"Theology . . . is not, we think, an accurate phrase as applied here by Mr. Brooke. . . . However, it is not worth while to quarrel with a term under cover of which Mr. Brooke has given to a Sunday afternoon audience so much thoughtful criticism, so many fine suggestions, such varied and copious knowledge."—Spectator, xlvii. 1502.

"Such a thing can hardly be said to have existed before this, at least in a separate form, and Mr. Stopford Brooke has supplied the want in a wonderfully small compass.—although we must remark that the compass allotted to him is rather too scant for even the most condensed treatment of his subject,—and on the whole with wonderful success."—*Sat. Brooks, Charles William Shirley, [ante, vol. i., add.] 1816-1874. Brooks's first magazine articles were signed Charles W. Brooks. He then adopted the signature Charles Shirley Brooks, and finally became known altogether as Shirley Brooks. His connection with Punch, by which he is best known, began in 1851 and continued unbroken to the time of his death. His articles were signed "Episcopus Rotundus." In 1870 he succeeded Mark Lemon as editor. His latest articles for Punch, Election Epigrams and The Situation, were written on his death-bed. Besides the books mentioned ante, vol. i., he published: 1. The Gordian Knot: a Story of Good and Evil. Illust. Lon., 1858, 16mo. 2. The Silver Cord, Lon., 1861, 3 vols. p. 8vo.

There is as much cleverness, as much contrivance of incident, as lively a conception of what the characters of selected might be supposed to say, in the "Silver Cord" as in the "Woman in White." But the latter was a much more successful book than the former, and because the plot was most carefully contrived, and the details fitted in with the most scrupulous nicety. The utmost success attainable in this line of art is not of a very high kind."—Sat. Rev., xii. 32.

"Whoever wishes to know what was the prevailing opinion among good, average, respectable Britons with regard to the Crimean War, the Indian Mutiny, . . . Bishop Colenso, Governor Eyre, has only to refer to this selection. . . . We doubt if Punch will ever quite recover the loss of any Shirley Brooks. Still at catching the momentary and fluency of the less thinking part of the community, and fluency of language for expressing it, . . . were possessed by him in a remarkable degree."—ibid., No. 2490.

"He has brought to bear upon a wide field of human experience a sagacious and penetrating mind, and his sermons are therefore always highly suggestive and interesting. On almost every page one finds remarks which are evidently the result of original thought, hints which surprise one by their ingenuity and novelty. Though the language is hardly eloquent in the highest sense of the word, yet, considering that these were, we believe, extempore sermons, it maintains a high level of beauty and lucidity, and occasionally rises into grandeur. . . . But we have some criticisms to make. Mr. Brooks seems to us, in the first place, to be more acute than profound, more ingenious than penetrating. His thought is not always quite clear, and it is never deep. . . . Mr. Brooks's whole treatment of religion is too fanciful and casual; he does not, in these sermons at least, show that he is penetrated by the truths with which he deals and the principles by which he explains them. . . . Each sermon gives one the impression that the preacher has had to look for his subject—it has not found him; and when he has got it, instead of going at once to the deep underlying religious meaning of it, he has let his fancy, and his wit, and his sagacity play round it; and he thus gives us much that is valuable, much that is wise, much that is ingenious and thoughtful, but he does not strengthen the foundations of religious thought or add to the great principles by which men's moral lives are guided."—Speaker, 1883, 315.

Broome, Mary Ann, Lady, b. in Jamaica, where educated in England, returned to Jamaica in 1850, and in 1852 was married to Captain G. R. Barker, R.A., who afterwards served in the Crimean war and the Indian Mutiny and was made K.C.B. He died in 1860, and in 1861 Lady Barker was married to Mr.—afterwards Sir—Frederick Napier Broome, esq., then of Canterbury, New Zealand. After her return to England in 1869 she entered on a successful literary career, writing works descriptive of life in the colonies and books for young people, which have been very popular. She was superintendent of the Kensington School of Cookery 1874-75, and has since then resided with her husband in the colonies where he has held appointments. 1. Station Life in New Zealand, Lon., 1869, p. 8vo; new eds., 1871, 1874, 1878, 1883.

"If grown-up people can be tempted, as doubtless they can, to run off to the colonies in the way that school-boys are tempted by stirring narrative of the adventures to be run off to sea, this must be a very dangerous book. Lady Barker, indeed, gives some express cautions on the subject, but the whole tone of her book is very exhilarating. . . . We may imagine, which are tinged with something of colour de rose, but not with more than comes from health and high spirits. . . . We find this book full of a genuine interest and charm."—Spectator, xliii, 561.

Brougham, Henry Peter, Baron Brougham and Vaux, [ante, vol. i, add.], d. 1868, aged 89. Lord Brougham was a voluminous writer, and the list of his works given ante, vol. i, includes the collected edition in 10 vols. issued in 1857, to which an 11th vol. was added in 1861, containing at the end a bibliography by Mr. Ralph Thomas. A new edition appeared in 1872-73, and the Bibliographical List was published separately, 1873, 12mo. The novel entitled Albert Lunel; or, The Children of Languedoc, published anonymously, Lon., 1844, 3 vols. p. 8vo, and suppressed after a few copies had been distributed, was privately acknowledged by Brougham, and was republished in 1872. His daughter, Eleanor Louise, who died in 1839, is the heroine of the book, he himself figures as "the Baron," and several other real persons are introduced under fictitious names. The following extract from a review sufficiently indicates his character:

"Some interest attaches to the recital of the adventures of the nominal hero, and there are one or two scenes in his life which surprise us in their unwonted feeling. But

"Mr. Brown has done his work with that complete forgetfulness of all but his subject which marks the true friend and true biographer, and there is not a line in his book which, to our minds, he could have omitted without diminishing its interest, not merely for Davidson's family and college friends, but even for complete strangers like the present writer, whose only interest in the book is in the picture it presents to him of a man of high purpose, quaint humour, strong but reticent affections, and profound Christian faith."—Spectator, l. 183.

He is even more at home in his work in this book, which not only unfolds the history of an interesting and non-muddled man, but is brimful of human interest, of pleasant anecdote, and appreciative and delightful description."—Spectator, lxi. 896.

Brown, Rev. James Baldwin. 1820-1884, son of James Baldwin Brown, [ante, vol. i.] b. in London and educated at the London University. After studying law for a time, he determined to enter the ministry. He studied theology at Highbury College, and in 1846 became minister of a Congregational chapel in London. He had a high reputation as a preacher, was president of the Congregational Union of England and Wales, and placed himself at the head of an advanced school of Congregational ministers, who endeavored to fraternize with Unitarians and others outside their own communion. 1. He was a devoted and enlightened physician, but his name is familiar to general readers as that of the author of Rab and his Friends, a sketch of animal character which attained a wide popularity both in Great Britain and America. His literary and social qualities brought him into intimacy with many celebrities, including Jeffrey, Thackeray, and Ruskin. 1. Horse Subsevivæ, Loek and Sydenham, with other Occasional Papers, Edin., 1858; 5th ed., 1885.

"It is observable that the whole of the first volume of 'Horse Subsevivæ'—perhaps, though not the most popular, yet the most substantially valuable of the whole series—is almost exclusively devoted to subjects intimately bearing on the practice of medicine."—Dict. of Nat. Biog., vii. 20.

Dr. Brown's papers on Leech and Thackeray, excellent as they are, full of appreciation and information, are less rich and rare than some of his studies of Scotch character and of Scotch family history and romance.—"Sat. Rev., iii, 273.

One very obvious characteristic of these papers is their appearance of ease and spontaneity.—"Acad., xxi, 169. The author of "Rab and his Friends" takes place apart for an alike peculiar to himself. His manner and his matter are alike peculiar to himself. They remind one very charmingly of other times and other ways than our own, they are of the old school. They stand midway between somewhat reckless past, and they are touched with some of the characteristics of both.—"Ida., No. 280.

Brown, John, F.G.S., 1797-1851, b. at Dover, Eng.; was at first a mitch-man in the East India Company's service, and afterwards a diamond-merchant. "We do not shrink from saying that Mr. Brown is the man. . . . It adds little to our knowledge of Bunyan before the village where he was born; the town where, as a prisoner or free man, he spent the greater part of his life; the congregation of which he was first minister; and the man himself,—an office in which Mr. Brown succeeds the troubled times, full of the throes of intestine strife, civil and religious, in which he lived.—"Sat. Rev., lxi, 52. He has produced the most elaborate and exhaustive account of Bunyan hitherto published, and has, indeed, left no room for a successor. . . . One point Mr. Brown makes out pretty clearly, that has escaped former biographers, namely, that Bunyan did not write his principal allegory during his twelve years' imprisonment, but during a later and comparatively short imprisonment of six months.—"Spectator, lix, 49.

Brown, Oliver Maddox. 1855-1874, b. at Finchley, Eng., son of Ford Maddox-Brown, a distinguished painter, gave promise during his brief life of remarkable excellence both as an artist and an author. "It is a good deal to say of a county history that it can be read through with pleasure; yet this can certainly be said of Mr. Craig-Brown's pages, which are never deficient in interest. . . . In fact, his literary skill is somewhat an impediment to his reader's appreciation of his erudition. This does not imply that the erudition is not there, but it is not the erudition of an antiquary or an archaeologist. In fact, Mr. Craig-Brown is neither of these, but is rather a social historian. It is the life, the manners and customs—above all, the literature and the character—of the dwellers in Ettrick Forest which attract him."—M. CREIGHTON: Historical Rev., No. 12.

"He has written with all his soul and with all his strength. . . . A consequence of this sincerity is that his verse should gain him friends and admirers wherever it is read, and that he should be as well known among strangers as among his own people. . . . It must be noted, however, that the author's romance is never so striking in conception or so successful in execution as his fun, his wit, his tenderness, his pictures of life and character, or his dramatic analysis of emotion."—ibid., No. 2793.

"We cannot say whether the author of this volume has much gift for poetry of the conventional form. But what he has done he has done well—almost to perfection. Browning, Elizabeth Barrett, [ante, vol. 1, add.] 1809-1861, b. at Burn Hall, Durham (not in London, as stated in vol. 1). Her name was originally Elizabeth Barrett Moulton, but her father, on succeeding to some property, changed his name to Barrett. Her early life was passed at Hope End, near Lechlary, Herefordshire, and at Sidmouth, near London. After her marriage to Robert Browning, ib. sup., she resided with her husband at Florence, where the house called "Casa Guidi" now bears a commemorative inscription placed upon it by a vote of the municipality. Most of Mrs. Browning's works, and several collective editions of her poems, are mentioned ante, vol. 1. Add: 1. Poems before Congress, Lon., 1860, 12mo. 2. Last Poems, 1862, 12mo. Poeth. Edited by R. Browning. (This includes some translations written in early life.) 3. The Greek Christian Poets and the English Poets, 1863, 12mo. Edited by R. Browning. (Contains prose essays and translations reprinted from the Athenaeum for 1842.) 4. Selections from Poems. Edited by R. Browning. (Two series. 1865-80, 12mo; new ed. 1884.) 5. The Earliest Poems of E. B. Browning, 1820-23. Edited by R. H. Shephard. (This is a republication of her first work.—An Essay on Mind, and other Poems.) 6. Letters addressed to Richard Hengist Horne, with Comments on Contemporaries. Edited by S. R. Townshend Mayer. Lon., 1876, 2 vols. p. 8vo. American edition, with Preface and Memoir by Richard Henry Stoddard, N. York, 1877, 2 vols. 18mo.

"Interesting, of course, in virtue of their authorship. They relate, however, in great measure, to matters of current literature and criticism not very familiar to the generation which has grown up since their date. . . . They contain, in fact, the record of a literary partnership now for the first time fully disclosed, and in some respects probably unique. . . . sundry detached felicitous occur in passages. . . . At the end Mr. Horne throws in some detached literary recollections of his own."—Sat. Rev., xliii, 28.

The most elaborate edition of her poetical works is in 5 vols., N. York, 1884, 8vo, of which 172 copies were printed on large paper.

Browning, Robert, [ante, vol. 1, add.] 1812-1880. After his wife's death Mr. Browning resided mainly in London, spending a part of the year with his sister and his son at the Palazzo Manzoni, Venice, which he purchased in 1885. He died at Venice, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. In 1881 the Browning Society was formed in London to promote the study of the poet's works, and many similar societies have since been formed in England and the United States. The following list of his works includes those mentioned ante, vol. 1, where, among other defects, very few dates are appended. Far more minute information concerning separate poems and volumes will be found in Mr. Furnivall's Bibliography of Browning. 1. Pauline: a Fragment of a Confession, Lon., 1833, p. 8vo. (This was not reprinted until 1868, when, hearing that it was about to be republished in America, the author inserted it in vol. 1. of his Poetical Works.) 2. Paracelsus, Lon., 1835, p. 8vo. 3. Strafford: an Historical Tragedy, Lon., 1837, 8vo. (Acted at the Covent Garden Theatre, April 23, 1837.) An edition with Notes by E. H. Hickey, secretary to the Browning Society, and an Introduction by Samuel Rawson Gardiner, was published in 1884, cr. 8vo. 4. Sordello, Lon., 1840, p. 8vo. 5. Bells and Pomegranates, 1841-46, 8 Nos., paper covers. No. 1., Pippa Passes, 1841. No. II., King Victor and King Charles, 1842. No. III., Dramatic Lyrics, 1842. No. IV., The Return of the Druses: a Tragedy in Five Acts, 1843. No. V., A Blot in the Scutcheon: a Tragedy in Three Acts, 1843. (Acted at Drury Lane Theatre, Feb. 11, 1843.) No. VI., Colombe's Birthday: a Play in Five Acts, 1844. (Acted at the Haymarket Theatre, April 25, 1853.) No. VII., Dramatic Romanances and Lyrics, 1845. No. VIII., Luria; and A Soul's Tragedy, 1846, 6. Poems; new edition, 1849, 2 vols. (Contains Paracelsus and all the poems in Bells and Pomegranates, except three lyrics.) 7. Christmas-Eve and Easter-Day: a Poem, 1850. 8. Men and Women, 1855, 2 vols. 9. Poetical Works; 3d ed., 1863, 3 vols. Vol. I., Lyrics, Romanances, Men and Women. Vol. II., Tragedies, and other Plays. Vol. III., Paracelsus. 10. Christmas-Eve and Easter-Day, Sordello: Selections from the Poetical Works of Robert Browning, Lon., 1863. (The selections were made by John Forster, and include, with entire short pieces, passages from long poems and dramas.) 11. Dramatis Personæ, 1864. 12. A Selection from the Works of Robert Browning, (Moxon's "Miniature Poets,") Lon., 1865. (A wholly different selection, made by the author himself, from that of Mr. Forster.) 13. Poetical Works, 1868, 6 vols. p. 8vo. 14. The Ring and the Book, Lon., 1868-69, 4 vols. 12mo.

"The length of the poem is far too great; the form of it is clumsy; the repetitions numerous. Here and there is a passage full of Mr. Browning's odd contortions and obscurities, which have rendered 'Paracelsus' and so many of his lyrics sealed books to the multitude. But, all deductions being made, he has in the present volumes given to the world a poem that must be considered one of the most considerable of the nineteenth century."—Sat. Rev., xxvii, 40.

15. Balanston's Adventure: including a Transcript from Euripides, Lon., 1871, 12mo; 3d ed., 1881.

"From Mr. Browning's poem, including his transcript from the 'Alcestis' of Euripides, the capable English student may learn more of the form and spirit of Greek tragedy than is known to some prosaic Greek scholars."—Sat. Rev., xxxii, 300.

16. Prince Hohenstiel-Schwangau, Saviour of Society, Lon., 1871, 12mo.

"The title of Saviour of Society is almost as definitely personal as a proper name, and . . . the French Empire might have been substituted for the imaginary principality."

"The Emperor Napoleon indeed would, even if he had been introduced in his own name, have had little reason to complain of an apostolite who sometimes defends his conduct, and motives with a subtle ingenuity of which he might perhaps himself be scarcely capable. Notwithstanding the ironical appearance of the title-page, his services in saving society are acknowledged in perfect seriousness. . . . The picturesque and impressive passages which are thickly interspersed through the poem would suddenly atone for defects which it might be possible to point out both in the plan and the composition. . . . The Browning's marvellous by solutions of thought is in itself no inconsiderable pleasure, for experience shows that the windings of the labyrinth are regulated by a law, and that in the utmost recesses a treasure is concealed."—*Sat. 17. Fifine at the Fair, Lon., 1872, 12mo.

"The whole of Mr. Browning's poem is . . . an illustration of his text that the life of man is a life of error lived by the help of truth, a life of falsehood which implies the need and capacity for reality, a life of illusion grounded and fulfilled in some ultimate perception of true being, and yet always inspires us—in short, a life such as that called her 'divine or mortal, or a mingling of both.' This is the theme which Mr. Browning pursues through many a page of his eccentric, candid, abrupt, business-like passion, into something like a philosophy of love, of beauty, of art, and even of faith."—Spectator, xlv, 83.

"It would need a bold man, indeed, to read the book through once stealthily from cover to cover, close it, and second reading will soon disabuse him. His third and fourth—each of which will be labour well paid—will make him wonder, with ourselves, whether Mr. Browning has not, in some of his fortresses of strength, set the world a riddle to be solved by those alone who plough with his heifer!"—Ath., No. 2328.

"Fifine" is the most enigmatical of all Mr. Browning's works, with the exception of "Bordello." . . . Yet in spite of all the drawbacks to enjoyment which are happily interposed, the subtle and profound genius of Mr. Browning encourages and partially rewards apparently hopeless toil, and it is his pleasant duty to follow in the plan of his poem the usual associations of an actual dream as it is occasionally represented in poetry, he composes one of those symbolic allegories which are unknown to the sleep of real life. . . . Whether Mr. Browning is essentially justified in framing elaborate riddles which drive ordinary readers to despair sometimes descends into a jargon little better than slang, is a question of literary morality which is not to be hastily solved. . . . Undoubtedly the puzzled and angry critic, starting at his himself liking what he approached with a bailing ignorance, may be hoped that he sometimes emerges into a glimmering of knowledge. . . . For the first time he finds that the disorder which jar upon his ear and his judgment have a relation to art, and that the connection of desultory passages is to be traced, if at all, by an inherent attraction to mountain climbers. The great majority of "Fifine" not worth the labour of discovery of the meaning gratification in the Prologue and Epilogue, both of which probably bear some kind of relation to the main poem, bolder, is, with the exception of the last scene in the Second Part of "Faust," almost solitary attempt to apply a humorous treatment to death; yet nothing can be more earnest than the figurative expression of impatience to attain after death is not a doctrine that personal regard familiar matter of course, gives to the little poem a reality worthy of Dante."—Sat. Rev., xxxiv, 220.

Selections from the Poetical Works of Robert Browning, Lon., 1872, 8vo. (Chiefly the same poems as in the selections published in 1865.) 20. Red Cotton Nightcap Country, or, Turf and Towers, Lon., 1873, 12mo. (This is founded on incidents brought to light in a lawsuit at Saint-Aubyn in Normandy. The real names of the persons concerned were originally given in the poem, but by the advice of Sir John (now Lord) Coleridge fictitious names were adopted, including a Transcript from Euripides: being the Ion Adventure of Balauston, Lon., 1875, 12mo. 22. The Inn Album, a Poem in Blank Verse, Lon., 1875, 12mo. (This is founded on incidents in the life of Lord de Ros, whose career of dissipation had made him notorious.)

"Mr. Browning . . . has never chosen a more dramatic, than in the 'Inn Album.' In this he has displayed, more than anywhere else, the essentially dramatic power of the force of his new poem, which is marked degree, swift convergence of three histories of tragic passion, in a speculative reflection that takes a reader's attention away from the characters put before him."—Sat. Rev., xl, 716.

"The raw material of a 'peny dreadful,' such as the theme here is, requires more artistic manipulation than beauty of any kind is what he has carefully excluded. Vulgarity, therefore, is stamped upon the 'Inn Album,' in spite of the ingenuity with which, by suppressing the name of each in presenting only the spiritual action, and reaction of his characters upon each other, in spite of the marvellous-sculpt-exercise of analysis which laid the most which gives a value to everything he has to say."—J. A. Sat. Rev., xlii, 265.

23. Pueblharolto, and How he Worked in Distemper: with other Poems, Lon., 1878, 12mo.

"In the present volume he challenges all who presume to form and express an independent judgment of his poems in language so unprovoked, so unreasonably, and to answer his defiance. . . . It is a whimsical fancy of a genuine poet to write verses in the hope of frightening and insulting readers into admiration and reverence."—Sat. Rev., xlii, 265.

"His later works have been injured, this last of all, utterly spoiled, by the strong tide of intellectual disgust under which he labours."—Spectator, xlix, 1076.

24. The Agamemnon of Eschylus, Lon., 1877, 12mo.

"We expected great things from this translation, and upon his mother-tongue was disappointed. . . . He has trampled and played such fantastic tricks with the words of a bull, and upon that it requires all the nobler poems with which he has enriched and adorned the English language to weigh against the deep treason of these unparalleled offences."—Spectator, l, 1302.

"It does not convey to the English reader either the pleasure of a poem in his own tongue or the impression which the original makes on a scholar's mind. . . . The version, comparing English and Greek phrases in detail, in matching word with word, and maintaining the exact order of the original."—J. A. Sat. Rev., xli, 419.

25. La Suisiaz; and The Two Poets of Croisic, Lon., 1878, 12mo.

"The two poems which make up the present volume apparently owe their origin to Mr. Browning's residence at one time on the coast of Brittany, and at another time in a remote village on the Savoy side of the Lake of Geneva. . . . The reader . . . is destined to condense the history of two scarcely forgotten poets whose existence Mr. Browning has happily rediscovered, because they lived centuries. . . . The poem contains nearly fourteen hundred lines of which not one is calculated to dwell in the memory. . . . The poem which takes its name from the ballet of La Suisiaz is founded on personal experience of the sudden death of a near friend. . . . A touching expression of feelings natural on the occasion, Mr. Browning passes . . . a long and subtle course of reasoning on the probability of future life. As in many of other poems, he rather indicates than expresses thoughts which have probably in his own mind both a logical and Browning in the faculty of reasoning in verse if he could but condescend to be lucid."—Sat. Rev., xlv, 759.

26. Dramatic Idyls, 1879, p. 8vo.

"The style is less obscure than that of some of Mr. Browning's poems, and his characteristic vigour survives, though it is almost wholly exhibited in a graceful form, and for the purpose, or at least with the effect, of giving useless pain."—Sat. Rev., xvii, 774.

"This is by far the best book which Mr. Browning has published for many years. Though not reaching the level of his 'Men and Women,' or of the first portions of 'The Ring and the Book,' it has many passages full of his characteristic power, and, except where a rough style gives transient ugliness to the sketch, . . . nothing at all of his latest gasping style of English verse. Of course, his subjects are, as usual with Mr. Browning, startling and incongruous. He not only loves to flash his weird figures upon the imagination with all the suddenness and abruptness of a year breath away as much by the singularity of its attitude as by the suddenness of its appearance. He rejects poor poetry of the shading and the moral atmosphere which make the grimmest subjects seem natural when they are given in connection with all the conditions of their history and world, rather than in his harmony, or the context which, at the least, explains it. But assuming . . . the poet's special bent and genius, there is nothing specially harsh in this volume, and much that is really powerful, while the pictures in it are lent a touch of grandeur by the purpose which penetrates the life portrayed."—Spectator, lli, 692.

27. Dramatic Idyls: Second Series, 1880, 12mo.

"In the present volume Mr. Browning has tested less severely than usual the inexhaustible loyalty of his genuine admirers. The second series of 'Dramatic Idyls' exhibits one of his peculiar gifts in his discernment of the poetic use which may be made of popular stories."—Sat. Rev., l, 237.

There is the same alertness, the same exuberance of vitality, the same unrivalled intellectual subtlety, the same brilliant wit and searching humour, with which he has been familiarizing us for many years."—Ibid., No. 280.

"The key of Ferishah's philosophy is contained in the text of his discourse; and some of the parables illustrate even to the average intellect the moral which they are intended to convey. . . . In all of them the transitions, the inferences, and the whole treatment of the subject-matter are essentially poetical."—Sat. Rev., xviii, 72.

"In 'Ferishah's Fancies' we have, as we suppose, a familiar sketch of Mr. Browning's theology, with its bearing on the morality of our actual life."—Spectator, lvii, 164.

GENERAL CRITICISM:—

"No poet since Burns—none, perhaps, since Shakespeare—has known and felt so deeply as Mr. Browning the pathos of human life."—Ibid., No. 2680.

"If Mr. Arnold is the poet of our times who as poet could least resist the maladie du siècle in its subtler forms, he whose energy of heart and soul most absolutely rejects and repels its influence is Mr. Browning. To him the world appears to be a palaestra in which we are trained and tested for other lives to come; it is a gymnasium for athletes. Action, passion, knowledge, beauty, science, art,—these are names of some of the means and instruments of our training and education. The size of sizes, according to his ethical creed, is language of heart, lethargy or faintness of spirit, with the dimness of vision and feebleness of hand attending such moral enervation. Which of us does not suffer now and again from a touch of spiritual paralysis? Mr. Browning's poetry, to describe it in a word, is a galvanic battery for the use of spiritual paralytics. At first the shock and the tingling frightened patients away; now they crowd to the physician and celebrate the cure. . . . Which of us does not need at times that virtue should pass into him from a stronger human soul? To touch the singing robes of the author of 'Rabbi Ben Ezra,' and 'Prosplee,' and 'The Grammarian's Funeral,' is to feel an influx of new strength."—E. DOWDEN: Victorian Literature, (Transcripts and Studies, p. 210).

