter 113, R.S.C., 1927.)

MR. ALEX. JOHNSTON

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Was Mr. Alex. Johnston, Deputy Minister of Marine, absent from his office in the Hunter building, at Ottawa, from July 2, 1927, to August 20, 1927?
2. If so, (a) from what date to what date, (b) what was the reason of his absence, (c) where did he go?
3. How long does the annual vacation of the Deputy Minister of Marine last?
4. How long has he been absent from his office, each year, since his nomination?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. No.
2. (a) He was absent from his office from July 7th to August 2nd inclusive;
(b) On departmental business for 18 days;
(c) To Halifax, Antigonish, Sydney and St. John.
3. There is no regulation governing the annual vacation of deputy ministers. Hitherto the Deputy Minister of Marine has not been in the habit of taking regular annual vacations. During many of the years of his incumbency he has not taken any vacation. On one occasion only he took a vacation on account of ill-health extending over a period of about four weeks.
4. There is no record of the time he has been absent from his office since his appointment.

IMMIGRATION OF RETIRED BRITISH OFFICERS

Mr. ROSS (Kingston):

1. Did the Department of Immigration and Colonization initiate a policy to bring retired British officers to Canada?
2. If so, in what year was the policy initiated?
3. How many settlers came to Canada under this policy?
4. If any, where were they settled?
5. Is this policy still in force, and what efforts are being made to encourage this class of settler?
6. How many such settlers have been secured in 1927?

Mr. FORKE:

1 to 4. The Department of Immigration and Colonization did not institute a policy to bring retired British officers to Canada, but efforts in the direction of settling a number of such officers on the land in Canada were put forward by the Soldier Settlement Board in 1923, at which time the board functioned independently of this department. Information was received from overseas that several thousand officers with considerable capital were to be retired from the British forces in the old country and in India, and with a view to effecting the settlement of some of them on the land in Canada, Major E. J. Ashton, commissioner, of the Soldier Settlement Board, and Col. Robert Innes, at that time director of agriculture for the board, proceeded to England and India respectively, where they interviewed numbers of the officers referred to. As a result of the visit of these officials, 109 officers were actually sent from England to Canada under the direction of the settlement board while 29 came from India, all with the intention of engaging in farming under the direction of the board. These officers, with two or three exceptions, had capital in hand ranging from £300 to £3,000 and they were destined as follows: Prince Edward Island, 2; Nova Scotia, 32; New Brunswick, 3; Ontario, 37; Manitoba, 1; Saskatchewan, 13; Alberta, 12; British Columbia, 38—making a total of 138.
5. No.
6. Covered by No. 5.

VANCOUVER ELEVATOR

Mr. MANION:

1. What is the elevator capacity at Vancouver?
2. How much wheat passed through the elevators at Vancouver in the year 1927, also in the years 1926 and 1925?
3. To whom are the elevators rented at the port of Vancouver?
4. How much grain was handled by the Vancouver harbour board elevator No. 1, in the crop year 1923-24?
5. Is there any intention on the part of the government to build any further elevators at the port of Vancouver at the present time?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. 7,425,000 bushels.
2. 1925: 34,868,000 bushels; 1926: 43,207,244 bushels; 1927: 42,006,874 bushels.
3. The harbour commissioners' elevators are rented as follows: No. 1, Pacific Terminal Elevator Company; No. 2, Alberta Pool Elevators Limited; No. 3, Burrard Elevator Company.
4. The harbour commissioners' records are kept on the basis of the calendar year. From the beginning of the operation of elevator No. 1 by the harbour commissioners on August 23, to December 31, 1923, the deliveries of grain from elevator No. 1 amounted to 11,266,940 bushels. From January 1 to July 31, inclusive, 1924, the deliveries from elevator

No. 1 amounted to 41,336,133 bushels. This makes the total for what is known as the "crop year," 52,603,073 bushels.

5. The matter of constructing additional storage accommodation to elevators Nos. 1 and 2 at Vancouver is under consideration by the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners.

INTERNATIONAL BIBLE STUDENTS' RADIO LICENCE

Mr. SPENCER:

1. Is the government considering refusing to continue the license of the broadcasting station C.H.C.Y. Edmonton (International Bible Students)?

2. If so, for what reason?

Mr. CARDIN: I answered a similar question the other day, and in view of the fact that I may have something to say later on in this regard I suggest that the question be dropped.

Mr. SPENCER: Stand.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It seems reasonable, Mr. Speaker, that an answer should be given by the minister on an important matter such as this. Absolutely no reason was given for the cancellation of licences.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

PEMBROKE POST OFFICE

Mr. COTNAM:

1. Is it the intention of the Post Office department to place the post office at Pembroke, Ontario, under control of the Civil Service Commission?

2. If so, when will said change take place?

3. If not, on whose recommendation will a new postmaster be appointed?

Mr. VENIOT: While I have not the answer here, the question could hardly be replied to except in one way. If it will please the hon. member I will give the answer orally. All post offices with an annual revenue of over $400 are under the Civil Service Commission. This office, therefore, comes under that head.

IMMIGRANTS—NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. CANTLEY:

1. How many immigrants settled in the province of Nova Scotia during the years 1913, 1921-22-23-24-25-26-27?

2. What was the nationality of such immigrants?

3. How many of said immigrants settled on farms?

4. How many were coal miners?

5. How many mechanics?

6. How many domestic servants?

7. Were those who settled on farms assisted by the federal government: (a) by way of assisted passages; (b) by advances for purchases of land, stock or implements?

8. What was the total amount of financial assistance so rendered?

9. What proportion of those who took up farms and were given assistance by the government afterwards abandoned their holdings?

Mr. FORKE: 1 and 2.

For the year 1913, destination of immigrants, for Nova Scotia, cannot be given, the Maritime Provinces being shown as a unit that year.

3 to 6. Statistics are not available except for the fiscal year 1926-27. The figures for that period are prepared from the declarations made by immigrants at the time of entry and they show the following numbers of the classes referred to as being destined to Nova Scotia:

Farming class	536
Mining class	275
Mechanics	108
Domestics	260

7. (a) Only those who came from the British isles under the assisted passage agreements. It is impossible to say definitely just how many there were of this class.

(b) No.

8. The department cannot give the total amount of financial assistance to settlers who came to Nova Scotia under the empire settlement agreement as the settlers are not classified in our accounts according to provinces.

9. 10 per cent.

JAMES BAY AND HUDSON BAY ISLANDS

Mr. PECK:

1. Are any of the islands in James bay and Hudson bay under the jurisdiction of either of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec?

2. If so, which are they and to what province are they respectively attached?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):

No. 1. The islands in Hudson bay and James bay are part of the Northwest territories.

No. 2. Answered by No. 1.

INTERNATIONAL SCHOONER RACE

Mr. ERNST:

1. Is it the intention of the government to assist the schooner Bluenose in the proposed schooner race from Sandy Hook to Spain?

2. If any such financial assistance is to be granted, how much will the government's contribution be?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. Representations which have been made to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries by the member for Antigonish-Guysborough and others to the effect that, in the event of its being decided to enter a Canadian schooner in the proposed international race from Sandy Hook to some port in Spain, assistance in the form of a money grant should be given by the federal government, are under consideration.

2. Under consideration.

BIGWOOD, ONTARIO, POST OFFICE

Mr. SIMPSON:

1. Has the post office at Bigwood, Ontario, been removed from the building of one H. Porlier to that of Henry Depuis?
2. If so, for what reason, and upon whose recommendation was the change made?
3. Has the Postmaster General or the Post Office department received petitions signed by the patrons of this office asking that it be returned to the original location?
4. If so, what action, if any, is being taken to meet the request of the petitioners?

Mr. VENIOT:

1. Yes.
2. Mr. Porlier was only acting postmaster. Mr. Dupuis was given permanent appointment; consequently, office was changed to his location. Change made on recommendation of the member for the constituency.
3. Yes.
4. None, as department has information that site is central.

BINDER TWINE INSPECTIONS

Mr. BANCROFT:

1. How many inspections of binder twine were made during the year 1927?
2. Was any of the twine inspected found to be shorter than the length guaranteed on the tag?
3. If so, how many of the inspections showed such shortage?
4. In how many cases was the shortage found to be 2½ per cent or more?
5. In how many cases did the shortage exceed the 5 per cent allowed by law?
6. Was any of the binder twine inspected found to be over the length guaranteed on the tag?
7. If so, in how many cases did this occur?
8. What quantity of twine, if any, was confiscated as a result of these inspections?
9. Was any twine relabelled as a result of these inspections?
10. Will the government introduce an amendment to the act this session cutting down the 5 per cent leeway allowed under the present act?

Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. 164.
2. Yes.
3. 88.
4. 54.
5. 29.
6. Yes.
7. 68.
8. None.
9. Two lots were seized and held until correctly labelled. One firm was fined $130.
10. The matter is under consideration, but probably not.

ANGLO-EGYPTIAN TREATY

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. In the draft treaties recently presented by the British government to the Egyptian government, is His Majesty the King the party?
2. Is it "His Majesty the King in respect of," etc?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. Yes.
2. The plenipotentiary appointed by His Majesty is stated to be empowered "for Great Britain and Northern Ireland."

LOSS OF STEAMER KAMLOOPS

Mr. COWAN:

1. What effort, if any, was made by the Department of Marine and Fisheries to assist in the search for the steamer Kamloops when lost with all its crew in November, 1927, in a storm on lake Superior, after leaving Port Arthur with a cargo of wheat?
2. When was the Kamloops reported lost?
3. Was assistance to locate the vessel and crew requested by owners of the Kamloops?
4. If so, was any assistance given in the search for the Kamloops and crew by the department, and when?
5. What equipment is provided on lake Superior by United States government for protection of vessels and crews under United States registry?
6. What would be cost of providing life saving speed boats and equipment for use on lake Superior?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. Vessels taking off lightkeepers on lake Superior were instructed to search for the steamer Kamloops.
2. She left Sault Ste. Marie, Ont., for Fort William and Port Arthur, Ontario, on December 4th, 1927, since which date no official information has been received of the ship, which has been missing ever since.
3. Yes.
4. Answered by No. 1.
5. The following coast-guard stations: *Deer Park, Mich.; Duluth, Minn.; Eagle Harbour, Mich.; Grand Marais, Mich.; Marquette, Mich.; Portage, Mich.; *Two Hearted River, Mich.; Vermilion, Mich.; Whitefish Point, Mich.
6. The cost would be governed entirely by the number and class of boats and the amount of equipment that would be provided. A vessel for operation on lake Superior during the period of lake navigation would cost approximately $250,000 to $300,000, depending on salvage outfit and equipment supplied.

*Station is not at present in full active duty service, owing to reduced force.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURN

RADIO—BROADCASTING STATIONS

Mr. CHARTERS:

1. How many broadcasting radio stations are there in Canada and where situated?
2. By whom are said stations operated?
3. How many radio licenses have been issued for the current year in Canada.

FEDERAL GRANTS TO FAIRS OR EXHIBITIONS

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac):

1. On what basis does the federal government make grants to fairs or exhibitions?
2. Are they based on attendance or on amount offered or paid in prizes?
3. How are such grants classified and the amount for each class?
4. What has a fair or exhibition to do in order to qualify for the government grant in each class?
5. How much money has been paid out by way of government grants to fairs or exhibitions in each year from 1924 to 1927, inclusive, in each province?
6. During the years mentioned what fairs or exhibitions in each province received government grants, and what amount in each case?

LEAGUE OF NATIONS—EXPENSES

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What remuneration, living expenses, and other incidentals were paid to those in each case who attended the League of Nations the past six years, representing the government in any capacity, with the names of our representatives in each case?

2. What has been the total cost of the league per annum to Canada since its inception to date?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, this question should be dealt with as an order for return. In bringing down the order the government proposes, in answer to the first section of the question, not to restrict the figures to the past six years but to give the expenses for all representatives since the inception of the league, as is requested in the second section in regard to the total cost of the league per annum.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands as an order for return.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

DEVELOPMENT OF WATER-POWER AND IMPROVEMENT OF NAVIGATION

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, immediate action should be taken, without further and unnecessary delays, to enter into a treaty with the government of the United States for the immediate development and generation of water-power on the St. Lawrence river and its deepening and development in the interests of navigation, and that a greater St. Lawrence waterway is an immediate and economic necessity for the welfare and best interests of Canada.

And that this house is further of the opinion that the government should undertake the construction and operation of this canal as a public undertaking itself and the power incident herein should be developed and generated at cost by the government for the people under public ownership and not alienated to private interests for gain or exported for use outside Canada.

He said: This resolution, Mr. Speaker, deals with one of the most important questions to come before the people of Canada since confederation, and I am sorry that more time cannot be found in which to discuss it. This is admitted to be the greatest economic problem facing the people of the North American continent to-day. It should not be considered as a political or party matter; it is not a local or provincial question but a great economic matter which affects every man, woman and child in the two great countries bordering on the great lakes. We have time to discuss all kinds of academic subjects which are brought up during the session, but we find very little time to devote to basic problems such as this, which will affect many of the great activities of our country. We have a great many rules and regulations in this house, some of them over one hundred years old; no one can bring up any question for the good of the country without being reminded that someone made a rule or regulation many years ago which has the effect of preventing a discussion of that particular matter. This question, however, is all-important, and should be approached from the national standpoint of the greatest good to the greatest number. We are not allowed to bring up any question in which the matter of finance is involved, but as we all know almost everything we would like to bring up has to do with the finances of the country in one way or the other. Just a few moments ago we found that the question of finance has something to do with even our own little restaurant question. Nothing can be taken up in this house without bringing up the question of money; under our rules only the government can bring up such matters. When a private member tries to do something to help solve some of the great economic problems of the country the Prime Minister will get up and throw a few bouquets, after which he will tell us that the question affects the finances of the country and therefore cannot be discussed. Handicapped and hemmed in as we are in this house by our antiquated rules and regulations, which are contained in the dead text books of the past, it is very hard for a member of parliament to discharge his duty to his constituents in considering any of these great problems which lie before us.

Never in the history of the party system in this country has such a great opportunity come to any political party to solve one of the great, outstanding problems of our nation. I would that Canada had an Adam Beck at present to take up this question which deals with power, light and transportation; I would that Canada had a Mussolini, who would do something in a practical way for the people of this country. Instead, we have a government which relies on the law courts for the solution of problems of this kind. The question of the Alberta natural resources is on its way to the Privy Council and no one knows when it will come back again; in the meantime we are not allowed to discuss it. Is this a free parliament or is it not? Are we attending a mock parliament or a real parliament? If we are free, any member should be able to speak on questions of this kind without waiting for some court to bring in a decision.

We also have boards of strategy on some sides of this house, and we are not supposed to bring up anything which has not been approved by these boards. We had one such board on this side of the house, which used to bring up questions which kept us here until three or four o'clock in the morning, and no one was allowed to think for himself. Even then, most of the problems which were brought up were not heard of outside the walls of this building. What was the result? When the ballots were counted we found ourselves over here in this Potter's field.

Matters have not improved since we obtained our new status; we now have a minister plenipotentiary in Washington, from whom we can hardly secure the production of papers or any information as to what is going on. There has been a great change in the form of the returns made by our new representatives as compared with those which we formerly received from the British Ambassador in Washington. Our representative signs himself "Envoy Extraordinary." He is extraordinary, in my opinion. He is also our minister plenipotentiary, but what has he been doing in connection with this matter? We have spent millions of dollars on officials, commissions, mock parliaments and so on, yet we have had only one report dealing with this matter. To my fellow members on this side of the house I would say that unless we are up and doing the Liberal party will carry through this great undertaking. We will have an election in a few years, and I believe that within a few weeks we will have at least a declaration from hon. gentlemen opposite that an agreement has been negotiated dealing with this all-important matter.

Why should these matters be referred to the Privy Council? That tribunal seems to be a very handy agency to take up these matters and throw out a life-line to the government of the day when they do not wish parliament to discuss them. In my opinion the political party which takes up this question in earnest will be in power in this country for a good many years, and I think we should be devoting all our energies to that end. The development of the St. Lawrence outranks in importance all other questions in the public life of this Dominion, past or present. Now is the time to deal with it, because it is vitally important that it be settled at the earliest possible moment. I hope this question will be brought up again, and I also hope that before it comes up in the house next time the government will see fit to have representatives of the Senate and the House of Commons go to Brockville or Prescott, where they can board a steamer and proceed directly to the places where these operations will take place, because seeing is believing.

Mr. Hoover visited the scene and he is a gentleman who now stands as one of the heads of the great Republican party, had an open mind on this problem, but after going through the ship canal with us and seeing the plans and the work being done on the Welland canal, he became, as he is to-day, a warm supporter of this waterway from the business and the economic standpoints.

There are certain questions which should be answered. What is the seaway? Is such a deep channel necessary? What must be done to improve it? What will it cost? How is an international agreement made? What agreement is necessary? Can we afford the seaway? And then it will be proper to say a few words on the political side of this question, on the engineering features, on the economic and international phases and to discuss briefly how it reacts upon the labour market.

A few years ago—on the 26th of April, 1922—there was a debate in this house on a similar resolution of mine. The arguments in favour of this waterway were set out by me then along the lines I mentioned a moment ago.

Since then we have had strong reports made in favour of this improvement by the International Joint Commission representatives of both countries, which prove conclusively from an engineering standpoint, from the power standpoint, and from an economic standpoint that this particular highway to the sea is necessary and practical. The great advantage of the St. Lawrence river is that it is one of the principal natural waterways to the sea. The cost should be divided between the two countries. It is a speed highway, avoiding long delays. We have engineering and commercial assurance of three facts: first, that it can be done, that it is practicable; second, that the cost will be less than that for any other route which has been spoken of; and third, that it will make possible the development of millions of horsepower and the saving of millions of tons of coal every year.

Canada has dealt differently with railway traffic from what it has with water-borne traffic. In the case of water-borne traffic, our canal system does not reveal any well developed policy. The deepening of the Welland canal is an important link in the St. Lawrence scheme and should have been finished long ago if the work had been prosecuted with the same vigour which marked the development of the Chippewa-Queenston power canal. There have been some objections raised to it. Some say it will be an economic failure and a waste of public money. The answer to that is that the power alone will pay for the work, and that is set out in the report of the International Joint Commission. Then it is said that the cost of power will be prohibitive, The answer to that is that the commission's report says it will not be.

Then it is charged that the fogs and ice make the St. Lawrence route too hazardous to be of practical use; although it is admitted that it is all right for six or seven months. The answer is that the fogs and ice on the Atlantic play havoc with the steamship service there as well.

It is objected that ocean vessels cannot navigate the restricted channels or afford the delays of lockage in canals. The reply is that the objection is not sound, the report says so, and it deals to the extent of twenty pages with that argument.

It is said that there will be no return tonnage and that one-way traffic cannot be developed. The answer is that the west is a great consumer and there will be a new development of package freight, and a new type of ship which will be able to sail the lakes and the ocean as well. We have a great many old whaleback type boats now sailing the great lakes and going down to the Atlantic seaboard.

The statement is made that the purpose is to enable Canada to control the export grain trade. The answer is that that is not so.

It is asserted that the project is designed to destroy the competition of the barge canal. The answer is that it would cater to a different form of trade and would be a feeder to the barge canal.

Then it is said that the power is not needed. The answer is given by the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission.

The last objection is that it would expose the United States to the peril of invasion by Great Britain. The answer is that we have had a hundred years of peace between the United States and Canada, and we have been digging canals for over a hundred years. There is only one difference between this canal and the others, and that is that it is proposed to be a little deeper.

I might say that I cannot understand some of the objections to entering into the particular treaty which is urged here; they are more parochial than anything else. For the past hundred years and more the two nations have jointly been using the St. Lawrence river and the improvements therein made. Treaties have been entered into, all matters of navigation and rights have been negotiated. To-day it is not a question, as I view it, of getting or giving an advantage, but it is a matter of continuing the policy that is as old as the two nations, that of using the waters of the St. Lawrence jointly and freely for the benefit of both nations. Neither government will forfeit a single right or privilege which they now have, in order that the two governments may jointly develop this river. Whether a ditch is to be four or thirty feet deep does not involve any new international or political question; or whether the improvement is on the American side or the Canadian side, or which government spends the money.

You are not breaking any new ground in entering into this new agreement. You are not raising any new international questions. I could quote from international treaties from 1792 till the present time to substantiate that point. We are not charting a new course, we are not raising new international questions, but we are travelling a road which has been used for a hundred years. All we are asking you to do is to modernize and bring up to date these channels so that the public and commerce can use them.

The last joint reports of the engineers representing the two governments, in 1921 and 1924 and 1926, both support locating a major part of the improvements on what may be called the international section on the United States side of the international boundary. Whether the international section will be on the Canadian side or on the American side, does not matter very much. On the Canadian side there must be a straight right of way; but on the American side it will be a curved course. Whether the one or the other is adopted is a matter for further negotiation between the governments; and I do not know what the new report says about that. It is interesting to note, however, that according to the engineers, for economic reasons, it should be on the American side. I want it in Canada if possible. I do not believe that the United States or Canada wishes to take any advantage on that account. All that it desired is to take advantage of this opportunity to benefit navigation. The first move is to negotiate a treaty. That is set out in the first clause of the resolution.

If there was less red tape between Washington and Ottawa we would have had all the papers on the table long ago. Are we to wait until they appear in the United States newspapers, or are we to get them on the table of the house now? The engineers who made this international report of 1922 rejected the New York plan and adopted the St. Lawrence plan. The case for the St. Lawrence plan has been set forth; it has weathered every possible opposition and attack on both sides of the border, and it stands to-day approved. We have to-day economic emancipation written across the face of this report. It has taken seven years of hard and insistent fighting, but the case of the St. Lawrence has been made and won. The fight has been worth the struggle for it has meant striking the shackles from forty million people in this land. The last and most pleasant task is that of bringing the two nations together in treaty. Let us write a new chapter in world peace, in international co-operation, in economics. Let us unlock a new treasure house of wealth. If the party on this side of the house will not undertake this work, the government has the greatest opportunity that any party ever had in its history.

A few minutes ago I asked the question: What is this seaway? From the head of the lakes at Port Arthur and Fort William across the ocean as far as Liverpool it covers a distance of 4,500 miles, and there is deep water navigation over all that distance with the exception of two short sections. One is at the old Welland canal, where the canal is fourteen feet deep, and the other is a twenty-four mile strip between Prescott and Cornwall. On the Welland canal section this country is spending $133,000,000 for a new canal. Our contention is that these two shallow sections of the waterway exclude us from the ocean, and because of the limited size of the eastern section it becomes necessary for cargoes from the upper lakes to be transhipped at Port Colborne. This double transfer is slow and expensive; it means extra delay and labour, and at best only a portion of the great lakes commerce finds its way through Port Colborne to the sea. As a result of this we are losing business to our competitors, the United States, at Buffalo through the Erie canal.

A deep channel is necessary. A start has been made on the Welland canal, and the first half of the greater St. Lawrence waterway, namely, the Welland canal, is well on the way to completion. The second half of the shallow waterway is the twenty-four mile stretch between Prescott and Cornwall. The St. Lawrence seaway is to take the place of the fourteen-foot St. Lawrence canal now in use and to continue the deep channel of the upper lakes on to the Atlantic. Its completion will permit great lakes' ships to reach ocean ports on the lower St. Lawrence, and will allow ocean-going ships of less than 27-foot draught to enter the great lakes. The physical effect will be to make the ports of the great lakes ocean ports. It will give to them, and to the farmers and manufacturers in the interior, the benefit of ocean rates to overseas markets. The economic effect will be to lower transportation costs. The seaway will increase the returns to the producer. It will foster new enterprise; it will throw open new markets; it will permit a normal development of our national life, and in general it will promote the common welfare.

What has to be done is to develop the two short strips at Welland and at Prescott, and also at the Galops islands and rapids which I have mentioned to-day. It is agreed that this is the best solution of the problem. I do not wish to dilate now on the rival plans. It is considered advisable to start this St. Lawrence plan with the twenty-four mile stretch from Prescott to Cornwall and the power development from the work will pay its share of the construction cost of the improvement. The report says that the scheme will cost $264,000,000. If you deduct the value of the inherent power which will be developed, the cost for a good seaway will be $123,000,000. The cost of this improvement, if built as a twenty-seven foot ship channel alone, and without any power, would be $173,000,000. By developing power in the international section and charging its fair share of the combined cost of navigation and power to power, and building the rest of the seaway without power, the navigation cost is reduced to $123,000,000. If power is developed in the Canadian section, this entire navigation cost will be increased and the canal distance shortened, thus providing better navigation at an effective net cost chargeable to navigation amounting to $148,000,000. Thus you have a cost of $123,000,000 for a good seaway, or $148,000,000 for a better seaway.

[Mr. Church.]

Before this work is gone ahead with, an agreement must be made between the United States and Canada. I asked a few moments ago: How is an international agreement to be reached? Under the constitution of the United States, the president has full power to negotiate a treaty with Canada, stating the terms and conditions under which the seaway is to be constructed. The agreement then goes to the senate, where, in order to be ratified, it must receive a two-thirds vote of those present. The Canadian procedure is for the government of the day, speaking for the party in power, to enter into the treaty desired, and to submit the agreement to both houses of parliament for majority vote approval. What agreement is necessary? By treaties already existing, particularly the Washington treaty of 1871 and the Boundary treaty of 1909, the two nations have defined their rights, duties and privileges with respect to the great lakes—St. Lawrence waterway, including the canals and locks, uniting them into one highway of commerce. In either case the only requirement is that the civil laws of either country shall be observed by the citizens of the other while making use of waters that for navigation purposes are declared by these treaties to be equally and jointly the property of both.

The only question outstanding between the two nations is that of further improvement of a waterway already improved, but inadequate for the traffic now demanding passage and originating within the interior of both nations. It is merely a question of detail what plan of improvement shall be adopted, where the money shall be spent, and how the construction work shall be administered. It differs from preceding improvements in this, that in all other cases, that is the locks at Sault Ste Marie or the new Welland canal, either government could and did complete the job single-handed. The United States government did the work in the case of the locks at Sault Ste Marie and the Canadian government in the case of the locks in the Niagara district. In the case of the St. Lawrence seaway, the international boundary, the course of the river channel, the problems of dam construction, all combine to make joint improvement both necessary and desirable.

Details of agreement as to plans, details respecting the joint outlay and supervision of the joint improvement while building, furnish the reasons for a further agreement between the two people. No additional rights or privileges are necessary to either nation; no concession of any territorial or jurisdictional rights is called for on the part of either nation. All that is required is a written agreement as to when and by what means the seaway already existing and in use shall be enlarged and made equal to the requirements of modern commerce.

Can we afford the seaway? Yes. The power inherent will pay for the construction. Is it practicable? The St. Lawrence commission of the United States in its report to the president under date of December 27, 1926, state:

> The construction of a shipway of sufficient depth to admit ocean shipping from the Atlantic to the great lakes will lessen the economic handicaps of adverse transportation costs of a vast area in the interior of the continent. Within the United States it embraces all or large portions of the states of Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky, Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, North and South Dakota, Montana, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Michigan, Pennsylvania and New York. It includes a large part of Canada. Within this area there are more than forty million inhabitants who gain their livelihood from its basic industries. It produces a vast surplus both from agriculture and from manufactures, much of which demands long transportation. It has been estimated that the values in a single year to the farmers alone would equal the capital cost of the waterway.

The conclusion of the commission is as follows:

> The construction of the shipway from the great lakes to the sea is imperative both for the relief and for the future development of a vast area in the interior of the continent.

What will Canada do? We do not know. The best answer to this question is to state just what Canada has already done. Canada has been digging for a hundred years and all Canada would have to do would be to join in more digging for a deeper canal between the two countries. The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence route has been used as a highway of commerce since first discovered.

In 1779 Canada began building canals and locks to pass the rapids in the upper St. Lawrence. Before the end of the eighteenth century she built the first lock at the Soo. Between that time and the present she has built and twice enlarged the Welland, built and twice enlarged the St. Lawrence canals, built the modern Canadian lock at the Soo, improved the lower St. Lawrence from the ocean to Montreal, and has only recently let the contracts for the last portion of the 27-foot Welland ship canal now building. This has cost Canada not less than $230,000,000, of which amount $115,600,000 is chargeable to the unfinished Welland ship canal, due for completion in 1930. In the meantime the United States has expended at the Soo and in the main channels of the great lakes, $44,700,000.

Now I come to the international treaties of which I spoke. Time will not permit me to read them all, but I will mention them. Let me first ask, what has so far been done toward making the great lakes and the St. Lawrence an international highway for commerce? If we look at these treaties respecting the great lakes, the connecting rivers and the St. Lawrence river, it will be found that the free and mutual use of the great lakes and of the St. Lawrence river has been enjoyed by the people of Canada and of the United States from the time of the close of the revolution until the present day. It is true that disputes have arisen. It is true that laws passed by the one country or the other have been looked upon as restrictive, but the fact remains that never in all that time has the actual use of the St. Lawrence or of the great lakes and their connecting channels been denied by either nation to the citizens of the other. That fact is of profound significance, for while the "natural" right to navigate the lower St. Lawrence was denied to the citizens of the United States by Great Britain, the privilege and the practical use of that channel was not denied.

The legal title of the United States in the great lakes and in the St. Lawrence rests upon a firm foundation. That great highway was once completely within the possession of France, secured to her by right of discovery. In 1763 all right and title to the dominions of France east of the Mississippi passed to Great Britain. Twenty years later, by the treaty of 1782, the British dominions in North America were divided and the boundary line between the new nation of the United States and the remaining British possessions was indicated as the mid-channel of the great lakes and the connecting waters, including the St. Lawrence to the northern boundary of New York.

By clause 8 of the treaty of 1782 it was agreed that:

> The navigation of the river Mississippi, from its source to the ocean, shall forever remain free and open to the subjects of Great Britain and the citizens of the United States.

Then we have the treaty of 1794, known as the Jay treaty, which provided for joint relations. Then in 1814 the treaty of Ghent sets out the rights of the parties with respect to the St. Lawrence, and by article 2 provides:

> The intercourse between the United States and his Britannic Majesty's possessions in the West Indies and on the continent of North America shall not be affected, but each party shall remain in the complete possession of its rights with respect to such an intercourse.

In 1817 the Rush-Bagot agreement for limitation of naval armaments on the great lakes was proclaimed, and since that time these international waters have been without gun or ship or fortress intended as a threat on the part of either toward the other.

In the treaty of 1842 the mind of the two nations is still further shown as drawing together to one common purpose, when in article 2 of that treaty they agree:

> It being understood that all the water communications and all the usual portages along the line from lake Superior to the lake of the Woods, and also Grand Portage, from the shore of lake Superior to the Pigeon river, as now actually used, shall be free and open to the use of the citizens and subjects of both countries.

Again, by article 3 of that same treaty, the river St. John forming part of the boundary between the United States and Canada, and in part a stream wholly within the province of New Brunswick, was declared "free and open to both parties and shall in no way be obstructed by either." Article 7 of the same treaty declares that the channels in the river St. Lawrence on both sides of the Long Sault islands and of Barnhart island, as well as the channels in the river Detroit on both sides of the island Bois Blanc, and between that island and both the American and Canadian shores, and the channels between the various islands lying near the junction of the river St. Clair with the lake of that name, shall be free and open to the ships and the vessels of both parties.

Then we have what is known as the Reciprocity treaty, which reaffirmed the same rights. Then in 1871, the Washington treaty was concluded, and article 27 of that treaty provides that the commerce of both nations shall enjoy common and equal rights and privileges within the canals or navigable waters of either. Here we have in this treaty of 1871 the bedrock of common property rights to the navigation of the St. Lawrence as distinguished from any possession or claim of possession of rights extending beyond navigation, upon which to establish the lasting structure of an agreement that will provide a seaway from the great lakes to the Atlantic.

The duty of both nations is to improve the St. Lawrence. But the story is not yet complete. Once more the two nations met in 1909 and concluded the boundary waterways treaty, which reaffirmed the doctrine that the United States and Great Britain have joint rights both as to navigation and power in these rivers. I would direct the attention of the house to the last paragraph of that treaty, which reads as follows:

> It is further agreed that so long as this treaty shall remain in force, this same right of navigation shall extend to the waters of lake Michigan and to all canals connecting boundary waters now existing or which may hereafter be constructed on either side of the line.

It will be noted that the language of the treaty covers canals "which may hereafter be constructed." We possess now every navigation right necessary. Police power we do not seek. The Welland canal, for instance, is wholly within Canada, and the police powers are under the jurisdiction of Canada. We have used these canals for nearly one hundred years and there has never been any trouble. This United States bogey has been raised by a lot of the power interests and the electric ring, and they have done more to bring this electric ring into Canada than any other agency.

What is the United States prepared to do? The United States has expended, in the dredged channels of the Great Lakes between lake Superior and lake Erie, $44,000,000. We have spent $230,000,000 on our canals.

I notice that an important declaration was made in favour of the St. Lawrence waterway by the chairman of the Montreal harbour board, Hon. W. L. McDougald. The arguments that have been used against the development of this waterway have been largely parochial. The Hon. Mr. McDougald takes very strong ground in favour of this waterway. He quotes the report of the joint commission, as follows:

> As to the economic practicability of the waterways, the commission finds that, without considering the probability of new traffic created by the opening of a water route to the seaboard, there exists to-day between the region economically tributary to the great lakes and overseas points, as well as between the same region and the Atlantic and the Pacific seaboard, a volume of outbound and inbound trade that might reasonably be expected to seek this route sufficient to justify the expense involved in its improvement.

He goes on to give the volume of grain shipments through the port of Montreal, as follows:

	Bushels
1921	138,454,000
1922	155,000,000
1923	120,200,000
1924	165,650,000
1925	166,200,000
1926	135,000,000
1927	195,000,000

He also states that after the canals were deepened to fourteen feet, the tonnages increased as follows:

	Tons
1900	1,310,000
1925	6,200,000
1927	8,000,000

He also states that in addition to the movement of Canadian grain through the port of Montreal, the St. Lawrence has attracted a large and increasing quantity of American grain, amounting last year to 91,000,000 bushels. He goes on to refer to the investigations which have been made by the Dominion Water Powers branch of the Department of the Interior into the power question, and says that if something is not done there will be a large shortage of power soon. He further states:

I give it as my considered opinion as chairman of the board of harbour commissioners of Montreal, and as the opinion of the technical staff of the harbour commission, who are in daily touch with shipping and of the moving of various commodities in and out of that port, that the business of that port will not be diminished, but on the contrary will steadily increase from year to year, and the proposed deepening of the St. Lawrence waterways will greatly accelerate the rate of increase in the volume of business handled by Canada's national port of Montreal. One of the main factors in achieving this beneficial result will be the undoubted lowering of the costs of the all-water grain movement from the head of the lakes, the minimum estimate of which, arrived at by all authorities, is a saving of three cents a bushel. Many experts say the saving will be as high as six cents a bushel but we are sure it will be at least three.

That is also the figure which the joint commission estimated.

Why is the lake Erie basin much more highly industrialized than the Ontario basin? Simply because it has the benefit of these deep waterways, with the result that Toledo, Detroit, Buffalo and other cities in that basin are large industrial centres.

Mr. SPEAKER: Forty minutes.

Mr. HERMAS DESLAURIERS (St. Mary) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, should we consider the wording of the resolution of the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church), we are naturally led to believe that he wants the United States to put up half the necessary expenditure to build a dam across the Long Sault rapids and dredge a canal 27 feet deep, from Montreal to the head of the Great Lakes. Secondly . . . .

Mr. CHURCH: The hon. gentleman is making a speech.

Mr. DESLAURIERS (Translation): Secondly, after the project is completed, he wants this enterprise to be owned by the state, and that Canada alone should reap the benefits. He seems to forget the aspirations of our neighbours and ignore one of their mottoes.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I started to speak at a quarter to four, and it is now only twenty past four. I looked at my watch and at the clock when I rose.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the officers of the House to guide me in this matter. The hon. gentleman spoke for forty-one minutes.

Mr. DESLAURIERS (Translation): He seems to forget their aspirations and ignore one of their mottoes which is part of their institution: "If you want a thing well done, do it yourself."

Judging from the tenor of his resolution, we might have expected that he would give proof of the urgency of his project and that he was also prepared to silence, in forty minutes, objections of a constitutional or physical nature but especially those of an international order. He did not do so. First, in regard to the constitutional viewpoint, the attitude he takes in this house seems to me untimely, owing to the fact that the provinces intertested in this project, according to the jurisprudence recently enacted in connection with the ownership of shores and beds of navigable rivers, forces the Dominion government not to interfere as long as the general interest of the country is not at stake.

Now, none of the provinces which are free to act in this matter have, at present, taken any official stand in regard to this project. Until the Privy Council has made up its mind we can but look upon this resolution as being out of order.

Moreover, considering that this resolution implies an expenditure of public money, I doubt, according to the rules of the house, that a private member has a right to submit such a measure.

From the physical standpoint, we cannot assert that the construction of a dam across the Long Sault rapids is beyond the reach of civil engineering. However, we may venture to say that at this spot nature would create such serious difficulties in the way of such an enterprise as to render it both uncertain and detrimental to the country's interest.

On December 15, 1908, Messrs. Anderson, Lafleur and Butler, engineers of the Department of Marine, made a report to the Dominion government which in substance was, that no one could forsee the consequences of the building of a dam with artificial causeways in the narrowest parts of the St. Lawrence, at Long Sault, where an immense sheet of water remains opened during the severe cold of our winters.

In fact, in that portion of international territory which extends between Prescott and Goose Neck Island, we have in winter, 18 miles of open water and a stretch of 13 miles of ice; between Goose Neck Island and Cornwall, we have 6 miles of open water and 15 miles of ice. In the open water frazil and anchor-ice form during the whole winter. Much of it is carried down to Lake St. Francis; however every year this ice forms a natural dam or jam in shallow localities and bends of the river that spring weather alone can break up. Years of experience has enabled us to observe that near Cornwall, at Crail island, at Weaver Point—a place located between Barnhard island and the Long Sault island—at Bradford, great ice-fields form. When the Long Sault dam is completed it is but logical to conclude that the ice, not being able to find an outlet in Lake St. Francis, will accoumulate up the river, from the autumn to the spring, hence the overflooding of canals, inundations and unavoidable havoc will be the result.

In the course of the years 1840, 1879, 1887, 1895, 1898 and 1905—serious jams occurred inundating part of the county of Dundas, carrying away buildings, etc.—We were thus enabled to form an idea of the consequences of such jams: in a few hours the town of Longueuil was flooded owing to the rise of the waters above the systems of drainage of towns neighbouring the ice-fields. Montreal was forced to build up special ramparts to protect itself and was obliged to install pumps in its draining system to protect itself against the rising water. With his ice-breakers, the Minister of Marine renders great services in the lower St. Lawrence. The artificial causeways at Long Sault will unavoidably and regularly raise the waters, create floods and their natural consequences because, even after the dam has been constructed, the swiftness of the current will still exist, carrying the frazil formed on a stretch of 10 miles of open water which accumulates from the autumn; above this artificial obstacle, anchor ice will form and the spring will accumulate there its ice-fields from less agitated waters, with results that are easily conceived.

This formation of frazil has the effect of greatly interfering with water-powers by impeding the flow of water, which obliges companies like the Cedar Rapids to have recourse to dynamite and gangs of men to remedy this nuisance.

Does my hon. friend believe that by completely damming the Long Sault—with the accumulation of ice over a stretch of many miles—a water-power will be able to develop its electric energy efficiently and produce it at a lower rate than those of other localities where these natural obstacles would not be encountered, and these powers we would be at liberty to acquire?

Besides the inconveniences which I have just enumerated the construction of a dam at the upper end of Long Sault island and at the foot of Barnhard island the narrowest parts of the river, would mean the closing up of navigation through the Cornwall canal, an entirely Canadian enterprise; it would mean a diversion of 50 per cent of Canadian waters through the South canal, on American soil, when we own 76 per cent of these international waters; that would reduce the efficiency of the canals in regard to safeness of navigation and diminish the interest tourists have in this locality.

With the knowledge that nature creates an irresistable force when water and pack-ice come in conflict, may we not rightly believe, that at a given moment, in a river of the size of the St. Lawrence, this dam may give way and cause disasters along the flooded area—from Cornwall to Montreal—as it has happened in other countries and even in our own country. In the present instance, what would be the damages sustained in the town of Cornwall, at the Soulanges canal, and even in Montreal? The scheme must assuredly need a great deal of consideration.

If this enterprise carries with it serious physical objections which make it difficult and dangerous to put into practice, and to say the least uncertain, there are other obstacles no less important as to their consequences. I mean in regard to the international viewpoint. Here are the facts: "This international stretch of country, commonly known as the Long Sault rapids is actually governed by the treaty of Ashburton which states that the north and south canals should be free of all obstacles and should only be used for navigation." This treaty would first have to be abrogated. A dam would be built at the upper end of Long Sault island so as to divert 50 per cent of Canadian waters into the United States territory, 86 per cent of the water-power would be within United States territory, the outlay for the erection and development of the water-power and the dredging of a canal 25 feet deep, from Montreal to the head of the great lakes, would be equally shared by the United States and Canada. The United States would acquire freedom of access and trade on the St. Lawrence. There would be joint management of the enterprise. This is in a few words the plans of our neighbours. Judging by his resolution, the hon. member for Toronto Northwest is opposed to Canadian private interests regulating the level of the St. Lawrence waters; yet, what is most extraordinary, he would allow foreigners to perform this work! It is rather amusing to see him depart from the motto of his party and his own: "No trucking with the Yankees!" and then to meet him on the shores of the St.

Lawrence crying out at the top of his voice for co-operation with these same Yankees, in connection with this scheme which, after all, would transfer from Canada to the United States 500,000 horse-power, under joint management, as the output of the St. Lawrence is 200,000 cubic feet per second with a drop of 30 and some odd feet.

If the hon. member for Toronto Northwest will take the trouble to examine our international relations with our neighbours, in the light of history, before taking such a step, he will be one of the first to admit the danger arising from such an enterprise. It is entirely wrong for a good citizen who has the interest of his country at heart, who is loyal to the British crown, to subscribe to such a scheme. Yesterday only, in the matter of the diversion of the waters of lake Michigan, the rights of Canada were ignored by the hon. member's friends of to-day. We have not forgotten the annexation terms of the Alaska peninsula, the States of Washington, Minnesota, Vermont and Maine, once Canadian territory, and we are also fully aware how they look upon our rights in the Newfoundland fisheries.

Do we not know as a matter of fact that the debentures of the cities of Montreal and Toronto—not to mention almost all the debentures of our municipalities and provinces —are in the hands of New York financiers? We are aware that our lumber and pulp industries belong to them—80 per cent of the capital invested in those industries is American—and the same thing exists in our textile, rubber, glass and automobile industries. When we know the part played by United States capital invested in our water powers and mines, when we witness every day Americanism creeping into our literature, theatres, music and commerce, when financially the Canada of to-day seems to belong to them, one can naturally question whether the hon. member is still logical with himself in upholding his title of British citizen. If the love of his country, Canada, and that of his mother country do no more strike a sympathetic note in his heart, if in the presence of the American dollar his loyalty to the Empire has become but vain words and he wishes so eagerly to surrender to the United States the St. Lawrence, the armature of the richest colony of the British Empire, one may question whether he has shares in the seventy-one cruisers of the United States navy.

I protest against such schemes which aim at favouring the interests of our neighbours to the detriment of ours and places the weaker at the mercy of the stronger—pursuant to the solemn practice of ages—at a time when war taxes burden the Canadian citizen. A project comprising the dredging of the St. Lawrence to a depth of 27 feet and the development of a water power of 1,000,000, horse power would cost, according to the American estimate and those advocating the St. Lawrence waterway, a sum of $252,428,000 and $2,562,000 per year for its administration, yet we know that these figures are put forth simply to lead one astray, because that amount does not include the interest on the invested capital in the course of carrying out the work, neither does it include the outlay for the dredging of ports on the lakes, nor the further outlay for dredging the rivers which connect the lakes—for it is an accepted fact that ocean liners are not built for the lakes no more than lake vessels are built for the ocean. It is acknowledged that even if ocean liners could sail up the lakes, they could not compete with lake vessels, even if we made allowance for the trans-shipment of their cargoes at Montreal.

Why should we be drawn into such a scheme, when we have at our door a project far more advantageous from every viewpoint —entirely within Canadian territory—a shorter route, less costly and capable of developing 3,500,000 of Canadian horse-power against 1,000,000 horse-power under joint management, and which would permit us to be the masters in our home.

The United States possess 16 per cent of potential energy at the Long Sault rapids; if they are short of electricity, let them utilize that power by damming the south canal at the foot of the Long Sault island, and let them follow the same procedure as in the Cedar rapids development; they will then have all that belongs to them and not 50 per cent of our electric energy as the present scheme calls for. That is all we can concede to them on behalf of the "bonne entente."

Any person who has the least knowledge, who knows American mentality and its ways of doing business must understand the purport of Senator Malby's bill introduced in the United States senate; it amounts to taking possession of our water powers without consulting us.

We must bear in mind the statements of Senator Chas. Townsend when he submitted to the Bureau of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, on May 25, 1913, and again on March 17, 1914, a bill which was no other than the project of the hon. member for Toronto Northwest.

This senator expressed himself very clearly when he stated that this measure had no other aim than to prevent the construction of the Georgian Bay canal, a scheme entirely Canadian and approved by all the prime ministers of Canada; the purport of the measure was to allow the United States to make use of our water powers on the St. Lawrence, control the transportation of Canadian grain and give them a navigable route into the very heart of their country by connecting with the Mississippi river. We cannot blame them for endeavouring to promote the interests of their country to the detriment of ours. But what are we to think of a Canadian who sides with them against his own country? We may strive to emulate them to a certain degree, but we would appear very childish if we thought that our neighbours were going to spend hundreds of millions to develop millions of horse-power for us, and dredge water routes to promote our interests, when the whole year round they treat us to embargo and prohibitive legislation. Certainly not. Let us provide for the future as well as they do, for are we not aware that their coal resources have been wasted, worked without discrimination and to such an extent that, to-day, we can foresee the date of their complete exhaustion; do we not know that in 30 years the iron mines of the Ohio valley, like the coal mines of the Appalachian deposits will be exhausted? Therefore, if we have been far-sighted citizens, we shall be in a position to see the same advantages as those of the city of Pittsburg and the Ohio valley transferred to the Ottawa valley where iron deposits are abundant and unexplored. The development of these mines by water powers, instead of coal would be more economical and capable of competing loyally with any country in the world, we shall witness all this on condition that we remain masters in our own country.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (Toronto West Centre): I am wholeheartedly in support of the principle of the resolution which my hon. friend (Mr. Church) has introduced to-day. For a number of years I have been convinced that the construction of this waterway would do more to promote the prosperity of Canada than any other single enterprise that has ever been undertaken or that is in prospect at any time in the future; and it is with some degree of satisfaction, sir, that I go back to the session of 1924 in order, if you will permit me, to give to the house a few of the sentences I spoke on this question at that time. I was dealing then chiefly with what I considered to the best means of assisting the western farmers, the grain growers and those who come from the prairie provinces, and I said on that occasion that the farmers of the west would have more to gain from the cheapening of transportation than from the removal of any tariff. I continued:

I would exhaust the resources of this country in cheapening transportation from western Canada to the seaboard.

That is the statement I made at that time. I went on:

The great thing is the development of the St. Lawrence river so that ocean vessels will go up to the head of the lakes, as they did last year, and take cargoes of wheat right over to Liverpool. I do not think that is the inevitable or the natural development of that route; but if the St. Lawrence river were improved to give a twenty-five or thirty foot draft, big ships that take 500,000 bushels of grain would load at Fort William and would probably break bulk at the city of Quebec. . . A vessel holding 500,000 bushels of wheat would leave Fort William, go down to the city of Quebec and discharge into ocean boats which would go across to Liverpool, or to any other port in the world, in that way saving five to eight cents a bushel on wheat. If from five to eight cents a bushel could be saved on the wheat that was grown on the western prairies last year, the leader of the Progressive party can figure out what that means. That is one of the ways in which transportation can be cheapened. Water transportation, as we all know, can be done at much lower rates than rail transportation.

I venture to quote that statement made by myself in 1924, because not only have I seen no reason to change my views, but rather the course of my study of the question has led me to see greater advantages than I was able to discover then. In my opinion, the whole of Canada, from the Alberta boundary to the Atlantic ocean, would derive an enormous benefit from the construction of this waterway. I doubt very much that a large quantity of grain will ever go out by the Hudson Bay route. I voted for that undertaking, but not with any great enthusiasm. I believe the inevitable outlet for the produce of the west is to the head of the lakes by rail, and from the head of the lakes to Quebec by boats loading half a million bushels of grain, thence to be carried throughout the world to any port to which it might be consigned.

It is estimated that there will be a saving to the grain growers of Saskatchewan and Manitoba of ten cents a bushel on wheat. Let us suppose that it will be eight cents a bushel. One has only to consider the volume of wheat and other grain grown in that part of the country to realize what an enormous saving that will be. And remember that every dollar of that saving would go into the pockets of the farmers, the original producers. I believe that Ontario will benefit probably less than the west, certainly less than other provinces, because the province of Quebec will have then the two greatest ports in North America. Not only will the grain of the northwest, and probably the cattle as well, go through Montreal to Quebec, but similar produce of twenty different states in the United States will be shipped by that route. We have to consider the organization that has taken place in the middle western states to promote this enterprise in order to realize how much dependence they place upon it as a relief from the high cost of transportation.

It has always been a matter of surprise to me that the western provinces of Canada should be so indifferent to this project while the middle western states of the republic should be so keenly alive to its advantages. I do not know how to explain that difference; I leave it to my hon. friends to my left. It may be that they have been so obsessed with the value of the Hudson bay route; that would explain it in part. But although this is a plan, the consummation of which is certain to save about eight cents a bushel on the transportation of their wheat, there has been remarkably little enthusiasm for it in the west. It would certainly result in an interchange of commerce among the different provinces which would do more than any other single thing to bring about that much desired national unity about which we are talking all the time. One has but to consider the volume of traffic that would pass over that portion of the St. Lawrence running through the province of Quebec to realize what it would mean to that province; and one can catch a glimpse of the prosperity that would result in the maritime provinces from the completion of this enterprise. It would make it possible to bring cargoes of 10,000 tons of coal right up to lake Erie. I do not suppose that Nova Scotia coal will ever do much on lake Erie, which is so close to the American mines. But Nova Scotia coal should go to Hamilton, where there is a great coking plant, to Toronto and to other cities along the lake Ontario coast. The maritime provinces would gain in another way. My opinion, which of course I venture with some hesitation—because I have reached the age when I have ceased to be dogmatic about anything—

Mr. FORKE: Hear, hear.

Mr. HOCKEN: You will get there too. My opinion, I say, is that these great bulk cargoes of wheat would go to Halifax; and either at Quebec or at Halifax there should be developed the greatest milling centre in North America. Flour leaving Canada should go from Halifax or Quebec, but to-day Buffalo is the great milling centre, because it is at the end of the water transportation route from the head of the lakes. We should make the end of that route somewhere on the St. Lawrence river or at Halifax, where flour could be shipped instead of wheat. If that development should take place, which I think is very probable, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick would become great cattle raising provinces; the by-products of the flour would provide feed for the cattle. These two provinces are well watered and suitable in every way for the raising of cattle, with the exception of feed, and with that one defect remedied they should become exceedingly prosperous in that particular industry. So it is not only the western provinces which will benefit through a lower cost of getting their produce to the markets of the world; it is not only Ontario, which would probably receive a great quantity of its package freight direct from the ocean, or the province of Quebec, through which all this traffic would pass and whose cities would grow enormously in consequence; the maritime provinces also would receive great advantages. We sometimes do not think of them as particular beneficiaries under this project, but they would prosper just as much as any other province in this whole Dominion.

I am not going into details just now, Mr. Speaker, because that perhaps will be done later, and I would not like to embarrass the government by laying down a policy for them to follow.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You are doing very well.

Mr. HOCKEN: I do not care whether this measure is introduced by the government or by the opposition; I am for it all the way through. The more I have thought about it during the last four years the more firmly I have become convinced that it is the greatest and most advantageous scheme which can be undertaken by the people of this country. It does not require much thought to realize that producers in the United States are going to enjoy equal advantages; they have to pay higher railway rates than are paid by hon. gentlemen from the west. They stand to gain perhaps more in proportion than the farmers on our Canadian prairies; therefore they are more deeply interested in this question than are the Canadian people, although without us they could not possibly go on with the enterprise. I absolutely support my hon. friend in what he has said, and I do so with enthusiasm; I trust that when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) brings down the correspondence having to do with this matter it will show that the government is deeply in earnest in its desire to carry on this great enterprise as soon as arrangements can be made with the American republic to join with us in it.

Perhaps I differ from some of my friends on this side of the house in believing that this should be a joint enterprise, but as I have travelled from the head of the lakes down through the St. Marys, St. Clair and Detroit rivers and the Welland canal, it has been brought to my attention very clearly that already the United States has spent enormous sums of money in improving transportation channels even in Canadian territory. This country is now committed as fully as it can be committed to the joint enterprise; we have this joint work on the rivers from lake Ontario up to Fort William. The Welland canal is used by our friends from across the border on the same terms as it is used by our own people, and most if not all the channels between lake Erie and Fort William have been constructed partly at least by the expenditure of money on the part of the adjoining republic. So we have already undertaken this joint enterprise, and having regard to the amicable relations which exist and which I trust always will prevail between the two countries; having regard to the treaty under which they use our canals on the same terms that we use them, it seems to me there can be no argument against undertaking this great work in collaboration and co-operation with our friends to the south.

I just wanted to say these few words, Mr. Speaker, to put myself on record as being behind this enterprise just as strongly as possible. If I have any influence at all it will be exerted in support of the scheme, regardless of the source from which it may emanate, because I believe it is going to be a great thing for Canada and will do more to develop this country than anything else I can call to mind at the moment.

Mr. JOHN MILLAR (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Hocken) states that he is strongly in favour of this project. I am also in favour of completing these waterways some time in the future, but I do not believe Canada is in a financial position at present to accept the heavy obligations which would be entailed. Altogether aside from that, a great deal is being promised which seems rather absurd. I have a paper here in which a writer makes the claim that on our western grain we will save 12 cents a bushel, while the last speaker stated that the saving would be from 5 to 8 cents a bushel. A year or so ago I looked up the cost of carrying grain by rail from the transfer points of Owen Sound and Collingwood to Montreal, and found it at that time to be 5.80 cents per bushel.

Mr. MANION: Where was that from?

Mr. MILLAR: From Owen Sound and Collingwood to Montreal. About 1908 or 1909 the entire cost of carrying grain from Fort William to Montreal was 4 cents a bushel; I think the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) will remember that, because he and I looked over the same book.

Mr. MANION: Yes, and I have the speech of the hon. member right here.

Mr. DUNNING: That was the all-water route?

Mr. MILLAR: I could not say; I think part was by rail, but it may have been all water.

Mr. DUNNING: It would not be part rail at the 4 cent rate.

Mr. MILLAR: The rate was 4 cents, anyway. Before this resolution came up I had intended to look up the rate for last year, but was unable to do so. I have heard it stated, however, that last year the rates were about 6 cents, and I have another statement here to the effect that a year ago the rate was 9 cents. This matter has no reference to the Welland canal; it deals only with the deepening of the St. Lawrence, so how are you going to save from 5 to 8 cents a bushel on wheat over a distance of only 135 miles when the whole rate from Fort William to Montreal varies from 4 to 12 cents? The whole proposition is absurd.

Mr. HOCKEN: Can the hon. gentleman explain the reason for the difference between the 4 cent and the 12 cent rates?

Mr. MILLAR: During the war the cost of everything went up; prices doubled and trebled, and that was the reason for the high rate.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What was the rate last year?

Mr. MILLAR: I am not sure. I heard it stated it was six.

Mr. CAHAN: For weeks it was down as low as 4 to 4½.

Mr. MILLAR: Now let me take up another point. I am very glad indeed that we have such friendly relations with the United States; it is something to be proud of, and it is a lesson to the rest of the world. Yet at this time, while some may think it would not be wise to review any instances of friction between the United States and other countries in past years, I think that in dealing with this matter it may be well for us to consider what difficulties other countries have had with the United States in connection with proposals similar to this.

In the year 1850 the United States and Great Britain agreed on what they call the Clayton-Bulwer treaty to build the Panama canal on the basis of equal construction and equal control. The United States seem to have fretted under this treaty, and some time later they persuaded Great Britain to agree to another treaty, called the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901. In this Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 it was provided that.

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

However, in the face of this, after this treaty had been agreed to the United States congress at once turned around and passed the Panama Canal Act, which provided that no tolls should be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States. Great Britain took the view that this was a violation of the former treaty, and there was a great deal of friction about it. The Hearst papers of the United States made much ado about it; organizations sent resolutions to congress and to the president, and a great deal was said about the impudence of Great Britain in objecting to this act. However, later on, after a considerable amount of discussion, President Wilson abrogated this act and did what was fair and right to Great Britain.

Let us look for a moment at the experience of Colombia in connection with the Panama canal. If Great Britain's experience was an unhappy one, so certainly was that of Colombia, formerly New Granada. The new canal ran through Colombian territory. By a treaty entered into in 1846 the United States guaranteed positively and efficaciously to New Granada the perfect neutrality of the before-mentioned isthmus (Panama) with a view that the free transit from the one to the other sea might not be interrupted or embarrassed at any future time while the treaty existed; and in consequence the United States also guaranteed in the same manner the rights of sovereignty and property which New Granada had and possessed over the said territory.

In the year 1903 a treaty known as the Hay-Herran treaty, negotiated between representatives of the United States and Colombia and providing for the construction of the canal, was ratified by the American senate but rejected by Colombia. The constituent state of Panama, a portion of Colombia, traversed by the new canal, thereupon declared its independence; a rebellion took place. In connection with this rebellion the independence of Panama was declared on November 3rd, 1903, and the United States recognized the independence of this state on November 6th, three days later. President Roosevelt who was in office at the time of the occurrence, afterwards declared:

> I am interested in the Panama canal because I started it. If I had followed the precedent in such cases I should have submitted a dignified state paper to the congress and the debate would be going on yet. But, I took the canal zone and let congress debate.

An American commentator, Carl Russel Fish, remarks:

> Its real excuse was rather the plea by which Jefferson justified himself in the Louisiana purchase,—the plea that the situation was one which could never happen again and was of such unparalleled importance as to exempt it from the ordinary laws of morality and of nations.

A matter that I think the government should very carefully study before this project is undertaken is the effect upon the levels of the upper lakes. It is a trite remark of recent years that the levels of the upper lakes as well as of the lower lakes have fallen considerably.

Mr. HEAPS: Will the hon. gentleman let me interrupt and ask: Is the house to infer that if a treaty between the United States and Canada became effective, and the project was consummated, we would be in the same position as in connection with Panama?

Mr. MILLAR: I just leave the house to draw its own conclusions. This is what took place in connection with Panama. I might go a little further in that connection. Not only did the United States recognize the independence of that state three days after they declared their independence, but on the 18th of the same month they made a treaty with them. A sequel to it was the memorial of Panama to the United States in June, 1923, requesting that government to declare that it "now holds all land necessary for the protection of the waterway, thereby affording a safeguard against expropriation which might eventually result in the absorption of the entire republic,"—a memorial yet unheeded. Colombia had had part of their land taken away, and when they tried to prevent the secession of Panama by armed force, they were prevented by the United States from doing so. The United States, as I have pointed out, recognized the independence of Panama three days after they had declared it, and on the 18th of the same month made another treaty with the newly recognized state.

I believe the last speaker stated that boats would likely load grain at Fort William and carry it to Quebec. That is indeed very doubtful. There are 44 miles of canal on the St. Lawrence, and a great many locks, and the insurance rates are high. It is doubtful whether large boats would take their loads of grain down through those canals with the probability of coming back empty; the cost would be too great. At present grain is transferred to smaller boats carrying 70,000, 75,000 and some of them as much as 90,000 bushels. The comment we would make, as grain growers of western Canada, is that the difference between the present rate and that which we might secure would be nearer one or two cents a bushel than six, eight, nine or twelve cents.

It must be remembered that this route would be open for only six or, at the most, seven moths of the year. Moreover, when a canal competes with a railroad the railroad usually takes the greater share of the trade. Competition between open water and rail gives a great advantage to the open water channel. The cost of the open water route, I believe, is about one-eighth—some have put it at one-tenth—the cost of an all-rail route; but that does not hold good for a canal where boats can travel at only about four knots an hour, which is the average, and where there is danger of their being held up, having to wait for their turn, or being crowded against the side, with possible consequent damage. It is very doubtful whether this route alone could compete with the rail route.

I am glad that some who are studying this matter are beginning to be doubtful about the wisdom of the government's proceeding at once. In my hand is a clipping containing a report of a meeting held at Kitchener. It states:

> A number of the speakers were strongly opposed to any loophole which would give American interests the slightest chance of gaining a grasp upon the solely Canadian section of the waterway. There was a very considerable feeling that those parts of the ship canal which lie entirely within Canada should be owned and controlled exclusively by Canada.

We have over-built our transportation facilities; we have made a mistake in going so far in the building of trunk lines, and our railways are finding difficulty in earning dividends. It cannot be denied that if a new route is opened up, if it is going to accomplish what is claimed for it, if it is going to carry more of Canadian and United States grain to Montreal, some of that traffic will be taken from the railways, which will find it even more difficult than they do now to make profits.

I regret that so much of the argument consists in promises of what this new route is going to accomplish for western farmers. I realize that it is really a power project. As such it may succeed, although I do not know so much about that. It seems on the surface that there may be difficulty in developing water power that we do not need at present in Canada. If this surplus power is sold it must be sold to the United States, and after establishments are started there and are using this power, it will be most difficult to get it back. But apart from the water power I think it should be recognized that as grain growers, we are not particularly in need of this development and we do not see very much advantage in it. It may result in a lower rate on grain but the reduction will be very slight. Some time ago, when the joint commission was appointed, Mr. Hoover, in the course of a speech on this question in Canada —I believe it was about the first speech he had made in this country—to my surprise, and I think to the surprise of many, stated that the joint commission would bring in a report favourable to the project. That was an astonishing statement to make, but it was so reported in the press at the time.

I do not care to add anything further to what I have said in regard to this project. I am not against it, but I believe the government would be well advised to study very carefully these matters in relation to the United States and particularly the effect on the level of the upper lakes. In fact it might be found after a thorough investigation that it is not possible to deepen this channel without seriously affecting those levels. If that should ever be found to be the case, I do not think it would be wise to proceed with the plan. A loss of one foot of water in regard to carrying power means a great deal, and that loss falls upon those who are paying for the carrying of the goods. A loss of one foot of water on the upper lakes would cost millions of dollars to the farmers of western Canada through higher rates on their grain.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to detain the house at any considerable length, because I believe there are a number of other members who wish to say a few words in regard to this project. I rise because I believe somebody from my section of the country should once again put himself on record on this question.

I am on record on it so often, I must confess, that a statement of my views to-day does not really matter very much. May I say before I go any further that I am of course speaking entirely for myself, as other members who have spoken to-day were speaking entirely for themselves?

I have had the fortune of following my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) once or twice before on this question. I happened out of curiosity to look up Hansard of 1923, and I found that at that time he spoke on the question much along the line he took to-day, and I spoke much along the line I intend to take now; so that at least two members of this house have been entirely consistent on the question. I made a few remarks also in 1921 in favour of this project. As the papers are going to be tabled so soon, perhaps it would have been as well—and I rather hoped it would have turned out that way—had the whole debate been adjourned following the speech of the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church), because we cannot really intelligently discuss the question until those papers are produced. Whatever remarks I make, however, will be very general.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle spoke of a rate as low as four cents from the head of the lakes at a certain period. There are low rates at certain seasons; there are other seasons when the rates are very high, and of course those are the seasons when the heavy grain traffic is taking place.

Mr. MILLAR: The four cent rate was for a whole season.

Mr. MANION: I think my hon. friend said that that rate was in force about 1908. Of course, freight rates as well as everything else have gone up since 1908; but Julius Barnes, who is perhaps one of the best authorities, if not the best in the world, on grain, made the statement that the building of this canal would mean a difference of ten cents per bushel on wheat shipped to the old land. I believe he meant by that that the saving would be ten cents a bushel in taking the grain from Chicago, Duluth or Fort William to the old country. I think he included everything, and did not merely take in the lake and rail route.

Mr. CAHAN: Did he not mean taking the grain from the whole central United States on the average?

Mr. MANION: I have read his speech a number of times and his statement was very clear that this would mean a saving of ten cents a bushel. I have not read his speech for some years, but I believe he said in one part of it that the building of this canal could be carried on every year by the saving that would be effected by the farmers of the United States in the transportation of grain. That is a pretty strong argument. Mr. Herbert Hoover has also taken pretty much the same attitude. It is a well known fact that the transportation of freight by water over a long haul is only about one-sixth or even one-tenth the cost of rail transportation.

Mr. MILLAR: Would my hon. friend make a comparison between the railway cost and the canal cost?

Mr. MANION: I have not the figures at hand, but I presume that the canals would run the cost up. I do not claim to be an expert in any way, and I am speaking probably entirely as a theorist, but it has been stated many times by experts that you can carry a cargo from New York to Calcutta and a cargo from New York to Bombay at exactly the same cost, although there is a difference of 2,000 miles in the distance. That is because of the cheapness of water transportation.

When this question of the St. Lawrence waterway comes up there are some who attempt to make fun of the advocates of this route—I noticed an attempt in one newspaper to-day—suggesting that they expect the Olympic or the Mauritania to come right up to Toronto and perhaps to Fort William. But those who look at this question intelligently never expect any such thing. Those who regard the route as a feasible one do, however, believe that the grain of the west could be shipped from Fort William and Port Arthur by water right through to Montreal, there to be transhipped on to the ocean-going boats. It is not believed by anybody of intelligence that there will be any regular system of ocean-going boats coming up the lakes, although I remember thirty years ago seeing a Norwegian boat at the head of the lakes, and foreign boats have been coming there ever since, although not on a large scale.

It should be remembered that the building of the Panama canal has made a complete change in the routing of traffic between the east and the west of the United States, and even between the eastern and the western part of Canada. One prominent manufacturer told me not long ago that he could ship his goods from a point near Toronto to Vancouver via the Panama canal more cheaply than he could ship them by rail across the continent. That illustrates very markedly the importance of water transportation. The building of the Panama canal has certainly been a very great blessing to the port of Vancouver. I venture to say that the port of Vancouver for the last few years has been the most prosperous city of its size in the Dominion, and that is largely because of the building of the Panama canal.

Then, of course, there also comes in the question of power development. It is estimated that between four and five million of horse-power can be developed on the St. Lawrence between Kingston and Montreal. There also enters into the question the fact that it will reduce the transportation costs on wheat, and a difference of only a few cents a bushel means a great deal to the farmers of the west. The development of this route would also mean that coal could be brought from Nova Scotia to the central portion of Canada. The development of this route is ultimately bound to come. Whether now is the time to make a start is a debatable question, and there are men just as sincere as I am who believe that we are premature in even discussing the matter at all at this time, while others think we are lagging behind in not making a start now. But ultimately this route will be developed in spite of all opposition from any section of the United States or of Canada, and when it is developed it will mean a much greater consumption of Nova Scotia coal in the central portions of Canada. And that is only as it should be, because it does seem to me a shame, when we have in this country the second largest coal deposits in the world, that we should be importing so much coal from the United States—$60,000,000 worth last year. The development of this route would mean the consumption of Nova Scotia coal to a very large extent in the central portions of Canada, and that would be a great blessing to Nova Scotia.

After spending $120,000,000 or thereabouts on the Welland canal—for that will be about the amount when it is completed—it seems to me that the building of this other waterway is the logical thing to do to round out the whole scheme. It will enable us to go down the lakes right to Montreal, which is 500 miles closer to Liverpool than is New York, and that is a factor of some importance. It is also to be remembered that about one-third the area of the United States, one-third of the population, and perhaps one-third of the production of that country, is tributary to this canal system through the great lakes. Taking all these things into account I do not see how anyone can definitely take the stand of absolutely opposing this scheme, though of course anyone has the right to do that just as much as I have the right to support it.

I shall not take up further time, Mr. Speaker, because I understand there are others who wish to speak on this question, but in a general way I wish to give what little support I can as an individual member of this house to the hon. member who introduced the resolution.

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto): One cannot listen to those who address the house on this motion without realizing that the whole question is one that simply bristles wtih difficulties. It is not as though we had no information, because from the date of the report of the International Joint Commission, which I believe was in 1921, there have been others well qualified and well equipped who have investigated this question in all its aspects and have made a report, and there is still another advisory board which has yet to make its report to this house. It seems to me that the air would be cleared to an appreciable extent if we could have the report of that advisory committee tabled. Having that, and having copies of the correspondence which the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has undertaken to lay on the table at an early day, we shall have information which will enable us to discuss the various features which my friend from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) has discussed with some knowledge and without groping so much in the dark as we are obliged to do at the present moment.

While I welcome the opportunity afforded by the resolution moved by my friend from Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church), I would not dream at the present moment of seeking to have this house compel the government forthwith to enter into a treaty in regard to the matter. We have not the information which has been asked for, and which I believe is being prepared and will be before us in a very short time.

My friend from Qu'Appelle has brought into the discussion queries as to cost, as to the relations with the United States of America, as to the levels of the upper lakes, and probably other questions of which I took no note, but all queries which have been for a long, long time before the various bodies which have been authorized to consider the matter.

Let us assume for a moment that we do find from the final reports that come to this house, and from the discussion on the reports which this house will have an opportunity of engaging in, that the scheme is feasible from an economic standpoint, that there is no danger of international complications, that the levels of the upper lakes and of the lower lakes and of the St. Lawrence will not be interfered with. Of course, we must be satisfied on these points before we can enter into such a tremendous undertaking. But assuming all that, and these difficulties being out of the way, would any hon. member of this house say that it would not be a wonderful thing for Canada that there should be a spearhead of navigation, so to speak, thrust into the very middle of the country? I will not speak of any benefit the United States may derive from that. If they benefit we need not be envious or jealous of them so long as it is a good thing for our own country. When we realize the vast resources in minerals stretching from central Manitoba at least, eastward to the province of Quebec, where geologists tell us we have an extension of the pre-cambrian shield bearing tremendous mineral deposits; when we realize the potentialities of that country in the development of minerals, potentialities which would come much closer to realization if we had this sort of transportation at the very doors of the mines; when we picture the industrial activity that would follow with waterborne traffic passing the doors of central Canada to the eastern and western provinces, it seems to me nobody can dispute the fact that the country would be tremendously benefited by such a state of affairs. We must rely on those general principles after disposing of the questions of cost, internationl complications, and so on, that have been raised. I suggest to the government that at as early a day as convenient and practicable all the information collated by the advisory committee be placed before this house for consideration. Then we shall have the last word on the subject, and many of the questions bothering members at the moment will be disposed of.

We have heard it said that Canada's main difficulty is a geographical one, that we have such a stretch of country from west to east as to make it almost impossible for adequate communications to be established. Well, as I look on this project in the large, to my mind it presents an opportunity of remedying one of the disabilities to which Providence has subjected us. I have often been surprised to hear my friends sitting in this house, particularly those representing western constituencies, state that the idea of a St. Lawrence waterway has not taken hold of their imagination. I learned this afternoon from an hon. gentleman who sits to my left—in whom I have much confidence— that in the west there is a general feeling of disappointment at the results following the construction of the Welland canal, and a conviction that the great railway bridge along the north shore has not done the work which it was built to do. It was built as a grain carrier in the expectation that it would enable grain to be carried to the seaboard at a comparatively low cost. In that regard the people of the west have been disappointed. When the third Welland canal was deepened great hopes were entertained in the west of a lowering of freight rates on grain, but it appears that very little reduction in the transportation costs ensued. It is a fact though that the Welland canal on that occasion was deepened only to such an extent as would enable it to be utilized in connection with the other canals along the St. Lawrence; that is to say, it was not deepened sufficiently to allow of the passage of deep draught vessels. The new Welland canal, which will be completed in a few years, will allow ships carrying half a million bushels of grain to pass into lake Ontario. At present ships of that capacity have to break bulk at Port Colborne, where their cargoes are transshipped to smaller vessels. The transportation cost by water from Port Colborne to Montreal has been at the rate of six cents a bushel for a little over one-third the distance for which grain is carried on the upper lakes at three cents a bushel. This higher cost is accounted for, I understand, by the greater overhead expense of handling smaller ships, and in various other ways which I am not in a position to discuss. It is said that if a 500,000 bushel cargo could be shipped by water from Fort William or Port Arthur to Montreal, there would be only a very small increase in the three cent rate to Port Colborne. Of that I know nothing more than one can gather from different quarters, but when we get the report of the advisory committee perhaps we shall be able to deal with that as a matter of fact rather than as mere conjecture.

But looking at this project in the broad sense, as I say, it occurs to me that from the eastern edge of this country to the western, granted that the economic difficulties are removed, there can be nothing but benefit as a whole from the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway. It is quite possible, as my hon. friend from Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken) said, that grain could be carried down to Halifax and handled at large milling establishments to be erected there, and the products shipped across the ocean all the year around, and that coal from the maritime provinces could be shipped to the central provinces and even further west. Such a proposition would undoubtedly be very attractive to the people down there. My friends from Quebec are not particularly enamoured of this project, and I can only hope that such facts and arguments as may be placed before them will convince them that they are in error in opposing, as they do to some extent, the construction of the St. Lawrence waterway. Take Ontario; if one or two of our sister provinces object, I am quite prepared to admit that we cannot proceed with an undertaking of this magnitude, for it must be considered as an undertaking for the benefit of Canada as a whole, not for one section or the other. We cannot expect the Dominion to spend money for the benefit of Ontario alone. For my part I cannot see how the city of Toronto is going to be advantaged by having grain carried past its door, but it is very likely that it will derive benefit from the waterway And I am safe in saying that a great body of opinion in the province of Ontario is strongly in favour of the project.

