Mr. FOSTER. This clause gives pretty large powers, which have not been given heretofore. I believe, although we have had the Civil Service Act in operation and the Department of the Geological Survey in working order for a number of years, both conjointly. I do not think the hon. gentleman has detailed the difficulties which arise now as compared with the difficulties which arose previous to this time, and as to why he requires these powers, when former Ministers appear to have conducted the department without possessing them. It might be supposed that the director of the department and the Minister might know very well beforehand what work would require to be carried out during the coming year, and submit the case to Parliament, if any extraordinary aid were needed. I also observe that this clause places these employees outside of the civil service examinations, and leaves everything at the discretion of the Minister, as represented by the deputy head and the director. I do not say that the deputy head is going to make recommendations if men are not wanted, but there should be very good reasons adduced for breaking in upon the general law.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). My hon. friend will notice, in the first place, that the director of the survey is responsible for the persons who may be thus employed possessing the qualifications required by the Act respecting the Geological Survey. In the second place, they cannot be employed except under the arrangement that payment is made from the contingencies of the department. So the power after all is extremely limited, and could not be extensively used even if the director of the survey so desired.

On section 2.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the extent of section 4 of the Act respecting the Department of the Geological Survey? Does it refer to any help in the form of clerks or anything of that kind?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The hon. gentleman will find on page 38 of the Appropriation Act of last year the same provision.

Bill reported, and read the third time, and passed.

THE ADULTERATION ACT.

Bill (No. 72) to amend the Adulteration Act was read the second time, and the House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE Act (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). The purpose of this section is merely to complete the description of the articles which are to be considered as adulterated.

On section 5.

Mr. QUINN. Are there any radical changes in this?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. The only change is that it increases the penalty in cases of fraud, especially in cases where the adulteration endangers the health of the people. Our inspectors generally discover adulterated articles in retail stores and necessarily the retailer is hardly morally responsible as he buys the article from some one else. I want to provide by this Bill that when a retailer is brought into court, there shall be means of proceeding against the manufacturer or original vendor of the article so as to make one case.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

SAFETY OF FISHERMEN.

Bill (No. 111) for better securing the safety of certain fishermen, was read the second time, and the House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. KAULBACH. I desire to inform this House that an enactment of this sort for the better securing the safety of fishermen, I do not object to, as the principle is a right one, and the motive commendable, but I certainly object to some of the details, and my reasons for doing so are as follows, which I hope the Minister in charge of this Bill will recognize, and make the necessary corrections by way of amendments. I may say that all this Bill asks from the owners and crew of each vessel have been observed for many years, and the crew more particularly have been careful for their own safety to see it carried out. The corrections I recommend are as follows:—Strike out at the commencement of clause 2, fifteenth line, after the words, "The owners of such vessel shall supply her," and insert instead thereof, the following:—"vessel shall be supplied." My reason for suggesting this change is, that I have had communication with our fishermen and they ask it on the grounds that the owner is not at all times in command, but invariably owns a part of the vessel, and if it says "vessel shall be supplied," it covers with all that is intended.

I seriously object to the words "fog-horn or trumpet" being left at the end of section 2, nineteenth line, as the construction is bad, with all due deference to the promoter of the Bill in the other Chamber, who probably was the framer, as it implies that every boat shall of necessity carry a fog-horn, and the fact of the boat carrying it would be interpreted that it was intended for use by the boat's crew in case of fog, which would be misleading, and tend to much confusion, and endangerment of life, as it would be the medium in most cases, if used in this way, of carrying them further away from their ships than otherwise, and the cause of injury instead of a benefit, as each vessel carries from six to eight boats, and if each were sounding a trumpet simultaneously they would probably be following each other's sound, and thereby, in the multiplicity of sounds, be unable to distinguish the trumpet sound from their ship, and instead of recovering their ship, would probably have the chance of finding themselves hopelessly lost.

The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries will see the difficulty and the confusion that a trumpet in a boat, if used in this way, would naturally lead to. But I want to be understood in this connection that I do not object to each boat carrying a fog-trumpet, if it is used at the proper time and place, as it might be useful and necessary on the approach of a vessel under sail, or a steamer in a fog, or if astray from their vessel and in their boat in the darkness of night, and hearing the approach of a steamer, that they in their boat with a trumpet, which would then be useful as well as a comfort, could sound the note of warning and avert danger. Consequently I would ask that after the word "trumpet" in the nineteenth line, as referred to, the following words be added, "The trumpet to be used only on the approach of danger." I would also suggest that after the word "owner," in subsection 2, twentieth line, that the words "or master" be inserted, so as to read "The owner or master."

With these amendments as advised, save that the penalty clause, is in my opinion, a stiff one, and should be reduced, which I trust the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries will recognize himself as being excessive. I am satisfied to give the Bill my concurrence.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, this Bill comes from the hands of a gentleman in another place who gave a great deal of attention to the subject some years ago, and it has not had the advantage of being carefully considered and drafted by the technical officers of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. It was in the charge of a private member in another place. The principle of the Bill is one against which nothing can be said, so far as it means an effort to save the lives of fishermen at sea. We know that the loss of life is something terrible in connection with these fishing journeys, and I can understand the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach), who is most familiar with the question, and who is interested in it, directly and indirectly, suggesting as he has done some of the difficulties which occurred during the time I was Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and had occasion to consult the technical officers on the subject. I propose to ask the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries to be good enough to submit the Bill to his officers, who are experienced in the working out of these things, in order to see whether the difficulties that occurred at the time when I had to consult them, have been in any wise removed. There are one or two things in this Bill that make it not altogether so desirable as one might think at first sight, and which may leave it open to the charge that it may do serious wrong or great injury. These compasses are no good unless they are accurate, as every one will admit. The first clause of the Bill makes it necessary that there shall be an accurate compass on board of every one of these boats, and a very severe penalty, as my hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach) has pointed out, attaches to an infraction of that clause. If the Bill is to be enforced to the letter, the difficulties attending compliance with it around the coast, not only of Nova Scotia but any of these coasts, where these vessels are fitted out, will be very great. Even if it were proved that the master of a vessel tried to get a good compass but could not, or even if it were proved that there was no one at the port where the vessel was fitted out, to test the compass.

none of these excuses, fair and reasonable as they would be, would avail against the imposition of this penalty, and the industry might be seriously embarrassed owing to the difficulty of complying with the law. The very men whom we want to benefit may be injured. Instead of waiting for the Bill to go into committee, to draw attention to its drafting, I would ask the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries to grant that concession, if it be a concession, and allow the Bill to stand, or he might take the reading now if he prefers.

Mr. SPEAKER. The second reading has been taken.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. At any rate, there are lots of ways of bringing about what I desire, and I would suggest that the hon. Minister should let this Bill stand over until we have the benefit of the decision of those who are experienced in the work, and to whom he must look for advice on the subject of the drafting of this measure. They will be able to discuss these points with him, which they discussed with me before, better than I can. Not only is a compass to be put on board but it is to be retained, and there is no bona fide excuse possible which can avail a man who has failed to retain these things after he has made a bona fide effort to do so. There are also various other suggestions which could be made, and I would ask the hon. gentleman to defer the consideration of this measure for the present.

Mr. McDOUGALL. It seems to me there is another objection to the passing of this Bill, especially in its present shape. It provides that, in any case, where a boat is launched from a ship to engage in fishing, whether with trawls, lines or anything else, the owner of the vessel is liable, if the boat is not provided with two pounds of food per man. In many cases, boats are sent out but a short distance from the vessel and for a very short time, and you would subject the owners in such cases to a great deal of risk, if they did not supply these boats with a quantity of provisions not at all required. Suppose the captain of one of these vessels sent his boat out only a few yards, there would be no need to supply the quantity of provisions required by this Bill; but if trouble subsequently arose between him and the crew, there is nothing to prevent any one of the crew taking action against the owners for having failed to supply the boat, on a particular occasion, in accordance with the provisions of this Act. I would suggest that the hon. Minister should provide some kind of a limit or allow some discretion to the master of the vessel in cases where there was really no need for supplying the boat with the provisions required by this Bill. The fine to be imposed is very heavy, and consequently the Bill is liable to abuse.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I am glad to see that, at any rate, the hon. gentleman who criticised the Bill, admits it to be an excellent one in principle. These men who go down to the sea in ships and do business in these waters, incur enormous risks, and from time to time great loss of life results, consequent upon the dangers they necessarily have to encounter. I may therefore assume that it is the desire of every hon. member to minimize those dangers, in every possible way, and that is the object of this Bill. This Bill was introduced in the other Chamber a good many years ago. It has had the advantage of the criticisms of that Chamber on many occasions, and has emerged from it in the form in which it now is. It was shipwrecked in this Chamber once or twice, when the slaughter of innocents took place at the close of the session, without being considered by the House. On one occasion, I think the hon. Minister of Marine, for the time being, rather objected to the Bill in the form in which it then was, but my hon. friends who have raised objections will notice that they are such as might well be considered in committee. The last objection raised, my hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) will find is not tenable. He says that the master of a vessel may send out a boat for a short distance, without the quantity of provisions required by this measure, and no harm will ensue. But the object is to provide that the owners of vessels engaged in deep sea fishing, who send out small boats for that purpose, which are liable to be overtaken by fog, should supply on all occasions a certain quantity of water and food so as to have the men sufficiently provided with these necessaries, in case they should be required. It does not seem unreasonable that the shipmaster should see, in every case, that these necessaries are put in the boats. If he allows a dory with two or three men in it to leave his ship on the banks, and go one, two or three miles away, where it may be overtaken by fog or stress of weather, without a reasonable amount of food and water and a compass, he should be liable to punishment. There is no arbitrary penalty imposed. Circumstances may arise which call for the imposition of the highest penalty, but there may be other cases in which the offence may be partly accidental and partly due to negligence, and the court will take these circumstances into consideration and give such effect to the excuses made as the court thinks reasonable and impose a reasonable penalty. The court may fine 50 cents, or $5, or $50, according to the circumstances of each case, so that my hon. friend will see that the Bill has been drawn with very great care, and is the result of years of criticism passed upon it, not only in this House but in the Senate and the newspaper press. I have not the slightest desire to force the Bill through the committee against the wishes of hon. gentlemen, but I would suggest that we go into committee, and if any reasonable suggestion be made, I would be very glad to reserve the Bill for further consideration.

Mr. KAULBACH. I think my hon. friend is right in regard to his answer to my hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall). I do not see where the limit would be placed exactly.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Kaulbach) must remember that we are not in committee and he has already spoken once.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into committee on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That clause is very badly drawn. I do not hesitate to say that it ought to be recast very carefully. For instance, take the point I referred to a little while ago, with regard to the word "retained." I find that in the penalty clause this is quite overlooked. When I first read it, I thought, of course, that the penal clause would cover this non-retention of an accurate compass. The penalty clause shows that the owner and master shall be liable where a boat is launched or set out in contravention of these provisions. This makes the provision as to retaining meaningless. And it would be most unreasonable if the penalty clause happened to cover it, to make any one responsible for a dory, a ticklish thing like that, during its absence, retaining an accurate compass. Again I point out to the Minister of Marine how carelessly this Bill has been drafted. Subsection 2 of section 1 refers to "serviceable compasses," while the first subsection refers to an accurate compass. I need not argue this distinction or difference. The clause reads :

That means that these shall be considered boats within the meaning of the Act, for section 3 provides that this Act is to be read and construed as if it formed part of the Fisheries Act. That being the case, it is most important that this should be put in the hands of a careful draftsman, because confusion may arise, which it is most desirable to avoid. The boat in which these other boats go is a boat within the meaning of the Bill. So you have the master liable if he launches the fishing smack of a schooner without this paraphernalia. What is the launching in this case, is it setting out from port or running off the ways? I could point out a good many other objections, and I am satisfied we shall not gain much time by attempting to lick these three clauses into shape. The draftsman should sit down, take the Fisheries Act of which this is a part and see that the language is in accordance with that Act, and distinguish sharply between the liability of the owner and the liability of the master and also make clear what is meant by this expression "launching."

Mr. KAULBACH. The hon. Minister will see in regard to the penalty clause—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think we had better finish the first clause first. We can make no progress if we attempt to discuss all the clauses at once. I cannot see why the hon. gentleman objects to this first clause if he agrees to the principle of the Bill. It is a mere declaration, which I think is pretty accurately phrased. It describes a dory, flat or whaler as a boat and provides that none of these "shall be launched or set out from any vessel" without these appliances provided.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What does "launched" mean? Can she not be launched without these things?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. She cannot leave the vessel without these things. The alternate language is "launched or set out," which shows distinctly what is intended. The clause is as follows:—

No dory, flat, whaler or other boat whatsoever shall be launched or set out from any vessel engaged in deep-sea or bank fishing, for the purpose of fishing with hooks and lines, trawls or other similar appliances, or with intent that the same shall be used in so fishing, or for the purpose of examining trawls, set lines or other similar appliances for fishing, unless there is placed in such boat and retained therein during absence from such vessel an accurate and serviceable mariners' compass, and unless there is placed in such boat at least two quarts of drinking water and two pounds of solid food for each man of the crew of such boat.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Now, to begin with the first section, I have no doubt as the hon. gentleman has read it is the way he understands it. But it is not forcing the construction, to put it on the lowest level of criticism, to say that "launched" does not mean launched from the vessel.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I read it "no dory, flat or other boat whatsoever shall be launched." then I leave out the words "or set out from any vessel," as might properly be done—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No. It means "launched or set out from any vessel," it means that or nothing.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think I am giving the meaning that would be put upon it. The boat is not launched from a vessel; it shall not be launched, nor shall it actively set out. In the one case we are not at liberty to launch these boats. Launching is rather an extraordinary expression.

Mr. FLINT. Would it not be better if the word "launched" was struck out altogether?

Mr. McDUGALL. Would it not be better to say that no dory, flat, whaler, or other boat whatever shall leave or set out from a vessel?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Is that any better than saying she shall not be launched from any vessel? It says launched from a vessel.

Mr. McDUGALL. It does not say that. It says shall be launched or set out from a vessel.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is the alternative.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Would this interfere with the principle of the Bill, acting on the suggestion of the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), and dropping these words "be launched or"?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think it would be as well expressed that way as in this way. People will understand it better this way, that they shall not launch any boat from the deck of a vessel engaged in deep sea fishing. "No dory, flat, whaler or other boat whatsoever shall be launched or set out from any vessel." There is no possible way of misunderstanding that.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Either set of words will do, but both together make confusion. For instance, say that none of these boats shall be launched from any vessel, or leave that out, and say none of these boats shall set out from any vessel.

Mr. KAULBACH. Leave out the words "be launched or." It will read a good deal better.

Mr. FLINT. The objection of the hon. gentleman could be met easily enough by altering the construction this way: "No dory, flat, whaler or other boat whatsoever shall set out from any vessel engaged in deep sea or bank fishing, or be launched therefrom."

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That would do.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think it improves it, but I am willing to accept it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I move to drop these words out of the seventh line: "and retained therein during the absence from such vessel an accurate and." I need not argue that, unless my hon. friend desires it, because it would be a most iniquitous thing to punish the captain of a vessel for the act of some of the men in the dory in throwing that compass out. His duty in every sense is complete when he gives them a compass, and gives them food and puts them in the dory and tells them to go to their work. But after that, it seems to me no one could claim that he should be responsible because this compass was not retained during absence from such vessel.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This is put in as a declaration of what it is the intention of the Act that they shall do, to avoid the formality on their part of putting it in the boat and taking it right out.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. "The master of every vessel from which any boat is launched or set out in contravention of the provisions of the preceding section." It may be that these words are inoperative. I do not think we ought to put in notices to the public that mean nothing. Let us put here the law we propose to enforce, instead of putting a meaningless declaration as to one's duty. Then again in that clause I ask to be omitted "an accurate," leaving the word "serviceable," because in the next subsection the words "serviceable compass" are used.

Mr. ELLIS. I do not think there can be any objection to strike out the words "an accurate." But I think the section ought to contain what the plain intention of the legislature is, that is, that a compass should be kept in the boat during the time the boat is away from the ship when she is in danger of being lost. To strike out the words would seem to allow the captains, if they so choose, or the owners, by collusion or in any other way, to escape furnishing sufficient compasses to provide these boats. The legislation is really necessary. The newspapers on the coast during the fishing season are continually giving descriptions of boats or men that are lost at sea, or men who are starved. It should be compulsory at least, the Act should express that the intention of the legislature is that the compasses should be retained in the boat, not put upon the boat and taken out five minutes afterwards.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What if the compass is lost?

Mr. ELLIS. There is always the contingency that the compass might be lost. No one could be blamed, probably, if the compass was lost, and the court would take this matter into consideration. There is always a possibility of that contingency arising, but the law should provide that the compass should be in the boat, and that one compass should not be passed around from one boat to another through ten or twenty boats.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The provisions of the Fisheries Act are sometimes enforced for the sake of reward in connection with penalties obtained. The hon. gentleman's experience will furnish him with cases of the law being rigidly enforced in certain districts, not for the purpose of enforcing any general principle, but in order to give people trouble. It is a most vicious principle of legislation that we should either pass ineffective clauses or penal clauses, on the ground that although they might cover hard cases, yet no one would seek to enforce the penalty. There seems to be a very unfair liability put on the man in charge of the dory. It was right if the master could not be sued for having failed to place a compass in the boat; it might be that the owner was not liable; but this is construed as if it formed part of the Fisheries Act, and there was a general provision in that Act making every one liable for violation of any provisions of that Act or fisheries regulations. Section 18 provides that any one who violates any provision of the Act shall be liable to a penalty. Here you have men starting out in a boat with the duty imposed on them by this section to have a compass on board; and when the hon. gentleman states that this section was merely a statement of duty without liability, he will look in vain for any legislation regarding this subject or other subjects under the cognizance of the Government where the legislation is identical with that now proposed. The subsection requires that a serviceable compass should be put in the boat.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Bill does not provide for punishing any man who, bona fide, places a compass in the boat, if that compass is afterwards thrown out of the boat and lost. The object of the section is to prescribe a penalty if a compass is not bona fide placed in the boat and retained there at the time she leaves. I suggest that the word "and" be struck out, and the following words substituted: "placed in the boat to be retained."

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The amendment will cover the point.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am also willing to strike out the word "accurate" before the word "compass" and allow it to read, "a compass."

Subsection, as amended, agreed to.

On section 2.

Mr. KAULBACH. I move that after the word "the" the following words be struck out: "owners of such vessels," and the following words inserted: "the vessel shall be supplied."

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There are two different classes of persons who should be made liable. The first are the owners, whose duty it shall be to see that when the vessel leaves on a voyage she shall be supplied with the necessary articles stated. Second, the master is held liable if he allows a dory to leave the vessel without compass, bread and water. If there are five or six owners of a vessel, there is always a ship's husband, whose duty it will be to see that the vessel is properly equipped.

Mr. KAULBACH. In many cases a vessel has eight or ten owners, who probably reside at different places, and the vessel is in charge of a master, who in many cases is part owner. The vessel is liable for any dereliction of duty on the part of the master. If the words I have suggested, "vessel shall be supplied," are inserted, both the owner and the master will be responsible. It will be very unfair to place on the owner this liability, when he is probably a hundred miles distant, and has no means of exercising the necessary supervision.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The owner must employ some one to carry out the requirements of the law. If he is not liable to be present personally he must act by an agent. The hon. gentleman will not find any difficulty in regard to this section.

Mr. FLINT. Some one must be held responsible for supplying the articles required under the law. The owner must be held responsible, even if the vessel is at sea.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This section necessitates a direct personal supervision over the vessel by the owner; it does not say that he shall exercise or use all reasonable means to see that the vessel is properly supplied. I am not attacking this subsection, but I desire to point out that it involves a line of duty not hitherto demanded.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman will see that the penalties imposed on an owner who has been negligent in performing his duty are variable, and depend on the extent of the legal and moral guilt. If he has absolutely neglected his duty and has given no instructions and adopted no precautions to carry out the law, then he may be liable to the full penalty.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And if he does not do it in fact?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He is liable to the same penalty, but the amount is in the discretion of the court. If this man has done all in his power to take proper precautions and was not guilty of an absolute neglect of duty, the court would not punish him to the same extent as another who was absolutely at fault. Unless you want to make the Bill a farce it is perfectly plain the owner must be liable.

Mr. KAULBACH. Why not say the "master" of such vessel instead of the "owner." The owner cannot, at least should not, be responsible for what has transpired during the voyage.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The master is liable if he allows the boat to leave the vessel for the purpose of fishing without the proper equipment, but this is a statutory duty cast upon the owner to see that the compasses and things are supplied to the vessel when she leaves the port. A great part of the usefulness of the Bill would be destroyed if the owner is held not to be responsible. This clause is for the protection of the lives of the hundreds of men engaged in the fishing vessels, and if the owner neglects his duty absolutely, he should be punished to the fullest extent the law provides. If there are excuses that he can bring forward in palliation of his conduct, the court will take that into consideration.

Mr. KAULBACH. The master is the person really in charge in setting out on the voyage, and I should say he would be the party really responsible.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Suppose there are several owners, some of whom do not participate in the management of the vessel, may there not be some difficulty about the word "owner" in this section?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think so. The Interpretation Act says the singular includes the plural.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Yes, but should you include those who are not directly concerned in the matter?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The court, in its discretion, may find that the owner was not so guilty as the ship's husband.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I appreciate what the Minister says, but it seems to me to be questionable whether you should make the owner liable for any penalty of that kind. I would ask the hon. gentleman whether under the Merchants' Shipping Act there is any obligation upon the fishing vessels to have a fog-horn?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, they are exempted.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Would it not be desirable to provide, as is done in the Merchants' Shipping Act, with regard to the character of the fog-horn? Would it not be well to say that it should be a "serviceable" fog-horn?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think that is a very good suggestion, and I am glad to accept it.

Mr. KAULBACH. It will lead to a great deal of confusion if every boat with a trumpet were to sound it in time of fog, for we would have one boat following the sound of the other.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think we can trust to the experience of the men on board with respect to that. The hon. gentleman will see that they would not all begin blowing their trumpets without necessity.

Mr. KAULBACH. I do not object to the words "fog-horn or trumpet" remaining in the clause, but I would ask the Minister to use the following words: "The trumpet to be used only on the approach of danger."

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think that is necessary. The men must themselves judge of the time for using the trumpet.

Mr. KAULBACH. It is quite possible that they might use it without necessity. I contend that my suggestion is a reasonable one.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This provision makes such a radical change that it should be well considered. The policy of Parliament so far has been in the opposite direction to the provisions of this subsection. We provide that these dories or little boats shall all have serviceable compasses, and my recollection is that the law exempts fishing vessels from the regulations in this respect, which apply to other ships. A vessel may go out without any serviceable compass so far as the law is concerned, but we now provide that these little boats which she carries shall each have a serviceable compass when they go away from the ship, so that they may be able, for instance, to find the position of the schooner, which they left at a certain time; but for all the law says, the schooner from which the boats started, if she moves, will not be able to fix the position of the nets or trawls from which the dories have gone with the compass. If you want this measure effective, you must not take everything for granted. You take for granted, for instance, that the magistrate is going to be reasonable, and that the penalty he imposes will often be the lowest amount. If you touch the subject at all, you should do it completely; and if you provide that these small boats shall be so fitted out, surely you must provide that the boat carrying them shall have a serviceable compass as well. According to my information, there are vessels, particularly on the Labrador coast, which are reported season after season to have none of these things. There are considerable parts of the coasts of this country—I am not referring to provinces like Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, but to certain out-of-the-way parts of the province of Quebec, for instance—where, if you would not permit vessels to go to sea without such things, they would not go to sea at all, and it would be a question how they would get a living. Questions of that kind were in the minds of the officers of the department who advised me with reference to a Bill of this character—how far you would be prepared to stop such an industry in certain parts of the country; and I call attention to the fact that you make this provision with regard to the small boats, and let the large boats go free.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Bill cannot be construed as applying to fishing smacks such as my hon. friend refers to. It is carefully confined to those vessels which are engaged in deep-sea fishing; and I am sure that the hon. gentleman himself on reflection will be satisfied that no vessel should go out and engage in deep-sea or bank fishing with these dories on board, and launch them on the deep, without providing them with a compass.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am pointing out that the hon. gentleman's legislation is incomplete—that he is only providing that the dories must have a compass, but is not providing that the big ship must have it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is no danger of her getting lost in a fog.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Are we to understand that this does not apply to small boats that fish around the coasts or in the Gulf of St. Lawrence?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It only applies to those engaged in deep-sea or bank fishing.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Take two or three miles from the shore—would not that be considered deep-sea fishing?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Of course not.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I think that three miles from the shore is deep-sea fishing.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I suppose you could find deep-sea fishing in the gulf.

Mr. McDOUGALL. In Nova Scotia we have two-ton boats which go out ten miles from the shore. Does this apply to them?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If these vessels are engaged in deep-sea fishing, it will apply. If they confine themselves to the shore, it will not apply.

Mr. KAULBACH. With regard to compasses, the hon. gentleman will see that the Bill breaks up any arrangement between the owner or master and the crew. Hitherto the crew have always furnished themselves with compasses for the boat, as well as the utensil for carrying water. This clause compels the owner of the vessel to furnish these articles.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He can make an arrangement to charge them to the seamen if he likes.

Mr. KAULBACH. My contention is that if this were made to read, "vessels shall be supplied," that would mean that the article would have to be supplied, without naming the owner or the crew.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The object is to provide that somebody shall do it, and that he shall be punished if he does not.

Mr. KAULBACH. I would urge that to be added, if it is at all possible.

On section 2,

Mr. KAULBACH. I would suggest that the words, "or master," be inserted after the word "owner" in the 20th line.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. You could not do that very well unless you altered the preceding section by inserting the same words there. The idea is to make the owner liable in one instance, and the master liable in another. If the vessel leaves port without these things, the owner shall be liable, and if any boat is launched from her in the deep sea without them, the master is liable.

Mr. KAULBACH. The owner may not be there when she leaves.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Then he must see that some one is there. The object is to make some one liable.

Mr. KAULBACH. Would it affect the clause if the words "or master" were included?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think it would.

Mr. McDOUGALL. When is it intended that this Act shall go into force?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. At once.

Mr. McDOUGALL. A great many men are now absent from their homes for the season, prosecuting the fishing industry, and it would be unjust to render them liable.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Let the hon. gentleman suggest a date.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I would suggest that this Act do not go into force until next year.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

It will entail a great deal of expense. A vessel that proceeded to the fishing banks a week ago may not return to her owners for three or four months. Say that a vessel goes to the Newfoundland banks from Nova Scotia, the master would be under necessity of going into a port on the coast of Newfoundland and getting those supplies or be liable to a penalty from the moment this Bill came into force.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am quite willing to accept any reasonable suggestion. How would the first of August do?

Mr. McDOUGALL. Supposing that vessel does not return for three or four months. They usually make but one trip during the season.

Mr. KAULBACH. My hon. friend is reasonable in his request. These voyages usually terminate about the middle of September, and not any earlier, and, therefore, the Bill should not go into operation before the first of October next.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Will there be any hardship making it the first of August, because it does seem to me that if the dangers we propose to avoid are really serious, and both sides admit they are, it would be a cruel thing to postpone the taking of reasonable precautions any longer than is absolutely necessary.

Mr. KAULBACH. The major portion of those vessels do not return until the middle of September. Some of them go for the whole season, and get their supplies in St. John's and other ports in Newfoundland.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will accept the hon. gentleman's suggestion and make it the first of October.

Mr. KAULBACH. Whilst on my feet, I would refer to the penalty clause. It seems to me excessive.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to call his attention to the fact that there is no arbitrary sum fixed. There is a maximum, but no minimum limit, and the penalty may be only a dollar.

Mr. KAULBACH. The maximum appears to be too heavy.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Suppose two men lose their lives through a violation of this Bill, do you think a fine of $100 would be too great a punishment?

Mr. KAULBACH. The hon. gentleman is putting an extreme case. My reason for asking that a lesser penalty be imposed is that the master of a vessel is compelled to exercise a certain amount of discipline on board, and very often fishermen, who were not previously on board that vessel or who were never at sea before, feel the ruling rather rigid on the part of the master, and may try to exercise some of their rebelling powers, and violate the law intentionally so as to bring the master to punishment. Therefore, I ask that the maximum penalty be not $100 but a less amount.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The feeling of all those I have spoken to is in favour of increasing the maximum.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I hope there will be a pretty good minimum fixed. At present, there is no minimum fixed at all. Those in favour of the principle of the Bill desire it to have some effect. My hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach) represents what we may call the wealthier class of men who go into this business, and they can never well afford to comply with this law.

Mr. KAULBACH. Some of them are very poor.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. But others we know from experience are not. We know that heavy steamship owners, all of whom no doubt are anxious that no lives should be lost, find it very difficult to comply with the different Acts passed for the purpose of preserving life, and our experience is that unless the penalties are considerable and effective, they will not take the pains to comply with the law. What may happen under this Bill? In districts where the influence of the ship-owners and masters are considerable, they may go before a magistrate friendly, or unprincipled if you like—for there are unprincipled magistrates—and have themselves fined, and then be able to plead this conviction, if the matter be taken up seriously afterwards. They may have been fined only 50 cents or $1. We know how our Fisheries Act works, and the hon. gentleman who is trying to neutralize such influences, should fix a sufficiently heavy minimum penalty. It seems idle, when enacting a law to protect life, that it should be left subject to such influences as I have mentioned, and have merely nominal fines inflicted because of these special reasons, which the hon. gentleman has mentioned, advanced by the owners and others who really intended to violate the law. I shall not press the hon. gentleman finally on that point for the moment, but I think it is worthy his serious consideration.

Mr. KAULBACH. The hon. member for Pictou is labouring under the very erroneous impression that the fishermen are a rich class. They are not.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Some are.

Mr. KAULBACH. The major portion of them have become very poor within the last year or two from the fact that the hon. Minister has withdrawn from them a certain amount of the bounty which was due to them.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not withdraw any bounty. I gave them a larger bounty.

Mr. KAULBACH. No, you reduced the bounty.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. The inshore fishermen have had the bounty increased.

Mr. KAULBACH. The deep sea fishermen, as a rule, have been greatly curtailed, as regards the bounty.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. How much?

Mr. KAULBACH. I do not remember exactly the figures, but I am correct in my statement. I contend that the bounties should be increased instead of reduced, and I take this opportunity now of reminding the hon. gentleman that instead of reducing the bounty for the deep sea fishermen, he should increase it and thus encourage that industry in ship-building as well.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Does the hon. gentleman intend to fix a date when the Bill will come into operation?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I intend to provide for that by another section.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I would like to move the following amendment:—

This Act shall not apply to vessels that proceeded to engage in fishing before the passage of this Act is published in the customs offices of Canada, and will not go into force before the first of August, 1898.

I take it that the hon. Minister will have the provisions of this Act posted up in the customs offices as soon as it passes.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Such a clause is never inserted in any statute because it would give rise to doubt whether in some instances the amount was posted up. I am willing to accept the suggestion as to the first of October.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I move that the following be added to the Bill clause 4:—

This Act shall come into force and effect on and after the first day of October, 1898.

Motion agreed to.

Bill reported as amended.

SUPPLY—THE YUKON CONTINGENT.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). Questions were put the other day by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) to which I desire to reply. I would have made my statement on the subject yesterday had the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) been in his place. The questions he asked related to the sending of the contingent of troops of the permanent militia into the Yukon district, and the probable expenditure that may result therefrom. Of course, it is well understood by the House that the principal object of the militia is to support the civil power, and it is for the purpose of aiding in this respect that it is proposed now to send this force into the Yukon country. The very large extent of territory there, and the wide distribution of gold in that country, as we are led to believe now on the latest reports received, will result in the establishment of a large number of mining camps. This caused the Government to believe that it would be necessary to increase the force which is now in that country. I think there are about 190 North-west mounted police in the Yukon district. At first, I believe, it was intended to increase the mounted police force, but on further consideration it was thought that it would better serve the objects in view to send a detachment of the permanent force, which would establish a central force in that country, would have a certain decided moral effect upon the scattered population through the district, and if necessity demanded, would be ready to assist in enforcing law and maintaining order there. It was proposed to send 200 additional North-west mounted policemen, but, instead of that, there are to be sent 200 of the permanent force, including officers and non-commissioned officers. In addition to the 200 members of the force, there will be a very few men who will go up as artificers and boatmen to assist in carrying the expedition. I might point out, what was very well known, I suppose, to every member of the House, that the United States have at the present time four companies of their regular troops in Alaskan territory.

Mr. FOSTER. What number does that make ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I think between three and four hundred men.

Mr. WALLACE. Whereabouts are they ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I think that two companies of them are at Skagway, but I am not informed as to the distribution of the others. With regard to the question of expense, I may say that it is a difficult matter to estimate, when sending into a country like that, exactly what the expense will be, because of the difficulties in the way of transportation and so on. So far as I am able to estimate now, this force will cost, in addition to what it would cost if it were left where it has been, about $200,000 a year. This, as I say, is extra, but for the first year only. I should think that it might be reduced, if they remain there, by $50,000 a year, in succeeding years.

Mr. FOSTER. Does that estimate include the cost of transport and maintenance for the year ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Possibly it will be a little more for the first year, but it will certainly be less in subsequent years. The cost of this force of 200 men now is about $100,000 a year, that is, the whole permanent force numbers about 800, and the annual cost is something over $400,000.

Mr. TISDALE. What would be the cost if you sent mounted police ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. It would have cost more. I believe that the pay of the mounted police is higher than that of the permanent force.

Mr. WALLACE. What is the pay of the privates in this force ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Fifty cents per day. I may explain that we pay the North-west mounted police, while they are in that country, double their regular pay. We propose to treat the militia force in the same way while they are there, so that really if it were not for the fact that the pay is actually double what it has been here, the increase would not be more than $100,000 to $160,000.

Mr. TISDALE. Is not their pay double the pay of the mounted police ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. No, the police get double its normal pay, and the normal pay received by the mounted police is greater than the pay of the militia. The militia will simply receive the double of its pay. I may say it is intended to send the troops by the Stikine River, and overland from Glenora to Teslin Lake and down Teslin Lake to Fort Selkirk. That is the objective point to which it is intended to send this detachment. It is intended, for perhaps a few months, to leave a portion of the force at Lake Teslin until towards the close of the season, but the objective point to which the expedition is going is Fort Selkirk. It is intended there to establish barracks, to construct certain defensive works, and make the men as comfortable as possible at that point.

Mr. WALLACE. Are they under the control of Major Walsh ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. They will be under the control of the civil power; whoever is administering the district will have control, because the military is sent out simply in support of the civil power, and will be at the call of the administrator of the Government there whenever necessity may require.

Mr. HUGHES. What armament are the men to take? Are they taking any Maxim guns?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes, they are armed with Lee-Enfield rifles; they will take two Maxim guns and two seven-pound field guns. The ammunition taken will be 300 rounds per rifle, and 12,500 rounds per Maxim gun.

Mr. McDougall. By what route are they going from here to Glenora?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. They are going to Vancouver over the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I believe from Vancouver up the Stikine River by the Canadian Pacific Railway Navigation Company. I think that is the arrangement the Quartermaster General has made, and from there we expect to be assisted by the Hudson Bay Company in the transportation of freight from Glenora to Lake Teslin.

Mr. SPROULE. Then there is no truth in the report that they were going by an American vessel?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Not the slightest.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE LATE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Before you leave the Chair, I desire to refer to a matter which has already been pretty thoroughly discussed in the House on previous occasions, but which, by reason of a return that has recently been brought down, assumes a somewhat new aspect. It has to do, Sir, with the appointments which were made by the late Government after its defeat at the polls in June, 1896. I shall refer to it very briefly for the reason that we are all anxious that the business of the House should progress as quickly as possible, and by reason of the fact too that the points in question have been pretty well discussed, and the points which I hope to be able to make will be so clear that they will not need amplification or much discussion at my hands. I may say at the outset that I do not desire to bring this question up for the purpose of showing that the Government of the day are inconsistent. So much evidence has been brought forward on that score, the point has been so well established, that no matter how strong a case I might be able to make, no matter how well I might be able to establish it, I think it would be altogether love's labour lost. Nor do I bring this matter up for the purpose of opening up the wider question of dismissals from the public service and the general treatment by the Government of the public servants of this country. That question has also been thoroughly discussed in the House, and has practically gone into history, and will form a precedent for subsequent Administrations; and if we are to believe, as it looks likely now that the cry of the party press is to be heeded, the precedent will in the future be made even more baneful than it is at the present time. I bring this matter up for the purpose of establishing two points: in the first place, that the chief executive of Canada has been placed in a very unenviable position by the action of the Government on this question; and in the second place, that the clear, well-defined and unmistakable promise of the Prime Minister of Canada, made to this House, has been disregarded by his colleagues in office. It will be necessary for me to recall the circumstances, though I shall not dwell upon them, which led up to the new phase which I say it has now assumed. After the defeat of the late Government, as hon. gentlemen will remember, certain Orders in Council were passed making recommendations as to appointments in the public service, and His Excellency, when the Treasury Board reports having to do with these Orders in Council were submitted to him, exercised what he believed to be his right in dividing the Treasury Board items into two classes—the first of those classes he proposed to approve, the second, for various reasons which he gave in his correspondence to the late Government, and which has been brought down to the House, he proposed to disapprove of. Of course, I do not propose to offer any criticism upon the course of His Excellency, that would be out of order, and at the same time it would be entirely unnecessary, because I fancy that every one in the House, as well as almost every one in the country, understands thoroughly that a Governor of Canada can do no act for which his Ministers, whether of one Government or another, must not be responsible. Now, for the purpose of my argument, perhaps I had better read from "Todd's Parliamentary Government of the British Colonies," an opinion which has been frequently read to the House, but which refers particularly to this point:

Upon a change of Ministry it is essential that the gentlemen who may be invited by the Governor to form a new Administration should be unreservedly informed by him of the circumstances which led to the resignation or dismissal of their predecessors in office, and that they shall be willing to accept entire responsibility to the local Parliament for any acts of the Governor which have been instrumental in occasioning the resignation or effecting the dismissal of the outgoing Ministry.

But, Sir, I do not need to read from Todd or any other parliamentary authority, because I think I shall be able to establish from "Hansard" that the Government of the day, led by the right hon. gentleman, only last year, as will be seen at page 1652 of "Hansard," assumed full responsibility for the course which His Excellency had pursued in regard to this question. If the right hon. gentleman will turn to the page to which I have referred, he will find that he declared :

But I would recall the statement made by His Excellency at the time, giving the reason for disregarding certain recommendations made by his advisers after their defeat. * * * I had occasion afterwards to state that we accepted the statement of His Excellency, which we thought laid down a fair and equitable rule.

And he proceeds to add that the consent which had been given by His Excellency to certain Orders in Council which were passed by the Government, also met with his approval. What was the course pursued by His Excellency? He took those items of the Treasury Board report, which I have under my hand in the sessional papers of 1896, and he returned them to his Ministers with a memorandum. With that memorandum the House is familiar. He divided them into two sections: those of which he could approve, and those from which he felt it his duty to withhold his approval. From some he withheld his approval, as hon. gentlemen know, for three reasons: First, because some might be the creation of new offices and appointments; second, filling vacancies for which no provision had been made by Parliament, and which vacancies had existed for more than one fiscal year; and third, superannuations consequent on appointments for which applications or requests had not been received from the persons affected. Outside of those cases His Excellency gave his approval to every appointment which had been made by the Government after its defeat at the polls on 23rd June, 1896. On this side of the House we hold that in consequence of the Order in Council which had been passed in consequence of the Treasury Board report which had been passed, and in consequence of the approval of His Excellency to those instruments, the parties whose names did not come within the exceptions to which I have referred as being given in His Excellency's memorandum, had a right to consider themselves members of the civil service just as much as though they had been for years in the public service of Canada. There can be, I fancy, no doubt on that question, and if there be any doubt on it, I think I shall have authorities to submit in favour of the position I have taken which the Government of the day will not feel like gainsaying. What had they? They had the appointment made by the Government that had gone out of power, they had the approval of the Government which came into power, because the Government which came into power were thereupon responsible for the action which was taken by His Excellency, which action was the approval of the appointments to which I have referred. But in order that there may be no misunderstanding on this question, perhaps I had better refer to the opinion of the Prime Minister, which is given on page 1652 of the "Hansard" of 1897. In an address made upon a motion for papers in connection with this very subject, moved by the present leader of the Opposition, the right hon. gentleman said :

We would not, and we could not, in fact, in consistency with the rules which we have laid down for our guidance, dismiss anybody appointed under such circumstances any more than we would have dismissed anybody else who had been in office, except for cause shown.

So I take the declaration of the present Prime Minister to be a proof of what I said, a defence of what I said that those people whose appointments were approved by His Excellency had as much right to consider themselves members of the civil service of Canada as though they had been for years engaged in the duties of their offices. On page 1621 of the "Hansard" of 1896, a conversation took place between the hon. member for York and the present Prime Minister, in which the hon. member for York used these words :

So all the officers which did not fall within that schedule became by the sign manual of the Governor General and the report of Council, bona fide officers.

After hearing that statement the Prime Minister made no objection to it, but he proceeded to excuse himself and the Government for not having previously notified those officers of the appointments they had received from the hands of the late Government, which appointments had been approved by His Excellency under his own signature to the Treasury Board report. I now come to the first point which I wish to make in reference to this matter, and it is that the promise of the Prime Minister, unintentionally, I am sure on his part, unintentionally I must suppose on his part, has been entirely disregarded in the actual and practical working out of this question in regard to those appointments by the late Government. Let me turn to "Hansard" of 1896, page 1619, where this subject was dealt with, after a question had been asked by the member for West York and another question by the member for Bothwell as regards a certain individual case. When we look into the statements made by the Prime Minister we will observe that he made an answer to myself in this connection. This is the statement I made :

What I stated for the information of the committee was this: That to my knowledge appointments had been made on the recommendation of the previous Controller of Customs and an Order in Council approving these recommendations had been passed, and I desire to know whether the policy of the Government was to repeal the Orders in Council.

The Prime Minister said in reply :

I cannot speak specifically as to the position at Berlin or any other port. The hon. gentleman is aware that certain recommendations were made by the late Administration after 23rd June to His Excellency, and he is aware that all those recommendations were approved by His Excellency except three categories ; that His Excellency refused to ratify appointments to new offices or to offices which had been vacant for more than twelve months. If the vacancy at Berlin had not exceeded that time, then the appointment made is permanent, and the present Administration has not disturbed it.

I asked the right hon. gentleman across the floor :

Do these appointments stand ?

I have the right hon. gentleman's answer as reported on page 1620, as follows :—

They stand like every other appointee, until removed for cause.

Then I asked the question :

Why have not these gentlemen been notified ? It is extraordinary, in regard to the announcement made by the leader of the Government, that those gentlemen, properly appointed by Order in Council to positions at Wallaceburg and Berlin, have not been notified.

The Prime Minister said :

It is a matter very easy to explain.

The explanation as to why they were not notified—I may remark here :

There was a batch of four or five hundred Orders in Council sent to His Excellency, and afterwards, two weeks or so were occupied in making a classification as between those appointed and those not appointed.

Then the leader of the Opposition asked the right hon. gentleman a question :

Is it the intention of the Government, now that they have gone over these recommendations, and have decided on those which should become effective, to see that the appointments will be promptly made to the offices which do not come within the categories mentioned ?

The Prime Minister replied :

It is for the different heads of the departments to do that in the course of their ordinary duties.

Then the right hon. gentleman proceeded to say :

We had nothing to do but the pure Ministerial duty of ascertaining whether or not certain officers came within the category laid down by His Excellency. It was a work of arduous labour to ascertain that, and now that the thing is done, it will be for the different heads of the departments to act.

The leader of the Opposition understood that statement, as he understands the English language and as we all understand the English language, to be a declaration on the part of the leader of the Government that so far as those officers whose appointments did not come within the special category which had been made by His Excellency, would receive their appointments, be notified of them, and be placed in positions to discharge their duties. I ask my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to read again the statement which he made, and to say whether I am putting too severe a construction upon the words he addressed to the House. I am willing to leave it to any man in this House and to any man who can understand a question in English and its answer, as to whether I am construing his words too literally when I say, that his was a direct and unequivocal statement, that these men would receive their appointments and that they would go on with the work in which it was intended they should be engaged. Last year there was a promise also made by the Prime Minister. I refer to the "Hansard" of 1897, the discussion which arose upon the motion of the hon. the leader of the Opposition to which I have referred, and speaking upon that, the Prime Minister declared as follows :

I stated upon the floor of the House that it would be the duty of the Administration to respect all these appointments unless there was some cause to the contrary.

Again the Prime Minister says :

There may be a few cases—I know there were—where the parties did not receive their commissions.

And the right hon. gentleman goes on to excuse even those few cases of omission, but the whole tenor of his speech as found on page 1651, Hansard, 1897, is a direct and unequivocal promise by the Prime Minister of Canada, that as regards these appointments which had received the approval of His Excellency, there would be no question that the Government intended that these men should receive their appointments. He goes on to say :

It is for his Ministers to act in their ministerial and departmental way.

Now, I am here to-day to tell him in the light of evidence which has been brought down to the House of Commons, that his Ministers have acted in their departmental and ministerial way ; but I am here to tell him also that his Ministers have acted in a manner which has utterly disregarded his promise made in 1896 and repeated in 1897. Why, what was his statement in 1897 ? He says :

A large number of them have already been carried out. There may be a few where the parties did not receive their commissions, though they came within the rule, but the reason was that behind every one of these cases—

And, Sir, I want to emphasize and call attention to these words of the Prime Minister :

—but the reason was that behind every one of these cases, as the papers will show when they are brought down, there were good reasons why the appointments should not be made. * * * We would not and we could not in fact, in consistency with the rules which we laid down for our guidance, dismiss anybody under such circumstances.

That is the class to which I have already referred, that he would not and he could not if he desired displace these people from office, because they had as much right to office as the parties who had been engaged for years in the civil service of Canada.

Now, we will see what the hon. gentleman's Ministers have done. In reply to an Address of the House of Commons of Canada, moved by the hon. leader of the Opposition in 1897, in this year of grace, 1898, we get a reply. The Address moved by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition was as follows :

Copy of schedule "B," showing recommendations of the Treasury Board as submitted by report of Council to His Excellency the Governor General on the 6th and 7th of July, 1896, and intended to be approved by him, laid upon the Table of the House last session, with a statement of the action taken by the Government upon each of these appointments, as made by the said Order in Council, approved by His Excellency, or, where no action has been taken, the reason for such a course.

It was commenting upon that motion that the Prime Minister declared that when the papers did come down they would contain a description of these good reasons which prevented action, if no action had been taken ; or, as I take it, he meant to say too, if adverse action had been taken as regards the appointments to which this Address refers. Now, here we have the return, and what has been the action taken by his Ministers, whose only duty, the Prime Minister said, was that in a departmental manner the opinion of the Government should be carried out ; and whose opinion was that these people, according to the Prime Minister's own statement, were actually members of the public service and that he had no right to dismiss them without good cause. Here are some of the figures regarding the appointments submitted to His Excellency for approval. There were 92 recommendations. There were rejected by His Excellency, upon the classification made by hon. gentlemen opposite—which I do not object to and which I suppose was perfectly correct as regards the categories into which His Excellency divided the list—there were rejected by him 47, and there were approved by him 45. Now, Sir, this return shows that of these 45, two men who had their new appointments from the late Government have got their places ; just two out of forty-five. The one is the Rev. J. Fraser, Indian agent, and the other is Mr. McDougald, who, after the defeat of the Government, was voted by Council a sum of money to remunerate him for being Chairman of the Customs Board. He was appointed by Order in Council, and his appointment assented to as Deputy Minister of Customs before the defeat of the Government, and the item of the Treasury Board referring to Mr. McDougald is only one as regards the paying to him of a certain sum of money to remunerate him in connection with his duties as Chairman of the Customs Board.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Does the hon. gentleman intend by these figures to indicate promotions?

Mr. MONTAGUE. No ; I shall deal with that now. The promotions are in addition to the two I have already mentioned. These were appointments, I said, of new men to the public service. There were six promotions, namely :—J. Smith, Library of Parliament, from third to second class ; Denis D'Aigle, a railway mail clerk, from third class to second class ; A. W. Owen, Marine and Fisheries Department, F. H. Cunningham, Marine and Fisheries Department, in Owen's place on promotion, T. Aumond in Cunningham's place. These are the promotions, but one exceedingly funny thing is that while the promotions were allowed, I notice that the new appointments in the several cases which were necessary to fill the vacancies caused by the promotions, were disallowed. In other words, while the hon. gentlemen were perfectly willing seemingly to allow promotions which gave them some patronage at the bottom of the list, they declined, notwithstanding the expression of opinion in the House, to allow the new appointment to fill the vacancy which had thereby created.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Will the hon. gentleman give an instance of that ?

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend will find an instance on this sheet, which I shall hand over to him, and which was prepared by the Government and brought down to the House. The next thing is the superannuations by the old Government. We have that of S. Thayne, in the library of Parliament, confirmed, and that of Angus Beaton, a lighthouse keeper, confirmed, but the appointment of the person who was to fill his place was disallowed. Now, what have we got, after all the promises of the Prime Minister in 1897, that those parties whose appointments were approved by His Excellency were to all intents and purposes permanent members of the civil service of Canada ? Out of forty-five Orders in Council, as I have shown, we have two new appointments confirmed, six promotions confirmed, and two superannuations confirmed, or, all told, ten out of the forty-five, notwithstanding the statement of the Prime Minister in 1897 that the most of these cases had been attended to, but that there were a few who had not yet received their commissions, and had not yet gone into the discharge of their duties as members of the civil service of Canada. Now, what is the information brought down as regards the causes which led the Government to pursue this policy ? When the hon.

Prime Minister of Canada made the promise to the leader of the Opposition that these papers should contain full and ample information on that point. I am sure this House accepted the statement in the fullest extent, and I am sure that the Prime Minister intended that that statement to the House should be carried out. Now, I ask the right hon. Prime Minister to look over this list—and I am perfectly willing to depend upon his judgment, because I know his fairness—and say whether this is full and ample information as to the causes which led the Government to pursue the policy they did.

After Recess.

DAWSON CITY ELECTRIC LIGHTING AND TRAMWAY COMPANY.

Mr. MORRISON moved that the Order for committee on Bill (No. 118) to incorporate the Dawson City Electric Lighting and Tramway Company, be discharged, and the Bill referred to the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines for further consideration.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the reason for this?

Mr. MORRISON. The Bill was referred to the Private Bills Committee, and it contained provisions for the construction of a tramway, and the Private Bills Committee were of opinion that that was a matter for the consideration of the Railway Committee.

Order discharged, and Bill referred to Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

THE KINGSTON AND PEMBROKE RAILWAY COMPANY.

The House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 69) respecting the Kingston and Pembroke Railway Company.—(Mr. Britton.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. SPROULE. What is the amendment to the seventh section?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bain). The amendment is as follows: "and shall be offered pro rata to the holders of preference stock and first preference bonds and debentures."

Section, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the new section 9a?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bain). The company shall also issue fully paid-up second preference stock to the amount of $150,000, in 3,000 shares of $50 each, upon which dividends, if any, when earned and payable, shall be limited to 3 per cent per annum, non-cumulative, which stock shall rank next after the first preference stock and in pro rata to the common stock. Such shares shall be issued to the holders of the first preference bonds or debentures, pro rata to the certificate or certificates for such number of shares to which they may be respectively entitled, and shall be delivered with the new debentures, and there shall not be any fractional share or any claim of any holder or owner of any of such first preference bonds or debentures to any sum or surplus that may remain over and above the number of full shares.

Section agreed to.

Mr. SPROULE. There are no sections 10 and 11 in the original Bill, and those sections, thus numbered, which you are calling must be new. I should like to hear them.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bain). No. 11 is the only other clause that has a material amendment, and there is a clause, No. 12, which we have not reached. Section 11 reads:

Nothing in this Act contained shall, save as aforesaid, as to such bonds and debentures in any way hamper or affect any such proceedings, charge or lien now pending, substituting or outstanding upon or against the company or on its railway or assets, and the benefits and liabilities given and incurred by contracts, agreements and liens, either expressed or implied, heretofore made by the company with any person or corporation, shall remain as if this Act had not been passed, nor shall this Act prejudice or affect the relative existing legal rights or priorities of any class of creditors of the company.

Mr. HAGGART. I do not know whether that clause covers exactly what was agreed upon in committee. This railway company was liable under the Railway Act for some claims for work done by labourers, work done by engineers, repairs to engines and the running of the railway. I hardly think that that clause gives the people the legal rights they would have under the Railway Act.

Mr. TISDALE. The solicitor of the gentlemen who are interested was there. I have forgotten his name.

Mr. BRITTON. Mr. Creelman.

Mr. TISDALE. He assented to these words, and I think they are quite sufficient for the purpose.

Mr. BRITTON. The intention was not to give these parties any new rights, but to protect them in the fullest manner possible as to any rights they might already possess. I think, and the solicitor of the company thought, that the words of the Bill as they originally stood were sufficient. However, Mr. Carter and Mr. Ruthven were both present before the committee and expressed their views with regard to it, and, to meet their views, this clause was amended in the way it appeared. These added words were :

Nor shall this Act prejudice or affect relative existing legal rights or priorities of any class of creditors of the company.

I am sure this does protect the parties.

Mr. HAGGART. I would like to have the opinion of the Minister of Railways. If he says that this is sufficient to protect them, that will be quite satisfactory. The question is, does that clause fully protect parties who have a lien by the Railway Act against that company.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I believe it is the clause agreed to in committee. I think it is sufficient.

On schedule " b. "

Mr. TISDALE. There are several blanks in that, are there not ?

Mr. BRITTON. The blank left by the committee in schedule " b " is as to the aggregate of bonds held before the mortgagee can be asked to take proceedings under the mortgage and sell the road. I move that the blank be filled by inserting the words " fifty thousand dollars. "

Section, as amended, agreed to.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 105) respecting the Montreal Island Belt Line Railway Company.—(Mr. Belcourt, by Mr. Bostock.)

LAKE MANITOBA RAILWAY AND CANAL COMPANY.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment made by the Senate to Bill (No. 66) respecting the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company.

Mr. JAMESON moved :

That the said amendments be disagreed to for the reason that they merely allow amalgamation with a portion of the road owned by a company with which it is proposed to amalgamate, and are therefore inconsistent with the object of the proposed amalgamation between the two companies, and are, moreover, repugnant to the object of the Bill ; also, that a Message be sent to the Senate giving the foregoing reasons for disagreeing to their amendments.

Mr. OLIVER. In regard to this motion I would like to say that I am to a certain extent interested as the promoter of a Bill called the Hudson Bay and Pacific Railway charter with which this proposed amalgamation interferes, and I would like just to state to the House the position which I understand the matter to be in. In 1896 the House granted a charter to the Hudson Bay and Pacific Railway to run a line from Fort Churchill to the Saskatchewan River near the head of Lake Winnipeg, and thence with branches westward. The House having agreed to that charter, and there being no other charter at that time covering that ground, I submit that it is not fair or right that another company should be given under any colour a charter to traverse the same ground until that company has lost its right under its charter by failing to commence and complete according to the terms of the charter. The charter which it is proposed to revive in this case is the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay charter. That charter was granted in 1887, it expired in 1889, and although there has been a certain amount of legislation since in regard to that charter, that legislation has never purported to apply to that part of the line from Saskatchewan River to Fort Churchill. Therefore, on behalf of the promoters of the Hudson Bay and Pacific Railway, I contend that the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay charter did not exist from the Saskatchewan River to Hudson Bay, and that if the House insists upon giving this amalgamation in the terms in which it is given here, they will duplicate the charter over the same ground, with the natural result that the Hudson Bay and Pacific people will be to that extent placed in difficulties in forwarding their scheme.

I beg to enter my protest against the motion made for the purpose of supporting the amalgamation entered into, which I say is prejudicial to the interests of the Hudson Bay and Pacific Railway, which is contrary to the well-defined policy of this House, and which, if assented to, will certainly prevent the building of any railway to Fort Churchill from Saskatchewan River. This charter, which it is proposed to revive, was granted in 1880, and it is a matter of notoriety that the existence of that charter has absolutely prevented, up to the present time, the building of a railway to Hudson Bay, an object very greatly desired by every part of Manitoba and the North-west Territories. That charter having been in existence since 1880, and no action having been taken on it, although it has been repeatedly before Parliament, it is only fair that when other men have come forward with another company and are within the terms granted by this House, they should be given the fullest opportunity to carry out what is a practical and valuable scheme.

Senate amendment disagreed to.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 125) to incorporate the Ottawa Interprovincial Bridge Company.—(Mr. Belcourt.)

SUPPLY—APPOINTMENTS BY THE LATE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I promised when I first rose to make a few observations on this subject I would be very brief, and I promise you, Sir, now that that statement will be fulfilled to the letter, only desiring as I do, to occupy the attention of the House for a few minutes longer. Before I proceed to finish the reading of the return which was brought down in answer to a motion made by the leader of the Opposition, perhaps, Sir, you will permit me to answer a question asked by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. That question was as regards my statement that whilst superannuations had been confirmed, it was equally true that appointments to vacancies which had been created by those promotions and superannuations had been disallowed. The hon. gentleman asked me whether I could give cases. Just at the moment I had not selected cases from the list, but if the hon. gentleman will examine the return, a copy of which I have in my hand, he will find these facts: That Angus Beaton, lighthouse keeper, was superannuated, and the superannuation was confirmed on 26th November, 1897; that C. J. Chapman was appointed lighthouse keeper, vice Beaton; that no action was taken, it not being deemed in the public interest to take any action. There is still another case, that of Denis D'Aigle, promoted to second-class railway mail clerk; confirmed on 9th June, 1896; H. Steele was appointed third-class railway mail clerk, vice D'Aigle, promoted; no action was taken, it not being deemed in the public interest to take action. Those cases are apparent on the face of the return, how many more there may be I am not able to say, because the information given is not sufficient to enable me to do so. I desire to continue reading from this return, which gives the list of all these appointments which His Excellency declared his assent to and the reason which the Government have brought down for their action in the several cases, in which I find as follows:—

Now, Sir, that is the list of the appointments which under the decision of His Excellency—which decision the hon. gentlemen are responsible for—and under the classification made by the Government of the day; that is the list of those, who, appointed by the late Government (as declared by the Prime Minister in this House) should have their places and be notified that they were required to discharge their duties. I am going to ask the colleagues of the right hon. gentleman, since he is not present himself, whether or not his promise to this House has been fulfilled; whether or not the action of the department and the action of his colleagues is in direct contradiction to the policy which the right hon. gentleman laid down as the policy of the Government? I do not believe that the Prime Minister could have intended to have misled the House. I do not believe that a gentleman occupying a place so responsible; occupying a place so high among the public men of the British Empire would deliberately attempt to mislead the House of Commons as regards the intention of his Government. But, Sir, this I must say, that if the hon. gentleman was not—and I have said I believe he was not—attempting to mislead the House of Commons of Canada, I cannot help thinking that he was peculiarly ignorant of events that were transpiring around him in his own Council and in the departments which were under the control of his own Ministers. Let me read the First Minister's speech again, because it has a direct bearing upon the point which I shall mention now. This speech was made in the House of Commons on 3rd May, 1897:

So far as concerns the recommendations made by the hon. gentleman which were approved by His Excellency, I stated on the floor of the House that it would be the duty of the Administration to respect all these appointments unless there was some cause to the contrary. We have gone upon this rule. We have respected, or intend to respect, all the recommendations approved by His Excellency, except in a few cases.

I want hon. gentlemen to put that statement beside that list and to say whether the right hon. gentleman's promise has been carried out. Let us continue the quotation:

The hon. gentleman says that in some cases the parties have not been notified of their appointments, and, in others, did not receive their commissions. That may be in a few cases. There may be a few cases—I know there were—where the parties did not receive their commissions, though they came within that rule; but the reason was that behind every one of those cases, as the papers will show when they are brought down, there were good reasons why the appointments should not be made.

I ask hon. gentlemen who are members of the Government, whether these papers which are the papers the right hon. gentleman referred to contain these good and ample reasons with regard to the non-carrying out of these appointments to which the right hon. gentleman referred in that speech. Let me quote him (the Prime Minister) again:

We would not, and we could not, in fact, in consistency with the rules which we laid down for our guidance, dismiss anybody appointed under such circumstances, any more than we would have dismissed anybody else who had been in office, except for cause shown. In many of those cases, so far as I remember, we thought it was preferable to hold an inquiry, departmental or otherwise, and we came to no determination in such cases. These reasons may have delayed the notification to some of those gentlemen who were appointed; but that was the only reason, and when the papers are brought down my hon. friend will find that these cases are very few indeed.

In view of the list I have read, and in view of the reasons which are given, I ask hon. gentlemen opposite whether in all fairness they can say these cases are very few indeed. I have made the statement, that while I was sure the right hon. gentleman did not intend to mislead the House he must have been sublimely ignorant or unconscious of what was going on around him in the various departments under the control of his Ministers. We have here the statement of the Prime Minister on the 3rd of May, that these appointments are to be carried out, that it is the policy of the Government to respect all these recommendations to which His Excellency had given his approval, and yet in the return brought down we have the evidence that all but two of them had been cancelled while the right hon. gentleman was upon his feet and addressing the House. I have here the dates of the cancellation of many of these Orders in Council to which the right hon. Prime Minister referred when he made the speech in reply to the leader of the Opposition, and in view of that fact I am justified in saying, that if he did not desire to mislead the House—from which charge I have exculpated him as in duty bound and in obedience to the rules of order—I must conclude that he was sublimely unconscious of what was going on around him.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me repeat that of these appointments ten were cancelled absolutely in 1896, and were cancelled before 3rd March, 1897. There were two or three cancelled—two only, I think—after the hon. gentleman made his speech, but I have made the statement deliberately that upon the face of these returns it appears that when the hon. gentleman was making his speech all but two or three of the cancellations had taken place, by his advice, or the advice of his Council, to His Excellency. I repeat that all but two or three cancellations had been made before the hon. gentleman delivered his speech in this House. Now, Sir, what of the twenty-four others—the reason for no action in regard to which are given in that beautifully indefinite phrase: "not deemed in the public interest to take action."

Sir, what is the position of His Excellency with regard to these appointments? His Excellency had recommendations placed before him, and His Excellency understanding, or as he believed he did, his rights and his duties as a constitutional governor decided to take a certain course. The Government assumed full responsibility for that course as they were bound to do if they desired to take office in succession to the Government defeated on the 23rd of June, 1896. They went further than that, they actively accepted responsibility for his acts through the mouth of their leader declaring that acceptance in this House. Has His Excellency been notified that no promulgation has taken place in regard to these appointments? Has His Excellency been notified that these appointments to which he attached his signature went no further than the pigeon-holes of the Ministers to whose care they were committed?

It appears to me that not only is that an act disrespectful towards the chief executive officer of this Dominion, but that hon. gentlemen have gone very wide of an understanding of their duties as members of His Excellency's Government. I cannot for a moment believe that His Excellency has been informed that these appointments have not been carried out; and what is the position of the office-holders? We have had the word of the Prime Minister that these men whose nominations were approved by the Governor in Council were as much members of the public service as those who had been discharging the duties of that public service for years. If they were members bona fide of the public service when that speech was made, they are members bona fide of the public service still; because, in the beautifully indefinite language to which I have referred, the Ministers say that they decided that no action was necessary; no action consequently was taken; and if no action was taken, these men, to whom these indefinite words apply, each and every one of them, are members of the public service of this Dominion, and can come upon this Dominion for indemnity for losses which some of them have sustained. I come back to the point, whether His Excellency was informed of what had taken place, and I want to read the following section from Todd bearing on this point:

In order to enable a constitutional governor to fulfil intelligently and efficiently the charge entrusted to him by the Crown, he is bound to direct—as by his commission and instructions he is authorized to require—that the fullest information shall be afforded to him by his Ministers upon every matter which at any time shall be submitted for his approval; and that no policy shall be carried out or acts of executive authority performed by his Ministers in the name of the Crown, unless the same shall have previously received his sanction.

Now, I contend, though I am not a lawyer, that the very announcement upon this return that the Government did not intend to take any action as regarded twenty-four of these appointments, is an announcement of public policy; and I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite as to whether they have consulted His Excellency upon that point, and as to whether they have his authority for bringing that down as a matter of public policy. Once more, what position have they placed the chief executive officer of this country in? Let us see. I have said that to my mind it is a most unenviable position. I have referred to the responsibility of His Excellency's Government for every act which they advise him to perform as I have said. It is equally true that the members of this Government are responsible for every act which he performed which was not upon the advice of his previous advisers, and which was performed before hon. gentlemen opposite took up the reins of power. So that upon the question of approving of these appointments hon. gentlemen are just as responsible and just as liable as though they themselves had recommended the appointments—as though the advice in the first place had come direct and straight from themselves. In other words, His Excellency formed a policy upon these appointments upon the advice of hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, let us see just where hon. gentlemen stand. They come one day to His Excellency, and they say these appointments are to be approved; because, boiled down, it comes to that. They come the next day to His Excellency and give him the directly opposite advice. They say to him that they want the appointments cancelled, for the approval of which they themselves became responsible only a few days before. I conclude that hon. gentlemen opposite have in that one act placed the first executive officer of this Dominion in a most unenviable position—in a position in which no previous Administration had ever placed the chief executive officer of Canada. Now, Mr. Speaker, suppose the Government of Canada to-day, of their own free will, pass an Order in Council upon an ordinary matter, and a few days afterwards go to His Excellency and ask that that Order in Council be cancelled. I am sure that when His Excellency sees the second Order in Council, he will require some reasons for the change of policy on the part of his advisers. But if that be true with regard to a simple matter in the hands of the Government itself, how much more must it be true as regards a matter in which a previous Government were concerned—a matter upon which the Government have, as I have said, not only given their advice, but as regards which they have announced their policy publicly to the Parliament of the country. Therefore I conclude that reasons must have been given to His Excellency much stronger, much more ample, much more complete, much more convincing, than are contained in the return which has been brought down to the House in answer to the motion of the hon. leader of the Opposition; and I contend that the House should have these fuller and more ample reasons. Now, Sir, just a word as to a saving clause which the right hon. gentleman placed in many of his speeches. He said that these appointments would be approved, would be promulgated, except in cases where there was good and ample cause for the contrary. Now, I am not acquainted with all the cases referred to in this return. But there is one case which I will mention, not only because I am acquainted with the facts, but because it was the foundation of the first statement the right hon. gentleman made to the House as to his policy in this connection. That is the case of Mr. Scully, who had by the previous Government been appointed collector of customs at Berlin. I see by this return that Mr. Scully's appointment was cancelled. Now, Sir, what are the good and sufficient reasons? Mr. Scully, I am informed, and in fact I know, is a very competent man to discharge the duties of that office. He is also a very prominent man where he lives, having once contested the constituency for the provincial legislature; and I am informed that he is a very responsible man. I would ask the Government to state what are the good reasons why, in this individual case, if not in others, the appointment was cancelled after it had been approved by His Excellency upon the recommendation of the late Government.

Sir, I am of course quite aware that the Government desire to serve their party friends, and I do not hesitate to say that I would believe in that doctrine, nor am I envious or annoyed because a supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite gets any place they have to give him. But what I say is this, that in the case of Mr. Scully, the reason given is that the public interests were being better served by his dismissal than by his retention. I am afraid, however, that the reason is that their party interests were being better served, and while that may be a good reason for hon. gentlemen opposite I have no desire to question that it is a good one for hon. gentlemen opposite. I submit in all candour, that it is not a good reason upon which to ask His Excellency to cancel an appointment made by the previous Administration.

I might amplify and enlarge on the facts to which I have referred in this connection. I might refer perhaps to unworthy motives, but I do not desire to do so. I have made a plain statement of the facts offering little comment, and I am sure, that the facts which I have brought before the House are of sufficient importance to demand the attention of the House during the short time in which I have asked its attention, and that is my only excuse—if excuse be necessary—for having detained the House as long as I have.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). The hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Montague) devoted some little time to the discussion, in general terms, of a question into which I do not propose to go at all in general terms. He, however, took exception to the action of the present Government in certain specified instances, with regard to appointments which were made by the Government of which he was a member, after their defeat at the polls in 1896, and before they resigned office.

As to the question of the propriety of a moribund Government making such appointments in the way and to the extent they did, I do not propose to enter. This is a question which has already been threshed out in this House on several occasions. It is a question which, I am satisfied, this Government is willing to leave to the judgment of the people of this country, and therefore I shall not deal with that part of the hon. gentleman's speech. But the hon. gentleman, in reading the list of these appointments, came to one which happened to have been made in my own department, and I therefore crave your attention, Mr. Speaker, for a few moments while I give the hon. gentleman the reply which, I suppose, he wants. He challenged members of the Government to give the reasons why these various appointments were either not confirmed or cancelled, and as the first one he read to this House happens to be that of Dr. George H. Duncan, who was appointed quarantine medical officer and superintendent of quarantine in British Columbia, and whose appointment was cancelled on the 3rd October, 1896, I propose to tell the hon. gentleman why that appointment was cancelled. In the first place, I may say that when I assumed charge of my department, I found that apparently the office in question was vacant, the late incumbent having died a short time before. Dr. Geo. H. Duncan had been appointed acting in the office by the hon. gentleman who was then Minister of Agriculture. The question was brought to my attention as to whether the office was vacant or not. I inquired into the matter, and I found that apparently that was one of the appointments which, under the rule accepted and carried out, His Excellency would naturally sign and confirm. I supposed, of course, that the office then was filled up, and, as a matter of fact, Dr. Duncan filled the office and performed its duties for some little time. Later on, however, certain actions of his were brought to my attention—actions which I do not know that it would be very wise, or necessary in the public interest, to go into to-night.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is all in the "Hansard" already.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I was going to tell the House, if the hon. leader of the Opposition had allowed me time, that they were already in the "Hansard" of last session, and very thoroughly threshed out in this House. They were actions which, on my responsibility as Minister in charge of the department, I did not feel were such that I could any longer entrust the quarantine establishment of the Pacific Coast in the hands of that gentleman. I therefore recommended the cancellation of his appointment and the appointment of another officer to take his place. If the hon. gentleman wishes any further amplification of these reasons, I shall be very glad to repeat them to the House and let them go before the country; but in the interest of the public, I do not think that that is necessary, and perhaps it is better, in the interests of the gentleman himself, that the matter should be dropped. But I want the hon. gentleman to understand that in this case—I speak not of others, but of this, which is the only one that happens to be in my department—there was, to my mind and the Council's mind, abundant reasons why the appointment made should be cancelled. There was no question of party in the matter. There was no question of action in any way except such as was called for by the conduct of that officer, and which indicated his unfitness for the office. The appointment was, in the first instance, confirmed, and the officer held the office for a short time; and had it not been for his conduct which led me to take the action I did, he would have held the appointment as long as he efficiently carried out the duties of the office. I can only say further that this, which is the only case that arose in my department, is probably a fair sample of the others, and that we may take it for granted that the hon. gentleman's contention falls to the ground, and that, as a matter of fact, the other dismissals or cancellations of appointments or non-confirmation of appointments, were probably just as thoroughly supported as was the action of the Government in this case, which came under my particular charge and which I know all about.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that such a spectacle has ever before been witnessed in this House as that which we have witnessed this evening. The right hon. leader of this Government is charged with having made statements on the floor of this House, in his capacity of Prime Minister, which are either totally inaccurate and which he knew to be totally inaccurate, or the right hon. gentleman was scandalously ignorant of the conduct of the members of his Administration. What is the spectacle that this House has witnessed? We have heard a gentleman who occupied the position of member of the previous Administration, making this grave indictment against the right hon. Prime Minister and his executive, and we have seen the right hon. gentleman leaving the House without venturing to offer a single word in reply.

Was there ever in any country in the world enjoying parliamentary government anything more scandalous? Imagine, the Prime Minister of England charged on the floor of Parliament with a statement of that kind. Why, Sir, his position would not be worth 24 hours purchase if he did what the Prime Minister of Canada has done here to-night. Irrespective of party, there is no Parliament that would not resent anything so utterly at variance with parliamentary government. When the time comes that the Prime Minister of Canada is unable to vindicate his character against a charge made on the floor of Parliament of attempting knowingly to mislead the House or of being ignorant of that which is going on in the Council of the country over which he presides, we have a cynical disregard of the open violation of public pledges which will place this Government in a most unenviable position, not only before this House, but before the people of this country. Is there any man in this House on either side of it who has ever witnessed anything like this, a Government willing to sit there and allow itself to be charged that they are guilty of attempting to mislead the House and yet not a member of the Cabinet rise—all willing that this question should be disposed of and this debate closed without a member of the Government venturing to stand up and defend the integrity of their leader or their own conduct as Ministers. They may think that, with a mechanical majority behind them, they are in a position to brave the opinion of this House. But they will find that, independent of the minority in this House, they must face a great body of intelligent electors in this country who will know that but one cause could account for such a spectacle, and that is that the Government are in an utterly untenable position.

As to the facts, the ground has been covered so clearly and succinctly by my hon. friend (Mr. Montague) that not a word is required from me until what he has said is met and refuted, because there is not an explanation that can be presented by hon. gentlemen opposite that will relieve them from the imputation of departing from a course of fair, frank, honourable, open dealing with this House. Now, I do not intend, for the reason that this has been discussed before, to go into the constitutional question. It has been dealt with in a manner entirely to my satisfaction, and I am quite prepared to leave the constitutionality of the position assumed by hon. gentlemen opposite to stand upon the records as it stands to-day. I am ready for the judgment of the people of this country on that question. But I would remind hon. gentlemen opposite of the contrast presented by the conduct of a former Governor General, the Right Earl of Dufferin, one of the most distinguished and able men that ever presided over the destinies of Canada. I will remind them of the course that that right hon. nobleman pursued when the party now in power were placed in the minority. My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) ventured to speak of a moribund Government, the Government having sustained a defeat at the polls on the 23rd June, 1896. But, Sir, what was the Government of which the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) were members in 1878? Was that a moribund Government? That Government, after five years of maladministration of the affairs of this country, had been condemned by the overwhelming judgment of the people of this country. They went to the country at the head of a large majority and came back to face a majority of 86 members of this House opposed to them. Were they a moribund Government? And yet how were they treated? The Governor General of that day, who was an able man and a constitutional Governor, allowed these gentlemen, before they left their offices to make no less than 116 new appointments and promotions to the number of 17 more, a total of 133 appointments of their friends to office. Lord Dufferin respected the constitution under which he was governing this country. In the light of the instructions from the Imperial Government that when the action of the Governor General of Canada was not specially provided for by the precedents in Canada, he was to be guided by the precedents in the mother country, and looking down the long line of precedents in that country, he found there was not an instance of a Government in Great Britain in which Her Majesty the Queen had not recognized the right of an outgoing government, whatever the position of the Government was, to fill up the vacancies that existed and to carry on the Government down to the last moment that they occupied their offices. That, Sir, was the position of Lord Dufferin when Governor General of Canada. Every one of the 133 appointments and promotions submitted for his approval received his imprimatur without question as the indefeasible right of a defeated Government before leaving office, as has been recognized from time immemorial in England. As this has been discussed, I will not detain the House upon it. But if there is one single fair-minded candid gentleman on the other side I want to present to him the contrast of this with the case of the outgoing Government of which I had the honour to be at the head. We submitted for His Excellency's approval not 133 appointments and promotions, but 92, and of these His Excellency the Governor General in the exercise of his judgment signed the memorandum to the Treasury Board, subject to the exceptions to which my hon. friend has referred, of parties for whom there was no provision in the public service for new appointments and other cases in which the parties did not apply for superannuation to create the vacancies. But, Sir, he signed this memorandum to the Treasury Board subject to these exceptions. I need not tell you, Sir, that I regard these exceptions as an invasion of parliamentary government and entirely at variance with constitutional practice both in Canada and in the mother country.

But I will not say more with reference to that than this, that he submitted to his present advisers these Treasury minutes, and he asked them to indicate, as he had not the information under his own hand, which of the appointments to which he had thus given his sanction and signed his name, were the appointments to which the exceptions would apply. These gentlemen, having reviewed the Treasury minutes signed by His Excellency reported to him that out of these ninety-two appointments, forty-five were open to no exception, and therefore were appointments regularly made by the Governor General in Council. These returns were brought down and laid upon the Table of the House shortly after the House met, and a discussion upon this question took place. As my hon. friend has stated, the Prime Minister was asked what was the intention of the Government in regard to these appointments that they had brought down themselves and laid on the Table of the House as appointments approved by His Excellency the Governor General in Council, and which they stated would stand. I need not repeat the words which fell from the lips of the Prime Minister on that occasion. But a year ago, or nine months after this occurrence, in May last, I moved for the return that has been brought down here a few days ago. The House would naturally inquire, that motion having been made in May last, why these returns were not brought down before a recent period. But nobody would need to ask that question. After listening to the details of that return, one is only surprised that the Government could muster up courage to bring it down to the House at all. If a blush of shame could suffuse the faces of hon. gentleman opposite, it must have suffused them when such a return as this was laid upon the Table of this House after that long period. Every person knows that you could give no more formal, no more complete, no more thorough declaration to the parties interested, of the position in which they stood than by the Government of the country laying upon the Table of the House of Commons a return which declared that they had been appointed to certain offices, and sustaining that action by the statement that it was the intention of the Government to confirm those appointments. Under these circumstances, I ask if there is a single hon. gentleman on that side of the House with a particle of independent spirit and candour in his nature, that will not feel that the Government have reason to blush for shame when, having cut down the nominations of the late Government from ninety-two to forty-five, having brought those forty-five names down here as persons whose appointments had been regularly made by His Excellency the Governor General in Council, down to this hour they have left all but two of those forty-five persons in utter ignorance of what their position was, or what action was to be taken with regard to them. Could there be any more complete publication of the fact of their appointment than the Government of the day laying upon the Table of the House a return showing that His Excellency had signed and ratified their appointments in Council? There could not be. Under these circumstances, I cannot conceive how it is possible that the hon. gentleman can expect the support of his most partisan supporters in this House when the spectacle is presented that, while in 1878 the Government, defeated by such an overwhelming majority, were permitted, and rightly so, to exercise their power to fill all the vacancies in the public service from the highest to the lowest, many of them being most important offices, such as judgeships in the Supreme Court, and so on, while this list of ninety-two recommendations made by the Government of which I was the head, contained hardly an appointment that was not of a comparatively insignificant character. Yet how are they treated? In the one case there may have been a few cancellations by the new Government, and that was within their right, but they were very few. Almost the whole of those appointments were allowed to remain just as if they had been made by the Government of the day. On the other hand, you find here what I do not hesitate to say is the shameful spectacle of this Government treating with utter contempt the Order in Council signed by the Governor General in Council, conferring the appointments, and cancelling some of them, as they had a right to do it if there was cause for the cancellation—but with the exception of a few cases, absolutely treating those appointments with such profound contempt as never to communicate with the parties in any shape or form. The first information that these gentlemen have received as to what their position was, is given by this return laid upon the Table a few days ago in which it was found that some fourteen had been cancelled, that only two of the appointments had been made out of the whole forty-five, and ratified by the Governor General in Council, and that in twenty-four cases the statement is that no action was taken. Now, I want to invite the attention of hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches, who, bolder than their leader, have had the hardihood to remain in this House in face of such an indictment as, I do not hesitate to say, was perhaps scarcely ever presented against any Government, or against any leader of a Government in any Parliament whatever. Why, Sir, you have the remarkable statement made that with reference to Thomas Jenkins, promoted to be a second-class clerk at the St. John post office, “no action was taken, not deemed in the public interest.” I do not believe in the truth of that statement. Do they mean to tell me that the position was left vacant, that it has not been filled, that no action has been taken? They are ashamed to say that they dismissed this man, regularly appointed by the Governor in Council, they are ashamed to proclaim to the world that they have dismissed him and put one of their friends in his place. Is that no action? Is superseding a gentleman who has been appointed under the signed manual of the Governor General of Canada, and appointing another person in his place, no action? One of two things is true; Either these twenty-four cases in which appointments were required in the public service of Canada have remained vacant, and nothing has been done down to the present hour and no notification whatever has been given to any one of the recipients of these appointments—either that is true, or these statements are all untrue. I believe they are all untrue, I do not hesitate to say so. I cannot believe that gentlemen charged with carrying on the public service of this country would leave twenty-four cases in which appointments had been made without any action whatever being taken upon them. The subject has been so fully discussed by my hon. friend that it is not necessary that I should take up any more time. But one curious exception of no action being taken, has been made. J. A. Fitzpatrick, appointed sub-collector of the Customs Department at Joliette, was dismissed and another appointment made in his stead. The right hon. gentleman who leads this Government promised this House, speaking on the floor of this House last session, that the fullest information why changes had been made should be given to this House. Is that the fullest information, that another appointment has been made in his stead? I congratulate the right hon. gentleman in having mustered up courage to enter the House once more.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes. This House has never witnessed such a spectacle from the first day of confederation down to this hour, as that of a Prime Minister, charged by a responsible member of this House with having betrayed his pledged word given on the floor of Parliament, or having been blindly ignorant of what his colleagues at that time were doing, and convicted, by the most clear, the most unequivocal, the most overwhelming and unanswerable indictment ever presented, leaving his seat, and doing what had never been done in the face of such an indictment, avoiding the discussion that he felt was forced on him and his colleagues. After the hon. gentleman had left his seat, his colleagues, afraid and unable to offer any defence for their fleeing leader, wanted to have the debate closed and a vote taken at once, so as to prevent hon. gentlemen having an opportunity to offer a single word in his defence. That hon. gentlemen opposite could offer any vindication, no man would believe who had listened to the strong indictment made, fortified by language uttered by the right hon. gentleman, and from all of which hon. members must conclude one or two things, either that the statements made to the House were made for the purpose of misleading it, which my hon. friend did not charge, but it was the only excuse if the hon. gentleman's statements were not intensely misleading; or that he was in complete ignorance of what the Privy Council were doing, what his own colleagues were doing and had done before that speech was delivered. I regret to say that I am not in condition to press this subject in the manner in which I would desire. But not an additional word is required. The very fact that the Government wanted the debate closed, without taking advantage of the opportunity of saying a word in contradiction of the statements made by my hon. friend who moved the adjournment of the House, is the best evidence that they realized the position in which they stand.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies.) I can assure the hon. leader of the Opposition that it was not with any desire to be discourteous to the hon. member who moved in the matter this afternoon, or with any desire to shirk the discussion of the merits of this matter, the occupants of the Treasury benches deemed it desirable to keep quiet. They kept quiet because this question had been threshed out ad nauseam, not only last session, but during the session preceding.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I wish to say—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman cannot keep quiet a moment. He has gone so far as not only to abuse my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, but also the Governor General of Canada; the hon. gentleman has occupied hour after hour in reiterating and reiterating in the very self-same language, the very self-same arguments and the self-same denunciations, until hon. members on his own side are sick and tired of the subject.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is why we kept quiet. The matter is so simple and the answer has been given so frequently, that I must ask the pardon of the House for repeating it. The late Government, when defeated by the people, when they knew they had not the sanction or authority of the people, but were a discredited and moribund Government—

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). A Government which had never received the sanction of the people.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. A Government, which, as my hon. friend reminds me, had never received the imprimatur and sanction of the people, undertook to do what? To recommend appointments not only to offices that were vacant, not only to offices for which Parliament had made provision to pay salaries, but to make appointments to offices and create salaries that the Parliament of this country had never voted, and which those hon. gentlemen must have known were unconstitutional and illegal. There was no more authority to make some of those appointments than there would have been for the city council of Ottawa to have made them. It is a well known constitutional rule that the Government, as advisers of the Governor General cannot create offices and pledge salaries in respect to them until Parliament has authorized the offices and sanctioned payment of the salaries. But those hon. gentlemen, discredited by the people, never sanctioned by the vote of the people, who had been told by the people that they had no confidence in them, not only attempted to override the constitution, but to thrust into office large numbers of people and fix salaries to be met subsequently by the taxpayers without the people's representatives having had a voice in the matter. This question divides itself into two distinct branches. So far as regards those recommendations made when hon. gentlemen were in power, by accident, for a short time, and which His Excellency did not approve, my hon. friend took the entire responsibility of His Excellency's action. We have never shirked that responsibility. The hon. gentleman debated it hour after hour last session, hour after hour the session before, and he made no progress either on the feeling in this House or on the public feeling in the country. Sir, the hon. gentleman would have been well advised if he had left that matter alone, because I venture to say that the opinion of this House and the opinion of the country thoroughly endorse the action which His Excellency took, and for which my right hon. friend the Prime Minister assumed the responsibility. The attempt to fill vacancies in the Senate, to fill the judgeships with appointees of hon. gentlemen after they had been defeated at the polls, appointees of hon. gentlemen who never received the imprimatur of the people, was an attempt which the people did not encourage or countenance. So far as the other branch of the question is concerned, those appointments which His Excellency did not sanction—for there is a broad distinction—but which he suggested in a memorandum his willingness to sanction, when my right hon. friend came into power he was met face to face with the question whether he would advise the carrying out of these nominations. What did he do? There were 48 of those cases about which we have had all this row. To hear the vituperation and abuse which the leader of the Opposition has heaped on my hon. friend, one would suppose that some violent wrench had been given the constitution by him in advising His Excellency not to assent to those attempts to make appointments. Twenty-three cases were recommended out of the 48 ; as to the cancellation upon or confirmation of those 23, the hon. gentleman dare not challenge the Government that we were not strictly within our rights. The hon. gentleman has asked why have we not brought down the reasons which led the Government to advise that no action should be taken. What was the position in the matter ? His Excellency had not signed those particular recommendations. He had in a memorandum signified his willingness to sign them, and when my right hon. friend came into power he had to advise His Excellency whether he should sign or not.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Allow me to correct my hon. friend.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Well ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman will look at the records as laid on the Table of the House he will find that the Governor General did sign those Treasury Board minutes, subject to the exceptions which he pointed out as regards three classes.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman is stating no doubt what he actually believes to be the fact, but he is not stating accurately the fact. The Governor General signed a memorandum in which he expressed his willingness to sign his name to a certain class of the recommendations made. He signed the general Treasury minutes, subject to that memorandum, but he did not sign his name to individual appointments. His name had not been placed to any of those individual appointments when we came into power, and when my right hon. friend assumed his position as leader of the Government he was bound to take the responsibility of recommending His Excellency either to attach or withhold his signature to those appointments.