"The essential thing about him, what differentiates him from other poets, seems to be that he is primarily a psychologist, with a certain poetic and dramatic color as regards religion, lit., and love, and with a subtle and intricate mode of expressing himself—we do not speak of the strained prosaicalness, the labored conversationalism, of his surface style—which is perfectly in consonance with the depth of his insight into the hidden recesses and subtleties of human character which he so naturally and so much loves to study and depict."—Action, viii, 135.

"Browning . . . is by nature and sympathy a realist. He has a strong hold on fact, a resolute aversion from fancies and illusions, however arising, from whatever part of man's nature they spring, by whatever interests chromed; keen and hardly thought and care for reality are constant elements of his work. His energetic curiosity has in it something of Bacon; his vigorous research and intellectual exploration something of Aristotle. He knows life in its large and thorough sense, though no 'pursuit' of his, is in complete sympathy with the habit and operation of his mind. But with this quality and these powers he is not a thinker, and, above all, a poet. He is a realist, and mastered by his practical bent nor by the world of facts, and he is certainly not absorbed or over-impressed by recent aspects of knowledge, or by the result of modern science. He knows how 'mere facts' neither exhaust the world nor satisfy the mind. He knows life 'infinite significances' that facts have for thought, and this significance comes of the mind's own laws and depths. He is, in a word, an idealist in the last resort. Behind the energetic realness and strong grip on facts is a 'visionary power' and sense of ideas,—convictions and passions that claim and affirm a world more real because ideal. Every fact—and the body of experience is seen upon this ground—is illumined and transmuted by this principle. He has the poet's 'ulterior, intellectual perceptions,' the artist's sense of the reality of the ideal, the thinker's conviction of its spirituality. Aware of both sides of experience, and keenly aware of its real side, he yet sees and understands the clue to experience and to the unknowable element of man's own nature. Of all worlds to him the most real is the world of man's thought and passion; and the world of man's mind and spirit has far greater interest for him than any world of things and forces. He feels the emotions, the characters and actions, of men, the expression of man through religion and art, the revelation of man in literature and history,—here indeed is a realm of facts of most curious and profound interest, facts revealing and rewarding interpretation more than any other facts, and throwing more light than the whole body of physical knowledge on all that is of most value for us to know. With the strongly positive quality of nature that has been described, Browning has bent his mind upon these facts above all others, and in his study and command of them gives assurance both of solidity and depth. In an age of science mainly physical, he has maintained and illustrated the supreme interest and most real significance of man, not only to himself and with reference to every 'use of life, but with reference to knowledge too. To this ground he has kept; from this stand-point and with this outlook all his work has been made."—JAMES FURNIVALL: Studies in the Poetry of Robert Browning, 2d ed., pp. 18-20.

"Browning's poetry is peculiarly needed by the present generation. It is a counter-irritant to that poison of subjectivity which impels poets to shut themselves up in the maze of their own personal experiences, and to imitate Nature because they cannot dramatize Man. When, day by day, originality grows more rare, when eccentricity masquerades as independence, when men's minds are more and more cast in uniform moulds, and when forty poets write like one, it is something that Browning reversed the conventional value of expression above substance, refused to turn the handle of a music box, disdained the shower of similes which displayed the ingenious fancy of the rhetorical artist. His very ruggedness is a protest against that creamy smoothness which emasculates religion, everts literature, and robs character of its virility. . . . Browning's characteristic theme is the scope and meaning of the human soul, the interior life, and its laws. Spiritual dynamics are his passion. He explores the shadowy region in which ideas, feelings, motives, are generated by elusive, impalpable elements. He notes everything which moves or reveals the soul, in order that he may disclose its mental machinery. It is the Columbus of a new continent, and both the voyage and the country itself are strange to us. His aim is to seize the unacted, unspoken impulses of character, for he is convinced that speech or conduct imperfectly expresses real motives. Action does not translate thought, truthfully or idiomatically. In the working of the mind upon itself, in the rise and growth of particular moods, in the inward conflict of feeling, he laid bare the soul's consciousness. So it is that Browning prizes particular crises and particular characters. On the one hand, he values those moments of intense passion which make their own laws, those sudden crises which hit men on their feet or catch them off their guard, those strange conjunctures which break down barriers, stifle prejudice, and sweep away conventionality. Such lightning-flashes light up the very essence of human nature, and reveal the soul to itself. On the other hand, he is on similar grounds, attracted to those soft characters, who alone are capable of the requisite intensity and energy of feeling. It is not the laws of life which he esteems, but the exceptions. . . . Even in the introspective drama, which is his own chosen field, he is not in one sense dramatic. He does not merge himself into his characters, but always speaks with his vizor raised. His thought is vividly embodied in real men and women; but the embodiment is often permeated with his own strong personality. He enters into them, scrutinizes their experiences, analyzes their motives, and presents them and their case in the light of his own mental habits. On the other hand, in his dramatic experiments he created a wide variety of human characters, each distinctly and individualized, each surrounded by circumstances of his own imagi-propriate individual details always true. It is always self is represented, paired or contrasted, or put in a little opposition of line and artist. Of range of every age with life conditions which upon the quires the fully awake without; activity is are feelings crises more the needs traces are which into which reveals and given cause he in sympathy doing he taken propriate world, set in a frame which is drawn with infinite detail and unflinching sympathy. His abstractions are always translated into terms of real life, and his thought self is repeated in living characters. Browning him- self is present indeed, but the vitality of no one creation is imparted; each figure is complete and distinct in itself. The impact is present indeed, but he gives us no models twisted into a fitting pose, through whose mouth he utters his own opinions or appropriate meditation. Here is no simulation of life more chastely than original death, no play of limb and feature reflected from the individuality of the range of characters, drawn from every scale of humanity, every age and every clime, men and women throbbing with life and passion, intense in the expression of emotions which they intensely feel. It is true that he relies upon the quick apprehensions of his readers, that he re- fully awake, and that his character pieces are presented without aid from actors, stage direction, or action. His scenery is laid in the chambers of thought; his persons are feelings, his situations transitions of emotion, his crises moments in the growth of moods, his catastrophes traces are embodied and individualized, not by the impulses which interpret formed characters, but by the impulses which reveal characters in process of formation. But, in and given them voice to proclaim their innermost souls, he has fused his live soul with the inert mass by the sympathetic action of a vivid imagination. And in so doing he has created a new form of dramatic literature, and taken

“for a nobler stage the soul itself,
Its shifting fancies and celestial lights,
With all its grand orchestral silences,
To keep the paces of the rhythmic sounds.”

Manitoba: its Infancy, Growth, and Present Condition. Maps and Illust. Lon., 1882, cr. 8vo.

"A ten years' residence in Manitoba enables Prof. Bryce to write with authority: Yet his personal experiences constitute a small portion only of his volume, the greater part being devoted to a narrative of what Lord Selkirk did for what is now Canada's 'Prairie Province.'"—Ibid., No. 2831.

2. A Short History of the Canadian People, Lon., 1887, p. 8vo.

"No one who has read Dr. Bryce's 'Manitoba' could doubt that in chronicling the events of his native country he would bring to this duty an industry, an accuracy, and a conscientious desire to be impartial, which, after all, are to the historian and to the student of history qualities of infinitely greater importance than mere literary power and a trick of marshalling his facts—or assumptions—in a dramatic form. A critical examination of the Short History amply confirms this belief."—Acad., xxxi, 308.

Bryce, James, D.C.L., son of James Bryce, of Bowshill, Blantyre, Glasg. W. B. 1818; at Belfast; educated at the University of Glasgow, and at Trinity College, Oxford, graduating in 1842, with a double first class. He was elected Fellow of Oriel College, Oxford, in 1842; was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1847, and practised as a barrister for some years. In 1849 he was appointed Regius professor of civil law at Oxford. He was elected member of Parliament for the Tower Hamlets in 1860, and for South Aberdeen in 1885 and again in 1890, and was under secretary of state for foreign affairs in the latter year. 1. The Holy Roman Empire, (Arnold Prize Essay for 1863,) Lon., 1864, 8vo; 4th ed., with a supplementary chapter on the new German Empire, 1874; 7th ed., rev., 1884.

"It exactly supplies a want; it affords a key to much which men read of in their books as isolated facts, but of set before them. . . . We know of no English writer who has so thoroughly and really treated the real nature and essence of the mediæval Empire, and its relations alike to earlier and to later time."—*Sat. By James Bryce, W. K. Sullivan, George Sigerson, J. H. Bridges, Lord Edmund Fitzmaurice, James F. Thurefield, and G. P. Macdonell. Lon., 1888, demy 8vo.

"It is singularly free from bias, prejudice, and party spirit; its statements are accurate, and the tangled web of the Indian difficulty is unravelled with considerable success. . . . Yet the result of the joint labour of seven gifted and well-informed men, it is before all things disappointing."—Ath., No. 3160.

"It is an admirable book in many ways, full of the nutriment of fact and of just observations often eloquently and always lucidly put; but it is too big. . . . The subject is vast, the knowledge of the author is immense, in every page those who wish to know America obtain fresh nutriment for their thoughts. . . . The exhaustiveness of the times almost burrowing impartiality, are marvelous; and some in this generation, and among the host of interests which has to be considered, with that reserve, however, we have nothing but praise for 'The American Commonwealth.' We have not found a point of interest which is not thoroughly discussed, or an opinion which is not supported by full illustrations, or a judgment which is not substantiated in the slightest degree either by prejudice or rancour."—Spectator, lxi, 184.

"He is apparently very conscious of the vast importance of America, and, though he does not argue for a side, is a firm believer in the virtues of democracy. Yet he has to write a long book to tell us such truths about it as these circumstances, it has achieved a government in which democracy is preferred, in which personal interests are of immense importance, in which the general vulgarly and rudeness of the scramble shut out men who possess ability and some regard for their dignity."—Sat. Rev., lxxi, 745.

"It may be safely assumed that all candid Americans will recognize it as a truthful and trustworthy picture of our institutions and our people. The prevailing sentiment in regard to it in this country will be found in its powerful, clear, and sympathetic appreciation of all its power, strength and all that is weak in the phase of human progress."—Nation, xliv, 13.

Buchanan, Robert Williams, b. 1841, in Glasgow, Scotland, is the son of Robert Buchanan, 1813-1866, a journalist and lecturer, who advocated the socialistic views of Robert Owen, and published several pamphlets and small books in 1839-40. The son was educated at Glasgow High School and University, and had for his college companion and intimate friend the poet David Gray, infra, with whom he shared a garret in London after their arrival in that city in 1869. His literary career began in that year, and has been active and prolific ever since. Besides the books enumerated below, he has produced some acting dramas.—A Ninu Days' Queen, &c.—has given public readings, and has been a frequent contributor to periodicals, especially the Contemporary Review. He visited the United States in 1884-85. 1. Undertones, Lon., 1863, 12mo; 2d ed.,

1867. 2. Idylls and Legends of Inverburn, Lon., 1865, 12mo. 3. London Poems, Lon., 1866, 12mo.

"It is the life of London—and mostly the life of poor and cringing people—which has drawn the poet into song: into edifying musical utterance and a resoundingly poetic life to the deep and sombre morals which underlie so much of what looks like the dull and common wattle of sin. . . . On the whole, these London Poems make good the promise of the "Undertones." They are true and genuine work, the result of real observation and personal emotion. . . . These verses have been lived before they were written down."—Atk., No. 2921.

"This is essentially an autobiography, being made up almost entirely of extracts from his private journals, which seem to have been very copious and full, containing often a minute account of the doings of each day. . . . It comprises only about one-fifth of the matter which was placed in the hands of the publisher by the widow. . . . The book before us is one of unquestionable interest and value, not only for its relation to the life of our illustrious naturalist, but also on account of the spirited and graphic pictures which it contains of the border and backwoods life of this country."—Nation, ix, 13.

8. David Gray, and other Essays, chiefly on Poetry, Lon., 1868, 12mo.

"The history of David Gray is full of melancholy interest: less tragic, it is true, than that of Chatterton, less absorbing, because of the infinitely smaller proportions of the central figure, than that of Keats, and yet sadder, enough and sad enough to win the regretful sympathies of every reader. . . . It is unfair to David Gray that his story, well and simply told as it is, should have to contend against the dead weight of the rest of the book."—Sat. Rev., xxxi, 372.

"The plan . . . (which) includes no action whatever somewhat recalls Shelley's 'Hellas.' The style is that of overloaded kind of which Shelley was probably the avante-courier, and which in weaker hands has been so abused in our day. . . . "There is a good deal to be said about the unwholesomeness not only of Mr. Rossetti's and Mr. Swinburne's poetry, but of the mutual admiration in which they and their associates appear to live and move and have their being. . . . But apart from the question of Mr. Buchanan's good taste in putting himself forward as advocatus diaboli, it may be doubted whether he has shown himself capable of doing justice to his cause. . . . There is, unhappily, a spreading taint of sensualism, which may be traced in various directions at the present moment, but it may be seriously doubted whether such productions as this pamphlet are not calculated rather to minister to than to check it."—*Sat. "In Holder the Beautiful the pleasure we might otherwise receive is greatly marred by the poet's ineluctable use of adjectives, and by much that when divested of all defects, the poem is one which none but a true poet could have written, and there are passages in it marked by noble imagination and felicitous description."—Spectator, l. 1179.

"In this novel we recognize with pleasure Mr. Buchanan's return to the former ways of pleasantness which we have so often trodden with him in his earlier and more popular measure. It has the great gift of imagination which bears the marks of his hasty execution, but the sketch is powerful one, and there are passages in the writing of a great power and beauty."—Spectator, lix. 834.

"The personality of Buchanan is the real thing in the volume; his opinions—at least the literary ones—are not so much his consequence. He is a good hater, and he does not like his talent in a pugkin; he venders his solid bil-lingsate with rhetoric of some color and polish; but all that he does truly regard the great names with which he makes free, and venerates them."—Nation, xlv. 411.

Buckland, Francis Trevelyan, [ante, vol. i, add.], 1829-1880, b. at Oxford; educated at Winchester, and at Christ Church, Oxford, where he took his B.A. degree in 1848; became a medical student, and was afterwards house-surgeon at St. George's Hospital, and from 1851 to 1863 assistant surgeon to the 2d Life Guards. In 1867 he was appointed inspector of salmon-fisheries. He became the highest authority of his day on pisciculture, and was indefatigable in his efforts to improve the British fisheries, salt-water and fresh. At his own expense he established the Museum of Economic Fish-Culture, which afterwards expanded into the International Fisheries Exhibition of 1883. He founded the journal called Land and Water, and contributed many papers to its columns, as well as to those of The Field. For biog., see BOWMAN, GEORGE C., supra. The following list of his works includes the only one mentioned ante, vol. i. 1. Curiosities of Natural History. Illust. Four series. Lon., 1858-72. 2. Fish-Hatching, Lon., 1863, p. 8vo. 3. Buckle, Henry Thomas, F.R.A.S. [ante, vol. i, add.] b. at Lee, Eng. Owing to his delicate health when young, he received very little education, but in 1840, after the death of his father, a London ship-owner, he went abroad for a year, and studied the languages of the Continental countries with such avidity and success that in 1850 he could read nineteen languages with facility and converse fluently in seven. He passed most of the remainder of his life in London, engaged chiefly in the preparation of a work which was originally intended to be a general history of civilization. The first volume, which bore the title of History of Civilization in England, vol. i, was published, as stated ante, vol. i, in 1857; vol. ii, which treats of Spain and Scotland, in 1861, (not 1858, as stated ante, vol. i.) The work thus left incomplete, and forming in fact only an introduction, was republished as History of Civilization in England, France, Spain, and Scotland, 1866, 3 vols. p. 8vo. There have been six later editions, the last in 1878. Translations have been published in France, Germany, and Russia, and in the last-mentioned country the work has had an extensive circulation and a stronger influence than elsewhere. Buckle published nothing more, except some magazine articles and a pamphlet entitled A Letter to a Gentleman respecting Pooley's Case, 1859. For biog., see HURN, A. H., infra. The Miscellaneous and Posthumous Works of Henry Thomas Buckle. Edited, with a Biographical Notice, by Helen Taylor. Lon., 1872, 3 vols. 8vo; abridged ed., edited by Grant Allen, 1882, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"The posthumous works consist of but Mr. Buckle's commonplace-books and some hundred and fifty notes or fragments, of various lengths. . . . As to what are called the 'Miscellaneous Works,' they consist . . . of but the single lecture and the single magazine article which marked the beginning, and we may also say the close, of Mr. Buckle's public career."—Ath., No. 2356.

"There are . . . pieces here which, fragmentary as they are, it was quite right to preserve and publish. But to publish a huge gathering, sometimes of obvious truisms, sometimes of obvious blunders, bits from books which are in everybody's hands, bits from books which do not deserve to be in anybody's hands, is no real tribute to Mr. Buckle's memory."—*Sat. Bucknill, John Charles, M.D., F.R.C.P., F.R.S., b. 1817, at Market Bosworth, Eng.; educated at Rugby, and at Bosworth School, and studied medicine at University College, London, graduating first in surgery in 1840. From 1844 to 1862 he was first medical superintendent of the Devon County Lunatic Asylum; from 1862 to 1876 he held the office of lord chancellor's medical visitor for lunatics. He established the Journal of Mental Science in 1863, and was its editor for nine years; he was also one of the original editors of Brain. Besides numerous pamphlets, lectures, and articles, he has published: 1. Unsoundness of Mind in Relation to Criminal Acts, (Sugden Prize Essay), Lon., 1857, 12mo. 2. The Psychology of Shakespeare, 1859, 8vo; 2d ed., rev., entitled The Mad Folk of Shakespeare, 1867. 3. The Medical Knowledge of Shakespeare, Lon., 1860, 8vo. 4. Notes on Asylums for the Insane in America, Lon., 1876, p. 8vo. 5. Habitual Drunkenness and Insane Drunkards, Lon., 1878, p. 8vo. 6. The Care of the Insane, and their Legal Control, Lon., 1880, p. 8vo. Budd, William, M.D., F.R.S. 1811-1880, b. at North Tawton, Devonshire, Eng.; studied medicine in London, Edinburgh, and Paris, graduating at the University of Edinburgh in 1838; settled in Bristol in 1842, and became physician to St. Peter's Hospital and the Bristol Royal Infirmary. His investigations in regard to the propagation of disease, and especially of typhoid fever, laid the foundation of the view now generally held in regard to this subject. Besides many contributions to medical journals, he published: 1. Malignant Cholera: its Mode of Propagation and its Prevention, Lon., 1849. 2. Varicella Ovis, Sheep's Small-Pox; or, The Laws of Contagious Epilemies illustrated by an Experimental Type, 1863. 3. The Siberian Cattle-Plague; or, The Typhoid Fever of the Ox, Bristol, 1865. 4. Scarlet Fever and its Prevention, Lon., 1869, p. 8vo; 5th ed., 1871. 5. Cholera and Disinfection; or, Asiatic Cholera in Bristol in 1866, Lon., 1871, 4to. 6. Typhoid Fever: its Nature, Mode of Spreading, and Prevention, Lon., 1873, r. 8vo.

"His principal work, 'Typhoid Fever,' . . . reproducing in a more complete form what he had previously published in the medical journals, proved beyond dispute that typhoid fever is contagious, and is propagated either by matter discharged from the intestine. . . . Professor Tyndall . . . writes thus: 'Dr. William Budd I hold to have been a man of the highest genius. There was no physician in England who, during his lifetime, showed anything like his penetration in the interpretation of zymotic disease. For a great number of years he conducted an uphill fight against the whole of his medical colleagues. . . . His doctrines are now everywhere victorious.'"—G. T. BETTAN: *Dict. of Nat. "In construction Captain Bulloch's book is defective. . . . But in describing the doings of the war the work is conspicuously fair,—there being indeed a somewhat over-punctiliousness at times in the effort to do justice,—and it is uniformly interesting."—Nation, xxxvii, 377.

Bulloch, John, 1805-1882, a brass-worker in Aberdeen, made a special study of Shakespeare, and suggested a number of emendations in the text which were introduced into the Cambridge edition by W. G. Clark, 1863. Studies on the Text of Shakespeare, Lon., 1878, 8vo.

"Evidently the author has devoted the most unsparring labour to his subject. . . . If the mist of the past still obscures the figure of the artist himself, his surroundings have received very complete exposition. The book might have been entitled 'George Jamesone and his Times.' We are presented with a picture of the period in which he flourished; its political, social, religious, and artistic aspects are clearly set before us; we have biographies of his townsmen and neighbours, his friends and patrons, and are thus enabled to realize the entourage amid which he worked."—Acad., xxviii, 139.

Bulwer, Sir William Henry Lytton Earle, Baron Dalling and Bulwer, G.C.B., 1801-1872, ante, vol. i., where the year of his birth is incorrectly given as 1804, add.; educated at Harrow and Cambridge; served several years in the army; became a diplomatist, and proceeded through the various grades of attaché, secretary of legation, chargé d'affaires, &c., to that of ambassador to Spain 1843-48, minister plenipotentiary to the United States 1849-52, and to Tosenay 1852-55, and ambassador extraordinary to Turkey 1858-65. He was several times elected to Parliament, and was raised to the peerage in 1871. Add to the books mentioned in vol. i. a small volume of poems, published in 1822, and: 1. A Pamphlet on Crimean Questions. By an Old Reviewer. Lon., 1833. 2. Historical Characters: Talleyrand, Cobbett, Mackintosh, Canning, Lon., 1867, 2 vols. 8vo; 3rd ed., 1875.

"The two volumes . . . contain many anecdotes which are at once new and entertaining, and some observations which are apt and acute."—Sat. Rev., xxiv, 731.

3. The Life of Henry John Temple, Viscount Palmerston: with Selections from his Diaries and Correspondence; vols. i. & ii., Lon., 1870, 8vo; vol. iii., 1874, 8vo. See AUBLEY, EVELYN, supra. (A new edition of vols. i. and ii., edited, with considerable additions and alterations, by Mr. Ashley, formed part of the complete work as published in 1876.)

"We could wish the life had been written by one who had loved more in his society, and could to a certain extent have boswelized him, as he would have repaid the process more than says that most of our public men. As it is, the book, though a valuable contribution to history, is imagination had previously conceived of a life of Lord Palmerston."—Acad., vi, 575.

4. (Ed.) Selections from Lord Palmerston's Private Journals of Tours in France in 1815 and 1818, Lon., 1871, 8vo.

"As Sir H. Bulwer's materials for the personal biography of Lord Palmerston were necessarily scanty, he is fortunate in the discovery of a highly interesting fragment of his Journal. It is evident that Lord Palmerston was a quick and accurate observer; and all the extracts which Sir H. Bulwer has selected from his letters and diaries prove that he was an easy and lively writer."—Sat. Rev., xxxi, 216.

5. Sir Robert Peel: an Historical Sketch, Lon., 1874, 8vo. Posth. (This is included in the 5th ed. of Historical Characters.)

Bunsen, Frances, Baroness, 1791-1876, the oldest daughter and co-heiress of Benjamin Waddington, b. at Dunston Park, Berkshire. In 1817, while residing with her parents at Rome, she was married to the Chevalier (afterwards Baron) Bunsen, then at the outset of his career as a scholar and a diplomatist. She survived her husband, who died in 1860, and in accordance with one of his last requests published a Memoir of Baron Bunsen, drawn chiefly from Family Papers. By his Widow, Lon., 1868, 2 vols. 8vo; 2d ed., enlarged and corrected, 1869.

"It is altogether too prolix, and the details are not sufficiently observed between what is left to the student to the Bunsen family and the reader, and what is interesting to the public."—Sat. Rev. l. 143.

(Contains three articles on the revised New Testament, and a reply to Bishop Elliott's pamphlet in defence of the revisers and their text.)

"Vigorous, learned, full of anecdotes and selfassertiveness, these pages will prove, to those who take an interest in the subject, delightful reading. . . . In much of his criticism of the Revised Version I must confess myself very much at one with him. But if he supposes that he can turn back the course of critical inquiry, and re-establish the hitherto received text—or something much more like it than that of Drs. Westcott and Hort—in place of the conclusions of the most advanced scholarship, he will undoubtedly find that he has undertaken a hopeless task."—ROBERT H. DUMMOND: Acad., xxv. 254.

44. To Ednae Young Women like Young Men, and with Young Men, a Thing Inexpedient and Unmodest, 1883. 45. Poems, (1840-1878.) Lon., 1883, 12mo. 46. Lives of Twelve Good Men, Lon., 1888, 2 vols. cr. 8vo. Posth. (Contains lives of Martin Joseph Rowth, Hugh James Rose, Charles Marriott, Edward Hawkins, Samuel Wilberforce, Robert Lynch Cotton, Richard Greswell, Henry Octavius Cox, Henry Longueville Mansel, William Jacobson, Charles Page Eden, and Charles Longuet Higgins.)

"The volumes possess a general and a special claim to public attention. Crowded as they are with anecdotes and with personal traits, they have attractions for the Poysses and Boswells of the nineteenth century. But they also appeal, in the first place, to all who are interested in the religious life of the century, and especially to all who are students of the Tractarian movement and its subsequent development. They appeal, in the second place, to Tractarians in particular, as a precious portrait-gallery of Oxford worthies, and an invaluable collection of reminiscences respecting the lives and characters of some of her most distinguished sons."—ibid., No. 318.

"The research displayed in the present volume [vol. 1] and the various sources of interest to be found in it will insure it a cordial welcome. Such bias as there is may be allowed for and turned to account."—Academy, iii, 1679.

"The chief advantage possessed by the book consists in this,—that quotations of a telling kind are brought together from authors when nobody now reads except for the purpose of writing history."—NICHOLAS POORE; Aead., xviii, 567.

Burke, Rev. Thomas Nicholas, 1830-1883, b. in Galway, Ireland; studied theology at Rome, and became a member of the Dominican order; ordained priest 1853; founded a Dominican novitiate near Dublin, and was for some time prior of a monastery of Irish Dominicans at Rome. In 1872 he made a tour in the United States, visiting the houses of his order and preaching and lecturing to immense audiences, his lectures on Ireland in reply to Mr. Froude being those which excited the widest attention. (An earlier edition of this book or a previous autobiography was published anonymously in 1853 under the title of The Autobiography of a Beggar Boy.)