This brings me to the subject of hydro-electric power, in which we in Toronto are very vitally concerned. We are running out of power. We have had to enter into a contract with a power company in Quebec to tide us over the shortage. That power has to be transmitted three hundred miles from the Gatineau to the city of Toronto and the surrounding district. It is not a contract with which we in Ontario are very well pleased, for we think we are paying a pretty heavy rate for the power. When we get power from the St. Lawrence our difficulties will be solved for a long time. It has been estimated that all power generated in the St. Lawrence to be allocated to Canada will soon be absorbed in the Dominion, and Ontario's share amounts from one to one and a half million horse power. Quebec, it is estimated, will have available some 3,000,000 horse power for distribution and use within the province, with all the consequences arising from cheap, adequate and easily transmitted electrical energy. The province of Quebec I imagine, must look forward to a tremendous industrial development from that source alone.

Now I come to the west. I do not think that my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle means to say that because the grain growers see no particular benefit from the St. Lawrence waterway they are going to oppose the project. I think better of them than to believe that. I do not think, simply because such an undertaking might not in his view be of any particular personal value to him or the grain growers whom he represents, that he will object to it on that score. The Hudson bay route will do a certain amount of business; then there will be competition from the port of Vancouver; and if competition is increased by waterborne traffic from the head of the lakes at least as far as Montreal, surely in the end that must enure to the benefit of the western farmer and lighten his burden of transportation charges. My friends from British Columbia need not be afraid that they will be harmed by this enterprise, because after all competition is the life of trade, and competition in grain carrying cannot help but have some effect upon freight and waterborne traffic rates via Vancouver.

At the moment, Mr. Speaker, I have complete confidence that this enterprise will be of advantage to the whole Dominion, and that it should be proceeded with at the earliest possible date. All I can urge upon the government is that without delay they place the house in possession of all the facts in order that we may have an opportunity of studying them, and also in order that they may be broadcast throughout the whole Dominion so that every one may be in a position to decide for himself that this enterprise, whether from the standpoint of dollars and cents, of international complications, or from any other point of view, is not going to hurt Canada but rather is destined to be of inestimable benefit to the country at large. We have a very clear pronouncement by the chairman of the Montreal harbour board, who sees nothing but good for the city of Montreal in the St. Lawrence waterway. That statement is disputed in some quarters, as is every other statement that is made. I do not think that we should get into that state of mind in which we should want to be fighting between province and province and city and city. We must consider this not as a party question, not as a political matter; one party should not seek to get any particular advantage from it as against another. We should regard the matter as one upon which the future of this country depends in a marked degree. The matter looms up as so important that this house could not devote itself to anything with greater hope of reward than it could to the sympathetic consideration of the construction of this immense waterway.

At the moment we are stopped at Port Colborne. All that immense lake-borne traffic stops there, and we know that transhipment takes place at Buffalo. For economic reasons there is a considerable development there—a tremendous milling centre, where a great deal of Canadian grain is milled, some of it mixed with grain of an inferior quality. As soon as the Welland canal is opened we shall be able to go as far as Prescott. Are we going to stop there? Is that narrow gap between the St. Lawrence, the greatest waterway in the world, and the upper lakes, Ontario included, to be bridged, or are we going to stop at the stage we have reached? The matter, I repeat, is one of vast importance; it may have an effect on the future of Canada such as we cannot comprehend. This house should consider the question from a Canadian standpoint, as effectively and thoroughly as possible, each member contributing his best to the consideration of it in the hope that we may arrive at the solution of a problem which, as I have said before, and as I say again, even at the risk of undue repetition, seems to be the most important before the people of Canada at this moment.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Most hon. members who have participated in the debate have, I think, very wisely recognized that, in the absence of important reports and documents bearing upon this great question, it would be inadvisable for anyone to attempt to give a final expression of his own views. I am sure the house will agree that in suggesting on behalf of the government that no effort be made to press the present resolution to a conclusion, but rather that the debate be adjourned until at least all the documents are before us, I am taking a course which is very much in the interests of all parties and certainly in the interests of the country.

Mr. CAHAN: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On Tuesday, on the resumption of the sittings of the house, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) inquired when the despatches on the St. Lawrence waterway project would be tabled, and I stated that I had communicated with the Secretary of State at Washington, expressing the hope that they might be tabled very shortly after the Easter recess. My communication had been sent to Washington prior to the recess. I may now say that it has been agreed between the two governments that the papers shall be given to the press on Monday night of next week. They will be tabled in this house at the time of adjournment, so that in both countries, so far as the press is concerned, the information will be available for the morning papers of Tuesday. Monday night the correspondence will be given out in both countries.

I agree with what my hon. friend (Mr. Geary) has said, that it would be advisable to include, in whatever documents may be brought down at that time, the report of the advisory committee, who have made a lengthy and careful investigation of the matter. The essential features of this report were brought to the attention of the United States government in connection with the communications which have passed between the two countries. As a matter of convenience to all members of the house, and certainly as a convenience in all subsequent discussion of the subject, it might be well to include in the papers that are to be tabled on Monday night all of the important dispatches relating to the St. Lawrence waterway project, the dispatches that passed prior to the meeting of the advisory committee, the committee's report, and the dispatches that have passed since then up to the present time. It will be also of advantage, I believe, to place before the house the questions that are to be submitted to the courts touching the jurisdiction respectively of the Dominion and of the provincial governments in relation to power which may be developed as a consequence of the construction of works for purposes of navigation.

As hon. members know, the question of jurisdiction in the matter has been raised by the provinces and at the last Dominion-provincial conference a request was made of the Dominion government to refer to the courts, for a final decision, this important constitutional phase of the subject. The government at the time acquiesced in the request made, and I may inform the house that, as they will be presented to the courts, the questions will be agreed to by representatives of the provincial and of the Dominion governments. I understand that the Supreme Court will hear the reference on May 28, and probably an appeal may be taken to the Privy Council thereafter.

Mr. CAHAN: Have they been amended since the first draft was given to the newspapers?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand that, at the request of the provinces, one or two additional questions have been incorporated in the reference; but the questions except in this particular remain as they were originally drafted in the order in council. The provinces themselves—at least so I am informed—have suggested one or two further questions which will be added. It would, I think, be well to include among the papers to be laid on the table the orders in council governing the reference. By this means the house will then have before it all of the essential recent documents bearing on the St. Lawrence waterway project as a practical project and as one which has come to be the subject of preliminary negotiations between the United States and Canada.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the Prime Minister submit also the report of the engineering board, which was laid on the table but which has never been printed? I have asked several times at the distribution office for a copy of the report and I understand that so far it has not been printed for distribution.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: To what report does my hon. friend refer?

Mr. CAHAN: In the early days of the session the Prime Minister laid on the table the last report of the joint board of engineers. The report was not then in printed form and a motion was made to have it printed and distributed. I have applied time and time again but I have not been able to obtain a copy of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I regret the fact; there must be some oversight. The report was printed and distributed and it is unfortunate that my hon. friend has not received his copy. I shall inquire.

Mr. CAHAN: I am glad to know that it has been printed, but I was told that it had not been.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Possibly I am in error in stating that the report was generally distributed. My impression is that it included some rather expensive plates, and it may be that only a limited number were struck off.

Mr. CAHAN: I shall be glad if the Prime Minister will see that I receive a copy, whether it includes the plates or not. A number of members on this side of the house have been applying continually to the distribution office, and these volumes have not been available. This is really one of the most important documents for our consideration.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The facts are, I think, that there are two volumes, one of the report and one of the plates. How extensive they are I do not recall at the moment; I know, however, they were quite large and it may be that they were not distributed to all the members on that account. In regard to a matter of this magnitude, however, I think the house should have before it, one might say almost regardless of cost, all the information which is essential, and certainly the government will endeavour to meet the wishes of the members of the house in that particular.

Now may I say that when the communications which have passed between the government of the United States and our own government are tabled, hon. members will find, despite what has appeared in the press and what has been hinted at by some of those who have spoken in debate, that so far no commitments have been made of a character which in any way will prove prejudicial to the Dominion, to any province of the Dominion, to the influence of any hon. member of the house or any organ of public opinion in the country. From the outset the government have taken the view which has been expressed by many hon. members on both sides of the house, that the St. Lawrence project is one of the largest undertakings with which this country has ever been faced or is likely ever to be faced, and we have felt that in the preliminary negotiations we should proceed with the utmost caution, not with undue haste nor on the other hand with undue delays, but rather to make progress in the light of the importance of the project and in a way which will enable public opinion gradually to formulate and express itself. I believe it would be prejudicial to the ultimate success of any project of this character were steps to be taken prematurely which would give rise to doubt or to fear in the minds of the people of any section of Canada as to the wisdom of the course which was taken. If the project, as I believe it to be, is one which will come in the course of time, and which has very much even now to commend it if certain economic considerations can be satisfactorily met, then it will be made all the more certain of accomplishment by being advanced cautiously, step by step, but always in the right direction. That is what the government have thus far attempted to do and I think, Mr. Speaker, with these words the house will probably support me in moving the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MANION: Just before the Prime Minister concludes, after these papers are tabled, if the house so wishes I suppose there will be an opportunity for further discussion?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The members of the house always have that privilege.

Mr. MANION: Perhaps there might be some obstacle in the way, so I presume it is understood that if the house so desires there may be a further discussion on the papers.

Motion (Mr. Mackenzie King) agreed to and debate adjourned.

COMPULSORY ARBITRATION OF INTERNATIONAL DISPUTES

Mr. H. B. ADSHEAD (East Calgary) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the time is opportune that according to agreement, the government of Canada should discuss with the government of Great Britain, the desirability of Canada accepting article 36 of the statutes of the Permanent Court of International Justice providing for compulsory arbitration in international disputes.

He said: Mr. Speaker, at this late hour it is impossible for me to cover all the points with which I had intended to deal in connection with this most important question. Suffice it to say that if the members of the house will look at page 23 of the report of the Imperial conference they will find that the question of compulsory arbitration is touched on. I do not wish to go into the details of the arbitration treaty more than to say in general that the countries which may subscribe to the arbitration treaty agree that they will arbitrate all their international difficulties without resort to war, with certain modifications and exceptions.

At that conference an understanding was arrived at, something as follows: A general understanding was reached that none of the governments represented at the Imperial conference would take any action in the direction of the acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of the permanent court without bringing the matter up for further discussion. So you will see that however desirable it may be that Canada, England, Australia, or any of the component parts of the British Empire should sign the arbitration treaty, they cannot do so. Canada's hands are tied; the hands of England, Australia, and all the members of the British Empire are tied until they bring up the matter for further discussion, and it is with this object in view that I have brought forward this resolution to-day. If this should pass the house, or if it strikes the government favourably, we might say to the British government: We are going to bring up that matter for discussion in order that our hands may be untied, so that if we wish to sign the compulsory arbitration treaty we may do so.

At present 26 nations have signed that treaty, and according to the latest report of the Empire Parliamentary Association, two more states, Germany and Guatemala, have signed, so I presume 28 nations have now signed it. It may be that when the government notify Great Britain that they propose to bring up the matter for discussion, some other and better method may be brought forward, but at any rate I hold that Canada should be free to sign that treaty if she so wishes, in common with any other component part of the British Empire.

There are other reasons why we should consider this matter. The other day Lloyd George said that perhaps the most disastrous war in history would occur unless the nations of the world saw fit to resort to something else than force, and unless they worked out some method of arbitrating their difficulties by right and by reason rather than by force of arms. Lord Rothermere has said the same thing, so I think Canada has good reasons for signing that arbitration treaty, or at least for bringing it up for discussion.

Then there is another point to be considered. I am sorry to say that if my information is correct, at present in England there is a very erroneous opinion prevailing among a large number of people that the dominions, Canada among them, are instrumental in tieing the hands of England; in other words, that England cannot sign the arbitration treaty because the dominions will not allow her to do so. In the issue of the Manchester Guardian of December 2 last appears some interviews and some speeches from some English statesmen. I do not wish to bring English politics into this house, but to my mind it is important that Canada should be placed in a right light before the English people, that we may not be looked upon as a deterring factor in this matter One of the gentlemen is reported to have said that if England agreed to arbitrate and the dominions did not agree to do so, England would find herself at loggerheads with the dominions. Again, Ramsay MacDonald is reported to have said, "It is not fair to blame the dominions." He spoke about Canada as probably being willing to accept the optional clause; and the reply was made that we did not sign the protocol. Then further it was said: Well, if Canada and the dominions are not willing to sign this thing, we should sign it whether they are willing or not. That is the attitude taken. There is a false impression that the dominions, Canada having been mentioned as one of the dominions, is one of the factors preventing England signing the clause by which she will settle her differences by arbitration rather than by war. To set ourselves right in our own estimation and in the eyes of the people of England and of the world we ought to pass this resolution and notify Great Britain that we are going to consider the optional clause, and that at the earliest opportunity we will discuss this matter in order to untie her hands and our hands as well, so that the false impression will not any longer exist.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Call it six o'clock.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I do not know whether I would be right in asking the government to make a declaration on this point. The time is getting late, and I should like the government to say something upon this point.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the hour is so late, but it is early enough for me to say simply that I am in sympathy with the subject matter of the resolution. I have some more reasons to give in support of my statement.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, April 12, 1928

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Third report of the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. —Mr. Cahill.

VALIDATION OF ORDERS IN COUNCIL

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): Mr. Speaker, I beg to lay on the table the orders in council in connection with Bill No. 62.

PRIVILEGE—MR. BELL (Hamilton)

Mr. C. W. BELL (West Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, if I am in order, I wish to rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. CAHILL: On the orders of the day.

Some hon. MEMBERS: At any time.

Mr. SPEAKER: An hon. member may rise at any time to a question of privilege.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, I have had an opportunity of perusing in Hansard of yesterday the remarks addressed to the house by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) on the question of privilege then raised by him. I am glad to see him in his seat, and I am sorry that when he had occasion to make those remarks—in which I appear to be slightly interested—unfortunately I had not arrived.

Needless to say, sir, I very cheerfully and very readily accept what my hon. friend then chose to state as being the condition of his own—shall I say?—affairs so far as they relate to the steamship—I should say the schooner W. C. Kennedy. However, it does devolve upon me as a matter of privilege to make some reply to what my hon. friend then asserted. At page 1918 of unrevised Hansard I find that he objects to my designation of "steamship", and I cheerfully make the correction and acknowledge that I should have described the Kennedy as a schooner.

[Mr. Adshead.]

On the same page I find my hon. friend said that I was in error in saying that at the time of the seizure of the Kennedy he was its owner. Again, I cheerfully accept his statement, but until yesterday the only information available to me in regard to the ownership of the schooner was that given under oath before the special committee of this house which in 1926 investigated the Department of Customs and Excise. At the bottom of page 1918 of Hansard my hon. friend is reported as follows:

> If I remember correctly, I sold the W. C. Kennedy in 1923, about six months before she was illegally seized—mark you, not legally, but illegally seized—in Northumberland straits nine and a half miles east by south of Pictou island. At the time of this illegal seizure I had no interest whatever in the schooner,—

The remarks that I addressed to the house in connection with this matter on Tuesday last—not by way of any criticism of my hon. friend but on a resolution in amendment of the Customs Act to prevent smuggling—certainly did come from me on the assumption and in the honest belief that my hon. friend was at that time the owner of the boat. My reasons for so concluding are to be found in the statement by Percy D. Rafuse, master of the W. C. Kennedy, which will be found at page 1202 of the proceedings of the special committee which in 1926 investigated the Department of Customs and Excise. Let me quote it for the benefit of the house:

> Statement of Percy D. Rafuse, captain boat W. C. Kennedy.
> Q. What is your name?—A. Percy D. Rafuse, Lunenburg, Nova Scotia.
> Q. Are you a British subject?—A. Yes.
>
> Q. Are you the master of the Kennedy?—A. I am a certified master.
> Q. Of what tonnage is the Kennedy?—A. 112 tons.
> Q. Where is she registered?—A. Lunenburg, Nova Scotia.
> Q. To whom does the Kennedy belong?—A. To Mr. William Duff, Lunenburg, that is as far as I know, but she is under charter to Ronald Betts and Charles Mee.
> Q. Who pays you your wages?—A. Mr. Duff, also the crew but I have a telegram from Mr. Duff instructing me to take my orders from Mr. Mee.
> Q. By whom are you employed?—A. By Mr. William Duff, Lunenburg, N.S.
> Q. How long were you hovering off the place I found you?—A. About three days or three and one-half days.

Your Honour will readily appreciate that, gladly hailing as I do my hon. friend's statement yesterday, I might well be forgiven down to the time of that very convincing explanation for thinking that my hon. friend was the owner of the schooner W. C. Kennedy at the date on which the master so emphatically swore that he was.

I notice also that my hon. friend has taken exception—it is apparent in the paragraph to which I have alluded—to the statement in regard to the boat having been seized for hovering. I have just read what was stated about the hovering that occurred, and I find on page 1194 of the report of the special customs committee the following statement by the chairman, the hon. member for St. Henri (Mr. Mercier):

I must remark that this is a question of law. Each one of us may interpret this question as we like, but I would like, if there is an opinion given by the Department of Justice, to see it.

Mr. R. L. Calder, K.C., counsel for the committee who had gone over the file, answered:

The entire file reveals no opinion, but the action was taken by the Customs department, merely on the representations of the owners of the vessel, that that was the true legal position. Without referring to the Department of Justice, the decision was made.

May I say again that, with the very best intention in the world to do justice to my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough, no one can legitimately complain that I accepted these statements without reserve from the sworn evidence given before the customs committee. I was not present yesterday, but my hon. friend felt called upon to make some comments on certain things that had occurred when I visited Lunenburg in the campaign of 1926. I shall not attempt to follow him there, but I would say—Sufficient unto the election is the campaign speech thereof. I am willing to leave the matter at that.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, I presume—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: There can be no debate on the explanation given by the hon. member.

Mr. DUFF: I am rising to a question of privilege and I think I am within the rules of the house in replying to the statements made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell, Hamilton), in his attempt at an extenuation of the remarks he made in this house the day before yesterday. You will have noticed that the hon. member did not refer to what he had said about my being president of the company owning the cargo of the W. C. Kennedy, valued at $20,000. He made that statement deliberately and now he offers no excuse and gives no reason for it.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): The captain said you paid him.

Mr. DUFF: The captain stated no such thing. I did not pay for or own the whisky. I am talking about the cargo, and the hon. member cannot deny the fact that he stated that I was president of a company which owned the cargo of the W. C. Kennedy. That statement, I say, is a falsehood, and I am surprised that the hon. member should have dared to give utterance to it the other day, or to get up now and try to explain it away.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): To do what?

Mr. DUFF: I say you made the statement that I was president of the company that owned the cargo.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): So did the captain.

Mr. DUFF: The captain said no such thing; you are not telling the truth.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DUFF: What the captain said was that he had been hired by me, and I am willing to make an affidavit to the effect that I never hired the captain, and I never paid the captain.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DUFF: It is all right for some of my hon. friends to laugh, but the less some of them say about rum or booze, the better. If they want to discuss either rum or booze or anything else I am ready to do it any time or any place. If the hon. member for West Hamilton will make, outside the house, the statements he made here two days ago I will put him where he belongs.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): I rise to a point of order. That is a distinct threat and menace, according to the rules.

Mr. DUFF: I repeat you are exactly what I called you yesterday—nothing more and nothing less.

TREATY WITH SPAIN

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 201, respecting a certain treaty of commerce and navigation between the United Kingdom and Spain and a certain agreement between the United Kingdom and Spain regulating the treatment of companies.

He said: We shall be prepared when the bill is presented, to give details of trade. On April 10, 1925, Canada entered into an agreement with Spain whereby Canada granted the intermediate tariff in exchange for the second column of the Spanish tariff, which is the clause involved in the agreement

On June 27, 1924, Great Britain and Spain entered into an agreement concerning the treatment of companies. The company agreement is of value to several Canadian companies including Canadian banks. The Spanish tax on capital and reserves is one per cent; under the agreement it will be reduced to one-quarter of one per cent. The trade agreement will be of considerable value to Canadian products shipped into that country.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TRADE CONVENTION WITH CZECHOSLOVAKIA

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 202, respecting a certain trade convention between His Majesty and the president of the Czechoslovak republic.

He said: In December 1926 a temporary agreement was made between Canada and the Czechoslovak republic whereby, on the main items of export from Canada, most favoured nation treatment was given, while in exchange Canada granted the republic the benefits of the intermediate tariff. This agreement was made for a term of fifteen months with the understanding that in the interval further consideration would be given the question of a permanent treaty. These negotiations having taken place, this bill is now introduced with a view to that agreement.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

COMMERCIAL TREATIES WITH EUROPEAN COUNTRIES

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 203, respecting trade between Canada and Esthonia, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Portugal, Roumania, and the Serb, Croat and Slovene Kingdom.

He said: The United Kingdom has various commercial treaties with world powers, most of them being styled "for commerce and navigation". It is the general term of these treaties that they shall not apply to any self-governing dominion unless such dominion gives notice that it intends to accept the treaty in whole or in part. In the treaties with the foregoing countries it had been deemed advisable to accept the clause providing for the extension mutually of most favoured nation treatment.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

MR. ARTHUR MACDONALD

Mr. MacDONALD (Richmond-West Cape Breton):

1. Was one Arthur MacDonald of Sydney employed by the government to investigate charges of political partizanship against government employees?
2. How many such investigations were held by the investigator?
3. What remuneration has been paid to the said Arthur MacDonald for his services?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. Yes.
2. Ten.
3. Fees, $520; expenses, $505.62.

LIGHT AND POWER FOR OTTAWA GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS

Mr. HEAPS:

1. From whom does the government purchase its light and power?
2. Does it purchase some from the Ottawa Electric Company?
3. If so, why does it not purchase all its light and power from the public owned hydro-electric system of the city of Ottawa and the province of Ontario?

Mr. KING (Kootenay) (for Mr. Elliott):

1. The Ottawa Electric Company and The Ottawa Hydro-Electric Commission.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. No advantage in doing so. Besides Ottawa Electric Company was original company connected to government buildings and pays taxes to the city.

REPARATIONS COMMISSION

Mr. STEVENS:

1. Has a report of the Reparations Commission been printed? If so, when?
2. Has there been submitted to the government a draft bill giving effect to the report of the Reparations Commission?
3. Has the government received on account of reparations from the Dawes report or other source a sum approximating eleven millions of dollars? If so, has such sum been incorporated into the consolidated fund?
4. If incorporated in the consolidated fund, is it the intention of the government to await this year's payment under the Dawes scheme before making payments on account of reparations as recommended by the Reparations Commission?
5. What is the approximate amount of the payment to be made this year to the Dominion of Canada under the Dawes scheme?
6. Is it the intention of the government to recommend to parliament payment of interest on reparation claims as recommended by the Reparations Commission, and will reparation claims be paid in full or on the instalment plan?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. A few copies of the report of Commissioner Friel on illegal war claims were printed on the 7th of March, 1928.

2. This relates to proceedings in council which are confidential.

3. Canada has been paid to date $10,800,-992.91 under the provisions of the London agreement, bringing the Dawes plan into effect. This sum has been paid into the consolidated revenue fund.

4. The Secretary of State made the following declaration in the House of Commons on March 30, 1928, concerning the Friel report; Hon. Fernand Rinfret (Secretary of State): "I may say in reply that the government is not in a position to submit any legislation on the matter during the course of the present session. Pending the consideration of possible legislation at a later date, the government think it would be inadvisable to have the report tabled at present."

5. No information.

6. Answered by No. 4.

*RADIO—CANCELLATION OF LICENSES

Mr. SPENCER:

1. Is the government considering refusing to continue the license of the broadcasting station C.H.C.Y. Edmonton (International Bible Students)?

2. If so, for what reason?

Mr. CARDIN: In view of the developments in recent times of radio broadcasting and having regard to the seemingly unsatisfactory conditions now obtaining, the government is giving consideration to the question of whether or not it would be generally advantageous to adopt a policy of national broadcasting along the lines adopted in this respect by the British government. The Department of Marine and Fisheries is responsible for the administration of the Radiotelegraph Act under which every radio station in Canada must be licensed. With the advent of broadcasting, the department as the licensing authority, at once realized its responsibilities to the listening public. Each application for a broadcasting license was, with these responsibilities in mind, dealt with as far as practicable from the viewpoint of the broadcast listeners.

When the Bible Students applied for a license to erect and operate a station at Toronto in 1922, their application received very serious consideration, but from information available the department was of opinion that it would not be in the best interests of the public to grant a license and the same was consequently withheld. An application was finally made in 1924 by an individual unit of the association at Saskatoon for a station at that place. The request for hours of broadcasting appeared modest and upon the recommendation of the department's local inspector that they be given a trial, more particularly for the benefit of the country people in that large farming section of the country, a license was issued to them. Subsequently applications were made and licenses issued to individual units of the association at Vancouver, Edmonton and Toronto, respectively. It may be stated here that all licenses automatically expire at the end of each fiscal year, namely the 31st March. Thus the department is in a position to review the same before granting renewals.

When the licenses for the Bible Students expired at the end of the fiscal year, 1927, some consideration was given to the question whether they should be renewed, because of complaints made by the listening public against the matter broadcast by these stations. It was decided, however, to give the association a further trial and the licenses were extended for another year. While the licenses were originally applied for by individual units of the association at the places named the broadcasting stations appear to have become organized under the central authority at Toronto, who last year made application and in whose name the four licenses were renewed. Whether this reorganization has any connection with the matter is not certain, but complaints from the listening public have gradually increased until to-day the department has received a large number of protests and petitions asking that the broadcasting activities of this association be either curtailed or entirely suspended. The matter being broadcast is generally described by complainants as having become intolerable and that the propaganda carried on under the name of Bible talks is said to be unpatriotic and abusive of all our churches. Evidence would appear to show that the tone of the preaching seems to be that all organized churches are corrupt and in alliance with unrighteous forces that the entire system of society is wrong and that all governments are to be condemned.

The department has before it many letters and a petition asking that the Toronto station be closed. A petition from the board of trade at Saskatoon asks that the association's broadcasting from the station at that place be restricted and the local inspector, who originally recommended the granting of the license, says that he has a "continual deluge of complaints." Complaints have been received from officials of the city and provincial authorities against the Edmonton station, and there are many protests from other prominent people in regard to the same station. Finally, a joint petition has been received from the Greater Vancouver Radio Aassociation and the Radio Trades Association of Vancouver asking that the license for the Vancouver station located at Burnaby, British Columbia, be not renewed for next year.

It should be emphasized that these communications and petitions are unsolicited, and should be taken as fully representative of the broadcast listeners in general. On the other hand the supporters of the association are protesting against any restriction of their broadcasting activities or the closing of the stations, but we are informed that these protests have been solicited. It should be borne in mind also that in granting licenses after first refusing them the department indicated its entire impartiality in the matter and its willingness to give the association a fair trial, to be either accepted or rejected by the listening public.

There are many who say that if the listener does not want to hear what any particular station has to say he has merely to tune it out. This may be so in some cases, but a large percentage of receivers in use at the present day are not sufficiently selective to do this; especially where the station is in close proximity we know very well that the listener has either to accept the program of the local station or listen to none at all. If we were in the fortunate position of having an unlimited number of radio channels available, it could be well arranged so to place stations broadcasting matter of the character objected to where their transmissions could be easily eliminated, but we have a very limited number of these channels and cannot accommodate all requests. The demand for channels from proposed stations ready to broadcast desirable programs of a high order far exceed the number of channels available, and up to the present we have refused nearly a hundred applications for broadcasting licenses. The present trend of the listening public is for stations employing high power and providing "entertainment" of the better standard rather than propaganda.

The evidence now before us would indicate that the broadcasting of the association does not meet with the approval of the listening public, and in reviewing license renewals for the current fiscal year, mindful of its responsibilities to the broadcast listeners as the licensing authority, the department is persuaded that in the general public interest the licenses of the Bible Students' stations should not be renewed.

I may add one further word. In view of the recent development in radio broadcasting, and having regard to the seemingly unsatisfactory conditions now obtaining, the government are giving consideration to the question whether or not it would be generally advantageous to adopt a policy of national broadcasting along the lines adopted in this respect by the British government.

[Mr. Cardin.]

REFORESTATION AT CHALK RIVER, ONTARIO

Mr. COTNAM:

1. How many men are employed in reforestation work at Chalk River, Ontario?
2. How many day labourers were engaged, and at what wages?
3. How many teams were employed, and at what rate per day?
4. On whose recommendation were such men or teams engaged to work?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):

1. During 1927 the following was the staff employed at the Petawawa forest experiment station: 4 permanent technical officers, 640 man days; 1 forestry student assistant, 122 man days; 3 monthly labourers, 205 man days; 49 day labourers, 3,062 man days. The foregoing staff was employed for all phases of work including reforestation, silvicultural research, forest protection, forest improvements, etc.

Segregating reforestation proper from the foregoing, 9 labourers were employed under the direction of one technical officer for a total of 59½ days.

2. The number of day labourers is given in answer to question 1 above. Wages paid were as follows: 5 special labourers on silvicultural research, surveys, etc., $2 to $3 per day with board; 2 forest rangers, $3 per day without board; 1 handy man, $2.50 per day with board; 1 telephone lineman, $2.25 per day with board; ordinary labourers, $2 per day with board.

3. Four teams employed for a few days at a time, to a total of 86 team days at $6 per day.

4. Selected by officer in charge of work.

DOCTOR WALLACE MCKAY

Mr. COTNAM:

1. Is Dr. Wallace McKay an employee of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment?
2. If so, by whom was the appointment recommended?
3. What salary?

Mr. KING (Kootenay):

1. Yes.
2. The Unit Medical Director, Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, Ottawa.
3. $150 per month.

SLAUGHTER OF ANIMALS—CONDEMNATION INSURANCE

Mr. SPENCER:

1. What was the total amount of money deducted by the packers of Canada under condemnation insurance during each of the years 1926 and 1927?

2. Do the packers report to the government the amount of loss incurred by them through diseased animals?

Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. The Department of Agriculture has no information as to the amount of money deducted by Canadian packers on account of condemnation insurance, as this insurance is based on the purchase price of the animals slaughtered in the respective plants.

For the years 1926 and 1927, however, the total number of animals slaughtered at these establishments were as follows:

	1926	1927
Cattle	995,864	1,108,831
Sheep	521,874	554,893
Swine	2,464,755	2,545,963

2. No report is made by the packers to the government of the loss sustained by them through diseased animals, but the reports of veterinary officers at the packing plants show that, for the years 1926 and 1927, the following were the numbers of carcases totally condemned.

	1926	1927
Cattle	18,182	17,078
Swine	6,915	7,255

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

COLLECTIONS FOR CHARITY

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton):

1. Does the Post Office department, or any other department of the government, allow charity collectors to solicit contributions or sell tags or such like in the post office and the various government departments?

2. If so, from whom is permission obtained?

3. Was such sale or collection in the Ottawa post office recently carried on?

4. If so, by whose authority?

RADIO LICENSES

Mr. SPENCER:

1. How many licenses were issued by the government in Canada for radio broadcasting as at March 1, 1928?

2. To what parties or corporations were these issued?

3. At what date or dates do such licenses expire?

4. How many of these have been or are being refused since the above date?

5. What are the names of the license holders and reasons for cancellation in each case?

GENEVA OPIUM CONVENTION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the Geneva Opium convention and protocol signed at Geneva on the nineteenth of February, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-five, after the second opium conference, and which was signed, on behalf of Canada by the Canadian representative duly authorized to that effect;

And that this house do approve of same.

He said: Mr. Speaker, there have been three important international opium conferences; one at Shanghai in 1909, another at the Hague in 1912, and a conference at Geneva in 1925. At the Hague conference an important convention was agreed to by the nations there represented, and Canada became a party to that convention on December 17, 1912. At the conference at Geneva, Canada was represented by the Hon. Dr. Beland, who at that time was Minister of Health, and by Dr. Amyot, the deputy minister of the department. They were present during most of the sessions, though, owing to the necessity of Dr. Beland having to return to Canada to attend the sittings of this house, his place was taken by Dr. W. A. Riddell, Canadian advisory officer at Geneva. It was decided at Geneva to make more effective the Hague conference of 1912. The terms of the convention and of the protocol are set forth in the document I tabled in the house before the recess. The convention contains thirty-nine articles. They are intended to complete the provisions of the Hague convention of 1912 and to bring about a more effective restriction of the production of narcotics in the effort to secure a closer control of the trade, and for the appointment of a permanent central board to watch the international trade. The board will prepare every year a report which will be sent to the contracting parties, and will also make recommendations.

In the protocol the signatory states recognize their obligation under chapter 1 of the Hague convention to establish such a control over opium as will prevent illicit traffic; and they agree to take steps within five years to prevent the smuggling of opium, so as to prevent its unlawful use in the countries where its use is at present authorized.

At the convention at Geneva Dr. Beland was chairman of the most important committee, and, as will be recalled, rendered a highly important international service by bringing about accord between the different countries, as embodied in the agreement subsequently drafted.

The purpose of this motion is to obtain approval by parliament of the convention. It was signed by the Hon. Senator Dandurand, when representing Canada at a subsequent meeting of the League of Nations, and it will be ratified by the king when parliament has given its approval. Canada will then become one of the several countries bound by the terms of this convention. It is desirable that the convention should be approved at once because it binds all countries only after a certain number of the signatories have had the convention approved and ratified.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I think under clause 36 it requires ten of the states to be signatories. How many have signed at present?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will find the signatures at the end of the document which I tabled. There are considerably over ten.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): May I ask the Prime Minister why a resolution like this should take from the 19th February, 1925, to the 12th April, 1928, to be brought forward? Are we to be merely a rubber stamp? It appears so. It appears that this was signed on behalf of Canada by the Canadian representative duly authorized in that behalf. If he was authorized, who authorized him? This parliament never authorized him. It seems to me to be a lot of red tape. We are supposed to be a nation. Is parliament to be just a rubber stamp for all the countries bordering the seven seas? It seems to me we are just going around in a circle. Here is a resolution for a convention, and it appears that three years ago it was signed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In reply to what my hon. friend has said, the procedure with respect to the appointing of a representative or the signing of a convention and where desired the approval by parliament is precisely the same in the case of Canada as it has been in the case of Great Britain. My hon. friend will, I imagine, be prepared to acknowledge that Great Britain is a nation. The present is following Great Britain's procedure.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate, informing Their Honours that this house has adopted the above resolution and requesting that Their Honours will unite with this house in the approval of the above mentioned convention, and that the Clerk do carry the said message to the senate;

And that this house do approve of same.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

INTERNATIONAL SANITARY CONVENTION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the International Sanitary convention and of the protocol of signature signed at Paris on the twenty-first of June, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-six, and which was signed, on behalf of Canada, by the Canadian representative acting under full powers issued by His Majesty;

And that this house do approve of same.

He said: Mr. Speaker, from May 10th to June 21st, 1926, an international sanitary conference was held in Paris. The purpose of the conference was to consider effective means, as between the nations, for preventing the spread of communicable diseases. At this convention Canada was represented by Dr. Amyot, the Deputy Minister of the Department of Health. A convention, which I presented to parliament before the Easter recess, was drawn up at that conference. This convention contains general provisions to be observed by the signatories on the appearance of plague, cholera, yellow fever, and certain other communicable diseases in their territories, and provides for measures of defence against these diseases. Its chief object is to provide with the least interference possible to shipping and transportation, effective procedure based on scientific knowledge for the prevention of the entrance and dissemination of the great epidemic diseases and such others as might become widely epidemic.

On the recommendation of the government of Canada Dr. Amyot received full power from His Majesty the King to sign the convention, and the convention is now being submitted to parliament for its approval.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): I should like to ask the Prime Minister on what theory parliament is called upon to approve this convention. I understand that in Great Britain, when a convention of this nature is executed by His Majesty, it becomes a part of the public law of that country and if it is a convention referring to other parts of the dominions, the empire as a whole, it becomes a part of the public law of those dominions. Does the Prime Minister assume that the approval of this convention by the parliament of Canada makes it a part of the public law of Canada, or is it his intention to provide by statute for carrying into effect within Canada the provisions of the convention with regard to sanitation? I had the opportunity during a part of an evening to read over the provisions of this convention, but it seemed to me to call for a very large expenditure of public funds, for a large increase in the whole machinery of health inspection at the ports of Canada, and for the provision of new hospitals for dealing with those who, having an infectious disease or having been liable to infection, enter certain Canadian ports. I should like to know briefly: Does the approval of this convention by the parliament of Canada make the convention the public law of this country? Second, is it the intention to bring into the house legislation by statute to carry the provisions of the convention into full effect? Third, will such statutory provisions be enacted to increase the work, I suppose, of the Department of Health and health authorities in the various cities, to extend the hospital system and all the rest, involving a large expenditure of money? Are we to look for such ancillary legislation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might say to my hon. friend first with respect to the course of procedure that is being adopted of having parliament approve this convention, that that course is in accordance with the principle underlying a resolution of this house which, was introduced by myself a year or two ago and at the time unanimously adopted. The resolution provided, so far as Canada is concerned, that important treaties should be approved in the first instance by this parliament. That is the reason why this convention, which to all intents and purposes is in the nature of a treaty between different countries, is being submitted to parliament. The purpose is to secure in the last analysis the control of parliament over any agreements of international significance which may bind the people of this dominion. If I caught my hon. friend's remarks aright he asked at the outset, why it should be necessary to have this parliament approve, seeing that His Majesty the King had signed the convention and that that would serve to bind all.

Mr. CAHAN: Pardon me. That was not the point. I was asking as to the effect of this approval. Does this convention become a part of the public law of Canada on the approval of parliament being given?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me present to my hon. friend the development that has taken place in the signing of international agreements of this character. At the time of the Peace conference at Geneva the signature of the British Empire as a whole was given by one of the British ministers. In fact, if my hon. friend looks at the signatures to the Geneva Opium conference, he will see what may on the face of it appear to be something of an anomaly. That agreement is signed for "the British Empire" by Malcolm Delevingne. Then there appears the signature for Canada of Hon. R. Dandurand, and following that the signatures for Australia, New Zealand and India of their respective representatives. I understand that at the time of the Peace conference the various governments of the empire represented there found it impossible to arrive at a final agreement as to how the several dominions should have reserved to themselves the right of signature through their own representatives, where they were to be held to be bound by treaties and the signature of the British government held to be for Great Britain alone as contrasted with the British Empire as a whole. My recollection is that there was reached at that time, I will not call it a compromise but a method of meeting the then existing situation. It was this: while the British representative signed as for "the British Empire", his signature was held to bind only Great Britain and Northern Ireland and in order that the other parts of the empire should be held to be bound the signatures of their respective representatives were to be separately affixed. At the Imperial conference of 1926 that method of procedure was changed and it was then agreed that the practice should be discontinued of having international agreements signed by Great Britain and Northern Ireland under the designation "the British Empire;" that as regards treaties binding different parts of the empire the signature of the representative of Great Britain and Northern Ireland would be as for that part only of the empire which did not include the self-governing dominions and the signatures for the self-governing parts of the empire would be in the names of their respective representatives. In order that this agreement or any other of like significance may bind Canada, it is necessary under our practice to bring to this parliament for approval the convention itself, and that is why the convention is now being submitted. After parliament has given its approval and before the convention becomes binding, His Majesty will be obliged to ratify it. Ratification, as my hon. friend knows, is an act of the crown, of the sovereign, but it is an act so far as Canada is concerned, that will be performed on the advice of the government, given after the approval of parliament has been obtained. Upon ratification the terms of this agreement will bind the Dominion.

My hon. friend has drawn attention to possible expenses. He has pointed out that our approval may necessitate the introducing of many measures that are far-reaching and possibly costly. If my hon. friend had read through the whole document he would have found that Canada had been careful to reserve to herself the determination of what in certain important particulars may constitute necessity for action and this, so far as she is concerned, as respects the very measures which I think my hon. friend has in mind. There is attached to the convention a protocol which is in the nature of a special reservation made by Canada, and the reservation is as follows:

The delegate of Canada reserves for his government the right to decide whether, from the point of view of measures to be applied, a foreign area should be considered as infected and to determine the measures which should be applied in special circumstances to arrivals in Canadian ports. Subject to this reservation the delegate of Canada declares that his government is ready to take into consideration the obligations of Article 12 of the convention and the official information which it may receive on the subject of the existence of diseases in foreign countries.

Article 12 of the convention is as follows:

The government of a country in which an infected area is situated shall inform other governments and the office International d'Hygiene Publique in the manner specified in Article 4, when the danger of infection from that area has ceased, and when all the preventive measures have been taken. On the receipt of this information the measures prescribed in chapter II. shall no longer be applicable to arrivals from the area in question, except in exceptional circumstances which will require to be justified.

So that, as far as Canada is concerned, this country has been put in the position of determining for itself what enactments may in certain cases be necessary to meet an international menace arising from disease. And so far as statutory enactments may be concerned, it will be for parliament to decide as the occasion arises.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): I am sorry I have not my documents with me and the notes I made, and that I shall have to speak from memory. I read that reservation, but it seemed to me that the reservation reserved very little indeed. Canada is becoming a party to a treaty, and it is bound legally and morally to carry it out fairly and fully and to assume full responsibility to that end. The reservation that it will be within the discretion of the government and parliament of Canada to decide as to the extent to which they will carry it out is more a reservation pro forma than an effective reservation. I do not wish to go beyond the subject under discussion, but I must say that in a number of cases dealing with matters treated at the Imperial conference, we have assumed very grave moral responsibilities indeed. In connection with the League of Nations, I think we have assumed more serious obligations than this country has ever yet realized, and we have consoled ourselves from time to time with a reservation in somewhat similar form to this, that it will be within the discretion of the government and parliament of Canada as to the extent to which they will carry out their legal obligations. But the fact is that a reservation such as that does not diminish the moral responsibility of this country to carry out such conventions to the full extent necessary in order to give full and complete effect to them.

As to the form in which the treaties are now negotiated, I presume that at some other time we may have an opportunity of discussing that matter, but, as I understand it, there is a grave difference of opinion between the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and some of us on this side of the house who have given some attention to the subject. In the form which has now been adopted by virtue of the resolutions passed at the conference of 1923, as amended by the Imperial conference of 1926, I understand that Great Britain signs for Great Britain and Ireland, but she signs for more than Great Britain and Ireland; she signs for every part of the British Empire outside of the dominions. Therefore, Great Britain is really signing for the British Empire except for South Africa, Australia, Canada New Zealand, and the Irish Free State.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is a pretty big part.

An hon. MEMBER: And Newfoundland.

Mr. CAHAN: No, Newfoundland does not come within that class. Under the resolutions passed at the Imperial conference of 1923, which were submitted to this house by the Prime Minister, and which were approved unanimously by this house—I am speaking from memory again; I wish I had time to send to my desk for my notes—we dealt, I think, solely and exclusively with treaties which involved active obligations on the part of Canada. As I pointed out to the Prime Minister later, and as I still insist, the resolutions passed in 1926 dealing with the negotiation of treaties very seriously amended the resolutions of 1923, and I have always contended that in justice to this house the Prime Minister should have placed before this house the whole of the Imperial conference resolutions for its consideration and approval, or at least should have placed before this house for approval the resolutions of the Imperial conference of 1926, which so seriously amended the resolutions of 1923, which this house had previously approved. But that has never been done. Therefore, some day, at a very early date, we must come to a clear understanding as to where we are in the matter of the negotiation of these treaties. The same distinction arises in connection with our appointment of ministers to Washington, Paris and Tokyo. If I remember correctly—I am speaking solely from memory again, because I have not my notes here—when the Irish Free State sought to appoint a minister plenipotentiary to Washington, there was a conference held between the Free State government and Mr. Thomas, who was then Secretary of State for the colonies, and they agreed as to the terms of the communication which would be made to the Secretary of State of the United States with regard to the terms and conditions and restrictions under which the Irish Free State would appoint a minister.

Mr. CAHILL: Was that not before 1926?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, in 1924, if I remember correctly. In that communication, which has been published in a white paper, which I have read, and which has also been published by the United States in its diplomatic correspondence, the British ambassador at Washington stated to the United States government that the condition upon which an Irish Free State minister would be appointed was that he should deal in his negotiations with the United States government solely and exclusively in relation to those matters which solely and exclusively affected the Irish Free State, and that was the condition on which the United States government agreed to accept the minister. That communication from the British ambassador at Washington to the Secretary of State of the United States—I am sorry I have not it here—went on to state that all matters which affected Great Britain and other parts of the empire, and not the Irish Free State solely and exclusively, would still continue to be dealt with by the British ambassador at Washington. Subsequently I made a motion in this house, to which the Prime Minister agreed, asking that there be brought down the documents in relation to the appointment of the Hon. Mr. Massey as Canadian minister at Washington, and again I am dealing with those documents from memory. Those documents indicated that the Canadian minister was to represent Canada in respect of Canadian affairs. I remember a short time afterwards reading the debates of the British House of Commons—and I shall be glad to give hon. gentlemen the reference—where Mr. Amery was asked, what is the position of the Canadian minister at Washington? In answer, he referred to the reply that had been given some two or three years before by Mr. Thomas, then Secretary of State for the Colonies, in relation to the appointment of the Irish Free State minister at Washington, and said that the same conditions and restrictions would apply to the work of the Canadian Minister to the United States.

Therefore I assume—and I am simply trying to follow this out in my own mind—that the Imperial conference resolutions effected a constitutional reform. Those resolutions have never been approved by this parliament nor by the Australian parliament nor by the Imperial parliament. I do not know whether they have been approved by the parliament of the Irish Free State, but I see they were approved the other day by the parliament of South Africa. But assuming that they do effect a constitutional reform, I understand it to be this; that Canada, through its representative at Paris or at Washington, may negotiate treaties which solely and exclusively apply to Canada and affect no other part of the British Empire; that the duties of a Canadian minister at Paris or at Washington are confined and restricted solely to matters which affect Canada, and Canada only, and that he has no jurisdiction to deal with matters which affect Canada in common with her sister dominions and Great Britain or other parts of the empire.

Consequently, in the negotiation of treaties I still understand that if they do not involve active obligations, as this treaty seems to, but only passive obligations—and the Prime Minister must admit, if he looks into it carefully, that there are a hundred and one matters affecting the most precious rights of Canadian citizens in all parts of the British dominions which are only passive obligations—with regard to those passive obligations, this government has acknowledged no duty to submit such treaties for the approval of the Canadian parliament.

Mr. THORSON: May I ask a question?

Mr. CAHAN: I wish to proceed with my argument for the moment. Secondly, that such treaties as affect other parts of the empire may be negotiated by the ministers of the crown or representatives of the administration at Westminster, and that this government will be kept advised of the negotiations; but that unless this government raises serious objection and refuses to be bound by certain provisions, the British representative—either the ambassador at some foreign post or the British minister in London—may still negotiate treaties in the name of Great Britain and Ireland which when ratified in the name of His Majesty, bind Canada and its citizens in every respect as if those treaties had been approved by the Canadian government and by the parliament of Canada. That seems to me to be the position in which we are now placed.

Let me give an illustration. I am speaking now from memory; I would rather have had my notes at hand. Take the Lausanne treaty. If I remember correctly, the Prime Minister raised certain objections to Canada being bound by that treaty. Those objections have been the subject of discussion in this house and in the press. They were approved by a majority of the house at that time, but there was no formal vote. After the treaty had been negotiated, and ratified by His Majesty the King, the Prime Minister—I think I can turn up the quotation—said that despite the fact that Canada had objected to the treaty, nevertheless now that it had been ratified by His Majesty, it was binding upon Canada as a part of the British Empire. I do not remember his exact words, but that is pretty nearly the effect of them. The Prime Minister shakes his head.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I drew attention to the fact that Canada was not represented at the Lausanne conference, had not signed the Lausanne conference agreement, that the parliament of Canada had not approved the agreement and that therefore the government would not authorize its ratification; and that therefore subsequently if it ever came to be a question of the obligations we were supposed to have assumed under it, all those facts would be a very important consideration in determining the extent of any of our obligations.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so; and if I did not stress that, it was not because I wished to misrepresent the right hon. gentleman. Nevertheless, if my memory is correct—and I think I can produce the passage—the Prime Minister said that the Lausanne treaty was in force with respect to Canada, with this exception, that Canada had not legally assumed any active obligations under it; but the treaty had put an end to the war with Turkey, and Canada was then in a similar state of peace in relation to that country.

Now, take the Locarno treaty. I remember the Prime Minister, two sessions ago stating in this house that Canada would not accept the Locarno treaty until it had been placed before this house for consideration and had received its approval. The Prime Minister in the exercise of his discretion has never placed the Locarno treaty before this house, and it has never been discussed here; we have never had an opportunity of considering whether its terms should receive our approval or not. But after having refused permission to this house to consider the Locarno treaty, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) at the last meeting of the Imperial conference united in a resolution, which bound them and their government, expressing the highest approval—I am not quoting the exact language—of the action and policy of the British government in carrying through the Locarno treaty. That resolution meant something or it meant nothing. Did it mean that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice when in England were so anxious to curry favour—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, no.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We did not curry favour with that resolution.

Mr. CAHAN:—that they endorsed resolutions which in the mind of the British public, and certainly in the mind of the British government and parliament, accentuated the fact that they were giving the moral support of this parliament and this country to the Locarno treaty, and that they subsequently refused to allow this house to consider it in all its bearings? But what is the effect so far as the British public mind goes? It is that the members of this government have taken this dual position, that we are morally bound, and should live up to our moral liability;—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, no.

Mr. CAHAN:—though they have made an indefinite reservation that the extent to which we will carry out that moral liability is left to our own discretion. It is a dual position which is not worthy of Canada, and the time is coming, in fact I think it is already here, when, if Canada is to assume the high duties and responsibilities of nationhood, at least her government should have the courage to state to this country, to the British commonwealth and to the world at large as to when she assumes obligations and when she declines to assume them.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is what we are doing.

Mr. CAHAN: It is what you are doing under a shield. You are saying one thing in Great Britain and another here. You are adopting in Great Britain one policy which is being properly and intelligently interpreted there and you are returning to this country with an entirely different enunciation of your policy. It seems to me that the hon. gentlemen who compose this government have never taken the trouble to probe beneath the surface of the problems with which they are dealing. The other day, in reply to a question I had asked in a previous discussion as to what was becoming of the rights of Canadians as British subjects and British citizens throughout the world, under the program which he proposes to carry out, the Minister of Justice flippantly said to me across the floor of the house, "That will be hereafter determined by a Canadian parliament representing the Canadian people." It puts me in mind of a story I read in a newspaper the other day. A teacher was speaking of God being omnipotent and one of the boys in that country class suggested that there was one thing that He could not do: He could not make a three-year old colt in a minute. It is equally impossible for the Canadian parliament, by any legislation which it may pass to give Canadian citizens any rights whatsoever throughout this empire as British citizens and British subjects. And when you destroy the ties which at present bind us to Great Britain and the other parts of the empire, you leave us in a position where, unless you institute new conventions and agreements between this country and Great Britain and between this country and the other British dominions, which will establish for the future the status of Canadian citizens once they have passed beyond the confines of this country, you will find it absolutely impossible to maintain what I believe is the most precious possession to the great majority of Canadians who owe allegiance to the crown, the most precious thing which they desire to preserve—their status as British subjects throughout the world; you cannot preserve that status by a Canadian statute.

I have spoken at greater length than I had intended, but I was led into doing so. Another time I may have an opportunity to deal more in detail with this question. It seems to me that the policy which the hon gentleman and his colleagues are pursuing—a policy of assuming one attitude to the world and another in Canada, one attitude to Great Britain and the other British dominions and another attitude to their partisans here, their policy of trying to reconcile two conflicting ideas, is placing us in a position that is dishonouring Canada and dishonourable to the Canadian people.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Miinster of Justice): I fail to see in what way my hon. friend (Mr. Cahan) connects all his remarks regarding treaty negotiations and other inter-imperial questions with the subject matter of the present resolution. I did not want to call him to order, but most of his remarks were certainly wide of the mark, so far as this discussion is concerned.

Mr. BENNETT: It began with the Prime Minister.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No; I think my hon. friend is wrong there. He is sometimes wrong.

Mr. BENNETT: Often.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This is merely a resolution asking the house to ratify a convention which the representatives of this country have signed on behalf of Canada as a member of the League of Nations. Canada is a member of the League of Nations of its own right. This convention was signed prior to the Imperial conference of 1926, and anything which was done in 1926 has no bearing on the present question. Canada signs a treaty of peace as a member of the League of Nations on an exactly equal status with Great Britain and with the other members of the British commonwealth of nations. Some Canadians do not like it, but even most of those who do not have come to the point where, when speaking publicly, they express pride in our equality in that respect, and claim credit for what is done. And I am pleased that they should claim credit in some way, because after all it shows the trend of public opinion in Canada. This convention has been signed by Canada as a separate member of the League of Nations. It has been signed by "the British Empire," which means Great Britain and Northern Ireland and other parts of the British Empire which are not separate members of the League of Nations. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has said, there was an anomaly in that respect, and at the Imperial conference of 1926 it was decided unanimously—and the British government agreed—that in future even conventions that are made in the League of Nations will be revised in respect of the title: the words "British Empire" will be replaced by "Great Britain and Northern Ireland" and other parts which are not separate members of the league.

My hon. friend says that the changes which were made at the Imperial conference of 1926 have not been submitted to the British parliament and to the other parliaments. He is right in that regard. But the British government has given effect to those resolutions of the Imperial conference and the League of Nations has been notified that now the title to be given to that part of the empire comprising Great Britain and Northern Ireland shall be so designated and shall not be called "the British Empire," which certainly made for confusion. The new conventions and agreements which have been signed since 1926 have carried into effect the provisions of the report of the Imperial conference of that year in that respect.

As to ratification, my hon. friend asked, why should this be submitted to parliament? As the hon. gentleman knows, ratification of treaties and agreements is a formal matter which differs in various countries. In Great Britain ratification is made by His Majesty the King, naturally on the recommendation of his advisers; in other countries it is different. In the United States the senate is the body that ratifies international treaties. I remember that when Mr. Lloyd George submitted to the British parliament the treaty of Peace, he took care to say that under the British constitution it was not really necessary, before His Majesty gave his assent to the ratification of the treaty, that it should be submitted to parliament. He thought it was such an important matter, however, that parliament should approve of it before His Majesty ratified the treaty, and this viewpoint was also accepted by the Canadian government at that time. Mr. Lloyd George said that this did not mean all treaties should be submitted to parliament, while on the other hand there is a strong body of public opinion in Great Britain which believes that all international agreements and treaties should be submitted to and approved by parliament before being ratified by His Majesty. This is the policy of the Labour party, and I believe they are right. This was the view accepted in Canada; a resolution has been passed by this parliament pledging that all treaties shall be submitted to parliament before they are ratified. This question was discussed casually during the present session, and I may say if there is any treaty coming into effect as the result of negotiations with the United States with regard to water transportation, this house will approve of the treaty or will reject it before it is carried into effect in any way.

My hon. friend spoke about Locarno, and said that the Prime Minister and myself were very good boys when we were over there. He also said that we approved of the treaty of Locarno and that we were morally bound by it. We were not parties to the Treaty of Locarno; we were not represented when it was signed. Included in that treaty was a clause which stated that Canada and the other dominions would be bound if they agreed to the treaty, but when it was submitted to the Canadian government we took the attitude that we did not want to be bound by it. As I remember it, we were asked not to take any formal or definite step before the Imperial conference was called, which was to be held at a certain time in 1926. At that Imperial conference the treaty of Locarno was discussed and the dominions were asked to accept it. I hope I am not betraying any confidence now, but I am forced to tell this because of what my hon. friend has said; Canada took the stand that we would not be bound by that treaty, and in view of the stand taken by Canada and perhaps one or two other dominions, no resolution was brought forward for the purpose of binding the dominions by that treaty. There was a nice little resolution congratulating Sir Austen Chamberlain upon the part he took in bringing about European peace, and I am free to say that he played a fine part at Locarno; as far as I was concerned, I had no objection to congratulating him on the really great work he did there. As far as my country is concerned, however, we never agreed to accept that treaty, and as a Canadian citizen I do not see that Canada should assume obligations in connection with the boundaries between France and Germany, any more than England should assume obligations in connection with the boundaries between Germany and the rest of central Europe. They agreed to guarantee the present boundaries between Germany and Belgium and Germany and France, but they did not agree to guarantee the boundaries between Germany and Poland or the other states of central Europe. One reason was because the eastern boundary was too far from England; well, the western boundary is still further from Canada. I do not believe it would have been good policy for us to assume any obligation which might result in a war to guarantee any boundaries in central Europe or elsewhere outside our own country. I have no objection to stating publicly and openly what my stand was in that regard, and I am willing to submit it to the Canadian people for approval or disapproval.

Mr. McGIBBON: Might I ask a question? Did not Germany herself guarantee those boundaries?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Surely; they are her own boundaries. I am quite willing to guarantee the boundaries of Canada at any time.

Mr. McGIBBON: But that treaty was one of peace, rather than one of war.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It was a treaty to guarantee the present boundaries between Germany and her neighbours; it was for the purpose of keeping peace. I will admit that, and I think it was a good treaty as far as European peace is concerned. However, I do not see why Canada should bind herself by any such treaty. I am free to admit that as a member of the League of Nations Canada has certain obligations, and if she is ever called upon to fulfil them, if there is a war with regard to any of these boundaries, Canada will have to consider what are her obligations as a member of the league. We are a member of the British commonwealth of nations, and we are quite willing to assume all our obligations and responsibilities in that respect. If there is a war, it will be for the Canadian parliament to decide whether the situation of Canada as a member of the British commonwealth of nations would compel this country to take part in that war. This, however, is quite different from binding ourselves to take part in wars with which we have no concern, just because these treaties or agreements might be conducive to the peace of Europe. As I have already said, I think the Locarno treaty was a fine instrument, but I also believe Canada could not be bound by it and should not accept it.

In concluding his remarks the last speaker said he wanted to keep our allegiance to His Majesty the King, and I agree with him absolutely in what he said. I yield to no one in my devotion to the king and in my desire to adhere to that allegiance to His Majesty, but my hon. friend and I differ as to the best way to retain that allegiance. I believe that the present constitution of the British commonwealth of nations is more secure and will be better safeguarded by acknowledging that all the citizens of the different parts of the British commonwealth of nations are equal in status and free to look after their own affairs. We all consider the king as the great bond of unity between us, and we want to keep that bond as sacred as possible.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to discuss even for a moment the constitutional question, although to listen to my hon. friend who has just taken his seat one might think that the only relations between Canada and the countries of Europe are relations which might or might not lead to war. We have many relationships with other nations which may place upon us duties almost equally onerous. Consider this international sanitary convention, of which we are asked to approve to-day. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) brought up a question upon which I desire to touch, and which was mentioned by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King); I refer to the possible financial obligations which this convention might bring to this country—unnecessarily, to a large extent. The diseases mentioned in this international sanitary convention are plague, meaning the bubonic plague, cholera, yellow fever, typhus and smallpox. Of these five diseases there is only one we ever have in this country, coming from the country itself, that is smallpox; the other four are tropical diseases which we never have except when they are brought in from some other part of world, as rarely happens. It is true that occasionally at Vancouver, and at Halifax, St. John, and Montreal, we do get such diseases on incoming ships, but according to this sanitary convention there are almost immense expenses which the countries approving of it agree to undertake. It is true there is in the protocol a clause perhaps allowing Canada to sidetrack some of those expenditures; but the point I wish to make, Mr. Speaker, is that before Canada should undertake any such expenditure as this at any port in Canada, before taking it upon herself to expend perhaps $100,000, we should see that all those expenditures are submitted to parliament. It may be replied that they always are; but they are not always, unfortunately; for this government and perhaps previous governments have commenced expenditures on a large scale and afterwards parliament has been asked to approve of them. I have the largest confidence in Dr. Amyot personally and professionally. He was an outstanding man on health matters in this country many years before he was connected with the department. But ports are particularly inclined to desire big expenditures, whether necessary or not. Any member of this house who represents a port, as I do myself, although not an ocean port, knows that they are glad to have moneys expended in their vicinity whether or not the objects on which the moneys are expended are necessary, or whether or not the buildings are of any use after they are put up. Therefore before any money is expended in regard to any such purpose as this, we must be sure parliament has had an opportunity to discuss the question. It would be a ridiculous thing that, having spent large amounts of money, perhaps tens of thousands or hundreds of thousands of dollars in precautions against tropical diseases, only then the subject should be brought before parliament. We have all the port sanitary authorities now; therefore let us be very careful before we consent to large expenditures, even though we belong to the League of Nations or wish to have the advantage of the sanitary resources of the world. We have had many governments in this country since 1867; many of them have been extravagant governments, and I will say frankly that the governments of the party on this side have not been without sin; but of all the governments which have seemed to care little about the expenditures of the country, without any thought of paying the piper, this government has the record. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) laughs, but there is probably no department which goes further than his in useless expenditures, on elevators for instance, which, as in Prince Rupert, we rent for perhaps a dollar a year and even golf links; and by other departments on harbour board expenses, national parks, and so on, which I say really shock anyone who gives a thought to them. A few days ago I saw a list of expenditures by this government, some of them called loans, but without any expectation of repayment. On one page of the orders of the day there were proposals totalling something like $25,000,000—a shocking figure when one thinks of it. We do not seem to care any more, since the war, how we spend the money of the country.

It is true that very few governments have ever been elected on a policy of economy and I think that the policy which this government adheres to is opposed to economy. At any rate, as a member of this side of the house I feel some responsibility for the expenditure of moneys. I hope the Prime Minister will see to it that before any sums of money are expended in caring for tropical diseases from a ship which possibly goes down to the Mediterranean, where we have already all the isolation and sanitary requirements necessary, such expenditures are submitted to this house and the house and the whole country given an opportunity to look into and discuss them.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): Mr. Speaker, there are a large number of people and a large section of Canada who do not agree with the ways and means taken outside the British Empire under our new status in signing these conventions. It is all very well for the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to stand up in this house in 1928 and ask this honourable body to agree to the sanitary conventions on terms adopted in 1926 by delegates who were supposed to represent this parliament, and who had no authority to sign a convention and in my opinion were never authorized to do so. You will notice the wording of the resolution, "and which was signed, on behalf of Canada, by the Canadian representative acting under full power issued by His Majesty". The first point is as to the status of the representative to sign that convention.

We have in Canada to-day a new disease, the new status disease, which must be cured first and exterminated from the shores of Canada. The Governor General is to-day represented here for the first time in a convention. The Governor General does not represent Downing Street. He is now a mere viceroy. If he were to ask for advice, they would tell him that he possesses in the front benches all the advice which can be given him. He is the representative alone of the government of Canada and cut off from His Majesty entirely. We have been content as a nation to depend upon the mother country, upon the British board of health, the British board of trade, the British Medical Association, and the medical health officers of the country and their organizations and especially on education in these matters. There are two or three hon. members who have spoken in this debate, and who, if they want laws for public health, should start at home. May I say to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) that they need a proper Public Health department to look after their public health in the city of Montreal; their water supply should be owned by the city, and that would do more for national public health in Montreal than all the conventions signed at Geneva, Rome, Paris and all the other places on world sanitary matters. Three-fourths of this convention does not apply to Canada at all. What have we to do with disease on the Red sea?

Who are the deputations which have been over the country asking for this legislation? Two or three of these gentlemen come from the city I represent, and they can hardly get together a corporal's guard at their league meetings. It is all very well for Canada's delegates to the League of Nations to waste the country's money on trips to Geneva; and what do I find? I find that instead of these Canadian representatives patronizing Canadian steamship ports they go down to New York. And what do they do when they get over there? Some of them are so-called labour men, and some of them are defeated Liberal candidates from the Toronto district. I know one of them who went over to represent us who knew nothing about public or international health laws. In all the great fights which we have had by Doctor Hastings, I have never known that gentleman to be on the public platform. We have in Toronto a great public health department and a great health officer. Dr. Hastings, one of the finest on this continent, but I never knew one of those gentlemen to spend his time over in Geneva spending the taxpayers' money on health matters or sanitation. We have gained a seat in the League of Nations but a seat in the National or American baseball leagues will accomplish as much for peace and goodwill as the mythical, academic, League of Nations. I have absolutely lost faith in the League of Nations, which is a menace to the British Empire. Of all the foolish resolutions that have been passed by that league, I think the one in regard to sanitation is the worst, and it deals with many matters foreign to the soil of Canada. I venture to say that not one per cent of the members have read this amazing new status report. The other day the Prime Minister said that we had nothing to do with the Anglo-Egyptian treaty, yet we to-day are dealing with sanitary affairs in the Suez canal. We have no navy. How are we going to enforce these conventions, supposing anybody breaks them? Last year the Conservative party had a convention and passed resolutions. Some years ago the Liberal party held a convention and still another one, of the women Liberals, is to be held at the Chateau Laurier next week. Are we to wait for two or three years, as we waited for this one, in order to get these resolutions before the House of Commons after the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice deal with these matters although they are already signed and have for three years been binding in Canada?

The matters covered by this convention are foreign to the soil of Canada, and dear knows what the cost of carrying it out is going to be. Some of these Geneva resolutions have been applied to the building laws of the city of Toronto. The plumbing regulations in Toronto have been incorporated into a by-law and they include amended resolutions that have been passed by this academic, mock parliament known as the League of Nations.

If you look over this report in regard to cholera and other diseases you will find they want to regulate the Dead sea, the Suez canal and the seven seas. Whither are we drifting under this new status? If we go on this way I do not know where this parliament is going to land. This convention will not increase the crops of our farmers, but will empty their pockets in payment of taxes which this fad now puts into the form of conventions binding Canada the world over. If the government want to do anything in the way of preventing diseases of this kind and for sanitation, let them start at home and deal with the diseases from which Canada is suffering to-day. Let them start right in this city of Ottawa and make the city clean up its streets and thus prevent diseases from arising. They do not know how to keep their streets clean; they have the worst kept streets of any city in Canada, and any health officer will tell you that there are more germs and diseases to be found in the streets of a great city than anywhere else. Let us begin at home and let us stop signing all these conventions. If this is a result of our new status, dear knows where we are going to land. If we are going to enforce these conventions we shall have to maintain a large army and navy. Why do we not begin at home by placing on the great lakes life-saving stations for some of our magnificent crews that are handling the great western crop in November and December? Let the government apply sanitary laws to the mining camps, for instance, the Hollinger and other mines in New Ontario where seventy men lost their lives recently, when we had to go to the United States to get sanitary devices and life-saving crews to rescue the survivors.

Let us not forget that we are part and parcel of the British Empire. Let the government co-operate with the provincial governments and the municipalities in matters of public sanitation and health instead of going off to the Dead sea, the Suez canal and all the countries that border on the seven seas. This sanitary convention is the most remarkable document that I have ever seen in my life and I do not think we should be called upon now to approve a convention set out in a document consisting of forty pages and which was formulated in 1926. The Liberal party held a great sanitary convention in the city of Ottawa and there were twelve pages of recommendations in their platform but not one of them was carried out. How many clauses of this particular sanitary convention, with the high-sounding names that are used to describe it, will ever be put into effect? I venture to say not one per cent of them. I have discussed this proposition with some of the ablest health officers in the country and they do not approve of what is being done. One of the most prominent health officers on this continent told me that it would be far better if Canada would continue in an educational way to work with the British board of trade, the British board of health, our sister dominions and the British Medical Association in matters of public health and sanitation. A great deal of good could be accomplished by educational means through the universities and hospital organizations of the country without our going to the seven seas of the world and signing conventions passed a few years ago.

I protest against this reckless waste of public money in sending all these large deputations over to this mythical League of Nations which is causing more trouble to the British Empire than any other agency I know of to-day. We are part and parcel of the British Empire, and it was a very sorrowful day for this country when we changed the status which had been good enough for Canada for nearly one hundred years, when we departed from that principle and started signing treaties as a separate country regarding Egypt, Persia, Russia and everything the League of Nations proposes to get up. Where will it all end? It is a nice way of spending money for some gentlemen to take a trip to the League of Nations, going via New York instead of patronizing our own ports. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) has criticized this convention somewhat and I agree with him that charity begins at home. If the members of this house will see that their own constituencies are properly regulated in regard to health matters, that will be much better for Canada than all these proposals in the convention. We can well leave these sanitary laws so far as the overseas part is concerned, to the British government, the British board of trade, the British Medical Association and the shipping companies who are beyond the control of this parliament.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to have had a word before the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) spoke, because what I have to say is rather in nature of a question. I quite agree that the procedure adopted by the government in this case is the correct one. It seems to me that parliament ought to ratify these conventions. I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) that the decisions and resolutions of the Imperial conference ought to have been brought and ought still to be brought before parliament. I think that was done this last year in South Africa in the case of some of the more important decisions reached at the Imperial conference.

In connection with this sanitary convention, I have wondered whether the labour conventions of the league were ever ratified by parliament. I cannot recall that this was the case and I should like to ask the Prime Minister: If not, why not? Why should we not ratify the labour conventions which I think are equally binding and perhaps of much more far-reaching importance than this sanitary convention? So far as I remember, parliament has not had an opportunity of making a declaration on the matter. Someone suggested to me that at that time we had not the status which we have now. I cannot see that that has anything to do with the matter because at that time we were signatory to the peace treaty and we were a member of the League of Nations. I will ask the government why we have not had the ratification by parliament of these other conventions?

Further than that, I am interested as to whether this is to be simply a sort of pious resolution, or whether what has been already suggested is really the case, that this resolution if passed will carry the implication that we are going to proceed to implement this convention. Is that clearly understood? Is it understood that if we pass this resolution to-day it means that the terms of this convention will be implemented by Canada? During the past seven years in which I have been a member of this house I have been trying from time to time to bring up the various clauses of the conventions and treaties which have been passed by the League of Nations, and almost invariably we are told, with regard to each matter, that this is not a matter over which the Dominion government has any jurisdiction whatever. We were so informed in regard to old age pensions; we were so informed in regard to unemployment; we were so informed in regard to the hours and conditions of labour. All these matters, we were told, under the British North America Act come under the jurisdiction of the provincial authorities. We have had before the house this session the question of sickness insurance, and there are those who suggest that this is a matter entirely within the jurisdiction of the provinces. So I would ask with regard to this sanitary convention, are we quite clear that the Dominion of Canada has jurisdiction; I am speaking now of the nation of Canada, not as a part of the British Empire, but in its relation to the several provinces which comprise this Dominion. In this country we seem to have a sort of divided sovereignty. My own contention all along has been that if Canada has the right to make treaties at all, Canada has the right to see that they are enforced; I cannot see that we are a nation otherwise.

In regard to this resolution then, irrespective of the contention that may be put forward by provincial authorities that some of these matters are entirely within the purview of the provinces, in spite of what has been said as to the provinces having control in the matter of certain civil rights and all the rest of it, if we endorse this convention, we should undertake to see that it is fully enforced, and that in the event of an outbreak of disease in any one province we shall have the machinery at hand to cope with it and take whatever steps may be necessary. I should like to have the assurance of the government that we are on safe ground, and that this is not merely the "rubber stamping," as someone has put it, of something that has been done by the League of Nations, but rather that we are solemnly entering upon the endorsation of this convention with the understanding that we are to implement it by definite legislation, and that never again will anyone here assert that this is beyond our powers.

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston): In the publication of this report I think the League of Nations has left itself open to a great deal of criticism. It is not that the articles in the so-called convention are not proper, but the fact is they are not agreed to. The protocol, in fact, is nothing but a summary of one nation after the other making reservations in regard to different articles of this convention. If you will look at the protocol you will see that Germany makes a reservation in regard to "observation", and that Brazil, Chili, the United States of America, and in fact nearly every country signs the articles of this convention with reservations. If we are going to have a convention to which no one is agreeing 100 per cent, what is the use of it? Read the articles one after the other, and you will see that the most important articles in this convention are accepted only with reservations by the different countries.

I wonder if the Prime Minister or the Minister of Health actually realizes what he is agreeing to in this convention. Article 14, for instance, reads:

> Governments undertake to maintain in their large ports and in their surroundings, and as far as possible in the other ports and their surroundings, sanitary services possessing an organization and equipment capable of carrying out the application of the prophylactic measures in regard to the diseases mentioned in this convention and especially the measures laid down in articles 6, 8 and 13.

If the Minister of Health were in the house, I would ask him what preparations he has made in this regard. What lies at the basis of all these articles is the compulsory notification of diseases, and there is not a country in which these diseases arise that has compulsory notification, and each country, one after the other, has signed this convention with reservations simply because they are not able to carry it out. We agree to prepare all our ports to deal with these diseases. Delousing, for instance; what preparations have we at our ports for carrying this out? I think we ought to be assured by the government whether or not they have made preparations to carry out the different articles of this convention—the different methods of preventing mosquitos from getting on boats, delousing, and all this kind of thing. It is worth while reading the different articles of this convention, because then you must come to the conclusion that somebody is making a monkey of us.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): It is quite evident to my mind that this legislation is like a lot of other legislation that the government introduce; they hardly know where it is going to stop. Certainly the government do not know what expenditure this will run the country into, for neither the Prime Minister nor the Minister of Justice has been able to give us the least idea what our financial obligations will be under this convention. It does seem to me that the government of the day has resorted to the method of sending a representative of this country almost any place on God's earth, with almost unlimited power, to commit the government of this country to any expenditure, and then come back here with an agreement to which the government says, "hear, hear," and then asks this parliament to ratify it. It is treating this parliament with a certain degree of contempt. A resolution of this kind comes along, and this house is asked to ratify it when the government can give us no information at all regarding it. I would ask the Prime Minister, where is this going to stop? Are the limits even on the American continent or are they in Europe? It is absolutely impossible to my mind even to estimate what our financial obligations will be under this convention.