What is the fact ? To-night the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) told the leader of the Opposition why one of these appointments had been cancelled. Did the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) accept the challenge to discuss the details of that case ? No, he shelters himself amidst a mass of vituperation of which he is master, but he carefully avoids arguing the question before the House. Hon. gentlemen opposite dare not discuss the recommendation to cancel Duncan's appointment ; they dare not discuss any particular facts in relation to the action of the present Government on these recommendations of the late Government. The reasons why we recommended these fifteen appointments to be cancelled are of record ; and have we heard a whisper from any one of these gentlemen opposite that our advice was bad.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will my hon. friend allow me.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Excuse me a moment. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) did not dare to discuss any individual case, but he shielded himself as usual in his general denunciation of the leader of the Government.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me one moment ; as there is a very important question of fact at issue between us. I hold in my hand the paper laid on the Table of the House by the Government, and it says :

Respecting certain proposed appointments and Orders in Council.

To the Honourable the Privy Council.

Memorandum with reference to the Treasury Board Reports numbered 2611, 2612, 2613, 2614, 2640 and 2653, which are returned herewith, subject to this memorandum and signed by the Governor General, having been submitted to him on the 6th and 7th instant.

These qualifications were :

The undersigned is directed by the Governor General to request that pending further consideration by Council, His Excellency's approval be withheld from all recommendations which involve—

1. The creation of new offices or appointments ;
2. The filling of vacancies for which no provision has been made by Parliament, and which have existed for more than one clear fiscal year ;
3. Superannuations (and the consequential appointments) for which application has not been received.

By command,

(Sgd.) JOHN SINCLAIR,

Gov. Gen.'s Secy.

The Governor General's Secretary there declares that these appointments were signed.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, no.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will read it again :

Orders in Council which are returned herewith subject to the memorandum and signed by the Governor General.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is, the memorandum is signed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not at all.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I can remove any doubt in the mind of the hon. gentleman. I have had the Treasury minutes in my hands dozens and dozens of times.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And you got the Governor General's signature in his own writing, for I have seen it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. You will find the Governor General's signature in his own writing on the outside of the first page, and he signed that intending to sign the body of appointments, forty or fifty, subject to his memorandum attached.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is exactly correct.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. But stop a moment. Every one of these forty-eight appointments were a separate appointment, tied together by a string, and there was no signature on any one of them, and no signature except the one before-mentioned, subject to his memorandum.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Other hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. But the outside cover contains His Excellency's name, and he intended, apparently, to sign them subject to his memorandum.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Here is the letter from the Governor General's secretary saying that he has signed them.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There were not only the forty-eight, mind you, but there were a large number of these outside the forty-eight, and we had to assort them, and we put to one side those which apparently His Excellency did intend to sign, but which he did not sign, and when we came into office action had not been taken, and we had to advise whether it should be taken or not. That advice we are responsible for, and are prepared to defend in every case, and we challenge hon. gentlemen now to single out any particular case or any body of cases and discuss them in this House or before the country, and we are prepared to defend the action we have taken. The first case is that of Dr. George H. Duncan. Will the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) discuss the propriety of the cancellation of his appointment?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will find a complete answer from me on that case last session, showing that there was not the slightest justification.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Of course any answer which the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) makes is complete in his own opinion, but I listened to his abortive attempt to explain that, and it did not amount to anything. The Minister of Agriculture produced the most unanswerable case why that man should be dismissed. Go to the next case almost, that of E. H. Gilbert, fish hatchery officer, Magog. I took the responsibility of advising that that office was not necessary and the appointment was cancelled, and I am prepared to discuss it with the hon. gentleman now. Take the next case; that of Fabien Vanasse, of Montreal. He had been shipping master of the port of Montreal; he resigned to run an election; he was defeated. The Board of Trade, the great commercial body in Montreal, protested against this man's appointment on the ground that he was unfit. Did the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) care for the recommendation from the Montreal Board of Trade? Not at all. The man had done some party service for him and he recommended his appointment. We cancelled the appointment of Mr. Vanasse and we were within our right, and if the hon. gentleman wants discussion on that, we challenge it. And so I could go through every one of these one after the other and show the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) that of the fifteen appointments which we cancelled, we gave the reasons in our recommendations to His Excellency, and those reasons are on record and can be obtained, and in many instances have been obtained by hon. gentlemen opposite. So far as I can recall at the present moment, I have not heard any serious challenge made of the correctness of our advice to His Excellency. As regards the eight or ten appointments that were confirmed, I suppose hon. gentlemen opposite will not object. Now, what did we do with reference to the others? I have already stated to the House that we found that other appointments were made without provision having been made by Parliament for the payment of their salaries. We were advised, and I think properly advised, that in these cases the appointments were unconstitutional, that the Governor in Council had no power to create offices with salaries attached and impose this burden upon the tax-payer until Parliament had provided the necessary money.

Mr. MONTAGUE. These surely came within the category which His Excellency did not intend to sign.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. His Excellency acted upon the advice of his Council, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) was one of them, and he advised that His Excellency should sign, and His Excellency expressed a willingness, on that advice, to do so, and when we came in and found it was unconstitutional, we advised His Excellency not to sign. That is the whole case in a nutshell, and I say we did right.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I hope the hon. gentleman will permit me, for he will no doubt agree that I was quite fair in stating the case. What I say is this: That when His Excellency returned this list and asked the members of his Government to classify it, they would not include in the list to which the Governor had said he could give his approval the ones to which he has now referred to as unconstitutional. They would be placed in another category entirely.

them to his present advisers with a memorandum stating the class of cases which he had been advised to sign, the class of cases which he had made up his mind not to accept the advice of his former Ministers to sign, and we classified them; and when we came to look them over, his signature not appearing upon them, we said: "As no provision has been made for these appointments, we advise you not to sign them."

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman does not understand me. What I stated was that as regards certain of these appointments, which we all admit on both sides of the House it was the intention of His Excellency to sign, the hon. gentleman says that when they came to inquire into them, they found that they were unconstitutional.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. In my opinion.

Mr. MONTAGUE. He says they were, because they were new appointments, and no money had been provided for them. What I say is that the hon. gentleman and his colleagues must have been greatly in error in making a classification, or they would have excluded these in the first place, and have put them in the category of those which His Excellency did not intend to sign.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not at all. The classification was a mere mechanical action, and when we had to advise His Excellency to withhold his signature in each case, we had to do it on our responsibility after determining whether the case was one that came within the constitution or not. I am not going to detain the House on this matter. We divided these appointments into three classes: those which were confirmed, those which were cancelled, and those on which we advised that no action should be taken, for the reasons I have given; and if our advice in any one case is challenged, we are ready to give our reasons, and the record will show the reasons. Parliament is sick and tired of these repeated attempts, on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, to thrash this dead horse. The sentiment and heart of the House is with His Excellency and the present Government in the action they have taken, and the heart of the country is with them, because they believe that an attempt was made, which partially was thwarted, to foist on the people of this country a large number of office holders for whom no official salaries had been voted.

Mr. HAGGART. Mr. Speaker, I have heard many extraordinary speeches from the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, but this is one of the most extraordinary I have ever heard from him. The hon. gentleman says that this thing has been thrashed out again and again before the House. Why, it was only a few days ago that we got the return so that we could discuss the matter. The hon. gentleman finds fault with the appointments made by the last Government, and states that numbers of those appointments were made without a single cent having been appropriated for them. Does the hon. gentleman not know that that reason can not apply to one of the cases which have been communicated to the House? The hon. gentleman knows that it would be impossible for one of these appointments to pass the Treasury Board unless a salary had been provided. The only appointments which were made for which no salaries were provided were those of the parties appointed to revise the Statutes of Canada. That is done again and again, and that is the only case, the vote being afterwards taken to cover the expense. In every case mentioned in this return the salary was provided, the vacancy did not continue for over a year, and the retiring Government had a right to make the appointment. That is the practice in England, and it has been the practice again and again in this country. The hon. gentleman says the Governor General did not approve of or sanction these appointments. How are these appointments sanctioned by the Governor General? They are sanctioned by the Governor General affixing his signature to the Treasury Board report. Did he not sign the Treasury Board reports? He signed them in full. The hon. gentleman said there was a pile of papers, and the Governor General's signature was not affixed to the different papers. The papers simply give the Governor General the reasons for the appointments. Where the appointments are made and passed by the Treasury Board the Governor General never affixes his name to the back of the individual papers at all; he signs the Treasury Board report. Did he sign it in this case, and did he consider that the appointments were made? The evidence is indubitable. Why is it that the hon. gentleman brings down a statement to the House that these appointments were cancelled if they were never made? Why is it that the hon. gentleman does not bring down the information which the House is entitled to have, by which we shall be able to judge whether the reasons assigned to the Governor General were sufficient for the dismissal of these parties or not?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. You did not move for it.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman says, why do we not challenge each particular case, and we will discuss whether the cancellation was right or not. Why does the hon. gentleman not bring down the reasons they assigned to His Excellency the Governor General for the cancellations? An Address was passed by this House asking for these reasons to be brought down, but they have not been brought down yet.

The responsibility rests upon hon. gentlemen opposite. We have a right to assume that hon. gentlemen gave no reason to the Governor General, and it is a most extraordinary position for them to occupy. I never heard of a Governor General dismissing an official. He is obliged to act on the advice of his regularly constituted Ministers, and he is most careful to do it. If he thinks the evidence is not sufficient to justify the dismissal, he asks for further evidence. We have not seen the evidence or the reasons which hon. gentlemen assigned to the Governor General. In regard to the statement of the hon. gentleman that these appointments were never made, what can be plainer than the memorandum which was read by my hon. friend? The memorandum refers to the Treasury Board reports Nos. 2611, 2612, 2613, and so on, which are returned herewith, subject to this memorandum," and signed by the Governor General. What is it that is signed? The hon. gentleman wants to get out of it by a quibble. He says, was the memorandum signed? It is the Treasury Board reports that are signed, and the hon. gentleman knows it. The memorandum was signed by the Governor General's secretary. Do you think we do not understand English in this House? Does the hon. gentleman think he can delude the House by making a bold, bald statement in loud and energetic tones?

Is it not as plain as possible that His Excellency the Governor General signed these appointments and reserved others for further consideration. These appointments which he signed were specially accepted by him; and yet the hon. Minister of Marine tells us: Oh, but we had sufficient reason for the dismissal of these parties. Sir, they had no reason. The Governor General having signed the appointments, is supposed to have sufficient reasons for doing so, and we know nothing about any reasons he may have had for subsequently dismissing them. We are entitled to have the reasons, but none have been given to us, although if he performed his duty towards this Government as he did towards us, when we were in power, he must have required reasons for the dismissal of any one appointed to the civil service by Order in Council. In such cases, he insisted on our giving the fullest reasons, as did every other Governor General that this Dominion has ever had. More extraordinary still, we have had the authority of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government for believing that all these parties in schedule "b" would be retained in office. Certainly he made that statement to the House, and yet at the very moment when he made it, two-thirds of these appointments were cancelled. I shall read to the House again the statement of the right hon. gentleman:

We have gone upon this rule, we have respected, or intend to respect, all the recommendations approved of by His Excellency,—

According to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, there were none approved at the time by His Excellency. What then could the right hon. gentleman have been speaking about at that time?

—except in a few cases, where we thought there was cause for removal or for different advice being given to His Excellency. The hon. gentleman says that, in some cases, parties have not been notified of their appointments, and in others did not receive their commissions. That may be in a few cases. There may be a few cases—I know there were—where the parties did not receive their commissions, though they came within that rule;—

Who were the parties that came within that rule?

—but the reason was that in every one of these cases, as the papers will show when they are brought down,—

What information did we get from the papers when brought down. "Cancelled, cancelled, cancelled, no action, it being in the public interest not to take any action."

—they required some inquiry,—

Where has been the inquiry?

—and no decision was come to at the time.

And yet when the right hon. gentleman was speaking, two-thirds of the men appointed had been dismissed.

We would not, and we could not, in fact, in consistency with the rules which we laid down for our guidance, dismiss anybody appointed under such circumstances, any more than we could have dismissed anybody else who had been in office, except for cause shown. In many of these cases, so far as I remember, we thought it was necessary to hold an inquiry, departmental or otherwise,—

In what cases was there any inquiry held?

—and we came to no determination in such cases. These reasons may have delayed the notification to some of these gentlemen who were appointed; but that was the only reason, and when the papers are brought down, my hon. friend will find that these cases are very few indeed.

What has the hon. gentleman to say now in view of that statement made by his right hon. leader of the House? He must think, as my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, has said, that the right hon. gentleman did not know the facts, because the very moment he was making that statement, two-thirds of these men had been dismissed. Out of forty-five appointments, only two were retained in office. What answer has the hon. gentleman to that? After the right hon. leader of the Government had promised that the appointments would be treated the same as other appointments in existence, and that the appointees would not be discharged without reason, without investigations being made, we have these forty-three men kept out of office and not a single bit of evidence furnished us why they were. We have not even brought down to the House the advice on which His Excellency acted, or the evidence which decided him to act on that advice. I know that His Excellency never acted on the simple recommendation that the parties should be dismissed. There must have been some reasons given and some evidence adduced in support of these reasons. If he acted without such reason or evidence, he would render himself liable to be called to account by this House and country and the Imperial authorities. He must have had reasons for the course he took, and this House is entitled to know what those reasons were, especially after His Excellency had given his sign-manual to the appointments, which made these appointments just as solemn and binding as that of any civil servant or judge whose appointment was made by the Government and signed by His Excellency. I did not intend to discuss this matter at length. I only rose to answer the remarks of the hon. Minister of Marine that the appointments never were made. The appointments were made, because the right hon. leader of the Government has told us that they were. We have the authority of the sign-manual of His Excellency, we have the statement of the military or private secretary of the Governor General that His Excellency affixed his signature to the Treasury Board reports, which is the only way in which his sanction is given to any civil service appointment. There is no other proceeding necessary in the appointment of an ordinary civil servant. If it were the case of the appointment of a judge or other parties who require a patent for their office, that patent would go to the secretary of the department and receive the sign-manual of His Excellency; but I am not aware that in the case of ordinary civil servants, anything else is required than the approval of His Excellency of the report of his advisers. A civil servant can receive no other appointment from His Excellency; and it is an extraordinary spectacle in this House that after His Excellency's signature had been obtained and after we had the promise of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government that no dismissal would be made without cause, we should be informed, as we were by this return, that the Government never gave any reason to His Excellency for the dismissal of these parties. Certainly they did not give to the House, at any rate, any reasons, as they are bound to do, if any were given. As my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, has said, there never was such a spectacle presented to this House before. We have never had before any instance of the kind—of appointments having been made by the Governor General, followed by the solemn promise of the leader of the Government to this House and country that none of the parties appointed would be dismissed without the ordinary course being pursued in regard to them, as is pursued in the dismissal of other civil servants, namely, holding an inquiry before taking action. We have simply the bald information that they were dismissed in the public interest, and the statement made by the hon. Minister of Marine that the sole reason for their dismissal was that they had been appointed by a moribund Government. Is that an answer to His Excellency the Governor General? Is that in accord with the statement made to this House by the hon. gentleman's leader? We ask nothing but fair, honest action in this matter. As my hon. friend says, the course followed by the Government is not the English practice. According to that practice, a retiring government, after its defeat, has the right to not only fill all vacancies in the Government, but also to make personal appointments, and no gentleman that ever succeeded the ministry of England would go to the length the hon. gentleman did and cancel such appointments. It is well known that the rule in Great Britain and in all its colonies is that a retiring ministry has the right of filling all the vacancies. We exercised that right. I take no objection to the action of the Governor General, but what I do object to is that, having his sign-manual and the statement of the right hon. leader of the Government, these parties should have been dismissed, so far as we know, without a single reason being assigned for their dismissal.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am sorry that I was called away from the House by a previous appointment and deprived of the pleasure of hearing some of the vituperations which were hurled upon me, in my absence, by the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition. But, Sir, I was here in time to hear some of it. I may say just here that I was sorry to hear that the hon. gentleman had not fully recovered his health, and I hope he will soon be in good health again. But whether the hon. gentleman is in good health or bad health, he has always the same power of reckless assertion. The hon. gentleman to-day has given another exhibition of a power with which we have already been made familiar, his power to distort facts which are very plain. But I must say at once to my hon. friend that I cannot find it in me to be indignant whatever vituperation he may hurl at my head. I have known him too long for that. I know that the weaker the cause he has to defend the louder and more violent will be his language. It is now almost two years since the general elections took place and the hon. gentleman has not yet been able to overcome the spleen and mortification which filled his soul because the Governor General would not allow him to prostitute the remnant of power that he held, would not allow him to prostitute his office to make a partisan Senate still more partisan. He who was Prime Minister of this country only by the machination of a nest of traitors, who never had the sanction of popular will for the authority he then exercised, who had been signally defeated at the polls—this gentleman had the audacity to ask the Governor General to sanction the appointments to the Senate of men who had just resigned their positions. Apparently there had been a bargain between the hon. gentleman and those members of his Cabinet who had been in the Senate that they would resign and try their luck at the polls, and if they were not successful, he would ask the Governor General to re-appoint them. But the Governor General would not prostitute his office for such a purpose, and ever since the hon. gentleman has not scrupled, on every occasion that offered, to heap insult on the head of the Governor General. He can be vituperative, he can be brave in words, he can be insolent and insulting in language, but he has never dared, insulting, impudent though his language is, to challenge the conduct of the Governor General by a vote of this Parliament. Even to-day, as has been stated by my hon. friend beside me (Sir Louis Davies), when, for the tenth or twelfth time, he has been again insulting to the Governor General, when he has it in his power to make a motion, he will not do so; he will be as before insulting and impudent in language but weak in action.

Now, Sir, what have we as a basis for this debate; what is it that these hon. gentlemen complain of? We have it for a fact, well known to this House, that though the hon. gentleman was defeated at the polls, he tried to appoint officers right and left. In a single day he sent to the Governor General memoranda on the Treasury Board's report, on no less than 92 appointments. Half of these were absolutely illegal, and he had no more right to recommend them than had any member of this House. The Governor General was not able to go through them all, but sent a memorial that he would approve of those that did not come within any one of three categories—those for whose salary no provision had been made, those for which no superannuation had been approved leaving the office vacant, and another which I have forgotten at this moment. Of these there were 47. There remained 45 to be accounted for, which the Governor General would have confirmed, but which, as has been said by my hon. friend beside me he did not actually confirm. But, Sir, the question afterwards came up, and we said we would respect the intention of the Governor General, that in all those appointments that were matters of routine and which the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) had power to advise the Governor General to make, we would respect the intention of the Governor General and would treat the appointments as made, that none of the appointees should be removed except for cause. This is the position in which we stand at the present time. Now, my hon. friend states that, out of these 45 appointments 10 have been retained in office or promoted. But what about the other 35? That is a question about which I can give an answer and will give it at once. All these 35 have been removed for just as good cause as that given by my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) regarding the removal of Mr. Duncan in British Columbia. I hope that my hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) will also speak as to other appointments and removals made in his department. Let the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) challenge every case individually and every one will be accounted for as fully as that of Mr. Duncan by my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture. And what is all this fuss about? It is because the report we brought in gave in general language the reason for the removal instead of giving a special report in each case. That would have occupied reams of paper. We gave the general causes for removals, but if the hon. gentleman wants particulars he can have them. Let him challenge one case or any number of cases and he shall have the reasons for removal. I make bold to say that every removal will be found to have been made for reasons satisfactory to this House. Now, this is all there is of this matter. As I said, this is another occasion taken by the hon. gentleman to be unjust, unfair and even insulting to the Governor General. But so long as the hon. gentleman takes this course and will not dare to ask Parliament to pass censure upon the Governor General, I can only repel as I do, every charge and every insinuation, and say, as I do, that the attack of the hon. gentleman is as outrageous as any that ever was heard in a British Parliament.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister lacks argument he has resorted to oratory, or, at least, what those docile members behind imagine to be oratory—upon which opinions may differ. Now, the right hon. gentleman at the outset, said that he courts a vote of this House on this question. Why, we know that the right hon. gentleman is speaking in a jocular strain when he asks that this House be divided. He can safely challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to vote against him when scores of them sit there with promises of office in their pockets. Does the right hon. gentleman expect the member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) to vote against him when that hon. gentleman has a promise of a Lieutenant-Governorship in his pocket? Does he fear the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) who haunts the corridors seeking a judgeship? Why, it is a farce to ask this Parliament to be divided on any question whatever. But the leader of the Government had an opportunity a little while ago to appeal to the great inquest of the people when his Government was defeated on the Yukon Bill.

Mr. GIBSON. It was not defeated. Where was it defeated?

Mr. BERGERON. By the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, all I can tell the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) is this: he has trouble enough at home, and I think that after the severe snubbing he got in the committee room this morning, he had better at least be docile for a little time. But there never was a skin so thick that it could not be irritated sometimes, and perhaps the time may come when even his thick skin may be irritated by the taunt of some of the Ministers. Now, where is the First Minister on this occasion? He has dogged the whole issue. When the hon. gentleman came in they found that the outgoing Ministry had done exactly what their predecessors had done in 1878. I can tell the First Minister one thing he did not find, he did not find that the late Government had given to one of their followers hundreds of miles of the public domain they had been administering without price and without remuneration. The hon. gentleman was a member of a Government that gave to one of his supporters, my predecessor in this House, Mr. H. H. Cook, hundreds of miles of timber limits. These are the hon. gentlemen that to-day are sticklers for propriety and for nicety in the administration of public affairs. But here are the plain facts. The First Minister, when he came into power, found there had been certain appointments made, and when he looked into those appointments—and nobody will complain that the Governor General was unfriendly to them—when these reports were placed under the supervision of himself and his Cabinet and the Governor General, the result was that this long list of forty-five cases were of such a nature and of such a class that the Governor General himself thought that these gentlemen on this list should all be placed in the positions to which they had been appointed. On the 3rd of May, 1897, the First Minister, speaking in the House, took strong grounds that these men whose names were on this list were all entitled to the positions to which they were appointed. I will quote his own language:

We have gone upon this rule. We have respected, or intended to respect, all the recommendations approved by His Excellency, except in a few cases, where we thought there was cause for removal or for different advice being given to His Excellency.

Now the hon. gentleman tells us that they themselves had given advice to His Excellency because they are his advisers, and in the advice they had given they stated that all those who came within the purview of that clause B should be retained in the offices to which they had been appointed. But further on the hon. gentleman said this:

Mr. BENNETT.

We would not, and we could not, in fact, in consistency with the rules which we laid down for our guidance, dismiss anybody appointed under such circumstances, any more than we would have dismissed anybody else who had been in office, except for cause shown.

Now, on the 3rd of May, when the hon. gentleman made that statement, in 1897, the facts are that a number of these appointments had been cancelled six months before; all but two of the whole forty-five had been cancelled six months before. Now, the right hon. gentleman was in this position: either he did not know that these dismissals had been made, or they had been made and he knew about them having been made when he made this statement. I incline to the former opinion, that the right hon. gentleman was not aware that the dismissals had been made, but that on the other hand they were made without his knowledge. There is the position the whole matter is in, and the hon. gentleman stands convicted on the written evidence, on the plain facts, that after he had pledged his honour, not only to the House, but to the men who held these positions, that every one of them should be retained in his position, at the very same time these men had been decapitated by the hon. gentleman's associates and those with him in the Cabinet. The question is plain, it is not a case for attempting to stir up the feelings of his followers behind him, it is not a question for appealing to them in that spirit at all. It is a plain, simple matter of fact, and on the record the hon. gentleman is convicted beyond the shadow of a doubt. The hon. gentleman can well afford to be brave in this House, he can well afford to challenge a division in this House at any time. Why, the hon. gentleman knows that no Premier ever sat with a more servile following than he has to-day in this House. The hon. gentleman knows that as soon as this Parliament comes to a close there will be a retirement to those positions that so many of his followers are longing and looking for. The hon. gentleman holds in the province of Ontario a senatorship, and within the sight of those whose names are daily being dangled in the country in respect to this position. The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton)—and my compliments to him—on one occasion recently stated that I never addressed the House unless I referred to some hon. gentleman opposite as being in quest of a position. The hon. gentleman does not state what is correct. I have not stated that. I have appealed to hon. gentlemen on that side of the House who, I believed, were fair, and had some atoms of independence about them. But the hon. member for Kingston must never expect me to place him in that category, must never expect me to treat him as does his own newspaper, the Kingston "Whig," which booms him perpetually for a seat in the Senate, or for a judgeship, or something else.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). I do not think you ever will be a judge, anyway.

Mr. BENNETT. I am at a loss to know whose musical voice that is, but I rather think it is the hon. member for Saskatchewan. I advise him that under the contract he has made, he can never again be a candidate, and that if the party are to have the patronage while he is a member, he had better have as good a time here as he possibly can. Now, let the First Minister remember this: there will come a time some day when he will have to appeal to the people, and when he does appeal to the people in the province of Ontario, at all events, let me tell him and tell his Ministers that if an appeal were had to-day all that would be on trial would be their Drummond deal and their Yukon railway scheme, both nipped in their infancy but not in their innocence. But outside of these two things, no person has ever heard of politics or public matters other than the decapitation of a few officials. That has been the whole range of politics in the province of Ontario. There is an army of hungry office-seekers rushing on to places that they so eagerly and anxiously desire, because they believe that the time is short which the hon. gentlemen will have to bestow them. The hon. gentlemen had an election lately in the province of Ontario, and they do not take much comfort out of it, and I have reason to believe that when that senatorship that is being dangled so long in the province of Ontario is given, it will not be given to a member of this House, because hon. gentlemen opposite do not wish to court the opening of a constituency to-day in the province of Ontario, much less than they are willing to fill a riding that has been so long vacant in the province of Quebec.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). In the discussion that has taken place, the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) has called attention to one case connected with the department over which, for the time being, I preside, in which he thinks there was an injustice done, saying that the pledge uttered by the Prime Minister in the House had been set at naught. He alluded to it very pointedly, I think, and wanted to know the reason. Well, I will give it to him. The reason is set down here why J. M. Scully, a collector of customs at Berlin was not appointed. The comment is because the appointment was cancelled. Well, that is precisely what took place. The hon. gentleman when opening his remarks alluded to the fact that His Excellency in regard to the many appointments placed before him made some reservations of his own motion. First, he was not prepared to consider recommendations made for filling vacancies that had existed for more than one year. Another was that he was not prepared to endorse any recommendations for superannuation that had not been made by the officers whom they sought to superannuate. The third reservation, if I remember rightly, was that there should have been provision made in the Estimates for the expenditure. I will give the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) a statement of the case of Mr. Scully. My accountant reported to me at the time, and he has since reported to me, for I have refreshed my memory and asked him for a report, that the reason Mr. Scully's appointment was not confirmed was because the vacancy at Berlin had existed for more than one year.

Mr. MONTAGUE. On that point, I might say to my hon. friend, that while I am fully of the opinion that the information he is giving as having been received from the accountant is quite correct, it is not so in fact. I of course absolve the hon. gentleman from wilfully making a statement that is not absolutely correct.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Allow me to make a suggestion, which will show the hon. gentleman that his information is entirely incorrect. Every member of the Cabinet is committed to the declaration that it is not true, because if it had been true they would not have put that name among those names which were not open to the objections raised by the Governor General.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). Does not the hon. gentleman see that he is giving away his whole case. If the hon. gentleman admits that there has been one mistake in the list, then a great many mistakes may have occurred.

Mr. MONTAGUE. A mistake did not occur.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The accountant told me that no public moneys were paid to the late collector after 30th June, 1895, not one cent of public money.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I may be pardoned for interrupting. I am satisfied a mistake has been made in regard to Mr. Scully, and no doubt the hon. gentleman, whatever may be the course adopted by some of his colleagues, desires to be fair towards his officers. The previous collector at Berlin—I cannot remember his name—

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Bowman.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Under circumstances that it is not necessary to refer to because they were of a painful character, left his office during the month of July. He was not in the country to draw his salary. No sum therefore had been paid him during July; but the hon. gentleman will find on indisputable evidence that the previous collector did perform his duties during part of July, and that the position was not vacant for a term of one year.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I can only say as to what appeared on the books, that no moneys were paid for the purpose of the collector at Berlin after that date.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Permit me to say—

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. It is no use going further. I have heard what the hon. gentleman said.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman will find also—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If the hon. Minister does not object to my interruption, hon. members need not, I think, object. The hon. gentleman will find in the department a record of the circumstances to which I have referred, which will prove indisputably the statement I have made.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Even if that statement were true, I would consider the office vacant when there was no appointee entitled to receive any money from his office. After 30th June, 1895, no money was paid. This recommendation of Council is dated, I think, 6th or 7th July. I have given the hon. gentleman his answer with regard to that matter. If he is going through the cases he will find other examples. There are two cases which I happen to know about. We have here the case of "J. Spence, collector of inland revenue, superannuated. No action taken. Not deemed in the public interest to take any action." I submit that is a proper answer, for that was the reason. Again, we have "E. H. Sinon, promoted to collector of Inland Revenue, vice Spence. No action; not deemed in public interest to take any action." I submit that is the proper reason, and it is given to the House. I think the hon. gentleman will not ask for any further reason in regard to this matter.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Not at all.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I do not think the hon. gentleman would like to discuss it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes, I would.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman is getting uneasy at once.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Not at all.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I invite attention to "Hansard" on this question. One of the rules laid down by His Excellency was that he was not prepared to consider any superannuation not made at the request of the officer sought to be superannuated. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) asked a number of questions. I will give two of them and the answer given by the Controller of Inland Revenue. The first question was:

Mr. MONTAGUE.

1. Whether one John Spence, of the Inland Revenue Department, has been superannuated, and if so, the date of his superannuation?

The second was:

2. Did the said John Spence make application to the Inland Revenue Department to be retired and placed on the superannuation list, and file the medical certificate required by the Act along with his application, and whether said application and certificate are on file in the department?

The answer was:

1. John Spence has not been superannuated.
2. No such documents are on file in this department.

The recommendation that went to His Excellency from his advisers and on which he was willing to consider the case, under the rule laid down was because John Spence had been superannuated at his own request. Where did the Government have the request? The recommendation placed before the Governor General, embodying the request for superannuation for Mr. Spence, declared that it was made at his own request. The question was asked in this House, and the responsible head of the department answered that no such request was to be found on the file of the department. If the hon. member for Haldimand would move for a return with a view to ascertain which of the late Ministers submitted the recommendation stating that Mr. Spence was superannuated at his own request, no doubt the papers would be brought down. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would then be able to say where the document is in which Mr. Spence made this request, for I understand that he most emphatically denies having done so.

Mr. WALLACE. What is the date of "Hansard"?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The date is 22nd April, 1897. I give that as another case, and I submit that the answer given in the return is perfectly correct. If the Governor General would not consider a request for superannuation unless made by the party to be superannuated, and when no such document or request, with the accompanying medical certificate, is to be found on file in the department, it was correct to state "No action was taken; not deemed in the public interest to take action."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Allow me to draw attention to the fact that this return does not give a correct statement. The answer to that should have been:

Was not superannuated at his own request;
And not—

No action taken; not deemed in the public interest to take any action.

That answer does not furnish the facts. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) says that the reason this superannuation was not carried out was because the officer denied that he requested to be superannuated. If that be the case, the answer in this paper is wrong, and the return is misleading.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. What followed. No action was taken and it was not deemed in the public interest to take any action.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is not a reason.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Certainly it is a reason. That man who would have been on the superannuation list drawing hundreds of dollars of the money of the people for doing nothing, is now performing his duty, and another man is not appointed in his place at a salary. This man whom they sought to get out of office is there today performing his duty, and performing it well. I believe he is a good officer and well able to perform his duty for, perhaps many years to come. It was certainly in the public interest to retain that man and not to put a charge of his superannuation on the public, and not to put the salary of a new appointee as a burden on the treasury. I have now given the House some samples from the list as we find them here, and I have no doubt as the First Minister said, that if there are other cases which hon. gentlemen opposite wish to discuss separately there can be no objection to give them full and explicit answers with regard to them. When a return is brought down to the House it is expected to be put in a concise shape, and this return was put in that shape. I believe I have given instances to show that the action taken by the Government in this matter was warranted in the public interest, and is entirely consistent with the utterances of the First Minister.

Mr. GIBSON. What is the name of the person they intended should replace Spence after he was superannuated?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. E. H. Simon, from Brantford.

Motion agreed to, and the House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Department of Agriculture..... $48,422 50

Mr. BERGERON. There is a decrease here.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). There is a reduction in the staff which occasions a decrease.

Mr. BERGERON. There are some reductions and some increases.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. There are some statutory increases to some of the deserving officers on the staff whose work appeared to be underpaid. But in consequence of the reductions in the number of the staff there is a decrease in the whole expenditure.

Mr. BERGERON. There is a decrease of three third-class clerks and an increase of one first-class clerk.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The increase of one first-class clerk is due to the promotion of Mr. Caron who is one of the examiners in the Patent Branch. Mr. Caron was a second-class clerk, but the other examiners were both first-class clerks and Mr. Caron was doing the work fully as well and just as much of it as those other officers, and I thought it was right he should be in the same class. He is promoted to the bottom of the class, while the other two examiners, because of length of service, are really getting higher pay than Mr. Caron.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Are there any statutory increases?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The first statutory increase is that of Mr. Jackson, who is the chief clerk in charge of the Trades Marks. His salary was $2,200, and it will now be $2,250. Mr. Jackson is an old servant of the public, has been a very long time in the service, and I thought deserved an increase in his salary. Dr. Brymer, the Archivist, also gets a statutory increase for the same reason. Mr. W. J. Lynch gets his increase. I promoted Mr. Lynch last year from being a first-class clerk to a chief clerk. At the time the late Mr. Pope died and the position of Commissioner of Patents was abolished, Mr. Lynch was given a great deal of extra work. He was put in charge, under the Deputy Minister, of the Patent Branch. He is doing very responsible and very important work and doing it very efficiently, and I therefore thought he deserved an increase.

Mr. McMULLEN. What is his salary?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It was $1,800, it will in the future be $1,850.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. How many have received the statutory increase in the Department of Agriculture, and how many have not received it, if any?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Six clerks and one messenger have received it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. How many were eligible and did not receive it?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Thirteen did not.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Had the hon. gentleman the recommendation of the deputy Minister in favour of all those who did receive it?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I had not an opportunity, unfortunately, of being present when this subject was very fully discussed, and I do not propose now to take up the time of the committee at any length. The question is one of great importance. The Civil Service Act, I think it will be admitted on all hands, was based on the principle of obtaining the services of young men of ability and qualifications for the discharge of the duties imposed upon civil servants for a small salary, with a regular statutory increase; so that while they were obtaining experience and qualifying themselves to discharge their duties in a more efficient manner from year to year their salaries were increased. That policy, in my judgment, was a sound one. Upon that, however, there is room for a great difference of opinion, which no doubt does exist among hon. gentlemen in this House. But one thing I think will be admitted by everybody, that is, that the law, whatever it is, should be carried out. I have not the advantage of being a lawyer; but I observe that in the discussion of this question there has been a great difference of opinion as to what the meaning of the law is. So far as I am able to form any judgment, I think the intention of the law was that the engagement with the civil servant was that he should receive the statutory increase provided his conduct entitled him to it. That was to be evidenced by the report of the Deputy Minister under whom he served, concurred in by the Minister and by the Governor General in Council; and in that case it was to apply uniformly. Now, I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman has been justified in all these cases in which he has given the statutory increase; but I would like to ask him whether any others were recommended for the increase by the deputy head. I think I may take for granted that the recommendation was not confined to the persons to whom the increase was given, but that the hon. gentleman exercised his own judgment and discretion as to whom it should apply to. Now, I want to draw the attention of the Government to what I think would be a wise course to pursue with regard to this very important question. If under the law now on the Statute-book the civil servant who discharges his duty faithfully and is recommended by the deputy head is entitled to the statutory increase, then I think all will admit that one of two things should happen—either the law should be repealed and a law substituted which will not be subject to any misconstruction or misconception, or measures should be taken to ascertain whether under the law the parties are entitled to have the statutory increase. The effect upon the civil service must be most detrimental, if, instead of it being a question of law and of good conduct, it is an optional matter with the Minister to give the statutory increase to whomsoever he may consider entitled to it. I think the time has come when that question ought to be settled, because it will at once be perceived that every person who believes that under the law he is entitled to the statutory increase and does not get it must feel aggrieved. The selection of a few persons in the department for the statutory increase, and the refusal of it to others, is to a certain extent a ban upon the character and standing of all those who do not receive it. I believe the intention of the law—and probably it was never carried out with sufficient rigour—was that the statutory increase should be given only to those who by their conduct proved that they were entitled to it. Now, without taking up the time of the House, I want to suggest that the Government should agree to have a case made for submission to the Supreme Court, to get their opinion as to whether a civil servant who faithfully discharges his duties and is recommended for the increment provided by law is legally entitled to receive it or not.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not think that I can agree with the hon. leader of the Opposition that the statutory increase should be given in every case.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not say in every case.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman carried out that system for many years without any discrimination whatever.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, perhaps too much so.

Mr. McMULLEN. I must enter my protest against the continuation of the statutory increases to men who are receiving a good round salary. Here we have a case of a man receiving the $50 increase in the Department of Agriculture when he is already getting a salary of $2,200. I say that is wrong. I do not think that increase should be made. We find that in the Department of Customs the salaries of the clerks are not as high as those in the Department of Agriculture. I think that any man receiving $2,200 is receiving all that he can earn, and more than he can earn. The judges get only $2,200 a year, and this includes $200 for travelling expenses. I think this is a case in which the hon. Minister should have hesitated before adding $50 to the salary.

Mr. McNEILL. I hope that the Government will take into consideration the suggestion made by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. I think it is a very fair suggestion and one, I am sure, that would go a great deal towards settling this question in the minds of the public and the members of the civil service. Nothing could be fairer than the suggestion that this matter should be stated as a case, and that we should have a thoroughly reliable legal opinion upon it, so that we may know exactly where we are with reference to it. Nothing could be worse for the civil service than the idea that they are being unjustly and illegally treated, and I think further that there really could not be a very much greater blot upon the fair name of our country than that other countries should suppose that our Government was unjustly treating its civil servants by deliberately depriving them of the statutory increases which the law provides.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). It does not provide it, and the hon. gentleman knows it does not.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman has not heard what I have been saying.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I have heard everything. I have heard all this fifty times over, and we are tired to death of it.

Mr. McNEILL. He does not know really what I have been saying.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I have heard all you have said and could say and will say to the day of judgment about this, I believe.

Mr. McNEILL. The suggestion made by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, when my hon. friend who has just interrupted me must have been thinking of something else, was that there should be a case stated.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I heard the suggestion.

Mr. McNEILL. It is all very well for my hon. friend to say that the law is so and so, but he will admit that there are some lawyers in the House to-day and some who were here in other years, who knew something about the law. There is his friend Mr. Blake, for example, who took a perfectly different view; and when Mr. Blake takes one view and my hon. friend another—

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I do not at all admit that the hon. gentleman interprets Mr. Blake's language correctly. On the contrary, he interprets it entirely wrongly.

Mr. McNEILL. There can be no doubt at all about his language, and there was no suggestion by any one when the Act was passed, that its language could have had any other significance than that which we have been placing upon it. All we ask now is that this should be done for the sake of the service of the country—that we should have a case stated and absolute knowledge as to what the law is. Surely that is not an unreasonable proposition. My hon. friend says that he knows everything that has been and can be said with regard to it. Well, this suggestion was only made a moment ago and is one that should commend itself to the approval of the right hon. gentleman who leads the House.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I do not think so.

Mr. McNEILL. Will the right hon. gentleman say that it is not a reasonable proposal, that, in a case of great doubt and gravity, and one which concerns the welfare of a great many people, we should find out what the law really is?

The PRIME MINISTER. No, and I will tell my hon. friend the reasons why. There are good reasons and authority for the course which the Government has taken under the law. Either the law is satisfactory or it is not. If it is unjust, it can be amended; but at present there is no reason why we should seek the opinion of a court of justice as to the interpretation of the statute. If the statute is not satisfactory as we interpret it, we can amend it. That is the best reason I can give my hon. friend.

Mr. INGRAM. A deputation waited on the right hon. gentleman the other day of civil servants with respect to the statutory increase. Will the hon. gentleman say what answer he gave on that occasion?

The PRIME MINISTER. I cannot recollect at this moment the "ipsissima verba" I used to the delegation that waited on me; but I think I told them that, so far as this matter is concerned, the Government had taken a course which I thought was quite consistent with the law and the only one consistent with the law. I told them also that I did not apprehend that the Act contemplated that every civil servant should be entitled to promotion, whether deserving or not. I could not admit either that the rule should be that a civil servant was entitled to promotion in every case, unless adversely reported upon by the head of the department. I said that, in my opinion, the proper course to take was that every officer should be entitled to promotion if recommended for promotion by the head of the department; but I said, at the same time, that I saw very great difficulty in working out the law, if it were the law, and that I would be very happy, after the session, to receive any representations they had to make on the subject.

Mr. SPROULE. I shall not say anything about the difference of opinion between Mr. Blake and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), because the one stands eminent as a lawyer and the other does not claim that distinction, and the House will draw its own conclusion. I have always thought that one of the objects of the establishment of the Supreme Court was to get reasoned judgments upon these questions on which the House could not agree, and I think that Mr. Blake at one time very deliberately stated so in this Chamber. It would not be at all out of place to get such a verdict from that court. In fact, it would be very much in place, when there is such a diversity of opinion as exists, even between lawyers in this House, with regard to this matter.

The PRIME MINISTER. What is the hon. gentleman's opinion as to what the law should be?

Mr. SPROULE. What the law is, as interpreted by the Supreme Court, is what we desire to know. I was going to ask the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) what disposal did he make of the other three clerks, when he reduced the number of his clerks from twenty-one to eighteen third-class clerks.

Mr. DAVIN. Before the hon. gentleman answers that question, I think it is not desirable that the House should go away from the question raised by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, because it seems to me that if you have a law on the Statute-book, and a great lawyer says that the law means a certain thing and the Government says it does not, and a large body of men are affected by that law, the suggestion of the hon. leader of the Opposition is one that should commend itself to reason and justice alike. With regard to the way in which the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) treats the opinion of Mr. Blake, all that the hon. gentleman says is that he does not at all accept the interpretation placed on Mr. Blake's language. But he has not done the House the courtesy of analysing that language and giving us his reason for saying that our interpretation is wrong. What we did was to quote the opinions of the former leader of the Liberal party (Mr. Blake), when sitting in this House and leading the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and also the right hon. gentleman now at the head of the Government, and there is no record that these hon. gentlemen ever dissented from the opinion which the Hon. Mr. Blake expressed at that time. Mr. Blake's language is not obscure.

It does not need any careful analysis to get at his meaning. And I will call the attention of the committee to what Mr. Blake said. And for this purpose—to enforce the suggestion made by the leader of the Opposition. Not for the purpose of getting an advance for the civil servant, but for the purpose of showing where we are and showing what justice demands. Because, if Mr. Blake is correct—not if our view of Mr. Blake's language is correct, because there can be no doubt of what he meant—then the Government pursuing the policy it does is weakening the authority of law in this country and destroying the morale of a great service, what should be done is to repeal the Act and bring in a measure under which the Government could legally carry out the policy which they believe best. I am not now discussing that policy, nor is it necessary to discuss what the right hon. gentleman suggested to my hon. friend behind me, what he thinks should be the law. It is not what we think should be the law that is the important question for the people. Fortunately or unfortunately for the country, it is what my right hon. friend thinks should be the law that is the important thing, because he is in place and power. Now, this is what Mr. Blake said in discussing this measure:

But, Sir, the practical operation of the law which was passed in conformity with the recommendations of the commission, and which has not worked in conformity with those conditions, is that there are those increases and these promotions going on steadily.

He goes on further:

That the mischiefs to which I refer still prevail, and they prevail to this extent, as the Finance Minister sums up the case, that 420 out of the civil servants of the country have, within the last six years, received increases which make them now in receipt of $300 a year by virtue of these $50 increases apart from the promotion increases, or a total of $126,900 a year, which would be equal to the average wages of 420 mechanics with families.

He goes on further:

I maintain that it ought to be changed; I maintain that the system is a bad one.

He says, the system is a bad one. Clearly he refers to the law. He does not condemn the Government for doing certain things, but he is condemning the Government of the day for having passed a statute that compels them to do certain things.

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the date of that speech of Mr. Blake?

Mr. DAVIN. This discussion took place in 1885. He says:

In those cases in which you give increases, the increases ought not—

Now, I call the attention of the committee with all respect to this. I have a great respect for the authority and position in this House of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). With great respect for the hon. gentleman I will call his attention to what Mr. Blake said, and then I will remind him of what he said a few moments ago that he did not care for our interpretation of what Mr. Blake had said.

In those cases in which you give increases, the increases ought not, in my opinion, to be given—

How, as the Government gives them? No, but——as this law gives them.

Now, how will the hon. member for South Oxford support the proposition laid down that the construction we put on Mr. Blake's language was not the correct construction? Why, Sir, there is no room for a double construction of this language; it is emphatic and precise. He goes on further:

I maintain there ought to be no right to an increase, even in those cases in which increases may be given.

I maintain that the increase should only be given as a stimulus to extra exertion;—

I will call the hon. gentleman's attention to this:

—whereas, by this law,—

By this law, mark you——it is given as a matter of course.

He does not say: You are not bound to give it by the law, but he says that it is given as a matter of course. He said further:

I maintain that the increase should only be given as a stimulus to extra exertions; whereas, by this law, it is given as a matter of course, for unless a man's conduct is disgracefully bad, the rule is to give the increase. If the rule is not without exceptions, let us hear the exceptions. But I need not argue this point, because the Finance Minister himself describes the increase as an increase inevitable under the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

Would Mr. Blake have said this if these increases were not necessary under the law? We know what a polemic he was. He would have said: The Finance Minister is wrong; this law does not compel him to give these increases, but they are made by the Government without justification, adding unnecessarily to the burdens of the country. And the present Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), in this same debate, said:

When we pass to the first-class clerk, we find he draws a salary of $1,400, increasable to $1,800 by an annual increase of $50. Then we descend in the grade, and we find a second-class clerk commencing with $1,000, increasable at the same arbitrary rate, as time rolls on, to $1,400 a year. The same fixed sum of $50 a year is added to the salary of each clerk, whether he is of the lowest class or the highest class. The Secretary of State must know that increases in salaries should be in proportion to the value of the services, having due regard to the then salary; whereas, in this case, there is an arbitrary sum of $50 a year, without rhyme or reason, added to the salary of each officer, from the lowest class up to the highest.

Then we have the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), and this was said as an obiter dictum:

Yet, in the face of this fact, Parliament is asked to increase the salaries of these mechanical clerks and give them $50 annual increase.

Now, Sir, here we have three or four sentences in the same speech in which Mr. Blake emphatically declares that the law compels these increases.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. No, he does not say anything of the kind. What he says is that the law gives it, and that does not in the slightest degree imply that in his opinion it is a legal right.

Mr. DAVIN. I will ask the hon. gentleman to consider Mr. Blake's language—

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I have heard the language fifty times over. It has been read fifty times in this House; it has been read a dozen times by my hon. friend (Mr. Davin), a dozen times by gentlemen beside him, and a dozen times by gentlemen beside him. We know the whole thing by heart.

Mr. DAVIN. Let me say, with all respect for the hon. gentleman, that that is a charming specimen of his capacity for heroic inaccuracy, because I have read it only three times and my hon. friend to my left (Mr. McNeill) only referred to my quotation of it.

Mr. McMULLEN. Will my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) permit, me to ask him a question? He has read from the speech of Mr. Blake which he says was made in 1885. Is he aware that the Civil Service Act was recast in 1886, and that three clauses affecting this subject were completely wiped out.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) must be aware that Mr. Blake is discussing this section 26.

Mr. McMULLEN. He was discussing in 1885 an Act that was recast in 1886.

Mr. DAVIN. He is discussing the very words we have in the Act to-day and the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) has shown the grossest ignorance of the question by his interruption. I want to discuss this question from the standpoint of parliamentary action. We have an Act on the Statute-book that a great lawyer tells us gives to a clerk who has no bad mark against him, the right to a statutory increase; it is called a statutory increase, that is the very phrase employed; showing the consensus of Parliament as to its interpretation. We have a great lawyer interpreting it as a man of sense would interpret it. But we have the hon. member for Cape Breton (Sir Charles Tupper) who has been in Parliament for so many years and has vast experience, taking the responsibility of suggesting that the Act passed by Mr. Blake empowering us to get the opinion of the Supreme Court as to the meaning of the statute, should be utilized to obtain an authoritative opinion. Then I believe there is another distinguished lawyer sitting on that side of the House, whose opinion coincides with ours, but I have not his permission to give his name. Under these circumstances should we not either repeal this Act and pass another, or get an authoritative opinion from the Supreme Court as to its meaning?

Mr. CLANCY. I want to ask the First Minister a question. Has he any doubt as to the meaning of the Act upon this statement : Not that the civil servant is to have a statutory increase upon all occasions, but upon such occasions as he is recommended by the head of the department, showing that he is a worthy servant and that there is nothing against him. I ask the right hon. gentleman if he has any doubt as to the meaning of the law under such circumstances.

The PRIME MINISTER. I have no hesitation in answering the question of my hon. friend. Though I am a lawyer myself, I have not given much attention to law for a great many years. But when this question first came up it was of course referred to the Minister of Justice, Sir Oliver Mowat at that time, one of the ablest lawyers in the land, and we have acted upon his opinion.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. Minister has not explained with regard to the three dismissals, or doing away with three of his clerks.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The three vacancies in the third-class clerkships are due to two promotions into the second class, and one death in the service. The vacancies in the second class were available in consequence of the dismissal from the service of Mr. J. H. Lyster, and the promotion of Mr. Caron into the first class. There is an extra clerk in the first class, the same number in the second class, and fewer in the third. Mr. Caron is promoted from the second class into the first class for the reason I explained to the hon. member for Beauharnois, a few minutes ago. One clerk was dismissed for misconduct, one died, and no appointments have been made.

Mr. WALLACE. Is the hon. Minister going to pay any attention to the representations made by the member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) ? It appears to me that the objection raised by him was a very proper one, that these men getting such enormous salaries, were not doing a very high class work. When was Mr. Lynch promoted to a chief clerkship ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Last year. He was at the head of the other class, and he was promoted to the bottom of this class at the same salary, $1,800. Mr. Jackson is in charge of the copyright and trade marks branch, an important piece of work in the department, and I think its importance justifies an additional salary. The same is true of Dr. Brymner, who has been for many years the archivist, and who does excellent work in a very important branch. He also gets a statutory increase. Mr. Lynch is doing a great deal of the work which used to be done by the commissioner of patents, the late Richard Pope. When Mr. Pope died the position was being taken by the deputy head of the department, but Mr. Lynch, as chief clerk in charge of that particular branch, has now to do a great deal of work and has a very responsible position. He is doing his work efficiently and well, and I thought it right, as I considered the pay he was getting was less than he was entitled to, that he should have a statutory increase.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I had an opportunity, when on the other side of the water, of knowing a good deal of the services of Mr. Brymner, and it is impossible to over-rate them. A more indefatigable, untiring public servant is not to be found, I am satisfied, in the service of the Government, and I am very glad that his right to a statutory increase has been favourably considered.

Mr. SPROULE. May I ask the Minister if he requests a report from his deputy on all these clerks, or only on certain ones ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. My deputy and I discussed the work in the department, and we agreed upon certain lines which I will explain to the hon. gentleman in brief. They were that where the work was not paid for commensurately with its importance ; whatever the officer had shown unusual or extraordinary diligence, or aptitude, or capacity in his work, an increase should be given. But except in such cases, or where the officer was doing new work, more important than the work that he had been doing before, we gave no increases. I may say that in the patent branch especially, the work has been very considerably reorganized as a result of the changes which came about after the death of the late commissioner of patents. In that reorganization I found that I was obliged to throw upon certain officers of that department, notably Mr. Lynch, greater work and responsibility than they had before. Under those circumstances I believe the statutory increases could properly be given.

Mr. SPROULE. I assume there were a number of clerks in regard to whom he did not report.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have stated that the deputy and myself discussed and talked over the clerks in the department.

Mr. SPROULE. The inference to be drawn from the explanation given is, that the Minister talked over the different clerks with his deputy, and because some clerks did important work and did it well, an intimation was given that it was desirable to give those statutory increases, and to do so on the usual principle that a favourable report from the deputy was required. But the balance of the clerks were apparently left out in the report asked with respect to their right to receive increases or otherwise. Then I take it that only a certain percentage of the clerks were reported on ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The whole of the clerks and the work of the whole of the clerks were discussed between myself and the deputy, with the result that these increases were given.

Post Office Department..... $197,169

Mr. SPROULE. I notice an increase, which perhaps the Minister will explain.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). There have been a number of changes in the staff, increases and reductions, with a net increase of $1,140. There was a draughtsman, Minguay, who at one time was attached to the outside service and was classified as connected with the Toronto chief inspector's office, although he has always been in Ottawa and has been in the inside service. He has been transferred to the inside service. His salary was $1,400.

Mr. WALLACE. How many new appointments were made during the year?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. There was a transfer in the case of Minguay, and another transfer, this being from the Ottawa inspector's office—I forget the name. There have been no new permanent appointments made to the inside service, unless the hon. gentleman includes temporary clerks. There have been two or three of that class. There was a Mrs. Armstrong appointed. Altogether there have been, I think, two at $500 and one at $400 during the year.

Mr. WALLACE. Any dismissals?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No dismissals, except by Providence.

Mr. SPROULE. How many statutory increases were given?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Sixteen increases.

Mr. HUGHES. How does it occur that the salary of the accountant is $1,800, while last year it was $1,850?

Mr. SPROULE. Will the hon. gentleman give the different classes in which statutory increases have been given?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. In reply to the hon. gentleman for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes), I may say that the accountant last year was Mr. Barrett, who received $1,850 a year. He died last September, and the next in command—Mr. Johnston, was $1,800, being $50 less than that of his predecessor. In reply to the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), I beg to say that the statutory increases are as follows:—Three among first-class clerks, seven among second-class clerks, six among third-class, and seven increases to packers and sorters.

Mr. INGRAM. I notice the Controller of the Railway Mail Service appears to have been reduced from $3,000 to $2,500. Does this indicate that the service is not satisfactory, or that Mr. Armstrong is not satisfactory and his salary has been decreased?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Mr. Armstrong receives $2,500. He entered the service on 1st January, 1897. At that time he was drawing $1,500 as a clerk in the Toronto post office. He was promoted to the rank of controller here at $2,500 a year. So there was $500 to be paid from 1st January, 1897, to 1st July, and $2,500 for the succeeding year. The $3,000 therefore includes the $500 difference between his salary in Toronto post office and his salary as controller for six months, and $2,500 for his regular yearly salary since.

Mr. SPROULE. In making these statutory increases will the hon. Minister state the principle on which he has made them? Was it by first requesting the deputy to report on all the civil servants in the department, or did he ask a report on certain civil servants, whose salaries he wished to increase?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I desired to ascertain from all proper and available sources of information what was the right thing to do with the staff. In my department, in addition to having a deputy, we have a number of heads of branches, and I consulted personally the heads of the branches both last year and this. I may say that I did not get what I thought proper advice and assistance in many cases. I know that I thought it was quite an erroneous view to take of the law for the head of a branch to recommend every one in the branch as deserving of increases, including amongst them, for example, a certain officer with reference to whom I had occasion to give express instructions, for very good reasons, that he should not have an increase. I found no discrimination exercised by the heads of the branches in many cases, so that I felt I could not get the heads of the branches to interpret the law as the Government intended to interpret it. Lately I was able to get some little assistance from the heads of the branches, and the recommendations I have made for increases are endorsed by the heads of the branches, as well as of course by the deputy.

Mr. SPROULE. Are we to understand that the report was received from the head of the branch and not from the head of the department? Is that the hon. gentleman's interpretation of what the Civil Service Act provides should be done?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not know what view the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) takes of the law, but the deputy head brought me the information and I also conferred with him and with the heads of the branches, who advised me. I presume that the law expects the deputy head to use his best efforts to find out what is right to recommend. My deputy did that. My department advised me, and I also had the advantage of hearing directly from the heads of the branches on the subject.

Mr. HUGHES. Was that the new or the old deputy?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. My present deputy.

Mr. HUGHES. There are thirteen first-class clerks this year and only ten last year. Is there any explanation of that?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Certainly.

Mr. HUGHES. I should like to hear it.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Mr. Walter Rowan, a second-class clerk at the head of the revenue branch, who has been a member of the staff for 24 years, is recommended for promotion from second to first-class. He is an able and faithful officer. His present salary is $1,400.

Mr. McDOUGALL. What is the increase?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not think it means an increase, he simply passes from one class to another. The second promotion is Mr. William Smith, of the Mail Service branch. He was appointed in 1876, and he is a very able officer. The third promotion is that of Mr. W. D. O'Brien of the Stores branch; he was appointed in 1862.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Will the Postmaster General explain how it is that a gentleman who has been put in the position of chief clerk in July, 1897, receives $2,500, while the chief clerks in other departments, who have been there for many years, receive only $2,000 and $2,200. I refer to Mr. Armstrong, chief clerk and controller of the railway mail service.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. He has been in the service, I suppose, for thirty years. He is one of the most experienced officers we have in the postal service. Mr. Armstrong entered the service on the 5th November, 1857,

Mr. WALLACE. I would point out to the Postmaster General that the law says the maximum salary for a chief clerk should be $2,400, and in this case $2,500 is proposed to be voted.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Mr. Armstrong is what is called the Controller of the Railway Mail Service. I am not aware that there is anything in the law limiting the salary to other than what Parliament may vote.

Mr. WALLACE. You may describe an officer in any way you like, but if he is made a chief clerk, as Mr. Armstrong is, then the Civil Service Act says that the maximum salary for a chief clerk shall be $2,400.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. When this Supply Bill is passed it will be an Act of Parliament, and just as efficacious as the Civil Service Act.

Mr. WALLACE. That is, it over-rides the statutory law as it stands now.

Mr. MULOCK.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The laws passed by this Parliament will supersede any prior inconsistent laws.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Postmaster General is going a long way in making any such statement as that. There is the Civil Service Act, and no one will contend for a moment that because the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) brings down an estimate and the House passes that estimate that he is within the law, when that other law, until it is repealed, is the law of the land. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) desires to vote a larger sum than is allowed under the Civil Service Act, he must place it as we used to place it, in an item by itself, and say: "Anything in the Civil Service Act to the contrary notwithstanding."

Mr. McDOUGALL. In reference to the salaries of the chief clerks, I find John Walsh went into the service in 1862—thirty-six years ago. He receives only $2,100 as chief clerk in the dead letter branch. I find also that David Matheson, chief clerk in the savings bank branch, receives $2,400. He has been in the service since 1863, and why put up the salary of this man, who only came into the service last year, to $2,500?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. He came into the service thirty years ago.

Mr. WALLACE. This gentleman, I understand, was a first-class clerk. The law says:

A chief clerkship in any department shall only be created by Order in Council passed after the deputy head has reported that such an officer is necessary for the proper performance of the public business in the department, stating the reasons on which he has arrived at that conclusion.

Was that done?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Mr. Armstrong was appointed controller by Order in Council.

Mr. WALLACE. Was the clause of the Act complied with specifically?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have no doubt that last year the necessary formalities of the law were complied with, and Mr. Armstrong was legally appointed.

Mr. WALLACE. We want a definite statement whether that was done.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. You might have got it last year.

Mr. WALLACE. We want it this year, because we are asked to vote the salary this year.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I suppose it was done last year.

Mr. WALLACE. I suppose we shall have to be content with that answer, though it is very unsatisfactory. The Act also provides:

The minimum salary paid to a chief clerk shall be $1,800, with an annual increase of $50 up to a maximum of $2,400.

Now, it is proposed to give $100 more than the maximum that the law allows. We want some explanation of that.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I can only say that the matter was explained to Parliament last year, when we established this branch. My recollection is that there was also special legislation referring to the controller.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not know the circumstances in connection with this case, but I submit that this committee cannot allow to pass the statement made by the Postmaster General that because he brings a vote down here, and that vote is passed, the civil service law is over-ridden. That is a statement which no Minister has a right to make and which this committee will not submit to from the Postmaster General or any one else.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Will the Postmaster General please explain why the salary of Arthur Lindsay, chief clerk and superintendent of the mail service branch, is $2,200, he having come into the service in 1864, and having been made chief clerk in 1891, while the salary of Armstrong is put at $2,500, he having been made chief clerk only last year, and having come into the service in 1867, three years later than Lindsay.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I submit that it is discourteous to this committee that the hon. gentleman does not deign to answer us in regard to this. The law is plain, and the Postmaster General has no right to state to this committee that he is going to over-ride the law by an estimate. This is not the way to get Estimates through this House.

Mr. BRITTON. I think the hon. gentleman misunderstood the Postmaster General in part. When he spoke of Armstrong, he said he was put there with the chief clerks, but he is a controller.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Britton) misses the point altogether. The statement of the Postmaster General was that if this House votes it in the Estimates, it does not matter about the Civil Service Act.

Mr. WALLACE. He also said Mr. Armstrong was a controller, and the hon. member for Kingston thinks that is sufficient. One chief clerk is controller of postal stores. That is Mr. Smith, who gets $2,400, the maximum of his class; but because he is the controller of stores, it is not considered that the law should be over-ridden and he should get $2,500.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend appealed to me a moment ago. I beg his pardon, as I was engaged in conversation at the time.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I did not refer to you as being discourteous.

The PRIME MINISTER. At all events, the hon. gentleman put a question to me. Let me remind him that Parliament makes the law. The Civil Service Act is only a law which guides the members of the Government and the members of Parliament; but my hon. friend knows that in many instances, for the time being, it is amended by the votes of Parliament in Supply. Very often when we pass an estimate for an officer against the rules of the Act, we use the words, "notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act," and the thing is done very often without even using these words.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

The PRIME MINISTER. I will mention an instance at once. Some of the deputy heads have been voted more than the sum allowed to them, by special vote of Parliament. There is the case of Mr. Lash, who, when Deputy Minister of Justice, received $6,000 a year by special vote of Parliament. Another case in point is that of the present Deputy Minister of Railways, Mr. Schreiber, who has a salary of $6,000 a year voted by Parliament. So that there are exceptions, and every case stands by itself when brought before Parliament.

Mr. WALLACE. But this is not a special vote. It is a vote taken in the ordinary way.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. My hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Montague) thought I was discourteous because I was simply waiting to get the statute before answering him. I would refer him to the statute of last session, chapter 26:

The salary of the controller shall be determined by the Governor in Council, not to exceed $2,500 per annum.

This branch was established by Act of Parliament last session.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am not finding any fault with the controller's salary. First, let me set myself right. The right hon. Prime Minister is always courteous to the House, and I regret that he thought I said he was discourteous. The statement of the Postmaster General was that it did not make any difference what the Civil Service Act said, the vote of Parliament was, of course, law.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. What I desire to say, and what I think I did say, was that the Supply Bill, when it becomes an Act, will supercede every existing Act wherever that Act conflicts with it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am not a lawyer and cannot follow these points out as a lawyer could, but I know, from the little experience I have had, that whenever we asked for any vote that exceeds what is allowed by the Civil Service Act, we invariably placed the words after it: "Notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act to the contrary." What I object to was the very free statement of the Postmaster General that he did not care what the Civil Service Act provided, he would put what he liked in the Estimates. As regards the salary of the controller, that is an entirely different thing, why is he called a chief clerk if he is a controller?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If the hon. gentleman will look at the item, he will find that Mr. Armstrong is called the controller of railway mail service. He will find the details on page 18.

Mr. WALLACE. On page 87 he is called chief clerk, controller of the railway mail service.

Mr. SPROULE. I notice that the accountant has been reduced from $1,850 to $1,800, what is the explanation?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Mr. Barrett, the former accountant, died, and his salary was $1,850. Mr. Johnson, who was next in order, took his place at a salary of $1,800.

Mr. HUGHES. I did not hear the explanation about the $3,000 last year.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Mr. Armstrong, who filled the position of clerk in the Toronto civil service, where his salary was $1,500 per year, was transferred from Toronto to the inside service, and his engagement began on the first of January, 1897. For that year he was getting at the rate of $1,500 per annum and then got another $1,000 for the year, or $500 for the half year from 1st January, 1897, to 1st July, 1897, and that $500 was added for the first half of that year, together with the $2,500 for the year we are in now. That should have been divided into two items—$2,500 for the current year and the other $500 for the half year when he was really on the staff.

Mr. WALLACE. When was the $500 voted?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. In the Supplementary Estimates of last year.

Mr. WALLACE. In the main Estimates it is $2,500.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. On page 16 of the statute, the arrears of salary from the 1st January to the 1st June, 1897, due Mr. Armstrong, being the difference between the salary paid him as first-class clerk in Toronto post office and his salary as controller of the railway mail service, namely, $500.

Mr. INGRAM. Last year, when this question was up for discussion, the hon. Minister was not in a position to give very full information. He may be in a better position now. The appointment of Mr. Armstrong, he said, was for the purpose of economy and making the service much more efficient. Perhaps the hon. gentleman could give us some information this year after the experience of how this new system is working.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think it is working well and economically. There has been considerable reduction in the cost of the mail service. There was a reduction of 35 in the staff.

Mr. McDOUGALL. How does that give advantage to the people?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think it will be to their advantage. I think they are getting better mail service than the year before.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think you will find, Mr. Chairman, that no member in the House will be able to make any point against the Government with regard to that branch.

Mr. INGRAM. I do not rise to find fault with Mr. Armstrong, because I believe he is an efficient officer, but last year the hon. gentleman said he was not in a position to give information but had instructed the chief inspector and Controller Armstrong to select the most efficient as local superintendents in the different districts.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I should be very glad to give the information, but perhaps that would come in more properly, when dealing with the outside service. If my hon. friend prefers to leave it over until then, well and good. But I may say to the hon. gentleman that I have done what I stated I would do. I have refrained from interfering in the slightest degree in the selection of the superintendents of the outside service. I will not take any credit for it, because it was my duty to select the best men, and I gave my instruction to the officers that such men should be selected. Only one consideration is admissible—the interest of the public service. I cannot give the hon. gentleman at this time the names of all these appointees. Commencing at Halifax, the superintendent is Mr. Brown. I may say that all these superintendents were appointed for a period of probation, and, if their record warranted it in the opinion of the Controller, they were confirmed. Mr. Brown has not been confirmed because he was, to some extent, a weak man. The next district is St. John. I do not remember the name of the superintendent there. The Ottawa superintendent is Mr. Plumb; then Toronto superintendent is Mr. McLeod. The men who were appointed as a rule, had been filling corresponding positions of chief clerks.

Mr. BENNETT. May I ask if Mr. McLeod had been filling the position of a chief clerk?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think so, but I cannot say positively. I said that this was a rule, but I do not pretend to speak with accuracy upon these points.

Mr. BENNETT. Had Mr. Plumb, appointed in the Ottawa division, been a chief clerk?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No, he was not; he was a railway mail clerk. I instructed the Controller to select a superintendent for this division. I am not aware that there was a superintendent before. The Controller submitted to me a number of names of men who had various political affinities. Mr. Plumb was a pronounced Conservative; and I do not hesitate to say that when I was making the selection arguments were advanced why he should not be appointed. I selected him because he was capable; I did not allow his politics to interfere. I sent for him and told him that I had been advised that he was the best man in the division and I propose not to promote in the department except for merit; that he should get the office without regard to his politics, and I trusted that he would be as fair to those under him as the department was to him. He was appointed and has proven a satisfactory officer.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Does that rule prevail with regard to postmasters all through the country?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It does not.

Mr. BENNETT. May I ask if Mr. Plumb had passed what was known as the chief railway mail clerk's examination?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. We are not now discussing the outside service, and I think it would be better to postpone this discussion until we reach that item.

Mr. BENNETT. The Postmaster General is asking for $2,500 for a controller, as he is termed, and he must remember that last year he made a statement that this was an experiment.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Not an experiment.

Mr. BENNETT. I beg pardon, I will read from "Hansard":

My desire is to make promotions in the mail service the reward of merit, and I instructed the chief inspector and controller in each case to select the most efficient men in the district as local superintendents.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. That does not say that it is an experiment.

Mr. BENNETT. Now the Postmaster General admitted that Mr. Plumb was what was known as a chief railway mail clerk.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No, I did not say that.

Mr. BENNETT. Then I can tell the hon. gentleman that Mr. Plumb was a chief railway mail clerk, or rather, a first-class railway mail clerk.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think he was a second-class. May I explain to my hon. friend what is a chief railway mail clerk. There is a difference—

Mr. BENNETT. I know. I misquoted the word and corrected myself. Mr. Plumb was a first-class railway mail clerk, as was Mr. McLeod. And I do not think either have passed the examination for chief railway mail clerk, which was a very high grade examination and a feature of the system. Last year the hon. gentleman stated and he reiterated the statement this session that he had not part or portion in the selection of these superintendents. What the hon. gentleman did was this: He found chief railway mail clerks discharging their duties, and Mr. Sweetman and Mr. Armstrong will not contradict that. He found Mr. Winstanley a most efficient officer in Toronto in the prime of health, and he stepped over his head and appointed Mr. McLeod in his place, and without being personal, I may say is a relative of a strong supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite. Mr. Winstanley was displaced, and, for all I know, Mr. Winstanley is on the superannuation list, though in the prime of health. Is that so?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No.

Mr. BENNETT. What position is he occupying and what salary is he receiving?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. He is receiving a salary of $1,500, and is in the office of the inspector in Toronto. I do not wish to prevent my hon. friend from pursuing his line of argument if he thinks it is advisable to do so. I do not propose to question his statement of fact very much, though I could do so. I do not think that it would be fair to the officers concerned. With regard to Mr. McLeod I do not know of his being related to any member of Parliament. I never saw the gentleman so far as I know, until a month or two ago. I had no personal knowledge of him, no acquaintance with him. He was recommended to me by Mr. Armstrong as the proper person to fill that place. He has been appointed and has filled the place ably and has proven himself useful and a desirable man. I do not think my hon. friend will speak of the personnel any further.

Mr. BENNETT. I see that the Postmaster General is very anxious I should not say anything further on the subject.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Do as you like.

Mr. BENNETT. Oh, I am not to be terrified or threatened by the Postmaster General. I had the pleasure of meeting him in a by-election in my constituency two years ago. And the Postmaster General came to another division. He came to what was known as the Barrie division—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I am obliged to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) to confine himself to the item under discussion, the item of Civil Government. The hon. gentleman, I hope will not discuss on this item, questions of the outside service which will come up later on.

Mr. BENNETT. I will call the attention of the Chairman—

Mr. GIBSON. Oh, he will tell us about the Midland Railway.

Mr. BENNETT. Now, let my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) be quiet. I thought that the Minister of Finance had snubbed him severely enough in the committee this morning, and that he would be quiet for a little while.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I thought it was the other way. I thought my hon. friend (Mr. Gibson) had snubbed me.

Mr. BENNETT. However, I do not mind the hon. member for Lincoln, because I may always recall these lines :

Faith never wounds more deep the generous heart
Than when a blockhead's insult points the dart.

Now, we have under discussion here a vote of $2,500 for a controller of railway mail service.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I must remind the hon. member that he might as well discuss the salary of all the postmasters in the country, because they are under the control of the deputy postmaster here. I will ask the hon. gentleman to confine himself to the discussion of civil government.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, in connection with civil government, you will find a controller of railway mail service on page 18, for whom the House is asked to vote $2,500. I want to review some actions of the controller of railway mail service during the past year in order that the House may judge—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I shall be obliged to rule the hon. member out of order if he continues to discuss this question now, because the conduct of these persons to whom he alludes will come up under another item of these Estimates.

Mr. BENNETT. But I am discussing the item on page 18 of $2,500 for a controller of the railway mail service.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman might as well discuss the salaries of the postmasters all over the country.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not think it will expedite the work to confine us in lines more strict than usual. We have here the salary of a controller of railway mail clerks, and certainly in discussing his salary and the effect of his appointment upon the general service, you must go out into the service over which he has control.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I understand the hon. gentleman wishes to allude to some dismissals of certain persons whose salaries come under some other item.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. member for Simcoe said he was going to call attention to the actions of the controller of railway mail service, and we are asked to vote the salary of a controller of railway mail service now. That is the item under discussion.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. That is all right, if the discussion only covers the acts of the railway mail clerk. But we are going outside of that, and it will come up under another item.

Mr. BENNETT. We are asked to vote $2,500 to Mr. Armstrong, and the Postmaster General to-night has said that during the past year there has been a very satisfactory state of affairs in that department under Mr. Armstrong, and that Mr. Armstrong has made many recommendations which have been satisfactory. I am going to ask the House to bear with me while we consider these appointments that have been made, and consider whether they were proper. I have said that Mr. Armstrong, on coming into office, found a gentleman named Winstanley. I find by looking up the Civil Service list that he is a gentleman about 50 years of age. This Mr. Winstanley is taken from the position which he then occupied as chief railway mail clerk, having been in charge of the Toronto division and having been thoroughly conversant with that large division, and he is relegated to the inside work of the office ; so that Mr. Armstrong is the gentleman who is responsible, according to the statement of the Postmaster General, for having placed Mr. Winstanley in retirement.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Winstanley's name does not appear on the civil service list.

Mr. BENNETT. I consulted a prior list to find his age. The Postmaster General has stated to-night that Mr. Winstanley is in the Toronto postal division at a salary of $1,500. This Mr. Armstrong, who is thoroughly conversant with the duties of his office, and who is the responsible man for making these appointments, found in the Barrie division a chief clerk who, unfortunately for himself, was a brother of mine, and who had passed the civil service examination, and was a chief railway mail clerk. Now, Mr. Armstrong, for some reason, dispossesses Mr. Winstanley, who had been in the position of a chief railway mail clerk in Toronto, so that there was a vacancy in the Toronto division for a chief railway mail clerkship. Coming down to the Ottawa division, where there was a chief railway mail clerk, he was superannuated, so then there were two vacancies.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Gordon, do you mean ?

Mr. BENNETT. I think that was his name. Now, one would suppose that Mr. Armstrong, having been appointed for a position like this, and finding two vacancies for two superintendents, would at least have said, finding in the Barrie division a Mr. Bennett, who had passed the chief railway mail clerkship examination, and who is 40 years of age, that he should be given one of these two positions, either appointed to the Ottawa division or appointed to the Toronto division.

But this prejudiced Mr. Armstrong overlooked the case of two vacancies and brought up a second-class railway mail clerk and placed him in the position of chief clerk or superintendent, as he is now called, and it was unfortunate that the chief mail clerk in Barrie, whose only offence was that he was a brother of mine, was superannuated at 40 years of age. He is now a pensioner on the public service, receiving $600 a year. I only wish to show the committee how utterly unfit for his duties Mr. Armstrong must be, because I am bound to say that not a word of complaint has been made against Mr. Bennett in the Barrie division, and I am free to mention that he passed the railway mail service examination for chief railway mail clerk, something neither of the two others have done, neither the man appointed in the Ottawa division, Mr. Plumb nor Mr. McLeod, who was appointed in Toronto. The Postmaster General has said he has had nothing to do with these appointments and the work appears to have been done by Mr. Armstrong. It is only fair to Mr. Bennett and Mr. Winstanley that the report should be placed before the House submitted by Mr. Armstrong, who had been placed over the head of these other officers.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Do I understand that a report against these officers was made by Mr. Armstrong ? The statement made by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) is an extraordinary one.

Mr. GIBSON. He makes a great many of that kind.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I meant to say that it was a statement of extraordinary action, and in this respect I agree with the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson). The statement has been made that an officer was retired at 40 years of age, that he was an officer performing his duties, that he was in good health and willing to continue to perform them, and yet on a report made by Mr. Armstrong he was retired at an expense of $600 a year, and a man not so well qualified was given the position.

Mr. BERGERON. Was that done for the sake of economy ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think Mr. McLeod, who was appointed superintendent at Toronto, has been in the service, speaking from memory, many years longer than Mr. Bennett, who was said to have been so efficient as the chief mail clerk at Barrie. With respect to Mr. Bennett I would say that the office of superintendent at Barrie was abolished. The inspectorship at Barrie was abolished, and all the staff at Barrie were relieved of their duties there. When it became necessary to deal with them, I offered Mr. Bennett the position of a first-class railway mail clerk. He accepted that position, and I gave him what I considered and what I was advised was in fact one of the best runs in the province of Ontario. In order that no injustice should be done to him, he was given a first-class mail clerkship from Toronto to Owen Sound.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman is entirely incorrect.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am entirely correct. An Order in Council was passed, with his approval, giving him the rank of a first-class railway mail clerk in connection with the Toronto division. After he had been notified of his appointment, he subsequently wrote saying he preferred to withdraw from the service and to be superannuated on the status to which he was entitled as superintendent, and he was accordingly allowed to have his own way.

Mr. INGRAM. What became of Mr. Jones ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Mr. Jones was the inspector in Barrie. I advised the abolition of the inspector there. It was a useless piece of furniture and not wanted, it was an absolute waste of money, and I abolished the office for that reason and that reason only. I told Mr. Jones that I contemplated establishing a certain branch in Ottawa in connection with the money order business, namely, a postal note system, and I told him that if he would like to be identified with the inside service and come to Ottawa, I would try to make him the head of a branch here, which would give him as good a status as he possessed formerly and it would not interfere with his salary. I offered him that position ; he took time to consider it ; he called on me and thanked me, and said that he was not in the most vigorous health and he would prefer withdrawing from the service. I gave him, as I did Mr. Bennett his option, and if he had chosen he could have had the rank in the inside service and a very desirable position in connection with the postal note system.

Mr. BERGERON. How old is he ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Speaking from memory, about 50 years.

Mr. BRITTON. That is how rumours are manufactured by such a gentleman as the hon. member for Simcoe.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman is insinuating at me because he thinks I will feel a little sore that my brother is not retained in the employment of the Government. The hon. gentleman can sympathize with him; he has been at the public crib, he has fed well, and he hopes to feed again no doubt.

Mr. BRITTON. That is one of the assertions the hon. gentleman has made so often without a contradiction being offered, that he thinks it is true. It is not true, and no one but the squirt gun of a party would all the time pour dirty water on somebody.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I rise to order.

Mr. BRITTON. If the expression is unparliamentary, I withdraw it.

Mr. BENNETT. Only a judge of grain water and bilge water would make such a statement as that. I tell the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) that I never made any reference to him until one day he took occasion to make reference to myself. I have only talked about the hon. gentleman as I have seen his name mentioned in the public print. The Kingston "Whig" booms him for a senatorship, and he has been talked about in connection with a judgeship.

Mr. BRITTON. I want to say here that nobody has ever said one word to me in regard to either of the positions about which the hon. gentleman has spoken; nor have I ever asked for them, nor am I an applicant for any position in the gift of this Government or any other.

Mr. BENNETT. Time will tell. The Postmaster General, however, has not yet satisfactorily answered the question as to whether he would bring down the report made by Mr. Armstrong condemning Mr. Winstanley and Mr. Bennett, and by reason of which two superior clerks were succeeded by two junior clerks. In regard to the statement respecting superannuation being requested by Mr. Bennett, I believe he did ask for superannuation.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. You are aware he had the option?

Mr. BENNETT. I was informed he got the option, that he could go back on the road as an ordinary first-class mail clerk. Being under Mr. McLeod, he was assigned, not as the Postmaster General has stated and as perhaps Mr. McLeod informed him, to one of the most important runs in the district, but to the most subordinate one in the whole Toronto district.

An hon. MEMBER. Where was that?

Mr. BERGERON.

Mr. BENNETT. A run somewhere in the county of Bruce, a short run.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Toronto and Owen Sound.

Mr. GIBSON. I wish to call the attention of the committee to a statement made by the hon. gentleman from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) with reference to the age of his brother. I find that in 1864 his brother was appointed to the service of the country. From 1864 to 1898—thirty-four years. Mr. John Othniel Bennett was in the service of Canada, so that he must have been appointed by the Government when he was six years of age. I leave the committee to deal with that in connection with other statements made.

Mr. BENNETT. There are times when I would not wonder at the hon. member for Lincoln seeing double, but I should not expect that to-night. The hon. gentleman has got the wrong bull by the horn, so to speak. My brother was appointed, I think, in 1879.

Mr. GIBSON. I hope the Civil Service List is correct.

Some hon. MEMBERS. You have got hold of another Bennett.

Mr. GIBSON. Perhaps this is another brother of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) that he is making complaint about.

Mr. GILLIES. It must be his grandfather.

Mr. INGRAM. In view of the statement made by the Postmaster General as to the chief inspector and the statement made by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), I cannot believe that the instructions of the Postmaster General have been carried out. Has the appointment of Mr. Armstrong been the means of reducing the inspectors in the different postal divisions, as was done in the case of Mr. Jones?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not think it is necessary to connect Mr. Armstrong with everything that has taken place in the department. The Barrie division and also the Stratford division have been abolished. There have also been two abolished in the province of Quebec, one in Three Rivers and the other at Sherbrooke.

Mr. INGRAM. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) is desirous of making the department as efficient as possible, and that is why I ask the reason for the inspectors being dispensed with in some of the divisions. In the London division, Mr. Fisher has been acting as deputy inspector for years, and is a very efficient officer. Under the late Government a gentleman was taken from another division and put over Mr. Fisher's head, and the inspector of that division was taken somewhere else. Under the present Government Mr. Hopkirk was taken from Stratford and also put over Mr.

Fisher's head. If a man acts as deputy in a certain division and gives satisfaction, surely the Government ought to encourage his promotion.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Mr. Fisher is going to be transferred to Toronto on the 1st of July.

Mr. MONTAGUE. As an inspector ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Not as inspector, but he will be transferred to the same rank in the Toronto division.

Mr. GIBSON. The hon. gentleman from Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) says I see double. I admire his modesty, because instead of seeing double, I should have seen nine times, for I see by the Civil List that there are nine Bennetts in the service. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett), who talks so much about people feeding at the public crib, if he has any complaint to make about this brother of his who gets $960 a year. I would like to know from him if this is the brother who was appointed on the 24th June, 1864, and if any of the other nine Bennetts are connected with him, or are cousins, or uncles, or any other relations ?