"His early life was spent as a beggar. . . . At the age of fifty-seven he went the same time a pauper and president of the Burns Club in Edinburgh. On the occasion of the Burns centenary he made a speech, which was reported at full length in the Scotsman. . . . He now gladly availed himself of an opportunity of going to America, and at the age of sixty he landed in that country with his wife and four children, and exactly twelve and sixpence in ready money. . . . He complains that while in America he and his family were 'completely isolated from society. . . . When he was severely ill, succeeded in getting an appointment as Inspector of Mines, which was reported at another grant from the Royal Literary Fund, and then he went to live with his daughters at Hammersmith, where he prepared the present book for the press. It would not be wise in us if twenty years hence a second volume were to appear, describing the author's various experiences, vicissitudes, and hardships, which he escapes between the ages of fifty and a hundred. . . . The patient reader. . . will find it well paid at least to reward him. . . . Its most adverse critic will not be so ready to admit that it is a literary curiosity."—Sat. Rev., iv. 608.

Burnaby, Frederick Gustavus, 1812-1883, b. at Bedford, Eng.; educated at Harrow School in Germany; was gazetted cornet in a cavalry regiment at the age of sixteen, and rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel in 1880. He was remarkable for his great stature and enormous strength and his thirst for adventure, combined with a familiarity with several languages, including Turkish and Arabic, and a facile pen. He travelled in various countries, made many balloon-ascents, some of which were attended with great danger; was correspondent of the Times in Spain during the Carlist rebellion of 1874, and in the Sudan, whither he accompanied General Gordon in the same year, and acquired celebrity upon his journey on horseback into Central Asia in the winter of 1875-76, when he penetrated as far as Khiva, but was then recalled at the request of the Russian government. In 1876-77 he made a similar tour in Asia Minor, and in the Russo-Turkish war of 1877-78 he commanded for a short time a Turkish brigade. He held a command as a volunteer in General Graham's expedition in the Eastern Sudan in 1884, and in the expedition sent to the relief of General Gordon in the following year, and was killed in the battle at Abu Klea. For biog., see WARE, J. R., and MAX, R. K. 1. The Practical Instruction of Staff Officers in Foreign Armies: a Lecture, 1872. 2. A Ride to Khiva: Travels and Adventures in Central Asia, Lon., 1876, 8vo; 16th ed., 1881; new ed., 1884.

"It is impossible to read what he has written, and to use the maps he has supplied, without feeling that he furnishes a key to the comprehension of the general scheme of Central Asia from Persia to China; for, although he only went to Khiva, he mastered this scheme himself and understood exactly how to bring it before others. . . . The merit of Captain Burnaby as a traveller, or as any rate as a traveller in Russian Asia, is that he writes with an overpowering prepossession. . . . A one-sided book may, however, be an instructive one, and Captain Burnaby's book is unquestionably instructive. Within a narrow range it tells us much, and tells what it tells as well as any book that has been written on Russian Asia."—Sat. Rev., xlii. 668.

Burnand, Francis Cowley, b. 1837; educated at Eton, and at Trinity College, Cambridge; called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn 1862. While at college he founded a club known as the A. D. C., or Amateur Dramatic Club. He has written a large number of successful burlesques and other pieces for the stage, including a burlesque of Douglas Jerrold's nautical drama Black-Eyed Susan, which had a run of over four hundred consecutive nights in London, and a comedy called The Colonel, which was equally successful. He has been for a number of years one of the chief contributors to Punch, and in 1880, on the death of Mr. Tom Taylor, he became its editor. 1. Tracks for Tourists; or, The Continental Companion, Lon., 1864, p. 8vo. 2. Happy Thoughts, Lon., 1868, 12mo.

"Of the many 'Happy Thoughts' which have occurred either to Mr. Burnand or his hero, the thought of having such thoughts is the happiest. . . . Utterly ludicrous as his characters are, they are neither monstrosities nor abortions. They are exaggerations of what is perfectly real, living 'humours' combined too copiously, but not invented. They have too many sides, and each side is brought out in turn with too much completeness. But in every case the skeleton is familiar to us. When Mr. Burnand begins to sketch in the first outlines, we recognize them at once, and perhaps we wonder at the absence of all novelty. But then he overlays them with such a vivid wealth of caricature that we forget our first impression, and give ourselves up to the most meretricious enjoyment."—Ath., No. 2133.

"He has unobtrusively discovered a vein of facetiousness almost peculiar to himself, and works it with an industry and a success that is really surprising. It is, indeed, true that the fun is not brought from far below the surface. Nobody will suspect Mr. Burnand of being a deep thinker or a powerful satirist on the strength of his incessant flow of rather small jokes. The strain upon the intellect of author or of readers is remarkably small; and it is partly to that circumstance that his popularity is owing."—Sat. Rev., xxxviii, 90.

"The mechanical details, which necessarily occupy a large share of Mr. Burnley's attention, will not have an equal attraction for all readers; but few who take up this handsome volume will fail to be interested by the story, not without remnants of its own, of the enormous development and extension during the present century of one of the oldest of human arts and one of the earliest of British industries."—W. Burroughs, John, b. 1837, at Roxbury, N.Y.; became first a teacher and afterwards a journalist; was a clerk in the treasury department at Washington from 1861 to 1873, and was then appointed receiver of a bank at Middletown, N.Y., engaging also in the business of fruit-raising at Esopus, N.Y. His publications consist chiefly of successive series of papers on rural topics contributed originally to the Atlantic Monthly and other magazines. 1. Notes on Walt Whitman, as Poet and Person, N. "The minuteness of his observation, the keenness of his perception of all these things, give him a real originality, which is confirmed by a style sometimes indeed idiomatic and unfinished to a fault, but capable of remarkable felicity and vividness."—Nation, xxii. 66.

"It is a book which every lover of the woods and birds and every angler will take to his heart at once."—Nation, xxviii. 340.

"He quotes: Notes of a Walker, Bost., 1881, 16mo.

"He allows himself amount of dogmatizing, in presence of nature, which is not only unattractive but quite unsafe. . . . We own to liking Mr. Burroughs best when he is least controversial, and when, on the other hand, he gives us something more than simple narrative. . . . On the whole, this must be pronounced one of Mr. Burroughs's best books. It shows more depth of thought than some of his writings; more care in execution than others; there is none of that occasional coarseness which marred some of his earlier descriptions; and he only gives two pages to Walt Whitman."—Nation, xxxiii. 16.

"A delightful book, of a sort whereof the Americans almost seem to have the monopoly. It is redolent throughout of the fresh air and the woodlands; and yet it is as full of culture as an egg is full of meat."—GRANT ALLEN: Acad., xx. 43.

"In this last book of his . . . we catch his ripest utterance, his sunniest philosophy, his pleasantest imagery."—Critic, v. 270.

"There is the same exactness of observation, the same sense of a greater intimacy with wild life than is open through any other introduction, the same comradery of the end that we had been much out of doors. . . . The book has a literariness, which . . . interferes really with the simplicity of the common sounds and sights of nature which it reports."—Nation, xlii. 410.

He was of a Methodist family, and became a minister of that denomination, but afterwards joined the Anglican Church, and became rector of the church of All Saints, Manchester, which he had himself built at the cost of £18,000. He is also mentioned on the title-page of one of his books as minister of the Episcopal Chapel, Broad Court, Drury Lane, London. The following list of his publications, exclusive of single sermons and lectures, includes three which are mentioned ante, vol. i.: 1. Horae, Poeticae, 1815. 2. Middleton: an Elegiac Poem, Glaston-gow, 1820. Printed for private circulation. 3. A Selection of Psalms and Hymns, including Original Compositions, Manchester, 1820, 16mo. 4. The Bardiad: a Poem in two Cantos, Manchester and Lon., 1823; 2d ed. same year. 5. Three Discourses adapted to the Opening of the Nineteenth Century: exhibiting the Porten-tous and Auspicious Signs and Cardinal Duties of the Times, Manchester, 1825. 6. The Servant's Monitor, 1829. 7. Discourses suited to these Eventful and Critical Times, Lon., 1832, 8vo. 8. The Church and Dissent: an Appeal to Independents, Presbyterians, Methodists, and other Sects, Manchester, 1810. 9. Lectures on the Mil-lenium, Lon., 1841, 8vo. "A lady enjoys facilities for penetrating Oriental house-holds which are denied to men; and when these advan-tages are united to a spirit of adventure, a quick percep-tion of native ways, a genuine sympathy with the poor and friendless, and considerable powers of description, they result in a book which takes us pleasantly over old ground, and discloses some scenes hitherto familiar only to such travellers as N. Vambéry, Mr. Palgrave, or Captain Burton himself."—Sat. Rev., xl. 371.

Burton, John Hill, [ante, vol. i., add.] 1809-1881; b. and educated at Aberdeen; pursued his legal studies in Edinburgh, and continued to reside in that city. As an advocate he had little practice, and for some years he subsisted chiefly by literature. In 1854 he was made secretary to the prison board of Scotland, and after the publication of his History of Scotland he became historiographer royal for that country. He was a constant contributor to Blackwood's Magazine, in which the papers that make up The Book-Hunter and The Scot Abroad originally appeared. A memoir by his widow is prefixed to a large-paper edition of The Book-Hunter, published in 1882. 1. (Ed.) Autobiography of the Rev. Dr. Alexander Carlyle, Minister of Inveresk: containing Memorials of the Men and Events of his Time: with Notes and a Supplementary Catalogue, Edin. and Lon., 1860, 8vo. (See CARLYLE, ALEX., ante, vol. i.) "Without recognizing the extraordinary merit and interest which Dr. Carlyle's countrymen seem to see in his autobiography, there is a good deal of curious and amusing matter in it."—Sat. Rev., xl. 20.

2. The Book-Hunter, Edin., 1862, 12mo; also a large-paper ed. of 25 copies; 2d ed., 1863; American edition, with Notes by R. G. White, N. York, 1862; new eds., 1882, 1881.

"Described by the author as 'sketches of the ways of book-collectors, scholars, investigators, desultory readers, and other persons whose pursuits revolve round pleasant to read—pleasant, from its rich store of anecdote, and its humor, even to persons who are little delighted to those who are in any degree members of the above-mentioned fraternity.'"—Sat. Rev., xv. 604.

3. The Gairnagon Mountains, Lon., 1861, pp. 8vo. 4. The Scot Abroad, Lon., 1861, 2 vols. 12mo; new ed., 1881. 5. The History of Scotland, from Agriæola's In-vasion to the Revolution of 1688, Edin. and Lon., 1867, 7 vols. 8vo; vol. viii., The Extinction of the Last Jacobite Insurrection, 1870.

"Mr. Burton merits as an historical writer are great. . . . He writes throughout in a thoroughly straightforward and unadorned way. Vivid and picturesque description is not his strong point. . . . When he has to deal with the great ease of Queen Mary, his treatment of the subject becomes a model of argument.—Sat. Rev., xxvii, 493, 494.

"His 'History of Scotland' has, indeed, the field to itself at present, being as yet the only one composed with the accurate research which the modern standard of history demands. By complying with this peremptory command Burton has distanced all competitors, but must in turn give way when one shall arise who, emulating or borrowing his closeness of investigation, shall add the beauty and grandeur due to the history of a great and romantic country."—R. GARRETT: Dict. of Nat. Biog., viii, 11.

7. A History of the Reign of Queen Anne, Edin. and Lon., 1880, 3 vols. 8vo.

"As Mr. Burton lacks neither knowledge nor spirit, so his 'Reign of Queen Anne' is abundantly instructive and frequently entertaining; but to any one who has expected to find in this thousand or so pages something like a comprehensive survey of the period which they profess to cover, the substitute provided is likely to prove disappointing."—Sat. Rev., xlix, 475.

Burton, Sir Richard Francis, K.C.M.G., F.R.G.S. [ante, vol. i., add.], 1821-1890. He passed several years of his early life with his parents in France and Italy; was subsequently entered at Oxford, but, having obtained a commission in the army, left the university and went to India in 1842, and after eight years of active service in the Bombay army, chiefly on the staff of Sir Charles Napier, entered on a career of travel and exploration, for which his love of adventure, his great linguistic attainments, and his intercourse with people of many different races qualified him in a high degree. His chief expeditions were: to Medina and Mecca in 1833; to East Africa in 1855; to Central Africa (resulting in the discovery of Lake Tanganyika) in 1856-58; to the West Coast of Africa in 1861; and through the regions of South America lying south of Brazil in 1867; besides journeys across the United States, in Ireland, in Syria, &c. Probably no other traveller has ever explored so many diverse countries. His connection with the army, in which he attained no higher rank than that of captain, ceased in 1861, and since then he has been in the consular service, having held appointments at Fernando Po, Santos, (Brazil), Damascus, and since 1872 at Trieste. He has received the gold medals of the English and French Geographical Societies. The following list of his publications includes a few mentioned ante, vol. 1. He has also contributed papers to periodicals and notes to some works by other writers. For biog., see HITCHMAN, FRANCIS, infra. 1. - "The exquisite spirit as well as the letter of the Portuguese seem to me to live again in the English of Captain Burton."—OSWALD CRAWFORD, Acad., xxvii, 1.
- "Camouens is not 'Englished' in the volumes before us; he is 'Burtoned,' and that is a different matter. Captain Burton has constructed a dialect of his own, which is neither the English of the present day nor yet the English of Shakespeare, or of Chaucer, and it is in this new language that his very able version is composed."—Ath., No. 3000.
41. The Book of the Sword. Illust. Lon., 1884, imp. 8vo.
- "The first part of Captain Burton's 'Book of the Sword' leaves us in suspense before we are even in sight of the point where real swordsmanship begins. . . . It is impossible to charge Captain Burton's [work] with lack of substance or with unprofitable repetition of commonplace knowledge. Rather we are in danger of a surfeit from the bulk and variety of matter offered for our digestion in this goodly quarto."—Sat. Rev., lxxi, 418.

(Vols. i, and ii, contain stories from the Breslau text of the Arabian Nights which were not included in the Eastern editions of Cairo and Calcutta, with an appendix on Variants and Analogues, by W. A. Clouston. Vol. iii, contains Aladdin, Ali Baba, &c. Vol. iv, contains the tales in the Wortley-Montagu manuscript in the Bodleian Library, of which a translation was published by Dr. Jonathan Scott in 1811. Vol. v, is mainly occupied with a Terminal Essay, indexes, bibliographical lists, &c.) 44. Lady Burton's Edition of her Husband's Arabian Nights, translated literally from the Arabic. Prepared for Household Reading by Justin II. McCarthy, M.P. Lon., 1896-88, 6 vols. 8vo.
- "I guarantee that no mother shall regret her girl's reading of the original save 25 out of 325 pages, and you have all the gain."—Lady Burton's Preface.
- "It has been edited with the greatest care, and is as fit for household use as Alice in Wonderland." Nor has it perceptibly lost in the process. On the contrary, . . . it distinctly gains by the elimination of stuff which is quite out of keeping with the characters of the heroines."—Spectator, lx, 469.
- "Knowing his profound Oriental scholarship, his amazing gift of tongue, and the vast range of his reading, one could not have doubted that Sir Richard Burton's translation would be a noteworthy performance; but now, I imagine, were prepared for the fine tone and old-world flavour of the style which he has forged for himself on this occasion, or for the extraordinary richness, variety, and quaintness of his vocabulary. . . . We owe Lady Burton a large debt of gratitude for the happy thought which places an inaccessible work at the disposal of all sorts and conditions of readers."—AMELIA B. EDWARDS: Acad., xxx, 387.

"The drama has even more of depth and beauty of expression in it than it has of strong dramatic outline. The characters are conceived well, but they are hardly brought into very active relations with each other. . . . The poem is truly beautiful, one of delicacy and depth, and breathing the soft air of a fine, visionary fancy."—Spectator, xviii. 119.

Butler, Samuel, b. 1835, a grandson of Samuel Butler, bishop of Lichfield, [q. v., ante, vol. i.]; educated at Shrewsbury School, and at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1858. He has published, in collaboration with Henry Festing Jones, a number of musical pieces, including gavottes, minuets, fugues, &c., for the piano, and a cantata, Narcissus. His literary works are numbered Opus 1 to 9, the first book on the following list being omitted from this enumeration "inasmuch as it was a youthful work," and Opus 7 being a selection from previous works. He is now engaged in writing a life of his grandfather, the Bishop of Lichfield. 1. A First Year in Canterbury Settlement, Lon., 1863, p. 8vo. 2. Erewhon; or, Over the Range, Lon., 1872, 8vo. 3. The Fair Haven: a Work in Defence of the Miraculous Element of our Lord's Ministry upon Earth. By the late John Pickard Owen. With a Memoir of the Author by William Bickersteth Owen, (pseud.) Lon., 1873, 8vo. (The 2d ed., published in the same year, has the author's name on the title-page.)

"It purports to be a posthumous essay in defence of Christianity, and a memoir of the writer; but we cannot help doubting whether this elaborate framework is not a mere dramatic setting to views exactly the opposite of those apparently advocated. . . . The theory which . . . emerges as the most definite suggestion of the book is one that we have been almost surprised not to find more prominent in rationalistic explanations of Christianity,—that Christ did not die upon the cross at all."—Spectator, xlv. 110.

4. Life and Habit, Lon., 1877, p. 8vo; 2d ed., 1878.

"The main thesis of 'Life and Habit' is a suggestion towards the completion of the Darwinian theory, meaning thereby not so much the particular explanations most relied on by Mr. Darwin himself as the general doctrine of alone, but while which does not belong to Mr. Darwin has made people believe in."—Sat. Rev., xlv. 119.

"The form which Mr. Butler's statements assume is frequently full of humour, but underlying all the familiarity his own, the scope of the argument he has in full sympathy with the stream of tendency in science which strives to make religion, and ethics, and spiritual voluminous and popular writings of Von Hartmann will result and those of Mr. Butler. . . . Unconscious intelligence, with all and purpose are with both the great solvents of all difficulties."—Spectator, li. 187.

5. Evolution, Old and New: or, The Theories of Buffon, Dr. Erasmus Darwin, and Lamarck, as compared with that of Mr. Charles Darwin, Lon., 1879, p. 8vo; 2d ed., 1882.

"He undertakes to assure the overwhelming majority of men of science and the educated public who have followed their lead that, while they have done well to be converted to the doctrine of evolution and transmission of species, they have been converted on entirely wrong grounds."—*Sat. "He has chosen his ground well. The region which lies in and about the southern spurs of the Alps, from the Po to the Ticino, is not much visited as yet by tourists. It contains, nevertheless, some of the loveliest scenery in Europe."—Ath., No. 287.

8. Luck, or Cunning, as the Main Means of Organic Modification? Lon., 1886, p. 8vo.

"Here is a work of consummate ingenuity, rare literary skill, and a certain happy vein of sardonic humour,—a work pregnant with epigram, sparkling with wit, and in-tinct throughout with a powerful original fancy,—lung treasure, and scarcely likely ever to meet the eyes of any-body except those who will regard it merely in the light of a little piece of vain argument against Charles Darwin's theory of natural selection."—GRANT ALLEN: Acad., xxx. 418.

"More than half his book is taken up with onslaughts of great vigour and minute detail on Mr. Herbert Spencer, Prof. Ray Lankester, Mr. Romanes, Mr. Grant Allen, and most of all on Mr. Darwin. . . . We still believe that he is on the right track in seeing the motive power of evolution in mind, not matter, for therein lies the difference between the two views. But because we think he is upholding the important truth we regret to see him damaging it by needless and often petty aspersions of the upholders of the opposite views."—Ath., No. 3091.

9. Ex Voto: an Account of the Sacro Monte or New Jerusalem at Varallo-Sesia: with some Notice of Tabacchetti's remaining Work at the Sanctuary of Orca. Illust. 1888, 8vo.

"This singular book, with its vivid descriptions, its strange and fascinating illustrations, its startling ideas,—amounting often to discoveries and new departures in the world of religious art,—its criticism, full of knowledge and originality if also of a certain mocking spirit which destroys the effect of it for some minds.—This book, with all its peculiarities, is certainly a striking contribution to literature of its kind."—Spectator, lxi. 1065.

"Not only does it supply interesting information about the preparation of the Nile flood, but, owing to the descriptive ability of the author, the successive stages of the long voyage are brought vividly before the reader. Indeed, it is as if he were shown a panorama of the wonderful river by an artist capable of explaining by word of mouth all that the brush failed to convey."—Ath., No. 3111.

Buxton, Mrs. Bertha H. (Leupold), 1814-1881, was of German parentage, her mother being Madame Therèse Leupold, well known in musical circles. She was educated at a boarding-school in London, and her parents in America, Germany, and Holland. At the age of sixteen she was married to Henry Buxton, club manager and author. In 1875 she found herself suddenly poverty-stricken, and becoming dependent on her own exertions, she turned to writing for a living. She was for some time a "walking lady" in a theatre at Exeter, and the knowledge of theatrical matters thus acquired was turned to account in some of her novels. 1. Percy's Wife: a Story. By B. H. B. Lon., 1867, p. 8vo. 2. Jennie of the Prince's: a Novel. By B. H. B. Lon., 1876, 3 vols. p. 8vo; new ed., 1877.

"We learn from a preface to this novel that it is 'a story with an object'; and that object is to prove that a 'right-minded woman can, in spite of youth, personal attractions, the much-abused stage,' . . . preserving her purity and simplicity from first to last. . . . A reader who ventures on the book in spite of the author's frank warning will find that an 'object' does not necessarily make a book dull."—Sat. Rev., xiii. 302.

Preceded by a Biographical Sketch by Rev. J. Llewelyn Davies, M.A., Lon., 1873, p. 8vo; 2d ed., 1883.

"These posthumous 'Notes of Thought' are full of delicate observation and reflection, and go far to justify in itself the remark quoted by Mr. Llewelyn Davies from Mr. W. E. Forster,—Mr. Charles Buxton's cousin,—that the gap which Mr. Buxton has left is bigger even than the place which he seemed to fill in society."—Spectator, xlv. 110.

"It consists of a series of reflections, written down apparently as they presented themselves, on a variety of subjects, religious, social, or political. . . . The book well deserves to be popular, if only as showing how excellent a life may be led in spite of the disadvantage of almost unmixt prosperity and domestic comfort."—Sat. Rev., xxxv. 55.

"Dividing the past history of words into three sets of laws—those of their original production, those of their subsequent change in utterance or form, and those of their subsequent change in meaning,—he declares that only the second set have been investigated with any considerable success, that very little progress has been made in the third set, and that inquiry into the first set has been pronounced to be at present chimerical. He has also prepared reports for the government on the condition of the people in parts of Western Louisiana. 1. Old Creole Days, N. York, 1879; new ed., 1883, 2 vols. 12mo. 2. The Grandissimes: a Story of Creole Life, N. York, 1880, 12mo.

"In painting the Creole life of New Orleans at the beginning of the century he has in effect broken new ground, and, as the soil is rich, one's first impression is that he has contented himself with merely overturning it. But, rich as it is, it needs an artist to exploit it with the success shown in 'The Grandissimes,' and Mr. Cable is a literary artist of unusual powers. The poetic vein in Mr. Cable is well developed and defined, and the picture he conjures up from the old Louisiana levees and swamps is steeped in sentiment. . . . It would be doing 'The Grandissimes' an injustice, however, to imply that it is only a charming picture cleverly painted. It deals with graver elements of social existence than mere picturesque; and though the society it depicts no longer exists, and its problems have been solved by time, it is none the less a serious and important work. . . . What prevents 'The Grandissimes' from taking the front rank in contemporary fiction is its weakness in portraiture of an intellectual interest."—Nation, xxxi. 415.

He has rightly judged that the time has not yet come for that. . . . What we find, then, in these volumes is an admirably stated narrative of the facts of Emerson's uneventful life, some account of his ancestry, large extracts from Emerson's journals, . . . and a considerable number of his letters. Interspersed with these are accounts of Emerson's nearer friends and of his relation to some of the leading events and movements of his time. . . . and much research and travel have enabled her to tell everything about him that the reader is likely to want to know. . . . When we add that Mrs. Caddy has thoughts that she expresses them as they arise, it may be thought that poor Linnaeus must be altogether lost. This, however, is really not the case. . . . "Beyond doubt the most satisfactory collection of sonnets that has yet appeared. Not the least interesting feature of it is the editor's explanatory and critical notes at the end. These contain more learning upon the subject of the English sonnet than has perhaps ever been gathered together before,—learning made bright with intelligent and careful criticism."—Ath., No. 2845.

"We rise from his book with the feeling of one who has sat out a very long sermon by a dull divine who had been engaged all through in refuting a set of old commentators that have long been out of date."—Sat. Rev., lvi. 813.

"It was certainly a good idea to collect and place side by side some of those astounding mistakes made by the critics and reviewers in the early part of this century. . . . Of instances of literary malignity and the wrong it has worked Mr. Caine's volume is full. His comments upon the extracts he gives are for the most part judicious and good."—Ath., No. 2945.

8. The Deemster: a Romance of the Isle of Man, Lon., 1887, 3 vols. er. 8vo.

"As a picture of Manx life the book is marvelously faithful. . . . Evidently, however, Mr. Caine aspires to do more than write a story of province. The Deemster is meant to be a powerful tragedy; and here, too, the writer has been successful, but successful with certain qualifications. . . . All that was needed to make a really the story finer still was that power of artistic selection which only comes with long practice in art."—Ath., No. 3136.