Again, why should we undertake all these obligations? It is quite true, as the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) has pointed out, that some of these diseases are more or less common in this country, but the great bulk of them are not, and we are simply undertaking to police the world, so to speak, from a sanitary standpoint, to delouse the world, ships and everything else. We are simply asked to go forward blindfold and accept the responsibility of this undertaking. I do not know what powers were vested in Dr. Amyot when he went over there, but I certainly think they were much too wide when he comes back to this country with an obligation of this kind. I recall in 1920, when the present Prime Minister was then leader of the opposition, he wanted to restrict the Prime Minister of that day as to what he should and should not do at the Imperial conference. But the whole attitude of this government seems to have changed. Having come back from the Imperial conference, they do not even ask parliament to ratify what they have done. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) this afternoon argued that Mr. Lloyd George adopted a similar course when he was Prime Minister of Great Britain, and that consequently the parliament of Canada has no right to be consulted at all. I wonder what has caused this change of heart on the part of the government. Is it due to the fact that we are a member of the League of Nations?—which I quite realize does not bring any comfort to the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice. Why are we asked to undertake obligations so foreign to the needs of this country when our national needs are absolutely neglected?

I am sorry that the Minister of Health (Mr. King) is not in his seat, for I intended to put some questions to him. I intended to ask him what his department has done to rid this country of the grave narcotic evil. I have been trying to ascertain from the department, but I can get practically no information. And yet the narcotic habit, which every year is taking down thousands of our best citizens into an untimely grave or, what is worse, to debauchery, is increasing right under the very eyes of the Department of Health, but apparently they are oblivious to what is going on. I would say to the Prime Minister, if he wants my advice as a medical man, that he had better shake up his department, or it will discredit his government. Although the department has been in existence for some seven or eight years, I can say without fear of successful contradiction that it has done nothing to justify its creation; it is a dead letter throughout the country to-day so far as the preservation of the health of the nation is concerned. One of the specific purposes for which it was created was to deal with the soldier problem. What has it done in this respect? Practically nothing. It was also promised that there would be incorporated with it a department of scientific research—one of the most important branches of research under God's heaven in any government or any land. But what has it done? It has not even started to organize yet. To-day I do not believe that the Department of Health is doing anything more, or doing it any better, than heretofore was done by other departments of government. It seems to me that we have to go far afield, to undertake obligations which may be far-reaching financially and otherwise, in order to give the department an excuse for existence.

Many extraneous subjects have been brought into this discussion. The Minister of Justice introduced the Locarno treaty, and also our status as one of the partners in the Britannic commonwealth of nations. He said he was equal to defending our position there; which is quite correct. But ask him what this country is doing to-day to help shoulder the burdens of empire now carried almost entirely by Great Britain, and there is no response. It is true that we are availing ourselves of all the protection accorded us by the Imperial authorities. Our complacent attitude in this respect always puts me in mind of the boy who has grown to manhood and still lives on his old father. That is what Canada is doing in relation to the mother country. In my opinion the time has arrived when we should shoulder our share of the necessary expense of the empire from which we are drawing very substantial benefits.

I also think that we might have participated in the Locarno treaty. I do not lay down the doctrine that we should bear any responsibilities where we are not consulted; but if Canada is in earnest in trying to preserve the peace of the world, we should do everything in our power to that end. As I said the other day, I think the Locarno treaty, if properly carried out, will do more to preserve world peace than anything that has been accomplished in the last four or five years. I recognize that we were not represented at Locarno, but I think we might have been. With Germany, France and Great Britain guaranteeing the European boundaries both east and west —Great Britain did not guarantee the eastern boundary; she said she could not be the policeman of the world, but she was willing to do so as far as she could. But to my mind the important feature of that treaty was that Germany herself guaranteed to protect those boundaries both east and west; and if she did that there could be no war between the nations concerned at least. I think if the spirit of Locarno had been carried out, if Great Britain, France and Germany had signed that treaty, it would have done more to preserve peace in Europe than anything else imaginable.

As a member of this house I object to undertaking obligations concerning which we know so little. We have not even been given an estimate of what this convention is going to cost Canada, or how far we shall be involved. I wonder if this convention is similar to the treaty we signed with Hungary and Turkey. When our accredited representatives signed that treaty, and this house on the motion of the present Prime Minister endorsed it, and we were asked to say if we were going to stand by it, the government said we didn't know whether we were or not. Are all of our international agreements to be treated in that way? Here is a convention with certain reservations. How far are we involved; where are we going to stop? It does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that the time is come when we must consider the revenues of this country as something not akin to an artesian well; we must recognize that there is a limit to the amount of taxation which we can collect, and I for one protest strongly against these unnecessary expenditures while our taxation is as high as it is to-day.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to participate in this discussion. That it has wandered very far afield from the motion upon the order paper is quite apparent, and I think this is attributable to the explanations made by the Prime Minister as to how treaties should, might, could or would be signed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was in reply to a question.

Mr. BENNETT: It may be that the right hon. gentleman is correct in saying that a portion of his answer was attributable to the question asked; but the fact is that we have taken about two hours to deal with matters extraneous to the subject matter under discussion. The motion before the house is to approve of a convention entered into between certain countries at Geneva—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: At Paris.

Mr. BENNETT: At Paris; an international sanitary convention. My own personal view is that Canada would have been well-advised not to have touched the convention. I say that for this reason. We have here a federal union—the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) touched upon the point—and the provinces are charged with the responsibility of public health, except where the Dominion deals with it by reason of sea ports or the international boundaries between us and United States. But even in the latter case, where health is concerned it has been the contention of the federal power that the provinces must be responsible for stamping out any epidemic within the provincial area. This convention is made between governments; the federal government of Canada, as a member of the League of Nations, is entering into a convention with other nations of the world. Clearly when Canada undertakes to do certain things with respect to certain diseases, as to which under the constitution the provinces only have jurisdiction, this Dominion cannot exercise any power. The mere fact that the federal government signs a convention does not enable it to transgress the constitution of the country. This convention confers no constitutional powers upon the federal government. The government's powers are just as they were before, and each of the provinces may be affected by outbreaks of the disease of smallpox, as mentioned. What power has this parliament to deal with smallpox? What power has this parliament ever exercised with respect to outbreaks of that disease? The provinces and the provinces only are concerned with the question of smallpox, and if an epidemic of smallpox should break out in Quebec or in Alberta the province of Quebec or the province of Alberta, as the case may be, must deal with it. The Dominion can do nothing at all in the matter. What is more, neither this parliament nor this government has the right under the constitution to impose upon any provincial government the necessity of making any return to the Minister of Health that sits yonder.

Had I been asked whether or not in my opinion we should become a party to the convention, I would have said, Certainly not. What purpose does it serve? I do fear—and I put this to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King)—that we in this country are beginning to think that because Canada is a member of the League of Nations it makes us appear to be important in the eyes of the world if we sign conventions and treaties. I regret to say this, but there is marked evidence of it. There is a jaunt across the water to Geneva. It is a lovely place and a delightful time is had. This country pays the expenses. There is excellent food on the ship and excellent provision is made for entertainment in Geneva and elsewhere. And then you must do something; you must sign a convention.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does my hon. friend suggest that we should have no representation in the League of Nations?

Mr. BENNETT: Not in the least.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Then why criticize the food?

Mr. BENNETT: I said the food was excellent; I did not criticize it. All these entertainments are admirable, but in many instances they are holidays for those who participate in them. I do not say that it was a holiday for the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) when he went over in connection with the question of naval disarmament—in respect of which, by the way, he has not yet given a report to the house. That, I suspect, was not a holiday for him. But it has been a holiday for some of our representatives who have gone there. And, what is more, they were unable to participate in the proceedings of the League of Nations to the same extent as my hon. friend has done because of their lack of understanding and of appreciation of all that transpired.

Now here is a convention we are asked to approve. The ratification of a convention is, of course, as the Minister of Justice has said, a prerogative of the crown. The crown acts on the advice of its ministers, and in this instance the ministers from Canada will advise the crown that the convention is a sound one in which Canada concurs, if the Canadian parliament, comprising both the Commons and the Senate, approves of it. I wholly agree that it is desirable—indeed, I have always so held—that both the Commons and the Senate of parliament should be asked to approve of conventions or treaties that carry international implications or responsibilities. That, I think, is clear. When we are asked, as the Commons house of parliament, to give our approval to this convention, I submit that it is abundantly clear that we should not seek to commit the Dominion to do something with respect to the provinces which the Dominion has no constitutional jurisdiction to do. And clearly that is what is implied here; there is no escaping that conclusion if this means what it says. For that reason therefore, I would have said, with respect to a matter of this kind, "We are entirely of the opinion that there is no necessity for us to become a party to this convention". That, I suggest, would have been the proper attitude for the Canadian representatives to have taken. I repeat, I see in all the proceedings of the League of Nations, so far as this country is concerned, an increasing evidence as the days go by of a desire on our part to find a place in the sun by signing conventions and treaties, thus suggesting that we have become a very important people. Importance in the world is not measured, I submit, in any such manner.

I go a step further. Some discussion has arisen with respect to the League of Nations. What is the League of Nations? The League of Nations is a covenant between various peoples that they will do certain things named in that covenant. Each of the contracting parties has incurred obligations, one of which is to enforce sanctions in the event of any member of the league violating the provisions of the covenant. That involves economic sanctions and, if necessary, military sanctions as well. The Canadian people, then, have obligated themselves if necessary, so far as the League of Nations is concerned, to become parties with other nations to the enforcement of economic and, if needs be, of military pressure to carry out the will of the league.

Now what is the difference between the League of Nations and the British commonwealth of nations? The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has been speaking in terms of war. The League of Nations involves in its very essence the exercise of military power, if needs be, for the purpose of giving effect to its will as against a transgressing member. That is all that can be said regarding it. The British commonwealth of nations is made up of a very large number of self-governing communities as well as of crown colonies and mandated territories in various portions of the world's area, embracing a quarter of it altogether. It is perfectly true that when Great Britain goes to war this country is also at war. It is equally true that this country need not participate in any such war unless this parliament sanctions our participation. That is clear. We have provided that by statute.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. gentleman considers, then, that the statement made in South Africa recently is not well founded?

Mr. BENNETT: I do not believe that any lawyer thinks for a moment that it is well founded. With all deference to Mr. Hertzog, who is an eminent lawyer—as I think the Minister of Justice will agree—it is not possible for any portion of the empire to be neutral while the empire is at war. That is clear. If, however, his meaning was that any part of the empire comprising a self-governing dominion need not participate in that war, the statement is correct, inasmuch as it is for the parliament of that self-governing dominion to determine what action shall be taken. I do not think there can be much doubt about that in the light of all that has been written on the question and with which we are familiar. There can be no doubt about it in view of the statements that are made from time to time, not only by British but by Canadian statesmen as well, notably by the great leader of the Liberal party, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, that when Great Britain was at war Canada was at war. That was the position taken by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and it cannot be successfully disputed.

The position, then, with respect to the League of Nations and the British commonwealth of nations, is not wholly analogous. We have become parties to the League of Nations by a covenant which we have signed. A covenant is an agreement under seal. We have incurred certain obligations under the League of Nations and in the event of transgression on the part of any member that has signed the covenant, that member may be brought to book by the concerted effort of all the other signatory members including Canada, with economic sanctions and military power if needs be.

On the other hand, the British commonwealth of nations is a group of self-governing countries, including Great Britain; and under our system of government—under the system that has evolved through time and under which we now live—if Great Britain goes to war we are at war. But we are not compelled, as we are under the covenant of the League of Nations, to make contribution either of a dollar or of a man except in so far as we may decide to do so. This parliament having given its sanction to the covenant of the League of Nations, we are bound by that covenant—whatever we may think of it—to give effect to any decision it may arrive at for the purpose of enforcing its will against a transgressing member.

This convention is alleged to have for its object the preservation of peace, and that enables one to make some reference to the Locarno treaty. That also was intended to preserve peace, but this government thought it undesirable to be a party to that treaty. It will be recalled, with reference to the policy of Locarno, that the report of the Imperial conference of 1926 contained these words:

> It then became clear that, from the standpoint of all the dominions and of India, there was complete approval of the manner in which the negotiations had been conducted and brought to so successful a conclusion. Our final and unanimous conclusion was to recommend to the conference the adoption of the following resolution:
> "The conference has heard with satisfaction the statement of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs with regard to the efforts made to ensure peace in Europe, culminating in the agreements of Locarno; and congratulates His Majesty's government in Great Britain on its share in this successful contribution towards the promotion of the peace of the world."

I do not think any person unacquainted with the subleties of mind of hon. gentlemen opposite would conclude anything but that this parliament had given its approval, or at least that the government had given its approval, to the Locarno treaty; because when you find a gentleman saying that it is clear from the standpoint of all the dominions and of India that there has been complete approval of the manner in which the negotiations have been conducted and brought to a successful conclusion, followed by congratulations for the results obtained, it shows, as the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) remarked, a desire to make it plain that there is complete unanimity on the part of Australia, New Zealand, Canada and South Africa as to the Locarno treaty. That is the attitude it is desired to express in England, while in Canada they wish to make it appear that they will not make any promises which will involve this country in anything beyond the three mile limit.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I said then exactly what I have said this afternoon.

Mr. BENNETT: Then my friend must have voted the other way.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No. This is not a resolution which was proposed; it is merely a congratulation to Sir Austen Chamberlain.

Mr. CAHAN: It is a unanimous report.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He has been receiving congratulations from all over the world.

Mr. BENNETT: There is nothing here to indicate that in the final and unanimous conclusion at which the conference arrived the Minister of Justice spoke one way and voted the other.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, I am not in the habit of doing that.

Mr. BENNETT: I am only reading it as it appears here; it says it was unanimous.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Surely this is unanimous.

Mr. BENNETT: It recommended to the conference the adoption of the resolution, preceded by the statement that it became clear from the standpoint of all the dominions and of India that there was complete approval of the manner in which the negotiations had been conducted and brought to a successful conclusion.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am glad to hear what my hon. friend has to say; it will be submitted on another occasion in order to show our friends in England how our actions are interpreted by hon. gentlemen here.

Mr. BENNETT: Far be it from me to place upon the conduct of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice any meaning other than that which he intended, but I only read from the report, which is said to be unanimous. Although the hon. gentleman says he took the position there which he has taken here, I can only say that he must have voted differently from the way in which he spoke, because he could not have spoken as he did this afternoon and arrived at this conclusion without indeed a great feat of mental gymnastics of which I think him hardly capable.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am happy to follow my hon. friend's example.

Mr. BENNETT: I am so delighted to have the Minister of Justice follow my example in anything; it indicates a modesty on his part which I had scarcely expected.

There is just one other matter I would like to mention, arising not out of this debate but rather from the answer made by the Prime Minister to a question asked by my friend from St. Lawrence-St. George. The question was this: Is this part of the public law of Canada when the convention has been approved by parliament and ratified by His Majesty? That question has not yet been answered. With his usual attitude of mind, when he was asked that question the Prime Minister immediately launched into an exposition of the signing of treaties, and avoided a direct reply. That is the position, and that is how this debate has been precipitated. The question was very simple; it was simply whether or not this became part of the public law of Canada after its approval and ratification, and it was answered by a long address on how treaties have been and will now be signed.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My friend is not serious; he knows that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George started the debate on the treaties when he mentioned Locarno and everything else. I merely followed his remarks.

Mr. BENNETT: But the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George only did that after the Prime Minister had made this exposition as to how treaties should be signed. The question put to the Prime Minister was whether this was part of the public law of the country, and that question still remains unanswered.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My friend knows the answer; it is the simplest thing possible, and the answer is obvious.

Mr. BENNETT: What is it?

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend knows very well that if this house approves of this convention and it is ratified, the convention will be binding upon Canada. If there is need of statutes or legislation, the house will be called upon to pass that legislation.

Mr. BENNETT: I am so delighted to have the Minister of Justice answer the question.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am pleased to delight my hon. friend in this respect.

Mr. BENNETT: I wonder if the minister realizes just what he has said? To carry into effect what he has just said involves an amendment to the British North America Act; that is all.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is so easy to amend the British North America Act, according to my hon. friends. We will amend it.

Mr. BENNETT: We will?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes. You say it is the easiest thing in the world to do that.

Mr. BENNETT: May I ask the hon. gentleman who said that?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, hon. gentlemen opposite say so all the time?

Mr. BENNETT: Would my hon. friend name the member who said that?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will.

Mr. BENNETT: Will he do it now?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It has been stated in this house.

Mr. BENNETT: Please name the member now.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The answer is not here at the moment.

Mr. BENNETT: The answer is what?

Mr. LAPOINTE: If my hon. friend wishes to debate this matter I shall be pleased to join him at any time, here or elsewhere.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman is very valiant, but will he answer the question?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not necesarily valiant to meet my hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: No, not valiant; it is an easy thing for him to meet the member for West Calgary, but I suggest that my hon. friend answer the question. Who has said that it is an easy thing to amend the British North America Act?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will have to consult Hansard.

Mr. BENNETT: Then the hon. gentleman has no particular person in mind? In other words that was a bald statement supported by no authority. I have not heard anyone say in this house that it is an easy thing to amend the British North America Act. That is a constitutional contract between four provinces, providing for the addition of other provinces, and being a constitutional contract it cannot be easily amended without the consent of the contracting parties. As far as I have heard, no one has made the suggestion in Canada that it is an easy thing to secure the consent of the contracting parties. However, now we have the answer of the Minister of Justice that this convention, when approved by this parliament and ratified by the sovereign, will become a part of the public law of Canada, binding this country and imposing upon our people the necessity of passing such legislation as may be necessary to give effect to it, if need be. I point out to him that that involves changes in the constitution of Canada, because it places upon this parliament a power which parliament cannot exercise, having regard to the constitutional provisions of the British North America Act which confer those powers upon the provinces and not upon the Dominion. Let there be no misunderstanding about this question to which the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George vainly sought an answer, and which is now answered by the Minister of Justice. Does the Prime Minister wish to ask a question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was going to say to my hon. friend that I think he is entirely wrong on that point, and I would like to give him my reasons later.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not know that it rests with me to give my right hon. friend permission to do that. The rules of the house are there and I cannot change them. As far as I am concerned, if the right hon. gentleman has the right to speak he can do so, and if he has not that right he should not speak. Unfortunately I cannot add to that or take away from it. However, I cannot be wrong with respect to this; under our constitution, if we were to have an outbreak of smallpox, an epidemic, in one of the western provinces, the obligation rests with the provincial rather than with the Dominion government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will read the convention he will see that he is entirely wrong in believing that the provincial authorities have that obligation; under the exclusive jurisdiction given this parliament, we have to deal with matters of quarantine, navigation and the like, and those are the matters primarily referred to in this convention.

Mr. BENNETT: I was very anxious to satisfy myself on that point, and the Prime Minister is quite correct in drawing attention to the fact that this parliament has power only to deal with questions of quarantine and with ships and shipping. But the convention deals with cars and railways passing international boundaries. I will turn up the section if my friend desires; it deals with crossings between the United States and Canada, and under those circumstances there is no jurisdiction on the part of this parliament to deal with an epidemic of smallpox in Alberta. They may deal with the trains and with the passage of the trains, but they have no power to compel the province of Alberta to make any report to this Dominion in respect to an outbreak of smallpox; and until you amend the constitution you will have no power to do that, because matters of health rest wholly with the local authorities, as we have found out in times past in appeals on these very matters. The minister may sit here and make suggestions, but the provinces need not act upon them. This is not a matter on which the Dominion has concurrent powers. It has exclusive powers of quarantine, but this parliament has no power over a province in respect to smallpox.

Mr. CANNON: May I ask a question? Would not this parliament have power to deal with the matter to prevent the spread of smallpox from one province into another?

Mr. BENNETT: The courts have held to the contrary. That is the reason this parliament had no authority to deal with the epidemic of typhoid in Montreal and prevent it from spreading into Ontario, beyond the questions which I have pointed out, subject to the reservation as to the passing of interprovincial trains, et cetera, where the Dominion would have power to deal with this matter. There will come an opportunity later to discuss the question as to the powers of those who represent Canada either at Tokyo or at Washington or elsewhere; but the statement made by the hon. member from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) is a very careful and accurate statement of the situation. He had not his notes before him at the time but they are now in my hand, and the letter of Sir Esme Howard to the Secretary of State of the United States, dated June 24th, 1924, says:

> The handling of matters at Washington exclusively relating to the Irish Free State should be confided to a minister plenipotentiary accredited to the United States government.

And that the Irish minister—

> —would be furnished with credentials which would enable him to take charge of all affairs relating only to the Irish Free State. He would be the ordinary channel of communication with the United States government on these matters. Matters which are of imperial concern or which affect other dominions in the commonwealth in common with the Irish Free State will continue to be handled as heretofore by this embassy.

The arrangements proposed by His Majesty's government would not denote any departure from the principle of the diplomatic unity of the empire. The Irish minister would be at all times in the closest touch with His Majesty's ambassador, and any question which might arise as to whether a matter comes within the category of those to be handled by the Irish minister or not would be settled by consultation between them. In matters falling within his sphere the Irish minister would not be subject to the control of His Majesty's ambassador, nor would His Majesty's ambassador be responsible for the Irish minister's action.

I have been instructed to expess the hope that the United States government will concur in the appointment of an Irish Free State minister at Washington on the footing I have indicated above.

The United States Secretary of State in replying on June 28, 1924, notes that the Irish minister will have "the handling of matters at Washington exclusively relating to the Irish Free State", and that he will "take charge of all matters relating only to the Irish Free State." On December 7th, 1926, when the Hon. Mr. Massey was appointed, a question arose as to what his powers were, and his letter of credence issued on the day of his appointment shows that he was appointed "with the especial object of representing in the United States of America the interests of our Dominion of Canada." And when the Right Hon. Mr. Amery was questioned in the House of Commons as to the functions of the Canadian minister at Washington, he replied:

I would invite reference to statement of the Secretary of State, June 26, 1924, on the occasion of the appointment of the Irish Free State minister to Washington. The position is similar in the case of the Canadian minister.

As to the powers of a Canadian minister in matters of the kind to which the Prime Minister has referred, and which have been mentioned by my friend, it is quite clear that they deal only with matters which affect Canada. Nothing better illustrates possibly the necessity of a clearer appreciation and understanding of any convention that is submitted to parliament than just what has taken place this afternoon. There are involved provincial rights; there are involved vast expenditures of public moneys, if this convention is approved. The ratification of it by necessary legislation will involve the amendment of the constitution of the country itself. It is necessary that those who represent us at the League of Nations should be advised that in matters such as this it is inadvisable that Canada should participate, because of our federal constitution, and due to our peculiar position, differing from Australia and New Zealand, in relation to the United States to the south of us. And if we follow the course which prudence would dictate and the law which governs in such a matter, we should not be a party to this convention; for certainly the reservations which are mentioned in this protocol do not cover, in my judgment, the point which should be covered if we are to avoid being charged with bad faith in the future, because it affects provincial rights in respect of which this parliament has no control.

Mr. SPEAKER: This will close the debate if the right hon. the Prime Minister speaks.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in my opinion my hon. friend is not correct when he says this convention should not have been brought before this house for approval because the obligations it implies are obligations which primarily are of a character to be borne by the provinces, and that the subject matter is one which relates to provincial rather than to federal jurisdiction.

My hon. friend is familiar with the British North America Act, section 91, dealing with the exclusive rights of legislation. Clauses 10 and 11 cover the exclusive rights of the federal parliament to deal with navigation and shipping, quarantine and the establishment and maintenance of marine hospitals. My hon. friend has spoken of smallpox as a communicable disease, and has given as his reason why this parliament should not deal with this question, that the control of smallpox is a matter which comes and can only come under the jurisdiction of provincial authorities. If my hon. friend had read the convention carefully, he would have seen that it refers specifically and at length to smallpox, and I am going to read the entire section to the house, because it deals specifically with the danger of the spread of smallpox by infected ships, and with that only in this connection.

Mr. BENNETT: Article I of section I, in the first chapter, provides that:

Every government must immediately notify to the other governments and, at the same time, to the Office International d'Hygiene Publique.
(3) the existence of an epidemic of typhus or of smallpox.

It has nothing to do with navigation at all. You have no authority, and you have not the knowledge.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me read Article 42, which is under the subhead "smallpox", and which is really the important section dealing with smallpox:

Ships which have had, or have a case of smallpox on board either during the voyage, or at the time of arrival, may be subjected to the following measures:

(1) Medical inspection.

(2) The sick shall immediately be disembarked and isolated.

(3) Other persons reasonably suspected to have been exposed to infection on board, and who, in the opinion of the sanitary authority, or by a previous attack of smallpox, may be subjected to vaccination, are not sufficiently protected by recent vaccination, or to surveillance, or to vaccination, followed by surveillance, the period of surveillance being specified according to the circumstances, but in any event not exceeding fourteen days reckoned from the date of arrival of the ship.

(4) Bedding which has been used, soiled linen, wearing apparel, and other articles which the sanitary authority of the port considers to have been recently infected, shall be disinfected.

(5) Only the parts of the ship which have been occupied by persons ill with smallpox and which the sanitary authority regards as infected, shall be disinfected.

The ship shall immediately be given free pratique.

It rests with each government to take, after disembarkation, the measures which it considers appropriate to ensure the surveillance of persons who are not protected by vaccination, and who arrive on a ship which has had no case of smallpox on board, but who have left an area where smallpox is epidemic within the previous fourteen days.

Article 43.—It is recommended that when ships call in countries where smallpox is epidemic, all precautions possible should be taken to secure the vaccination or revaccination of the crew.

It is also recommended that governments should make vaccination and revaccination as general as possible, especially in ports and in areas near frontiers.

Mr. BENNETT: Over which parliament has no jurisdiction and the provincial authorities have.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not interrupt my hon. friend. It must be clear to hon. members that the great purpose of this convention is to deal with diseases that are communicable through agencies of transportation and particularly agencies of transportation overseas. It is to prevent plagues and other communicable diseases from spreading from one country to another. Practically all of the sections relate to different diseases which may be carried from one place to another by infected ships. They are such diseases as the bubonic plague, smallpox, typhus, cholera and the like. Those are all referred to in the section.

Mr. CAHAN: Are the quotations which the Prime Minister has made not all under section 4 on page 8, "measures at marine ports and frontiers," while the other sections apply to other than marine ports and frontiers?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The sections which I have quoted are all sections which apply to this country under this convention, and it is only the federal government which can take action on these matters of inspection at ports in the manner which the convention describes.

Mr. BENNETT: But section 6 deals with the land frontiers between the United States and Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would again submit that we have a federal Department of Health which was instituted for the very purpose of dealing with these matters of health that are likely to be of concern to the entire Dominion and every province would have a right to expect that the Dominion would co-operate with it in every possible way to prevent the spread of diseases of the character in question. May I say that when one takes into consideration the trade of Canada, expanding as it is towards all ports of the world, and the fact that this treaty is signed by such countries as Japan, China, India, there is the strongest of reasons why we in this parliament should be anxious to become a party to a convention of this kind. It places obligations upon those oriental countries immediately to notify other countries that are parties to the convention of any outbreak of disease which may occur in their ports and which may be communicated in the course of transit of a ship from one part of the world to another. If it were for no other reason than that of protecting our own people from disease this convention should be welcomed by this parliament.

My attention has just been drawn to section 132 of the British North America Act which provides:

> The parliament and government of Canada shall have all powers necessary or proper for performing the obligations of Canada or of any province thereof, as part of the British Empire, towards foreign countries arising under treaties between the empire and such foreign countries.

Mr. BENNETT: That does not cover this.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend might there say that we have again a question of interpretation of what is and what is not the British Empire. I hope he will be able to see that under that clause the last vestige of his argument fades away.

Mr. BENNETT: It has no relevancy to this.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With respect to the advisability and desirability of this country associating itself with other countries, particularly those countries with which it is trading, in an endeavour to prevent the spread of such frightful national plagues as cholera, smallpox, typhus and the like may I say a further word. If there were not even an advantage to Canada itself, there is I think an obligation upon our Dominion as a country to co-operate with other countries of the world in a humanitarian endeavour of this kind. Much has been said about furthering movements that will make for peace. The other evening we had a long discussion of that subject and on the importance of cultivating the international mind as a means of bringing about a better understanding between nations. I do not agree with the leader of the opposition when he says that Canada should not be represented at these national conferences. I think as a nation we should take our share with the other nations of the world in helping to further those movements which make for greater international security and greater international goodwill.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that Canada should not be represented at an international gathering.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But that was the inference I gathered, or perhaps it was from remarks that were made by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) who took rather strongly the position that in some of these matters we should not be represented.

Mr. McGIBBON: I beg the Prime Minister's pardon. I took no such position.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will come back then to the leader of the opposition who I think did use words to the effect that, because Canada was a member of the League of Nations, she was taking herself very seriously and felt that as a nation she should participate in all these national conventions and sign them.

Mr. BENNETT: I said that it was our duty to attend once we became a member, but I said that there was no reason why, to make ourselves great, we should sign conventions; that was not a test of our greatness.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This convention relates to the important matter of disease in which this country is vitally interested. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) spoke about contradictory attitudes, but I think his own speech betrayed his own contradictory attitude, because the first part of it denounced us for assuming obligations and the latter part of it reprimanded us because we were trying under a special clause to evade some of the obligations.

Apart, however, from any of the particular points of discussion, viewing generally and broadly the wisdom of inviting parliament to consider the approval of treaties, might I say this further word in conclusion in regard to the matter of bringing conventions and treaties to this parliament for approval. I submit that the day has passed when any government or executive should feel that they should take it upon themselves without the approval of parliament, to commit a country to obligations involving any considerable financial outlays or active undertakings. In all cases where obligations of such a character are being assumed internationally, parliament itself should be assured of having the full right of approving what is done before binding commitments are made. I would not confine parliamentary approval only to those matters which involve military sanctions and the like. I feel parliamentary approval should apply where there are involved matters of large expenditure or political considerations of a far-reaching character. As the Minister of Justice has said, a better example could not be given than that with respect to a possible treaty between the United States and Canada on the St. Lawrence waterway development. This government, should it be in office at the time that a treaty of the kind is being negotiated, has always had the intention of submitting it to parliament and of having it understood in advance that all negotiations involved the submission to parliament of any such treaty. It should now be understood that approval by parliament will be expected and necessary before that treaty, if it ever should come into being, would in any way bind this country. I say that this is a wise doctrine to follow in regard to all treaties irrespective of their particular character wherever they involve large national obligations.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I wonder if the Prime Minister would give information on the point I raised as to whether the federal authorities feel they have jurisdiction in a matter of this kind to bring forward legislation implementing this convention, and that there will be no difficulties with regard to the provincial authorities.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, I think the government has full authority for all it has agreed to.

Motion agreed to, on division.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a message be sent to the senate, informing Their Honours that this house has adopted the above resolution and requesting that Their Honours will unite with this house in the approval of the above mentioned convention, and that the Clerk do carry the said message to the senate;

And that this house do approve of same.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. CANNON

On the orders of the day:

Hon. LUCIEN CANNON (Solicitor General): I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I direct your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that it is now six o'clock, because I shall have something to say in regard to the matter the hon. gentleman is now raising.

Mr. CANNON: On April the 10th the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) raised a question of privilege in connection with the release of one Baldy Robb, and his statement is to be found in Hansard at pages 1872 and 1873. I do not wish to re-open the debate, and I reiterate that such matters should not be discussed in the house.

In the course of his remarks the hon. member for West Calgary stated:

I had no communication with the Solicitor General with respect to this matter. I made no recommendations of any kind regarding the release of this convicted criminal; I left the responsibility where it belonged.

My hon. friend's memory is not accurate. He did have communications with me on two different occasions—

Mr. BENNETT: That is untrue.

Mr. CANNON:—once in Ottawa and once in Montreal, and moreover his interview with the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) was reported to me by the latter. I wish to declare now, as I did on March 29th last, that the hon. member's action in this matter does not cast any reflection upon his character as a public man or as a private citizen, but was dictated by a high sense of duty.

Mr. SPEAKER: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: Just what I thought, an absolutely untrue statement.

Mr. CANNON: If my hon. friend wants to make a statement he can make it; I will be here.

Mr. BENNETT: He is going to; don't you worry.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. BENNETT

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on the 29th of March I was absent from the house—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. BENNETT: I find it difficult to speak much louder, my throat being somewhat sore. On that occasion a statement was made with respect to Baldy Robb during the course of a discussion, and the member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) was warned by the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) that the leader of the opposition—referring to myself—would be able to give certain information as to the release of Baldy Robb. I leave it to this house to imagine what would have been the effect of that "warning" had the matter been left just as it then was.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is a question of privilege?

Mr. BENNETT: Surely. But fortunately the member for Fort William (Mr. Manion), followed the matter up and the Solicitor General then made certain other observations. In his statement to-day he says that he repeated what he had said on the previous occasion, that there was no reflection on the leader of the opposition as a public man. Let me quote his words:

—that the hon. member's action in this matter does not cast any reflection upon his character as a public man or as a private citizen, but was dictated by a high sense of duty.

Why there should have been any necessity on the part of the Solicitor General to give his so-called warning in respect of such action I am unable to say. Last Tuesday I gave an explanation in respect of the matter, and yesterday the Solicitor General told me that he had read it. He added that he had had a conversation with me once in Mr. Robb's office when we were discussing pension matters and on another occasion in the Windsor hotel in Montreal in reference to Baldy Robb. To-day he sent me a copy of the statement he proposed to make, and I despatched a note to him stating that surely he did not desire to say that I had had any communication with him as to this man. I was very careful in the statement I made to the house on Tuesday to use the word "communication", because last session there was a great deal of discussion about Baldy Robb and considerable levity throughout the house in connection with the case, and I could not be certain whether or not I had had any conversation with any particular person in respect to it. Fortunately I find that on February 15, 1927, when speaking on the Athabaska election inquiry, I made reference to the matter and stated my position. I said that the man was not entitled to a ticket of leave, that the Minister of the Interior had made certain statements, and that while I could quite understand that he sympathized with the accused in the matter and had mentioned it to the Solicitor General, in the end the law officers of the crown must accept responsibility for whatever action they might take. I continued—and I am quoting from page 309 of last year's Hansard:

I remember distinctly the case of Baldy Robb and two others being spoken to during the fall. I recall an expression of my own opinion with respect to the matter to the effect that it was important that an example be made. It is far more important—this is the attitude I took—that the law should be vindicated, though not vindictively, and that its majesty be upheld than that feelings of sympathy should prevail in relation to any individual. We have all experienced those things; every man in public life knows that he has to make the choice between sympathy and public duty. His sympathies naturally impel him to do what the hon. member from Athabaska (Mr. Kellner) rose in his place to-day and so admirably stated—"I signed a petition for the parole of these two prisoners, for the reason that my sympathy found expression in the act". That was done to change and mould the opinion of the Solicitor General and of the Minister of Justice favourably towards the request. But as a public servant, owing a duty to the public, it is not open to any public man occupying a position of trust to sign any petition for the release of any prisoner under a system of ticket-of-leave.

When yesterday the Solicitor General reminded me that he had had a conversation with me in the office of the Minister of Finance on an occasion when we were dealing with the pension bill and certain amendments which I desired to move to it, which the Minister of Health (Mr. King), the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) and he himself were considering, I turned up the journals of the house and found that the third reading of the bill was discussed on April 13, 1927. I have no recollection of that conversation; but I do not say for a moment that a casual conversation with respect to Baldy Robb did not take place during that discussion. Nor do I say, although I have no memory of it, that the Solicitor General and I may not have spoken about the case in the Windsor hotel at Montreal. But I do not regard that, nor do I think would any hon. member, as a communication made to the Solicitor General with regard to leniency to be extended to Baldy Robb. However, I did state very distinctly in the house on Tuesday, in order that there might be no misapprehension, that I had said to the Minister of the Interior—to the Minister of the Interior, mark you—that I did not propose to criticize the action of the government if they released Baldy Robb. I never desire to escape responsibility for anything I have said. I gave the minister my reasons, although just prior to that I was under the impression that Baldy Robb was out on ticket of leave, and had so read in the newspapers.

The Solicitor General stated in the house this afternoon:

My friend's memory is not accurate. He did have communication with me on two different occasions, once in Ottawa and once in Montreal,—

I object to his language. I am not going to say whether there were any conversations or not. If there were, they were casual conversations, not communications. I had no interview with him in regard to the case, nor did I discuss it with any member of the government save the Minister of the Interior. The Minister of the Interior bore me out in that last Tuesday. I repeat, he is the only one with whom I had any discussion on the subject.

Since recess I understand that the word "communication" is used by the Solicitor General and other lawyers in the province of Quebec in the sense of conversation.

Mr. POWER: It is used that way in the dictionary.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so; but we do not use it in that way. In my statement on Tuesday I referred to my "communications" with the minister, and then I added that I "stated" to the Minister of the Interior so and so. That is the distinction I was drawing at the moment. I went further; I said:

I made no recommendations of any kind regarding the release of this convicted criminal; I left the responsibility where it belonged. I did state, however, that I would not criticize any action that might be taken in the circumstances by the law officers of the crown.

That is, I made no recommendations involving my placing communications on the files of the department with respect to Baldy Robb, and I could not do so after the speech

I had made in the house in February last year. Had the Solicitor General used the word "conversation"—and I think he might have done so—instead of "communication" I would have no objection to the statement that he has made; I am not prepared to challenge him when he says that he had a conversation with me, if that term is to be applied to casual observations about Baldy Robb, for I fancy there are at least twenty-five or thirty hon. members who last session had conversations with respect to Baldy Robb. In fact the case was treated with considerable levity and there was a good deal of joking as to when he would get out of the penitentiary. When it was announced in the papers that the convict had been released, I thought he was at liberty up to the time when the Minister of the Interior in his office told me that this was not so.

Once more, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I had no communications with the Department of Justice with respect to this man, and that I made no recommendations. If the casual conversations that took place between not only the Minister of the Interior and myself but with dozens of other hon. members with respect to Baldy Robb are to be termed "communications", then the Solicitor General's statement is correct; but those casual conversations were not so treated by me, and in my observations last Tuesday I was very careful to draw a distinction between what I regard as a communication and the statement which I said I made to the Minister of the Interior. I have no apologies to offer for my attitude in this case first, last and all the time, but I do resent keenly the covert suggestion that there was something wrong about my action, that the member for West York had to be warned, when the "warning" turned out to be nothing more than that I had done my duty as a public servant, that in fact there was no reflection on me one way or the other. I do not think that that was the intention of the so-called warning, and for that reason I have risen to vindicate myself. I resent most strongly the suggestion that I had communication with members of the government for the purpose of securing the release of Baldy Robb. As the Minister of the Interior very frankly and very honestly said on Tuesday, I left that responsibility where it belonged. I told him that I was perfectly willing not to criticize any action the government might take upon a proper realization of the circumstances, that is, that they should be governed by the opinion of the judge and the warden of the penitentiary.

Hon. LUCIEN CANNON (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege, I wish first to congratulate my hon. friend on the tone which he has adopted this evening. It is a welcome change from the attitude which he took at recess. As to the word "communication", in justification of myself I may say that before using the word I was careful to look it up in the dictionary.

Mr. BENNETT: That makes it worse.

Mr. CANNON: And this is what the word "communication" means — Murray's New English Dictionary, volume two, page 700:

> Communication: the imparting, conveying, or exchange of ideas, knowledge, information, etc., whether by speech, writing, or signs. Interchange of speech, conversation, conference, converse, personal intercourse.

In Webster's New International Dictionary, at page 452:

> Communication: (2) intercourse by words letters, or messages; interchange of thoughts or opinions, by conference or other means; converse; correspondence; (3) that which is communicated or imparted; intelligence; news, a verbal or written message.

Therefore I contend that I was perfectly justified in stating that there had been communications from the leader of the opposition to myself in connection with the matter. The hon. gentleman has mentioned a note which he sent over. In fairness to myself and in fairness to the house I think that the note should be quoted as sent. And this is the note:

> The Solicitor General: Surely you do not mean that I ever sent you any "communication" regarding Robb. You must mean "conversation". I was very careful to say "communication". R.B.B.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would simply ask my hon. friend to explain why he was so careful to use the word "communication" if he wanted to exclude conversations, when, in the paragraph before that relating to myself, he quoted a conversation with the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart, Edmonton). Why should conversations with the Minister of the Interior be relevant and conversations with myself have nothing to do with the matter? I think, Mr. Speaker, that it is good thing that this incident should close now, and again I congratulate the leader of the opposition upon having adopted to-night a tone which is by far more in keeping with the very high position he occupies in the house than was the tone he adopted this afternoon.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): On a question of privilege, seeing that I seem to have been the central spirit in this discussion, may I make it very clear to the house, as I think I did on a former occasion, that I have no interest in Baldy Robb. Indeed, if my interests had been consulted perhaps they would have been best served by leaving him where he was. But being in receipt of a very largely signed petition from people in the province of Alberta, and being asked in that petition to take action, I did so. I want to say here and now, however, that never at any time had I any interest in this prisoner such as I would not take in any other prisoner in the province of Alberta. I make this statement because the inference might go abroad that I was the person in this house who was going about interviewing people on behalf of Baldy Robb. That I never did. As a matter of fact I have suffered more at his hands than I have on account of any other person in that province. I bear no ill-will in the matter, however. I was perfectly willing to do what I could to meet the request contained in the petition, just as I should do for any other prisoner. But, I repeat, I have no interest in the individual.

Mr. BENNETT: The Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) was good enough to ask me a question, which I think I may answer in the terms of Hansard itself. I do not wish to quote too much of what I said the other day, but I may read the following:

It transpired that the minister was correct and we had some conversation touching the matter. My recollection is that I stated I would have nothing to do with it, pointing out, however, that I had recently been in Edmonton where I had learned that a large number of people there, who had been associated with the prosecution of Robb, were of the opinion that the ends of justice had been satisfied and the law vindicated by his conviction and imprisonment, and that, having regard to the fact that his wife and family were in poor circumstances, there was no reason why, if the government deemed it a proper course to pursue and such a recommendation should be made to His Excellency, Baldy Robb should not be released on ticket-of-leave. If I remember rightly the Minister of the Interior inquired whether I would have any objection to communicating that fact to the leader of the opposition. I told him I would not. I ascertained that the leader of the opposition was absent from Ottawa, as was also the Solicitor General, and I telephoned the Minister of the Interior to that effect.

I had no communication with the Solicitor General with respect to this matter. I made no recommendations of any kind regarding the release of this convicted criminal; I left the responsibility where it belonged. I did state, however—

I emphasize that.

—that I would not criticize any action that might be taken in the circumstances by the law officers of the crown. The view I intimated to the Minister of the Interior, the only minister with whom I had had any discussion with reference to the question.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Those are the facts. Casual conversations with regard to Baldy Robb certainly were not discussions concerning him, and the only discussion I had was with the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart, Edmonton). If, however, casual conversations are to be regarded as discussions, then it is a warning to me in the future, with respect to at least one of the law officers of the crown.

COPYRIGHT ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): I desire to ask a question of the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret). Having regard to the report of the special committee of 1925 dealing with amendments to the Copyright Act, and in view of the urgent need of such amendments, is it the intention of the government this year to bring down these amendments?

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): In addition to the amendments embodied in the bill to which my hon. friend refers, a considerable number have been submitted to my department, but it is not the desire of the government to put through this year any measure with regard to the Copyright Act. As my hon. friend is aware, an international conference on copyright will take place in Rome next month, and we deem it advisable to avail ourselves of the benefit of the deliberations there and of such resolutions as may be adopted, before suggesting any further amendments on our own behalf.

ECONOMIC CONFERENCE AT GENEVA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) inquired prior to the Easter recess whether it was the intention of the government to ask the approval of parliament of resolutions adopted at the economic conference at Geneva last May at which, he said, the government was represented. I informed my hon. friend that I would give him a reply after the recess. At the time I was not quite clear as to which conference he had in mind—we have been represented at a good many, as to-day's debate would disclose. The conference to which the hon. member alludes was a conference of economic experts called originally at the instance of the League of Nations. The government as such was not represented, but did appoint delegates to the conference to deal with the questions that were presented there, and the report, as adopted by the conference, was in the nature of a basis for consideration and discussion by the different governments. It was never intended, however, to treat it as a document to be submitted to parliament for approval. In the circumstances it is not the intention of the government to submit any of the resolutions of the conference for approval.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

REPORT OF JOINT ENGINEERING BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): While discussing the question of reports, may I say that last night my hon. friend (Mr. Cahan) directed the attention of the house to the fact that he, as well as other hon. members, had through some inadvertence failed to receive the report of the joint engineering board on the St. Lawrence waterway project. I have made inquiries as to what took place with regard to the distribution of the report and I find, as I intimated yesterday, that the report is in two volumes. It is rather bulky and includes a number of expensive plates. The actual cost of publication of the report is $12.50 for the report and plates. At the time of its receipt the government did not have it distributed generally, although I understand, any members who had applied to the Department of Railways—not to the distribution office—were supplied with copies. Some hon. members, however, seem to have been under the impression that the report was being distributed through the distribution office, and not having received copies there were naturally surprised. I may observe that copies are available for all members of the house, but those gentlemen who have already received copies from the Department of Railways will not expect additional copies unless for some special reason. Any members who so desire may receive a copy of the report on application. When the report was laid on the table of the house it was distributed to the leading newspapers throughout the country, to the universities, the provincial governments and a number of leading libraries as well as engineering journals and societies. It has been made available at a nominal cost of $5 to the members of the engineering profession, and indeed to any person interested in it for professional reasons. It was not thought advisable to distribute a report of that magnitude and cost free of charge, and the government will maintain the nominal charge of $5 for a report which has cost it $12.50 to print.

I have just one other observation to make. The report has been printed at the expense of the department, but it has not been translated into French. I think it should be translated; I believe it should be made available to all members of parliament and I hope the committee on public printing of this house will consider the advisability of the translation and publication of this report in French.

Mr. SPEAKER: The necessary instructions will be given.

REPARATIONS COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): I desire to ask the Prime Minister whether the government have come to any conclusion with regard to the tabling of the Friel report?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I thought the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) the other day made a clear and comprehensive statement on that subject. It was to the effect that the government did not contemplate bringing in any legislation this session with regard to any of the matters referred to in Mr. Friel's report. Having decided not to bring in legislation during this session we do not think it advisable to have the report made public until some subsequent time. The report contains recommendations which must be taken into consideration by the government in any legislation which may be brought down, and we think it would be prejudicial to make the report public until such time as the government is prepared to bring in the legislation which may be based thereon.

BRITISH COLUMBIA LANDS

REPORT OF MR. JUSTICE MARTIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): May I ask the Prime Minister if the government have concurred or intend to concur in the report of Mr. Justice Martin relative to the Peace River block and Dominion railway lands in British Columbia, and whether the government are taking any steps to give effect to that report?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am afraid my hon. friend has not seen the statement which was made by the Minister of the Interior on that subject a day or so ago.

Mr. LADNER: The statement does not deal with those points at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand that my friend wants to know whether the government intend to act on that report. I may tell him that the government do intend to act upon it, but the time of such action is something which we must reserve for further consideration.

SEEDS ACT AMENDMENT

The house in committee on Bill No. 11, to amend the Seeds Act—Mr. Motherwell—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Sections 1 to 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Sale, etc., of clovers, grasses, seed grain and fodder seeds.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the minister considered whether or not section 4 as contained in this bill is a legal and valid section?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Do the law officers say it is valid?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I presume it is.

Mr. BENNETT: As I said the other day, I do not wish to raise questions of this kind unnecessarily, but I think it my duty to point out the fact that there are grave questions connected with a statute of this parliament which forbids any person having seed in his possession unless under certain conditions; that is a serious matter. This section states:

> No person shall sell, offer, advertise, expose or have in possession for sale for the purpose of seeding in Canada any seeds in containers containing seeds of clover, alfalfa, grasses, flax, sorghums, millet, wheat, oats, barley, rye, corn, buckwheat, sunflower, field peas, field beans, vetches, or other kinds of seeds that may be prescribed by regulation, nor shall any shipment be billed as seed unless each container containing such seed, or a tag or label durably attached thereto, is branded or marked on one side in printed characters . . . .

Certainly the powers of this parliament are very wide with respect to agriculture, but I cannot help thinking that the rights of the provinces are invaded in some degree by the provisions of that section. I am not expressing an opinion, but I think it should be submitted to the law officers before the bill is finally passed out of committee.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I realize that there is an element of doubt as to our jurisdiction, especially with regard to transactions between citizens of the same province. There are three kinds of sales; there is the sale for export, over which we have undoubted control; there is the interprovincial sale, which we also control, and there is the sale between persons in the same province. This has stood all the tests since 1911, so I think we are fairly safe in letting it go through again.

Mr. FRASER: Is this a change from the existing regulations?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This is really one of the most important changes which has been made. Perhaps the chairman would read subsection (e).

The CHAIRMAN: Subsection (e) of section 4 is as follows:

> (e) the name of the grade of seed, which shall be one of the following:—
> (i) for the general seeds of commerce, No. 1, No. 2, No. 3;
> (ii) for seed derived from an inspected seed crop that was pure as to variety and was registered by the Canadian Seed Growers' Association, registered extra, registered No. 1, registered No. 2, to which grade names there may be added such further word or words as may be prescribed by regulation to describe such damage to the seed as may not impair its utility value for seeding;
> (iii) for mixtures of grass, clover, or other fodder or forage crop seeds, No. 1 mixture, No. 2 mixture, No. 3 mixture.

Mr. FRASER: There is quite an amount of seed grain grown in British Columbia. What effect will this have upon people buying seed from one another?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The seeds will be the same, but they will be of different names.

Mr. FRASER: What about the regulations?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There are no changes in the regulations yet. Regulations are never drafted until after the bill is adopted. That will come later.

Mr. FRASER: They grow a great deal of timothy seed up in the valley. If a man sells timothy seed to another man in a different part of the province, does that have to be graded?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is no change in regard to timothy seed.

Mr. SPENCER: In regard to seed grain in the province, will it have to come under the regulations?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, no change whatever. It is just in the nomenclature of the grades. The grades of seed are now 1, 2 and 3; the registered grades are registered extra, registered No. 1 and registered No. 2; three grades in each. Nos. 1, 2 and 3, are commercial grades.

Mr. BENNETT: As the statute now stands, it applies to all transactions whether inside or outside of the province?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Whether it is legal or not is another question; but as it stands it now applies to all, inside as well as outside of the province.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this clause is going too far in establishing three more grades. Goodness knows we have enough grades already. There is another feature which I do not like. It provides for grades higher than 1, 2 and 3; the consequence is that a man going into a store to buy grass seed, the unscrupulous dealer, if there are such, says: Here is No. 1 grade, and quotes a price for it. The man naturally thinks that is the best grade, and the dealer does not tell him that there are three grades ahead of it. I think it is a great mistake to have fancy names. If there are six grades and a man is told that a certain seed is No. 6 grade, he knows what that is; but if it is No. 1, he thinks it is the best. It has always been a standing grievance that the government will put on "extra" and "fancy" grades ahead of No. 1 grade, which to the man on the street gives a false impression. If you must have six grades, I think they should run from one to six. I should like to know what would be the germination of the sixth grade.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The grades are not all registered. The grades 1, 2 and 3 are just seed, whether of wheat, oats or whatever it is; it is not aristocratic seed. But as to high class, registered seed, that is called now in the bill "registered extra," "registered No. 1" and "registered No. 2." I think what my friend is getting at is why they are not called by corresponding names to the unregistered. That is at the request of the seed growers' association, who have done a lot of useful work in western Canada. They do not like the idea of a registered No. 3; that is getting down too low when it comes to a high class registered grade. They suggest that it should be called "registered extra", "registered No. 1" and "registered No. 2". They avoided the 3. Personally I would rather have seen it registered No. 1, 2 and 3, to correspond to the other grades 1, 2 and 3.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Why does not the minister change it now?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am following the rulings of the agriculture committee. I do not see in the house the farmers' representatives on that committee. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) and the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) and myself were in the minority. If this committee thinks that is the sensible thing to do, naturally I will be agreeable; but I would say that the agricultural committee wanted it in this way because of the successful work done by the seed growers.

Mr. CAHILL: What about the buyers of seed?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is more understandable by them, and after all they are more numerous than the growers.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The buyers are the ones to protect, and you protect them better with this suggestion.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If anyone made the motion that the registered grades should be registered No. 1, registered No. 2 and registered No. 3, I would accept it. But remember that these parties have made a very strong bid for it the way it is. We are sacrificing convenience a good deal to meet the class of men who are doing extra work and think there is something in these names and do not like to adopt the standard No. 3 for seed.

Mr. CHAPLIN: As a matter of fact the minister admits that in practice there is a No. 3, but it is called something else. We had better call it what it is.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know whether my hon. friend would agree to that when it is applied to fruit.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It would apply to everything.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We like to get away from the numerical grades 3 and 4.

Mr. MILLAR: While the seed growers' association represent the seller, do they to any extent represent the buyer?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, that is right; the Canadian Seed Growers' Association naturally represent themselves.

Mr. MILLAR: They do not represent the buyers.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Oh, no doubt they sometimes buy from each other. The growers of registered stock sell back and forth to farmers; but those transactions are small in comparison with the purchases of the average man who is buying seed grain.

Mr. McMILLAN: Mr. Chairman, I beg to move:

That subparagraph (e) of clause 5 be amended by striking out the word "extra", so that the clause will then read:

Registered No. 1, registered No. 2 and registered No. 3.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. NEILL: Should a further amendment not be made in the last sentence, which reads:

To the grade names registered No. 1 and registered No. 2—

That should read—

Registered No. 2 and registered No. 3.

—in order to carry out the purpose of the section.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There are only two or three copies of the written amendment that was made in the agriculture committee. With the amendment now made it will read:

(2) For seed derived from an inspected seed crop that was pure as to variety and was registered by the Canadian Seed Growers' Association, registered No. 1, registered No. 2 and registered No. 3.

That it the way it will read now.

Mr. NEILL: I am referring to the next sentence, which reads:

To the grade names registered No. 1 and registered No. 2 may be added such word or words as may be prescribed by regulation to describe any damage to the seed when such damage does not affect its seed value.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That has been changed in the committee. It now reads:

Such further word or words may be prescribed by regulation to describe such damage to the seed as may not impair its utility value for seeding.

That is in the case of some slight damage by frost or a little hail.

Mr. FRASER: What facilities is the minister providing whereby growers of seed may get those certificates?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There are inspectors and seed laboratories at convenient points.

Mr. FRASER: Will the minister have one in the northern part of British Columbia?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If it is not too far north, we might.

Mr. FRASER: Along the main line of the Grand Trunk Pacific?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is one at Smithers on the Canadian National.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 5 and 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Sale, etc., of field root, garden or vegetable or flower seeds in lots of two ounces or less.

The CHAIRMAN: There is an amendment in the 37th and 38th lines. The words: "a tag or label, durably attached thereto" have been struck out and the following substituted: "each container of such seeds".

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 8 agreed to.

On section 9—Power to change name.

Mr. SPENCER: If a registered name is granted to a seed grower, can that name be changed or cancelled without the seed grower being consulted?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The proper thing to do would be to acquaint him of the fact that a change was contemplated and to give him an opportunity to justify the continuance of the name. For instance, if a variety name had been granted and the seed proved not to be living up to its name but to be merely developing into a strain of some other variety, such as marquis wheat or something like that, there would be no reason to continue the name; but in ordinary courtesy the seed grower should be notified and given an opportunity of proving that he was right and that the department was wrong. The advisory board and the department would be the final authority in the matter. The purpose of this is to correct any mistakes that have been made in the past in the matter of too much generosity in granting licenses for new varieties. We have been suffering from a plethora of varieties of grain, especially wheat.

Mr. SPENCER: I have in mind vermilion wheat. I am not going to say whether in my opinion it is a good or a bad wheat, but I understand that some question has arisen whether it is a good milling variety, and I believe a license was granted to the grower and later on was taken away from him without notice.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That would not be done. He would be given proper notice and an opportunity of defence.

Mr. GARDINER: What steps have been taken to determine whether or not a variety of grain or seed is valuable, and whether a variety should be given a name?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: First a proper sample of it would be taken, preferably sealed and certified to as being of that variety. Mr.

Newman, the Dominion Cerealist, would then make a milling test and a baking test, and he would have it judged on its merits in that respect. The primary purpose for which we grow wheat is its value as a food.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—False advertising.

Mr. NEILL: I should like to draw attention to the last part of this clause, which reads:

Nor shall cereal grains, grasses or clover seeds be advertised for sale unless the grade name is included in the advertisement.

Let us think what that means. Feed stores generally sell and advertise seed grain and grass seeds, and every time they put on their billhead or in their advertisement in a little monthly or weekly paper that they sell these things, they will have to put, in the case of clover, the fact that they are selling registered No. 1, registered No. 2, registered No. 3 and No. 1, No. 2 and No. 3 grades. It is absurd that they cannot advertise the fact that they have for sale seed grain or grass seed without inserting the grade of every particular variety they have. That is wrong. If the intention is to prevent a person advertising one grade as another, that is all right, but it should be so expressed. This will prevent any man advertising, either on his billhead or in his weekly paper, the fact that he sells grass seeds unless he names the grade of every one of the grass seeds he carries. If he carries ten kinds with six grades for each kind, his billhead will be filled up with this information.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Section 14 makes four distinct exceptions to the application of this bill which I think will cover what my hon. friend has in mind. The farmer often has to sell a carload on the basis of grade after it is cleaned by the seed merchant. I have sold many carloads that way myself without any grading. We will let this section stand until we come to section 14.

Section stands.

On section 11—inspection and grading.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This has been tested out and has proved to be satisfactory. There is no change except that the new grades are inserted.

Mr. McMILLAN: This section should be changed to correspond with the changes that have already been made. The words "extra No. 1," and "extra No. 2," and so on, should be changed to read "registered No. 1," "registered No. 2," and "registered No. 3," and I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 12 agreed to.

On section 13—Importation of seeds.

The CHAIRMAN: This section has been amended to read:

Section thirteen of the said act is repealed, and the following is substituted therefor:

No person shall import into Canada for the purpose of selling or offering for sale, or for the purpose of seeding, any of the seeds named in section five of this act, or any kinds of garden vegetable seeds that may be prescribed by regulation, unless they are branded or marked or coloured in accordance with the provisions of this act and conform to the regulations thereunder.

Mr. FRASER: This seems rather a radical change. What is the explanation?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, it is quite simple. My hon. friend will note that it says "unless they are branded or marked or coloured." I do not know whether my hon. friend knows, but it is the usual practice in Canada and elsewhere to have a certain percentage of imported clover and alfalfa seed coloured. We rather like the idea, because it indicates which is Canadian seed that has a high reputation in other countries. The same conditions prevail with regard to identifying seeds in other countries.

Section agreed to.

On section 14.

Mr. McMILLAN: We have not a copy of the bill as amended by the committee, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is not the usual practice to reprint the bill unless the changes made are very considerable.

Mr. NEILL: I think much of this confusion is due to the facts that our new rules, of which we have heard something before, were amended last year to cut down largely the numbers on the agriculture committee, and the consequence is that half the members who are interested in farming now see this bill for the first time, whereas had there been the same number on the committee as in former years we would have been able to discuss this matter much more intelligently, and there would not have been all this confusion. That is one more thing to the credit of the beloved new rules.

Section 14 agreed to.

Section 15 agreed to.

On section 10—false advertising.

Mr. NEILL: I would point out, Mr. Chairman, that section 14 does not refer in any way whatever to section 10. It makes exemptions under sections 5, 6 and 7, but it does not in any way refer to section 10. I would draw the attention of the committee to the original section 10, which will be found on the opposite page of the bill, and which says, and very properly, that no person shall sell any seeds that are falsely represented in any advertising. That is perfectly proper, but that is not what the new section says. The new section says that you shall not advertise grains, grasses or clover seeds unless the grade name is included in the advertisement. I know something about this business because I have been in it for fifteen years, although out of it now, and I know that it is customary for people in this business to advertise that they are dealing in these things. They simply say that they have a supply of grains and grass seeds on hand, and there is no false description and no false advertising about it, but under this new section they are forbidden to put that simple advertisement on their billheads unless they specify every individual grade of seed, and there are six of every kind of seed which they handle. I know what the government is getting at, but it is not expressed correctly. It would be much better left as it was originally in the act.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If a seed man advertises so much grass, clover, wheat, oats or any other seed, how can the buyer make an intelligent bid unless he is told whether it is grade 1, 2, 3 or registered 1, 2, 3? It seems to me that at present there is plenty of room for fraud, unintentional perhaps; to advertise such and such seed in extravagant terms. If my hon. friend bought that seed, say a certain variety of clover, and found it below grade, he would be very much disappointed. That has been our experience in the administration of the Act.

Mr. NEILL: The minister does not grasp my point. The old section covers what he has described. It made it an offence to falsely describe what you are offering for sale. Customers in the retail trade do not bid; they come in to buy and know what they are getting. If they are buying No. 1, they see that they get No. 1. But this amendment refers to advertising. If I advertise No. 1 seed and supply No. 2 I am liable under the old act and can be punished. But now I have to be prevented from advertising by way of my bill head unless I set out a whole rigmarole of ten or more different kinds of seed, each of six grades. If anyone will take the trouble to read the old section on the right hand of the page he will see that the public is fully safeguarded against any fraudulent advertisement. If I advertised myself as a dealer in potatoes, would I have to describe the life history of each potato?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have no seed catalogue under my hand, but my experience is that every parcel of seed sold by a seed house is graded.

Mr. NEILL: Certainly, but not advertised.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If that is so with the seed firm, then everyone who sells seed by advertisement should comply with the same conditions in order to give the prospective purchaser a chance to buy intelligently. If he does not know what he is getting, he is buying a pig in a poke. Suppose he is buying wheat, there is a tremendous spread between the best and worst grades. I think my hon. friend might look into this a little more thoroughly.

Mr. NEILL: I have been looking into it for sixteen years.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This amendment is sought to remedy the injustice done to buyers of seed by reason of glowing seed advertisements in newspapers without any grade being specified.

Mr. NEILL: That was fraudulent, and the old section covers it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We are a party to the fraud if we do not close that open gate.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It seems to me that this section is badly drawn to accomplish what the minister has in mind. The objection taken by the member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) is well founded. If seed people advertise it would be entirely right for them to state in their advertisements that they have a stock of seed on hand for sale.

Mr. NEILL: Hear, hear.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That is reasonable and business-like. You ought to arrange it so that when seeds are presented for sale the bags and packages shall show definitely what is being sold. As the hon. member for Comox-Alberni says, you should not require a man to advertise all the grades he has in stock. That is his point.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not think there is any abuse by the seed houses at all; their catalogues are before the whole country.

Mr. CHAPLIN: If that is the case, cut this out.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This is to cover the case of a person who inserts a short advertisement in the newspapers that he has such and such clover seed for sale at certain prices. I do not see how any prospective purchaser can buy that seed with any safety unless he knows what grade it is. If the committee thinks that the man who buys as a result of reading an advertisement should buy with his eyes shut as to the quality of the seed, we can leave the section in its original form. But I have some regard for the buyers; they are in the majority.

Mr. BOYS: But you are prohibiting a man from advertising that he is a seed merchant.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am prohibiting him from faking a prospective buyer by offering something, the quality of which is unknown.

Mr. BOYS: Everybody agrees with that; but the section goes much further as it is worded.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Does my hon. friend think it better that the buyer should buy blindly?

Mr. BOYS: Certainly not.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: He would if the seed is not graded.

Mr. BOYS: If the seed merchant is going to sell specific seed of specific quality he must comply with this act; but the section is broad enough to prevent his advertising at all.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Our whole grading system would be set at naught if we did not buy and sell by it.

Mr. BOYS: The minister does not grasp the point.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is simplicity itself. Let us dispense with grading; then wheat is wheat, clover is clover, grass seed is grass seed.

Mr. FRASER: I gather from the member for Comox-Alberni that thousands of farmers throughout the Dominion buy their seed from the small retail merchants. I sell car loads every year. This section would prohibit those merchants from advertising that they are simply selling seed unless they insert a whole page ad. specifying the different qualities for sale. I do not see any sense in it.

An hon. MEMBER: There is none.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Is the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Fraser) referring to the small packages of seeds we see in every store?

Mr. FRASER: No; in quantity. The retail merchant might buy a carload of clover or timothy seed for distribution in his locality. To sell that seed he has to advertise. But if he does so you compel him to advertise each and every grade that he has in stock. The member for Comox-Alberni contends that all he should be required to advertise is simply this: I have clover or timothy seed for sale. He should not be required to specify every grade. Surely the farmer knows enough to ascertain the grade when he buys seed.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think this is a decided safeguard for the buyer. If we prefer to legislate for the seller, then the buyer must look after himself. Which is the greater interest? All who favour legislation in this particular instance for the benefit of the seller will be in favour of eliminating it. I should prefer to legislate for the buyer. Joking aside, the primary object of the Seeds Act, the reason for its adoption twenty-five years ago, was after all to introduce a reasonable measure of fairness between buyer and seller, not only as regards home consumption, but as well for the protection of the buyer in Canada against spurious importations from abroad. I should not like to change this section offhand, but I am agreeable to having the bill stand in committee. Of course we all like to get our bills through, but I would rather have the bill stand than hurriedly change it.

Mr. McMILLAN: I think you are trying to get the farmer to do the very thing that you say he should not do. When I go into a store to buy my seed I use my eyes, but the minister suggests that the farmer does not need to do so.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If the hon. member will second the motion of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) and accept the responsibility for what is done we can have the words in question eliminated. Or perhaps the committee would prefer to let the matter remain in committee. I want to be as amiable as possible to-night.

Mr. MILLAR: It seems to me that the objection of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni would be met by a differentiation between advertising and selling. Leave advertising free from the application of this new clause.

Mr. NEILL: That would meet my objection, but it would not be fair; it would not impose a penalty on people who falsely advertise. Why not strike out section 10 altogether, and have the old section 10 reinstated? That section reads:

No person shall sell, offer or have in possession for sale any seeds or plants that are falsely represented in any form of advertising.

That provision would cover the matter. I suggest that we leave out the section altogether and have that old provision put into effect.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is a practice, particularly in the west, when advertising seed grain, grass seeds and clover seeds, to mention the price but not the grade.

Mr. FORKE: How can you grade your grain in your granary? If it is in your granary and you advertise it for sale, how will you grade it?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The farmer cannot sell it until he gets the certificate of the Seed branch. We are not discussing commercial grain sold by the carload. In my opinion it would be a mistake to strike out the section, and I would therefore suggest that we leave the matter in committee and have the section redrafted so as to protect the buyer in the manner indicated, without giving offence to the seller in the way implied by my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni. I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Progress reported.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT

The house in committee on Bill No. 170, to amend the Special War Revenue Act—Mr. Robb—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. EULER: When this bill was in committee on Tuesday evening every clause had been adopted, but it was proposed by the leader of the opposition, I think, that the bill be not taken out of committee until such time as we had considered a suggestion made by the hon. member for West York in regard to the manner in which we should proceed to make collections of sales tax. Before I deal with that I want to make one or two observations in explanation of certain questions raised on Tuesday. The leader of the opposition inquired as to how many cases of sales tax were actually in the courts. I made the statement then that I thought there were between 500 and 600; I was quoting from a tabulated report. I was in error. To be exact, the number is 347—not so great as I thought at the time. There was also in the report in Hansard the statement that the amount of money which we expected to collect from brewers and distillers in cases now in the courts was half a million. As a matter of fact what I did say was, nearly five millions. A further question was asked by the leader of the opposition as to how many exemptions from sales tax had been passed by order in council. I said at the time that I thought there were none. I shall have to modify that slightly; there were a few. The roasting and grinding of coffee were exempted from the application of the sales tax for the reason that it was impracticable and unfair to apply it. The grocery stores were grinding and roasting coffee and were in competition with the ordinary roasters engaged in business on a large scale. We thought this was unfair and we made the exemption by order in council. We exempted from the sales tax the statue of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, as well as official stationery from His Majesty's stationery office in England for the use of the British trade commissioner in Canada, and provided further for exemptions in the case of paintings in oils and water colours valued at not less than $20 and imported by the National Gallery and Archives. That was all.

When the bill was in committee, as I said, all the clauses had been adopted, but the hon. member for West York suggested that we should make some amendment, if necessary, in regard to the collection of sales tax items overdue, as we did in the case of income tax arrears. I promised then to take the matter into consideration. Last session a provision was passed enabling us to proceed in exactly the same way as we now do in the case of the income tax. We make an application to the Exchequer court and we may receive a certificate of default which at once becomes a judgment, and we can proceed to execute that judgment. In probably 75 per cent or more of the cases for arrears of sales tax we have proceeded in precisely that way. There are some cases which we do not take to the Exchequer court, as hon. members who are lawyers know; if the cases are taken to the Exchequer court there is practically no defence permissible by the taxpayer. Of course in some cases no defence should be offered, when it is merely a matter of collecting a tax and there is no doubt that the sums are owing. There are numerous cases, however, where that procedure would not be fair; there is sometimes a reasonable doubt whether the amount is correct or perhaps whether it should be collected at all, and in those cases it is surely fair that we should allow the taxpayer to make his defence in the ordinary courts of the province.

Mr. McGIBBON: Would the minister tell us how many people are in arrears on their sales tax, with the amounts?

Mr. EULER: I have not the figures before me, but I would say to my hon. friend what I said the other night, that the number of debtors in arrears from the old days has been very considerably reduced, and the number is not being added to.

Mr. McGIBBON: That does not answer the question.

Mr. EULER: I cannot tell my hon. friend the exact number; I can get the information for him if he really desires it. I think what I said with regard to the powers we have under the new act would answer the suggestions of the hon. member for West York and the leader of the opposition.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Has the minister the right to add interest to overdue sales tax?

Mr. EULER: Yes, and we are doing so.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Will the minister tell me if any of the cases instituted by the hon. member for South Wellington during the summer of 1926 are among the cases now pending? If the minister has no record of this at present, will he get that information for me?

Mr. EULER: I am sorry I did not catch the first part of the question.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): I will repeat it. The minister will remember that during the summer of 1926, before the present government came into office, certain actions were instituted for the recovery of sales tax and income tax by the hon. member for South Wellington, who took over the work of collecting the revenues of the country in addition to his other duties. Have those actions lapsed, or can the minister tell us whether or not they are still pending? I am referring now to actions commenced during that summer as a result of the report made by the parliamentary committee which investigated the Department of Customs and Excise, as distinguished from the royal commission which sat later.

Mr. EULER: In every case where action has been instituted, so far as the Department of National Revenue is concerned, it has been prosecuted; I do not know of a single action which has been withdrawn. A great many others have been instituted as well.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Is the minister able to give me this information without inconvenience, or is it a matter in connection with which I should wait? I should like some information as to the present position of those actions which were instituted during the summer of 1926.

Mr. EULER: Many of these actions have been settled, and some are still in the courts, but none has been dropped. I would also say that quick decision in some of these matters is not under the control of the department. That is for the courts, and I am free to say that I have not always been satisfied with the postponements which have taken place. I think the committee will realize, however, that after all this is a matter beyond the control of the minister in charge of the department.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): I am not making my inquiry in any spirit of criticism; I merely wish to learn the present position of these actions. If the facts are not at the disposition of the minister at this time I do not wish to press for them.

Mr. EULER: I am afraid I cannot tell my friend anything more at the moment.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): I suppose I can get that information?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: There is one question I would like to bring up, having to do with the licenses. The department has recently given notice that it proposes to cancel these licenses on July 1, I believe. It is very difficult for many merchants to meet that situation, and I think the commercial community would be gratified if the minister would make some statement with respect to the whole question of sales licenses. This would seem to be an opportune time to do so, in view of the fact that this is mentioned in the statute under consideration.

Mr. EULER: The hon. gentleman is quite right when he says it is the intention of the department to cancel the great majority of the licenses now held by wholesalers with regard to the sales tax.

Mr. BENNETT: Why?

Mr. EULER: For a number of reasons. One reason is that it will make the work of the department a great deal easier, and another is that it will save money to the department. For example, if a wholesaler who holds a license does not pay his sales tax when he buys from the manufacturer, or if he happens to have bought from the manufacturer and there is a reduction made in the sales tax, as happened this year and last year, the department losses the revenue from the reduction of the sales tax. Another reason is this: I take it that the theory of the application of the sales tax is that it should be applied as nearly as possible at the source, that is, the manufacturer or the importer, and that is the principle we would like to carry out. I would add that the wholesalers, through their organizations, waited upon the minister and made their representations, and I am informed that they are pretty well satisfied with the change. We are trying to make it as easy as possible; we are making it easy with regard to the taking of the stock as of June 30, and we are making it easy for them to pay the sales tax on the stock on hand. We are not asking for an immediate payment of the whole amount of the sales tax, but are permitting them to pay by instalments. I believe the change is in the interests of the department and I believe the method we are going to adopt now is the method which should have been adopted in the first place. I also believe the wholesalers will be quite satisfied, and in fact are now very well satisfied with the method we are going to adopt.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister has clearly stated the intention of the department, and July 1 is not very far away. I have received communications from wholesalers in various parts of the country indicating that it may work a very great hardship upon them to have these licenses cancelled as of July 1. It has been alleged also in some cases that political pressure was being brought to bear to secure the waiver of the operations of the prescriptive rule in the cases of some wholesalers and not in others. I am sure the minister is not a party to any such transaction; as a man of business himself I know such would not be the case, and I hasten to assure my hon. friend that that was not my understanding. it might be advisable to consider whether, having regard to the fact that the fiscal year so far as the revenues of the country are concerned ends on March 31, these licenses should not be allowed to run for the six months following, which would be half of our fiscal year. That would bring it to October 1, which I think would be better than July 1. That was suggested to me by a wholesaler in one of the eastern provinces, and I pass it on to the minister for his consideration.