Mr. BENNETT. There are some people who never have relatives ; they start from a point that they can never look back, so they look sideways. I have relatives. I can, however, tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gibson) that there is no relative of mine in the civil service to-day, and there never was one except my brother who was decapitated by Mr. Armstrong. My brother was in the service long before I had anything to do with politics. And, Sir, if the reference has been made here to-night by myself, it was not made because I am smarting under any sense of the injustice that I believe has been done to him and to Mr. Winstanley, and if I have to notice the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson), as I suppose I have to, I will tell him that I have no relatives in the civil service to-day, and never had any relatives in the service except my brother. My brother got that position thanks to the kindness of Mr. Dalton McCarthy. I may tell the hon. gentleman that Mr. Bennett who was superannuated, passed all the examinations, and did his duty well. The best proof of that was that he was the only clerk in the Barrie division who passed the chief railway mail clerkship examination, which is a difficult examination. And while he was overlooked by Mr. Armstrong, I will be bound to say that neither Mr. Plumb nor the other gentleman, Mr. McLeod, passed the examination to entitle them to the position.

Mr. MONTAGUE. May I ask the Postmaster General whether he will bring down the reports with regard to these two men ? As I understand it, reports have been made by Mr. Armstrong with reference to Mr.

Bennett and Mr. Winstanley, and these reports have not been brought to the attention of Parliament.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not know what foundation the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) has for referring to such reports.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There are no reports, then ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have never heard of any except what the hon. gentleman states.

Mr. CLARKE. It would be a very great mistake, I believe, for hon. members of this House to blame Mr. Armstrong for the decapitation of these officials. I do not think Mr. Armstrong had anything to do with it or was responsible for it.

Mr. BENNETT. The Postmaster General said that Mr. Armstrong made the commendation.

Mr. CLARKE. I have known Mr. Armstrong for twenty or twenty-five years, and it is my pleasing duty to bear testimony to the efficiency of that gentleman, and I think no better appointment could be made to the position of controller of the railway mail service than the same Mr. B. M. Armstrong. I am satisfied that Mr. Armstrong will do his duty in that position in a straightforward manner, if he is not interfered with. I felt it my duty to rise and make this statement with reference to Mr. Armstrong. On the whole, when the Barrie division, for economic reasons, was abolished, it would have been better if some consideration had been given to gentlemen who occupied positions such as the brother of my hon. friend (Mr. Bennett). Any person who knew that officer knew that he was thoroughly efficient. I desire to give the Postmaster General credit for everything he is trying to do, but I believe that he might have strained a point, when there was a vacancy made in Ottawa and Toronto, to have looked more carefully into the claims as well as the capabilities of Mr. Bennett, and to have given him one of the vacancies thus created. So far as Mr. Armstrong is concerned, I believe that there is no more efficient officer in the postal service of the Dominion, and I am satisfied that if he is not hampered by political instructions he will do his duty fearlessly and faithfully.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not wish any hon. gentleman to suppose that Mr. Armstrong is responsible. I take the fullest responsibility for every change in the service, although it is my duty, of course, to be guided by advice. As my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Clarke) has stated, Mr. Armstrong is a most zealous and efficient officer, and it would be entirely erroneous to suppose that he has made any unfavourable report upon Mr. Bennett. I instructed Mr. Armstrong to recommend to me a superintendent for each division, and when it came to Ottawa, I naturally expected to give the appointment to a member of the railway service connected with the Ottawa division. I found that the provinces had been divided into divisions, and railway mail clerks had been assigned to divisions. They were supposed to be local in their appointments, and it did not appear to me that it would be fair to take a man out of one division and appoint him over the heads of all the railway mail clerks in the other division. So that when it became necessary to select a man from Ottawa, I instructed Mr. Armstrong to give me the best man he could select from Ottawa. He selected Mr. Plumb. There were some objections to Mr. Plumb, which some persons might have thought serious, and I would have been fully warranted had I thought it necessary to pass him over. But I was satisfied that these objections were not really valid, and I ignored them. With regard to Toronto, it was an independent division; and therefore I did not contemplate appointing over all the mail clerks of the Toronto division, an officer not connected with that division. I am sure that my hon. friend who represents West Toronto would have been hard to satisfy if I had transferred to the Toronto division an officer who was not connected with that division. I had to deal with the existing officials. With regard to Mr. Bennett, I can only say, whether the hon. member (Mr. Bennett) gives me credit for it or not, that I studied his interest in every way. The office had to be abolished, and I tried to put him in a position where he would earn as much money as he had earned in the former position. I gave him the position of first-class mail clerk at $960 a year, and he had a run from Toronto which was desirable both socially and financially. That I had done by Order in Council; but before it took effect, he asked me for a little time for consideration, and subsequently asked to be retired, and I accepted his views. I submit whether I could have done anything fairer to any man in the service.

Mr. HUGHES. I do not know anything about Mr. Armstrong, but I think the Postmaster General was perfectly justified in abolishing both the Barrie and the Stratford divisions. To my mind they should not have existed. But after the Barrie division was abolished, it became part of the Toronto division, and I think the Postmaster General made a mistake in not giving Mr. Bennett the corresponding position in the new division. He was in the amalgamated division, and he had just as much right in the city of Toronto as any chief mail clerk there. It would be just as proper to say that we who live in the Barrie division should have a clerk from Toronto put over. I think if the Postmaster General had been well advised, he would have retained Mr.

Mr. MULOCK.

Bennett, who was undoubtedly a most capable officer, and would not have put a junior like Mr. McLeod, who had not passed his examination at all, over Mr. Bennett. We used to find very serious complaints of the Toronto division. We were told that we had the patronage of the Barrie division, but we had not a single mail clerk appointment there. All the runs were made from the Toronto division, and when a mail clerk was to be appointed to the Barrie division, we were told the patronage belonged to Toronto. I think that the Postmaster General will consider that he made a serious mistake in regard to Mr. Bennett. Undoubtedly he should have been a chief mail clerk in the amalgamated division.

Mr. HENDERSON. I would like to ask the Postmaster General when the Barrie division was abolished, which division was it attached to? Did it not become merged in the Toronto division? If so, it seems to me that there would have been nothing wrong whatever in taking a man from Barrie and placing him in a position at Toronto. He would have been still in his division, and the argument that it would be taking him from one division and putting him in another does not hold good.

Mr. GILLIES. I cannot understand on what principle the Postmaster General acted in this case. When the Barrie division was abolished, it was not abolished in the technical sense of the word. A line of demarcation between that and some other division was simply wiped out, and instead of having the Barrie and Toronto divisions, we had the Toronto division as it is now. When that state of affairs arose, there was a chief postal clerk required for that division. Why, then, did not the Postmaster General, on the ordinary principle that guides in such matters, have reference to his list of clerks and see who among them was the most prominent, and who by virtue of his qualifications was the most competent; and the only standard by which he could judge the qualifications was that of examination. Now, it appears that Mr. Bennett was a chief mail clerk in that division, because the very moment the line was blotted out between Barrie and Toronto, he became a chief mail clerk in the new division. He was as much a clerk in the new division as the clerks who were in it before the abolition of the Barrie division. If that be the case, if Mr. Bennett was as much entitled to be appointed in the new division as any other clerk within its territorial boundaries, why did he not receive the appointment? He was entitled to it, by virtue of service, by virtue of his examination, his qualification and his position as chief mail clerk of the old division. Then I ask the Postmaster General under what rule, and guided by what principle, did he call upon Mr. McLeod, who has no qualifications whatever, so far as the standard of examination goes, and appoint him to this position, overlooking the claims of Mr. Bennett and Mr. Winstanley, for the argument that applies to Mr. Bennett applies equally strongly to Mr. Winstanley. The Postmaster General must explain under what principle he acted when he overlooked the case of Mr. Bennett in the first instance, and is certainly bound to explain how he came to overlook the case of Mr. Winstanley.

Mr. CLARKE. The Postmaster General found some fault with my remarks respecting the advisability of recognizing Mr. Bennett's services and qualifications. He said that as long as there were qualified officials in the Toronto division, it would not be proper to bring Mr. Bennett down and give him a position there as chief clerk. But that did not apply when a vacancy occurred in the office of post office inspector, although there were officials in that division just as responsible and with as long a record as the gentleman whom he appointed. He went outside that division to appoint an inspector in the place of Mr. Barker, who was superannuated, and I think he made an argument against himself when he did not promote some of the officers of the Toronto division to the vacancy in the inspectorship of that division.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Mr. Spry was inspector at London. He died, and at the same time we were abolishing the Barrie division. Mr. Henderson had been assistant inspector at Barrie, and Mr. Bennett was chief mail clerk, and Mr. Jones was inspector at Barrie. I tried to find positions for those three men, and offered Mr. Jones a position in the inside service here. I asked him if that would not suit him, whether there was anything else in the service that would. So much for Mr. Jones. Mr. Bennett I transferred to Toronto. Mr. Henderson had been in the Toronto office for years in connection with the inspectorship of that division, and he had also been for years in Barrie in connection with the Barrie inspector's office. It occurred to me, therefore, that when we were doing away with the Barrie division and putting a portion of that division into Toronto, it would be a good thing to get in command of that whole division an officer who was familiar personally with both divisions that were being amalgamated or the portions that were being amalgamated. Mr. Barker had been inspector at London for many years. He had been seventeen years in that division, and when a vacancy occurred I gave him the position of inspector in it, which he was well qualified to fill. That was my arrangement and I think it was a business one.

Mr. CLARKE. We are quite willing to give the Postmaster General credit for all that he has done or is trying to do, but we would like the hon. gentleman to be perfectly frank in the explanations he makes with regard to these transfers and promotions. He has told us that he appointed a gentleman who had the position of assistant inspector in the Barrie division to be the inspector in the Toronto division, the most important one in the Canadian postal service; and in order to give him that appointment, he had to remove Mr. Barker, who was a most efficient inspector, back again to the position he occupied many years ago, as inspector of a division not so important as Toronto. Mr. Barker had no superior in the Canadian postal service, and it was a peculiar way of recognizing his services, to put him back again into the position he occupied for many years and appoint a gentleman, who was only assistant inspector at Barrie, to the important office of inspector at Toronto. The reasons which prompted the Postmaster General to appoint an assistant inspector to be the chief officer of the division of Toronto did not seem to apply when the case of Mr. Bennett was being considered.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Mr. Barker is out of the service, and therefore I do not wish to make any reference to him other than to say that I think that I have had a much better opportunity of knowing his fitness than those who have not been brought into daily contact with him. I say that Mr. Barker was not, in my opinion, entitled to the status in the profession given him by the hon. member for West Toronto. He is out of the service and I shall not say more.

Mr. MONTAGUE. When did you remove him to London?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. About September last.

Mr. SPROULE. I thought the hon. Minister said last year that the changes which he made then in his department were made in the view of economy, and that there was an efficient service and that when taking charge of that branch, he found that the various places were more than filled with employees, and therefore he could dispense with the service of some of them without destroying its efficiency. How is it that he has 195 employees on the list this year as against 193 last year?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman will observe that in that increase there are certain officers who were never there before. Take the controller, and if the controller has several members on his staff, they are included in the inside service and were not there before. I think there are perhaps three or four—Controller Mr. Jones and two or three more not in there before—that have been brought from the outside to the inside service. There is also Mr. Minguay, a draughtsman, taken from the outside to the inside, and one or two others from the outside to the inside, where vacancies occurred. I had two courses open to me. One was to wait until a vacancy occurred and then to transfer superfluous men from the outside to inside. Or I could have dealt with the inside service direct and at once recommended dismissal. I chose to await the ordinary course of events. As vacancies occurred in the inside service in the ordinary course of events, I transferred from the outside officers that were unnecessary, and quite a number have been added to the inside service in that way, far more than the number my hon. friend refers to.

Mr. SPROULE. I thought the hon. gentleman referred to the fact that there were too many in the inside service. So I would have supposed when a vacancy occurred he would have abolished the office instead of bringing in new appointees.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) does not understand that the service is a growing service, and if we have been keeping the number of inside employees stationary, whilst our revenue and the volume of our business are increasing, we are practically reducing the staff, because we are doing more business with the same numbers.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood the Postmaster General to say that there were only two ways to reduce the service; one was by dismissal and the other by waiting until a death or some other cause removed those holding office. I would have supposed that he would take advantage of this latter measure to make reductions. But he tells us that, instead of abolishing offices, he brought in men from the outside service. The service may be developing, and thus require an additional number. I have not the facts and am not prepared to discuss how far that would apply. I would ask him if, in making appointments in his department, he has had in view the qualification of the individual and his familiarity with the work to be done?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Would the hon. gentleman name the officers he refers to?

Mr. SPROULE. I was referring to the appointments of the inside service generally.

Mr. INGRAM. I am astonished at this interposition, breaking a line of discussion that we were carrying on.

Mr. SPROULE. I thought it was ended. I would like an answer to the questions I have just asked.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. In making promotions I have had regard to the efficiency of the service. New appointments have been so trifling that they are scarcely worth referring to, as we have generally transferred men from the outside to the inside service. My hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) does not object to that, I presume. I recall only two or three new appointments. One young man was appointed in connection with the distribution of postage stamps. The counting of postage stamps does not require previous training or more than an elementary education. I think we had one minor clerk appointed to assist in the savings branch bank, and another one appointed to do clerical work also in the savings bank branch.

Mr. SPROULE. The answer of the hon. gentleman is pretty much in the line of what he said some time ago. In view of that, I would like to ask where his deputy became familiar with the work he was expected to do and what his qualifications were. If I recollect correctly, he was a medical man practising in Aurora, and not acquainted with the postal service or the work of a deputy Postmaster General.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I suppose the hon. gentleman, being a medical man, does not think that a medical man is per se disqualified from filling any other position.

Mr. SPROULE. No.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I selected the deputy because I considered him eminently qualified to discharge the duties of the office. The worst class of men that I know of to deal with are those who have been in the rut of the service for years. I tell the hon. gentleman frankly that when I took charge of the department, I was quite of the opinion at first that I could carry it on with my then deputy. But as my familiarity with the details of the department increased I came to the conclusion that the long service of fifty years made it impossible for a man to get out of the rut and for that reason and for that reason only I came to the conclusion that it was advisable to make a change.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Is that the reason the Postmaster General retained him as adviser?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Did I say so? If the hon. members (Mr. Montague) will make a statement I will try to answer it.

Mr. GILLIES. Was he retained?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Colonel White was not retained as adviser. If the hon. gentleman desires it, I will tell him my feelings towards Colonel White. When I came to the conclusion, after the best part of a year in the department, that it was necessary to introduce more vigorous management, I first made my views known to the deputy, Colonel White. I told him my reasons, and he with a frankness and fairness, for which I was grateful, acceded to my view, and, in the most friendly and fair way said he thought my attitude was quite reasonable, that he would take no exception to it whatever, and would not in the slightest way embarrass me in making the change. That was most gratifying to me because I thought it would be a wrench to a man who had been fifty years in the public service to be taken from a field of activity and to retire into private life.

For that reason, I desired to recognize his conduct, and was about establishing under the Act of last session, a system of promotion examinations in the railway mail service. Col. White knew nothing whatever of that service, as it had not been in existence, but it was not a very difficult thing to learn, and I said to him that if he did not care to break off his connection with the work so abruptly, but would take charge of some of these examinations, and if he would study the system of examinations, I would be very glad if he would take charge of them. It is one thing for a man to be at the head of a large department with a mass of details such as the Post Office Department, and another thing merely to conduct, as presiding examiner, examinations in given points in the country. He was pleased to take the position, and I sent him through Canada to give a preliminary examinations to all the mail clerks, so that when ultimately they went up for examination, as they are now doing for promotion, they would not be taken by surprise, and make mistakes and be disappointed. Whether he may be continued in that office I do not know. Whilst I am desirous of befriending him, if the committee does not desire it, or if there is any undue criticism, I may have to take a different course.

Mr. SPROULE. Nothing I said could be construed into an unfavourable criticism of the Minister's action in superannuating Col. White. The Minister informed us that it was very difficult to run his department on account of the deputy being so long there that he could not get him out of the old rut. Now, with regard to the qualification of the party who has taken his place, I am not aware that it would be possible for the present deputy to have the qualifications which are required in that position. If I am correctly informed, he never had anything to do with the postal service of the country.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I should be very sorry to have any one that had been connected with that service.

Mr. SPROULE. Then, the hon. gentleman has a very strange view of the qualifications for that position, if the less a man knows about it the more valuable he is.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. There was not a man I knew in the service fit for it.

Mr. SPROULE. Then, how do we account for the fact that the Postmaster General made such a serious blunder as to reduce the postage, and afterwards admit that he knew so little about the laws governing the service that he was obliged to withdraw his regulation?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Where do you say I admitted that?

Mr. SPROULE. I think I read in one of the Toronto dailies that he admitted he was not aware at the time that he made the reduction that the laws governing postal union were such that the reduction could not be made. Had he had an intelligent deputy there like Col. White, he would not have made that unfortunate mistake.

Mr. INGRAM. Shortly after the hon. gentleman was appointed to the position of Postmaster General, I asked him if he intended to superannuate Col. White, and his reply was something like this. I have no idea of superannuating Col. White. I find him a good and efficient officer and have no idea of making any such change. Shortly afterwards the hon. gentleman did superannuate Col. White and made another appointment.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Will the hon. gentleman say how long afterwards?

Mr. INGRAM. I suppose about nine months or a year afterwards; so I do not understand now how that statement could be consistent with the statement he has made to-night. Now, there is another point with regard to Mr. Barker. The hon. gentleman stated here to-night that Mr. Barker was not an officer so efficient that he cared to continue him in the service.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I did not say that.

Mr. INGRAM. It was equivalent to that. The statement was to the effect that Mr. Barker was not competent for the position.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. My hon. friend must not distort what I said. When the hon. member for West Toronto described Mr. Barker as the best qualified inspector in the province of Ontario, I took exception to that relative certificate.

Mr. INGRAM. I understood from the hon. gentleman's statement that Mr. Barker was not sufficiently competent to meet the requirements of the Toronto division.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I said it was in the public interest that Mr. Barker should be transferred to the city of London, where he had had seventeen years' experience, and fill the vacancy by Mr. Henderson, who had been in the Toronto division, and was familiar with that and with the Barrie division, which were to be largely amalgamated.

Mr. INGRAM. I am surprised at the hon. gentleman making a statement of that kind. Mr. Barker filled the position of inspector in Kingston division years ago, and he was sent from there to London and afterwards transferred to the Toronto division. In all these divisions, I understand, he has given entire satisfaction. The hon. gentleman has stated before this evening that in the Stratford and Barrie divisions he reduced the inspectors by two; he placed the Barrie division into the Toronto, and the Stratford division into the London. Does not the hon. gentleman think the London division is of as much importance as the Toronto division? Surely it requires just as competent a man in the Toronto as in the London division. In view of the long service of Mr. Barker, who was certainly entitled to promotion, if he is not competent to fill this position as inspector in one division, he had no right to be retained in the service; but being competent to fill the position of inspector in one division, it is unfair to Mr. Barker to promote Mr. Henderson out of his class, and to give him the preference over other inspectors who are better entitled to that position. I found fault with the last Government for changing the inspectors, not in the interest of the service, but, as I am inclined to think sometimes, for political purposes. I am sorry that such changes are made for political purposes, and that they should be made in a department like the post office, which should be conducted on purely business lines. There were six divisions, and I take it that every inspector has certain instructions to carry out in the administration of his position. The controller must have some instructions, and I should like to know the instructions given to the inspectors, whether they have any control over the mail clerks in the different postal divisions, and if they have received instructions similar to those of the controller. Has he entire control over the mail clerks or has the inspector control in so far as making a recommendation or removing those clerks.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. They are under the control of the controller and are attached to the controller's branch. They report in the first place to the superintendent and he afterwards reports to the controller. The inspectors have no control over the mail clerks.

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. gentleman has claimed a decrease of 36 clerks. Are they employed in any way by the department?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No; they are outside the service.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I am not satisfied with the explanation given with respect to the salary given to Mr. Armstrong. He was promoted to the position of chief clerk only in 1897, and receives $2,500 a year. There are a great many chief clerks who perform more responsible duties who receive much less. In the Militia Department, Mr. O'Meara, who has been in the service since 1861—

Mr. WALLACE. He has been superannuated.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The highest salary he received was $2,400. Benjamin Sulte receives $2,050; he entered the service in 1867, and was promoted to be chief clerk in 1889. In the Geological Department there is Dr. Hoffman, who receives $2,400; he occupies the important position of assistant director of chemistry and mineralogy. John Macoun, assistant director, receives only $2,200, and of course his services are very much more important than those rendered by Mr. Armstrong. There is a chief clerk in the office of the Controller of the North-west Mounted Police who receives only $2,000; he entered the service in 1875 and was promoted in 1892. In the Auditor General's office there is Edward Sutherland receiving $2,150; he entered the service in 1875 and was promoted in 1890. John Gorman receives $2,100, and he entered the service in 1880. Mr. Fred Hayter also receives $2,100. In the Finance Department, C. J. Henderson, chief clerk in savings bank branch, receives only $2,400; he has been in the service since 1858 and was promoted to be a first-class clerk in 1874. M. J. Dickenson is chief clerk in the Dominion Savings Bank and receives $2,400; he has been in the service since 1874, and was promoted to a chief clerkship in 1886. I might go through the whole civil service list and would find in each department a chief clerk who has been in the service a great many years, who fills a more responsible position than does Mr. Armstrong, and who is receiving a less salary. On what principle or by what rule did the Postmaster General act when he placed Mr. Armstrong's salary at $2,500?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. A year ago I gave the explanation. If the hon. gentleman thinks the other officers are not sufficiently paid, he can bring in an amendment to the Act, and Parliament will consider the proposition.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I want to know on what rule Mr. Armstrong's salary is fixed at $2,500?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Under the statute of last session.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The statute is no reason for it.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. We consider it a reason.

Mr. GILLIES. I should like to obtain from the Minister an answer to the question I put to him a short time ago, and which must have escaped his notice. It is a reasonable question and I will repeat it. I wish to know on what principle the Postmaster General acted when the new division, which is called the Toronto division, was created and Barrie division was eliminated from the territorial division. At that time there were two chief clerks eligible for the position of chief clerk of the new division, Mr. Bennett, chief clerk of the Barrie division, and Mr. Winstanley, chief clerk in the old Toronto division. Upon which principle did the Postmaster General act when he overlooked those two gentlemen, who are competent in every respect and hold first-class certificates of qualification, and who have also been a long time in the service. I want to know why he overlooked Mr. Winstanley and Mr. Bennett, chief clerks, who held certificates and appointed Mr. McLeod, who held no certificate and who was a grade in rank below either of these gentlemen?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gillies) is helping his cause by pressing that question.

Mr. GILLIES. I want to know.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not think the hon. gentleman ought to press the question. One of these officers is one of his own friends, and he had better not press the question. I think if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gillies) will consult some other members he will not force me to answer and I think the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) will agree with me. As regards Mr. Bennett I have given my explanation.

Mr. GILLIES. I know nothing of the private character of any of these gentlemen, but as the matter has come before me tonight it seems a most extraordinary proceeding on the part of a chief executive officer such as the Postmaster General, that he should pass over two men long in the service and admittedly competent and qualified, and foist another officer over their heads who was of lower rank. I want to know on what principle the Postmaster General acted? The hon. gentleman seems to make an insinuation and he tells me that I had better not press the question. If there is any private reason, it will be within my discretion whether I should press the question or not, but if there is no private reason, then we should know on what principles the hon. gentleman acted.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. So far as I know both of these gentlemen are very honourable and upright men. I know nothing of their moral character and I think in that respect they are all that could be desired. I have given the reasons why Mr. Bennett was not appointed—

Mr. GILLIES. What about Mr. Winstanley?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gillies) will consult his own friends and he then desires that question answered I will answer it. He had better inform himself before he presses the question.

Mr. BENNETT. A year ago when the question came up as to the appointment of Mr. Armstrong, the Postmaster General said:

My desire is to make promotions in the mail service the reward of merit, and I instructed the chief inspector and controller to select the most efficient men in the districts as local superintendents.

To-night the Postmaster General made the statement that these local superintendents had been chosen by the chief inspector, Mr. Armstrong, but later on the Postmaster General changed his ground and he entirely absolves Mr. Armstrong from having had any thing to do with the appointments, and he takes upon himself the sole responsibility. I think I am correct in assuming that from the tenor of his remarks—

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. You are correct in assuming that I take the responsibility, but you are not correct in assuming that I changed my ground as to having acted on advice. I am entitled to the best advice of the officers under me, and I acted on their advice. I say I acted on their advice and take the responsibility of what I have done.

Mr. BENNETT. I am absolutely at a loss to understand whether Mr. Armstrong was the gentleman who is to assume the responsibility for the passing over of Mr. Winstanley and Mr. Bennett, or whether the Postmaster General himself is?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I take the responsibility of passing them over.

Mr. BENNETT. Then, Mr. Armstrong is absolved from any fault in that regard. I am pleased that the Postmaster General has taken that ground, for the reason that I believe Mr. Armstrong, Mr. Winstanley, and Mr. Bennett were all personal friends, and I know that both Mr. Winstanley and Mr. Bennett will be pleased to know that no comment or ill remark has been made against them by Mr. Armstrong, as I believe none was made by Mr. Armstrong. But it comes to this, that the Postmaster General utterly regardless of merit and knowing that Mr. Bennett and Winstanley had passed the high examination required for chief clerks appointed two subordinate officers.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. They are not to be compared in merit with Mr. McLeod, neither your brother nor the other.

Mr. BENNETT. I challenge the Postmaster General to lay on the Table any report of Mr. Armstrong to that effect. I take it that that is his own judgment and his alone, and I tell the Postmaster General with all due deference to his exalted rank and great attainments, that he knows nothing whatever of the comparative merits of Winstanley, Bennett, McLeod or Plumb. I defy the Postmaster General to show by the records of his department any case in which it was shown that there was on the part of Bennett any deficiency in the knowledge of his office. I know that personally from Mr. Spry, who was a first-class superintendent, and I know from Mr. Jones that in the Barrie Division there was no possible friction and that the post office clerks had never been in better conduct there than during the time Mr. Bennett was the chief clerk. The Postmaster General has made a bold statement and I can tell him that McLeod was placed over Bennett not on the ground of merit but for this reason: that the Postmaster General, smarting under the reverse which he had met with in the constituency of East Simcoe, where he came and fought a battle against me, as the Minister in charge of the district in which that riding was situated, thought he would have to revenge himself on some person, and he did revenge himself by dispossessing my brother of the position he held. I have only this to say, that if politics has no other or higher aim for the hon. gentleman than to vent his spleen and his vindictiveness, as he did in this case, then politics has no high or ennobling aims to which any man may hope to attain.

Mr. MONTAGUE. In view of the statement of the Postmaster General, that he has had no report as regards these officers or their efficiency. I think he ought to explain to us how he comes to know their relative efficiency.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not know how many times I have answered it. I am prepared, however, to continue it. I myself exercised no judgment whatever in the selection of a single superintendent, with the exception of having dealt with certain objections which were brought to me against the appointment of Mr. Plumb. When the controller was instructed to appoint the superintendents, he recommended them and I acted on his judgment.

Mr. GILLIES. The statement which the hon. gentleman has just made differs from the statement he made a moment ago. He said: "Neither Mr. Winstanley nor your brother (addressing the hon. member for East Simcoe) was to be compared in merit with Mr. McLeod." If there was no report adverse to any of these gentlemen by any of his officers, how is it that this statement was made by the hon. gentleman?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Mr. Armstrong simply furnished me with a list of the superintendents. I had no knowledge of them at the time. I acted on his judgment, but I am not incapable of knowing something. I had no personal knowledge of Mr. Bennett's qualifications; but I had occasion to inform myself, and I may say that though his status has been referred to here as a very high one, it is said in the department that he did get his promotion with undue haste, and in a way which created a good deal of dissatisfaction. Mr. McLeod, I think, was Mr. Bennett's superior in point of time.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Not in qualification.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think he is. I think there is no superior to Mr.

Mr. BENNETT.

McLeod as a superintendent in the service. I have had an opportunity of knowing the way in which he has discharged his duties, and he has done so in a way that is eminently satisfactory to the service. A more efficient officer than Mr. McLeod could not be procured. Not a man here knows anything about the relative merits of Mr. McLeod and Mr. Bennett. I take my statement from Mr. Armstrong, who selected him.

Mr. MONTAGUE. You have said that Mr. Armstrong made no report.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Mr. Armstrong made no report. He selected the men, and I have no reason to believe that he made a mistake. Watching the mail service from that time to this, I am entirely satisfied with the way these men have managed it. I have made it my business when in Toronto to call at the office of the superintendent to see the manner in which they perform their work. Not that I am competent to judge; but I have always found them engaged in their work, and I have received the most satisfactory accounts of the way they are discharging their duties. They are loyal, enthusiastic and industrious to a degree, and I think no Government could have more satisfaction with the service rendered as a rule by the railway mail service.

Mr. SPROULE. May I ask the hon. Postmaster General if he regarded that provision in the Civil Service Act which requires that before any promotion is made the individual must first pass the promotion examination; and if he did not regard the passing of that examination as an evidence of qualification for the position as against one who did not pass it or could not pass it?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Some hon. gentleman has stated that Mr. McLeod did not pass the examination. I think the hon. gentleman is quite in error. Mr. McLeod was reported to Council, recommended with others, and I do not think he could have got his promotion without having passed the examination. The routine, as the hon. member for Haldimand knows, is to send the question to the Treasury Board, where all conditions precedent are looked into, their report is made to Council, and finally an Order in Council is passed.

Mr. HUGHES. Inasmuch as the fitness of Mr. Bennett has been called in question, I would like to state that I knew Mr. Spry, who was post office inspector in Toronto, then in Barrie, and then in London, and though he was not of the same political faith as Mr. Bennett, he stated that he had found no more efficient officer than Mr. Bennett in the whole course of his service. I also know Mr. Henderson, the present assistant inspector at Toronto, formerly the assistant inspector of Barrie, and, though he is not of the same political faith, he also testified to Mr. Bennett's efficiency in the service. While Mr. Jones is of the same political faith as Mr. Bennett, yet he had the same sentiment as the others in regard to Mr. Bennett. The only mistake the Postmaster General made in abolishing the Barrie division was in his treatment of Mr. Bennett. I think it would have reflected more credit on himself if he had treated Mr. Bennett in such a way as not to leave himself open to the charge of personal feeling after the exciting time we had in that district in a couple of elections a few years ago. He would have shown better grace if he had allowed Mr. Bennett to be the chief clerk of the amalgamated division. I would like to ask what time Mr. Winstanley was retired and what time Mr. Bennett was retired, and what time the amalgamation took place between the two divisions? Was Mr. Winstanley retired at the same time as Mr. Bennett, and was that the time the amalgamation of the old Barrie division and the old Toronto division took place?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Mr. Winstanley is still in the service.

Mr. HUGHES. Then when was he changed to the inner office?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. In the case of the Barrie division, the report to Council was made in July or August, and Mr. Bennett's superannuation took effect probably the 1st of September.

Mr. HUGHES. When was Mr. McLeod appointed?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think he was appointed in the spring.

Mr. HUGHES. Previous to this?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Yes, some time before—perhaps the 1st of March.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. Postmaster General, feeling the awkwardness of his position, as shown by the warmth with which he rose to speak on one or two occasions, insinuated then this much-talked of Mr. Bennett had, by some unfair means, arrived at the position of chief clerk. Am I right in this?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I did not say unfair or suggest unfairness. If I have anything to say of that nature I will say it in unmistakable language. What I said was that the brother of the hon. member for East Simcoe had succeeded in obtaining promotion in a way that some members of the staff considered as the result of a disregard perhaps of their prior interests. Mr. Bennett was rapidly promoted, and his predecessor in Barrie, a Mr. McCarthy, was superannuated and had arrived at a good old age. I am not going to say that he was superannuated unfairly, but he himself contended that he was.

Mr. HUGHES. On Mr. Spry's recommendation.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. That may be. I have not studied the details, but Mr. McCarthy was in vigorous health when he retired, and complained of his retirement as unnecessary because he was still able to discharge his duties. He contended that he was retired, not in the public interest, but in order to make a vacancy for Mr. Bennett, and that Mr. Bennett's promotion was rather rapid compared with those of other mail clerks. That is the case I make.

Mr. BENNETT. I have only this to say in reply.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Oh, but that has nothing to do with this.

Mr. BENNETT. Why then did the Postmaster General drag it in?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Simply because when the hon. gentleman is contending that his brother ought to be recognized and be still passed over men who are his seniors in the service, I cannot but remember that he, in his turn, did succeed in passing over men who were prior to him in order of time.

Mr. BENNETT. Now, the hon. Postmaster General will have to back down again. He says that this Mr. Bennett was advanced unfairly.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I did not say unfairly.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, unduly and too rapidly. Then it must mean this, that in the Barrie postal division, there were clerks who were senior to Mr. Bennett. Now, in the Barrie division at the time of the retirement of Mr. McCarthy—who was retired on the report of Mr. Spry, the inspector, also a Liberal as Mr. McCarthy was—this Mr. Bennett was the only clerk who had passed the examination which would qualify him for that position.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. You say he was retired because he was a Liberal.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman's understanding is at fault. I did not say that at all. I said that Mr. McCarthy was a Liberal and retired on the report of Mr. Spry, who is also a Liberal, so that this Mr. Bennett was the senior clerk in the division and entitled to the promotion, and, as the Postmaster General said, Mr. McCarthy was a very old man. If the Postmaster General thinks that he should not have been retired, why did he not reinstate him? If Mr. McCarthy suffered such injustice at the hands of the hon. gentleman's predecessors, why did not the hon. gentleman remedy that injustice? The Postmaster General is in the judgment of the House, and I think the judgment of the House is this, that the appointments were made not on the ground of merit, but first and foremost to gratify the vindictive spleen which the hon. gentleman was suffering under at that time—smarting as he was, under the reverse he had sustained in East Simcoe; and this Mr. Bennett was not the only object of the hon. gentleman's spleen, because other persons, one man in particular, suffered in East Simcoe by reason of the wrath of this vindictive Postmaster General. In the next place, the appointments were made on a political basis and on that basis alone, and I can tell the hon. gentleman frankly that his conduct in that regard has not made for himself, even among strong Liberals in Barrie, any more admirers than he ever had, and it is doubtful if ever he had any.

Mr. McMULLEN. You are putting in a last spoke for your brother.

Mr. BENNETT. No, I am not; and I can tell the hon. member for North Wellington this, that any relative of mine in the civil service had not to be relegated to a penitentiary position, but had the intellect and the brains to fit him for a better one. I do not know how menial and how contemptible may be the position in the penitentiary, but most men of ambition and brains want to go into a little higher groove than that. Let us come to this clerk, Mr. Smith, who is promoted or rather is getting the statutory increase, did he get it last year, may I ask the hon. Minister?

Mr. McMULLEN. I would say in reply to my hon. friend that he is evidently spending his spleen to-night on the Postmaster General, because in the readjustment of the postal service, his brother has not been recognized and promoted. I can only say this, that if his brother renders no better service to his country than the hon. gentleman opposite does, it is time he was retired. The hon. gentleman has virtually constituted himself the gutter snipe of that side of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am quite in order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. What is the point of order?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Chairman is not deaf and has heard the point of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman himself is certainly not in order in thus addressing the Chair.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. member for North Wellington referred to the hon. member for East Simcoe as a "gutter snipe." It is a very gentlemanly term, but I submit that gentlemanly as it may be, it is not in order in this House.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I am glad that some members are asking me to decide a point of order. I tried some time ago to keep the discussion within the limits of order, but I was not obeyed.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is not the point, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I find that the expression used by the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) is not out of order.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Well, Mr. Chairman, it is in order, then, for one member of this House to call another hon. member in debate a gutter-snipe, and I desire to have that plainly stated by the Chair; and having it so decided, I want to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), who is the senior Minister present, what he thinks of it?

Mr. McMULLEN. As to the remarks I made in answer to the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), I think he was justly deserving of it from me. However, I had no desire to say anything unparliamentary. I believe he has constituted himself that in a political sense. However, I am not disposed to press it further. I apologize to the committee if I am at all out of order in making the reference, and I am quite willing to withdraw it.

Mr. HUGHES. The Chairman has ruled that the expression is perfectly in order. Unless that ruling is retracted by the Chair we will have the Speaker in here and have the matter settled.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. member for North Wellington having withdrawn the word—

Mr. MONTAGUE. No, it has been upheld by the Chair.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The ruling of the Chair, as I understand it, was not that an hon. gentleman might be called a gutter-snipe, but that the form of words used by the hon. member for North Wellington admitted of debate. As he has withdrawn it, I think we should accept and—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. All right.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think the Minister of Finance is asking us to be a little too generous. Undoubtedly the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) used the offensive term quoted by the Minister of Finance and applied it directly to the hon. member for East Simcoe. I raised the point of order and the Chairman ruled that term gutter-snipe might be applied by a member of this House to another member directly and unequivocally, and it was ruled that this was quite in order. I must say that, so far as I am concerned, and so far as the members on this side are concerned, while we would desire to bow as respectfully as we possibly can to the decision of the Chair, whether the Chair be occupied by the Speaker or the Deputy Speaker, we cannot, having regard to our own feelings, having regard to the dignity of Parliament and the decisions that have been given from the Chair in the past, we cannot submit to that ruling.

Mr. SPROULE. I wish to refer to the rule which is so plain that I do not see how it can be misunderstood :

No member shall speak disrespectfully of Her Majesty the Queen or of any or the Royal Family,——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. SPROULE. Now, will hon. gentlemen wait a little before they get their laugh in. I am quoting the rule that must govern debate, so far as this point is concerned :

—nor the Governor General administering the Government of Canada, nor shall he use offensive words against either House or any members thereof.

Now the question is : Was the word used by the hon. member for North Wellington an offensive word against a member of this House ? If so, the expression clearly comes within the rule. And I think we have a right to question the ruling of the Chair if he rules that it is not offensive and its use is not a violation of the rules or amenities of debate.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have no doubt that the term as we understand it in English is not regarded as complimentary. Of course, my hon. friend from North Wellington, if I remember the phrase correctly, said the hon. member for East Simcoe was constituting himself——

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think that is what he said. But even with the qualification I have mentioned, the word would be considered the reverse of complimentary. We whose native language is English no doubt are more familiar with this form of expression than Mr. Deputy Speaker is. Perhaps he would accept the view we would take of it. For my part, I hope that it would not be regarded as a parliamentary term and I think it would be better if the Chairman took that view of it, seeing that peace has been restored.

Mr. HUGHES. But it has already been ruled.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. But if Mr. Deputy Speaker were informed that in the English language the term is not considered complimentary I think he would——

Mr. WALLACE. Is it considered complimentary in the French language ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I suppose it is not known in the French language at all. The French polish and politeness would exclude it from the vocabulary.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not know if I understood the hon. member for North Wellington aright, but I understood him to say that the hon. member for East Simcoe was constituting himself in such a way.

Mr. WALLACE. No, no.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. That is what I understood. We shall see by the "Hansard" later on what the form of expression was. So long as the language has been used in the way I understood I think it is not unparliamentary. The expression may not be polite, but it is not unparliamentary. Being called upon to decide whether it was in order, I decide that it was in order, because the way it was used was parliamentary.

Mr. SPROULE. Would you regard it as an offensive word ?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. If it were applied to an hon. gentleman himself, I think it would be impolite and, perhaps, unparliamentary, but not in the way in which it was used.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood the hon. member for North Wellington to say that the hon. member for East Simcoe had constituted himself the gutter-snipe of this House. I think those were the exact words. Under the rule I have quoted, and, taking the word in its common acceptation, I would respectfully submit that that is an offensive word.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Of course, I am not very familiar with the English language——

Mr. MONTAGUE. Do you rule the expression out of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Perhaps I did not give to the expression the same meaning that seems to be accepted by members of the committee. Of course, hon. members will recognize the fact that there are many expressions which do not bear the same shade of meaning in French and English. It may be that I do not understand the meaning of this word as it is understood by those whose native language is English. I found that the expression was impolite. But many impolite expressions have been used since the beginning of this discussion, and even many unparliamentary expressions. I would ask hon. members to see to it that only polite expressions are used in debate.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Do I understand you, Mr. Chairman, to rule that the expression is out of order ?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Impolite.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And unparliamentary and out of order ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If the Chairman will permit me, I do not think we should allow the words to go on record as parliamentary. As we understand them in the English language they are not complimentary.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Most offensive, most insulting.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I would be exceedingly sorry to have those words accepted as parliamentary, and I should be much pleased if the Deputy Speaker, instead of pressing the point, will merely agree that the decision he has given should not be insisted upon. I am sure we are all anxious to get along and avoid any unpleasantness.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER. I have no objection to submit myself to the judgment of the Committee on this question. As it seems to be the judgment of the Committee that the expression is unparliamentary, I am willing to submit my view to theirs.

Mr. ROGERS. There has been a great deal of fuss made about this little word, but much more disrespectful words, if possible, have been used towards myself, and the words were not ruled out of order.

Mr. INGRAM. Hon. gentlemen should not so far forget themselves as to use unparliamentary language. I have heard my hon. friend from Simcoe called the squirt gun of the Conservative party, and now he has been called the gutter snipe of the Conservative party.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Which is it?

Mr. INGRAM. Now the hon. gentleman who used that phrase, while occupying a position on this side of the House, took a very active part in criticising the estimates, as we are doing now; and I think if at that time he had had a brother who had been treated in the same way as the Postmaster General has treated the brother of my hon. friend from Simcoe, I would like to know if the hon. member for North Wellington would not have raised a pretty strong protest.

Mr. LANDERKIN. He would not have cried all night.

Mr. INGRAM. I have heard the hon. gentleman whine a good deal himself over the estimates, and perhaps he was justified in doing so. My hon. friend from Simcoe is doing what he believes to be his duty in criticising these estimates, and I do not think the hon. gentleman should get so warm as to use the language he did to-night.

Mr. BENNETT. As the matter has got to be of a somewhat personal nature, I have only this to say, that when I look for a member of gentlemanly deportment, my eyes will never look in the direction of the hon. member for North Wellington. I am glad that the Minister of Finance has brought the House up to the level where it should be brought, despite the fact that it sometimes has to be dragged in the mire by people whose inclinations tend in that direction. The question that has been before the House is one of fair comment, and I do not think the Postmaster General himself will say that I have unfairly commented on it. As to my own position in this House, I have fought my way here, but I hope I should be the last to do so in an offensive manner to any hon. gentleman. I have been very much honoured in the opposition that has been given to me by hon. gentlemen opposite, from the Premier down, in my elections. If I have been struck by anybody I have had the manliness to strike back again, and I hope I shall always do that, at all events. Now, the Postmaster General tells us that Mr. Smith received his advancement last year of $50, statutory allowance.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. He received $150 of an advance last year.

Mr. BENNETT. I would like the Postmaster General to take into consideration a very deserving class of employees in his department, I refer to the railway mail clerks. I think I am correct in saying that the railway mail clerks only receive a salary of $25 per month.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. And mileage.

Mr. BENNETT. The Postmaster General knows well that the position of railway mail clerk is one of great danger. I think it was in Ottawa division that two mail clerks were killed last year in a railway accident. It is an occupation that endangers the health, ill-ventilated cars, opening doors frequently at points where they have to throw off the mail bags—all this makes the work unhealthy. I think it is unfair that while clerks in the inside service are receiving large salaries, the mail clerks are cut down to the miserable pittance of $25 per month and mileage. The Minister should bear in mind that they are away from their homes, and this allowance for their mileage barely pays their expenses while they are on the road. I trust that the Postmaster General may see his way clear to advancing the pay of these clerks.

Mr. SPROULE. How many employees is the Postmaster General giving the statutory increase to?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Sixteen.

Mr. SPROULE. How many were eligible for the statutory increase as reported on?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It is contended by some that if the clerks are not at the maximum of their class and are in other respects qualified, they are eligible. If they were reported on, the following would be eligible in that sense. Three chief clerks, seven first-class clerks, seven second-class clerks, sixty-nine third-class clerks and seven packers and sorters.

Mr. POPE. What are the names of those who are going to get the statutory increase.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Mr. Rowan, Mr. Smith, Mr. O'Brien, Mr. Rochester, Mr. Greenfield, Mr. Briggs, Mr. Glover, Mr. Code, Mr. Carson, Mr. Barrett, Mr. Maingy and Mr. Anderson.

Mr. POPE. What principle guided the Minister in making these increases?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The principle of their being deserving of it. Mr. Rowan is head of the revenue branch and is a very efficient officer and has been in the service for very many years. The same applies to Mr. Smith. Mr. O'Brien has been in the service since 1862 and has been passed over many a time. Mr. Maingy is a professional gentleman, a draughtsman who drafts the maps and is a very efficient officer. Mr. Rochester is next in charge of the railway mail service and is a very efficient officer, who works without regard to hours and is loyal to the service and has his heart in the work. Mr. Greenfield has been in the service for many years and has been recommended highly for promotion. The same remarks apply to Mr. Briggs, Mr. Martin, and the others.

Mr. SPROULE. Have any got more than the statutory increase?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not think so.

Mr. POPE. Were those who received the increase recommended by the deputy?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. In the Post Office Department there are heads of branches who have a number of clerks under them and these recommendations came first of all with the imprimatur of the head of the branch, and they were endorsed, of course, by the deputy.

Mr. HUGHES. Did I understand the Minister to say that railway mail clerks start now at $300 a year?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Some other gentleman said that.

Mr. HUGHES. It used to be $40 a month.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I concur entirely in what has fallen from the hon. member for East Toronto in regard to the railway mail service. I am not satisfied with the status of the mail clerks. I recognize the risk and the severity of the service they perform. The risk incurred cannot be ignored, and while I claim no credit for it, I may say in passing, that I did not find, prior to my becoming the head of the department, there has been any recognition by Parliament of the lives of the mail clerks when lost in the service. Last year one of the clerks, Mr. Edgecombe was killed while on duty. I submitted the propriety of granting $2,000 as an allowance to his widow and children, and Parliament passed it without a murmur. A similar vote appears in the general Estimates this year for another mail clerk who met with an accident from which he ultimately died.

Mr. HUGHES. Is that Pedan?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No; there is a cause of action in that case against the railway company, and that will have to be determined. I do not think it would be fair to prejudice the case by making any statement now. If Parliament voted a sum of money, it would prejudice the case against the railway company, and therefore I do not think it fair to make a statement.

Mr. HUGHES. Do I understand that the hon. Minister agrees that $25 is the amount they start with?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have not turned up the Act. I think that amount is correct, and there is mileage besides. I think there has recently been a change.

Mr. INGRAM. Who made the change, and when was it made?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think last session. If so, I am responsible for it. I do not, however, retain it in my mind at this moment.

Mr. CLARKE. In view of the discussion that has taken place, in which every hon. member has sympathized with the small remuneration paid to the railway clerks, I desire to ask if the department has ever considered the desirability of insuring these men's lives. The Government now deducts from the salaries a certain appropriate amount for superannuation; and I would ask whether some similar arrangement could not be made with a view to securing endowment insurance on the lives of these railway mail clerks. As they follow a hazardous occupation, I submit that the department might consider whether additional protection to the widows and children might not be secured by appropriating each year a certain sum to procure insurance on the lives of these men.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. That question has been the subject of consideration. I am not, however, prepared at the moment to make a recommendation, nor at this session to refer to the salaries of the mail clerks further than to say that at present I am not satisfied with the remuneration paid them, and I hope before another session to obtain the concurrence of Council to submit a measure to the House.

Mr. POPE. Has there been any adverse report made by the Deputy Minister in regard to those who have not been recommended for increases?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. There has been no adverse report. I got an affirmative opinion in regard to the worthiness of these men in whose cases increases are recommended.

Mr. HUGHES. Has the deputy or any officer recommended that an officer suspended or under the displeasure of the Minister during the past year, should obtain an increase?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Will the hon. gentleman ask me that question at another time?

Mr. McDOUGALL. Am I correct in understanding that the hon. gentleman accepted the reports for statutory increases from the heads of the different branches under whom the clerks served?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. My deputy brought me certain names of gentlemen recommended for increases. I did not act upon them at once, but I had the heads of the branches come to me and give me their reasons. I went carefully through those recommendations and I concurred in those names that I recommend.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I cannot understand that the new deputy would be in a position to inform the Minister as to the merits of his staff, because he has been only a short time in the service. I understood from the Minister that all the appointments had been made on recommendations. I should like to ask the Postmaster General on whose recommendation did he appoint the Deputy Postmaster General, and what reasons existed for placing him in that position.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman quite misunderstood me. It is quite incorrect to say that I made all the appointments on recommendations. I said the promotions in the railway mail service had been made on recommendations. Appointments to the service are not made on the recommendation of persons in the service. There are many considerations in connection with appointment to the service. I recommended the appointment of the Deputy Minister because I knew him well and I considered him thoroughly qualified for the position, and the country will be well satisfied with the selection made.

Mr. SPROULE. Have any of the parties received more than the statutory increase?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No; from $30 to $50 are the highest figures.

Mr. POPE. The preference given to a few clerks in the large number employed by the Government is a serious reflection on the balance of the clerks not recommended. I cannot believe that so business-like a Minister as the present head of the department would retain so many men undeserving of the fulfilment of their contract with the Government, as may be inferred from the few clerks who have received the statutory allowance. It cannot be considered otherwise than as a serious reflection on those clerks who, having faithfully fulfilled their duties, do not receive that just recognition. I do not think any financial considerations should interfere in the carrying out of what these gentlemen had a right to consider as their moral and legitimate contract with the Government when they entered the service. If any of these clerks are neglectful of their duties, I do not think the Deputy Minister or the Minister himself should have any hesitation in placing a black mark opposite their names. I understand that it is considered the proper form for the Deputy Minister to recommend to the Minister those clerks who are deserving of preferment. Well, Sir, it may be a failing of mine, but I must say I have not much confidence in these Deputy Ministers. They are more or less permanent arrangements; in many instances, they are there to a fossilized age, they have forgotten a great deal they once knew, and finding themselves in a permanent position, they have neglected to learn a great deal they might have learned, consequently arriving at a period when they have become mummified. I do not think hard-working employees like those the hon. Postmaster General has under him, should be subjected to the judgment of men who have survived their usefulness. As a clerk in a department, I would much prefer to submit myself to the judgment of the Minister, whether he agreed with me politically or not. Some hon. gentleman suggests that the Minister may not be fit. But under these circumstances there is one salvation for the clerk, that the Minister is bound to be changed from time to time. He cannot be so unfortunate as always to have a Minister who is unfit for the portfolio he holds, and in the course of time he is certain to be changed. The Postmaster General has recently appointed a new deputy. I do not know that he is an improvement on the gentleman who held that position for many years, who on a recent occasion I saw trotting about in a manner that made me think he was not altogether useless; and I must say that during my experience as a member of this House I found the late Deputy Postmaster General quite capable of performing his duties. But there will be no great quarrel between the Postmaster General and myself because he has chosen to appoint a Deputy Postmaster General more congenial to himself or more in conformity with his own ideas than Mr. White. But on general principles I do seriously object to men who have no responsibility in this House, having in their hands the entire disposition of the promotions in the civil service. More than that, in our communication with the departments, we find that the gentlemen who occupy these positions fancy that they are more than the Ministers—that they have the right to pigeon-hole applications made by members of this House to the departments with regard to various questions. I cannot help feeling that in this particular there is room for a wide improvement in all departments of the Government in the direct connection between this House and the departments. If the Postmaster General, or any other Minister, should happen at any time to have a seat in the Senate, we would have no Minister in this House to answer for his department. Therefore, I think it is worthy of the serious consideration of the Government whether they could not conceive of some way by which these poor old fossilized remnants of humanity would be furnished with a home, with proper remuneration, without being imposed on the good-will of this House and this country. I quite understand that with the wonderful influence these Deputy Ministers have in this country, it is unpopular for me to speak so boldly and so frankly in regard to the Deputy Ministers; but, Sir, I feel that it is a duty that I owe to this country and to my constituents, no matter what the result may be.

Mr. MULOCK.

No matter how detrimental it may be to me, Sir, no matter how serious it may be in my next appeal to my constituents, I feel bound to point out that not only have we the Senate which is recognized by hon. gentlemen opposite as a serious block to legislation, but there is standing between us and the Ministers of the Crown a set of people known as Deputy Ministers, living in the departments, not only as persons, but as fossilized persons which, of course, means Egypt, in a sense, mummified people who have forgotten long since to realize or reckon beyond the limits of their desk; and you know, Mr. Chairman, that that is but three feet square, and this country is 4,000 miles long. We no longer, under those circumstances, have popular Government; we are no longer a popular Chamber; our presence here is a farce. Of course, if you have an energetic Minister, as we undoubtedly have in the Postmaster General—a man who devotes a great deal of time and attention to details—possibly you may avert some of the serious consequences; but supposing you have as all Governments are bound to have from time to time among their number, respectable men, because in order that a Government should properly represent the country, it should not only have capable men, men of ability and business capacity, but also respectable men, and very often, in order to get these respectable men, so-called, you have to go to past ages—supposing you have in your Cabinet such men, what are you going to do? In order to get that element, you have to seek a man who has arrived at that point when sin is useless to him, when virtue is a bitter necessity, and when he clothes himself in virtue in order that he may possibly enter the Government. Fancy one of those Ministers at the head of a department, and under him one of those fossilized mummies I have spoken of, between that respectable Minister and the people of this country. Think for a moment of what the citizen of Canada has to wade through in order to get justice, fair-play and reasonable business treatment from a department of that kind. That is known in some places as red tape. I do not call it red tape but by its proper name—past centuries, past ages, things that have been, things that at one time had a being and an existence and for which there was a necessity. In their childhood, they attracted attention because people fancied that as they grew up they would be somebody, and they succeeded, by dreaming over this thing from time to time, in fooling a sufficient number of people in their constituency into that belief and into electing them to Parliament. Not having succeeded anywhere else, as a last resort they were sent to Parliament. And they arrived there at a time when respectability was hard to find. They were thus selected by the Cabinet. They became Ministers, and as Ministers became rulers over departments with these poor old unfortunate creatures presiding over them as Deputy Ministers. This seems perhaps an extreme picture, but to me it is not altogether an extreme one. It is not a reflection on the hon. gentlemen who sit opposite any more than it is upon the hon. gentlemen who formerly occupied their seats at the same salary. We, who have the responsibility and labour of representing constituencies, when we meet one of these combinations, it impresses itself upon us so completely that it perhaps becomes a grievance. And as it becomes a grievance with us, it becomes a grievance with our constituents, and anything that tends to be a grievance is an injury to popular Government, and is bound to work against the best will of the people. And no matter what that grievance, whether it is well founded or not, it is worse than reality. You cannot sell it, you cannot dispose of it in any way, you cannot get anybody to buy it from you, you cannot trade it off for a horse, no matter how cheap, and heaven knows horses have been cheap enough for years. That thing becomes harnessed on to you and your constituents, and that becomes a nest-egg of rebellion, discontent, and all these things that change Governments, even though the majority of the Government be pretty good. Under those circumstances, knowing all the serious results that might flow from a fossilized Deputy Minister, I do say that if I should ever be in the employ of the Government—and I trust I never shall, and do not presume I ever will under hon. gentlemen opposite—but should that hour arrive, I hope that when it does, those remains of pleasant recollections of other ages will have passed away, and that I shall be able to get at the man who hires me direct, and that my faithful services rendered to the department will be known to the Minister direct. From him alone I shall anticipate receiving recognition of the service that I have rendered in the department in which

I might be employed. This may be of course an agricultural view of it. It may be simply a farmer's way of looking at it, but I have employed a great many men myself, and I always like to know what man is worthy of recognition by my own eyesight. I do not want any man to stand between me and the man whom I employ, whose services are worth recognizing, and I never permit it. I should never think of going to the many foremen I have and asking them who is worthy of an increase of salary. I have always found that the gentleman who is worthy of an increase of salary, some way or another impresses himself upon me. I fancy if I had one of those dummies there, things that have ceased to speak or reason or even think, that open their mouth three or four times a day to receive food and enable them to allow their salary to run on—if I had one of these peculiar arrangements standing between me and my servants, I do not think that the condition of the servants would be improved or my condition as an employer. If that is the case in my instance, why should it not be the case with a business Government, because this is recognized as a business Government. I think it was announced early in its origin as a business Government; it floated a banner with that motto on it: "Business is business"; I think that that was announced by the principal member of that Government, upon some occasion, a gentleman who not only rules the destinies of one department, but who indirectly influences the destinies of many others. Under these circumstances, if the condition I have mentioned is applicable to myself as an employer of labour, I cannot see why it is not, with equal force, applicable to the department over which any of these hon. gentlemen presides, and I am bound to make a plea in conclusion, after having given to this House these very forcible arguments, which I am sure will be recognized by hon. gentlemen opposite, perhaps to a greater extent than by hon. gentlemen on this side, because there are very few men on this side who have occupied positions inside the Cabinet, and being outside the Cabinet, of course they are not able to realize the force of my remarks or so thoroughly appreciate them as hon. gentlemen on the other side.

Never having had the extreme honour of occupying a Cabinet position, I am perhaps not qualified to criticise. But, Sir, I should like to live as everybody hopes I shall, particularly myself—and of course I am not speaking after the manner of the Senate, where they never die, but from the point of view of the member of the House of Commons—if I should live to that amusing age where a man gets to be useful as a gentleman, I may possibly find myself occupying a position in a Cabinet to be formed at some future day. In view of that possibility, I have an interest in urging upon the Government of the day to do something with regard to these fossilized people. How unfortunate it would be if, having reached a Cabinet place, but still continuing to think, I should find myself with a Deputy Minister who had ceased to think ten years before I got there. Hon. gentlemen opposite must recognize that changes will take place. Even if not through our cleverness, through their blunders, we shall some day be called to that side of the House. By the time I occupy the position I speak of I shall probably have reached that stage where I shall be permitted to occupy a corner seat nearly under the balcony and close to the respectable part of the Government. I have a personal interest, therefore, in having these Deputy Ministers active men. I should like to see them occupy seats in this House and be answerable to the House for their actions. It would not be then as it is now. A member calls upon the Minister at the head of some department and asks him to deal with a certain matter. The Minister informs him that he will see his deputy and will he please come to-morrow. Of course, you go back next day. We have all gone back. We all understand it. I understand it thoroughly, as a common slave of this House. You go back to the Minister and ask him if he has seen his deputy. "Really" he says, "I am so very busy and I have not been able to—and Council meets in ten—oh, in three minutes—and will you please excuse me—and will you be kind enough to call to-morrow." And to-morrow you find is a holy day, and the Minister is not in his office. And the next day is Sunday. Then you discuss the matter with the one nearest to you, and you find that he is in the same position. And so the matter is dropped in utter disgust. This tends to disgust the best people and keep them away from this House. That is the reason why we have not better men here. There are better men in the country than have ever sat here—lots of them. But the representative goes home and he tells the story of his desperate struggle, of his wrestling with the Premier or the head of the department in which his constituency happens to be most interested. Hon. gentlemen who sit back of the Ministers understand it. My hon. friend over there has to go back and say to his people, and say that the Minister is a good fellow and well-disposed, but you cannot get over the Deputy Minister; the work that the Ministers do is tremendous—deputations after deputations waiting on the Government, for this, that and the other thing, and while they are well-disposed and desire to give the matter every attention, they cannot do it in the time at their disposal. The Minister is well disposed to give you everything you want, but his time is so occupied and then you are forced down upon the miserable Deputy Minister—the fossilized remains that exist in the department. Now is not that discouraging to a bright Liberal? Is not it discouraging to the supporters of hon. genlemen opposite who anticipated better things to find that these Tory deputies standing between them and Liberal justice, the justice that should be measured out according to their anticipations on the advent to power of the party which they supported? In every constituency we find men walking about who are completely discouraged, who feel that the advent to power of the party has not brought them what they anticipated and all because these fossilized remains of humanity, the deputies, stand between them and common justice. Now, all this tends to weaken the strong opinion in the minds of the people of this country of the possibilities of the Government which has come into power.

Mr. SPROULE. I think we have done a pretty good night's work, and at this hour in the morning, perhaps, I would suggest to the leader of the House that we now adjourn and prepare for another day's work.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think that our minds are so thoroughly devoted to the postal affairs of the country that we might at least take the two items which remain under civil government in relation to the Post Office Department, that is to say, this particular item under consideration, and item number 40. If hon. gentlemen would agree to that, it would be a sensible course.

Mr. SPROULE. The next item belongs to a branch of the department that will necessarily bring out a good deal of discussion.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If the hon. gentlemen could agree to have these two items passed, then we might be able to report progress, otherwise I am afraid we cannot say that we have.

Mr. WALLACE. I endorse what has been said by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule). We have just heard the commencement of the eloquence on this side of the House the last hour or so. It is now pretty nearly daylight, and I do not think there will be any progress made. I think we may fairly appeal to the Minister to allow the committee to rise now, so that we may proceed to-morrow diligently with business.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think the Minister had better allow us to adjourn with the item we have had under discussion.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I find the House in such excellent working trim that we might as well put in a couple of hours more.

Mr. SPROULE. The present item has been discussed at considerable length, and it might be allowed to pass. No doubt, however, that the discussion of other items will take much time and we will not make much progress.

Mr. GILLIES. The Postmaster General stated that the deputy recommended for promotion a certain clerk, whose name he did not mention, and he announced that he had not acted on that recommendation. Who is the clerk, when did he come into the service and what salary was he then receiving?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman misunderstood me. I did not say that the deputy made a recommendation; it was made by the head of a branch. The officer in question is not one recommended for increase.

Mr. GILLIES. Who is the clerk?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Excuse me for not naming him. This is not before the committee. I submit there are many reasons why the names of men who are not now recommended for increase should not be stated publicly. I have already stated to the member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) that I am willing to give information of this kind privately, and I repeat the statement to the hon. member for Richmond.

Mr. HUGHES. I did not ask for the name of the officer—I knew his name. I was merely asking as to a fact.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think it would be very unfair to give this information.

Mr. McDUGALL. We are not voting money for private purposes.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No increase is asked in this case.

Mr. GILLIES. I am not asking for private information. The hon. gentleman, having, however, volunteered the statement, my curiosity was a little excited, and legitimately so. I should like to know the name of this clerk, if it is not a private matter. I cannot understand why the name should be a matter of private information. I desire to ask again if the Postmaster General withholds the name of the clerk, and if so, why?

Mr. HUGHES. The reason I asked the question in the case referred to was not because I wished to ascertain his name—it should not be brought in here—but because I wished to point out that reports of officers recommending increases to clerks who have been derelict in their duty were not worthy of much consideration.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I gave that as an illustration of the laxity of the system. The officer, I think, recommended for increase every one in the branch. That was about the style of all the recommendations given, and among them was the officer to which I have referred. I had considered whether I would recommend his dismissal. I took, however, a more lenient view, and decided, on account of his family and people dependent on him that I would accept his version, although I had my own opinion of it.

Mr. INGRAM. Are we to understand that the opinion of the head of the department who recommends an increase to an employee is given even when employees are not worthy of increases?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman has been told that the practice has grown up in the department generally of increases being made automatically, without regard to merits or value of services; and as an outcome of that system, the case to which I have referred occurred.

Mr. INGRAM. If the Minister refuses to grant the increase, after the head of a branch has recommended the officer, some reason should be given to this committee why the increase was refused. Surely we are entitled to an answer to this question?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have answered it half a dozen times already.

Mr. INGRAM. Are we to understand that the Minister will not tell Parliament why he refused to give the increase to this man though he was recommended by the deputy head of the department?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I refused because he was guilty of conduct which disentitled him to it.

Mr. INGRAM. Has the Minister instructed the heads of the different branches that they were not to make these recommendations?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have given no instructions what they are not to do.

Mr. INGRAM. Then it occurs to me that the deputy head who would recommend an unworthy man is not fit to be retained in the Cabinet.

Mr. POPE. It all shows what we must expect from these men who unfortunately are fixtures in the departments and who have arrived at that age when even if we went to the expense of painting them and varnishing them up it would not improve their appearance. It shows the state to which the Government of this country has come when the real Government of the country is entrusted to these specimens which we have discussed at some length. When I spoke of those deputy heads some time ago I hardly knew that so soon my word would come true, and it must now be evident to hon. gentlemen opposite that I was not talking against time, a thing which I would deprecate in any member of the House.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Hear, hear.

Mr. POPE. The Minister of Public Works who has known me for many years fully recognizes that I would be the last member in this House to occupy the attention of hon. gentlemen with anything than "business is business." The hon. gentleman (Mr.

Mr. MULOCK.

Tarte) is a literary character and I would advise him that if he should write a book he need not put anything inside of it but simply on the outside the inscription: "business is business," and it will be sold by the thousands. If he can find a camera old enough to photograph some of these fossilized Deputy Ministers and put their pictures inside the book, he would make a fortune for himself and his families, no matter how many families may follow him. The hon. gentleman knows that there was a fire in his department some time ago.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. POPE. I am out of order, I will get right back to it. I came into the Chamber rather late and I did not know there was any order, but I will, however, obey your ruling. If the Minister of Public Works could get up the book I have described he would make money enough to build us three times as many post offices as we have now, and I think that is a point worthy the consideration of the committee. Have you ever seriously considered, Mr. Speaker, the territory we have in Canada? You take our country from Halifax to Vancouver.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Take it from Sydney.

Mr. POPE. Well, we will go to Sydney, we do not care where we go. But at all events I am informed that Canada is 4,000 miles long and if you put a post office at every mile, you will have 4,000 post offices. That would increase the number of mails and would give an immense increase to the revenue of this country. Then, you know, this is a great mineral country. Its mineral development has just begun, and no man knows where a mine may be discovered. We may have a mine for every mile of that 4,000 miles, and we may have a post office for every mile, and if the herdsmen established these post offices, the results to this country might be immense. To put it upon a conservative basis, I think we ought to sell a three-cent stamp for every office, provided the Postmaster General does not interfere with that international postal arrangement.

An hon. MEMBER. But he is going to war.

Mr. POPE. Oh, he is not going to war. I do not believe he wants to go to war. I believe his greatest desire is to see these Estimates pass. I do not think he is a pugilist or is disposed to fight; and my observation is that it is the fault of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House that these two items are not through. But I think the Postmaster General has done his best. Of course, he has not given the proper explanations; but his deputy is not present, and he could not give them. I understand that his deputy is modern, and I would like to have seen one of these modern arrangements. One of these modern deputies would be a curiosity in this House, and he ought to be brought in. From what I have observed of the Postmaster General, I do not think he is disposed to go to war; he is a man of peace. Of course, he has grieved a great many people in this country by disposing of certain postmasterships, as the opportunity presented itself. On that question I have a magnificent speech which I propose to give him in this House on the proper occasion. So I will not take up the time of this committee with anything that is not absolutely pertinent to the question. As I undersand it, we have to pass two items.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Oh, no.

Mr. POPE. One item, then?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Not necessarily one.

Mr. POPE. That is first rate. I thought I was limited; but that cuts me loose. I thought we had to get these two items passed before daylight. Not being a parliamentarian, I thought we had to do something. The Minister of Finance says we have not to do anything, and I believe we have been fulfilling our duty in that respect since the 4th of February, and I congratulate the gentlemen on having accomplished what the Minister of Finance says we are here for. It is a great pleasure to me, and will be a great gratification to my children to know that their father took part in a great work which has led up to nothing. Of course, Mr. Chairman, if I get out of order, I trust that you will bring me back to the right path, although I do not believe it makes much difference what I talk about. There is so much time to take up, and I do not think it matters much whether I am in order or out of order. As the leader of the House says, we are here for a special purpose; we are here to perform nothing, and it is not absolutely necessary for the progress of this country that anything should be accomplished. I have heard insinuations made by gentlemen on the other side of the House against the Chamber which sits above us. Why, Sir, if that Chamber were not there, we would have accomplished something. We would have passed a certain contract which would have meant something, which would have opened up a mail route from the Pacific Coast towards the Klondike. I can now understand why that route did not go from somewhere to somewhere. Because it is the duty of this House to accomplish nothing. But the hon. senators who are sitting above us—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. POPE. I am now speaking of the mail route.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I am very sorry, but the mail route does not come under the item we are discussing.

Mr. POPE. Having considered Deputy Heads of departments, I come now to the allowance for private secretaries. I myself have great respect for the private secretary. He is essential to the happiness of his Minister, but at the same time I believe, since we have a Government that was elected upon economic principles, that this item should not be found in the Estimates. In my opinion, the private secretary ought to be paid by his Minister. If a Minister of the Crown were to devote his time assiduously to the duties of his department, he would be able to perform all the duties imposed upon him as Minister, he would be able to do what is expected of him in his department in the way of correspondence outside of politics and political organizations. At least 75 per cent of the time of a private secretary is taken up in making arrangements for his Minister's political meetings, and I say, therefore, that his salary should be paid by the Minister himself. The other 25 per cent of the secretary's time is taken up in writing invitations to dinner to the supporters of the Government in order to keep them in line. When the Ministers have some scheme invented by themselves, some idea of achieving something for their country, that we will not say reflects upon their honour because that would be a reflection upon the country itself, and require to bring a certain pressure to bear upon their following, then the private secretary is kept busy sending out invitations to the innocent following of the Government, willing at all times to be fed. I remember the pic-nics and can speak of them from experience. I am no novice in being fed at the tables of hon. Ministers, when they send out invitations and ask their flock to come in and feed at the trough prepared for them; and I know that the secretary has to be very particular in putting each guest's name opposite his chair, so that he may not be seated at the wrong place, because these men have to be kept in line. There are certain people whom the Government can always depend upon to support it under any circumstances and conditions. Those gentlemen, few as they are, have to be scattered around the table and seated next to those who are not so certain; and in order that this may be thoroughly done, the private secretary is the only man in whom the Minister can confide. The Minister says to the secretary: This gentleman is a little bit shaky on this question that is going to come up in a few days, and I think you had better seat him alongside the whip or sub-whip of the party, as the case may be, and put him in a position where he can be controlled. Or, it may be a lady. We know that ladies are clever in controlling men. This is a systematic arrangement on the part of the secretary, though it appears to be by accident. If it is not one of the cold storage dinners that I understand are given by certain gentlemen who are not now in the House, but if it is a dinner worth having, a dinner that makes you feel that you like your fellow man as you should like yourself, the arrangement of the secretary takes effect. And some of these gentlemen sitting there begin to open up their schemes, but gradually so as not to scare the man for whom it is unfolded. It unfolds like a rose in the sun and rain until finally it is in full blossom. And around that table some of the most nefarious transactions that this country has ever known are arranged. And all this is brought about by this private secretary. Now, the Finance Minister would not have gone to the trouble of issuing these cards nor would he pay for it, if the money came out of his own pocket. I have just received a message: "Breakfast is waiting for you." There is an idea I never heard of a private secretary giving an invitation to breakfast. I never heard of a private secretary to get up early enough in the morning to give an invitation to breakfast. But the Ministers neglect to act upon this idea. We know that first impressions are lasting, and by bringing their friends to breakfast they might be able to accomplish many things which now they find difficult. And it would be further occupation for their private secretaries and assist them in their political work. We all know and the Minister of Finance will frankly acknowledge that his private secretary is a political organization in himself. The Minister of Finance would not deny that one of the most useful persons in his political organizations is his private secretary. He has been carefully trained and is an expert, and I think the Minister of Finance must have brought him with him. I remember, on one occasion in the Russell House, the secretary of the Finance Minister shook me by the hand and said: "Mr. Fielding was so sorry he could not have you to dinner to-night." I could not doubt the sincerity of the Minister. The Minister of Finance himself, with all his urbanity could not have been more sympathetic, could not have done it better. Now, should this country pay for that? I say no. The Minister of Finance should have paid for that shake of the hand, and I am sure the private secretary is worth to the Minister himself every dollar of the salary he gets. If I knew this young gentleman, I should not hesitate to make the remarks I do. Now, as to the secretary of the Postmaster General, I do not know the gentleman. But I venture to suggest to these Ministers that now that young ladies can be employed to operate these typewriters, do a great deal of clerical work, they could be employed as private secretaries, and half of the money paid to the present private secretaries saved. Of course, it might in some cases arouse jealousy.

An hon. MEMBER. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) has carried out that idea.

Mr. POPE.

Mr. POPE. He could well afford to, because there are no domestic difficulties that could arise, the Minister being a single man. This plan of employing young ladies would save much money to the country. Now, Sir, having dealt with the question thus far, I leave to other hon. members its further consideration until I go and get my breakfast.

Mr. WALLACE. I think we ought to get from the Postmaster General some further explanation than we have yet received. He stated at an earlier hour in the evening that Mr. McLeod had passed his examination for chief clerkship, and all the evidence he has given is that the application of Mr. McLeod had passed the Treasury Board and passed through the other forms required for appointment and promotion. But that is not evidence, that was his impression, he did not give it as a known fact at all, but as his impression on the matter. I think his impression is wrong, because the law does not require that they should pass this promotion examination at all. The Act under which superintendents were appointed passed last year, and I think that all the qualifications that are required are that no person shall be eligible to be appointed as such superintendent unless he has served at least ten years as railway mail clerk. I presume that is all the qualifications that are necessary for transforming a railway mail clerk into a superintendent, and that I presume was the case with Mr. McLeod. Now, with regard to this other man, Mr. Winstanley, I understood from the Postmaster General that Mr. Winstanley, who had been in the railway mail clerk's department, was transferred to the inspector's office. His name, however, does not appear in the Toronto division or in the index.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. That is an omission of the printer.

Mr. WALLACE. There is another feature worthy of consideration, and that is the large number of officers who have reached the maximum of their class and for whom there is no hope of promotion. The Postmaster General has picked out those who received appointments from the Government of Mr. Mackenzie. He has taken three second-class clerks, Rowan, Barrett and Smith and has made them first-class clerks. They cannot be the only meritorious clerks in the department. This action is very suspicious and shows the manner of selection adopted. The hon. gentleman has declared that his actions are taken apart altogether from political considerations, but his action cannot be justified by this selection. Again, with respect to the number of clerks in the Post Office Department, the hon. gentleman when in Opposition always declared the number was excessive and it was imagined that when he assumed office the expense of the department would be largely reduced.

Nevertheless there is an increase of over $1,000 this year. As a reason for that the Postmaster General tells us that this is a growing department. Well, all the other departments of Government are increasing in volume and in the amount of work they transact. But the Postmaster General is curtailing the work of his department for he told us he has abolished a number of post offices because they were non-paying. Now these non-paying post offices are the very ones the Postmaster General should have retained because they are established in the interests of the pioneers, who are developing the wealth of Canada in remote regions. There are other ways for the Postmaster General to economize rather than by his cutting down the annual compensation of a man who carries the mails for miles, from $55 to $50. The system of secret tender has brought down the price to a lower figure than the work is worth, and if the Postmaster General really wanted to economize he could cut down the remuneration paid for mail subsidies to railways and steamship companies to whom we are paying millions of dollars a year. I am under the impression that we are paying higher rates to-day for carrying the mails on railways than we paid forty years ago when the railway system was first established in Canada. Hon. gentlemen know that owing to improvements in the rolling stock and railway construction the cost is now much cheaper, and all freight rates have been lowered. As a matter of fact the only railway rates that appear to have grown are the railway subsidies for carrying the mails and we are entitled to some explanation from the Postmaster General on that subject.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is not in order in discussing this question now.

Mr. WALLACE. Why?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Because we are discussing the item under Civil Government and the mail service is included in another vote altogether.

Mr. WALLACE. If the Chairman thinks this is not a suitable time to discuss the subject, I am willing to defer it. I admit that the daylight is coming on, and that the hour is perhaps not appropriate, and I am glad the Chairman has called my attention to the fact. We all realize that the subject is one of great importance, and that the discussion would be perhaps more appropriate and more satisfactory at another hour of the day. I think we might fairly ask the Minister now to pass this item, and let the committee rise and the House adjourn. What does the Minister of Finance say to that proposition?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I shall be glad to agree to the first part of my hon. friend's proposition, to pass the item.

Mr. WALLACE. We had better have an understanding.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman wished me to be serious. We are just beginning a day now, and we had better take the second item also.

Mr. WALLACE. There is a good deal to say on that.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There is ample time to say it.

Mr. WALLACE. I think we may fairly ask the Minister to pass this item and let the House adjourn. We have discussed matters pretty fully on this item. I do not think the business of the House is promoted by being too positive. I think we can fairly appeal to the Minister. Of course, if he remains stubborn, other people will get stubborn too. But we do not desire to have anything of that sort. I think we may ask the Minister to pass this item and let the committee rise. There are a good many things to be discussed on the other item.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If the hon. gentleman wishes me to be serious, I may say that hon. gentlemen opposite have been spending many hours in discussing nothing, but in repeating the same thing over and over again.

Mr. WALLACE. I submit that when it comes to two or three o'clock, it is time to ask the House to adjourn. That is always recognized.

Mr. INGRAM. I am glad now that we have been three months in session, that hon. gentlemen opposite are showing an earnest disposition to work long hours to get through the business. In discussing this very important item of $197,000 for the Post Office Department, I may be allowed, perhaps, to take up the time of the House in going over the different items under this head. I find in one part of the statement of the Postmaster General that as the deputy head of the department had ceased to be of very much use to the department, the hon. Minister desired a change; but I notice in the report of the new Deputy Minister that great praise is given to the late Deputy Postmaster General, who was appointed to the department in December, 1854, was appointed Deputy Minister in 1888, and ceased his connection with the department on the 1st of August, 1897. He was instructed to go to Washington to perform a very important duty with respect to certain changes which I believe the department propose to introduce on the 1st of January next. Perhaps the Postmaster General will enlighten the House as to what those changes may be. But it struck me as peculiar that if the late Deputy Postmaster General had lost his usefulness, he was considered so reliable and trustworthy to perform that important duty as the representative of Canada at Washington? I would also like to know whether it was under the late Deputy Postmaster General or under the new one that the idea was suggested of lowering the postage between Canada and the old country. If it was under the new deputy head, I understand that he made a very serious mistake, for I am informed that the department had not the power to lower that rate of postage.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Neither the old nor the new Deputy Postmaster General had anything to do with a matter of policy of that kind. Policy is one thing; to carry it out is another.

Mr. INGRAM. Would the hon. gentleman state what these proposed changes will be that are to take place on the 1st of January?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman stated that after the late Deputy Postmaster General had been superannuated he had been sent to Washington. Permit me to correct him. The late Deputy Postmaster General was sent to Washington in May, 1897, when he was still Deputy Postmaster General, and took part in that international conference as the representative of Canada; and whatever decisions that conference arrived at are as much within the reach of the hon. gentleman as myself. The postal union meets once every five years. In 1897 it met at Washington.

Mr. INGRAM. I find that I was in error in stating that the ex-Deputy Postmaster General went to Washington after his superannuation. I am glad to be corrected as to that. But I do not think the committee is altogether satisfied with the explanation the hon. gentleman made with reference to the controller of the railway mail service.

Contingencies—Post Office Department... $42,855

Mr. CLARKE. Is the printing done in the Bureau at Ottawa?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Yes.

Mr. McDOUGALL. It seems to me that at this hour of the morning, the hon. Minister leading the House should consent to an adjournment. He knows as well as any member of this House that the Postmaster General, from the beginning of the session until the present, has been most discourteous to hon. gentlemen on this side when they have asked for information connected with his department, and they have to get all the information they can from those items. What is the cause of this increase of $3,285?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The item is made up of clerical and other assistance, $23,855; printing and stationery, $15,500; sundries, $3,500. The item of $23,855 is comprised of the following particulars:—19 clerks at $400 and one at $600, making $8,200; 13 copyists at $400, making $5,200; 10 writers at $400 and one at $300, $4,430; four messengers at $320, two at $300, and one at $1 per day, making $1,285; 10 packers at $300 each, $3,000. There is an increase in the salaries of fourteen packers, sorters and messenger, and 44 temporary clerks at $30 each, making a total increase in salaries of $1,740. That deducted from $3,250, the gross increase, leaves the balance of $1,550, which represents one messenger and three clerks altogether.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Why this increase? Has the business increased or does the hon. Minister propose to supply the work which might have been supplied by the officials he dismissed?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not know what the hon. member means. If he is aware of my having dismissed any officials in the inside service, I shall be glad to be informed of it. I am not aware of it. The volume of business has increased and is increasing. We have in the present year increased the money order offices by 50 per cent in round numbers. There were 1,200 money order offices when we took office. On the first of July last we increased them about 600 more. We cannot do that without increasing the service. The revenue increased in the first year, 1896-97, $260,000, and in the present year probably about $400,000.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Did the Jubilee stamps count in this?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The Jubilee stamps were issued on the 20th June, 1897. A part of them went out before the fiscal year closed.

Mr. McDOUGALL. How much was realized on the sale of these stamps?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am unable to give those figures.

Mr. McDOUGALL. How many were issued, and what was the value of the issue?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. All the information is in "Hansard." I stated it in the House last year, and it is on record.

Mr. WALLACE. That is not very satisfactory.

Mr. McDOUGALL. We want the information now. We can hardly be expected to search through "Hansard" for what the Postmaster General said last session.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. If the hon. gentleman will turn to the report of the Postmaster General for the year ending 30th June last, pages xiii. and xiv., he will find the information.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I have not the report.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It will afford me pleasure to send it to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Perhaps the Postmaster General would give me the amount?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I will read the report. Mr. Gibson asked some questions on the subject of the jubilee stamps and the Postmaster General explained that it was his intention to issue these stamps. A schedule is given showing all the details of denominations, &c., but it is not added up.

Mr. WALLACE. That shows how many were to be issued; how many were issued and paid for?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. We kept no track of these stamps separately from the ordinary stamps, so far as revenue is concerned.

Mr. WALLACE. They were different from ordinary stamps inasmuch as they were not redeemable.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Quite so, but I said we kept no separate account of them so far as revenue is concerned.

Mr. WALLACE. Could not the hon. gentleman give us the amount received from these stamps?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I could not. The hon. gentleman will understand that these stamps were sold and returns made in the ordinary way, and many of them may be still on hand in the hands of postmasters. Unless we asked every postmaster in Canada to send a return to say what he had on hand, it would be impossible for us to know.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Is it not the rule that stamps are paid for in advance?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No, not exactly, it is done in some cases.

Mr. McDOUGALL. In Cape Breton, the postmasters have to send their money to the inspector in order to get stamps.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. There is a system of keeping accounts.

Mr. McDOUGALL. If the system is properly carried out, I should think that the Postmaster General could tell us what has been received from this issue of jubilee stamps. The hon. gentleman said that we should go to "Hansard" for the information, yet he could not read it from the book he assumed to quote.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does the Postmaster General intend to make any change in the colour of the stamps he has issued recently? From a number of business men I have heard that the stamps are very unsatisfactory, as the denominations are not properly marked and the colours are not good, and thus many errors arise.

Mr. INGRAM. I see that the revenue from stamps, &c., exceeded that of last year by over $277,000.

Mr. SPROULE. When it was proposed to issue these jubilee stamps it was understood that a certain number were to be issued at a certain time. But, if I remember well, they were not issued on time. I understood the Postmaster General to say at that time they expected they would realize a certain sum. Surely there must be an account somewhere of the results. If the stamps have passed out of the hands of the Government, they must have realized a certain amount of money, and somebody should know what that amount is.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I thought the hon. gentleman would have understood that these stamps were taken into stock and sold to the postmasters, and the results of the sales transmitted to the Finance Minister, and every month the Finance Minister issues a statement showing the revenue from the post office. That shows the revenue from all kinds of stamps. These jubilee stamps were not kept track of separately from the others.

Mr. SPROULE. Is there no means of knowing what amount would have been realized if they had been all sold?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Yes, but I have not extended it. Speaking of the matter in the first place, I said I thought it would be about a three-months' issue, that is it would be about what we would require in three months, and the revenue from the post office is something like $4,000,000.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Among these jubilee stamps were some of high denomination. How can the holder of a fifty-cent stamp make it take the place of fifty cents worth of stamps of ordinary denominations?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. There is a certain class of mail matter that is posted, but the postal stamps are not affixed. I refer to periodicals and newspapers that are posted in bulk. For instance, if a news agent desired to deliver, say 500 pounds weight of magazines, he does not bring in stamps and fix the proper weight of stamps to each separate paper, or pamphlet, or magazine, but they are all weighed. Supposing they were to weigh 1,000 pounds, at the rate of one cent a pound he would have to pay $10. He would hand $10 in stamps to be cancelled by the Postmaster. Then if there was only one stamp of $10, he would hand that to the Postmaster. If they were two of $5, he might hand them. He may make it up in any form he chooses, as a man may pay a debt by bills of various kinds. In that way the higher denominations serve a great convenience. Moreover, I may say that they are also available and have been used for letters and packages of large quantities. I myself saw a package with stamps on it sent to England containing stamps exceeding $8.