"At last we have in English a book which will tell any one, accustomed to philosophical reading and who will read it with attention, what it was that Kant had to say, how he came to say it as he did, and how it has happened that what he said has had such a different significance for different eras which have followed him to the same field. . . . Caird, Rev. John, D.D., LL.D., [ante, vol. i, ad.] b. 1820, at Greenock, Scotland, and educated at the University of Glasgow; was ordained a minister of the Scotch Established Church 1845; became minister of Park Church, Glasgow, 1857; professor of divinity in the University of Glasgow in 1862, and principal of the university in 1873. 1. An Introduction to the Philosophy of Religion, Glasgow, 1880, 8vo.

"The book is Hegelian throughout. It is a remarkable book in many ways.—remarkable in that it proceeds from the pen of a Scottish clergyman, bred in the Presbyterianism of Scotland, nurtured on the metaphysics of the Scottish school and on the theology of the Westminster Confession. It is remarkable also for its marvellous power of exposition and graceful subtlety of thought. Hegel's solution of the problems of religion is at length adequately represented in English literature. Hegelianism has never appeared so attractive as it appears in the clear and fluent pages of Principal Caird. It must be confessed, however, that the book is hard reading. We feel that we are learning a new language. . . . Hegelianism is without relation to the speech which men use, to the process by which they reason."—lector, liii, 622.

Cameron, Verney Lovett, C.B., D.C.L., b. 1811, at Radpole, Dorsetshire, entered the navy in 1837; appointed Lieutenant in 1865, and commander in 1876. In 1872 he left England in charge of an expedition sent out by the Royal Geographical Society to search for Livingstone, and on hearing of the death of Dr. Livingstone determined to cross the African continent, and accordingly travelled on foot a distance of 3000 miles, from the east coast to Ilougueta on the Atlantic. In 1878 he set out on a journey through Asia Minor and Persia, with the object of determining whether a rail-road could be built from the Mediterranean to India without following the course of the Euphrates, and in 1882 he accompanied Captain R. F. Burton on a journey of exploration to the gold Coast of Africa. He has received gold medals from the English, French, and Portuguese Geographical Societies. 1. Campbell, Lord Archibald, b. 1846, son of the eighth Duke of Argyll. Records of Argyll: Legends, Traditions, and Recollections of Argyllshire Highlanders: collected chiefly from the Gaelic. Illust., Edin. and Lon., 1885, 4to.

"In opening up those rich mines of poetic and romantic legend for which the West Highlands have always been famous, Lord Archibald Campbell in this handsome volume has done something more than give the public a chapter of family or even local history. As such, indeed, the book is sufficiently interesting for there is scarcely a tale told here which was not worth the telling; but it is a really valuable acquisition to the student of anthropology."—Sat. Rev. "So handsome a volume as this is not often issued from the press. Evidently no expense has been spared in getting it up. The chapters (seventeen in number) are by Mr. Charles Laurie. Campbell, George Douglas, eighth Duke of Argyll, K.G., K.T., D.C.L., LL.D., [ante, vol. i, add.] b. 1823, at Ardeneapple Castle, Dumbartonshire; succeeded his father in 1847; was lord privy seal 1853-55, 1859-60, and 1880-81, postmaster-general 1855-58, and secretary of state for India 1868-74. The duke's political career has been described as that of a "Whig by family, Liberal by intellect, independent by nature, and conservative by inclination." He has taken an active interest in scientific research, while rejecting theories inimical to orthodox Christianity. He has been chancellor of the University of St. Andrews and rector of the University of Glasgow, has presided over a meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, and has been a frequent contributor to the Contemporary Review and other periodicals. 1. "Whatever may be the merit and success of the essayist's suggestions, he at least takes up the neutral position which alone can promise usefulness in the treatment of such a question. He has no reserves on the side of science. He has no hesitation on the side of religion. . . . This system, which is indeed by no means new, but is expounded by the Duke of Argyll with great clearness and freshness of illustration, places the supernatural, not in a power interfering with law, but in a design contriving combinations."—*Sat. "In the face of the materialistic or agnostic tendencies characteristic of so much of the spirit of modern science, he boldly takes his stand upon the older ground of an embracing and overruling Mind permeable in nature. He is able to discern a true and definite design or theological plan, to which is due the unity which he makes his task to demonstrate as the law of the cosmos or centre of the processes of the one hand, and the unity which he has made sure of, and on the other hand, accepting without any of divine authority and inspiration, he shows himself eminently qualified to hold the balance between the claims of science and of theism, and to vindicate that which he views as the goal of all well-directed speculation."—Sat. Rev., 1881, 791.

"Any recapitulation of theology covains the new thought denigrating the brain-conceptions which show the development of the laws working within the cosmos. The religious ideal lay in his recognition of this need and more mechanistic theology of the last century the Duke of Argyll has not advanced the cause of religion nor aided the all-important reconciliation of science and religion."—Ath., No. 2941.

Campbell, John, first Baron Campbell, [ante, vol. i., ad.] 1779-1861, was lord chancellor from 1859 till his death. Most of his works are mentioned ante, vol. i. 1. Shakespeare's Legal Acquirements considered in a Letter to J. Payne Collier, Esq., F.S.A., Lon., 1859, 8vo. 2. Lives of Lords Lyndhurst and Brougham, (vol. viii. of Lives of the Chancellors,) Lon., 1869, 8vo.

"Of all Lord Campbell's biographies, the Lives of his two eminent contemporaries are in tone and feeling the best. He is almost uniformly ill-natural. . . . The Life of Lord Brougham is fuller and more interesting than the Life of Lord Lyndhurst, and the narrative, notwithstanding the spirit of detraction which pervades it, conveys a vivid impression of restless and imperfectly-regulated energy."—Sat. Rev., xxvii, 181.

3. Life of John, Lord Campbell, consisting of a Selection from his Autobiography, Diary, and Letters. Edited by his Daughter, the Hon. Mrs. Hardcastle. Lon., 1881, 2 vols. 8vo; 2d ed. same year.

"The narrative which has been compiled with remarkable skill and judgment by Mrs. Hardcastle is entirely of his own composition. . . . It has happened to but few men of eminence to admit the world at large to so complete a knowledge of their lives and characters."—Sat. Rev., li, 177.

Campbell, Gen. Sir John, C.B., K.C.S.I., 1802-1877, b. at Kingsburgh, in the island of Skye; entered the army 1819; served in India, and during several years, from 1837, had charge of the hill tribes of Orissa, and succeeded in suppressing the practices of human sacrifice and female infanticide. His policy having been abandoned by his successor, Captain Macpherson, disturbances ensued, and in 1847 the appointment was again conferred upon Campbell, who held it till obliged by ill health to return to Scotland in 1855. 1. Narrative by Major-General John Campbell, C.B., of his Operations in the Hill Tracts of Orissa for the Suppression of Human Sacrifice and Infanticide, Lon., 1861, 8vo. Printed for private circulation. 2. A Personal Narrative of Thirteen Years' Service amongst the Wild Tribes of Khondistan for the Suppression of Human Sacrifice, Lon., 1862, 8vo.

"It is something far more wise and suggestive than an ordinary book of travels. . . . We can only hope that commissions such as that executed so completely by General Campbell may be often intrusted to as steady a head, as firm a hand, and as large a heart."—Sat. Rev., xvi, 825.

Campbell, John Francis, 1822-1885, son of Walter Frederick Campbell, infra; educated at Eton, and at the University of Edinburgh; was at one time secretary to the light-house commission, and occupied other posts in the public service, while spending his leisure in scientific studies, and in the collection of folk-lore tales among the western Hebrides. He was the inventor of the sunshine re-order for indicating the varying intensity of the sun's rays. He edited his father's life in Normandy, published several books anonymously, and left others in manuscript. 1. Popular Tales of the West Islands, orally collected, with a Translation, Edin., 1860-62, 4 vols. f. 8vo.

"Mr. Campbell has brought together in his Introduction and his notes much that is valuable and curious. The coincidences which he has pointed out between the stories of the Western Highland and other parts of the Aryan world are striking in themselves, and will be useful for further researches. But the most valuable parts of his work are the stories themselves. For these he will receive the thanks of all who are interested in the history of language and popular literature."—*Sat. "Although agreement with all the author's views is scarcely possible, it is quite refreshing to meet with so much originality, backed by such close cogency of reasoning. . . . The inherent weakness of the author's thesis is contention is that Koch is wrong in maintaining that the tubercle-bacillus is a pure parasite, completing its cycle of existence in its animal host, . . . and passing to and infecting fresh individuals by means of dust-carried spores. Per contra, he argues that tubercle-bacillus, as we know it is but one phase in the life-history of a low form of vegetable, . . . that it is an endemic miasma which hangs about certain rooms and districts and poisons the occupants more or less. . . . Carleton, William, [ante, vol. I, where the year and place of his birth are incorrectly given, add.] 1794-1869, b. at Pailisk, County Tyrone, Ireland, son of a small farmer; educated at a "hedge school," and afterwards by Rev. Dr. Keenan, of Glasslough; was subsequently a tutor in private families; commenced his literary career by a sketch entitled The Lough-Derg Pilgrim, which was published in a Dublin magazine and afterwards included with others in Traits and Stories of the Irish Peasantry. A long series of stories and novels followed, many of which passed through several editions, and were translated into French, German, and Italian. Notwithstanding this productivity, he became embarrassed in his circumstances, and was granted a pension of £200, on the recommendation of many persons of high rank and credits. He has been described as "the truest, the most powerful, and the tenderest delineator of Irish life." (Dict. of Nat. Biog., vol. ix, p. 98.) The following list of his works includes those which are mentioned ante, vol. I, and some published after his death: 1. Traits and Stories of the Irish Peasantry. Carlyle, Thomas, [ante, vol. i., add.] 1795-1881. The notice of Carlyle ante, vol. i., covers nearly the whole period of his literary activity. After many years of toilsome struggle and gradual emergence from obscurity, the hard-won recognition of his genius had extended from a comparatively small circle to the general mass of intelligent readers. There was no longer any question as to his pre-eminence in the world of letters among his English contemporaries, and his installation as lord rector of the University of Edinburgh in 1866 was received as an expression and confirmation of the public verdict to that effect. In 1874 he accepted the offer of merit from the Prussian government, but declined an offer made to him by Disraeli of the Grand Cross of the Bath and a pension. On his eightieth birthday a medal was presented to him, and an address signed by many persons of note in literature, science, and art. But these acknowledgments came when, like Johnson, he was old and could not enjoy them, when he was solitary and could not impart them. The death of his wife during his absence in Edinburgh in 1866 deepened the gloom which had never been wholly absent from his life, and which had its original source, not in mere physical ills or in adverse circumstances, but in his mental constitution. He died on the 4th of February, 1881, and was buried in the kirkyard of Ecclefechan, the offer of a burial in Westminster Abbey being declined in accordance with his own understood wish.

dents of his career and the details of his private life and family and social relations were laid bare in a degree never before witnessed in the case of any individual, efficient, however conspicuous or widely known. The immediate, distorted perspective, in which every fault or blemish was magnified and made prominent, while great and noble qualities were obscured or overlooked. Yet it may be doubted whether on the whole there has ever been a character that could have passed through such an ordeal with less of permanent stain or essential disfigurement.

In regard to Carlyle's rank in literature it will remain for posterity to pronounce a decision with little aid from the diverse verdicts of his contemporaries. Although he was the first to introduce into English criticism a comprehensive and objective method of investigation on the ground of an enlightened judgment, no eminent writer of the time has been himself so little the subject of criticism lacking, but of full and penetrative discussion no adequate specimens can be adduced. Perhaps the chief difficulty has lain in the fact that Carlyle stands alone and cannot be assigned a place in any group or class. It is rather by incidental testimony of the impression he has produced upon his age than by direct expression of opinion that we can form any forecast of the estimate which will hereafter be put upon his work. From this point of view it may not be unsafe to predict that his prose will be regarded as the most vivid and original of English prose writers, and the one whose influence on thought and action has been the most stimulating, wide-reaching, and profound. 1. History of Frederick, the Second, edited by Frederick the Great, Lon., 1858-63, 6 vols. 8vo. (The first two volumes are included in the first given ante, vol. ii.) If he had succeeded better in making a hero of Frederick, his history would have had much less historical value. As it is, it appears to be not only the best, but almost the only, in English which gives any account possible to read with interest or to remember when it is an immense task. . . . The six thick volumes found about nearly every important event in European history which was in any way whatever connected with detached anecdotes and personal histories so elaborate, so authentic, in some instances so inconceivably picturesque interest of a novel."—Fraser's Magazine, lxxii, 78.

"In truth the whitest book that ever was written. . . . directly, too, to practice; with new heroes, things unvoiced before; with a range of thought and wisdom the largest and the most colloquially elastic that ever was sensibility of a man, so that I do not so much read a steady eye, with winks and long-commanding glances, and river, wood, hummock, and pebble in the long perspective; with a book that is a Judgment Day, for its moral terms; verdict on the men and nations and manners of modern times."—Emerson's Diary, ap. Correspondence of Carlyle and Emerson, ii, 272, note.

"Although in the prophetic sight of the writer that most remarkable book may, at the moment it was written, have borne a conspicuous reference to events which his future but have since most wonderfully illustrated its great theme, the world in general recognized nothing of its sort in it. The author, if he knew himself to be a rook at the time, must have been astonished at the rapidity with which his Gospel of Force triumphed as soon as it had its chance. . . . Some of us shook our heads over it, one great man amongst us, whose place I am proud to occupy, I dare not say to fill, did not hesitate to speak words of summary condemnation; but the doctrine itself was esoteric, the words, like much else of Carlyle's, were ὄρατα ὑπερῶτα, but ὄρατα only; to the ears of the STUBS, B.D., the Bishop of Oxford? "Just at the time when the first installment of Carlyle's 'Life of Frederick' was published, I found him (Macaulay) engaged in the perusal of the opening chapters. His wrath—can use no milder word—against Carlyle's style was boundless. He read aloud to me, for or five of the most Carlylean sentences, and then, throwing the book on the library table, exclaimed, 'I hold that no Englishman has the right to treat his mother-tongue after so unilluminating a fashion.' . . . Before a week had elapsed I was again at Holly Lodge, and he at once returned to Carlyle's history. 'Pray read it,' he said, 'as soon as you can find time. Of course I have not read and never shall get reconciled to his distortions and contortions of language; but there are, notwithstanding, passages of truly wonderful interest and power, and in the infinite variety of new historical facts and in the delight and instruction they afford, if my first feeling has been that of annoyance at the strangle way of telling the story, my second and permanent feeling is one of gratitude that—even in such a way—the story has been told."—Reminiscences and Essays, by James Montgomerie Stuart, ap. 5. Reminiscences. Edited by James Anthony Froude, Lon., 1881, 2 vols. p. 8vo. Re-edited by Charles Eliot Norton, 1887, 2 vols. p. 8vo. (In regard to the circumstances under which these Reminiscences were composed, and Carlyle's own views as to the editing and publication of them, compare the statements of Mr. Froude and Mr. Norton in their respective prefaces.)

"It is impossible to enter into any doubts as to the curious interest and value of the matter thus thrown open to the public gaze. The various reminiscences taken together, and sometimes overlapping and repeating themselves as might be expected, form a very near approach to an autobiography, with the singular feature that the writer does not form the central figure or hero of his story. This circumstance gives an unusual charm and freedom to the narrative. Carlyle is always discoursing of other people as his subject, and not ostensibly of himself; but the triple strand which he has thus spun supplies an almost complete and often sad and sombre enough; but through it all runs and gleams the golden thread of tender recollections of his wife."—Sat. Rev., li, 370.

"He betrays a narrowness of judgment about his contemporaries which contrasts strangely with the catholicity of his sympathies in the past. He could be both just and generous in his estimate of characters as various as Voltaire, and yet was neither just nor generous to Lamb or Coleridge, Scott or Hazlitt, Wilson or De Quincy."—Ath., No. 2841.

6. Reminiscences of my Irish Journey in 1849, Lon., 1882, cr. 8vo.

"The style of the book is rather remarkable. It is Carlyle in its most eruptively volcanic form, unrestrained by any such thought of artistic shape as that displayed in the 'Latter-Day Pamphlets,' which it immediately preceded, and which resemble it most of all the published works. . . . Abundant strokes of the writer's cunning are to be found—little vignettes of social or personal portraiture, even now and then a landscape or two."—Sat. Rev., liv, 87.

"A certain exaggeration of Carlyle's qualities is that he was more than usually sick with poverty and discommodities, and the effects of the double sickness are visible on every page of the account of his visit, which, we may add, he never meant to publish in its present form. And yet what natural power there is in the book! It is a mere mass of rough notes, it notices only the bad side of things, but when it reads you have only the bad side of individual impression. The squallor and the bad side of suffering and misery, of the faults, of Ireland, are given, as it were, but actually bites into it."—Spectator, lv, 867.

8. Early Letters of Thomas Carlyle. Edited by Charles Eliot Norton. Lon., 1886, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"The contents of these volumes would be sufficiently interesting if they were nothing more than an independent supplement to the 'History of the First Forty Years of Carlyle's Life,' which was published in 1882; but their interest is greatly enhanced by the fact that they are not such a supplement as a contradiction. Mr. Norton is of the many outsiders to whom the view of Mr. Norton is 'character presented in W. Froude's biography has professed itself, and he endeavours to correct that by printing selections from the letters written by Carlyle himself, and addressed to him by his friends and kindred, which have been placed in his hands by Mrs. Alexander Carlyle. To copies of some, if not all, of these letters Mr. Froude had access, and Mr. Norton complains that from the documents before him he made garbled extracts, and, apparently of set purpose, omitted such portions as did not fit in with his 'view.' The charges thus brought against Mr. Froude are very grave indeed, and as in the letter which he has addressed to Miss Welsh, he makes no answer to them, and declines to make any, it must be assumed that he allows judgment to go by default. The gravest charges have to do with the correspondence that passed between Carlyle and his future wife before their marriage. . . . All the new light thrown on this strange business by Mr. Norton discredits Mr. Froude, and is honourable both to Carlyle and to Miss Welsh."—Ibid., No. 3280.

"The opportunity now afforded under Professor Norton's editorship of reading the present instalment of Carlyle's letters offers incontestable proof of how well Carlyle himself was entitled to engage the esteem of those who really knew him the most, and who were duly fitted to receive the right impressions to be gained by a study of his wonderfully complex character."—Sat. Rev., xlvii, 550.

"Mr. Froude has done his worst, or his best, and it cannot be undone. Even Mr. Elliot Norton's brilliant re-edition cannot undo it. And what is the result? Simply that we must thank either Mr. Froude or his hinderer for enabling us to understand how great Carlyle really was. . . . Carlyle, as we know him now, is more real, and immeasurably more impressive, than the Carlyle we knew before. The literary small talkers may say this should be shattered; but those to whom Carlyle was never an idol, but an instructor and inspirer, must be glad and not sorry that he has become so real to them."—WALTER LEWIS; Acad., xxxii, 128.

10. Correspondence between Goethe and Carlyle. Edited by Charles Elliot Norton. Lon., 1887, p. 8vo.
"A book which brings us nearer to such a spirit as that of Carlyle, and to the greater spirit of Goethe, cannot but be precious. Yet the substance of the book is slight, and its virtue could easily be distilled into one magazine article of no considerable length. . . . Mr. C. E. Norton's work as editor is as thorough, and as nearly faultless, as such work can possibly be."—EDWARD DOWDEN; Acad., xxxi, 281.

"Besides showing us in a most interesting light a curious phase of Carlyle's intellectual growth, and differing not inharmoniously in this respect from the view of his relations with his kinsfolk, wife, and early friends, which we get elsewhere, these letters give fresh and delightful evidence of Goethe's temperament in his old age."—Ibid., No. 3101.

The first collected edition of Carlyle's works was published 1857-58, 18 vols. 8vo. Library Edition, and General Index, Lon., 1870-82, 34 vols. 8vo. Cheap Uniform Edition, 1870, 23 vols. cr. 8vo. People's Edition, 1872, 37 vols. 12mo. Index to the same, 1871. The immediate sale of this edition is said to have amounted to 90,000 vols. For bibliographies see GARNETT, R., and SHEPHERD, R. II.

"He alone has associated the life of work with all that in former days men have associated exclusively with the life of arms. Carlyle hated political economy, and had but scant reverence for all that it implied. His words were steeped in the richest dyes of poetry; on every page is the vividness, the colouring, the romance, that in the language also is the appeal which, till he wrote, men only knew in the dialect of prose. He spoke the word for our age, but he spoke it in a language for which, except from him, we must turn to the past. He brought the wealth of feudal and chivalric life to enrich the sermon of the nineteenth century. He set before the toiler of to-day, and the dust and fog of a prosaic age, the glowing ideal that seemed lost with these vanished ages. He set to music a lesson which, except from him, was associated only with the multiplication-table. Surely we need no other explanation of the vast hold on his generation which has been revealed by his death."—Spectator, liv, 1437.

"Great and deathless writer as he was, he will be honoured by posterity for his influence on human life, rather than for his supremacy as a literary artist. . . . The way to test how much he has left his country, says a great writer of another country, 'were to consider, or try to consider, for a moment, the array of British thought, the resultant of the ensemble of the last fifty years, as existing to-day, but with Carlyle left out. It would be like an army with no artillery.' The true legend for his monument is the dying witness of John Sterling: 'Towards England no man has been and done like you.'"—RICHARD GARNETT; Life of Carlyle, ('Great Writers'), 178.

"As a representative author, a literary figure, no man else will bequeath to the future more significant hints of our story, era, its heresies, paradoxes, its din, and its struggling partition-periods, than Carlyle. . . . Rugged, mountainous, volcanic, he was himself more a French Revolution than any of his volumes."—WALT WHITMAN; Death of Carlyle. In Essays from The Critic, 31.

"In his clearer moments, when he lays aside his wrath and addresses himself to his nobler work of edifying exhortation, he commands a lofty soul-piercing language, which seems to extinguish all ignoble desires and call forth their opposites by a sort of celestial affinity. . . . His literary faculty, if not perfect,—very few are perfect,—was extraordinary and magnificent in the extreme. His supreme gift is his penetrating imagination, of seeing as it were into the heart of things in a moment, and reproducing them in words which it is impossible to forget. . . . In this respect he well deserves the epithet of poet, and more than many metrical and musical persons. . . . And he sees so much and so well outside himself because he has so much inside, because, by his own richness of thought and feeling, he comes ready prepared to observe, to note, to recognize things when they present themselves. . . . Carlyle's depth of insight into character was owing to the depth and capacity of his own nature. He had lived the lives of a dozen men before he put pen to paper, by reason of the passions with which he had become intimate in his own breast. In the next place, his hard peasant life, his education in the school of poverty, had made him acquainted with fact at first hand. He had not been shielded, like the unfortunate rich, from wholesome collision with realities. . . . The combined result of his natural endowment and his stimulating training was to make him the most figurative and imaginative prose writer in our language. All nature seems under his sway for colours and image,—seems to offer him, as it were, the right suggestive thing to express his thought."—JAMES COTTER MORISON; Macmillan's Magazine, xlvii, 260-272.

Carlyle, Thomas (ante, vol. 1, add.), 1803-1855, b. at King's Grange, Kirkcudbright, and educated at Annan Academy in company with Edward Irving. He studied law at Edinburgh, and was admitted to the Scottish bar in 1824. He became a member of the Catholic Apostolic Church, and was known as the Apostle to North Germany, in which country he resided for a long time occupying himself in evangelical work. Many of his publications, consisting largely of pamphlets, appeared anonymously. The following list includes the only one mentioned ante, vol. 1: 1. 2. Round the World, N. York and Lon., 1884, 8vo; new ed., 1888.

"Though his work is fully entitled to its title, 'Round the World,' yet, from reading it, it would appear that 'the round world' is, in fact, British. . . . Nearly every page of the book is worth reading, for the new way of putting facts—even when the facts themselves are not new—and which they suggest."—Spectator, lvi, 111.

3. Triumphant Democracy; or, Fifty Years' March of the Republic, N. York and Lon., 1886, 8vo; 8th ed., 1888. 40,000 copies are said to have been sold in England in 1886-87.

"He is an un-discussed worshipper of material success, and delights in the figures. He loves to tell how small things were fifty years ago, and into what splendor they are exalted as a speciality of the native American, but here is a foreigner who out-Herods Herod. And yet, so far as the material side is concerned, there is perhaps hardly a word which passes the truth. . . . It is only when it is placed in this vivid way that we realize the stupendous development."—Nation, xlii, 42.

"Much as the American critic and the British lion may grate on the ordinary reader, there is no doubt that Mr. Carnegie has provided a most readable summary of the present condition of the United States, and some striking instances and reflections on the superiority of democratic institutions."—Spectator, lix, 74.

"If Lord Southesk has not added much to our knowledge, he has succeeded in giving a lively picture of a curious region. In case this inducement to read his book should not be sufficient, he has added a rather incongruous appendix containing the meditations upon Shakspeare which occurred to him during his journey. The remarks upon Hamlet approach the dimensions of an essay. We cannot discuss the soundness of his conclusions so unlikelily a place for a bit of literary criticism, he will be repaid for his trouble."—Sat. Rev., xxxix, 277.

Carpenter, Mary, 1807-1877, b. at Exeter, Eng., daughter of the Rev. Lent Carpenter, LL.D., [q. v. ante, vol. I.] was educated by her father. Her life was devoted to philanthropic work, especially to the establishment and management of reformatory schools. She made several visits to India between 1868 and 1870, drew up reports on subjects connected with education and reform, and established a National Indian Association for the promotion of fuller intercourse and understanding between India and England. In 1875 she visited the United States and Canada, and delivered addresses on prison reform. For biog., see CARPENTER, J. Carpenter, Philip Pearsall, 1810-1877, youngest son of Dr. Lant Carpenter, [ante, vol. i.] b. at Bristol, Eng.; educated at Bristol College and a Presbyterian training college at York, and took the degree of B.A. at the University of London in 1811. He was for some time a Presbyterian minister, but afterwards devoted attention to the study of natural history, giving special attention to conchology and becoming an authority in this department. In 1858 he visited the United States and classified collections of shells at the Smithsonian Institution and elsewhere, and in 1865 he settled at Montreal. One of these books, the life of Mrs. Amy Carpenter, should interest any; the other, the life of Philip Carpenter, will probably interest few."—Ibid., No. 2728.