Mr. EULER: Originally it was the intention of the department not to renew these licenses after March 31, but the wholesalers made representations that that was rather short notice. I appreciated their point of view and found no objection from them when we decided to advance the date to June 30. This is the first intimation I have received that any of these gentlemen are dissatisfied with the decision of the department. I would be quite prepared to consider any change if there is real hardship involved, but I am inclined to believe that June 30 will be pretty fair to everyone. With regard to the statement that political pressure has been brought to bear, I want to say to my hon. friend in all sincerity that if it has been brought to bear it has not been upon the Minister of National Revenue; and I can assure him that if it is brought to bear it will have no effect whatever. I may add that there would be no purpose in taking away the license from a wholesaler who sells practically his whole stock to manufacturers, because when he sells to manufacturers there must be a refund made of the sales tax. We have not come to an absolute decision as to which of these will be allowed to continue with a license, but I would say in a general way that where a wholesaler does sell say seventy-five per cent of his product to manufacturers we shall probably continue to grant him a license.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the circular said fifty per cent.

Mr. EULER: I do not think it is as low as that.

Mr. BOYS: I am not familiar with the practice of the department in connection with this tax. When a man goes into default the certificate is filed in the exchequer court and judgment issued. I should like to know whether the execution is filed in the county in which the man resides, or is issued from the exchequer court and is valid throughout Canada. For instance, if there was some arrear from a taxpayer and there was an advance made to him, it might happen that on a search being made it could not be found in his own county. In connection with the income tax, the tax took precedence over all debts; but a change has been made in that respect. It seems to me that this should not precede any loan made in the county, unless filed in that county.

Mr. EULER: I do not know the details with which the thing is carried out, but the Commissioner of Excise will be here in a moment.

Mr. BOYS: If it is filed in the county anyone can search and find out. If it is not filed there, must the person who wants to do business with the taxpayer search in the Exchequer court every time? There might be a judgment for $1,000 or $5,000. The execution to be issued should not take precedence over anything in that county unless it is filed in the county in which the debtor resides.

Mr. EULER: I will give the hon. member that information afterwards.

Section agreed to.

On section 2.

Mr. BENNETT: I was going to ask the minister, when he mentioned the number of cases outstanding, some 300 odd, how many besides that were reduced to judgment on which execution issued.

Mr. EULER: I may say that included in the 347 are the actions against the brewers and distillers, some 30, and I think also 138 against job printers. Those are in the courts.

Mr. BENNETT: My friend from Hamilton mentioned the recommendation of the parliamentary committee in connection with a very large number of cases, some in Toronto, some near the border, and near Lindsay. Have all those cases been either liquidated or reduced to judgment?

Mr. EULER: The commissioner informs me that in his opinion the majority of those have been paid or settled and the remainder are in court.

Mr. BENNETT: The method of the arrangement I fancy would be better discussed in connection with the estimates than here.

Mr. EULER: Yes. In reply to my friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Boys), executions are filed with the sheriff of the county.

Mr. BOYS: Do I understand the minister to say that the execution is issued to the sheriff of the county in which the taxpayer resides?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. BOYS: And until that is done it does not take precedence over mortgages, loans and executions filed with the sheriff of that county?

Mr. EULER: Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN: When this bill was last before the committee they adopted the sections up to section 9.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

TORONTO TERMINALS RAILWAY COMPANY

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That the acts relating to the Toronto Terminals Railway Company be amended to provide that the amount of $7,000,000 which the Canadian National Railway Company was authorized to issue by the amending act, 1925, c. 28, may be increased to $10,500,000 to be used for the purposes therein prescribed and for defraying the cost of other railway facilities necessitated by or incidental to the construction of the said viaduct and works.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING: It may facilitate the discussion if I state to the committee that after the bill is read a second time I intend to ask that it be referred to the committee on railways and shipping, as it is distinctly a matter which could be advantageously examined in detail by that committee. The whole Toronto terminal project is, as most of the members of the committee know, a very involved one. I have before me figures and so forth relating to the matter, but I think it would be for the convenience of the members generally if the bill were referred to the committee in question. The evidence taken before the committee is, as hon. members know, recorded and printed, and it would then be available for later discussion in committee of the whole house on the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: Personally I wholly agree with that view, because in that way we shall get more information than we otherwise would.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 204, respecting the Toronto Terminals Railway Company.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first and second times.

Mr. DUNNING: I move that this bill be now referred to the special committee on national railways and shipping for examination and report.

Motion agreed to.

EXCISE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of Bill No. 54, to amend the Excise Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Minister may refuse or suspend license.

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to new section 10, I desire to make a few observations. It will be remembered that the parliamentary committee had to investigate certain matters that involved the exercise by the executive of the powers contained in the former section which is now replaced by this new section. I need hardly point out that that was the cause of much abuse. There is given to a minister a power that no single man should exercise politically. Although one may entertain the highest possible opinion of the present minister or his successors or predecessors, the fact remains that the government have made it possible, for purely political reasons, to work a very serious and great hardship upon the public revenues by showing on the one hand favouritism and partiality or, on the other, vindictiveness. The evidence before the special committee was very clear upon that matter and it is very clear to any thoughtful member. The proposed new section reads:

> The minister may for any reason which he deems sufficient in the public interest refuse to issue any license or to grant any privilege authorized by this act, or may suspend, cancel or revoke a license granted or any privilege given by this act.

Without appeal, with the mere assertion that it is in the public interest, the minister may suspend or cancel a license. The old section was open to the same objection. The evidence before the committee clearly indicated that the moment there was a violation of the law and the department desired to cancel the license which could not then be renewed, the pressure of political friends became so insistent that, however willing the minister might be to discharge his plain duty, he was in many instances overborne by the pressure of that political influence. The converse also was true; that where you found those engaged in the business opposed to the administration of the day and there was a possible breach of the law, the pressure of political friends against that political opponent to break down his business by cancelling the license was very great. The cases we had before us were clear. Obviously, of course, they did not say that that was the reason for doing this. I suggest that there should be a power of review. It is not right that in the hands of a minister such a power should rest, nor should it be a purely political power. It must be remembered that that is a punishment of the most severe character. It destroys the business of the person concerned. That is not the prerogative of government. It rests with the courts awarding sentences, fines and penalties, to carry into effect that punishment which follows an infraction of the law; but the punishment here is to destroy the man's business, and it may be done. I am perfectly frank; I say to the minister that I do not think he would do it, but I also say that he might do it without knowing he was doing it. Not that the minister is in any sense lacking in astuteness, but the exigencies of political necessities in cases such as I have had occasion to observe may result in that end being attained, although the reason given for it will be a very high-sounding one, and in the public interest, of course, in the noblest sense of the term. We have heard of these things happening before. I suggest that this section should be reconsidered. If it were as it stood originally I intended to speak to it, because it was quite clear before our committee that this section placed in the hands of the minister a power dangerous alike to the subject and the crown, and I think it should not be there without the right of appeal.

Mr. EULER: The bill as now printed, which is I believe in the hands of members, is somewhat different from the bill as introduced into this house and given its first reading. After the bill was given its first reading, certain representations were made, some from western Canada, asking for other amendments to the Excise Act, and we thought that we should make those changes. I therefore propose to move certain amendments as we proceed, introducing these other changes, but they have already been incorporated in the bill which is now known as Bill No. 54. What is now the first section of the bill was not in the bill as originally introduced.

Mr. BENNETT: It was not in the bill when it was given its first reading?

Mr. EULER: No. I move, Mr. Chairman, that the following be inserted as section 1 of the bill:

> 1. The said act is amended by inserting after section nine thereof the following section:
> 9a. (1) The rates and duties of excise imposed by this act or any other law relating to excise as well as the rates and duties of excise heretofore imposed by any law relating to excise or inland revenue enacted and in force since the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven, shall be binding and are declared and shall be deemed to have been always binding and payable by His Majesty in respect of any goods which may be hereafter or have been heretofore manufactured or imported by or for His Majesty, whether in the right of His Majesty's government of Canada or His Majesty's government of any province of Canada, and whether or not the goods so manufactured or imported belonged at the time of manufacture or importation to His Majesty; and any and all such acts as aforesaid shall be construed and interpreted as if the rates and duties of excise aforesaid were and are by express words charged upon and made payable by His Majesty. Provided, however, that nothing herein contained is intended to impose or to declare the imposition of any tax upon, or to make or declare liable to taxation, any property belonging to His Majesty either in the right of Canada or of a province.

(2) Without restricting the generality of the foregoing when any goods subject to excise have been seized or forfeited by His Majesty's government of any province in Canada or any public authority established by or under the authority of any such government, the duties of excise imposed by this act shall be payable and may be recovered in the same manner as if the said goods were found in the possession of any private person.

I might explain that this amendment arises out of legislation which has been passed by one of the provinces giving the province the power to go into the business of distilling liquor. There is some doubt whether when a province does that, the Dominion government has the right to impose excise taxes and we just want to make sure that we can collect excise taxes on liquors whether the liquor is made by private manufacturers or by the province. I think the committee will see the reasonableness of that amendment.

Mr. BENNETT: Does this refer to brewing and distilling?

Mr. EULER: To collecting the excise taxes on the distilling of liquor.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 2—Minister may refuse or suspend license.

Mr. BENNETT: This is the section to which I was speaking, which was section 1 in the bill as originally introduced. My hon. friend from North Simcoe has made a suggestion which I think would do much to meet that difficulty, and that is to amend it to read that the minister may, in the case of conviction, do so and so.

Mr. EULER: For violation of the act?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. That at least involved a fair court trial and determination of guilt before the minister acts, and to that extent releases the minister, it seems to me, from unfair pressure at least at the inception, because first there must be a conviction. I think the suggestion of the hon. member for North Simcoe would go a long way to meet the situation, and is not unreasonable.

Mr. EULER: I do not see any particular objection to that. Without casting any reflection upon any of the brewers or distillers, I think possibly in most cases that would give the minister power to suspend or cancel the license.

Mr. BENNETT: At least it would give them warning that that power was there for use in the future.

Mr. EULER: I think the committee should realize that the criticism of the leader of the opposition is directed just as much against the bill as it was originally introduced as it is against the amendment before us because under the bill as originally introduced the department or the minister had the power to refuse to renew the license at the end of the year, on March 31st. The hon. leader of the opposition has stated that that is an extreme power to put into the hands of the minister, and that it might be used for political reasons.

Mr. BENNETT: I said, because of the pressure of political friends.

Mr. EULER: I do not like to admit that such a thing could possibly happen. I hope it would not happen under present conditions at least. If any have tried to exercise that pressure in the past, it has never been successful. As I say, in the past the minister has had the power absolutely to refuse to renew a license at the end of the year on March 31st, and if that were done the business of that particular distiller or brewer would be wiped out. But that has never been done. In addition to that, I think most men even in public life have some sense of fairness and justice, and would not deliberately wipe out a heavy investment even of a distiller or brewer without very good reasons. We have power now to withhold the license, and it is only consistent with that power that we should have power also to cancel or suspend the license. I might explain that it was merely a coincidence that at the time of the withholding of a license of a certain brewery in the city of Toronto the books of which were not produced, its license had expired, and we did not renew it until they had paid their taxes; they did not produce their books. But if the order for the production of those books had been made a few days later, the license would have been issued in the ordinary course on the first of April, and we would not have had the power to cancel or suspend it. If it was right that the minister should have the power to withhold the license at the expiration of the year, I think it is right that he should have the power to suspend or even cancel the license in case the holder abuses his privileges or his rights. I hope the leader of the opposition will not press that point too strongly. I have no particular objection to the insertion of his amendment, but frankly I do not believe it is necessary.

Mr. BENNETT: I am going to speak very frankly to my hon. friend. It is true that the licenses have not been cancelled, it is true that the discretion has been exercised favourably; but it will be recalled that during the course of the investigation the auditors reported contributions to political parties by these same gentlemen. Now, just put the two things together. That is my point.

Mr. EULER: But it never resulted in the withholding of licenses.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so; it resulted in something else. That is the point exactly.

Mr. EULER: My hon. friend said he was going to be frank; I wish he would be a little more frank.

Mr. BENNETT: The evidence before the committee did not give the details. It was pressed in certain quarters as to what were the amounts, and what they were paid for. It will be recalled that the royal commission also made certain investigations. Now, the public observing this power, and observing that licenses are always renewed, regardless of the antecedent conduct, connect the two things. That is the position. This is to make it clear that in future, misconduct followed by conviction will involve the loss of the license.

Mr. EULER: Would the hon. member say that loss would automatically follow after conviction?

Mr. BENNETT: No, because there might be a technical breach of the law. My hon. friend referred to such a case. I simply suggest this as being worthy of careful consideration.

Mr. EULER: I might draw to the attention of the committee that this is based directly upon the royal commission's recommendation. They did not add any proviso that there should first be a conviction.

Mr. BENNETT: I know that; I was looking at the recommendations to-day. Commission or no commission, the fact is that we had those things brought to our attention, and they caused a great furore throughout the Dominion. Now every step you take that enables the public to look upon business transactions as being above suspicion is in the interest both of the public and of good government. The removal of that power under those circumstances would be something very much to be desired.

Mr. EULER: As I said before, I am not greatly prejudiced against the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman, but I do think it might occasionally delay and tie the hands of the department if it were absolutely necessary first to secure a conviction in the courts. Or this might happen: a distiller or brewer might violate the law and leave the country. You could not proceed against him, you could not cancel his license, his business would still go on, and yet it might be highly desirable that his license should be suspended. Again I wish to urge upon the committee, with due regard to what my hon. friend says, that, in a practical way, I do not believe there is any very great danger of working injustice to any brewer or distiller if this is allowed to go through as it stands.

Mr. BOYS: The minister admits there must be misconduct. Then how is the misconduct to be established? Surely the man charged should be given an opportunity of defending himself in the courts either by way of prosecution or appeal. No doubt it is a tremendous power; "the minister may for any reason he deems sufficient;" it does not even say there must be misconduct.

Mr. BENNETT: I suggest that the clause be allowed to stand to give the minister an opportunity to consider it further. Certainly in view of what transpired in the committee regarding the action not only of the minister but of other members of the government of the day, and of members of parliament being placed in a difficult position by their constituents—all these matters were before the committee—this is an undesirable power. It is the power of punishment without conviction; it is the exercise of the functions of a court without trial, and it affords an opportunity for pressure to be brought to bear of a kind certainly not in the public interest in connection with these matters.

Mr. EULER: I appreciate what my hon. friend has said; but after all the committee should realize this also, that never yet has anything which he fears and dreads taken place.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it has.

Mr. EULER: Never. I am taking the word of the commissioner of excise.

Mr. BENNETT: But he does not know what we are talking about. The most flagrant violations of the act on the part of some distillers were proven before that committee. But was the licence ever suspended or cancelled? Never. What did the evidence show? Journeys to Ottawa; representations; the licence renewed.

Mr. EULER: But I understand my hon. friend to say that he does not desire to make it mandatory upon the minister to cancel the licence if there is a violation of the act proven in the courts. I must confess that I cannot appreciate the point which my hon. friend is trying to make.

Mr. BENNETT: I think my hon. friend appreciates it all right.

Mr. EULER: A distiller may violate the act half a dozen times and be convicted in the courts, but even then, as I understand his suggestion, the minister may not cancel or suspend the licence; the distiller can still continue his nefarious practice.

Mr. BENNETT: But no minister would hesitate to cancel the licence under those circumstances. That is the point exactly.

Mr. EULER: I am not so sure.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend would not anyway.

Mr. EULER: No matter what has taken place in the past, whether in the shape of political contributions or anything else—and I have not anything to say about that phase because I know nothing with regard to it—

Mr. BENNETT: Continue in your innocence!

Mr. EULER: —in no instance—and I am taking the word of the Commissioner of Excise—has the licence ever been withheld, no matter what party was in power.

Mr. BENNETT: That is my whole point.

Mr. EULER: Suppose the suggestion of my hon. friend is adopted, if I chose, my political friends could come to me, having been convicted of violating the law once, twice or three or four times; their licences ought to be cancelled; but I do not cancel them, I still have power to decline to do so. If the hon. gentleman suggested that once a conviction has been registered against a distiller, the minister must cancel the licence, then I think there would be some teeth in the suggestion.

Mr. BENNETT: It is never usual to do that in this form of statute. But this is also true, that where you have a provision with respect to a conviction, no minister dare to disregard enlightened public opinion by continuing a licence under those circumstances. It is merely the effect of public opinion upon a condition that is then known. The evidence before the committee abundantly established it. The law was set at naught, laughed at. What about the licence? The licence was all right. If there was a conviction, the effect of public opinion is all powerful with respect to the minister. We had a striking illustration of that recently in some discussions on questions of privilege that took place in this house.

Mr. MANION: It would be a dangerous rule that upon one conviction, of any character, the license should be cancelled. A man might be convicted of a very minor offence, or the conviction might be altogether unwarranted. I have in mind the case of a brewer convicted by a magistrate whose judgment was, in my opinion, unsound. He was convicted because of some act on the part of his agent, although I do not think he was personally responsible. I submit this suggestion to the minister.

Mr. EULER: A conviction might easily be registered once or twice, or four or five or six times, as has been the case. A good many brewers in this and other provinces have violated the provincial liquor laws as many as six times, and I venture to say—I am not referring to the government of any particular party—that there would not be very grave doubt what public opinion might be as to whether these licenses should be cancelled. I would observe this further: I believe that there is a sense of justice in most public men—I believe it characterizes those in responsible positions in charge of departments, whether they belong to one party or the other—which would restrain them from doing such a thing as my hon. friend suggests. My hon. friend has spoken about public opinion. Would a minister, for political reasons or for no adequate reason at all, dare to cancel a license, even if he did not have that sense of justice to which I have alluded? I cannot agree with my hon. friend that a power like this would be abused. After all, I have a good deal of faith in the sense of justice of most men; and there is the further fact that such power has never been abused in the past.

Mr. BOYS: In the Customs Act you have very much the same thing. Any man who offends under that act is given an opportunity of being heard by the minister and there is an appeal from the minister to the Exchequer court. But there is nothing here that indicates that the offender is to have a hearing. I do not say that the present minister would not give him a hearing; but we are discussing the act as it stands, and under that act the minister is not obliged to give him a hearing or to assign any reason. He can act upon any reason, good, bad or indifferent. There should be something in the act affording the offender an opportunity of being heard. If the minister does not like the thought of prosecution and wants to assume jurisdiction himself, let there be some provision to ensure that the offender shall be heard, just as a man is heard under the provisions of the Customs Act. Under that act he is not only heard by the minister, who gives a decision, but there is an appeal from the minister. Why not have such a provision in this act?

Mr. KENNEDY: What does the minister think the words "public interest" mean in this connection? Would the paying of campaign funds to either of the parties be one of the offences?

Mr. EULER: I am not sure that my hon. friend expects an answer to that.

Mr. KENNEDY: Why not?

Mr. EULER: I am free to say I do not think I know so much about campaign funds as my hon. friend appears to do. Certainly it would have no weight with me at all. But "in the public interest" would mean in the interest of the revenue, and I think the Department of National Revenue, when it found any brewer or distiller defrauding the revenue, should have the power to suspend the license immediately without waiting to go to the courts. I repeat, I do not think that any minister, I care not to what party he might belong, would exercise the power unjustly.

Mr. BOYS: You must have proof that he is defrauding.

Mr. EULER: Public opinion would drive him from office if he committed so palpable an injustice.

Mr. BOYS: But you must have proof.

Mr. EULER: And no minister would refuse a hearing.

Mr. BOYS: But do you not think the act should give that right?

Mr. EULER: It would be tying the hands of the minister unduly.

Mr. BOYS: You might as well say the same of the Customs Act.

Mr. KENNEDY: What was the amount in dispute in the case referred to to-night where the license was cancelled?

Mr. EULER: We got $320,000 I think, and perhaps we might not have received it had not the moment been opportune, because it was just then a question whether or not the license would be renewed. Had the occasion been a week or two later we should not have been able to exercise the power we did.

Mr. KENNEDY: Were the arrears in that case the accumulation of several years or of one year?

Mr. EULER: Two or three years.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That was the sales tax?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That was only the sales and gallonage tax?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Security may be by bond of liquor commissions.

Mr. EULER: This is one of the new clauses added to the original bill. I move that:

3. Subsection one of section fifty-seven of the said act is amended by adding thereto the following proviso:

Provided that if the applicant for a license is any board, commission or other government agency which by the law of any province of Canada is vested with the right of selling or authorizing the sale of intoxicating liquor, the security hereby required may be by bond of such board, commission, or other government agency without sureties.

This is advanced at the request of one of the provincial governments who felt that they were put to unnecessary expense in obtaining the bond of any ordinary guarantee company. We thought we should be safe in accepting the bond of the commission itself. I might ask the opinion of my hon. friend from Fort William as to whether I am on safe ground in saying that.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Recovery of penalties.

Mr. EULER: This is also a new section. It is rather lengthy, but I may explain that it extends the jurisdiction of magistrates to impose imprisonment not only for six months but for a year. We ordinarily choose to proceed by what the lawyers term summary action. The judges have already the power to impose this punishment, but we should like to make it certain that the magistrate shall have the same power. It follows the law in the Customs Act.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Bottling spirits in bond.

Mr. EULER: This merely gives to the liquor commissions in the provinces the right to bottle in bond just as is given the distillers.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Duties of excise on imitation beer.

Mr. EULER: This section has been reconsidered and I now move that section 3 of bill No. 54 as introduced, now section 6 of the reprint, be struck out.

Mr. BENNETT: Why?

Mr. EULER: It is struck out for this reason: it imposes upon the manufacturers of beer who do not make their beer out of barley malt a higher tax than is imposed upon those who make their beer out of rice, say.

Mr. BENNETT: You are going to leave the old section 198 as it is?

Mr. EULER: Yes, and those who desire to make malt out of rice can do so on the same basis as those who make malt out of barley.

Mr. BENNETT: I wonder if the minister would leave the bill in committee until the first of the week?

Mr. EULER: Is there some special reason?

Mr. BENNETT: There is an hon. member on this side who is very familiar with it, and he will not be here until Monday.

Mr. EULER: I am quite content, although the sections are so non-contentious that I should like to get it out of the way.

Mr. BENNETT: I believe the hon. gentleman has something to say with regard to section 2.

Mr. EULER: Very well, I will move that the committee rise and report progress.

Progress reported.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. C. A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the second reading of Bill No. 194, to amend the Canadian National Railway Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Application of Railway Act to Canadian Government Railways.

Mr. GARDINER: Will the minister explain the scope of this proposed legislation?

Mr. DUNNING: Under the old section, which will be seen in the explanatory note, the Canadian Government Railways were under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners with respect to their operation but not with respect to construction and maintenance. The object of the amendment is to put the Canadian Government Railways under the Board of Railway Commissioners as all other railways are under their control, especially with regard to the construction and maintenance of the lines. It is thought that there is now no reason for what might be called special privilege for the government railways, and when I speak of government railways I am distinguishing between them and the Canadian National Railways generally. It is understood that the Canadian National Railways generally are already under the control of the Board of Railway Commissioners. This section deals with the old Canadian Government Railways, the Intercolonial Railway and the National Transcontinental Railway, and seeks to bring them more completely under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners than is now the case.

Mr. BENNETT: What necessity has arisen to demand this legislation?

Mr. DUNNING: The necessity arises through the demands of people along the lines affected for improvements of one kind or another for which, in any other part of the country, they would secure an order from the Board of Railway Commissioners. With respect to these particular lines they find it necessary to come to the minister exactly as they did when the minister had direct control over the Intercolonial Railway and the National Transcontinental Railway.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely this does not apply to the Intercolonial Railway?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. CANTLEY: Do I understand that the minister wants to be protected from the people of the maritime provinces?

Mr. DUNNING: No, I have no desire to be protected from the people of any part of Canada, but I do desire to give the people of every part of this country the same right to appear before the Board of Railway Commissioners and appeal for anything they think should be done which comes within the scope of the Railway Act. Really this simply creates a standard practice on our Canadian railways, and I think the house will agree that it is desirable that all our system should be operated in a standard manner.

Mr. CANTLEY: We in the maritime provinces regard the Intercolonial Railway as something quite different from the other railways of this country. It is part of an agreement which was made at confederation, and there is a feeling abroad to some extent at least that we have certain obligations toward the Canadian National Railways, or in other words that we are not entitled to the benefits of competition. I should like the house and the minister to understand that the Intercolonial Railway was built for the people of the maritime provinces; it was one of the conditions of confederation, that the railway be built to serve us.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps if I were to say to my hon. friend that this amendment is not desired by the Canadian National Railways, who believe themselves to be subject to much less expense under the present system than they will be if under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners, he will not regard it as something which is not in the interests of the people of the maritime provinces. The Canadian National Railways do not desire this amendment.

Mr. BENNETT: If they do not want it and it is going to cost more money, why have it?

Mr. DUNNING: We are doing this in the interests of a standard practice, and I will point out an instance to my hon. friend. In connection with the matter of fencing, he well knows through his connection with railways what a problem this has been throughout the country. The Board of Railway Commissioners have gradually developed a standard practice in regard to ordering the railway companies to provide fences. All down through the maritime provinces that problem still exists, and under this amendment the Board of Railway Commissioners will have power to order the company to build the fences. I submit that there is no reason why the people of that part of Canada should not have the same right to apply to the Board of Railway Commissioners for an order against the railway company, just as the people in any other part of Canada do. It is also desirable that the same regulations with regard to clearances, for example, should be operative on all the railways of Canada. It is unfortunate, perhaps, but in some of the communities served by the Intercolonial Railway, due largely to the period in our history when the railway was built, the clearances are not as complete and free as they have become since on the railways generally under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners. I think everyone will agree that it is desirable to have standard clearances throughout Canada, and under this amendment the Board of Railway Commissioners will have power to see that the clearances along the Intercolonial railway are standardized. The National Transcontinental, of course, was built at a later period and consequently has greater clearances. I give these merely as instances. My friend the leader of the opposition is correct in saying it may cost the Canadian National more money to comply with orders which the Board of Railway Commissioners may make; but inasmuch as similar orders are already being made throughout Canada, I see no reason why the people of the maritime provinces should not have the protection of the same orders and standard devices which prevail elsewhere throughout Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: I understand that standard orders as to clearances and so on are in force already throughout Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: That is not quite correct.

Mr. BENNETT: I have not recently been over the road as frequently as I used to be, but from 1912 on the clearances were standard, and everything else was done under the same rules and regulations as though it were under the Board of Railway Commissioners. At one time I advocated in the house the bringing of the Intercolonial under the Board of Railway Commissioners, and I believed it was right. Subsequently I changed my mind, because I realized that the Intercolonial was different from any other railway in Canada; that it owed its being to the provisions of the pact by which its construction was provided for. I cannot understand what is behind this. If it is going to cost more money and nobody is asking for it, why should we do it?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is correct except in this respect: as applying to construction and maintenance, these railways are not and never have been under the Board of Railway Commissioners. Difficulties arise every few months, I may say, particularly in respect to labour unions, on matters of maintenance. That is another point which I did not mention before. Standard methods and practice are of importance to labour and labour unions. At present the government railways are under the Board of Railway Commissioners with respect to management and operation, and with respect to maintenance so far as the safety and protection of railway employees and passengers upon the railway are affected; but always there are questions of interpretation, as to whether or not the particular matter of maintenance under discussion is one which affects the safety of passengers and employees. By this amendment we eliminate that question of interpretation altogether and make the Board of Railway Commissioners the judges of what is needed.

Mr. BENNETT: In other words you substitute some other engineer for the railway's engineer.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend is right, we might as well eliminate all the expenses of the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of fact, they do very little. The Canadian Pacific Railway maintains a higher standard than is required; then there is the rock ballast of the National railway line also to Chicago. What I cannot understand is why this should be done, having in mind what the minister has said.

Mr. DUNNING: I thought it was so self-apparent that it would require no explanation. If other members of the committee share my hon. friend's view, and if there is no demand for a standard of maintenance, I should like to know of it. I thought this was something so much in the public interest that I was taking a forward step in bringing about the same conditions in the maritime provinces as exist elsewhere in this regard. If it is desired to let railways decide their own standards of maintenance and construction, let parliament say so.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not say that; the hon. gentleman cannot get away with that sort of thing. When he talks about the standard of maintenance he knows very well he is talking piffle. The standard of maintenance between Toronto and Montreal is different altogether from that which prevails in other parts of Canada, and the standard is one which the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific do not respect, because their standard is much better. In this country, under any system of government, the Canadian National Railway is bound to provide for the Intercolonial such a standard of efficiency as the traffic demands. I admit I am taking up too much time in talking about it, but what I am anxious to know is who is wanting it. The minister says the railway does not want it.

Mr. DUNNING: I must object to my hon. friend's word when he says I am talking "piffle" in advocating the standardization of practice and equipment. There is a minimum standard set up, as he well knows, by the railway commission. Will he argue for a moment that the setting up of that minimum of standard by the Board of Railway Commissioners has not tended throughout the years to improve the general standard of construction and maintenance throughout Canada? Of course he will not.

Mr. BENNETT: I would say at once, no, it has not. The standard which now prevails on both the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific is higher than that laid down by the Board of Railway Commissioners, as to rail, fastenings, roadbed, class and kind of ballast, and structures and approaches.

Mr. DUNNING: But not on the Intercolonial in all cases.

Mr. BENNETT: I will tell you where you will find the minimum—on some branch lines in western Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: On some of the branch lines on the Intercolonial. If the member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) were here to-night, he would tell my hon. friend all the refusals, from his point of view, for instance,—and there are others,—of the Canadian National to do what the Board of Railway Commissioners would order them to do were they under the jurisdiction of the board, in the matter of fences, for instance. I have mentioned the representation of the unions with regard to the matter of standards of maintenance on the Intercolonial lines. I believe I am correct in saying that that particular matter has been adjusted, for the reason that I took it up with the railway; but I cannot see any reason why, with respect to this particular part of the Canadian National system, the management should be able to say: We do not have to take any notice of the Board of Railway Commissioners, whereas with respect to the rest of the same system they are compelled to do so. I should like to hear an expression of opinion from the rest of the committee, because if this is not a proper step to take, I should like to know it.

Mr. CANTLEY: We have a general opinion in the maritime provinces that we have suffered in recent years because the road has been taken over and operated as it has, and naturally or unnaturally we are a little suspicious of any additional changes which will further put the railway under the control of any other department, whether it be the Board of Railway Commissioners or any other. We would prefer to have the Intercolonial railway as we had it before unholy hands were laid on it ten or fifteen years ago, or say before 1912. The explanation, so far as I can see, appears all right. I do not know that the proposed change is going to interfere very much, but I am not sure that I see all the way through it, and I would prefer to leave the situation as it was.

Mr. KENNEDY: Will the minister explain the reference to the Expropriation Act in the last few lines of the bill?

Mr. DUNNING: The difference between the expropriation procedure under the Railway Act and under the Government Railways Act I think I can put briefly in this way—and some of the legal members may help me out if I get off the track a little in my terminology. If the government railways undertake to expropriate property they may surrender that property again to the former owner and are liable only for any damages which may have accrued during the period of occupancy of the government railways. If expropriation proceedings are taken under the terms of the general Railway Act, the expropriation once made confirms the ownership of the property in the railway. They must pay for the property and then of course they have the right to sell it, but they cannot hand it back in the same manner as the crown can do under the ordinary crown expropriation procedure which applies to the Canadian Government Railways Act.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. W D. EULER (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of Bill No. 198, to amend the Customs Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Vessels found hovering in territorial waters may be boarded and brought into port.

Mr. BENNETT: Subclause (2) reads:

> Any vessel in territorial waters of Canada, shall bring to when required so to do in the king's name.

Is "bring to" the proper term?

Mr. EULER: I am told so.

[Mr. Cantley.]

Mr. BENNETT: I have always heard that "heave to" is the proper term. It is the term used in admiralty cases.

Mr. EULER: The matter was discussed in the office the other day and I was assured by the chief official there that "bring to" was the proper term.

Mr. BENNETT: In the English statutes in the English cases and under the admiralty jurisdiction the term used is that the ship is ordered to "heave to". I have never seen the term "bring to". It may be technically correct.

Mr. EULER: I do not think there is any doubt as to the meaning.

Mr. BENNETT: According to the clause I do not think "bring to" means anything. The subclause reads:

> Any vessel in territorial waters of Canada, shall bring to when required so to do in the king's name by any officer or upon signal made by any government vessel or cruiser by hoisting the pennant and ensign approved and appointed for the purpose by order of the governor in council.

Of course, what it is intended to do is clear. The vessel, if it is a sailing vessel, must come up in the wind and thereby lose headway. If it is a steamer, this means that she must stop. I think it is desirable to use some term that will give rise to no uncertainty.

Mr. EULER: If it were a steamer, "heave to" would not be as appropriate as "bring to."

Mr. BENNETT: No, the word "stop" is right.

Mr. DUFF: "Heave to" is the proper term.

Mr. EULER: The matter was discussed in the department and the officials there seemed to know a good deal about it. I am quite willing to accept the opinion of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough.

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough will follow me, I think the term "heave to" is proper with respect to sailing ships.

Mr. DUFF: Quite right.

Mr. BENNETT: But with respect to a steamer I think the idea should be made perfectly clear. Motor boats or vessels using secondary power are supposed on demand to shut off their steam or other motive power and come to a standstill.

Mr. EULER: Why not use a plain English word and say "stop?"

Mr. BENNETT: That is exactly what I was going to say. In the case of a steamer it should stop; in the case of a sailing vessel it should heave to.

Mr. EULER: You want the vessel to stop in either case. Why not use the word "stop" in both cases.

Mr. DUFF: You cannot stop a vessel which has sails.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Why not say "heave to, bring to, or stop?"

Mr. EULER: I think the clause is all right the way it is.

Mr. KENNEDY: Will the minister explain what is meant by territorial waters?

Mr. EULER: I made that explanation as well as I could on Tuesday. It is explained on page 2 of the bill. Subclause (7) reads:

Territorial waters of Canada shall mean the waters forming part of the territory of the Dominion of Canada and the waters adjacent to the Dominion within three miles thereof.

Mr. CANTLEY: I appealed to the minister before in regard to this whole question. So long as the customs and excise duties are as high as they are to-day you cannot stop smuggling in the maritime provinces. For instance, Nova Scotia has two thousand miles of coast line. If the minister had a hundred protective vessels and a thousand coastguards on the coast of the maritime provinces he could not stop the smuggling of liquor. But the Minister of Customs can stop it overnight by reducing the duty to what it was ten years ago, $2.40. If he will turn up the speech that the Hon. Mr. Fielding made the last time he changed the duty, he will find there a wealth of information based on experience. While I am not able to quote verbatim what Mr. Fielding said at the time, in effect it was this: He increased the duty from $1.80 to $2.40, and he said that he was convinced that he had put the duty as high as, and he rather thought higher than, was in the country's interest, and he was absolutely sure that he had reached the limit. He had had some considerable experience. He knew the conditions, and continuing he said he might be asked why, if he viewed the matter that way, why he was raising the duty, and he said that he was making the change at the solicitation of his temperance friends who thought that an increased duty would be conducive towards greater sobriety in the country. I submit that it has not had that effect, that on the contrary it has had the opposite effect, and I tell the minister, in all seriousness, that he will never be able to stop this smuggling with the duty remaining as high as it is to-day, because human nature is the same everywhere, whether it be in the maritime provinces or on the great lakes. While $10 a gallon is imposed on spirits coming into this country and while the customs duty on a case of whiskey costing say $14 is $21 or more, which in the case of West India rum means a duty of 1,000 per cent of the value, smuggling cannot be stopped. You can buy rum at Demerara of first class quality for one dollar a gallon or less. That is the situation to-day, and the minister might as well face it. I understood from the minister last year and the year before that the duty would be reduced simply for the reasons I am outlining now, and I would like to know why it has not been done.

Mr. EULER: Does the hon. gentleman say that I made the statement in the house that the duty would be reduced?

Mr. CANTLEY: The minister in charge at the time.

Mr. EULER: I was in charge last year.

Mr. CANTLEY: Well then, I think the conversation was with you.

Mr. KENNEDY: Subsection 7 of section 1 says:

(7) For the purposes of this section and section two hundred and seven of this act, "territorial waters of Canada", shall mean the waters forming part of the territory of the Dominion of Canada and the waters adjacent to the Dominion within three marine miles thereof, in the case of any vessel, and within twelve marine miles thereof, in the case of any vessel registered in Canada.

Does this mean we are going to have two rum rows, one three miles out and the other twelve miles out? If so, how on earth are you going to enforce the law? What is the advantage of that subsection?

Mr. EULER: As the law now stands, vessels registered in Canada can hover around the three mile limit awaiting an opportunity to discharge their cargoes into smaller boats. If we can make them stay twelve miles out from our coast, we have a little better opportunity of watching them and seizing their cargoes.

Mr. HEAPS: Would not this result in more Canadian vessels coming under foreign registry?

Mr. EULER: I do not think so.

Mr. ERNST: I doubt if subsection 7 will have any real effect. I am still of the opinion I expressed the other day, that the jurisdiction of Canada, even over its own nationals, is territorial. It is an accepted fact that only sovereign states have jurisdiction over their own nationals extraterritorially, and ships would come within the same category once they get beyond the borders of the country. I am firmly of the opinion that that portion of the act which permits the seizure of a vessel of Canadian registry outside the three mile limit, as it is called, will be held ultra vires by the courts. I do not think that even since the last imperial conference we can be classed as a sovereign country. Certainly there is nothing which would induce the courts to change the opinion they have formed, and they have definitely held that the jurisdiction of non-sovereign states is purely territorial. Great Britain has jurisdiction over its own nationals, or at least can punish them for offences committed outside of Great Britain on the high seas, but once our ships leave the three mile limit they come under British mercantile law. My opinion is that subsection 7 is not going to accomplish anything, but if it does, all it will do will be to make ships of Canadian registry register in the United States or at St. Pierre. If the minister were at all conversant with the conditions he would surely realize from the outset that the clause is futile.

Mr. EULER: I spoke on this the other night. As I said, I am not a constitutional lawyer or any other kind of lawyer, and I am not in a position to express any legal opinion. But I should think it at least regrettable if the Dominion government has not control over its own vessels.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It is time it had, but it has not.

Mr. EULER: The Minister of Justice will probably like to make some comments upon this, and I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps he would look into the expression "bring to" at the same time.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, April 13, 1928

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Fifth report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Parent.

[Mr. Ernst.]

JUDGES' SALARIES

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER QUESTION

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved:

That in accordance with the resolution passed by this house on the twentieth of March, 1928, the special committee to consider the question of the adequacy of the remuneration paid to the judges of the various courts in Canada, and all matters pertaining thereto, consist of the following members: Messieurs Boys, Bell (Hamilton), Bell (St. John-Albert), Cantley, Carmichael, Duff, Fafard, Gershaw, Hay, Ladner, Lapointe, Miss Macphail, Messieurs Sanderson, Thorson and Totzke, with power to send for persons, papers or records, and to report from time to time.

Motion agreed to.

VALUATION OF IMPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): I desire to ask the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler) whether it is correct that the order in council which enables him to put a fair valuation on fruits and other imports from the United States has been cancelled and, if cancelled, why.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of National Revenue): It is quite true that the order to which the hon. member refers has been cancelled by council.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why?

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is a large question.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It could not be answered.

CHICAGO DRAINAGE CANAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): I promised to lay on the table of the house to-day the papers and communications between the Canadian government and the government of the United States in connection with the Chicago drainage question. That promise was made upon the request of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan). I find, however, that in respect of the two recent dispatches that have passed between the two governments the government at Washington has not yet consented to their being made public. We expect to have that consent within a few days, when I shall bring down the return.

RADIO—CANCELLATION OF LICENSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin) supplement what he said yesterday with regard to the cancellation of certain radio licenses, by stating the reason for the cancellation of the license of Universal Radio of Canada, Limited, which I understand is an independent concern although its equipment has been used by the International Bible Students Association. What reason is there for cancelling the license of this organization?

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): The reasons for the cancellation of that license were the same as those advanced for the cancellation of the others. I quite realize that this company may be in a somewhat different position. This point has been brought to my attention, and I am considering the facts in regard to that particular case. I will be in a position before very long to give a decision in regard to it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the government afford us an opportunity to discuss this very extraordinary proceeding?

Mr. CARDIN: The house will have full opportunity to discuss all matters in that connection when the estimates of my department come before the house.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT

The house resumed from April 12 consideration in committee of Bill No. 198, to amend the Customs Act—Mr. Euler—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Vessels found hovering in territorial waters may be boarded and brought into port.

Mr. BENNETT: Is the minister going to leave the words "bring to" as they are?

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of National Revenue): We had some debate yesterday as to the propriety of those words, which are intended to indicate that a vessel should come to a stop. Yesterday I was rather in agreement with the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) with regard to the words "heave to" rather than the words "bring to", but I think we might settle the dispute if we adopt some different words which will be perfectly clear. For that reason I move, seconded by Mr. Lapointe, that the words "bring to" in line thirteen be struck out and that the words "proceed to come to a stop" be substituted therefor. I think that should meet all objections.

Mr. DUFF: Before the amendment carries, I am afraid the minister does not realize what those words mean. You cannot bring a ship at sea to a stop without great danger to the passengers, the crew and the cargo, whether it is a sailing ship or a steamer. In the case of a sailing ship the words "heave to" are correct; they mean that the vessel comes into the wind and proceeds gradually. In the case of a steamer the words "slow down" are proper, because if a steamer stopped and got into the trough of the sea, or if the wind were ahead and she went backwards, she might capsize and founder. Consequently I think the amendment is not in accordance with marine rules and usage.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I would have hesitated to venture an opinion with reference to language of this kind if I had not had the benefit of the views of an officer of my department with regard to the expression "bring to". I am told that the expression "bring to" is defined by Todd and Whall on Seamanship as an order from one ship to another to heave to, that it may be boarded or spoken. Evidently the distinction is that "bring to" is a special expression while "heave to" is a general expression. The Admiralty Manual of Seamanship defines "bring to" as an expression used in bending sails or when a ship is about to anchor, and I am also told that this expression has been used in Dominion legislation for some time past. Still, I have no objection to seconding the amendment of my hon. friend.

Mr. EULER: I took some trouble this morning to get advice with regard to this expression from those who should know. After all it is a small matter, and I do not think there should be any doubt as to what is intended. In answer to my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough I would say that the words "proceed to come to a stop" does not indicate any sudden effort to stop; I think it will answer the requirements of sailing vessels as well as steamers.

Mr. DUFF: "Come to a stop" means that eventually the ship will stop, but it is a dangerous thing for any preventive ship belonging to any government to order either a sailing vessel or a steamer to stop in the middle of the ocean. That is a dangerous proceeding, and it is not fair to the owners of ships, because it will endanger the lives of the crews and subject the ships themselves to great hazard.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ERNST: I understand that the Minister of Justice was to give an opinion with regard to subsection (7); we were so informed last night by the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. EULER: I was not trying to bind my friend: he can do as he wishes.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am sorry I was not here last night, but I read Hansard this morning and I think my hon. friend has made a slight mistake. It was he who suggested that I should express some view in the matter.

Mr. ERNST: No, it was the minister.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It does not matter very much anyway. I was not here on Tuesday either, but I took the opportunity this morning to read Hansard in order to see what took place on the other two occasions. The views of my hon. friend are about the same as those set forth in this house in 1923, when as Minister of Marine and Fisheries I introduced some legislation with regard to the north Pacific halibut fisheries. That legislation was designed to put into force the provisions of the treaty with the United States concerning the protection of the halibut fisheries in north Pacific waters. Both in the treaty and in the statute adopted by this house there was a provision which conferred extraterritorial jurisdiction upon the enactment of parliament. I mention the fact that this was in the treaty also because that treaty was ratified by His Majesty the King, and no one either in England or in Canada challenged the right of Canada in that respect, and that statute never has been challenged since. It has been enforced since, giving the right to our officers to seize vessels, even on the high seas, which are engaged in fishing halibut in the prohibited zone during the prohibited season. However, at that time the same objection was raised against that statute, and I am free to admit that my hon. friend can quote authority in support of his contention. It is a debatable question in some respects; it has been debated, but I believe that the trend of constitutional authority is now rather to the effect that the dominions have the same right within their sphere of legislation as the Imperial parliament has within its sphere. This view is specially supported in the case of the award re Cooks' and Stewards' Union. That was a New Zealand case, in which the court decided that the award of a New Zealand court of arbitration as to wages to be paid on vessels trading between New Zealand and Australia was binding with reference to vessels registered in New Zealand.

In the well known Canadian case of Cain versus Gilhula, where aliens had been deported under the Canadian legislation with regard to alien labour, for having come to this country in contravention of our law, those men took proceedings by way of habeas corpus, and the court of first instance decided that as there was a question of extraterritoriality involved our statute was not constitutional; but the Privy Council decided otherwise, and that Canada may exert extraterritorial powers for the purpose of exercising her sovereign powers as effectively as the Imperial authority.

There have been two cases decided by the Supreme Court of Canada, in re Frederick Gerring and re North, in which vessels had been captured outside the three-mile limit, taken in hot pursuit, and the seizure was declared valid by the supreme court.

Mr. ERNST: Different circumstances.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I admit that the circumstances may be a little different, but still the extraterritoriality was admitted in that case. My hon. friend is right as to the point that there is a certain element of doubt attached to the matter, and it is for that reason that in 1920, I believe, the then government submitted to parliament the resolution for the purpose of amending the British North America Act, in order that it should be made clear that any enactment of this parliament within its jurisdiction had the same effect with regard to extraterritorial rights as an enactment of the Imperial parliament. The resolution was adopted by the parliament of Canada in 1920, but I see in the correspondence that there was some difficulty as to the drafting of the resolution or rather of the legislation to be introduced in the Imperial parliament. There was an exchange of views between the law officers of the crown in Great Britain and the Department of Justice; and as a result, in 1924, I myself, as Minister of Justice, introduced a new resolution to this parliament with somewhat different language. It was to the effect that

> An enactment of the parliament of Canada, if expressed to operate extraterritorially, shall have, and be deemed to have had, that operation, if and in so far as it is a law for or ancillary to the peace, order and good government of Canada.

This resolution was voted by the parliament of Canada, but I may qualify this by saying that the Senate amended it in some slight manner, so as to safeguard the rights of the provinces in that respect. The amendment came to the House of Commons on the last day of the session and was accepted then; but we found afterwards that the language was not exactly what it was intended to be, and that a new resolution would have to be passed by this house to amend it.

The whole question came before the Imperial conference of 1926, not brought there by Canada but by other dominions, and it was then decided that this matter should be submitted as well as other matters to a committee of jurists which is to be appointed for the purpose of looking into all those questions. Meanwhile, as it is a very important matter concerning peace, order and good government in Canada, I think this parliament should take the same view as was taken in regard to the halibut fishery treaty, and that it should be made clear that as far as we are concerned we believe that for the peace, order and good government of Canada we should have in that respect the extraterritorial jurisdiction which the legislation of the Imperial parliament has provided with regard to their own affairs.

Mr. ERNST: Mr. Chairman, I am very much indebted to the minister, as I am sure the house is, for his discussion of the matter, and I can assure him that we are as desirous as hon. gentlemen opposite are to make effective and enforcible the customs laws of this country. Unfortunately I am not familiar with the section in the north Pacific convention to which he refers, and it is impossible without it before me to say whether it is the same as the proposed subsection 7 with which we are now dealing.

A number of the cases cited by the minister are not in point. For instance, the case of the ship North. The infraction in that case was committed within the teritorial jurisdiction of Canada, and what was involved was the right of immediate pursuit, or hot pursuit as it is termed. It seems to me we ought to approach this question frankly. The fact that the fishery decision was not challenged is no answer; that simply means that it has never stood the test. What I have suggested, and what I suggest again, is that we should be frank in the matter. The Minister of Justice admits that there is doubt, and knowing that there is doubt, knowing that this provision is almost certain to be challenged, that seizures will be made within the twelve-mile limit, and that the question will come before the court and result in expensive litigation, why not go before the Imperial parliament and get legislation which will make it certain?

Mr. LAPOINTE: My friend has not noticed my statement in that respect. The Imperial government were quite willing to enact legislation to enforce the will of this parliament in that regard They asked, and we agreed, that the whole matter should come up with regard to the other dominions as well as to Canada. If Canada asks for that amendment, it will be made and agreed to by the Imperial parliament.

Mr. ERNST: What I am suggesting is that really the proper procedure would be to ask for it immediately, so that the customs laws can be enforced. There is grave doubt whether this is constitutional. My hon. friend is no doubt aware that Lord Halsbury has expressed the opinion that the colonies, including in that the self-governing dominions, have a jurisdiction which is territorial. What is going to be done in this case is to create what amounts to a new and distinct criminal offence on the high seas, that is perhaps ten or twelve miles from the shore. The anomaly that will occur will be that you are creating the offence for Canadian vessels at a time when United States or French vessels can come inside and trade with impunity. As the minister is probably aware, the method adopted by the people engaged in this business to-day is to go to the West India islands, load up with a cargo usually consisting of rum, come to some prearranged point off the coast and there sell the cargo in the open sea. The law leaves the onus or responsibility of getting the goods, as they are called, on shore on the little man, not on the man who makes the purchase in the West Indies. The result will be simply that the business will be carried on by vessels other than those of Canadian registry and the section will be of no value.

Mr. EULER: If that be true, will it not be equally true, if we ask for the remedy that the hon. gentleman suggests, namely, that we secure an amendment to the British North America Act? Would that preclude United States vessels or vessels of any other country, from operating within the twelve-mile limit?

Mr. ERNST: There are two points I want to make. I am suggesting first that this section is not constitutional and, second, even if it is enacted in this form, before you make treaty arrangements with other nations, you will not make any real headway in the suppression of smuggling. The result will be that vessels of Canadian registry will go to foreign ports, become registered there and carry on the business.

Mr. EULER: Is it not true that vessels of Canadian ownership cannot obtain foreign registry?

Mr. ERNST: It is very easy to make a transfer which is only a transfer on paper. That is done every day.

Mr. EULER: This will at least make it more difficult for them to do that.

Mr. ERNST: It may. But I suggest that the difficulty will really amount to nothing in the final analysis. I started however on the constitutional aspect of this sub-clause. I am suggesting that, as there is this grave doubt, and because, as the Minister of Justice has very frankly admitted, in face of all we have heard about the recent Imperial conference and Canada being a sovereign country, we are not really a sovereign country, we should go to the Imperial parliament and secure the necessary legislation.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend goes too far when he says that I admit that. I said that he was justified in expressing his views in that regard and he is not alone in holding that opinion, but I do not agree with him that this would be unconstitutional. I said that the bulk of authority is on the other side. May I quote one of our constitutional writers on the constitution of Canada, namely, Mr. Lefroy, who says:

> Moreover, bearing in mind the fact that, as we shall see, the powers of the Dominion parliament, as also all the provincial legislatures are as plenary and ample within the limits prescribed by the British North America Act as the Imperial parliament in the plenitude of its power possessed and could bestow, and that the expressed intention was to confer upon the Dominion a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom, it seems beyond question that they must have the same power to bind their own subjects everywhere as the Imperial parliament has to bind British subjects everywhere.

A very distinguished legal gentleman, Sir John W. Salmond, who was Solicitor General of New Zealand, in an article in the Law Quarterly Review for 1917, writes as follows:

> There is no rule of substantive constitutional law which prevents a colonial legislature from enacting such extraterritorial prohibitions or authorizations as may be required for the peace, order and good government of the colony.

Even the law officers of the crown in England, when this parliament adopted in 1920 the resolution to which I refer, make this statement in their correspondence with regard to air regulations, because it was on the matter of aviation that parliament was incited to ask that the whole matter should be cleared up because, as the committee will realize, it is very easy for an aviator to cross the boundary line and if parliament has no extraterritorial jurisdiction attached to its legislation, our law could be broken very easily. The law officers felt that the power actually possessed by the Dominion parliament entitled them to make their regulations applicable to Canadian aviators even for offences committed while they were outside of the boundaries of Canada. This question is being discussed in all the dominions. I remember that after the peace treaty, when the territory of Samoa was put under the mandate of New Zealand, New Zealand thought that as there was doubt as to her power of extraterritorial jurisdiction, she could not have her laws apply in that territory, and an imperial order in council was adopted for the purpose of giving that right to New Zealand. But General Smuts, who was then premier of South Africa, to which West Africa which had been taken from Germany was given as a mandatory territory, claimed that South Africa as a self-governing dominion had the right of extraterritoriality and no order in council or legislation was passed in order to give that additional right. So I think we are in pretty good company in asserting this right in this case and I am sure there will be no difficulty because the whole matter will be made clear when the judicial committee make a decision in this connection.

Mr. EULER: I cannot pretend to make any legal argument and I have no intention of doing so, but I should like to set forth what I regard as a reasonable view to take of the situation. The department has been very much troubled by the practice of these rum-smuggling vessels loitering just beyond the three-mile limit and demoralizing the whole coast line in many instances.

Mr. CANTLEY: They are not loitering They are very active.

Mr. EULER: We want the power to cope with them just as quickly as possible. We might go to the British parliament and ask for an amendment to the British North America Act as the hon. member has suggested, but that would take time. There is, as the Minister of Justice has conceded, a reasonable doubt as to the constitutionality of what we propose to do, but there is a pretty strong presumption that we are right. If the clause goes through as it stands, we are certainly going to exercise our rights under it. Then we are in a practical position to have the constitutionality or legality of it tested out. The case will be fought out in the courts. If we win, the matter is settled. If we lose, we still have the remedy of going to the British parliament for an amendment to the British North America Act. We should like to have a remedy now. We are dealing with a difficult situation and if we postpone much longer dealing with it, it becomes all the more difficult to apply the remedy. I should also like to say in reply to my hon. friend when he spoke of the danger of our Canadian boats securing United States registry and becoming owned by Americans, that does not seem to me to be so serious a danger because of the fact—and I think I am right in this—that an American-owned vessel cannot legally carry liquor at all.

Mr. DUFF: That is quite right.

Mr. ERNST: But they do.

Mr. EULER: I hope the committee will consent to leave the clause as it stands.

Mr. CANTLEY: I am opposed to this legislation for half a dozen reasons. In the first place, it is autocratic. In the next place, it will be inefficient, and I should think the minister by this time would have realized that. My hon. friend from Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst) referred a moment ago to vessels going under American registry. I do not think they will go under American registry, but under Newfoundland or French registry, and what can the minister do then?

Mr. EULER: That would take some time.

Mr. CANTLEY: It would take about fifteen minutes, just time enough for them to go down to St. Pierre, which is where the great bulk of this traffic originates, where it all originates so far as spirits are concerned. So far as rum is concerned, the traffic originates in the West Indies. The ships could also register in South America or British Honduras. There is no end of places where they could register.

Mr. EULER: They would have to change ownership.

Mr. CANTLEY: I can tell the minister that they do not have to change ownership, and we have had abundant proof of that in the last two years in this house. That will not get you anywhere.

Then look at the provisions of this bill. Look at subsection 4, for instance. What is the effect of that? It is almost an inducement for his officers to commit murder and be held free of all consequences in doing so. That is a provision entirely uncalled for, and his proposals will be entirely ineffective. I think the minister himself is convinced of that fact, and if he is not, he ought to be. If he lived in the maritime provinces or in any maritime country he would realize what the difficulties are. You cannot stop rum running in that way. There is one simple method of stopping it to which I have referred before in this house several times, and that is by lowering the duty.

Mr. EULER: That will not stop it either.

Mr. CANTLEY: It would stop 90 per cent of it.

Mr. EULER: It will not stop it entirely because smuggling existed before the duty was raised. I am not expressing any opinion whether the duty ought to be cut or not. I am rather in sympathy with what my hon. friend suggests, but there was smuggling of liquor prior to the time that the duty was raised to $10 a gallon.

Mr. CANTLEY: I am glad to have the minister admit that he is in sympathy with my view. I knew that he was. Now why does he not act on that view? What is the use of our attempting to pass in this house legislation that we know we cannot enforce, and which is vicious in principle and contrary to British justice and contrary to all commonsense, because that is what it is. As I said before, you cannot stop smuggling in this way. I would ask the minister how much liquor was smuggled into Canada when the duty on whiskey was $1.80 a gallon? Smuggling was not worth while then, and it would not be done to-morrow under the same conditions, but the difficulty is that to-day on some of the liquor that is coming in the duty is practically 1,000 per cent. How are you going to stop smuggling under those conditions? The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg has referred to the modus operandi, how vessels come off the coast and peddle their goods to smaller boats that run them into the shore. The twelve mile limit will not affect these boats at all because they will be there under foreign registry. I am surprised that the Minister of Finance is supporting this legislation. He knows what the situation is, and he is the man who is responsible; there is no question about that, and I appeal to him and to the minister in charge of this bill to use that large stock of commonsense which I know they both possess and do what ought to be done instead of attempting in the way proposed by this bill to stop the smuggling of spirits.

Mr. DUFF: I am sure that the reason for the amendment contained in subsection 7 is because the minister feels that extending our territorial waters to the twelve mile limit will have a greater effect in stopping smuggling than when the territorial waters extend only to the three mile limit. That may be quite true. But if it is true, I would like to ask the minister why he has increased the limit from three miles only to twelve miles, because if the twelve mile limit is going to be more effectual than the three mile limit in preventing smuggling, and if this parliament has the power to extend the limit, I respectfully submit that instead of making the limit twelve miles the minister should make it fifty miles, because then the vessels would have to lay off fifty miles from the shore, and if they came within the fifty miles the revenue cutters of the minister would be able to seize them and take them into port and tie them up. This is a good subsection if this parliament has the constitutional power to enact it, which I very much doubt. I agree with the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg that this is an international matter; it is not a matter for the British parliament at all. The worst feature of this legislation is that the ships of Great Britain, where they manufacture the whiskey, can load up with whiskey in Scotland and then come across and lay to off the United States and our Canadian coast, while our own ships will have to lay to beyond the twelve mile limit. If the British government was so anxious to stop the smuggling of whiskey into Canada, they should agree not to allow their own vessels to clear from their own ports when they know that they are going to break the laws of Canada. But if we have the constitutional right to enact a subsection of this kind, which I very much doubt, then let the minister go the whole way and instead of making the limit twelve miles, make it perhaps fifty miles. I would ask the minister why he fixed upon twelve miles rather than some other figure.

Mr. EULER: I suppose it really springs from a recommendation based upon the limit which they have along the coast of the United States. I have no constitutional objection to making it fifteen or twenty miles. As a matter of fact, I think it was eighteen miles in the first draft, but we reduced it to twelve to conform, I suppose, with the case I have cited. That is all; there is no other reason. Fifty miles might sound a little unreasonable.

Mr. DUFF: The results on the United States coast have not been very successful, and I think we should go them one better, and if the minister would agree, I would ask him to amend his bill to make the limit twenty-five or fifty miles instead of twelve.

Mr. EULER: I think we had better try the half of it first.

Mr. DUFF: I am suggesting fifty.

Mr. CANTLEY: Why not send your cutters right down to St. Pierre and seize these boats just as soon as they come out of port with a full cargo? That shows the ridiculousness of the position the minister takes.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—vessel carrying dutiable or prohibited goods liable to seizure.

Mr. ERNST: I think this section needs careful examination on the part of the minister. May I point out to him the exact wording of it? By subsection 7 of section 1 we have in so far as Canadian vessels are concerned extended, prima facie at least, the territorial waters of Canada to twelve miles from the shore. Now section 3 reads:

If upon the examination by any officer of the cargo of any vessel hovering in territorial waters of Canada—

Let us say that she is eleven and three-quarter miles from the shore:

—any dutiable goods or any goods the importation of which into Canada is prohibited are found on board, such vessel . . . . shall be forfeited.

I quite appreciate why that provision should be made in the case of alcoholic liquors, but in the case of other goods a vesel can scarcely be within the territorial waters of Canada or anywhere else without having some dutiable goods on board. If she has dutiable goods of any character, no matter where they may come from, and she is found in the territorial waters of Canada within the twelve-mile limit—

Mr. EULER: She must be hovering.

Mr. ERNST: Let us say that she had to heave to because of stress of weather, the question arises whether or not she is hovering, and she may be seized unjustifiably. Why not limit the clause to alcoholic liquors?

Mr. EULER: I think the preventive forces will have to be given credit for exercising reasonable discretion in these matters. In my opinion we ought not to make the distinction my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. CANTLEY: I would cite another case to the minister. A yacht is cruising, your officers may term it hovering within the twelve-mile limit; she has an admiralty warrant, which gives her the right to take out of bond liquor and other dutiable goods; she has these goods on board legally—they are not dutiable; a revenue cutter overhauls the yacht, and according to this section she may be seized and condemned. What is to be done in that case?

Mr. EULER: That would not be cargo at all, but ships' stores.

Mr. CANTLEY: The section says that if dutiable or other goods are found on board the vessel shall be seized and forfeited.

Mr. DUFF: I agree with the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst) that fishing vessels sometimes anchor off the Nova Scotia coast to pursue their peaceful avocation of catching cod and haddock. Under this section the preventive officers may go aboard, demand the ship's papers, and make a search.

Mr. VENIOT: That is an extreme case. Her clearance papers disclose her status, and if she is engaged in that pursuit the preventive officers cannot accuse her of hovering.

Section agreed to.

Sections 4, 5 and 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Export of deer.

Mr. SIMPSON: What changes are made in the regulations with respect to the export of deer?

Mr. EULER: Under the present law citizens of Canada are not permitted, for instance, to export deer hides. It very often happens that there is no market for them in Canada but there is in the United States.

Bill reported.

LOAN OF $500,000,000

REDEMPTION OF LOANS AND PURCHASE OF UNMATURED SECURITIES

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 35 to authorize the raising, by way of loan, of certain sums of money for the public service.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Loan authorized.

Mr. BENNETT: My friend the minister will observe that "the governor in council may, in addition to the sums now remaining unborrowed and negotiable of the loans authorized by parliament by any act heretofore passed, raise by way of loan." With respect to those authorizations, in some instances there is no limitation imposed that they shall be used for the redemption of existing securities; whereas this loan is limited to the proceeds being used for that purpose. I simply call his attention to this.

Mr. ROBB: I quite appreciate it. I do not recall the other authorizations under chapter 2 of 1926.

Mr. BENNETT: There are seven or eight of them altogether.

Mr. ROBB: The memorandum I have is that with respect to the loans authorized by chapter 11 of the statutes of 1926 there is still a balance of $131,000,000. I am not sure whether it is limited to renewals or not; I imagine it is; but it is quite understood that this is limited to redemptions.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Charge upon consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister has not given us any information as to how he proposes to utilize this money. Conferring upon the governor in council power to borrow half a billion dollars for the purpose of redeeming existing securities is a very large grant of power without any scheme being submitted. I had occasion a few days ago to draw attention to the course pursued in England. Whenever it is contemplated by legislation there to retire existing securities, it has always been the custom to formulate a plan, and when the house is in committee the Chancellor of the Exchequer expounds at length the principles which govern in connection with the redemption of outstanding securities or the conversion of existing loans. Now this measure contemplates the possibility of conversion; that is clear. It must mean that. It contemplates the possibility of borrowing $500,000,000, let us say, at 4 per cent for the purpose of retiring existing securities, if they were selling at such a rate as would enable the minister to make money thereby. That is clearly what he has in mind. But the minister has formulated no plans, and it is unusual to ask parliament to grant authority to the governor in council to borrow so considerable a sum, under such circumstances, without some statement of the principles that are to govern with respect to redemption or conversion.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is right. I explained on the resolution that we had no plan worked out, but that representations had been made to us from time to time by financial houses that money was becoming easier and that we could convert these outstanding loans and get a lower rate of interest. I think I also made it clear—and I want to emphasize this to-day—that the government has no intention whatever of trying in any way to compel the holders of these 1933's and 1934's to part with their securities before maturity. But from time to time these bonds are on the market; there is trading in them all the time. The government therefore believe that they can work out a plan which will enable them to take in these securities at a lower rate of interest, thus saving that revenue to the Canadian people. Representations have been made to us that in future financing we should provide for a sinking fund so that yearly these maturities might be taken care of. The experience of the department is that some sinking funds we now have are somewhat expensive to administer, as my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton), who has been in the Finance department, will agree. But there is a method of providing for serial or instalment bonds so that we may be able to take care of so much every year. That is what we are doing now with small maturities coming on. In presenting the resolution I stated to the house that we hoped to be able, from now until 1933, to take care out of our revenues of the smaller maturities. As respects this large maturity in 1933 and 1934, however, no one will suggest that it can be taken care of without some refinancing. We will try to work out a plan of refinancing which will be profitable to the people, and we shall be placed in the position where we can get these bonds off the market, with their high rate of interest, and thus save money to the people.

I did not intend to make it public, but I do not mind saying right now that of the maturities coming along this fall—I forget the amount, but I believe it is some fifty million dollars odd—we have bought up a portion which we now have in the government vaults. We are picking them up from day to day whenever we have the money, buying them on a basis that will enable the country, instead of the holders of the bonds, to earn around 4 to 4¼ per cent.

Mr. SPENCER: I understood the Minister of Finance to say that he did not intend to pay off any of the bonds due in 1933-34?

Mr. ROBB: I did not say any; I said we could not take care of all.

Mr. SPENCER: I understood the minister to say that he did not intend to go out on the market and force it.

Mr. ROBB: That we did not intend?

Mr. SPENCER: What I understood the minister to say was that he did not intend to buy them before they matured.

Mr. ROBB: Not to force them.

Mr. SPENCER: I believe that we have to-day outstanding over $800,000,000 in tax free bonds.

Mr. BENNETT: More than that—a couple of billions.

Mr. SPENCER: In view of this very large amount outstanding, and considering the fact that the investors, after all is said and done, have since the war received a very nice return over a number of years, I think it would be in the interest of Canada if some scheme could be carried out whereby these bonds could be bought and any other bond issue made taxable.

Mr. ROBB: They always are.

Mr. SPENCER: Although most of these bonds are, I understand, owned by Canadians, they are owned by very few Canadians, so that the majority of the people are paying for the privilege which this minority enjoy. It would be in the interests of the mass of the people—probably 85 or 90 per cent of the citizens—if these few, this small minority who have received this great benefit for a number of years since the war were paid off so that everybody would come under the ordinary taxation of the country.

Mr. ROBB: The tax-exempt bonds outstanding are: 1931, five per cent; $52,931,600; 1933, five and a half per cent, $446,658,800; 1937, five and a half per cent, $236,299,850.

Mr. BENNETT: And 1934?

Mr. ROBB: That is not tax-exempt. Then there is a five per cent issue of $90,166,900. These are the tax-exempts.

Mr. BENNETT: The Loan Act of 1926 has provision with respect to the process being used for paying, redeeming, or otherwise retiring the whole or any portion of loans or obligations of Canada. It is rather an unfortunate way in which to accumulate authorization, but that perhaps is not so important a matter. The point I do make, however, is this: In the loans that have been made in the last few years, notwithstanding the experience of corporations, no provision has been made for retiring them when money can be obtained at a lesser rate of interest. No provision has been made for retiring them at a premium. However small the premium might be, it seems to me that this country should have the right to retire on notice any securities it hereafter emits. I suggest that because of what has transpired in the world of finance. In England it is so, and has been so for over a hundred years. There has been a provision there enabling them to retire on notice their annuities, 3 per cent and 3½ per cent or consuls. Most corporate financing is now done on the principle of the company having power to retire all the preferred shares at a premium, as well as bonds, depending upon the period which they still have to run. It does appear to me that as most of this financing will be done on the American continent, at any rate, where it is well understood that securities may be retired on notice, there should be a provision—whatever the rate of interest may be at which the securities are hereafter emitted—enabling the minister to take advantage of a possible plan for conversion or refinancing if money was much lower than at the time the issue might be made. My hon. friend (Mr. Spencer) no doubt had some such idea in mind when he referred to tax-exempt securities, and the amount he mentioned is, I think, correct. I was assuming to deal with the sum total which was maturing before 1937, and not the tax-exempt. The tax-exempt is something less than a billion. So I think there is practically $2,000,000,000 of the debt maturing between now and 1937, and I cannot see just how the minister is going to make any substantial profit. It is clear that he cannot borrow money to-day at the rate for which he disposed of the Canadian National securities in the middle of 1927, which would be between 4½ per cent and 4¾ per cent and purchase these tax-exempt securities which now yield something like 4.15 per cent or 4.18 per cent in some instances, because the demand for them has become very great and the yield has become very low. In fact, at one time the 1937's were selling at $110.752, or something like that, the 1933's at about $109 and the 1931's at $106.

Mr. ROBB: The quotation to-day on the 1933's is $104.90.

Mr. BENNETT: What is it for the 1937's?

Mr. ROBB: They are selling at $110, tax free.

Mr. BENNETT: Obviously to buy those at $110 will make it necessary for the minister to sell securities at a lower yield than 4¼ per cent, say about 4.10 per cent. When you take into consideration other matters in connection with them the minister would have to sell securities at not more than 4¼ per cent to be able to buy these other securities, so I cannot see how he can make any money if the market continues as it is at present. Two or three years from now, however, when they begin to go down in price due to the fact that they are nearing maturity—because the price is dependent upon the nearness to maturity in some instances—he might be able to make a little money, but that is the only way I can see in the circumstances.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I believe my hon. friend will not make use of this legislation unless the price reaches such a point as will ensure an immediate profit to the country in these transactions; I would assume that to be his underlying policy in this matter. I do think, however, that the minister should take very careful cognizance of the suggestion made by my leader in connection with the right of redemption. Personally I think we are in for lower money rates; we have had no difficulty at all in disposing of very large emissions both in Canada and the United States where the right of retirement is given after the lapse of so many years, at $102, $104 or $106, which is the highest I remember in any single emission of really good securities. That, of course, is extremely valuable in case what I expect does come about; that is, if we have a progressively lowering rate of interest so far as governmental securities are concerned.

During the discussion another point has come up; that is, the danger of these maturities accumulating at any one time. I assume that my hon. friend does not consider issuing all these securities at once, or making them all payable at a certain time; I suppose he will issue them in each instance having regard to two things. First he will consider the way to get the best value for the security at the time it is issued, and then he will bear in mind the dates upon which other payments fall due, in order to avoid that lumping of governmental obligations which would naturally depress the market price.

Then my hon. friend said something about a sinking fund, and I think he is really getting around to that idea. I will admit that it does cost something to administer a sinking fund, but I do not think it is going to cost much more to administer it if we make use of the machinery and personnel we already have. Even if we give them a great deal more work to do I do not think it will cost a great deal more, although of course my hon. friend has to consider several things in connection with that proposition. He has mentioned the sinking fund on the one hand, while on the other he appears to lean more to the alternative that we should sell instalment bonds. I desire to point out to my friend that instalment bonds do not command a price anything like as good as the bonds which are issued for a stated period, and I think he would find that as a rule we would save money by looking after our retirements through a sinking fund, even though it cost a little more, rather than by selling securities at the lower rate which these instalment bonds always carry.

Mr. ROBB: I will keep that in mind. Just before the chairman rises I want to point out one fact in connection with the last long term loan, which was made not very long ago. My hon. friend will be glad to know that we then followed the practice which he has emphasized to-day, of putting in a callable clause operating within ten or fifteen years.

Mr. MATTHEWS: Was there a callable clause in the railway bonds issued in 1927?

Mr. ROBB: I could not say; I am talking about the government financing. We have adopted this callable clause.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We should have that clause in all the bonds, whether for railways or anything else.

Mr. ROBB: I quite agree.

Mr. SPENCER: I think this is probably the best time to draw to the attention of the minister the fact that in December last the government borrowed from the banks on treasury bills to the extent of $48,000,000, I think. The minister will correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. MATTHEWS: They borrowed $45,000,000.

Mr. SPENCER: They borrowed that money at 4 per cent, and I understand that under the Finance Act these same treasury bills can be bought back by the banks, and that they can get Dominion notes upon them at 3¾ per cent. In other words, the government borrows from the banks at 4 per cent, and the government loans money back to the banks on the same security at 3¾ per cent. I would like an explanation of this, if the minister would be good enough to give it.

Mr. ROBB: As a matter of fact, under the Finance Act I think the rate was reduced to 3¾ per cent, but the banks have not availed themselves of that privilege to any great extent. Of course my hon. friend will understand that to keep the finances of the country sound that sort of thing cannot go on indefinitely, although I admit that it can be done to a limited degree.

Mr. SPENCER: The minister will admit that it does seem extraordinary for the government to pay one-quarter per cent more when they borrow on a security than when they lend on the same security to private institutions.

Mr. ROBB: You must allow them something for administering the affairs of the country; you must remember that the banks pay all these interest coupons and cheques all over the country for the government at par.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is right, and yet perhaps he is wrong. It is not quite fair to say that the government borrow on the same security used by the banks; they do not. As a rule the government gives its obligation with no further security, and that is first rate security. When the banks come to the Department of Finance for a loan, they do not give their obligations or anything like that; they give securities in other forms. For instance, when we had the stress on the currency at the time we first stopped the operations of the wheat pool, we introduced what are known as prime bills. I thought they made a first rate basis for the emission of currency, and events proved that I was correct. The banks either use those bills or they leave with the government its own securities, such as victory bonds and so on, which are held by the banks. So the situation is not exactly the same. My hon. friend from Battle River (Mr. Spencer) has followed this question very carefully, and he will recall the evidence given before the committee on banking and commerce the other day by Mr. Harding, who pointed out that all these emissions of currency, or emissions of credit one way or the other, have to be controlled by something which would make for an immediate and proper return at the right time, in order to do away with any danger of inflation. All these bank transactions are protected and fortified in that way. For example, when we looked after the financing of the wheat crop, all the emissions at that time which were on a 5 per cent basis, all the extra currency, all the issues had to be retired, because it was manifestly in the interests of the banks to retire them as soon as possible.