Mr. CLARKE. The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) has drawn attention to the quality of the new stamps. It has been my experience, and I presume it has been the experience of many hon. gentlemen in the House, that owing to the colour of the paper that is used for the stamps, the image of Her Majesty is very indistinct, and that half the time, unless we are very careful, we put the stamps on upside down, we cannot see whether the stamp is right side up or not. I may say also that I think the mucilage used on the new stamps is far superior to that used on the old, but their is an indistinctness about the figure on the stamp, which is a cause of inconvenience.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think the observation of the hon. member is well founded. But I may say that arrangements have already been made to correct that, and I think he will be perfectly satisfied when he sees the next issue. The two lower corners will in all future issues contain the denominations themselves in good plain figures. In regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Haldimand as to the colour, I fancy his reference is particularly to the two cent stamp. It is a very beautiful colour, although I admit it is open to the objection that it is indistinct. That has been got over, as you will see when the next issue takes place. The parallel lines running across give a light colour, whereas in the first instance they were too close together, giving a more solid appearance to the ink. That has been remedied, and the colour will appear very much brighter on those that are printed from the new die.

Mr. INGRAM. I notice that 40,000 eight-cent stamps were returned by the postmasters as unfit for use, and that 40,000 were destroyed as unfit for use.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The explanation of that is this: The total number issued was limited to the schedule mentioned in the answer that I gave to Parliament. By a mistake, a larger quantity was delivered to the department, and before it was discovered the department had distributed a larger quantity than was mentioned in the schedule. They discovered it when the mail had gone out, and at once recalled the overissue. Of course they were at once destroyed so as to keep the amount within the figure named by Parliament.

Mr. INGRAM. Then it was not through the stamps being unfit?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not know how it is worded there. "Unfit for use" is not a proper description. There was not one stamp in excess of the limit stated in Parliament that got into the hands of the public. There was that little error I speak of, but it was detected at once and corrected, and of course the extra amount was at once destroyed—I suppose by the Auditor General and by Mr. Stanton of the stamp department.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like an explanation why it was that the post offices in the rural districts of the country could not get certain denominations of those stamps. When the explanation was made here before the issue was to take place, it was stated that they would be sent all over the country in proportionate numbers of the various denominations, according to the quantity of stamps issued in the post offices. My information is that the rural post offices could not get certain denominations at all, for instance, the half cent stamp, and I think the one cent stamp. I know there were many inquiries made about them for a length of time. There were some few distributed through offices here and there, but the denominations that were in great demand were not supplied, they were taken up somewhere before they reached these post offices. The denominations that were not saleable were supplied in larger numbers in some cases than they could be sold or distributed in the locality.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The stamps were issued in the ordinary course without regard to their being Jubilee stamps, and half cent stamps to which the hon. gentleman refers, are only used on papers weighing less than half an ounce or perhaps less than an ounce. It is a rare thing for rural offices to use such stamps, and officer Stanton simply distributed them in the ordinary course to offices that had been in the habit of purchasing half cent stamps. The practice as a business connected with the Post Office Department, was strictly adhered to so far as I know, and my instructions were carried out. An office that never bought a half cent stamp for the ordinary purposes of business, would not therefore receive them without application, at least the half cent stamp, it being assumed they would not have any use for them.

Mr. SPROULE. My information is that they made application more than once from the same offices, and could not get them.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. A great many people applied for them, everybody wanted to get half cent stamps, and in a few days one person would have been able to buy them all up and make a corner in them.

Mr. SPROULE. The information given in this House was that they were to be distributed to the various post offices throughout the country in proportion to the amount of business which they did, and the various denominations in proportion. That was not the case.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. They were distributed strictly according to the pledge given upon the floor of Parliament.

Mr. SPROULE. I can assure the hon. gentleman that they were not, to my knowledge. I have it, not from one postmaster, but from three whom I know very well.

Mr. McDougall. I sent to the department here the day before leaving for British Columbia as I wanted to take some with me, and I could not get them.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Of course not, you are not a postmaster.

Mr. McDougall. That should not prevent me from getting them from the department that issued them.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Yes it should; you had to go to a postmaster.

Mr. McDougall. I sent a messenger for them. I do not know whether he went to the Post Office Department or to a branch outside, but all I could get was three cent stamps.

Mr. SPROULE. I applied personally and could not get them unless I took the full set, and I paid for the full set in order to get two or three half cent stamps.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. As to getting them from the Post Office Department the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) may have my sympathy. I tried to get some from the Post Office Department and I was refused. I was told they could only be supplied by the postmasters, and I failed to get a stamp.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I would remind the hon. gentleman that while this discussion is very interesting, it would come up more appropriately on the item respecting stamps, postal cards, &c.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I wish to read to the committee what I stated in Parliament last year on the point:

On 10th June the Post Office Department will proceed to supply Jubilee stamps to the principal offices in Canada, and through them the minor post offices will obtain their supply until the issue is exhausted.

Inasmuch as the department is already receiving applications for the purchase of Jubilee stamps, it may be stated that the department will adhere to the established practice of supplying them only to postmasters and through them to the public, who may purchase them on and after the 19th June, 1897.

Mr. SPROULE. What I am pointing out is, that people did not receive them, although these stamps were applied for. If the sale were made to the postmasters, the customers of the post office would have received them. I tried three or four offices, and wrote to postmasters, but failed to get them.

Mr. INGRAM. In June there were stamps issued to the value $1,268,000, of which $719,650 were ordinary stamps and $444,000 Jubilee stamps. That will explain the issue.

Mr. SPROULE. Is the amount for printing and stationery a regular one?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is more or less an uncertain quantity.

Mr. SPROULE. There is a reduction of $1,000 in sundries. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will explain that reduction?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The reason is that there is nothing charged in the department for my travelling expenses, which has not been the practice in the past.

Resolutions to be reported.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. WALLACE. What is the next order of business?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If the Solicitor General is present we shall proceed with the Franchise Bill; and if not, we will take some minor Bills, and afterwards Supply.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 5.40 a.m. (Thursday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 5th May, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BILL WITHDRAWN.

Bill (No. 98) to incorporate the Edmonton and Peace River Railway and Navigation Company.

GOVERNMENT HARBOURS, PIERS AND BREAKWATERS.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 135) to amend the Act respecting Government harbours, piers and breakwaters. He said: I explained the nature of this Bill the other day when I stated my intention to introduce it. The object is to permit the Minister of Marine, in cases where Government wharfs make an average return to the Government of a very small sum, to lease the wharf to the municipality in which it is, at the average sum received by the Government during the previous three years.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PROTECTION OF NAVIGABLE WATERS.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 136) to amend the Act respecting the protection of navigable waters. He said: The object of this Bill is to provide that in navigable waters where there is not at least 12 fathoms of water at low tide, ballast, ashes, cinders, and other material that would sink to the bottom shall not be thrown into the water. This has grown into a practice with some of the large ships and the shipping interest asked that it be stopped.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

GANANOQUE CUSTOMS HOUSE.

Mr. TAYLOR (by Mr. Mills) asked,

Is the Government aware that the customs-house at Gananoque is so out of repair that the collector lately appointed cannot occupy the residential part of the building, much to his inconvenience? Is it the intention of the Government to cause the said repairs to be made at an early date?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows:—1. The building is, it is true, out of repair; but not to that extent that the residential part cannot be occupied by the collector. He has applied for alterations and repairs which cannot be made now owing to insufficiency of appropriation. 2. It is the intention to have the repairs made as soon as a vote is available for that purpose.

THE LAURENTIAN RAILWAY.

Mr. GAUTHIER asked,

1. Whether the Government is aware that the Laurentian Railway, between Ste. Thérèse and St. Lin, is not provided with a telegraph line for the regulating of its trains, which constitutes a serious danger for those who travel thereon?

2. Is the Government aware that the said line is not sufficiently ballasted to insure the safety of trains running on its rails?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to inquire into the truth of these facts, and to compel the company working the railway to make such improvements as may insure the safety and comfort of travellers?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. The Government is not aware that the Laurentian Railway between Ste. Thérèse and St. Lin is not provided with a telegraph line for the regulating of its trains. 2. The Government is not aware that the said line is not sufficiently ballasted to insure the safety of trains running on its rails. 3. If a complaint is made to the department that the road is in an unsafe condition to operate, the Government will most assuredly make all proper inquiries.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

MINING LEASES TO G. A. DROLET.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

Has the hon. the Minister of the Interior given his consent in writing to G. A. Drolet, of the city of Montreal, province of Quebec, to assign, transfer or sublet the right and privilege of taking and extracting by sub-aqueous mining and dredging all royal and base metals other than coal from certain portions of the bed of the North Saskatchewan River leased to the said Drolet by Her Majesty by virtue of an instrument or lease bearing date the 25th August, 1897? How many dredges has the said Drolet or his assignee at work on the portion of the North Saskatchewan covered by the said lease?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). In reply to the first question, I beg to say, yes. To the second question: the agent of the department has not yet reported as to the number of dredges at work. A report will be procured a little later in the season.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN MR. CHARLES RUSSELL AND CARDINAL RAMPOLLA.

Mr. McDOUGALL asked,

Has the Government knowledge, and was the same authorized by the Government or any of its members, of a letter written by Mr. Charles Russell to His Eminence Cardinal Rampolla, Secretary of State, of which the following is from a French translation:—

“Rome, 26th November, 1897.

“Eminence,—I have just arrived at Rome once again, at the urgent request of the Catholic members of the Government and of the Parliament of Canada, in whose name I have already presented myself to you. Although I have come so far, I do not dare to present myself to Your Eminence, because I would not in the least like, at this moment, to seem to be bringing pressure to bear or wish to impede the complete liberty of His Holiness. Moreover, I know how busy Your Eminence is, and I remember with what patience Your Eminence has so many times before heard our representations on the subject of Manitoba, which besides, Your Eminence now fully understands.

“I should not even like to give you the trouble to read this letter if I had not been very particularly asked to go to Rome by those whom I represent, and who, living far from Rome, do not know quite what to do in order to plead their cause and fulfil their duty to the Holy See.

“This is, therefore, why I take the liberty of writing to Your Eminence as follows:—

“Some days ago the Canadian newspapers caused to appear an item by which it was set forth that His Holiness has published a letter condemning in the most formal terms the concessions obtained for the Manitoba schools.

“A few days afterwards a declaration of official appearance made it known that no such letter existed.

“Although not resting upon any foundation, the publication of this news has created in Canada such a state of feeling that my principals thought they would be wanting in their duty to His Holiness if they did not bring their respectful representations before him.

"The object of my visit is to call the attention of Your Eminence to the subject upon which I have so often negotiated, to know that such a condemnation would have the most disastrous effects for the peace of Canada and the cause of Catholic education in this country, while at the same time it would sow discord among the Catholics themselves.

"We do not solicit His Holiness to sanction as perfect the concessions obtained, but that in his wisdom he will be pleased to regard them as a beginning of justice. With the aid of time and thanks to the patient work of persuasion by their compatriots, the Catholics of Manitoba may hope to obtain satisfaction. The condemnation of the concession made would, at the present hour, render (I am begged to insist upon this point) any further concessions impossible.

"My instructions enjoin me again to renew to Your Eminence the desire, which I had already the honour to express to you, that His Holiness will be pleased to name a permanent delegate to Canada. The representative of His Holiness would reside on the spot, but would be outside local interests, and thus he could with more wisdom guide Catholics through the difficulties which they have to surmount.

"There is another point which I dare beg Your Eminence to be good enough to consider.

"Almost immediately when the Latin text of the letter of the Holy Father appears, difficult and even contradictory translations will appear, and, I am sure of it, most regrettable discussions will at once arise as to the interpretation of the words of His Holiness.

"In order to avoid such a misfortune, may I be permitted to suggest to Your Eminence, how desirable it would be that the Latin text should be accompanied by authorized texts in French and English. This procedure has been followed, if I recollect aright, on several occasions in the case of France and of England.

"I shall leave Rome on Saturday; till that day I am entirely at the disposal of Your Eminence."

And—

1. Whether the words "at the urgent request of the Catholic members of the Government" can in the present instance be applied to any other Government than to the Government of which the Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier is the Prime Minister?

2. Whether Mr. Russell tells the truth when he affirms that he went to Rome at the request of the Catholic members of the Government?

3. Whether Mr. Russell tells the truth when he affirms that he had already presented himself to the Secretary of State in the name of the same Catholic members of the Government?

4. Whether Mr. Russell tells the truth when he affirms that he was particularly requested to go to Rome by the Catholic members of the Government whom he represents?

5. Whether Mr. Russell tells the truth when he affirms that those whom he represents, living far from Rome, do not know quite what to do in order to fulfil their duty to the Holy See?

6. Whether Mr. Russell tells the truth when he affirms that his "principals, the Catholic members of the Government" thought they would be wanting in their duty to His Holiness if they did not bring their respectful representations before him?

7. Whether Mr. Russell tells the truth when he affirms that the Catholic members of the Government beg him to insist upon the fact that the condemnation at present of the concessions already made in the school question would render impossible any future concession?

8. Whether Mr. Russell tells the truth when he affirms that his instructions enjoin upon him to renew the demand which he has already made for the nomination of a permanent delegate?

9. If Mr. Russell tells the truth, how can the answer given up to this date in the Senate by some members of the Government be reconciled with such contradictory assertions?

10. If Mr. Russell does not tell the truth, is it the intention of the Government to continue to make use of a man whose assertions it is obliged to disavow?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The Government never had any knowledge of this letter, and does not know of its existence nor of its genuineness.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE LATE GOVERNMENT.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman if he would be good enough to lay upon the Table of the House the original reports of the Treasury Board submitted by the late Government just previous to leaving office, and the Orders in Council relating to them.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I thought we had had enough of this question, and I should suppose my hon. friend would think so himself. But I am not prepared to say yes or no to his question at the present time. I will give him an answer in a day or two.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will say, with the permission of the House, that the reason why I have not had enough of it is that there was a sharp issue as to a matter of fact between the Government and myself. I declared that the Governor General had signed these reports from the Treasury Board making these appointments, and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries joined issue with me and declared that the Governor General had never signed the reports of the Treasury Board, that his name was merely on the back.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken, I made no such statement. I said that the reports of the Treasury Board were all fastened together, and that the Governor General signed his name on the outside, subject to his memorandum, and that the individual reports, each one of them, were not signed by him. When I made that statement, the hon. gentleman said across the floor of the House, "That is exactly correct," as the "Hansard" will show.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What I said was that it was correct to say that the Governor General had signed the reports of the Treasury Board subject to the exceptions which he had taken.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Well, I say that the hon. gentleman is correct, and I said so yesterday, that the Governor General appended his name to the outside of the bundle, subject to his memorandum. But the individual reports were not signed by him, and on the advice of the then Minister of Justice, before they were completed, they had to be signed by him. There is no issue of fact between us.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. You added that consequently the appointments had never been made.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. I have allowed the hon. gentleman to transgress the rules of the House, as I looked upon their statements as in the nature of a personal explanation as to what they had said. I do not think any other hon. members have a right to intervene.

Mr. FOSTER. I just wish to ask a question, if that is in order. I ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if he will be kind enough to answer whether, when the work of a Treasury Board consisting of many recommendations, passes up in the shape of an Order in Council and goes to the Governor General, it is the custom for the Governor General to sign each one individually, or is the signature made by the Governor General upon the back of it, covering the order?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am not able to answer the hon. gentleman as to what is the practice. I am saying what was done in this case. The signature was subject to a memorandum, and the advice of the Minister of Justice of the day was that it was not complete until each order was signed.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I think the practice was this, unless it was altered: His Excellency usually signs each separate report, but not each separate item. As I understand, half a dozen of these reports all went to His Excellency for his signature, and His Excellency, I think, to make it a lawful signature, should have signed, not each item but signed each report. I think there were four or five of them.

VACANCY FOR BAGOT.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the right hon. leader of the House if he proposes to name a returning officer, and name an early day for the election in Bagot, as you have yourself, Mr. Speaker, declared that you have issued your warrant for the purpose of holding that election.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). My hon. friend was not in the House the other day when I suggested that under the circumstances now existing, it would be advisable to delay this election until there could be a full electorate. As my hon. friend is aware, if this writ is to be issued at present the election must take place upon lists which are nearly four years old. This suggestion was not received with favour by my hon. friends on the other side of the House. I may say to my hon. friend—this is Thursday—I will give a positive answer on Monday.

NEGOTIATIONS WITH NEWFOUNDLAND.

Mr. RODDICK. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether it is the intention of the Government to reopen negotiations with the Government of Newfoundland with the view of bringing that island into the confederation.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I received a note from my hon. friend within a couple of hours, informing me that he would put this question. I answered him—but I suppose he has not received my answer—that it was a matter of some consequence, and the Government would not be prepared to give an answer on the spur of the moment, and asking that he would give notice in the usual way.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

Mr. McALISTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the Postmaster General when the returns will be brought down concerning the Oak Bay Mills post office, in the county of Bonaventure. The order was passed two weeks ago.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). I will send to the department at once and see why the return has not been produced. Instructions were given.

PREFERENTIAL TRADE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. McNEILL. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask my right hon. friend a question as to which he has had some little time to think over his answer—whether he will be able to let me have a day, not later than Wednesday of next week, to discuss the preferential trade question.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). My hon. friend and myself had some private conversation yesterday upon that subject. If he will agree to the day which I privately mentioned to him, I will be glad to meet his wishes. If he will not accept that day, I cannot give him an answer to-day.

Mr. McNEILL. My right hon. friend, I suppose, has no objection to my referring to the day, although it was a private offer.

The PRIME MINISTER. No.

Mr. McNEILL. The day my right hon. friend proposed was a week from Wednesday next, and I understand that on his own side of the House there has been an impression abroad that the House will be near or about prorogation at that time. If that be so, I must say that I am very much surprised at the offer made by my right hon. friend. I do not think it is treating a great question with that degree of gravity and consideration which it deserves.

Mr. SPROULE. At the rate of progress made last night, we shall not reach prorogation very soon.

Mr. McNEILL. This question, my right hon. friend knows, is regarded by the Colonial Secretary as the greatest of all questions which a British Parliament can discuss.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must not discuss it now.

Mr. McNEILL. I have no intention of discussing it now. The time will come, I hope, when there will be an opportunity afforded to discuss it. I do not wish to trespass on the time of the House, and I do not desire to move the adjournment, unless it is absolutely necessary, but I cannot allow the matter to stand over later than Wednesday of next week, or Thursday at the very latest day. I should like to know from the right hon. gentleman whether he will be able to give a day not later than Thursday of next week?

The PRIME MINISTER. I scarcely think it is necessary for the hon. gentleman to ask me the question, when he has already announced his determination to take a day. I have offered a day to the hon. gentleman, and if he will not accept it, I shall have to accept another day he may state.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will repeat his statement.

The PRIME MINISTER. I said I had suggested a day next Wednesday week, and I may add that I suggested that day for the reason I stated a moment ago. We are anxious to facilitate the business as much as possible in order to secure at some early day the blessing of prorogation. We want next week to send as much work as possible to the Senate in order that when the time comes for prorogation, nothing will hamper it. I suggested as a day very convenient Wednesday, 18th May. That is a very fair arrangement. If the hon. gentleman wants a previous day, I suppose he will take it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would recommend my hon. friend to accept the proposition of the leader of the House, so as to have a day fixed and definitely arranged, and in order that the House may know it.

Mr. McNEILL. Under the circumstances, if the hon. gentleman announces without any doubt that that will be the day, I will accept his proposal.

The PRIME MINISTER. I cannot make it any more definite than I have done, and the hon. gentleman should be satisfied.

MAILS FROM LAKEFIELD AND APSLEY.

Mr. LANG asked,

Did the Government ask for tenders in the year 1897 for carrying the mails from Lakefield to Apsley, in the county of Peterborough? If so, what were the names of those who tendered and the amount of each tender?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). Tenders for the carrying of the mails between Apsley and Lakefield were invited on March 5th, 1897; tenders to be received until April 16th, not later than twelve o'clock noon. The department received the following tenders:

Patrick Kennedy.....	$288
T. C. Eastland (tender dated 26th March)	300
R. J. Lennox.....	300

And another tender from T. G. Eastland, dated 19th March, for $340. The contract was awarded to the lowest tenderer, Mr. Patrick Kennedy, and has been signed by him.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 111) for better securing the safety of certain fishermen—(Sir Louis Davies.)

THE OFFICER COMMANDING THE MILITIA.

The House resolved itself into committee to consider the following resolution:

It is expedient to provide that the officer commanding the militia shall be paid a salary at the rate of $4,000 per annum, and in addition thereto in lieu of allowances, such sum, not exceeding $2,000 per annum, as the Governor in Council determines.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. SPROULE. Will the Minister state the present salary paid?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA (Mr. Borden). The law as it exists at the present time gives the general officer commanding $4,000, to cover salary and all allowances. It is proposed to change the law so that the salary paid shall be $4,000, but that a sum not exceeding $2,000 may be paid as allowances.

Mr. SPROULE. Then the salary has been $4,000 heretofore, and it is now proposed to increase it by $2,000? The Government are more liberal towards the general than the poor civil servants.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA. This matter has been the subject of correspondence between this Government and former Governments of Canada and the Imperial Government, with the result that the present proposal is made to the House. It has been pointed out to this Government that it is impossible for an Imperial officer, occupying the prominent position which he holds in this country, to live on the salary at present given him. It has been pointed out, too, that while we are paying $4,000 a year salary and allowances, and while the strength of our militia is between thirty and forty thousand men, the commandant occupying a similar position in the colonial forces of Victoria, Australia, is in receipt of £1,400 sterling or $7,000, $3,000 more than we pay, and he has command of some five or six thousand troops only, whereas our commanding officer is in command of between thirty and forty thousand. It is also a fact that the commandant of the colonial forces of New South Wales receives £1,250 sterling, and has about the same number of men under him as the commandant in Victoria. The commandant of the S. M. mining and superintendent defence works, New South Wales, receives £1,050 sterling, and the commandant of the colonial forces in Queensland receives £1,200 sterling. The commandant of the Canadian forces is therefore paid very much less for a great deal more work than are the commandants of these colonial forces, and certainly the Dominion of Canada is not less important than are these other colonies. I have asked the quartermaster general to prepare for me a statement showing what the officer commanding the militia of Canada would, if employed in England or with the Imperial forces, receive. Such an officer as usually comes here as Major General—

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. That is in the way of allowances.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA. Pay and allowance. Such an officer is employed in England or with the Imperial forces would hold one of the following appointments, according to his rank in the Imperial service:

If a major-general in the army, he would be employed either as (a) major-general on the staff or (b) brigadier-general on the staff. The pay of a major-general on the staff is £3 sterling a day, or £1,095 sterling a year; his allowances amount to about £1 7s. a day, or £492 15s. sterling a year. Total, £1,587 15s. The pay of a brigadier-general on the staff is £2 10s. a day, or

Mr. BORDEN (King's).

£912 10s. a year; his allowances are about 18s. 3d. a day, or £333 1s. 3d. a year. Total, £1,245 11s. 3d.

If his rank was that of colonel in the army, he would be employed as colonel on the staff, when his pay would be £2 a day, or £730 a year, and his allowance 15s. a day, or £273 15s. a year. Total, £1,003 15s. In view of these facts, taken in connection with the statement I have made that this is being done as the result of correspondence which has taken place between this Government and the Imperial Government, I hope the committee will approve of this resolution and will expedite the passing of it into law.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would ask the Minister of Militia if this resolution passes, whether Major General Gascoigne will receive any increased emolument under it?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA. The Act will not come into force until after the 1st of July. As the hon. gentleman is aware, Major General Gascoigne has resigned his position and is simply continuing until his successor has been appointed. I may say this, in justice to General Gascoigne, that this action of the Government has not been of his seeking at all.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not ask that question. I may say that I should give this resolution the most strenuous opposition in my power if it were contemplated that General Gascoigne would receive a single dollar of the money that will be voted under it. I give a most hearty support to this resolution for the reason that I believe it to be of the utmost importance to Canada, that we should have the office filled by an Imperial officer who is of high standing and ability, and who is calculated to discharge the duties of that important position in a manner suitable to the service. There can be no better evidence of the absolute necessity of passing this resolution than what we have witnessed in the administration of that department by Major General Gascoigne. If it were necessary to give even a larger amount in order to protect Canada from the employment of such an officer, I would cheerfully concur in it. As I understand it, the appointment of the commandant of our militia rests with the Canadian Government, but it has been the invariable practice, and I have no doubt will continue to be the invariable practice, that the Imperial War Office should be consulted in regard to the appointment. The Act provides that the Major General commanding the Canadian militia shall be an officer holding a certain rank in the Imperial army, and the practice has been to secure the recommendation and approval of the Imperial authorities to his appointment. But, Sir, that has not been sufficient to protect us from the presence of a gentleman occupying that position, who, in my opinion, has disgraced it. The conduct of Major General Gascoigne in the discharge of what he thought to be his duties has brought the Government again and again into contempt, and has brought the department over which he presided and the officers of that department into contempt; that fact is, I say, a sufficient reason for the Minister of Militia proposing to this House that we shall give a larger salary for the purpose of securing a person properly qualified to fill the office. I am stating what is a matter of public notoriety when I say, that Major General Gascoigne involved himself in a most discreditable position in connection with the militia in Halifax, a position which led to great humiliation on his part. His conduct in relation to Col. Strathy was such that if a change of front had not been exhibited, serious consequences would have resulted. Major General Gascoigne rushed into the public press in that case, violated every principle of military rule, and described the differences between officers under his command as "a squabble between washerwomen." When that came to the notice of the public it was enough in itself to lead the Government to call on him the next day for his resignation. But the Government did not call for his resignation then, and Col. Strathy was forced into the position of protecting himself by an appeal to the press, the medium that was used by the Major General in attacking his officers. I say that Col. Strathy was forced to appeal to the public press to protect himself, and that was followed by his dismissal from the command of his regiment, and by his having his commission and rank removed. The conduct of the Major General resulted in a civil action being brought by Col. Strathy against him, and, speaking with the authority of one of the most eminent counsel in Canada, I have no hesitation in saying that that civil action would have resulted in a verdict against Major General Gascoigne in the courts of this country, which would have driven him out of the Imperial service altogether. Fortunately for him, he has been able to avoid that disgrace by getting his resignation accepted. I am delighted that it has been accepted by the Government, and I trust that the resolution before the House will enable us to secure an officer who will not degrade the position as Major General Gascoigne has degraded it from the time he came into this country up to the present moment. I trust we shall secure the services of an officer of high standing in the Imperial army, an officer who, in future, will be able to discharge properly these most important services for the Government of Canada; services as important as it is possible to conceive in relation to our country. We do not know at what moment we may want officers possessing the standing in the Imperial army, and the ability to render the most important service, not only to Canada, but to the Crown and the Empire to which we belong. I give my support most cheerfully to this resolution, on the assurance of the hon. gentleman that no portion of this money will be used for the advantage of Major General Gascoigne.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am sure we must have heard the language just made use of by the hon. gentleman with astonishment and regret. There was no occasion at all for the exhibition of temper he has just shown; and, moreover, I think it was quite unworthy of him to use such language towards a brave officer. The fact that General Gascoigne has the honour of wearing the uniform of the British army, should alone be a reason for the hon. gentleman not speaking of him so lightly as he has done. I cannot refrain from saying that the hon. gentleman, when he used such language towards General Gascoigne, was simply indulging his personal spite. With regard to his conduct, there are different views, as there must always be with regard to the conduct of any man who occupies a public position; but when a man serves the public to the best of his light, even if he should be guilty of indiscretion, there would be no reason whatever for imputing improper motives to him, or using such insulting language as the hon. gentleman has used towards an officer of the British army. Though General Gascoigne will leave the service of Canada at an early day, I must say to the hon. gentleman at once that this resolution is not to be voted upon the understanding that no part of it is to go to General Gascoigne. General Gascoigne has submitted his resignation, which has been accepted, but he is to remain in office until his successor is appointed; and if his successor is not appointed before this resolution goes into force, that is, before the 1st of July, General Gascoigne will have the benefit of whatever benefit there may be in it. Therefore, let it be well understood that, if the Government have brought this resolution, it must be accepted by the House without any reference whatever to the merits or demerits of General Gascoigne. I conceive that his personality has been brought into the discussion of this matter by the hon. gentleman, for no other purpose than the indulgence of a little personal spite.

Mr. TISDALE. The hon. Minister of Militia was courteous enough to send me a copy of the correspondence with the War Office in Great Britain, and a comparison of the difference between what is paid to the Major General commanding the militia of Canada, and what is paid to similar officers in other colonies. It is expressly stated in the correspondence that a proper increase in the pay of the Major General Commanding would probably lead to the appointment of a commandant of a higher grade than those hitherto sent out to Canada. Without reflecting upon any of them, which would be foreign to the few remarks I have to make, I may say, so far as my responsibility goes, that I am only too happy to support this motion; because, as has been well said, even if a higher amount were necessary to procure the best material in the British army to command our militia, it would be none too much to pay for such an improvement. I think our militia, without disparaging that of any other colony, stands equal to the best, and, therefore, I am quite willing to support such an increased emolument as will secure for our militia an officer of superior rank and attainment, such as the War Office in England is anxious to send. I am sure this is a step in the right direction, and I am quite confident that both sides of the House will support it. That is the main question at issue, and is the main reason, I understand, why the hon. Minister has proposed this moderate increase in the salary. This is an especially opportune time for taking this step, when we are pleasantly as well as seriously faced to face with large Imperial opportunities and larger Imperial feeling, and I hope more intimate relations in all respects with the Empire; and one of the first necessities of any free country is to show, by the organization of a proper defensive force, that we are prepared, when the proper time comes, to take our share of responsibility in a more serious manner even than granting the money necessary to secure for our militia the best class of officers. I have great pleasure in supporting the motion.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I fully agree with every remark that has fallen from the lips of the hon. gentleman who occupied for some time the position now occupied by the hon. Minister of Militia. This matter was a subject of discussion between the Imperial Government and the Canadian Government, even when I was Minister of Militia, and I think the resolution is a move in the right direction. I think the General Officer Commanding has been underpaid, though he occupied the highest position in this country that could be conferred upon any military man from the old country. But admitting as we do that the increase now proposed is not too great, I think the hon. Minister should be extremely particular about the officer who will be recommended to us. The appointment is a Canadian appointment, but the Canadian Government, in selecting an Imperial officer to command our forces, naturally and properly consult the Imperial Government, in order to obtain that information which they can hardly be expected to possess themselves, as to the qualifications of the officer who may be recommended. It is extremely important that the very best man available should be selected, not only from a military standpoint, but from the standpoint of other qualifications which are probably even more indispensable—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. In an officer commanding the volunteer forces such as we have in Canada than in one commanding an army, controlled absolutely by regulations which enforced a discipline more rigid than can be expected among volunteers. I think that we can, as Canadians, be very proud of our militia. We know that whenever that force has been called upon to do its duty towards our country, it has done it in a manner which has commanded the admiration not only of Canadians, but of people living outside the realm of Canada.

With regard to the increase in the pay of the commanding officer, I am not quite certain whether the hon. gentleman has explained how he intends to make that increase. Is it to be in the shape of allowances or in lieu of allowances, or is it as an increase to the salary, because I can see a distinction? For instance, the commanding officer should be allowed a certain amount to keep a charger, which is as indispensable to him as his sword; and if the hon. gentleman gives an increased amount, I think that regulations should be laid down as to how that increase is to be utilized.

Mr. HUGHES. I very heartily endorse the proposition of the Government to give an additional sum of $2,000 allowances to the general officer commanding our forces. I wish to point out that the mistakes or the faults, if there have been any, in relation of the officers commanding the militia in this country have not always been with the general officer commanding. It will be remembered that up to the year 1875, our militia force drilled every year. We had the various excitements of the Fenian raids, the Red River rebellion, and so on, which kept the martial spirit alive in the country, and the consequence was our various corps were well filled up with good men. In 1874, the same party who now controls the Government assumed the reins of office, and on that occasion they pursued a policy entirely different from that now actuating this Government in relation to the militia. At that time their policy was openly expressed to break up the militia as far as possible. To-day an entirely different spirit, I am pleased to see, pervades the Militia Department of the Government. The volunteer forces, on account of being brought out for drill at company headquarters only once every two years, fell undoubtedly into a disorganized condition, and in 1880 we found the first attempt made after 1875 to revive the annual camps. Even then these were merely spasmodic. The Liberal-Conservative party failed to return to their old line of policy, and pursued a half-hearted policy with regard to the militia until very recent years. Therefore, I maintain that when Generals Luard and Middleton and Herbert came out they found the militia in a condition which undoubtedly called for adverse reports. But although I have had my own differences with some of these gentlemen, I stand here to say, as one who pretends to know something about the militia of our country, that these gentlemen, in many of the recommendations and strictures they made to the Government were entirely in the right. So far as General Gascoigne is concerned, I must say that while I do not know the details of some of the little scraps he seems to have got into—and I think it would be very strange, with all the conditions surrounding our militia force if the officer commanding would not occasionally run foul of somebody—so far as my observation and experience have gone, I have always found General Gascoigne a most efficient and gentlemanly officer, and personally I shall be very sorry when he leaves the country. I believe he leaves in the end of June, and at all events, he will carry with him, so far as I am concerned, nothing but the very kindest regards. Whether he has made mistakes or not, I am not here to say, but undoubtedly he has done a great deal to promote the effectiveness of our militia, and I believe that if the hon. Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden) expresses his views, he will say that undoubtedly he has been greatly assisted in carrying out every necessary reform by the Major General commanding our forces.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Hear, hear.

Mr. HUGHES. References have been made here to the fact that we can get a better commanding officer by paying him more. No doubt, we can more readily get men to leave the Imperial service and come here by that means, but many gentlemen in this country seem to think that it requires one type of man to command a regular regiment and another to command a militia regiment. I had the pleasure of seeing the militia march past in Aldershot, and in appearance, physique and drill they compared very favourably with the regular service, and I believe that the same qualities which enable a man to command in the volunteer service make him fit to administer a command in the regular service. This cry that one type of man is required for the regular army and another for volunteer regiments is entirely wide of the mark. Today the old tyranny and cat-o'-nine-tails have fortunately disappeared in the service, and the man who understands how to manage the regular service undoubtedly will understand how to manage the militia service of this country.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA. The remarks which have fallen from the hon. leader of the Opposition render it necessary for me to make a short rejoinder. I think it was extremely unfortunate that the hon. gentleman should have deemed it his duty to take advantage of a motion of this kind to make a violent attack upon the Imperial officer commanding the militia in this country. The hon. gentleman ought to have remembered that that officer has no opportunity of replying. Therefore, I think it was exceedingly unfair, under the circumstances, for the hon. gentleman to have made the attack he did. It is due to General Gascoigne that I should say—and I say it with the greatest pleasure—that my relations with him up to this moment, have been of the pleasantest character. I believe him to be a man well qualified to fill the position he holds. He has worked hard, and has brought about reforms in the militia greater than any that have been effected in an equal number of years at any previous period. It is only fair to General Gascoigne to say that while I was recently in England, I met there a gentleman who had been in command of the force here, and that gentleman told me that more had been done during the last two or three years for the militia of Canada than had been done during any previous ten years, and those previous ten years to which that gentleman referred covered a time during which he was general in command here himself. So far as the departure of General Gascoigne from this country is concerned, it is not due to any breach of pleasant relations between him and myself, but is entirely due to personal matters of his own. As I have said, throughout his career, I believe, he has endeavoured honestly to do his best and to do his duty, and he has done it. He is not perfect, as the Premier has said, any more than any of the rest of us, but whatever he has done he has done conscientiously. I have always found him ready to meet me on any case in which we differed, and we have always been able to come to an amicable settlement of the difficulty. The hon. leader of the Opposition has referred to the case of Colonel Strathy. I think it is unfortunate that that case should be brought up here. Whatever cause Colonel Strathy may have thought he had for taking the course he did, his course was certainly an unsoldierlike course. If it were a fact that the General has committed an indiscretion—which I do not admit—there would have been no justification for Colonel Strathy to take the course he did. The hon. gentleman well knows that two wrongs do not make a right. I repeat that it is unfortunate that this case should have been brought up here. With regard to the matter at Halifax, that has been entirely settled. There was for a time a slight misunderstanding, but there is not the least doubt that General Gascoigne was right in the letter of his contention that there were men enlisted in the 66th Battalion of Halifax who had no right, in view of the contract they had entered into to serve the Imperial Government, to enlist in that battalion. I have thought it only fair to say this single word with reference to the General.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am not surprised at the remarks that have fallen from the hon. Minister of Militia. He has found General Gascoigne a very complaisant commanding officer, he has found him making reports of the strongest character to the late Government on an important question, and taking those reports back and making other reports at the request of the Minister. He has found in General Gascoigne exactly the sort of man that suits some Ministers, and that is a man who has no opinions except those dictated to him by his superior officers, and so complaisant as to be ready to take back his own recommendation and throw contempt upon it at the instance of his superior, and again change it when the Minister found the pressure upon him too strong, and to go back to his original report. I say I am not surprised at the defence the Minister of Militia has made for him. But I may say that the Minister of Militia is entirely wrong in saying that General Gascoigne has not the means of defending himself. The hon. Minister says rightly that Colonel Strathy was guilty of great indiscretion, to say the least of it, and violated military orders, in going to the press. But it must be remembered that Colonel Strathy had the example, before he did so, of the General Officer Commanding. He only followed the pernicious example which led him into that indiscretion. General Gascoigne has no means of defending himself, says the Minister of Militia. Why, he has an action for libel to-day against the Montreal "Gazette," if he ventures to take it. The hon. First Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) says he has a profound respect for a red coat. I have no respect for a cad because a red coat is on his back, not the slightest. I respect a red coat and I respect every man who is engaged, whether in Canada or in any other part of the Empire, in defence of the country, and no man will be more ready to sustain that important branch of the service than I, here and everywhere. But to say that because a man wears a red coat we must bow down like a Chinese before him and hold his person as too sacred to allow us to speak of him is an opinion I do not entertain. The Montreal "Gazette" states the facts as I have stated them with regard to Colonel Strathy, and not only that but they state that when General Gascoigne was confronted with legal process that would put him on the stand in the courts of the country to answer for his conduct, he endeavoured to take back what he had said, but was unable to do so. And the Montreal "Gazette" says that there is abundant proof of what he said and attempted to deny when face to face with legal process. This requires no elaboration on my part; these facts speak for themselves. But I express my satisfaction that the country is soon to be rid of an officer who, since he came to the country has proved himself so unfitted for the position he held. I am not a militia officer, I am not one under his command, I am not one of his professional associates—but I am in a position as a layman to judge of the conduct of militia officers, just as I am to judge of the conduct of anybody else. I say that tried by everything that involves manly, straightforward, independent able discharge of public duties, General Gascoigne has been the most signal failure ever sent to this country to occupy so high a position.

Mr. WALLACE. I was rather surprised that the Minister of Militia in one sentence, should condemn Colonel Strathy in the most measured terms for what he calls unsoldier-like conduct in rushing to the public press, while, in the same breath he eulogizes General Gascoigne who was guilty of the very same wrong. I think the superior officer should have set an example to his subordinate, and I think if censures are to be inflicted, a commencement should be made with the chief and most grievous sinner.

Now, the Minister of Militia said that he had it on high authority, and he himself endorsed the statement, that the militia had improved more during the past three years under General Gascoigne's management than they had for ten years before. If that is the case, I would like to ask the Minister why he so readily accepted the resignation of General Gascoigne? Why, that resignation was hardly put in before he jumped at it and accepted it at once. If we had such a valuable officer, one who had done more in three years than others had done in three or four times that length of time, the Minister of Militia was not doing his duty to the country in accepting that resignation unconditionally and so readily. I think he is bound to give an explanation of his conduct in that respect. We are told, and I think told now for the first time, that this resignation was sent in for personal reasons. That statement should have been made before. The people of this country, the press of this country have been making comments and suggesting various reasons for this resignation, and not until to-day have we been informed that those reasons were of a personal nature.

It is a well known fact that General Gascoigne is not specially needed in the British army at the present time. I regret that when the Government are coming down with a proposal enormously to increase the pay of the General commanding the Canadian forces, they should not have taken power to appoint a Canadian to that office. We have had experience in the past of the difficulties to be encountered in the appointment of a British officer, coming here, as has been the case with every one of them, without a knowledge of our Canadian militia, without a knowledge of the genius of the Canadian people, without a knowledge of the spirit which animates our Canadian volunteers, without which a General commanding cannot effectively do his work. We have been getting these British officers, and it has taken them years to get educated so as effectively to perform the duties they are called upon to perform in Canada. Very few of them, I think, have succeeded. They have always had this difficulty to contend with, that they have spent their lives in the permanent force of the British army, and they do not realize the great difference that exist between a permanent force of that character and our Canadian volunteers. As a result, there has been a great deal of friction, a great deal of unrest, a want of unification and success in the efforts of the commanding officer. We are training up in Canada many able and competent militia officers, and I think that the command of the Canadian contingent should be something that every Canadian militia officer, who devotes his time and his talents to the defence of our country, might fairly look forward to. But hitherto that has been denied them, the officer has been selected from the British army; and, as I understand, the regulations require that he shall be an officer of the British army. But, Sir, our Canadians have had experience of war, our Canadians have had experience in the theory of war, and in the drilling and organization of troops. They know the country, they know the genius of our people, and in many respects Canadians would be the best qualified to have control and management of our Canadian volunteers. As to their loyalty to the Empire, Mr. Chairman, we yield to no part of it in our loyalty and our devotion to Great Britain. Therefore there is no danger to Imperial connection, but on the contrary a cementing of those loyal influences would be secured by the appointment of a Canadian officer to command the Canadian forces.

Mr. TISDALE. I will venture to trouble the House a little longer, because the discussion has wandered to some extent from the very important matter that the House is called to pass upon. For that reason I will take the liberty of putting on the "Hansard" an important part of the correspondence, because it is more valuable and probably more cogent than anything which could be said in justifying this resolution, which, as I have said before, I have great pleasure in accepting. The first letter is addressed to the Under Secretary of State from the War Office:

I am directed by the Secretary of State for War to request you will be good enough to draw the attention of the Secretary of State for the Colonies to the inadequacy of the pay received by the General Officer commanding Canadian Dominion Militia and his aide-de-camp.

With the view of assisting Mr. Chamberlain in approaching the Canadian Government on this question, should he think fit to do so, the following summary is given of the main points for consideration:—

1. The General Officer commanding Canadian Militia is in receipt of only $4,000 (£800) a year, which rate compares very unfavourably with the pay assigned by the various Australian colonies to the commandants of their local forces, especially when the small strength of their respective commands is compared with that of the Canadian forces, which consist of 35,000 men. (See statement inclosed.)

2. The post is intended to be held by a general officer. An officer of inferior rank would not be likely to have sufficient weight and authority in the Dominion. The pay (exclusive of allowances) which a general officer can obtain in an ordinary appointment, as major general on the staff at home is £3 a day, or £1,095 a year and when unemployed his half-pay is £500 a year. There is, therefore, an obvious difficulty in inducing such an officer to accept a post so onerous as the Canadian command for only £300 a year more than half-pay when unemployed.

The Marquis of Lansdowne considers it very desirable, as a matter of Imperial policy, that this appointment should be filled by a general officer on the active list of the British army, who would, during his tenure of it, remain in touch with the authorities of the army at home. He fears, however, that it is entirely out of the question to expect the general officer concerned to maintain a proper position upon the existing rate of pay, and he, therefore, desires strongly to urge Mr. Chamberlain to press the matter upon the Canadian Government in any way he may consider most likely to be successful. It has been suggested that, as there are at present no allowances attached to this command, it might be possible to obtain an increase of the officer's emoluments in that form, and it is understood that the Adjutant General and Quartermaster General of the Dominion Militia receive $600 a year in this manner.

With regard to the post of aide-de-camp, the total pay is $1,200 a year, which is considerably less than that received by an aide-de-camp on the home establishment, who receives 15s. a day, exclusive of allowances.

The next letter is from the hon. Mr. Chamberlain. I may ask the Minister if these letters were laid on the Table?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA. No.

Mr. TISDALE. Well, the other letter is a confidential one, therefore, I will not read it. That is the main letter, and that was followed by a communication from the Governor General in regard to this matter. As I understand the proposition, it is no disparagement to the distinguished officers who have occupied the position of commandant here. These have been colonels of regiments before they came here. I understand it to be part of the intention of the Minister of Militia and Defence that this additional allowance we are asked to vote, is to enable him on the advice of, and after communication with the War Office, to procure a general officer from the British army instead of simply a colonel of a regiment. Now, that is a most important distinction, and possibly it was not fully enough explained before. But I understand that is the reason for which this is to be voted. I think we could give a considerably larger sum, and yet be within the amounts that some of the other colonies, with smaller forces, vote to-day. Now, with regard to the proposition of the hon. member for York (Mr. Wallace), I do not propose to discuss it, because both the late Government and the present Government are controlled by the Militia Act which says that the commandant shall be an officer of the British army.

Mr. WALLACE. Who was it made the Militia Act?

Mr. TISDALE. I am not sure, I think it was Cartier, and from that time up—

Mr. WALLACE. I thought it was the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. TISDALE. I thought you meant what Government was responsible.

Mr. WALLACE. Parliament can unmake it.

Mr. TISDALE. I am not raising the question, but I am saying that it has been well settled, because the late Government adopted the law and the present Government have adopted it. I may say, however, that I do not agree with my hon. friend that the time has yet come when a Canadian officer should command our militia.

Mr. CLARKE. Why not?

Mr. TISDALE. The very letter from the War Office in London gives the reason, it is that we shall be kept in close touch with the British army. There is another reason which is quite sufficient for me at the present time. We should have a general officer who has had experience in commanding a regiment, not in commanding a brigade, not largely in simply drilling corps, but an officer who has seen service in commanding large bodies of men. In case we are ever called out to active service in a foreign war, our forces will be auxiliary, and they will be kept in direct touch with the British army through an experienced general who has seen service in commanding larger bodies of troops, and who would not only command our confidence, but command the confidence of the Imperial army. I am not saying but that the time may come when this change may occur, and when it does come, I shall be prepared to support it, but the question is not raised, and I make these few observations, though they are not strictly pertinent, because there is no proposition to change the Militia Act, but there is simply before the House a proposition to increase the pay of the Major General Commanding, in order that we may get, and I emphasize this point, a thoroughly qualified commanding officer, and I understand that is the object aimed at by the Minister. I would not be prepared, however, to make even this increase, except with the understanding that we do not get a colonel of some regular regiment, but a major-general or a brigadier-general on the active list, as the hon. Under-Secretary of War intimates. That being the case, there will be a unanimous feeling, not only in the militia, but among the people of the country, that this is a wise proposition, and will be the means of preventing the troubles that have been alluded to, because I have confidence in the superior knowledge, experience and capacity of an officer who has attained the rank of General in the British army, that he will be able not only to bring military qualifications, but other qualifications necessary, proper and desirable to distinguish as between the command of a regular force and a volunteer force such as ours.

Mr. HUGHES. Representations have been made in the press in favour of the appointment of a Canadian officer to command the Canadian militia. Although it may seem a little heterodox in one of the militia, probably with some aspirations in the military line, to oppose any such scheme; nevertheless, I stand here to say that I am heartily and emphatically opposed to the command of our militia being given to an officer simply possessing training in the Canadian service. There are hundreds of high positions open to Canadians in the military service of the Empire, as compared with those offered in the Canadian service. There is no reason why a Canadian at an early day should not become Field Marshal of the British forces. We have here many able young Canadians, graduates of the Royal Military College, who have attained high rank and are considered superior officers by those in authority in the old land. What is to hinder these men in the near future attaining high rank, because not very many years have elapsed since Lord Roberts and Lord Wolseley were juniors in the service, and the whirligig of time may bring one of our Canadians to the command of the Imperial service. Should there be in the Imperial service a Canadian of rank to command our militia, there would be no objection to bringing this officer back and placing him in command of our forces. Take, however, any officer of the permanent, country or city corps and place him at the head of the militia, and the result would be to bring about dissensions. At no time during which an Imperial officer has been in command here, has there been anything like the trouble that would follow if a Canadian officer were placed in this position, because there are fifty or a hundred officers who think they are just as good as the other officers, and I do not think there would be any reason to suppose that one is not as good as the other. The only way to have the militia properly managed is to have members of Parliament create an enthusiasm in its favour in the country.

I congratulate the hon. gentlemen opposite on reversing their old niggardly policy and adopting a progressive policy, and I congratulate specially the hon. Minister of Militia and Major General Gascoigne on this change, and if the members of Parliament and the people would feel greater interest in the force, there is no reason why any officer of the Imperial service should have the slightest trouble whatever in commanding the militia. The trouble has arisen owing to the militia being half-hearted, owing to the department being half-hearted and owing to Parliament being less than half-hearted, and officers have been called upon to make great sacrifices, and have not been able even after making those sacrifices to maintain the high position which the force should occupy.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not desire to enter the list of military critics, but I should like to ask the Minister of Militia a question in regard to a matter of procedure. Suppose a responsible officer makes grave charges against the commander of a regiment and offers to prove his charges, they taking quite a wide range, and suppose that the officer demands an investigation, what would be the routine followed? Does it rest entirely with the General whether an investigation be held or not; or do the General and the Minister of Militia in common have certain powers in respect to it; or has the Minister himself ultimately the supreme power with respect to the matter?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA. In the first instance, the matter will go as one of routine to the General. If the officer aggrieved did not get satisfaction from that quarter, if an investigation were refused, then he would have the right to appeal to the civil head of the department, to the Minister. As a matter of fact, in matters of discipline, the General does not come to me at all until he has got through the case. Then, of course, it comes to me ultimately, to decide whether I approve or disapprove of his conclusions. If the General fails to act, I may know nothing about the case. If he acts; before his recommendation is carried into effect, I must approve of it.

Mr. FOSTER. In regard to the ultimate appeal to the Minister, what is the procedure?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA. I think it would be open to any officer to appeal direct to the Minister. The case, however, should go through the regular channel. The officer should write a letter to his commanding officer if he be a subordinate officer or if a commanding officer of a battalion should write to the district officer; from the district officer the case would go to the General, and the General would send the officer's letter to me. That is the course such an officer should take, and then the matter would be considered.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not rise to say anything in regard to criticising the proposed vote, and I may say in passing that I approve it, but I desire to refer to the criticism of the Minister of Militia and the First Minister with respect to the observations of the leader of the Opposition, when they expressed surprise that he should have availed himself of the present occasion to have addressed the committee as he has, seeing there was very little connection between the item and a commandant occupying the position of Major General Gascoigne. Now, if I understand correctly the proprieties of Parliament; it is proper that when an estimate is before the House for the purpose of paying the expenses of any department, any hon. gentleman can either criticise the management of the department or the actual incumbent of the office. In my judgment, there could be no time more appropriate than the present for the observations which were made by the hon. leader of the Opposition.

Resolution to be reported.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT.

Bill (No. 127) to further amend the Fisheries Act, was read the second time, and the House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What is the change here?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The law at present provides that fishing stands under license need not be removed from the time of low water mentioned in this clause, and the amendment provides that they shall be removed whether under license or not.

On section 2,

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. At the present time in order to overcome the regulation that the meshes shall be of the prescribed size, it is a practice to double the nets so as to make the meshes half the regulation size. This provision is that the nets shall not be arranged in any manner so as to defeat the object of the regulation.

On section 4,

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This section provides that where legally caught fish and illegally caught fish are intermingled, all of the fish may be forfeited.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It came up in connection with lobster fishing.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY.

The House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Ocean and River Service—Maintenance and repairs to Government steamers. $112,000

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. How comes this decrease of $400?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I cut it off because I found that the service could be performed for the round sum of $112,000. The steamers are the "Newfield," "Lansdowne," "Stanley" (when used in the summer service), "Aberdeen," "Quadra" and "Druid."

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What has become of the "Canadienne"?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. She is going on this year in the fishery protection service.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Is the "Lansdowne" going to be used this year for the tidal service?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not this year; we cannot spare her.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Is any vessel?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We have no vessel to spare for the tidal survey this year. The tidal survey will be the usual service that Mr. Dawson carries on. He has seven tide gauges in different parts of the river and Gulf of St. Lawrence. I consulted with Mr. Dawson and he thinks that by having some one to inspect them he can be better employed here in tabulating the results and forwarding them to the Hydrographic Office in England. I have a special vote for that.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Is the hon. gentleman going to add to the vessels on the Pacific Coast?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not this year. I hope to press on my colleagues some day in the near future the propriety of an appropriation to have a vessel detailed there for the fishery service, so as to confine the "Quadra" to the marine branch.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Is the "Quadra" used now by the Customs Department?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not to any extent. She is at present up the coast with Col. Anderson, superintendent of lights.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is her regular service, but is she not used for customs work?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not that I know of.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Is there an arrangement between the two departments as there used to be, for a division of the charge, when a vessel is used by another department than that to which she is primarily charged?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Department of Customs has the "Constance," and the "Stanley" will be specially detailed this summer for customs work; and of course they will be charged against that department.

Mr. CLARKE. I notice it stated in one of the papers that some of these fishery protection vessels are being armed with Gatling guns. May I ask if that is so?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is so. I thought that, instead of having old-fashioned guns which were of very little use, on these fishery protection boats, it was desirable to have one or two modern quick-firing guns; and I was fortunate enough to be able to secure from my hon. friend the Minister of Militia a number of these, and one is being placed on board of each of the fishery cruisers.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think that is a move in the right direction, and I shall be glad when the Government is able to improve the fishery protection vessels in every respect, so that they may be serviceable for any contingency that may arise. I think it would be proper for the Government to consider the desirability of having vessels which would command more respect than schooners or pleasure yachts; and I have reason to believe that the Minister of Marine has given some attention to the subject of having for this service a better class of vessels, which could be used for other purposes should occasion require. Is the hon. gentleman able to say in this connection whether he has had before him any proposition from a society or organization in Toronto with regard to the improvement of this service?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes. I have had very important representations made to me from the society in Toronto, and from other parts of the Dominion, as to the necessity of improving our fishery protection service, so that it should afford some protection to our marine and to our ports and harbours. That subject has been receiving the consideration, not only of myself, but of my colleagues before whom I have brought it; and I am in hopes that before the session ends I may be in a position to propose a small vote in that direction. When that comes down, I shall be happy to discuss the question fully with my hon. friend, and I am sure he will strengthen my hands in that matter.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.
Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I quite agree that the present fishery protection boats are not quite as effective for purpose of attack and defence as they might be; and, so far as my voice goes, it will be my care to see, that if any addition is made to that fleet, the vessels shall be fitted to receive a reasonable number of guns and a reasonable amount of armament, so as to protect themselves and to afford some protection to the ports and harbours in the vicinity where they ply.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. When I was in the Department of Marine, I adopted a plan which worked very well indeed for the short time it was tried. It was this. We found that in connection with the protection service we got a splendid class of men as seamen for a limited period. We put them under regular discipline and training, instructing them in revolver shooting, sword exercise, and so on—in fact, such regular discipline as they would have on a man-of-war. After the season was over, these men had nothing to do in the Government service; and they got places much cleaner and nicer in every way than the hard and rough life of seamen on the coast. Preferring not to go back to that life, they went to other countries and entered the navy. Many of them entered the United States navy to carry on the profession which we had practically taught them. That was not desirable from any point of view. To counteract that, the scheme I speak of was adopted by the department, and I want to know how far it is in force at present. We took the pick of the men, and after the season of the protection service was over, we put them on the payroll of the vessels on marine duty, such as the supply boats that serve the lighthouses. We had more men than were required for those boats in the winter, but we had them available for the spring. I see nothing in the reports about that system, and I would ask the hon. gentleman if he has continued to carry it out.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I may say that I have carried it out, at a great deal of personal inconvenience to myself. Many of our friends were under the impression that these vessels should be supplied with new hands every spring; but, at the risk of some personal unpopularity, I have adhered to the old system, because I thought it was a wise and judicious system. I have retained the old hands on board, and have continued the system of promotion, thus making the whole service one as far as possible; and, so far as I know, since I have had charge of the department, Commander Spain has enforced the discipline quite as fully as before. But I prefer to leave this matter open, because it is so intimately allied with the proposition which I hope to submit for still greater improvement in the training of our naval force. I am in hopes of submitting a scheme whereby we may train annually a certain number of seamen, so as to constitute them into an effective naval reserve, and so that no man shall be employed on any Government ship until he has received that training and a certificate. But I would prefer to leave that matter until I bring down the proposition.

Mr. KAULBACH. When is it the intention that the fleet for the patrol service shall proceed to the waters of the North Atlantic? It is desirable that it should go as soon as the run of mackerel comes from the south.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Commander Spain has gone, and he is now commissioning his vessels without any delay.

Mr. CLARKE. I do not know whether this is the time to inquire about the granting of fishing licenses on the waters of the great lakes. I communicated with the hon. gentleman on behalf of one of my constituents who applied for a license and whose request could not be granted.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is hardly germane to the vote before the committee. The system on the great lakes has been to grant licenses largely to the local fishermen. Of late years, the past season particularly, the fishermen who sail out from the north shore lakes—Goderich and other places which I call the north shore, I do not know whether I am right or not—desire to have their licenses made out so as to allow them to follow the fish south, but the fishermen of the southern parts protest very vigorously against that, and I have had numerous protests made by the captain of the "Petrel" and other qualified gentlemen against this. I, therefore, am disposed to adhere to the system I found in operation. There are some advantages which could possibly be urged in favour of the change, but weighing them against the disadvantages, I have been unable to come to the conclusion that the present system ought to be changed.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. How much does the hon. gentleman estimate for such steamers? In the Auditor General's Report, I find that instead of costing $112,000 they cost $136,000.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That comprises the "Stanley," $26,250.25, which is not in the present estimate. You will find that that will exactly make the $112,000. The "Stanley" has been detailed for other work, and is therefore not in this item.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Is the "Douglas" going to be held on to?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is tied up at the wharf at Victoria and has been for years. I have had a couple of offers at $2,000, but would not listen to them for the reason that I may employ it on a hydrographic survey of the coasts of British Columbia, for which it might be used effectively. The great trouble is, she is such an expensive boat to run, but I thought it would be better to keep her at any rate than sell her for $2,000.

Mr. KAULBACH. I hope the hon. gentleman will not consider that I am departing from the usual practice by taking too wide a range in this discussion, but the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) having referred to the drill or practice on board these government cutters. I desire to offer a word or two in that connection.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not want to be dragged into a discussion of this matter unless it is really necessary, but would prefer that the hon. gentleman would reserve his remarks until the vote comes down for that subject.

Mr. KAULBACH. As I may not be here then, I desire to say a word or two now. There is a young man residing in my town, who has been on board the steamship or man of war "Blake," and is thoroughly well drilled in his work as an able seaman in every particular. He has been on board one of the steam cutters in the patrol service last year, and reported as a very excellent man. Last autumn, when the vessel was taken off the service, he was discharged and left to paddle his own canoe. I would like to ask the Minister whether he could not possibly manage to retain his services, as I would not like to have him leave the country. I may say his habits are excellent, and in every particular I can recommend him as worthy of the employ of the service. His name is Alfred Wood.

An hon. MEMBER. Politics.

Mr. KAULBACH. No, not politics at all. If he has any, it may be the other way.

Mr. McDUGALL. I want to ask whether the Registry of Shipping has been completed and distributed, because I find an item in the Estimates for this purpose?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is not in this item, and we will come to it in a moment.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Is there a general officer for supervising the repairs of steamers?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, except Captain McElhinney, who is a nautical officer. We have them of course in different places.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I understand that Mr. Stevens was the inspector of steamboats, and Mr. Stewart, of Charlottetown, was appointed inspector in his place.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not at Charlottetown.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It was Stewart, or some name like that. At any rate, he was appointed before the late Government was defeated, and Mr. Stevens, a very experienced man, who had been inspector for quite a number of years at Halifax, was appointed to the position of general supervisor of repairs for these steamers, one of the largest items that go to make up this amount, and a great deal of abuse can occur from negligence or anything of that kind under this head. The idea was to have Mr. Stevens in full charge of these steamers, at any rate those in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, so that these repairs might be made as required and made with the strictest economy.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is carried out still.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Is the hon. gentleman able to say how the experiment has resulted? I found that private steamship companies, for instance, the "Cunard" and others, had an officer like that whom they paid well—a first-class man of course—but I have never seen anything to show whether the experiment resulted in a reduction in the amount required for repairs.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have not had my attention called to that, but will look into it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. For that reason, this item ought to be a declining one, and we have only a reduction of $400.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is pretty hard to make them decline, I notice.

Mr. FOSTER. Harder now than it was before.

Rewards for saving life..... $7,000

Mr. INGRAM. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Marine if Mr. Berry has been dismissed from the lifeboat station at Port Stanley?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am not aware that he has.

Mr. INGRAM. I was informed that he had been.

Mr. FOSTER. Can my hon. friend inform me whether any change has been made in the keeper of the lifeboat station at Wellington?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. None that I am aware of.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish the hon. gentleman would inquire of his deputy.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My deputy cannot recall the facts, but I will make inquiry and give the information before my estimates go through.

Mr. FOSTER. Probably I had better give the Minister the information, and he can think it over. The statement was made in a letter received this morning that the officer on the lifeboat station at Wellington has been for 15 years in the service and captain of the life-saving station. He has received a letter notifying him of his dismissal, and stating that the lifeboat is to be removed to Weller's Beach. From what is said, this seems to be a bad move, as the new location is not well chosen. The statement I have is that during these 15 years the station has been well kept and the officer in charge of it has given good service and been thoroughly satisfactory, and he does not know why he has been dismissed.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Now that the hon. gentleman mentions details to my mind, I recollect something of the case. The change has nothing to do with the officer, no charge against him having been made. But representations were made to the department as to the necessity for changing the location, and I have had reports made by the inspector and by Captain McElhinney, who has charge of the life stations, and these officers recommend the change. As the life station is to be removed, of course the present officer cannot be captain.

Mr. FOSTER. If it would not be too much trouble, perhaps the Minister will ask his officers to put these papers together that I may have an opportunity to see them. There is no charge, so far as this letter is concerned, that politics has anything to do with the change.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPEPR. Is there not a mistake in the heading of this item? I should think there would be danger of difference with the Auditor General if this were voted as simply "Rewards for saving life." These men are under salary and considerable sums must be paid out for building boats, buying boats, maintenance, and so on.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My deputy tells me that this is the form that the vote has always taken.

The Auditor General is always especially careful not to allow the expenditure of a dollar unless it comes within the appropriation, has not raised any doubt about this so far.

Mr. McDUGALL. The heads under which these expenditures are entered in the Auditor General's Report is "Lifeboat stations, &c."

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I propose to add, with the consent of the committee, "including life-saving stations."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McDUGALL. Are there any changes being made in the life-saving service of Scatary, Cape Breton? I have heard the rumour that some change was in contemplation.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No.

Mr. BRITTON. Reverting to the subject of the Wellington life station, as it is near my constituency, and as I know something of the locality, I may say a word with reference to what the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) has said. Wellington station is not considered a desirable location, because it is in a bay and would not be easily within reach in case of disaster. This has been a ground of complaint on the part of captains for some time, and efforts have been made to have the station moved to Weller's Beach.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the distance?

Mr. BRITTON. Between 30 and 40 miles. I do not know whether the Minister has decided upon the change, but there is a considerable feeling in favour of it. There has been some apparatus, a boat and so on, at South Bay, which will be rendered unnecessary if this removal takes place.

Mr. FOSTER. It may be a very desirable change. I do not know.

Registry of Shipping $500

Mr. McDUGALL. I would like to know whether this publication is complete now and whether it is distributed or not.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We are not publishing one this year; it is only published every second year.

Mr. McDUGALL. I had a number of demands for the book. Was one published last year?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, but it is not in the expenditure of last year. The expenditure of last year included $104 paid to the Board of Trade in England for measuring tapes, a subscription to the "Register Veritas," and printing, stationery and supplies from the Queen's Printer.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.
What was the printing last year?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Forms of all kinds.

Tidal Service $2,590

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. From what the hon. Minister said in connection with maintenance and repairs of Government steamers, I am afraid he has overlooked entirely the importance of this subject. He certainly is not carrying out the recommendations of his chief engineer. So much has been said in the press, including papers friendly to the Government and papers of a non-political character, that if nothing is done, those who are well informed as to the importance of this subject will be greatly disappointed. The question of a proper tidal survey is one that, I think, ought to have been grappled with by a country like Canada before now. It seems to be a disgrace that a country so well known for its large shipping should be in such a position as Canada is in compared with other countries in this respect.

The United States, for instance, are in this very connection humiliating us to a very great degree, according to information I have received, in suggesting that they be given permission to do a little of this work on our Pacific Coast, seeing that we won't do it, and that their vessels are running risks that every vessel has to run where she cannot have scientific information concerning the currents, and so on. The reports teem with information from valuable officers in our own service as to the dangerous condition of the very important waterways of Canada. Take the Gulf and River St. Lawrence, take the report long ago made by that able officer now gone, Lieut. Gordon, who sailed up and down that gulf, and where, from personal investigation into the matter, he found, if I remember aright, that going by all the guides now open to a navigator at night, taking his own calculations and all other means at his disposal, his vessel, by means of these unknown currents, would be eighteen miles out of its course in twelve hours. That is a terrible statement to make, showing at once that in the opinion of many those great losses in the gulf and in the straits to our big ships have been due to the action of these unknown currents. Take the case of the "Montreal" and several other vessels, the loss of which men well up on this subject have attributed to the fact that masters had to navigate a place where the ship was affected by currents of which they could know nothing whatever. Now, this subject was first broached by men like Prof. Johnson, of McGill, backed, as his opinion was, by those interested in large ships, and by all captains who have studied their profession carefully, who have the advantage of the tidal service of Great Britain as they leave British ports, who have the advantage of the tidal surveys of India on the Indian coasts, who have the advantage of the tidal service of the United States coast, splendidly done by a trained and skilful service. When this gentleman some years ago pressed the subject upon the late Government, they were unable to deal with it. But he continued to press the subject, and the Royal Society took the matter up and looked into the question. These reports of our own officers could not longer be overlooked. We ought at the start to have taken an appropriation of something like $40,000 a year to put the work through. Instead of that, the best that could be done when the matter was brought up was an appropriation of some $10,000 a year. It would take longer to accomplish as much, but the work was of course the same as would be required had we started with a more generous appropriation. But supplementing that, in my department, we used the "Lansdowne," the expense of which was not borne by the $10,000. Much work was done, and an attempt was made to grapple with this subject. Now, the hon. gentleman has whittled the whole thing down to an appropriation of $2,500 for salaries merely. It is a bitter disappointment to the people who have studied the subject, apart wholly from any political question. I ventured a short time ago to press upon the Prime Minister the views I am referring to, in the hope that the subject would come before the Minister of Marine and Fisheries before these Estimates were completed, and that ample provision would be made. I do not propose at this time to go very fully into the subject, though it could be enlarged upon at length. You have an expert officer who is specially brought into the service for this object. I am certain he never would have been appointed under an estimate of only $2,500. Mr. Dawson came into the service particularly in connection with this work, and the provision that was made then in order to justify his appointment and make it useful was a minimum of $10,000, and, as I say, we afterwards got the advantage of the Government ship that involved so much additional to the $10,000 annual appropriation. That is dropped altogether, and we are asked now to vote this sum, which, as the Minister says, will simply enable them to take observation of those gauges that have been put up at different parts of the coast, but will not enable a single current to be surveyed, nor its strength to be calculated. So that work practically stops and the department proposes to use the money simply for the purpose of looking after these gauges that have been erected at different places, and the department is now to lose altogether the knowledge and experience of this valuable officer. Let us see what the hon. gentleman's own report says on this subject. Of course, the officer immediately in charge might be supposed to exaggerate the importance of his particular work, but the chief engineer over that officer, dealing with this subject, says, in his report to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries :

In consequence of the material reduction in the vote for the tidal and current survey it was necessary to abandon for the season all work in connection with observations and currents.

That is last year, under an estimate of $2,500, that work proper had to stop.

The sum allotted for the service barely suffices for the maintenance of the seven tide-gauges previously established ; and to utilize the records obtained from them, which are yearly increasing in value, some help will have to be given the engineer in charge, and some additional outlays incurred to pay for computation.

We cannot even compute these records, we cannot even make proper use, for the purposes of navigation, of the very gauges the hon. gentleman says he is going to look after. His chief engineer tells him that. There is a halt called. Then there is a very large waste of money in doing valueless work, that is to say, simply to keep the gauges in order, but no computations can be made which are so much required to be printed in the standard nautical journals.

THE MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is nothing to prevent these computations being made.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The chief engineer says that you cannot do it with $2,500.

THE MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, what I understood him to say was that you could not carry on the current work.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is my point. No one will dispute that the survey of the current stops absolutely with the drop in the appropriation. Some work has been done in the survey of the current, and I am going to give testimony as to the great value of that work. Now, upon the point that we cannot make these computations for these annual publications all over the world for the use of mariners, here is what he says :

To utilize the records obtained from them, which are yearly increasing in value, some help will have to be given the engineer in charge, and some additional outlay incurred to pay for computation.

We are therefore in this unfortunate condition. We are not starving in this country, the service is not so hard-up that a useful public work has to be abandoned in this faint-hearted way. $12,000 can be got to prosecute or persecute, whichever you like to call it, political opponents, to employ Pinkerton detectives and let them loose over the province of Manitoba, resulting in the conviction of one man who had entered into a conspiracy to raise $800 out of the Conservative committee. $12,000 can go to four or five lawyers in Winnipeg and other political heelers, and thus be thrown away; but you cannot give $10,000 for a work that would be of interest to the whole world, and of use to every ship that sails our Canadian waters. That is the position in which practically the Marine Department appears before the House. The chief engineer—and I am reading only an extract from his report—says :

I am particularly anxious to have an investigation of the currents between Cape Breton Island and Cape Race undertaken, as soon as the necessary funds and a steamer can be allotted for the work.

I have overlooked a very important fact. There has been communication between the Government of England and Canada in regard to what contribution we should make toward the defence of the Empire. These large proposals have their advocates, and many views are expressed in this connection. Whatever may be said in regard to British vessels being in Canadian waters to protect this country, we appear to forget the risk they run owing to the lack of this information which we should supply. To such an extent is this the case, that we are in the humiliating position that England has been paying year after year for work we will not do in our own waters. During some years we were good enough to meet half the cost of work done by the hydrographers of the Admiralty for surveys on our own Canadian coast. We have neglected our duty—I am not blaming this Government for that—but Canada has not surveyed the coast which the Imperial vessels have to navigate. The Imperial authorities have accordingly done the best they could. In the first place they did the work at their own cost, and later the Canadian Government agreed to pay half of the cost of surveys on our own coasts, and the "Gulnare" was employed.

THE MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. She is there yet.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is no one who would not bear out the testimony of Lieutenant Gordon, who was himself in the Imperial service, and the officers of the Marine Department as to the great importance of carrying out this work at the earliest possible moment, and there is no reason why this duty should not be well and thoroughly performed. Another circumstance that should bring a blush to the cheek of Canadians is set out in the report of the chief engineer, as follows :—

I also learn that the publishers of the British Columbia Almanac are indebted to the United States Government for the tide tables of British Columbia waters which they issue. I beg to draw attention to the desirability that tidal observations in British Columbia waters should be made and the records reduced for use by our own service.

So it appears we have not done the work that other colonies have completed and we are not taking proper care of our shipping; we have not done the work that the United States have done on their own coast, and which they have attempted to do on our coast as we have neglected the work. Together with the chief engineer's report we may take that of the officer in charge of the service. He says:

Little attention has been given to the currents in Northumberland Strait, and around Prince Edward Island, or to the tidal currents of the lower St. Lawrence from Anticosti to Quebec, as some knowledge had first to be obtained of the Gulf currents and their relation to the ocean. A further examination of the currents in the Strait of Belle Isle is also desirable, to obtain more complete data for its tidal character.

It appears as if we cannot afford to obtain this information, although we have an officer well qualified to do the work, and whose work has been accepted by the Admiralty authorities in Great Britain.

The work has been carried on with the assistance of one of the supply steamers of the lighthouse and buoy service,—

That was several years ago.

—which has been placed at the disposal of this survey for the three months of July, August and September in each season, which was as long as it could be spared from its other duties; but it has proved unsuitable for the purpose, as it is so slow and unwieldy as to add materially to the difficulty of carrying out the work to advantage, and the time allowed cuts the season too short, even with the best endeavour, to take advantage of every available day, and to make the observations continuous day and night. The further surveys of the currents was discontinued this season to save expense to the department, and when it is resumed a steamer of suitable character and properly equipped for the purpose should be made available for the work, and in some regions one or two schooners, if properly fitted out, could be used with advantage as auxiliaries.

Members from Montreal and gentlemen familiar with the business there and on the St. Lawrence are well aware that this subject affects every shipowner as regards the rates of insurance. The Montreal Board of Trade has brought the subject forward in connection with the national waterway of Canada, and have pointed out that Canadian rates of insurance are very seriously affected. Enormous rates are paid compared with the insurance rates on other waters. This subject was under the consideration of the board as late as 15th March of the present year, as I observe by a report of the proceedings, and no doubt they have pressed the subject on the attention of the Government. Then we have a statement from the Chairman of the Board of Examiners of Masters and Mates, and I think the view of that experienced navigator, who was for some time commodore of the Allan Line is important. He could tell the Minister the risks incurred by the vessels of the line, and especially by slow boats navigating the St. Lawrence, owing to the absence of this information. He understands the subject thoroughly, and he is aware as to the value of such information in approaching the British Isles, and as regards the danger that will always exist in connection with navigating the gulf, which every captain enters with anxiety. If hon. gentlemen opposite are anxious in regard to the fast line service, they know the merits of the St. Lawrence route will be investigated before any man asked to take a pecuniary interest in the fast line will agree to make an investment. If the dangers are such as are reported, and if the Government do not take the trouble to make as far as possible navigation safe, how do the Government expect the contractors for the fast line service to be able to establish their line, and go before the public and secure capital with which to build the necessary vessels; and, in fact, their chances of success are very much reduced if the Government will not see that all these dangers to navigation are as far as possible provided against. No one will deny that when investors take up the records of success on the Allan Line and find that the experienced navigator of such a fine ship as the "Montreal" attributed the disaster to the vessel to unknown currents, that public attention will be given to the subject. When they read in regard that a steamer was drawn towards Anticosti by unknown currents and nothing but daylight and the experience of the navigator saved the vessel from running on that island, it will be apparent that further investigation should be made of the route. Looking back at the report of Captain Smith made in 1897, I find he said:

In December, 1895, I received a letter from the department stating that it was carrying on a survey of tides and currents on the coast, by which important additions to its knowledge was being obtained, and informing me that the latest knowledge of this character would be included in the subjects for examination before my board, and I notified the instructors of navigation to that effect. The information gained from a survey of the Gulf of St. Lawrence and Straits of Belle Isle made for the purpose of ascertaining the movement of the tides and currents of those waters, will, no doubt, be of much service to mariners, and the inauguration of the method of continuous tidal records obtained from the automatic gauges placed at some of the principal parts of our coast and other places in the gulf, will no doubt hereafter prove beneficial and assist in the safe navigation of all classes of vessels. The influences which act upon the waters of the Gulf of St. Lawrence are ever changing, making it most difficult for officers of ships to calculate the force and direction of the tidal currents with any degree of certainty.

There is the statement of a man who has spent his life navigating these waters, and who now in an official position testifies as to the great importance of our having what other maritime nations of the world had long ago :

Mr. W. Bell Dawson, who conducted the survey, has given much valuable information upon the subject, and it is to be hoped the Government will see their way to prosecute this useful work for many years, as the short time occupied in the survey is not sufficient to give any proper knowledge of the movements of the tides.

I have not in my hand, though I should like to have been able to give it to the committee, the remarks from other authorities upon the value of this work. You have, however, enough to show, not only that it is useful but that it is an absolutely necessary work for the successful carrying on of the shipping business around our coasts and particularly up the Gulf of St. Lawrence. You have the fact that the representations of all these interests in Montreal have been most anxious in connection with the matter. We have had the advantage, for which we have not had to pay, of the valuable advice of such men as Prof. Johnson, and of a non-political body like the Royal Society of Canada quoting the testimony of able men who are competent to give valuable advice, on the subject. You have the pressure of the Montreal Board of Trade, and you have the opinion of the underwriters, such as Major Edward Bond, who have given a great deal of attention to the subject. The Government have been pressed, not merely for the increase of this $2,500 item, but strong arguments have been produced to show that the former vote was altogether too small, and that it meant that we had to take several years to do what a larger appropriation would have enabled the Government to have done in a couple of years. It is a most disheartening thing to see that instead of there being an increase to the annual vote of $10,000, the hon. Minister should ask for a mere $2,500, which his own officer tells him is not enough to enable him to utilize for practical purposes the information which these gauges supply, and which gauges have been set up at considerable cost.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have listened to the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) with a good deal of interest, and I am not by any means insensible to the importance of the work which he has spoken of. I call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that it was quite impossible for this work to be undertaken unless we had a steamer built for the purpose or a special steamer chartered. $10,000 would hardly pay for the steamer if I hired her, and it would cost fifty or sixty thousand dollars if we built a steamer. I did not feel justified, in the present state of my mind on this question, in asking my colleagues to vote sixty or seventy thousand dollars until I had thoroughly satisfied myself that this was a very pressing necessity. We are asking the country to spend enormous sums of money on the aids to navigation in the River and Gulf of St. Lawrence, for it would be most unfortunate if the slightest suspicion got abroad that we were not doing our very best to light, and guard our coasts from the danger of accidents. We are constructing on Belle Isle Island, at very great cost, a magnificent lighthouse and fog alarm. We are constructing, or propose to construct the coming summer, on the southern side of the Belle Isle Straits another lighthouse which was recommended to us by the consensus of opinion of the captains of the ocean-going steamers. I have at the present moment a report to my colleagues, which may or may not be adopted, for the expenditure of a very large sum of money in the St. Lawrence River, near the Traverse, to put a permanent light there instead of the floating light. That will require a very large sum of money. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works is now having a most elaborate and perfect survey made of the channel of the River St. Lawrence, in order that he may make the navigation of that river as safe as a liberal expenditure of money can make it. I am not insensible to the importance of the subject, but, as the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) knows, there are limitations which surround every Minister, and you cannot get all the money you want. There is such a gentleman as the Minister of Finance who stands guard and cuts down and cuts out, too.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What provision for any necessary public work has been cut down except this ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Lots of them.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not notice any.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I state to my hon. friend that I have not got a ship, and therefore that part of the service to which he refers, of taking the force of the currents, cannot be gone on with this year. I may tell him that all the work which was suggested to me by Dr. Dawson that he could perform will be carried out by him this summer in the Bay of Fundy, and I have had a supplementary estimate made up, after careful consultation with him, to add to this sum, which is before my colleagues and which I have no doubt will be approved by them. This summer we will not only have the tide gauges and the preparation of the results obtained from them done here by a staff of officers, but we will have all the work done which Mr. Dawson is prepared to carry out in the Bay of Fundy. Although he will not have a ship at his disposal, he will, I suppose, take a survey to some extent of the currents.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He cannot do that without a ship.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not know exactly, but I suppose he will go with Captain Pratt. At all events, whatever he is able to do he will do, and there is a sum in the supplementary estimates for that. I am considering the question very carefully, not only from personal consultations with captains of ocean-going ships, but by reading those reports which the hon. gentleman has referred to. It may be that in the near future I will be able to convince my colleagues of the supreme importance of this phase of the case, and perhaps get enough money to build or charter a ship to carry the work on. At the present time, I do not do it simply because I have not got the ship, and cannot get her this year.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would implore the hon. Minister to not yet give up the hope of getting the money in the supplementary estimates for the charter of a ship.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am not giving up the work in this direction by any means. I have arranged with Dr. Dawson this year that his services will be engaged part of this summer in the Bay of Fundy, and I have a sum in the supplementary estimates for carrying out the work he himself recommended.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am delighted that the hon. Minister is going to do more than this item provides for, and I would urge upon him to press his colleagues with more earnestness than perhaps he has used before, for enough money to charter a vessel. Surely the hon. gentleman can obtain that if his colleagues agree with him, and they should agree with him, backed up as he is by all the authorities I have mentioned, in the contention that there is pressing need for this work and that it ought to have been done long ago.

Mr. McDUGALL. I find here these items: A. Blakeney, wages and expenses, as observer at Sydney, June to October, 1896, $139; George G. Hare, travel to North Sydney, October 1 to November 7, 1896, $64.55; John Harpel, observer at East Bay, nineteen days, $38.50. I do not know any man of the name of John Harpel at East Bay, nor of any services of this kind. There is no tide there, and no work that could be done, unless making a report on the tide at Port Sydney.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am not able to give the hon. gentleman the information, because no part of the work was done under my authority. It was done under my predecessor. I have no doubt it was quite proper, but I never heard of the man, and certainly gave no authority for the work.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

Mr. McDUGALL. Will the hon. Minister let me know later on?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will promise to make the necessary inquiries.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is so obliging that I assume that the usual course will be followed of allowing a certain latitude in the discussion of these matters in concurrence.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Certainly.

Removal of obstructions in navigable rivers $1,000

Mr. POWELL. I wish to refer to an item that is passed. Before making a few remarks on the subject, I would like to ask the Minister as to the circumstances which justify an investigation into a wreck—whether the mere fact that a wreck has occurred is sufficient, or whether there must be some special circumstances. I would like him to state the general principles on which investigations are held.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There are no arbitrary principles. There are two investigations: one preliminary and the other more full and complete. The application is made to the Minister, and if sufficient information is laid before him to satisfy him that an investigation is required, it takes place under statute. I can give no definition or how much information is required.

Mr. POWELL. The case I refer to is the case of the vessel "John McLeod," which was lost last summer. One of the chief owners of the vessel is Mr. Troop, of St. John, N.B., and there has been considerable correspondence between him and the department. As soon as the papers are brought down, I will call attention to the matter.

Winter mail service.....$7,000

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman last year took a special vote of $21,000 for an experiment in this service. Will he shortly state what was the result of the experiment?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The experiment was not successful. I requested Captain McElhinney to have an examination made of all the boats available in Canada, and any that he thought could be obtained in the neighbouring republic, if none were available here, for the purpose of making the experiment. After looking over the different boats available, he selected the "Petrel." In the opinion of many, she had not sufficient horsepower, but with that exception it was thought by Captain McElhinney and others that she was suitable and would be a success.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Where was she got ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. She was got somewhere on the lakes above Kingston. She was sent down and commenced the service between Summerside and Cape Tormentine. She ran there satisfactorily for a little while, but when the winter storms came on, she was nipped by the ice inside the Tormentine breakwater or pier. In a north-west storm, the captain took her to the eastern side of the pier for shelter, and she became bound inside the "L," and when the ice made and piled up, she could not be got out, although time and money were spent in the effort to get her out. Therefore, she did not do one-twentieth of the work it was hoped she would have done. Towards the spring she did some work, but on the whole I could not pronounce the experiment a success.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What did the experiment cost ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. About $11,000.

Mr. FOSTER. What did the experiment consist in—in taking soundings ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, in sending a steamer to see if it was possible to keep a channel open during the winter months between Cape Tormentine and Cape Traverse. It has been held by residents for many years that owing to the tides meeting at that particular point, there is more loose ice there than anywhere else, and the vessel was sent to test that. The ice which bound the vessel at Cape Tormentine became so enormously thick, owing to a north-west storm. It was piled up five to ten feet thick. That was a misfortune which could not be helped, and for which the captain could not be censured. It was due to one of the storms that frequently take place in the fall of the year, and which nobody could predict. Unfortunately, therefore, the experiment did not give the result hoped for, although it cost $11,000.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Was that boat his own choice ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, Captain McElhinney reported it as suitable, and the only suitable one he could get.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What did he say about the horse-power ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He said that it was not sufficient.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yet the vessel satisfied him.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It was the only one that could be got in Canada that would suit. The hon. gentleman will find all the information he requires in the report.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. From whom was this vessel got ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. From the Collins Bay Rafting Company.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Was she bought outright ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, she was chartered for eight months during the winter, at the price of $7,000.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Was she one of the boats of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No ; he had nothing whatever to do with it.

Mr. POWELL. Was the experiment conclusive as to the feasibility of the attempt ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No.

Mr. POWELL. I am very much pleased to learn that the hon. gentleman did not purchase the boat, because the experiment was simply absurd. She was unable to go through the smallest quantity of ice. When the straits were calm as a mill-pond, she was able to make her trips, but the very first frost put an end to them, and I think the best thing to do with her was to put her in the "L," in which she was located the rest of the winter.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The experiment was not a success, but the hon. gentleman is not correct at all in his description. The boat was far different from what he leads us to suppose it was. Captain McElhinney reported that she was an excellent one and very fast.