"She was undoubtedly the stronger of the two, and her work is probably the more enduring. Yet, whether because Mr. Russell Carpenter has given us more extracts from his brother's writings, . . . or for what other reason we cannot say, but certainly we seem to have a more lively and life-like impression of the brother than of the sister, after reading the two lives."—Spectator, III. 212.

Carpenter, William, [ante, vol. i., add.] 1797-1874, was the son of a tradesman in London, and was apprenticed at an early age to a bookseller. He educated himself, learning several languages and devoting himself to Biblical studies. He was also strongly interested in political reform, and edited various periodicals. In 1831 he was tried and imprisoned for refusing to pay the stamp duty levied on newspapers for a periodical publication entitled Political Lectures. Besides the works mentioned ante, vol. i., and others of an early date, he published: 1. A Comprehensive Dictionary of English Synonyms; 4th ed., Lon., 1833, 18mo. 2. An Introduction to the Reading and Study of the English Bible, Lon., 1867-69, 3 vols. 12mo. 3. Carpenter, William Benjamin, M.D., F.R.S., LL.D., C.B., [ante, vol. i., add.] 1813-1885, eldest son of Lant Carpenter; became Fullerian professor of physiology at the Royal Institution in 1844; was professor of forensic medicine at University College, London, and lecturer at the British Museum and at the London Hospital. In 1850, on being appointed registrar of the University of London, he resigned his lectureships, and thereupon was the chief worker in the great development of that university till his resignation in 1879. He contributed extensively to the proceedings of scientific societies, to encyclopedias, and to periodical literature. 1. Popular Cyclopaedia of Natural Science, Lon., 1841-44, 5 vols. 8vo. 2. Pub.,) Lon., 1862, fol. 5. Principles of Mental Discipline, with their Application to the Training and Conditions, Lon., 1874, 8vo; 4th ed., 1876.

"Dr. Carpenter has collected in this volume the researches and systematic thought of many years on the relations between the mind and its organism, and on the application of the conclusions arrived at to the best training of the mind for the purpose of the organism, and of the best training of the organism to make it a suitable instrument for the mind. The result is certainly true, sometimes disputable, sometimes in our opinion erroneous, but always worthy of attentive consideration. . . . Dr. Carpenter grasps the broad distinction between the mental constitution imposed upon us, and the modifications of it which we make for ourselves, most vigorously, and the importance he attaches to it runs through the whole volume, and may be said almost to constitute its value."—Spectator, XLVII. 881.

"No great discovery illustrates the name of Dr. Carpenter, but greatness may be achieved in more ways than one. By his almost unaided efforts he lifted up the whole scientific education of this country, and he did more than any man of his generation to bring biological science home to the minds of students and teachers alike."—Spectator, LXL. 1732.

The Hundred of Launditch and Denney of Brisley, in the County of Norfolk: Evidences and Topographical Notes from Public Records, Herald's Visitations, Wills, Court Rolls, Old Charters, Parish Registers, Town Books, and other Private Sources, digested and arranged as Materials for Parochial, Munerial, and Family History, Norwich, 1879, 3 parts.

"Deserves to rank among the most important contributions to local history which have ever been printed; and indeed it must be regarded as something more. It is a vast storehouse of curious and erudite learning, such as only a born antiquary could have accumulated during a long life of intelligent and minute study. . . . Incidental illustrations of most points in English history are to be found on almost every other page. His method is novel and suggestive."—ibid., No. 2682.

- In the author of this book is found the ritualist in the true sense of the term: and in his patient research, his careful comparison of various usages, and gradually developed rites, his abundant collation and edition of ecclesiastical authorities on the most minute points of detail, may be read an instructive commentary—however unimportant—upon the loose and ill-informed chatter on such subjects, from whichever side proceeding, with which our own times have become familiar to weariness. —*Sat. - Chambers, Robert, LL.D., [ante, vol. 1, CHAMBERS, WILLIAM and ROBERT, add.] 1802-1871, so closely associated during his lifetime, both as publisher and utopian, with his brother William, has a posthumous reputation all his own, as the author of Vestiges of the Natural History of Creation, published anonymously in 1844. The secret of the authorship was kept very closely, in accordance with a rule made by the brothers to "avoid as far as possible mixing themselves up with debatable questions in politics and theology." The proofs of the book were sent to Mr. Alexander Fraser of Manchester, and forwarded by him under fresh covers to the author. The work was attributed to different persons, but as early as 1851 the conjectures had already settled upon Robert Chambers. The questions raised in Vestiges of Creation were fiercely debated for three years; it was generally regarded as an attack on orthodoxy, and regarded the matter as a purely scientific one. 1. "The plan of the work deserves praise, and its execution is, on the whole, commendable. . . . It is a matter of course in a compilation so comprehensive and complex as this . . . that many mistakes should present themselves. . . . Our wonder is that they are not much more numerous, for the pages are crammed with minute particulars, to gather which, even without critical weighing of authorities one against the other, must have been a work of stupendous labour."—ibid., No. 3192.

Chesney, Charles Cornwallis, 1826-1876, b. near Killybeg, in Ireland; son of an East India artillery captain, and nephew of General Francis Rawdon Chesney, educated at the military academy at Woolwich, and entered the Royal Engineers as sub-lieutenant in 1845. He served in Ireland and Bermuda, and was ordered to New Zealand in 1851, but his delicate health obliged him two years later to return to England. He was appointed professor of military history at the Royal Military Staff College at Sandhurst, and was soon recognized as the best military critic of his day, his Waterloo Lectures being adopted as a text-book in French and German as well as English military schools. He served on important military commissions, became lieutenant-colonel in 1868, and brevet colonel in 1873, with the command of the home district of the Royal Engineers. 1. A Military View of the Recent Campaigns in Virginia and Maryland, Lon., 1863, p. 8vo; 2d ed., rev. and enl., Lon., 1864-65, 2 vols. 2. The Tactical Value of Fortresses: a Lecture, Lon., 1868, 8vo. 3. On the Value of Fortresses and Fortified Positions in Defensive Operations; 2d ed., rev. Lon., 1868, 8vo. 4. Waterloo Lectures: a Study of the Campaign of 1815, Lon., 1868, 8vo; 3d ed., 1874.

"The work is extremely valuable, but, as it bears everywhere the impress of the naked truth, it is intensely unflattering to the national vanity of both French and English. Romantic stories concerning the campaign, which have hitherto passed current with all the air of military authority, are ruthlessly dissected, the undesired praise which has been indiscriminately heaped on Napoleon and Wellington by their own admirers is considerably modified, and the real importance of the Prussian intervention in the final action is fairly and honestly shown."—Sat. Rev., xxvi. 691.

5. The Study of Military Science, Lon., 1871, 8vo. 6. Essays in Modern Military Biography, Lon., 1874, 8vo.

"The reader, of whatever profession, who can appreciate an unseasonably clear, refined, and forcible style will find his taste amply gratified in the perusal of these essays. The subjects, too, are of a striking kind, and the biographical character of the volume imparts unity to scenes and events which occupy considerable space in the history of nations. But their chief value is for the military student."

" . . . Whether illustrating an epoch from the personal experience of a minor actor in the scenes depicted, such as Bezsouche and Brandt, or presenting a leader in the light of his own achievements, as in the essays on Lee, and Grant, and 'Chinese Gordon,' he falls not to give us new and faithful impressions."—Sat. Rev., xxvii. 26.

Chesney, Francis Rawdon, [ante, vol. i., add.], 1789-1872, b. in County Down, Ireland; was gazetted to the Royal Artillery at the age of sixteen, and attained the rank of lieutenant-general, but never had an opportunity of serving in the field. In 1831, 1835-37, and 1856, he made expeditions through Syria and the Euphrates valley, with the view of opening a new route to India. For biog., see CHESNEY, Mrs. Louisa, infra. Narrative of the Euphrates Expedition, carried on by order of the British Government during the Years 1835, 1836, and 1837, Lon., 1838, 8vo.

"The present volume is not the most important which General Chesney has published as the fruit of his survey. . . The volume now before us only sums up the record by showing the personal labour with which the results attained were won. It is agreeably written, full of striking incidents, and has novelty enough to float any book of travels, though written so long after the event."—Sat. Rev., xxvii. 491.

Chesney, George Tomkyns, C.B., C.S.I., b. 1830, brother of Charles Cornwallis Chesney, supra; was educated at Woolwich, and joined the Bengal Engineers in 1848. He served through the siege of Delhi, where he was twice wounded, and attained the rank of lieutenant-general in 1885. He was president of the Royal Indian Engineering College 1870-80, secretary to the military department of the government of India 1880-85, and since 1886 has been a member of the council of the governor-general. 1. Indian Policy: a View of the System of Administration in India, Lon., 1868, 8vo; 2d ed., 1870.

"In the compass of one moderate-sized volume Major Chesney gives an exhaustive account of the manner in which India is governed, and offers certain suggestions for the improvement of the existing system."—Sat. Rev., xxvi. 370.

"The modest dimensions of the volume, the interesting nature of its contents, and the literary skill shown in its production will secure for it an exceptionally favourable verdict."—Spectator, lviii. 172.

"This biography has certainly one merit which every biography has not. It gives the character of the man with all its angles and its shades, as well as its brighter colours. The truthfulness and honesty, the unwavering religious faith, the pluck and perseverance, the self-reliance and vigour, the impatience and occasional irritability, of the man, are well brought out."—*Sat. Chester, Joseph Lemuel, LL.D., D.C.L., 1821-1882, b. at Norwich, Conn.; removed in 1845 to Philadelphia, where he was editor of the Inquirer and Daily Sun; went to England in 1858 and settled in London, and, turning his attention to genealogical matters, became the most distinguished genealogist of his day. He was employed by many Americans to trace their English ancestry, and he expended much labor on the genealogy of the Washington family, but was unable to complete his researches on this subject to his own satisfaction. He was a member of several learned societies, one of the founders of the Harleian Society, and a member of the first council of the Royal Historical Society. Besides the works enumerated below, he left many manuscript volumes. Of these the Matriculations at the University of Oxford was sold by his executor for £1500, and another copy was purchased at auction for £750 by Joseph Foster, (q. v., infra.) Childers, Robert Cnsar, 1838-1876, son of Rev. Charles Childers, supra; entered the Ceylon civil service in 1860; acted for three years as private secretary to the governor of the island, and was for a short time office assistant to the government agent in Kandy, but in 1864 was compelled by ill health to return to England. He had devoted much time to linguistic studies, and had begun the study of Pali under a learned Buddhist. In 1869 he published in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society the Pali text of the Khuddaka Pa'tha, with English translations and notes, which was the first Pali text printed in England. In 1872 he was appointed sub-librarian at the India Office, and in 1873 was made professor of Pali and Buddhist Literature at University College, London. He contributed papers to the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society. A Dictionary of the Pali Language, Lon., 1872-75, 2 vols. 4to.

"The publication of this work removes a reproach which has long rested on Oriental scholarship. . . . The first great practical value of Professor Childers's Dictionary is that the study of Pali can now be taken up and pursued without a previous knowledge of Sanskrit."—Sat. Rev., xlii. 145.

"One of those monuments of Oriental learning and research which appear scarcely once in a century."—Id., No. 246.

"Mr. Christie has undertaken the justification of one whose brilliant powers no one denies, but who is commonly held to have abused them for the basest of purposes. . . He does not set up the subject of his biography as a paragon of unusual virtue; he is satisfied with trying to show that the worst crimes laid to his charge are certainly false, and that there is something to be said for most of the doubtful parts of his conduct. . . He asks us to believe that Shaftesbury was not the double-deal villain that he appears in the pages of Lord Macaulay and Lord Campbell. . . Mr. Christie has been more successful in clearing Shaftesbury of great crimes than in giving a favourable impression of his general political conduct."—Sat. Rev., xxxii. 308, 309. "His sons have supplemented this work by an equally large volume of memoirs, which is, fortunately, of such a character that it can be read with pleasure and profit by laymen as well as experts. They have wisely allowed their father to tell as much of his story as possible by extracts from his letters; not less wisely have they intrusted to competent hands the task of summing up his professional and scientific work in special chapters. . . The impression that remains after reading these two volumes is very well expressed by the phrase in which Christison's most intimate friend, John Brown, described him,—Ulmus Romanorum."—Spectator, lx. 1483.

5. Civilization before and after Christianity: Two Lectures, Lon., 1872, 12mo. 6. On Some Influences of Christianity upon National Character: Three Lectures delivered in St. Paul's Cathedral, Lon., 1873, p. 8vo.

"He generalizes freely, but his generalizations are guarded and qualified so carefully that the untrained mind may easily fail to grasp these; the charm of his style lies in its sweetness, its subtlety, its singular flexibility in expressing the many shades of one idea, rather than in the bold and forcible presentation of views that are easy to catch and not difficult to hold. . . He represents national character by means of types and specimens; thus the Greeks stand for the European races belonging to the Eastern Church, and the Italians and French for the Southern or so-called Latin races."—Sat. Rev., xxxvii. 84.

7. The Sacred Poetry of Early Religions: Two Lectures in St. Paul's Cathedral, Lon., 1874, 18mo. 8. The Beginning of the Middle Ages, ("Epochs of Modern History,") Lon., 1877, ff. Svo. 9. "Dean Church's treatment of Bacon shows with curious exactness how much Shakespeare's Helton work has effected, and how far it is still from having produced its full effect. . . So it is that Dean Church's estimate of Bacon, though a very different thing from Macaulay's, is, in its result, as a whole nearer to Macaulay than to Speding."—Sat. Rev., lvii. 727.

"A more interesting narrative, a more truthful delineation of events and character, and a more unbiassed judgment we cannot expect to have."—Nation, xxxviii. 368.

"Of the native race he formed at once a good opinion, which he never budged to change. . . . But the German influence, the steady, even, intelligent, self-interested, heartless grind and pressure of the German power, proved more paramount and all-pervading than he had anticipated. This is really the burden of the book,—a kindly, sympathetic, and interesting narrative by a singularly fair-minded and observant man."—Spectator, lxi, 388.

Churton, Ven. Edward, M.A. [ante, vol. i., add.] 1800-1874, b. at Middleton Cheney, Northamptonshire; graduated at Christ Church, Oxford, 1821; made rector of Crayke, in Suffolk, in 1835, and archdeacon of Cleveland in 1840. He was a contributor to the British Critic, and edited some of Bishop Pearson's writings, &c., for the Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology, and was also a critical student of Spanish literature. Add to the list of his works in vol. i.: 1. The Book of Job in English Verse, Lon., 1854, 12mo. 2. (Ed.) Memoir of J. Watson, Lon., 1861, 2 vols. 8vo. 3. Gongora: an Historical and Critical Essay on the Times of Philip IV. and Philip V. of Spain: with Translations, Lon., 1862.

"The historical essay, which the title-page would lead us to suppose was the main and substantive part of the work, is in reality only an introductory preface to a volume and a half of translations. . . . The sketlet in which he interweaves with his notices of the uneventful life of Gongora an account of the Spanish Court. . . . is written with knowledge,—knowledge first-hand and genuine."—Sat. Rev., xv, 536.

"It is not in my power to accept as just Archdeacon Churton's admiration for Gongora, nor do I think that his translations, though very free, and often better than his originals, will justify it. But I have read few books on the Spanish literature and manners with so much pleasure."—G. TICKNOR: History of Spanish Literature, (4th ed.), iii, 26.

"It contains not only a large amount of matter which will be surprisingly new and curious to the average American reader. . . but also a great deal that will be read with pleasure and found instructive by those familiar with history. The author, it is true, is himself totally unfamiliar with some of the best writers on the various topics of his enquiry, having only English books, including a few translations, before him. . . But he has made good use of the sources of information accessible to him; . . . and the varied combination of sketches and extracts which he presents to us reflects equal credit on his selection of guides and themes, on his diligence in research, and care in elaboration."—Nation, xxviii, 17.

Clarke, Rev. James Freeman, [ante, vol. i., add.] 1810-1888; b. at Hanover, N.H.; graduated at Harvard College in 1829, and at Cambridge Divinity School in 1833. He then went to Louisville, Ky., where he was pastor of the Unitarian church, and from 1836 till 1839 edited the Western Messenger. In 1841 he settled in Boston and established the Church of the Disciples, of which he was pastor for forty-one years. From 1847 till 1871 he was professor of natural religion and Christian doctrine at Harvard, and in 1876-77 he lectured there on ethnic religions. He was one of the writers for the Dial, and a frequent contributor to other periodicals. None of his publications are mentioned ante, vol. i. 1. (Trans.) Theodorus, or The Sceptic's Conversion; from the German of De Wette, Bost., 1811. 2. Disciples' Hymn-Book, Bost., 1844. 3.  "Admirable in intention, kind in temper, candid in spirit, earnest in purpose, this volume occupies a place before which all the theological literature which ought to have been filled, but which until now has remained empty. . . . by the hand of Dr. Clarke, makes at its honest attempt to their opponents. . . . He has the requisite erudition and his mind is comprehensive, systematic and exact; his versing on dogmatism, and an absence here and there of philosophical perception, and an artificial cast in its logic, we are right to expect from anybody."—Nation, iii. 328.

Clemens, Samuel Langhorne, ("Mark Twain"), [ante, vol. iii, TWAIN, MARK, add.] b. 1835, at Florida, Monroe Co., Mo., was apprenticed to a printer at the age of thirteen, and, after working at that trade in different cities, became a pilot on the Mississippi river steamboats in 1851. Ten years later he went to Nevada, where he edited a paper, and he subsequently joined with Bret Harte in editing The Californian, and began to deliver humorous lectures with great success. In 1872 he settled in Hartford, Conn., where he has since resided. In 1884 he established in New York the subscription-book-publishing house of C. L. Webster & Co., which published General Grant's "Memoirs of the Civil War." Mr. Clemens is said to have taken the pseudonym by which he is so universally known from the recollection of his experience as a pilot, the phrase "mark twain"—i.e., "mark two fathoms"—being used in taking soundings on the Mississippi. He has been a frequent contributor to periodicals, and his story The Gilded Age, written in conjunction with Charles Dudley Warner, had great success as a play, with John T. Raymond as Col. Sellers. The following list of his works includes two mentioned ante, vol. iii: 1. The Celebrated Jumping Frog of Calaveras County. Edited by J. Paul. N. York, 1867, 16mo. 2. The Innocents Abroad; or, The New Pilgrim's Progress: being some Account of the Steamship Quaker City's Pleasure Excursion to Europe and the Holy Land. Illust. Hartford, 1869, 8vo. (Of this book 125,000 copies are said to have been sold in three years.) "All the prominent characteristics of our peculiar school of humorists—their naivety, their extravagance and exaggeration—Mr. Clemens displays in fullness in the course of his ramblings, and he has some merits which belong to his individual self, and which make him a very agreeable companion when he is at ease and natural—which is not always; for as he puts so, we must make free to tell him, does he sometimes grimace, and is professionally a humorist as he was professionally a book-maker."—Nation, ix, 194.

Bost., 1882, 8vo. 10. The Stolen White Elephant, &c., Bost., 1882, 16mo. 11. Life on the Mississippi. By Mark Twain. With more than 300 Illustrations. Bost., 1883, 8vo.

"Life on the Mississippi" is only secondarily the work of a funny man. Primarily it is descriptive and historical work, by an exponent of the old Mississippi sort. . . . The book will be found, as a record of a past phase of American life, both entertaining and valuable."—Nation, xxxvii, 102.

12. The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn, Tom Sawyer's Comrade, N. York, 1885, 8vo. With WARNER, CHARLES DUDLEY, The Gilded Age: a Tale of To-Day. Illust. Hartford, 1873, 8vo.

"Mr. Clemens's humor is of such a universal and comprehensive character that it is very difficult to say in what its peculiarity consists. His eminent forerunner, Artemus Ward, had a certain literary coquet which Mr. Clemens lacks. His sketches were sketches of American life and manners, grotesque and absurd as you please, but still having a distinctly national flavor. It is hardly possible to say that Artemus Ward described life as he found it; but there was a definite literary relation between life as he saw it around him and what he wrote, which every body recognized in his books. Mr. Clemens's humor, on the other hand, is American enough, but his inventions, which he uses as a vehicle for it, are of no nationality. There is a kind of monstrosity about them which we remember in no other writer,—a wild extravagance which is not simply that of exaggeration."—Nation, xxxv, 119.

"Mark Twain is American pure and simple. To the eastern mother-land he owes not the rudiments, the groundwork, already archaic and obsolete to him, of the speech he has to write; in his turn of art, his literary methods and aims, his intellectual habit and temper, he is as distinctly national as the fourth of July itself."—Atl., No. 2739.

Clifford, William Kingdon, 1845-1879, b. at Exeter, Eng.; exhibited as a child unusual precocity of mind. He went to school in Exeter, and in 1860 to King's College, London, where he distinguished himself in classical as well as in mathematical studies. In 1863 he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, where his extraordinary mathematical powers were at once recognized. He displayed athletic as well as intellectual prowess, and with a constitution and build naturally slight, was active to excess in gymnastic exercises. He was made a Fellow of Trinity in 1868, and in 1871 became professor of applied mathematics in University College, London. In 1874 he was elected Fellow of the Royal Society. His lectures delivered before various scientific and philosophic societies 1872-75 had a marked success, being at once original and popular. The highest hopes were entertained of him in scientific circles, but his health, always delicate, broke down under the severe physical and intellectual strain to which, in his eager activity, he had subjected it, and he died of consumption at Madeira. 1. Elements of Dynamiter: an Introduction to the Study of Motion and Rest in Solid and Fluid Bodies, Lon., 1878, 8vo.

"A collection of such of his papers and lectures as were addressed to non-technical audiences. . . . Clifford intended to remodel them into a definite statement of his views on philosophical and other subjects, to be called 'The Creed of Science.' . . . The whole book is eloquent with the fervour of an enthusiast who threw himself into the pursuit of truth in the firm belief that thereby lies the only hope of good for that humanity which he loved so passionately. It is an eloquence chastened by an extraordinary simplicity of style and a resolute seeking after clearness, but it is not the less effective for that."—Sat. Rev., xviii, 216.

"In these essays there is very little appearance of scientific precision. The doctrine of Mr. Darwin is made the basis of ethics without any preliminary enquiry whether it will bear the weight imposed on it. A reflective reader will seek in vain among these papers for a clear definition of the extent and final end of action. . . . Clifford's moral teaching is not adequately reasoned out."—J. SULLY; Acad., xvii, 133.

"Never was an Intenser illustration than is spread out in these pages of the chaotic state of our contemporary thinking, or a creed on the whole less fit to be proclaimed to the people as the matured and classified result of scientific thought. There are, of course, exquisitely simple and vivid statements of particular physical theories."—Nation, xxix, 312.

"Its use will be found in giving the mathematician an increased interest in his own work, rather than in opening up the mysteries of that work to the outside world, though the explanations are so fundamental that the unmathematician, if only he have good natural faculty in that line, may peruse it with advantage."—Atk., No. 3911.

He has left his mark on contemporary English thought in his sentiment, and his writings, fragmentary though they are, may probably carry some bright flashes of insight to other generations than our own."—JAMES SULLY; Acad., xvii, 133.

"As a mathematical writer Clifford was marked by a keen power of imagination, rich in its suggestions of new lines of thought and discovery; he was a standing example of the fact that the true man of science, especially the mathematician, is the man of speculation, of tested theory, of keen, albeit disciplined, imagination."—LESLIE STEPHEN; *Dict. of Nat. Clistold, Rev. Augustus, [ante, vol. i, add.], 1797?–1882, brother of Henry Clistold, was educated at Oxford, ordained in 1823, and made curate of Stoke Newington. Enthusiasm for the writings of Swedenborg led him about 1840 to give up his clerical office and to devote himself to the translation and spread of Swedenborg's works. He was connected with the Swedenborg Association and Swedenborg Society, which he aided largely with money, translated and printed at his own expense some of Swedenborg's works, and wrote numerous pamphlets and volumes illustrating the doctrine of the New Church. The following list includes two or three works mentioned ante, vol. i: 1. The Practical Nature of the Doctrines and Alleged Revelations contained in the Writings of Emanuel Swedenborg, in a Letter to the Archbishop of Dublin, Lon., 1838, 8vo; 2d ed., entitled Practical Nature of the Theological Writings, &c., Lon., 1860. 2. Illustrations of the End of the Church, as predicted in Matthew xxiv., Lon., 1841, 8vo. 3. A Letter to the Rev. J. Bonwell, of Preston, upon the Subject of his Sermon on the Perishing in the Gaining of Core, Lon., 1843, 8vo. 4. The New Church: addressed to the Inhabitants of Preston, Lon., 1843, 8vo. 5. A Review of the Principles of Apocryphal Interpretation, Lon., 1845, 3 vols. 8vo. 6. (Trans.) Swedenborg's Principia Lorum Naturalium, Lon., 1845–46, 2 vols. 8vo. 7. (Trans.) The Economy of the Animal Kingdom considered Anatomically, Physically, and Philosophically, by Emanuel Swedenborg. Ed. by J. J. G. Wilkinson. Lon., 1846, 2 vols. 8vo. 8. A Reply to the Remarks emanating from St. Mary's College, Oscott, on Noble's Appeal in Behalf of the Doctrines of Swedenborg, Lon., 1849, 8vo. 9. The Spiritual Exposition of the Apoca- lysee, as derived from the Writings of Emanuel Swedenborg, Lon., 1831, 4 vols. 8vo. 10. A Letter to the Rev. the Vice-Chancellor of the University of Oxford on the Present State of Theology in the Universities and the Church of England, and on the Causes of Existing Scepticism and Infidelity. By Clericus. Oxf., 1809. 11. Swedenborg's Writings and Catholic Teaching: in Answer to a Series of Articles on the Swedenborgians, by the Vicar of Froim-Selwood, (Rev. William James Early Bennett), in "The Old Church Porch," Lon., 1858, 8vo; 3d ed., 1881. 12. Inspiration and Interpretation: being a Reply to Seven Sermons by J. W. Burgon, Oxf., 1861-64, 7 parts, 12mo. 13. Swedenborg and his Modern Critics: with Some Remarks upon the Last Times, Lon., 1860, 8vo. 14. The Honour of Christendom, Lon., 1860, 8vo. 15. Clive, Mrs. Caroline, 1801-1873, b. in London, was the daughter of Edmund Mersey, Wigley, of Shakenhurst, Worcestershire, and in 1840 was married to Rev. Archer Clive, supra. Mrs. Clive was a confirmed invalid for some years previous to her death, which was the result of an accident, her dress having caught fire while she was writing in her boudoir at Whitefield, Herefordshire. Her works were all published anonymously. 1. IX Poems. By V. Lon., 1840, p. 8vo; 2d ed., 1841. (This volume attracted much notice, and was very favorably reviewed in the Quarterly. The second edition includes nine additional poems.) 2. I Watched the Heavens: a Poem. By V. Lon., 1842, p. 8vo. (The first canto of an unfinished poem.) 3. The Queen's Hall: a Poem. By V. Lon., 1847, p. 8vo. 4. The Valley of the Bean: a Poem. By V. Lon., 1851, p. 8vo. 5. The Marlas: a Poem. By V. Lon., 1853, p. 8vo. 6. Paul Ferroll: a Tale. By the Author of "IX Poems," by V. Lon., 1855, p. 8vo. (The fourth edition contains a concluding chapter, bringing the story down to the death of Paul Ferroll.)