Now just one other point in connection with these loans. The treasury report fixes the rate of interest, at least it ought to fix its rate of interest having regard to the then value of money and the then needs of Canadian commerce. My own view is that the latter consideration is greater than the first, but those are the two great considerations one must always have in mind. The rate of interest was then high and I used to be able to get 5 per cent without any trouble. To-day my hon. friend was pointing out that at one time there was a very low rate, only 3½ per cent. The reason of that would appear to be that at that time the banks could borrow at that rate and even less in New York; and it is just as well for us to keep our banks borrowing money here on perfectly good security, prime bills and the like, against which we issue currency, costing us nothing, and under such terms that the currency must in the very near future be redeemed. It is a question of fighting for the business, and that was the situation, I would imagine, at the time that low rate was got. That would have nothing whatever to do with the rate the government was paid because the times or conditions might not have been at all similar. I apprehend that if at that time the government also had been in the market for money it would have got a lower rate. The fact may be that the rate was higher at that particular juncture.

Mr. SPENCER: I would like to remind the minister, Mr. Chairman, that if he is anxious to get money at a cheap rate, he would get very large amounts if he would simply increase the rate on post office savings to 3½ to 3¾ per cent. The accounts having a government guarantee behind them, I have not the slightest doubt that a very large amount of money would be put in the savings banks and the government could make use of these deposits. This seems to have been simply ignored by those in charge up to the present time. Why the rate is kept down to 3 per cent, when the government is paying anywhere from 4 to 5½ per cent, I cannot understand.

Mr. ROBB: I am ready to listen to my friend's argument, but the government is not paying anything like 5 or 5½ per cent. We have paid that in the past but are not now.

Mr. SPENCER: I mean in the past. There are some bonds outstanding, I take for granted, that are carrying 5½ per cent.

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. SPENCER: If the government expects to borrow at 4 per cent, why not give the rank and file who have some savings or want to make savings, the guarantee of the extra one per cent? Why not!

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

DEPARTMENT OF PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

The house resumed, from April 10, consideration in committee of the following proposed resolution—Hon. Mr. King—Mr. Johnston in the chair:

Resolved, that the Department of Health and of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment be amalgamated in a single department to be called the Department of National Health and Veterans' Welfare, presided over by a minister of the crown; that the powers and duties of the minister be defined; and provision be made for the appointment of a deputy minister, the making of regulations, and the employment of such other officers, clerks, and employees as may be deemed necessary.

The CHAIRMAN: The minister moves to strike out the words in the second and third lines:

to be called the Department of National Health and Veterans' Welfare.

Mr. LADNER: Just what is the change which the minister has made in that matter?

Hon. J. H. KING (Kootenay, Minister of Health): I have not changed the name but I propose to strike it out. I suggested the other night in committee that we strike out the name, and then on the second reading of the bill we would be ready for suggestions for the name, and then the name would be inserted. Leave it in blank for the present.

Mr. McGIBBON: May I ask the minister if it is intended to appoint a separate deputy minister?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. McGIBBON: You are going to amalgamate it under the same deputy ministers?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. McGIBBON: Will the minister tell us just what will be the advantage on the whole?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think the whole amalgamation will be advantageous. I stated the other night that the work of re-establishment, for which the department was primarily organized, was largely past; and to-day the work is confined pretty much to the administration under the Pension Act and to the treatment in our hospitals, and the care of certain unemployable people in our vetcraft shops, and measures of that character.

I have here some statistics, prepared by the department officials, which will bear out my statement. The total expenditure under the department for the year 1926-27—the figures for the past year, 1927-28, are not quite up to date—is shown as $47,774,371.92.

Administration costs	$ 1,447,127 39 or 3.03 %
Pensions	37,674,163 50
Returned soldiers insurance	778,413 07
War service gratuities	22,968 72
Pensions, administration fund	319,836 53
Interest on funds	24,804 80
	$40,267,314 01

The balance of $7,507,000 would be applicable to medical care and re-establishment. As regards treatment the expenditures are as follows:

Hospital treatment	$3,314,269 62
Limb factory operation	211,647 40
Capital expenditure	6,412 30
Transportation	130,035 25
Funeral expenses	25,549 99
Shelter employment	358,517 52
Employers' liability compensation	65,174 80
Treatment, stores purchased	271,334 09
Accounts receivable	175,458 78
Pay and allowances	2,008,844 80
Burial of destitute	10,000 00
Total	$6,577,244 55

Under re-establishment the expenditures are as follows:

Unemployment relief	$376,055 35
Transportation of blind	4,950 87
Vocational training	1,353 55
Vocational loans	1,250 14
Federal appeal board	163,416 01
Total	$567,025 92

Or 7.29 per cent of the total. I think that covers the information sought the other night and bears out the statement I made that more than ninety per cent of the work of the department to-day is in the nature of treatment or care of the veterans rather than re-establishment. This amalgamation was not gone into hurriedly. It was only in May last that, after some months of observation in the department, I suggested to the government that there should be a reorganization or an amalgamation of the department possibly with the Health department. In making that recommendation to the government, in order that we might have confirmation of my opinion, because one who undertakes to reorganize a department of government or to amalgamate one department with another, undertakes a very responsible and rather difficult task. I suggested to the government that an outside authority should be asked to come into the department and make a survey. Mr. Gordon W. Scott, of the firm of P. S. Ross and Sons of Montreal, was asked to make this survey and he spent some two or three months investigating the work of the department. His report has been tabled and it is now in the hands of the members. He confirms my opinion that an amalgamation could be properly made; that economies could be had, and that the administration would thereby be improved. That is why we are bringing down legislation and asking that it be accepted by the house.

Mr. GEARY: This is a matter in which some of us are interested and I hope we may be allowed to listen to the discussion.

The CHAIRMAN: I hope we shall have better order.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There should not be much doubt in the minds of the members, because I find on going back over Hansard that this question of amalgamation has been suggested not only from this side of the house but from the other. In Hansard of June 12, 1925, the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling), who apparently had given very considerable study to the affairs of the department, had this to say, as reported on page 4219:

> My criticism is that this department has outlived its usefulness, and that considerable economies could be effected were it abolished.

And so on. His opinion was to some extent confirmed by another hon. member opposite. I refer to the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion). I cannot just place my hands on his reference, but he commended the hon. member for Yale for having given so much study to this department, and for his speech in reference to it. In 1923 the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) had this to say, as reported on page 3893 of Hansard:

> As we are drawing into the fifth or sixth year since the conclusion of actual hostilities, the time is coming for a consolidation of some of the departments of government, and the one which is due first for consolidation is, I think, the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment.

And he goes on. So the subject is not a new one to the members of the house nor to the members of the government.

Mr. ESLING: Did the Prime Minister himself not suggest in 1926 that the two departments under discussion should be consolidated with some other department He thought they were running so smoothly there was no necessity for further expenditures in that connection.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have not the reference to the Prime Minister's speech in 1926 or 1927, but there is no doubt that the matter has been considered for some time and I believe a consolidation such as we have undertaken will be advantageous to the service that is being rendered by those departments.

The name of the department seemed to be the chief contention the other night. The government are not wedded to any particular name. What we are desirous of having is a name that will indicate the activities of the two departments. Since the resolution was last in committee several suggestions have been made as to names, and I might cite them:

> Department of Pensions and Health.
> Department of National Health and Pensions.
> Department of National Health and Veterans.
> Department of National Health and Veterans' Services.
> Department of National Health and Veterans' Affairs.

The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) suggested the other night the name "veterans' affairs". I am not wedded to any one name and I am open for suggestions when the bill comes up for second reading. I want merely to have a name that will properly designate the activities of the combined departments.

Mr. CLARK: I do not think the chief concern on this side is with the question of the name. We are, however, concerned with the name if the amalgamation is to take place. I think the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) suggested a name which the minister did not mention to-day. He suggested the department of soldier re-establishment and health. Another name that has just occurred to me is the department of soldiers' problems and health. The question is not so much one of re-establishment details as one of problems. There are a number of suggestions that might be considered, for instance, "soldier problems and health".

Mr. KING (Kootenay): May I ask if my hon. friend prefers the word "soldiers" to "veterans"?

Mr. CLARK: I do, yes, decidedly. I am not wedded to the word "veteran." These are returned soldier problems, and the phrase that we are most familiar with and which is most commonly used among those who served overseas is returned soldiers. Therefore, I think "soldier problems" would be best adapted to the situation to-day. But the chief concern at the moment is that some concrete evidence be presented as to the increased efficiency that is going to result from this amalgamation. What increased efficiency will there be? If there is to be any, I think the minister will find support from this side of the house. And if there is to be increased efficiency, the next concern is economy. We would like to know what those economies, if any, will be.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In regard to the economies to be effected, they will come about in administration, largely through centralising the auditing, registration and accounting systems. We know that there will be a very considerable saving there. The units themselves have not been reorganized, but the question is being carefully considered with a view to making economies, and improving the organization of these units where possible. That is a matter that cannot be done hurriedly. It requires the very careful consideration of each individual unit with a view to bringing about an organization that will co-ordinate in the various functions. I think we can bring about a better condition than has existed.

Mr. McGIBBON: Like the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, I am not very particular about the name, but I am particular about having an organization with some life in it. There can be only one effect of this amalgamation, and that is the uniting of the soldiers' department to a department that is a corpse, nothing more or less. If the Department of Health during its seven or eight years of existence had in any respect led us to believe that it ever could do anything I would not object so much, but I have been studying the working of that department now for some years and I cannot find anything it has done that was not equally well done before.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That is not fair.

Mr. McGIBBON: I have read the minister's reports and I have waited patiently year after year when his estimates came down for an explanation from him of what his department had done, but he has always very diligently sought not to tell us. I repeat that the effect of this amalgamation is the wiping out of the soldiers' department by tying it up to another department which is no more than a political corpse. What is the reason for doing that? Is it because the Department of Health has nothing to do? Or is it because there is nothing to be done for the returned soldiers? It must be the one or the other. If there is anything to justify the existence of the Department of Health, it must surely have something to do, and if it has enough to do it should not have a large and important department like the soldiers' department tacked on to it under the same deputy minister, and the same staff I presume, all the way through—a staff, the qualification of which is qualified to deal with soldier problems I doubt very much. The minister himself after presiding over this department for some years admits that he has to go outside of the department and get a chartered accountant to tell him something about it.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Very wise, too.

Mr. McGIBBON: The minister ought to know his department by this time, having been in it for several years.

Mr. RALSTON: How long?

Mr. McGIBBON: If hon. members on that side have not anyone who can master it in a few months, I can pick out a dozen over here who could do so.

In the first place, Mr. Chairman, I object to the soldiers' department being wiped out. I am not averse to creating a department that will be wholly concerned with the returned soldiers. You have your land settlement scheme, which the government have very conveniently dropped so far as the soldiers are concerned, but which I think ought to be revived in the interest of this country. Then again, those of us who have been sitting on the pension committee know that there are innumerable problems coming up all the time. Our advice from the officials appearing before that committee is that these problems are going to increase, and at the very moment when they are on the verge of increasing and giving us a lot of difficulty, the whole soldiers' department is to be wiped out.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. McGIBBON: I say it is wiped out. It is fundamentally changed and absorbed into another department. That is obvious from the very fact that you are putting the soldiers' department under another deputy minister who will be the executive head. The minister is making a mistake, and so far as I am concerned I am going to oppose the change.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): This bill might well be called the narcotic bill, because it is intended to put to sleep, if not put out of business, the soldiers' department. Personally I object to an amalgamation which makes the soldiers' department subordinate to any other department. I do not care how many departments you tack on to the soldiers' department, but I object to making it secondary to any other. I have no objection to the deputy minister of health being made the deputy minister of the soldiers' department, because he is a good man with considerable experience, and perhaps there is no one better qualified. Secondly, I object to the name, "national health and soldiers' welfare". That smacks too much of the child welfare movement, and suggests that it is just about of the same importance. The minister has failed to give us any reasons for this amalgamation. Would he tell us, to begin with, of any one section of the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment Department that is being wiped out? Perhaps the one nearest to it would be the workshops, but if the minister had been in the committee this morning he would have come to the conclusion that there is more necessity for the workshops movement to-day than ever before.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am familiar with that.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The minister also says that there may be changes in the financing and accounting systems. Has the Department of Health any branch that can do that work? Then in connection with the work of re-establishment—

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend is under a misapprehension. I stated very definitely the other night that this section would remain distinct, and operate on the lines along which has hitherto proceeded.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Then why not leave it alone? I do not care how many departments you amalgamate with the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, but what we do object to is that this important department should be tacked on to the Department of Health. The Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment Department is more important than the Department of Health, and if the minister would consider it in that light perhaps there would not be as much objection. What does the minister expect to accomplish in the way of economy and efficiency by wiping out the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment? I do not care for the report of Mr. Scott or anyone else; we all recognize the fact that changes could be made. Put Mr. Scott in any other department of government and he might well make a similar report. What benefits or economies will be effected by this change?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend was informed a few moments ago that considerable economy had already been effected in the internal organization of the Ottawa branch by centralizing our auditing, registration and accounting systems. That will be evident when my estimates are before the house, for I shall then move for their reduction. The reorganization beyond the central department has not yet been completed. It will be carried out by officers of the department after careful investigation. The suggestion that the organization which has been dealing with the soldiers' affairs will be wiped out is not fair and cannot be attributed to anything that I have said; in fact my remarks have all been to the contrary; and there is very little use in trying to create that impression. For many years to come we know there will have to be an organization to deal with the problems to which my hon. friend from Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Clark) referred. They are soldier problems.

As to the proposed amalgamation, I have quoted authorities from my hon. friends opposite in support of it. Only two or three years ago the then leader of the Conservative party intimated that the department should be done away with, and there have been other suggestions from all sides of the house that it might well be amalgamated with another department. My observations convinced me of the wisdom of this course, and my judgment has since been confirmed by an independent audit.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I do not think the minister has added to our information; all he says is that the registration office and another section will be combined. That is no argument for the proposed amalgamation. Two or three years ago I suggested that the department itself might well consolidate two or three of its sections; but I cannot understand why the soldiers' department should be placed under the Health department in order to bring together a couple of sections within the department itself. I still think that the amalgamation is all right in principle, but I fail to see any reason for putting the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment department under the Health department. The minister's idea was that a rose by any other name would smell as sweet. Well, whether you call it a rose, a leek, or any other name, I would remind the minister that something goes along with the name. The mere fact that two or three members who are not returned men made certain suggestions does not necessarily make those suggestions of any greater value than if they proceeded from returned men. I think any returned man will say that the proposed title is destructive of the idea of sympathy which we all entertain for our returned soldiers.

Mr. RALSTON: Probably the apprehensions of my hon. friends are due to the fact that they are still discussing the title of the amalgamated department. As I understand, my colleague has already moved an amendment to the resolution whereby the name is to be left over for further consideration.

Mr. McGIBBON: We are not objecting to that.

Mr. RALSTON: At the same time I feel sure that he and his friends have that in the back of their heads, if they will permit me to say so. This must be so when it is suggested that the veterans' department is to be wiped out, because the resolution does not so provide.

Mr. McGIBBON: The minister himself admitted that it is to be put under the Health department.

Mr. RALSTON: I beg my hon. friend's pardon; nobody has admitted anything of the kind. The resolution provides that there is to be an amalgamation of the two departments. The Department of Health happens to be mentioned first. If the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment had been mentioned first, I suppose my hon. friend would have claimed that it was swallowing up the Department of Health. As I understand it, the activities of the Health department will carry on, and the activities of the department which was known as the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment—which perhaps is no longer an accurate title—will also carry on. According to the report submitted to the hon. minister, there will be a saving of administration expenses, and he has already intimated that his estimates will show a reduction. So far as economy is concerned, it seems to me that that ought to satisfy my hon. friends, for the present at least.

The two departments are made into one, but, I repeat, the veterans' department is not to be wiped out. So far as I am concerned, I am perfectly happy to have the names of the departments reversed, so that the soldier activities should be mentioned first in the title and the health activities second. One or the other must be mentioned first; you cannot mention both in the same breath. I think such a change should at least remove the objection that the soldiers' department will be wiped out. While listening to the discussion it seemed to me that the title Department of Pensions and Health would meet all the objections which have been made on this score. In England the department which administers soldiers' affairs is called the Ministry of Pensions. Someone may say that that does not include treatment. But the point is that treatment is only ancillary to pensions. You treat a man in hospital in order that he may be cured of his disability so far as possible and his pension reduced if he gets into a better physical state. Therefore I think the word "pensions" will cover the general activities in regard to ex-service men.

I disagree with my hon. friend from Vancouver-Burrard—with whom I am generally in accord on soldier matters—in suggesting that the word "soldiers" be retained. I do not think the ex-service man wants to be still regarded as a soldier. The department over which I happen to preside has to do with soldier matters, and it seems to me there will be some difficulty in the public mind if you have two departments, both apparently having to do with military affairs. The word "re-establishment" is also equally inappropriate in view of the fact that re-establishment in so far as it refers to land settlement, vocational training and so on, has been largely done away with. Therefore I think the time is come when the department may well be called by the name which best expresses its activities—the Department of Pensions. Whether the title be the Department of Health and Pensions, the Department of National Health and Pensions, or the Department of Pensions and National Health, I do not think makes the least difference. The ex-service man will not be very much concerned with the discussion we are now having as to the title of the amalgamated department; he wants to be assured that his difficulties and problems will be squarely faced; and the minister assures us that will be done. I think hon. gentlemen who have listened to the evidence which has been given before the special committee this session have realized that the officials of the department are alive to the interests of the ex-service men, and are endeavouring to do their duty in that respect. These officials will be the officials of the pension side of the new department and will proceed to carry on in the same way. Let us get out of our minds the obsession in regard to the name, and realize that we are dealing with a resolution that contemplates the amalgamation of two departments, preserving the activities of both but under one head. After all, it is just the same as it was previously, because my hon. friend has been minister of both departments and there is no difference in administration. It seems to me that we shall be able to think a little more clearly—if I may say this without offence—and get along with the real question in hand if we do not concentrate so much on the name. The important thing is what will be involved in the matters that will come up as a result of the report of the committee.

Mr. LADNER: Will there be two deputies or one?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): One.

Mr. RALSTON: Let us disabuse our minds of the idea that the soldiers department will be wiped out. I do not think my hon. friends want to be unfair, nor do they want the country to get any such impression. I believe that if they will read the resolution carefully, and listen to the explanation of the minister, they will offer no objection, because nothing is further from the fact than the thought that the activities now carried on in the interests of the ex-service men will be abandoned or in any way curtailed. I do not want to review the matter to-day; some time I may do so. But the activities of the past four or five years, and the legislation that has been passed in that time, will convince this committee and the country, I think, that there has been a real appreciation of the problems of the soldiers and an endeavour to improve in every possible way by legislation the situation as we have it.

Mr. LADNER: The minister mentioned a short time ago, in connection with the question of names, that my suggestion was, "national health and veterans' affairs". The suggestion which I made at the inception of this discussion was "soldiers' affairs", but the Minister of National Defence has rather convinced me that "soldiers' affairs" would be better replaced by "veterans' affairs", in view of the fact that his department also covers soldier activities in the sense of dealing with men in active service at the present time. I suggest therefore that the name should be the "Department of Veterans' Affairs and National Health". I think that veterans' affairs should come first: it is veterans' matters with which we are dealing, as the Minister of National Defence has pointed out. The question of national health should come second. I agree with the Minister of Health that the word "national" has a place. Some of my colleagues here have considered it wise inasmuch as there are departments of agriculture and of health in the provinces. The only purpose of and advantage in using the word "national" in this connection is that it would be a clear indication to people at large that this was a federal department. Some years ago in Vancouver there was a soldier settlement board and a department of the provincial government—I have forgoten its exact designation—with a similar name, and this made for some confusion.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Land settlement.

Mr. LADNER: My suggestion is, therefore, that the title should be "Department of Veterans' Affairs and National Health".

Mr. MARCIL: It has been my experience in this house over many years that nothing is so pleasant as the announcement that some department will be amalgamated with another, while there is nothing the house dreads so much as the creation of a new department. It is an old standing grievance that we have too many departments, and I have heard many complaints from both political parties on that score, accordingly as they sat to the right or to the left of the Speaker. The argument has been always the same. So far as the soldiers are concerned, they objected strenuously not long ago to being linked up with the Department of National Defence, on the ground that they were no longer soldiers and wished therefore to be treated as civilians. Now there is something in having a brief name for the department; a long name is quite unnecessary. It strikes me that if the word "welfare" is going to be retained the title of the department should be simple and brief: "Department of National Welfare". I suggest this in view of the fact that the departments of Customs and Excise have been called the Department of National Revenue. If you are going to call it the department of health and veterans, very well; but why add the word "welfare"? If you want to summarize the name, make it as brief as possible and call it the Department of National Welfare.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Will you please translate that into French so that we may see what it looks like?

Mr. MARCIL: It would be "Le département du Bien-être national". There is nothing to be gained by having a long name for the department. The suggestion of the Minister of National Defence, of "Pensions and Health", might also be recommended on the ground intimated, that the name of a department should indicate its activities as far as possible.

I think the government should be congratulated on the attempt which is being made to amalgamate our departments so far as this is deemed wise, because the cost of civil government in this country has been increasing at an enormous rate. If hon. members want to get an idea of what government now costs, they should go back to the estimates that used to be presented in this house thirty years ago. That would open their eyes, and I do not think, in the light of the comparison, that they would object to this amalgamation. If dollars are to be saved the country by this amalgamation, efficiency being promoted at the same time, the proposal should receive the support of the house. Economy is particularly necessary in the administration of the affairs of the country at this time owing to the enormous burdens we have to bear and the great problems we have to face.

Mr. McGIBBON: I am glad to hear one voice in the wilderness over there preaching economy; it is the first one I have heard this session from that side. In reply to the Minister of National Defence I wish to say this: my objection is not to the name at all; I have tried to make that clear. I object to the soldiers' department being united with the Department of Health in any shape or form.

Mr. RALSTON: Would you object to the Department of Health being united to the soldiers' department?

Mr. McGIBBON: Yes, equally. I claim there are soldier problems enough in this country to justify retaining the department. You might combine pensions, land settlement and soldier problems, which we are discussing every day in the committee. We were told only this morning in the committee that there were 2,000 problems cases before the country to-day, registered, and the opinion was that these did not constitute any large percentage of the total. They did not think for a moment that the cases were all registered.

Mr. RALSTON: Those are pension cases.

Mr. McGIBBON: They are problem cases, including both pensions and other matters. They are problem cases which the department must look after, and everyone knows that they will increase as the days go by. Now what are you doing? You are taking the deputy minister from the Department of Health and putting him in charge of the whole thing. He is to be the business head, notwithstanding that he has never been associated for a moment with the soldiers' department. Ten years after the war you are taking the head of some department other than that concerned with the soldiers and putting him over the amalgamated departments. Your deputy minister should be one who has been in touch with these problems all along. Surely there are in the present department men who have been in touch right along with these soldier problems, with seven or eight years' experience behind them. Then there is the pensions committee, with all its ramifications; and you have the soldier land settlement board, which could be brought under; it deals with soldier problems.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend does not want any more brought in?

Mr. McGIBBON: I presume the theory is that the department has not enough work. If you amalgamate all the soldier activities there will be plenty of work, and I think there is plenty now.

Mr. MARCIL: Would the veterans like to be linked up with the Department of National Defence as far as pensions are concerned? I think they would strenuously object.

Mr. McGIBBON: I was not discussing the Department of National Defence.

Mr. MARCIL: I understood the hon. member to say he wanted all soldier activities under the Department of National Defence.

Mr. McGIBBON: I was refering to returned soldiers' problems, and I think these problems are going to increase and become more acute as the years go by. There is bound to be some interlocking between the work of these different departments such as the Pension board and the present Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, and this interlocking will become more apparent in the future. Problems will come up then which we do not face now; disabilities will increase as the men get older, and as I have already said in this house there are a large number of additional diseases breaking out. A regular wave of insanity is sweeping over this country which everyone knows is the result of war service but which cannot be definitely connected up with it. That is a problem which is bound to become more acute, and I believe there is plenty of work in all the departments dealing with returned soldiers to keep the deputy minister and his staff busy. I do object to having this work united with the work of the Department of Health; I think it needs a live organization and a deputy minister who has been connected with it for the past ten years.

Mr. POWER: I had not intended to take part in the discussion of the principle of this matter, because I do not think it is of very much importance to the returned soldier by what name the department is called. Personally I do not care what they call it so long as they keep on giving the service they have given for the past few years. However, I cannot believe that the hon. member (Mr. McGibbon) really understands the purpose of this bill. He has been telling us that he objects to having the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment tacked on to the Department of Health.

Mr. McGIBBON: Or vice versa.

Mr. POWER: He does not want the Department of Health to have anything to do with the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment; but surely he knows that the two departments have been under the one head for eight years or more. The objection of the hon. member, therefore, must be to the deputy, but I am sure he must be aware that the present deputy minister of health, who will be the executive head of the amalgamated departments, is Doctor Amyot, who had a magnificent war record overseas and who among all our physicians who served in France was particularly distinguished. So he is well aware of the problems of the returned soldier. If we should have a returned soldier as deputy minister of this department I submit that he should be a medical man as well, who can look on all these questions from both points of view.

Mr. McGIBBON: I am not criticizing Doctor Amyot in the least, but does my hon. friend know the position he occupied overseas?

Mr. POWER: I am not quite sure, but I believe he was either an A.D.M.S. or a D.D.M.S.

Mr. McGIBBON: He was engaged in sanitation work.

Mr. POWER: I know he had a high executive position. He may have been dealing with sanitation also, but if the hon. member wishes me to do so I will look up his record, or will ask the minister to do so.

Mr. McGIBBON: Oh, no.

Mr. POWER: So the only objection we have had so far is that these two departments are to have the same deputy minister, but the hon. member must be aware of the fact that all the higher officials of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment are to remain in that department.

Mr. McGIBBON: I do not like to interrupt, but my point is that we should have a deputy who has been conversant with this work for at least the last ten years.

Mr. POWER: I have no doubt that the next deputy minister of that department will be someone who has been conversant with the work for ten years, but at present that position is vacant, and in order to fill it a new man would have to be appointed. In that case a man would have to be taken from the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, which doubtless would meet with some objection from hon. members opposite who have constantly criticized that department; or we would have to take an outside man with no experience. If we must take an outside man I see no reason why we should not take a soldier with a distinguished overseas record, who knows something of medical matters as well.

The suggestion has been made by the minister that the bill based upon this resolution should be referred to the committee dealing with pensions and returned soldier problems, and to that suggestion I wish to object most strenuously. I have no desire to exaggerate the amount of work which is before that committee at present, but we have been sitting almost every day since the opening of the session. We have heard innumerable witnesses; the evidence we have heard covers some 800 or 900 pages, which we have to wade through before we can make a report. We have had suggestions and submissions with regard to pensions, and I also happen to have with me a list of the subjects which have been brought before this committee. They are as follows: Pensions; civil service preference; employment of returned soldiers; grave markers; returned soldiers' insurance; last post fund; medical examination and treatment; returned soldiers' advisers; old age pensions; Victoria Cross veterans; housing schemes; indigent veterans; soldier settlement boards; vetcraft shops, and recently the Minister of National Defence referred to this committee a bill dealing with canteen funds.

Mr. McGIBBON: Does not the hon. member think that is enough work for one department?

Mr. POWER: I am quite sure it is enough for one department, but it would not hurt to add the little work which the doctors of this country would give. We have all that work before the committee, and although I do not wish to make that work appear unduly important lest when the report is brought down someone may say, "Parturiunt montes, nascetur ridiculus mus", I think we have enough work to keep us busy until the end of the session. There is this further point, that hitherto in this house matters relating to returned soldiers such as pensions and so on have been dealt with in an impartial, non-partisan manner. It has been shown clearly that this question of amalgamation is a matter of government policy; perhaps otherwise there would not be so much opposition to it. If a matter of government policy is brought before this committee it is likely to be opposed or upheld on grounds not unconnected with political partisanship, and I believe it very important that the discussion of matters which relate to the welfare of our returned soldiers should be free from even a suspicion of partisanship. I therefore ask the members of the house not to refer this bill or any question arising out of it to the committee on pensions and returned soldiers problems.

Mr. CLARK: I certainly agree with the member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) that the committee which is at present sitting is loaded with work; and I should like also at this moment to pay a tribute to the work of the chairman of that committee, who has been there daily and has been indefatigable in his efforts. It struck me when he read the list of matters which are being dealt with by that committee that there must be work for at least one department; and it also struck me that perhaps there is nothing so important as the organization of that department. I am not so sure that the committee which is now sitting is not perhaps the best qualified of all the bodies at present functioning to give consideration to the method and manner of organization of this particular department.

As I have said before, and I have said it repeatedly, I am not quibbing over a name; but I want to be convinced that there is going to be some increased efficiency and some real economy. I have not heard anything which would give any indication of that, except the minister's statement that when the estimates comes up he will move for a reduction; but he does not give us any idea of what will be the nature or extent of that measure of economy. The Minister of National Defence said that things would be just as they are—I think I am quoting him correctly—

Mr. RALSTON: That the same service will be carried on.

Mr. CLARK: Then I would say if they are going to be just as they are, the only thing we are doing here is to change the name; and if that is the only job we have it seems to me we are wasting a lot of time. We might just as well—

Mr. RALSTON: Will my hon. friend permit me? When I said that, I called attention to the statement which had been made by the minister with regard to the reduction, and also the report as to the saving in administration expenses.

Mr. CLARK: I mentioned that, and I say that is the only reason, so far as I can see, which has been given for the change. But there has been no indication as to what those reductions will be, what will be the saving, and what will be the increased efficiency. If they are to be just as they are, I conceive that the department is going to operate with the organization as it exists, and there would be very little advantage except that there will be one deputy minister instead of two; and there has been one minister for the past eight years, as has been indicated. The only change, so far as I can observe, is one deputy minister instead of two. Well, there is some economy, I suppose; but the member for Quebec South has stated there is a tremendous number of problems to be dealt with; and the question is can they be dealt with efficiently by one deputy head? Judging from the amount of work which this committee has before it, I question whether it can be done efficiently. We would like some conclusive evidence that there is to be increased efficiency, something more than a mere change to one deputy head where there were two, and something more than the mere change of name.

So far as the name is concerned, some names have been mentioned to which I do object so much, though I do not consider the name of any great importance. The name the minister suggested is simple and I think applicable, and so far as I am concerned personally I would be prepared to support it. I do not see, however, why he should object to "soldier problems" or "soldier re-establishment". Every man who served is known as a returned soldier and is proud of it; he speaks of himself as a returned soldier and will be known and will speak of himself as such until the day he dies. So that I think the words "returned soldier" will always be in use when we are speaking of the men who served during the great war.

Mr. CANTLEY: My objection to the explanation given by the minister has been that apparently he is subordinating soldier services to that of health. I submit that the name he announced and the explanation he offered left that impression upon me and upon others, particularly on this side of the house, and will undoubtedly leave that impression throughout the country. Without criticizing the minister, I would point out that naturally the minister looks at these matters of health as the most important as between the two departments. All the explanations he has given have rather confirmed me in the idea that the first element in this whole question as it presents itself to his mind is that of what he calls national health. Now, I submit that that is not the important thing. The important thing is to look after our soldiers. The problems in connection with returned soldiers are getting more complex as the years go on. I think all will admit that. I know many cases in my own county which have developed within the last two or three years, and have developed in a way and in numbers and of a character that I fancy was not contemplated by anybody three or four or five years ago. I am sure the Minister of National Defence will agree that that is by far the most important side of what is proposed to be combined under one department. I am afraid that the minister (Mr. King, Kootenay) does not realize that, and is not in full sympathy with that side of the question.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend should not say that. It is not a fair statement—that I am not in sympathy.

Mr. CANTLEY: Possibly I did not make myself sufficiently clear. What I wished to point out is this, that I think his first love is with the medical side. I am not at all blaming him for that. Consciously or unconsciously, I think that would be true, and I am not blaming him for it. I may be wrong, but he is a medical man, and I think that is the part of the combined department which would appeal most to him. The last thing I would think of doing would be to do the minister any injustice so far as his view of the matter is concerned. But the main point is that we should make sufficient provision for the disabled soldiers. We do not yet know how many of them there are. Each month and each year develops new difficulties in connection with returned men. The problems are becoming greater, not less, and it will continue to be so for some little time—how long, I do not know; but the experience of the last four or five years has been such as to support that view. I do not think any satisfactory reason has been given for the amalgamation. We do not take seriously on this side of the house the idea that the consideration of economy is what prompted the change. As I said at the outset, the name suggested gives the impression that the soldier problem is the one of least importance, while on the other hand I consider it by far the one of the greatest importance.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Mr. Chairman, although not myself a returned soldier, I have been closely associated with their affairs during the past few years, and from my point of view the proposed change may be beneficial in its effects. We have heard a good deal of criticism as to the cost of administration of the department as compared with the money actually paid to the men themselves. The opinion has been expressed that too great a proportion of the vote has been spent in administrative costs. This change, if carried out properly, will I think reduce that proportion; it will enable us to decrease the appropriation to some extent without affecting adversely the returned men. In other words it will increase the amount spent directly for the benefit of the returned men and decrease the expenditure for administrative purposes. So far I think the change is well warranted and will have beneficial results.

There are one or two dangers to be guarded against. The first is that the department of soldiers' affairs, or whatever it may be called, should be made subordinate or minimized by the amalgamation. It is our opinion in this corner; it is my opinion very strongly that that will be the heaviest and most important end of the work for a long time to come; that the greatest stress will have to be placed upon that work, and that anything which would minimize the importance of that work should be deprecated. But I fail to see that an amalgamation, if properly organized and carried out, would have that effect. If an amalgamation is to take place, I can conceive of no more proper department for the amalgamation than that of Health, because a great deal of the work in connection with soldiers' problems deals with medical examination, or in other words with health. The basis of all the assistance which we are obliged to give, the basis of all the pensions which are earned is the question of health and physical disability and the question of medical opinion, and if there is one department more than another which could be attached to the department of soldiers' affairs it would rightly be that of Health. I am not sufficiently well acquainted with the internal economy of the two departments to be able to say what the saving would be; but I believe it might be of such an amount as to be well worthy of consideration, and I am prepared to support the amalgamation as long as it is apparent, through the bill which will present the details of that amalgamation, that the necessities and problems of the returned men will be kept to the front and will not in any way be ignored or minimized.

As regards the name, I must confess that I am not very much interested except to this extent: once we adopt the principle that the department of soldiers' affairs, or problems, or whatever you like to call it, is the important end of the work, the name should advertise that principle to the country so that there will be, in the minds of the returned men themselves, no misconception as to the amalgamation. That is why I attach importance to the name—not because the name itself will make any difference to the work done, but because of the moral effect of the name upon the men affected. As so many names have been already suggested I am not going to suggest another. Granting those two premises, first, that the soldiers' problems will be kept to the front; that their importance will be recognized; that the growing importance and scope of the problems will be realized; second, that the organization will be of such a character that that work will come first, and third, if I may add another, that the name decided upon will be one which will give to the country and the returned men the proper impression of the amalgamation which is to be effected, I am prepared to support the amalgamation.

Mr. McGIBBON: Possibly the minister can now give us a little information. He tells us that when the estimates come down he is going to ask for a reduction. How much will that be?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That will be determined by the time the estimates come down.

Mr. McGIBBON: The minister has stated that he intends to ask for a reduction.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The matter is being gone into very carefully by the departmental officials and I have been advised by them that they will be able to submit to a reduction arising out of the amalgamation.

Mr. McGIBBON: Surely the minister does not mean to say that he is coming here asking for an amalgamation and he does not know whether the reduction will be ten dollars or ten thousand?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not think my hon. friend is serious when he suggests that.

Mr. McGIBBON: I am serious to this extent, that I think the minister should have some idea of the amount.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We shall have some idea.

Mr. McGIBBON: I am asking what it is.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am suggesting to my hon. friend that there will be a substantial reduction, and I think that is as far as I should be asked to go at this time. The estimates will be before the house very shortly. I have asked for a statement from my officials. That is being prepared and at the proper time it will be given to the house.

Mr. McGIBBON: It is almost incredible that a minister of the crown should come before the House of Commons with a resolution of this kind and yet have no information at all except that his officials told him that there would be a substantial reduction. Surely he is not serious. Surely his officials have given him a faint idea within a few thousand or five or ten thousand dollars. If he has no idea, I will let the matter go at that. How many officials are to be let out?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That has not been decided. It will depend upon the reorganization and the requirements of the department.

Mr. McGIBBON: What will become of the Deputy Minister of Health?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The Deputy Minister of Health will continue to be the Deputy Minister of Health.

Mr. McGIBBON: What about the Assistant Deputy Minister of Health?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): He will continue to be the Assistant Deputy Minister of Health.

Mr. McGIBBON: What about the Assistant Deputy Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): An appointment has been made to that position in the person of Mr. J. W. McKee.

Mr. McGIBBON: I assume this economy the minister is speaking of will come through better organization. That means decreased salaries or the elimination of some officials?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): If they are not required, yes.

Mr. McGIBBON: Could the minister give us any idea who would be let out and about what number?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. McGIBBON: Then I submit the minister is asking too much from the House of Commons. He comes here and he can tell us practically nothing. Not a single intelligent answer, I say with all due respect, has he given this afternoon.

Mr. POWER: That depends upon the quality of the question.

Mr. McGIBBON: I will let the hon. member for Quebec South ask a question and we will see if he will be better off. We have received only one statement from the minister in justification of this resolution and that is that his officials have told him a certain amount of economy will result. We do not know how much it is. We do not know what it is based upon. We do not know whether it is to be secured by letting out returned soldiers from positions which they occupy at present, as has been done by the minister in the last few months. How is he going to carry out this reorganization? I think the minister should answer the question.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I fully appreciate what the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) said. He exactly expresses the views of those present in this corner of the house. I would like to ask whether the deputy minister will be a returned soldier who is fully acquainted with the returned soldier problems, because in my opinion such a man should be the dominant figure in this new department.

Mr. RALSTON: He will be a returned soldier with a very broad and excellent experience.

Mr. McGIBBON: Did I not understand the minister to say a while ago that the present deputy minister is going to be the deputy minister of the new department?

Mr. RALSTON: That is right.

Mr. McGIBBON: That is settled?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. King (Kootenay) thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 205, respecting the Department of Health and of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

MILITIA PENSION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence) moved the second reading of bill No. 197, to amend the Militia Pension Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

[Mr. McGibbon.]

On section 1—reservations from salary treated as deductions.

Mr. BENNETT: If the amounts were different, it could not be said that the dededuction in the one case would be treated as a payment on account of superannuation in the other.

Mr. RALSTON: It is 5 per cent in both cases. As I explained to the committee the other day, all that is being done here is to substitute the title of the present Civil Service Superannuation Act for the title of the act which has been in force for so long a time.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Time served in public service reckoned in term of service.

Mr. BENNETT: Any change in that except the title?

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Officers' service in R.C.M.P.

Mr. CLARK: Does this deal with the long standing complaint of the veterans of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

Mr. RALSTON: It does deal with a few. I do not know about a long standing complaint. There has been a question for a long time as to whether or not time served by an officer in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as a constable counted towards pension; I think that is what my hon. friend is referring to, and a very distinguished predecessor of mine gave an assurance at one time that it did count. As a matter of fact, the Department of Justice considers that it does not, and this is being introduced for the purpose of making the point clear.

Mr. BENNETT: There are certain other matters in connection with the veterans of the mounted police, but I suppose they have to be taken up under the Mounted Police Act. The Minister of Justice is familiar with the circumstances and with the claims that have been set up by the veterans of the mounted police, and now that we are changing this law to make it clear that the time served by an officer as a constable shall count, which I think is a very proper amendment, and was understood to be the basis of their pension by those who thus served, perhaps the Minister of Justice, not because it arises out of this bill, but because it touches a point that sooner or later will have to be dealt with, would indicate whether or not the government has concluded to meet the wishes of the veterans of the mounted police with respect to pension or otherwise. That is the question to which my hon. friend from Vancouver-Burrard has referred.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I thought we had met the demands of these veterans to a large extent two years ago. I know that there are still other claims, and they are being considered.

Mr. BENNETT: But no action has been determined?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not yet.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—In South African constabulary.

Mr. RALSTON: The explanation here is that the Department of Justice has ruled that only the time served with the South African constabulary when the party so serving was an officer of the militia shall count towards pension. That is not the case with regard to the non-commissioned officer and man, and we are making the same provision here with regard to the officer.

Mr. GEARY: It was never intended otherwise?

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Gratuity in case of death before pension may be granted.

Mr. BENNETT: This is the new section?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. I wanted to ask the committee to consider an amendment which I am proposing. I explained the other day that this clause is intended to give back to the dependents of an officer who dies before he has completed the full period necessary for pension at least the amount which has been deducted from his pay. At the present time that cannot be done; the money is forfeited. Then a case was mentioned the other day by the hon. member for Prince, and I know of two cases at least, where an officer died having served the full period for pension, but leaving dependents who did not come within the meaning of the act, which defines dependents as the wife and children. The suggestion has been made that in such a case if he had dependents—in this case the officer to whom I particularly refer left dependent sisters—it would be at least fair to pay to the sisters actually being supported by him the amount which he had paid in, not by way of pension but gratuity. Therefore I am suggesting to the committee that section 5 be eliminated, because it provides only for the case of an officer who served an insufficient time to entitle him to a pension, and that this clause be substituted.

I therefore move that:

5. Section eleven of the said act is amended by adding thereto the following subsections—

"(3) If an officer dies before a period at which a pension might be granted him, the governor in council may grant to his widow, or, if he leaves no widow, to his children under eighteen years of age at the date of his death a gratuity equal to the amount of the deductions made under subsection one of section ten of this act from such officer's pay during his service.

"(4) If an officer dies leaving no widow or child to whom a gratuity under the provisions of the preceding subsection, or a pension or compassionate allowance under this act would be payable, but who leaves a person or persons who, at the date of this officer's death were wholly or partially dependent on him, the governor in council may grant to such person or persons a gratuity not exceeding the amount of the deductions made under subsection one of section ten of this act from the officer's pay during his service."

(2) This section shall be deemed to have come into force and effect on the thirtieth day of June, nineteen hundred and twenty-three.

That is the date when the pensions' legislation came back to normal. As I explained to the committee the other day, there was a period when a man who had served ten years was entitled to a pension, but on June 30, 1923, we reverted to the normal procedure, and it was thought that that would be a convenient date to make this effective.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it done for the purpose of taking in this particular case?

Mr. RALSTON: It is made retroactive for the purpose. There will be one other case at least; that is all the department knows of.

Mr. GARDINER: This proposal will be applicable only to officers; it does not include warrant officers ?

Mr. RALSTON: It applies to warrant officers also.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

ST. CLAIR TRANSIT COMPANY

Mr. W. T. GOODISON (West Lambton) moved the third reading of Bill No. 23, to incorporate the St. Clair Transit Company.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Before this bill gets its third reading, while

I have no special objection to the measure I want to direct the attention of the house to one section in particular which, in my opinion, should not be passed. I refer to section 12. I wish to read that section to the house because it will be observed that it leaves the door wide open to any kind of stock watering which might be desired. I do not believe there is a member of this house who is in favour of the watering of stock, and in my opinion the people of Canada have expressed disapproval generally of this practice. This house certainly should not by its own action make the watering of stock any easier than it is, and for that reason I intend to move an amendment to this section. The section itself reads:

12. The directors may issue as paid-up stock shares of the capital stock of the company in payment of any business, franchises, undertakings, rights, powers, privileges, letters patent, inventions, real estate, stocks, assets and other properties which the company may lawfully acquire, and may, for such considerations allot and hand over such shares to any person or corporation or its shareholders or directors; and any such issue or allotment of stock shall be binding upon the company and such stock shall be not assessable for calls; nor shall the holder thereof be liable in any way thereon; or the company may pay therefor wholly or partly in paid-up shares or wholly or partly in bonds and debentures or as may be agreed upon.

In amendment to that clause I move, seconded by the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Kellner):

That the said bill be not now read the third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole for the purpose of amending it.

That all the words after the word "directors" in the eighth line of section 12 be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"but no such issue or allotment of shares as fully or partly paid up shall be valid or binding upon the company.

(a) Unless before any such issue or allotment of shares shall have been made as fully or partly paid up otherwise than in cash, the company shall have filed in the office of the Secretary of State a contract in writing, duly executed by the parties thereto, setting forth the considerations other than cash for which the company is about to issue and allot such shares as fully or partly paid up; nor

(b) Unless in each and every case in which the company shall allot or issue shares upon the footing that the whole or some part thereof shall be credited as paid for a consideration other than cash, such consideration shall be received and credited by the company at not more than its then actual cash value;

(c) And, in case the foregoing provisions of this section are not complied with, the holders of the shares so issued shall be liable to the company and to its creditors to the amount of the par value of the shares held by them respectively.

[Mr. Irvine.]

I leave it to the house to decide whether it is our wish to facilitate the watering of stock by any company.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I voted for a similar clause in connection with a previous measure proposed by my hon. friend (Mr. Irvine) who now moves this amendment. I did so on that occasion because of the evident desire of my hon. friend to deal with what is generally regarded as something which should be dealt with, but I disagree with the practicability of subsection (c), having studied it more closely since then. Under the former subsections shares would be issued by the company, some for cash and some for other considerations, and unless there were distinguishing marks on the share certificates issued from time to time, innocent third parties in future years would be unable to tell whether or not the particular shares which they purchased at any time were subject to this perpetual liability of litigation, and I am afraid such a provision as this would make it impossible to finance such a project. I do not see how it could be worked out practically, because this subsection creates for all time the possibility that the holders of some of the shares of this company might be liable for the par value of the shares irrespective of what the market value might be or of what they might have paid for them. If some way could be found to avoid that difficulty, which I think would lead to litigation and would create that sense of uncertainty which makes the financing of any enterprise very difficult. I am in agreement with the principle which it is sought to establish.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I ask a question? Is not this very clause copied almost verbatim from the English Companies Act?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: Possibly my hon. friend is more familiar with its origin that I am. Perhaps the mover of the amendment can tell us.

Mr. IRVINE: Yes, that is so.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The mover of the amendment and the leader of the opposition, who is no mean lawyer, have said that it is so. I would like to ask a further question. Knowing that the minister is in agreement with us as to the advisability of doing away with the watering of the stock as far as may be possible, has he any proposal to submit by which this bill could be amended to meet that desire?

Mr. DUNNING: I am in the unfortunate or perhaps the fortunate position of not being a lawyer. I supported a smiliar amendment on a former occasion; I thought my remarks to-night would be received sympathetically by the hon. gentleman moving the amendment, and that has been the case. My legal friends will correct me if I am wrong, but it does strike me that if the company failed to obey the injunctions contained in subsection (b) the company would be liable to action by anyone for not having done so.

Mr. IRVINE: Does not the minister think that with subsection (c) in this bill the directors of the company would be a little more careful about what was done, knowing that their company would be liable under this subsection?

Mr. DUNNING: On that point I have this in mind: The question as to the fair actual market value of something for which shares are given as a consideration is always a debatable matter, and by this legislation it continues to be a debatable matter during the whole of the period of the existence of the company while its shares are on the market. Anyone could take the attitude at any time that perhaps ten years earlier more than the fair market value had been issued in shares for a particular consideration, and in that way the affairs of the company would be brought into litigation. For my own part, if I were promoting a bill of this kind I would eliminate a lot of the invention stuff and so on and allow it to be dealt with in accordance with the ordinary company law of the country, because in my judgment that is the proper way to deal with it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In the meantime may I ask this question? The minister comes from the old country originally; can he tell us how this section actually works out in practice and whether there is watered stock as a general rule?

Mr. SPEAKER: This is all irregular; we are not in the committee stage.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps we had better get into committee, when I may have a chance to say something further.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): I know your honour appreciates the situation; we are anxious to secure as much information as possible before this bill goes back into committee. The objections raised by the minister have not been convincing to me. I appreciate the practical difficulty, which may be minor or major, but we do know that this English company law has worked out well in that country, and I have heard no protests against it. We have lawyers in this house who are acquainted with English law and its practical application, and unless they can produce evidence to show that this section has not operated well in England and has not militated against undue watering of stock, then I am afraid the entire case of the minister falls to the ground. I am in sympathy with the mover of the bill; I have made some investigation of the matter and I really believe the bridge is needed. Apart from that, however, we are faced with this question of the watering of stock, which has become a common practice in all our corporations and which is perhaps particularly common in bridge companies. As far as it may be possible we must protect the public, the stockholders and the interest of the company by avoiding undue and false capitalization. Therefore I intend to invite the mover of the bill to accept this amendment in good spirit and let the bill embody some measure of public protection. That is all that is asked for, and if the mover of the bill is so unwise as to reject it, then I feel that I must vote for the amendment.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): The legislation of which this house is asked to approve is vicious in its character from two standpoints: First, it creates a bridge company with rights which interfere with navigation which under treaty is free to the countries on either side of the river in question. In the second place, the measure itself contains terms such as no enlightened parliament in the British Empire or in any state of the American union would pass at this period of progress. It starts first with a company whose shares have no par value, and makes provision that the whole of these shares may be given to the promoters. This amendment is designed to check the provision having to do with the no par value of the stock.

Let us analyse these matters. I say first that it interferes with a river on which navigation rights are granted by treaty, although it is true that this measure is not to become law unless certain conditions are fulfilled. Those conditions involve first of all concurrent legislation by the congress of the United States; they must enact a law which will enable this bridge to be constructed. In the second place, the conditions imposed by the bill, which I do not intend to discuss at length on the third reading, safeguard the public interest to some extent, but place the power in the hands of the governor in council.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is my hon. friend through with it from the navigation point of view?

Mr. BENNETT: I am just saying that it affects navigation to some extent.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No structure could affect navigation.

An hon. MEMBER: The Navigable Waters Act covers it.

Mr. CANNON: Unless the act is excepted in the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: I quite appreciate, for instance, that the Beauharnois canal matter is now being submitted to the cabinet. I have not had a chance to analyse it since, but it is not perfectly clear that the Navigable Waters Act would apply to this structure.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend will agree that no structure could be built over navigable waters without the consent of the governor in council.

Mr. BENNETT: Here is a bill which shall come into effect with the consent of the governor in council, provided that the United States authorities give authority to construct the bridge at the other end. I am not certain, and I do not think the Minister of Justice will say he is at all certain, having regard to the way the bill is drawn and the provisions is sets forth, that it does not eliminate the provisions of the general statute. It substitutes for the general statute the governor in council.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I can hardly take that in. Navigation is paramount.

Mr. BENNETT: Navigation is paramount, but my friend the minister overlooks this fact, that parliament has control over navigation; it can impede navigation, and sometimes has done so; and navigation is not paramount unless this parliament keeps it paramount. It may or may not be paramount, depending upon what the attitude of this parliament may be. Leaving that aside for a moment, we will assume that parliament has concluded that the bridge company shall exist? Now what is the result? We have given, as the books say, life and vitality to something, an entity that we hereafter call the bridge company or whatever it may be; it comes into being by act of this parliament; it is clothed with the power that this parliament confers upon it. Leaving out for a moment the question of the power to construct the bridge, let us say that the view suggested by the Minister of the Interior is sound, that the project is subject to the provisions of the Navigable Waters Act and that there must be the consent of the minister. In this bill the governor in council must consent before it comes into force.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Now come to the next point. It is a toll bridge, is it not? Last week the governor of New York state vetoed all bridge bills dealing with tolls, declaring that the time had come in his country when the state can borrow money so much more cheaply than the individual that if it is desirable to construct bridges over any water on which people shall be charged tolls, that the people should pay the least possible toll; which means that the public should build the bridge and recoup themselves from the tolls. That is the position which the governor took. Is not that a sound principle?

The government must adopt some principle in regard to this. Is it the sound principle that the capitalists of any country shall meet together, form themselves into a syndicate and then take this company's charter, which gives them a living entity called the St. Clair Transit Company, charge tolls to yield back to them the cost of this bridge and interest on their money, with all the promotion expenses incidental to it, with the stock issued under the terms mentioned in the bill; then say that they shall have these powers conferred upon them, and when they get their money back that the bridge shall revert to certain people? If it is in the public interest, that a bridge be built at St. Clair let the people of this country give their collective credit to it, and the country will get the money much cheaper than anybody else can get it. We have had a number of toll bridges in this country, but they have been abolished in most of the provinces because it has been found a most unfair use of the powers of parliament to create them; and I think the last one was brought out in the older provinces. I cannot speak of them all, but I know that has been done.

We have a toll bridge across the Niagara, and there has been a great deal of difficulty in connection with it. Tolls must be fixed in this case by the governor in council. On what basis are they to be fixed? Tolls are to be fixed from time to time by the governor in council and by the railway board so as to yield a return upon the capital invested in the construction of the enterprise. They are going to borrow the money to build the bridge, and issue stock for the services rendered in getting the charter. That is the position. Now what is suggested by the hon. member? When I listened to the amendment being read it sounded familiar, and I have now read it. Subsection (c) is one which becomes operative only in the event of there being non-compliance with the other provisions of the section. In other words sub-paragraph (c) does not become effective unless there has been non-compliance by the company with the provision with respect to capital, namely the filing with the Secretary of State of the agreement showing how the capital was issued and for what services it was emitted from the treasury. That is all. Our Companies Act makes certain requirements with respect to filing prospectuses and contracts with the Secretary of State. You have to file a contract, for instance. You are asked in your prospectus to state what contracts are outstanding or have been issued, and if there is a contract outstanding it is supposed to be filed with the minister. This section is partially copied from the English section, and is somewhat different; it is modified to meet the case. The amendment says:

> But no such issue or allotment of shares as fully or partly paid up shall be valid or binding upon the company—
> (a) Unless before any such issue or allotment of shares shall have been made as fully or partly paid up otherwise than in cash, the company shall have filed in the office of the Secretary of State a contract in writing, duly executed by the parties thereto, setting forth the considerations other than cash for which the company is about to issue and allot such shares as fully or partly paid up; nor
> (b) Unless in each and every case in which the company shall allot or issue shares upon the footing that the whole or some part thereof shall be credited as paid for a consideration other than cash, such consideration shall be received and credited by the company at not more than its then actual cash value.

Now in respect to that there is a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the case of a company that was promoted in Ontario, one of the Orchard companies. There are numberless decisions in Great Britain from the House of Lords down to a single judge. It is therefore well settled by well determined precedent and a well regulated line of cases, so that there is no difficulty in respect to that.

Mr. RALSTON: What is settled? I did not catch that.

Mr. BENNETT: What relation the services rendered have to the stock issued has been settled by a series of cases. We had one in the Supreme Court of Canada in which the whole of the capital stock of the company was issued not for services but—

Mr. RALSTON: For a boat, a one-man company?

Mr. BENNETT: No, not for a boat. It was one of the Orchard cases, and the court said it will not be astute to discover whether the consideration is adequate up to a single dollar, but whether it bears some relation to the capital stock issued for it. The minister will probably bear that case in mind. I sent for Palmer's Company Precedents, but I did not get them in time to turn up the section from which this is taken, because I imagine, with certain changes, this is the form which will be found in Palmer's Company Precedents.

Mr. RALSTON: I thought I recognized it too. But is the hon. member sure that paragraph (b) is in the English statutes?

Mr. BENNETT: That was my memory when I read it.

Mr. RALSTON: I have Lindley's Company Law here.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend will remember that the Companies' Act was amended, but I do not think Lindley's to which he refers deals with the latest amendments to the Companies' Act. The paragraph to which the Minister of Railways takes exception is one that can have no effect at all upon the question now before the house. It is a paragraph that becomes operative only in event of the company failing to discharge their duties. In other words, if they take the chance of issuing shares without fulfilling the agreement called for by the preceding sub-paragraphs, then they run the risk of being liable for the par value of the shares. But in this case the difficulty is that no par value is attached to the shares. That is an unusual feature with respect to the matter. Furthermore, the Minister of Railways was very fearful lest this should result in litigation. Let me point out to him that the courts, rightly or wrongly, decided two generations ago that any man who buys shares in a company must be considered as having read the memorandum and the articles of association. He buys them at his peril and when he buys shares in this enterprise he knows that that paragraph is there. The courts decided that question very early in the history of incorporated companies. There having been fixed upon him the onus of knowing what he is buying, the terms of this section are known to him, and if he buys shares, like a pig-in-a-poke, without knowing what he is buying, the law says that that is his business, because it attributes to him, when he bought the shares, knowledge of the charter and all its terms. That is the position with respect to that.

The matter has nothing more than a general public interest so far as I am concerned but this is a step backwards in the worst sense. No such legislation as this would be passed in these days by any parliament or legislature that I know of. It would be desired by promoters if they could secure it. It has about it all the earmarks of legislation that existed in the United States at least fifty years ago and about which we read so much, except that it has set no par value for the shares instead of setting a par value of a fixed price per share. It does permit, in its very terms, of the issue of shares for the service of getting this charter through the House of Commons, the expense of preparing the bill and other expenses incidental to the completion of the charter.

The government should have a well-defined policy with respect to this bridge, indeed with respect to all these bridges. The government should have enunciated a policy with respect to all these bridges that cross international waterways. It is neither meet nor proper nor just nor in the public interest of this country that private bills should be introduced and passed through parliament because someone is rather a nice gentleman, you like him, you do not like to vote against him, you have a desire to accommodate him and a desire to support his bill. It is not a pleasant thing to vote against legislation promoted by my hon. friend whose name is on this bill; anyone would like to oblige him by voting in support of his bill, and too often the public interest is subordinated to our personal likes or dislikes and the popularity or unpopularity of the person who has the legislation in charge. I have discharged my duty in the matter of directing the attention of the administration to these facts, to the abuses that will follow and to the retrograde character of the legislation, which is at variance with all modern ideas. The time has come for the enunciation and declaration of a policy in regard to bridges crossing international waters instead of leaving such bills in the hands of a private member who, by suggesting that if you and your friends will support my bill, I and my friends will support yours, may be able to get it through the select standing committee and into the House of Commons and then, with the aid of party associations and good friendship, get it through the house. I will vote for the amendment as a protest against legislation of this character and I leave with the government the responsibility of having placed upon the statute books of this country legislation which is more backward in its character and more far-reaching in its effects than any bills of a similar nature to which my attention has been directed in recent times.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Just two points. At first I was impressed by what was said by the mover of the amendment with regard to this being copied from the English statutes. Is that correct?

Mr. IRVINE: The principle, I mean.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is wrong about that, as I felt sure he was. There is a principle which is contained in a good many of the provincial companies' acts and that principle is that when shares are issued for a consideration other than cash, the contract showing the consideration for those shares shall be filed with the registrar of joint stock companies in order that anyone who buys shares may have an opportunity of going to the registrar's office and seeing just exactly what property the shares represent. In other words it provides publicity in order that a man may see just what he is buying when he buys these shares. That provision was contained in the English Companies Act of 1867 and from that act it was copied into most of the provincial acts. I have just had an opportunity of looking at Palmer's Company Precedents, thirteenth edition, 1927, page 574, and I find that that section was repealed in England and now under section 88 of the act of 1908—

> A contract and a return have to be filed within one month after the allotment of shares in whole or in part for a consideration other than cash.

That is about the same principle as was contained in the former act. But note this:

> In case of default there is no provision that the shares are to be deemed to be allotted on a cash basis. Penalties are, however, imposed in case of default on officers of the company.

That is in case of default in the matter of filing the contract. Now in regard to this proposed amendment, subparagraph (a), to which the Minister of Railways has referred, provides in general terms for the same idea which is contained in provincial legislation, namely, the filing of a contract in order to show what the consideration was for the issue of shares. Subparagraph (b) I cannot find in the English act and I have never seen it before.

Mr. BENNETT: Paragraph (b) or (c)?

Mr. RALSTON: Paragraph (b). Paragraph (b), with all due respect to the Minister of Railways, is the one which, it seems to me, perpetuates the possibility of litigation and makes a pretty serious situation for anybody who buys shares no matter how innocently. It is one thing to insert in an act a provision that the directors shall not issue shares for a consideration other than cash unless they file with the registrar of joint stock companies a contract showing what those shares are issued for, whether for property or service. Then a man can go and buy the shares, and if he finds there is no contract he has a right to assume that the shares are issued for cash and that therefore the cash proceeds will be found in the treasury of the company. But it is quite another thing to say that not only shall there be a contract filed when the shares are issued for other than cash, but that the consideration for those shares shall be received and credited by the company at not more than its actual cash value. By the proposed subparagraph (c) if, in a company in which that provision has not been complied with, I buy shares ten years after the company is incorporated, I shall be liable to the company to make up in cash the par value of the shares notwithstanding the fact that I have paid in full for them already to the person from whom I bought them. The effect of it is this. I buy shares in the company from some other individual. The company was incorporated ten years ago. If the liquidator of the company can prove that ten years ago the directors of that company received certain property in consideration of the issue of shares, and that the value of that property was not the full par value of those shares, then I am liable to pay the difference.

Mr. BENNETT: The statute of limitations would apply if it was ten years ago.

Mr. RALSTON: Then let us say six years, although I do not think the statute of limitations would operate, because the action would accrue against me only from the time I purchased the shares.

Mr. BENNETT: The statute would run.

Mr. RALSTON: The statute would run against me from the time the cause of action arises, but I do not think the cause of action arises against me until I become the owner of the shares. So I say that the effect of this would be that six years at least after the company had been incorporated and had issued its shares, for property or services which it turns out were not worth the full par value of the shares, and if the company fails, the liquidator of that company could come into the courts and cause me to pay up to the par value of those shares notwithstanding the fact that I had paid par for them to the person from whom I purchased them. That is going a long way in this sort of legislation; it is going further than any provincial act goes, and it seems to me that this house should stop and consider before arbitrarily passing such legislation, and particularly before putting it in the provisions of any particular bill when it is not the general law.

I know nothing about the merits of this particular legislation which is before the house, but I do believe that we should not pass that sort of legislation without a good deal more consideration than we can give to it on the third reading of this bill.

Mr. IRVINE: Suppose the minister was going to buy shares as he has suggested, would he not be careful first to inquire how those shares had been acquired in the first place?

Mr. RALSTON: Certainly I would inquire. If the first part of the section were in force, I would go to the registrar of joint stock companies and there find out that the shares were issued, for instance, for services, perhaps six years before, but does my hon. friend tell me that I could be in a position to make up my mind what the court would decide five years afterwards as to the worth of those services? I would have to go back to the time those shares were issued and decide in my own mind whether the property or services for which they were issued was worth the amount of the shares? That burden should not be put upon any purchaser of shares.

Mr. BENNETT: It is on some of them now.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know of any.

Mr. BENNETT: Where shares were issued under contracts filed with registrars of companies in the provinces where the old English act was in force, that risk was always present.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is quite wrong about that.

Mr. BENNETT: I have had to do it in my province.

Mr. RALSTON: The very case my hon. friend cited decided that so long as the contract was filed with the registrar of joint stock companies, and the directors of the company considered in good faith that the property was worth the amount of the shares issued, that decision was conclusive and would not be inquired into. My hon. friend, I think, is under a misapprehension about this. The individual is not required to try for himself any such question in that case. I say that my hon. friend's amendment, Mr. Speaker, goes far beyond anything I know in the English statutes and far beyond anything in the provincial statutes. Further than that, there is no provision even with regard to filing a contract under our Federal Companies Act.

Mr. IRVINE: There ought to be.

Mr. RALSTON: I may agree with my hon. friend. The leader of the opposition is quite right that a prospectus is required to be filed, but there is no provision for the filing of the contract.

Mr. BENNETT: One of the questions asked in the prospectus is, what contracts are there.

Mr. RALSTON: I understand that, but that is very different from saying that the shares shall be taken as issued for a cash consideration. My hon. friend from Wetaskiwin raises the real point. It seems to me it would be worth while considering in this house at some time an amendment to the general company law of this Dominion, putting into that law a provision similar to the one they have in the provinces, and I for one will be very ready to consider such a proposition when it is made, but I do not think we should select any particular bill as the one into which to put this special provision, when, after all, it is a matter of general company legislation.

Hon. E. B. RYCKMAN (East Toronto): I feel it necessary to say a word in view of some of the expressions that have been made in regard to the law as applicable in a case of this kind. The object of this bill, I conceive, is to hand upon a silver salver a golden bonus to some friends of the government or to those who desire to enjoy this charter. For my part, I would very much like to support the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Goodison) and to give him anything he wants in reason from this house, but in my view, if we gave this franchise, each one of us when we sat down in the cool of the evening and reasoned with ourselves would seriously castigate ourselves for allowing a bill of this nature to go through. What does it mean? It means that some men have got together to get a franchise out of which they expect to make money at the expense of the public; in a word, that is the situation. And who are the gentlemen who are seeking the franchise? I dare say they are very estimable gentlemen, but I find that in a matter of this kind, which concerns the public, the Canadian National Railway seems to know pretty nearly all about it. The first one mentioned is George Newton Galloway, a Canadian National engineer. The next one is John Alexander White, salesman. I would not fancy that he would be a man of very great means, or one who was capable of taking part in the building of a bridge the cost of which would run into millions of dollars. The others are William Robert Paul, loan company manager, John Morris Tobin, barber, Peter Paton, merchant, James Manford Norwood, Canadian National engineer, and Chester Holdsworth Belton, lumber merchant, all of the city of Sarnia. The object plainly is to get this franchise from the government and having got it, to see how they can build this bridge and obtain the most money for themselves, and incidentally charge as high tolls as the government will allow them to charge.

The capital stock of the company is to consist of one hundred thousand shares of stock of no par value. I think the judgment of the house has been obfuscated by the debate that has taken place upon how the shares may be dealt with. In less than half an hour I could draw up a contract that would fully pay up those shares. What for? For the Hansard reporter's pencil, and no more value at all. It is the law of this country. That can be done, and in a case of this kind it will be done, and I desire to offer a protest against any such valuable franchise as this being given to men who expect to turn it to their own account as a gift of grace from the government by which they will reap money for themselves.

If this bridge is necessary, let the Canadian National Railways, which seems to know something about it, build it. This is a public enterprise and members of this house, one after the other, get up and declare themselves in favour of public ownership. This very day I heard a member of the government declare how strongly he stood for public ownership. Well, this is a case for public ownership, if this bridge is necessary at all. Let the people have this accommodation if it is necessary, but let the government build the bridge. Do not let it be built by salesmen and barbers, who expect by means of this franchise to line their own pockets with gold. I think parliament at this time cannot afford to grant a franchise of this nature in defiance of public protest, and I am sure that once the people understand what is involved in this case they will be keen to resent such a grant when the public welfare is at stake.

Hon. J. D. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I am not opposed to this bridge in the same way that I am opposed to a bridge on the Niagara frontier. There may be a reason for this bridge; there is none for the other. There is no other bridge where the promoters desire to erect this bridge.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I call the attention of hon. members who are yet to speak that there is an amendment before the house, and that they should address themselves to the merits of the amendment, not to the general principle of the bill? I had intended to bring this to the notice of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Ryckman).

Mr. CHAPLIN: Mr. Speaker, you have been pretty lenient with some hon. members who have spoken. I will try to keep within the four corners of the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman will do so.

Mr. CHAPLIN: In my judgment this is a proper amendment. In addition to the reasons already advanced in its favour, I wish to place before the house other reasons for its adoption. In this bill it is provided that eventually the bridge is to revert to the Dominion or to the province of Ontario. When that happens I do not want it to be encumbered with a lot of watered stock. Of course, members of the government will assure me, as some have already, that they are not behind the bill, but it will be noticed that with one or two exceptions they have all been helping its passage. I contend that the amendment is fair and proper and, to a certain extent at least, will prevent the watering of stock. Will the minister tell me what harm can come to this or to any other company by inserting in the charter a provision that the company must get cash only for its stock?

Mr. RALSTON: I have endeavoured to point out that the harm can come to people who purchase shares and are not in a position accurately to judge what a court will decide as to the value of the consideration for which the shares were issued.

Mr. IRVINE: Why a court?

Mr. RALSTON: Because that is the only way in which the penalty under (c) can be enforced.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The officers of the company can obviate all trouble in reference to the stock if they issue it for cash only. We want to prevent the giving away of shares in exchange for something that is of no value; that is, the watering of the stock. As I have already pointed out, my particular interest in this bill is that it purports to give something back to the country a little later on.

Mr. RALSTON: Did my hon. friend ever yet vote in this house for a bill which provided that shares could be issued only for cash?

Mr. CHAPLIN: I have no doubt that I have done so, but I am prepared to say now that I am no longer in favour of this sort of thing, and in the future I shall vote against it, even if I stand alone in my opposition.

Mr. FRANKLIN SMOKE (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I gather from the remarks of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) and other members on the government side that they are quite in sympathy with the idea embodied in the amendment, but do not believe that it is practicable. The main objection of the minister seems to be that some ten years hence the question may be raised and the stockholders at that time may be held liable to the company or its creditors for the value of their holdings not paid in cash. It strikes me that if the minister is so much interested—

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Smoke moves, seconded by Mr. Dickie, that the debate be now adjourned.

Mr. CANNON: He has not moved that.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. member object to the motion for adjournment of the debate?

Mr. CANNON: He did not move any motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Then the bill will fall to the bottom of the order paper.

Mr. BENNETT: It is nine o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hour for private bills is exhausted.

MILITIA PENSION ACT AMENDMENT

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 197, to amend the Militia Pension Act—Mr. Ralston—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. RALSTON: When the committee rose we were considering section 5, and I intimated then that I would move an amendment. I explained the subsection intended to benefit those dependants, other than wives and children, of men who had served their full pensionable period but on account of whose death nothing was payable because they had left neither wife nor child. A suggestion was made that the use of the word "dependant" might be somewhat ambiguous, and I have therefore redrafted the section which I submitted this afternoon.

Mr. BENNETT: The word "dependant" does not appear in section 5.

Mr. RALSTON: Not as printed, but I read before recess a proposed amendment. The first subsection of that amendment as I gave it then remains; the second subsection I have redrafted, adding a few words descriptive of "dependant". The redrafted subsection 4 reads:

If an officer dies leaving no widow or child to whom a gratuity under the provisions of the preceding subsection, or a pension or compassionate allowance under this act would be payable, but who leaves a father, mother, brother, sister or child who, at the date of such officer's death was wholly or partially dependent on him for support the governor in council may grant to the person or persons so dependent a gratuity not exceeding in the aggregate the amount of the deductions made under subsection one of section ten of this act from the officer's pay during his services.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there not a possible incongruity there? The word "child" is used in the preceding subsection, meaning one under eighteen years of age.

Mr. RALSTON: True, the word "child" is used in both subsections. If the child is under eighteen then he or she comes under other sections providing for pensions to children. But there may be a child over eighteen dependent upon the father for support, and in that case he or she comes under the second subsection.

Mr. BENNETT: This would apply even to a married daughter.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, if dependent upon the father for support.

Mr. BENNETT: I see no reason why the amendment should not pass, inasmuch as it merely permits the governor in council to hand over to certain named persons money which belonged to the officer, which was deducted from his salary or compensation in his lifetime, which he could not get, and which is now made available for those persons. I would point out however that the retroactive feature is an invitation to a request for similar legislation in other cases. It is exceptional and involves a principle which I am sure will be invoked hereafter by others in connection with the mounted police, and under other statutes. Once you concede the right to make this provision effective as from June, 1923, you will certainly be asked to extend the same consideration to others.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You probably will.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, you probably will. I cannot see on general principles that there is anything wrong with the section except that it has not been customary in this parliament to adopt this retroactive feature. This covers a special case, and one which no doubt is deserving; we are providing that the provision shall be retroactive over a period of five years. But I warn the minister—and I use the word "warn" this time in its proper sense—that many similar applications will come before parliament. I remember having heard the same question discussed once before in the House of Commons, and the minister of the day thought it was too dangerous a thing to do when dealing with gratuities and pensions; for once you make legislation retroactive in respect of gratuities and pensions—fixing the year 1923, as in this case—there will be someone here next session saying, "I am willing to have you make it 1926". Others will say that 1924 will do. The minister should be able to devise some other method, and I should be glad to co-operate with him to meet the cases he has in mind. That, I think, would be preferable to putting on the statute books an invitation to all and sundry, affected either directly or indirectly, to ask for legislation of a retroactive character. I have in mind particularly a case I mentioned to the Minister of Justice last year in connection with the mounted police. In respect of the widow of an officer an effort was made to pass a measure retroactive for a year, and there was a good deal of discussion about it. I bring this matter to the attention of the minister because I think it is my duty to do so.

Mr. RALSTON: I thoroughly agree with my hon. friend as to the undesirability of passing retroactive legislation, but in this instance it is, I think, amply justified, not by the circumstances of the individual case, but by this fact: Up to the thirtieth of June, 1923, the wife of a soldier could get a pension if that soldier had served for ten years; but on the thirtieth of June of that year that privilege ceased, so that while the woman whose husband had served ten years and died the day before could receive a pension, the widow of the man with similar service who died on the first of July found herself deprived of her allowance. In the event of an officer dying before he attains the pensionable period this provision will enable the widow to receive the amount deducted from his salary. I think therefore that the retroactive feature is justified. not, as I say, because of individual reasons but because it will, if I may use the expression, ease off the sharp break that took place when the new legislation was passed in June, 1923.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Term of service of militiaman.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): During the course of the discussion of this bill I inquired of the minister whether he had received any communications. I have one from a member of the permanent force asking that consideration be extended to some of them who have served continuously, but in another department of the government. I thought that service should go towards their pension in the same way as the service of these reservists would be estimated. I have no objection to the first part, but here is a suggestion from one of our own men who since the war has joined the permanent force and has served continuously in some department of the government. He thinks the same favour should be granted to them as is granted to the other people referred to in the present bill.

Mr. BENNETT: The point is this: A civil servant joins the permanent force, and my friend suggests that the time during which he was a member of the civil service but not in the militia department should count as part of his service. I think that is not an unreasonable request, having regard to the fact that we are extending this to service in the constabulary, the navy and the air force, as well as to other services. After all, if a man was a civil servant paying into the superannuation fund, it seems to me that that time should count in the new branch of the civil service in which he finds himself.