Mr. POWELL. Eight miles an hour.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. She might not have been much faster than eight or nine knots an hour. She went between Summerside and Cape Tormentine, but no boat would have been able to make its way through the thickness of ice accumulated a mile out from the wharf. Instructions were given to the captain to keep outside the edge of the bord ice, under any circumstances almost, so that he might be in a position to run across. We know that the bord ice runs a mile and a half from the shore, and it was impossible for any boat to get through it. It could only cross from the edge of the bord ice on one side to its edge on the other. Even a boat of 80 or 100 horse-power could not have cut its way through the ice from the edge of the wharf. I sent down Captain McElhinney to take charge in addition to Captain Macdonald, and nobody has greater experience than Captain McElhinney, but it was one of those misfortunes that could not be helped.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Before recess, the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) desired to ask a question, and as he is not here, I am perfectly willing that he should ask it on any other item. He wanted to know if I had obtained Captain McElhinney's report, which was brought down to the Senate, and I said that I had sent for it. It is not a part of this item, but there was a supplementary vote taken last year, and we were discussing whether the steamer "Petrel" had been a success or not in the experiment provided for by that vote.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Were her services secured direct from the owners?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, the owners of the boat are in Ontario. She was employed on the lakes previously, and we chartered her for seven months and sent her back at the end of that time.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I suppose that $7,000 covers all the service.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I did not know that the removal of the obstructions of navigable rivers was under the hon. gentleman's department.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, we always take $1,000 for that, and last year we spent $671.

Mr. MONTAGUE. You could easily spend the balance of $429 in the Grand River.

Mr. McDOUGALL. What tonnage was the "Petrel"?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I could not say.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I thought I understood before six o'clock that her speed was seven or eight knots?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Eight or nine knots.

Mr. McDOUGALL. A boat of that speed could not be a success in that experiment.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. She was not powerful—only about forty horse-power.

Mr. McDOUGALL. She could not be anything but a saller, running only eight knots.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is all.

Mr. POWELL. Before the item is adopted, in pursuance with what I intimated when we were about closing at six o'clock, I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the "John McLeod." This comes fairly under the 4th item on page 199. It seems that last summer one of our largest ship-owners in the maritime provinces, named Howard Troop, who was at the time managing owner and a very large registered owner of this vessel the "John McLeod," was unfortunate enough to have her cast away by the master in attempting to enter the harbour of Halifax. Mr. Troop states that he immediately notified the Department of Marine and Fisheries and the department caused a preliminary investigation to take place, of which preliminary investigation, he says, no notice was given to him. The circumstances of the loss were peculiar. The captain attempted to enter that harbour during a very dense fog and at night time, and, when making or approaching the land, he failed to keep his lead going, and the result was that the vessel ran on the rocks and became a complete wreck. As she was a valuable ship, the loss to him was very great. At the preliminary investigation, of which he had no notification, and therefore no opportunity of attending, the evidence taken was chiefly the evidence of the captain. The report made by the officer who had charge of the investigation to the department, and his conclusion, approved of by Captain McElhinney, the adviser of the department, was to the effect that this vessel, under the guidance of the captain, was nearing the coast during a dense fog without any lead being kept going. It was found that the captain was very much to blame. Notwithstanding that he was shown to be very much to blame and that this vessel was lost because of his negligence, his certificate was not cancelled, and the captain is now credentialed as a first-class master mariner and able to take vessels to any part of the world. This extensive ship-owner complains very much that the department should have taken the course it did. Though I do not look on the action of the department as quite as bad as Mr. Troop regards it, yet I think it would be well, in future cases of loss, where the investigation is held, to notify the parties interested, so that they may have an opportunity to appear and produce their witnesses. In this case the captain alone was examined. The seamen were allowed to go, and when Mr. Troop desired afterwards to have a full and complete investigation, no one who knew anything about the circumstances could be produced to give evidence. Mr. Troop thinks that wrong has been done to him and those associated with him. The commissioner who made the investigation, Captain McElhinney, considered that the captain himself, who was part owner, was sufficiently punished for his neglect of duty by the loss of his shares in the vessel. It seems at the time he was the registered owner of a large part of the vessel, about 8-64ths, or one-eighth, for himself, and a considerable number of shares beside which he held as registered owner in trust for some other person. The statement of the commissioner that the captain was punished severely enough without depriving him of his certificate is altogether groundless for the simple reason that there was a very heavy insurance, I am informed, upon his own shares, and instead of an inducement to save her, there was an inducement to cast away the vessel. Now, if the facts are as Mr. Troop supposes, and the papers substantiate his supposition, and if this vessel was cast away through barratry of the master, and a fair opportunity was not given to investigate the case, a great injustice has been done. I do not feel like charging the head of the department in this case, or even any particular individual in the department, with wilfully or maliciously injuring Mr. Troop. But I think it was incumbent upon them to give full notice of the inquiry before they entered upon it. It may be one of those cases in which good people err through force of circumstances, and error of judgment, and do innocently a great injustice to people who are without a remedy. I would ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in the interest of the ship-owning part of our population to have a thorough investigation in the first place in such cases, and not a preliminary investigation where the testimony taken will be only that of those interested on one side. All parties interested should have an opportunity to produce their testimony in order to properly bring home their guilt to parties who are guilty of crime or negligence.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The preliminary investigation in this case was held under the statute by Captain Smith, Royal Navy Reserve, the officer who has for many years conducted these investigations for the department. The examination was held in Halifax on the 17th, 18th and 19th of November. Captain Smith made his report, which, in the ordinary course, was referred by me to Captain McElhinney, and he reported that he approved of it and thought that the master had been sufficiently punished by the loss of the ship, and he thought the preliminary inquiry held was quite conclusive for the purposes of the department. I read the report and concurred in it, and I think that, under all the circumstances, quite as full an investigation was held as the case demanded or justified. I am rather surprised, I must say, to hear what the hon. gentleman says that no notice was given to Mr. Troop, because my information is that he had every opportunity of bringing out at the preliminary inquiry everything required. The preliminary inquiry lasted three days, full reports were published in the papers and everybody knew about it. I cannot understand how Mr. Troop was at any disadvantage, but of course I cannot controvert what the hon. gentleman has said. I have the report here, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell) is welcome to examine it. I will make further inquiry from Captain Smith whether he notified those interested specially in addition to giving public notice. The officers and sailors who were accessible were examined, and the report was thoroughly approved by Captain McElhinney, and I saw no reason to dissent from his decision.

Mr. POWELL. As I understand, the department in these cases notify the parties interested, and if that has not been done in this case it is an oversight. I am glad to hear the Minister make this statement, as Mr. Troop feels aggrieved.

Mr. CLARKE. What was the detailed cost to the country of that steamer that was employed and brought down from Lake Ontario?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The contract was $7,000, which, with incidental expenses and everything, run up to about $10,000.

Mr. MARTIN. I hope the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will see his way clear to make some improvement in this service. I have called the attention of the Government this session to the exorbitant rate for freight charged over that route in winter. The Minister who was asked that question very skilfully evaded answering it by saying that the Government had not enough information. I showed that the rate for baggage and freight was 3 cents a pound, which is equal to $60 per ton. How can trade be encouraged between Prince Edward Island and the mainland under those circumstances? We were discussing not long ago the Yukon Bill, the freight rates over the 140 odd miles of that railway was supposed to be $50 a ton; but here, over a short run of nine miles across the Straits of Northumberland, the Government charges at the rate of $60 a ton. I know whereof I am speaking, because I have conversed with the travelling public, and when I came here during the first part of the session I found that every pound of baggage carried over that route was charged 3 cents a pound—at least all baggage over thirty pounds in weight. I believe the Minister himself on former occasions when sitting on this side of the House, drew the attention of the Government to this fact. That the travelling public should have to submit to pay 3 cents a pound for freight over that short run of nine miles, is, I think, disgraceful to any country pretending to any degree of civilization at all. I hope that the winter season just passed is the last season this will ever be permitted to continue. I know of travelling agents who are passing to and fro between that province and the mainland, who have paid for their samples as high as $20. Does the Minister of Marine and Fisheries intend to remove this exorbitant tax on the people of Prince Edward Island and the travelling public?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I promise the hon. gentleman to give his representations every consideration. Of course, he knows that this is not a paying line. I have continued the previous regulations and the rates charged in previous years, I have not made any change except to lighten them slightly. But I will be glad to consider and read over very carefully the observations the hon. gentleman has made, and if I can make any move in that direction, I shall be very glad to do so. Now, with reference to the remarks of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster). I have in my hand the statements which he desired me to produce. In the first place there is No. 1, which I do not think I need read, which is the memorandum from myself for Captain McElhinney's information, sent in August, 1896, as to what I desired him to do. I stated that I desired him to ascertain exactly what boats were suitable. I have two reports of Captain McElhinney, dated in September and October, 1896. There is a statement that he had proceeded to Ontario for the purpose of examining the tugs there, and a memorandum is attached stating the different tugs in Canada that he had examined and reporting upon them. This I will be glad to hand to the hon. gentleman if he desires. Then he speaks of the boat that we accepted, reporting that an officer had come from the Collins Bay Rafting and Forwarding Company, offering the tug "Petrel" from the 1st of September to the 1st of May, for $6,000. As he had never seen the steamer, he requested that he might be authorized to visit and examine her to see whether she was fit for that purpose. That authority was granted.

Mr. SPROULE. For what purpose was it proposed to employ that boat?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It was an experiment, to see whether, in the winter months, steam communication could be maintained instead of by ordinary boat, the service which we have by oars or running on the ice, which has been maintained for the last forty years. We thought it was possible that steam communication might be maintained instead of the ordinary boat service.

Mr. SPROULE. Surely you would need a different boat from that. She was running round Georgian Bay trying to pick up fishermen. She has neither power nor steam.

Mr. MARTIN.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman is mistaken about the boat. It is not the Dominion steamship "Petrel," it is a boat of the same name belonging to the Collins Bay Rafting Company.

Mr. SPROULE. A boat on the Georgian Bay, the same boat.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. She plies on the Georgian Bay. I am telling the hon. gentleman that I gave general instructions to Captain McElhinney to examine all the boats in Canada that were suitable for the purpose, and I went on to describe, in my instructions, what kind of a boat I thought would be suitable. I do not know anything about the Collins Bay Rafting Company. Captain McElhinney reported to me in the following terms:—"The Collins Bay Rafting and Forwarding Company offer the tug "Petrel" from the 1st of September to the 1st of May," for so much, and he suggested that he might be allowed to go and examine her. I at once gave him instructions to examine her, and he reported to me:

This is the most suitable vessel I have been able to find in Canada, and I recommend that the offer be accepted, and all necessary steps be taken to place the boat on the route between Cape Tormentine and Summerside from the 1st of September next.

He has been for a long time the nautical adviser of the department, and I accepted his report the same as any other Minister would do. He reported adversely to all the other vessels, and reported in favour of this one.

Mr. FOSTER. Are there any precautionary remarks in his report as to whether this boat is really suitable or not?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Perhaps I had better read the report:

REPORT ON TUG "PETREL."

Hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Sir,—I beg to report that I visited the steam tug "Petrel," as instructed, for the purpose of examining her as regards suitability for running during the winter between Cape Tormentine and Cape Traverse.

I find that the vessel was purposely constructed for towing large rafts, assisting and taking charge of wrecks, and was designed and adapted for going into ice on the lakes, being provided with a 40-ton water tank at the stern, and receding stem.

The dimensions are: Length, 129 feet; breadth, 26 feet, and depth, 9½ feet; is built composite, steel floors, frames and angles; bottom planking hard wood 3 inches thick; ceiling and inside double bottom all of steel; wales or sides ½ steel plate; stringers and beams are of steel, and all the deck-houses are steel plate covered with wood. The hull contains five water-tight compartments which add considerably to the strength to resist the crushing in ice.

Her computed nominal horse-power is 22, which will probably work up to 30; is fitted with twin-screws with portable blades, and a full spare set of which is always carried. There is ample deck room covered in for all the ice-boats required, also cabin-room for passengers, mails and ice-boat crews.

A surface condenser is required to adapt her for running in salt water; this will be put in at owner's expense.

Iron sheathing-plates on both bows will have to be put on to protect the wood planking; this will cost from $200 to $300, which can be done on the owner's marine slip with least expense, which will have to be borne by the department.

The owners offer to hire the vessel from 1st November to 15th May for $6,000, not found, and I estimate the cost of running for the six months, fuel, crew and provisions, at about $7,000, making the total about $13,000. The vessel can be made ready and taken to the capes to commence work 1st of December.

This is the most suitable vessel I have been able to find in Canada, and I would recommend that the offer be accepted, and all necessary steps be taken to place the boat on the route between Cape Tormentine and Summerside about the 1st of December.

Respectfully submitted,
(Sgd.) M. P. McELHINNEY,
Nautical Adviser.

Ottawa, 8th, October, 1896.

Mr. SPROULE. Is there anything said about speed?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No. Her speed, however, was between 8 and 9 knots.

Mr. SPROULE. I thought it was the small boat.

Mr. MCGREGOR. The hon. gentleman is thinking about a small boat. This is a large boat, a tug boat.

Mr. MARTIN. Does the Minister think that the failure was owing to the want of power in the boat, or to the thickness of ice?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman unfortunately was not in the House when I explained the matter before dinner. There has been an opinion held for many years by the residents on both sides of the straits that inasmuch as the tides meet from the east and west at the particular point where Cape Tormentine and Traverse are located, there is more or less opening of the ice at every return tide, and so it would be easy for a steamer to force her way through the loose ice. I have crossed many times, and do not share that opinion, but I do not consider that I am competent to form an opinion against that arrived at by those who have crossed hundreds of times. I determined, however, that an experiment should be made to ascertain if the ice was loose and a passage could be made through it by a steamboat. I authorized Captain McElhinney to inspect all the tug boats in Canada and ascertain if any were fit for the service. He visited them and made a report, to the effect that the only boat he found suitable was the "Petrel" belonging to the Collins Bay Rafting and Forwarding Company. Having received that report I accepted the offer of the owners. She was a twin screw steel steamer, a very strong boat accustomed to tow heavy rafts across the Georgian Bay. She went down to the island and did fairly good work between Summerside and Cape Tormentine before the water froze and the ice came in. As this took place she was moved to her destination between Cape Tormentine and Traverse. Then there came on one of those awful storms that almost inevitably happens once or twice in the fall of each year. The instructions the captain had were to take care to keep the vessel out from the wharf so as to avoid the bord ice, that is the ice which formed from the shore and which remains steadily from the time it forms in the fall to the spring. It was supposed that between the bord ice on the mainland and the bord ice on the island the vessel could be kept moving and pass through the loose ice. It was to make this experiment that I asked a vote from Parliament. During the storm the vessel was run east of Cape Tormentine pier; she kept creeping around the "L" of the pier and the ice piled up so it was found she could not get out. Captain McElhinney was at once sent down to do everything possible to release the vessel, and Captain Macdonald was also employed, but it was found utterly impossible to get the boat through the bord ice, which was from eight to ten feet thick, because it had formed and piled up until it reached that thickness. The vessel remained there several months. The Government had to pay the charter money, and in that sense the experiment has proved to be a comparative failure. I have not, however, lost hope that eventually means may be devised by the skill and energy of those well up in the business to overcome the apparent insuperable difficulty of securing steam communication at that point. Everything was done that could possibly have been done, but nothing was left undone that I know of; and my advice from the nautical adviser of the Marine Department was as strong and conclusive as hon. gentlemen opposite could desire. This was an honest effort made on my part; unfortunately it was not successful, but, I repeat, I have not given up hope that some day or other we may yet be able to overcome those difficulties. We shall not always meet with an unfortunate storm occurring at a critical moment as in this case, which resulted in hemming the vessel in the ice.

Mr. MARTIN. At page 51 of the report of the Department of Marine for 1897 it is stated, in the course of a description of the ice there:

The ice was found to be about two feet in thickness, and although every possible expedient was resorted to, it was not found possible to release the steamer from her ice-bound condition until towards the spring.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That was inside and east of the wharf.

Mr. MARTIN. I merely call attention to it, because two feet in thickness is very much below the mark.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is between seven and eight feet thick at different times.

Mr. MARTIN. Then this part of the report is misleading.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman will find that this reference is to the thickness of the ice at the point where an effort was made to cut the boat out. He found it two feet thick and he cut out some hundreds of yards.

Mr. MARTIN. It does not make a distinction in the report; it simply says the ice is about two feet thick.

Mr. McDOUGALL. How is that we cannot find the name of that boat on the Canadian Shipping Register?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I really cannot say. I know nothing about the boat, except that the Collins Bay Rafting Company tendered amongst others, and I sent the nautical adviser to examine her, and he reported. They asked me the other day if I would try her for another winter and I said no. Is there anything at all behind this cross-examination, because it would almost appear that there is something behind all this which the hon. gentleman is trying to get out. I know nothing about it. Mr. McElhinney inspected a number of boats at St. John, Halifax and along the St. Lawrence, and he reported as I have read about the vessel. I know nothing else in the wide world about it. I do not know the Collins Bay Rafting Company, nor anything about them.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I do not know that there is anything behind it, but there seems to be a mystery from the fact that I cannot find the boat registered in Canada.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Has the hon. gentleman got the list of the vessels registered in Canada?

Mr. McDOUGALL. Yes, the last issue of 1896. There are several vessels called the "Petrel" here, but none from Ontario.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. All I can say is that the "Petrel" was in esse. She was inspected by the nautical adviser, reported to be the best vessel in Canada for the purpose, chartered, and did a certain amount of work but was not as successful as I had hoped.

Mr. BRITTON. The Collins Bay Rafting Company have their headquarters at Collins Bay, eight miles west of Kingston, on the Bay of Quinté. Their manager is Mr. William Leslie, and they own a tug named the "Petrel," which I have been on many times, and which has been doing some work in the Lower St. Lawrence. Whether that boat is registered or not, she has been afloat for many years. Mr. Leslie is a man of good repute; he has done work in connection with laying the intake pipe at Toronto, and has had the contract for pontooning one of these large western tugs down the canals. The "Petrel" is a well-known boat on the St. Lawrence.

Mr. McDOUGALL. She may be a well-known boat, but she is not registered.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I am glad to be able to inform my hon. friend (Mr. McDougall) that the "Petrel" is registered. My hon. friend (Mr. McDougall) has been reading from the register of sailing vessels, but on the next page he will find the registered steam vessels, and there the name of the "Petrel" appears as registered at Kingston and built at the port of Collins Bay, Ontario.

Mr. SPROULE. The Minister of Marine seems to think there is something behind it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think so at all, but I thought my hon. friend (Mr. McDougall) believed there was something behind it.

Mr. SPROULE. I know something about the "Petrel," and from the knowledge I have of her, as soon as I heard she was chartered for this purpose I felt perfectly satisfied that she was no use to run through ice. If you went to Lake Superior and Duluth, where they have iceboats breaking through five or six feet of ice, and saw those boats, you would at once see that the "Petrel" was no good for any such purpose.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. She was not intended to break through ice. Capes Tormentine and Traverse are eight miles apart, and the tides which come around the island meet at these points. It was contended that as the tides receded the ice opened out, and that it was possible to run a steamer through the openings. The theory seemed reasonable, and it was asserted that any ordinary steel boat such as the "Petrel," could accomplish the work.

Mr. McGREGOR. She is a good boat.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That the "Petrel" was not successful was not due to the fact that she could not get through the ice, but that she was met with a big storm on the 24th December lasting two days, which would have interrupted any boat no matter what her horse-power was.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) broke in before I had concluded my remarks. I thought it was a legitimate subject for inquiry, because remembering the speed and strength required by boats to cut through the ice, I believed that the "Petrel" would not be of any value whatever for the purpose. A boat of 24 horse-power with about nine knots an hour speed would not be regarded as a very strong boat to get through a place like that. From my knowledge of the "Petrel," I knew she could be of no use down there, and the fact that she was chartered rather suggested the suspicion that either the Minister had been imposed upon, or that there was a job behind it. For that reason I asked several questions to bring out the information.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not object to the hon. gentleman's questions. We have in Prince Edward Island, the "Stanley," an extremely powerful steamboat built when Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper was Minister of Marine, which can go through two feet of ice with perfect ease. The "Stanley" crosses from Georgetown to Pictou, a distance of 40 miles, but it was not for any such use as that we employed the "Petrel." It was for the purpose of experimenting as to whether an ordinary steel steamer could get through the openings in the ice, and that experiment had nothing to do with her horse-power.

Mr. POWELL. The selection of the "Petrel" for this work was undoubtedly a mistake, and if the Minister had acted on his own judgment he would have come out more successfully. The ice does separate at that particular place, and what is required is a boat, not only to go through open water, but a boat which will crash through the ice fields.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Average moving ice fields.

Mr. POWELL. Yes, and the "Petrel" was not at all suited for that purpose. The proper boat would be one something like those they have on Lake Superior or on the coast of Norway; a boat that had considerable of a drag and an enormous horse-power. The Minister, no doubt, is thoroughly satisfied now that the "Petrel" is not suitable, and probably he will in the future make the attempt with some other style of boat. There is a matter in connection with this vote to which I wish to call the attention of the hon. Minister.

A very old servant of the Crown, who spent fifty or sixty years of his life in the service between the Capes, gave me a numerously signed petition, requesting the Minister to place in the Estimates a small sum as a gratuity to him. He had lost the toes of both feet, as a result of having been out at night to save the lives of people who were lost on the ice-floes; and when incapacitated for night service, he took the work of driving the mails to meet the life-boats. But he got unfitted for that, and he is now in very poor circumstances. In view of the many superannuations that are going, his sixty years of service and his trying circumstances should entitle him to some small gratuity and he appeals to the hon. Minister, who in his open-heartedness and generosity is aiding and abetting his colleagues in the Ministry in granting large superannuations to various people on the ground of their being Conservatives, and thinks that for a much better reason, namely, that he has sacrificed his health and used his best endeavours for sixty years in serving the public, he should receive some small degree of compassion at the hands of the Ministry. There is no political axe to grind in this matter, because last year the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) brought up against the Conservative party as a very serious charge, that they had turned this man adrift on account of his politics. So, inasmuch as he is a Liberal in politics, and does not at present reside in Westmoreland, the fact that I am urging his case from a purely disinterested motive, will appear evident.

Mr. YEO. I would like to say a word in support of the application of the hon. member for Westmoreland. All who know the gentleman to whom he refers will heartily join in saying that he is entitled to some sympathy and assistance from the Government. He has devoted the best years of his life to the public service, especially in the winter, and I know he has been the means of helping many who have made the perilous voyage across the straits. If there is one individual in Canada who deserves to be remembered it is the person to whom the hon. member for Westmoreland has referred.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I may say that the person to whom my hon. friend from Westmoreland and my hon. friend from East Prince refer is a historical character in the maritime provinces, known popularly as Tom Allen, and it will be my great pleasure to support the application which my hon. friend has made. But the difficulty is that the Ministry are hedged about by statutory restrictions which they find it very difficult to overcome. However, I shall be very glad to bring the matter to the attention of my hon. friend the Postmaster General, for whom Mr. Allen has carried the mails for so many years, to see if he can suggest any method of getting around the hard and fast statute which prohibits us from giving a superannuation allowance to any persons except those prescribed by the statute. Perhaps some way out of the difficulty may be found. I may say that personally I would be very glad to see it done, if it can be.

Mr. POWELL. A gratuity could be given to him by a vote of the House.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Oh, yes.

Mr. FOSTER. I have very hurriedly run through the daily record of the "Petrel," which constitutes, I suppose, the history of her behaviour in the ice during the little time she was outside of the "L," and I have also looked over the Minister's memorandum and the reports of Captain McElhinney. Any one who reads the daily record of the actions of the boat will see in a moment that the prime trouble was that she had not power enough. She could not make her way through ice of anything beyond the most ordinary thickness; and when she was once walled up and the heavy ice had formed and deepened, she was there in quod, and could not be cut out or freed until spring. But while the Minister's intentions were all right, and while Captain McElhinney is a good officer, there is no doubt that he gave way to the idea that some vessel must be got, and when he looked over the different vessels, he said that this was the most suitable one he could find; but he never said that the "Petrel" was a suitable boat for the work. In fact, for a time it was a toss-up between the "Petrel" and the "Bayswater." I am sorry that in that state of things the Minister did not subordinate his laudable desire to have the test made to the necessities of the case, and come to the conclusion that he had better wait for another year and get a suitable boat. The cost of the experiment was large, amounting to $15,162, and we have got a little worse than no result from it, for it has to a certain extent jeopardized the experiment. I want to ask my hon. friend if on account of this failure he has made up his mind to do nothing towards having a fair and adequate test of that passage?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. By no means.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose we shall have to forgive the Minister for his mistake. I have not been pursuing this with the idea that there is anything behind it at all. The only thing behind it and in front of it is that the "Petrel" was not a suitable vessel, and that the test has not been fairly made, but we have succeeded in spending about $15,000 of the people's money. My impression, gathered from my experience in the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and from my interest in the matter, is that that route between Cape Tormentine and Cape Traverse is a feasible route, and that all the department has to do is to have constructed the proper vessel. I think you will get a cheaper service by that route than you will by any other route. I hope my hon. friend will not be deterred from making a thoroughly adequate test; and, after all, if you can once prove the feasibility of the route, the expenditure of $20,000 or $25,000 in doing so will be more than saved in one year's service.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's). In my opinion, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries has made a mistake in this matter. I know his intentions were good, and he did the best he could under the circumstances; but I think he made a mistake in regard to the capacity of the boat that was engaged. As he says, it was the best thing that could be done by himself, under the able superintendence of Captain McElhinney, but with respect to the route being feasible, I myself have very serious doubts. The hon. member for York seems to have the impression that it could be made a feasible route. The distance would lead anybody to think that it is the most feasible one, because the distance is the shortest, but the disadvantages of it for winter service would always be felt and render it impracticable. It is closed up and jammed by the running ice, and in this respect attended with difficulties not experienced to anything like the same extent in the route between Georgetown and Picton which, up to this time, has proved itself a proper and feasible route. It is my impression, and I believe it is that of all those who have conducted the winter service up to this time, that it will continue to be the best one until some other means are found of getting across during the winter. It has proved itself a much greater success than was ever anticipated, and with the very excellent boats which is, I was going to say, one of the wonders of the world, it no doubt is the one that will continue to be used. That boat has been such a success that the Russian Government talk of sending over one of its officials to see the wonderful work she does, in order that they may find the means of navigating their ice-bound harbours. She does work that those who only hear of it can hardly understand. She has succeeded in making winter navigation a success in the face of enormous difficulties, and except where there is a continuation of strong gales from a certain quarter, which impose barriers that are insurmountable by anything that can be constructed, she plies her way to and fro, and it is only occasionally that she is unable to make the passage. Under these circumstances, seeing the success that has attended that navigation, I think that, so far as winter navigation is concerned, it will be a loss of public money to further attempt the navigation of the straits between the capes with steamers. I believe if there had been a suitable boat there last season, with sufficient power to penetrate the somewhat heavy ice, some success might have attended the experiment, but she got confined behind the pier in such a way, as the hon. Minister has already said, and the drift ice piled around her in such immense quantities, that no boat could by any possibility have got out. Otherwise she might have met with a small amount of success. There is no doubt a mistake was made in not obtaining a boat of sufficient power to give a fair test to that route. However, I am of the opinion, as I said before, that it is not a proper route for winter navigation, notwithstanding all that can be said about it.

Mr. YEO. I do not suppose this is the proper item on which to discuss the best route for the navigation of the Straits of Northumberland.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Hear, hear.

Mr. YEO. In my opinion, the hon. member for King's, P.E.I., is altogether astray. If a steamer of sufficient power were put between Cape Tormentine and Summerside or Cape Traverse, I have very little doubt but she would do excellent work and make almost regular daily trips. The distance is not one quarter between the capes that it is between Pictou and Georgetown. The route between the capes has never been tested properly, and I am quite satisfied that the people of the western part of Prince Edward Island will never be satisfied until a proper test has been made. In ordinary winters, the "Petrel" would have done good service, but as has been explained by the Minister of Marine, it was unfortunate that we had more severe weather than we had for many years so early in the season and in so short a time as we had just at the time the "Petrel" was put on this service. In ordinary winters she would have done good service in the early part of the winter and in the spring, but unfortunately she was closed in by the ice. I hope at no distant day a suitable boat will be put on this route, and I feel positive that if the route is given a fair trial it will be shown to be the most feasible one for winter navigation.

Salaries and allowances of light-keepers. $207,000

Mr. FOSTER. In this item I want to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Marine very briefly to a case that I consider, not on account of the amount of salary involved or anything of that kind, but on the simple principle of fair-play, an important case which the hon. gentleman ought not to treat altogether so lightly as he might think the salary attached to it might justify. I mean the course which was taken by the hon. gentleman with reference to Benjamin Palmer, a lighthouse keeper in King's County on the St. John River, to whom, I think—and I hope it will be proved unwittingly, although I am afraid the hon. Minister has pledged himself very strongly—a great injustice has been done. I would not say that in the case of most people. Those who go into a contest and are partisans, if they come to grief have had their share of the fun; and whilst I would stand up for them and try and have justice done, I quite acknowledge that in warfare there must be blows given and somebody must have scars, when the battle comes to a conclusion. But this is the case of a man who never was a partisan, who, by his nature and his characteristics, is not fitted to be a partisan. He is one of those men who take life quietly, who does what business he has to do without interfering with anybody else; and in the whole course of the contests, from 1882, in King's County, whilst I ran there, he never was a violent partisan, although he always voted for me and was a friend of mine, politically as well as personally. This man has a brother whose temperament is quite different. He is up and alive in every contest that takes place, and he left no honest stone unturned in the election, so far as his advocacy of the Liberal-Conservative policy was concerned. But I do not suppose that my hon. friend or the Government think that it is right to punish an unoffending man for the work of one whom they may call an offending man, in the light of political partisanship. Benjamin Palmer was the lighthouse keeper at Palmer's Point. Shortly after the election in October 27th, 1896, the member who was returned, defeating the Conservative candidate, asks in a letter for the dismissal of Mr. B. R. Palmer. He says:

I think I state sufficient reason when I say the present incumbent was a bitter organizer in the parish of Kars, and did all that he could in the interest of the Conservatives to obtain my defeat.

That is the charge. Well, the request of the sitting member was not immediately complied with. There seemed at first a disposition not to engage in this work of decapitation too hurriedly. However, the opinions of the member prevailed to this degree in that he triumphed over the sense of justice and fair-play for the time being of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and induced him to go back on the statement of the Government through the right hon. the Premier that every person who was charged should have an investigation and that none would be dismissed without having their cases looked into. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries ordered Mr. McAlpine, the commissioner, to hold an investigation on the charge preferred by the member elect, namely, that Mr. Palmer was a bitter organizer and did all that he could to defeat the candidate in the Liberal interest. Mr. McAlpine who was a very strong partisan went into this work con amore, of course. One could easily see that he was not biased in favour of Mr. Palmer, that, if anything, his bias would naturally be in favour of the contention of the sitting member of whom he was a strong supporter and for whom he had done a lot of political work. So Mr. McAlpine was appointed to look into this case. But the procedure was not sufficiently strong or quick, and about half a month after the appointment of Mr. McAlpine to investigate the case, the sitting member again writes and recalls to the memory of the Minister, his "Dear Mr. Davis" that he had not paid prompt and executive attention to the request which had been made before. He said:

Mr. Palmer has been a most bitter political enemy, and has used all possible machinations in conjunction with his brother, Whit Palmer, against us, and so successfully that at last election I was beaten in that parish nearly two to one. If an investigation is held there is ample proof ready, and I wish to see this man removed, as my people in that parish are really very angry to think I have not been more active in pressing for his removal.

Trusting you will carry this without delay,

I remain, &c.,

(Sgd.) JAMES DOMVILLE.

That, I suppose, acted as a spur to the Minister. Anyway, the commissioner held his investigation. Mr. Palmer says, in the letter in which I read last year, that the investigation was not quite fair to him, that he did not get in all the evidence he should have got in and also that he was not present when the evidence against him was given and consequently he was put at a disadvantage. I will read some short extracts from the evidence taken by Mr. McAlpine. In the first place I will read the evidence of Mr. Palmer himself, which is as follows:—

I reside in Kars; am lighthouse keeper and farmer. Have kept the light-house about ten or twelve years. I voted for the Conservative candidate,—

That is no harm—

—but I did not take any active part in the last election, or in any election since I have been appointed to the position. I did not canvass a single voter. I did not ask any man to vote in a certain way. I did not assist in organizing the parish. I took no part except to vote. I paid no man to vote. My brother is an active worker in Conservative ranks.

People who live in that section, if told that Benjamin R. Palmer had gone out to organize would smile. He is not an organizer in any sense of the word. He is not built that way. He makes the declaration under oath that I have just read. Then we have the evidence of Robert Vanwart, who says:

I live in Kars; am a farmer; I know Mr. B. R. Palmer. I remember last election, June 1897. I saw Mr. Palmer at the polls. He did not stay over twenty minutes. After dinner on 23rd June,—

That is the day of the election.

—Mr. Palmer and myself went to Wickham, Queen's County, to vote. I did not hear Mr. Palmer canvassing any one, nor did I hear of him doing so. I never heard of Mr. Palmer offering money or holding out inducements of any kind to any man to get him to vote.

Then we have the evidence of his brother with whom he lives and ought to know, and who would not swear to a lie.

Mr. FOSTER.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He is not so quiet a man.

Mr. FOSTER. No, but he is an honourable man. He says that the charge that his brother is an active organizer and worker in the parish of Kars is not true. It is absolutely false that he took any part in any Dominion election. And here is the report of the commissioner, and it is to this particularly that I wish to ask the attention of my hon. friend. This commissioner heard all the evidence, and he gives his report as follows:—

I have the honour to submit herewith my report concerning B. R. Palmer, lighthouse keeper, Kars, King's County, N.B. Mr. Palmer was charged with active political partisanship in last Dominion election and in previous elections. The charge was not satisfactorily proved.

I have the honour, &c.,

(Sgd.) E. H. McALPINE,

Commissioner.

Then I find, Sir, that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries makes a report to Council. This report of Mr. McAlpine was signed 6th March, 1897:

Extract from a Report of the Committee of the Honourable the Privy Council, approved by His Excellency on the 7th May, 1897.

On a memorandum from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, recommending with reference to the Order in Council of the 21st June, 1884, appointing B. R. Palmer keeper of the light-house of Palmer's Point on the St. John River, that the appointment be cancelled, as it has been established to the satisfaction of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that the keeper referred to was an active partisan on the occasion of the last Dominion election.

That is to say, a charge is made by the sitting member, the charge is given to the commissioner to investigate, the judge investigates by hearing witnesses and reports that the charge is not proven, and yet the Minister who employs the judge to hold the investigation comes to Council with a report that it has been established to his satisfaction that this man was an active political partisan—and out Mr. Palmer goes.

Then comes a communication with the joyful note running through every word of it, to the member for King's (Mr. Domville) to tell him that at last the desire of his heart has been consummated, and that although the real culprit was not touched, the inoffensive brother has been deprived of his office. Now, Sir, neither I nor, I think, the brother who was deprived of office, care very much about that. It was a small office, but there are two principles concerned. In the first place, if there is a charge, and the Government say that a man who is charged shall have the charge investigated, shall have a chance to prove himself innocent, if that is the maxim which is to be acknowledged that a man is innocent until he is proved guilty, if the judge who is appointed to try the case tries it fairly, as we will suppose he has done, and reports that the charge is not proven, it does seem to me that the Minister is bound to take the report of the commissioner, and is bound to retain the officer. I do not see where fair-play and common justice can find a resting place at all unless this principle is admitted. But there is another thing, and that is the injury to a fellow-man. Now the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is a high and mighty man. He has long been a high and mighty man, and he is higher and mightier now since he has kneeled before Her Majesty, figuratively, and has been dubbed a knight. He is now Sir Louis, and this is only plain Benjamin Palmer that kept a lighthouse down in the county of King's. The mighty Minister may think that it does not matter much, that there is no use of talking about it. But Benjamin Palmer and Sir Louis Davies are both men, and between men the code of fair-play and even justice holds, whether one is a knight and the other is a farmer, or whether they both be on a plane of equality as far as their occupation is concerned. That man feels that an injustice has been done him, and he rightly feels so. He was charged with a certain offence, the man who charged him was determined to make him pay a penalty for what he charged as the crime. The charge was disproved, and yet the penalty has to be paid, the man has to be branded as one kicked out of office, and kicked out of an office where he performed his duties with perfect satisfaction to the department, a man against whom morally or in any other sense, not one word can be said. If the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is satisfied to take the simple word of Col. Domville against the report of his own commissioner, against the sworn evidence, against the finding of his own judge, to please a partisan, to inflict this wrong upon an unoffending and innocent man, then the Minister must take the responsibility. But it is mighty poor work.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There never was a case affording better evidence of how facts can be—I will not say distorted, but improperly presented, than the case which my hon. friend has placed before the House. Now, this case is as plain and simple as a, b, c. I do not think I can be charged by my friends opposite with a desire to carry out the spoils system. I have resisted it, because I do not believe in it, and I have resisted it firmly and honestly from beginning to end. But I have invariably held that where a public official is an open, active, violent and bitter partisan, that man, on proof of his partisanship, ought to be dismissed from office. The hon. gentleman has intimated that the commissioner report of the charge was not proved. That is perfectly correct. I have never been guided myself by the report that a commissioner may make. I did not ask him to make any report, I asked him to report the evidence. I am responsible for the judgment taken, I must read that evidence, and I must determine whether, on the evidence, there is sufficient to dismiss the man. Whether Mr. McAlpine reports that the case is proved or not proved, does not matter to me, and will not absolve me before this House. If Mr. McAlpine reported evidence which showed the charge unfounded, I think hon. gentlemen will hold me to a stern account. But here we do not care what Mr. McAlpine reported, we want to know what the evidence proves, and therefore I remove that part of the case entirely. I do not care whether Mr. McAlpine reported it was proved or not. I come down to the evidence. What are the facts here? A lighthouse keeper holding a small appointment, but as my hon. friend truly remarked, being also fully entitled to every privilege that belongs to a British subject, was a perfectly innocent man, a stool-pigeon, a man who took no part whatever in the proceedings. He was not a man who could organize, nobody would accuse him of that. I have heard a good deal about it personally from my hon. friend the member for King's and others, and I know he was a man who could not organize, who would not organize, he was a stool-pigeon. But he had a brother who was the incarnation of the party. As my hon. friend said himself, he left no stone unturned—

Mr. FOSTER. No honourable stone.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There was not an honourable thing he could do to oust the Liberal party that he did not do. What position did he hold? He did not draw the salary direct, oh, no. His stool-pigeon, his brother, who took no active part, drew the salary. But the man who guided and organized, and controlled the Tory party in that parish, was Whit Palmer, and I will now quote his brother's evidence as to the relations he bore to the light-house keeper:

My brother is an active worker in the Conservative ranks. We live together, and share everything we make.

That is the substance of the whole thing. He did not draw the salary direct, but he was the organizer, he put his brother forward to fill the position nominally, while he shared the profits. As soon as I read that I said: Well, there can be no question about it. I looked upon it substantially as if Whit Palmer was the lighthouse keeper himself. He lived with his brother and he shared the salary.

Mr. McNEILL. What is the salary?

Mr. FOSTER. A matter of $60

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not care what it was. He was the incarnation of the Tory party in that province. He put his brother forward as the nominal lighthouse keeper, whereas he was the real one.

Mr. McNEILL. The amount of salary matters a good deal, because if the salary was very small and they were living together they could not require much money to support themselves, if any part of it went to this man's brother. If the salary was $60 or $100 only it would, from this point of view, be a very different thing from a salary of $500 or $600. However, I do not want to say very much so far as the hon. Minister's conduct in these matters is concerned. Personally, I have found that he has dealt with matters of this kind in what I consider to be a very fair way.

Mr. McDUGALL. I should like to ask the Minister with respect to what he justifies as a proper reason for dismissing an official. If I understood the hon. gentleman correctly, he said that because a man was a partisan, an offensive partisan, that was justification for his dismissal. Admitting that to be the case, would the hon. Minister justify the appointment of a man to take the place of an official dismissed under those circumstances, who himself was a very strong and offensive partisan.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is a very different matter.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not intend that the Minister shall get away on that exceedingly thin ground. I do not know but that the case is at its best when left just simply on the terms in which it has been pleaded before the House by the hon. Minister, and to let the common sense of members of the House settle it. But there are two points to which I should like to call attention. The hon. Minister stands in the position of final arbiter. On what? On a charge which was preferred definitely, tried by one of his own commissioners and reported upon by that commissioner. What was the charge? Not that Whit Palmer got half of the salary of $80 from his brother Benjamin; not that the two brothers of the same parents, living together, neither married, sharing everything equally, were as if they were one man; not that one-half of that immense salary paid to Benjamin Palmer went to his brother Whit. The charge was that Benjamin Palmer was an offensive partisan. The commissioner said he was not. It is very well known in the administration of justice that very much depends on active contact with witnesses when giving testimony. The commissioner had that advantage and the Minister had not. The commissioner having that advantage decided that the man was not an offensive partisan and so reported. The Minister sits here, and if he has an ear it is not for Benjamin Palmer, but for the member for King's, so that he had to rush over to London in order to boost an enterprise for him, the class of which he was trying to damn at the other end, to boost an enterprise which the insinuating member for King's told him to boost, ordered him to boost, if not that he would speedily heap sorrow with a spoon of grief.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

An hon. MEMBER. What has that to do with the question?

Mr. FOSTER. I think I am the judge as to what this has to do with the question. My hon. friend, I was going to say, has a very willing ear for the hon. member for King's. That is the man the Minister listened to when he decided that Benjamin Palmer should be dismissed, and except for the insistence of that hon. gentleman, Benjamin would not have lost his position as lighthouse keeper. But what a position it is for the Minister to take, that when a man is charged with an offence and is found not guilty, the hon. gentleman cuts his head off all the same but for an altogether different reason, because in partnership with his brother in every affair of life, in the farm, in the fishery, and in this little lighthouse, he is said to have received a portion of this $80 a year. If the hon. gentleman can afford to do that injustice, if the Government can get along by those little means, let them do so, but to my mind it is pretty small business. I ask the Minister if he does not feel ashamed of cutting off an official's head in this way. There was only one objection I took to the hon. gentleman's remarks, and that was when he charged Benjamin with having acted secretly. He took charge of the lighthouse above board, and I regret that the hon. gentleman's inherent sense of justice has been overridden by the imperative demand of the hon. member for King's.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me the hon. Minister has laid down a most extraordinary doctrine. Would the hon. gentleman adopt such a course in any line of life except in politics? The hon. gentleman is a lawyer to-day, and he may be a judge next year. If he were on the bench and a case were brought before him and tried and the evidence proved that the accused was not guilty, but that some one else was the offender, surely he would not condemn the man who had been shown to be innocent. The hon. Minister has admitted that the party charged did not commit the offence. According to British justice no matter what the offence may be, if a man is found innocent he is allowed to go free, and no authority could administer punishment. But because Benjamin Palmer is stated to have been an offensive partisan and his brother is shown to have been an offensive partisan, and the charge against Benjamin is not proved, the brother has to receive the punishment, the innocent for the guilty. If the Minister were a judge, would he apply that rule in any similar case? There is another extraordinary circumstance connected with his case. A commission was appointed. Either the commissioner has a right to give final judgment or not. I notice that in several commissions of late the commissioner has acted as judge, and decided whether punishment should be awarded or not. I always considered that was overstepping his duty, as a commissioner is only to ascertain the facts and report them to the department; but it seems this course has not been followed by political commissions which travelled around the country and investigated charges of alleged offensive partisanship, for they have decided whether an offence had been committed or not. But in the face of the facts the Minister goes behind the decision given by the commissioner; he looks over the evidence, no doubt with the object of trying to find out whether a charge of political partisanship could be sustained, and when he finds he is unable to convict Benjamin Palmer on the evidence, he learns that his brother was a political partisan, and as the two men live together he decides to convict Benjamin, although entirely innocent, the ground really being that his brother had committed an offence of the same nature. Does it not seem very extraordinary that a man occupying the high position of Minister of Marine and Fisheries, an eminent lawyer who has practised for many years, should lay down such a principle and endeavour to defend it, and should try to convince the people of Canada that it was a fair trial and a just judgment. It was a most unfair trial, and I do not think it will reflect any credit upon the Minister of Marine, notwithstanding that he is usually very fair in those things. I will say that I understood he was a man who was not desirous of carrying out the spoils system very strongly, but I confess that the good opinion I have entertained of him heretofore is very much shaken by this case which he himself has cited.

Mr. McNEILL. The contention of the hon. Minister is, that he would not have dismissed this man had it not been that he believed he was actually drawing the salary from which his brother derived the benefit.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The brother swore they shared the salary between them.

Mr. McNEILL. When the Minister agreed to the dismissal, he surely could not have realized that the salary was only $80 a year, because after this lighthouse keeper paid for his own board out of the $80, the Minister must see that he had nothing to give to the brother.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. In many places a contribution of $40 towards a political fund is quite a nice little thing.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Are you getting $40 out of the new appointee.

Mr. CLANCY. The committee must be delighted with the declaration of the Minister that he was not thirsting for the heads and blood of officials. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman has probably resisted a very great deal of pressure, but be that as it may, he has laid down an extraordinary rule for one who is not anxious to engage in such doubtful enterprises. The Minister's principle is, not that a man must account only for his conduct, but that he must account for his salary, and if a single dollar goes to a partisan, though that partisan may not be an official, then off goes the head of the employee of the Government.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Suppose an official comes forward and says: I am not an active partisan, but I give the half of my salary to my brother who is notoriously an organizer of the opposite party in the district.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Did he say "notoriously?"

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We all know it; he admitted it. I ask my hon. friend if the lighthouse keeper, as he swore, shared his salary with the political organizer, would the hon. gentleman not consider the maxim, 'Qui facit per alium facit per se,' would apply?

Mr. CLANCY. What is the difference in principle whether he was a brother or a distant relative, or some person holding no position whatever? If the Minister lays down a rule of that kind, an official could not lend a dollar to any person who was a partisan. And let me ask, is the Minister the keeper of the salaries of every official in his department? A man has a right to do just as he pleases with his own money.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. To give it as a contribution towards a political fund?

Mr. FOSTER. The Minister is trying to make the House believe that that money went into the active organization of the Conservative party to defeat the Liberal candidate. I stand here to say that I do not believe for one moment that a single cent of that money went to that purpose. Mr. Whit Palmer may conduct a canvas in his parish, but he is not an organizer in the sense that Mr. Smith is the organizer of the Liberal party, which means the handling of funds, and the conduct of a large organization.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He chips in, does he not?

Mr. FOSTER. It is altogether unfair for the Minister to try to produce the impression that this money was given to Whit Palmer for election purposes. The two brothers shared everything alike, and this brother who had no selfish interest in letting the world know the partisanship of the brothers, himself gave the evidence.

Mr. CLANCY. The Minister would try to make us believe that the half of this paltry annual salary of $80 was the means of overturning the whole Liberal party. Why, if every dollar of the salary went into the fund, the Minister had no justification for his course. From this day out any civil servant who gives or lends a dollar that may be diverted against the Liberal party, will lose his position. That is the doctrine of the Minister. These two brothers sat at the same table, shared the $80 salary between them, and the lighthouse keeper is dismissed for helping his brother to live out of this beggarly sum of $80 a year. If the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) is proud of such a thing as that, he has lost his reputation for being possessed of any sense of justice.

Mr. BENNETT. It is a matter of consolation for me to have the dictum of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in this case, because I shall appeal to him in another case in reference to which I will ask him to apply the converse rule. The brother of an official whom I hear the Minister is going to decapitate, is a very strong opponent of mine. I refer to the case of one Thomas Marchildon, the keeper of Hope Island lighthouse. A couple of weeks ago an investigation was held in reference to his conduct in the election of 1896. It seems rather a long time that after two years the Minister should have awakened to the fact that an investigation was necessary, and still more so is it strange, because I believe that many times representations have been made to him and he thought that the charges were so flimsy that an investigation even should not be held. Whether that was so or not, I do not know. But this I am free to admit, that after two years the Minister was fair enough to give to the accused party an investigation, which was conducted before Mr. Harty, one of his officials; and I think the lighthouse keeper cannot fairly complain that the investigation was not fair and above board. In this connection I would ask the Minister whether he has decided, on the evidence heard before Mr. Harty, to dispense with the services of Mr. Marchildon?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I may say that complaints were made from time to time of Mr. Marchildon's conduct. I did not feel disposed to go to the expense of a special commission to investigate those complaints. What I said was that when the Inspector of Lights next went on his rounds, I would instruct him to make an investigation. Mr. Harty is not in politics; he is simply an official of the department. I instructed him to make an investigation and report to me the facts. He made the investigation, and I said, "I think the lighthouse keeper should be suspended and his assistant should carry on the light for a time." The evidence is there, it is quite voluminous, and though I have suspended the lighthouse keeper for the time being, I have made no determination in the matter at all.

Mr. BENNETT. I am free to admit that Mr. Marchildon did vote for me on the occasion of the election in June, 1896.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That would be no offence in my eye at all.

Mr. BENNETT. I am free to admit that the lighthouse keeper would of necessity have to leave his light on that day to come in and vote on the mainland. But I think the Minister will find it borne out in the evidence that during the by-election that occurred in 1897, the lighthouse keeper was on the mainland, owing to permission which he had received to winter there, and I have no doubt that out of gratitude at having received his appointment on my recommendation, he voted for me on that occasion also. But I would ask the Minister to bear in mind that in 1897 Mr. Marchildon met with an accident while painting the lighthouse, and that he was in consequence put to considerable expense for medical attendance and for the assistance of a man to look after the lighthouse during his illness. What I contend is that the affair having occurred so long ago, though at the time he was at the polls he may have perhaps spoken in a heated way, the Minister should condone and overlook it, especially in view of the fact that Mr. Marchildon in supporting me was supporting the candidate of the Government which had given him the position; and I think there should be a sharp distinction drawn between an appointee who supports the Government which appointed him, and one who has been appointed by a prior Government and opposes a subsequent Administration. Furthermore, in that part of the province there is a large provincial reformatory, and as it is the custom of the officials of that institution to use their best efforts on behalf of the candidates on the Liberal side, it is rather placing a premium on interference in elections. I would also ask the Minister to bear in mind that the other day, in answer to an inquiry of mine, he stated that he did not purpose interfering with one Baxter, a lighthouse keeper at the adjoining light, against whom a complaint had been lodged, and who, as shown by a report in the hon. Minister's own department, had been found guilty of illegal fishing. If the Minister is going to condone the offence of Baxter, a Government lighthouse keeper who deliberately sets the law at defiance, he should certainly overlook the action of Mr. Marchildon, particularly in view of the fact that the matter complained of occurred nearly two years ago. I trust the Minister will give Mr. Marchildon the benefit of the doubt.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I promise to give it every careful consideration. I am not going to act hastily at all.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I must do the hon. gentleman the justice of saying that up to the present time he has had the reputation of not being one of those who carry out the policy that to the victors belong the spoils; but I am very much afraid that this case of Mr. Palmer is going to seriously interfere with his reputation in that respect. Not only have we had a change of Government in Canada, but the new Government have changed the law and even the principles of justice. I have always understood that when a man is charged with an offence, and it is investigated before a commissioner, and the commissioner decides up on the evidence aduced before him, that the man is not guilty, that disposes of the case. But the hon. gentleman says no. Why, it seems to me that the old principles of British justice have been replaced in Canada by the fables of Lafontaine. From our classical studies we all remember how in Lafontaine's fable of the wolf and the lamb, the wolf says to the lamb, "You have sinned against me; I was drinking in the stream, and you troubled the water and prevented me from enjoying my refreshing drink." But the lamb says, "That is quite impossible, because I was down stream below you." "Oh, but," says the wolf, like the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, "If it was not you, it was your brother." So the hon. Minister says, "There cannot be any doubt about your guilt, because you have a brother, and it must be your brother." Now, Sir, I put it upon this one ground. The hon. gentleman and his friends happen to be on the right side of the Speaker to-day, but to-morrow they may be on the left; and I say that for the protection of the rules regulating the relations which should exist between the Government and the people of the country, that kind of thing should not be done. I did not rise so much for the purpose of discussing the case of Mr. Palmer, although I have a strong conviction that Mr. Palmer has been treated by the hon. gentleman in a manner which it is absolutely impossible to defend. I think that possibly the Minister's own judgment was set aside, and that he was controlled by the ardent wish of a strong supporter, Col. Domville. Whether it be on account of Col. Domville or for any other reason, the hon. gentleman, as a Minister and a lawyer, cannot defend the action which was taken in that case. I want to refer to another case, which is not in the province represented by my hon. friend (Mr. Foster), but the province of Quebec—that of the light-house keeper at Point du Lac—Mr. Biron.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is St. Peter's light ship.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I do not want to make any charge now, because I asked the hon. gentleman for information and he was kind enough to refer me to his officers, and I must say that whenever I have had the opportunity of visiting his department, I have always been treated in a manner which prevents my making any complaint whatever. But when I heard of the fate of Mr. Palmer, I thought I would put in a good word on behalf of Mr. N. Biron, so as to prevent the hon. gentleman, if Mr. Biron should happen to have a brother, from treating him as he did Mr. Palmer. I hope the hon. gentleman will let me know, at his convenience, exactly what I may expect in the case of Mr. Biron. He is a Conservative, because I believe in that parish there were only two Liberals altogether.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Then he is safe. They cannot get a Grit to put in his place.

Mr. HENDERSON. I must confess that I was more than surprised to-night at the fine point raised by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries in the case under consideration. I always had the impression that the hon. gentleman would be the fairest man in the Cabinet to deal with a case of this kind. I have never before risen to say a word with respect to dismissals made, either by him or any other member of the Government, but allowed them to have their own way without any criticism from me. But I must say that I feel a very nice point indeed was raised by the hon. gentleman to-night, and that he has certainly gone a very long way to find an excuse for dismissing this man with a paltry salary of $80. Even supposing that his brother did get a portion of this $80, as I understand he did, both living together and sharing what they may make whilst the lighthouse-keeper put $80 into the common pot the brother put in another $80 alongside of it from his earnings elsewhere, and they would divide, so that the brother did not gain an advantage in the end from his share of the salary. I think that the hon. Minister should take this into his consideration, and he will realize on inspection that he has gone too far in the matter, and that he should do this man the justice to which he is fairly entitled. Had this man thought for a moment that he was going to be dismissed on account of this nice distinction, he might just as well have taken an active part in the election. But the evidence is clear that he did not; and since he abstained from any partnership, and since his brother did not derive any benefit from that division of salary, I think the hon. gentleman should reconsider the case.

Mr. McDOUGALL. In the early part of the session I endeavoured to get a list from the hon. gentleman of the dismissals in my county from his department, but he did not have the courtesy to let me have it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think the hon. gentleman should charge me with discourtesy. He asked the question across the House, and I said I thought the better plan would be to move for a return.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I put a notice of motion on the paper, and whenever I brought it up, some hon. gentlemen on the other side would ask to have it stand.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I cannot help that.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The hon. gentleman could have helped it by answering my question. The list is not a very large one. I would ask him if he did not dismiss the keeper of a fog horn in my constituency at a place called Cranberry Head and also the keeper of a lighthouse at Louisburg?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is not in the hon. gentleman's county.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I think that I ought to know something about the county I have represented for 20 years. I would also ask him if he dismissed a lighthouse-keeper at Piper Cove and a lighthouse-keeper at Gabarous and the board of pilot commissioners at Sydney?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We are not on the matter of pilot commissioners.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Then I will confine myself to the lighthouse-keepers and the keeper of the fog-horn.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What is the name of the lighthouse-keeper?

Mr. McDOUGALL. The man's name was James P. Burke, lighthouse keeper, Louisburg.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, and Philip Price was appointed in his place.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Was there an investigation?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I could not tell; I do not remember of any.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Was John Hardy, the lighthouse-keeper at Gabarous, dismissed?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have not any such name on the list.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Was E. A. McNeill, the lighthouse-keeper at Piper's Cove, dismissed?

Mr. McDOUGALL.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, and John C. McNeill was appointed in his place. I do not know whether they were brothers or not.

Mr. FOSTER. In view of the Palmer case, you had better be careful about that.

Mr. McDOUGALL. And the Minister provided him with a salary three months in advance. The man dismissed was dismissed about the time the lighthouse was being closed for the season, and the other man got the key and drew the salary during the season when there was nothing for him to do. Can the hon. Minister give me information about the fog-horn keeper at Cranberry Head?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Mr. James McNeill was appointed keeper of the fog-horn August 26, 1896.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I would like to know who was first recommended for this place?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am not able to give the hon. gentleman that information.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Is it not a fact that the person who was first recommended was not fit for the place?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the person recommended was not fit for the place, I have only to say that nobody has been appointed yet. This appointment is only temporary.

Mr. McDOUGALL. And there is no responsible person in charge?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes; there is a responsible person in charge.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's). I wish to call attention to several of the lighthouse-keepers in my county.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald) is not going to complain of dismissals. He has no need to do that.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's). I do not know; I shall see before I sit down, but that was not my purpose in rising. I wish to point out that the lighthouse-keepers at Cape Bear, Panmure and St. Andrews have to keep their lights the whole year on account of the winter steamer from Pictou to Georgetown, and yet their salaries are not so large as those of some others who only keep their lights during the summer season. Some of these gentlemen are friends of mine, and some of them are friends of hon. gentlemen opposite. I think that, as a matter of justice this matter should be considered to see if more liberal provision cannot be made in these cases.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My mental energies so far have been entirely engrossed with the considerations of applications to dismiss these men from office, which I have not seen fit to do so far. But now that the hon. gentleman has brought this new phase of the question before me I shall consider it. So far as the Panmure light is concerned, and passibly Cape Bear there may be arguments in favour of his view, but I do not think the same applies to St. Andrews.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's). They have to keep the light.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. But it is a far different thing.

Mr. SPROULE. I desire to call the attention to the lighthouse keeper in my riding, Mr. Lowe, of Thornbury. He is attentive to his duties and has given good satisfaction. His salary is only $80. He is comparatively helpless. I think he lost one of his limbs or had it disabled so that it is of little use. I previously applied for an increase for him, but I did not get it. I hope the hon. Minister will take into consideration this man's comparatively helpless condition.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I may say to my hon. friend that in the matter of salaries to lighthouse keepers, I invariably refer to Col. Anderson, who has charge of that branch, because they have to be considered, not only with reference to the duties the keeper discharges himself, but with reference to the relation that his salary bears to all the others. The Colonel is well up in the matter, and between him and the deputy I am generally pretty well advised. I shall be glad to bring this matter to their attention.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's). I hope the Minister will not forget his own province in that respect. I find that the salaries of lighthouse keepers in the other provinces, on the lakes and the upper St. Lawrence, are much in excess of those paid in our province. I do not see why there should be such a vast difference.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman knows that the delightful island he and I come from has always been rather shabbily treated.

Mr. McNEILL. I would ask the Minister if it is not possible to increase the salary of Mr. McKay, lighthouse keeper of Stoke's Bay. The lighthouse is in a position which makes it exceedingly inconvenient for the light keeper, and is also the cause of a good deal of danger, owing to the service of an open boat being required to get ashore. Mr. McKay is a gentleman whose name, I think, is familiar to my hon. friend, a man who has distinguished himself by saving life on more than one occasion.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will consult with my officials on the point.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not want to bother my hon. friend too much, but there is another case down on the St. John River just about opposite this Palmer's Point. At Oak Bay there is a lighthouse on the St. John River, not far from Palmer's Point. The Oak Bay lighthouse was kept by a young man named George B. Pickett. He was the son of a very estimable Church of England clergyman who has long ministered to his flock in that part of the country. He is a very worthy, quiet and efficient young man, who does his work well. Now, the same gentleman, I believe, who was very anxious to have Mr. Benjamin Palmer eliminated from the lighthouse at Farmer's Point, was equally anxious to have the same process carried out upon Mr. Pickett. I think his request was made to the Minister, and the Minister instructed Mr. McAlpine to hold an investigation. But before Mr. McAlpine came around to that part of the country to hold the investigation, Mr. George B. Pickett's head was cut off. Has the Minister any explanation for that?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am sorry to say I am not able to give my hon. friend any information. It was a small salary, only $50, but that should not matter. I do not recall the facts at all.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend will look into that matter, he will find the facts as I have stated. I do not know what excuse he may invent. The same malign influence, I am afraid, has been at work in both this case and the Palmer case.

Maintenance, repairs to lighthouses,

&c..... $230,000

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I desire to say to the House in passing that item, that the Auditor General requires, if anything not strictly within the words "maintenance of lights" is going to be spent, that should be stated in the House. In this matter we have had for some time a vessel in Prince Edward Island and on the north shore of New Brunswick, engaged in carrying supplies to lighthouses. That vessel is worn out, and had to be sold. We are building a new one, on which it is proposed to spend $15,000, which will come out of this vote. It is necessary that I should state to the House that it is my intention to pay out of this vote the sum of $15,000 to build a small steamer for carrying on the lighthouse service on the coast of Prince Edward Island and north shore of New Brunswick. It is to take the place of the boat Mr. Lord used to have, that is sold.

Mr. BRITTON. Under the head of Maintenance, quite a large sum was paid last year for legal expenses. Has there been any investigations connected with lighthouses west of Montreal, or why should there be a charge for legal expenses?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There have been no legal expenses since I came in. I had to pay a lot of expenses that had been incurred before.

Mr. BRITTON. The item of $500 to Mr. Hodgins was incurred prior to this Administration?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am told that was incurred in 1896, before I came in.

Construction of lighthouses..... $45,000

Mr. BENNETT. The MINISTER will recall to recollection an application that was made last year by a deputation of the town council of Midland, for placing a light off what was known as Sawlog Point. Does the Minister intend this year to erect a light on that shore?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I may say to my hon. friend that Col. Anderson, the chief inspector of lights, is at present in British Columbia, and I have delayed making up my estimate for special lights in the supplementaries, until he returns. We desire to divorce as far as possible politics from the matter, and I am generally guided by the advice of Col. Anderson in these matters. He has to have a report upon it. I cannot say until he returns—I am expecting his return daily—whether that will be put in or not. But if he advises it and I am able to do so, I will be glad to do it.

Mr. BENNETT. I admit that a great deal of expense is necessitated after the building of the light, by the appointment of the lighthouse keeper. If the Minister finds he will not be able to meet the expenditure this year, I would ask him to consider the question of placing on this shoal a gas buoy, which will not cost a large sum, and will meet the purposes as well as a light. It is an important point where large vessels pass continually. Last year two or three went down in the dark on this shoal.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will be very glad to make a note of it to-morrow morning from the "Hansard" report of the hon. gentleman's remarks, and bring it before Col. Anderson. In these technical matters I am not prepared to give an offhand opinion, but I am inclined to think the cost of a gas buoy is very much larger than the hon. gentleman has any idea of.

Mr. McALISTER. I desire to ask the Minister if it is his intention to open the two lights that were closed at Oak Point, below Campbellton, on the opposite side of the river. These lights were erected there a number of years ago, but for some reason they were closed a few years ago. Campbellton is an important port, and the shipping is increasing very rapidly. A petition has been sent in asking that these lights be re-opened, and I know some of the parties there have been in communication with the Minister about it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Is the hon. gentleman able to say whether the lights afford accommodation to shipping, or is it only for fishing boats?

Mr. McALISTER. They afford accommodation for shipping. Under present circumstances, supposing a vessel was loaded at the wharf at Campbellton, after the month of September, when the evening tide is the highest, if she cannot get away before dark, it is impossible for her to get out with any degree of safety until the next day, and it is necessary to remain 24 hours perhaps before she can get out.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. When were these lights discontinued?

Mr. McALISTER. About five or six years ago. They have been very much needed ever since. I may say that the lumbermen and shippers who have moved in the matter, have tried to get the light re-established.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have not had the matter brought to my attention, but I will look into it.

Mr. MONK. The lighthouse at Point Claire has been burned down a year ago. Will that be in operation this year?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It will.

Mr. MONK. I suppose it would be useless to speak about the dismissal of the lighthouse keeper. I believe they have all been dismissed in that vicinity, brothers or no brothers.

Repairs to wharfs..... $3,000

Mr. SPROULE. Are those wharfs used in connection with the lighthouse service?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They are wharfs which are administered by the department. These wharfs are constructed by the Minister of Public Works, but small repairs are done upon them from time to time under my department.

Mr. SPROULE. It is a small amount, but it seems to me they should come under the head of Public Works.

Hydrographic surveys..... $16,000

Mr. FOSTER. What work has been done?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Captain Stewart is with his staff on Georgian Bay completing surveys which have been prosecuted for many years very effectively.

Mr. SPROULE. The work has gone on for several years. Can the Minister give any information as to how much has been done and how much remains to be done?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The work done in the summer is completed during the winter, and the results forwarded to the Admiralty, where the maps are prepared and sent out here. I shall be very happy, if the hon. gentleman will call at the department, to give him the necessary explanation by referring to the map. Captain Stewart is a very energetic officer. I should have been very glad if I could have induced my colleagues to double the vote in order to establish a branch for the survey of the British Columbia coast. Her Majesty's Government, feeling that we have not carried out the necessary surveys, have sent Her Majesty's ship "Ælgeria" to commence surveys on the British Columbia coast this year. I feel that the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) was very nearly correct this afternoon when he said that Canada hardly discharged her duty in this regard. I think we could assume a little more responsibility in this direction, and I do not think it right to ask the British Government to do what we should do. I hope to bring the matter before my colleagues, so that next year we may ask Parliament for an increased vote for the purpose. In point of fact, I would have endeavoured to do so this year, except for the expense involved in getting a boat ready. Next year, however, we hope to ask for the necessary vote, and I am sure from the reception given to this vote every year. Parliament will be prepared to vote an increased amount when it is shown that our necessities require it.

Mr. SPROULE. The sum seems very small for the work done. I can bear testimony to the efficiency of the officer, Captain Stewart. I have heard many captains and others navigating the Georgian Bay speak of him most favourably; he appears to be highly respected and considered a very efficient officer. Already he has done a great deal of good work, as did his predecessor, Captain Boulton. The increase in trade on Georgian Bay requires that this work should be very carefully done. A great many accidents have occurred, and dangerous spots have been found from time to time since these surveys were entered upon. This is very valuable work, and much needed in the interests of trade. A good officer is doing the work, and the only matter of surprise is that so small a vote is taken for the purpose.

Meteorological Service..... $62,049

Mr. SPROULE. I observe an increase in this item of $1,061.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There are increases in the salaries of Messrs. Denison, Blake and Kingsmill, and provision made for a messenger at $300 a year. There is also a small amount, $500, for the observatory at Kingston, which was omitted last year.

Observatory, Toronto..... $2,700

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON. What is covered by this item?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There are two votes, one under the head of Observatory, Toronto, $2,700, and one under the head of Meteorological service, $62,000. The vote of $2,700 is merely to cover the expense of weather forecasts at Toronto, the officers being Messrs. Webber and Payne. The amount of $62,000 is to cover the general expenses of the observatory, including officers' salaries.

Mr. CLARKE. What changes have been made in the Meteorological Office in Toronto?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The scientists of the British Association who visited the Toronto Observatory last year met in Ottawa and pressed on me the necessity of removing a part of the Observatory to a place which would be free from the electric currents caused by the street cars. Mr. Stupart, acting on instructions, secured a couple acres of land about nine miles from Toronto and I have a vote in the Supplementary Estimates to construct a small building there this year. Our observations then will be free from the influence of these currents which now render them almost useless.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON. Will the new station be connected by telegraph with the General Observatory in Toronto?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. MONK. I would call the attention of the Minister to the necessity for having a re-survey made of Lake St. Louis on the St. Lawrence, near Montreal. It was surveyed as far back as 1836, but that survey was not a very complete one. At any rate, there has been a great deal of dredging both at the entrance and the outlet of the lake since then, and a great deal of other changes have taken place which make a re-survey necessary, or at least a correction of that old survey of 1836. The Minister is probably aware that during the summer the lake is frequented by a large number of steam and sailing yachts from the United States and Canada. It would seem necessary that those visiting the lakes during the summer should have the advantage of an exact chart. I called the attention of the Minister to this last year and I trust he will consider my proposition favourably now. The same remark applies with increasing force to the Lake of Two Mountains on the Ottawa River, about twenty miles from Montreal. It is some two or three miles wide and about fifteen miles long, but it never has been surveyed at all. It is also the resort of a great many strange craft in the summer and it is proper that we should have a proper chart of the lake which is a dangerous lake for navigation. If the hon. members for Vaudreuil (Mr. Harwood) and Two Mountains (Mr. Ethier) were here, I am sure they would bear me out in this request. I have been told that a survey of both of these lakes would not cost more than $2,000, and it would be a very proper expenditure to make.

Mr. CLARKE. Have any changes been made in the staff of the Meteorological Office at Toronto?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Mr. Denison is granted an increase of $100, Mr. Blake an increase of $50, Mr. Kingsford an increase of $80, and a messenger at $310.

Marine Hospitals..... $38,000

Mr. SPROULE. What number of patients are cared for in these marine hospitals?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is a Sick Mariner's Fund contributed to by the shipping interests and out of that fund these mariners are provided for. It costs the taxpayers nothing. Formerly we used to provide for them in hospitals maintained at the public expense, but we now find it more economical and better to send them to the general hospitals where we pay at the rate of 80 and 90 cents a day each.

Steamboat Inspection..... $27,000

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is an increase of $1,000 to provide for an additional inspector in British Columbia. There has been an immense increase of shipping there during the last year, and some time ago I sent Mr. Adams out to hold a board for the examination of persons qualified to become inspectors of steamboats, and an additional inspector was appointed.

Mr. FOSTER. Who is the new inspector?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Mr. Russell.

Fisheries $243,000

Mr. FOSTER. We have been pretty good to the hon. gentleman in letting his Estimates go through, and I think some gentlemen were here quite a time last night. I propose to my hon. friend that if he will leave one item, we will let the others go through.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is reasonable.

Mr. MONK.

Salaries and disbursements of fishery inspectors overseers and guardians... $95,000

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is an increase here of $5,000 which calls for an explanation. For the past two years I have been making a very stern attempt to improve the service for the protection of the lobster fisheries in the maritime provinces. There appear to be two diverse interests at play. One is the lobster fisheries as viewed from a national standpoint—is it desirable to conserve it and preserve it? The other is the interest of the lobster fisherman, who is carrying on the lobster industry. He has an interest in preserving the industry; but he has a greater interest in catching all the lobsters he can for the time being. He is not disposed to observe regulations, or times or seasons, and a conflict has been going on between him and the department. The lobster industry gives more employment and brings in more money than almost any other industry in the maritime provinces; and my predecessors came to the conclusion, and I have adopted their conclusion, that it is of the greatest national interest that this industry should be guarded in every possible way. Regulations were adopted for guarding it, and a close season was adopted. Up to the 15th of July lobsters of a certain size can be caught; but after the 15th of July men who engage in this fishery violate the law. Yet they continue fishing after the time has come when fishing should cease. Although we have a very large staff of fishery officers around the coasts, they are insufficient to cope with the difficulty, and my proposal is to increase the vote by $5,000, to cover the cost of supplying two small steam launches which will go along the coast and enable the officers not to confine their efforts to the land, but to go out one, two three, four or five miles, and catch the men in flagrante delicto, and seize and destroy their traps. We tried last year to cope with this evil by means of the ordinary cruisers, but they found it difficult to go into the bays. Captain Spain strongly recommends that two small steam launches be supplied, and as soon as the House votes the money for the purpose, I intend to have them built. The Auditor General requires that I should state that this $5,000 is to be spent for these steam launches, and that is what the increase is for.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's). I am pleased to find that the hon. Minister of Marine is taking active measures to try and preserve this valuable industry from being completely wiped out. There is no doubt that it is nearing that period year by year; and unless very strict measures are taken, it will soon become a thing of the past. With respect to the mode in which the hon. gentleman is going about it, I must say I do not agree with him. I do not think it is possible for steam launches to detect these people when they lay themselves out to deceive or to get to the windward of the authorities. I made inquiries last year of the parties engaged in this business, and I find that when the season is over they do not put out any buoys, but set their lines of traps under water and take landmarks, by which they can strike the line of traps every time with their boats. A steam launch cannot detect that kind of thing at all. There is only one way in which it can be stopped. If the hon. gentleman would spend the same money or half the money which these steam launches will cost, to have a detective organization on the shore, to catch these fellows when they bring the lobsters to land, something might be done. In some sections of the country nothing of that kind is carried on. In the eastern section of the island, from Cape Bear to East Point, it is not done; but around the southern and western sections, I am told that it is done to a large extent; and it will continue unless there is an active police patrol set on the coast to detect these men and catch them. I do not think that if a dozen steam launches were got, they would be of any use to stop this practice.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have a great respect for the opinion of the hon. gentleman, because he is a practical man who is engaged in the business, and he knows the difficulties; but I am acting in this case, not only on the opinion of all my officers in the maritime provinces, but as a result of the experiments which I tried myself last year. On the authority of the vote granted to me by the House, I chartered a steam tug and employed her on the coasts of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, and by that means my officers destroyed thousands of traps. A steam launch capable of going ten or twelve miles an hour can go along the coast and come upon these men before they know where they are. Whether the traps are buoyed or not, the steam yacht can catch the men who go out in the boats, and then pick up the traps and destroy them. It may be not as effective a system as hon. gentlemen desire, but it is a step in the right direction.

Mr. YEO. The great difficulty is in the law compelling fishermen to fish at a time when there are no fish to be caught, and preventing their fishing at a time when fish are plentiful. It will be impossible to prevent their trying to get fish when fish are to be caught. These people have gone to a very large outlay, and under the present law are compelled to fish at a season when there are no fish on the coast and are not allowed to fish when fish are plentiful. If the hon. Minister would make a change in the regulations as regards certain portions of the eastern provinces he would find no difficulty in having the law observed.

These people do not ask for a longer season than is allowed in other parts, but they want the season changed.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I must congratulate my hon. friend who has just spoken (Mr. Yeo) for having brought this matter to the attention of the hon. Minister. I must say that the remarks he has made apply equally well to the Magdalen Islands. It is a well-known fact that lobsters are caught at these islands three weeks and sometimes a month later than in certain portions of Prince Edward Island and the Nova Scotia coast, and the same thing is the case in Cape Breton, according to statements made by hon. gentlemen last year. Under the circumstances, would it not be better not to provide a uniform season for lobster fishing which will apply to all parts of the maritime provinces. Many complaints have been made and petitions sent to the hon. gentleman since a couple of years, and I have been told, on every occasion on which I made representations, that it was absolutely necessary we should have uniform legislation on this subject, and that it was out of the question to have some parts of the Dominion dealt with differently from others. Well, there is no dissentient opinion among those engaged in the business in the Magdalen Islands, among the merchants, very important firms, on this point. It is a well-known fact that the lobsters are caught in the Magdalen Islands three weeks and a month later than in the other parts of the Dominion, and under the circumstances it seems to me it would be better to extend the season. What happens at present? The regulations of the department are violated, and any regulations that may be made in this connection will be violated. I do not approve of the violation, because I respect the law, and I desire that my constituents shall obey it, but I must press earnestly on the hon. gentleman the unfairness to the Magdalen Island fishermen of fixing the same close season for them as in other parts of the maritime provinces. According to the Treaty of Washington, those islands are the only place in the Dominion where the American fishermen can catch fish inside the three-mile limit in Canadian waters.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not lobsters.

Mr. LEMIEUX. No, but other fish. The people of these islands labour under more unfavourable circumstances, under the law, than the fishermen of other parts of the Dominion; and what I ask is not that they be given any special privilege, but that justice be done them by the Government by extending the season. I sincerely hope that in his visit to the maritime provinces next summer the hon. gentleman will call at the Magdalen Islands and judge for himself the facts that I have the honour to present to him.

Mr. MACDONALD. No doubt the hon. gentleman has stated the facts with regard to the Magdalen Islands, but there is a serious side to this fishery business. It is a very important industry. We can catch, perhaps, more fish during the close than during the open season, but the fishermen of our section do not wish for any change. Even if they got the privilege, they would not take fish in the season now prohibited, because they desire to preserve the fisheries. The hon. Minister has a very difficult task, as had his predecessors, in carrying out the regulations. But our fisheries are a very valuable asset, and they are getting fished out. I believe that my county is the first place in the maritime provinces in which lobster fishing was started, and that industry has been continued there from that day to this. At the time the industry was started, two lobsters would fill a pound can, whereas now it takes ten. That tells the whole story, and that will be the result in the whole of the maritime provinces if the present law is not observed. I would strongly urge the hon. Minister to have a good stiff back on the question, and take every means to carry out the law as strictly as possible. That may seem very hard to some people, but it will be in the interests of the whole country.

Mr. McALISTER. I represent a county in which lobster fishing is carried on to a great extent, and I have not, for some years past, heard any complaints whatever about the close season being too short. I agree with the hon. member for King's (Mr. Macdonald) that if we wish to preserve this valuable industry, we must enforce the regulations. The fishermen in the county of Restigouche, which I have the honour to represent, and all along that coast are perfectly satisfied with the length of the season and do not ask that it be changed in any respect. They desire all through to see the regulations strictly enforced and thus preserve this valuable industry.

Mr. MARTIN. As long as those regulations are not suitable to the different localities, it will be almost impossible to make the fishermen obey them, and they have some cause for not doing so. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries knows that, even so far as the small province from which he comes is concerned, the season that suits the north side does not suit the south side. In the south side they begin earlier and can continue their fishing later. As a matter of fact, after the 15th July and even up to September, there is a larger run of lobsters suitable for canning on the south shore than in July. Now, if you attempt to force a regulation that will prevent these men from fishing in that season and thus deprive them of all returns from the very large sums of money they have invested in this business, why it can hardly be expected but that they will try to recoup themselves for their investment. I will say with all due respect to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that if the sum he proposes to spend in steam launches—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is only $5,000 on a steam launch.

Mr. MARTIN. Well, if that $5,000 were expended in dividing the lobster fishing country into sections and giving a season to each section, the results would be much better. I do not see any great difficulty in that. Unless you do that any expenditure of money you make is merely an attempt to make these men honest by law. They are not naturally disposed to violate the law, and will not violate the regulations except as a matter of self-protection. I am sure that not one of these fishermen would violate the law if you would give them the fishing at the proper season. I know the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has a lively interest in the success of this industry, and I do not think it would be too much of a task for the department to make regulations more suitable in regard to the proper season for each section. If this were done it would give more satisfaction than the expenditure of money for steam launches, which, after all, will not stop the illegal fishing.

Mr. GANONG. If the conditions of lobster fishing in the different localities are to be considered, I must respectfully call the attention of the Minister to the county of Charlotte in which I reside, for the conditions of the lobster fishery there are as different from those around Grand Manan as they possibly can be. I shall not take the time to discuss the matter, but, if these local differences are being considered, I should like to have attention paid to the conditions in my county.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am much pleased to have had this discussion. I desire to say a few words to call attention to the facts. My predecessors had to grapple with this question, and one of them, I think it was Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, appointed a commission composed of some of the best officials in the maritime provinces to examine into this question thoroughly. This commission held meetings and heard evidence in all parts of the maritime provinces, and made their report. There was also a special committee appointed by this House. They also called evidence from all parts and made a report on the subject. The department acted on these reports and adopted not exactly the present close season but one very much akin to it. The department had the advantage also of a discussion in this House almost every year. Though hon. members have suggested that possibly a change could be made in this close season from time to time the House will see that the moment the suggestion is made hon. members, even on the same side of politics express their opinions but cannot be got to agree. I do not say that the present system is perfect, but I do say that it is the result of experience for many years of the fishery officers and of the evidence given by many hundreds, and I may say by many thousands, of fishermen. The importance of the fishery cannot be over-estimated. Take, for instance, that about the Bay of Fundy in the county of Charlotte. I think it is criminal to can lobsters in that bay. Why? Because the fishermen get for 1 to 1½ cent for each lobster for canning, while they can get from 18 to 20 cents for that lobster to be shipped alive to Boston. I have under consideration an amendment of the rule as to the length of lobsters in that bay for the purpose of canning, to extend the minimum length from 9½ to 10½ inches so as to stop canning there altogether. The Americans have cleaned out their own coast along the shore of Maine and they are creeping up the Bay of Fundy and establishing themselves on the Grand Manan. I propose that if possible the fishermen shall get from 18 cents to 20 cents for a lobster instead of 1 cent or 1½ cents that they get now for canning. Then take the Magdalen Islands. It is a debatable question, and I do not pretend to speak ex cathedra or with certainty, but I have consulted some of the leading lobster packers in the Magdalen Islands and they are of opinion that the present close season is the best we could adopt. I know from personal knowledge a good deal about the lobster fishery in Prince Edward Island. I am aware that the close season that is proper for one part of the island is not best suited for another. My hon. friend from East Prince (Mr. Yeo) has spoken of the west end of the island. I know the west end of Prince Edward Island. I think that there and in New Brunswick they ought to have a more extended season than the present. But the difficulty is that if you grant that extended season, they will insist upon it in Cape Breton and Antigonish and other countries, and so we are face to face with a grave problem. If we extend the season in one or two localities, the rest will be up in arms demanding the same; and if we make the extension general we strike a blow at one of the most important industries in the maritime provinces. The question is not by any means free from difficulty. It has given me more anxiety than any other I have had to face since I became head of the department. When I came into office I called a meeting of lobster men, and got together about 150 of them, men representing a very large amount of capital and employing thousands and tens of thousands of men. And I could not get them to come to any agreement. They have as different opinions as have hon. members of this House. I sent my officers to investigate, chief among them being the commissioner, Mr. Prince, a scientific gentleman at the head of the fishery branch, and he held meetings in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and came back with the same report. It seems impossible to get an agreement among the different localities and different interests. But I think that the season we have chosen suits the large majority of those localities, and with respect to the minority of localities, either they will have to be content with the law as it is, or we shall have to make a slight extension to meet the very grave cases of hardship that has occurred in some cases. I promise my friends to do the best I can in that regard, and I am in hopes to be able fairly well to meet honest and reasonable demands, while I reject unhesitatingly unreasonable demands. I am sorry to have any member of Parliament say it will be impossible to enforce the regulations. I say it is not impossible to enforce honest and reasonable regulations. It can be done, we did it well last year in some places, although public opinion was against us, we did not have the steam launches, and we had not our machinery arranged. But I think this coming season the illegal lobster fisherman who attempts to poach on the preserves we have down there after the season expires, will find he is taking great risk.

Mr. SPROULE. As I understand the object of the Minister is to get these items through, and he is to allow one item to stand upon which we can refer to other items, I will defer making any remarks tonight.

Mr. HENDERSON. I might possibly not be here when the item comes up again, and I desire to ask the Minister who is the overseer at the present time at Bronté, in the district from Brant House to Port Credit, on the north side of Lake Ontario. Who is the present overseer of fisheries there, or is there one appointed?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I cannot give the hon. gentleman the information off-hand. I have not got the book with me.

Mr. HENDERSON. Perhaps I may be able to draw his attention to it again.

Resolutions to be reported.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 6th May, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF RAINY RIVER.

Mr. BENNETT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to say that I have had placed in my hands by the leader of the Opposition a letter written to him by a firm of solicitors in the town of Rat Portage, to which I would call the attention of the Government. It would seem that the districts of Rainy River and Thunder Bay were attached for judicial purposes. On the 4th of April last a proclamation went into effect separating the two, and owing to the non-appointment of a judge to the Rainy River district, they are not now able to go on with the administration of justice. Under the former arrangement the Rainy River district had a stipendiary magistrate who exercised the functions of a district court judge, and a local judge of the high court of justice, and also other extensive powers. By reason of the proclamation separating the two districts, a part of the Rainy River district is no longer under the Thunder Bay district, and consequently since the 4th of April all legal processes in that district have ceased, and the courts cannot be carried on. A further telegram dated yesterday has been sent by these gentlemen to the leader of the Opposition, asking him when the Government proposes to appoint a person to take the position that was formerly occupied by the stipendiary magistrate. I do not know what title the new appointment is to hold, whether that of stipendiary magistrate or judge. But these solicitors complain that the law business has all been suspended there now, and that they are in a chaotic state so far as the processes of law are concerned, and they ask that the Government may be pleased to appoint an officer at the earliest possible date.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I may say to my hon. friend that that is not an altogether unpleasant task for the Government, and if the hon. gentleman will kindly let me have these papers, I will communicate them to the Department of Justice.

ENFORCEMENT OF THE ALIEN LABOUR LAW.