"Paul Ferroll, although a condensed, vigorous, and interesting story, is rather an evidence of the writer's ability than absolutely excellent in itself. . . . The incidents in the book are extremely well managed; we cannot say so much for the delineation of character. Paul Ferroll himself is, in fact, the only full-length figure; the other characters are merely accessories, supplying the requisite dramatic situations."—Id., No. 1451.

7. Poems. By the Author of "Paul Ferroll." Including a New Edition of "IX Poems," by V.; with Former and Recent Editions, Lon., 1858, 8vo. (Some of the earlier poems are omitted in this edition.) 8. Year after Year. By the Author of "Paul Ferroll" and "IX Poems." Lon., 1858, 12mo. 9. Why Paul Ferroll Killed his Wife, Lon., 1860, 12mo; new ed., 1864. (The preface contains a defence of "Paul Ferroll" against some strictures in the Edinburgh Review.)

"A book which, even if it be not destined to be popular, will not be easily forgotten nor lightly esteemed by some of those into whose hands it falls. . . . It is not so much a picture of life as a study from life, and to appreciate the study one must seize the key to it, and place oneself at the point of view from which the scene is taken."—Sat. Rev., 8, 838.

10. John Greswold. By the Author of "Paul Ferroll." Lon., 1861, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"John Greswold" is not only a good book, but it is one whose merits are even less easily pointed out than those of most good books. . . . No doubt there is a certain charm in the style. . . . Perhaps the secret of John Greswold's exceeding simplicity of incident, combined with the most careful treatment of details. . . . The whole picture is natural and unartificial in the highest degree."—Sat. Rev., xvii, 692.

Clough, Annie Crossley. Cranleigh of Cranleigh: a Story, Lon., 1873, 8vo.

Clough, Arthur Hugh, [ante, vol. 1, add.] 1819-1861, b. at Liverpool; educated at Rugby, and at Balliol College, Oxford, where he graduated 1841; was elected Fellow and tutor of Oriel College, but, having changed his religious views, resigned these positions in 1848; was head-master of University Hall, London, from 1849 till 1852, when he visited America and resided for some months in Boston; on his return to England he was appointed to a place in the Education Office, but in 1859 his health gave way, and he went abroad, visiting Greece, Spain, and Italy, where he died. His name is probably familiar to many who have never read his poems, from the mention of him in the writings and biographies of the time, and the high estimation in which he was held by M. Arnold, Emerson, and others. His "Bohio of Toper-na-Fuoshich," (afterwards changed to "Bohio of Tober-na-Vuolich,") and his revised edition of Dryden's translation of Plutarch's Lives, are mentioned in conjunction with Thomas Burbidge is mentioned under the name of the latter, supra. For biog., see WADINGTON, SAMUEL, infra. 1. Greek History, from Theophrastus to Alexander, Lon., 1860, fp. 8vo. (Biographies selected from Plutarch.) 2. Poems: with a Memoir, [by F. T. Palgrave], Lon., 1862, fp. 8vo; 12th ed., 1888, 3. Poems and Prose Remains: with a Selection from his Letters and a Memoir. Edited by his Wife. Lon., 1869, 2 vols. p. 8vo; 3d ed., 1871. "In the arrangement of these volumes there is scarcely anything that does not deserve high praise. . . . The memoir strikes us as uniting compactness with brevity."—Sat. Rev., xxviii. 383.

"I do not think that any competent judge who really studies Clough's Remains will doubt for a moment that he was one of the most original men of our age, and perhaps its most intellectual and buoyant, though very far, of course, from its richest, most musical and exquisite, poet."—R. Cobbe, Miss Frances Power, b. 1828, in the county of Dublin, Ireland, and educated at Brighton, Eng. After a visit to Italy and the East, she resided for some years at Bristol with Mary Carpenter, supra, whom she assisted in her reformatory and ragged schools, and later she interested herself in plans for helping young servants-girls and for the relief of destitute incurables. Her attention had been early directed to theological reading, and she was deeply impressed with the writings of Theodore Parker, with whom she opened a correspondence which led to a warm friendship. She has brought out an edition of his works in England, and may be regarded as an exponent of his line of thought. On returning from Italy Miss Cobbe settled in London, where she has been known as an earnest writer and practical worker in matters relating to the higher education and political enfranchisement of women, and the suppression of vivisection. She has been a constant contributor to the reviews and other periodicals. She has lately lived in retirement in Wales. 1. *An Essay on Intuitive Morals: being an Attempt to popularize Ethical Science. 19. The Hopes of the Human Race, Hereafter and Here, Lon., 1874, cr. 8vo; new ed., 1880.

"Only in studies as to some rather rhetorical lucubrations on the mortality of the soul, varied by a few not particularly original speculations regarding the conditions of the possible future, and followed by an essay on the natural history of the emotion of sympathy and the counter emotion, for which Miss Cobbe has devised the term 'sympathy.'"—Atlan., No. 2457.

There is much in this book which is true and able. . . we regret it, that with her profound sympathy with the philosophy and the sentiment of Christianity, she should appear to feel a sort of amused surprise at those who believe that in it are revealed, far more clearly than in ordinary human nature itself, the divine character and purposes of God."—Spectator, xlviii, 114.

"This is, in many respects, the most telling of Miss Cobbe's books, full of life, spirit, and aggressiveness. . . The object of these admirable lectures is . . . to enforce on women who are growing up to the greater freedom of modern times as to their functions and duties that they must not leave behind them the old moral ideal of women, but, on the contrary, struggle more sedulously to preserve it, amid the new temptations and new difficulties of their enlarged conceptions of right and duty."—Spectator, liv, 87.

"Sir Robert Peel particularly urged a correspondent to attempt an 'historical account of the villas in the neighbourhood of London.' He especially referred to those which were mentioned in what he called 'Horace Walpole's song about strawberry hill; but he added, there were a hundred others with very curious anecdotes of local and personal history connected with them; and he wound up by saying, 'the county histories would furnish a substratum for the work, but everything would depend upon the liveliness and accuracy of the details.' Such a work as is here sketched out, executed in a manner that would have satisfied the sketcher, would be one of the most delightful volumes that ever charmed mankind.

We must thank Mr. Cobbett for giving us a book which, if not so good as it ought to be, is at least one step in advance of its predecessors."—Sat. Rev., xxvii, 378.

Codrington, Rev. Robert Henry, D.D., graduated at Wadham College, Oxford, 1852, and elected a vicar of Wadhurst since 1887; canon residentiary and prebendary of Chester Cathedral 1888. The Melanesian Languages, Oxf., 1885, 8vo.

"The expectations raised by a preliminary paper recently read before the Anthropological Institute have been amply realized by Mr. Codrington's present work, which for the first time places the comparative study of the Melanesian tongues on a solid foundation. . . . It consists of two essentially distinct parts,—a general survey of all the Oceanic tongues constituting the so-called Malayo-Polynesian family, and a separate study of thirty-five more or less distinct languages current in the New Hebrides . . . searching investigation are in some respects so startling that they will scarcely meet with universal assent without further research."—Sci. Rev., xl, 58.

"The book is written with all the ripe knowledge of one who has lived and taught for years among the natives of Melanesia, and it offers a welcome contribution to the solution of an obscure problem of scientific philology. . . . Dr. Codrington . . . seems to think that the Melanesian is really, as well as linguistically, connected with the Polynesian and Malay; but his arguments have certainly not convinced me to my mind, and his view is opposed to that of the most eminent ethnologists. It is only incidentally, however, that he glances at the question of race. His book is concerned, not with ethnology, but with the Melanesian languages, a subject on which he supplies an abundance of material that makes a revision of our old opinions necessary. . . . The conclusion reached by Dr. Codrington is that the Melanesian languages have the same origin as the Malayan and Polynesian. . . . Dr. Codrington's opinion seems to me to have proved the main point of his contention."—A. H. Sayce, Acad., xxviii, 129.

That Governors, Residents, Commissioners, and the whole population of a colony were ill informed, unjust, and even occasionally insane, is a proposition which Miss Colenso unhesitatingly advances with graceful indifference to the balance of probability and to the comparative weight of authority."—*Sat. His father, a mining agent, was in straitened circumstances, and Colenso, while struggling for an education, was obliged to aid in the support of the family. He became assistant in a school at Dartmouth, and at last managed to enter Cambridge as a sizar of St. John's College, of which he became a Fellow. In 1846 he was made vicar of Farnett St. Mary, Norfolk, where he remained for seven years. In 1853 he accepted the new colonial bishopric of Natal, South Africa. Here he labored inle-fatigably, instructing the people, writing a grammar and dictionary of the Zulu language, and translating the New Testament and parts of the Old into that language. While thus bending his mind to this task he was led to re-examine its familiar pages for himself. The conclusions to which he came were embodied in his commentary on the Romans and critical examination of the Pentateuch. The publication of these books raised a storm in England. An attempt was made by the Bishop of Cape Town to depose, and even to excommunicate, the author, but on Coleridge's appeal to the crown these proceedings were declared to be legally void. For biog., see Cox, Sir G. W. infra. In the following list of his works his mathematical school-books, which are mentioned generally ante, vol. i., are not included: 1. The Pentateuch and the Book of Joshua Critically Examined. Part VI., The Later Legislation of the Pentateuch, Lon., 1871.

"The volume now before us is distinguished by the same sort of merit, and shows also, we regret to say, the same defect, as those which have preceded it—the merits of unwearied and minute research, of fairness in dealing with opposing arguments, and kindly feelings to opponents generally, and of outspoken honesty and fearlessness of statement;—the defect of not sufficiently appreciating the importance of the historical element to religious conviction."—Spectator, xlv, 369.

Coleridge, Sir John Taylor, D.C.L., [ante, vol. i., ada.], 1790-1876, son of James Coleridge of Heath's Court, Devonshire, and nephew of Samuel Taylor Coleridge, b. at Tiverton, and educated at Oxford, where he gained high prizes and formed a close intimacy with Keble. He was called to the bar in 1819, but for some years devoted himself mainly to literary work, contributing largely to the Quarterly Review. He was appointed a judge of the King's Bench in 1835. 1. Public School Education: a Lecture delivered at the Athenaeum, Tiverton, Lon., 1860, fp. 8vo; 3d ed., 1861. 2. A Memoir of the Rev. John Keble, Oxfr., 1869, p. 8vo; 3d ed., same year.

"Mr. Keble has been fortunate in his biographer. . . . Sir John Coleridge knew Keble probably as long and as intimately as any one. . . . He thoroughly understood and valued the real and living unity of a character which mostly revealed itself to the outer world by what seemed jerks and discordant traits. . . . Many people will of course except to the character. It is not the type likely to find favour in an age of activity, doubt, and change. But, as it was realized in Mr. Keble, there it is in Sir John Coleridge's pages, perfectly real, perfectly natural, perfectly whole and uniform."—Sat. Rev., xxvii, 389.

Collier, John Payne, [ante, vol. i., add.] d. 1883. The folio Shakespeare mentioned in vol. i., which was known as the Perkins Folio from the inscription "Tho. Perkins his Bookes" on the outer cover, was presented by Collier to the Duke of Devonshire, on whose death, in 1858, it fell into the hands of his successor, who, in 1859, deposited it at the British Museum for examination. This revealed the fact that the manuscript notes were recent fabrications simulating a seventeenth-century handwriting, that they corresponded to other marginal notes made in pencil and partly rubbed out, and were themselves in some instances written first in pencil. The authenticity of the lectures published by Collier as taken from his own long-lost short-hand notes made from Coleridge's lectures was also impugned, and a genuine letter preserved at Dulwich was shown to have and been cited by him with falsifications made in order to introduce Shakespeare's name. Sixteen more forgeries circulated by him were discovered at Dulwich in 1851. Collier published, in addition to works mentioned in vol. i.: 1. (Ed.) Five Miracle Plays, or Scriptura Dramas, Lon., 1836, Svo. 25 copies privately printed. 2. The Skyrovers' Play: The Incredulity of St. Thomas: from a Manuscript, (Camden Soc. Pub.) Lon., 1837, 4to. 3. "To one fatal propensity Collier sacrificed an honourable fame won by genuine services to English literature. Apart from his labours on Shakespeare and the history of the drama, few have done more to rescue the works of less famous writers from undeserved oblivion. His critical judgment, however, was not always equal to his industry, and he was never a particularly accurate editor. Worse than this, the habit of suspicion necessarily rests upon all his work. . . . In literary matters he was apparently devoid of conscience."—Dict. of Nat. Biog., xi. 353.

"When one reads the long list of novels which flowed from his prolific brain mind betwixt 1865 and 1876, the three 'per annum' it is to be wondered that his works of fiction are full of himself in one shape or another as the poet; that they bear the most evident marks of rapid composition; and that, as we once heard it said of them by a friendly critic, 'his plots construct themselves, and his heroes run away with him.'" Acad., xii, 132.

Collins, William Wilkie, [ante, vol. 1., add.] d. 1859. He was a regular contributor to Household Words and All the Year Round, in which latter periodical he published his most successful novel, The Woman in White. In 1874 he visited the United States, and gave public readings of two of his short stories, The Frozen Deep and The Dream Woman. His first dramas, The Light-House and The Frozen Deep, were performed by Dickens and other amateurs at Tavistock House, and afterwards brought out at London theatres. Many of his novels have been dramatized, and most of them have passed through several editions, though his popularity as a writer had considerably diminished during the later years of his life. 1. The Queen of Hearts, Lon., 1859, 3 vols. p. 8vo. 2. The Woman in White, Lon., 1860, 3 vols. p. 8vo; new ed., 1861. 3. No Name, Lon., 1862, 3 vols. p. 8vo. 4. My Miscellanies, Lon., 1862, 2 vols. p. 8vo. 5. Armadale, Illust., Lon., 1866, 2 vols. 8vo. 6. The Moonstone: a Romance, Lon., 1868, 3 vols. 7. Man and Wife, Lon., 1870, 3 vols. p. 8vo. 8. Poor Miss Finch, Lon., 1871, 3 vols. p. 8vo; new ed., 1873, 1 vol. 9. The New Magdalen, Lon., 1873, 2 vols. cr. 8vo. 10. Mrs. or Mrs.? and other Stories in Outline, Lon., 1873, 8vo. 11. Roundings and Writings in America: The Frozen Deep and other Stories, Lon., 1874, 2 vols. p. 8vo. 12. The Law and the Lady, Lon., 1875, 3 vols. cr. 8vo. 13. Alicia Warlock, 1875. 14. Two Destinies: a Romance, Lon., 1876, 2 vols. p. 8vo; new ed., 1878, 1 vol. 15. The Haunted House: a Mystery of Modern Venues, &c. Illust. "It is as a story-teller that this writer will go down to posterity, and as a story-teller his wonderful power is, we think, chiefly due to the dramatic unity which is to be traced throughout all his finer works. There is the utmost possible concentration of interest and no irrelevant matter is allowed for a moment to intrude itself. Each work represents a design, and each character, and even each speech of the characters, assist to the fulfilment of the action whereby the design is completed."—Spectator, 1. 1008.

"Mr. Wilkie Collins probably does not himself expect that any of his works will live. . . . But it is something to be juste principe even in a transient school. . . . He has made what may be called the 'detective' novel his own, and for comparisons are unnecessary—need fear no rival. He takes so much and such evident trouble over what he writes, and his workmanship is so good and so conscientious, that the result is always, of its kind, as good as can be got. . . . No one ever yet began one of his novels to throw it aside. It is possible that, having read one, we may not care to begin a second; but if we once begin it we shall most certainly finish it; for, although Mr. Collins has grave defects, he has no positive faults. . . . For ingenuity, for cleverness, for power of rousing curiosity and keeping interest alive, Mr. Collins stands altogether alone. The art is not a high art, perhaps; but he has mastered it, and mastered it—as his books show—by honest industry."—Ath., No. 2312.

Colquhoun, Archibald Ross, member of the Institute of Civil Engineers, F.R.G.S., b. 1846, off the Cape of Good Hope, and educated in Scotland and on the continent; went to India as a civil engineer in his youth, and rose to be executive engineer of the Indian Public Works. In 1879 he was appointed secretary and second in command of the mission sent by the government of India to Siam. In 1881 he returned to England on furlough, and a few months afterwards, in company with Mr. C. Wahab, started on an expedition through Southern China and the Chinese Shan states, partly with the view of discovering a new trade-route from China down the Irrawadi. On his return he was awarded the gold medal of the R.G.S. In 1883 he visited Hong-Kong and Tonquin as correspondent to the London Times. In 1885 he was appointed deputy-commissioner of the Sagam district in Upper Burma. 1. Across Chryse: the Narrative of a Journey of Exploration through the South China Border-Lands, from Canton to Mandalay; with Specially Prepared Maps, Fac-Similes of Native Drawings, and 300 Illustrations. Lon., 1883, 2 vols. 8vo.

"By far the greater part of these two volumes treats of southern and central Yunnan and Kwangsi. In a very considerable portion of these provinces Mr. Colquhoun has had no European traveller before him. . . . Altogether Mr. Colquhoun's book . . . is well worth perusal."—Sat. Rev., lv, 601.

- "He has carefully examined the various accounts that we have of this great man, and he has spared no pains in working up the materials into a whole. The sketch is readable and in parts interesting even to those who were already well acquainted with the main facts. But greater praise than this it does not, we fear, deserve. The criticism is of a higher order, though even this . . . is scarcely worthy of the subject."—Sat. Rev., lli. 228.

- "A critical monograph on Keats, in which should be disclosed all the new material that, since the appearance of Lord Houghton's biography, has been furnished by the industry of poetical students, has long been a desideratum. . . . And with regard to the book before me, on every page will be found evidence of that care and that scholarly conscience for which Mr. Colvin is distinguished even among English scholars. Every knot of information from every source has been examined with an honest sagacity which nothing can escape. . . . Those who read this delightful little volume will admit that Mr. Colvin in his treatment of Keats is almost as happy as he was in his treatment of Landor."—THEODORE WATTS: Acad., xxxii. 111.

Conder, Major Claude Reiguler, D.C.L., b. 1848, at Cheltenham, Eng.; son of F. R. Conder, infra, and grandson of Josiah Conder, (q. v., ante, vol. 1.) obtained by competitive examination a commission in the Royal Engineers in 1870, and in 1872 was appointed to the command of the Palestine Exploration Fund Survey, on which he was employed till the completion of the survey of Western Palestine in 1877. From 1878 until 1881 he was employed in the construction of fortifications at Edinburgh; in 1881 he was in command of the survey of Eastern Palestine, and on the work being stopped by the Turkish government in the following year he was appointed to Lord Wolseley's staff in Egypt, and he was present at the battle of Tel el Kehir. He was on the staff of Sir C. Warren in Beethunaland in 1881, and served on this expedition as British commissioner for laying down the boundary-line of the South African Republic. Since his return to England he has been appointed to the staff of the Ordnance Survey of Great Britain. He received the Order of Merit in 1882. His work on the Palestine survey—drawings, plans, descriptive notes, &c.—is embodied in the volumes published for the Palestine Exploration Fund. 1. Tent-Work in Palestine: a Record of Discovery and Adventure. With Illustrations by J. D. Whymper. Lon., 1878, 2 vols. 8vo.; 3d ed., 1880, 1 vol. cr. 8vo.; new ed., 1885.

"In the volumes now issued we have Mr. Conder's personal history of the work, telling in modest terms with how much toil, occasional hardship, and no trifling risk to person and life, the survey was carried on. Only a limited portion of his book is devoted to the topography and archeology of the Holy City—his object being to afford a succinct and comprehensive account of the field of operations through the length and breadth of Palestine."—*Sat. "A most valuable addition to our knowledge of Eastern Palestine. . . . It is on the wonderful collection of Ruin Stone Monuments made by Captain Conder's party that the leader of the expedition may most justly pride himself."—Sat. Rev., xvii. 28.

4. A Primer of Bible Geography, founded on the Latest Explorations, Lon., 1884, p. 8vo. 5. Syrian Stone Lore; or, The Monumental History of Palestine. Illust. Lon., 1886, p. 8vo.

"It is a treatise, as the writer says in his preface, on 'the ancient condition of Palestine from the earliest recorded times down to the close of the Frank dominion,' discussing the 'social condition of the inhabitants, their various origins, languages, religions, social customs, government, art, literature, and trade.' Obviously, in a popular volume of moderate dimensions, such an extensive programme could not be exhaustively carried out; but it may be said that Captain Conder, who has enjoyed unrivalled opportunities of examining on the spot, the archeological history of Syria, has also diligently studied the chief literary sources of information, and has compiled a most serviceable and book of syrian antiquities."—Isaac Taylor: Acad., xxx. 404.

6. Altaic Hieroglyphs and Hittite Inscriptions, Lon., 1887, cr. 8vo. (In the "Quarterly Statement" of the Palestine Exploration Fund, April, 1887, Major Conder says that he desires in this volume "to restore the known sounds of the symbols to which they belong, to show that this was the Hittite language, and to put into the hands of specialists the key which will enable them to make final and complete translations of the text." In a paper read before the British Association in 1888 he adduced evidence in support of his view that the Hittite texts are written in a Mongol language akin to the ancient Akkadian.) 7. Palestine, ("The World's Great Explorations and Explorations.") Lon., 1889, cr. 8vo.

"The name of Conder will remain as indissolubly connected with the Holy Land as that of Magellans with the Straits. In this book which, we have to say, is in every respect admirable and worthy of the subject, the author gives first a short history of exploration from the beginning. . . . He then summarizes in half a dozen chapters his own survey and its principal results."—Sat. Rev., lxix. 29.

Constable, Thomas, 1812-1881, son of Archibald Constable, the well-known publisher of the Edinburgh Review; b. at Craighook, near Edinburgh; learned the trade of a printer in London, and became a publisher on his own account in Edinburgh, issuing the series of translations, &c., known as Constable's Miscellany. He gave up the publishing business in 1860, and associated his son, Archibald Constable, with him in a printing-establishment, devoting his leisure to literary work. 1. Archibald Constable and his Literary Correspondents: a Memorial. By his Son. Edin., 1873, 3 p. 8vo.

The interest of the Memoir centres as much upon the lives and characters of his correspondents, as shown by their letters to him, as upon his own life. Letters hitherto unpublished from Sydney Smith, Godwin, Jeffrey, Lockhart, and Sir Walter Scott, cannot fail to arrest attention. — Sat. Rev., xxviii. 49.

Conway, Moncre Daniel, b. 1832 in Stafford Co., Va.; graduated at Dickinson College, Pa., in 1849, and in 1850 became a Methodist minister. Having modified, however, both his religious views and the extreme Southern political tenets in which he had been brought up, he left the Methodists and entered the Divinity School at Cambridge, Mass. He then returned to Virginia; but his course in aiding a runaway slave from his native county made him the subject of threats which obliged him to leave the State. He became pastor of a Unitarian church in Washington, from which he was dismissed for some anti-slavery discourses. In 1863 he went to England and lectured there on the civil war from a Federal and anti-slavery point of view, becoming also the minister of a Unitarian society in London, a position which he occupied until 1884, when he returned to the United States. He has contributed largely to periodicals in England and America, and has been a writer for the daily press in London. 1. Tracts of Today, Cin., 1858. 2. The Natural History of the Devil, Clo., 1859. 3. The Rejected Stone; or, In-surrection, Resurrection in America. By a Native of Virginia, Boston, 1861, 12mo; 2d ed., 1862. 4. "There is much of his characteristic quality about these essays, and they are very pleasantly written; but they are of the sermon class, and represent the views of an extreme party upon topics most of which are matters of sentiment rather than of reason, of faith rather than philosophy."—Nation, xxv, 74.

14. Demony and Devil Lore. Illust. Lon. and Edin., 1878, 2 vols., 8vo.

"For the industry and perseverance with which he has almost exhausted the subject of demony, Mr. Moncre Conway deserves the highest praise."—Ath., No. 2672.

"Since Mr. Conway first wrote the 'Natural History of the Devil,' . . . twenty years ago, the subject has haunted him; he has explored libraries in its behalf, ransacked the British Museum, visited cathedrals; he has had the aid and counsel of men like Tylor, Lubbock, and Max Müller. . . . While his book has, to our thinking, some marked faults, it has predominant merits which do him honor and make the work a real addition to the history of human thought."—Nation, xxviii, 203.