Mr. RALSTON: I think that is dealt with in section 2, although I am bound to say that I speak with some hesitation as to that.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I cannot make it out from this, but they evidently do not consider that it covers their case.

Mr. BENNETT: This afternoon I thought that was the very thing we were endeavouring to do in section 2, is that clear?

Mr. RALSTON: I thought so also, but I am bound to say that I did not differentiate between the outside and the inside service. I shall be glad to look into this question.

Mr. GEARY: Under the Civil Service Superannuation Act the time served will apply towards a pension, but if that civil servant enlisted, even though he became a commissioned officer, he would not come under this section because this is an officers' section.

Mr. RALSTON: I will look into that question.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Pension to officer or militiaman of His Majesty's Army Reserve who enlisted in permanent force.

Mr. RALSTON: I endeavoured to explain section 7 quite fully the other day; it deals with those cases of reservists who served with the British army and were afterwards placed on the British army reserve. They then enlisted in the Canadian permanent force and were liable to be sent back to England at the outbreak of the war. Their services were requested by the British authorities, but the Canadian authorities asked that they remain here, and that request was granted. These men are now asking that some provision be made for accepting the time they served under the British colours, with the British army and with the reserve, for pension. Provision is made to add their service in Great Britain to their service in Canada up to the time they were demobilized, and they are given the same pension they would have received if they had served in England, with the alternative of taking the Canadian pension from the time they started to serve in Canada.

Mr. CLARK: I endorse the principle of this section, but I cannot understand the words:

> An officer or militiaman who, whilst belonging to His Majesty's Army Reserve, enlisted in the permanent force . . . .

Why should it be "officer or militiaman;" surely it would not be necessary for one of the reservists to be an officer or militiaman when he enlisted in the permanent force?

Mr. RALSTON: No, I do not think that is what is meant. An officer or militiaman is defined in the act, as my hon. friend will notice, as follows:

> An officer or militiaman means a non-commissioned officer or private of the force.

This section says he is entitled to this option.

Mr. CLARK: My point is that he might be a reservist but not an officer or militiaman.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think it is intended that he shall be contemporaneously an officer or militiaman and one of His Majesty's army reservists. He becomes an officer or militiaman when he enlists.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Provision of 1919, c. 61, to apply to certain cases.

Mr. RALSTON: This section also I explained previously, quite fully. It provides for those members of the permanent force who served in the war and who were invalided out on account of war disabilities or sickness before July, 1919, when the act came into force which permitted them to retire even though they had only served ten years. It is said that the effect of their war disability was that they were out of the force before that section came into effect and this provision is to make them come under the provisions of that legislation as though they were members of the force at that time, in order that they may get their pension.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Application to Royal Canadian Navy.

Mr. RALSTON: The other day there was some discussion with regard to deserted wives, and I think this a convenient time to discuss that matter; I promised to consider the question, and I think I have a suggestion which will meet with the approval of the committee. Under the superannuation act the deserted wife of an ex-civil servant gets no gratuity or payment; that payment is made to the husband, but I find that in the Pension Act relating to war disabilities there was an administration section inserted when the act was passed in 1919, which gave the Board of Pension Commissioners quite wide powers in appointing someone to administer a pension. Perhaps hon. gentlemen do not know that the pensions dealt with by this act are also paid by the Board of Pension Commissioners, although they do not decide the right of payment, which is a matter for the governor in council. The Board of Pension Commissioners act as paying agents for the department.

Mr. BENNETT: For all military pensions.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes; and I am proposing that we insert in this act an administration section, similar to the section to which I have referred.

Mr. BENNETT: There was a good deal of trouble in working out that section, as I had occasion to discover at one time.

Mr. RALSTON: I have discussed the matter with the chairman of the Board of Pension Commissioners and he assures me that this section has worked very satisfactorily in connection with disability pensions. In my discussion with the chairman of the Board of Pension Commissioners he assured me that, although they did not ask for any further responsibility than they now have, yet they have found that section to work out very well in that connection with disability pensions, and they would be prepared to take on if desired similar duties in connection with service pensions. I have endeavoured therefore in the section which I propose to make the Board of Pension Commissioners the recommending authority, and to provide that when the Board of Pension Commissioners recommend, the minister may order the appointment of a person to administer the pension. I have used the same words as in section 16 of the Pension Act except that I have substituted the minister for the board in the operative portion of the section. If the committee will allow me, I will read it now. The provision is:

9. The following section is inserted after section 34:

34a. When the Board of Pension Commissioners of Canada is of opinion that the pensioner is incapable of expending or is not expending the pension in a proper manner, or that he is not maintaining the members of his family to whom he owes the duty of maintenance, the minister may order that the pension be paid to such person as it may appoint, in order that the money may be expended by such person for the benefit of the pensioner and the members of his family. The expenses connected with such payment, if any, shall be paid by the commission.

This is where my friend the minister of pensions and health will come in and perhaps have to provide the board with a little extra for the purpose of such expenses. I am saying that is the exact section 16 contained in the Disability Pension Act, except that the word "minister" is substituted for "board".

Mr. BENNETT: In one case which came to my attention it was found that it does not pay the minister to pay the money directly to the widow—you observe the way in which it is put. Might it not be better if the board recognized that the money be paid directly to the person thus entitled instead of to the administrators?

Mr. RALSTON: I agree with my hon. friend, and if I had been drafting a new section I would have done it that way. It is really one of their own people who acts as agent in the district where the man happens to be living; he administers the fund and he pays it for the wife and children. It is because we have a practice which is already settled that it seems to me it would be better possibly to adopt this than to attempt to lay down something new.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Do I understand that the minister says that the pension is not paid directly to the widow and children in the case of disability pensions?

Mr. RALSTON: No. What the Board of Pension Commissioners do is go through the form of appointing someone to administer the pension, but the one they appoint is generally their own respresentative in that district.

Mr. BENNETT: This will be a very great step forward. In the case to which the member for Kingston (Mr. Ross) referred the other day, and which I fancy most of the members of this house have had brought to their attention, the pensioner is out of the country and the wife is left in destitute circumstances. This will enable the payment to be made under the Pension Act. It is a great improvement on the old condition, and I think it is worthy of being tried out.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The minister will find that the cases to which I have referred, while not numerous, are very deserving cases. The amendment, I think, will work out satisfactorily.

Mr. RALSTON: I think it will in practice, because I have talked it over quite fully with the chairman of the Board of Pension Commissioners. I am going to move, Mr. Chairman, that that be inserted as section 34A of the act. My hon. friend will see that part II follows; it should be in the first part and then will be made applicable automatically to parts II and III.

Mr. CHURCH: Why do you not make it a new section 9?

Mr. RALSTON: I will have to make it section 9 of the act. I will have to renumber them.

Mr. BENNETT: Then say "the following section is inserted as"—

Mr. RALSTON: As section 34A.

Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall part II of section 9 carry?

Section agreed to.

On section 10.

Mr. RALSTON: That should be renumbered. The section which you just read previously, introducing part II, should be renumbered as section 10, the section which you have just passed. The next one, on page 5, will be section 11.

DOMINION FOREST RESERVES AND PARKS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved the second reading of Bill No. 193, to amend the Dominion Forest Reserves and Parks Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Withdrawals from forest reserves.

Mr. GARDINER: Will the minister give an explanation?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I might make an explanation of the whole bill. The bill proposes no additions to the forest reserves. These are withdrawals that have been recommended, after inspection by our officers who do land inspection work, as being lands that were included in the forest reserves and are fit for agricultural settlement. There is one withdrawal in Manitoba, the remainder being in Saskatchewan, and none in Alberta or British Columbia. Application, I may say, has been made to homestead these lands, and we are withdrawing them for the purpose of allowing them to be used for agricultural purposes.

Mr. KENNEDY: Is it the policy of the department to withdraw from forest reserves lands that are fit for agriculture and apply them as homesteads?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, with the single exception that sometimes we have applications for lands within the centre of a forest reserve, but my hon. friend will readily understand that it would not be feasible to allow settlement in the centre of a forest reserve, even where there is good agricultural land. Wherever good agricultural land is found on the boundary of a forest reserve, it is the policy of the department to withdraw it from the reserve. These lands are all on the boundaries.

Mr. GARDINER: When these lands are withdrawn, what steps are taken in regard to allowing homesteading privileges? Will everyone have the same chance?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, they are advertised as being open for homesteading.

Mr. GARDINER: In that case the returned men will have the preference the same as they do now?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: This raises a very serious question, as perhaps the minister knows. After much consideration these lands are put into a forest reserve, and in some instances that has been done by order in council. It has been provided by the statutes of Canada that lands thus placed within a forest reserve by order in council cannot be taken out of that reserve except by statute. That is the present law. The minister says that they have reports covering all these lands, which, except for one group which is in Manitoba, are all in Saskatchewan. Next week the minister is undertaking a great effort in connection with preventing the destruction of forests by fire. The public have been accustomed to these lands being part of a forest reserve, and it is true that a considerable area on the edge of the forest is free from trees and that this constitutes or has constituted a great bulwark against the attack on the forest itself by fire. The planting of homesteads near the forests—and while I was not able to trace them carefully on the maps, some of these come quite close to the forest itself—increases in a marked degree the fire hazard with respect to these areas. If we are sincere in our efforts to protect the forests, if they are of the value that the minister has intimated in connection with next week's campaign, and if we are reciprocating with the people of the United States in our efforts, this statute will at least increase the fire hazard of the forest reserves in Saskatchewan by not less than fifty per cent—and I think that is a conservative estimate—because, as the matter stands now, the fringe of forest in the reserve is protected by a strip of agricultural land. My understanding from the little checking up I was able to do is that these lands do not comprise sections within the reserve; that they all lie on the outskirts, and that they constitute one of the greatest safeguards we have against fire.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Are they prairie lands?

Mr. BENNETT: They are mixed lands. The hon. member knows that is too large a question to expect me to give an answer that will be of value to him. Some of them are practically prairie lands and some are scrub lands, but there is no habitation upon them.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): My experience in western Canada is that as habitation increases, the risk of fire decreases.

Mr. BENNETT: That is true as regards prairie fires, but need I say to the hon. member for Weyburn that these strips of arable land surrounding a forest reserve are very carefully safeguarded by the fire guardians. They burn them, for instance, at certain seasons of the year so as to protect from fire the forest that lies beyond. I fancy that my hon. friend has seen just what I mean with respect to that. These forest reserves are being protected by aeroplanes, telephones and fire guards. I noticed particularly that that was the case in British Columbia and in some parts of my own province of Alberta They string lines along the trees for the purpose of carrying on telephonic communication, and they have depots from which they are able to make observations with respect to the cause of fires and immediately to take steps to protect the forests from destruction. There is no doubt that this fringe of untreed, arable land, when properly burned for purposes of protection and without habitation, constitutes a great safeguard with respect to the forests. From that standpoint I felt that we should have complete information because the area we are now withdrawing amounts to thirty-two square miles.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is out of all the reserves.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. The area involved amounts to thirty-two square miles which, roughly speaking, is about twenty thousand acres. From a settlement standpoint that is not a large area scattered over Saskatchewan and Manitoba in all these reserves. It comprises only a limited number of homesteads. There are only four to the square mile, so that in an area of thirty-two square miles there would be about one hundred and twenty-eight homesteads in all. I am questioning the minister as to whether the benefit that accrues from a mere designation of these lands as agricultural lands for one hundred and twenty-eight homesteads is to be compared with the resultant risk that attaches of the destruction of the forests which we are doing so much to save, especially in the western provinces. I merely put the matter before the minister. I have not any expert evidence to support my point beyond a mere inspection of the map and a determination of the areas, but what we have to face is this: Is it desirable to render subject to fire hazards to a very much greater degree than now exists the forests affected in Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba, for the sake of rendering open for settlement one hundred and twenty-eight quarter sections of land? That is the proposition. I think the minister should give us some information with respect to that question so far as he is able to give it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I shall be very glad to do that, Mr. Chairman. I think my hon. friend is unduly alarmed about the fire hazard, because these eliminations are alongside of the forest reserves. They do not involve a very large area except in one instance, where the most we are taking is twenty-one square miles. We do not increase the fire hazard by taking these lands that are fit for agricultural purposes owing to the fact that the forest reserves in many instances, particularly in Manitoba, are settled right up to the boundary of the reserve. That is the case in many of the forest reserves in Saskatchewan. It is not the case in the more northern districts, but we have not yet selected forest reserves in what are strictly the unsettled parts of the country. They will have to be selected later on, and the endeavour will be to select for the forest reserves lands that are unfit for agricultural purposes, and every precaution will be taken to protect them from destruction by fire. I want to relieve my hon. friend's mind of any anxiety that by the elimination of small areas on the fringes of the forest reserves we are increasing the fire hazard.

Mr. BENNETT: You are bound to increase the fire hazard.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, because these lands are settled right up to the boundary of the reserve, and the taking of a small additional portion of the land for agricultural purposes does not in any degree increase the fire hazard.

Mr. BENNETT: It puts the fire that much nearer the forest.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But settlement is right up to the boundary of the reserve.

Mr. BENNETT: And now you are changing the boundary.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We are not changing the boundary. The settlement to-day is up to the reserve in the great majority of cases, and in some cases unfortunately they get into the reserve.

Mr. BENNETT: I know that, and fire happens by reason of it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): These small areas that are desirable for agricultural purposes are, I think, much better in the hands of some careful farmer than allowed to lie uncultivated with grass growing to a considerable height, with the risk some day of a prairie fire coming along. That is the menace. Personally, speaking from my own experience, I would much prefer to have the boundary of the reserve in the thickly timbered areas, because then we have a much better chance of preventing the fire from entering from outside.

Mr. BENNETT: None of these lands will be offered for sale?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, they will all be opened for homesteading.

Mr. BENNETT: I trust that the particulars given here have all been carefully checked.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

REPORTED LANDING OF GERMAN PLANE "BREMEN" ON GREENLY ISLAND

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Before we proceed to the next order, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Defence has received an important intimation which I think will be of special interest to all hon. members of this house, and I would ask that he might now have permission to announce it.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): We have had so many rumours, Mr. Speaker, that one almost hesitates to say anything with regard to the intrepid fliers who yesterday morning, started out from Ireland on a transatlantic flight to this continent, but this report which I have received seems to be reasonably official. It reads:

> Plane forced down in snowstorm on Greenly island. Reported by Point Amour wireless station. Official. Lighthouse on island and keeper there to take care of fliers.

Upon looking at the map I find that Greenly is in the straits of Belle Isle, and it is rather significant to note that it is just over the Canadian line and in the province of Quebec.

Mr. SPEAKER: And not far from Gaspe, either.

LOWER EAR FALLS STORAGE DAM

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved the second reading of Bill No. 195, to facilitate the provision of storage in Lac Seul in the province of Ontario, and to repeal the Lake of the Woods Regulation Act, 1921.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Agreement binding, and governor in council authorized to carry out its provisions.

Mr. BENNETT: Is the agreement signed by the provinces of Ontario and Manitoba?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Manitoba is really not a signatory. The federal government signed on behalf of Manitoba, but the province, of course, was in agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: I know that in most things the federal government claims the right to the mines, for instance, minerals, and water-powers of the province, whether Manitoba likes it or not, but in this case it says that the agreement was signed by Premier Bracken.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is correct; I beg my hon. friend's pardon. In this case we all signed.

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved the second reading of Bill No. 199 to amend the Dominion Lands Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Power in the chair.

On section 1—Entry in southern part of Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the effect of this?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In 1923 we amended the Dominion Lands Act giving the right to homestead within what was known as restricted area "A" on all the lands south of township 31 in Saskatchewan and Alberta. We extended the privilege of homesteading to the sons of farmers residing with their fathers on lands under the provisions of the Dominion Lands Act nine miles from the homestead. This privilege is subject to the discretion of the minister. It is found that all who could do so have taken advantage of the amendment, and it is now proposed to extend the privilege to any applicant. At a later date another amendment provided for the granting of a second homestead to an individual living within area "A" south of 31 if he appeared before the proper authority with the recommendation of the minister of agriculture of the provincial government. There has been considerable agitation to extend this privilege to all those who have proved up and patented their land prior to this year. Of course, the privilege will not be extended to individuals who have homesteaded for the second time; but if they have proved up and are desirous of securing another homestead they will be granted the privilege, a number of homesteaders having sons who are desirous of moving into newer localities. That is the main idea underlying the bill.

Then we have made a slight change with respect to the sale of school lands.

Mr. BENNETT: For what reason?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Formerly we had the right to sell, subject to the approval of the provincial governments, land for any project—reservoir, church, cemetery or hospital sites—but in the case of agricultural societies we could only grant leases. Frequently they establish their agricultural grounds on school lands, but their tenure being only leasehold they cannot erect buildings on the site, and they are asking that they be given the privilege to purchase the land in fee, always of course, subject to the approval of the provincial government. Then in section 39 we are amending the act to revert to the old principle of requiring one-tenth of the purchase money to be paid down at the date of sale of school lands, for the reason that many people took advantage of the small initial payment of one-twentieth, failed to pay the balance, and after allowing the land to become so full of weeds as to be a menace to the surrounding district, abandoned their holding. While we are not changing the rate of interest we think we had better revert to the old principle of requiring the larger initial payment rather than one-twentieth of the purchase price. These are virtually all the changes proposed in the bill.

Mr. EVANS: Does this privilege of the second homestead run all the way across Saskatchewan from east to west down to township 16?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The amendments proposed here allow anyone to apply for the second homestead. It is not confined to a limited area, as it was before.

Mr. GARDINER: I take it that section one deals solely with area A.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: If it is passed in this form there will be no restrictions at all on homesteading in that area?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes; I thought I made that clear. Under the provisions of the amendment of 1923, even the farmer's son, to whom the privilege was granted, could not secure a homestead except by consent of the minister. That meant, of course, after inspection by the homestead inspector who reported whether or not, in his opinion, there was reasonable chance of succeeding agriculturally on the land. The same provisions apply.

Mr. GARDINER: That is still in existence?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: I can quite understand that in some districts it might be advisable to apply this amendment in order that some portions might be more easily homesteaded. But area A, as most hon. members know, is in the dry belt; there is no question about that. This has been a good year in that district, and just at the moment when we get a little rain and harvest a good crop, all the regulations which have been in force in the past are going to be thrown to the winds, with the result that, in my judgment, we shall go through an experience similar to that of the recent past. Homesteading may be restricted to some extent, but not as it is at the present time. I know quite well that there has been a good deal of propaganda in that particular area, more particularly by people in the towns and villages, for the opening up of these lands in order that they may be settled again. The people are desirous of seeing as large a population as possible in the area. Judging from my experience in that area from 1910 or 1911, I should say that it would be in the best interests of the Dominion and of the area itself if we refrained from changing the conditions under which homesteads can be secured. It would be advisable, in view of the fact that probably more than fifty per cent of the people have been forced out of that area to go to other parts of Canada to secure a living, to allow that area to develop gradually and not to be forced. I am afraid that if the minister opens up this area to any considerable extent we shall have a forced growth, due solely to the conditions that have prevailed during the last year in the way of good crops harvested, and in time to come we shall have on our hands the problem which we have tried to solve in the last few years and which we have not yet met. I trust however that if this amendment passes the minister will see to it that there shall be no great extension there at the present time merely on the strength of this year's good crop; otherwise we shall be again faced with the problem with which we have had to deal in the past. If the federal government opens up this land it is its responsibility to see to it that the land is capable of sustaining a population. In my judgment we have a sufficient population in that particular area. There are many quarter-sections owned by the municipalities, held more or less by mortgage corporations and controlled by the Department of the Interior. In respect of these sections there are certain liens, and it is quite true that legislation was passed last year for the purpose of dealing with them. When this is done it will give the settlers now there an opportunity of obtaining larger holdings at a reasonably low cost so that they may go in for stock and be placed in a more secure position in their efforts to make a living. I should regret to see any action taken which would open up that land indiscriminately for further settlement. I believe it is a dry area, with a wet year once in a while, and when the dry period comes along all the good work done during the more favourable time is undone.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am in hearty accord with my hon. friend in respect of the area. Personally I should prefer to make it a closed area; it would save me a good deal of trouble. But here are some of the difficulties that have to be met. For example, in the constituency of Maple Creek there is a very large ranch. I have had complaints, registered by the former member and the present member as well, to the effect that there is a considerable area of good agricultural land in that ranch, and the farmers who live in the surrounding neighbourhood have had fairly reasonable crops throughout all the years since settlement took place. My hon. friend will remember that at one time he appealed to me to open lands held by ranchers for settlement purposes in his own constituency, south of the Cypress hills. Strange to say, during all these years in this particular locality there has been a fair return for agricultural labour. That is the problem with which I am confronted. If I close the area I shall receive very vigorous and serious protests from a great many settlers, who apparently have been successful during all this time, asking that the lands be eliminated from the ranch and opened for settlement. I went to the trouble of asking the soil expert of the agricultural department of the university of Saskatchewan to go to the district in company with our homestead inspector and make a thorough investigation of the soil. Having in mind the experience of the farmers in the district, I thought this advisable before even considering the question of releasing these lands for settlement purposes. And that is what I propose to do in every case before allowing crown lands in that whole southern area to be homesteaded. I shall take the utmost precaution to ensure that we shall not have a recurrence of the conditions we have just passed through in recent years.

Mr. GARDINER: In my previous remarks I indicated explicitly that I was aware that there were certain sections in that area which might make good homestead lands. In the particular section to which the minister has referred I know the soil and I believe there is good agricultural land there, but at present it is held under lease for ranching purposes. In the first place, I presume it is under a twenty year lease, and I am not aware how long the lease has to run. Is it the purpose of the department to cancel the lease in order that homesteaders may secure the land?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Where there is undoubtedly good agricultural land.

Mr. GARDINER: I suggest to the minister that he is going to multiply his troubles tenfold rather than get rid of them. If he brought down an amendment embracing the area adjacent to the Cypress hills I could see that he would have no trouble at all, and it would be quite possible for the farmers to make a good living there. I am satisfied of that, and I can appreciate the situation, but the moment you get outside that area I do not know of any portion within Area A of any great value for agricultural purposes. What the minister is going to do is to get himself in trouble to this extent, that he will have representations made to him to open up every quarter-section, provided that someone wants it in that particular area, and he will have to refuse those applications or place himself in the position of putting people on land which cannot sustain a population of any size. I would much rather see the minister confine his operations to that particular district which he has in mind, and if he would do that I should be very glad to support him, because that is good land.

Mr. BENNETT: I hope the minister will not proceed with this legislation. It was my unfortunate duty to have something to do in connection with these areas, and I saw people who had been fairly well to do, able to maintain themselves and their families and buy rather expensive automobiles, actually driven to the verge of starvation in a portion of that area in Alberta.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): What was the nature of the soil they were on?

Mr. BENNETT: I am not a farmer; I am only saying that it was of such a character that because of lack of moisture they were driven out of the country.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): There are some soils in that district which will grow crops with very little moisture.

Mr. BENNETT: I am only dealing with the actual facts. Have the governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan agreed to this?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, they have been consulted in both cases.

Mr. BENNETT: And have they agreed?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This bill has been discussed with both premiers, and they have agreed to it.

Mr. BENNETT: That seems incomprehensible to me in view of the statements made in the Alberta legislature, and in view of the fact that it has cost the government of that province thousands of dollars to move out these farmers. They have had to provide food and clothing for a large number of these people, who left in their prairie schooners when they could and abandoned everything to go down to the United States. Now, when we are about to return their resources to these provinces, parliament is asked to sanction something which has brought more condemnation upon a former minister of the interior than any other act of his official life. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) has put the case very mildly with respect to that territory in the Manyberries district.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is no crown land there, except some under lease.

Mr. BENNETT: There is none now, but once there were substantial areas which were homesteaded. These leases about which the minister speaks were granted to ranch companies after careful inspection by proper officials, and the old story which I have heard every year during the thirty years I have lived in western Canada, that there is an agricultural section or quarter-section in this area which should be granted to the homesteader, is being brought up again. I am sure the minister has heard it ever since he has been there. I feel very strongly about this, because it imposes upon the taxpayers of our province a very great burden. One of the earliest settlers to go to that country said, "I saw the conditions that now prevail obtaining in that district; I saw the change. I saw the agriculturists go in, I saw the crops and then I saw them fade away and disappear, going back to ranching, the land incapable of producing a single bushel of grain or any other kind of crop, or of sustaining human life of any kind." In these circumstances, is there any such pressing necessity for this legislation that the minister should not leave the statute as it was, in view of the experience of recent years? It amazes me that Alberta should agree to it, because certainly during the short time I was connected with the Department of the Interior the representations made by the minister of agriculture of that province as to the expenditures involved in moving settlers out of that district did not suggest that he would favour such legislation. I believe this government contributed large sums for that purpose; I am not sure of the amount, but I believe it amounted in all to about $25,000, which was contributed by this government. Under these circumstances is there such an urgent necessity that the minister thinks we should make possible the return of these conditions? They did the country a great deal of harm. The Minister of Justice would probably think it impossible that people who were very well to do should be actually driven to sacking for clothing, left practically without food and in some cases put to the necessity of abandoning everything they had in the world, putting a top on a wagon, hitching a horse to it and taking away their women and children to another country. That is a situation which I would not like again to contemplate, and I only point it out because it seems so strange that the government of Alberta should agree to this legislation in the light of the experience of the past.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): All these dire results are well known, by no better than by myself. I happened to be a member of the government of Alberta when this occurred, and I would be the last man in the world to allow settlers on any of the abandoned lands in that territory. I am quite willing now to abandon the idea and let it remain a closed area; I took this action only at the request of people interested, mainly in Saskatchewan. In that province there are some lands to-day held by ranchers and some crown lands surrounded by districts which have been successful through all these dry years, but rather than have a feeling that I was going to allow homesteading in any indiscriminate way, which is not the intention at all, I am quite willing to eliminate this section from the proposed act. Therefore I would move that we strike out section 1 of the bill.

Mr. GARDINER: Instead of moving to eliminate this section of the bill I suggest that the minister allow it to stand and that he bring in some amendment which will give him the right to deal with the land in that particular area east of the Alberta boundary. There is no question that there are some good lands in that district which are capable of sustaining a population, and I think if an amendment is brought in which will give the minister power to allow homesteaders in that particular section it would be better for all concerned. I appreciate the attitude of the minister, and I think it would be better to let this stand as it is with that exception rather than bring back the former conditions.

Mr. GERSHAW: I am fairly well acquainted with the area under discussion, and I can assure the committee that the hon. member for Acadia and the leader of the opposition have not overdrawn their description of the conditions and hardships which were endured by the settlers in that district. I am particularly well acquainted with Manyberries. It was a prosperous community, and a busy town which was built up there is now almost completely deserted. It is a fact, however, that even in that part of the country a number of farmers have managed to live through all the bad years and are doing fairly well. The provincial governments have had very capable farm instructors living in that district and giving advice to the farmers there. I believe that many of the farmers who have lived there during all the bad years are in a position to continue to make use of that land and to support their families very well. Of course the school districts are disorganized, and the country is almost back into the ranching area, except that the ranchers have not the leases. But another plan might be worked out. A farmer who is there and has experience might do much better to get more land if some system of mixed farming could be carried out. I strongly support the suggestion that the member for Acadia has made.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): For the purpose of getting on with the bill I would prefer to strike out section 1, Mr. Chairman.

Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 2 will now become section 1.

Mr. GARDINER: The proposal embodied in this section, now section 1 of the bill, has some merit. I believe that we have in western Canada to-day many people who through no fault of their own have lost their first homesteads and would be very glad indeed to secure the opportunity to have a second one, and I am sure they would be very successful. However, there are one or two points in regard to this matter that I would like to draw to the attention of the committee. In the first place it is proposed that a person who has received his patent prior to the first day of January, 1928, may secure, at the discretion of the minister, entry for a second homestead. I do not think that provision is as it should be. Many patents have been issued, for instance during 1928, and the moment you give a person who has recently patented his first homestead the opportunity of getting a second, you make that person a speculator. If you put the date back to say 1922, or 1923 or 1924, as the case may be, it would not be so bad, but once you do this you will induce speculation in homesteads, and that is not desirable. Then as to the discretion given the minister by this section, I do not think any minister should be placed in that position. It is not fair to him, to the house, or to the country as a whole. A second homestead should be granted to all alike or not at all; and no minister of the crown should have the power to determine whether or not a person is entitled to a second homestead. I cannot conceive of any condition where a person who has once received a patent to his homestead would not be just as entitled to a second as any other person. Such a condition would create a condition of partisanship which I think it is desirable to avoid, and therefore I suggest to the minister that this portion of the section be struck out.

The only large available portion of western Canada for homestead purposes is in the north of the three prairie provinces. At present the attention of the public in Canada, and as a matter of fact of the people of the world, is directed towards the Peace River district, and quite a population is going in there. People are going in and homesteading 50, 60 or perhaps 100 miles from the railway; in fact I know of cases where they are homesteading 400 miles from the railway. After a time this parliament is going to be called upon to provide transportation facilities for those people, simply because of the fact that we have given the right to homestead that far from transportation facilities. I maintain it is not fair to people going into those areas. People intending to get homesteads are usually led to believe that the moment they go into a certain area and get reasonable developments they are going to receive transportation facilities. We have many cases of that sort in western Canada, and I could mention thirty or forty places in Alberta which now require transportation facilities. That is a problem which we are up against every day. We find the Canadian National Railway, for instance, criticized because they do not meet that demand, but they cannot begin to meet it for even present day requirements. It seems to me that if we are going to give the privilege of second homesteads to people who have already homesteaded we should place a restriction upon the districts or upon the distance from transportation facilities. Let us thicken up our population to the greatest extent possible. We need population in the west even alongside our present railways, and if we give second homesteads we are going to burden ourselves and be in greater need of transportation facilities than we are even now. I think I brought this matter to the attention of the Minister of the Interior some years ago, as to allowing homesteads to be secured at great distances from transportation facilities, but as far as I can see nothing has been done in that regard. We have either to follow some well-considered policy in regard to giving these transportation facilities within a reasonable time, or to restrict the area within which these people may go; otherwise we will have greater trouble in the future than we have had in the past.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The mere fact that you are giving a second homestead is not making the difficulty any greater, but new settlers coming in from the outside go into these outlying districts and will settle upon the land. The mere fact that a few hundred people—because there will not be more than that—may take advantage of this provision will not make the condition worse than it is at present. My hon. friend says he has mentioned this to me before, and it is a matter to which I have given a great deal of consideration. Twenty years ago, before my hon. friend came to Alberta, you could not stop the expansion of settlement; if you did not survey the land the people would go in and squat on it. An instance of that is seen at Fort Vermilion, 300 miles away. The mere fact that you put a boundary on settlement will not stop the expansion of settlement if there is good land to be found in the territory and people are willing to go into those outside districts. I am speaking in the light of actual experience in this matter, but the mere fact that we are giving this privilege to a few hundred of our own people will not make that condition any more serious than it is at present.

Mr. CAHILL: I agree with the hon. member who, as I came in, was pointing out that the homesteading area should be restricted. That should have been done twenty-five years ago. The matter of which my hon. friend spoke is only a trifling one. If you do not allow people to take up homesteads in certain districts, if you give them to understand that they cannot get a patent in those districts, then you will not aggravate the conditions that we have had in the west for many years, whereby settlers have taken up homesteads many miles from railway facilities and later come to parliament asking for railway construction. The policy of the various governments for the last twenty-five years has been wrong in that regard. In the first place they encourage settlers to come to Canada and no regard is paid to them after they land in this country. If the settler is a Canadian, no regard is paid as to where he should settle. I know from my experience in the west that many people who came to Saskatchewan never got beyond the city of Saskatoon. They spent all their money in endeavouring to find a homestead in western Canada and they had to fish for themselves in Saskatoon, Regina, Moose Jaw, Calgary, or some other city in the west.

I am not so much opposed to the present measure, but it is time that the government had some policy with regard to land settlement in Canada. Land settlement should be restricted to areas where they have already a railroad or where they will have one in the near future. We have advocates appearing all the time before the railway committee asking for railway construction in different parts of the country. This is a very expensive proposition; we are wasting not only the money of the people but the time of the settlers who are placed thirty, forty, fifty, sixty and in some cases a hundred miles from a railway. The land settlement question in Canada is one which should have the careful consideration of the department, the government and the house, because we have not now any blocks of land to offer to settlers where they can have any assurance of railway facilities within the near future, unless some section of land is blocked out and offered to the public either free or at a price with the understanding that railway facilities will be provided.

As you go through western Canada you find that railways have been built without any regard whatever to a fixed policy. Homesteaders have taken up land in one place and other people have bought land in others. Lands purchased in districts adjacent to railways are in many cases being held out of use. I have heard many plans suggested for bringing under cultivation all that land, but I have not yet heard any that I think is feasible. We should not allow future settlement at great distances from railways without first having it understood that the people who go into such districts will be given railway facilities or they will not receive a patent for their lands. The government should take this matter into consideration when they are suggesting a change in the homesteading legislation, because many homesteaders in western Canada have suffered great hardships from the lack of railway and other facilities. We have throughout Canada ample land for every person in this country and for many millions of people who may come here, if a sane policy be adopted with regard to the settlement of that land. Land north of the present settled district, of the present railway facilities, is regarded by the people of Canada as of doubtful value, but the same thing applies to all land that is not settled anywhere. There is good land throughout Canada for many millions of people. In Ontario and Quebec there is ample land to offer as an inducement to incoming settlers and to our own people who are now leaving the country, if you have a proper progressive policy to take care of the prospective settler. We have the land to offer to the incoming settler, but we should offer it to him on the understanding that he will have the facilities when he gets the land, and we should not allow people to go out over the country promiscuously and settle. We should adopt a policy whereby certain sections should be thrown open for homesteading and certain sections sold in order to facilitate the development of the country. The policy of allowing people to settle wherever they like has been a bad policy in the past, and it is a bad policy to-day, and one that should not be encouraged, to assist people in taking up land where there is no assurance that they will have railway facilities in the near future.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): There is a good deal in what the hon. member has said; but if the people had waited for the government to lay out a policy whereby they would be segregated in certain areas, this country would not be producing now six hundred per cent more wheat than it did twenty years ago. That is a record that has not been equalled anywhere else in the world. Men are not all built alike. You cannot make human nature conform to certain modes and regulations that governments may enforce. When the Minister of Agriculture came west from Ontario and found that he had to go forty miles away from a railroad and across a difficult terrain—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Four hundred miles.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Well, forty miles later on, and across country that is difficult for transportation purposes—if he had not been willing to go out that distance from a railroad he would not have secured what he wanted, he would not have been satisfied, and the chances are that he would have left the country and gone somewhere else. The minister is well known throughout Canada as a pioneer of worth. I should not like to make invidious comparisons, but he is only a sample of many members who come into the House of Commons to-day. Many people have come from the older parts of Canada, from Great Britain, from Europe; they have not been satisfied to go one or ten or twenty miles from a town or a railroad; they have wanted to get away out. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) must be familiar with the story of the ranchman who, when he could see the smoke of a neighbour, decided to move away because the country was getting too crowded. So long as human nature is what it is, you cannot corral it in any segregated area. If you do not allow people to go out and settle where they like, they will move away. It will be a bad day for Canada if that instinct ever dies out.

If clause 8 of this bill is carried, the change will in my opinion help to remedy some of the weaknesses of previous legislation. The leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Acadia both spoke of lands in the south that should not have been entered as homesteads but that were entered with the result that the people had to move away. The discussion was illuminating to me because, coming from the north, I, along with many more, think the best lands in the western provinces are in the north.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Medicine Hat, in whose constituency those lands were, gave better evidence on the subject.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I did not hear him so well as I did the other members. I appreciate the discussion because it throws a new light on the matter from my point of view. Some of us in the north have been accustomed to thinking that the good vacant lands are in the north, because we did not know of many good lands elsewhere. There is a weakness that will be remedied by the passing of this legislation. Many settlers in those districts that perhaps should not have been opened, many people who went in there with considerable wealth, as the leader of the opposition has said, find themselves compelled to move elsewhere. The young people are able to move up into the north country and take up new homesteads, but the father or the guardian or the older brother is not able to move with them. I know of actual cases of men who homesteaded forty odd years ago and who just missed coming within the second homestead law by a matter of a few months. Their boys have grown up and they have gone into the north. They are looking around for homesteads to take, but the father, at a time when he might well homestead, finds himself compelled to live on his son's farm or with one of his sons because he cannot go out now and buy land.

Among other things, this will enable the family to be kept together. I have not asked for this, and I am not particularly enthusiastic over it, because I believe—I may be wrong—there is not so much good vacant land in the province of Sasckatchewan as many people think. But I do think that our own people, whether in eastern or western Canada, who now find themselves compelled to seek a second homestead should be treated at least as generously as the immigrant. I say this in all kindness, because I was of that class myself, coming in here as an immigrant. Many of our people in western Canada, due to climatic or soil conditions or to lack of ability and experience, have fallen down and to-day they are anxious to make a new start. Just before I left home a returned soldier from southern Saskatchewan asked me if I would see the Soldier Settlement Board and get permission for him to enter again for a homestead in northern Saskatchewan. He had already had one homestead or had secured a farm from the Soldier Settlement Board and had fallen down in making his payments—probably through no fault of his own, because he was a good worker, but he was in an unfortunate district, and he is now anxious to make an entry in the north country. I am satisfied that this house and the people of Canada would be just as anxious to give that returned soldier a chance to enter on another quarter-section of land free, except for the payment of ten dollars, as they would be to give a quarter-section of land to a man who comes in here from abroad and who can immediately go to the land office and get a quarter-section on payment of ten dollars. Many good settlers in western Canada even to-day are a considerable distance away from the railroad. Until four years ago one of the best districts I know of was forty miles away from the railroad, yet the farmers there were carrying on and doing pretty well, and the railroad which has since gone into that district is doing all right. I said that these lands were free except for the payment of ten dollars, but of course it is the old story; the government bets a quarter-section of land against ten dollars that the settler cannot stay on it for six months in each of three years and carry out his duties. Many of these lands are hard to bring under cultivation, but men who have to make a new start should be given a chance and I hope that the committee will pass this measure.

Mr. CAHILL: I do not want to be understood as objecting to the measure passing or being opposed to a man having a right to a second homestead. I do not know that any hardship would be caused if every farmer in the west who had settled upon a farm and sold it had the right to a second homestead, or even a third or a fourth or a fifth, so long as he performed his duties on each one according to the act. I do not know that any harm would be done to the country if he was allowed to take as many homesteads as he could prove up. But some policy should be formulated by the government for the intelligent direction of settlement, so that settlement may take place in districts where there will be facilities in the future. The example of the Minister of Agriculture does not mean anything to-day. He may have located several hundred miles away from a railway, and was able to do it and succeed, but he is one man in a thousand, perhaps in a million. It is not necessary for people to undergo these hardships to-day, if there is intelligent direction of settlement by the department in charge. That is my only objection to the present system. I say that there should be some policy whereby the lands will be laid out for settlement where the settlers can expect facilities, instead of allowing the land to be taken up promiscuously all over the country, and then later on having the settlers coming to Ottawa and asking for railway facilities. But I have no objection whatever to a man taking the second homestead.

Mr. BENNETT: I was about to rise to express the views that were so admirably stated by the hon. member for Acadia. The hon. member for Pontiac has dealt with the matter as one viewing it from the outside, but he stated his opinion, and in my judgment, it is a sound opinion, as to the principles that should govern in considering matters of this kind. We all know what the situation is in the Peace river country. We all know that if there had not been unrestricted homesteading that situation would not have arisen. The hon. member for Acadia has pointed out that in some instances the settlers are four hundred miles from railway facilities. I had a letter the other day from a returned soldier who had been fortunate enough to get a homestead entry within forty miles of an existing railway, which would be much closer when projected railways were constructed. This is the sequence of events: First, a long tedious journey, the staking of a homestead, the paying of the ten dollars, the getting of the certificate, the building of a sod shack, sometimes a wooden shack, depending upon the distance and the facilities and the money the homesteader has; then a crop from a few acres, then more settlers, and then a demand for (a) transportation by roads, highways; (b) railway transportation. and (c) schools. The schools are a charge upon themselves, and the hon. member for Medicine Hat would have been able to tell this house that there are school districts now abandoned in drought areas in which there is not a single ratepayer left, although debentures were sold to eastern investors and others, and efforts are now being made to repay them. That condition actually prevailed in the territory to which the hon. gentleman referred, and in which he spoke of abandoned towns. In these new territories where homesteads are being staked, the settlers get further and further away, and then demands are made in just the order I have indicated. There was a statement made in this house by the Minister of the Interior that the day of free homesteads had long since passed, and that that policy should be abandoned, but that was not done.

I think it is very unfair for this parliament to be dealing with the matter in this way. We are only trustees for these western provinces, and we are now saying that these lands shall be made available for second homesteads when, on every equitable basis, the provincial authorities should really be dealing with them. We are coming very nearly to relinquishment of our trusteeship in passing this legislation. I think the point which the hon. member for Acadia made is most worthy of consideration. Apart from the fact that we should not grant the second homesteads in the way in which they are to be granted, I have lived long enough in western Canada and I have had enough to do as a member of parliament and as a defeated candidate to know just what is meant when you talk of the minister having power to dispose of second homesteads. Human nature is not any different under a Liberal coat or under a Conservative coat; I am not now speaking with respect to the virtues of one party or the other, but the truth is that no minister of the interior, and no department like the Department of the Interior as now organized and administered should have it in its hands to say who shall and who shall not have a second homestead. It is unsound. Is it fair, is it just, is it proper, that it should be so? I leave it to this committee to say.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This was put in by the officers of the department to take the place of the certificate of the provincial authorities. I am quite willing to wipe it out. I am also willing to make the date twenty-five instead of twenty-eight to meet the objection of my hon. friend. But what I want to know is this: Does the committee object to the principle of giving a second homestead to people who are already in the country, while continuing the policy of giving homesteads indiscriminately to newcomers to Canada? If it is the attitude of the committee that we should treat our own people in Canada differently from newcomers, and not give them the right to a second homestead, I can withdraw the whole bill and leave the matter as it is now. If the desire of the committee is to deprive the settler who has gone through the hardships of homesteading once—and I am one of them, I know all about the sod shack and the other makeshifts—if it is the desire, I say, to deny that individual who has boys growing up around him the opportunity of selling out his little holding and homesteading in a new district, while we give to newcomers the privilege of securing free land, then I will withdraw the whole thing. On the other hand, if it is desired to give him a second chance, I am willing to wipe out supervision by the minister and make the period 1925 instead of 1928.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. minister has with great fairness expressed his willingness to amend the legislation. I do not think he himself drafted the section, but nothing could more clearly indicate the attitude of the department of the Interior towards western Canada than that very section.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is not quite fair. Let me point out that under the provision for second homesteads to those going north from the dried out area, since 1923 we have had to require the certificate of the provincial government. This amendment is intended simply to provide for the necessary inquiry, not with any intention to be autocratic.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: I am sorry that I cannot agree with my hon. friend; for I have had experience, and so have the people of western Canada. In no department of the public service has there grown up the same sense of autocracy as in the Department of the Interior. Now the minister says he is perfectly willing that the certificate of the provincial authorities should be required. That is quite fair and proper.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, I say I am willing to wipe out the whole thing.

Mr. BENNETT: I will come to that presently. In that section he will substitute for his discretion the certificate of the provincial authorities?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend does not quite understand me. The individuals who had the right to a second homestead had to come from area "A" south of 31. Now we are removing that restriction and they may come from all over the province; that is, there is no debarred area.

Mr. BENNETT: I know that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): When the people came from the restricted area we asked the provincial authorities to give us certificates that they were entitled to second homesteads. The name of the Minister of the Interior has been substituted. I am willing to wipe that out.

Mr. BENNETT: I congratulate the minister upon his spirit of fairness; and what is more, I accept very gladly his observation that he is not responsible for the amendment. No one who has spoken so far has denied that there should be second homesteads. But there are two sides to the question. If a settler comes into Alberta from Saskatchewan or Manitoba, having once had a homestead or a pre-emption there, and says, "I want another homestead in this province", he is not the least bit different from the immigrant.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not?

Mr. BENNETT: For the simple and obvious reason that there is placed on the province the burden and expense of schools, transportation and roads. In the one instance we have added to the population of Canada, in the other we have not. I cannot think that the provincial authorities in their anxiety for population are trying to get it from one another.

Mr. McINTOSH: There is a certain amount of overflow that you cannot prevent.

Mr. BENNETT: There are a certain number of pioneers and the other kind mentioned by the minister, speculators, that are never static.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) said so. I absolutely deny that there is any speculation in proving up a homestead.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member speaks very feelingly in respect to it; but that is not the form of speculation meant. Unlike the minister I never homesteaded, but I have been a fair observer of the settlement of one section of western Canada, and nothing has amazed me more than the number of farms that are not now occupied by the men who homesteaded them.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Very few.

Mr. BENNETT: They stayed long enough to get their preemptions and then moved on. I think it is a very grave question whether the right to a second homestead should be left open in the terms now proposed.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The preemptor is provided against.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. The committee is aware of the fact that a man is allowed to homestead and then preempt, giving him a total of 420 acres. This amendment prevents the man who has a homestead and a preemption from getting another 160 acres. But while listening to-night my thought has been this: Is it desirable to leave it open in the terms of this bill so that lands may be available to any person for a second homestead; or shall we endeavour to meet the very situation that I think should be fairly considered, namely, that of the man who has been driven out of his existing holding and who is desirous of remaining in this country with his family? He gets a second homestead, his boy of 18 gets another, and his boy of 20 gets a third, and he has a very substantial holding around him. That is what the minister desires to do. But is it not advisable to protect that by some form of legislation, rather than leave it open to chance, knowing as we do that in many instances the result will be that those who come from Manitoba or Saskatchewan will at once push into that country for a second homestead?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Moving from one province to another?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; and the minister knows that that is not an imaginary situation.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Would not that be a good thing for Alberta?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; but think of the loss to Manitoba.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The movement is the other way now.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They are going into northern Manitoba.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Suppose a man in Manitoba sold his homestead and decided to take another in Alberta, would you deny him the right to go there?

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

AUTOMOBILES CARRIED ON P.E.I. CAR FERRY

Mr. BEAUBIEN:

1. How many automobiles, operating under their own power, were carried on the car ferry Prince Edward Island during the calendar year 1927?
2. How many automobile passengers were carried during the calendar years 1917 to 1927, inclusive?
3. What were the rates for automobiles during the years 1917 to 1927, inclusive?
4. What is the estimated cost of loading and carrying an automobile?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. 5,701.
2. No record.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS EARNINGS

Mr. BRADY:

1. What were the gross and net earnings over the Canadian National Railways from Jasper to Prince Rupert and from Jasper to Vancouver during each of the following years, 1925, 1926 and 1927?
2. What was the amount of money spent by the Canadian National Railways in the maintenance of each of these roads during the year 1927?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. Railway accounting methods do not permit of this information being obtained.
2. See answer to question No. 1.

OTTAWA GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS—LIGHT AND POWER

Mr. HEAPS:

How much does the government pay for electric light and power per annum to: (a) Ottawa Electric Company; and (b) Ottawa Hydro-Electric Commission?

Mr. ELLIOTT:

Total amount paid in 1927-28: (a) $86,524.31; (b) $38,964.86.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

EUROPEAN IMMIGRATION AGREEMENTS

Mr. ADSHEAD:

For a copy of the agreements entered into by the government with the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways for the bringing in of immigrants from the British Isles or from southeastern Europe.

POSTMASTER AT WABAMUN

Mr. LUCAS (for Mr. Kennedy):

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams or other documents between the Post Office department or the Postmaster General, and the Civil Service Commission, or between these or other parties relating to the position of postmaster in the village of Wabamun during the years 1927 and 1928.

ALIEN LABOUR ACT

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton, for Mr. Church):

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, orders in council, and other correspondence relating to the enforcement of the Alien Labour Act as set out in the Revised Statutes of Canada; and

Also for a copy of all correspondence and other documents protesting against the non-enforcement of the said Act.

ORIENTAL GRAIN COMPANY

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River, for Mr. Kennedy):

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence, reports and other documents passing between the Department of Marine and Fisheries and any other department of the government, or any other person or persons, or the Vancouver harbour commission, with reference to the claim of the Oriental Grain Company against the Vancouver harbour commission, and between the Vancouver harbour commission and the Oriental Grain Company and any other person or persons.

RADIO—CANCELLATION OF LICENSES

Mr. WOODSWORTH (for Mr. Heaps):

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, and correspondence, pertaining to the cancellation of the radio licenses held by the International Bible Students Association.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): With respect to this particular motion, I might say the government have no objection to bringing down the correspondence if the hon. member still feels it desirable that this should be done. However, there is a large amount of correspondence on this subject, a great deal of which is the outcome of a suggestion which appeared in the press that as many individuals as possible should write to the government protesting against the cancellation of the licenses. A good many of the letters obviously have been solicited. I would suggest that the government lay these communications on the table of the house, and then if the hon. member or any other hon. member thinks he would like them copied, well and good. The expense of copying these papers is very considerable, and has to be borne by the department. I simply make this suggestion in order to save unnecessary expenditure.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not think it was the intention of my colleague to put the government to any unwarranted expense or trouble, but the Minister of Marine and Fisheries stated that because of certain protests made by outsiders these licenses had been cancelled. I believe my hon. friend simply wishes those letters which led to the cancellation of the licenses.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There can be no exception taken to the order passing in that form, namely to cover only such letters as were the occasion for the cancellation of the licenses.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried on that understanding.

Motion agreed to.

RADIO—STATION CKCX

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton, for Mr. Church):

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, and all other documents for and against a license to CKCX radio station at Toronto.

Mr. SPEAKER: I suppose the same understanding will prevail in this instance?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am not so sure that that understanding would cover what the hon. member (Mr. Church) has in mind. I would suggest that this motion stand until he is present.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

PURCHASE OF ALBERTA RAILWAYS

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River, for Mr. Kennedy):

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence, reports and other documents passing between the Department of Railways and Canals and the Alberta Government, and the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway, with reference to the purchase of the railways of Alberta, by the Canadian National Railways, or by the Canadian Pacific Railway, or by the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific Railways jointly.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I notice that the mover of this resolution is not in the house and I would ask that it stand. I do not want to set it over to the debatable motions, but it appears to duplicate an order which has already been made.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

UNITED STATES COAL IN WINNIPEG

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River, for Mr. Kennedy):

For a copy of the report made by the investigators to the Minister of Customs, with regard to the alleged dumping of American coal into the Winnipeg market.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of National Revenue): In the absence of the member who is making the motion, I would ask that the motion be allowed to stand.

INTERNATIONAL PEACE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. B. ADSHEAD (East Calgary): Press reports state that Great Britain, Germany and Japan have been invited to join with the United States and France in a world wide treaty aimed at the prevention of war. I ask the Prime Minister if Canada has received such an invitation, and if so, what policy the government intends to pursue in connection therewith?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to make further inquiries before answering my hon. friend's question. My present impression is that no special communication has been received by the government on this subject.

Mr. STEVENS: Refer it to the Department of Peace.

DUMPING DUTY ON IMPORTED EGGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. HARRY J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): In view of the number of inquiries that I have received I should like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of National Revenue. The question is: Has the dumping duty as applied to imported eggs since February, 1927 been cancelled by order in council? If so, why has this action been taken?

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of National Revenue): I replied to a similar question on Friday. All orders permitting the minister to fix valuation have been cancelled.

CANADA'S WAR MEMORIALS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): I wish to to ask the government a question regarding a matter which I consider important. Canada has a wonderful collection of war memorials. These memorials consist of photographs, etchings, drawings, war relics, and paintings by many prominent artists. These were gathered together by a branch of the Canadian overseas organization which I think was called the Canadian war records. The officer in charge of this branch was Sir Max Aitken, now Lord Beaverbrook, who although living in London is a good Canadian and is interested in everything that concerns his native country. May I say that in doing this work Lord Beaverbrook displayed his usual, well known energy and initiative with the result, and I believe I am well within the mark in saying this, that no country possesses a greater or more important collection of war memorials than does Canada. This work was all done without much cost to Canada but I believe at some expense to Lord Beaverbrook personally. I am told that nearly all these war memorials are kept in the basement of one of our public buildings in Ottawa, and if they are allowed to remain there I feel sure they will eventually deteriorate. Now, Mr. Speaker, this collection is a very important one. It belongs to the people of Canada and in my opinion should be properly housed and cared for by the government. I would therefore ask the Prime Minister if he will not see that proper steps are taken to bring this about.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The house is indebted to my hon. friend for bringing to its attention the importance of the collection of war memorials to which he has just referred. At the time the collection was made there were so many matters receiving attention that I doubt if the citizens of Canada generally, or even the members of this house, have any appreciation of the extent of the collection that was made by the war memorials committee, which as I understand, was a branch of the war records office. The personnel of the committee included Lord Beaverbrook, as my hon. friend has just said, Lord Rothermere, the late Sir Edmund Walker, the late Sir Bertram Lima and Lady Perley. The committee succeeded in collecting or obtaining a great many extremely valuable works of art descriptive of all phases of the war—paintings of actual battle scenes, portraits of generals and those who had won the Victoria cross. The collection includes also important pieces of sculpture, and as my hon. friend has said many valuable etchings and lithographs. Some works of the old masters likewise form part of the collection, notably paintings by Romney, Lawrence and Reynolds. Among these paintings is one of the death of Wolfe by Benjamin West which was presented, I believe, by His Grace the Duke of Westminster. As my hon. friend has said, the collection has been gathered together practically without any cost to the people of Canada, and was very largely in the nature of a labour of love on the part of Lord Beaverbrook. I should say, having regard to the distinguished reputation of many of the artists who were retained for the purpose of painting the various pictures and portraits, that the collection might be valued at anything over $1,000,000. The total number of artists engaged for the purpose—several of whom were British and several Canadian—was over 100. As my hon. friend has said, the collection, after it was turned over to the Canadian government, was temporarily housed in one of the public buildings of this city. It is now for the most part in the national museum, more, however, for storage purposes, than for the purpose of exhibition. Some of the paintings in the collection are on the walls of the senate, a few of them are at the Dominion archives, one or two of them are in the departmental buildings, but the greater part of the collection is in storage at the national museum. I can assure my hon. friend that great care has been taken of the collection at the museum but unfortunately it is not as yet available to the general public. The government has had under consideration the possibility of finding some means of making the collection available to the public, but each consideration of the matter brings us back to the point of seeking to discover means whereby a suitable building can be obtained for the purpose. Undoubtedly, if the collection is to be properly exhibited, it should be a part of a national art gallery, and as matters now stand it would appear to mean asking parliament to make an appropriation for an art gallery. Up to the present time we have felt that there were other demands more imperative than the demand for a building for the purpose of housing these particular works of art. I think, however, we must not lose sight of the fact that the collection is a national possession, a very valuable possession, and one which as speedily as possible should be properly housed. I may say to my hon. friend that in some countries public-spirited citizens have supplemented the donations of others by presenting buildings to the nation. If anyone in Canada or elsewhere should think of presenting the Dominion with a national art gallery, the government would cordially co-operate in providing a site and in facilitating its erection, but at the present time we do not feel that we are in a position to ask parliament to vote the necessary appropriation for that purpose. The government has in mind a suitable site for such a building, and in connection with any public buildings that may be erected, or other public improvements care will be taken that what may eventually prove to be the most suitable location for a national art gallery is not lost sight of. Perhaps I should say to my hon. friend, as I happen to know the fact, that, in connection with this art collection, there were sent not only the paintings and other works of art but also plans of a building specially designed by Mr. E. A. Rickards, the architect of the Central Hall, Westminster. The plans were transmitted with a view or providing the appropriate kind of accommodation for the collection in the event of the country finding it possible to undertake this work.

I would just wish to add this further word to what I have said. I feel that parliament has perhaps been remiss in not having expressed long before this the appreciation that should have been expressed of the work that was done by Lord Beaverbrook in assembling this great collection and virtually presenting it to the Dominion. Perhaps the words of my hon. friend and the response that I have endeavoured to make may serve as some expression of appreciation from this parliament.

HOME BANK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): Has the Minister of Finance yet received a report from the exchequer court in regard to the Home Bank, and can the depositors expect any relief?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): I have not yet received the report.

FEDERAL DISTRICT COMMISSION

EXPROPRIATION OF RUSSELL HOUSE BLOCK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. T. MacNUTT (Colchester): In view of the reported sale of the Russell House block to the government, has a transfer yet been made, and if so have the insurance policies covering this block been also transferred to the government?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): This is evidently a departmental matter and some inquiry will have to be made before a reply can be given to my hon. friend.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of National Revenue) moved the third reading of Bill No. 198, to amend the Customs Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SEEDS ACT AMENDMENT

The house resumed from April 12 consideration in committee of Bill No. 11, to amend the Seeds Act—Mr. Motherwell—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When this bill was last before the committee all clauses had been adopted with the exception of clause 10.

On section 10—False advertising.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I move to amend clause 10 by the insertion of the words "at a stated price" immediately following the word "sale" in the twenty-eighth line.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

EXCISE ACT AMENDMENT

The house resumed from April 12 consideration in committee of Bill No. 54, to amend the Excise Act.—Mr. Euler—Mr. Johnston.

Mr. EULER: When the bill was in committee last week we had passed all the clauses. The bill was left in committee on the suggestion of the leader of the opposition.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

TREATY WITH SPAIN

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 201, respecting a certain treaty of commerce and navigation between the United Kingdom and Spain and a certain agreement between the United Kingdom and Spain regulating the treatment of companies.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Treaties sanctioned.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I think the minister ought to give us a full explanation regarding the purpose of this treaty, and particularly how it is that only now we are taking up a treaty that was made in October, 1922. If this is such a valuable treaty for Canada, I would like to know why something was not done about it before.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is quite right as to the date. Perhaps I might give a history of the negotiations.

On the 31st of October, 1922, the British government signed a treaty of commerce and navigation with Spain, a clause of which provided that the terms could be extended to any of the British dominions at the Dominion's option. On the 27th of June, 1924, Great Britain and Spain entered into an agreement concerning the treatment of companies. On April 5, 1927, the previous agreements were revised and as the objectionable features of the old agreements have been removed Canada is now prepared to accept the treaty. On the 10th of April, 1925, Canada entered into an agreement with Spain whereby Canada granted the intermediate tariff in exchange for the second column of the Spanish tariff. A clause of this agreement reads:

> The modus vivendi will come into force on April 20, 1925, and will cease to be in effect three months after its denunciation by either of the contracting parties. In view of the provisional character of this arrangement the governments of both of the contracting parties agree to commence without undue delay the necessary negotiations for the conclusion of a more general and definite convention for the regulation of the commercial relations between Canada and Spain.

The company agreement is of value to several Canadian companies, including some of the banks. The Spanish tax on capital and reserve is now 1 per cent. Under the agreement that tax will be reduced to one-quarter of one per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: the important sections, so far as we are concerned, are the articles dealing with the application of the treaty to the Dominion. It was specially provided that the treaty should not apply to the dominions unless they gave notice. Has that notice been given?

Mr. ROBB: Yes. As I intimated a moment ago, we did reach an agreement with Spain in 1925 regarding an exchange of tariffs. Now we are coming to an agreement with them in regard to how it will affect companies. In the meantime they are treating our companies as if they were under the agreement, with the understanding that we are to bring in a bill to carry out the agreement.

Perhaps the house will be interested in knowing just what the tariff concessions are. The tariff of Spain consists of (a) First tariff; (b) Second tariff, and (c) Conventional tariff on some goods. The first tariff is usually three times as high as the second tariff, while such conventional rates as exist are the lowest in force.

Based on an exchange of notes between the United Kingdom and Spain in 1894, Canada and Spain for several years granted each other most-favoured-nation treatment in tariff matters. The relations between the two countries came up for review in consequence of a new Anglo-Spanish commercial treaty signed October 31, 1922, and which contained provisions for adherence by British dominions and colonies. This treaty, though not precisely so in form, practically gave to the United Kingdom full most-favoured-nation treatment in Spain. It contained British guarantees of either exempting certain Spanish products from duty or, with regard to some goods, maintaining as low duties as were in force at the signing of the treaty. The same obligations will be imposed on Canada if she accepts the treaty. Although not becoming a party to the British treaty, Canada did not immediately withdraw most-favoured-nation treatment from Spain. That is the agreement that has existed since 1894.

The attitude of Spain was to grant us her second tariff, but not conventional rates in return for most-favoured-nation treatment in the British dominions. On September 14, 1923, Canada discontinued most-favoured-nation treatment of Spanish goods, the occasion being the bringing into force of the present Franco-Canadian convention of commerce. Beginning in January, 1924, the Spanish first tariff was applied to Canadian goods.

The negotiations for a trade agreement between Canada and Spain terminated in an exchange of notes on April 10, 1925, at Madrid, between the Spanish authorities and the British ambassador. A modus vivendi was thus established which went into force ten days after the date of signing, which provided for exchanging the Spanish second tariff for the Canadian intermediate tariff, the arrangement to terminate on three months' notice. The governments agreed to begin without undue delay negotiations for a more general and definite convention. The Spanish second tariff is the lowest in force on most items, but Canada is deprived of such convention rates as exist. According to an examination of treaties made recently there were Spanish conventional rates lower than the second tariff on commodities of considerable interest to Canada, including fish, lumber, wood pulp, rubber tires, electric apparatus and machinery. The treaty situation is, of course, subject to change from time to time.

A Spanish decree of July 20, 1927, provided for revising the Spanish customs tariff and supplanting the present triple tariff with two columns, general and conventional. It was expected that early in 1928 the system would be reconstructed along these lines, and no doubt with important effects on Spanish treaty arrangements.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I understood the minister to say that so far as duties were concerned, the arrangement was governed by a convention made between Canada and Spain in 1925.

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: These treaties between Great Britain and Spain which the government is now proposing that Canada shall become a party to have to do with commerce and navigation. Do these overlap at all, or does the convention made between Canada and Spain deal with entirely different matters from those that are dealt with in the treaties with Great Britain?

Mr. ROBB: We are adhering to the British trade treaty so that we get the lowest rates for our nationals doing business in Spain.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Quite so; but if Canada agrees to become a party to the British treaty with Spain, will that not supersede the convention made between Canada and Spain in 1925?

Mr. ROBB: In 1925 we agreed to start negotiations for a treaty; this is the consummation of that agreement.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: But we never made a treaty?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. BENNETT: I wonder, Mr Chairman, if the attention of the Prime Minister has been directed to this bill. The other day I had occasion to draw attention to the fact that some of these conventions which were submitted for our approval had the effect of placing obligations upon the provinces, and that under our constitution exclusive power to deal with certain matters was vested in the legislatures of the provinces and not in the federal parliament. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister referred me to the section of the British North America Act dealing with this matter. I was perfectly aware of the section, but I do not apprehend that it could ever be taken as enabling us to amend our constitution by the aid of a convention made between Great Britain and a foreign state and approved by us. I do not think that even the credulity of the Prime Minister could be imposed upon to that extent, although the other day he said that he did not happen to be a lawyer.

This bill contains three sections: the first is merely the title; the second sanctions three treaties, one a treaty of commerce and navigation, the other an agreement between the United Kingdom and Spain, and the third a convention between the same powers; the third section provides that the act shall come into force on proclamation. There is, of course, a distinction in international law between a treaty, an agreement and a convention. The first schedule sets out the treaty of commerce and navigation between the United Kingdom and Spain exchanged at Madrid on April 23, 1924. May I direct attention to article 3?

The subjects of each of the contracting parties in the territories of the other shall be at full liberty to acquire and possess every description of property, movable and immovable, which the laws of the other contracting party permit or shall permit, the subjects or citizens of any other foreign country to acquire and possess. They may dispose of the same by sale, exchange, gift, marriage, testament, or in any other manner, or acquire the same by inheritance under the same conditions which are or shall be established with regard to subjects of the other contracting party. They shall not be subjected in any of the cases mentioned to any taxes, imposts or charges of whatever denomination other or higher than those which are or shall be applicable to subjects of the other contracting party.

It happens that succession duties are wholly within the purview of the provincial legislatures, and that they have enacted laws dealing with such duties. The method devised for the purpose of collecting taxation in that form differs in the several provinces, and in some instances differs with respect to the residence of the persons affected. This article purports to put the residents of Spain in the same position and upon the same basis as the residents of any other foreign state, and I think it might be important to consider whether we are not taking an obligation with regard to the provinces that was never contemplated in connection with a treaty, because not only does that article deal with this matter, but there are other articles that deal with military obligations, which clearly are within the power of this parliament. At the top of page four the continuation of article 4 provides that:

They—

The subjects of each of the contracting parties within the territories of the other.

—shall similarly be exempted from all judicial, administrative and municipal functions whatever, other than those imposed by laws relating to juries, as well as from all contributions, whether pecuniary or in kind, imposed as an equivalent for personal service, and finally from any military exaction or requisition.

Between the United Kingdom and Spain there would be no difficulty, but when you come to deal with a country such as Canada that is a federal union, you cannot cover "judicial, administrative and municipal functions;" these are solely within the jurisdiction of the provinces. It shows the difficulties that arise in connection with the mere sanctioning by this parliament of a treaty made between the United Kingdom and Spain, and thus imposing upon us all the obligations, duties and responsibilities under the treaty so negotiated. Section 92 of the British North America Act distinctly says that the provincial legislatures shall have exclusive jurisdiction in respect to judicial, administrative and municipal matters. Section 132, dealing with treaties being binding alike upon the Dominion and the provinces did not and could not contemplate the possibility of a treaty negotiated between Great Britain and Spain, and sanctioned by this parliament, imposing upon the provinces a restriction of their legislative powers as defined by the British North America Act. I think the Prime Minister will agree with me that this must be so, otherwise we should be placed in a most difficult position. If the articles that I have read impose those restrictions upon the provincial legislatures, the truth is that the British North America Act has, pro tanto, been amended; and it cannot possibly be contended that that was in the mind of the parliament at Westminster when it gave us our constitution.

Now I come to the agreement which is printed at page 12 of the bill, regulating:

the treatment to be accorded in the territories of each of the high contracting parties to the companies registered in the territories of the other, have for this purpose named as their plenipotentiaries.

With respect to federal companies, the right hon. Prime Minister will at once agree with me that our sanctioning of this agreement would carry with it all the power that might be necessary. But to say that companies having provincial objects, and wholly within the powers of the provincial legislatures, should be affected by legislation of this kind, would seem to me to be something that was not intended by the British North America Act, and it might get us into this difficulty: some of the provinces might accord more favourable terms to, say, a United States company than to a Spanish company, and the Dominion would be confronted with the complaint that we had not performed our obligations under the treaty; but there is no power in this Dominion to enforce any such view on the provinces with respect to an agreement of this nature. It will be observed that some of these sections touch upon the very difficult and dangerous subject of provincial taxation, over which clearly this parliament has no jurisdiction, when you come to deal with the right of the province to impose taxation on any company that may be registered within its boundaries for the purpose of transacting business. The convention was not signed until April 5, 1927, and accompanying it is a letter from the British ambassador as well as one from the Spanish ambassador.

I do not desire to do more than merely point out the difficulties as I see them, because I do not think that they are limited to this particular case. I had occasion the other afternoon, when we were discussing the sanitary conventions—they were not treaties—which were negotiated through the League of Nations, to look into the question generally, and I must say I do not think it was ever intended, or that it will be held by the courts, to be within the power of a treaty, a convention or an agreement—and there is a clear distinction in law between the three things—negotiated between Spain and Great Britain, and given sanction by a legislative act on our part, to affect the constitutional jurisdiction of the provinces as defined by section 92 of the British North America Act. And yet that is inevitable in this instance if we declare this to be a part of the law of Canada, and do not provide any limitations, or, as the Americans say, reservations, with respect to not affecting companies or businesses or the legislative power and jurisdiction of the several legislatures. I certainly have some difficulty in my own mind regarding it, and I direct the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to the matter, for I think it is worthy of more than passing notice, having regard to what would be the effect upon some of the businesses that are directly mentioned in (a) the treaty, (b) the convention, and (c) the agreement itself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The section of the British North America Act, to which my hon. friend made special reference, is 132:

> The parliament and government of Canada shall have all powers necessary or proper for performing the obligations of Canada or of any province thereof, as part of the British Empire, towards foreign countries, arising under treaties between the empire and such foreign countries.

As I suggested the other day, there may be room for debate on the significance of the word "empire" as respects its application to any one part of the empire, but I should be inclined to think, looking at the clause as it reads, that it was clearly intended to give the federal government full power and authority to make any treaty coming within the scope of its jurisdiction which it might wish to enter into with another country—a power sufficiently comprehensive to cover just such a situation as my hon. friend has in mind where there might be a possibility of conflict with the provinces. However, that is a matter of interpretation which, as the hon. member has said, it would be well to have carefully considered, and I shall bring it to the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) with a view to ascertaining whether in his opinion it has any special bearing upon this particular case.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I wish to call the attention of the Prime Minister to article 10, in which we in this parliament propose to protect the Spanish wine dealer as against anything that the provincial legislature may do, while we are not attempting to protect the Canadian wine dealer from what the same legislature may do in this regard.

Mr. ROBB: I do not know that my hon. friend has made himself quite clear; I am not sure that I understand just what objection he is taking to article 10.

Mr. CHAPLIN: My understanding of the matter is this: If the provincial authorities in this country were to put a local tax on Spanish wines or French wines, then we undertake to see that these wines shall be placed in no worse position than our own wines. I want to point out that the local authorities now tax Canadian wines. You propose to see that they shall not tax foreign wines, but you are not taking any notice of the fact that they are taxing the Canadian product.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend has a wrong interpretation of the matter. The imported product will pay the same tax as the native.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Not at all; I am quite sure of that.

Mr. BENNETT: The point made by my hon. friend from Lincoln has not, I think, been apprehended by the minister. Article 10 in the second paragraph reads:

> The produce or manufacture of either of the contracting parties imported into the territories of the other, and intended for warehousing or transit, shall not be subject to any internal tax.

There is already an internal tax in Ontario on its own wine, and my hon. friend is pointing out that Spanish wine paying the customs and excise duties will be free from any internal tax in that province. I wish to draw the attention of the Prime Minister to this fact: Section 132 of the British North America Act must be read with sections 91 and 92, and the effect of the proper interpretation of the three sections is this, that any treaty negotiated by the Dominion shall have force and effect upon Canada only within the ambit of the powers conferred upon this parliament by section 91; and to the extent that we have powers, under the constitution, affecting the provinces, the provinces are thereby bound. There are cases without number which I might mention. But surely it never could be contended that a treaty —I will not discuss either agreements or conventions inasmuch as "treaty" is used in section 132 of the British North America Act —negotiated between a foreign state and Great Britain, to which we give our approval, could deprive the legislature of any province of its plenary powers. Such a contention is certainly at variance with the statement of the law made by Lord Loreburn in the Privy Council. It would simply imply that the plenipotentiaries of Canada and of some other country might sign a treaty which, without reference to a province, could deprive that province of its legislative power with respect to every subject matter that might be dealt with in that treaty. It is perfectly clear that this is not the law; it is not at any rate the law heretofore understood by jurists of repute. No jurist of repute has ever suggested for a moment that a treaty could encroach upon that ground. The provinces could be affected only in so far as this parliament might act within the limit of its powers over the provinces, but not within the constitutional jurisdiction and plenary powers of the provinces. Surely no treaty can take away from any provincial body its legislative power; it can affect only those powers which the Dominion may exercise in the province. That is to say, this parliament might denude itself of every power which it has a right to exercise in every one of the nine provinces, and the provinces would thereby be bound. But the legislative jurisdiction of the legislatures, conferred on them by the British North America Act, cannot be limited, restrained, restricted or destroyed by any treaty made at Madrid to which we give sanction. Surely it is unnecessary to point that out. Under the rules of interpretation the sections of the British North America Act must be read together, and the sections conferring exclusive powers upon the Dominion and the provinces respectively must be read with section 132. Any treaty that may be negotiated between Great Britain and any foreign state, and to which we may become a party, will bind the provinces to the extent to which the parliament of Canada may have jurisdiction over those provinces. This parliament has wide jurisdiction over the provinces, but within the purview of the powers conferred by the constitution upon provincial legislatures, nothing short of the legislative power of the Imperial parliament can deprive the legislature of its constitution. The effect is that the constitution of the province might be wiped out; one must always carry these matters to a logical conclusion, and that is what this means. It had not occurred to me the other day until it was read, but I remember very well my early teachings in connection with matters of this kind, and they are very simple. This parliament is the entity which speaks for Canada; under the federal system and under the powers conferred upon parliament by section 132, this is the national entity. In that case it was not contemplated that our parliament should negotiate a treaty; it was intended only to deal with a treaty negotiated with respect to the British Empire of which we are a part, and that treaty has power, force and application binding the provinces to the extent to which the parliament of Canada can exercise power over them. It cannot be suggested, however, that you can take away the legislative power of the free legislatures of the nine provinces by a treaty negotiated in Madrid, to which we give our approval.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has raised a very large question, and I hesitate even to attempt to make a contribution to it by way of debate. It does seem to me, however, that some power in the state must have the authority to make treaties, and that authority to whoever it belongs must be plenary. Situations may arise where it would be quite impossible for the federal government to negotiate a treaty with another nation, which it was in the interests of the Dominion to conclude, without to some extent overriding some of the alleged exclusive powers of the provinces. In such a case it could hardly be assumed that, if it were in the national interest to have such a treaty made, this could not be done because some provision therein appeared to override some particular jurisdiction of a province. I just raise that point as the other side of the question, and I think my hon. friend will see clearly that in giving to the parliament of this country the power to make treaties under the British North America Act, in the terms of the section which I have read, it must have been intended that all the powers which were needed for that purpose were being given, even though they did appear in some particulars to come into conflict with certain rights reserved to the provinces. In other words in treaty-making the national interest must be paramount when brought into apparent conflict with the interest of any province.