Mr. CLARKE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the First Minister if there has been any officer appointed yet to visit Toronto and enforce the Alien Labour Law?

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I have received information—I have not got it here—that all the men who had been imported from the other side have been sent back; so there has been no necessity for the appointment of such an officer.

Mr. CLARKE. The hon. gentleman's information does not accord with some information which I have.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman knows that at present he can only put the question, but if he wants to debate the question, he will have an opportunity of doing so when we move the House into Committee of Supply.

Mr. CLARKE. I would not like to take up the time of the House even then. I have some information that I can communicate to the right hon. gentleman which would show him that he has not been correctly informed.

Mr. BENNETT. I desire to ask the leader of the House if an officer has been appointed to enforce the Alien Labour Law on the north shores of the Georgian Bay, where, I am informed, a large number of Americans are now being employed to the exclusion of Canadians.

The PRIME MINISTER. I cannot answer my hon. friend at this moment. I will make inquiries.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I beg to move:

That from this date to the end of the session, Government Orders have precedence on Mondays immediately after Private Bills.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does my right hon. friend propose to take next Monday?

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think it would be better to say after next Monday, in order that we may have more means of disposing of the resolutions and motions.

The PRIME MINISTER. I had intended to take next Monday, but if the hon. gentleman insists upon having that day, of course, I will yield to him with the view that we can come to some satisfactory arrangement towards reaching a close of the session. If the hon. gentleman insists, I will amend the motion so as to read after Monday next.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think that would facilitate business, because we can take up those motions that are on the Order paper. I should be glad to do everything in my power to facilitate the business so that we may reach the close of the session.

Mr. DAVIN. In this connection I would like to call the right hon. gentleman's attention to one or two items on the Order paper. One of them is the Pension Bill. The right hon. gentleman, in moving the adjournment of a debate on that Bill, stated that his desire was to get the opinion of the Department of Justice on a question that he raised. I should like to say to him that even with Monday next given to private members, it is hardly likely that will be reached, and even if it were reached, I know that a private member cannot take charge of such a Bill. I would urge the hon. gentleman who is at the head of the North-west Mounted Police to take this matter up, especially if he should be advised that my view of the law was correct. The right hon. gentleman will remember that at a previous session I had a pension Bill on the paper, in which I provided for meeting even a greater grievance than this.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would remind the hon. gentleman that he is not speaking to the motion before the House.

Mr. DAVIN. I am informing the right hon. gentleman. Of course, if I am out of order—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman will see that his remarks are out of order unless he can make them relevant to the motion before the Chair, that after next Monday Government measures should have precedence.

The PRIME MINISTER. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that he can bring this matter up when we go into Committee of Supply.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask my right hon. friend whether he is able to make a statement to the House as to the probable date of closing the session.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I think you had better make that statement.

The PRIME MINISTER. Following the suggestion of my hon. friend beside me, I think that is a question which the leader of the Opposition could better answer himself. However, I understand that the hon. gentleman wants to know, and it is a very fair question, whether the Government have any new questions to bring before the House. I will be able to give an answer on Monday or Tuesday next.

PRIVATE BILLS LEGISLATION.

Mr. LANDERKIN. With the permission of the House, I will present the 17th report of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders. I also beg to move:

That that portion of the 49th Rule which limits the time for receiving petitions for Private Bills be suspended in reference to the petition of the Anglo-French Telegraph Company (Limited) for an Act of incorporation; and also in reference to the petition of the International Radial Railway Company, for an Act to amend their Act of incorporation, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders, as contained in their Seventeenth Report.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. We should have heard the report read before that motion was made. But I want to call your attention to the fact that this year we have been ignoring the rules of this House in respect to a very large number of private Bills, much more frequently than on any previous occasion. Three or four years ago the House decided to put a stop to this private legislation when it was not brought forward in accordance with the established rules of the House. These people are allowed to come before us in the latter days of the session without having given public notice of their intention, and therefore leaving interested parties unaware of the legislation sought from this House. I believe if we are going to keep on the way we have pursued so far this session, we might as well remove that rule from our rules of order. It is a great mistake, I believe, to ignore the rules of the House to such a large extent. I can easily understand that in special cases there might be good and strong reasons for allowing such legislation to pass through the House; but I also believe there is speculation on the part of certain parties to bring in legislation without giving the least notice thereof, in order to avoid opposition on the part of other parties who may be interested. I do not know anything about this last case, and I am not referring to it, and I do not wish to oppose the motion before the House, but I desire to call your attention, Mr. Speaker, and the attention of the House to the fact that we are relaxing too much the rules of the House in matters of private legislation.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think it is absolutely necessary at this stage of the session that no such permission should be granted without the fullest statement being made by the parties moving in the matter as to the grounds on which they ask for a suspension of the rules.

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not think we should be any more severe on this occasion than in other cases; but I equally agree with the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) that we have been altogether too lax in the application of the rules of the House, and if both parties would agree, we might very well give notice to the public, and have it well understood, that next session the rules will have to be adhered to.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I desire to say, on behalf of the Committee on Standing Orders, that the members are as anxious to maintain the rules of the House as are the members of any other committee, and they have not relaxed the rules this session unless good and sufficient reasons had been submitted for so doing. There may be a possibility that the amending of the rules governing standing orders might well be considered by the House. Those rules were made years ago, before the means of communication were such as they are at present, probably before the introduction of the telegraph and telephone lines. It might be well to consider the advisability of maintaining or changing the rules in view of the facilities at present provided for submitting objections and representations before the Committee on Standing Orders. I am quite satisfied that the committee has been painstaking and careful in considering the reasons why the rules were not complied with by those presenting petitions, and time and again the committee have refused to suspend the rules until the fullest reasons and satisfactory reasons for non-compliance have been submitted to the committee. I can say this, on behalf of the committee, that I do not believe they will take any advantage of the rules and not further any scheme that is not of public benefit, but the committee merely listen to the reasons why the parties have not complied with the rules.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the hon. gentleman state some of the reasons why suspension of the rule is asked now?

Mr. LANDERKIN. The reasons are always given in the report.

Mr. WALLACE. A report was not made.

Mr. LANDERKIN. They are given to the committee by those in charge of the proposed legislation, and the committee judge whether those reasons are good and sufficient. If they deem the reasons good and sufficient they ask the House to suspend the rule and allow the petition to be received.

Mr. WALLACE. There are no reasons whatever given in the report.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The reasons were given before the committee, and if they were incorporated in the report it would make it very voluminous, and it could not be read before the House.

Mr. WALLACE. Let the hon. gentleman state the reasons verbally now.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It is the committee who take charge of the reasons, and who ask the rule to be suspended if these reasons are considered sufficient. I am only there to preside.

The PRIME MINISTER. It is hardly in order to refer to what passed in the committee.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We must ask either the chairman or some member of the committee to state briefly the reasons in order to justify the action of the House.

Mr. LANDERKIN.

One of these Bills refers to an Anglo-French cable. I do not know that there is any objection to it, but the very title of the Bill shows it to be of a grave character, and there should be some reason given for asking the House to suspend the rules.

The PRIME MINISTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I am sorry that the rules of the House prevent me from giving the reasons that transpired in committee.

The PRIME MINISTER. We can discuss the report.

Mr. WILSON. I have had the pleasure of being a member of the Committee on Standing Orders ever since I have been in the House, and every year we promise that we are going to enforce the rules more rigidly in the future. However, instead of getting more careful I believe that committee is getting more lax every session. Those who want to get through this kind of legislation are always ready with some excuse, and whether they are honest or dishonest in their reasons, they always say that the circumstances justifying the legislation have recently arisen and they had no knowledge of them before. It is high time that the rules should be revised with reference to that committee, and that they should be more rigidly enforced. In fact, I have almost refused to attend that committee this year, because I thought that the rules are not carried out as they should be.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of that House that the motion be agreed to.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not until we get the reasons.

The PRIME MINISTER. Any member of the House can object to this motion being carried, and if no explanation is given in reference to this report of the committee, it must take the consequences.

Mr. FOSTER. If they cannot give an explanation, I object.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would not take the responsibility of objecting to a thing until I know what it is, and that is the reason why I have asked for an explanation.

Mr. LANDERKIN. If the leader of the Opposition has any repugnance, his colleague (Mr. Foster) will object to it at any time for him.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, I object to this report going through without an explanation. The chairman of the committee says it is not his business to give the reasons, as he is simply the chairman, but I trust that some member of the committee will be able to give us some reasons why we should suspend the rules. There are no reasons given in the report.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question will have to be considered on the merits of the motion, because I have put the motion. It was not moved at the regular time, but I asked that leave of the House should be given to move this motion and leave was given. Therefore, the merits of the motion will have to be considered by the House.

Mr. WALLACE. We did not object to the motion being made, because we expected that there would be reasons given for it.

Mr. SPEAKER. The rule does not require any notice of motion concerning the conduct of a private Bill. The only rule of the House which was suspended was that this motion was brought in after I had called "motions," and when we had proceeded to the Orders of the Day. This motion could then only be made with the consent of the House, and I asked for that consent and received it. Now, the question is before the House on its merits.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Let us have the merits.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt this motion?

And the yeas and nays being asked for, the motion was agreed to on division.

Mr. FOSTER. We throw the responsibility on the Government.

CONTRACT—AMERICAN CANNED MEATS.

Mr. QUINN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to mention a matter to which I drew the attention of the Government some time ago concerning an article which appeared in the New York "National Provisioner," and which I have already spoken of to the Prime Minister. At that time the Prime Minister said that the statement contained in the article concerning the sale to the Government of some goods by the firm of Libby, McNeill & Libby, was not true. Since that time the statement has again appeared in the Canadian papers and has caused some unrest amongst the trade. I have in my hand now a letter which has been handed me by an hon. member of this House, which letter was written to him and contains the following statement:

To-day, however, we received a letter from our representative in the United States, in which he stated that Libby, McNeill & Libby had informed him that they had just shipped three carloads of canned meats to British Columbia on Canadian Government account.

I bring this matter up to-day for the purpose of having a denial given to the statement, because, as I have said, it has caused some unrest in the trade, and with the hope that the denial will be taken notice of by the Canadian press.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I have only to repeat, Mr. Speaker, what I have already stated, that no order has been given to the firm mentioned. Contracts have been made after tenders were asked for, and if my hon. friend (Mr. Quinn) will give notice of motion I will be very glad to bring all the papers down.

Mr. QUINN. I do not suppose that is necessary.

ROULEAU POST OFFICE.

Mr. DAVIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the Postmaster General about a post office, concerning which I wrote to him last year. The post office of Rouleau is a small post office on the Sault branch. I received a letter from his private secretary at the time, November 30, as follows:—

In the absence of the Postmaster General, permit me to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 19th inst., protesting against the closing of the Rouleau post office, and beg to assure you that the same will receive the Minister's consideration.

Yours truly,
E. H. LASCHINGER,
Private Secretary.

I had some communication with the department subsequently, and I believe that orders went out to do away with the office; but I am under the impression that my hon. friend the Postmaster General was good enough to say that he would reconsider his decision, and I would like to ask him whether he has done that.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). I cannot recollect any of the circumstances connected with the office in question; but I will inform the hon. gentleman on Monday.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

Mr. MARTIN. I wish to remind the Postmaster General that two orders of this House were issued on April 21, 1897, one relating to the dismissal of the postmaster of Kinross, P.E.I., and the other relating to the dismissal of the postmaster of Little Sands, P.E.I.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to send me a memorandum about them?

Mr. MARTIN. I sent a memorandum three weeks ago.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I gave instructions to have that complied with, and I am surprised that it has not been complied with. Has the hon. gentleman looked at the Votes and Proceedings?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes. There is also a return, which I asked for since, regarding the post office of St. Mary's Road, P.E.I.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I will try and have them attended to ; but I must ask for a memorandum of them.

SUPPLY—MOUNTED POLICE PENSIONS

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. DAVIN. Before the House goes into committee, I should like very briefly to call the attention of the right hon. Prime Minister to what is really a serious and pressing grievance on the part of some of his most deserving officers, for instance, those officers of the Mounted Police who have been promoted from the ranks. Some of them were promoted a few years ago, and were forty-five years of age when promoted. The men at that age would not be entitled to superannuation at all, if retired from the force, and some of the most deserving officers who were promoted a few years ago, would only be entitled to a wretched pittance. In one case a man would be entitled to only a month's pay for each year that he had served as an officer ; others may have served only a year or two or three years ; whereas the same men, if retired as sergeant-majors, would each be entitled to thirty-fiftieths of their pay as a pension. I may mention one case which I pressed upon the attention of the right hon. gentleman, because I knew the man to be a deserving man and a good officer, who takes no interest in anything but his profession. He was then sergeant-major. When pressing his merits on the attention of the authorities in other days, I did it unwillingly, because I knew that in becoming an inspector he would be sacrificing a much better position, and a much better prospective position than he would gain. All he would gain would be the social rank that belonged to the higher position. When I mentioned his claims to those in authority they said they knew he was a first-rate officer, but surely he was not fool enough to become inspector, and give up his position as a sergeant-major." If he were retired, he would be entitled only to a month's pay for each year he served as an officer. There are others who were promoted after the age of forty-five ; and, as I read the Act, they would be entitled to nothing if retired by way of superannuation. I dealt with this subject in a Bill I had before the House the session before last or the previous session, and the right hon. gentleman said that he would consider it. What was suggested in a clause of that Bill was that the service in the ranks of those men who had been promoted from the ranks should count. That is obviously a claim of the commonest justice ; because it is a cruel promotion that you have given them, if in giving them superior rank you place them in such a position that if ill-health or anything else caused them to be retired, they would be ex-inspectors of the Mounted Police and almost indigent. Therefore, I would ask the right hon. gentleman, who I know takes a great interest in the force of which he is the head, to consider that question, which I deem much more urgent than anything in the other Bill.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). All I can say at this moment is that the reasons just set forth by my hon. friend appear to me to be entitled to consideration and weight. I was not prepared the other day to give assent to his Bill. The session is too far advanced to remedy the grievance this year ; but he has thrown new light upon the subject, and I will promise to take it up and consider it with a view perhaps of dealing with it later on.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

Civil Government—Department of Agriculture—Contingencies $16,500

Mr. FOSTER. I would like some explanation of this.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). The two gentlemen, Messrs. Thompson and Farmer, whose names are here mentioned, are young gentlemen, graduates of McGill University, whose assistance I was obliged to obtain for the purpose of aiding the examiners in the Patent Office. The examination of patents had got very much in arrears, and I found that the staff did not seem able to overtake the arrears. This year, unfortunately, the oldest examiner, Mr. McCabe, was laid up for a considerable time. Some delay occurred in consequence of the shifting of the model room from the Langevin Block, the rooms of which were required for the Interior Department in consequence of the fire. A great deal of time was thus lost in the examination of applications for patents. I required some technical officers as assistants, and applied to the authorities of McGill University to recommend me a chemist and a mechanical electrician. They recommended these two young men, but I could not get them to come on the ordinary terms of temporary clerks, who are only allowed $400 a year, and was obliged to give them the higher salary of $600. Therefore these words had to be put in. In consequence of that increase, I am obliged to ask for the round sum instead of $9,415.

Mr. FOSTER. Is the work of such a nature that it requires a technical officer ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It is work which requires a good deal of technical knowledge. The examiners ought to be, according to the particular lines of patents which they examine, mechanics or chemists or electricians, and so on—men who understand at once or easily the drawings and the descriptions of the things for which patents are applied for. The work is really of a highly technical nature. The examiners who have been for some years in the department said it would be no use getting men not technically qualified.

Mr. FOSTER. How many examiners has the hon. gentleman?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Three, and we issue over 4,000 patents in the year, every one of which has to pass under the examination of one of those three examiners. That makes an average of about 1,300 or 1,400 to each examiner. In the United States the average number of patents examined by any one examiner, is 350 or 400. In fact, so much work have our examiners to do, that they have been for a long time in arrears, and there has been constant complaint that patents are not examined as rapidly and as promptly as they should be. But notwithstanding the drawbacks we have suffered, owing to the illness of Mr. McCabe and the fire, we have overtaken a good many of the arrears.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman knows more about the technical needs than I do, but I can hardly understand why he should need a chemist to examine applications for patents.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. A great many applications deal with chemical processes, and it requires considerable technical knowledge to examine them.

Mr. HAGGART. Are these young men graduates from any school of technology?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. They are graduates of McGill. I applied to Dr. Harrington, the Professor of Chemistry and Technology.

Mr. DAVIN. The item for telegrams, $1,286, seems very large.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Last year we had a great deal of bother about hog cholera and a great many telegrams in that connection. My deputy informs me that the telegraph bills have been larger in that connection very much than usual. I am sorry that people often send telegram marked "collect" to the department, which I do not think ought to be done nearly as much as it is. I felt tempted on certain occasions to send them back, because the business might just as well have been done by letter, but it really was public business, and consequently, although tempted, I did not do so.

Mr. DAVIN. It seems a small matter, but I must confess that some of the items strike me as startlingly large. For instance, there is a charge of 138 boxes of pens. That seems an enormous quantity to be used in a department the size of that of Agriculture.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I drew my deputy's attention to that very fact, and had him go over the work of the department and make a fair estimate of what amount of stationery each clerk ought to have for his work. A direct charge now is made against every clerk for every piece of stationery taken by him, and I hope in the future considerable reductions will take place in these items.

Mr. DAVIN. May I ask what is this item of $1,952 for printing and stationery. Is it for printing the Year-Book?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No. Without being positive, I can say that that is for the printing and binding of the patents. We have to keep on record in the Patent Office the face and form of every patent, and these we get bound into volumes. There are hundreds of large volumes there of all the patents that have been issued, and every year we have to pay a good deal for binding.

Mr. DAVIN. Is it issued monthly?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No, there is a monthly publication called the "Patent Record," which is under a different item which we shall come to later on.

Archives $8,000

Mr. DAVIN. I suppose this item does not require much explanation. I do not know if other members of the committee visit Mr. Brymner, the archivist, but I sometimes do. The work that Mr. Brymner is doing is an important and valuable one.

Mr. HAGGART. Would the hon. Minister of Agriculture state what progress is being made in the amalgamation of the several archives. There is one, I believe, in the Department of the Secretary of State, also there is one in the Department of the Privy Council, and this one in the Department of Agriculture. When I was in the late Government, an effort was made to have these united, and I thought that that had been done.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I quite agree that something of that kind should be done. A commission was appointed some time ago to examine into this question and report. I do not know whether this was done under the late Government or under our Government. It may have been done at some Council meeting when I was not present. The commission consisted of Mr. Courtney, Mr. Joseph Pope and another gentleman whose name I do not recollect. I believe their report is ready, but it has not yet come before Council, and therefore, I cannot give the hon. gentleman information as to what it contained. I trust that something practical will result from it.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) asked a few minutes ago as to the "Patent Record." I may explain that it is a monthly publication issued by the department, giving one picture and a short description of every patent that is issued. It is necessary to the proper administration of the Patent Office, and of great use to the public, inasmuch as a person is able to learn from it whether any idea which he may think of having patented has been anticipated. It is distributed regularly to public libraries, to members of Parliament and to people throughout the country who are interested in this sort of thing. This item has been the same for a great many years. I have not looked into the details of the matter, but I have every reason to believe that the expenditure is necessary.

Mr. DAVIN. I receive a copy of this publication every month and usually give it to some person whom I know to be interested in scientific matters and inventions, and to such persons I believe it to be of great value. I gather from what the Minister has said that the publication is in no way self-sustaining. But it struck me that if the public knew the nature of it, there might be a sale for it. However, it is probably a difficult thing for the department to regulate that.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The work is a very expensive one to publish, because there are so many cuts, and because the issue is not a large one. If a very large edition were put out, the cost per copy, of course, would be reduced. It is issued by the Printing Bureau, and, of course, there are no profits for anybody in it. It is for sale, but the number of copies sold is very small.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the price at which it is sold?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I cannot give the hon. gentleman that information at the moment.

Mr. WILSON. The price is $2 a year.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON. Would the hon. Minister inform me whether this publication called the "Patent Record" contains, in addition to a description of the patents issued in the previous month, a list of the books copyrighted in the department?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It does not.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON. Is there any official publication giving a list of that kind?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON. Would it not be well to publish such a list in the "Patent Record"? It would be no additional expense to give a list of books copyrighted each month, as is done in England.

Mr. FISHER.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. At the suggestion of the hon. member (Mr. Ross Robertson) I shall look into the matter. I do not see any reason why it should not be done. The expense would be very small.

Mr. McDOUGALL. If the hon. Minister would adopt the plan of sending a few copies of this publication to the educational institutions of the country it might lead to those institutions becoming regular subscribers, and thus make the publication more profitable to the department.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I will remember the hon. gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. CLANCY. Did I understand the Minister to say that these bound volumes were distributed in some cases?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No, that is not what I said. Perhaps the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) will allow me to explain. The bound copies to which I had reference in answering the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) were not the bound copies of the "Patent Record," but the official record of the patents for the use of the department. First, we have the application for the patent which is filed away in a particular form of file. Then, when a man receives his patent, one copy of the patent is sent to the patentee and another is kept in the department and the copies thus kept are bound.

Mr. CLANCY. I thought from what the hon. Minister said that there was a distribution of the bound volume made in some cases to the mechanics' institutes and free libraries.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Only the "Patent Record" is sent out to those institutions, not the bound form, but monthly as it is issued.

Mr. SPROULE. Is the bound volume for sale?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Those bound volumes are not for sale. They are the official records in the department, and they cannot leave the department at all.

Mr. SPROULE. But you distribute them to the members.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Not those things at all. There are two copies made up of every patent, one is sent to the patentee and the other is kept in the department as a record. These are bound together in volumes, and kept as records in the department.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON. Would the Minister allow me to ask him a question with regard to item 73 that has already been passed? When will the new room in the department of the archives be ready, so that the books that were removed after the fire may be in such order that those desirous of information may obtain it? At present there is a good deal of complaint that it is impossible to get information, from the fact that so much delay has occurred in making that information accessible.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I may say to the hon. gentleman that I have been prodding up my department and the Minister of Public Works in regard to that matter. I received the other day a letter from the chief architect saying that this room would be ready very soon. But there has been a good deal of delay, I confess, much to my own inconvenience.

Collection and compilation of criminal statistics $1,300

Mr. DAVIN. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman what officer or officers in his department prepare this volume?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Mr. Gravelle is one of them, and I think Mr. Skead is the other. I have not got my book with me at the moment which gives the duties of the different clerks, and I am speaking from memory. I think it is Mr. Gravelle and Mr. Skead, or it may be Mr. Gravelle and Mr. Wilkins.

Mr. DAVIN. The statistics are, of course, most valuable; but I think that with very little more trouble whatever clerk edits that volume could give us in a readier way and more rapidly indicative, what are the general results. I have been accustomed in the past continually to refer to them, and it struck me that a little improvement could be made in that direction.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That book is in charge of Mr. George Johnson, who is the chief statistician. I will bring the matter to his attention.

Statistical Year-Book..... $4,000

Mr. SPROULE. Will the Minister tell us how many copies of this book he intends to issue, and when the next edition will be out?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I think the current edition came out in the winter; I cannot say when the next edition will be out, but I think it is in about a year from the last publication.

Mr. SPROULE. How many copies were issued?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Speaking from memory, there were more copies issued this year than ever before, but the book is much smaller in extent. It seems to me there were 4,000 copies of the English and 1,000 copies of the French.

Mr. SPROULE. Why is it, then, that members of Parliament can only get one copy, when we are told that they are for distribution?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. There has been no change in that respect. Each member of Parliament gets a copy, and copies are sent to a large number of institutions all over the country, copies are issued to exchanges, and are sent out to anybody who applies. Mr. Johnson, who has charge of that book, has a long list of those to whom it is regularly sent. If the hon. gentleman sends a name in, unless the edition is exhausted, it will be sent to him. I am constantly having applications from people all over the country, and I do not remember to have had to refuse one yet.

Mr. SPROULE. I applied for it before it was out, and I was instructed that none would be available but one copy for each member. I had application from some parties for them, and I could not get a supply. My opinion has always been that we should print a larger number of copies than usually are printed. A great many school teachers want them; they find them valuable on account of the statistics they contain. I think if they were supplied in larger numbers and put at a certain price, a larger number than at present would be put into circulation.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Of course, if Parliament wishes to spend more money on it, it is very easy to print a larger number. As a matter of fact, this year I printed a much smaller book, eliminating a good deal that was in it before, condensing it, and striking out some tables which appeared to be repetitions; and the consequence was that something like 20 or 25 per cent greater number of books was published this year than ever before. So I am proceeding on the lines the hon. gentleman has indicated.

Mr. WILSON. I applied for an extra lot of these books, and wrote to Mr. Johnson, and he informed me that if I would send in the names he would send the copies.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I know that is done.

Mr. SPROULE. I dropped into the office desiring to obtain copies of last year's issue, especially as I had applications made to me, but I found there were no copies available. I notice that in the Auditor General's Report the cost of the Statistical Year-Book for last year was $7,700, but only $4,000 had been voted.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That is for the previous year. The work will be done this year for $4,000.

Mr. SPROULE. Are there any copies available now?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes.

Mr. CLANCY. Does the term "exchanges" mean that copies of the book are sent to newspapers and to other parties on the distribution list? I have had inquiries from free libraries and mechanics' institutes for this work. It is a very valuable book and one to which the public should have access. The number must of necessity be somewhat limited, but it should be placed where the people can readily have access to it.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. On Mr. Johnson's list there are most of the mechanics' institutes and all the free libraries, and a good many schools, which have made special application to be placed on the list. I have not seen the list personally, but it has been described to me by Mr. Johnson, and the intention is as the hon. member has indicated.

Mr. McNEILL. Formerly copies of this book were bound in cloth, which were very convenient for purposes of reference. Lately, however, they have been sent out in paper covers, which very soon get broken. I would suggest that a certain number of copies bound in cloth be prepared and sent to members of Parliament.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That might be done.

Mr. BRITTON. I was going to call attention to the expenditure, but this has already been done. Does this publication cover the fiscal year, or the calendar year?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Although I have consulted the work, I never took notice as to that point.

Mr. BRITTON. In other years there has been a good deal of dissatisfaction expressed with regard to the Statistical Year-Book, and considerable complaints made. Mr. Johnson is a pretty highly salaried officer, and there have been complaints in regard to this work. Has the publication of the last year been satisfactory?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I hope so.

Mr. McMULLEN. How many clerks are there in the statistician's office, and what do they cost?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That question was answered by me about two weeks ago. I cannot remember the answer given, but it will be found on the pages of "Hansard."

Mr. McMULLEN. I have been under the impression that there are a great many departments in which the pruning knife should be vigorously applied, and I think this department is one of them. There are twelve or thirteen clerks in connection with the statistician's office, and the head receives a salary of $2,400 a year. What does the country get in return for $2,400 a year?

Mr. SPROULE.

Mr. DAVIN. Full value.

Mr. McMULLEN. The country gets the Year-Book containing some information, but it does not get anything like value. There should be considerable change made in that department. I do not think Mr. Johnson earns his salary—I say so frankly, and the people of the country should not be asked to continue to pay such an enormous salary to a man who has spent only a few years in the department. I know he was an old newspaper man, but whatever he learned in this line he learned after he entered the department. There are a lot of clerks. I think the Minister should be able to state the entire cost of that branch of the department.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I see, on counting the names I recognize in the branch, there are six regular clerks and two who do temporary work.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I should like to say in connection with this matter that I cannot at all agree with the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. McMullen). I believe it would be difficult to over-estimate the value to Canada of Mr. Johnson's work. It is sought after in Europe, and in all quarters is regarded as the highest authority, and has been the means of disseminating a great deal of most valuable information. The book had become a little too bulky, and perhaps is not as useful as a smaller volume would be, but I am quite certain it would be of the greatest possible value, and I think it would take a long time to replace Mr. Johnson or to find a gentleman who, without spending some years in giving attention to this class of work, would be able to do the work quite as efficiently as he has performed it. While I quite agree that the greatest economy should be exercised in regard to public expenditures, I should be extremely sorry to see measures taken that would not secure real economy but would prove a very serious detriment to the public service.

Mr. CHARLTON. I believe there were reasons to a limited extent, perhaps to a very considerable extent, for criticising Mr. Johnson's work in years past. He was in a position where statistics could be made to do service, so far as they could be represented with any degree of fairness, to the party in power, and there were suggestions made that some of those statements might possibly have been slightly coloured. I do not doubt Mr. Johnson's ability; and believe he has the ability to fill that position and he is now likely doing the work very well, as he is under different influences and is perhaps watched more closely than formerly, and is not prompted to do what he did before.

But I rose specially to refer to a remark made by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) about the cost of managing departments, not this one, but all departments of the Government. We used to say a great deal when in Opposition about the uselessness and unnecessary cost of conducting civil government in Canada. We can scarcely expect to bring that cost down to the actual cost under business management. We all know about the influences, the currents and counter currents and the political pulls that are used respecting appointments, perhaps of men who are not absolutely required. But I believe if the Government were to set themselves to reform the civil service and determined to put the service on a business basis, and turn a deaf ear to all political influences and representations and pay no attention to political pulls, our departments of the Government could be managed and carried on more efficiently than they are at the present moment for at least not more than two-thirds of the present cost.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes. An instance has come to my knowledge which illustrates the position, an instance of a clerk who had fallen behind two and a half weeks in his work, while at the same time he was receiving a salary of $1,400 a year. A young lady, working in the department at a salary of less than one-third, brought up the arrears within three days. The young woman probably worked faithfully, and if we required our civil servants to do a day's work, and placed in positions men capable of doing a day's work, men capable of performing their duties as they would be required to do if employed by corporations and business firms, and if we required eight or nine hours service per day, the expenditure would be largely decreased and efficiency very greatly increased and we would be relieved of that demoralizing influence which exists to-day of crowding the service with people who have friends to whose influence it is necessary to pay some attention, and who desire to have men put in the service, not because of their fitness to perform the duties, but because they desire to do some friend a favour. It is worthy of consideration how far we could make reductions in the public service if we set ourselves honestly about the task. I believe that very great reductions could be made, and our duty to the people of this country calls upon us to make such efforts as we may in this line. I fully comprehend the difficulty of moving in this direction; I fully comprehend that a thousand influences will surround the reformer or reformers who attempt to do this, and will make the task a difficult one; but so far as possible it ought to be done. Coming back to this vote under consideration, my opinion is, that the work of that little bureau could be performed with a smaller clerical force. Although I do not feel a disposition to criticise very severely the amount of money spent, or the character of the occupants of the office, or the character of the gentleman who is statistician for the Dominion; yet I believe we could make reductions there and I believe that in dealing with these questions we ought to try so far as we can to reach the result of reducing the public expenditure, and at the same time increasing the efficiency of the service by putting into positions men fit for them, and by keeping in positions only men who are capable of discharging their duties.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not know whether my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) rose to have a side slap at the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) who I believed has got a relative of his into the public service, or at some others of his political friends who have got relatives into the public service, but I do not intend to deal with that at this moment. I rose to say, as a public man who has been much indebted to Mr. Johnson and who is in a position to say something as to the qualities requisite to produce such a book as Mr. Johnson produces; that it would be a very difficult thing to get a man competent for that work at the salary paid him. I rose also to repel the sneer that the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) flung at newspaper editing and newspaper editors. He sneered at Mr. Johnson as having been a mere newspaper writer.

An hon. MEMBER. What about the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding)?

Mr. DAVIN. The Minister of Finance, I am reminded from behind me, was a newspaper editor. One of the best men that we ever had at the head of the Interior Department, the late Hon. Thos. White, was a newspaper editor; and in this Chamber, and in the Chamber of the legislative assembly of Nova Scotia, a man of genius, the late Joe Howe, he was a newspaper editor. And, Sir, let me remind the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) that Thiers, Cavour, John Morley, Sir Edward Russell, Whitelaw Reid, Hay, the American Ambassador at the Court of St. James; they were all newspaper editors. D'Arcy McGee, whose name will always be connected with our history, who fell the proto-martyr of the Canadian confederation and whose genius and eloquence illustrate our parliamentary life, he was a newspaper editor. So, Sir, the fact that Mr. Johnson had been a newspaper editor is no reason why he should not be a good statistician. I may say to the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) that in this very place there are gentlemen connected with the newspaper press who earn more than this $2,400 a year which Mr. Johnson is paid. I venture to say there are gentlemen within the sound of my voice writing for newspapers, earning much more than $2,400. It would be simply impossible to get anything like a first-class man—and you want a first-class man for this work—under $2,400 a year. I may say that the man who gets up that Statistical Year-Book is eminently fitted for the position, and is a first-class man, and both Grits and Tories are deeply indebted to him for bringing the compilation of these statistics into their present form. Anybody who has set himself at times to form exhaustive conclusions in regard to our commercial and political progress will have been confronted with the fact, that there are statistical fields which are not yet explored; so that if there is any ground for complaint it is that not enough has been done in this direction. Sir, I wished to not only speak the truth about this Statistical Year-Book, but I really wished to recall—not so much to resent—but to recall my hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) to something like a sense of justice in regard to the newspaper press, and above all to put him in a position to retract what was an indirect sneer at his own leader, the Minister of Finance.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) was mistaken if he concluded that I offered any sneer or discourtesy to the press. In mentioning the very distinguished men the world over who have occupied positions as newspaper editors, I am sure that nothing but extreme bashfulness prevented the hon. member (Mr. Davin) mentioning the name of one distinguished individual in this House, to wit, the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). I had no intention of offering any discourtesy to the press. I simply said that Mr. Johnson for the best part of his life put in his time as a newspaper man and that he was not educated in the line necessary to make a successful statistician. My hon. friend (Mr. Davin) proves that by showing that the Year-Book is not what it ought to be.

Mr. DAVIN. Oh, no.

Mr. McMULLEN. My hon. friend (Mr. Davin) admitted that there was very great room for improvement.

Mr. DAVIN. Not in the sense the hon. gentleman means.

Mr. McMULLEN. My complaint is, that there is too much expense connected with this and other departments, and I say there is room for reduction in the statistician's department. This office seems to cost about $25,000 a year, and I contend that the country does not receive a return for that expenditure. As my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has said, we all promised that reductions could be made and would be made, and we are extremely anxious that they should be made. We know that hon. gentlemen opposite have kindly feelings for their political friends installed in office, and I suppose if the Liberals had been in power so long as they were, we would look kindly on our friends, but these feelings must be subdued in the interests of the country. There are several departments of Government to which the pruning knife could and should be vigorously applied, and this is one of them. I would like to know what Mr. Johnson has been doing during the past year, and I am not referring to him any more than to the rest of the clerks in that office? We have the Year-Book, but that seems to be all that is issued. I would like to know how many clerks are engaged in that department, what Mr. Johnson is doing at present, and what he has been doing during the last few months.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I am very glad to answer the hon. gentleman. I find that there are five permanent clerks under Mr. Johnson, and Mr. Johnson himself, making six—besides these, there are four temporary employees under him, making a total of ten in that branch. As to the work they are doing, I can say in general terms that Mr. Johnson and the staff under him are keeping up the statistics as time goes on, from day to day and week to week and month to month. There is a certain work called criminal statistics, which come in regularly from the local authorities all over the country. These have to be compiled and brought together, and put in such a shape that they can be made use of for the whole Dominion. Mr. Johnson and his staff are also constantly preparing the work of the Year-Book, keeping track of the events as they occur from day to day and week to week and month to month, so as to have them all ready to put in the Year-Book when it comes to be published. Besides that, Mr. Johnson is frequently engaged in working up information in connection with the industries of the country. I will give an instance to the House. Lately Mr. Johnson has been working up the details of all possible information in connection with the pulpwood and paper industry, which is assuming such great magnitude in this country, and which I venture to believe is shortly going to be one of the most important industries in our land. The staff under Mr. Johnson are also very frequently engaged in looking up references for people who apply for information. I am constantly getting letters asking for what may be called statistical information of various kinds, and I refer these matters to Mr. Johnson and ask him to prepare the information. The other day I received an application from a gentleman, saying that he had received a letter from England, in which he was asked to give the names of all the pulp mills in Canada, so that this gentleman, who is a pulp broker and dealer in pulp in England, may open up communication with the pulp mills in Canada, with the view of opening up a trade. I referred that letter to Mr. Johnson, and in a few days received a list of all the pulp mills in Canada that he could ascertain, and that information will be sent. This is the kind of work Mr. Johnson and his staff are engaged in. I dare say I am speaking imperfectly in regard to it, as there is no doubt a great deal of other work. There is another class of work which the junior clerks in that department are engaged in. During the period when the census is not engaging their attention, two or three of them are largely occupied in preparing returns, and making up the details asked for from the department, instead of my getting temporary and extra clerks for that work. You will find that since I have been in office, there has been no work of that kind given out, and no temporary clerk has been brought into the department to do it.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether from his general knowledge of the statistician's department, he has any hope of further reducing the expenses of that branch?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I may say that since I came into office I have very considerably reduced the expenses in connection with that branch. I have not under my hand a list of the temporary clerks who were in the department at the time I came into office. Speaking from memory, I think twelve or thirteen were dispensed with, of whom, I think, four or five were engaged in the statistical branch. I asked Mr. Johnson if he could do without them, and he said he thought he could, and he has been getting along without them.

Mr. McNEILL. I am sure the committee must have heard with great satisfaction the explanations given by the Minister in reference to this matter. I regret very much for my part the attack that has been made on this branch of the service and on Mr. Johnson personally. I am quite sure there is no officer in the service who less deserves an attack than Mr. Johnson. As for his having been connected with newspaper work before he became a statistician, I think anybody who knows anything about newspaper work, must have seen that the natural trend and bent of Mr. Johnson's mind was in the direction of statistics, and I am quite sure that the information which he has gathered since he became statistician has been of the greatest possible benefit to Canada. Personally, I know that it has been of the greatest possible assistance to me on very many occasions.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not at all wonder at the hon. gentleman's remarks. The fact is, I would expect not only the leader of the Opposition, but every member of it to rise and in the very strongest terms express their high appreciation of Mr. Johnson. It would be indeed a very poor return for many years of faithful service on his part to the party to which they belong, if they did not do it. It is a return to which he is unquestionably entitled; for not only up to the time he took charge of the department over which he presides, but for years after that, I believe up to the year 1891, he still continued to render very important services to hon. gentlemen opposite. I would certainly expect them to get up and manfully defend their friend and plead that he should be kept where he is. I do not blame them for doing so, but after all, we have the interests of the country at heart, we are not pleading for friends or urging to have men kept in office simply because of their political relations. What we want is to see the best interests of the country attended to, and I contend that there are opportunities for making savings that might well be taken advantage of. I commend the hon. Minister of Agriculture for having made reductions, and hope to be able to renew my commendations next year. Not only he, but other Ministers have, I believe, room in their departments for considerable reduction. That may possibly hurt the feelings of hon. gentlemen opposite, but that cannot be helped.

Mr. McNEILL. I am glad that the hon. gentleman has so completely thrown off the mask. We now understand that this attack on Mr. Johnson on his part is a mere party attack.

Mr. MOORE. I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to the explanation of the hon. Minister of Agriculture, and am glad that he appreciates the importance of the work done by Mr. Johnson. I do not think there is a record in this Parliament any more important than the Statistical Year-Book, and in my opinion there is no man in this country better qualified to discharge that important work. I was very glad to hear the commendations which fell from the hon. gentleman who opposed the expenditure in that department. That hon. gentleman may possibly be correct, but there is one thing certain, and that is that a man of the ability of Mr. Johnson, who only gets $2,400 a year, cannot be said to be getting a very extravagant price. His work is under the supervision and direction of the hon. Minister of Agriculture, and we must leave the matter in his hands. That hon. Minister is responsible for the carrying out of the work in an efficient and economical manner, but I would be very much pleased to see the work extended and more information given the people through the Statistical Year-Book than what is given now. Certainly I think it should not be lessened in any way, but rather extended. We are able to pay for the information, and I trust there will be no stinting of the amount placed at the disposal of the Minister of Agriculture for the purpose of keeping up that work.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). There can be no question of the ability and energy of Mr. Johnson. Our friends opposite are in duty bound to say a good word for him, because, to my certain recollection, he has done them numerous services while drawing the pay of the country. No doubt, he does his work well and efficiently, but I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Agriculture if he employs Mr. Johnson in the same capacity in which he was employed by the former Government. I do not suppose he does. I wish further to ask if it is the intention of the Minister of Agriculture to employ Mr. Johnson in taking the coming census, because from the position he occupies, I presume he is the most likely person to take charge of that very important part of the public service.

Mr. WALLACE. I would like to know if the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has got through, because I would not like to interrupt him in his questions. I would like to ask him still further if the answers of the hon. Minister of Agriculture were quite satisfactory to him. They appear to have been, as he nods his head. What I have to say is that he appears to be very easily satisfied. The hon. Minister assured me that he had reduced the expenditure from year to year, and my hon. friend took the Minister's word for it, and hoped the Minister would go on from year to year doing the very same thing. What has the hon. Minister done? He tells us that he has reduced the expenses of the department. Well, the figures for 1896-97, for which those gentlemen are responsible, of the expense of the interior service are $64,282. The next year they were $64,922, being an increase of $600 or $700. The hon. Minister assured us that that was a decrease, and of course the hon. member for North Wellington considered that all right and very satisfactory. In 1897-98, the expenses were increased over those of the former year to $1,200, being $65,478, and of course that was equally satisfactory to the hon. member for North Wellington. When he was in Opposition he was always preaching economy. I believe he does so occasionally yet; but now whenever a Minister makes an explanation, that explanation is perfectly satisfactory to my hon. friend, and he has no further complaint to make. Some people say on this side that the secret of the hon. gentleman's complacency is that he had some relatives he wished appointed to office, and that they were appointed, and that consequently the hon. member is completely satisfied. I do not know whether that is the case or not, but he is here and perhaps he would inform the House whether it is true, and we can form our own conclusions. I was much struck with the statement made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) this afternoon. He said—and I presume he had given the matter study and consideration—that a reduction could be made in the expenses of government of one-third, that is, in the inside service at Ottawa. If that could be done, it would effect a saving of over $470,000 a year. But I do not see that the Government have made any material move in that direction. I can understand that a Government which has been a long time in power, and which has many influences surrounding it, may find the work of reduction a very difficult task; but I assume that a new Government, coming in unfettered by any political considerations with regard to these civil servants, and that had pledged itself up to the hilt to accomplish such economies, ought to be able to present to the House and the country some plan for reducing the expenditure in Ottawa as would carry out its pledge and conform somewhat to what the hon. member for North Norfolk said might be easily done, and at the same time make the service more efficient. I am not in a position myself personally to say whether that could be done. You would require to have some intimate knowledge, particularly in the case of a large department employing a great many civil servants, before you could speak with any authority as to whether such economies could be fairly made; but no doubt large economies could be practised, and I regret that the Government is not carrying out its pledges to the country by taking some step to reduce the expenditure. I remember the statement made by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce the other evening, that if the annual increase to the civil servants went on as they have been going on, adding $40,000 or $50,000 every year to the expenditure, in a very few years the expenditure would be so large that it would be quite unjustifiable. I agree with the statement, still further, that if, after thorough examination, the Government found that the staff in the various departments was too large, they would be justified in reducing it. There is no doubt that in every large employing agency—and even in a small one for that matter—some men work faithfully and effectually, while others render but little service. But the Government, representing the whole country and justifying the expenditure they propose to make—and particularly this Government, pledged as it is to economy—should have taken measures to largely reduce the expenditure in the departments here in Ottawa. But this they have not done. With regard to the particular item before the House, the expenditure on the Statistical Year-Book, the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) makes the statement, that this branch costs $25,000 per annum. I presume he has included the various expenditures for printing and other things in this sum total. Well, I think we have very inadequate results from that expenditure, so far as giving information to the country is concerned. As has been stated here, each member of the House receives only one copy of the Statistical Year-Book. We receive at least two copies of every other Government publication, including the Auditor General's Report. I think we should receive a number of copies of the Year-Book, as it contains information furnished by all the departments. I do not think that it requires a great deal of genius to prepare this Year-Book, because it is compiled on lines which are followed year after year, and the information is taken from the reports of the various departments. It is work that any one could do who would take the time to do it. Now, the Minister of Agriculture said Mr. Johnson performed many other duties. He said that he wanted some information on the subject of pulp manufacture and applied to Mr. Johnson for it. In my opinion the proper course would have been to refer it to the Department of Trade and Commerce, to which it specially belongs. Mr. Parmalee of that department, a very efficient man, could have got the information more promptly and more accurately and on better authority than Mr. Johnson could. I am sorry I cannot concur in the eulogies that have been passed by hon. members on this side upon Mr. Johnson's work. I have taken some interest in statistical work and have watched these matters in past years, and cannot coincide with the statements made on this side of the House in that regard. I think the Government is in duty bound to take the advice given years ago by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), and practise a little economy. That hon. gentleman appears to have almost forgotten what he used to say, and I think it would be well for us to remind him and the Government that these pledges have been made to the people, and that the people look for their fulfilment.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton).

Mr. McMULLEN. Permit me to give the expenses of the Agriculture Department from 1890-91 down to the present time. Now, for a gentleman who occupied the position virtually of a Minister of the Crown, and with the figures before him, to get up and make a statement such as that made by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) is somewhat surprising :

1891-92.....	144,124 60
1892-93.....	93,828 08
1893-94.....	76,674 18
1894-95.....	77,876 87
1895-96.....	75,379 49
1896-97....	70,002 37

There is a reduction of about $5,000 last year as compared with the year before. Yet the hon. gentleman states that there has been no reduction.

Mr. WALLACE. The figures I have were taken—

Mr. McMULLEN. My hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) will have to revise his figures. I have the expenditure of every department here, and if the hon. gentleman challenges them I can give him the figures. I can tell him that the present Government are making reductions, that there are reductions in nine different departments last year as compared with the year previous, and if the hon. gentleman doubts it, I can give him the figures.

Mr. WALLACE. I have here the figures for 1896-97 taken from the official documents. They show an expenditure of $64,202. In the figures given by the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) I presume that the expenditures for 1891-92 and several subsequent years are to be accounted for to the extent of more than half by the extra work of taking the census. If the hon. gentleman had been as honest as he professes to be, he would have stated that the census was taken in these years, thus accounting for a very large share of the expenditure. But he did not state that and has misled the House and the country to that extent. I do not say that he did so wilfully, or of deliberate and malicious purpose.

Mr. McMULLEN. I merely give the total figures because I wish to place the contrast on record in "Hansard." I do not doubt at all that what my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) said is true and that the census has something to do with the extra expenditure for 1891-92. But, take the expenditure for 1895-96 or for 1894-95, or even 1893-94, and we find that in these years the expenditures were higher than in this year. There is not a year when the expenditures were so low as that my hon. friend has given for 1896-97.

Mr. McDUGALL. When was it that the work in connection with the taking of the census, the classifying of the returns, &c., was completed ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I can only say that it was completed before I came into office.

Mr. McDUGALL. Was it not in 1895-96 ? I feel pretty sure that I got the last publication some time in that year. The hon. Minister might tell us where the saving was accomplished to which the hon. member for Wellington refers.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have not the figures for past years here, and cannot inform the hon. gentleman at the moment.

Mr. BENNETT. Is the number of clerks in the hon. Minister's department reduced ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes. I was looking at the estimates for the first year after I came into office. I find that at the present time there are five fewer permanent clerks, and, as I said a little while ago, I think there are twelve or thirteen fewer temporary clerks.

General Statistics $3,200

Mr. FOSTER. What is included under general statistics ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. A part of that work I have been alluding to. It is out of that that the temporary clerks are paid, and the printing office statistics, and work of that kind.

Paris Exhibition (towards preparation for)..... $20,000

Mr. SPROULE. What preparations are being made ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Perhaps I ought to give a little explanation in regard to this vote. My hon. friend asks what preparation was being made. No preparation is being made, because I have not got any money to make any. But I may say that I am looking forward to a representation of Canada at that exhibition which shall be worthy of the country. It is going to be one of the greatest universal exhibitions that have ever been held, and I thought it would be right for me, as exhibition matters are generally in the hands of the Minister of Agriculture, to discuss the matter with those who had had some experience and consider what steps might be taken to make a worthy representation of our country at that exhibition. I may say that my attention was drawn to it partly by letters which I received from various parties in the country urging that Canada should have a worthy representation there. I have in my own department Prof. Saunders, who was the commissioner of Canada at the Columbia Exhibition at Chicago, and Dr. Dawson, of the Geological Survey, who has had a good deal to do with exhibition matters in various exhibitions where Canada has been represented. Prof. Robertson also has had a good deal to do with the representation of Canada at the Columbia Exhibition at Chicago. Therefore, when my attention was drawn to this matter and I began to think about it, I naturally consulted those three gentlemen, and after talking the matter over with them, I came to the conclusion that a few dollars spent early in preparation for such an exhibition would be worth perhaps hundreds of dollars spent in the hurry and heat of preparation at the last moment. Dr. Dawson especially pointed out to me that he had been called upon more than once to prepare mineral and mining exhibits of Canada at various exhibitions, and that he had always been hampered by the short time at his disposal to prepare those exhibits, to get the necessary specimens and make the necessary arrangements. Prof. Saunders also pointed out that in preparing for the Chicago exhibition a great difficulty had arisen from the fact that so short a time was at his disposal for obtaining specimens and arranging for the articles which they wished to send. In respect to the productions of Canada, it will be quite possible that we will have to send specimens which have been produced in the country during the coming fiscal year. It seems a long way off, I know, it may seem almost too soon to begin. But it was so pressed upon me by those gentlemen who had experience in this kind of work, that I decided to take time by the forelock, considering that it would be more economical to make an early preparation for the exhibition, and I asked Council to give me leave to put in an item to be spent during the coming fiscal year. I may say frankly, that I have not yet made any definite plan as to how this money can be spent. I have simply had two or three conversations with these gentlemen, and they have pointed out to me in general terms the necessity of taking this precaution. It is my intention, in connection with some other work of my department, to go to England soon after the close of the session. Prof. Robertson was over there last year in relation to the cold storage work and the placing of our products on the English market. He is going over again this summer, and I shall go myself to see what can be done to prepare for this exhibition. I have had communication with Lord Strathcona who has been appointed by our Government as the Canadian representative on the Imperial Commission representing the British Empire at the Paris exhibition. I desire to consult with Lord Strathcona, and will probably have to go to Paris when I go over to England this summer, for the purpose of looking into details and the best way by which Canada can obtain the proper space for making an exhibit. I regret to say that up to the present time communications have not been at all satisfactory in regard to the space at that exhibition. We applied for 60,000 square feet of space, but so far, only 12,000 square feet have been allotted to us. A separate space has been allotted to the colonies of the Empire to the extent of 58,000 square feet, of which Canada has 12,000, India 22,000, Australia 12,000, and 12,000 to the Cape colonies. I think 12,000 feet is a very much smaller space than will suffice to enable us to make a worthy representation of Canada.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Is that space paid for?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No, it is not. Lord Strathcona informs me that the buildings and grounds there are not at all in a forward state. When he went to Paris a month or two ago to get information about it, he found things in such a chaotic condition that he could not obtain at that time the information he hoped to obtain. I may say that he was over in Paris on other business, and went to see the grounds between two and three months ago, and made me a report in regard to them. I wish very much indeed to urge strongly both on the Imperial authorities and the French authorities in connection with the exhibition that we should be awarded greater space and privileges than have been accorded at present. There are a large number of people, especially French Canadians, but I speak not of them only, who desire that Canada should be properly represented at the exhibition. I sympathize with that view. It will be one of the greatest universal exhibitions ever held, and this country occupies that position and has occupied that position in the past, and perhaps now more than at any other time, when a worthy representation of the products of this country would redound not only to the credit of Canada but to the material progress and prosperity of the Dominion. Under those circumstances I thought I would be fully justified and fairly entitled to ask the House to pass a vote, and I ask for $20,000. I may tell the committee frankly that I do not very clearly understand for what purpose the $20,000 will be expended. I hope not to require this year to spend the amount, but if I find that work will prove effective, appropriate and economical in order to secure a proper representation of Canada in 1900. I think I will be justified in expending the amount up to that limit. We can understand that for the purposes of a great exhibition of this kind a sum of $20,000 will be only a small proportion of the expenditure eventually required. I shall be glad to answer any question in regard to this proposed vote.

Mr. SPROULE. Has the hon. Minister had any communication with the provinces and territories of Canada in order to ascertain what they propose to do in this connection?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No official communication. I have spoken to several members of local governments, and they have expressed their willingness to co-operate, but so far we have not come to any arrangement as to the terms on which we will co-operate. That will form a subject of immediate official correspondence with the local authorities, but I do not wish to take official steps or any active steps until authorized by such a vote as the present to go ahead.

Mr. DAVIN. I think the space mentioned by the hon. gentleman would be quite inadequate. This opinion is the result of my experience at the Philadelphia Exhibition in 1876, to which the hon. gentleman has referred. At the Columbia Exhibition, Manitoba was compelled to erect a building for its exhibits outside of the exhibition itself, because the space allotted to Canada was entirely inadequate. If 12,000 feet is given to the Cape of Good Hope and only the same space to Canada, it will be seven times bad treatment for a country like Canada, that really represents seven colonies, each as important as the Cape.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I would say that this is for all the different African colonies, but still I believe they are not as important as Canada.

Mr. DAVIN. I hope the hon. gentleman will pay strict attention to have Manitoba and the North-west Territories properly represented at the Paris Exhibition, and it cannot be done, as we know by past experience and by what took place at the Columbia Exhibition, unless we have adequate space; and now that the Klondike has been opened up, the exhibit will be far more extensive than that at the Columbia Exposition.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I wish merely to state that I fully agree with what the hon. Minister of Agriculture stated, that the Paris Exhibition of 1900 was going to be the greatest and most important the world has ever known. There is no question about that, for it is well known that the result of every exhibition is that the one following it is always an improvement on the last, owing to the experience acquired and the development of the various countries that took part in the exposition. I believe it is of the greatest importance that Canada should make a full display of the resources of this country, which are daily acquiring greater importance. I wish to ask the Minister if he has considered, or possibly he may think the time has not yet arrived to do so, the manner in which he intends Canada to be represented in so far as taking charge of the exhibits of Canadian products in France is concerned. Does the hon. gentleman mean to have a commission appointed for the purpose, as I believe was done in 1861 in Paris? That commission was composed of three or four members, one of whom was Dr. Taché, who has left a name in Canada among literary men and scientists and who at that time occupied the position of deputy of the department over which the Minister of Agriculture now presides. I should like to ask the Minister if the $20,000 which he asks the House to vote now is for the purpose merely of prospecting work and the proposed visit of Lord Strathcona to Paris, or for any other specific purpose, because outside of the Minister's proposed trip to Europe after the session, and the possibility of securing some products for exhibition purposes, I do not see that the hon. Minister has given the House any intimation as to the policy he is ready to adopt so far as this proposed vote is concerned. The representative of Canada in Paris, Mr. Fabre, who has acquired wide experience and possesses much influence, no doubt will be able to give the hon. Minister valuable information when he visits Paris. Mr. Fabre, as the leader of the Government ascertained when he visited Paris, is in close touch with the French Government, and he will no doubt be able to render services of great value to Canada. I more especially ask the hon. gentleman how he intends to deal with the representation of Canada at the exhibition, and the real purpose to which the amount of $20,000 will be devoted?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have not yet by any means decided as to the representation of Canada at the exhibition, as regards the personnel or anything of that kind. We have not decided whether there should be a special commission or one commissioner, the two plans having been adopted at different times. Both plans have been adopted at different times. The hon. gentleman has spoken of Dr. Taché as having been one of the commissioners to Paris in 1855, but at that time Dr. Taché was not deputy of the department over which I have the honour to preside. He was then, I think, a journalist, and not in the civil service at all. As to the $20,000 I must confess that I have not yet by any means estimated at all exactly what that money will be expended on. I do not even think that I will have to spend $20,000 or could properly spend $20,000 during the coming fiscal year, but I was informed by the gentlemen whom I have consulted, that if they were to be able to secure certain things they could do so much better in advance, than if at the last moment they were obliged to search the country round.

Mr. FOSTER. What could these things be?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Dr. Dawson specially mentions such things as mineralogical specimens.

Mr. FOSTER. Surely you are not going to buy $20,000 worth of specimens?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have no intention of doing any such thing; but these gentlemen also pressed upon me the importance of laying out plans, preparing for the exhibition, and of having one or two persons who would go about the country to find out what exhibits could be obtained and what arrangements could be made. I tell the hon. gentleman quite frankly that I am not prepared to definitely estimate what this money will be spent on; it will be used as occasion may arise. From the advice these gentlemen gave me it will be very likely proper to appoint some individual who would take upon himself to devote his time almost entirely to making preparations for that exhibition—not in the sense of a commissioner to go to Paris—but a man who would work in Canada preparing the details for the exhibition. I may tell the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) that it would be a very small proportion of the $20,000, if any, that would be spent on my trip to Paris. I was not thinking of that at all in connection with the vote.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. Minister mentioned the trip.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I mentioned the fact that I would have to go to Paris.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

Mr. FOSTER. Two hundred and fifty dollars would pay that.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I hope so.

The PRIME MINISTER. Cold water.

Mr. FOSTER. Sure.

Mr. SPROULE. It has always been the rule, and I think a proper one, that when a vote is asked for the Minister should explain how he intends to apply it. Now the Minister of Agriculture has evidently not yet made up his mind as to how he will expend this money, and he has given us no information, or very meagre information as to what will be done with the $20,000. While it may be that the expenditure will be properly made and the result beneficial to Canada, yet I do think that the Minister ought to be able to give the House some information on the subject. I rise particularly to refer to what I consider a matter of importance in connection with this exhibition, and that is, that an effort should be made at the earliest possible date to get the provinces and territories to act in harmony with the Dominion, so that whatever is done may be done conjointly and the expense distributed. The Government should endeavour to prevent any such fiasco as that which took place in connection with the Chicago Exhibition in the case of Manitoba, and which was not at all creditable to Canada. The object we all have in view would be frustrated by the squandering of this money in the manner in which Manitoba squandered her money at the Chicago Exhibition. I believe that the space of 12,000 feet square allotted to Canada is entirely too small, and it would seem that considering the importance of the Dominion, the extent of her territory, and the large population as compared with other portions of the British Empire, we should be assigned more space. It is to be hoped that the Minister will at once communicate with the Imperial authorities and secure a larger space for Canada.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I may say that we are protesting against the smallness of the space, and Lord Strathcona has vigorously protested. The right hon. the Premier informs me, that in consequence of the information I gave him a few days ago on the receipt of a letter from Lord Strathcona, he has communicated with the French consul in Montreal in the hope that we may be able, through the French Government itself, to secure further consideration. The space which we have demanded, namely, 60,000 square feet was about the same as we had at Chicago. The Imperial authorities are getting 350,000 square feet for the Imperial exhibit, but the French authorities of the exhibition seemed to think that the colonies must not expect anything like what the home country would, and they have refused so far to listen to the representations made on behalf of the colonies by the Imperial Commission, whose chairman is the Prince of Wales. However, the Imperial Commission is still urging the question and we are yet in hopes that we will get greater consideration. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule), that 12,000 feet is entirely inadequate. If we can only get 12,000 feet, Lord Strathcona wrote me seriously questioning whether we had better be represented at all. I would hardly like to take that view, although I would be very much discouraged on behalf of the country if we were restricted to 12,000 feet.

Mr. WALLACE. The 60,000 feet asked for, represents an acre and a half in superficial area, and it would entail an enormous expenditure upon this Government to fit it out. It would be worth while considering whether the opinion of Lord Strathcona in that regard should be taken, and whether we should engage in such an enterprise at all. Notwithstanding that we have made a treaty with France which should have encouraged trade between the two countries, our exports to France last year, which was the largest in the history of the country, amounted only to six or seven hundred thousand dollars, and it is therefore a matter of consideration whether Canada should get involved in such a large expenditure for this exhibition. The Minister of Agriculture has given us merely a crude statement as to this vote of $20,000. He should have given us details of the expenditure, and I object to voting such a large sum to be expended in a manner we do not know of, and even the Minister himself says he does not know how it will be expended. This House should be careful to vote no such sum without having further and specific information upon it. Another objection; it is rumoured throughout the country that the Canadian commissioner to that exhibition is to be no less an individual than the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte); so that if it goes on, this House will be deprived of the presence and services of the Minister of Public Works.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I could not consent to that at all.

Mr. WALLACE. And I often wonder how we could get on without him.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. You would be very sorry yourself, I know.

Mr. WALLACE. If the Prime Minister is to be deprived of his wicked partner—

The PRIME MINISTER. There is no wicked partner here.

Mr. WALLACE. I am delighted to hear that.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There is no nest of traitors here.

Mr. WALLACE. There was an impression throughout the country that the Prime Minister had a wicked partner, and that that wicked partner was the Minister of Public Works; but when we have the assurance of the Prime Minister himself that there is none, it will make the mind of the country a great deal easier.

The PRIME MINISTER. Commencing with your own mind, I have no doubt.

Mr. WALLACE. Oh, yes, I feel quite easy to start with. With regard to another matter, the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) gave a statement to the House of the expenses of the Department of Agriculture. The Public Accounts, prepared by hon. gentlemen themselves, do not bear out the hon. gentleman's statement. They show that the expenditure on agriculture, arts and statistics for the last three years was as follows: For 1895, $216,000; for 1896, $210,000; and for 1897, $224,000; the last year being under the present Government, and the two others under the Conservative Administration. These figures are completely contradictory of the statement made by the hon. member for North Wellington.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that during the last two years there has been a cold storage expenditure charged against "agriculture, arts and statistics" to the extent of about $100,000, which was not there before.

Mr. McNBILL. I think the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) might on this occasion allow the vote for the $20,000 to pass the committee. It is for a work of the greatest possible consequence to Canada. We cannot have a better opportunity than will be afforded by the Paris Exhibition, of showing to a great number of the best people in all the world what we can grow, what our minerals are, and what we can manufacture; and if the Minister is not ready to-day to say exactly what he is going to do with this $20,000, I think we might give it to him on trust; and if he does not make a good use of it, he may look out for squalls afterwards. I can understand that it is difficult or almost impossible to foresee exactly what may be required, and some considerable sum of money ought to be in hand to meet unforeseen expenses.

Mr. CLARKE. I would like to ask the Government if any request has been made to the Government to have Canada represented at the Mid-State Exhibition to be held during the coming summer, I think at Omaha. It was pointed out by a commissioner from that exhibition who visited us this session, and who, by the way, was a Canadian, that very substantial advantages would be gained for Canada, especially for Manitoba and the North-west Territories, if a really good exhibit of the products of this country could be made there.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I hope that when the Supplementary Estimates come down, my hon. friend will see an item in them for that purpose. I think that exhibition may be made of great advantage to Canada, especially for immigration purposes. The tide of immigration is now setting in to a considerable extent from the western states to our own North-west.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have no doubt that the Minister of Agriculture will see that there shall be a good representation of Canadian products at the Omaha exhibition. It is in the heart of the Mississippi Valley, and a good exhibition of the products of Manitoba and the North-west ought to lead to a large immigration to western Canada. The available lands of the western states are very limited, and if we could set in motion a tide of immigration from that country to our North-west, it would no doubt soon reach a large volume.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) has pretty nearly converted me to the opinion that we might trust the Minister of Agriculture with that $20,000; but we are seldom called on to vote so airy an appropriation as the hon. gentleman has asked. We are two years from the exhibition for which he wants the $20,000. His purpose is good, but he has not given this committee any idea of what he proposes to expend the money on. In fact, he has no idea himself. He wants it so that if anything turns up he may be able to catch occasion by the forelock; but if all the Ministers are going to get $20,000 votes for what may possibly turn up two years before the event, we shall have to revise the traditions of Parliament in that respect. The hon. gentleman cannot want it for his trip across to interview the French Government. Being a cold water man, with a large system of cold storage in operation, he ought to get over for $250 or thereabouts.

Mr. CHARLTON. Did you go to the West Indies for that?

Mr. FOSTER. It was hotter in the West Indies, and I had to get something to keep me cool.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. All the more need of cold storage.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman hinted that he might want a commissioner to go round and lay plans, and see what could be got for the exhibition. That should not cost a large amount of money. A thousand dollars ought to pay the expenses of a commissioner for that purpose. There is no use of stuffing the Estimates with votes unless there is some plan as to how the money is to be expended. There is nothing that can be gathered and kept in store for two years. I am not opposing Canada having an exhibit there, but I am questioning the utility of having so large a vote when there is nothing in the field.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I fully appreciate the position, and I explained quite frankly, to begin with, that I had not any special estimate of how this money was to be spent. I explained that I had consulted three gentlemen who I thought had a good deal of experience in connection with exhibitions, and it was at their suggestion that I decided to ask for the vote. They thought that before the end of the next fiscal year there would be occurrences which would make moderate expenditures more effective and economical than greater expenditures later on.

Mr. FOSTER. Would the hon. gentleman tell us the suggestions of these gentlemen that had weight with him, because they might have weight with the committee. $20,000 is not a moderate expenditure.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The representations they made were those I explained a while ago. I do not know that I shall have any opportunity of spending the $20,000, and I can assure the hon. gentleman that I shall not spend any portion which I find cannot be spent with telling effect. I want to have sufficient, so that I shall be able to take up any scheme or plan that may commend itself to my judgment and the judgment of those I may consult.

Mr. DAVIN. What is needed, no doubt, is to begin at once to collect exhibits. The suggestion of Dr. Dawson is an excellent one. From our experience of small exhibitions, we know that if you put off to a year beforehand the collecting of exhibits, it will be impossible for you to get them. It is not a bit too soon to begin collecting, and I think the hon. Minister is perfectly right in seeking to be put at once in a position to get the information required. The question is whether the amount may not be excessive.

Mr. McMILLAN. Is the intention to take over live stock?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have not yet come to a decision about such details, but I hardly think it would be wise to do so. We took live stock to Chicago, but I do not think that any were ever taken to any European exhibition, and I hardly think it would be advisable.

Mr. McMILLAN. If you are going to do so, the farmers ought to be informed in time, for you cannot prepare cattle for an exhibition in a month or six months.

Mr. FOSTER. The Parisians are not going to allow any of our live stock into the city of Paris.

Mr. HAGGART. How many persons does the hon. gentleman intend to employ in getting information and making collections ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I shall begin with one, and if I find more are needed, I shall employ them as they are found necessary. Several references have been made to the commissioner. I do not mean the commissioner of the exhibition. I have no idea of attempting to name any such commissioner, and this vote has nothing to do with the commissioner who will deal with the exhibits in Paris when the time comes. This is merely for preparatory work.

Mr. FOSTER. I would advise my hon. friend to content himself with $10,000, unless he has some more definite plan.

Mr. McNEILL. I want to ask whether the hon. gentleman, in his conversation with Prof. Saunders and Dr. Dawson, discussed this question of expenditure and the sum required ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. During that conversation the question arose. I do not remember exactly whether a sum was fixed then or not, but this figure was the result of that conversation.

Mr. POPE. Were any details of the figures gone into ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No ; we just thought in a general way of the necessary preparatory steps to be taken to accomplish the object in view. If hon. gentlemen think they can trust me with $10,000, they can trust me with $20,000.

Mr. FOSTER. It is not a question of trust. The hon. gentleman is not going to take any of the money himself or throw it away, but it is a principle the House ought to keep pretty close to, that the estimates should be kept pretty close and that you should not ask for a sum without giving details, and say that you will not spend it unless you want it.

Mr. McNEILL. I may say that I should not have made the suggestion or observation I did, had I not thought that this was an unusual kind of expenditure, and I do think still that we would all regret very much if we found that because we cut the vote down to $10,000, some difficulties occurred, and that in any respect the exhibit we made was not as good as it otherwise would have been.

River St. Lawrence ship channel..... $256,000

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). I hope the explanations I am going to give will convince the committee that this amount, although it may look somewhat large, should be granted. I have no doubt my hon. friends understand the importance of the St. Lawrence ship channel. It is one of the most important highways that Canada possesses. Last year the House granted me a sum of $200,000, of which sum there had been expended up to the 30th of April, $162,488.88. This year I am asking a little more. We intend having on the St. Lawrence ship channel at least four dredges; as it costs $20,000 to work each dredge, we shall expend on that head $80,000. But if we use five dredges, as it is proposed we might do, it will amount to $100,000. At the present time I think we will employ only four dredges. In the next place, we intend building two new steel dredges at a cost of $75,000 ; two new tugs at a cost of $12,000 ; two new hopper scows at a cost of $12,000 ; one stone lifter, $10,000 ; one testing scow, $6,000. With the $80,000 I have mentioned, these sums will amount to $200,000 in round numbers. Now, with the remaining $50,000, the question is whether I will buy a property in Sorel and have a new building and new machinery erected, or whether I will buy a new steamboat. Sorel is our headquarters, we have a very important shipyard there, nearly all our dredges and tug boats winter at Sorel. We are also building there these new dredges and tugs that I have just enumerated. Until the present time we have rented those yards in Sorel from the McCarthy estate, paying a rental of $1,200 a year, and while paying that large amount of money, we are not at home. During the last year I have negotiated to buy that property, but so far I have not been able to come to any satisfactory arrangements with the McCarthy estate. I have not yet decided whether during the next year to buy that property, or to buy a new steamboat. I would ask my hon. friends to remember that when that ship channel was transferred to the Government in 1888, we took over all the plant of the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, and we have been working with that plant ever since. I may say that some of those dredges can scarcely be kept afloat now. I may add that we have some new dredges which are giving us every satisfaction. But the reason why we are building these two new steel dredges, and the tugs and scows that I mentioned, is because we are working to-day with very old plant. Now, Sir, I have given briefly the details of the expenditure which I propose to make during the coming year, and I shall be glad to answer any questions which may be asked with regard to this important work.

Mr. FOSTER. Do I understand my hon. friend that out of that vote of $256,000, he is going to expend $120,000 for buying or building boats, and $80,000 for running them. What is he going to do with the remaining $56,000?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have just explained, but I am sorry I did not make myself clearly understood. The $80,000 will be employed to work four dredges, at $20,000 each for the season. We intend building two new steel dredges at a cost of $75,000 for the two; two new tugs for $12,000; two new hopper scows, $12,000; one stone lifter, $10,000; one testing scow, $6,000, which makes $115,000, aside from the $80,000. Then there are $10,000 for salaries of the staff and other officials, and office expenses. Besides what I have mentioned, there remains a balance of $51,000 which, as I have already explained, may be used either to buy and equip a shipyard in Sorel, or to build or buy a new steel boat, I have not yet made up my mind which. I have tried to negotiate with the McCarthy estate, but so far I have not been able to arrange with them as regards the price. I have also negotiated for the dredges and a boat. We are badly in need of a boat, but as the price has gone up a little on account of the war, I could not make up mind to buy at the present time. However, I desire to take the House into my confidence and tell them how I may expend that $51,000.

Mr. FOSTER. How many dredges did the hon. gentleman operate last year?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Last year we worked five dredges on the St. Lawrence ship channel. I intend to work there with three dredges, the Laurier, the Laval and the Cartier, and as to the fourth, I am sending that dredge to Kingston for a while. Kingston is badly in need of a dredge, as my hon. friend knows. Three new elevators are being built there, and I have made up my mind to give them the use of a dredge. They are going to have four dredges on the St. Lawrence.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the hon. gentleman expect to dredge at Kingston with a dredge which is charged to the St. Lawrence Ship Canal account?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No; I provided in my estimate only for four dredges, for which I asked $80,000.

Mr. FOSTER. What sum is the hon. gentleman going to credit to the River St. Lawrence Ship Canal account by reason of the dredge that is going to Kingston?

Mr. TARTE.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Nothing. I am going to ask in the Supplementary Estimates a vote for a dredge.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose the accounts are kept under their proper headings, and we will know at the end of the year the amount of the St. Lawrence Ship Canal account. Suppose the hon. gentleman takes half a dozen dredges and applies them to general dredging work, is he going to credit nothing to the St. Lawrence Ship Canal account, when the dredges have been originally charged to that account?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No.

Mr. FOSTER. But the hon. gentleman is doing it this year. He is taking a dredge paid for out of the St. Lawrence Ship Canal capital vote, and he is utilizing it for general dredging work. If he can do that with one dredge, he can do it with all the dredges.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman must not forget that this is an exceptional case. There is a large amount of business doing in the grain trade, and people represented to me that there is not enough water to allow boats to discharge grain at the Kingston elevators. I, therefore, decided to send a dredge there. I did so because it was in the public interest that we should not allow the grain trade to go by another route. I am taking a dredge which last year worked a large part of the time in the harbour of Montreal. I do not see anything irregular in that. The hon. gentleman will agree that those dredges should be employed elsewhere if they are not needed on the St. Lawrence. I see that in course of time we shall only employ two there, and then there will be dredges for other purposes; and if the hon. gentleman saw the applications made daily for dredges he would find no trouble in using the dredges on works at large.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman scurries over the water and talks about the necessity of dredging at Kingston. I am not questioning the necessity of that work. But this dredge belongs to the St. Lawrence Ship Canal account, and he is now sending it to Kingston. It was either taken over at the time—

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It was taken over.

Mr. FOSTER—or it has been purchased and paid for since. It was part of the capital stock of the ship canal work, the accounts of which must be kept by themselves in order that we may know exactly what we have expended. If the hon. gentleman sold the dredge, the amount received would pass into the Receiver General's hands, but it would be credited to that fund. I wish the hon. gentleman to understand that he is going to transfer this dredge from the St. Lawrence Ship Canal account to the general service account, to do work at Kingston, or anywhere else, but not on the St. Lawrence ship channel. If the hon. gentleman makes this transfer to the general dredging account, he should credit the value to the St. Lawrence Ship Canal account.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am not asking one dollar for a new dredge. I am only asking $80,000 for four dredges. An application will be made to Parliament subsequently for a fifth dredge.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the value of the dredge ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is an old dredge that has been repaired. My deputy informs me that it is worth $25,000 or $30,000.

Mr. McDOUGALL. When were the repairs made to the dredge ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Every year we have to make repairs to dredges.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not discussing the manner of carrying out dredging work, but the hon. gentleman is asking $150,000 for plant. If the hon. gentleman is going to divert dredges from the St. Lawrence Ship Canal work to general rivers and lake service without crediting the account with it, the accounts cannot be kept in proper form, so as to be able to make any comparisons. So if the hon. gentleman is going to make that transfer, he should credit the Ship Canal account with the value of the dredge, say $25,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is true I am going to use the dredge for a few months at Kingston, instead of on the St. Lawrence Ship Canal works, where it has been for a number of years. But that does not alter the case; the dredging is part of the work to be done for Canada. In every general business, accounts must be kept separately, as is done by all merchants, for the purpose of seeing at the end of a certain period how the accounts stand.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Why not charge the rent of it to the Kingston works and credit the amount to the St. Lawrence Ship Canal account ?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has transferred the dredge to the lake and river service.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am doing so for the time being. I do not know how long the dredge will have to work at Kingston. We have a certain quantity of material to remove at that point, and I have taken one of the dredges from the St. Lawrence to give relief to our Kingston friends.

Mr. FOSTER. When she is done with Kingston, where does she go ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I will take her back to the St. Lawrence again.

Mr. FOSTER. Will you let her lie idle ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I will have some work for that dredge there or elsewhere. The Dominion assumed the debt of the Harbour Commission of Montreal in 1888, and the commission transferred to the Government their plant. That plant does not belong to the ship channel especially, but to Canada as a whole. When I take an appropriation for the ship channel it does not mean that I am not free to use one of these dredges anywhere.

Mr. FOSTER. If the Minister asks Parliament for $20,000 for the ship channel, is he at liberty to use that $20,000 somewhere else ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, he is not at liberty to take a dredge and use it somewhere else unless he gives a quid pro quo on that account.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am perfectly free to use the dredges wherever I like, provided I get authorization to spend a certain amount of money here and there.

Mr. FOSTER. You cannot divert the money voted for a certain place. This dredge represents money that you get from Parliament for a certain purpose, and you cannot divert the money or use it anywhere else.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That dredge is part of the consideration of the $3,000,000 debt of the Harbour Commissioners, assumed by Canada. I do not see that there is anything to interfere with my using that dredge at Kingston. I may be wrong, but it is a question of book-keeping, and that is the book-keeping done in the department.

Mr. SPROULE. I see you have one item here, "Less—charged to other votes—dredge vessels, repairs, $4,663.69," "New dredging plant, $2,368." That was evidently charged to another vote. I draw the Minister's attention to the fact that a portion of the cost of dredging repairs is charged to another vote, as shown at the bottom of Q—19 of the Auditor General's Report.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have a special vote outside of that ship channel vote, for other dredging operations, and it is out of that vote that the repairs are made.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Will the Minister replace the dredge sent to Kingston with one of the proposed new dredges? What work will these new dredges be engaged in?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have some dredges that we can scarcely keep afloat and we are building these new dredges to replace old craft that will be out of shape in a year or so.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The Minister proposes to build two new dredges, and as I understand it they are to be used in connection with dredging of the St. Lawrence channel to Montreal. This dredge that was sent to Kingston was used there before. Why not use this dredge sent to Kingston on the St. Lawrence ship channel and only build one new dredge?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We would have to build two new dredges whether this dredge was sent to Kingston or not.

Mr. McDOUGALL. If the dredge was not sent to Kingston it would be used on the St. Lawrence.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, and in other places where dredging is needed.

Mr. McDOUGALL. At all events, the St. Lawrence ship channel is deprived of the services of that dredge for the time being. I would suggest that the Minister would charge a rental for this dredge to the Kingston works and credit it to the St. Lawrence ship channel work. If that were done, the thing would be nearer right.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I think that suggestion might be adopted. I have no objection to it as a matter of book-keeping.

Mr. SPROULE. I see an item on Page Q—22 of the Auditor General's Report: D. & J. McCarthy, Sorel, $2,353.15 for rent. That seems to be a pretty large sum for rent. Could there be no other permanent arrangement made whereby that cost would be reduced?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have had our shipyards on the McCarthy estate for a great number of years, and we are under the same rental now as before. The rental we pay is $1,200 per year. In the item $653.15 is for arrears.

Mr. SPROULE. Do the wharf and the office belong to the same parties?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to call my hon. friend's attention to another point. He has two votes. One is a vote for public works chargeable to capital, under the heading of River St. Lawrence Ship Channel. He has, of course, no business to spend any of that for dredging, which is provided for out of income. On page 53 he has a dredging vote chargeable to income. When my hon. friend mixes up these two, he is going outside of the aim of the parliamentary appropriation, and is complicating his accounts besides. When I turn to the Auditor General's Report, I find, under capital account, St. Lawrence Ship Channel, that a certain amount is deducted from the expenditure and charged to the income vote for dredging. How does my hon. friend explain that?

Mr. McDOUGALL.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My deputy explains to me that we had certain work at Sorel for dredges outside the ship channel, and for that we made a special account.

Mr. FOSTER. I have my hon. friend where I want him. He does that to keep his accounts straight. In this case he diverts the expenditure for dredging for four or five months out of this capital account, and he makes no corresponding entry. If you make the entry in one case and not in another, you complicate your accounts, and you are diverting the vote intended to be used on the ship channel of the St. Lawrence under capital account to what is arranged by Parliament to be defrayed out of income.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not divert one dollar of what I am asking from Parliament for the work in the ship channel. I am asking $80,000.

Mr. FOSTER. I want my hon. friend to drop the $80,000 out of his mind entirely. I am not discussing that. I am discussing the point that a certain amount of capital which has been invested in plant you are now diverting to dredging work which Parliament has said should be paid for, both as to plant and work, out of income.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman and myself agree in the main, namely, that when a Minister asks Parliament for a sum of money for a certain purpose, he has no right to spend it on anything else. But where we differ is in this. In 1888 this Parliament assumed the debt of the Harbour Commissioners, who in return gave us a certain quantity of material and plant. It was not stipulated that those dredges should belong to this and the other part of Canada or be employed only in such and such particular work. That plant was simply transferred to us, and the Minister of Public Works has the right to send any of those scows and dredges where he likes. They are the property of Canada. I do not propose to charge one dollar of expenditure at Kingston to the ship channel.

Mr. FOSTER. There are but two things in an expenditure. There is the thing you work with and the actual cost of working it. Take, for instance, the vote given you for dredging chargeable to income. You do two things with that money. If you want a dredge, you build her with part of it, and then you work her with part of it, but both are payable out of income, and you have no right to take out of that vote money for plant to be used down in the St. Lawrence channel, which is always charged to capital account. My hon. friend gets a vote, and out of that takes $115,000 which he puts into plant, and $80,000 which he puts into work. He admits that he cannot take any part of that $80,000 and apply it to work at Kingston or any other place. Can he then take one of his dredges, which he has built out of that $115,000 and use it at Kingston or any other place on work not provided for in this vote? My hon. friend says the case is not the same because we took over this plant from the harbour commission. That does not make a bit of difference. We assumed the debt of the commission and charge it to our capital account. We paid for the plant in that way, and if you use any portion of that plant for temporary works, chargeable to income, you should charge the income fund and credit capital with the value of the work done.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Is not that carrying the thing to a very fine point?

Mr. FOSTER. No, it is a $25,000 plant that is in question.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I will not say that, in strict accuracy, there may not be something in the hon. gentleman's contention. But what amount of rent would be involved in the use of that dredge? It may possibly be used two or three months at Kingston, and the rent would be a mere bagatelle.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think it would, and in any case it involves the accuracy of accounting.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. In the hon. gentleman's own time and before that, I do not think that the Government insisted on charging things with that minute accuracy, although I will not gainsay that there might not, from a book-keeping point of view, be something in the hon. gentleman's pretension. At the outside, the amount involved would not be much more than a couple of hundred dollars.

Mr. FOSTER. It would be more than that.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Supposing the dredge cost $20,000, what would the rent be?

Mr. FOSTER. $50 or $100 per day.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Everything asked for in this vote of $256,000, my hon. friend will have to spend on the St. Lawrence ship channel.

Mr. FOSTER. He says he is going to do it.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The Auditor General will take extremely good care that he does.

Mr. FOSTER. As long as you let him.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. We cannot help it; he will compel us no matter what we may care to do. I think the hon. gentleman will find that the whole of this $256,000 will have to be expended for this purpose. It may be the case that my hon. friend, the Minister of Public Works, may borrow a part of the old plant and use it elsewhere, so as to avoid the expense of procuring separate dredges for every separate bit of work he has to do. The hon. gentleman is too good a business man to say that we should have a dredge set apart for each separate work we have to do.

Mr. FOSTER. I am keeping the distinction between capital and income only.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. That does not come up in this particular matter. Everything my hon. friend asks for he means to spend on the St. Lawrence channel. He would have to spend this sum, independent altogether of what he does with this small old dredge that he proposes to send to Kingston. I do not say that, strictly speaking, there is not something in the hon. gentleman's contention, but he is pushing the matter too far, and the course he urges was not taken in former times. The dredges were used pretty indiscriminately where they were wanted.

Mr. FOSTER. There is a certain vote chargeable to income for dredging and the Minister of Public Works cannot exceed that. Now there is work to be done in Kingston, which is properly chargeable to income. You want a dredge to do that work at Kingston. Suppose you advertised for a dredge of the capacity of the one you are going to send up, your officer will tell you how much a month you would have to pay.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It would cost about $40 a day.

Mr. FOSTER. Take three months, or 100 days dredging at $40 per day, that will give $4,000. Does not my hon. friend see that by that device of borrowing a dredge from the capital account, he is extending his capacity to work in that class of work chargeable to income by $4,000, and is exceeding the vote chargeable to income by that sum. If he can do that with one dredge, he can do it with five dredges.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Suppose the dredge were lying idle.

Mr. FOSTER. It would not lie idle because my hon. friend has already said that if he did not send it to Kingston, he would have other work for it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Once more, I am very much afraid, we are at loggerheads altogether. I am building now two new dredges out of ship channel money. I suppose that when the work is completed on the ship channel or when I have not as much work there as I now have, I will take those two dredges elsewhere, and I do not see why I should not. Those dredges are after all the property of Canada, and I do not see the point my hon. friend makes.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman does not see the point we will not pursue it further.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Leave it to the Auditor General.