"Mr. Conway is not, we think, fortunate in his choice of title for a work which must demand acceptance as a valuable contribution towards the early history of engraving upon wood. . . . Through no fault of the author, it must remain incomplete until it can be accompanied by illustrations."—Acad., xxvi, 275.

"Written to support the theory that the large Belgic population, the infabula hominum multitudine, which Caesar found in Britain, remained with practically undiminished numbers after the Roman conquest of this island, that they thoroughly received the stamp and impress of Roman civilization, and their largely increased numbers were, again, practically undiminished by the barbarian conquests, that the barbarians adopted many of the customs which they found in the land; in short, that Roman civilization underlies Anglo-Saxon institutions, if we may use such loose and inaccurate language, and that Romanized Britain reacted upon the conquerors in a very marked and important way. . . . We quite believe . . . that he has made out a case for having the question which he puts regarded, and we are sure that his book will be read with pleasure, if not with approval, by all whose tastes and studies lead them to take an interest in the subject."—Spectator, II, 640.

"We find here discussions on the relations of animals and plants, on the influence of mind in nature, and on the origin of consciousness, with others on less remote problems. . . . One of the most curious speculations to be found in this volume is the tracing of plant to animal life through a progressive automatism and loss of consciousness. The great fault of the book is that no attempt has been made to systematize and weld together the material of which it is composed."—Nation, xiv, 121.

"It will be read with pleasure from beginning to end. . . . Even some of those points in which we find this work defective as a history increase the charm of its perusal. . . . He never likes to reject a good story because the evidence in support of it is weak. . . . It is the picturesque more than the importance of an event upon which he loves to linger. The philosophical reflections are often rather commonplace."—Wilson, xxxi., 282.

"It is sufficiently pleasant reading, and in every way excellent in tone. It tells all there is to tell of his active life; but it is weakest precisely where it had need to be strong. We cannot blame a lady for not dwelling on the scientific work; but, after all, that is what we should like to hear about. . . . We miss those definitions of the work, those explanations of mental processes which, after all, make up the life of a man of science."—Sat. Rev., lxxi., 472.

Cotton, Henry John Stedman, of the Bengal

Civil Service. New India; or, India in Transition, Lon., 1885, p. 8vo; new ed., 1886.

"Mr. Cotton begins by briefly describing the political crisis which is now at work in India. He then proceeds to discuss native opinions and aspirations. After considering the respective feelings of the two races towards each other, he points out with a 'consentaneous accuracy' the increased bitterness in their daily relations. He urges the necessity of non-interference with economy in the public administration."—Acad., xlix. 231.

"With the exception of three introductory chapters, which were due to the Dean of Westminster, the whole of the work is occupied with Dr. Cotton's Indian life and work. The first three chapters are written with a charm of style and vividness of portraiture which recall the Life of Arnold, and they contain brief but extremely interesting reminiscences of Bishop Cotton by two of his most intimate friends,—Principal Shairp of St. Andrews, and the late Professor Conington. For the remainder of the volume Mrs. Cotton is almost solely responsible, and the manner in which she has executed her task, on the whole, excellent."—Sat. Rev., xxxi. 571.

"His collateral chapters are of high interest and value. We are not aware that there exists anywhere else in English so full an account of the antecedents of Faust or of the dramatizing of the legend."—Ith., No. 3013.

"He shows himself quick in importing an ethical significance into portions of the poem which seem hopelessly obscure."—Spectator, xvii, 681.

"We question whether any interpreter, native or foreign, has more truly or tersely expressed the purpose of this wondrous work than Mr. Coupland when he says, 'The theme of the drama of Faust is the Trial and Triumph of Man. Inmaterial whether we think of the individual or the race, the story is the same—Faust is the colossal man, Faust is the long spiritual history of our planet. . . . For myself, I hear this echo in every part.—Aspiration, not attainment, is the lot of man; and aspiration is only born of surrender to that spirit of unselfish beauty which in its manifold earthly disguises is still ever of the heaven, heavenly.' This is undoubtedly the pith of the matter, and he who follows this clue will not go far astray."—St. Rev.

"The language of a burlesque should be gay, graceful, and harmonious: its plot should be ingenious, compact, and consistent; its pleasantries should avoid grossness, and its personalities should never descend into vulgar abuse. Judged by these canons, Mr. Courthope's poem possesses great merit."—St. Rev., xxviii, 43.

8. The Liberal Movement in English Literature, London, 1885, p. 8vo.

"Mr. Courthope's thesis is that, from the date of the reform of English prose and verse by Dryden and Pope to the outbreak of the Romantic movement under Wordsworth and Coleridge, . . . English writers were mainly under the influence of a "conservative" reaction. Since that time they have been mainly under the influence of a liberal movement. . . . No one who is interested in the study of English literature can afford not to read the book."—Sat. Rev., ix, 716.

"Himself a poet and scholar of distinction, and, in addition, a poet and scholar strongly in sympathy with his theme as a writer, he is, above all, qualified to appraise Pope's position as a writer. Those parts of his book in which he addresses himself to this task are the most accomplished and the most instructive in English literature with probably set upon Pope's character he has endeavoured to imitate the excellent example of Johnson, and to make the study of the writer's work his main business, in preference to moralizing upon his deceptions as a man."—*Sat. Cox, Rt. Rev. Sir George William, Bart., M.A., b. 1827; educated at Rugby, and at Trinity College, Oxford, graduating in 1849; took orders in 1850, and, after holding some curacies in Devonshire and an assistant-mastership at Cheltenham College, became vicar year was appointed rector of Serravalle, Yorkshire, in 1856 he was made Bishop of Bloemfontein, South Africa. He succeeded to the baronetcy on the death of Edinburgh Review since 1857; has made a specialty of comparative mythology and ancient history, and is a prominent advocate of the sun-myth theory. 1. 'Mr. Cox's style is lucid, logical, and eloquent. . . . He has all the literary power requisite to be just to a large subject, and to deal fairly with those of other views.'—Sat. Rev., xxxi., 677, 741.

9. Latin and Teutonic Christendom: an Historical Sketch. Lon., 1876.

'To the general public Mr. Cox is best known through his admirable 'Tales of Ancient Greece' . . . and his larger and more important work on Aryan Mythology. But if in these subjects he is a zealous disciple and fellow-labourer of Professor Max Müller, he is hardly a less keen admirer of the late accomplished historian of Latin Christianity, though we doubt whether he has brought the same amount of independent research to bear on Christian history as on that of the ancient religions and civilization of Greece and the remoter East.'—Sat. Rev., xxxi., 362, 374.

10. A History of Greece: vols. i. and ii., Lon., 1874, 8vo.

'In the main it may be said that, while continually consulting the original authorities, Mr. Cox has drawn most of his facts and arguments directly from the perusal of Mr. Grote's work. . . . They had both the same quarry and not so often to Mr. Grote, there would not be such frequent coincidences in the mode of expression, and there would be a greater difference in the historical illustrations. . . . Mr. Cox's history is remarkably well written. The book is interesting in the highest degree. The tone of many instructive allusions to other facts of historical development of the Athenian and Spartan characters and politics, and of part of the work which the Greek nation performed in the history of the world.'—Ibid., No. 2924.

23. The Life of John William Colenso, D.D., Bishop of Natal. Lon., 1888, 2 vols. 8vo.

'His volumes depict a strikingly noble and generous character; and the result is attained, not by the partial scintilla of a devoted friend, but mainly by the unobtrusive instrumentality of its object's self-portraiture in letters and documents which were never meant to see the light.'—JOHN OWEN; deed., xxxiii., 101.

With JONES, ESTACE HISTOR: 1. Popular Romances of the Middle Ages. Lon., 1871, p. 8vo; 2d ed., 1880, 8vo.

'We have here the histories of Arthur, Merlin, Tristram, Bevis of Hampton, Guy of Warwick, Roland, Olger the Dane, Ivaldek, and Beowulf, all given in the simple, yet powerful and picturesque language that best suits these early tales; while the skill with which they are condensed is admirable.'—Sat. Rev., xxxii., 725.

'The essay and the stories are quite separate, so that provision is made for the possible case of a reader who likes romances and does not like comparative mythology, or for the almost impossible case of a reader interested in comparative mythology who does not care for the romances.'—Spectator, xiv., 386.

2. Tales of the Teutonic Lands. Lon., 1872, p. 8vo. (These are included in the 2d ed. of "Popular Romances.")

'The tales, with two exceptions, have all been contributed by Mr. Jones; while the key to their meaning is given

In the introduction by Mr. Cox, who attempts, as he says, "to remove some strange misconceptions of the method which has been applied in the analysis of the popular legends of the Aryan nations."—Sid. Rev., xxxv, 457.

"It is by no means a bad book for students. . . . The oldest feature about the book is that it is preceded by an abridgment of fifty closely-printed pages. There is something almost pathetic in the tenderness for idle readers which this displays: 'if you won't read my book, at least read my abstract of it.'—Sid. Rev., xvi, 588.

"It supplies a life of Swift which, as distinguished from a criticism of his works, will, except in the extremely improbable event of entirely new information turning up, not require to be rewritten for a very long space of time. . . . For careful examination and judicial handling of matters complicated in themselves, and complicated still more by a century and a half of speculation and gossip, it is a book of very unusual merit."—*Soc. The Unknown God, and other Sermons, preached in St. Peter's, Vere Street, Lon., 1885, p. 8vo.

"These sermons, preached in the church which is, for many of us, indelibly associated with the teaching of Frederic Maurice, are full of interest and value on several accounts. They are thoughtful and instructive discourses, well worth perusal for their own sake, and they also present an interesting landmark of thought in the Church of England. . . . The truth is that Mr. Craufurd and his teachers like him are trying to make Christianity inoffensive, at the cost of making it meaningless."—Spectator, lviii. 123.

Crawford, Francis Marion, b. 1845, in Italy, son of the American sculptor, Thomas Crawford; educated at St. Paul's School, Concord, N.H., at the University of Cambridge, Eng., and on the Continent. In 1880 he went to India, and while there was for some time editor of a newspaper. For several years past he has resided chiefly at Rome. 1. Mr. Isaacs: a Tale of Modern India, Lon. and N. York, 1882, p. 8vo.

"We do not deny to the author considerable observation and descriptive power, especially of the scenery of the hills; but his characters are forced and unnatural, his situations and tableaux often excite a smile, and his plot is made up of 'contradictory inconceivables.'"—Sat. Rev., lv. 215.

"There is a kind of obvious cleverness about 'Mr. Isaacs' sufficient to excite remark, but upon a second look it disappears. . . . The whole story is only not an outrage because it is so palpably absurd."—Nation, xxxvi. 161.

2. Doctor Claudius: a True Story, 1883, p. 8vo.

"Beyond question 'Doctor Claudius' is next of kin to 'Mr. Isaacs.' . . . It might be that, after a short-lived popularity, these books would be classed as 'brummagem literature.'"—Nation, xxxvi. 553.

3. To Leeward, Lon., 1883, 2 vols. p. 8vo; Bost., 1884, 12mo.

"The tale . . . has been praised because 'not immoral.' By just so much as it is not immoral, it is not artistic, it is not true to life."—Nation, xxxviii. 193.

"He has treated an unpleasant subject in an objectionable manner, and his style is both pretentious and slipshod."—Sat. Rev., lvii. 87.

4. An American Politician, Lon. and Bost., 1884, p. 8vo.

"Mr. Crawford is nothing if not grandiose and darkly mysterious. . . . Ideas at once so crude and so trite are below the level upon which discussion is possible."—Nation, xl. 58.

5. A Roman Singer, Lon. and Bost., 1884, p. 8vo.

"Far better than either of the author's earlier novels. . . . But when all is said, Mr. Crawford has only the cleverness, and, we fear, the trickiness, of the scene-painter."—Nation, xxxviii. 631.

6. Zoroaster, Lon. and N. York, 1885, p. 8vo.

"The philosophy is rendered in the same grandiose style in which 'Ram-Lal' was introduced; the painting is done with the same haphazard brush he has used before."—Nation, xli. 157.

7. A Tale of a Lonely Parish, Lon. and N. York, 1886, p. 8vo.

"Judges of good work . . . will see in its more sober tone and its less ambitious aim the evidence of a care and painstaking which Mr. Crawford has not shown before. . . . Mr. Jaxson is a figure that deserves to stand beside any one of the worthy English squires with whom fiction has made us friends."—Nation, xliii, 14.

S. Surcinnesca, Lon., 1887, 3 vols. p. 8vo; N. York, 1 vol. ("The Cardinal" in this novel is understood to be Cardinal Antonelli.)

"It needed almost as much courage as talent to give the counterfeit presentation of one who was at once one of the greatest statesmen of his day and the best abused. The result amply justifies the attempt. . . . For the rest, 'Surcinnesca' is a very remarkable book, and a great advance upon any of the author's previous work."—Acat., xxxi, 286.

3. Marzio's Crucifix, Lon., 1887, 3 vols. p. 8vo; N. York, 1 vol. 12mo.

"In 'Marzio's Crucifix' there is hardly a superfluous page. It is short, yet not hasty, strong, and well finished."—Nation, xlvi, 142.

10. Paul Patoff, Lon., 1887, 3 vols. p. 8vo; Bost., 1 vol. 12mo. 11. With the Immortals, Lon., 1888, 2 vols. or. 8vo; N. York, 1 vol. 12mo.

"Nothing but very clever writing—and Mr. Crawford is always clever—can stifle one's sense of the ludicrous in reading these pages. Dr. Johnson, Julius Cæsar, Francis I., Bayard, Pascal, Helme, and two or three more dead men, sitting with the living on the grass, or on boulders of rock, social life, has its absurd side, of which the reader is sometimes keenly conscious."—Spectator, lxi, 1101.

Recollections of Travel in New Zealand and Australia. Illust. Lon., 1880, 8vo. "Mr. Crawford, after having been in the Navy, has known this colony [New Zealand] since it was first really settled in 1839. He has made a geological survey of many of its provinces. . . . To these opportunities of observation must be added no inconsiderable political experience. His remarks are such as we might expect from an intelligent colonist of the Liberal-Conservative type."—Sat. Rev., xlix, 733.

"The distinctive merit of his book is its marked freshness and originality."—Sat. Rev., xl, 395.

3. The Fool of the Family, and other Tales. By John Dangerfield. Lon., 1875, 2 vols. cr. 8vo. 4. Alix Fairford: a Novel. By John Dangerfield. Lon., 1877, cr. 8vo. 5. Portugal, Old and New. By John Latoche. Lon., 1880, 8vo; new ed., 1881.

"The subject of each chapter may be taken as a separate essay, and yet the book forms a complete whole. . . . History, literature, antiquities, agriculture, sport, and port wine are touched upon with skill and scholarly met. . . . The book is excellent in every way."—Ath., No. 2744.

6. (Ed.) English Comic Dramatists, ("Parthenon Library.") Lon., 1885, 12mo. 7. The World we live in: a Novel, Lon., 1884, 2 vols. cr. 8vo; new ed., 1885. 8. A Woman's Reputation, Lon., 1885, 2 vols. cr. 8vo.

"None of the novel-writers of the day shows his readers the play of motive and the working of the wheels within wheels of our complex life in the individual and in the aggregate with easier mastery than Mr. Crawford. . . . In his own refined way, and without the monotony of Mr. Anthony Trollope's photographically accurate reproductions, Mr. Crawford is as true a painter of life as the character of Barsletshire. . . . and his humour is far more pervading and finely favoured."—Spectator, lviii, 883.

9. Horses and Riders, and other Essays, Lon., 1885, 12mo. 10. Beyond the Seas: being the Surprising Adventures and Ingenious Opinions of Ralph, Lord St. Keyne, told and set forth by his Cousin, Humphrey St. Keyne, Lon., 1887, cr. 8vo.

"It is written in a dialect which has a seventeenth-century flavour, but no archaisms are introduced which jar upon the ear or make reading in any way task-work. . . . He has represented a real and true religion, in a manner that we have never seen surpassed."—EDWARD FENWICK: Acad., xxxii, 218.

"In spite of intentional drawbacks, this will be very much the best History of the Reformation, if the execution of the central and more difficult parts corresponds with the remote beginning."—Lord Acton's Acad., xxii, 407.

"Unless we date back 'the Reformation' to the Council of Constance, or even to the Council of Pisa, we can only regard this fraction as introductory to the history of the Papacy 'during the Reformation.' . . . His grasp of the unity of his subject, his completeness of detail, and his lucid narration, grounded as they evidently are upon a singularly fresh and unbiased critical overhauling of all the materials used by his predecessors, will secure a place for it as a trustworthy guide."—*Sat. Vols. iii. and iv.; The Italian Princes, 1460-1518, 1887.

"He resolutely refuses to deal with the personages belonging to an historical period as if they could be viewed distinctly from the age to which they belonged, as if their growth could be severed from the fibres of its."—Sat. Rev., xliii, 806.

"The literary charm of his work is very great. There is a freshness and frankness in the style, a directness and vigour of diction, together with touches of dry humour every now and then, which delight the reader and carry him up the unromantic lins and outs of papal and Italian intrigue. The book is as fascinating as a romance; and yet there is never for a moment a suspicion that strict and rigid accuracy has been sacrificed to picturesque effect."—Acad., xxvii, 23.

Croll, James, LL.D., F.R.S., 1821-1890, b. at Little Whitefield, Perthshire, Scotland; attended school for five years, but was mainly self educated, acquiring while young a pretty extensive knowledge of the fundamental principles of natural philosophy. He was apprenticed to a millwright when about sixteen years old, and worked at that trade for eight years, when he was obliged from the effects of an accident to give it up. He was afterwards an insurance agent. From the age of twenty-five to forty he gave much attention to the study of metaphysics. In 1859 he became keeper of the Andersonian University and Museum in Glasgow, retaining that post until 1867, when he joined the Geological Survey of Scotland, from which he retired in 1881. He published in scientific journals and in the Transactions of learned societies about ninety separate memoirs and papers on geological climatology, which attracted wide attention and are regarded as important contributions to the literature of physical geography and geology. 1. The Philosophy of Theism: an Inquiry into the Dependence of Theism on Metaphysics, and the Determination of Molecular Motion considered in Relation to Theism, Lon., 1857, p. 8vo. 2. What determines Molecular Motion? the Fundamental Problem of Nature. Reprinted from the Philosophical Magazine. Lon., 1872, 8vo. 3. Climate and Time in their Geological Relations: a Theory of Secular Changes of the Earth's Climate. Illust. Lon., 1875, 8vo; new ed., Edin., 1885.

"This is one of the most philosophical contributions which have been made to the science of geology within the last half-century. Every page of this volume is distinguished by close and earnest thought, and the conclusions arrived at by the author are, whether we accept them or not, the result of striking powers of deductive analysis."—10th, No. 2488.

"His epoch-making work on 'Climate and Time' is still (1888) recognized only by the little band of like-minded workers all the world over who have eagerly appropriated and assimilated in detail the leading ideas with which it revolutionized climatological science."—GRANT ALLEN: Journ. XXX, 332.

4. Discussions on Climate and Cosmology, Edin., 1885, p. 8vo.

"The papers themselves consist throughout of detailed arguments and discussions, reinforcing and restating the general principles of 'Climate and Time' with special reference to the 'Island Life' and to the objections more or less pertinently raised against it by sundry astronomical and physical authorities."—GRANT ALLEN: ibid., XXX, 332.

5. Stellar Evolution, and its Relations to Geological Time, Lon., 1889, or. 8vo.

"He has, in my humble opinion, been the first to recognize the full importance of one of the agencies which, under possible conditions, may have profoundly affected the climate of the globe during past epochs, although I do not believe that, in the present state of our knowledge, we can safely draw those positive inferences at which he has arrived. Even those who are unable to accept any portion of his theory as to the causes of past changes of climate must feel indebted to his writings for numerous valuable suggestions, and for the removal of many popular opinions which his severe criticism has shown to be untenable."—JOHN BALL: Notes of a Naturalist in South America, Appendix B.

Cross, John Walter. George Elliot's Life, as related in her Letters and Journals. Arranged and edited by her Husband. Edin. and Lon., 1885, 3 vols. p. 8vo.

"The novel method of extracts arranged in order of time tells the tale spontaneously, and George Elliot the woman stands forth revealed to the world in all the strength and refinement of her intellect, in all the clinging tenderness of her moral and emotional nature. . . . This stern independence of intellect combined with a complete dependence on others for the emotional life gives the characteristic tone throughout her life, and we are continually coming across a severe philosophical disquisition side by side with an outburst of uncontrolable affection or longing. She has doubtless portrayed this side of her nature in Maggie Tulliver, with her impulsive affection, her emotional dependence on others. But she had recognized it from the side with an outburst of herself as 'Ivy-like as Lam by nature,' and in this peculiarly womanly quality she remained a very woman to the last. Manly intellect and girlish heart were united in her to an unusual degree. This problematic nature serves to explain—so far as it bears explanation—the crisis of her life—her union with George Henry Lewes. . . . She had evidently found in him some one to cling to amid the dreary solitude of life in London lodgings. . . . The pre-eminence of the philosophic over the artistic spirit in George Elliot has tended to make these volumes, containing the record of her private life, rather dull and—dare we say it?—commonplace. She was a great woman, but this is not a great book. Like all thinkers, she intended to weave a web of theory between herself and life, and seemed to reserve all her honour and liveliness for her books."—Ath., Nos. 2988, 2989.

lectual mosaic work cannot produce a life-like picture. . . . In all the diadematic side of George Eliot's character is fairly represented by the extracts from her letters and journals. We see, and it is most interesting to see, her intense pre-occupation with the truths which she pressed upon her readers. . . . Unfortunately, Mr. Cross's admiration for her moral aim, so to speak, reflects itself in his wife's character has, in the description he has given of her, caused him strangely to leave out of view the amazing gifts of humor and imagination which rendered it possible for George Eliot to interest the world in her teaching."—Nation, xl, 283.

"Of the actual events of George Eliot's not very eventful life these volumes tell little that was not known before, but as a commentary on her works they are simply invaluable. . . . The way in which these volumes are saturated with what may be called the cant of Free-thinking, the glib-goodness of Irreligion, the unctious of the anti-supernatural, the gush of Positivism and Nihilism, might be disagreeable if it were not exceedingly interesting. The moral and intellectual atmosphere is that of the class-and-Christian and the proceedings are opened with an Chapter of Strauss instead of a chapter of the Bible. . . . It will probably provoke screams from her admirers, but we say hardly that if at the time when she fell under Lewes's mate influence, she had fallen under the male influence of an orthodox Churchman, she would probably have been a pillar of the faith and a brand plucked from the burning. The person whom superficial critics long took to be the most masculine of her sex was a very woman."—Sat. Rev., ix, 181.

"Taken as a whole, this Life leaves us with the impression of a lofty mind of singularly feeble instincts and singularly amiable sentiments,—somewhat slow and clabsty in its movements, and almost artificially judicial in its attitude towards every new intellectual claim. A sceptical Milton, without his epic genius, thought of as a very real dramatic gift of her own, we yet never see that gift in anything which she writes in her own name."—Spectator, lviii, 151.

"Mr. Cross has done his work, as far as we can discern, with admirable judgment, fine feeling, and dignified self-subordination to the cause. . . . We can afford to sacrifice a trivial vivacity for the sake of a deeper spiritual interest. . . . We can suppose something from George Eliot's writings which sufficiently represents what is here missing; and we receive a gift of greater worth."—E. DOWDEN, Acad., xxvii, 89.

Cross, Mary Ann, ("George Eliot,") 1819-1880, b. at Arbury Farm, in the parish of Chilvers Coton, Warwickshire. Her father, Robert Evans, began life as a carpenter, but afterwards became a land-agent. He was twice married, his second wife, the mother of "George Eliot," being Christiana Pearson. In 1820 her father removed to Gripp House, an old place, half manor, half farm, where Mary Ann passed her childhood, of which the early pages of The Mill on the Floss are in substance a reproduction. In her eighth or ninth year she was sent to a boarding-school at Nunnton, where Miss Lewis, the principal governess of the school, became her intimate friend, and corresponded with her for years, helping to influence her religious faith in the direction of Evangelicalism. In 1832 she was sent to a school at Coventry, where she remained till Christmas, 1835. In 1836 her mother died, and she took charge of her father's household, removing with him in 1841 to Coventry, where she became very intimate with the family of Charles Bray, (q. v., supra.) His wife, Mrs. Caroline Bray, supra, was the sister of Charles Hennell, who had published, in 1838, an Inquiry concerning the Origin of Christianity, which was translated into German, with a preface by Strauss. The reading of this book, her intimacy with the Brays, and various other circumstances led to an abandonment of her orthodox views, which caused a temporary estrangement from her father. She thought of establishing herself as a teacher at Leamington, but soon returned to her father's house and resumed her old life. About this time she met Miss Brabant, who had undertaken a translation of Strauss's Life of Jesus, a task which, on her marriage, in 1843, to Charles Hennell, she handed over to Miss Evans. It was accomplished under many difficult arrangements, and the money for its publication obtained by a subscription started by Mr. Hennell. In 1849 Mr. Evans died. His daughter went abroad soon afterwards with the Brays, and remained for some months in Geneva, in the house of M. d'Albert, an artist, who became her friend, painted a portrait of her which is now in the library at Geneva, and afterwards published French translations of several of her novels. In 1850 she returned to England, and in 1851, having accepted the position offered her through Mr. Bray, of assistant editor of the Westminster Review, she removed to London. Here she became interested in the writings of Comte and the positivist doctrines, by which she was influenced, though her adherence to them was never unqualified. She made the acquaintance of a number of notable men, including, Herbert Spencer and George Henry Lewes, then editor of the Leader, whom she speaks of as her first introduction to him as "a sort of miniature Mithras in appearance," whom she distrusted a little at first, but soon pronounced "a man of heart and conscience wearing a mask of flippancy." In July, 1854, she entered into the connection with Lewes which she always regarded as a marriage, though without the legal sanction. They spent some time at Weimar, and then settled in Richmond, where they lived for three years. Urged by Lewes to try her hand at a novel, she began Amos Barton in 1856. It was sent without the writer's name to Blackwood, and with others in the series of Scenes of Clerical Life appeared anonymously in Blackwood's Magazine, the name George Eliot being adopted only on their republication in book form. Adam Bede followed, and made the pseudonym famous. Her success as a writer relieved Lewes and herself from pecuniary anxieties, enabled him to devote his time to the prosecution of biological and philosophical studies, and brought a throng of friends and admirers to their Sunday receptions at the Priory, Regent's Park, where they lived from 1863 to 1876. After the death of Lewes, in 1878, she occupied herself for some time in preparing his unfinished writings for the press, and founded a studentship in memory of him. In April, 1880, she was married to J. W. Cross, supra, and Dec. 22 of the same year she died after a brief illness. Besides the works enumerated below, and some articles in the Westminster Review not included in the collection published since her death, she contributed two short stories—The Lifted Veil, and Brother Jacob—to Blackwood's Magazine in 1860, and Agathia, a poem, to the Atlantic Monthly in 1869. 1. (Trans.) The Life of Jesus; from the German of D. F. Strauss, Lon., 1846, 3 vols. 8vo. Anon. 2. (Trans.) Scenes of Clerical Life. By George Eliot. Edin. and Lon., 1857, 2 vols. p. 8vo; 3d ed., 1860.