With respect to this particular treaty, a clause is contained therein which provides for its termination by either party upon the giving of three months' notice, and perhaps I could put at rest any concern which my hon. friend may have as to our intentions by saying that if it did appear that a serious conflict was about to arise between the provinces and the Dominion with regard to any of the sections to which we are now referring, rather than have such a conflict, the treaty itself could be abrogated as far as we are concerned.

Mr. ROBB: Perhaps the hon. member for Lincoln has misunderstood article 10 by reading only that part of it which appears on page 6. If he follows that article on page 7 he will find the following words:

> The produce or manufacture of either of the contracting parties imported into the territories of the other, and intended for warehousing or transit, shall not be subjected to any internal duty.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not desire to argue this question before the committee, but I wish to direct the attention of the Prime Minister to section 132 of the British North America Act, which is as follows:

> The parliament and government of Canada shall have all powers necessary or proper for performing the obligations of Canada or of any province thereof, as part of the British Empire, towards foreign countries, arising under treaties between the empire and such foreign countries.

That is, they shall have all powers necessary or proper to perform the obligations of Canada or of any province thereof. Certainly these obligations must be read subject to the constitutional grant of powers by the British North America Act to the several provinces. This question really raises the whole issue of sovereign power, and the right of this Dominion to negotiate any treaty. There is no grant of power by section 132 to negotiate a treaty; far from it. That section contemplates that the treaty shall be negotiated by someone else; it says, "between the empire." In this particular treaty there is a reservation providing that the treaty shall not apply to the Dominion, to India or to Australia unless their parliaments, in terms, accept, adopt or sanction the treaty. We sanction the treaty; by so doing we make ourselves a party to every term of it, and my point is that the language is not apt to make such a treaty binding upon the various component parts of this confederation which have their grant of plenary powers from the parliament at Westminster. Section 92 of the British North America Act says ". . . .may exclusively make laws. . . .", but section 91 grants to this parliament the right to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada as a whole. It is further provided that where there is no exclusive grant of powers, if there is any conflict between the federal and provincial power the federal power shall prevail. As the Privy Council has so often said, however, this is not so as against the enumerated classes of subjects in section 92, over which the legislatures have exclusive jurisdiction.

Possibly this is a difficult matter to argue in committee, and I merely direct attention to it because it does occur to me that as the matter stands it is of far-reaching consequence and it was never intended that the mere approval or sanction by Canada of a treaty negotiated between two outstanding portions of the empire or between two foreign nations to which the empire was a party should have the effect of repealing, pro tanto, the power of the legislatures of the provinces which is said to be exclusive. I quite agree with the Prime Minister that there must be a national entity, and that national entity is Canada. Canada is composed of several provinces; but the national entity has power to make laws for the national well being. These laws thus made for the national well being, however, must not conflict with the exclusive jurisdiction conferred upon the provinces by the constitution with respect to those numerated classes of subjects in section 92 of the act, and some of the articles of the treaty deal in terms with matters solely within the exclusive jurisdiction of provincial legislatures, being designated and named classes of subjects over which the legislature alone has jurisdiction—not jurisdiction concurrently with this parliament but exclusive jurisdiction in the terms of the constitution itself. I merely submit the matter to the committee because it was new to me when I first read this treaty, and I felt that it was of considerable importance and at least worthy of the attention of the committee and possibly of the law officers of the crown, as well as the attention of those responsible for our commitments with respect to foreign treaties.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is just one point with regard to what my hon. friend has said. I agree with him that in negotiating any treaty the federal government should have the utmost regard for all matters reserved to the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces, but I think my hon. friend will agree that as to the Dominion and the empire as a whole, at the time the British North America Act was drafted the position with respect to treaty-making powers was not as clear at it is to-day. It is now conceded with respect to matters of primary or exclusive concern to the Dominion that we have the full right to negotiate, sign and ratify a treaty which formerly might have been held to belong to the British Empire as a whole. The powers of this parliament with regard to a treaty such as we are now discussing are complete in all particulars, and are not affected by the wording of the section as it appears.

Mr. CANNON: I have listened very attentively to the argument put forward by the leader of the opposition. The hon. gentleman has stressed one point—that it would seem a rather extraordinary thing that the federal government would be able to impose obligations on the provinces in connection with matters and subjects which are enumerated in the British North America Act as being within the exclusive jurisdiction of those provinces. That is the argument which my hon. friend put before the committee. But when we come to examine the relative authority of both the federal parliament and the provincial legislatures throughout the Dominion we have to make a distinction between the authority of the Dominion government acting in internal matters, and the authority of that government in matters which are outside of Canada and are international in character. It is no new principle to-day to say that one authority could impose obligations on a provincial or secondary power. For instance, up to recent years the Imperial government could impose obligations in international matters on the Dominion by legislation passed in the Imperial house in relation to questions which were enumerated as being within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Dominion parliament. Why could it be so? It could be so because the British government at that time was the authority which could deal in these matters with foreign powers. Now Canada has altered her position. To-day if we wish to enter into agreements, or if we wish to sign any treaties with foreign countries, we have an authority in Canada that is able to do so and that authority is the federal parliament. Section 132 of the British North America Act covers this matter, but as the leader of the opposition has rightly said, when the British North America Act was enacted in 1867 the relation, as between this Dominion and the British parliament in connection with international matters was not that which exists to-day. In 1867 it was said that when the British government entered into a treaty with some country which affected Canada, the authority in Canada which would provide that the obligations under the treaty would be lived up to would be the Dominion parliament. Now the situation is somewhat changed, and no treaty is to be regarded as binding on Canada unless that treaty has been signed or ratified by this country itself. But there is no doubt in my mind that whenever, in any treaty, there is a stipulation which affects a province, that province is bound by any act of this federal parliament, otherwise it would be absolutely impracticable for Canada to deal with foreign countries.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

In conclusion I wish to call your attention to a similar situation which exists in the United States. The states in the American union have much greater and much wider powers than the provinces in Canada, because if in Canada the residuary power lies within federal jurisdiction, in the neighbouring union the residuary power lies within the jurisdiction of the states. To put my argument in another form: When the United States of America came into existence the different states retained their authority except and only to the limit of the authority which they conceded to the federal government. But here in Canada all authority was given to the central government except and in so far only as authority to deal with local matters was given to the provinces. So that even though the individual states of the union have a much greater authority than our individual provinces, the American government enters frequently into treaties with foreign powers. Every provision of those treaties is lived up to and the central government at Washington sees to it that treaties are properly observed. The doctrine of exclusive legislation by the provinces may apply when it is a question of internal administration in Canada, but when it comes to international matters the one central authority is empowered to deal with these matters and it can do so under the three existing provisions of the British North America Act: first, by exercising the authority which is given to us to pass any law which is necessary for the peace, order and good government of Canada; secondly, under the authority which we have by reason of our possessing the residuary powers; thirdly, from the expressed authority which is given to us by section 132 of the British North America Act.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not know that any useful purpose is served by taking up the time of the committee with respect to this matter, but when the observation was made that the provinces are a secondary power a total disregard of the jurisprudence of the Privy Council was indicated. The Privy Council has said that the legislatures of the provinces have as plenary powers within the ambit and scope of their activities as the parliament of Canada has within its jurisdiction or as the Imperial parliament in the plenitude of its powers could bestow upon them. Those are the words of the Privy Council and are quite as important as the words to which we have just listened. With respect to the residuary power being vested in the Dominion, it is quite true that the residuary power rests with the Dominion as indeed the Privy Council has said, but that does not enable the parliament to take from the provinces the powers conferred upon the legislatures by section 92 of the British North America Act. As far as section 132 of the British North America Act is concerned it has no bearing upon the subject at all for the reason I have indicated which goes to the root of the whole question. Is Canada a sovereign state? Has Canada any treaty-making powers at all apart from those which belong to us as a part of the empire? In section 92 these words are to be found:

> In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,—

Then follow sixteen enumerated powers. Those powers are exclusive and there is no right on the part of this parliament—the courts have held all such legislation ultra vires—to interfere with these enumerated subjects. The exercise by the legislature of their exclusive powers with respect to these subjects is subject to the exercise of its ancillary power by the parliament of Canada. For instance legislating on banks and banking, we provide that warehouse receipts shall have a certain validity as against a registered chattel mortgage; and it was held by the Privy Council that that power was a power ancillary to the exercise of the exclusive power of parliament with respect to banks and banking. Therefore it must be deemed to orevrride the power of provincial legislatures with respect to property and civil rights so far as registration as a chattel mortgage is concerned, although at the last revision of the Bank Act we made certain amendments in that regard. There is no question of that sort involved in this. The sole question is whether or not a treaty negotiated between a foreign state and Great Britain and now sanctioned by this parliament can be said to carry with it by implication the power to overrule the powers of the provincial legislatures with respect to companies created within their own border, it does apply to federal companies, I agree—but with respect to internal taxation imposed by the provinces, and with respect to dealing with land registration it cannot be so. The Privy Council held that where you have a federal enterprise created by a federal authority, it must comply with the registration laws of the various provinces with respect to real estate. That was held to be part of the law of the constitution. Under those circumstances I am free to say that while I have not seen the point discussed, it is certainly quite clear to me that, if that be the law of this Dominion, then our constitution must be different from that contained in the British North America Act. Our statutory constitution is what governs not only with respect to our relations between the federal and the provincial authorities, but it is the authority that is responsible for our being an entity at all. The entity called Canada came into being by an imperial statute called the British North America Act. It did not come into being by an agreement such as they had in the United States. The British North America Act defined the terms under which this entity called Canada shall exercise its legislative powers. It does not contemplate, as I have said, our making a treaty. Section 132 has no reference to the treaty-making powers which are exercised by Canada. It says that the Canadian parliament shall have power to deal with a treaty negotiated with respect to the British Empire. This is not a treaty with respect to the British Empire. The British government has not negotiated the treaty on behalf of Canada and it has been very careful not to do so. It left Canada to say what it will do. When Canada sanctions this treaty by the action of parliament, parliament can bind the provinces only to the extent to which the Dominion can reach its arms into the provinces. It can do so with respect to many things but it cannot do so with respect to many matters that are mentioned in the treaty. If a provincial legislature, the day after to-morrow, after the treaty is ratified, sees fit to pass a statute at variance with that treaty, parliament might disallow the legislation. We have that power—and it has not been exercised for many years—but apart from that power we cannot do anything.

The application of the American constitution is covered by the provisions of the constitution itself. The senate of the United States which comprises two representatives from each state, has power to give its approval to treaties. The senate of the United States was originally composed of men elected by the state legislatures, subsequently, in most of them by the direct vote of the electors themselves. There is a section of the United States constitution dealing specifically with that situation. No one for a moment questions that the national power in the United States is the federal authority called the United States of America, but there is no section such as section 132 which we have and which, instead of advancing the position taken by the government, actually has the opposite effect because it contemplates only a treaty negotiated for the British Empire of which Canada is a part and not a separate treaty negotiated by a portion of the empire or a treaty negotiated by that portion of the empire that does not include Canada and subsequently sanctioned by Canada. I suppose no purpose is served beyond merely stating the situation as it occurs to me and citing the decisions that have been made with respect to it. We cannot settle it here, but I think we should take cognizance of the circumstances to which I allude.

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend has quoted the decisions of the Privy Council in support of his contention; but in order to show that the exclusive jurisdiction of provinces is not a territory so highly protected against the federal jurisdiction that we can never enter into it, I would quote to my hon. friend the very recent decision given in re the Royal Bank of Canada by the Privy Council, where the question arose whether the federal parliament had the right to put aside the laws of registration which prevailed in Quebec with respect to properties. If there is one subject matter which is deemed to be within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces, it is property and civil rights; but in that case the decision rendered by the Privy Council within the last few months is that when we are dealing with bankruptcy we have a perfect right to legislate and, exercising what my hon. friend has designated, and rightly so, an ancillary power, we can do away with provincial legislation even covering such matters as property and civil rights. This being the case—and this decision is very recent—if we have the right as a central and national parliament and government to deal with outside and foreign governments in international matters, we surely have the right, in order to exercise that authority, to exercise an ancillary authority in these highly important matters. Again I say I do not think it would be seriously contested that any authority other than parliament or the Dominion government has the right to deal in international matters.

Mr. BENNETT: I hesitate to trouble the committee, but in subsection 21 of section 91 it will be found that it is the exclusive power of parliament to deal with bankruptcy and insolvency. The Privy Council held, following the case of the Union bank and Tennant, which was thirty years earlier, that where parliament exercises one of its exclusive powers it has the right to exercise every power that is ancillary to giving effect to that power. That means that we could interfere with property and civil rights in the provinces with respect to the registration of chattel mortgages in the Tennant case, and the same was held with respect to bankruptcy and insolvency. But the test which the Lord Chancellor laid down in the earlier case was this: Is the legislation in its character legislation dealing with bankruptcy and insolvency or property and civil rights? It was held that it was dealing with banks and banking in one instance and with insolvency and bankruptcy in the other, and the other was only incidental to the exercise of that power.

When you begin to apply that doctrine to an international arrangement with respect to a treaty, it is unnecessary to say that it has no parallel and no analogy, for the simple reason that in the one instance you are interpreting a statute of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and in the other you are endeavouring to apply a principle that applies only to a sovereign state. That is the whole point that is at issue in this case. No one for a moment suggests that any power other than the entity called Canada can deal with international problems. A province is not Canada. The name of the province is Ontario or Quebec or Nova Scotia or New Brunswick as the case may be; but the federal entity which comprises the territory of those provinces and which has exclusive power conferred upon it by section 91 is the Dominion of Canada, and it alone has power to deal with international problems. No one has questioned or will question that. The question is whether or not this Dominion, created by an imperial statute, has power, having regard to the exclusive jurisdiction conferred upon the provinces, to sanction a treaty made between Great Britain and a foreign state, which treaty in its terms does not apply to this country except as sanctioned by parliament, and thereby deprive the legislatures of their constitutional powers which are exclusive with respect to many matters that are mentioned in that treaty. That is the problem to which I direct attention, that and none other. I am not expressing beyond the casual arguments that occur to me any considered and careful opinion, because I have not had the time to look up the authorities, and I am speaking solely from memory with respect to them, but with respect to the last authority I have very peculiar knowledge, and if it follows the Tennant and the Union bank principle, that any community which is not a sovereign state may negotiate a treaty the effect of which is to deprive one of the component provinces which has exclusive jurisdiction to deal with the matters therein mentioned of the powers conferred upon it, that is a problem not yet settled, and I submit it to the committee for the purpose of engaging the attention of the law officers of the crown.

Bill reported.

TRADE CONVENTION WITH CZECHOSLOVAKIA

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 202, respecting a certain trade convention between His Majesty and the President of the Czechoslovak republic.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. ROBB: I might explain to the committee that Czechoslovakia had in 1921 a population of 13,613,000. It is one of the most self-supporting countries of Europe, being rich in coal and other minerals, and well forested and well developed agriculturally. The republic contains over seventy-five per cent of the manufacturing industries of the former Austria-Hungary empire. The republic is an extensive importer of bread grains, edible fats, coffee, tea and other luxury foodstuffs, agricultural implements, automobiles, and tires.

In December, 1926, a temporary agreement was made between Canada and Czechoslovakia whereby, on the main items of export from Canada, most favoured nation treatment was given, we in exchange granting Czechoslovakia the benefits of the intermediate tariff. This agreement was made for a term of fifteen months with the understanding that a further discussion looking to a permanent treaty would take place in the interval. These negotiations have now been completed, and the agreement now submitted calls for the mutual exchange of most-favoured-nation treatment.

The principal imports from Czechoslovakia are—I will give round figures only:

Glass and glassware	$403,000
Tableware of china	313,000
Jewellry	121,000
Cotton manufactures	79,000
Worsted, serges, etc	74,000
Hops	63,000
Flax, hemp and jutes	52,000
Other wool, and manufactures thereof	51,000

Mr. BENNETT: What is the total?

Mr. ROBB: The total imports for 1926 amounted to $1,272,000, and for 1927 to $1,726,000.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That is for the fiscal year?

Mr. ROBB: I imagine so. The records of both countries are incomplete due to the fact that Czechoslovakia is an inland country and the larger part of her imports pass through the free port of Hamburg. For that reason the major part of our exports to that country appear in the Germany statement. Flour is our chief item of export. The Canadian trade commissioner at Hamburg, Mr. Wilgress, in a report to his department, states:

> Last year more Canadian flour was sold in Czechoslovakia that in any other country except the United Kingdom. This market is therefore of great importance to the Canadian flour-milling industry.

A few weeks after the signing of the present convention, a representative of the republic in Montreal, Mr. Kveton, in an interview stated:

> From the total imports of 2,531,287 barrels of wheat flour in the calendar year 1926, according to the Czechoslovakia statistical returns, 1,021,248 barrels, valued at 8,699,340, originated in North America. The Canadian ratio, 70 per cent, would be 714,873 barrels, worth $6,089,538, at the Czechoslovakia frontier. These figures include only imports designated in the returns as coming from Canada, Hamburg and the United States, without even taking into consideration that probably a part of the imports credited to Germany and to the port of Trieste, 15,757 barrels is of North American origin.

Mr. ADSHEAD: What was the price of this flour per barrel of 196 pounds?

Mr. ROBB: I gave the customs export price; that would be the f.o.b. price, probably.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Per barrel?

Mr. ROBB: I think so.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Per barrel?

Mr. BENNETT: It was in bags, was it not?

Mr. ROBB: I do not know whether it was in bags or wood. The estimated figure at the Canadian port is $6.50 per barrel.

Mr. STEVENS: Does the minister intend to go through this treaty clause by clause?

Mr. ROBB: Whatever the house desires.

Mr. STEVENS: Otherwise I should like to ask one or two questions.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Before the minister leaves the subject that we have been considering, will he tell us what are the other exports?

Mr. ROBB: The memorandum which I have applied to exports direct from our own ports:

> Rubber tires, $122,428.
> Canned lobster, $10,825.
> Rags, $22,688.
> Wood, unmanufactured, $2,351.

I cannot think what that is.

> Farm implements and machinery, $2,892.
> Adding and calculating machines, $21,763.
> Automobiles and parts, $337.

There must be an error there.

Settlers' effects, $300.
All other articles, $3,993.

As I have pointed out before, these figures cannot be correct, because much of this trade has been distributed through the free port of Hamburg. The conditions of the treaty are that the trade shall go through that port.

Mr. CHAPLIN: At the end of the year will the minister be able to determine what business we are doing with Czechoslovakia?

Mr. ROBB: Yes. Under the new statistical arrangement we hope to be able to determine what trade is going through there.

Mr. CLARK: Is it not a fact that last year there was almost a complete failure of wheat shipments from Odessa to Czechoslovakia and these other countries?

Mr. ROBB: I cannot answer my hon. friend. I know that our Canadian millers who have representatives over there have urged the government very strongly to negotiate this treaty, and have found fault with us because we were making haste rather slowly.

Mr. CLARK: I understand that. But can the minister give us the comparative shipments of wheat and flour to Czechoslovakia covering a period of two or three years?

Mr. ROBB: I cannot give such figures.

Mr. CLARK: I think it is really worth looking into. My understanding is that last year there was an almost complete failure of shipments from Odessa, and that Canada consequently sent a much greater quantity of wheat and flour to these countries.

Mr. ROBB: Of course, that applies to our trade with all the world. Everyone knows that the wheat coming out of Russia has been comparatively limited within recent years. No one can tell when Russia will again be a factor in the export market.

Mr. CLARK: I am trying to get at the reason for the treaty that relates chiefly to wheat and wheat products. Because of that very fact Russia will be in a position to compete with Canada in that particular market on a much more favourable basis.

Mr. KELLNER: What are the duties Czechoslavokia is now charging on Canadian wheat, and what will be the duties if this agreement is made effective?

Mr. ROBB: The duties under the general tariff are based on the kronen, which equals 2.96 cents—not quite three cents. These are the figures:

[Mr. Robb.]

Commodity—General tariff—Treaty rate—
Wheat; 60 kronen; 30 kronen.
Wheat flour; 120 kronen; 70 kronen.
Apples; 200 kronen; 80 kronen.
Grass seeds; 300 kronen; 180 kronen.
Fish and seal blubber; 15-144; free.
Vegetable tallow; 15 kronen; free.
Fish, other than herrings, 270 kronen; free; Fish, other than herrings, smoked, 270 kronen; 180 kronen.
Canned fish; 1,200 kronen; 360-600 kronen.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Is the Czechoslovakian a fixed tariff, or is it on a minimum scale and subject to change like the French tariff?

Mr. ROBB: We get their minimum and we give them ours.

Mr. CHAPLIN: But we do not change our tariff. If their tariff is similar to the French tariff they will have a big advantage over us.

Mr. ROBB: My protectionist friends will be glad to have the admission that ours is a stationary tariff. I recollect that not long ago my hon. friend argued that we had reduced our tariff.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The minister cannot get away with that. He knows that on a large line of commodities under the French treaty our rates are fixed and must continue so as long as the French treaty remains on our statute books. This is a repetition of the French treaty as far as goods from Czechoslovakia to this country are concerned.

Mr. ROBB: I am sure my hon. friends opposite will be glad to have this from a report dated April 16, 1928, issued by the Department of Commerce at Washington:

Czechoslovakia market for American flour declines.

A leading importer of grain and flour in Czechoslovakia reports that Canadian flour has steadily been displacing American flour in that market since 1922, according to information received from Commercial Attache Elbert Baldwin. Due to the frequency of indirect shipments via Hamburg, Antwerp and Amsterdam, trade figures fail to trace this movement. In the case of the importer quoted, however, Canadian flour represents 95 per cent and American flour only 5 per cent out of 30,000 tons (338,000 barrels) imported during the period June-January, 1927. This is a reversal of the situation which prevailed in 1920 when the United States dominated this market and Canadian flour was practically unknown. It is said that the advantage gained by the Canadian mills has been accomplished largely by the better export technique recently developed by them. Recently Canadian exporters have been maintaining spot stocks not only at centres of distribution such as Hamburg, but also, if in smaller volume, at interior points. The domestic importer is consequently less exposed when purchasing Canadian flour to the danger of market fluctuation incurred when purchasing American flour, while the Canadian exporter, dealing in larger volume and close to a source market is able to hedge his own risk while protecting his customer. It is the opinion of the importer quoted that the American flour could regain a large part of the lost market if equal facilities with Canadian competitors were accorded the importer.

We have this statement from the representative of another country that Canada has been capturing the market.

Mr. CHAPLIN: We like to hear that, and it is evidently due to the quality of the goods they are getting and has nothing to do with what the government has done.

Mr. ROBB: I am willing to give credit to the quality of the goods.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That is only a little red herring drawn across the trail so far as the question I asked is concerned.

Mr. STEVENS: The question asked by my hon. friend (Mr. Chaplin) is a pertinent one which should receive some consideration. This country entered into a trade agreement with France, giving France a fixed tariff. The items were enumerated and the duties fixed, and in return France gave us a sort of omnibus right to certain rates of duty which may be, and which in fact have been, changed very frequently. Now this treaty with Czechoslovakia by its general terms gives to that country the same specific duties that France gets on these articles enumerated in the French treaty; and after all, the articles of export from France are very similar in type to articles which we may expect to import from Czechoslovakia. In return we simply get the general clause extending what is known as most favoured nation treatment. It is the usual clause. That is the point raised by my hon. friend from Lincoln. The minister very adroitly quotes an expression of opinion regarding the importation of flour—an opinion from the American Department of Trade and Commerce. Well, I think it is a very fitting occasion upon which to compliment the Canadian millers upon their enterprise and their trade ability. But that is no answer to the point raised. It seems to me an opportune moment for the committee to consider whether or not the terms of the French treaty have been to the advantage of Canada and whether the extension of those terms is entirely in Canada's interest, or at any rate in the interest of this country to the same degree as it is advantageous to those with whom we are trading. I submit we ought to have an expression from the minister, a justification, if I may say so, of the French treaty which is now applicable to this treaty.

Mr. ROBB: I have no great quarrel with my hon. friend's statement regarding parts of the French treaty, but I am not now discussing the French treaty. We are discussing this treaty which has been made with Czechoslovakia under which Canada gives to that country her most-favoured nation clause, receiving the same in return.

Mr. STEVENS: Including the French treaty—that is the point.

Mr. ROBB: There is nothing to prevent this parliament from increasing the rates against France, with the exception of a very few items.

Mr. STEVENS: Surely!

Mr. ROBB: If the people of Canada determine upon such a policy.

Mr. BENNETT: Then you would have to abrogate the treaty.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister is not correct; you cannot change the items without abrogating the treaty, giving notice to that effect. I would point out that the minister has imported the French treaty into this one. That is the point. The minister says he does not want to discuss the French treaty, but he must do so if he is to give a fair indication of the application of this treaty. That is what we complain of. Our hands are tied; we are bound to certain terms with Czechoslovakia until we denounce the French treaty. I say, we find ourselves in a humiliating position as a result of the French treaty, which was one of the minister's pet babies.

Mr. ROBB: Oh, no.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, yes.

Mr. ROBB: I will not take any credit for the French treaty.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, the minister adopted the baby with a good deal of pride.

Mr. ROBB: I will admit adoption.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister thought at first it would be a lusty child and would reflect credit upon him, but in recent years he has been inclined to repudiate it.

Mr. BENNETT: It is somewhat anaemic.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, it has become a little anaemic. The point is that the French treaty has been imported into this one; it is embodied in this treaty. Someone asks me to read the section involved. It is article 4:

> It is understood that in all matters governing the import, export and transit of merchandise Czechoslovakia grants to Canada and Canada grants to Czechoslovakia the treatment of the most favoured nation.

That clause, the minister says, includes a few articles; as a matter of fact it is a very long and important list of articles incorporated in the French treaty. Perhaps the minister will tell me whether it includes the West India agreement?

Mr. ROBB: That is British.

Mr. STEVENS: That is not included?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Why?

Mr. STEVENS: The question is asked—why?

Mr. ROBB: It is a British country; you will notice the words "any foreign country".

Mr. STEVENS: Not in this particular article. There is another article referring to foreign countries, but the article I have just read is clear: we simply grant the most-favoured-nation treatment. Does that include the West Indies?

Mr. ROBB: See article one of the schedule.

Mr. STEVENS: True, article one provides that "articles the produce or manufacture of Canada imported into Czechoslovakia" and vice versa shall not be subjected to other or higher duties or charges than those paid on like articles the produce or manufacture of any other foreign country. That is clear. But I have called the attention of the minister to article 4, which I have fully quoted, and I want to know whether the treatment we accord to the West Indies applies in this case.

Mr. ROBB: That is the language in all treaties. It might have been made clearer had it specifically mentioned foreign countries, but the intention is fully understood. They quite understand it.

Mr. STEVENS: But in the practical application of it, according to my understanding of the matter, Czechoslovakia will claim to come under the treatment extended to the West Indies, say, or to Australia or to South Africa.

Mr. ROBB: No; it is exactly the same as in the agreements with Italy and Belgium. They have never made such a claim and we would not admit it. They quite understand it. They understand it in all these negotiations.

Mr. STEVENS: So long as we understand it clearly—

Mr. ROBB: It is clearly understood.

Mr. STEVENS: Then I come back to this question: The French treaty will be applicable to this treaty with Czechoslovakia?

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. ROBB: It will, in respect of a limited number of articles. Perhaps I might just as well put those articles on record now:

Canned meats, canned poultry and game; extracts of meats and fluid beef, not medicated, and soups of all kinds: 20 per cent.

Trees: apple, cherry, peach, pear, plum, and quince of all kinds and small peach trees known as June buds: each, 2 cents. Grape vines, gooseberry, raspberry, currant and rose bushes, fruit plants, n.o.p.; trees, plants and shrubs commonly known as nursery stock, n.o.p.: 15 per cent.

Vegetables, tomatoes excepted, including baked beans, in cans, or other air-tight packages, n.o.p., the weight of the cans or other packages to be included in the weight for duty; per pound, 1 cent.

Fruits in air-tight cans, or other air-tight packages, n.o.p., the weight of the cans or other packages to be included in the weight for duty; per pound, 2 cents.

Anchovies, sardines, sprats and other fish, packed in oil or otherwise, in tin boxes, the weight of the tin box to be included in the weight for duty:

(a) When weighing over 20 ounces and not over 36 ounces each, per box, 4 cents.

(b) When weighing over 12 ounces and not over 20 ounces each, per box, 3 cents.

(c) When weighing over 8 ounces and not over 12 ounces each, per box, 2½ cents.

(d) When weighing 8 ounces each or less, per box, 2 cents.

Alcoholic perfumes and perfumed spirits, bay rum, cologne and lavender waters, hair, tooth and skin washes, and other toilet preparations containing spirits of any kind:

(a) When in bottles or flasks containing not more than 4 ounces each; 75 per cent.

Medicinal or medicated wines, including vermouth and ginger wine, containing not more than 40 per cent of proof spirit; 70 per cent.

Wines of the fresh grape of all kinds, not sparkling, imported in barrels or in bottles:

(a) Containing 20 per cent or less proof spirit; per gallon, 15 cents.

(b) Containing more than 20 per cent and not more than 23 per cent proof spirit; per gallon, 20 cents.

(c) Containing more than 20 per cent and not more than 26 per cent of proof spirit; per gallon, 25 per cent.

(d) Containing more than 26 per cent proof spirit until strength reaches 40 per cent of proof spirit; per gallon, 55 cents.

And in addition thereto for each degree of strength in excess of 26 per cent of proof spirit until the strength reaches 40 per cent of proof spirit; 3 cents.

Provided that 6 quart bottles, or 12 pint bottles, shall be held to contain a gallon for duty purposes under this item.

Books: Novels or works of fiction, or literature of a similar character, unbound or paper bound or in sheets, but not to include Christmas annuals, or publications, commonly known as juvenile and toy books; 15 per cent.

Advertising and printed matter: Advertising pamphlets, advertising show cards, illustrated advertising periodicals, price books, catalogues and price lists; advertising almanacs and calendars, patent medicine or other advertising circulars, fly sheets, or pamphlets; advertising chromos, chromotypes, oleographs, or like work produced by any process other than handpainting or drawing, and having any advertisement or advertising matter printed, lithographed or stamped thereon, or attached thereto, including advertising bills, folders and posters, or other similar artistic work, lithographed, printed or stamped on paper or cardboard for business or advertisement purposes, n.o.p.; per pound, 12½ cents.

Printed music, bound or in sheets, and music for mechanical piano players; 5 per cent.

All medicinal, chemical and pharmaceutical preparations, compounded of more than one substance, including patent and proprietary preparations, tinctures, pills, powders, troches, lozenges, syrups, cordials, bitters, anodynes, tonics, plasters, liniments, salves, ointments, pastes, drops, waters, essences and oils, n.o.p.:

(a) When dry, 22½ per cent.

(b) Liquid, when containing not more than 2½ per cent of proof spirit, 30 per cent.

Provided that drugs, pill-mass and preparations, not including pills or medicinal plasters, recognized by the British or the United States pharmacopoeia, or the French Codex as officinal, shall not be held to be covered by this item.

Perfumery, including toilet preparations, non-alcoholic, namely:—hair oils, tooth and other powders and washes, pomatums, pastes and all other perfumed preparations, n.o.p., used for the hair, mouth or skin; 25 per cent.

Olive oil, n.o.p.; 15 per cent.

Essential oils, n.o.p.:; including bay oil, otto of limes and peppermint oil; 5 per cent.

Tableware of china, porcelain, white granite or ironstone; 20 per cent.

Locomotives and motor cars, for railways and tramways and automobiles and motor vehicles of all kinds: 25 per cent.

White and cream coloured lace and embroideries, of cotton or linen; 15 per cent.

Knitted undershirts, knitted drawers and knitted goods, n.o.p.; 25 per cent.

Church vestments of any material; 15 per cent.

Embroideries, n.o.p.; lace, n.o.p.; braids, n.o.p.; tapes of cotton or linen not over one and one-quarter inches in width, not including measuring tape lines; fringes, n.o.p.; cords; elastic, round or flat; garter elastic; tassels; handkerchiefs of all kinds; lace collars and all manufactures of lace; nets and nettings of cotton, linen, silk and other material, n.o.p.; shams and curtains, when made up, trimmed or untrimmed; 27½ per cent.

Velvets, velveteens, silk velvets and plush not over twenty four inches in width; 20 per cent.

Silk fabrics not over twenty-six inches in width; 20 per cent.

Ribbons of all kinds and materials; 25 per cent.

Manufactures of silk or of which silk is the component part of chief value, n.o.p.; 30 per cent.

Fur skins, wholly or partially dressed, n.o.p.; 12½ per cent.

Rubber cement and all manufactures of india-rubber and gutta percha, n.o.p.; 20 per cent.

Gloves and mitts, of all kinds; 25 per cent.

Feathers and manufactures of feathers, n.o.p.; artificial feathers, fruits; grains, leaves and flowers suitable for ornamenting hats; 22½ per cent.

Cinematograph or moving picture films, positives, one and one-eighth of an inch in width and over, per linear foot; 1½ cent.

That covers the list of fixed items.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I think there are two more lists which I would like read.

Mr. ROBB: Those are not fixed; we can change them at any time.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Under those other lists France is receiving a further discount over and above the special rate. They receive that discount on canned goods, and those lists have not been read.

Mr. ROBB: I quoted those.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I did not hear anything about canned tomatoes.

Mr. ROBB: Tomatoes are excepted. I read the item, and I recall that tomatoes are excepted.

Mr. CHAPLIN: There is a line of goods on which France gets a special discount of 10 per cent or 15 per cent below the regular duty.

Mr. ROBB: That may be, but there is nothing to prevent parliament from changing those rates if the people of Canada determine that they wish to do so.

Mr. CHAPLIN: And on the other hand there is nothing to prevent this parliament from wiping out the whole French treaty. I assume that Czechoslovakia will receive the same advantages on these special lines of goods as France receives, and those goods should be enumerated now.

Mr. ROBB: Not necessarily.

Mr. STEVENS: I am afraid the minister does not get our point.

Mr. ROBB: So long as we admit that we give Czechoslovakia whatever we give France, why encumber the act with a list of these items?

Mr. CHAPLIN: On that basis the minister need not have read this list at all.

Mr. ROBB: I read those items particularly to show the duty. There are people throughout this country who will argue that that is not a low rate of duty.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It is not a low rate of duty on liquor; quite the opposite. On the other hand, however, the rate of duty on goods coming to this country from France is lower in some instances than the duty on the same goods entering France, in some cases to the extent of 10 per cent. Take automobiles, for example; when that treaty was made our duty on automobiles was 35 per cent, but this treaty only calls for a duty of 25 per cent on automobiles coming from France. That is an illustration, and the same thing applies to canned vegetables.

Mr. ROBB: Last summer I discussed with the Minister of Trade for France the desire of Canada to revise the French treaty.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I am glad of that.

Mr. ROBB: I pointed out to him as emphatically as I could that on three different occasions since this treaty was made France has increased her tariffs against our products.

Mr. BENNETT: She has done so on one further occasion since this house met.

Mr. ROBB: At that time they were negotiating an agreement with Germany and the French minister said they did not care to enter into a discussion with Canada until the negotiations were completed. The agreement with Germany was completed and my hon. friends will recall the United States raised some objection to it.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROBB: Our representative in Paris, Mr. Roy, reached an understanding with France that whatever concessions France gave to the United States, in order to meet the objections of the latter country to the treaty with Germany, would be accorded also to Canada, and they made some reductions at that time. Now Mr. Roy is awaiting a favourable opportunity to take the matter up with France. That opportunity does not exist at the present time because for the last few months France has been busy getting ready for a general election, but we propose to take up with the French government during this summer the question of the revision of the treaty.

Mr. CHAPLIN: In our agreement with France there is a clause to the effect that any concession granted to the United States shall be applicable to Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the minister has misapprehended part of the criticism. The point is this: We negotiated a treaty with Australia. We have no treaty with New Zealand but by virtue of the terms of the treaty between Australia and Canada, New Zealand was able to take advantage of its provisions through an order in council. In the case of the French treaty we have the same situation. In that treaty there are some items which are covered by specific duties and we may not increase those duties without abrogating the treaty, whereas France has three times increased her duties, and once since this house met an increase of duties became applicable against Canada. On the other hand we are unable to increase any of our duties without abrogating the treaty. The same sort of thing has happened in the case of Australia. Australia has changed her duties since we negotiated a treaty with her, but we are unable to change our duties without abrogating the treaty.

Mr. ROBB: We could change ours.

Mr. BENNETT: Only by abrogating the treaty.

Mr. ROBB: Not necessarily.

Mr. BENNETT: That would be the effect of it.

Mr. CHAPLIN: You could not take the duty off raisins.

Mr. BENNETT: Not without abrogating the treaty; I think the minister will remember that not long since we brought to his attention the fact that if, for instance, this parliament sought to change the duty on raisins—

Mr. CHAPLIN: Or the duty on butter.

Mr. BENNETT: —or the duty on butter or eggs, it could only be done by abrogating the treaty; whereas for some strange reason Australia has constantly been dealing with its treaty without regard to us or the effects upon our trade relations. The favoured nation clause has sometimes had very far reaching consequences, and the effect is to make the question of the negotiations of new treaties very difficult. You give certain nations most-favoured-nation treatment and under a treaty such as this Great Britain is treated as a foreign country. I ask the minister if Great Britain is not treated as a foreign country.

Mr. ROBB: British.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister says "British," but there is nothing in the treaty which so indicates. One of the difficulties I had was in relation to the first paragraph, which refers to foreign countries. Then in the fourth paragraph you say that Czechoslovakia shall enjoy most-favoured-nation treatment. That is a short way of putting it. With respect to this treaty as far as Czechoslovakia is concerned is not Australia to be a foreign country?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Why?

Mr. ROBB: Because Australia is a British country and is recognized as such.

Mr. BENNETT: But there is nothing in the terms of the treaty that defines it as such. My hon. friend beside me (Mr. Stevens) makes it perfectly clear that there are two parties to this contract—Czechoslovakia and Canada. So far as Canada is concerned it is a foreign country to Czechoslovakia and Czechoslovakia is a foreign country to us. Australia is a foreign country to Czechoslovakia and we have said that we will give the most-favoured-nation treatment to Czechoslovakia that we give to any other country. Therefore if we give to Australia, or even to Great Britain, a preference over other communities, Czechoslovakia has a right to ask for it. There does not seem to be any answer to that. They are both regarded as foreign countries, and there is nothing in the treaty which makes it clear it shall bind only those countries that are not portions of the British Empire. There is no good arguing that the question of foreign countries has nothing to do with it at all. Having covenanted under an agreement or treaty to give most-favoured treatment to Czechoslovakia, have we not thereby bound ourselves to give to that country the same treatment that we give to any other country, that country being, so far as Czechoslovakia is concerned, a foreign country. Is not that the difficulty?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is a good lawyer and I am not going to be drawn into a discussion of legal technicalties. But if my hon. friend is right, every country with which we have entered into treaties since the British preference was granted in 1897 could have claimed the benefit of that preference.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. ROBB: Yes. If my hon. friend's argument is right, Great Britain is a foreign country just as much as Australia and those other countries could have come in and claimed the benefits of the preference. But no country has ever sought to set up such a claim. The same language which appears in this case with respect to most favoured nation treatment appears also in our agreement with Italy, with Belguim and with the Netherlands. These countries quite understand the situation. I think I have made myself clear on that point. Now as to the agreement with Australia and New Zealand the facts are these, and my hon. friend will admit that it takes two to make a bargain.

Mr. BENNETT: Sometime three.

Mr. ROBB: We urged certain points very strongly upon Australia. That was done not only by the government that made the treaty in 1922 but by mostly every other government which has held office ever since the time of Sir John A. Macdonald. It was urged by Sir Mackenzie Bowell, who made a special trip down there, and it was urged by Sir George Foster and others in an attempt to negotiate an agreement with Australia. We always put up to Australia the broad principle of preference for preference. We would give her our full British preference, if she would give it to us, but Australia was not willing to make that sort of arrangement. We gave them the concession that now exists on dairy products. That is what my hon. friend is particularly referring to.

Mr. BENNETT: I mentioned raisins.

Mr. ROBB: Of course the raisins do not come in. Just about that time the people of New Zealand were complaining bitterly that they would have to cancel their trade agreement with Canada because we had the big end of the bargain. They said: We are buying everything from you and selling you nothing. We thought it only fair that the sister dominion of New Zealand should have the same advantage as Australia, and we gave that voluntarily by order in council.

Mr. BENNETT: Can it be abrogated by order in council?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to New Zealand only?

Mr. ROBB: We can cancel the agreement with Australia if we so desire, but I submit this to my hon. friend, and I should like to have their judgment on it—whether they think it is wise to cancel the agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: One is an order in council.

Mr. ROBB: Our imports and exports in regard to New Zealand are as follows:

Year	Imports	Exports
1922	$1,783,500	$ 4,131,131
1927	4,576,842	13,538,513

Mr. BENNETT: About the same ratio in the two years.

Mr. ROBB: In regard to Australia the figures are as follows:

Year	Imports	Exports
1922	$1,079,324	$10,687,484
1927	6,296,197	18,965,881

I should like to be advised by my hon. friends if they think it is a good idea to cancel a bargain of that kind.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is one of the cleverest persons in this house in dodging away from a point at issue. We are not discussing whether the Australian treaty is good or bad.

Mr. ROBB: I did not raise the question of the Australian treaty.

Mr. STEVENS: I know, but we are asking simply this: Does Czechoslovakia, under this treaty now before the committee, secure the privileges that Australia enjoys under her agreement with us?

Mr. ROBB: Absolutely no.

Mr. STEVENS: Very good. I will leave the Australian treaty alone, but the minister will admit that Czechoslovakia will enjoy the full privileges that France enjoys under her treaty with Canada.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, while it is in force.

Mr. STEVENS: Furthermore, we cannot change the French treaty except by agreement with them or by abrogating the treaty; the rates are fixed definitely.

Mr. ROBB: On certain limited articles.

Mr. STEVENS: On a list of articles part of which was read.

Mr. ROBB: All of which was read.

Mr. STEVENS: No. The minister will pardon me. He read a list, but there are two other schedules providing for certain discounts, the details of which I certainly cannot carry in mind, and which provide for very favoured treatment with France.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, but we can change them.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, but the point I am making is that that applies to Czechoslovakia. Am I right in that?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: Again I come to the argument that in this treaty with Czechoslovakia we are giving a great deal more than on the surface we appear to be giving, and I state to the minister—and I think I carry with me the judgment of a good many members of the house—that the treaty with France in the form in which we entered into it was an improvident treaty so far as Canada was concerned: that the benefits from it have not accrued to Canada in the same degree as they have to France. Therefore I argue that this treaty with Czechoslovakia is not a wise one because it carries into effect the same objectionable features that apply to the French treaty. By the way the minister bitterly criticised us, and especially the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin), who analysed the French treaty very effectively, when we drew his attention at the time of the ratification of that treaty in this house to the possible or likely effect. Now we have an admission from the minister that he has asked the French government to agree to a modification of that treaty. That is obviously an admission that the hon. member for Lincoln and others of us who took the same view were correct in 1922 when we criticized and warned the minister and the government against entering into the treaty in its then form. So we say to him now that it would have been better to make some reservation in this treaty as regards that list in the French treaty until we had cleaned the situation up. If we do not, while I am not in a position to go into technicalities, I call his attention to the fact that in the French treaty we admit silks under a very wide, sweeping clause, at a low rate of duty. We have recently spent a great deal of time reforming or remodelling our silk schedule in the Canadian tariff, but the silk schedule of the Canadian tariff will not apply to Czechoslovakia. Czechoslovakia will come under the French treaty special silk description, just read by the minister, in terms something like this: silk, not wider than twenty-six inches, fabrics of all kinds, so much. That is a sweeping, general description that will take in almost any class of silk. Canada with its young industry of artificial silk, for instance, which is competing with genuine silk fabrics, will find that such imports will seriously affect Canadian manufacturers, and it is not fair to this young and growing industry that it should be subjected to still further competition of this kind. If the treaty was made specific in its terms so that the people of Canada would know what was being done, the thing would not be so bad, but there is nothing specified except these omnibus clauses. That is why we have some apprehension as to the likely effect of this treaty, just as we had in 1922 when we warned the minister in regard to the French treaty, which he now admits he is endeavouring to modify after some five years of experience.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The minister a few minutes ago told us, in respect to the special discounts of the tariff items that had been given to France, that we could change the duties. Does the minister now tell us that he can cancel those special discounts of 10 per cent and 15 per cent that he allowed France over and above the regular tariff?

Mr. ROBB: No. I say that we can change the duty.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The minister means that he can go back and change the original duty but he cannot change the individual items of 10 per cent and 15 per cent discount that he allowed France. Certainly he cannot. Therefore, owing to the fact that we have giver

France that extra list of goods on which they can get this special tariff, Czechoslovakia will have the same privilege and those items should also be read. The minister further says that he is not quite satisfied with the French treaty; he has said that in just so many words, and he has asked the French government to make certain changes. Why? Because France deliberately raised the minimum tariff two or three times after the treaty was made whereas we were bound in regard to many lines to keep our tariff stationary. The result has been, as we all know, that hundreds of lines of goods that we formerly sold France are wiped off the schedule to-day, and we are now down to bare raw material and a few manufacturing goods, notably rubber and some agricultural implements with which we can supply France. Apart from that, there is nothing but raw materials that we are supplying to France, and I think the minister will agree with me. That is one reason why I would like to see the French treaty readjusted. The Minister of Finance has already put on the statute book treaties with other nations which are based upon the French treaty, and this is another of them. Now I ask him what chance on earth has he of being able to readjust the treaty with France when five or six other treaties are based on the French treaty? The thing looks to me to be ridiculous, and the more treaties you base upon the French treaty, the harder it will be to get the French treaty readjusted.

Mr. ROBB: Surely my hon. friend is not arguing that we should not put this treaty through. Czechoslovakia is buying a little more from Canada than we are buying from them, and why not give a good customer of this country the advantages of this agreement? That seems to me common sense.

Mr. STEVENS: That is only begging the question. Our argument is that under the French treaty, Canada is not getting a square deal, to use plain, every-day language. The minister admits that. France has four times amended her tariff, but our tariff is fixed by the agreement, and it cannot be changed except by abrogation or with the permission of France. That is the position in a nutshell. We are now walking blindfold into a similiar position with Czechoslovakia. I am not going to criticize the Czechoslovakia government for a moment. They will probably treat us fairly, but they can, if they wish, do as they like with their tariff, and we shall be bound to Czechoslovakia to the extent of the French treaty without the possibility of amendment, unless we amend our treaty with another country. The thing is absurd.

What we complain of, and what we complained of in 1922, when the French treaty was up for ratification, is that it was improvident unfair to Canadian trade and Canadian industries—obviously unfair. We warned the government then, but they insisted on putting the treaty through. They realize now that they made a mistake then, but they cannot amend that treaty without breaking up the whole trade agreement with France. With that experience before us, we are here being asked to go with our hands tied into an agreement with another country. So far as I am concerned—I am speaking for myself because I have not consulted my colleagues on this particular point—I would abrogate the French treaty to-morrow unless we could get an amendment to it that will be wholly satisfactory. I would not rest under what the minister cited as quite an accomplishment for Mr. Roy, that we shall receive whatever privileges are granted to the United States. I want to see Canada stand on its own pins in dealing with France, and to get a square deal, because we are entitled to it, instead of depending upon the United States, which by the weight of its influence may get certain advantages, which then we may get. I do not care a snap of my finger what they give to the United States, and I say that at the earliest possible date we should either abrogate this French treaty or have it re-adjusted so that it is made fair to Canadian trade.

I want to deal with the clause in the French treaty which the minister has not seen fit to include in his recital. The point which my hon. friend from Lincoln made, and made effectively, and in a manner I think that merits the consideration of this committee, is that other considerations besides these specific duties have been given to the French nation which now will accrue to Czechoslovakia, and which are a disadvantage to Canadian trade. I think there is not a member of the government but would admit, if he were frank with this committee, that we ought to change or abrogate the French treaty —perhaps not abrogate; they might hesitate to do that because they do not wish to have an open commercial breach with France. Neither do I, but they would change the treaty if they had the power to do so, but they cannot change it without the consent of France. Under the French treaty, schedule E provides for intermediate tariff rates less a discount of 10 per cent of the amount of duty on certain articles entering Canada, mentioned in article 10; and schedule F provides for intermediate tariff rates less a discount of 15 per cent on the amount of duty on certain articles entering Canada, mentioned in article 11. All other articles from France enter Canada at intermediate tariff rates. The point we are making is that apart from the schedule of fixed rates, there is a large number of other items coming in at intermediate tariff rates and on which a discount of 10 and 15 per cent is given, and these rates we are now proposing to give to Czechoslovakia. I venture to say that outside perhaps of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance, and a few others who have given a close study to this subject, there is not a member of this house who understands the extent of the application of this treaty which we are being asked to pass to-day, and what I submit we ought to do is to take up our own tariff schedules item by item, and see just what the effect of this treaty will be.

I again draw the attention of the government to this fact. We had two schedules before on silk alone, and we spent hours and hours in this committee, and the tariff board, we were informed, also spent days and possibly weeks remodelling the silk schedules of the Canadian tariff for the purpose, I presume, of intelligent administration of that particular schedule. But this treaty wipes all that work out of existence; the silk schedule is wiped out so far as Czechoslovakia is concerned, and the treaty simply says that Czechoslovakia will export her silk to Canada under the French treaty rates, and the French treaty says simply "fabrics from silk up to 26 inches, so much."—just one sweeping item covering a dozen technical expressions that we have recently laboured over. Either this work that we have recently done is a joke, or else we should bring Czechoslovakia under the terms of that new schedule.

What I suggest to the minister is this, that in this treaty and in the case of every other treaty, we should exempt the specific French schedules. Let their goods come in under the most favoured nation clause, yes, where there is general treatment of those countries under our tariff laws; where we have the lowest tariff or the intermediate tariff or any other tariff, let us give it to these people, but when you include as you are doing here, the French specific schedules, I am opposed to that absolutely.

Mr. KAISER: The expression is frequently used in this bill, "any other foreign country.." While we readily understand that Australia, New Zealand and the West Indies are not foreign countries, this might not be the view of the statesmen of Czechoslavokia. What objection would there be to changing the words to "any other than a British country?"

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will observe that this agreement has been signed and submitted to the Czechoslovakian parliament; consequently we cannot change one word. But my hon. friend is in error in believing that the statesmen of other countries place upon the most favoured nation clause the interpretation which he has just given. It has been made perfectly clear to their representatives, and there is no misapprehension on their part as to what is meant. As to the argument of my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre with respect to the lower rates of duty accorded to Czechoslovakia by virtue of the French agreement, I have not any quarrel with his argument. All he has done recently has been to tell the people of Canada who sometimes complain that this government have not reduced duties to the extent expected—and I am talking more particularly of the people who support this government—that by our trade agreements with other countries we have materially reduced the customs duties on goods coming into this country. I am not backing away from that point. We have materially reduced the duties. When our friends quote the general tariff as the measure of protection, they are all wrong. The duties on most of the items imported are based on the British preference or on the trade agreements which we have made with other countries, and we have exposed our own industries—I admit it frankly—to keen competition with other countries throughout the world. That is the policy of the government and the policy of the Canadian people as determined at the polls. Just as soon as they decide for a higher tariff they will elect my hon. friends opposite to office.

Mr. STEVENS: Again the minister has wandered off into a side issue. He has not attempted to answer our contention that we are introducing into this treaty the full force and effect of the French treaty, which, according to his own statement, the government is desirous of amending.

Mr. ROBB: Revising.

Mr. STEVENS: Now I say to him, exclude the French treaty from this agreement. Then we will have something.

Mr. MALCOLM: My hon. friend from Vancouver Centre is altogether wrong in his interpretation of what the Minister of Finance pointed out. My colleague is not complaining of the preferential rates of duty given under the French treaty; he is complaining of the treatment France is according to our exports. There is no doubt that under the French treaty ninety-two articles get 10 per cent under the intermediate tariff, fifteen get 15 per cent, and thirty-one have a fixed rate of duty. That is admitted. Those same rates of duty will apply to Czechoslovakia under the terms of this convention. But my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) is mistaken when he says that every other trade treaty we may enter into will be dependent on the terms of the French treaty. The fact remains, however, that if by rearrangement with France those terms are removed from the French treaty, then also they are automatically removed from all our other trade treaties.

Mr. STEVENS: In the meantime they remain.

Mr. MALCOLM: Yes, until some rearrangement is made with France.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I never made any such statement as the minister attributes to me. I said then, and I repeat it now, that while you retain the French agreement as you have it to-day, what is the use bringing the other countries under the French arrangement? You are only making things worse by negotiating similar arrangements. If we make such a rearrangement with France as the minister suggests, the other countries with which we have trade agreements will accuse us of bad faith. Would it not be better to tell them now that we intend to change the French treaty, if that is the government's intention? We have heard it mooted around the house for some time, but you have not the nerve to do what you want to do. That is where the trouble is.

Section 1 agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Extension of advantage to the Czechoslovak republic.

Mr. STEVENS: This deals with the most favourable terms granted to any foreign power, and is recited in the schedule containing the treaty. Why is it inserted in the bill?

Mr. ROBB: It is the language drafted by the law officers.

Mr. STEVENS: Is it in the Italian treaty? I do not think it is in the other bills.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, in the convention with Italy the same language occurs.

Section 4 agreed to.

Section 5 agreed to.

On the schedule.

Mr. BENNETT: Were the plenipotentiaries appointed by His Majesty or by the Governor General?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: By His Majesty on the recommendation of the Canadian government.

Mr. STEVENS: In article 5 of the agreement set out in the schedule I find the following words:

> To enjoy the benefit of the tariff advantages provided for in the foregoing articles, without prejudice to the stipulations of article 4, and so on. That is a broad general article to which I and others have referred several times. Why are those words inserted there?

Mr. ROBB: It might change the conditions under which goods go through another country.

Mr. STEVENS: The clause provides that Czechoslovakia may have a port in a foreign country recognized if she has no port of her own. I understand that. But leaving that out of the question, why are the words "without prejudice to the stipulations of article 4" inserted in this particular article? My own opinion is that they could be left out without affecting the meaning of the clause, and their very presence indicates that there is something sacred about article 4, which is the article upon which we have based some of our criticism.

Mr. ROBB: They insist that they desire that concession. It was considered by the Justice department.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister has not apprehended the point. "Without prejudice to the stipulations of article 4" would seem to render nugatory the other provisions of the treaty. Article 4 provides for the most-favoured-nation treatment between two countries and article 5 provides the conditions to be observed if the benefits of the agreement are to be enjoyed. To enjoy those benefits it is provided that the goods shall go from a port of Czechoslovakia into a sea or river port of Canada. Incidentally, I wonder why "lake port" was left out? Is there any reason for its omission? But the point my hon. friend (Mr. Stevens) raises is this: the words "without prejudice to the stipulations of article 4" render the whole thing of no value at all. Of what value is it? I am sure the Minister of Trade and Commerce sees the point I am making. If article 4 provides, as it does, for the most-favoured-nation clause to be extended mutually, what is the necessity for these particular words I have quoted? Article 5 says that the goods shall go in such and such a way, and if they do not follow this course then the benefits to be derived from article 4 are not to be enjoyed. The minister has not explained the reason for the use of the words I have quoted. That is the first point. And the second point to be explained is the reason for the omission of lake ports.

Mr. ROBB: That is in order that the goods shall not come in by way of the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: But they could not come direct from the United States by way of a lake port. They could come to Toronto by a lake port; they could come to Ogdensburg. Montreal is probably a river port, but the ports beyond that are lake ports.

Mr. ROBB: It is the same as in the French treaty.

Mr. BENNETT: But two wrongs have never yet made a right. We have been trying this afternoon to convince the minister of that.

Mr. BOYS: I have been puzzling my brain to see what the effect of the words "without prejudice" and so on would be, but for the life of me I cannot. Will the minister explain the difference between the clause as it now stands and—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil): I shall have to call it six o'clock.

Mr. ROBB: I will consult the Justice department on the matter. In the meantime I will move that the committee rise and report progress.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

ELECTRICITY INSPECTION ACT

Hon. JAMES MALCOLM (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 36, to amend and revise the Electricity Inspection Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. MALCOLM: I think I should give a word of explanation now. When this bill was first drafted by the officers of the department, no thought was given to the fact that the national research council should set the standards of measurement for electricity and that the department should solely administer the act. That point was rightly raised in the house by the leader of the opposition, and immediately I called the officers of the department together as well as representatives of the Hydro Electric Commission, the chairman of the national research council and the officers of several of the power companies. The result was that these amendments which have been distributed were drafted to cover all the contentious points, and I think they will make the bill satisfactory to all the electrical interests in Canada.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Interpretation.

Mr. BENNETT: I was going to ask the minister whether or not with respect to many of these matters it might be possible to make the designation "in respect to", because there are certain things which are universal, and when I say that I mean they have been adopted generally in Europe and in America. The introduction of the national research council as the determining body would involve the necessity of repealing legislation in the event of that council being changed or passing out of existence, so it struck me that with respect to several of these matters we might use a term which has a world wide meaning through long usage and universal practice.

Mr. MALCOLM: In reply to my hon. friend I would say that this very point was discussed by the committee which revised the legislation, and I think there was unanimity of opinion in the matter.

Mr. STEVENS: To what committee does the minister refer?

Mr. MALCOLM: The committee of which I spoke, consisting of Mr. Dobson, of the Hydro Electric, Mr. Davies of the Southern Canada Power Company, Mr. Holder of the Shawinigan Company, who is also chairman of the Canadian Electrical Association, and Mr. Turley of the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company, together with the officers of the department and Dr. Tory of the national research council.

Mr. STEVENS: This is just the interpretation clause, but I would like to ask about the first subsection:

(a) "Broken seal" means a seal which has been rendered ineffective.

Is that the seal on the meter?

Mr. MALCOLM: It is intended to cover meter seals which do not seal. There were some seals which were not broken but which were not effective, and under this subsection if they are not effective they are deemed to be broken seals.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Unit of supply.

Mr. MALCOLM: I move that section 3 as it appears in the bill be struck out and that the following be substituted therefor:

The commercial unit of electrical supply shall be the kilowatt hour or such units based upon the units of electrical measure established by the Electrical Units Act as are determined by the national research council.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it necessary to add the last five words?

Mr. MALCOLM: Yes, I think so. That was one of the contentious clauses, and after a great deal of consultation this was finally passed and accepted by all the interests concerned.

Mr. BENNETT: I still think it would be better to stop with the words "Electrical Units Act". It is the old story; here is a body looking for something to do. I am sorry to put it that way, but the national research council should have nothing more to say about this work than a child on the street, and I am sure the minister will say that is so as a commercial proposition. He has provided that the unit shall be that established by the Electrical Units Act, and while that act may be settled in terms by the national research council there is no need to say they are the people who shall do it. I commend that point to the attention of the minister.

Mr. COOTE: I wonder if we could not persuade hon. members to speak a little louder, in order that we may hear them.

Mr. BENNETT: It is only a question of time until my hon. friend will move further up on this side of the house anyway.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MALCOLM: As hon. members will see by looking at the printed amendments, I move that the last sentence of section 6 be added as subsection (2) of section 3. This is as follows:

The certificate or statement of accuracy of the department of any electricity measuring instrument shall take precedence over any other certificate.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 5, subsection 1—Director.

Mr. MALCOLM: I beg to move the following amendment:

After the word "supervision" line 4, substitute for all the words thereafter in the subsection the following:—

"of all the work necessary to give effect to the provisions of this act and any regulations established thereunder in connection with the measurement of electricity for sale throughout Canada."

Mr. STEVENS: This act is highly technical, and it is very difficult for any of us to give intelligent criticism or consideration of it; we must trust very largely to the minister and to the committee which he says went over these proposed changes. I think it would be desirable if the minister would give the committee a brief summary of the reasons for this clause. Frankly I confess I have not had time to study it.

Mr. MALCOLM: This clause will now read:

There may be appointed for the purpose of this act a director, together with such assistants as may be deemed necessary by the head of the department. Such director shall have the direction and general supervision of all the work necessary to give effect to the provisions of this act and any regulations established thereunder in connection with the measurement of electricity for sale throughout Canada.

That gives to the director full authority for the administration of the act.

Mr. BENNETT: This means a new job, I suppose.

Mr. MALCOLM: No, no.

Mr. BOYS: Reference is made to the head of the department. Is that the minister?

Mr. MALCOLM: No, the director.

Mr. KENNEDY: As far as I can see this motion strikes out the old part of the act which calls for the appointment of officers that have passed the qualifying technical examination to be held under the direction of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MALCOLM: No. Subsection 2 is not deleted. It stands as it is.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 6—Validity of certificate.

Mr. MALCOLM: I move that section 6 be deleted.

Mr. COOTE: Where is the deletion?

Mr. MALCOLM: It is now embodied in section 3 by the amendment of subsection 2 of section 3.

Mr. STEVENS: Just what is the significance of this sentence:

The certificate or statement of accuracy of the department of any electricity measuring instrument shall take precedence over any other certificate.

What is the object of that?

Mr. MALCOLM: The department will then have definite authority for creating a standard by which electricity shall be measured, and it shall take precedence over any over device which may be introduced.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The purpose of this bill is to regulate to a certain extent the sale of electricity. Is there any provision in it which declares, for instance, what peak shall be used?

Mr. MALCOLM: No.

Mr. CHAPLIN: You do not say anything about that.

Mr. MALCOLM: No.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Why? If you are going to regulate the sale of electricity do you not need to provide whether the sale is to be on a minute peak or a twenty-minute peak?

Mr. MALCOLM: No, that is outside the jurisdiction of this act entirely. This act only relates to inspection of meters and the measurement of elecricity. We are setting a standard for the measurement of electricity. This does not affect the regulation of the sale in any way, only the measurement of the electricity when sold. That is the purpose of the act.

Mr. MANION: Are there any provincial acts dealing with the questions dealt with under this act?

Mr. MALCOLM: This is a matter of federal jurisdiction and always has been. It applies to measurement throughout the whole Dominion.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I would refer the minister to the last four words "over any other certificate". What does that refer to?

Mr. MALCOLM: Some power company might question the unit we use to measure electricity. For instance the Montreal Light, Heat & Power Company might have a unit for testing their own meters. The departmental inspectors must have some authority over all other devices that may be introduced. In case of controversy the devices accepted by the department must be considered as superior to all other devices.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The only objection is that one of these companies may have an up-to-date instrument.

Mr. BOYS: Does this mean that the government standard will have precedence in the courts, or where?

Mr. MALCOLM: Anywhere.

Mr. BOYS: This would practically set at naught every possible means of getting evidence contrary to the dictum of the departmental official.

[Mr. Malcolm.]

Mr. MALCOLM: My hon. friend will realize that this is the principle which has always been followed. The decision of the department must govern in deciding whether or not measures are honest.

Mr. BOYS: But this is going a long way. You could not even show whether the government standard was wrong, and it may be wrong. I am not saying that the officers of the department are inefficient at all or that the instruments are not up-to-date; but to pass a section of this kind without any possibility of relief is certainly going a very long way.

Mr. MALCOLM: I think my hon. friend understands that there must be a primary standard of measurement, just as there is a standard of length, and the standard that is set up by the department for the inspection of instruments must be accepted as the standard for Canada and must take precedence.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 8: Inspection standards.

Mr. MALCOLM: I beg to move that the following be added:

Such standards shall conform to primary standards which shall be determined by the national research council under the authority of the Research Council Act.

Mr. STEVENS: What about section 7?

The CHAIRMAN: Section 7 was deleted.

Mr. STEVENS: It takes a motion to delete.

The CHAIRMAN: I put the motion.

Mr. STEVENS: I did not hear it. We were on section 6. I was going to ask the minister what was the object in deleting section 7.

Mr. MALCOLM: Section 7 gave to the minister authority to set the standards of regulation. That is deleted from the act, and the setting of standards is left to the national research council.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the motion to delete section 7 carry?

Motion agreed to.

On section 8.

The CHAIRMAN: The minister moves that the following sentence be added:

Such standards shall conform to primary standards which shall be determined by the national research council under the authority of the Research Council Act.

Mr. MALCOLM: I may explain to the committee that the Research Council Act gives the council authority to set standards for measurement.

Mr. BENNETT: The research council consists in part of laymen and in part of trained scientists. Such a bureau of standards would not be regarded as of much value in the United States, and certainly would not in Europe. I have a very warm friend who is a member of the research council.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. BENNETT: I said that the bureau of standards, which is now under our national research council—

Mr. MALCOLM: It is not set up yet.

Mr. BENNETT: But it determines standards. There are on that body some gentlemen who are delightful persons and excellent business men, but I should not set them up as being able to determine what our standards of measurement for electricity should be. I fear the minister has once more permitted the ideas of a few people to overrule his better judgment. We should determine in this statute what a kilowatt is; we have it defined in the Electrical Units Act, and we should not say that the Electrical Units Act is going to be determined by one or two men.

Mr. MALCOLM: No.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what it says. It says that the national research council is going to do this. That is my difficulty, and it runs through the whole bill. Is it not the old, old story? There is a gentleman, nameless now and forever more, who fancies himself as being an authority; he is to be made the head of a particular branch of something and every bit of legislation is to be submitted to him. He fills his name in somewhere—I do not mean as Jim Jones or John Smith, but he fills it in in such a way as to make some work for himself. I am borne out by my own observation and experience as to where these things lead. The minister, a commercial man of great repute, knows that if you employ a person or give him a title in your business he starts in for the first six months to make himself a job. He adds to the work which he has to do, and he defines it. It becomes a constant effort on his part to draw to himself this jurisdiction. I think this is all wrong.

Mr. MALCOLM: I can reply to my hon. friend in this way. I think he is making a mistake in assuming that the national research council are trying to take to themselves authority which they do not possess. It is because I intend to set up under the national research council a bureau of standards to determine electrical units that this clause is inserted in the act. At the moment the bureau of standards is not in existence.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly.

Mr. MALCOLM: The legislation could be worded:

It shall be determined by the bureau of standards under the national research council.

There is no particular objection to that. But the bureau of standards is to be set up almost immediately, so that we shall have Canadian standards and not be dependent upon laboratories in Chicago. By this legislation I am taking away from the department and from the authority of the minister the power of determining standards and putting it under the national research council, so that the body which they create, namely, the bureau of standards, may determine the standards for the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: My point is that we should set up the bureau of standards.

Mr. MALCOLM: Possibly we may do that.

Mr. STEVENS: There seems to be an anomaly in this legislation. I am endeavouring to read the amendments together with the effect of the deletions from the bill and so on. Clause 7 which deals with standards is deleted, I understand?

Mr. MALCOLM: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: And a substitute clause is suggested for clause 8?

Mr. MALCOLM: There is an addition to clause 8. One must read the two together.

Mr. STEVENS: Clause 8 reads:

Such standards shall conform to primary standards—

Mr. MALCOLM: "Which shall be determined."

Mr. STEVENS: What are described as "such standards" are those referred to in the deleted clause 7?

Mr. MALCOLM: Exactly.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, clause 7 having been deleted, where are the standards to which "such standards" refer? That is my difficulty. By deleting the clause you eliminate these standards.

Mr. MALCOLM: Clause 7 deals with primary standard. Clause 8 covers the standards by which the officials work. Clause 8 as amended reads:

All instruments and measuring apparatus required for electricity inspection shall be supplied by the department: they shall be designated inspection standards and shall bear the imprint or nameplate of the department. Such standards shall conform to primary standards which shall be determined by the National Research Council under the authority of the Research Council Act.

Mr. STEVENS: In my opinion it does not read well even at that.

Mr. MALCOLM: I think it reads very well.

Mr. STEVENS: In clause 8 you are referring not to standards but to instruments.

Mr. MALCOLM: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: But the clause referring to standards is clause 7 which is being deleted.

Mr. MALCOLM: Quite so.

Mr. STEVENS: It may be right, but I cannot see it.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): What will be the routine in regard to inspection?

Mr. MALCOLM: Just the same as it is now. Our regular officers will do their inspection work as they are doing to-day.

Mr. COOTE: Are other weights and measures to be placed under the research council.

Mr. MALCOLM: Is the hon. member referring to the Inspection of Weights and Measures Act?

Mr. COOTE: All our weights and measures. I am endeavouring to find out why this is being placed under the research council unless other weights and measures are also placed under them.

Mr. MALCOLM: I think my hon. friend and every other hon. gentleman present realise that weights and measures are time-known standards and the standards which we use for weights and measures are in the department and are not subject to controversy or question. The measurement and inspection of electricity are subject to a good deal of alteration from time to time and the standards may change. Therefore that is being left to the new bureau of standards which, is being created under the national research council.

Mr. COOTE: It seems to me that the logical thing would be for the department to maintain this power of fixing standards and to let them have the advice of the national research council or the bureau of standards. Why this should be turned over to the research council is more than I can understand.

Mr. MALCOLM: I endeavoured to explain the matter to my hon. friend, but I may not have made myself entirely clear. We are proposing to set up in the Dominion of Canada a bureau of standards which will be the creature of the national research council. The bureau of standards for the Dominion of Canada will be acceptable to all provincial governments, all power companies, all hydro-electric municipally-owned corporations, and it will be able to confer and consult and endeavour to make a standard for Canadian and British equipment for ourselves, so that the Dominion will not be dependent upon standards set by some foreign laboratory. That is the very purpose of a bureau of standards in the Dominion. As the situation stands to-day, if electrical equipment is imported from another country for use in Canada, it first must pass the fire underwriters' laboratories in Chicago or it cannot be used in building construction. That is a situation which I do not think is desirable in regard to equipment of Canadian manufacture or equipment imported from countries other than the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: That is an underwriters' requirement.

Mr. MALCOLM: Yes. If a fuse plug or switch or anything required for use in Canada is purchased in Great Britain or on the continent or made in Canada, the underwriters demand that it be passed by a Chicago laboratory. We shall not have that condition of things when we have this bureau of standards, because the underwriters will have to accept their standards.

Mr. COOTE: All I say is that the bureau should be subject to some governmental authority and the department might very well have the advice of the bureau in fixing these standards. The minister is going to create this bureau and give them an absolutely free hand to do what they like with regard to the measurement of electricity. There is no governmental control whatever.

Mr. STEVENS: Clause 8 in my estimation will not accomplish what the minister has in mind. I am quite in favour of the idea of setting up a national standard in Canada, but I cannot see how under section 8 even the national research council is empowered to set up these standards. That, I think, should be done under an act which will set up and define the powers of a bureau of standards. All that this section does is to refer to certain instruments and measuring apparatus, and it concludes with the words, "Such standards shall conform to primary standards which shall be determined."

Mr. MALCOLM: That section is taken from the authority which the national research council now has under the National Research Council Act. I will pass over to my hon. friend a copy of the act.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Is the minister assured that the underwriters' association will be forced to accept the standards that are set up?

Mr. MALCOLM: My hon. friend realizes, of course, that there will have to be empowering legislation by the provinces, but when we have a Dominion bureau of standards set up, I think the provinces will want to accept its standards. I do not mind telling my hon. friend that at the Dominion-provincial conference, the provincial premiers were in favour of the creation of a bureau of standards. They suggested that it would be a very desirable body to establish in Canada, so I think all the provincial governments will avail themselves of the services of the Dominion bureau of standards.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): It will be almost useless unless the bureau includes electricity and gas, and have the standards of both electricity and gas measured by the one inspector instead of having one inspector for gas and another for electricity.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Will this bureau have to do with anything else besides electricity?

Mr. MALCOLM: I am not in a position to go into full detail on that question, but the bureau of standards will, I believe, cover practically every standard of measurement. To go into the full scope of the bureau of standards at Washington, for instance, would take some time, and I am not conversant enough with it to explain it in full detail, but it does cover a very wide range of standards in other things than electricity.

Mr. CANTLEY: What is the necessity for amending the act at this time? Why not wait until you get your bureau of standards in existence and working?

Mr. MALCOLM: Amendment of the act has been urged now for two or three years. The act has been under discussion for three sessions, but action has been deferred until we felt we were within reasonable approach of having everything arranged agreeably to the various interests concerned.

Mr. CANTLEY: Why not hold it back another year until you have your bureau of standards established, and we can then deal with the matter intelligently?

Mr. DUNNING: The minister has asked me to read the explanation on the opposite page defining the powers of the research council, as it is in fine print, although I do not know that my eyes are any better than his. These are the powers of the research council:

To undertake in such way as may be deemed advisable.

(iv) the investigation and determination of standards and methods of measurements, including length, volume, weight, mass, capacity, time, heat, light, electricity, magnetism and other forms of energy; and the determination of physical constants and the fundamental properties of matter.

Mr. STEVENS That seems broad enough.

Mr. DUNNING: It seems so.

Section agreed to.

Section 9 agreed to.

On section 10—Verification.

Mr. MALCOLM: I move to strike out the words "and sealed or stamped" in lines 4 and 5.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 11—Approval of type.

Mr. MALCOLM: I beg to move to substitute the words "national research council" for the word "minister" in line 3.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Surely the minister must have some responsibility in the matter. He cannot put all the responsibility on the council. They report to him, but surely he must be responsible to parliament.