Mr. FOSTER. He can hold you to expenditure as it is being charged, but once it is put into shape of a shovel or a spade or a dredge or a tug, and even the Auditor General finds it hard to trace it.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Presuming that that matter is disposed of, I should like to ask the Minister for an explanation with regard to some payments that appear in the Auditor General's Report for coal. On page Q-22 I find that the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company were paid at the rate of $3.10 per ton on 453 tons of coal; in another place on the same page I find T. F. Moore & Cie paid $2.90 per ton on 1,326 tons of Scotch coal; and on the preceding page, Kingman, Brown & Co. paid at the rate of $2.55 per ton on 2,215 tons of coal. I would like to know why this difference in the price.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We were short of coal and were obliged to buy some from the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company, and were obliged to pay their price, which is $3.10. As to the difference between $2.55 and $2.90, it is because of a difference in the coal. We bought some Scotch coal, which is a great deal better for the use of dredges than the Nova Scotia coal. I see my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) is protesting, but there is no occasion for it. Nova Scotia furnishes very good coal; but the chief engineer and all the engineers report that for dredges, Scotch coal is a great deal better, and that is the reason I pay a little more for it. I do not pretend to be an expert; I am acting on the advice of my chief engineer.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I am not inclined to agree with the hon. Minister's opinion with regard to the Nova Scotia coal.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. For certain purposes.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I do not think it is possible for the hon. Minister to get any coal better than the Nova Scotia coal. I find also, in connection with the handling of this coal, the unloading, several items at 12½ cents per ton and some at 15 cents per ton. I would like to ask the hon. Minister, first, whether this coal was bought after tender and contract.

Mr. FOSTER.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Tenders were called for from different parties, my deputy tells me.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Were tenders called for with respect to the coal bought from the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, that was a small quantity. The Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company have their headquarters at Sorel, and they often borrow from us and we from them.

Mr. McDOUGALL. But the amount paid for this coal and some other comparatively small items was $1,729. It appears to me that that is too large an item for the purchase to be made without tender. At a place like these points on the St. Lawrence where coal is offered in large quantities, many would probably have tendered.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It was during the early part of the spring and we wanted the coal immediately.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I hope I can successfully appeal to the hon. Minister of Public Works to investigate a little further into the relative merits of Scotch coal and Nova Scotia coal. I would remind him, in connection with that subject, that, as every one who has had experience with engineers and shipping men will know, there is a great deal of prejudice on this subject that is liable to mislead. I had to deal with that subject once when I was in the Marine Department. The agency at Quebec and the men in connection with the ships at that port were all wedded to the use of Scotch coal. I investigated the subject and found that there was nothing in it but sheer prejudice. The men who handled Scotch coal, the commission merchants and others make the production in a sense, local. They have their friends on the steamers—I am not saying there is any corrupt arrangement—and Nova Scotia coal is at a comparatively low range, and is not forced and pushed in the same way for the use of the Government ships. But I am satisfied that if the hon. gentleman will take advantage of the experiments that have been made in the city of Montreal to determine the relative merits of Nova Scotia and Scotch coal, he will find that the Scotch coal is the inferior article. It comes out in ballast—it is a cheap coal. I am almost positive on that point; I know it was correct when I looked into the matter. Coming out in ballast it is landed at a comparatively cheap rate at Montreal and Quebec. If the hon. Minister will take the trouble to get the result of the experiments made, I think by the harbour authorities, at any rate by the public authorities outside of the Government departments themselves, he will ascertain that I am right and that Nova Scotia coal is a much superior article. There is no complaint, I am sure, from any of the dredges of the Public Works Department in the provinces where they use Nova Scotia coal. They have no trouble about it and can show that the service can be carried on as efficiently using our own coal as using coal from outside, and, whether the hon. gentleman is in favour of the National Policy or not, I hope he would prefer, unless the expense was very serious, to use the home article rather than that which is imported. And as the duty on coal is to sustain another cut in the coming year, I trust the hon. gentleman will make an effort consistent with his own idea of what is due to the public, at least to give the Nova Scotia article a fair trial.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) may be perfectly sure that I have no prejudice against Nova Scotia coal. When my chief engineer, Mr. Coste, represented to me that it was better to use Scotch coal, I made the very same representations as have been made by my hon. friend, but Mr. Coste, who was a very experienced engineer—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He is not a coal man.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. He knows all about it. When he stated to me that Nova Scotia coal, though a good coal was not so good for the use of dredges as the Scotch coal, on account of the draft and because it clogged the grate—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Oh, oh.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Well, I would much rather use the Canadian coal than any other. But I am not an expert and, when my chief engineer made a report to me that our dredges could not work with the same advantage with Nova Scotia as with Scotch coal, I felt that I could not set my opinion against his, and, with great regret—I say it again—I consented to buy Scotch coal. But, I take in good part the advice that is tendered me and will have new experiments made.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In regard to that question about clinkers in the grate, much of that difficulty can be obviated at very small expense in connection with the grates themselves, the arrangement of the furnace. If they are in the habit of arranging for Scotch coal they can alter that arrangement so as to give the other such a trial as will obviate these difficulties. But I ask the hon. gentleman to bear in mind these tests that can be made, and to consult the representatives in Montreal of the several companies, who will be able to put the merits of the coal before him in a business shape.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I will have tests made on our boats during the next month or two.

Mr. GILLIES. I would like to put in a word or two for the Nova Scotia coal, and draw the attention of the Minister to the fact that the large liners now running between Montreal and Liverpool and other transatlantic ports call at the ports of Cape Breton and take in Cape Breton coal. For a long time a strong prejudice existed against Cape Breton coal in favour of Scotch coal. That prejudice has long since been exploded, and it is well for the Minister to wake up to the fact that these large transatlantic liners are using Cape Breton coal exclusively for bunker coal. Another fact that demonstrates the superiority of the Nova Scotia coal is that the French fleet on the Atlantic Coast use exclusively Cape Breton coal, as do also the British fleet on the coast of Newfoundland. To my mind, these facts should weigh more with the Minister than any opinion given by any civil engineer in his department.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have used a good deal of Nova Scotia coal this year, I think about 2,000 tons. I promise again to make a complete test.

Mr. McDougall. I am sorry the Minister's chief engineer should have given such an opinion, because Cape Breton coal is generally looked upon as a very superior coal, with perhaps one or two exceptions. The product of one or two seams might be somewhat inferior. I do not think the general run of coal there has been offered on the market of the St. Lawrence to any extent; I know it has not been offered, unless very lately or perhaps many years ago, to any extent at all on the St. Lawrence. Perhaps it was offered at a time when they had not facilities for separating the coal from the objectionable products that were mixed with it in the seams, and made it unsuitable for steamboat purposes. But in making any future tests of Nova Scotia coal, I would strongly recommend the Minister to get the opinion of those large liners who use it constantly.

Mr. FOSTER. Would my hon. friend tell us about what work was done in the channel last year, and what he proposes to do this year?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Last year the dredge "Laurier" worked till about the 20th of October, removing 80,500 yards of sand and stone, at a cost of 8.86 cents per yard. Later in the season the "Laurier" was removed to a point near Montreal in the Contrecoeur channel, where it remained to the 25th of November. The material removed there consisted of 31,650 cubic yards of clay and stone, at a cost of 8.45 cents per yard. The dredge "Laval" was employed opposite Lotbinière up to the close of navigation. The ma-materials removed were 36,431 cubic yards of hard-pan and boulders, which cost 31·29 cents per yard. Dredge No. 12 was employed at Isle St. Ours, where she worked till the 14th of August. She removed 59,760 cubic yards of clay and sand, at a cost of 5·75 cents per yard. The dredge was then removed to another point where she worked till the 4th of October, removing 33,800 cubic yards of sand, at a cost of 10·12 cents per yard. She was then removed to Champlain, where she worked till the 11th November, removing 13,520 cubic yards of sand, clay and stone, at a cost of 18·82 per yard. The work being completed at this place, the dredge was removed to Upper Pointe aux Trembles channel, where she worked until the close of navigation, removing some small obstructions. The material removed was 1,280 cubic yards of gravel and stone, at a cost of 27·37 cents per yard. Dredge No. 11 worked at the widening of the upper end of Pointe aux Trembles channel until the 14th of August, removing 19,512 cubic yards of gravel and stone, at a cost of 13·77 per yard. She was then taken to Longue Pointe for the purpose of removing a portion of the isolated shoal located a little below the Longue Pointe church. This work was completed on the 9th of October. She removed at that spot 25,969 cubic yards of gravel and stone at a cost of 16·62 cents per yard. The dredge was then removed to Contrecoeur, where she worked till the 24th of November, at the close of navigation, in conjunction with the dredge "Laurier," widening the channel at Isle St. Ours. The material removed there consisted of 47,580 cubic yards of clay and stone, at a cost of 6·67 cents per yard. At the beginning of the fiscal year 1897 there were twelve dredges working in the Montreal harbour, and they continued there until the close of navigation, removing 20,100,000 cubic yards, at a cost of 50 cents per cubic yard. This was the work done last year on the St. Lawrence.

Mr. WALLACE. What is the total value of the work done ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The total expenditure up to 30th April last on the St. Lawrence ship canal was $163,488.

Mr. FOSTER. What portion of that expenditure represented the actual taking out of quantities of material ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. $62,873 was the amount of the working expenses of the dredges.

Mr. FOSTER. Now that the Minister has read a mass of technical details from his memorandum, will he give the committee an idea of the condition of the work generally, how near to completion the ship canal has advanced, and so on.

Mr. TARTE.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have here the depths of water during the last two years, and the figures may possess some interest. The table is as follows :—

	Lowest Water,
	1890.	1897.
May	36 ft. 6 in.	35 ft. 6 in.
June	35 3	32 6
July	31 9	30 3
August	30 6	29 3
September	30 9	28 0
October	29 9	27 0
November	30 6	27 6

The lowest depth in 1890 was 29 feet. The lowest depth in 1897 was 26 feet 6 inches, and the highest 37 feet.

Mr. FOSTER. When the hon. gentleman gives the depth for May, I suppose he gives the average monthly depth.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes. On one day in 1897, the depth of water was only 25 feet 6 inches, which was due to an east wind, but it only continued a day or a day and a half.

Mr. FOSTER. How does the Minister account for the fact that the average for 1890 was perceptibly higher than for 1897, with six full intervening years during which dredging work has been done ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The depth has varied a good deal. For instance, I find that in 1891 the lowest depth was 27 feet 3 inches, while the lowest during the preceding year was 29 feet. The lowest in 1895 was 26 feet, but it continued only for a short time. As to the cause, it is very difficult to state the cause. The engineers of the department have given a great deal of attention to the matter, but they cannot explain the reason of the change. As the hon. gentleman knows, the important sources of supply for the St. Lawrence are the great lakes and the Ottawa River. When the water falls in the great lakes there must be a loss of water in the St. Lawrence River.

Mr. FOSTER. All the same it is somewhat disheartening in view of the amount of money we have been spending on the river every year, to find that during seven years there has been a decided lowering of the available floatage.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is not disheartening. The water has fallen in the lakes by four feet, and we cannot expect to have the same depth in the St. Lawrence. If we look at the facts we will find that the St. Lawrence is one of the most important highways and moreover it is one of the cheapest routes. I will give the hon. gentleman some facts to show the importance of our trade.

Mr. FOSTER. We know the importance of our trade and the value of the St. Lawrence route, but we are now considering the floatage power of the river. What is the draught of the largest vessel coming up the channel?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have low water only during a short period of the season. Last year the only accident that could be fairly attributed to the low water was the grounding of the SS. "Arabia" at Cap a la Roche. When she left Montreal we were supposed to have 27½ feet of water, but there is no doubt that on account of the east wind there was not that depth of water there. In May last year we had 35 feet 6 inches.

Mr. FOSTER. Just the same as in 1890.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In June we had 30 feet 6 inches.

Mr. FOSTER. Three feet less than in 1890.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In July we had 30 feet 3 inches.

Mr. FOSTER. Which was 1½ feet less.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In August we had 29 feet 3 inches.

Mr. FOSTER. Which was 1 foot 3 inches less.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In September we had 28 feet.

Mr. FOSTER. Two and three-quarter feet less.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In October we had 27 feet.

Mr. FOSTER. Three feet less.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In November we had 27 feet 6 inches. The hon. gentleman must remember that the water was falling in the lakes and everywhere last year, and there are not many great water channels in the world which have a greater depth than this.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) seems to think that the whole question is solved if the channel is still quite deep today. That is not the point. He must remember that the weakest link in a chain measures the strength of the chain and your channel will be serviceable according to the depth it is at an average. It is somewhat disappointing that after seven years work and expenditure the channel is even shallower than it was before. I find that on the average each month you come down to about two feet six inches less water in 1897 than in 1890. That is a little bit disappointing.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In the year 1896 we were better off. In that year the following were the depths of the water in the channel each month:—May, 33 feet 6 inches; June, 30 feet 6 inches; July, 28 feet 9 inches; August, 28 feet; September, 27 feet; October, 27 feet 6 inches;

November, 29 feet. Last year was an exceptional year and the water was very low.

Mr. FOSTER. And 1896 was quite a falling off from 1890.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, a little.

Mr. FOSTER. Do these shallow places extend over quite a large area, or are they confined to one or two places?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The most difficult part of the channel is at Cap a la Roches which is three miles long. When the "Arabia" grounded there was only 25½ feet there, but it only lasted a day or so and the greater part of the year we have between 27 or 28 feet. There are very few steamers which draw more water than that. We had last year in Montreal bigger ships than we ever had before. The Elder-Dempster Company are bringing to Montreal to-day very large ships indeed, and I have it from Mr. Harling, the able and efficient manager of the Elder-Dempster Company, that the St. Lawrence ship channel is a safe channel, but of course it has to be deepened and widened as we are doing from year to year. The reason why I am asking a larger amount this year is to enable us to do as much work as possible. I think myself that we have achieved pretty satisfactory results.

Mr. FOSTER. I will conclude my remarks by reiterating what I said before, that it has struck me for a number of years that in the case of the St. Lawrence channel and as well as the whole dredging business of the country, it is very, very expensive as carried on by the Government. Between your dredges, and your officers, and your hangers-on, and the men who are actually employed, and all that, an immense amount of money is spent, and I am decidedly of the opinion as I have been for years—though I may be wrong—that the Government would get better results if it would simply sell out its whole concern of plant and everything else and go on the principle of getting by contract proper dredging companies to do the work for us. I believe that for the amount of money you spend, you would get a great deal better work done in this way and the companies would do their work more cheaply and provide their plant more cheaply than the Government possibly can. That place at Sorel is a regular sink. In it there is from $120,000 to $160,000 spent each year for repairs and plant and one thing or the other, and a modicum only of the vote goes to the actual taking out of earth or stone in the channel. I held that opinion while I was a member of the Government and I hold it yet. There is the difficulty, of course, that you have all this plant on hand and the Minister has charge of it; that your officers are there and none of them want to go; but for the good of the country I believe it would be better if it were known that Canada hereafter would simply pay for her dredging by the cubic yard, and you would find contracting companies that would do the work and make a business of it; it is not going to be a small business either. If it has been expensive in the past, it will be still more expensive in the future, for the Government. If it were once well understood that the country depended upon contract for its dredging, you would find enterprising companies to complete, and I believe we could get far better value for our money.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) and myself practically hold the same view. There is no pleasure in supervising that work, and if I could get rid of it as Minister of Public Works I would not continue it. I must, however, take issue with my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) with regard to the cost of the work. I grant that he is right to a very large extent as to the past. When the Government took the old plant of the harbour commissioners, they went on for a number of years with that old plant, and I am quite of the hon. gentleman's opinion that the work in these days was expensive indeed. But the figures I have given to the House show the great improvement that has been made, and we are now able to take out material at 8 or 10 cents.

Mr. FOSTER. So would a modern dredging company; it would make no difference in that respect.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. You could not find in Canada any company which has the plant to do that work. More than that, there is not in America to-day a dredge that could be compared with the "Laval" or the "Laurier." With the improved dredges we have, we can do the work more cheaply than it can be done by any private company at a profit.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I find a charge for providing two sign-boards—one $30 and the other $25. I consider these prices extremely high.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Of course, I do not buy these sign-boards myself. My hon. friend knows that I cannot control these details; no Minister could.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Besides, I do not see why any difference should be made in price between the two.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There are a few more letters in the one than in the other.

Harbours and Rivers—Ontario—River
Kaministiquia $15,000

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This is for the continuation of the work of last year.

Mr. FOSTER. How much work has been done there?

Mr. FOSTER.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We spent last year $6,800 in dredging, and expect to spend the balance of $10,000 before the 1st of July. This year we shall spend $10,000 for dredging and $5,000 for pile work.

Mr. FOSTER. How much money has been spent on that work altogether up to the present time?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. To the 31st of December, 1897, $231,179.63.

Mr. FOSTER. And, briefly, what have we there now?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have deepened the channel of the river to 20 feet, for a width of 200 feet and a length of five miles; and we have built a turning basin opposite the Canadian Pacific Railway elevators.

Mr. FOSTER. What is supposed to be necessary to finish the work?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This year the work will be completed, so my officers inform me.

Mr. FOSTER. I want my hon. friend to make a broad note of that with a finger-mark, for we have heard for many years that this was to be the last of it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My officers tell me positively that this will be the last time. As a matter of fact, the dredge which is working there now cannot work any longer. We can scarcely keep it afloat.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose that is working to great advantage.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is working fairly well, and is good for this year.

Mr. BENNETT. The Minister referred to the construction of some boats at Sorel. Last year the old tug "Trudeau," with the barge "Challenge," had the machinery taken out of her, and I understood that a new tug was being constructed at Sorel. Is that correct?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My officers inform me that we have a tug under construction at Sorel to take the place of the tug "Trudeau." It is not yet completed, but it will be completed in a month.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I would like to know if we are to expect anything in the Estimates this year for the improvement of St. Andrew's Rapids in the Red River?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. As my hon. friend knows, that is a subject of very great importance. I visited the place myself, and I had a careful survey made of the river. Upon that survey an estimate has been made, and, if I remember rightly, the cost of the work would amount to $600,000. Of course Parliament would pause before engaging in such a large expenditure. At the same time I recognize the great importance of the work. Several deputations have called upon me and made representations in regard to it; and we have before us now a suggestion, which was made by some members of Parliament, especially by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Jameson), but I could not promise anything for this year.

Public Buildings at Ottawa—Towards reconstruction of portion of Western Departmental Block, destroyed by fire, 11th February, 1897..... $50,000

Mr. FOSTER. We would like a full history of everything done.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. As hon. gentlemen know, the work is not yet completed. I am aware that a good deal of comment has been made on the fact that the work is progressing very slowly.

Mr. FOSTER. So slowly that it has become a joke for the end men in the minstrel shows.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The reason we are not more advanced is that we have called for tenders for the iron structure. Fortier & Godbout got the contract at the price of $20,000. They gave the work to the Hamilton Iron Works of Hamilton. They were to have completed the work by the 1st of April, but although we have been calling on them every day, we have not been able to make them go quicker. That is the reason for the delay. The work of restoring the building, repairing the chimneys and walls, etc., has progressed favourably. It is first-class work, done under the supervision of the chief architect himself. We have spent so far $116,000. Out of the $32,000 that we had after 1896-97 and out of the vote of last year of $100,000 we have spent $116,000 up to date. I understand that the total amount of work will represent in round numbers $200,000. The balance of the work consists of the iron structure, which, as I have said, is under contract. My hon. friend wants complete details. I have them under my hand. Total expenditure from 11th February, 1897, to 1st of February, 1898, clearing away debris, taking down portions of the wall, &c., $84,055.16. Amount required to complete reconstruction of the walls, doors, chimneys, stone-cutting, &c., 31st June, 1898, $32,924.20. Contract for steel roof, $20,000; terra cotta for walls, $7,637.50; laying the terra cotta, and so on, $3,000; concrete between joists, &c., $1,135.80. The works, when completed, will probably cost about $200,000, according to the estimate of the chief architect.

Mr. WALLACE. Did you charge any of that to the Hull election fund?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I never heard in my life of any such election fund. I am both surprised and scandalized at the hon. gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. FOSTER. It is just the different sections that my hon. friend has heard of—not the hull. What is the date at which my hon. friend thinks this will be finished?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The chief architect expects that the whole work will be completed by the end of September. We had a great deal of work to do. Hon. gentlemen who have experience in the restoring of buildings seriously damaged by fire know what work that involves. You start out with the idea that you have very little work to do, but you find that when you pick out a stone twenty-five come down.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that a correct statement?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. What?

Mr. FOSTER. That wherever a stone is picked out, twenty-five come down.

Mr. POPE. I would like to know from the hon. Minister if they intend to pick out any more stones?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I only wish that my hon. friend's opposite would pick out a little fewer ones to throw at me.

Mr. FOSTER. Is this being done by day work?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Mostly. The chief architect, who is a very experienced officer, supervises the work himself and has employed the best men he could find. I did not interfere at all. The work has been carried on very successfully indeed, and is well done.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Are the men employed working hard?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I think that the chief architect of Public Works to-day is an officer able to handle men. He began himself at the very foot of the ladder as a workman, and reached the position he has to-day by his own hard work. I am glad to have the opportunity of paying him the compliment of saying that I have learned to have full confidence in him. He is an old officer, has been in the department twenty-five years or more, and I have found him most faithful and efficient.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The place of that officer is not outside, but rather in the office, is it not?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. His office is very near the works. I know that the chief architect goes on the works every day and several times a day. He is a very capable man.

Mr. FOSTER. Is the work of pulling down and refacing the wall that is now going on being done by contract?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, it could not be done by contract. The chief architect saw that the walls were falling and directed that the rebuilding should take place.

Mr. WALLACE. Was the work of plastering done by contract or by day's work?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My hon. friend will agree that, in a building like that, it is not possible to do such work by contract. A piece of the wall gives away here or there, and it is impossible to estimate what is necessary to be done. When a building has been damaged by fire and water it is out of the question to make repairs by contract.

Mr. FOSTER. At page Q-56 of the Auditor General's Report begins the general repairs pay-lists. Does that include the men employed on this Western Block?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That has reference to the general repairs which, as my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) knows, are going on all the time. This comes out of the item of about $75,000. It was $100,000 or something like that formerly.

Mr. FOSTER. There are enough men here to make an army to invade Cuba.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) was Minister of Finance for a long time—

Mr. FOSTER. But I never saw so many names on such a list before.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman is exaggerating the facts, if he will allow he to say so without offence. It certainly did take a great many men as the building was half destroyed and a great deal of dirt and rubbish had to be cleared away. On account of the fire, I must agree, we had to employ a great number of men. I was surprised myself at the length of time occupied.

Public Buildings, Nova Scotia—

Halifax Drill Hall (lapsed amount)....	$18,000
Kentville Public Buildings.....	5,000
Liverpool Public Buildings.....	5,000

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The first item is a revote to build the Halifax drill hall, which is now under contract. I am informed that the work will be completed by the end of the year.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What has been done on the Kentville post office?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Nothing has been done so far. The proposal is not a new one. The building was applied for five or six years ago under the administration of which my hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) was a member.

Mr. FOSTER. When was the vote brought down?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In 1897-98, I think.

An hon. MEMBER. What is the population of Kentville?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In 1891 the population was 2,526.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What is the estimated expense of the building?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Between $15,000 and $18,000.

Mr. WALLACE. Does that include the site?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, and fittings—the whole building complete.

Mr. WALLACE. I remember that that was brought up last year and it was regarded by many hon. members as an unjustifiable vote, and I think the House divided on that item and the one following it. But the statement was not then made that the building would cost $18,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) would refer to the "Hansard" I do not think he would find that I made any estimate of the work last year. No plans were then prepared.

Mr. WALLACE. Surely the hon. Minister did not call for an appropriation without having any plans.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My hon. friend has more experience than that would indicate. You often ask for a vote of Parliament without having any plans, especially when you do not ask for the whole amount. You only want enough to buy the site and start work.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Of course it is a complete change of base for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) to advocate this building for a place of the population he has given. Still, personally, I am very glad to see Kentville receiving attention of this kind, because it is a centre of a very important county and a fine country, and the mere statement of population does not indicate the amount of business transacted there, I am quite certain that there are many places in Canada that have received this attention that would not be able to show as much business done as Kentville.

Mr. FOSTER. As the one in the following vote, for instance.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Liverpool is a flourishing place. Will this Kentville public building include custom-house, &c. ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We are not going to build only a post office, of course, but a public building as it is usually understood.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Has the site been obtained ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Not yet.

SIR CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Does the hon. Minister know what he will have to pay for the site ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have no estimate yet and no site is recommended.

Mr. TAYLOR. What is the revenue at Kentville ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The postal revenue in 1896-97 was $4,659.62 ; custom duties collected, $23,405.06 ; money orders issued and paid, $41,583.07 ; value of exports, $74,102 ; value of imports, $118,849.

Mr. WALLACE. The Minister has included in the customs revenue, the revenue from half a dozen other places.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Well, I have just read the figures prepared for me by my officials, the same as is done in every other department.

Mr. FOSTER. What has been done on the next building ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have bought the site for $1,600. The site is 100 x 60, that is for Liverpool. The population of Liverpool in 1891 was 2,465, and the postal revenue last year was $2,202.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to know whether this is going to be followed by a full-fledged building in that little town ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The plans which have been prepared are for a building costing between $15,000 and $16,000, including land, furniture and everything.

Mr. WALLACE. I would like to hear from the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) about these two items, because last year he asked us to vote against this appropriation, which we did with great pleasure. A few years ago this House declared its opinion that small places were not entitled to have public buildings, and since that time that rule has been fairly well observed. This seems to be going back to the principle condemned in the past by Parliament. We now find that $13,000 in one case and $18,000 in another are to be voted for buildings in these hamlets.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Order.

Mr. WALLACE. At any rate, they are small places whose population would not justify the erection of public buildings of this kind.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is quite true I opposed the appropriation last year, and moved that it should be struck out. I am opposed to the erection of public buildings in places of this size where the revenue is so limited. At the same time, the site has been bought in this case, and last year the committee voted $5,000. I earnestly hope that the Estimates this year will not contain another single appropriation for a public building where the population is as limited and where the revenue is limited as they are in this case. If the Estimates do contain such appropriations, I shall certainly oppose them. Last year there was a kind of understanding come to that these appropriations given in violation of the principle laid down before, should be dropped. I accept that contract, and I am willing to allow this to go in the face of that distinct understanding come to last year. But if in any other case the rule is violated, I shall be glad to join my hon. friends in voting against it.

Mr. McDUGALL. But the Minister says the site is not bought in the case of the Kentville building.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down has an awkward record on this subject, while I am at liberty to hope that these appropriations will not stop. Liverpool and Kentville are entitled to the consideration that every other part of Canada has received. Besides, these places have the good fortune at present to be represented by Ministers : The Minister of Finance speaks for Liverpool, and the Minister of Militia and Defence for Kentville. But the member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) is not here, and I want to say a word for Guysborough. I hope that is not to be left out, and I trust that the Ministers from Nova Scotia will resist the pressure from the member for North Wellington. I think they won't have much difficulty, from what we see. The hon. gentleman has not made a very successful fight against these two items which he tackled last session. So long as the Ministers have made such progress in spite of all that he says, I trust they will gradually carry this policy out, and that all the counties of Nova Scotia, at any rate, will be provided for.

Mr. McMULLEN. I claim to be just as consistent as my hon. friend, and more so. Last year I stated, as I state now, that there was an understanding come to that this should be the last instance of violation of the principles laid down years before.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. McMULLEN. Well, I understood it so, that no appropriation should be voted for the construction of public buildings in a place with only 2,000 population, and where the postal revenue is only $2,000. If there is any appropriation of that kind proposed, it will meet with my determined opposition. We have got to establish a principle. There was a principle established years ago for which every man in this House voted, Sir John A. Macdonald accepted the proposition himself. It was then agreed that in the erection of public buildings the claims of the place to consideration should be regarded, and they were to be erected only where the revenue showed a surplus, or justified the money being invested. If we had taken that course, the town of Woodstock, where there is a revenue of $16,000 a year, would have a post office, whereas it has none now. I contend that is a good rule, which should be carried out. If you are going to depart from that rule, I can draw the attention of the Minister of Public Works to other places in my riding where the amount is double the amount received in Liverpool; and simply because I respect the principle that was then adopted by this House, I have not asked that that principle should be broken. Last year, as I said before, there was a kind of consent given that this should be the last of this thing, and in face of that fact I am willing to allow it to pass.

Mr. CHARLTON. I hope the Government will take note of the fact that there seems to be a rather sinister anxiety on the part of hon. gentlemen on the opposite side, that this policy should be continued. I think it will serve the interests of our hon. friends opposite very effectually to do so, and that is worth considering. It is always a safe thing to avoid pleasing your enemy. The appeals of my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) and other hon. gentlemen opposite, are appeals to which I trust our friends upon the Ministerial benches will have the wisdom to turn deaf ears.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I hope the Minister of Militia and Defence will not forget to provide a drill-shed in Cape Breton, notwithstanding the threats of the hon. member for North Wellington. This is a matter which was laid before his attention some time ago.

Mr. BAIN. I thought they were all warriors from that country who did not need any drilling. Now, on this question I would like to say a word on behalf of the ordinary citizen who has to bear the burden, not being specially interested in a public building in my county, nor in any other county. I want to ask the people's representatives, what advantage it is to any town to spend $15,000 or $20,000 of public money on a post office when, for $200 or $300 a year, you can find accommodation just as efficient, just as central, and as useful for the public service. You are borrowing money upon which you pay interest, you have to hire a man to take care of that building, all of which expenditure lands on the public treasury. And for what purpose? To enable the inhabitants of the town to say: The Government have erected a nice building here, they have spent so much public money, and we have spent so much a year to keep it up. Is that business?

Mr. McDOUGALL. No. Business is business.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. And your business is very small now.

Mr. BAIN. The hon. member for Wellington is on the right track, and I hope my hon. friend will continue to remind the House that we are spending the people's money, and I say unhesitatingly that we are spending it to serious disadvantage in putting up a building under these circumstances.

Mr. BENNETT. I remember five or six years ago, on the occasion of a grant being proposed to the Laprairie post office, that hon. gentlemen opposite, then on this side of the House, kept the House sitting the whole night while they protested against that expenditure. And the loudest probably in denunciation of that vote was the present Minister of Trade and Commerce. I think no words of mine and no arguments I could put forward would be half so strong and forcible as the language used on the occasion of that grant, which was about on all fours with this for the Liverpool post office. I ask the attention of hon. gentlemen because every word uttered by the hon. gentleman applies with double force to this case, because hon. gentlemen opposite are to-day making an appropriation for a similar undertaking. Speaking on May 18th, 1892, Sir Richard Cartwright made use of the following language in regard to the Laprairie post office grant:

It appears to me that this is a most monstrous and disgraceful job. We are asked to spend $16,000, costing us in interest at least $640 a year, for the accommodation of a post office of which the total revenue is $433. We will have in addition to provide the salary of the postmaster, the fuel and light, the repairs, and, as we are our own insurers, something should be allowed for that. So that to collect a revenue of $433, the country is going to be saddled with an annual charge of $1,400 or perhaps more. There will be $400 for the salary of the postmaster, $640 interest on the money spent in the building, and at least $400 will go to fuel and light and caretaker, so that it will cost $1,400 a year to erect a building for the lodging of a post office with a revenue of only $433. I think it is a scandalous proceeding and that this should be struck out forthwith. I do not feel that there can be any possible excuse for this expenditure, except as a deliberate bribe to the electors.

I have looked up the revenue in this case and it will be about $900 a year. The remarks of the hon. gentleman will apply, no doubt, with full force to the Minister of Finance, and when he goes to this constituency on the next occasion, he will feel that he is being criticised by the Minister of Trade and Commerce as one deliberately bribing the constituency in order to secure his election.

I should like to hear from the Minister if there is any possible reason he can give except that which I have alleged, for the expenditure of $1,400 a year for the accommodation of a post office of which the total revenue is a little over $400.

The hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) made a strong protest, but as he does not say a great deal in the House one way or the other now, I will not quote from his remarks. But there is one gentleman who is blatant in his professions about expenditures, the Postmaster General, and he on that occasion was even more wrathful than the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He said :

I ask the Minister of Public Works if he can stand up before the people and say that he considers this public work in Laprairie is necessary in the public interest.

Now, I will ask the hon. Minister of Public Works if he thinks this Liverpool post office is a work in the interest of the public ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Certainly.

Mr. BENNETT. That is the difference between the Minister of Public Works of the present day and the then Minister of Public Works, and I am proud to say that the Minister of Public Works at that time had not the effrontery to stand up and unblushingly support a proposition of that kind. Then the present Postmaster General said :

There is not a Minister of the Crown to-day, from the Minister of Justice down, who raises his voice before this Parliament in defence of the country, but, one and all, they seem to be engaged in the crime of looting the treasury.

It is to be regretted that the present Postmaster General is not here to-night in order to back up some of the hon. gentlemen who are stalwarts, and I am glad to say that the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Bain) put in a word for the county as against what the Postmaster General was pleased to call the "looters of the public treasury." It is true the hon. member for North Wellington has made a promise, but it is not a promise the country wants at this time, it is a performance. Let me commend these words uttered by the Postmaster General to some hon. gentlemen opposite :

You cannot do a better service to a Government, if you are truly loyal to it, than to check it in wrong-doing, nor can you do a better service to the country than bring the Government back to right principles. Unfortunately, public opinion in Canada has been so debauched that we know we are speaking to many deaf ears.

This is rather prophetic language, and it is more applicable to-day than it was then. The hon. gentleman proceeded to say :

But I hope there will be some in this House behind the Government sufficiently independent to condemn a transaction of this kind, which is so disgraceful in itself that the Minister of Public Works will not dare to tell the people of Canada that it is necessary in the public interest.

Then the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) got indignant that night too, and I will quote from his language. He said :

This is a businesslike transaction, indeed. Is this something that really commends itself to hon. gentlemen over there, who charge me with obstruction when I oppose it ? I am glad I am obstructing ; I want to be considered an obstructionist of everything of that character. I wonder that the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Pelletier) does not get up and defend this vote. He apparently has got too much good sense to do that. There are other places in his riding, I believe, larger than Laprairie, and if he defends this vote he is going to get into trouble with other places, unless he gets post offices for them. What a position for the Government of the Dominion—going around and peddling the public money like a lot of hucksters for the purpose of gaining support ; building a post office in order to buy votes.

I cannot help but think that after the lapse of five years and with the goal of his future preferment in sight, I mean something higher than the present worldly position, he will be more virtuously honest than he was then. I expect that before this item passes he will tell the Minister of Finance that it appears as if the Government is spending the money of the people going about peddling the public money like a lot of hucksters to build post offices in order to gain support. As the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) said :

Where a clear case can be shown that they are bartering away public money for the purpose of gaining political support, they should be dealt with by the courts if their own supporters have not honesty enough to deal with them in this House.

One thing to be said in defence of this little post office is that the code of morals in that country is lamentably low. How is the average elector in that riding to be asked to view public appropriations, or asked to appeal to the Government. The ordinary elector in that riding is told that he must never look up to those in authority because he cannot expect anything from them, for in that riding they, in their innocence, elected a gentleman who thought the only reason of his election was that he was one better than themselves. And yet they found that Mr. Forbes profited by his position, and he transferred his seat in Parliament for a judgeship, which he now enjoys.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He was first appointed a tide waiter.

Mr. BENNETT. The code of morals is low in that riding, as proven by the fact that in the case of Mr. Forbes, for the reason that it was a doubtful question whether he was fit to be a judge, the Government made him simply a tide waiter. I am not sufficiently acquainted with the duties of a tide waiter to know whether they require a judicial ken or not, but I do know that after Mr. Forbes had served a certain length of time as a tide waiter he was promoted to a judgeship. I am pleased to see that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) has come in. I know that the hon. gentleman has a memory that never lapses, one that we might all envy, and I will quote for his benefit a speech made by him when the House was asked to vote a sum of money under exactly similar circumstances to this. On the 18th of May, 1892, referring to a similar vote in this House, the Minister (Sir Richard Cartwright) said :

It appears to me that this is a most monstrous and disgraceful job.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That sounds familiar.

Mr. BENNETT. He continued :

I should like to hear from the Minister if there is any possible reason that he can give, except that which I have alleged, for the expenditure of $1,400 a year for the accommodation of a post office whose total revenue is a little over $400. I think it is a scandalous proceeding, and that the vote should be struck out forthwith. I do not see that there can be any possible excuse for it, except as a deliberate bribe to the electors of Laprairie, in violation of the rules laid down by this House, in violation of every proper rule which ought to govern the proceedings of Parliament.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce is certainly consistent, and I expect that he will forthwith rise in his place and move that this item be struck out on the ground that it is "a most monstrous and disgraceful job," and in addition to that, "that it is a violation of every proper rule which ought to govern the proceedings of Parliament." I understand that in this case the site for the public building has already been purchased. It is not too late to stop now. Surely if the site is worth purchasing some one will be found to purchase it back again, and even though they lose something by the transaction, the Government had better do that than go to this enormous expenditure. That is what the Minister of Trade and Commerce recommended in the case of the Laprairie post office. There is to be a building erected at Liverpool, the interest on the cost of which will be $600 a year, and may I ask the Minister (Mr. Tarte) will he appoint a caretaker.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. When it is built, of course it will have to be taken care of.

Mr. BENNETT. Then there will be $400 for the salary of a caretaker, an allowance, at a low estimate, of $100 a year for repairs, and so we are erecting a building at a cost of $1,200 a year to the people of Canada, when, as the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Bain) stated, the Government could easily in the same town obtain suitable premises for $100 or $200 a year. This is simply a bribe to the constituency. This is a monstrous and disgraceful job—if the Minister of Trade and Commerce will allow me to borrow his words—and it is all the more disgraceful because there has been an enormous amount of looting of the treasury going on in the different departments—to borrow the language of the Postmaster General. The Minister of Trade and Commerce will remember that this is the constituency in which the member-elect traded his membership in the House for a position on the bench.

Mr. BENNETT.

An hon. MEMBER. Tide waiter.

Mr. BENNETT. Oh, that was simply a waiting spell for him, a kind of purgatory he was put through to fit him for better things. Where is this going to stop? Every other member on that side will want a post office.

An hon. MEMBER. Every other Minister.

Mr. BENNETT. But there are no more Ministers to be satisfied. The Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden) has his post office, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is to have his, and what is to be done for the rank and file from the province of Nova Scotia. These gentlemen will say to the Ministers: covered as you are by all the prestige of Ministers of the Crown, surely you cannot expect us to carry our ridings without a post office, and especially since you yourselves began the looting of the public treasury. I ask the Minister of Public Works if he will now give us assurance that no more public buildings will be erected in Nova Scotia?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Oh, no.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am very sorry to hear that my hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) and those around him make so much opposition to the very small grants that this Government is giving to the fair province of Nova Scotia.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We do not want to be unfair. Other provinces of this great Dominion have been so well treated by the late Government that this Government intends to be fair to Nova Scotia. It happens for the time being that Queen's County is very well represented indeed. It is not a crime for a county to be represented by a Minister, and it is no reason why it should be excluded from public favours. If my hon. friends were fair they would admit that they erected many public buildings and post offices. I quite agree with the view that we should not build public buildings in too many small towns, for, as Minister of Public Works, I see every day that these buildings cost us a great deal of money. On the other hand, while being economical, we must be fair and just. A public building costing $10,000 or $15,000 will be looked upon by a town of 2,000 or 3,000 people as a great public favour. It seems to me that on this occasion my hon. friends are a little unfair. Nearly every county represented by a supporter of the late Government was given a public building. I say again, I do not think we should build too many of these public buildings.

Mr. FOSTER. How many, for instance ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Just enough to be fair.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am, of course, not opposing this vote for Liverpool ; but the Minister of Finance represents two important towns in his riding, Liverpool is the shire town of Queen's, and Shelburne is the shire town of the other half of his riding, and I want to know what about Shelburne ? Was there no pressure for a public building there ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Everything comes to one who knows how to wait.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman tell me whether that has been pressed on his attention ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I will give it my best consideration.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. Minister said that the lot was 100 feet by 60 feet. Which is the frontage ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I understand that it is a corner lot.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Where is it ? The Minister of Finance can tell.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It is on the Main street of Liverpool. It is a corner lot.

Mr. HUGHES. How many streets in the place ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Oh, many.

Mr. BENNETT. As the hon. gentleman is going to erect a building at a place where he can rent suitable premises for $100 a year, and is going to place against that an annual expenditure of $1,200 a year, let it be remembered that there are a great many towns in the province of Ontario of much greater importance than Liverpool ; and as the Minister of Public Works has announced that the policy of justice is to be carried out, I hope he will be just all round. But we may take this consolation, that after all the tales of blue ruin which we have heard in a wayside country village in Nova Scotia land is worth $26 a foot, which is not bad considering all we have been told about the depression that has existed in that part of the Dominion.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Who owns the lot ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think it belongs to what is called the Rees estate.

Mr. McMILLAN. With regard to the building of this post office, I wish to say that the town of Seaforth in my riding has a population of over 3,000, and the postal revenue is $4,800 or $4,900. Last year application was made for a new post office, and we could not get it. The postmaster had to repair the post office at an expense of $1,500, and all he gets for rent, light and fuel is $200 a year. I hold that it is an injustice to build post offices in small places like this, and let places like Seaforth stand aside.

Mr. BENNETT. I think all on this side of the House can come to the assistance of the hon. member who has just taken his seat, and point out the great injustice which the riding he represents is suffering under. The postal revenue of the town of Seaforth is in round numbers $5,000, while that of Liverpool is $2,200. The riding the hon. member represents is a riding that deserves a great deal of consideration at the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite, particularly from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). When that hon. gentleman was once driven by a relentless fate out of a riding, I think the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) vacated his seat, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce found there temporarily a resting place for his feet.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Which foot ?

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman always lights on both feet. But there is one town of Ontario which deserves a great deal of consideration, especially from the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson). A few years ago that hon. Minister was hard pressed in an election in North Grey, and among the many promises he made on that occasion, one was that the town of Owen Sound should have a post office. Let me call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the fact that while this little town of Liverpool, with a revenue of $2,200, is to have a magnificent post office building, the town of Owen Sound, which accepted the Minister of Customs when he had been spurned in his own riding has an income of nearly $12,000, and has no post office building. Let me appeal to the hon. Minister of Public Works whether he thinks it right, under these circumstances, that Owen Sound should be disregarded, while Liverpool is selected for this favour. May I ask him if he will consider the claims of Owen Sound? I know that it is diffidence and bashfulness on the part of the Minister of Customs that prevents him from asking, and so in his interest I would ask that the promise be kept in the Supplementary Estimates.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. What I said a moment ago applies to Owen Sound as to every other place: everything comes to those who know how to wait. There is already a large Government expenditure at Owen Sound, and it will no doubt be all right in time.

Mr. BENNETT. The diffidence of hon. gentlemen opposite compels me to come to the assistance of some of them. I know it is only due to their innate bashfulness that they have not asked for grants. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has in his constituency the large and flourishing town of Mount Forest, with a postal revenue of $4,400. Is that to be cast to one side, when Liverpool, with an income of $2,000, is to have a post office?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If my hon. friend and those who surround him advise me to put in the Supplementary Estimates a vote for every town in Quebec, Ontario and the other provinces, I shall be very glad indeed to meet their wishes.

Mr. BENNETT. No, but we are asking that the most deserving cases should be met.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Will my hon. friend give me a list of those?

Mr. BENNETT. We are asking particularly on behalf of gentlemen who, but for their modesty, would ask it themselves. Since the hon. Minister will not promise anything this year, I would ask him to take a note for next year of Owen Sound, Seaforth, and, last but not least, Mount Forest, and keep them before him.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Has the hon. gentleman done anything in connection with the buildings destroyed by fire in Windsor, N.S.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We are repairing the walls and intend asking for tenders for the balance of the work. As to the drill shed, we propose to rebuild it, and the item will be in the Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. McMULLEN. As far as Nova Scotia is concerned, there appears to have been a weakness in past years, on the part of Ministers from that province, in seeking to get special grants for their own ridings. I notice that the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) did everything he could to get post offices in his riding. He got New Glasgow a post office that cost $37,000, when the revenue was insignificant. He got one built in Pictou that cost over $20,000. He certainly exercised all the influence he could, whether just or unjust, to get public buildings in his own riding. I hope that we have put an end to the hawking around for political purposes of public buildings, and that we will follow up the principle which we laid down last year when we turned over a new leaf. As far as my riding is concerned, the people are patriotic enough and patient enough, and have sufficient confidence in the present Government to wait until their turn comes to get a post office. I am grateful to the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) for drawing attention to the fact that the revenue has largely increased in Mount Forest, and I believe it will get a post office when the time comes. I hope that the principle which was laid down last session will be carried out. We came to a definite understanding then, and while I am willing that the items now proposed should pass, I am quite sure they will be the last of this kind.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) reminded me—I am very glad he did—of a portion of the county of Pictou which deserves a great deal of consideration and will press upon the hon. Minister of Public Works, in the strongest manner possible, the consideration of Westville. It is one of the most important mining centres in Nova Scotia, and a very large amount of business is done there. I do not know what the postal returns are, but the hon. Minister of Customs will know; he has had to appoint extra officers in connection with the port of New Glasgow, especially at Westville, owing to the great development of business at that point.

Mr. HUGHES. I might take this opportunity of drawing the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the fact that in the riding I have the honour to represent, there is a village as large and thrifty as Liverpool, whose postal revenue is as large, and which has not got a new post office. I refer to the village of Fenelon Falls, which is very much in need of a post office, and I trust that when the Supplementary Estimates come down—or possibly we could wait another year—the hon. Minister will give this place his serious consideration and have a post office erected there.

Mr. POPE. I am very glad that the hon. Minister of Public Works has asked hon. gentlemen on this side to furnish him with opportunities for constructing public buildings. As it is well known that he is our representative in the Government, having been selected to represent in the Cabinet the Conservative element of this country, he has done nothing more than I should have expected of him, and it is with great pleasure I find that not only outside but inside the House he is true to the position he occupies, and we have the right to expect something from him. He is asking us to do a thing that I do not think he can wish us to do too long, and that is to wait. He says that all things come to him who waits. Now, our leader in the Government (Hon. Mr. Tarte) did not wait until all things came to him, but went and met those things, and as a result of the meeting, he finds himself favourably situated on the other side. Under the circumstances, I would like to represent to him the claims of the town of Megantic in Compton—a very important flourishing place, the last town on the Canadian Pacific Railway, towards the State of Maine, and having a large customs business. I am sure that these people would be pleased to have a public building, and I think it is in the public interest that a building should be constructed there. But I must take exception to the hon. Minister's saying that it is not a crime to belong to the Ministry. I am beginning to think, when the places mentioned to-night, whose representatives are in the Cabinet, are preferred to the places of greater importance, represented by supporters of the Government, there must be a little crime attached to a Cabinet portfolio. The pleasant little scoff which the hon. Minister casts at this side about dealing in small matters, should have been addressed to his own colleagues. The quotations given from the speeches of the Postmaster General and the Minister of Trade and Commerce should have impressed themselves upon the mind of the Minister of Public Works, and instead of looking at us, he should have cast his eyes on his colleagues and have severely punished them, in some way or other, for having put him in this awkward position. I think also that the member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) now that the Minister of Public Works has intimated that he intends to continue his good work from time to time, that he intends to listen to the appeals made by his supporters on this side of the House, as they offer names of towns worthy of consideration, the hon. member for North Wellington must see that his future is not a happy and a bright one on the other side. And he must expect, from time to time, to face, as a supporter of the Government the same issue that he had to face when he was on this side of the House. And, while he says—and no doubt he is frank and honest in all his utterances—that he is prepared to support this particular item because he believes it to be the last, it is to be noted that he said that before the Minister of Public Works took the House into his confidence and asked us to give him the names of places which could be favourably considered for public buildings. Under these circumstances, I do not see any comfortable resting place for the hon. member for North Wellington on the other side of the House. And as there is a disposition on this side to accept anything and everything that the Government is willing to give us, I do not see that there is any chance for him to come to this side. Therefore, while we should all regret to see the hon. gentleman leave the House, I do not see any future for him in politics, unless he can find some comfortable quarters, at Regina let us say, where he can rest until all the public buildings are constructed and the Minister of Public Works has rewarded his friends on this side of the House as he has promised to do. Of course, for the remainder of the session we will draw it very mild for the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) and endeavour to squirm him through. But we can hardly promise, when so prominent a man as the Minister of Public Works has promised to consider cases we lay before him, to make things quite to suit the hon. gentleman, and I am sure, we should all regret to see him occupy an uncomfortable seat. Again, I wish to impress on the Minister of Public Works the importance of the town of Megantic and to express the hope that I may see in the Supplementary Estimates an appropriation for a building there second to none outside the large cities.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am sure I am grateful to the hon. gentleman for his sympathetic reference to myself. I endeavoured to do my duty when I was on that side of the House, and I shall endeavour to do the same on this side. With regard to the town my hon. friend (Mr. Pope) has made his appeal for, I do not find the name of Megantic in the post office list at all. The hon. member for Picton makes an appeal on behalf of a town in his riding, the postal receipts of which are a little over $1,700, and yet he is lecturing the Finance Minister for having asked for the erection of a post office in Liverpool, where the receipts are over $2,000. But I do not find any information about the town of Megantic, not even the name.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Agnes is the name on the list.

Mr. McMULLEN. Turning to the figures for Agnes post office, I find that the receipts reached the magnificent total of $671.90.

Mr. FOSTER. There is a good chance for growth there.

Mr. McMULLEN. A very good chance. I think we have an understanding as regards this matter now, and I hope the item will be carried.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I should like to remind the hon. member for North Wellington of one thing with reference to what he said concerning New Glasgow. The customs revenue of New Glasgow last year was $24,913. In Liverpool, for which the hon. gentleman is now assisting the Finance Minister to obtain a public building, the customs revenue was $4,704.

Mr. FLINT. But how about Westville ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Westville would be considerably in advance of Liverpool, though I do not wish to prejudice the claim of that town. I am supporting, as well as I can, this praiseworthy effort of the Minister of Finance to get a public building for Liverpool. But I venture to tell the hon. gentleman that this method of criticism will lead him into all sorts of trouble. I would suggest that he should adopt a better method than a mere quotation of these returns. For instance, Westville had a postal revenue of only $1,700. But the customs receipts come high, and it is not merely a post office that Westville wants, but a place to accommodate the Customs Department, the inland revenue, the post office, &c. Kentville shows up well with a custom revenue of over $19,000 for last year.

Mr. McALISTER. Claims have been made on behalf of a number of towns where post offices have not yet been built, and I think I can justly put in a claim for the town of Campbellton, as it is a more important town than a number of those named. We find that in Kentville last year the gross post office revenue was $4,659, and the total amount of money orders issued $23,456. The gross postal revenue in Liverpool was $2,202.06, and the money orders issued $20,394.40. I find that there is an appropriation for a post office in Montmagny, in the province of Quebec, where the gross postal revenue was only $1,750.54, and the money orders issued $10,215.90. Now, in the town of Campbellton in the county of Restigouche, which I have the honour to represent, the gross postal revenue was $3,377.86 last year, and the money orders issued $31,532.42. Now, if it is going to be the policy of the Government to have post offices erected in these places—a policy I do not pretend to criticise at all—I think that, taking all the circumstances into consideration the town of Campbellton should have an appropriation for a public office. The Minister of Public Works said that everything came to him who waited. I can do nothing but wait patiently, but I would ask the Minister of Public Works to take it into his favourable consideration, and if he cannot put the town of Campbellton an appropriation in the Supplementary Estimates this year, let it appear in the Main Estimates next year.

Mr. POPE. The hon. member for North Wellington has asked me to discover the post office in my county. Of course he will understand without the use of a geography or anything like that, I would know the location of the most important town in my own county. He speaks of the post office of Agnes, which is a little village across the river in the county of Beauce, but practically a part of the town of Lake Megantic. The post office of Lake Megantic is separate from that of Agnes, but if a public building were erected at Megantic one post office would supply both places, as they are separated only by a narrow river. Lake Megantic is a growing town.

I am astonished that after the effort that has been made on this side of the House to make the hon. member for North Wellington feel comfortable in the position he occupies, he should take an opportunity to prejudice the Minister of Public Works against the town of Lake Megantic. That town is not as large as the city of Montreal, but it is a growing place, a great centre, and has a great future before it, in fact, it is the largest town in my county. Being an old personal friend and of course an old political friend of the Minister of Public Works, I felt that I could depend upon his favourable consideration for this town.

Mr. POWELL. The fact occurred to me this evening that the first time I had the pleasure of listening to hon. gentlemen in this House was in 1891, when an estimate for the Farnham post office was under discussion. I remember particularly the very bold stand taken by the present leading Government whip, by the present Minister of Justice, by the present Minister of Customs, and I must say I was thoroughly in sympathy with the arguments that they adduced. I remember how this room fairly rang with denunciations of Tory corruption and attempts to bribe constituencies. The first speaker on that occasion, I find by "Hansard," in leading the attack, was the present member for North Wellington:

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the amount of the receipts?

Mr. FOSTER. The postal revenue is about $2,000.

The hon. member for North Wellington led off in the attack, and his language was vigorous indeed. He says, as reported on page 6202:

I have not lost an opportunity since I have become a member of this House to draw its attention to the impropriety of erecting public buildings at places where the revenues are so exceedingly limited as they are at the town which my hon. friend represents.

I ask the House to remember that the revenue of the Farnham post office was about the same as that of the Liverpool post office. He goes on to say:

He says it has increased in population. I am glad that it has, and I am sorry so many towns have decreased. But the point at issue is not the increase of population but the respective business to be done. There are a hundred places in Canada where the money order transactions are four or five times what they are at this place, where the revenues are three times greater, where the rent paid is more than double, and where there are no post office buildings. Will hon. gentlemen opposite explain why this discrimination is made? My hon. friend says it is not for political purposes. I would like to know then what it is for—why the Government have thought it wise, out of the whole Dominion, to select the little town of Farnham and decide to build a post office there ?

Afterwards the present Minister of Customs spoke strongly indeed. One paragraph I will quote, referring to the estimate for the Farnham post office. He said :

But votes such as this are sure to call forth comment when places in my constituency, and notably in the constituency of Oxford, are found unprovided with public buildings, though their claims are much greater than many places to which public buildings are given. The Government do not act on principles of equity, and leave their conduct open to the imputation that it is governed by other motives than a desire to promote the public welfare.

The present Government whip also spoke very vigorously and very well :

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am bound to accept the statement of the hon. member for Missisquoi that he had nothing to do with the obtaining of the grant, but that it was given on the petition of the Board of Trade and council of the town. But a few sessions ago this House adopted unanimously, with the consent of the Government, a resolution laying down the principle that appropriations for the erection of public buildings should depend on the amount of revenue derived.

But the gentleman who, I think, indulged in language the most vigorous, was the present Minister of Justice. He says in the course of his speech :

There are scores of places in this country where more revenue is collected, and where it would be of much greater importance to expend this money. In many places where these buildings are put up they will require caretakers, and so on, adding to the public expense, and enormously increasing the fixed expenditure without any corresponding increase in the revenue, and this is one of these places. There are places where large amounts of revenue are collected, and where it is important that public buildings should be erected in the public interest, but this is not one of those places. I say the Administration are not keeping faith with this House; they are disregarding the principle laid down in this House, without a single dissentient voice, for the guidance of the Administration, and acquiesced in by the members of the Administration, and this House ought not to allow this item to pass without the Government taking the responsibility of asking the House to repeal the resolution adopted twelve months ago. I say, Sir, that the hon. gentlemen cannot go on in this kind of way. The day of boodling, and of commissions, and this attempting to bribe constituencies with their own money, has gone by. We can no longer tolerate it.

Again he says :

These public expenditures are made out of the moneys of the people of this country, and not out of the moneys belonging to the Administration. The hon. gentlemen sitting on the Treasury benches are the trustees of the people, and it is our business to see that that trust is fairly administered, and that the scales of justice are held evenly between all classes of the population of this country.

And again :

This policy they are pursuing now can no longer be sustained, and the people of this country shall hear of it from one end of it to the other, until these hon. gentlemen either reform their policy or retire from the positions which they occupy. They must remember that they are the trustees of the people of this country, that the moneys they are expending are not their own moneys, but moneys which belong to the people. We find large places, where there are thousands of dollars of revenue collected yearly, that are left without proper office accommodation, because they are in constituencies represented by Reformers in this House and here we find a constituency carried by the hon. gentleman from Missisquoi (Mr. Baker), in which there is a small village, and a post office yielding a revenue of a little over $1,800 a year, which is to be provided with a public building, entailing a large expense upon the people of this country, simply because it happens to be in a constituency that he represents, or that may be pretty close between the two parties.

These remarks apply particularly to the constituency of Shelburne. The reason a post office is asked is, as we know, because it is a close constituency, and represented by the Minister of Finance, who desires to entrench himself in the affections of the people. Now, the hon. member for North Wellington went further on that occasion, and read a very long list to the House of towns having a larger postal revenue than Farnham, and which were not provided with a public building. He considered it a crying evil that all these places should be passed over, and gave some of the names and I quote them :

Take Alexandria, for instance, in the county of Glengarry, which returns $2,291.06 of receipts; in Almonte, county of Lanark, the receipts are $4,176.26; Amherstburg, Essex, $2,000.34; Arnprior, $3,581; Aurora, $2,258; Aylmer West, $4,201; Blenheim, $2,529; Bowmanville, $4,745; Brussels, $2,541; Campbellford, $3,298; Carleton Place, $4,359; Chelsea, $2,613; Colborne, $2,911; Clinton, $4,541; Collingwood, $5,822; Deseronto, $4,142; Dresden, $2,278; Dunnville, $3,028; Durham, $2,066; Elora, $2,235; Essex Centre, $3,271; Exeter, $2,106; Forest, $2,574; Gananoque, $5,041; Glencoe, $2,335; Gravenhurst, $2,302; Harriston, $3,092; Hespeler, $2,393; Huntsville, $2,187; Ingersoll, $3,556; Iroquois, $2,056; Kincardine, $4,135; Leamington, $2,716; Lindsay, $8,091; Listowel, $4,129; Lucknow, $2,349; Madoc, $2,169; Mattawa, $2,895; Meaford, $3,500; Midland, $2,438; Milton West, $2,370; Mitchell, $3,314; Morrisburg, $3,888; Mount Forest, $3,902; Newmarket, $3,441; North Bay, $2,919; Norwich, $2,244; Norwood, $2,134; Oakville, $2,364; Oshawa, $5,433; Owen Sound, $9,625; Paisley, $2,777; Paris, $2,661; Parkdale, $5,268; Parkhill, $2,850; Petrolia, $6,113; Port Arthur, 4,972; Port Elgin, $2,181; Port Perry, $2,805; Prescott, $4,811; Preston, $2,156; Rat Portage, $2,075; Renfrew, $3,804; St. Mary's, $5,850; Sarnia, $8,505; Sault Ste. Marie, $3,548; Shelburne, $2,357; Simcoe, $5,139; Smith's Falls, $6,023; Sudbury, $2,844; Thorold, $2,854; Tilsonburg, $4,174; Uxbridge, $3,526; Trenton, $5,011; Wallaceburg, $2,831; Waterloo West, $4,263; Watford, $2,479; Welland, $3,343; West Toronto Junction, $3,420 ; Whitby, $4,235 ; Wingham, $3,976 ; Woodstock, $15,423 ; Yorkville, $6,277.

Only three or four out of that long list of sixty or seventy places have been supplied with post offices, and each and every one has a larger revenue than the post office at Liverpool; so all the remarks of the present Minister of Justice apply particularly at this point. It had been hoped that the period of these extravagances had gone by, I do not hesitate to reflect on the record of the Conservative party when I feel that that record deserves censure. In New Brunswick there was a post office building erected in Sussex, which should never have been built, and another one in the town of Dalhousie, represented by my hon. friend from the county, and I have no hesitation in saying that that post office should not have been erected, although the revenue is, I believe, nearly as large as that of Liverpool. The reason I object to these votes—and I propose to take the opinion of the House on this matter at a later stage—is that such are useless expenditures of public money. Take this post office, and what do we find? We all know there has been a large deficit in the Post Office Department, and probably there will continue to be a deficit for some time to come. Here is a post office that afforded a net revenue in aid of the public service of \$1,158 ; and what do hon. gentlemen propose to do? They propose to cut down the net revenue to a little in excess of \$100. How is that to be done? The salaries are \$780. The very first thing done after the erection of a large building is to increase the salary of the postmaster. I will say nothing about that. He now receives \$63.50 as commission on the money order business done there. Then there will be charges for heating, lighting and caretaking, \$400. In addition there will be interest on the money at 3 per cent. \$480. Then there must be an allowance, for instance, $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent which is very low, \$75. Altogether the charges against the revenue of that office will be \$2,098.76, making those allowances, which are very reasonable. Simply by the action of the Minister of Finance this amount, in round numbers, \$1,100, will be practically swept away, and this post office, which is supposed to contribute to make up the deficits occurring in adjoining country districts, will not do so, and be very little more than self-sustaining. At present the total charges against the post office are \$973, as against the total revenue of \$2,278. We all know the kind of place Liverpool is. There is no necessity for the proposed expensive public building. If the hon. gentleman were true to his trust, if he had the idea which the present Minister of Justice entertains, that this is a sacred trust and should be administered in the public interest and economically, the Finance Minister would not ask this appropriation. The present rental of the post office building at Liverpool is \$80. Let the hon. gentleman add to that sum \$120 or \$125, so as to give a total rental of \$200. A proposition of this kind has been made by the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Bain). For that sum a magnificent building, in view of the size of the place, could be rented, and we could retain \$1,000 of surplus revenue. I will mention a place of equal importance in my own county, Shediac. For \$100 the department rents a very nice flat in a brick building, and that sum covers fuel and rent. In Sackville, where there is a very large revenue collected compared with Liverpool, there was an agitation for the erection of a post office building, but I did not favour the proposition and protested against the expenditure of public money on the ground that it would be wasteful to expend the required expenditure until there was a revenue of \$5,000 or \$6,000 and a population of between 5,000 and 6,000 souls. The present proposal before the committee is thoroughly unjustifiable, and hon. members who decried this policy year after year when in Opposition must feel that it is against public policy to make such expenditures. No doubt they decried against these expenditures honestly, and they should not now allow themselves to be dragged in to support this proposal because the hon. Finance Minister wants to boom himself in his own constituency. A man occupying the position of the Finance Minister should be able to carry a constituency without being bolstered up by such an extravagant grant. When the proper time arrives I propose to divide the House on this item. We will take the yeas and nays now.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I declare the ayes have it.

Marysville, N.B., public building..... $8,000

Mr. COPP. What is the population and revenue?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The population is 1,339 ; I have not particulars of the revenue. It is a very interesting town and has a large factory.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. What county is that in?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is in York County, which is very well represented indeed by the ex-Minister of Finance.

Mr. FOSTER. Since the question has been asked, perhaps the Minister will tell what the arrangement is with reference to that. It is not a $16,000 building ; it is an $8,000 building.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The difficulty is that while Mr. Gibson, who owns the town, is willing to give a very long lease, he has not been willing to sell a site, but all the same I have made up my mind to go on with this building.

Mr. HUGHES. What is the population of that town?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). About 1,500.

Mr. HUGHES. Is it near Fredericton.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. About two miles.

Mr. HUGHES. A little too far to walk.

Montmagny post office, customs office, &c. $7,500

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I beg to move that this item be struck out altogether.

Mr. BENNETT. There will be an election there soon.

Mr. FOSTER. Who represents the county of Montmagny?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Mr. Choquette. The whole thing is settled now.

Mr. FOSTER. How settled?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. A building and site were bought for $5,000 and it will cost $2,000 to fit it up for a public building, so the whole amount will be spent by the 1st of July, and I ask that the item be struck out.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no extra vote?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No.

Mr. HUGHES. Is the member for the county satisfied to have this struck out?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. All our friends are satisfied.

Mr. BENNETT. $7,500 were voted last year for this post office. Does the Minister tell the House that no part of that will be expended?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Quite the reverse. The $7,500 voted last year will be spent by the 1st of July, and it is not necessary to ask for any vote this year.

Mr. BENNETT. How was that money expended?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We bought a building for $5,000, and it will require $2,500 to refit it. The whole amount, but no more, will be spent.

Mr. BENNETT. Last year there was quite a discussion in respect to this post office, and I think I am correct in saying that the Minister promised that no portion of the vote would be spent on the purchase of a building that was then erected. Was the building purchased, the one referred to last year, by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) as a building that a mortgage was on?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The building we bought belonged to the Seminary of Quebec, and I may say that we have made an arrangement by which this new public building will not cost us a cent, because the town of Montmagny has agreed to take care of it.

Mr. FOSTER. To take care of its maintenance?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We will not have a dollar to pay for care-taking, and that is a good arrangement.

Mr. BENNETT. I was incorrect in my recollection of the matter. The following took place:

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If I do not buy a building I will certainly not spend one dollar more than I am asking now.

The amount asked for was $7,500. Now, the Minister has bought the building for $5,000, and he proposes to spend $2,500 more on it. If there is one case more glaring than another it is this one. Would it not be in the public interest that this building should be sold even at a sacrifice—because from the discussion that took place last year it appears that this building could not be sold for more than $3,000—rather than the country should spend $2,500 more to patch up an old building, which, as stated last year by a gentleman familiar with the place, is only a cottage.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The building referred to then was not the same as the building we have purchased.

Mr. BENNETT. That makes the case all the better for my argument because I assume it a much better building has been purchased and the Government will likely get a better price when they sell it. Here we are spending $7,500 for a post office in what is certainly an out-of-the-way place, where the postal revenue is only $1,750, and the population only 1,700. A little while ago, as a result of some remarks made in the House, we succeeded in making some converts. The hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Bain) spoke strong against the expenditure at Liverpool; the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) also demurred to that expenditure; and we had the assurance of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) that if we had not his vote with us, we at least had his heart. When I appeal to them in this case, which is a much stronger case, I think we should have the support of hon. gentlemen opposite, and have this item struck out of the Estimates altogether.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That is just what I am asking. I want it to be struck out. I am glad to have my hon. friend as my seconder.

Mr. BENNETT. We want the Minister to go a little further and give us his assurance that he will not expend that $2,500.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I cannot do that; it is gone.

Mr. BENNETT. If we did not succeed in making all hon. gentlemen opposite converts, we at least attained some appreciable results, for I notice that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) has quit the Chamber, no doubt because he saw looming up ahead of him this case, which was less defensible than the other. When I last addressed the House and made a convert of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, another Minister was not in the House whom I am pleased to see here now; and I trust that the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) will not weaken on these strong words which he addressed to the House in 1892; and I am bound to say that every time he did address the House in denunciation of public expenditures his speeches were models of excellence, particularly in point of invective. Speaking on the Laprairie case, which was on all-fours with the present one, the Postmaster General said:

I ask the Minister of Public Works if he can stand up before the people and say that he considers this public work in Laprairie is necessary in the public interest? I pause for a reply.

I pause for a reply to ask if it is in the public interest that there should be this large expenditure made at this little village of Montmagny. Allow me to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that while he is voting away thousands of dollars for the erection of public buildings in these little places, the large towns of Aurora in his own riding, with postal receipts of $2,682, is without a public building, and the large town of Newmarket, also in his own riding, with postal receipts of $3,315 and a population of 2,150, is without a post office building, while this large expenditure is made at this little village of 1,700 people with paltry postal receipts of $1,750. But the Postmaster General went on, and the further he went the stronger his language got:

I say it is history repeating itself; and whatever the people of Quebec may say who get this work, I, from the province of Ontario, if I stand alone, will protest against this malversation of public money. I say it is a gross crime against our people to place the great spending department of our country in the hands of a Minister who has the audacity to ask Parliament to give him money for a work which he cannot defend, and the time has come when his record is a fair subject of criticism.

I ask the Postmaster General what he thinks of his colleague to-day, who is making an expenditure as bad as that for Laprairie was then, when he stated that the then Minister of Public Works was indulging in malversation. Further on, he said:

The time has come before this Parliament to withdraw its confidence from a Minister whose record alone ought to have prevented his being selected for the office, and whose present record in office is sufficient to demand his early expulsion.

Mr. BENNETT.

I ask the Minister of Public Works to note these words, because there may be a conspiracy hatched against him. The Postmaster General will never go back on anything he has said, I am sure, and he stated a few years ago that the time had arrived when the Minister of Public Works should be expelled from the Cabinet, because he indulged in an expenditure similar to what the present Minister of Public Works is indulging in. I warn the Minister of Public Works to beware of the Postmaster General, because Cassius-like, he may stab him in the back.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS.
He is not so bad as that.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, he felt strongly on this before, and we have no reason to suppose that he will change his mind. He said:

I say that if there is one representative from the province of Ontario who gives this matter honest consideration, and feels that he is bound at some time or other to justify it before the country, let him raise his voice now, before it is too late and aid in stemming this tide of wastefulness which is setting in. We were promised, when this Government was formed, that they would reform and serve the public honestly, and that everything would be pure and right in their administration. The country especially the province of Ontario, took them at their word, and gave them its confidence. They succeeded in getting an overwhelming majority at their back and since then, intoxicated with power, they have thrown aside all regard for decency, and have plunged their hands to the arm-pits into the public treasury. There is not a Minister of the Crown to-day, from the Minister of Justice down, who raises his voice before this Parliament in defence of the country, but, one and all, they seem to be engaged in the crime of looting the treasury.

This is the language of the Postmaster General, and we can believe that language like wine improves with age. Here we have the statement of two hon. gentlemen who are now members of the Cabinet—first, the Postmaster General, that a case exactly like the present one was a looting of the public treasury—

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It was a good deal worse.

Mr. BENNETT. I cannot see very much difference. I think this case is equally bad. But here is the position of these hon. gentlemen. The Postmaster General said six years ago that an action of this kind was the looting of the public treasury, and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce who, fearful that this was going to come up, moved out of the Chamber a little while ago, characterized such a proceeding as a most monstrous and disgraceful job. Well, this is just as bad as the late Laprairie case. If it was true that in the Laprairie case the treasury was being looted by the hon. gentlemen who then sat on the Treasury benches, there is no difference between them, and these hon. gentlemen opposite, who then made such blatant professions of honesty, now, intoxicated with power, have thrown their professions to the winds, and, with an utter disregard of decency, parade themselves before the public as the looters of the public treasury of to-day.

Mr. HUGHES. Is this building conveniently situated in Montmagny ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is situated in the very centre of the town. The site was chosen by the Deputy Minister himself.

Mr. HUGHES. Will it be given up entirely to the Government ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It has been agreed, so as to save the cost of a caretaker, that the town council shall have the use of two rooms, and we are to have the balance. I think that is a very good arrangement indeed. I wish I could make the same arrangement everywhere, because these public buildings cost a great deal for caretakership, fuel, and so on.

Mr. HUGHES. Is the agreement in writing with the town council to that effect ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES. For how many years ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. For all time.

Mr. BENNETT. Have there been any appointments made in the past year as caretakers of public buildings in any of the provinces ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. BENNETT. What is the uniform salary ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I try my best to decrease them but have not been able to do so each time. There is an item of $70,000 for this, which will come up for discussion later.

Mr. HUGHES. What was the building used for previously ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The room that will be occupied by the town council was used in the town council meetings. In the past the building was used as a town hall.

Mr. FOSTER. From whom did the hon. gentleman buy it ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. From the seminary of Quebec, after a great deal of trouble and negotiations.

Mr. BENNETT. How was the valuation fixed ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My deputy conducted the negotiations, and tells me that two prominent contractors of Montmagny made the valuation.

Item struck out.

Resolutions to be reported.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12 o'clock (midnight).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 9th May, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

GANANOQUE DRILL SHED.

Mr. TAYLOR. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to bring before the House a matter of considerable importance to myself and of some importance to the country, and in order to put myself right, I will conclude with a motion. I may say at the outset that a few days ago when discussing the tariff I made some reference to the composition of the Cabinet, pointing out that it was composed of lawyers with the exception of one or two business men, and a doctor, no doubt, of standing in his own profession.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must be careful not to refer to a previous debate.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am not referring to a previous debate further than to say this. I had asked certain questions, which I proposed to read with the Minister's reply, and in his reply the Minister diagnosed the case. To-day I propose to dissect the case, and ascertain if the diagnosis was correct. I moved for a return, and it was brought down. I have the return, and I wish the Government to understand that so far as I am concerned as a member of the Opposition, I propose to obtain a full return when asked for. I think it is due to the Opposition that, when a return is asked for, it should be brought down in full, and members of the Government must not expect to get their Estimates through if they fail to bring down full returns when ordered. I have received the return which I propose to read before I conclude, and from it I will prove conclusively that certain papers are not included in it. No doubt the papers have been held back because if they had been brought down they would have convicted the Government. The questions I submitted were asked, in my absence on 14th February, as follows:—

(a) Has the Government removed the drill shed at Gananoque from the site sold to the town for the purpose of a high school?

(b) Did the Government give the town a deed of the site for the sum of a thousand dollars?

(c) Has the town paid for the said site; if so, when?

(d) Did the Government promise to remove the drill shed within a reasonable time?

(e) Is the Government aware that the High School is greatly inconvenienced by the non-removal of the building?

(f) Was part of the drill shed taken down to enable the High School building to be erected in 1895?

(g) What disposition was made by the Government of the lumber and timber of that part of the building that was taken down—was it sold by tender—who was the purchaser—how much did the Government get for it—or is the report true that it was given away to one of the Government supporters to repair his wharfs and buildings with?

(h) Has the Government rented a warehouse from Mr. C. E. Britton, in which to store the arms and ammunition of the volunteers force? If so, when, and for how long? What rent have they agreed to pay for the said warehouse?

(i) Has the Government purchased a new drill shed site from Mr. J. B. Turner? If so, what price did they pay for it? How much land does the site contain?

(j) Was the said C. E. Britton the defeated candidate for the House of Commons in the general elections of 1882 and 1887? Was the said J. B. Turner the defeated candidate for the House of Commons in the general election of 1891?

(k) Was the renting of the warehouse from Mr. Britton and the purchase of the drill-shed site from Mr. Turner, to in part recoup them for their election expenses?

The Minister's reply was as follows:—

(a) Not entirely. A sufficient part has been removed to enable the High School building to be erected. (b) The title deed in favour of the corporation was sent to Geo. Taylor, Esq., M.P., on the 27th December, 1895, to be transmitted to the corporation. (c) Yes. By deposit receipt, received 16th November, 1895. (d) Yes, or rather the town council (on 4th July, 1895) agreed to "permit the remainder of the drill shed to remain on the present site for a reasonable time." (e) It is stated. The inconvenience is stated, in a letter from the Mayor of Gananoque, dated 28th April, 1897, to be that "the shed stands an unsightly affair, and also endangers the school buildings from an insurance point of view." One cause of the delay is that the transfer of the land for the new site was only completed on 13th November last, and the removal of the shed was impossible before that was done. The drill shed contained arms and clothing, and the removal of these to a temporary armoury was necessary. This could not be fully effected until last month. Mr. J. B. Turner agreed some time previously to pay $200 for remainder of old shed, not already taken down, and to take it down within two weeks of purchase of new site. This could not be done until the arms, &c., had been removed from old shed. Mr. Turner has been notified that the shed is now ready for removal. (f) Yes, authority telegraphed to Mayor 9th July, Mr. TAYLOR.

1895. (g) The council (Mayor's letter of 4th July, 1895) undertook "to take down, and remove and store at our expense" the portion which was to be taken down and to "rebuild a new end to said drill hall for present purposes." Presumably the old materials were in part used to build the new end. Mr. C. E. Britton, in a letter dated 21st October, 1897, offered $20 "for that portion of the old drill shed which was torn down and stored inside and outside of the remaining portion" which then remained. On the recommendation of Lieut.-Col. Cotton, A.A.G.A., this offer was accepted. (h) Yes; the Government being under obligation to remove the remainder of the old drill shed from the site sold to the town council in 1895, and the shed not being fit to stand the strain of removal to the new site, it became necessary to secure, temporarily, a suitable building in which to store arms, &c. The Assistant Adjutant General of Artillery recommended, and the Q.M.G. approved of the building selected. Lease dated 20th September, 1897, for one year from 1st October, 1897, with right of renewal. Rent, $150 per annum; owner to put up all internal fittings required for arms, ammunition, stores and clothing, which he has done using the fittings from the old drill shed. (i) Yes. The lot was selected by the then D.O.C. of the district, now the Assistant Adjutant General of Artillery, and approved by the Q.M.G. as being the best available. The deed is for $2,500. Three lots, frontage of 60 feet each, extending back to the river—size of level portion of building about 180 feet by 95 feet. (j) I have not inquired. (k) I am informed by Col. Lake, Q.M.G., that both matters were recommended by the District Officer Commanding and himself without any suggestions from the department, or outside, and without any knowledge of either Mr. Britton's or Mr. Turner's political opinions. From the inception of the negotiations, which were begun in 1894-95, between the town council of Gananoque and the late Government, as a result of which the country has been compelled to buy a new site for a drill shed there, one Geo. Taylor, of Gananoque, seems to have taken part therein. In the autumn of 1896 said Taylor strongly urged the purchase of the J. B. Turner lots, claiming that the late Government had, through a former Minister of Militia, committed the country to the purchase. He requested me to write to His Honour the Governor of Manitoba—who was the former Minister referred to—for confirmation of his statement, which I did, and, in reply, received a practical confirmation of said Taylor's statement. In view of said Taylor's presumably intimate knowledge of the matter, I respectfully refer the member for South Leeds to the said George Taylor for information as to what disposition Mr. J. B. Turner may have made of the purchase money received by him. For the further information of the House I will read a letter just received from the aforesaid J. B. Turner:

Gananoque, Feb. 12, 1898.

Hon. F. W. Borden,
Minister of Militia,
Ottawa.

Sir,—In reference to Mr. Taylor's questions in regard to who I am and in relation to the price paid for the drill shed site purchased from me by your Government, I beg to inform you that Mr. Taylor agreed to recommend the late Government to purchase the same site for the same purpose for the sum of six thousand dollars ($6,000), and he informed me that the Hon. Mr. Patterson, now Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba and late Minister of Militia, wired from Winnipeg to the present Government that he had recommended the purchase of the same site for the drill shed; all of this can be proved by the most positive evidence. I think it only right that you should be placed in possession of this information, and will be glad to substantiate it by further evidence, if necessary.

I have the honour to be,
Your obedient servant,

J. B. TURNER.

The next time this matter came before the House was on the 16th February. I was absent when the hon. Minister gave this uncalled for answer to the questions which I put on the Order paper, and on the 16th February I moved the adjournment of the House for the purpose of bringing this and another matter before the attention of Parliament. This discussion then took place:

Now in reference to the question the Prime Minister raised in answering the motion on the Order paper for papers, there is a statement made in the answer given to me that will not appear in the papers, but which is personal to myself, and I want to make a personal explanation. The question No. (j) on the paper reads as follows:—

Was the said C. E. Britton the defeated candidate for the House of Commons for the general elections of 1882 and 1887? Was the said J. B. Turner the defeated candidate for the House of Commons in the general election of 1891?

The Minister, in reply to that question, says: "I have not inquired."

Now I think there are returns made to Parliament of all the general elections. He has the information, and I think, to treat me civilly, he should have turned up the Government returns and said, I find in the returns made to the Government the names of the gentlemen.

Then there was considerable discussion, in which the Prime Minister took part, and the hon. the Speaker ruled in my favour, and I made the following statement:

Mr. TAYLOR. I purpose keeping strictly within the rules of the House. The notice on the paper calls for correspondence and has no reference to the subject I am now discussing. The answer the Minister gave me referred to something that was not in the question, neither is it in my motion calling for papers. He said:

"In view of the said Taylor's presumably intimate knowledge of the matter, I respectfully refer the hon. member for South Leeds to the said George Taylor for information as to what disposition Mr. J. B. Turner may have made of the purchase money received by him."

I claim, Mr. Speaker, that there is an insinuation here made by the Minister of Militia that Mr. Turner sold his property at a price to some person, and he refers to me as if I got a commission on it. Now if he insinuates by that reference to me that I received any commission, or that any person that I know has received any, he states something that is unfounded. I have been in this House for some fifteen years, the records of the late Government are in the hands of the hon. gentleman, and I ask for the papers for the purpose of getting the correspondence brought down to this House. They can bring down everything they have got, and they will find no reference—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must not refer to correspondence.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am not referring to correspondence, but I am asking the Government to bring down all the papers they have in their possession including communications from me to the late Government, and they will find that not a cent of the Government's money ever came from any contractor or anybody else into my hands. The Minister makes an insinuation here that I participated in the sale. He read a letter here. I ask for the correspondence. This will come down. I may just say that in the letter of Mr. Turner that he read here and that was uncalled for, there is not the shadow of a truth, for I never recommended to the late Government or anybody else that this lot should be sold for $6,000.

On the 14th March I moved for:

Copies of all correspondence between the mayor and corporation of Gananoque or any other person, with the Government in reference to the removal of the drill shed at Gananoque. Also, all correspondence in reference to the sale or purchase of a new site. Also, all offers made by the president of the Agricultural Society of Gananoque, or any other person, offering to rent or sell a suitable building in which to store the arms and clothing; and also, all other correspondence with the Government dealing with this question.

This motion was ample and broad, and included every detail of the correspondence that could or should have taken place between the Government or any person either offering to sell a site or lease a site or anything else dealing with this question. The return that I have before me ought to include all this, but as a matter of fact, it contains some papers not at all pertinent to the issue, and it does not contain many papers that should be produced; papers which to my own knowledge have been sent to the Government, and yet they have not brought them down, for reasons which the Minister must certainly explain before he can expect to get his Estimates through the House this year. I am satisfied that many hon. members of the Opposition feel as I do, that when we ask for papers, and the resolution passes the House, the Government are in duty bound to lay all the information on the Table called for in the resolution. The papers brought down here contain, first, an abstract; second, the will of the late James Turner, mixed in with an affidavit made by Mr. Peck in reference to another document that appears further on. After the will of Mr. Turner comes a portion of the lease from Mr. C. E. Britton for a building in which to store arms; a portion of it is connected at the front of the return, the balance is in the latter part of the return, and as the papers are all numbered consecutively, they evidently have not been displaced. Next comes an extract from Mr. McCommon, the clerk of Gananoque, stating that the town council had passed the resolution authorizing the purchase of the Government site for $1,000.

The only letter in the return from the late Minister of Militia (Mr. Patterson) is dated Ottawa, April 23rd, 1895, addressed to the Hon. Mr. Dickey, and is marked "private." It is as follows :

My dear Dickey,—The removal of the Gananoque drill shed to another site was urged on me more than once, and a couple of months ago I visited Gananoque to look into the matter. The town council is very anxious for the removal, and they have offered $1,000 towards a site and to help defray the expense of moving the building. I consented that the removal should be made, and I earnestly hope you will be able to carry out my promise.

Very faithfully yours,
(Sgd.) J. C. PATTERSON.

That is the only communication in the return from the ex-Minister of Militia (Mr. Patterson) ; but the present Minister (Mr. Borden), in answer to my question, stated that there was another communication, and I expected that that would be brought down. If it had been brought down it would have proved conclusively that the late Government had not promised Mr. Turner, or anybody else this $6,000, but had simply made the statement that they had agreed to purchase. The next letter is from Mr. Rogers, the chairman of the board, to myself ; the next document is an Order in Council, signed by Mr. McGee, passed on the 8th June, 1895, stating that the Government had decided to sell the site to the town of Gananoque for the sum of $1,000. The next is a letter from Mr. D. E. Sheppard, secretary of the committee, urging upon the Government to take action and carry out the agreement, so that the town school authorities might go on and erect their new building. The next is a letter from the mayor, the late Mr. O. D. Cowan, addressed to the Hon. Mr. Dickey, accepting the proposition the Government made in purchasing the site, and allowing the building to remain on the ground for a short time. The next is a telegram from Mr. C. B. Rogers, chairman of the board, asking the Minister of Militia, the Hon. Mr. Dickey, to telegraph to Mr. Mackenzie, the officer in charge, that a portion of the building might be taken down. The next is a letter from Colonel Panet, Deputy Minister of Militia, addressed to the Deputy Minister of Justice, authorizing the sale for $1,000. The next is a letter from Colonel Percy Lake, stating :

The Minister has decided that the corporation of Gananoque may be allowed to carry out their proposal to remove a portion of the drill shed, as stated in the mayor's letter of July 4th, and a telegram has been sent to the mayor to that effect. Please communicate the decision to the officer commanding the corps affected, and give the necessary orders for carrying into effect the wishes of the Minister.

The next is a letter from the department, acknowledging the receipt of $1,000 from the corporation, signed in triplicate. The next is a letter from Captain Benoit to myself transmitting the deed, and asking me to hand it over and take a receipt for it from the corporation. The next is a communication from the Department of Militia to the Department of Public Works asking for the sum of $2,500 to be placed in the Estimates for the erection of a drill shed at Gananoque. The next is a communication offering a site to the Government, as follows —

Gananoque, March 26th, 1897.

