Ten Guineas' Worth of Advice.

The following anecdote is told of the celebrated Henry Fielding: "The son of one Boaz de Paba, a celebrated Jew, was on the point of marrying a Christian lady. His father made no objection to the intended wife's religion, but was greatly dissatisfied with the match on account of her small fortune, in consequence of which he refused his consent. The son who was desperately in love, threatened the father that he would marry her without his consent; and the father, in his turn, threatened that he would not give him a shilling. . The young Jew answered that he would force him to do it; and that if he refused dividing his substance with him, he would get himself baptized to enjoy the benefit of the English law, which (then) assigned to a Jew child becoming a Christian the half of the father's property. Boaz, confounded at this answer, went to consult Fielding, to know if such a law really existed. Fielding told him that it did exist, and was in full force ; but added, if he would give him ten guineas he would put him in a way of frustrating his son's hopes, so that he should not be able to get a farthing. Boaz instantly told down ten guineas. Fielding, having pocketed the money, told him his remedy was to " turn Christian himself !"

The Believing Wife.

" Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me but weep for yourselves and for your children," said the compassionate Saviour to the weeping women who followed him to Calvary ; forgetting himself in his concern for them. He saw them unattended by their husbands, who doubtless were unbelievers. He saw them and their offspring exposed to coming tribulations : but more than this, he saw their husbands and their chilcountless families thus exposed. And he now

The Welcome Guest.

AN ENIGMA.

The following appears as an anonymous

Week by week, into our homes

A friend we welcome ever comes;

His brow is very white and fair,

We read his mission in his eyes.

For in the humblest cot is he ;

And yet his footsteps noiseless fall

Both old and young claim him their friend

In many a rich and tasteful hall;

To him they eager hands extend.

The little ones he don't forget.

Their portions in a corner set :

He, like a man of culture true,

Gives each a portion as 'tis due.

Quite varied is the news he brings ;

At first we list the song he sings;

Then care and pain he soon dispels

Our leisure moments to engage.

Of politics he seldom speaks,

A nortion for the great and wise,

He has for such a word of cheer,

And brings the far off to us near.

His voice in sweetest music swells

He tells who rest in death's embrace

Thus ws, in all our life-path, find

But let me whisper in your ear,

The grief and joy close intertwined.

(We will not let the stranger hear,)

He has dependent ones, you see.

This friend must live, as well as we,

And surely should not beg his bread

With tearful and averted face

Whene'er he speaks of marriage bells;

While he the humblest don't despise

With glowing stories which he tells ;

And from his hoarded treasure seeks

He gleans rare gems from many a page,

And on this fact we may reflect,

He enters each with due respect.

Aristocrat be cannot be.