Mr. DUNNING: It is a purely scientific matter that is dealt with here.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not purely scientific, if I may say so without being arbitrarily contradictory. Suppose your bureau of standards sets up the metric system in this country; are we bound by it? Think what power you are giving to a body of men who are not responsible to parliament. The point of the hon. member for East Calgary is that this government must assume the responsibility. According to what has been said by the minister, the bureau might, without any more ado, set up the metric system in Canada, using hectometers, decameters, kilometers, centimeters and various other units of measurement under the metric system. Is it intended to give that power to this body of men? Surely not. I think the minister will agree that that is too dangerous a power to entrust to a body not responsible to parliament. Perhaps they will introduce the soviet form of measurement, which consists in measuring my necessities by another man's opportunities. The Minister of Railways has just read, in fine print, that this body is able to deal with large questions. While the Minister of Trade and Commerce is able to see only out of the small end of the telescope, the Minister of Railways, being able to see out of the large, is able to determine their powers with very much more astuteness than his colleague. I think the point made by the hon. member for East Calgary is a sound one, and that you should not entrust to a body not responsible to parliament the power to change our whole system of measurements.

Mr. MALCOLM: The weights and measures of the things he refers to are now statutory under the Weights and Measures Act, and the council could not change them.

Mr. BENNETT: But seeing through the large end of the telescope, the Minister of Railways said that they had power to do these things.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): If this bill gives power to any outside body to change the standards in this country, I suggest to the minister that he proceed very carefully. It is not often that I find myself in agreement with the leader of the opposition, but I do not think it is good practice to set up some body and then say that they may do what they will. It does seem to me that it would be better for us first to decide what we want, and then we could have the advice of the council, but let the final determination of the matter be with parliament. I should like the minister to consider that phase of the question.

Mr. MANION: I must disagree with my fellow members on this matter, for I think we should take this from the authority and responsibility of the government. The more affairs we take from the authority and responsibility of this government the better it will be for the country.

Mr. STEVENS: I take second place to no one in this house in advocacy of the inauguration at the earliest possible date of a bureau of standards. I have had the idea under consideration for a good many years, I have consistently supported it, and will welcome the establishment of such a bureau. But I think we are going too far in handing over to the research council power to change our system of measurement.

Mr. MALCOLM: We cannot do that.

Mr. STEVENS: I am under the impression that that would be the effect of this clause. In any case I submit that it will not lessen the influence and authority of the research council if the final determination is still left with the minister. The council will in a sense work under the control of the department only to the extent of its final determination with respect to any given problem. I ask the minister to give this further consideration.

Mr. MALCOLM: This is only bringing the act into line with the powers now possessed by the national research council, as the committee will see by referring to the second page of the proposed amendments, clause (v) of section 10:

> The standardization and certification of the scientific and technical apparatus and instruments for the government service and for use in the industries of Canada, and the determination of the standards of quality of the materials used in the construction of public works and of the supplies used in the various branches of the government service.

And clause (iv) preceding provides for the investigation and determination of standards, and so on. But all the standards as to weights and measures are now determined by parliament under the Weights and Measures Act.

Mr. COOTE: Why depart from that principle in connection with electricity? We can use the bureau of standards to advise the government as to the proper standards under the act for measuring electricity, but surely the minister responsible to this parliament should have the final determination. I do not think we should set up any bureau to absolutely fix these standards; but this appears to be the intention of the bill.

Mr. MALCOLM: It is not a case of setting up standards for weights and measures, but of standardizing scientific apparatus to measure electricity. The creation of this apparatus has to be under some central authority. In the United States it is under the bureau of standards. We propose that it shall be under our bureau of standards, which is part of the national research council, which, in turn, is subject to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. There is no more likelihood of the council attempting to change any standard of measurement than of parliament seeking to alter the existing system. It should be realized that meters which are permitted to enter Canada from various foreign countries must be inspected to see that they conform with our standards. The minister's approval would be purely nominal; naturally he would approve of the standard set by his own inspectors. Therefore the approval of these meters might just as well be vested in the national research council as in the minister.

Mr. ADSHEAD: But I do not think that the entire responsibility should be placed on the bureau of standards; it should be absolutely subject to the approval of the minister.

Mr. MALCOLM: The bureau of standards is under the minister's department, and he must take full responsibility for its work.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 12.—Sealing of meters.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 12 is to be inserted as subsection (2) of section 10.

Mr. MALCOLM: Without change.

Mr. STEVENS: In the previous clause you are making the apparatus subject to the approval of the national research council; in this section we have these words:

—with the exception of such meters as may be approved by the minister for use unsealed.

Why the inconsistency?

Mr. MALCOLM: I must confess that the explanation given to me by the officer of the department is not entirely satisfactory. He says there are certain types of meters which cannot be sealed, forming an exception that the minister should deal with.

Mr. STEVENS: That would never do.

Mr. MALCOLM: I have no objection whatever to make it coincide with the other section, and will move an amendment accordingly.

Mr. STEVENS: I think the minister would be well advised. For instance, section 11 reads:

No meter shall be admitted to verification in Canada until the type of meter to which it belongs has received the approval of the national research council.

Having passed that section, we are assuming that it is necessary for the welfare of this country that the national research council shall approve of such meters. But in the very next section we undo the whole business by allowing the minister or his inspector to admit certain meters.

Mr. BENNETT: Is not this the explanation? The officers of the department realize that that form of meter—a gas meter—should be in the hands of the minister, and that the electricity meter should be in the hands of the research council.

Mr. MALCOLM: I move that the word "minister" in section 12—which now becomes subsection (2) of section 10—be struck out and the words, "national research council" substituted therefor.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 13.—Re-verification of meters.

Mr. MALCOLM: No change.

Mr. STEVENS: It looks to me as if this clause is open to the same criticism as the last:

Within six years or such periods as the governor in council may determine from each verification and sealing

And so on. Is that the same principle with which we have dealt in the other two clauses, on which we place this determining power with the research council?

Mr. MALCOLM: The power companies and those selling electricity wanted to fix a ten-year period and we insisted in our negotiations on a period of six years. They felt that they could do better with the governor in council, in their representations for a longer period, than they could if they went to the research council. We have left it with the governor in council to make any change.

Mr. BENNETT: A frank explanation.

Mr. MALCOLM: That is the real story. The power companies wanted a longer term, but we insisted on five years, plus the twelve months' leeway.

Mr. BENNETT: I had occasion once to have meters investigated, and certainly the life of the modern meter is not six years. Under the statute as it stands the period is fixed at six years.

Mr. MALCOLM: Not necessarily.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, practically.

Mr. MALCOLM: If there is no complaint.

Mr. BENNETT: But the difficulty is in the small consumer being able to make complaints effectively. This matter is one that affects every householder in every city in Canada; that must not be forgotten. This is probably the most far-reaching piece of legislation we have dealt with in this house, for it touches every house in which gas is consumed and electricity used for any purpose, and it also affects every factory in which electrical power is employed. That being so, the power companies will steadily contend that the life of a meter is quite considerable, although in actual practice this has not been found to be the case. No doubt the minister has had occasion to ascertain this as well as any other person. Let me ask him this: Is it just right to say that the governor in council shall have power to extend the lives of these meters?

Mr. MALCOLM: We will not extend the inspection period; it is the other way.

Mr. BENNETT: Or shall he have power to shorten them? Should it not be left to some scientific body that has the facilities to make the necessary investigations to decide the question? Should it not read, "Upon the report of the research council?" Otherwise it leaves it open to the very objection which my hon. friend urges, that they can do better with the governor in council than they can in negotiations with the research council. That, I thought, was the frankest explanation ever given by any minister. It means that the political power is stronger than the scientific, which unfortunately we have all found to be the case. Is it not desirable in some way to protect the existing standards? As an hon. member was referring to the sections and the minister was making his explanation, I recalled to my hon. friend (Mr. Stevens)—not as part of the discussion—the fact that after all the Chicago standards are probably the best electrical standards in the world.

Mr. MALCOLM: And probably will be adopted.

Mr. BENNETT: In the United States 110,000,000 people are using electricity to an extent never known before, and there is no reason why we should not adopt those standards. Why should our people be put to the trouble and expense that might be involved in view of this declaration that only these certificates are to be valid? All these Chicago meters will be affected unless we protect them by some legislation; otherwise we shall not have protected the people. My hon. friend from Saskatoon will agree with me in this respect. We must not overlook the amount of money put up by people in securing these meters in the first instance, because they must make a deposit; and that, coupled with the effect which these certificates will have in evidence, suggests that the matter may become of considerable importance as the legislation now reads.

Mr. MALCOLM: My hon. friend is under a false impression as regards what I said. The inspection of meters is entirely under the department while the setting of standards is left with the research council. No one knows better whether meters are up to standard, than do our own inspectors, who frequently report to the department administering the act. The power companies felt that the bureau of standards might demand an inspection which was not justified and which the experience of our own inspectors did not warrant. We contended that a six-year period was long enough, strict as we are regarding the type of meter that may be used in Canada for the protection of the purchaser; and the experience of the department has shown that this period is fair. The power companies, as I say, wanted a longer period and they felt that probably if the matter went to the research council that body might arbitrarily demand a shorter period while, if it were left to the department, the finding of the inspectors who have supervision of meters from day to day would be safest in their own interest as well as in the interest of the department. Being purely a matter of administration, it is just as well left with the department.

Mr. STEVENS: There is to my mind a distinct menace in this clause. I think we ought to fix in the act a standard period, whether it be six years or ten years. We should fix it definitely.

Mr. MALCOLM: We have it fixed at six years.

Mr. STEVENS: Those who drafted the bill have left it to the governor in council to decide, let us say in the case of the Hydro-Electric of Ontario, that their meters may be inspected within a period of ten years.

Mr. MALCOLM: My hon. friend is mistaken.

Mr. STEVENS: I hope I am.

Mr. MALCOLM: The clause provides for inspection within six years or within such period as the governor in council may determine. We might find that the meters have to be inspected oftener. We wanted to change the period to five years, to-day it is five years plus twelve months leeway, which makes it practically six years. We do not intend to make it longer.

Mr. STEVENS: If that is the object then let us state it definitely. In cases where in its opinion, on the advice of the chief inspector, it is thought desirable that meters should be inspected within a shorter period, let us enact that the governor in council may have power so to order. But as the clause now reads the governor in council may extend the period as it sees fit in respect of any company. That may not be the intention, but that is the power which we are conferring.

Mr. MALCOLM: Within six years.

Mr. STEVENS: "Or such periods as the governor in council may determine": that to my mind is where the faulty drafting of the clause comes in. I have no objection to the minister's interpretation, but I object to the way the clause is drafted.

Mr. MALCOLM: I think my hon. friend is mistaken; the bill is fairly clear.

Mr. ARTHURS: I suggest the words "or such shorter period". That being evidently the intention, why not so state?

Mr. COOTE: The point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre is well taken. The governor in council could make it longer than six years, if the clause were enacted as it stands.

Mr. MALCOLM: The government has that power, but at the present time we will not increase the period. The inspector's report that, the existing equipment for measurement of electricity being as it is, a six-year period is long enough, and at the moment we refuse to make it longer. I am not saying that in ten years' time, or later, equipment may not be produced and put into general use justifying, say, seven years. At the moment, however, the six-year period is the standard which, on the advice of our own inspectors, we consider satisfactory. We are therefore leaving it with the governor in council, as time goes on, either to extend or to shorten the period. At the present time, however, it certainly will not be extended.

Mr. McGIBBON: Is the minister convinced that six years is not too long?

Mr. MALCOLM: Our inspectors recommend that as the correct period, and it has been in force for some years.

Mr. McGIBBON: Has it not been the experience of every person who has had anything to do with these matters that that is too long?

Mr. MALCOLM: I think not.

Mr. ARTHURS: I think the minister would be well advised to make six years the extreme limit, and to put the word "lesser" before the word "periods" in the first line. It is easy to change the act if you get better meters than you have at present, and in the meantime the consumer has to pay.

Mr. STEVENS: Not very long ago I sent a letter to the minister which I received from a gentleman whom I do not know personally, but who wrote to me very pointedly with regard to this very question. He found that his consumption of electricity, according to his meter, had doubled or trebled, and he insisted that he was not using any more power. As a matter of fact he felt that he was using less electricity, because as his bill mounted he became more careful in his use of electrical energy. I have forgotten the figures, but his bill had doubled or trebled within a few years, and he complained that the meter had not been and was not being properly inspected. I do not know whether he was right or wrong, but that illustrates this point. Obviously it is the duty of parliament and of the government to keep a very strict control over the inspection of meters, and I submit to the minister that it would be advisable to fix in this statute a maximum period. The six years is a minimum period, as the minister has admitted.

Mr. MALCOLM: There is no minimum; you can ask for inspection by the inspectors of the Dominion government a month after the installation of the meter, if it is not satisfactory. This is the longest period for which meters may remain without inspection.

Mr. STEVENS: But the governor in council may say that it shall be longer.

Mr. MALCOLM: That does not remove the right of an individual to apply for inspection.

Mr. STEVENS: That is true, but there must be nearly a million meters in use in Canada to-day, and most people are not competent to judge whether their meter is accurate or inaccurate. Consequently there are very few applications for inspection; the people trust the department, and it is the duty of the department to look after these meters. My point is that this six year period should be the fixed statutory maximum; if it is not long enough make it longer, but give the governor in council power to call for a shorter period if it is considered desirable. I agree with the suggestion of the hon. member for Parry Sound, that the phrase should be "such lesser period" in the first line.

Mr. BRADY: I would like to ask the minister whether it is compulsory to use watt hour meters exclusively in Canada, or whether ampere hour meters are permitted, as is the case in Great Britain, Germany and other countries?

Mr. MALCOLM: The use of ampere hour meters is permitted, and they are being used very generally through the west to-day.

Mr. McGIBBON: I would like to support the suggestion of the hon. member for Parry Sound, because we must go on the hypothesis that in most cases the user of electricity has no idea whether his meter is correct or incorrect. He depends on the inspector to give him a correct reading, and I think six years is too long a period to let a meter go without inspection.

Mr. ARTHURS: In order to bring up the matter for discussion I would move that the word "lesser" be inserted before the word "periods" in the first line of section 13 of the act. I believe this is the intention of the minister; I think he will agree that six years is the longest period for which a meter is reliable, and this amendment will give the governor in council power to extend that period indefinitely if it is found desirable to do so. We are only seeking to make six years the maximum period which will prevail.

Mr. MALCOLM: I would like to point out to my hon. friend that while we have been discussing the inaccuracy of meters, during the inspections which took place last year 158,000 meters were accepted as being not over 3 per cent fast, which is the standard; that is as close as they can be regulated. There were 47,800 meters accepted as not being over 3 per cent slow; 672 were rejected as over 3 per cent fast and 991 as being over 3 per cent slow. So in the last year our inspectors tested 200,000 meters, of which only about 1,600 were found to be over 3 per cent slow or fast, and of those which were over the standard more were slow than were fast. So it will be seen that the meters in use to-day are a great deal more accurate than those we had ten years ago, and as the days go by we receive fewer complaints.

Mr. ARTHURS: At that rate it would take about twelve years to inspect all the meters in use in Canada at present.

Mr. MALCOLM: Oh, no.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. McGIBBON: May I ask if those figures include the meters which have been tested individually in the municipalities by the local inspectors, who have found them to be defective?

Mr. MALCOLM: Those are the meters which were inspected by the government.

Mr. McGIBBON: Then I would draw attention to the fact that there are a good many meters in every municipality, in Ontario at least, which are taken out and tested by the local engineer and which are found to be defective but which are not inspected by the government men.

Mr. COOTE: I wonder if the minister would tell us how often scales must be inspected?

Mr. MALCOLM: I will be glad to discuss that question when we consider the estimates having to do with the Weights and Measures Act.

Mr. COOTE: I was just asking for information; I thought it might help us now if we had a fixed period within which scales must be inspected.

Mr. MALCOLM: Scales are not sealed.

Mr. STEVENS: This section says "in accordance with regulations made by the minister." Is that what is intended?

Mr. MALCOLM: Yes. That is a departmental matter, having to do with administration.

On section 15.—Right to break seal.

Mr. MALCOLM: As an amendment to this section I move that the words "except as may be provided for by regulation of the department" be added to the last sentence.

Sections 16 to 22 inclusive agreed to.

On section 23—Test of voltage and frequency.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to ask the minister what the word "contractor" means in this section? It is set out in the interpretation act that it includes a municipal or government corporation like the Hydro-Electric Commission of Ontario which is generating electricity and distributing it to the public at cost. The department is deriving a quarter of a million dollars a year from the operation of this act. The hydro is actually placed in the same position, although it is selling electricity at cost, as a private company which is selling electricity to the public and making a profit of it. There should be a distinction between a public and a private utility. The hydro should be exempt from charges under this act. My opinion is that this parliament has no control over the Ontario Hydro-Electric Commission, as it is a provincial government property and undertaking and work. There have been some decisions to support my view on this point, with respect to taxation of a provincial government work or undertaking. Is this act intra vires as applied to the hydro? I was told in 1923 that the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act was intra vires and had to go to the Privy Council to upset it. The sections of this bill to which I take particular objection are sections 23 and 24, as to who a contractor is and to whom this act applies. I have no objection to the application of the provisions of these sections to privately-owned companies, but it is a different matter when it comes to public utilities owned by the provinces and municipalities, and operating at cost. The bulk of the revenue received under this act—about sixty per cent of it—comes from the province of Ontario, and it is an imposition to take nearly $10,000 a year out of the publicly-owned system of Toronto for meter tests alone. Any meters used for electrical purposes should be manufactured in Canada and foreign companies forced to establish branches here. If the minister wants to accomplish a useful work let him insist that the American and German owners of meters and other electrical devices establish branch factories in Canada. That policy will result in providing more work in this country, and will supplement what the Hydro-Electric has been doing along this line in Ontario. The hydro-electric of Ontario has done much for that province through its developments at Niagara and in the northern parts of the province, and this government must be hard pressed for revenue when it taxes the hydro-electric such large sums for meter testing. Besides, the hydro was taxed in customs duties nearly two millions during the war while construction was proceeding in connection with Niagara hydro development, and that amount should now be refunded. Surely some distinction should be made between a publicly-owned utility which develops electricity and sells it at cost and a privately-owned company operated for profit. Representations along this line have been made for years, but without result, as to reducing hydro meter testing to a nominal sum. I have no doubt what the issue would be if the matter were taken to the courts as I have indicated. In my opinion it would be declared that the federal parliament has no power to tax a publicly-owned undertaking such as the hydro-electric of Ontario, which is the property of the province and municipalities. I have no doubt the minister contends that he is giving this service at cost, but he is including in the expenditure for this particular inspection a lot of things that should not appear there, such as salaries, fuel, furniture, and the like, of the head office at Ottawa. I think the government might be better employed than by invading the sphere of activity of provincial property such as the hydro-electric of Ontario and imposing such a heavy burden on the public who get the benefit of power at cost as against private companies that pay dividends and issue millions of common stock of no par value.

Mr. MALCOLM: My hon. friend seems to be labouring under a false impression with regard to this. The clause would certainly have to include everyone selling electric current, whether it be the Hydro-Electric of Ontario, the light, heat and power company of Montreal, or the muncipality of Ottawa. You cannot differentiate between the contractor who is selling electric current as a publicly-owned utility and the one who is selling it as a privately-owned utility.

Mr. BENNETT: We are protecting the consumer.

Mr. MALCOLM: As the leader of the opposition says, we are protecting the consumer and many Ontario hydro-electric municipalities want this inspection of their meters. The cost of inspection is very low and the hydro-electric engineer, I may tell my hon. friend, was here and assisted in drafting the legislation so that my hon. friend's point is not at all well taken.

Section agreed to.

On section 24—Inspection fees.

Mr. BOYS: Will the minister give the committee some idea of the fees being paid? Is there a distinction between the fee charged for an inspection which the department requires to be made within six years and the fee for what is called a disputed meter test made pursuant to clause 20? If so, what is the charge under clause 20? Because the person who turns out to be wrong as to the operation of the meter is the one who has to bear the expense of the inspection?

Mr. MALCOLM: I might give my hon. friend the list of meters inspected under the various classes. The fee for inspection of class 1 meter, which is most generally in use, is sixty cents.

Mr. BOYS: That is the ordinary household meter?

Mr. MALCOLM: Yes. That works out at about one-half of a cent a month on a six-year period. For class 2 meter, a higher voltage meter, of which 49,000 were inspected, the fee is seventy-five cents; for class 3 meter, of which 3,400 were inspected, the fee is $1.50, and for class 4 meter, which is a very large meter for a high-powered station, and of which only thirty-three were inspected, the fee is $5.

Mr. BOYS: The minister has not directed himself to the other branch of my question.

Mr. MALCOLM: There is no difference in the charge whether the inspection is asked for or not.

Mr. BOYS: In other words, if a purchaser desires a meter tested for his own protection and asks for a test, those are the fees he has to pay.

Mr. MALCOLM: If the meter is correct.

Mr. BOYS: If that is the case, I think that fee is very moderate. If the meter is not correct, the fee would be the same?

Mr. MALCOLM: If the meter is not correct the contractor pays the fee.

Mr. BOYS: Yes, but what does he pay?

Mr. MALCOLM: Sixty cents.

Mr. BOYS: In other words, the expense of the inspector in going from the nearest point at which he resides to the place of residence of the user of the meter or anything of that kind is not added?

Mr. MALCOLM: No.

Mr. BOYS: There is no question that under that an ordinary householder for sixty cents can satisfy himself as to the accuracy of his meter?

Mr. MALCOLM: Yes.

Mr. BOYS: That would seem to be a moderate charge.

On section 31—For installing unverified meters.

Mr. MALCOLM: I move to strike out the word "or" between the words "stamp" and "issues" and substitute therefor the word "and" in paragraph (c) of section 31, so that it will read:

Not being an inspector, seals or stamps and issues a certificate.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 32 and 33 agreed to.

On section 34—Procedure.

Mr. BOYS: I am by no means sure that this is quite as complete as it should be. I observe that there are two forums under which a prosecution may take place. One is before any justice of the peace where the penalty does not exceed twenty-five dollars, and the other is before any two justices of the peace where the penalty exceeds twenty-five dollars. There are in some municipalities, in Ontario at all events, police magistrates who I am by no means certain are justices of the peace. I think their commissions are given to them as police magistrates. If I am right in that—and I think I am—you would not have any opportunity of proceeding before the only tribunal now in existence in practically all the towns of Ontario and possibly other provinces. In my own town you never see a justice of the peace presiding now; he is a thing of the past. There are police magistrates appointed for various districts of the county and they sit as such. If in their appointment they are not described as justices of the peace they would not have jurisdiction to proceed under this clause. I suggest that a provision be inserted in the clause that police magistrates as well as these officers have jurisdiction; and the police magistrates would have to have jurisdiction as regards penalties under twenty-five dollars as well as over twenty-five dollars.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There can be no question that a police magistrate should have the same power that a justice of the peace has. Speaking from memory and offhand I think there is in the criminal code a clause which gives to every police magistrate the same power as that of two justices of the peace. It would seem advisable to permit him to exercise that jurisdiction in this particular case unless it be covered by the general clause in the code, and I think it is covered.

Mr. BOYS: There is not the slightest doubt about what the minister says regarding the criminal code, but the jurisdiction given under this legislation is being given apart entirely from the criminal code. The fact that a police magistrate has certain powers under the criminal code does not give him those powers under this legislation. I am just mentioning the fact: I think the objection is worthy of consideration, and the minister should look into it.

Mr. MALCOLM: I have no particular knowledge with which I could dispute the question raised by my hon. friend any more than that the bill was before the law officers of the crown and I would have expected that the point he raises would be covered. If he thinks there is a doubt and desires to move an amendment in the committee to cover the point, I have no objection.

Mr. BOYS: I am certainly willing to move it, but the difficulty is that it may be rather difficult to frame an amendment which will meet the application of the clause as at present drafted. Paragraph (a) provides for penalties under twenty-five dollars and paragraph (b) for penalties over twenty-five dollars. In my view a police magistrate should have jurisdiction in either case. The only way I see to deal with the matter would be to start off by giving a police magistrate jurisdiction to hear all complaints under this legislation, and then to give special jurisdiction to one justice of the peace in the one case and to two justices of the peace in the other. Unless the minister is particularly anxious to dispose of the matter to-night, he might ask those in charge of it in his department to draft a suitable clause. I make the suggestion for what it is worth.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Would it meet the views of my hon. friend if paragraph (b) were made to read:

Before any two justices of the peace or a police magistrate, if the penalty exceeds twenty-five dollars.

That is provided that the point is not already covered.

Mr. BOYS: I do not think my hon. friend is going far enough. Suppose you have a case in a town where there is a police magistrate, and it is under $25; he would not have jurisdiction.

Mr. MALCOLM: We might insert in paragraphs (a) and (b) the words "or a police magistrate."

Mr. BOYS: All right, if you want to cover it that way.

Mr. ELLIOTT: After the words "justice of the peace."

Mr. BOYS: Or stipendiary magistrate. There are cases where there are stipendiary magistrates.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the section should stand for redrafting. If the Minister of Public Works will look at the old section 40, he will observe that if the penalty does not exceed $20, it is before any justice of the peace, and if the penalty exceeds $20, before any two justices of the peace. We would now add, "or any magistrate exercising the powers of two justices of the peace." There is a special provision in the code with respect to stipendiary magistrates, to which the Minister of Public Works referred, and that is what he has in mind, I take it, when he speaks of the stipendiary exercising the powers of two justices of the peace. I think the section should stand and be redrafted, for the terms in which it now reads might divest the stipendiary entirely of his jurisdiction because he might not happen to be a justice of the peace.

Mr. MALCOLM: We will let the section stand for redrafting.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. SPEAKER: What is the next order of business?

Mr. MALCOLM: Supply.

Mr. BENNETT: There has to be a motion to go into supply to-day, and we have an amendment to move to the motion. It is probably undesirable to start that at this time of the evening, if there is any other business we can proceed with.

ADJOURNMENT—ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

Mr. MALCOLM moved the adjournment of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: Before the motion is formally put, Mr. Speaker, might I point out that we were to get the correspondence to-day with respect to the St. Lawrence waterway? I do not want to complain of the Prime Minister in his absence, but unfortunately one of my colleagues informs me that the press has the correspondence, and none of us has seen it or heard of it. Surely parliament must not be treated in this way.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Was not the statement that it would be handed to the press?

Mr. BENNETT: It was promised to us, too, and one of my colleagues tells me that the press had it this morning.

Mr. MALCOLM: The clerk has just handed me a letter from Doctor Skelton saying that he has sent to the distribution office 950 copies of the report in English and 400 in French. The letter, I see, does not refer to the correspondence. I think the clerk has handed me something different from what the leader of the opposition had in mind.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker will recall the circumstances. We were to have the correspondence and the report laid on the table before the house rose this evening. I expected that to be done just before six o'clock, or at all events on the house meeting again at eight. That has not been done, and one of my colleagues informs me that the press has had the correspondence and this report since early to-day, yet none of the members of the house has received it, and no copy has been laid on the table. I think the House of Commons should not be treated in this way, and I protest against it. I do so very reluctantly, with the Prime Minister not here, because I know that neither my friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce nor the Minister of Public Works is responsible for this particular matter, and I suppose the Prime Minister may have intended to come in later in the evening.

Mr. MALCOLM: He did.

Mr. BENNETT: Will this correspondence be laid on the table tonight? Otherwise the press will have it to-morrow, and this house, the people's representatives, will know nothing about it.

Mr. MALCOLM: My hon. friend is aware that the Prime Minister intended to lay the correspondence on the table to-night before the house adjourned. We were ready to go into supply on the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and I am prepared to do so yet if hon. gentlemen opposite are agreeable.

Mr. BENNETT: The motion to adjourn the house has been moved, and as I told my hon. friend, we have an amendment to the motion for supply.

Mr. McGIBBON: This is only one more instance of the contempt with which this government treats parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: If the Minister of Trade and Commerce wishes to waive his motion for adjournment—

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. MALCOLM: And then go into supply.

Mr. BENNETT: No, and then make your motion to go into supply; that is as far as you will get.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Malcolm moves, seconded by Mr. Elliott, that the house do now adjourn. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried, on division.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 9.40 p.m.

Tuesday, April 17, 1928

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Third report of the select standing committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government—Mr. Goodison.

Fourth report of the select standing committee on banking and commerce—Mr. Hay.

REPORT

Report of the board of audit on the financial affairs of the Quebec harbour commission—Mr. Robb.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

CORRESPONDENCE, REPORT OF ADVISORY COMMITTEE AND REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I beg to lay on the table correspondence between the governments of Canada and the United States in 1927-28 with respect to the St. Lawrence waterway project; the report of the international advisory committee, dated January, 1928, and observations thereupon by certain of its members, and orders in council referring to the Supreme Court of Canada certain questions as to water-power rights of the Dominion and the provinces. I must express to my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Bennett), and to the house, my regret that owing to the early adjournment last evening I was not in a position to table these papers as I had hoped to do. I fully expected to be present to table the documents, but the adjournment took place earlier than was anticipated. I wish to move, seconded by Mr. Robb:

That 2,500 copies in English and 1,500 copies in French of the St. Lawrence waterway project papers now tabled be printed forthwith, and that standing order 64 be suspended in relation thereto.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I quite appreciate the statement made by the right hon. the Prime Minister with respect to this matter, but I cannot but think that having regard to the circumstances that must have been present in his mind he might have tabled the documents at six o'clock before the house rose, for the press had them in their possession since the morning, although not to be used until later, as I understood at midnight; and the members of parliament might have been entrusted with the same documents at six o'clock or at eight o'clock at any rate. It is true the house adjourned rather earlier than was expected, but on the other hand the Prime Minister knew of his engagement and I am sure that if he had intimated that he would be absent from the house, they could have been laid on the table by one of his ministers at eight o'clock. I cannot think it is using parliament quite right to have these documents published in the newspapers and widely known to a very considerable number of people before we have any knowledge of them at all. I hardly think that is consistent with the dignity of the house. I do not, however, for a moment think that the Prime Minister wittingly adopted that method of dealing with documents intended for the information of the house.

The motion with respect to the printing of the documents enables me to say something further in connection with another matter of the same kind. Not long since, a document was published in a Toronto paper before it became known at all to the members of this house. I understand that the explanation of it is that the commissioner who made the report gave a copy of it to the newspaper thereby enabling it to be printed. That is, it seems to me, a very reprehensible practice and one that this house should not at all sanction. A report that is to be laid upon the table of the house should not be given to the newspapers until such time as it has been tabled. The adoption of a contrary course is really an insult to members of parliament. I investigated this matter at the time, and my information led me to conclude that the government was not to blame, but rather the commissioner who made the report. I think that principle is quite wrong. Certainly members of parliament should enjoy as much latitude in connection with matters of this kind as the press of the country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say that I agree entirely with my hon. friend in all that he has said as to the procedure which should be followed, but I think the house will see in a moment that it was a pure accident that hon. members did not receive these documents last night as was anticipated. In the first place as to the press having copies of the correspondence, my hon. friend knows that with respect to important documents of any length it is sometimes the practice to give copies in advance to the press on the undertaking that they will not be released until a certain time. In connection with the correspondence between the United States and Canada on the St. Lawrence waterway project the understanding was that the press in both countries should receive the documents on Monday at the latest, and the Canadian Press on Saturday night, but that the press summaries of the documents were only to be released for Tuesday morning's papers—

Mr. BENNETT: After midnight.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, the purpose being to enable the Canadian Press and the Associated Press to send full despatches and obviate the necessity of individual correspondents telegraphing lengthy communications to their respective papers. It was intimated to me by members of the press gallery that in the case of these papers it would not be advisable to confine the copies that were being given out to the Canadian Press, but that they should be given to all the members of the gallery on the understanding that they would not be released in any case until after the adjournment of the house on Monday night. This was agreed to and I have every reason to believe that the members of the press in that particular have kept faith with the government.

As to tabling the papers at six o'clock, I may say to my hon. friend that I had them in my desk and the thought entered my mind to table them at the hour mentioned when I recalled a conversation I had had with respect to the hour of tabling and mention of the fact that what would be regarded as an early hour here was still earlier in some parts of the western states and western Canada, and that it would be breaking faith with others to allow any of the afternoon papers to receive in advance any intimation at all of what was in the documents. Therefore I deliberately refrained from carrying out the thought I had at the moment of tabling the papers at six o'clock.

Now as to the events of the evening, I fully expected to be in the house not later than half-past nine. As a matter of fact I was in the house by twenty minutes of ten. In the interval, however, the house had adjourned and I had no alternative but to defer tabling the papers until to-day.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question. Could he not have intrusted the leader of the opposition and the leader of hon. members to the left of Mr. Speaker with copies of the correspondence on the same terms as in the case of the press?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should have been very happy to do so, had I thought my hon. friend might have wished to have the documents in advance. Another time I shall perhaps profit by this experience and see that he gets them a little in advance. As a matter of fact the documents were in my desk in the house and had it been anticipated that adjournment was to take place when it did some of my colleagues might readily have opened the desk and tabled the papers before the house adjourned. I think however everyone now has full information in the form in which it will be found most accessible.

Mr. CHURCH: Will an opportunity be given to resume the adjourned debate on this question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With respect to debates to be brought up in the house we shall have to follow the rules.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

On motion of Mr. W. T. GOODISON (West Lambton), the third report of the select standing committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, was concurred in.

MILITIA PENSION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence) moved the third reading of Bill No. 197, to amend the Militia Pension Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

LOWER EAR FALLS STORAGE DAM

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved the third reading of Bill No. 195, to facilitate the provision of storage in Lac Seul in the province of Ontario, and to repeal the Lake of the Woods Regulation Act, 1921.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

TREATY WITH SPAIN

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. 201, respecting a certain treaty of commerce and navigation between the United Kingdom and Spain and a certain agreement between the United Kingdom and Spain regulating the treatment of companies.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

FEDERAL DISTRICT COMMISSION ACT, 1927, AMENDMENT

On the order:

Resolved, That the Federal District Commission Act, 1927, be amended to provide,

1. That the period for the payment of the annual grant to the commission, at present fixed at sixteen years from the first day of April, 1927, be extended to thirty years from the first day of April, 1928, the said annual payment to remain at the sum of $250,000;

2. That the commission may issue securities and the Governor in Council may authorize the guarantee of the payment of principal and interest thereon, the proceeds to be deposited to the credit of the Minister of Finance in trust for the commission and released by the minister in his discretion for the purposes of the act;

3. That a sinking fund shall be created and maintained by the commission out of its actual annual income to provide sufficient funds to redeem such guaranteed securities as they respectively become due, and the provisions of the Expropriation Act instead of the Railway Act shall be made applicable to proceedings of the commission.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My purpose in having this number called is not to proceed with the resolution but to ask the permission of the house to withdraw it in order that I may substitute a resolution in somewhat different terms. If consent is given, I move that the resolution be withdrawn and that the order be discharged.

Mr. BENNETT: Carried.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT

The house resumed, from April 13, consideration in committee of Bill No. 199, to amend the Dominion Lands Act.—Mr. Stewart (Edmonton) Mr. Johnston in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When this bill was last before the committee certain progress had been made. Section 1 had been struck out. The committee were considering what appears as section 2 in the bill and which will now become section 1.

On section 2—Second homestead.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): I move to amend this clause in the thirteenth line by changing the figure "8" to the figure "5", and by striking from the fourteenth and fifteenth lines the words "in the discretion of the minister". The clause will then read:

Provided, however, that any person who on the first day of January, 1925, had obtained or had become entitled to letters patent for a homestead as aforesaid, may be granted the right to make entry for a second homestead, subject to the provisions of this act.

Mr. DONNELLY: I would like to know why the change has been made to 1925. If a man is entitled to a second homestead who has become entitled to letters patent for his homestead before January 1, 1925, why should not that apply to the man who has become entitled to letters patent in 1926, 1927 or 1928?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The criticism of the clause as it was originally drafted was that it would give rise to speculation, although frankly I do not agree very much with that criticism. At all events, this provides for a longer interval between the dates on which a man has proved up and received letters patent for his homestead and the date upon which he may make application for his second homestead. It may tend to prevent an individual proving up and then at once selling his homestead and making application for a second one. On the whole, I think the precaution is a wise one.

Mr. EVANS: Does this provision apply to the whole of the western provinces or only to the dry area?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): To the whole of the western provinces.

Mr. EVANS: When this scheme was first projected, it was with the idea of giving a chance to those homesteaders who had failed to establish themselves in the dry parts of Saskatchewan and Alberta particularly. When we were called into conference last year at Regina, some of us understood that that was the purpose of the whole scheme. I must say now, as I said then, that I am opposed to giving a second homestead indiscriminately to all who may feel disposed to apply for it. It is going to upset tremendously conditions throughout western Canada. It will mean more vacant homesteads; the weed crop itself will be a considerable trial to the municipalities, and speculation and other factors will enter in so that conditions will not be improved by giving the second homestead indiscriminately to all who wish to apply for it. I would confine the application of this act to those who have settled in the dry areas and failed to establish themselves as they expected.

Mr. FRASER: Does this apply to the Peace River country and the land in the railway belt of British Columbia?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, just to the crown lands open for homesteading.

Mr. FRASER: There are crown lands open for homesteading in the Peace River country, are there not?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In the Peace River block, yes, but not very many of them.

Mr. FRASER: And in the railway belt also.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not in the railway belt.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh yes. I think the minister is mistaken. There are pre-emptions granted in the railway belt.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is different.

Mr. VALLANCE: I wish to say a few words in support of this measure. It is true, as the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans) says, that when we gathered in Regina to discuss this matter, he took the attitude there that he takes here to-day, but some others of us voiced the opinion that this was good legislation for various reasons. I know that in the particular district from which I come we have been homesteading for some twenty years, and we find there many good Canadians who have come in from other parts of Canada, particularly from Ontario, and immigrants from overseas. We find families who settled in that district eighteen and twenty years ago, with four or five of a family. Some of those families to-day have two or three boys who are in a position to take up a homestead, and who under the existing law could take up a homestead, but they do not wish to leave the family roof, and if the father can be given the opportunity of taking up a second homestead, it will keep the family united. I believe that that is a good thing, and from my own experience in homesteading I believe that those people who have already had experience in homesteading will be an asset to any new country that is being opened up. As conditions are to-day, these people cannot extend their activities in the district where they are already located because of the high price of land, and the result is that the boys are drifting into the towns and cities, but when the father is given the opportunity of taking up a second homestead, a privilege which I think should be granted, the boys will come back home and probably homestead again. I am heartily in support of this particular section.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Terms of payment.

Mr. DONNELLY: Has the minister any intention of restricting the provision of this act to the dried out area? The constituency of Willow Bunch which I represent has been considered wholly in this dried out area, and we feel that that is a black eye for the district. We have been farming in there for the last fifteen or twenty years, and we have had crops every year, and we feel that we should not be dubbed as a dried out area. We think the definition of this dried out area should be limited in some way. All through that district we find many returned soldiers living in the towns and unable to get homesteads because they have no land within the nine miles, and they have to fake either the sale or renting of land before they can file on land. Last fall we opened up a lease in that district, and some of the returned soldiers went in there and faked sales and leases of land to allow them to file on this land. We have farm labourers who have come into that district and worked there for four or five years, living with the farmer, and they cannot go out and take up a homestead, but the farmer's son can. They have to buy or lease land before they can enter on land for a homestead. There are some districts in southern Alberta where probably this might apply, but we do not think it does apply to the constituency which I have the honour to represent. We think this should be restricted.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): When the bill was in committee on a previous occasion the criticism was that the legislation had worked out very well, but that it would be unwise to widen its scope and throw all this territory south of township 31 in Saskatchewan and Alberta open for homesteading. I suggested that the amendment proposed be stricken out. I may say that I agree entirely with the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly). This summer I shall arrange in conjunction with the provincial government and their officials to make a close inspection of the territory mentioned by him and several other hon. members who represent constituencies in southern Saskatchewan, and next session I hope to submit an amendment that will provide for definite sections to be thrown open for homesteading generally.

[Mr. Vallance.]

Mr. KELLNER: From the remarks of the hon. minister I assume that there is no immediate intention to turn over to the provinces their natural resources. With respect to the terms of payment on school lands, as amended by section 4, I do not think the amendment goes far enough to meet the situation in Alberta. I have a return before me showing that at a sale of school lands last fall one Joseph S. McCallum purchased 3,739 acres, and another A. Shandro, purchased 19,677 acres. I think it may be taken for granted that neither one of those purchasers intends to farm the land so acquired. In all probability they found certain farmers were interested in purchasing, and then said, "All right, you give us a dollar an acre and we will buy the land." I know one man replied that he was quite competent to buy the land himself, and thereupon those speculators ran the particular quarter-section up to $60 an acre, although generally speaking it would not be worth more than $10 or $12 an acre. That was the policy followed all through the recent sales of school lands: unless the farmers gave them a commission to make the purchase they ran up the price ridiculously high. I think it is the intention of those men not to make any further payments unless they can resell the land at a profit; otherwise they are prepared to lose their first payment. It is simply a case of speculation. I think the minister should so amend the act that no one purchaser would be able to secure more than a quarter or a half-section of land.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend may remember that some ten years ago W. J. McNamara purchased a large quantity of school lands along the right of way of the then Canadian Northern Railway system in northern Alberta. I felt this was an injustice to the people generally, and I spent two or three days down here with the then Minister of the Interior in an attempt to devise ways and means to prevent the recurrence of such a case. But we were met with this very practical difficulty, that all government officials have discovered that the fairest way in which to dispose of school lands is to offer them for sale at public auction. This results in better prices being obtained for the land and provides the most efficient means against fraud that has yet been devised. Of course, it does not prevent an individual from acquiring more land than he intends to farm, but it does have just the effect my hon. friend has mentioned, where a group of farmers get together and arrange not to bid more than a certain amount for any quarter-section. However, that is not the evil that I am trying to cure by this bill. My primary purpose is to get a sufficient first payment. We have discovered that one-twentieth is too small an investment on the part of the purchaser to warrant his holding the land if it does not suit his convenience, with the result that he abandons it in very bad condition. I think to dispose of these lands at public auction without any particular restrictions is the best method that can be devised for attaining fair and reasonable prices and thus getting the largest return for the school fund—the object for which the land is set aside.

Mr. IRVINE: What is the usual term after the initial payment has been made?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Twenty years.

Mr. SPENCER: When was the term changed from ten to twenty years?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The change was made by me some three or four years ago.

Mr. DONNELLY: I do not agree with the Minister of the Interior; I think the terms have been absolutely too lax, with the result that many of our western farmers have gambled in school lands. This change from one-twentieth to one-tenth is a step in the right direction, but still the terms of sale are too easy. The trouble is that a man will buy school lands and not complete his payments, farming them for ten or fourteen years. If the department presses him very hard he will rent the land at fifty cents an acre and continue farming for another ten or fifteen years.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): He can only rent the land pending another sale.

Mr. DONNELLY: The terms are far too easy. The purchaser should be made to pay in two or three years, just as he would be obliged to do if he had bought from a private individual. If he fails to make his payments the land should be put up at auction and rented at a certain percentage of the upset value. For example, if it was worth $25 an acre, make the rent 8 per cent on that value. Either do that or call for tenders. Many farmers will bid up land to $50, $60 and $75 an acre, and I have seen them bid as high as $80 an acre, with no intention whatever of buying it. They bid it in to control it for the next eight or ten years. He puts up one-twentieth and then sits back and in four, eight or ten years' time he throws it back on the government. He rents the land at fifty cents an acre, and neighbouring farmers who want to rent it cannot do so. This man continues to hold the land at fifty cents until the government puts it up at auction and then he bids it in again paying one-twentieth or one-tenth, and continues ownership. That has been done time and time again in the district I represent. Last summer in two or three sales I saw land run up 50 per cent more than the land was worth in what was nothing but a fake sale, for that land was not sold. The only object is that these individuals may hold the land in this way. Unless we become more strict in our sales we shall not be able to sell our school lands, and they will become polluted with weeds, dirt and so forth, so that they will be worth little or nothing. It seems to me the time has come when we should take measures to enforce more severe terms in connection with these school lands.

Mr. SPENCER: I wish to support what the hon. gentleman who has just spoken has said. Two or three years ago I was informed that the money owing on school lands in Saskatchewan and Alberta amounted to some $3,000,000. As the hon. member (Mr. Donnelly) has said, there are school lands—I know of many cases—where the price was run up to a fair amount and only the first payment was made. That is going on all the time. There are people who hold lands for eight and ten years without paying anything more than the first instalment. In the interests of the country we should in my opinion, be more severe. It is only reasonable, where climatic conditions adverse to agriculture warrant it, to afford the buyers fair opportunity to come through. But where crops are obtained on these lands the department should be more strict than it is at the present time.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Most of the difficulties I have observed in connection with school, Indian and other government lands in my constituency have been due to the manipulations of speculators and not to anything on the part of bona fide farmers. We find a condition out there such as the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Kellner) has referred to. A group of speculators will attend sales, and at the particular season of year farmers anxious to obtain lands may not have any money with which to purchase them. The result is that a speculator gets the land cheap; or perhaps a group of them will combine so as to eliminate opposition, and then by the time the regular farmer, the man who really intends to till the soil, to break up the land and make a farm out of it, is ready and anxious to get hold of the land, he finds that the price has gone up $5, $10 and in some cases $15 and $20 per acre. Then what does the speculator do? He collects year after year all he can obtain from the farmer without turning one dollar in to the department. If the minister will look over the books in the school lands branch as well as in the other branches to which I have alluded, he will find case after case where land was sold to some speculator, a man who never was a farmer and never intended to farm, and then resold to bona fide farmers at greatly enhanced prices. His game is to withhold the money from the department, and in the cases in which I have had to make representations to the minister's department I have discovered that lands have been held five, six, and in some cases, ten and twelve years. During all this time the farmers have been making regular payments to the speculators while the department has not secured a dollar. I have been able to get the departmental officers in many instances to cancel their undertaking with the speculators and to re-lease to bona fide farmers, with the hope of ultimately selling to them when they are in a position to buy. If we are to avoid trouble of this kind in the future the proper thing for us to do is to compel the purchaser to effect improvements on the land. I would not go so far as to compel him to reside on it because the owner might be a farmer living on his own adjoining farm. But if the department is to avoid a lot of these difficulties in the future and at the same time be just to those who are tilling the soil it would be in the interests of these people as well as to the advantage of the government to impose some specific obligations upon the purchaser in connection with the land. Those difficulties of which I have knowledge in my own district have arisen for the most part in connection with Indian lands, and there are some very sad cases in this regard, where farmers have paid in $1,500, $1,800 and sometimes, $2,000 or more to the speculator, believing all the time that he was keeping up his payments to the department, and after a lapse of ten years he finds to his amazement that not a dollar has been paid by the speculator apart from the initial instalment. Then he is threatened with cancellation. In some cases the cancellation proceedings deprive the farmer of the land which he has been farming. But the speculator has secured his profit and he is not very greatly concerned. I agree with the minister on the reasons he has given for raising the initial payment from one-twentieth to one-tenth. That decision, I think, is sound. I think, however, the minister would relieve his officers of a good deal of trouble, and at the same time do justice to the farmers, if by legislation he compelled the purchaser to carry out certain improvements on the land within a specified time.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): A serious difficulty suggests itself in connection with the point raised by my hon. friend. In connection with both school and Indian lands we find a good many farmers entering into agreements of sale with people who owe the government money, and never taking the precaution to notify us that the sale has taken place. We know nothing about the matter and we continue notifying the purchaser year after year. We make annual demands for payment and we receive what appear to be reasonable excuses for non-payment. No doubt in a few cases hardship is entailed where payments have been made to the purchaser while no return is made to the department; and this notwithstanding the fact that we have sent out warnings pointing out the importance of our being notified. While we do not intend to be harsh in the collection of these outstanding accounts, I think the purchasers of these lands will realize from now on that we are going to be more insistent than ever that the obligations to the government shall be lived up to in connection with school lands and Indian lands as well. We have had a good deal of difficulty. Times have been bad and we have been somewhat patient, but there does not appear to be any good reason why we should not receive substantial payments and have a clearance of these outstanding obligation within a reasonable time.

Mr. ADSHEAD: What is the effect of these words in subsection 4:

> Provided that the government of the province in which the land is situated expresses its approval of the sale and price in each case.

Does that mean that the government of the province in which the land is situate must consent to and approve the terms of the sale?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No. It is by agreement with the province that the sales take place, and by agreement with the province that the interest charges are fixed. With the single exception of the date of sale, the provinces are consulted about all school lands.

Mr. ADSHEAD: But it says "in each sale."

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is necessary in order to cover the situation.

Mr. KELLNER: I submit to the minister that the most important factor of the sale is not getting a big price for these lands. I think the upset price which is put on the land is the fairer price, and it would be better for the country generally if the land were sold at that price than at a higher rate. Perhaps the minister will remember when the Saddle Lake reserve lands were sold; a large tract of land was sold to two or three buyers, but the department cancelled the sale and later sold the land again. At the later sale no individual was allowed to purchase more than a half-section, and I do not see why a similar clause could not be introduced in this legislation.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The case is not parallel at all, because a portion of the Saddle Lake reserve was turned over to the soldier settlement board at a fixed rate of $10 per acre, if I remember correctly. They were unable to settle that land, and a portion of it was turned over for local settlement at the same price and with the same adjustment. The only provision we made was to prevent speculation, because the price was fixed, and we intended to prevent any individual from securing an undue portion of the reserve.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I think the minister should take into consideration the suggestion made by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell).

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): With reference to this matter of speculation, it is true that ten years ago there was a good deal of speculation in school lands, for several reasons. One reason was that the land could be secured by a comparatively small initial payment, and the price of grain was exceedingly high. When wheat was worth over $2 per bushel and oats sold for more than $1 per bushel, many men bought land at ridiculously high prices, expecting the high prices for grain to continue. Eight years ago this coming summer oats sold for $1.25 per bushel in the district to which the hon. member for Mackenzie referred, and at that price certainly land would be worth $100 per acre. Men went out and bought land at prices up to $70 per acre before the slump came in the fall; then oats dropped to about one-half the former price, and by the following summer oats of the same quality were selling for about 35 cents per bushel at the same point. If the department had stepped in then and dealt harshly with the people who had bought land, many of whom were not speculators but real farmers extending their holdings, there would have been a great deal of suffering caused and the 5 per cent of the purchase price which had been paid would have been lost. That situation has been more or less cleaned up in the intervening years; agriculture has become more prosperous, and now is the time to guard against the recurrence of those conditions. The people throughout the western country are looking for an opportunity to buy school lands; the sale which was held last year indicated that there was a good demand even for land which was not new and which was not as clean in many cases as it might have been. There is a pretty good demand to-day from many legitimate farmers for this land, and I think this provision under which we will collect 10 per cent of the purchase price instead of 5 per cent will check careless speculating.

The example quoted by the hon. member for Athabaska a few moments ago is something which very rarely happens. Land worth $10 per acre was run up to $60, and of that sum 5 per cent was paid. That payment amounted to $3 or 35 per cent of its real value. The speculator could not run up the price of that land by himself; he had to have competition, and a real farmer does not often run up land to a ridiculously high price, although he will run it up to what it is worth to him because of its proximity to his own holdings. In this case apparently the department already has received 35 per cent of the value of the land, and if this amendment had been in force at that time the department would have collected for the school fund 60 per cent of its real value. In these cases there are two parties to the procedure; first, we have the real owners of these lands, and it is incumbent upon the minister to secure every dollar he can possibly get from these lands for the provincial school funds. At the same time what the hon. member for Athabaska has said must be borne in mind; it is better to sell these lands as nearly as possible at their actual value, because then it is more likely that they will be paid for.

Then just a word about improvements; that is a very loose term, and may include a great deal or very little. The hon. member for Mackenzie does not want to see a man forced to live on the land because that might interfere with his residence elsewhere, and I quite agree with him. But when he asks that the department should request the man to carry on other improvements I cannot agree, because I imagine he means breaking and cultivating the land, and in many cases that is the worst thing that can happen. It would not be a good thing to compel a speculator to cultivate land; the legitimate farmer is going to cultivate his land as quickly as possible, because there is no revenue from it while it is idle, but to take steps which would force the speculator to cultivate the land himself would not be good business because in most cases it would become polluted with weeds and would have to be taken in and sold again if the speculator fell down in his payments. If that were done it would not be worth as much as it was worth before anything was done to it. There is a remedy for that condition, which has been working satisfactorily during the last few years. There is no doubt that the wild lands tax which is collected from such vacant lands in the western provinces has compelled large holders of land to either sell their land to someone who will cultivate it or to cultivate and improve it themselves in such a way as to enable them to avoid paying that tax.

I think this amendment raising to 10 per cent the deposit paid in the first instance is a good thing, and at this time, when demands for land are becoming more general, it will help avoid such speculation as we have had. The balance of the question can be handled by administration; this is a good time to tighten up on collections, because as we know any one who suggested in this house or in the country five or six years ago that we should tighten up on collections would not have been very popular, because it was hard for farmers to get along without paying anything on the capital cost of their land.

Mr. VALLANCE: After listening to this discussion I think there is a keen desire on the part of the committee to restrict the sale of school lands to bona fide farmers who can buy and pay for them. It has been suggested that by raising the initial payment we will keep out the speculator, but I have spoken to a speculator in land within the last few days who told me that that is not so, that the higher the initial payment is made the greater his chance will be. I quite believe that to a certain extent, because many of the western farmers to-day in those districts where school lands are available are not able to make a very high initial payment. However, we may have this condition; one man may buy school land for $10 an acre, while another man pays from $50 to $60 for similar land. They both fall down on their contracts, appeal to the department, sign a quit claim deed, and then obtain the privilege of renting that land for 50 cents per acre. If in the one instance the land was only worth $10 per acre while the other land was worth $60, surely the privilege of renting the land is worth more to the man who had the $60 land than to the man who had the $10 land. The higher price paid for certain land would indicate that the productive power of that land is greater, and therefore I think there ought to be a further tightening up of the regulations. I am absolutely with the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) in the statement that the land should be put in a condition where the farmer who is to cultivate it can do so as easily as possible.

Mr. EVANS: We have certainly fallen somewhat on evil times in certain parts of the west during the last few years. With the exception of those in Alberta our people out there have not recovered from the years 1918, 1919, 1920 and perhaps will not for some time to come. I do not wish to see conditions made much harder for those people who are trying to establish themselves in certain districts where the rain-fall is rather scarce. Another thing, I am of opinion that this legislation is very untimely at this stage. Is there such urgency for the sale of school lands that on the very eve of the handing over of their natural resources to the prairie provinces the government feels impelled to pass a measure of this kind? What urgent need is there of this legislation? Does the minister think there is going to be a large sale of school land? If not what is the reason for this urgency? I think the whole thing is untimely and might just as well be deferred seeing that we are on the eve of giving to the prairie provinces their natural resources.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In reply to my hon. friend may I say that while there is every hope their natural resources will be transferred to the provinces the transfer has not yet been effected, and I am sure he would be the last one to suggest that the whole machinery under which those resources are operated should stop. May I assure him that no arrangement of this kind is made without the consent of the provincial governments or discussion with them with only one single exception and that is the plan alluded to with respect to the renting of the land. It is the intention to apply these amendments to lands that fall back on our hands where failure to make payment is made and the purchaser is closed out, and where we may have for one year, or two at the most, the land under lease. Because it is the most unsatisfactory business we have to deal with in connection with the sale of school lands. We much prefer to deal with purchasers rather than with tenants. We have had a great deal of difficulty in that regard. It is not our intention to allow tenancy to continue for more than two years but there will be a public sale of the lands and new purchasers will be sought for them. In the matter of the short period that may intervene before there is a resale of the land, and other amendments also, we have been in consultation with the provincial governments concerned.

Mr. SPENCER: Has the department any rules by which the buyers of school lands are allowed to keep on with their payments without those lands being put up for resale?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): After consultation with the provincial governments it was decided not to execute the sale of the school lands, but I may say that I pressed upon them the desirability of allowing the sale of improved lands that were held under lease to go on in order to avoid the difficulties encountered in leasing these lands. So far as I know they are all sold at the present time, but reversions are always taking place. We have to take measures to prevent the lands growing weeds and the obvious thing to do is to lease them for a short period. I trust that period will be very short indeed in future.

Mr. EVANS: Have the provincial governments asked for this particular legislation?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. SPENCER: What I wanted to find out was for how many years can a buyer continue to farm a piece of land after he has made only one payment or before his ownership is cancelled?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Unless he suffers an absolute failure of crop we expect a payment every year. That has not been the case. I am free to admit we have been somewhat lenient during the bad years settlers have recently passed through. Now we are making more careful inspection, and where we know the purchaser has had a reasonable crop and should be in a position to make payment, we intend to press very strenuously for payment.

Mr. DONNELLY: Is there any intention to change the terms of the lease?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I tried to make it clear to the committee that it is not our intention to continue leasing. Just as soon as it can possibly be done we will resell the land.

Mr. DONNELLY: I wanted to know whether you intend changing the terms of the lease?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is not our intention to do so. We have a very simple method. It is easy of administration and it does not require inspection.

Mr. FANSHER (Last Mountain): What objection would the minister have to stipulating that not more than one half-section could be purchased by any single individual? This would prevent operations by speculators and would give a bona fide farmer a much better chance of acquiring a holding if he desired to do so.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If in any given locality you restrict the purchase to a quarter or half-section, you immediately have collusion amongst the purchasers in the locality and the price will be depressed to that extent. We have found by experience that the easiest method is to allow free competition. I think there is no doubt that the school land fund has profited proportionately by the free competition which prevails in connection with the purchase of these lands, notwithstanding the fact that in some cases the prices of lands do go to unprecedented heights. I want to say that in many cases where high prices are paid we have not the same amount of difficulty in collection, and the reason that I am making the change back to the one-tenth payment down is that most of our difficulty arises from the fact that the actual individual on ordinary priced land, not on land purchased at too high a figure, appears to have good and sufficient reason for delay in making his payments, with the result that he falls into serious arrears.

May I say a word with respect to the improvements? These matters have all been discussed with the provincial governments who are extremely anxious to get the best prices possible, because, as I pointed out a moment or two ago, they are the ones who benefit by these prices. The better the prices are, the more money they have for their school land funds. While one can find many criticisms to offer, after years of experience these are the methods that have been adopted. I am not averse at all and will agree this year, if we continue to administer these lands, to discussing with the provincial governments the advisability of asking for improvements during the first or second year of purchase; but until I have an opportunity of discussing this matter with them, I do not care to embody such a provision in the legislation.

Mr. COOTE: I do not object to the proposal of the minister to ask for an initial payment of one-tenth; but in view of the remarks which have been made by some members of the committee, I should like to suggest that, after a piece of school land has been purchased and several payments made upon it, the department should not be very strict in enforcing payment of the principal, because the unpaid principal as soon as it falls into arrears is drawing seven per cent interest. The minister himself stated that it was the desire of the provinces to get as much money as possible out of these school lands. Once the principal is paid it is impossible for the government to secure a rate of seven per cent interest on it. In some cases I have made representations to the department on behalf of parties who were in arrears on their contracts, but who were keeping their interest paid up. As long as they are paying the interest, and particularly such a handsome rate as seven per cent, I think the department should not press these people for payment of the principal provided they are keeping the farm in good shape. It is good business for the provinces to have this rate of interest coming in.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I quite agree with the minister that a sale free from all restrictions may make a better showing on the date of sale; that is, the amount realized at the date of sale might be a little larger than if certain restrictions such as I suggested were attached to the sale, but that does not mean that the government will ultimately secure that amount for the land. The reason I make that suggestion to the minister is that the sales will be good sales. The minister himself knows, and the records of his department will show that scores of these sales are not sales at all. Some speculator secures the land, turns it over to a farmer and expects the farmer to pay up the balance. The speculator collects all he can from the farmer; he stands the department off, and years after, when he has extracted a large amount from the farmer and got his money out of the land, he drops out of the picture altogether. In this way many cases of hardship arise as regards the department as well as the ultimate purchaser, and I think that should be avoided.

In that particular case you might have a very satisfactory showing on the date of the sale but it would not be very satisfactory ultimately to the department. Many of those sales, as I think the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) intimated, were made at a time when land prices were unduly inflated, and just because during a long period these speculators were standing the department off, little or nothing was collected. Now that land is in many cases back on the hands of the department and it must be sold for probably less than half the price it was sold for at that time. My point is that had that land been purchased originally with certain improvement conditions attached to the sale, it perhaps would not have sold at as high a price, but in most cases the department would have secured more money than they did on sales made without restriction. I still think the minister would be well advised to insert some such restriction as that in the statute.

Mr. KELLNER: The minister stated a few minutes ago that he was afraid there might be collusion among the parties. Unquestionably there has been collusion under these regulations, and as regards getting into trouble, I think the minister is in trouble at present. Let us take, for instance, the case that I cited a moment ago of A. Shandro who purchased 123 quarter-sections. I am satisfied he is well known to the minister and I think the minister will admit that unless he sells that land again, it will never be paid for. The only way Shandro can pay for that land is by re-selling it, and I cannot for the life of me see the object in getting him to purchase a large quantity of land like that simply to make some bona fide farmer pay him a commission. The man does not intend to farm and he has no immediate prospect of re-selling the land. He will make his first payment; he will hang on until he runs across some farmer who wants to buy it, and he will then make that farmer pay him a commission. That is not good business for the government of this country to follow and I want even yet to endeavour to persuade the minister to add to this legislation a clause which will limit sales to at most half a section to any one person.

Mr. SPENCER: While I agree with the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Kellner), who is trying to limit to a certain extent the purchase of land under the School Lands Act, I would not limit it to quite such a small quantity as half a section. I think we should put a limit on people buying 25, 50, 75 or 100 quarter-sections. I take it that the main object in selling this land is to get more settlers, but sales made in this way are purely a matter of speculation.

I wish to say a few words with regard to the statement made by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote). There is something in what he says about not pressing the farmer too hard if the interest payments have been kept up; but my main criticism is that there are too many purchasers of land who are not keeping up their payments of either principal or interest, and in those cases I think the department should be a great deal stricter than it is. Where they are not paying either interest or principal, their right to the land should be cancelled at an early date unless they are suffering from difficult climatic conditions.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I shall be very glad to bring all these representations to the attention of the provincial governments; but inasmuch as this is being done by agreement between the Department of the Interior and the provincial governments, I do not care this year to add to or take from the amendment anything that will materially affect it. I shall, however, be glad to bring before the provincial government the question of the restriction of individual purchases, although I say very frankly that I shall not advocate it; I will oppose it, because I think the effect will be exactly the reverse of what my hon. friends expect. I think free and unrestricted sale is the best method of getting the most money out of these lands. If an individual takes his chance on paying one-twentieth down on each quarter-section that he purchases, he is taking a chance on re-selling or on our closing him out if he is holding these lands for purely speculative purposes. That has not been done in the past, I am free to admit. I have in mind particularly those lands along the old Canadian Northern railway. It is not the intention to allow speculators to hold lands indefinitely out of use. They usually do not do so; usually these lands are leased for grazing purposes; but our difficulty starts when we have an individual farming the land and failing to make payments so that finally we have to close him out. In that case we have the cultivated lands on our hands, and if we do not do something with them they grow up with weeds and we are bombarded by the municipalities to clean them up. That is where our difficulty starts. However, I will make the best presentation possible of all these suggestions to the provincial governments and be prepared, if we are in control, to embody them in amendments next year.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I do not agree with the minister at all on one point, and it seems to be his chief ground for rejecting now, and expressing his intention of rejecting in the future, the suggestion that has been made by the hon. member for Athabasca. What is the minister going to do with a situation like this? Up in the district of Mundare, we will say, there are school lands to be sold. The people in the district of Mundare, many of them, do not speak English fluently, although a few of them do, of course. Some of them want to buy a piece of these school lands, and a gentleman of a certain delicate type of occupation learns that there is to be a sale of these school lands, and he goes down amongst these people and says, "You are going to be up against a difficult proposition. Just leave it all to me. You do not need to appear at the sale at all. I will buy the land for you and look after everything." He makes himself a good fellow, and for a commission proceeds to make the purchase. He buys the land from the department at a lower price than the land would have brought had he not called off all these people. He will have an agreement with several of these people to get this one a certain piece of land, and that one a certain other piece. There is collusion of the worst type in the open auction sale method, because as soon as that agent has bought the land he goes back to these poor individuals for whom he has purchased it, and in addition to the commission he intends charging, he adds something to the purchase price of the land, and they have no way of dealing with him; they have simply to pay him his price, because the sale is made to him in the first place by the department. It has been called to my attention that many cases of that kind have occurred during the last year in the northern districts where school land sales have taken place. I do not know just how the minister is going to cope with that situation. I think the ideal solution would be to say that no land shall be sold to anyone who is not a bona fide farmer, but the difficulty there is to define a bona fide farmer accurately for the purpose of the act. In the face of that difficulty I think the minister should really take into his sympathetic consideration the proposal of the hon. member for Athabaska, especially in view of the fact that, in spite of the words of the hon. member for Melfort, there is no doubt in my mind but that if the prosperous conditions which my hon. friends opposite so loudly declare exist now in western Canada and elsewhere continue, then inevitably there is going to be a steadily upward trend in the price of land. These men know it. I feel myself that such will be the case, and if conditions in the west are going to be better, and I believe they are getting better now, there is going to be as wide speculation as possible.

I agree with the hon. member for South Battleford that the increase in the initial payment is not going to stop the speculator, but it will stop the farmer who has not much cash in the bank, but has a couple of growing sons for whom he would like to hold a certain piece of land. He has not the money to put up, but Mr. Doctor or Mr. Lawyer or Mr. Somebody else in the nearby town sees there a fine chance for himself. He has the capital, and he grabs this land. He knows that the farmer's sons within five years must have the land or get out of the district, and so he says to the farmer, "Don't worry. Just as soon as your boys are ready to take up the land, I will sell it to you, and in the meantime you can use it for grazing." I do not think this amendment will prevent speculation.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not say so.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Nor do I think it will put the land under cultivation any sooner. Under the old system, if the payment was smaller at the start, there would be more chance of the farmer getting the land and bringing it under cultivation. Frankly, I do not think the minister has made much of a job of these changes, and if the provincial governments have agreed to them, then all I have to say is that perhaps some of them need revision themselves, and some of them quite clearly do.

I think the best point that has been raised so far was raised by the hon. member for Mackenzie and by the hon. member for Athabaska. In my opinion in connection with all these sales of land the attempt should be to get them into the hands of bona fide farmers and bring them under cultivation as soon as possible, and you can best do that, first, by providing that the improvements must be done. They will not always do them, but that provision would help. Secondly, prevent the sale of large blocks of land to any single individual, not more than a section to any individual.

Mr. COOTE: I think it would be good policy for this government and for the provincial governments interested to say that not more than four quarter-sections of school lands shall be sold to any one man at any of these sales. I know of cases where speculators have bought as much as thirty quarters at a school lands sale, and then have sold that land to the farmers who lived near at an advance in price. It would take the farmer four or five years to pay off the increased value which the speculator had put on the land, and for years the farmer would not be able to pay anything to the department. The department kindly allows them to hold this land without paying interest, let alone principal, and after the farmer has taken four or five years to pay off the increased value which the speculator charges him, he then begins to pay off the department. I think the land would bring just as much if it was sold with a limit of four quarter-sections to any one man, and certainly it would cut out a lot of the speculation that now goes on. The provinces will admit that it is to their interest to get this land under cultivation as soon as possible, as well as to get a good price for the land, and any loss the provinces might suffer by limiting sales to four quarter-sections to any one individual would easily be offset by the less amount of speculation which would take place and by having the land brought under cultivation sooner.

TRADE CONVENTION WITH CZECHOSLOVAKIA

The house resumed from April 16 consideration in committee of Bill No. 202, respecting a certain trade convention between His Majesty and the President of the Czechoslovak republic.—Mr. Robb—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, when the house rose at six o'clock last night doubt was expressed by my hon. friends opposite regarding the words, "most-favoured-nation", some contending that their inclusion would give Czechoslovakia the advantages of our tariff arrangements with the mother country. I observe that in May, 1925, when we were passing a similar treaty with The Netherlands the then leader of the opposition, the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen, raised the same point. To make sure of our position, I then wired to the representatives of The Netherlands and this is the reply I received:

I have the honour to inform you that according to a cable dated May 20, received from the Minister of Foreign Affairs at The Hague, The Netherlands government has not at all the intention to claim the benefits of the said British preferential tariff under article one of said Canadian-Netherlands convention; and furthermore, that in the opinion of The Netherlands government the claiming of the benefits of the said British preferential tariff would not be justified under the text of the said convention.

So there is a clear understanding as to that.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Does the minister think that the opinion he has just read will be effective as against the Czechoslovakian government?

Mr. ROBB: The language is identical in both treaties, and we have the same understanding with the representatives of that country. There is no doubt in their mind as to the scope of the treaty.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

COMMERCIAL TREATIES WITH EUROPEAN COUNTRIES

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 203, respecting trade between Canada and Esthonia, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Portugal, Roumania, and the Serb, Croat and Slovene Kingdom.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the minister will make an explanation with reference to this bill.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, this is similar to the bill dealt with yesterday, with some exceptions. The United Kingdom has made various commercial treaties with world powers, most of them being styled "for commerce and navigation," and it is a general term of these treaties that they do not apply to the self-governing dominions unless the dominion gives notice that it intends to accept the treaty in whole or in part. In treaties with the foregoing countries it has been deemed advisable to accept the clause providing for the mutual exchange of the most-favoured-nation treatment.

Let me give the committee the figures of our trade with these countries for the fiscal years 1926 and 1927. In 1926 our exports totalled $1,250,693, as against imports of $433,350; and in 1927 the relative figures were $2,374,021 as against $673,760.

In the classes of goods that we export our chief competitor is the United States, which enjoys the most-favoured-nation treatment with each country. As our exports are considerably in excess of our imports from these countries, the benefits, both present and potential, are obvious. Several of the countries in question are new, and from time to time there is a gradual adjustment of tariff barriers, and as the United States is entitled to the most-favoured-nation treatment that country would immediately get the benefit of any local adjustment. Canada is now being placed on an equal footing with the United States.

This is the tariff position in each of the countries affected:

Esthonia has recently adopted minimum and maximum tariff schedules. The minimum rate is 50 per cent less than the general.

Hungary. Hungary has one tariff but has special treaty rates with a number of countries. There is also a provision that she can increase the normal rates three times where there is tariff discrimination against her goods.

Latvia. Latvia has now introduced a two-column tariff, the preferential being 50 per cent less than the general.

Portugal. Portugal has two rates, the maximum being generally double the minimum, although sometimes it is greater.

Roumania. Roumania has two rates, and it is provided that non-treaty countries may be called upon to pay the maximum, which is 50 per cent higher than the minimum.

The Serb, Croat and Slovene Kingdom. This kingdom has two rates. The maximum if often three times the minimum.

Lithuania. Early in 1926 Lithuania amended its customs tariff so that goods coming from non-treaty countries might be made subject to a duty of 30 per cent over the present one-column schedule. This new rating was never put into effect, but now that Latvia and Esthonia have adopted conventional rates Lithuania may do the same.

On section one—Short title.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, I am at a loss to understand how these particular treaties are going to benefit Canada. Great Britain is a free-trade country, and to-day a million and a quarter men are out of work there because of such treaties as these. In a fiscal sense we are in an altogether different position as compared with the mother country. This simply means that we are following in the footsteps of Great Britain and adopting free trade piecemeal. We have given away the Canadian home market to foreign producers, with the result that 700,000 Canadians have had to go to the United States to look for work. As representing an industrial constituency I protest vigorously against this way of doing business. We are simply opening our doors to all the countries under the sun and making Canada the dumping ground for their surplus products and manufactures under a favoured nation free trade policy. One cannot go into any department store in the city I come from without finding on the counters every variety of goods imported from all these countries as well as from the United States, produced under such conditions as it is impossible for our manufacturers to compete against. In these European and Asiatic countries there is depreciated currency and cheap labour and the conditions are such that the Canadian manufacturers are entirely at a disadvantage. Treaties like the Australian, the French and others which this government has entered into, can have only one effect, and that is to destroy our home market.

There is nothing before us to show how this is going to affect the home market here or employment in this country. The result will be the abolition of such little protection as we have. If that is the object, why not strike protection off the books altogether? I attended a convention where the word "protection," I am sorry to say, was not mentioned in any resolution, and the particular resolution in which it should have appeared I opposed. This proposal before us at the present time simply means that we are going to open our doors to free trade with Europe, South America and other parts of the world. We are not given any information as to how agriculture and many of our basic industries will be affected. What we have before us to-day is nothing else than a second budget; that is what it is. It seems that this year we are geting our budget piecemeal—a part prepared by Mr. Moore, a part prepared by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), and a part presented to us in these various favoured nation treaties. This parliament is in the economic position of adopting a "shut your eyes, close your mouth and see what I will put in it" free trade policy.

Why, I venture to say that half the members of this house do not know what they are voting for. Those hon. gentlemen who represent protectionist constituencies are not in the house to protect the interests of their electorate. It seems to me that the Liberal party is aiming at complete free trade such as exists in England. That is their platform —free trade, as they have it in England. As a matter of fact, they have all sorts of platforms, but their fiscal policy is a platform to get in on and not to stand on. As a consistent protectionist I absolutely protest against this sort of thing. I protest against favoured-nation treaties which are going to open the doors of this country wide to all the nations of the seven seas. On the pretext of something called "most favoured-nation treatment", we are making Canada the dumping ground for the surplus products of the rest of the world. The only country under the sun not favoured by this government is the Dominion of Canada; Canadians are the only people on the face of the earth who are not to enjoy any economic favours or a place in the sun. The result, as I say, is that 700,000 of our men are obliged to seek employment in the United States owing to economic reasons.

Under the free trade favoured-nation policy pursued in Great Britain one and a quarter millions are receiving the dole and a million are out of work. But to-day England is beginning to find out her mistake; she is being shut out of the markets of the world and is veering around to protection and the Safeguarding of Industries Act. England has lost the ship-building orders to the Germans, and many of her other basic industries are threatened. They will not be able to weather the storm. I was alone in protesting against such a policy when I attended the convention at Winnipeg and I am consistent to-day in again opposing a proposal which makes for free trade and adopts free trade as they have it in England, piecemeal, as an economic policy for Canada.