"The work has satire, but the satire is loving; it has pathos, but the tears make human nature more beautiful; it is homely in its pictures, but they are connected with our most impassioned sensibilities and our daily duties; it says of a good book, 'It may contain firm assertions; it may be sternly satirical; but it never sneers coldly nor asserts haughtily; and it always leads you, to love or reverence something with your whole heart.'"—Sat. Rev., v, 666.

"The exquisite truth and delicacy both of the humour and the pathos of these stories I have never seen the like of. . . . I have observed what seemed to me such womanly touches in these moving fictions that the assurance on the title-page is insufficient to satisfy me even now. If they originated with no woman, I believe that no man ever before had the art of making himself mentally so like a woman since the world began."—Letter of Charles Dickens, Jan. 17, 1858, ap. George Eliot's Life, II, 3.

4. Adam Bede, Edin. and Lon., 1859; 16th ed., 1862, 1 vol. cr. 8vo. (For a correspondence in reference to the authorship of the book, which was claimed by or for a person named Liggins, see Ath., No. 1650, 1651.)

"A novel of the highest class. Full of quiet power, without exaggeration and without any strain after effect. It produces a deep impression on the reader, which remains long after the book is closed. . . . 'Adam Bede' is a book to be accepted, not criticised."—Ath., No. 1653.

"The author has got into an original field of observation, and as he has very great powers of observing, and a happy method of making his detached points of observation into a connected whole, he gives us something we have not had before. He is evidently a country clergyman, and the object of his observation has been the rustic life of a village in one of the central counties—a very unpromising object of observing to most men, but most men are not observers. . . . The continuity of character is so well kept up. . . . that it would be unfair to speak of the tale as a series of disconnected sketches; but the continuity is wholly in the characters, and the story, as a story, breaks down."—Sat. Rev., vii, 250.

5. The Mill on the Floss, Edin. and Lon., 1860, 3 vols. p. 8vo; 5th ed., 1862, p. 8vo.

"We do not consider 'The Mill on the Floss' equal to 'Adam Bede.' The authoress has not given herself fair play. There is the old freedom of plot, but the workmanship is neither so delicate nor so elaborate as in 'Clerical Scenes' and 'Adam Bede'; neither is the story, as a story, at all comparable to 'Adam Bede' for interest, or for artistic treatment."—Ath., No. 1693.

"Now that we are wise after the event, we can detect many of the signs of female authorship in 'Adam Bede'; but at the time it was generally accepted as the work of a man. To speak the simple truth, without affectation of politeness, it was thought to be too good for a woman's story. . . . The Mill on the Floss may not, perhaps, be so popular as 'Adam Bede,' but it shows no falling off nor any exhaustion of power. . . . If Mrs. Poyser remains unequalled, the great variety of characters, all distinct and yet all so happily amalgamated, the figures in the first volume of 'The Mill on the Floss,' show that the range of the writer's observation goes far beyond one or two spectatans.

"Both in the description and in the dialogue there are exhibited a neatness of finish, a comprehensiveness of detail, and a relief for subdued comedy that constantly bring back to our recollection the best productions of Miss Austen's genius. . . . Portraiture, however, and the description of farmers and their wives, only occupies one portion of George Eliot's work. Her side-glance to the mind which is entirely unlike that of Miss Austen, and which brings her much closer to Charlotte Brontë. She is full of meditation on some of the most difficult problems of life. She contemplates with the deepest of the possibilities, and the religious position of all the people of whom she cares to think. . . . But the objection which we feel to difficult moral problems being handled in fiction is certainly not removed by the writings of either of these gifted women."—Sat. Rev., ix, 476.

6. Silas Marner, the Weaver of Raveloe, Edin. and Lon., 1861, p. 8vo; 7th ed., 1861, fp. 8vo.

"The plot of 'Silas Marner' is good, and the delineation of character is excellent. But other writers who have the power of story telling compose plots as interesting and perhaps sketched characters as well. It is in the portraiture of the poor, and of what it is now fashionable to call 'the lower middle class,' that this writer is without a rival; and no phase of life could be harder to draw. . . . The gift is so special, the difficulty is so great, the success is so complete, that the works of George Eliot come on us as a new revelation of what society in quiet English parishes really is and has been. . . . Within its limits, 'Silas Marner' is quite equal to either of its predecessors, and in combining the display of the author's characteristic excellences with freedom from blemishes and defects, is perhaps superior."—Sat. Rev., xi, 369.

7. Romola, Edin. and Lon., 1863, 3 vols. p. 8vo. (Originally published in the Cornhill Magazine, July, 1862, to August, 1863.) An édition de luxe, with illustrations by Sir Frederick Leighton, 1880.

"As a serial story 'Romola' was not attractive; readers found their patience wearied by the minuteness of details which they were required to follow the transitions of popular feeling in Florence. . . . But, read as a consecutive whole, these scenes take their due place as the framework and background for the human characters, whose struggles and hopes and fears have a perennial interest, and which are in 'Romola' as vivid as if they concerned English men and women of 1863. . . . The character of Savonarola is the gem of the book; it has been grasped and delineated with a wonderful force and truth, the commands it issued instinctively as a real presentment of the man. . . . As a novel 'Romola' cannot be called entertaining; it requires sustained attention, and it is by no means light reading; but those who do not seek the mere amusement of an exciting story will find noble things in 'Romola'—eloquent and beautiful pages—subtle interferences and lofty thoughts. It has not the powerful interest that is to be found in the author's former novels; but there are indications of much higher powers of mind."—Ath., No. 1863.

"Great as is the power displayed in it, and varied as is the interest awakened in it, there is still the general impression produced by it that the authoress has been tempted into a field where, indeed, she is not less than she has been, but where her merits are obscured and their effect impaired. . . . Sometimes the antiquarian quite drowns the novelist. . . . The conception of the character of Savonarola which is here given is profound, subtle, and probably true. . . . But there is a side of the scenes where he is introduced. He is merely a study, clever, original, and faithful. . . . If she has got nothing else out of her Florentine researches, and out of her selection of an historical remote and uninteresting period, she has at least got the possibility of drawing such a character as Tito—a Greek and an Italian at once, beautiful, refined, flexible, kind, cowardly, and yet charming and kind, and not very bad. In the latter part of the tale the subtle drawing of his character is so allowed up by the sad necessities of the Florentine story. . . . But in the earlier part of the story his character is worked out with an infinite vividness and among much simpler elements. . . . Romola, however, is the central character of the work which bears her name, and the interest attaching to her increases as the book goes on."—Sat. Rev., xvi, 124.

8. Felix Holt, the Radical, Edin. and Lon., 1866, 3 vols. p. 8vo; new ed., same year, 2 vols. 12mo.

"As a story 'Felix Holt' is singularly inartistic. . . . As a novel with a hero there is no doubt that it is a failure. . . . It is as a broad picture of midland country life in England, thirty years ago, that 'Felix Holt' is, to our taste, most interesting. On this subject the author writes from a full mind, with a wealth of fancy, of suggestion, and of truth, at the command of no other English writer, bearing you along on the broad and placid rises of her speech, with a kind of retarding persuasiveness which allows her crowded images to sink slowly into your very brain."—H. James, Jr., Nation, II, 2.

"The popular notion about the excellence and brilliancy of the style of George Eliot's novels is that it is simply the excellence of a painter like Teniers. People talk of 'Silas Marner' as if there were nothing in it except a Stoney Lameter and the famous meeting in the parlour of the inn; of 'The Mill on the Floss' as if they were only a rural chronicle of Gleits and Dobsons and Tuillivers; of 'Adam Bede' as if it contained no more than a photographic reproduction of the life of midland dairies and farm-houses and apple-orchards. No doubt the same kind of remarks will be made about the latest, and in some points the best, of the writer's stories. And there is no lack of material even for the limited appreciation involved in such criticisms as this. . . . One group succeeds another, and not a single figure appears in any of them, though it be ever so far in the background, which is not perfectly drawn and perfectly imagined."—Sat. Rev., xxi, 782.

"If there is any fault in this rich and fascinating story, . . . it is in an overflowing affluence of lively and striking detail, which hardly leaves room for that force, subtlety, and intensity in the carrying out of the principal characters which marked 'Adam Bede' and 'Romola.' This is the brightest, the least penetrated with inner melancholy of all George Eliot's stories, and there are wanting in it, perhaps as a consequence, some degrees of that depth and of those grave by-ways of imagination which gave the former tales so much grandeur of outline."—Spectator, xxxix, 692.

9. The Spanish Gypsy: a Poem, Edin. and Lon., 1868, 8vo; 3d ed. same year.

"George Eliot's verse occupies a lofty table-land, but in all the region there is not a peak which pierces the cloud. As a composition, 'The Spanish Gypsy' is greatly superior to 'Anrom Leigh'; but Mrs. Browning, though she failed, as might have been expected, in the attempt to write a great poem, was born a poetess. If the larger and more masculine nature of George Eliot had shared the same mysterious quality, she might perhaps almost have confined the inference drawn from the experience of ages, that the highest sphere of poetry is inaccessible to women."—Sat. Rev., xxvi, 21.

10. Middlemarch: a Study of English Provincial Life, Lon. and Edin., 1872, 4 vols. cr. 8vo. (Originally published in eight parts, December, 1871, to December, 1872.)

"If we are to call 'Middlemarch' a novel at all, we may say that as a didactic novel it has scarcely been equalled. Never before have so keen and varied an observation, so deep an insight into character and motives, so strong a grasp of consequences, such power of picturesque description, worked together to represent through the agency of fiction an author's moral and social views. But the reservation we have implied is a broad one. A genius by itself, can quite overcome the inherent defect of a conspicuous, constantly prominent lesson, or bridge over the disparity between the story-teller with an ulterior aim ever before his own eyes and the reader's, and the truth of human nature to portray, and human nature as supporting a theory, but human nature as she sees it. . . . Not but that he must be hard to please who cannot, without overtaxing his powers of attention, derive plenty of amusement, and simple out of 'Middlemarch'—but that the ordinary country reader reads a novel for; but it would be unjust to so thoughtful, powerful, and earnest a writer to ignore the intention that underlies the whole. And to read such writing and thinking as they ought to be ought to be a real exercise of mind; especially as we own ourselves, while charmed by infallible touches of character, and enjoying the author's grace of style and felicitous illustration and allusion, but seldom differing from her views and strictures upon society, and her suggestions for its amendment. . . . But what a ceaselessly busy observation, what lively penetration, what a tenacity of memory, are indicated by these different social pictures! All the gradations of rank and class nicely measured and appreciated, what lively distinctions of rank are represented, even while the limitation of common souls, and therefore things to be overlooked by menures of higher insight and more universal goal will. In such questions the book is a delicate challenge to society as at present constituted."—Sat. Rev., xxxiv, 733, 791.

"If it were necessary to fix upon any one quality as the characteristic trait of the book, few attentive critics would term, as its distinguishing feature. The avowed irony of much of the writing is too obvious to call for much notice. What is better worth observation is the indirect irony in ample, a constant irony of situation. Misfortunes befall men just at the moment when they feel the safest from conversations of common people, anticlimax, horse-dealers, and laundresses, in which George Eliot delights. They are no doubt amusing and truthful enough in themselves, but they derive a peculiar gusto from their presenting an unconscious parody on the thoughts and language of educated people. But all the minor forms of irony sink to nothing compared with the lesson enforced by the conclusion of 'Middlemarch' itself. . . . The conclusion of the character to circumstances, and that, therefore, in a fair chance of happiness. . . . Though 'Middlemarch' novels, and though it would hardly at once make the reputation of an unknown author, it will not be permanently placed on a level with 'Adam Bede,' 'Romola,' or 'The History of Miss Marbury.' The defect of the book is, that the parts are more striking than the whole."—Nation, xvi, 61, 75.

"Middlemarch," if not the best or the pleasantest of George Eliot's works, is yet beyond all measure the most powerful."—Ath., No. 2374.

"The book is called 'A Study of Provincial Life,' and answers to its title. Round the central characters are country society—the country gentry, the survivor, the clergyman of various types, the country doctor, the bankers, the manufacturers, the shopkeepers, the coroner, the auctioneer, the veterinary surgeon, the horse-dealer, the luncheoner, and drawn with a force and yet a perspective which it takes time, and a graduation of feeling not easily commanded in the few hours usually given to a novel, to apprehend."—Spectator, xlv, 154.

11. The Legend of Jubal, and other Poems, Edin. and Lon., 1874.

"The volume is all poetic respect in an advance upon the 'Spanish Gypsy.' In those respects, which, without being indispensable to poetry, supplement and elevate it, in large-heartedness, tenderness, and humour,—it is worthy of the author of 'The Mill on the Floss.'"—Ath., No. 2129.

12. Daniel Deronda, Edin. and Lon., 1876, 4 vols. cr. 8vo.

"We recognize George Eliot's distinctive excellences all through; we never detect a flat or trivial mood of mind; if anything, the style is more weighty and piquant than that of her other works, and the work would have been better for more pains, for labour and care are conspicuous throughout, and labour and care which always never—or so rarely as not to affect his general posture of mind—feels at home. The author is ever driving before him persons—those with whom her sympathies lie—are guided by interests and motives with which he has never come in contact, and seem to his perception to belong to the stage of life which he has never seen, conversing in a language which was never heard, upon topics which will never arise in the mind of a religious novel without a religion."—Sat. Rev., xlii, 336, 394.

"Whether consciously so designed or not, 'Daniel Deronda' comes to us as a counterpoise or a corrective of the work which immediately preceded it. There we saw how two natures framed for large disinterested services to humanity can be narrowed—the one into the round of the dearest sweet observances of domestic life, the other into the servitude.

"Eyeless in Gaza, at the mill with slaves," which the world imposes upon those who accept its base terms and accepting compensations. Here we are shown rescued through anguish and remorse, and by the grace of heaven if also divine, which the soul of man has power to bestow upon the soul of man, from the self-centred insularized youth, first a crushed penitent of a spoiled child; and as a new-born lamb to the simplicity of a mother's love, and at last plunged into a purgatory of fire, consuming and quickening and seven-time heated, until the precious soul is released from bond and forfeiture, and reclaimed for places consecrated by love and duty; the other nature of finer mould and temper than that of Lydgate, with a disintegrating sense of commonness in it which produced through its very plenteousness and flexibility of sympathy peculiar dangers,—the danger of neutrality in the struggle between common things and high which fills the world, from these dangers Deronda is delivered; he is hurled and pointed into a great ideal life, made one of its nation and bound with love is confined to him the heritage of his and of which histories of Gwendolen Harleth and of Daniel Deronda, in the briefest summary. When we speak of 'Middlemarch' as more realistic, and the later novel as more ideal, the other untrue; it is rather meant that in the one the facts are taken more in the gross, and in the other there is a judicious selection of those facts that are representative of the highest (and also of the lowest) things. . . . That last novel detectable is easily understood; that some should find his irreconcilable proves no more than that clever critics in walking from their lodgings to their club, and from their club to their lodgings, have not exhausted the geography of the habitable globe."—EDWARD DOWNING, Studies in Literature, 24.

"It is only proper that we should give Mr. Dowden credit for his independence on this point, and some imperious protest against the critics who stand amazed and indignant at a genius to whose work they are accustomed presuming to strike out a new and unfamiliar path."—Sat. Rev., xlv, 798.

"To me 'Daniel Deronda' is one step further upwards in the career of a soaring genius who was destined, if life was spared, to achieve greater heights than any to which it had yet risen. It is the result of the normal and regular growth of unrivalled powers which were ever seeking superior to and more worthy for their exercise. It is as Ado about Nothing." It is an effort to realize the highest heights, and the lowest depths of human nature."—OSCAR BROWNING, Life of George Eliot, 141.

"The sense of dissatisfaction was the result of 'Daniel Deronda' has its source in something deeper than any of the peculiarities of the story. The reader feels that there is something disappointing in the development of George Eliot's own genius. The power, the humor, and the deep moral insight which were revealed to the public in 'Adam Bede' and 'Scenes of Clerical Life' are all to be found in 'Daniel Deronda.' The genius is still there, but the proportions gradually changed. Reflection prevails over description, and the moral purpose—discernible in George Eliot's five books, and in the shade the author's creative analysis and reflection, and instead of the action of a drama telling its own tale you have the reflective comment of a chorus of moralists."—Nation, xxiii, 245.

"No book of hers before this has ever appeared so laboured, and sometimes even so forced and feeble, in its incidental remarks. . . . No book of hers before this ever contained so little humour. . . . On the other hand, no 'Bede,' ever combined so fine a plot, so admirably worked ideal lines so noble, the whole effect of which was ever back to the beginning from the end, seems to have been so powerfully given. No book of hers before this has ever contained so many fine characters, and betrayed so much moral life within its shuffling buds and blossoms of the selfish life, which has been put off and condemned. And, timely religious a tone. . . . What makes it, after all, uncertain whether, in spite of the much greater inequality of execution and style, 'Daniel Deronda' may not rank in the estimate of the critics of the future as a greater work altogether than any which George Eliot has previously written, is the powerful construction of the plot—almost a new feature in her stories—and the occasional grandeur of the ideal Deronda, thus seems to us much more than 'Middlemarch.' But it rises at certain points definitely above that great book. Its summits are higher, but its xlix, 1131.

13. Impressions of Theophrastus Such, Edin. and Lon., 1879, cr. 8vo; new ed., 1880, 12mo.

"The title of the book provokes a comparison with the observation taken by Theophrastus and his great modern imitator, La Bruyère, we find ourselves in a literary coterie. Here and there, and especially at the end, the peculiar views associated with her name creep out, but most much by opinion, whether heterodox or orthodox, or most personal considerations of feeling and interest. They are drawn with a more hidden motive than the indignance

Her novels are by no means devoid of merit. They are a curious and not unpleasing mixture of imagination and matter of fact. "The singular diligence with which the actual records of the artists' work have been sought out, or brought together from scattered printed sources, and then collated with their remaining pictures, has not slackened as the authors have advanced over their enormous field. . . . They have been rightly anxious to avoid the snares of word-painting and line-drawing; they have much to record, and have thought more of noting it at once than of relating with literary skill; and hence, though we recognize their good taste, yet the book leaves much to be told when the genius of men like Manegone or Bellini is in question. But it would be unreasonable to complain that the annalist cannot group his masses or preserve his forces, like the historian."—Sat. Rev., xxxi. 747.

The work before us is so little so that it requires insight to men and their times, ere the pretentiousness of what has been gathered, its vitality above all, becomes recognizable; of gossip it has nothing; its special claims refer to impartiality and accuracy, of which 'Georgio' was innocent."—Atk., No. 220.

by the authors to make this book of value to the art student. A little more care had been bestowed upon the illustrations. In these days, when so many admirable new processes of reproduction are in vogue, one can scarcely help feeling aggrieved at being offered such poor outline engravings as these."—MARY M. HEATON, Acad., xl, 371.

5. Raphael: his Life and Works: with Particular Reference to Recently-Discovered Records, and an Exhaustive Study of Extant Drawings and Pictures, Lon., 1883-85, 2 vols. 8vo.

"We have no doubt that in these two volumes is a great life and doings of the painter, well qualified to stand as a text-book and an honourable monument of the acumen, taste, and research of the authors. . . . We are compelled to lament the absence of outline engravings or illustrations of any kind."—Art., No. 3927.

"The solid merits of this work are not seriously affected by blemishes which are mostly superficial. It contains a vast mass of matter partly unpublished before, and the whole of this interesting subject treated in a very wide and comprehensive manner."—J. H. MIDDLETON, Acad., xxvii, 443.

"Notwithstanding the irritating style in which it is written, . . . notwithstanding the (in my opinion) wrong-headedness or many of the judgments expressed upon important questions, it is far more complete, far more suggestive, far more solid, than any other work on the subject."—Letter of H. M. Conway, giving an account of an examination of the "new Raphael literature" and a collection of 800 photographs of his pictures and drawings in the Berlin Museum: Acad., xxx, 157.

Cumming, Constance Frederica Gordon, b. 1837, at Altyre, Morayshire, Scotland, is a daughter of Sir William Gordon Cumming, Bart., of Altyre at 1 Gordonstown, and sister of Rowleyton Gordon Cumming, or, ante, vol. 1.) known as the Lion-Hunter of South Africa. On her mother's side she is descended from the Campbells, and from the celebrated beauty Elizabeth Stirling, Duchess of Argyll. A visit to a married sister living in the Himalayas was followed by twelve years of almost continuous travel. She is a diligent water-color artist, has made sketches throughout her wanderings, and has contributed largely to periodicals. 1. From the Hebrides to the Himalayas: a Sketch of Eighteen Months' Wanderings in Western Isles and Eastern Highlands. Illust. Lon., 1876, 2 vols. 8vo.

"There is no conceivable reason why such distant regions should have been considered in these volumes, except that their names both begin with the letter H. . . . Miss Gordon Cumming has shown that she can use the pen and pencil most effectively. . . . The sketches of Hebridean rocks, lakes, and castles are excellent, and the descriptions. . . are lively, faithful, and effective."—Sat. Rev., xli, 588.

2. At Home in Fiji. Edin., 1881, 2 vols. 8vo.

"As the picturesque record of a sojourn in little-known lands, and a thrilling account of customs which are happily becoming things of the past. . . . At Home in Fiji is a very interesting and readable work."—Sat. Rev., lli, 488.

3. A Lady's Cruise in a French Man-of-War: with Map and Illustrations, Lon., 1882, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"It is with the Society Islands that the larger part of Miss Cumming's volumes deals. . . . Looking at the book as a whole, it cannot fail to increase the author's reputation, both as a writer of amusing gossip letters and as a collector of valuable sociological information."—Ath., No. 2835.

4. Fire Fountains: The Kingdom of Hawaii: its Volcanoes, and the History of its Missions, Edin. and Lon., 1882, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"The present volume is the author tells us, the Indian portion of her former work. . . . From the Hebrides to the Himalayas, greatly expanded. It has all the attractive qualities which Miss Gordon Cumming has accustomed her readers to look for—a keen observation, a creditable amount of study of her subject, and a flow of picturesque description, sentiment, and fancy of considerable power and variety, not always under the strictest control."—Ath., No. 2960.

8. Via Cornwall to Egypt, Lon., 1885, p. 8vo. 9. Wanderings in China. Illust. Lon. and Edin., 1885, 2 vols. 8vo.

"The picture of China and Chinese life that she is able to lay before her readers is a charming one, and gives a better idea of what the country is like, and a just estimate of the character of the people, than has yet been laid before the English public."—Sat. Rev., lxi, 820.

Curerton, Rev. William, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S., 1808-1864, b. at Westbury, Shropshire, Eng.; graduated at Christ Church, Oxford, 1830; ordained 1832. In 1837 he became assistant keeper of manuscripts at the British Museum, and, having learned the Syriac language, published several Syriac texts. His discovery of a text of the Epistles of St. Ignatius to Polyeare, maintained by him to be the only genuine one, led to a warm controversy with Dr. Wordsworth and others. In 1849 he became a canon of Westminster and accepted the charge of a parish in that district. 1. "With the wealth of materials placed at his command, and controlled by his own life-long experience, Mr. Curr is able to pass in review the ethnography of Australian lands, and in so doing brings a heavy indictment against some of its shining lights." Many notions which as Brough Smyth, Fyfe, Fison, McLehan, and Sir John REANE are shown to be absolutely erroneous."—A. H. REANE, ibid., xxxiv. 316.

"Mr. Curr's contention is that the Australian race is the product of a cross in which the negro had a large share, and that the family arrived on the continent in this state, and preserved from change by isolation. . . . He certainly places in a good deal of evidence to prove the affinity, despite the physical contradiction."—Spectator, xl. 610.

Life of James Buchanan, Fifteenth President of the United States, N. York, 1883, 2 vols. 8vo.

"The task of the biographer is to examine the judgment of his fellow-men have passed upon Mr. Buchanan, and review it in the light of the more complete evidence which he has at his command. This Mr. Curtis professes to have done, and finds that Buchanan has been misjudged. . . . His standpoint he has given us in a long chapter entitled a 'Summary of the Slavery Question.' This is, in substance, what was known in 1860 as the 'Silver-Grey' Whig position, and we do not find that Mr. Curtis has since accepted a more comprehensive view of the history of the country."—Nation, xxxvii, 277.