Sir,—The militia authorities, of which you are the head, require in this town a site for a drill hall.

I own two lots on Stone Street, 120 x 120 feet running to the Gananoque river, with dock. These lots are situated 400 yards to the south of the old site of the shed cut in two and partially removed by the late defunct Government.

This is the best place in the town for the drill hall, as I have spent a great deal of time and money in the past, both in the interest of the party and for the militia force.

The party late in power always looked after their own here, to my loss, and I now want a fair field and no favour in regard to this matter.

Kindly do the best you can for me.

Sincerely yours,
(Sgd.) D. E. JACKSON,
Gananoque.

The Honourable
The Minister of Militia and Defence,
Ottawa.

I may say that this is the only offer that has been brought down, though I know of several offers of sites that were made to the department. The next is a letter from Captain Benoit, acknowledging the receipt of Mr. Jackson's letter. The next is a letter from Mr. Britton, the mayor of Gananoque, dated April 28, 1897, addressed to the Minister of Militia, reciting all that has taken place, and urging the removal of the drill shed. The next is a reply from Colonel Panet acknowledging the receipt of that, and stating that Sir Richard Cartwright is acting Minister, and that he will have all the papers brought before him and inquire into the matter at once. Accordingly, he did so, and sent Colonel Cotton up to investigate and report. Colonel Cotton makes this report :

With reference to the above, I beg to report that I have again visited the site proposed.

In my opinion that marked "D" on the plan is the most eligible.

There was a plan that ought to have been brought down, showing all the sites that had been submitted, and the price of each site. Colonel Cotton refers to it. He says :

The owner, Mr. Turner, in presence of the mayor, made me the offer of this property for $2,300. Mr. Turner also agreed, in the event of the purchase of his property, to give the sum of $200 for the old shed as it now stands, and to remove it within two weeks from day of sale.

This is another statement in this report which I want the Minister to make a note of, because he referred to it in his answer to my question. I want to know if he got the $200 yet. Colonel Cotton's report continues :

The special fittings for harness, &c., &c., he agrees to take down and remove, free of cost, to any building the department may arrange to occupy as temporary quarters.

This property marked "D" has a frontage of three lots of 60 feet each on South street, and extends to the water front. There is an old wharf (in bad repair) almost the entire width (180 feet) of the property.

For 95 feet on Charles Street the ground is level enough for building purposes. At this point it slopes abruptly down to the water level, about 20 feet.

The size of the level portion for building on would be 180 x 95 feet.

I would not advise hiring or purchasing drilling rights over adjoining vacant property for the present.

(Sgd.) W. H. COTTON, Lt.-Col.

The Deputy Minister makes this note on it :

This site appears to me to be certainly the best available. I would suggest that it be approved and that the Department of Justice be requested to take the necessary steps to complete the purchase before the vote lapses—31st inst.

(Sgd.) PERCY LAKE, Col.

The next thing is a continuation of the report, dated July 26, 1897, in which Colonel Cotton says :

I have inspected the portion now remaining of this drill shed. It is unsightly and almost butts against the new school buildings. The "reasonable time" for the removal, which has apparently been promised, would seem to have expired.

Undoubtedly it is detrimental in every way to the school and church property adjoining. I would recommend immediate removal and that a building be rented for a year in which to store the field battery and infantry equipments. The present building is nearly 30 years old and is entirely of wood. The sills have greatly perished. It would be of no use re-erecting the remaining portion, as its removal would impair the material to too large an extent.

I desire, therefore, to recommend that it be disposed of by tender or sold at public auction, the purchaser to remove it within two weeks of sale. For the requirements of the school, the ground should be entirely cleared by 31st August.

If sold, the internal fittings should first be removed and placed in rented buildings. A suitable building for both the field battery and company stores, can be rented for about $150 per annum.

As to a new site, I have visited all shown on plan and others, and am of the opinion that that marked "D" on the banks of the St. Lawrence River is entirely the most suitable. It is also one which will in short course of time enhance in value. It has a wharf, and water front privileges, as well as adjoining suitable ground for drill purposes.

This should not, however, be hurriedly decided on, and certainly not until the question of regimental armouries be fully considered.

(Sgd.) W. H. COTTON,
Lieut.-Col.

At the foot of this is a note by Colonel Panet, saying :

The money voted for this service will lapse at the end of this month if not utilized. Please report to me what can be done.

On the 31st of July the next document was completed, giving a deed of this lot, transferring it from Mr. Turner to the department for $2,500. Colonel Cotton reported that it was offered to him for $2,300, and he recommended the purchase of it; besides $200 was offered for the old building. There is the Colonel's recommendation saying that this was the most suitable lot, that it had been offered to him for $2,300 in the presence of the mayor; and yet the next document is a deed of the property for $2,500, dated the 31st of July. The next is a letter from Colonel Panet to the Deputy Minister of Justice inclosing a check for $2,500 to pay for the lot. The Department of Justice had so much work to do that they could not attend to the little details of taking the transfer of the site for the drill shed; but they must employ an agent. I remember when hon. gentlemen sat on this side of the House they found fault with the late Government before they had a Solicitor General on account of their legal expenses; but after there was a Solicitor General, they said that all these expenses should be saved. But what do we find this economical Government doing? They handed this matter over to Mr. O. K. Fraser, of Brockville. Mr. Fraser presents a nice little bill for $73.79 for drawing a deed for Mr. Turner and examining the title at the registry office, and handing it over to the Government. Why did he not make it $73.80? Any lawyer in the country would have done the work for $10. One hon. friend says he would draw ten such deeds for that; but they had a pet in the person of Mr. O. K. Fraser, and they pay him $73.79 without any hesitation. The Department of the Solicitor General, with their staff, could not look after this little business, but they had to transfer it to Mr. Fraser and pay him four or five prices. The next document is a certificate from Mr. Mansell, showing that there were no taxes registered against the property. On the 27th of August, Mr. Britton, the mayor, writes another very strong letter to the Minister :

Gananoque, Ont., Aug. 27th, 1897.

Lieutenant-Colonel Cotton,
Assistant Adjutant General for Artillery,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—Please let me know what is being done with regard to the removal of the drill shed. Steps must be taken at once to have it removed. I was in hopes that arrangements would have been made so that we could have got the whole thing out of the way before the school re-opened. That now is an impossibility, but it must be removed at once. The school authorities are crowding this matter, and justly so, as they require the ground upon which it stands, and the insurance companies are complaining about the extra hazard on the school building.

Please let me hear from you by return mail, and oblige.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) C. H. BRITTON,
Mayor.

The next document is a portion of the lease of the building which was rented from Mr. C. E. Britton, to which I have already referred. Then comes a letter dated October 21, from Mr. Britton, addressed to Colonel Cotton, as follows:—

Gananoque, Ont., Oct. 21st, 1897.

Lieutenant-Colonel Cotton,
Ass't Adjutant General for Artillery,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—Owing to absence from home I have not been able to reply to your communication in regard to a debris of the old drill shed. I beg now to repeat in writing the offer which I made and which you accepted when on the ground, for that portion of the old drill shed which was torn down and stored inside and outside of the remaining portion of the old drill shed: Namely ($20.00) twenty dollars.

Yours truly,
C. E. BRITTON.

There is reference in this to a letter which is not on the file at all. If it were here, I fancy it would reveal something; but the Minister sees fit not to bring it down. Mr. Britton had drawn the timber away and repaired his wharf with it early in the summer. Of course, the Government had made him a present of it.

But at that time the timber was practically all removed, with the exception of a little old debris not worth very much. A larger portion of the drill shed had been taken down, than the portion remaining, for which Mr. Turner offered $200, as it stood, they sold the larger part for $20 to another political friend.

The next document is a letter from Colonel Panet acknowledging receipt of the deed to the property. Colonel Cotton reports that Mr. Turner offered to sell the site for $2,300 and to give $200 for the old building. Colonel Cotton's report is corroborated by a letter from Colonel Lake, dated 4th December, 1897:

When the new site for the drill shed at Gananoque was purchased this fall, Mr. Turner, the owner, agreed, in the presence of the Mayor of Gananoque, in the event of the purchase of the property, to give the sum of $200 for the old drill shed as it stood, and to remove it within two weeks of the date of sale; also, to take down and remove, free of cost, to the temporary drill shed hired, the special fittings for harness, &c., in the old drill shed.

Please report whether this sum has been paid and the work carried out.

Colonel Lake, as well as Colonel Cotton, says that Mr. Turner made this offer. Colonel Lake writes to the Commandant of the battery at Gananoque to find out if the $200 had been paid and the building removed. Colonel Mackenzie replies:

Mr. TAYLOR.

As far as any bargain is concerned, I know nothing of it. Consequently have received no money. Mr. Turner says that no such arrangements were made, but refuses to give a letter to that effect.

The harness fixtures have been transferred to the new shed. Mr. Britton informs me that he paid expenses of same.

Mr. Turner, the witness whom the hon. Minister put into the box here to prove that the late Government had offered $6,000, tells two of the Minister's representatives that they are lying, because, he says, no arrangements were made, and the harness fixtures, that he agreed to transfer, were transferred to the new shed and Mr. Britton paid the expenses of removal. Yet Turner was to have them transferred at his own cost and paid besides $200 for the old building.

The next document on the file is the letter from Mr. Turner which I have already quoted, stating that the late Government had agreed to purchase the property for $6,000.

Now, I think the hon. Minister ought to be pretty well satisfied that when he read Turner's letter, he had in his own hands evidence that Turner had not carried out his agreement and denied having offered $200 for the old building. He knew that the Agricultural Association had offered to the Government a building in which they could store arms and ammunition and a much better site attached. Where is the site that they have located? The drill shed to-day stands within six feet of the railway track. There are trains running by every few moments, liable to set the building on fire, and on both sides are a planing mill and a lumber yard, with the lumber piled right up against the building. At the other end is a residence. That is a nice place for a drill shed. There was a place offered, away at the east end of the town, on the agricultural grounds, with a first-rate building on it, which was offered at the Government's own price. Yet they preferred this old warehouse, alongside a railway track, in the centre of the manufacturing part of the village, and alongside a planing mill and a lumber yard—a nice place in which to store Government property. On the 14th February the hon. Minister said, in reply to my question:

One cause of delay is that the transfer of land for that new site was only completed on the 13th November.

The money was paid on the 31st July, the deed was issued the 31st July, and yet the hon. Minister says that the transfer only was completed on the 13th November.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA. I am sure the hon. gentleman does not wish to be unfair. If he will look through the papers he will see that there was a good deal of difficulty about getting a correct title, owing to mortgages that were against the property and the difficulty of ascertaining the number of owners of the property. It took until some time in November, I think the hon.

gentleman will find, to get a perfect title to the property. The Government were not in position to take possession of the property until that time.

Mr. TAYLOR. If the hon. Minister had brought down all the papers, he might have proved his case, but the papers he has laid on the Table prove the very reverse. Before the 31st of July, the money passed out of the department's hands and, so far as I can see, the matter is closed up after the 31st July. He makes the statement that Mr. J. B. Turner agreed to pay $200 for the remainder of the old shed and to take it down within two weeks, but this could not be done until the arms were removed. On the 14th February the Minister said that Mr. Turner was notified; but what do the documents prove? I have just read them. They show that Col. Lake notified Mr. Turner on the 4th December. It was true he had been notified, but an answer came back from the department that no money was paid and Mr. Turner said that no such arrangement was made. The Minister had the information then before him that Mr. Turner repudiated having made such a bargain. The Minister had that information when he led this House to believe that the bargain was made for $200, and Mr. Turner had been notified to carry it out. He notified Mr. Turner some time before, and this was the answer that came back. It was not until the town council took the matter in hand and appointed a deputation to come to Ottawa that action was taken. The deputation arrived here one evening, and the next day Mr. Britton, or somebody else, tore the building down and carried the material away, even before the deputation had returned. Was the building sold? Did they carry out the advice of Col. Cotton, to put the building up and sell it, either by tender or by auction? Did they comply with the recommendation of their own officer? No, I expect they simply gave it to a man to tear it down and draw it away to his own property. That is the way that this Government deal with the public property that they have in charge. They pay $200 more for the site than their own officer said it could be bought for, and they lose $200 that they might have had for the old building. And when a straightforward question is asked by a member of this House, the hon. Minister tries to make a case against the hon. member who asks for information. He says he can prove so and so, and yet the papers that he has brought down show the very reverse. Had the Minister complied with the order of the House and produced the letter he got from the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba, the ex-Minister of Militia, the House would have had an opportunity to judge of the correctness of the allegation that I had recommended the purchase of this site for $6,000, which allegation I repudiated before and which I repudiate now. A number of applications had been sent in, but the Minister did not produce any of them. I recommended no price on any site to the late Government. Now the hon. Minister of Militia must expect, that before he can get his Estimates through he must either establish his case or admit that he made uncalled-for answers and, in my case, to produce the papers ordered by the House. When an order of the House is made, a Minister should bring down every paper covered by that order. But this is not the only case, for I have heard other members of the Opposition complain not only that when they asked for information by question they do not get satisfactory answers, but even that when they moved for papers they do not get the returns that the House orders. Surely it is time that this thing should cease. If I have done an injustice by stating that the Minister gave wrong information, that he said the transfer of this property was not completed until the 30th November, I cannot find anything in these papers to show that I was wrong. The cheque went out on the 31st July and it is retained, and the lawyer that they paid $73.79 to for completing the title—which is seven or eight times what it is worth—makes his report long before the 13th November. And another statement that he made to the House is, that on the 14th February they notified Mr. Turner to remove the building. But the report of his officer is here stating that on the 4th of December Mr. Turner refused to do so. How can a member of this House be held accountable for not knowing the facts of the case when the Minister will not bring down the papers? He must have some sinister motive in not complying with the order of the House and keeping back a portion of the return. But I have to say that, in my opinion, from the first to the last, the Government have dealt unfairly in this matter. They have dealt unfairly with the school authorities at Gananoque; they have dealt unfairly with the military authorities in having placed their armoury in the centre of the manufacturing district in Gananoque and alongside of a railway track; they have dealt unfairly with certain residents of the town in depreciating their property by renting a warehouse and filling it with munitions of war. The people in that neighbourhood feel that their property has been very seriously injured, and I think that any person will see that it is no place to have military stores. The Agricultural Society offered a building at the Government's own price and yet that offer has not yet been brought down. I want the return completed before the hon. Minister asks for supplies for militia purposes this year. I know that the letter of the Agricultural Society was sent in to the department offering their property for the storage of arms at the Government's own price. There are other offers also in the hands of the department, and I want these papers brought down in order to complete the return. And I contend that the hon. Minister ought to investigate and withdraw the insinuations he made when he answered me. After examining witnesses he put in the box, after seeing that two of his own officers contradict his statements, after relying on the evidence of the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba, formerly Minister of Militia—which does not support him—after all this, surely he will withdraw the insinuation that I would be profited by this transaction. I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

THE MINISTER OF MILITIA. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) seems to have smarted very much under an answer I gave to a question which he put to the Government in the early part of the session. I may say at once that I had no intention of making an insinuation against the hon. gentleman, but I felt that the question that he put, although a proper one enough in itself, perhaps, was put in a most improper and unfair manner. I will tell the House why. The hon. gentleman, during the session of Parliament of 1896, came across the floor of this House, as I am happy to know hon. gentlemen differing in politics do, and came to me as a member of the Government and asked me, as I supposed, and as he represented it, a favour. He said that the late Government had proposed to buy a lot for a drill shed in Gananoque. The sale had not been completed before the late Government went out of office; he said that a certain lot, which, by the way, is the one that has been purchased, was the lot which he thought ought to be purchased; he said that a former Minister of Militia and Defence, then and now the Governor of the province of Manitoba, was cognizant of the fact with reference to it, and that although there might not be anything on file in the department showing that to be the case, he thought that if I would write to Governor Patterson, that gentleman would give me such assurances as would satisfy me that the Government of the country was under an obligation to take the particular lot of land which we have bought, and which was owned by Mr. Turner, who, I supposed, was a friend of the hon. gentleman. Now, in perfect good faith, the hon. gentleman, the whip of the Conservative party, having made that request to me—

MR. TAYLOR. I know the hon. gentleman does not want to misstate the facts, but I never told him that the lot had been bought.

THE MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I did not intend to say that the lot had been bought, what I intended to say was that the late Government had agreed to buy it, and that Mr. Patterson would tell me so if I wrote to him. That is what I think I said. Now the hon. gentleman having taken that course, having come to me, I at once cheerfully acceded to his request, and having done so, I got the information, which was in accordance with what the hon. gentleman stated. But it did seem to me, after I had done that in good faith, somewhat of an extraordinary proceeding for that hon. gentleman to come to this House two sessions afterwards and put the questions which he did put on the paper:

Has the Government purchased a new drill shed site from Mr. J. B. Turner? If so, what price did they pay for it? How much land does the site contain?

Was the said C. E. Britton the defeated candidate for the House of Commons in the general elections of 1882 and 1887? Was the said J. B. Turner the defeated candidate for the House of Commons in the general election of 1891?

Was the renting of the warehouse from Mr. Britton and the purchase of the drill shed site from Mr. Turner, to in part recoup them for their election expenses?

Now, I leave it to you, Sir, and to any hon. gentleman on either side of the House, whether, in view of the statement which I have made, and which the hon. gentleman confirms, it was a proper use of parliamentary privileges to put such questions on the paper in the manner the hon. gentleman did. I did not so consider it, and the hon. gentleman must not smart too much, must not object too much, if I did what perhaps I ought not to have done, if I answered him in kind, and told him that he knew a great deal more about this transaction than I did, and that he might ask himself whether the money had been properly disposed of or not. Now, the hon. gentleman said that I have failed to bring down all the papers, and he adds a threat that I shall not be allowed to get through with my Estimates because I have not brought down all the papers. Well, the hon. gentleman is very powerful, but possibly his friends of the Opposition may not all take the view that this thing is of such prime importance that the whole militia Estimates for next year should be stopped until the documents which the hon. gentleman wants, are produced. But let me say, Mr. Speaker, that there is no difficulty of that kind likely to occur, because I shall be delighted to bring down every paper the hon. gentleman wants. I supposed that every paper had been brought down. It is true I did not bring down the letter which I received from the Governor of Manitoba, because it was not a public letter but a private letter written to me. But if the Governor of Manitoba, the former Minister of Militia and Defence, gives me his consent I shall be happy to produce the letter, and I think I can get his consent by telegraphing to him. As the hon. member for Leeds spoke to me in the House, and as I wrote to Governor Patterson from my seat in the House, I did not keep a copy of the letter which I sent to him; therefore, if I lay on the Table the letter of the former Minister of Militia and Defence, I shall not be able to lay a copy of my own letter. But it was merely a formal request that he should let me know what he knew about this matter. Now, I understand the hon. gentleman to say that several formal offers of sites were made to the Government. I can only say that there were none made to me or to the present Government, except those which he has. I will ask the officers of my department to look up every offer that has been made, and add it to the papers which the hon. gentleman has now. I am surprised to hear that the plan of the site is not there. I have seen that plan, and it must be in the department. I will see that that deficiency is promptly supplied.

Mr. TAYLOR. The paper referred to is a plan of the town, with all the sites marked in red, and with the prices of each.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I have a distinct recollection of seeing the plan, and it ought to be among the papers. There could be no motive on my part for keeping back the plan, and it will be supplied. The lot, however, which was approved of by Colonel Cotton is, as a matter of fact, and as I think the hon. gentleman knows, the plan which we selected.

Mr. TAYLOR. If the price was right, the property was all right.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The hon. gentleman has referred to the building which was selected in which the stores are now placed. I believe the Agricultural Society made some offer. But I can assure the hon. gentleman that after a careful examination, I think by both Colonel Cotton and the Quartermaster General, the present building was selected, and it was not selected because it was the property of Mr. Britton. My report states that it was the best place available for the purpose, and it was chosen for that reason. My information is that the rent paid is not excessive. The hon. gentleman will remember that it was only a temporary arrangement and intended to be so, because we hope to construct a handsome drill shed in that town before very long, and as soon as a drill shed is erected, there will be no need of renting the present rooms. The hon. gentleman has referred to the transfer of land. I have already explained to him—and if the papers are not sufficient to prove what I have said, I shall be able to supply further evidence that the transfer was not completed, as a matter of fact, until the month of November, although it appears to have been earlier. It was subsequently discovered that there were some flaws in the title which had to be remedied, and for that reason the transfer was not completed until November.

Mr. TAYLOR. How about Mr. Fraser's bill of costs. Is that reasonable?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Mr. Fraser's bill of costs was paid upon the recommendation of the Department of Justice, and I think I may fairly place the responsibility for that upon the Department of Justice. I think the hon. gentleman does an injustice to the department and to Mr. Fraser when he endeavours to convey the idea to this House that there was only a deed of this property prepared. I can assure the hon. gentleman that it was necessary to make many searches in the records, and that a great deal of time was occupied in procuring a clear title to this property. With regard to the hon. gentleman's reference to the fact that Mr. Turner seems to have offered to sell the land to Colonel Cotton for a less sum than the sum which was paid, I can only say that the whole of the files, including all the originals of the papers that the hon. gentleman has before him, and including this report of Colonel Cotton where he alleges that an arrangement was made with Mr. Turner for the purchase of $2,300—all these papers were sent to the Justice Department with instructions to procure for the Government a deed of the property. The Department of Justice seems to have employed an agent. That agent might have called Mr. Turner's attention to the fact that he had at one time previously agreed to sell the property at a lower price than $2,500; I am unable to tell the hon. gentleman whether such is the fact or not, but I can inform him that the question is being looked into. It is a matter entirely before the Department of Justice, and I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that some reason should be given why $2,500 was paid for the property when the seller seems to have offered it at one time for $2,300, but I do not think that is a matter with which I, as the head of the Militia Department, am specially called upon to deal. I have only, in conclusion, to repeat what I have already stated, that I think the hon. gentleman's question was in very bad taste, that I think he has not much to complain of in the answer I gave him; that I quite absolve him from any charge, in fact, I did not pretend to convey the idea that he was connected in any way with this transaction, but I was aware that he had had something to do with it more than I had, and I therefore told him to inquire from himself as to how the money might have been disposed of. If the hon. gentleman would be kind enough to prepare a list of the papers he wants, or if the hon. gentleman will do me the honour to come over to my department, I will endeavour to give him from the records everything he desires. I supposed that everything except Hon. Mr. Patterson's letter was there. I have no desire to keep anything back, and I am fully disposed to give the hon. gentleman every scrap of paper in the department in respect to this matter.

Mr. TAYLOR. I desire to say a word as to the reason why I put the question on the paper. After last summer's experience, knowing the Government pretended to deal with the people's property in a business-like way, after seeing that property had been disposed of to political supporters and not put up to public auction, seeing that a building had been used that was not suited for the storing of arms, and that the Government seemed anxious to look after their friends, I put the question with respect to Mr. Turner and Mr. Britton, and the renting of the building from Mr. Britton, because he was a political supporter of the Government. The Government might as well have made one of their supporters a present of the building as to have accepted $20 for it. Two-thirds of the drill shed had been removed. What was done with the balance? When I saw these things going on, I thought it was time to inquire what this business Government was doing with the property of the people, and knowing that $2,500 had been paid, I wanted to know why $200 more had been paid, and also why $200 for the old building had been refused, making $400 lost on the total purchase price.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I should like to remind the right hon. leader of the House of the intimation he gave that he would be able to convey some idea to-day as to any further Government business that would be brought down with a view to prospective completion of public business.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am sorry that I cannot at this moment implement to the full the promise I made to the hon. gentleman. I may say, however, that the Government do not contemplate submitting any new business of a serious character. There may be, perhaps, one or two matters of moment and importance locally, but nothing of a general character, or as to general policy.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. May I ask the right hon. gentleman if the statement appearing in the morning papers is correct, that the Government intend to bring down a Bill for the organization of the Canadian Yukon territory?

The PRIME MINISTER. It is the intention to bring in a Bill for the organization of the Yukon territory—not a full Bill, because we do not possess at the present time all the information and data necessary to fully organize the territory—but we require, in view of the special conditions prevailing there, to have some general legislation passed.

Mr. BORDEN (King's).

CONTRACTS FOR SUPPLIES FOR NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I should like to draw the attention of the Government to a message which I have received to-day from a member of this House, Hon. Colonel Prior, now in Victoria. He wires:

Victoria B.C., 6th May, 1898.

Hon. Sir Charles Tupper, Ottawa.

Seattle "Post-Intelligencer," 5th inst., jubilantly states Canadian Government given contract to Boston and Alaska Transportation Company for carriage of some hundreds of tons freight to Yukon via Seattle, thus proving Seattle's supremacy as supply centre for Canadian North-west. If true, this serious blow to Victoria and Vancouver shippers, who state they are equally good position to carry out contract.

(Sgd.) E. G. PRIOR.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). This is a purely departmental matter, and I cannot give an answer at the moment. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will send over the telegram.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I sent a copy of it to the Minister of Militia.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA (Mr. Borden). The fact is, a contract has been made with the Boston and Alaska Transportation Company to transport some of the supplies that are going up to the North-west for the troops sent forward, but very much the largest part of the supplies is going from Vancouver. A small portion will go via Seattle. The company has three boats, and the contractors desiring to get supplies forward early, asked that a portion be allowed to be put on board at Seattle, to which request we consented.

Mr. WALLACE. Where were those goods purchased?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA. They were purchased here. They were purchased from the contractors to be shipped on board, not of the cars, but on board of the boats, and at the request of the company we could see no great objection to a portion going through Seattle, probably less than one-third, while the rest would go by Vancouver. The majority will go through Manitoba.

Mr. FOSTER. By the same boat.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA. By different boats; the same line.

Mr. DAVIN. This will be in addition to the transportation that my hon. friend the Minister (Mr. Borden) told me of a few days ago.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA. Yes.

ALIEN LABOUR LAW ENFORCEMENT.

Mr. WALLACE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the First Minister if an agent has been appointed to carry out the Alien Labour Act in the city of Toronto. Mr. DuVernet, who is acting for the men out of employment in J. D. King's & Co.'s factory, makes the statement that the law has been violated and that he has made application to the Government for the appointment of an agent there in order that Canadian laws may be vindicated and our Canadian workmen protected. Mr. DuVernet says that nothing has yet been done. I would like to know if the First Minister has yet made the appointment of an agent.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The order has been sent over to the Department of Justice, to have an agent appointed.

Mr. WALLACE. When?

The PRIME MINISTER. I think it was on Saturday or to-day.

THE QUEEN VS. SKELTON ET AL.

Mr. DAVIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to mention the case of the Queen vs. Skelton et al., and I may say that I gave notice to the Solicitor General that I should draw attention to this matter. Early in the session I saw the Minister of Justice and he assured me that no ex parte proceedings would take place in regard to this case, and that he would listen to no application for a new trial without hearing me. On April 21st I wrote a letter to my hon. and learned friend (Mr. Fitzpatrick) asking how the matter then stood, and I would like to ask how the matter stands now.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). I am quite sure that I may be able to answer the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) to-morrow.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

Mr. MARTIN. I wish to ask the Prime Minister when I may hope to get an answer to the Address passed by the House, for copies of Order in Council, correspondence, &c., in connection with the Dominion Government and a delegation from the government of Prince Edward Island relating to the settlement of claims at issue between that province and Canada.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I can inform the hon. gentleman that the papers are in course of preparation, and I would not be surprised if they have been brought down to-day in the Senate.

KLONDIKE AND DAWSON CITY BANK.

Mr. MORRISON moved that the House resolve itself into committee on Bill (No. 117) to incorporate the Klondike and Dawson City Bank.

Mr. MORRISON. This Bill has stood for some time at the request of the Government, who have given notice of an amendment providing that the head office of the bank shall be in Canada. I have no objection to that amendment.

Motion agreed to, and the House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 2,

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). This clause provides that the head office shall be in London, Eng. I move that it be amended by fixing the head office at some place in Canada to be determined by by-law to be passed by the directors.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection to the Act stating where the head office should be, but it goes a long way, to allow the head office to be placed wherever the directors wish. Has my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) thought of that. I do not think that will do at all.

Mr. MORRISON. They are quite willing that the head office be fixed at Montreal.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That information was only given to me a moment ago. I understood that the promoters of the Bill were absent and that my hon. friend (Mr. Morrison) might not be able to reach them. My amendment was with a view to facilitate the hon. gentleman in the passage of the Bill. I quite agree that it is better to fix the place, and I move:

That the head office of the bank shall be in the city of Montreal, Canada.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported, and read the third time, and passed.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the questions by members are proceeded with, I wish to draw the attention of the House to a matter which I think will be regarded as one of a good deal of importance, and, in order to put myself in order, I will move the adjournment of the House. I want, Mr. Speaker, to draw the attention of yourself and the House to the question how far we are in a position to exercise any authority over parties connected with the press who are allowed to occupy seats in the press gallery, and who are employed by committees of this House. I am, of course, quite prepared to respect the reporters and the correspondents of the various newspapers, and to regard their treatment of the events passing in this House or before the committees which are brought under their notice, as coloured to a very considerable extent by the views and opinions of the papers they represent; but I think that every member of this House will agree with me that some limit must be placed upon parties, connected with the press, who occupy positions in the gallery of the House of Commons, in making communications of an utterly false character as to proceedings, and especially proceedings under oath, which take place before the committees of this House. I wish to draw the attention of the House to an article which appears in the "Globe" newspaper of Saturday, 7th May, in the form of a special despatch from its Ottawa correspondent, who, I understand, is Mr. Magurn. I may say that Mr. Magurn occupies an extremely important position as shorthand reporter appointed by the hon. gentleman who is the chairman of the committee regarding the Drummond County Railway. It will thus be seen that the position that person occupies is one which gives considerable weight to his statements. The "Globe" reports from its correspondent the following:—

Mr. Farwell's Impressions.

Mr. Farwell's examination by the Chairman proceeded:

Q. Before the elections took place in 1896 was there any sort of promise made by any member of the Government that in case the Conservatives were successful in the elections the road would be taken over?—A. I never heard such a promise.

Q. Did you ever see such a letter?—A. I have an impression that there was such a letter; but I am not prepared to swear that there was.

Q. Who was the writer?—A. I would not be prepared to say.

Q. To the best of your recollection?—A. I am not prepared to say that there was; consequently it is only an impression.

Q. The other would be an impression also?—A. I do not think I could—

Q. It is only an impression, of course?—A. I would rather not mention the name of an impression.

Q. The committee wants you to mention it.—A. I cannot, because it is only an impression.

Q. What is your impression?—A. I would not swear that there was such a letter.

Q. You have told us that. Whom do you think it was from?—A. Is it right to give your impression?

Q. Yes, sir; we are trying to find out the facts.—A. I do not think I can answer that question.

Q. Do you swear you cannot answer it?—A. Well, I swear that I had an impression?

Q. That is all I want.—A. It is not evidence.

Q. No matter; this is not evidence here, entirely; we are searching.—A. I do not know whom such a letter was from.

Q. I do not ask you whether you knew it or not. You told me that you have an impression. I ask you now to let us know what that impression is?—A. I did not have any such letter.

Q. You have told us that.—A. I never had such a letter.

Q. Your impression is that you saw a letter. I want to know what is your impression as to whom the writer is?—A. Very well; I have an impression that it is Sir Charles Tupper. I did not have any such letter from him, and I may be wrong.

Q. You may be, I understand that perfectly, but your impression is that you saw a letter written by Sir Charles Tupper?—A. Yes.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Q. What is your impression as to whom that letter was addressed to?—A. I have an impression that it was addressed to Mr. Pope.

Q. What is your impression as to the contents of that letter?—A. Well, in a general way, that the Government would be favourable to some arrangement to take over the road.

Q. To take over the road "if"?—A. There was no "if" about it.

Q. If they succeeded at the election?—A. No "if" about it.

Q. How long before the election was that?—A. I cannot say.

Q. Was it in 1896?—A. Yes, in the spring of 1896.

Q. And taking over the road, in your mind, meant $2,500,000, or $100,000 a year?—A. That is what I asked for.

Q. And that is what you expected if it were taken over?—A. I should have taken less if I could not have got that.

Q. But you would have taken that?—A. Yes.

Q. That is what you expected?—A. That is what I hoped for.

Q. Can you be no more definite as to date?—A. No.

Q. In the spring of 1896?—A. I think so.

Q. The elections were in June?—A. Yes, I think so; but I am not much of a politician. I am not a political organizer, as was stated.

Q. Your memory is not good?—A. I had nothing special to fix the exact time.

Q. Where did you see this letter?—A. It was in Montreal.

Q. At the hotel?—A. Yes, I think it was in Montreal.

Q. Was anybody present besides you two?—A. No, I do not think so.

Q. What hotel was it at?—A. The Windsor.

Q. Did you communicate the fact that you had seen that letter to anybody else?—A. I do not know that I did, unless it might have been to my partners in the railway transaction.

Q. I suppose that stimulated you a little politically?—A. I mean Mr. Mitchell and Mr. Green-shields, if to anybody. I do not know whether it stimulated them or not.

Q. Did you ever have any communication with Mr. Hugh Ryan within the time of giving up that option and the time you saw this letter?—A. No, I do not think so.

Q. Then any effort that you made in the interval to sell the road to the Government was made through Mr. Pope and Mr. Ives?—A. Well, yes; although they were not active measures; as I say, we were forced to adopt a waiting policy.

Q. Till they got into a critical place?—A. No, until their good judgment would convince them that it was a good thing to extend the road to Montreal.

That is the evidence that this shorthand writer reports to the "Globe" newspaper, of which he is the correspondent, as to what took place before that committee. Now, I want to draw the attention of the House to the fact, and it is greatly to the credit of the "Globe" newspaper, that the messages which their special correspondent, Mr. Magurn, sends to them, are of an entirely different character from the messages which he sends to the Halifax "Chronicle" and the St. John "Telegraph," with which papers, I understand, he is connected. I shall now draw the attention of the House to the despatch that this gentleman—this person sent to the Halifax "Chronicle," distorted from the evidence which, as a stenographer, he had taken before the committee and which he had sent to the Toronto "Globe." I now quote from the Halifax "Morning Chronicle" of 7th May :

VERY INTERESTING.

A Genuine Boodling Arrangement Brought to Light.

And Sir Charles Tupper wrote a tell-tale Letter on the eve of the General Elections—Who was to share in Hugh Ryan's Handsome Allowance of $1,667,000 ?

(Special despatch to "Chronicle.")

Ottawa, May 6.—Highly interesting evidence was given at the House of Commons Drummond County Railway investigating committee this morning. Wm. Farwell, ex-president of the Drummond County Railway Company, was the witness and swore that he carried on negotiations through Rufus Pope, M.P., Hon. W. B. Ives and Mr. Cleveland, ex-M.P., for the sale of the road to the late Government for the purpose of the extension of the Intercolonial to Montreal. The price named was $2,500,000, of which the other shareholders of the road were to get one-third and the other two-thirds to go to Hugh Ryan, Government contractor. He saw a letter from Sir Charles Tupper to Rufus Pope just before the last general elections promising to see to the purchase of the road after the elections.

In view of the fact that Mr. Blair secured an option to purchase the Drummond County road for $1,600,000 or a rental of $61,000 a year, Mr. Farwell's evidence to-day before the committee is important, namely, that Sir Charles Tupper wrote a letter to Rufus Pope, M.P., on the eve of the last general election, 1896, promising to buy the road for two and a half millions or $100,000 a year rental

I need not add another word to show that this person, the special correspondent of the Toronto "Globe," sent to the Halifax "Chronicle" a telegram filled with a mass of lies of a most striking and positive character, utterly at variance with the testimony which, as a shorthand writer, he had taken down. I ask you, Sir, whether there is to be any protection in this House against parties who are admitted into the Press gallery and employed as stenographers by committees appointed by this House, thus abusing their privileges. I ask whether we are to be protected against the sending broadcast of falsehoods, which the person sending them knew to be false, by a person enjoying such privileges. I do not intend to let the matter rest there. I say that there is not the slightest foundation for the statements made as regards myself. I never wrote any such letter to any person. I never had before me, nor had the Government of which I was a member, ever before it, any proposition to purchase the Drummond County Railway.

The PRIME MINISTER. Order. My hon. friend is now proceeding to discuss a matter which is before the committee.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not at all. This is not before the committee.

The PRIME MINISTER. I beg my hon. friend's pardon. We all know what took place in the committee, and I find no fault with my hon. friend if he wants to give his version of it. But the only way in which he can do that is to go before the committee or wait for the report of the committee. Now, however, he is proceeding to give his version of a certain fact, which transpired before the committee.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend will see the injustice of what he proposes. I am not dealing with anything which is before the committee, but with the conduct of a reporter, who has access to the galleries of this House—a correspondent of the "Globe" newspaper, who, as such, has access to the reporters' gallery, and is employed in an important position by one of the committees of the House. In so doing, I am entirely within my right. I would fail altogether in what I owe to myself and the House if I did not draw attention to the fact that a party who, by his own report to one newspaper, shows that he knows the facts, nevertheless sends to another newspaper a mass of falsehoods. My hon. friend will see at once that that is a matter which I cannot overtake by going before the committee.

I propose to ask the committee to call me and take my evidence under oath. That is an entirely different matter. But my hon. friend knows perfectly well that I cannot, in justice to myself, allow these false statements to go uncontradicted or fail to draw the attention of the House to the conduct I complain of. My right hon. friend, the leader of the Government, is perfectly correct in saying that we cannot discuss what is before the committee, and I do not propose to do so. All I say is that there is not a particle of foundation for this false report to which I have alluded. I felt that it was my duty to the House and to myself to draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the question as to whether hon. members of this House are to be subjected to such monstrous injustice as the dissemination of statements of this character, wilfully false and unfounded, by parties who are permitted to have access to the galleries of this House as correspondents of newspapers, and are proved to have been guilty of such flagrant misrepresentation and unwarrantable attacks against members of this House.

The PRIME MINISTER. I have just one observation to offer to my hon. friend with reference to what he has said. As to the version he has given of the facts before the committee, that closes the debate, and I have no word to say on that subject. But in justice to Mr. Magurn, I understand my hon. friend has not complained of the report sent to the "Globe" but admits that to be correct.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. So far as I have read it.

The PRIME MINISTER. But he says that the report sent to the Halifax "Chronicle" was altogether unfounded and incorrect. That may or may not be. Personally, I am not in a position to judge. I do not know whether Mr. Magurn is the correspondent of the Halifax "Chronicle" or not, but I think he is correspondent of the "Globe." But whether he be a correspondent of these papers or not, I understand my hon. friend to raise the point as to whether it is desirable that members of the press gallery should be allowed to act as secretaries or stenographers of committees?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not raise that point.

The PRIME MINISTER. Then I have nothing more to say.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What I ask is whether members of the press gallery are to be permitted to falsify the evidence they have taken down as shorthand reporters.

The PRIME MINISTER. That applies to all correspondents, whether secretaries of committees or not.

Mr. DAVIN. Do I understand the right hon. First Minister to lay down the doctrine that a correspondent may send accounts to a newspaper utterly false as to what has taken place in this House or in any of the committees? Surely such a thing would not be permitted by the House, nor I hope would it be permitted by newspapers of standing. With regard to what has been brought before the House by the leader of the Opposition, it is clear that the correspondent of the Halifax "Chronicle" has wilfully and maliciously misrepresented what took place in the committee. I do not know whether Mr. Magurn is correspondent of that paper, but I do know that misrepresentations have been made in the newspapers on other occasions of what has taken place in this House. I do not mind how harsh may be the judgment of any newspaper correspondent or publicist or critic with regard to any public man, but the moment he deals with matters of fact and misrepresents the facts, that moment he has become a culprit at the bar of public opinion and this House. Apart from personal interest altogether, in the interest of the public, in the interests of the press itself, the honour of which is a matter of vital importance to modern society, we should use the power we have to prevent misrepresentation of facts. Even if our interests were not in any way concerned then, in the interest of the press itself, we should use the power we have in this House to prevent misrepresentations of facts. I do not complain of any harsh criticism, any invective or abuse. But when, in regard to something that an hon. gentleman does and says in this House or in any committee of this House, a gentleman occupying the high position of correspondent in the gallery of a leading newspaper should maliciously misrepresent, why, it is so gross an offence against public morality that we must not allow it to pass without censure, and, if more than censure be necessary, then let more than censure be administered. Sir, the most illustrious predecessor, at the very least one of the most illustrious predecessors, of the right hon. leader of the House, the late Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald, had occasion at one time to deal with misrepresentation on the part of an occupant of the press gallery, a gentleman who was known throughout the length and breadth of the land as the Ottawa Liar. He is no longer in that gallery. I do not know who he was, but he is no longer there. I am not going to say that he has any successor there, or that there has been any transmigration of his spirit into any present representative of the press. But the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald, as will be seen in reference to "Hansard," said in this House that misrepresentations of matters of fact would not be permitted. And he used this strong language—that if this continued and misrepresentations as to matters of fact were sent out by anybody in that gallery, the person so offending would be expelled from the gallery.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentlemen on the other side seem to be very sensitive as to what the Reform press of the country thinks proper to say about the proceedings before this committee. I would refer them to their own press, not only as to the proceedings before the committee, but as to everything that takes place before the House, concerning which representations are made that are grossly incorrect. Now, so far as this matter is concerned, there has, no doubt, been an error on the part of the reporter in the statement he made in the press as read by the hon. leader of the Opposition. For, as a matter of fact, the evidence did not show, and I do not think the reporter intended to convey the impression that it did show what the hon. gentleman has read. I may say to the leader of the Opposition that, on being informed that that statement was made. I am instructed, the reporter at once telegraphed to the paper correcting the error. But what was said? The hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) does not deny that a letter was written.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do deny it. I stated in express terms that I had never written such a letter to any person. Nor was it sworn to that I had.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) says that he never wrote such a letter. Do I understand him to say that he never wrote a letter concerning the Drummond County Railway?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I never wrote a letter on that subject to any person under any circumstances.

Mr. SPEAKER. I may remind the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lister) that he is not allowed to go into matters that were brought before the committee.

Mr. LISTER. I do not intend to, Mr. Speaker. So far as the report is concerned, it simply goes on to state that the letter suggested that the road was to be purchased for $2,500,000. The evidence goes to show that there was a letter.

Mr. DAVIN. No.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Lister) must avoid going into the evidence.

Mr. LISTER. I do not intend to go into the evidence. According to the report the hon. leader of the Opposition has read, the witness gave it as his impression that a letter was written, and his expectations was, if the road was taken in accordance with the letter, it would be taken over for $2,500,000.

Mr. DAVIN. He does not say that he saw a letter.

Mr. LISTER. His impression, he says, was there was such a letter. He gives the details, where he saw the letter, to whom it was addressed, and who showed it to him.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think we ought to discuss a matter of this kind with reference to making any capital against either one side or the other. It is a matter which concerns a member of this House as a member, and the very remark by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lister), who has just taken his seat, shows that if it affects one side at one time, it may affect the other side at another time. Consequently, I think it is a matter which does not affect the House divided into sides but it affects the House as regards its individual members, and I, for my part, do not like to have it passed over with the simple remark that hon. gentlemen on one side or the other are very sensitive as to what is said of them in the press. I think hon. members ought to be very sensitive as to what is said of them in the press.

Mr. LISTER. They will have a very unhappy time of it.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend (Mr. Lister) will allow me, I think hon. members ought to be sensitive as to what is said of them in the press. When it comes down to statements such as are made here, we have a direct attack made upon a man's character and standing, and disseminated through the press. I do not care whether this is done by a reporter who has certain privileges as correspondent or who has certain privileges and emoluments in connection with committees in this House. All that a member of this House has is his character as a public man; and if that character is to be assailed in the way in which the character of an hon. member has been assailed in this report sent to the "Morning Chronicle," and we choose to pass it over with the remark that we ought not to be over-sensitive about these things, I do not think it is fair, I do not think it is just, and I do not think it will promote public morals, newspaper morals or political morals in any way. Now, I am not going into the discussion of what took place in the committee, but I am going to show how aggravated is this case. The gentleman who is said to have sent this despatch is the very gentleman, who not only heard that evidence, but took it down and transcribed it for another paper, and must have had it before him. If another reporter, who had not been present at the committee and who, we will say, got his impression of what took place at the committee at second hand, had made a statement of this kind, he might have pleaded that he had a distorted impression of the proceedings, he might have pleaded ignorance of what took place. But if it be true that it was Mr. Magurn who penned this despatch for the "Morning Chronicle" there is no excuse for him, it is a downright misrepresentation and meant to be so; it cannot be anything else. Now, as to the extent of the misrepresentation, I think I have the right to read the report in the press of what took place. I was not in the committee; I am not a member of it. But, taking the report in the "Globe," I find, with reference to this matter, certain statements: First, that Mr. Farwell did not commence by stating that there was as a fact, a letter, nor did he end by swearing it. Though the attempt was made to bring out strongly that Mr. Farwell should state that there was such a letter, he swore that he was unable to state that there was such letter, but he had an impression that there was, and that was as far as he would go. If he had only the impression that there was a letter—and that was his statement and that was his oath persisted in when question after question was put to him—why, it stands as a matter of simple sequence that the alleged contents of that letter could not have been sworn to as facts; they must have been impressions as well, or impressions of impressions. But the question was asked him, for instance:

Your impression is that you saw a letter. I want to know what is your impression as to whom the writer is.

A. Very well, I have an impression that it is Sir Charles Tupper. I did not have any such letter from him, and I may be wrong.

Again:

Q. What is your impression as to the contents of that letter?—A. Well, in a general way that the Government would be favourable to some arrangements to take over the road.

Then, I find in another place:

Q. Did you ever see such a letter?—A. I have an impression that there was such a letter, but I am not prepared to swear that there was.

Now, with reference to the amount, when the chairman rather insinuatingly, I think, wished to draw from the witness that the sum of $2,500,000—

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. member is going a little too far.

Mr. FOSTER. I am taking it exactly as it appears in the paper which has been read already.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The only question the hon. gentleman ought to discuss is as to whether there was a fair report of that evidence. He is going away beyond that.

Mr. FOSTER. I am trying to do that. My hon. friend's sense of right is parallel with my own. I was reading what was stated, first, in order to prove that there was a distorting of the evidence. Hon. gentlemen have heard what I have read. The right hon. gentleman who leads the Government has heard it read twice. Now, let us see what this gentleman says when he comes to pen his interesting despatch to the "Morning Chronicle," the gentleman who took the evidence down first and transcribed it, who put it in a despatch to the "Globe," and who consequently has twice gone over that evidence, if not more than twice, the evidence being of such a nature as I have read. Now, what does he state when he comes to pen a despatch to the "Morning Chronicle"? I do not know whether Mr. Magurn wrote the headlines; I imagine he did not. I suppose these are made up in the office of the "Chronicle" in Halifax. But I may say that the headlines are entirely in keeping with the body of the despatch, and it is impossible not to believe that the despatch as printed is not the same as it was sent by the person inditing it in the "Globe." There may have been an error here or there in the transmission, or in looking over the printer's proof, but the whole despatch is consistent, and it displays open and plain and complete misrepresentation of what the man who had the information under his hand knew to be the truth of the matter:

Highly interesting evidence was given at the House of Commons Drummond County Railway investigating committee this morning. William Farwell, ex-president of the Drummond County Railway Company, was the witness and swore—

Now, I ask my hon. friend's attention to this:

—swore that he carried on negotiations through Rufus Pope, M.P., Hon. W. B. Ives, and Mr. Cleveland, ex-M.P.

Hon. gentlemen have heard the evidence read. Did Mr. Farwell swear to a fact of this kind? He did not.

Mr. FOSTER.

The price named was $2,500,000, of which the other shareholders of the road were to get one-third, and the other two-thirds to go to Hugh Ryan Government contractor.

Mr. Farwell swore to nothing of the kind.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Does the hon. gentleman profess to have read to the House all Mr. Farwell's testimony? I was not present and did not hear it. But does the hon. gentleman profess to have read to the House every word of Mr. Farwell's testimony?

Mr. FOSTER. I have read the testimony which was published in the "Globe," and which gives the gist of Mr. Farwell's evidence.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Certainly it refers to Mr. Farwell's evidence so far as it had alleged reference to Sir Charles Tupper. I do not understand that the evidence read professes to have any reference to the statement now being made. So far as the quotation goes which the hon. gentleman has read from the "Globe," it neither proves nor disproves anything. He did not give any expression of opinion. The hon. gentleman is building up a false argument here altogether.

Mr. FOSTER. The next sentence I find is this:

He saw a letter from Sir Charles Tupper to Rufus Pope just before the last general elections, promising to see to the purchase of the road after the elections.

Now, the evidence given by Mr. Farwell was explicitly that he simply had an impression of a letter.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman is saying that from having heard it himself. Did the hon. gentleman hear the evidence?

Mr. FOSTER. I was simply taking the other report that was given in the "Globe."

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. You are comparing the two reports, and you say they do not agree. Which is correct and which is not, you cannot state.

Mr. FOSTER. I am holding the contention that this is a complete misrepresentation of what Mr. Magurn, the well-known reporter of the Toronto "Globe," gave to his own paper, the Toronto "Globe." Now, the man must have been making a wrong statement in one or the other, it is immaterial, to my mind, which was wrong. My impression is that the wrong statement is made here, and that is borne out by the facts given in the answers in the evidence which have already been read to the House.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Will the hon. gentleman say how he knows that the same reporter sent the two reports ?

Mr. FOSTER. I am taking that for granted, it is so stated, and I believe it to be true. Of course, I said at first that I take it for granted that that was the case. Now, Sir, I have simply to say this, that I think it is a matter of a great deal of moment if a gentleman can be allowed to sit in the gallery of the House of Commons and misrepresent, in such vital matters as this, hon. gentlemen who are sitting on either side of the House. It does not make any difference to me on which side of the House the gentleman so misrepresented may sit. I think that in all these vital matters it is important that falsehood should not be stated, and that the truth should be stated. I am quite willing to give reporters all the license that reporters will have, and which they ought to have, to a certain extent. But when it comes down to a matter of such vital importance as this, I think both sides of the House should feel that a reporter ought not to be allowed so to misrepresent on so important a question as this, any member of this House. I quite understand that in discussing this matter we are at a loss in not having the whole evidence of the committee before the House. But this statement has been sent broadcast about my hon. friend, and I think he has a perfect right, as a duty to himself as well as to the House, to call the attention of the House to it at once. Whether I was on that side of the House or this, I should express my sympathy with any gentleman who is so misrepresented. I hope, and I am compelled to say, that this misrepresentation ought not to be made.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No possible objection, of course, can be taken to the hon. gentleman bringing the matter before the House, and making the statement he did, and making the further statement that it was his intention to come before the committee and give his evidence there. I thoroughly agree with my hon. friend when he says it is most unfortunate that misstatements should be made through the press as to what has been said or done by any public man, either in this House or out of it. That is all very well so far as it goes. But what I deprecate is that the hon. gentleman should attempt to catch the judgment of the House now as to what was actually said before that committee when we are in complete ignorance of what was said. I do not know what was said, I was not there, I never attended a meeting of the committee, I have not even read the evidence taken, except the evidence which was in the "Globe" newspaper, which I did read at the time it came out. But I never saw the "Chronicle" before. But unless the hon. gentleman was present or read the whole of the evidence, he is neither in a position to condemn Mr. Magurn, nor to judge—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Allow me to say a word. Did the hon. Minister hear the hon. member for Lambton say that under his direction Mr. Magurn had been directed, and had corrected, this misstatement in the "Morning Chronicle" ?

Mr. LISTER. I did not say under my direction. I said I had been told that the reporter seeing that the report was erroneous, had corrected the error.

Mr. MACLEAN. I think in the interest of the House that no employee of the House, in the receipt of money from the House, ought to be connected with the public press ; and in the interest of the newspapers themselves, I hold that no newspaper ought to allow its employees to be servants of the House in that way, or to allow the independence of papers to be questioned.

Mr. FLINT. I think hon. gentlemen, apart from the hon. leader of the Opposition, who brought the question before the House, have travelled somewhat beyond the records and have been somewhat premature in their discussion of the newspaper correspondent. I do not find fault with the remarks the leader of the Opposition has made, and all hon. members will agree in a general way as to the course which gentlemen of the press should pursue, and that they should report absolute facts. But in mentioning the name of an individual reporter, and in referring only to a portion of the evidence before the committee, and in not referring to the point mentioned by the chairman of the committee, that the reporter of the "Chronicle" had subsequently telegraphed a correction to his paper, which will no doubt appear in the issue when it arrives here, the leader of the Opposition may fairly be charged with being premature in his comments, especially in mentioning the name of an individual reporter. There is more than one official reporter of the committees, there are three, and even if one should be correspondent of a paper, who misrepresented or who is alleged to have misrepresented the evidence given before a committee, it would not follow that he did it deliberately or intentionally, because, unfortunately, he may have been absent when the evidence was given. But when, as has been stated, the reporter of the "Chronicle" made a correction of the error, all has been done in that particular direction that can be asked by any member of the press. If upon investigation as to the facts, an error appears to have been committed, and immediately on the attention of the reporter being called to it, he telegraphs a correction, he certainly has acted in an honourable way and we should delay further discussion on the question until copies of the paper containing the correction comes to hand. I think we can all subscribe to the general sentiment that reporters of the press should be as truthful as possible in presenting absolute statements of facts, and neither one side of the House or the other is in a position to charge one party more than another with being unfair. I think in this particular case, after the leader of the Opposition has presented to the House his statement, it was unnecessary to proceed further with a view to establishing the status of the representatives of the press before the country.

Mr. McNEILL. I think this is a very grave matter, and one that should not be glossed over. The character of the members of this House and the public men of the country is a very important matter and one in which we are all very deeply interested. We ought to be protected against deliberate misrepresentations as to facts. I listened to the statement made by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and I am quite sure he intends to be fair; but it seems to me that the matter comes to this, if we are to accept his version of the matter, we must assume that the report of the "Globe," which is presented as a verbatim report—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No.

Mr. DAVIN. It purports to be so.

Mr. McNEILL. It goes before the public as a verbatim report so far as it goes.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, so far as it goes.

Mr. McNEILL. Then we must assume that the report is incorrect, if we are to assume that the statements made by the correspondent of the Halifax "Chronicle" are correct. If the report of the "Globe" is a correct report so far as it goes, it is quite evident there is no justification for the statement made by the correspondent of the Halifax paper.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman should not form any judgment on it, except in regard to the one item, which has been corrected.

Mr. McNEILL. It is in regard to one item, I am discussing it, and it is to that item the leader of the Opposition referred. It makes no difference whether the statement was sent by the correspondent of a paper supporting hon. gentlemen on this side of the House or supporting the other, for I would blame one as quickly as the other. It is, however, in the interest of hon. members and of the House that the character of public men be protected in every way possible, and I think a matter of this kind should not be glossed over.

Mr. FOSTER. This is a matter on which it may be important to say a word. Mr. MAgurn informs me there are three stenographers on that committee, and that as a matter of fact he was not the stenographer who took down the evidence, and he did not send it to the "Globe." I take it, from his note, that he was the person who sent the report to the "Chronicle." Mr. Magurn also states that he telegraphed a correction of that report. It is fair to make this statement.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. leader of the Opposition, in moving the adjournment of the House, took the opportunity to deny a statement in the Halifax "Chronicle" referring to himself, and the hon. gentleman asked me if members have any protection against libellous articles in newspapers. Of course they have a remedy, but a special course of procedure has to be followed. The article complained of has to be read, the name of the supposed writer has to be stated, and he has to be called to the bar of the House and examined. All these proceedings have to be gone through with. In view of the personal explanation made by the hon. gentleman in regard to the statement published, I suppose it is not intended to proceed further, and of course further proceedings are not open under this motion. With respect to the question which the hon. gentleman asked the Chair also, as to the control over the stenographers appointed by committees of the House, I may say that in this case the House itself gave authority to a certain committee to employ shorthand writers, and it is the committee itself who controls them, and the Speaker of the House has no jurisdiction whatever. I may mention, however, for the information of the House, that since I have had the honour of occupying this position, I have laid it down as a stringent rule, which I believe has been literally carried out, that no employee, seasonal or permanent, in this House under my control, shall take part in politics, either personally or as political correspondents of newspapers.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

PETERBOROUGH DRILL SHED.

Mr. LANG asked,

Did the Government ask for tenders for repairing the drill shed in the town of Peterborough, in the year 1898? If so, who were the parties who tendered and what was the amount of each tender?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). Tenders were asked for. Each party tendering to supply plans of the method proposed to be followed in making the repairs. Tenders were received from Thos. McKee, $425; Thos. Wilson, $450; Thos. Rutherford, $475. The specifications were prepared by the parties tendering and the departmental architect recommended the acceptance of Thos. Rutherford's tender as being really the lowest, in view of the work undertaken under it, and the one most likely to attain the object sought, viz.: the permanent strengthening of the roof of the drill shed.

PAYMENTS TO MR. NOBLE, BARRISTER.

Mr. HUGHES (by Mr. Bennett) asked,

1. What sums have been paid to one Noble, a barrister of Cannington, Ontario, by the Government of Canada since 1st July, 1896?
2. For what purposes were these sums paid?
3. Who is now Indian agent to the Rama Indians?
4. What was the result of the inquiry into the conduct of the said Indian agent?
5. What is the total cost to April, 1898, of the said inquiry?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). I cannot find that any sums have been paid to Mr. Noble by this department.

Mr. TAYLOR. The Solicitor General has not answered all the question. Who is the Indian agent.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The answer, so far as it concerns the Interior Department, is as follows:—
1. Seventy-five dollars. 2. As an advance for witness fees and other disbursements, in the investigation of charges preferred against D. J. McPhee, Indian agent for the Rama Band. 3. D. J. McPhee. 4. The report has just been received, but has not yet been considered or acted upon. 5. Not known, as all the bills have not yet been rendered.

SOULANGES CANAL EXPENDITURE.

Mr. BERGERON (by Mr. Taylor) asked,

How much money has been spent upon the construction of the Soulanges Canal up to the 1st of May, 1898?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). There has been expended upon the construction of the Soulanges Canal up to the 1st May, 1898, the sum of $3,257,080.87.

ISSUE OF MINERS' LICENSES.

Mr. MACLEAN asked,

How many free miners' certificates were issued during the month of April (a) in Canada; (b) in Great Britain?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). It is impossible to state how many free miners' certificates were issued in the month of April, as complete returns for that month have not yet been received at the department.

GOVERNMENT CLAIMS—YUKON DISTRICT.

Mr. MONK asked,

1. What number of claims, according to latest reports, does the Government now hold in the Yukon, under the terms of regulation 16 of the regulations concerning placer mining in the district of Yukon, approved the 16th of January, 1898, by which every alternate ten claims are reserved?

2. In what manner does the Government intend disposing of said alternate claims so reserved?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. No statement has yet been received from the Gold Commissioner showing the claims in the Yukon district held by the Government. 2. Pending the receipt of the statement no decision has been come to as to the manner in which the claims are to be disposed of.

CAPE BRETON RAILWAY—HARD PAN APPROPRIATION.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness) asked,

1. What are the names of claimants for "hard pan" appropriation in connection with the building of the Cape Breton Railway, and the respective amounts claimed?

2. What are the names of claimants to whom money was paid from this appropriation, and the respective amounts so paid?

3. What is the amount remaining unpaid of the grant made by Parliament to meet such claims?

4. Whether the Government intend paying over any moneys remaining unpaid, under this head, to the various claimants whose claims remain unpaid?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The following are the claimants with the amounts paid:—

Names.	Amount Claimed.
Isbester & Reid	$303,273 00
Neil, McDougall & Co.....	22,929 00
John McKeen & Co.....	4,700 51
McGregor, Kennedy & Graham..	4,500 05
Dan McGregor	3,155 00
S. C. Graham	2,805 56
McAdam & Grant	15,723 72
W. J. Sims.....	4,035 20
Sims & Slater	60,026 88
Beatty, Shirlye & Beattie; McAdam & Grant; Sims & McDonald and others; Neil, McDougall & McNeill; McDonald & Cameron (sub-contractors of Sims & Slater).....	*

*There appears to have been no specific amount claimed.

2.—	Amounts Paid.
Isbester & Reid	$145,472 69
Neil, McDougall & Co.....	11,261 88
John McKeen & Co.....	4,000 00
McGregor, Kennedy & Graham..	2,400 00
Dan McGregor	1,200 00
S. C. Graham.....	1,000 00
McAdam & Grant.....	6,000 00
W. J. Sims.....	416 23
Sims & Slater	4,855 50
Beattie, Shirlye & Beattie	6,442 00
McAdam & Grant	9,756 40
Sims, McDonald and others.....	2,822 40
Neil, McDougall & McNeil.....	4,883 20
McDonald & Cameron.....	7,709 20

As to the other two questions of the hon. member (Mr. McLennan) the grant made by Parliament has lapsed and it has not yet been determined whether the Government can pay any of the moneys remaining unpaid under the heading to the various claimants.

DES JOACHIM AND MACKIE'S STATION MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. POUPORE (by Mr. Taylor) asked,

Has the mail service between Des Joachim and Mackie's Station, on the Canadian Pacific Railway, been discontinued? If so, for what reason has such service been abolished?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). In the absence of the Postmaster General, I beg to answer. The mail service between Des Joachim and Mackie's Station, on the Canadian Pacific Railway, has not yet been discontinued, but with the view if possible of establishing a daily instead of the present tri-weekly service, tenders have been called for a daily service between Moore's Lake Station and Des Joachim.

SEED GRAIN—AMOUNT DUE.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

How much is owed the Government for seed grain by settlers in the North-west Territories?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). On 1st April, 1898, there was owed for seed grain by settlers in the North-west Territories, $145,235.49.

PARRY SOUND—HARBOUR MASTER.

Mr. MCCORMICK asked,

1. Who is harbour master at Parry Sound, Ontario, and what is his salary?

2. Have the services of John Galna as harbour master at Parry Sound been dispensed with?

3. If so, upon whose complaint, if any, and was there an investigation?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. Mr. Frank Strain. Salary, $200 of fees collected. 2. Yes. 3. Mr. Galna's services dispensed with by Order in Council of the 26th April, as he had lately been dismissed from his position of landing waiter for offensive partisanship after a full and exhaustive investigation.

LEGAL AGENTS OF THE GOVERNMENT IN GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. WALLACE asked,

Who are the legal agents of the Canadian Government in Great Britain? When were they appointed? How much have they been paid (1) as solicitors' fees (2) as counsel fees; (3) for other services, and what were such other services? What is the amount of accounts presented but not yet paid?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). Day, Russell & Company, solicitors, Mr. BLAIR.

tors, 37 Norfolk Street, London. They were appointed in September, 1896. They have been paid altogether up to the present time the sum of £738 8s. 2d. It is impossible to distinguish the amount paid to them as solicitors' fees, from the amounts paid to them to be paid over to counsel in the different cases in which they have acted for the Government. They have performed no services for the Government, except as solicitors before the Privy Council in England, and they have not been paid anything for other services. Their outstanding accounts rendered the Government, amount to £1,713 6s. 8d.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is in addition to the first sum?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is the amount of their claim upon us and presented to the Government by them.

INSURANCE COMPANIES.

Mr. BRODER (by Mr. Taylor) moved:

That in the opinion of this House some changes in the laws governing insurance companies should be made by which those insured with the honest intention of protecting their properties would be less under the control of the companies and their agents in reference to the value put upon property when insured, the rates charged for insurance, and the adjustment of claims when losses occur.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I imagine, Mr. Speaker, that the object of the hon. gentleman who gave notice of that resolution was to address the House in explanation of its contents. I can hardly imagine that his purpose will be served by having it moved and pressed to a vote without discussion. If it is my hon. friend's intention to discuss the question, I will give way to him. If not, I ask him whether he will serve the object of the mover by pressing the resolution?

Mr. TAYLOR. When I took the paper up hurriedly, I thought it was the intention to take the motions that call for papers, and as this is the last day for making motions of this kind, I thought the wise course would be to make the motion to-day. But I see that this motion involves discussion, and it had better stand.

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion stands.

NORTH-WEST ROUTE TO THE YUKON.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan) moved for:

Copies of all reports and plans respecting or in any way relating to a route through and from the North-west Territories to the Yukon district via Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, Green Lake, Isle La Crosse and the Clear Water River and Fort McMurray on the Athabasca.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think it is in the interest of the country, as a whole, that a route to the Yukon district should be opened up from the centre of the North-west Territories, not only for the purpose of obtaining communication with the Yukon district for the settlers of the Territories, but also for the purpose of developing the vast agricultural lands in the valley of the Peace River and opening up the extensive placer deposits which we have in that country. I think it will be conceded by all that it is not practicable to build a railway from the centre of the Territories to the Yukon district at the present time. The shortest distance, even if we could build a railway in a direct line, would be about 1,500 miles; and if it would cost $30,000 a mile, it would involve the expenditure of over $30,000,000. I think that $30,000 a mile is not too large an estimate, when we consider that the Intercolonial Railway cost something like $32,000 a mile. As it is not practicable to build a railway through the Peace River country to the Yukon district from the centre of the North-west Territories, I think it would be wise on the part of the Government to take some steps to open up the waterways which nature has provided as a means of communication. We have a magnificent system of waterways, running from the eastern portion of the Territories to the Yukon district, with only three small portages. The route I allude to, the Prince Albert route, is the shortest route by some 300 miles from any point in eastern Canada, through Winnipeg and Prince Albert, to the Yukon district. It is that much shorter than the Edmonton route, and is a better route in every way. It is the old route which has been used by the Hudson's Bay Company for some 200 years to transport men and merchandise to the north. Starting from Prince Albert, it runs to Big River, a distance of 70 miles, thence by way of the Big River to the head of Green Lake; from this point to Isle LaCrosse. Here there is a Hudson's Bay post, a Roman Catholic mission, a saw-mill and a considerable settlement. From this point the route goes up the Beaver River to Buffalo Lake, thence by a portage of about 12 miles to Clearwater River. Then there is straight sailing down the Clearwater River for about 80 miles to Fort McMurray on the Athabasca River. From here there is a choice of two routes to Dawson City, one by way of the Peace River, and the other by way of Slave River to Great Slave Lake, thence by the Mackenzie River 1,000 miles to Fort McPherson, thence by a portage of about 25 miles to Rat River, thence down the Rat River to the head waters of the Porcupine River, and down that river to the Yukon. The total distance from Prince Albert to Dawson City by this route is 2,829 miles. That looks like a great distance, but when we take into consideration the fact that nearly the whole traffic going to the Yukon goes by St. Michael's on the Behring Sea, and up the Yukon against the stream, a distance of 1,300 or 1,400 miles, we shall find that the route I am speaking of is a much shorter one from the heart of the Territories. Another thing in its favour is that it is practically down stream and clear sailing all the way. On the Mackenzie River for the 1,000 miles there are no impediments to navigation. At the present time there is a steamboat that draws six feet of water running on the Mackenzie River. There are only three portages, and there is plenty of electric power to be had to run tramways across these portages. There is no doubt that if the Government would take the matter up and build tramways across the portages, there would be companies to put steamers on the rivers. The Hudson's Bay Company have at present steamers on the Mackenzie and Athabasca rivers and the Great Slave Lake. This is a very important question to the people of the Territories, because we not only want the people who are going to the Yukon to pass through the centre of the Territories, so that they will see our agricultural lands, but we would like those who return from the Yukon to come that way, in the hope that many of them will stay in the country. We must not assume that all the people who are going to the Yukon will make large fortunes. Where one man may make a fortune of a million dollars, there will probably be many who will not make over $1,000 or $500. These are the men we want to come back through the centre of the Territories, and if possible have them settle there.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the hon. gentleman leaves that point, will he briefly state what the distance is from Prince Albert to Dawson City over that route?

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). Two thousand eight hundred and twenty-nine miles.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Would it be convenient for the hon. gentleman to say how much of that is land and how much water?

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). The portages are 70 miles from Prince Albert to the head of Green Lake, 12 miles from Beaver River to Lake La Crosse, and 25 miles from Fort McPherson to Rat River. The total distance of land that will have to be traversed will be about 120 miles. I might say in this connection that for the first seventy miles I have mentioned, I do not think it would be necessary to have a railway at all. There is a splendid wagon road all the way and old settlements. The country is all taken up in the first seventy miles, and I do not think there is any necessity for a railway there. The only thing required would be a tramway over Portage Laloche to the Clear Water River, which runs into the Athabasca at Fort McMurray. That would give us uninterrupted navigation the whole way; and it is important to us to have a road going from the town of Prince Albert, in the district of Saskatchewan, and it is also more important in the general interest of the country, for this reason. It is generally conceded that the district of Saskatchewan is the finest agricultural district in the North-west Territories. It is a country adapted for mixed farming and well timbered—a rolling country the same as Ontario. No doubt, a great many of the people going to the Yukon would settle in the Saskatchewan country. I hope that the Government will take this into their serious consideration. I understand that there is a vote in the Supplementary Estimates for the purpose of exploring the country north of the Saskatchewan River, with the intention of finding out the practicability of building a railway through it. If that is the intention, I think it would be very well for the Government to explore these waterways. I do not think it is practicable to build a railway from the centre of the territory to the Yukon at present, because that will take five or six years, and by the time it would be completed a great many of the people who went in would be prepared to come out, if they had not already left. In fact, at present there are hardly so many people going in as have been going. Therefore, I do not think the Government would be warranted in going to the expenditure this railway would involve for that purpose. But the route I advocate is a poor man's; it is a cheap route. It is a route that starts right from the centre of the territories, and will give us a chance of supplying all the food required by the people of the Yukon. The stuff can be hauled down the navigable rivers very cheaply, and there are many reasons why all the food products required in the Yukon should go from the centre of the territory. This route would connect with the Edmonton, by the way of Athabasca Landing it connects with that route at Fort McMurray. The only difference between the Edmonton and this route is that it is 360 miles shorter going from the east.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take up any more time of the House, as others wish to speak on this question, and it is nearly six o'clock.

Mr. DAVIN. Before this motion is carried, I wish to say that I am exceedingly glad the hon. gentleman has brought this matter before the House, because I think that the merits of this as one of the routes to the Yukon cannot be too emphatically placed before the notice of the public. My hon. friend the Speaker of the North-west Assembly, went before the boards of trade of some of our principal cities and placed the merits of that route, which my hon. friend has advocated to-day, before these bodies, and it is a matter of notoriety.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan).

judging by the reports in the newspapers, that a most favourable impression was created upon the various boards of trade as to the feasibility of this route, the readiness with which it can be utilized, and its cheapness; and if I remember rightly, opinions were expressed by leading business men very favourable to the idea of the Government utilizing it. Early in the session I put a question on the paper asking the hon. Minister of Railways whether he had considered the feasibility of the Prince Albert and Edmonton route, and the hon. gentleman replied that when the Supplementary Estimates came down, I would see whether or not the Government had paid any attention to the question, and I am somewhat surprised that the Government should allow this motion to pass without giving the House some information as to the view they take of the merits of this route which my hon. friend has brought to their attention. Much more might be said in its favour even than what he has stated. He knows better than I do that you do not travel very far upon this route until you come to a place where gold has been already discovered, and is now being successfully mined, and the information we have is that not merely have you a vast ranching country there all the way, but that certainly over a great part of the route, before you come to the Mackenzie River—all along that line—there is mining that will probably arrest the attention of people going over to the Yukon. The town council of Prince Albert has published an excellent pamphlet, in which the opinion of ecclesiastics who have gone over that route are set forth. The bishop of the Roman Catholic church wrote a letter to a gentleman in Prince Albert, which is published in a pamphlet, in which he says: We have travelled over every part of this route and it is one well adapted for a poor man's road to the Yukon.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). What pamphlet does my hon. friend refer to?

Mr. DAVIN. It is a pamphlet issued by the Board of Trade of Prince Albert. Not only does that pamphlet contain a letter from the bishop, but also from one of the clergymen in his diocese, endorsing the view taken by him. You need only look at the map that accompanies the Klondike Forward Guide to see that nature has here, as elsewhere in Canada, placed at the disposal of the Government waterways that must prove of the greatest value in opening up and developing the country. Now, my hon. friend the Solicitor General asked me a question, and I think I cannot do better than read the following letter, which was received by the Prince Albert Board of Trade as to the practicability of the route:

Bishop's Palace,

Prince Albert, 3rd December, 1897.

To F. C. Baker, for the Prince Albert Board of Trade.

Dear Sir,—You have expressed a wish to know my opinion as to the best route to follow in order to reach the celebrated gold mines on the Klondike. Here it is :

While waiting until the railway companies, with the assistance of Government, open a direct line across the fertile valley of Saskatchewan to reach Peel River (let us say for example via Portage la Prairie, Yorkton, Prince Albert, Shell River, Jackfish Lake, Victoria, Athabasca Landing, Little Slave Lake, Peace River, Liard River and Peel River), while awaiting this railway which is now impending, I do not hesitate to tell you that in my opinion—and I believe it to be the true one, the most comfortable, the most direct, and the most easy route is that which the hand of Divine Providence has traced, and which has been followed for a century by the Hudson's Bay Company's men and for half a century by the missionaries who evangelize the Indians of the North-west in the immense districts of Athabasca and Mackenzie.

Taking Regina for a starting point, we may go to McMurray by two routes, one via Prince Albert, Green Lake, Portage la Losche, Clearwater River and McMurray ; the other via Calgary, Edmonton, Athabasca Landing and McMurray. On leaving McMurray the traveller was borne down stream as far as Peel River, without effort, without danger, and without difficulty. Everywhere on his road he will meet with Hudson's Bay Company's posts, and missionaries willing to render service and inculcate charity ; Half-breeds and Indians ready to serve as guides and facilitate this voyage without being too exorbitant. Besides Lake Athabasca and the Great Slave Lake, which one can cross without danger, there is the portage of Fort Smith, 140 miles below Lake Athabasca. This portage is eighteen miles in length, and can be made by wagons or carriages drawn by horses or oxen.

Starting from Regina, you will ask me which is the best route to reach McMurray ? Is it via Edmonton or via Prince Albert and Green Lake ? I confess, dear sir, that I should prefer Prince Albert and Green Lake. These are my reasons : This route is direct everywhere, and is shorter by about 300 miles ; it presents not the least danger, and is exceedingly cheap. It is by this road that the Hudson's Bay Company has transmitted its goods for seventy-five years to provision its trading posts on the Athabasca and Mackenzie. The company would still continue to do so had not the development of its commerce compelled it to utilize the Calgary and Edmonton Railway and to construct a steamer on Athabasca River.

All those who have ascended or descended the River Athabasca have retained a souvenir of the difficulties and dangers to which they were exposed in descending the impetuous torrent. When the waters from the mountains swell the river, as happens two or three times each spring, the waves are enormous, and one blunder might cost you your life. It is better to avoid the rapids. The guides, who at such times hold the fate of the traveller in their hands, occasionally show themselves exorbitant and dishonest. In autumn, when the water is low, the bed of the rapids is strewn with rocks and shoals, necessitating, in such cases the portaging of goods, and occasioning much loss of time. Besides Grand Rapid, which resembles the key of the country to the north, the traveller has yet to pass nine more rapids, some of them several miles in length, in which there is great risk of loss of life and property. These reasons alone, to say nothing of economy and saving of time, decides my opinion in favour of the route via Regina, Prince Albert, Green Lake Isle a la Crosse, Portage la Losche, Clearwater River and McMurray. As I have already said, this route presents no danger, is direct, very pleasant, and is like a pleasure trip. The essential point is to have a boat at Green Lake prepared beforehand, so as to gain time.

Such, my dear sir is my humble opinion, based upon my numerous voyages by each of these routes during the twenty-four years I have resided in the North-west, sixteen of which were passed in the missions on the Athabasca and Mackenzie.

Accept, dear sir my best salutations.

(Sgd.) ALBERT PASCHAL, O.M.I.,
Vic. Apost. de Saskatchewan.

Now, there was one remark that fell from my hon. friend from Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) that I do not quite agree with, if I understood him correctly. I understood him to say that it was not practicable at present to build railways from the centre of the territory.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). What I said was that I did not know whether it was practicable to build a railway from there or not, but it would take forty-five years, and we want to get a road open at once.

Mr. DAVIN. Then, there is no substantial difference between us, Mr. Speaker. I do not think the Government can too soon entertain the idea of building a line of railway that shall develop that Peace River country. I say there cannot be a better work for Canada or for the North-west Territories than to utilize these magnificent water stretches reaching from Prince Albert right on to the Mackenzie River, and thence by the head waters of the Porcupine you are swept down into the Yukon country. The Government cannot do better than immediately utilize this magnificent channel of lakes and rivers placed by nature at our disposal, as it were, to enable us to get in and possess the Yukon country. The Government cannot do this too soon. Not merely will they be opening, as it were, a door, and a door easy of access, for the miner into that country, but they will be preparing for the development of a country that, the shores of those lakes and rivers, is rich not merely in pasture lands and in some few places rich in arable lands, but I am assured by gentlemen who can speak with authority, in almost every corner of which mining can be successfully pursued. The railway from the centre is the true railway for Canada, the true railway to get the trade of this country for Canada. Look, Sir, what has come to our knowledge within a few days as to the peril to Canada with regard to the trade of the Yukon, because we have not a central railway. If you take over all these parts, you could have a good route, such as my hon. friend (Mr. Davis) speaks of, but you would have then a railway that would infallibly bring to us all the trade of this mining country that will be of such immense value to Canada, or ought to be, for years to come. For I do not believe it will play out with the rapidity that some gentlemen speak of. A short time ago I was reading in the "North American Review" an article written by an official of the United States, an official who spoke with authority in regard to mining matters, and he calculates that the mineral wealth of Alaska is equal to the whole mineral wealth that has been developed in California and on the Pacific Coast in the last fifty years. Well, if the mineral wealth of Alaska is so great, what must be the mineral wealth of the Canadian Klondike and Yukon? We know that this immeasurably exceeds the wealth of Alaska. What is the proof of it? The proof is that the American miner, instead of remaining in his own country, in Alaska, and mining under his own laws, has been for many months back hurrying across into Canadian territory in order that he may reap the rich gold harvest that is to be reaped there. So we have in our Klondike and Yukon country, if it be properly managed by the Government, if they be wise, untold wealth yet to be developed. Let us make sure that the great wealth of gold that is there shall be for our own people here in Canada.

If they do that, the trade of the Yukon and the trade of the Klondike will be secured for the merchants of Montreal, the merchants of Toronto, the merchants of Victoria. Then we shall have an invigorating source of wealth operating on older Canada that will give to Canada itself an immeasurable push forward in the march of progress. As it is now six o'clock, and as I do not want to prevent my hon. friend's motion from passing, this being our last day for private business, I will conclude my remarks.

Motion agreed to.

ANGLO-FRENCH TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

Mr. FRASER moved :

That the petition of Alexander Ferguson, of the city of Ottawa, and others, presented this day, praying for an Act of incorporation under the name of the Anglo-French Telegraph Company (Limited), be received forthwith and referred to the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman explain the object of this motion? My hon. friend is aware there was some discussion on the subject.

Mr. FRASER. It does not relate to the Act at all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Ferguson, on behalf of his friends, asked leave the other day to present a petition, which leave was granted, and the petition was presented. But it was omitted to have a motion passed, when motions were called. This is merely to remedy the neglect.

Mr. DAVIN.

Motion agreed to.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

SAFETY OF RAILWAYS EMPLOYEES AND PASSENGERS.

Orders of the Day for consideration of the Bill (No. 4) further to secure the safety of railway employees and passengers.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved that the order be discharged, and the Bill recommitted to Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MACLEAN. I hope before this Bill is referred back that the Government will give an expression of their opinion in regard to it. This is a measure on the lines of which I introduced a Bill five or six years ago; it is a Bill on the lines of legislation that is taking place in the United States, and it has been successful there. Railways under that legislation have been compelled to change their equipment, and a great many railways are having their equipment changed, all these provisions in the interest of the public are being enforced, and the time has now come when the roads must equip all their cars in the direction of this Bill. It is urged on behalf of the railways over there that the Bill is too stringent, and that some time ought to be given to them to allow them to equip the whole of their cars. I believe that time will be given to them. But so far in this country we have not given that power, we have not made the Bill law, and it is urged that we should not make this Bill law, because it is too hard on the railway companies. I say, make it law and give them reasonable time to change equipment. If the time proposed in the Bill is not sufficient, we can follow the example of the United States and extend the time. But so far as I can see, there is no disposition on the part of the Government, and their is no disposition on the part of this House, really to tackle the railway problem of this country, and to secure in some way justice for the people.

What is wanted in every country is for the legislature to try and solve the railway problem and compel the railway companies to do justice to the people. So far nothing of this kind has been done in Canada. Nothing has been done except in the direction of aggravating the railway situation. We vote large subsidies to railway corporations, and thereby make it harder for a railway company to exist. And then it is urged, why pass laws which make it more difficult for a railway company to secure a return on their investment? If such be the fact, we should stop creating further railway corporations and at the same time pass laws to compel the railway companies to-day to do justice to the people. This Bill is asked by men who work for the railways, it is asked by the people in the public interest; and yet although it was introduced five or six years ago, it has not made any headway, and the intention of the Government apparently is to discharge the order and not allow the Bill to pass. I hope, however, the Government will change its policy, and let the people understand clearly that they intend to do something in respect to this question. In view of the statements made by members of the Administration in this House and pledges given to the country, they are bound to do something towards the solution of the railway question. First, they should stop the subsidizing of new roads, which aggravates the situation and does not ameliorate the condition by giving cheaper rates and securing better accommodation. If they are earnest in dealing with the railway question, they should depoliticalise the Railway Department. The Minister has told the House that he administers the department from a political point of view, that he does so because of recommendations made by hon. gentlemen behind him. Such a course is not in line with progressive legislation. Another thing hon. gentlemen opposite should do is to create a railway commission.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is not permitted by the rules of the House to discuss the merits of the Bill on the question now before the Chair. The rules say:

On a motion to discharge the order for the second reading of a Bill, it is irregular to discuss the merits of such Bill.

MR. MACLEAN. There is a motion before the Chair to discharge this order, and this is equivalent to defeating the Bill. I propose to show the reasons why the order should not be discharged and the Bill allowed to pass. If the Government are in earnest, I say they will appoint a railway commission. The Government have been in power three sessions, in each of which the Bill has been considered, but no progress has been made and no legislation apparently will be had during the present session. The Bill altogether has been before the House five or six years; I have brought it up myself. It was jollied along by the late Government, and is being jollied along now. If the Government are in earnest they will pass a railway law and do the railway men and the public justice. I take this opportunity to protest against the action being taken against this Bill, and I hope the Government will not allow another year to pass without passing it into law.

MR. DAVIN. I certainly must add my protest to that of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) in regard to the present Bill. I thought the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) saw a haven of rest for his measure. It had passed through many difficulties, and after several years, during which it was taken up and discussed, it looked as if it would be carried during the present session. It is quite clear that the reason it is not to be carried is because of the powerful hostility, that has thus far been carefully veiled, of the Government in power. In 1891 I brought forward a Bill dealing with a similar condition of affairs to that proposed to be met by the present Bill. One of my objects on that occasion was to deal with the question of second homestead, and on dividing the House I brought down the Government majority to fourteen, whereupon Sir John Thompson stated that he would put my Bills on the Government paper. Then I thought my railway Bill was secure. I thought when the Government said they would take up my Bills, it was intended to take up all of them; but, as in this case, my railway Bill was referred to the Railway Committee. When before the committee I saw at once the position occupied by my poor Bill; an overwhelming majority was arrayed against it, comprised of members from both sides of the House; and an extraordinary circumstance occurred, namely, that an hon. member, who had given me good points and furnished me with arguments in support of my Bill, spoke against it, because of the tremendous influence exercised in his constituency by the Grand Trunk Railway. I got, however, a promise from the Canadian Pacific Railway that they would gradually introduce into the North-west the things provided for by the Bill, and I must say they have to a considerable extent, done so, and they have shown very good faith. These included fire brakes and the gradual introduction of automatic couplers and some other things. I saw, however, it was no use whatever for a private member to initiate legislation of this kind. Each time either the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) or any other hon. member has brought forward a railway Bill, I have supported it, and when the Conservative Government was in power I used whatever little influence I possessed with that Government to have them push it forward, and since then I have urged on hon. gentlemen who are supposed to have influence with the present Government to forward any measure of this kind, but an hon. member cannot succeed unless the Government throws its heavy hand into the scale. I thought my hon. friend was really to succeed in regard to this, but now it seems that this year he too will have to succumb.

The PRIME MINISTER. Will my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) permit me to interrupt him to say, that his indignation is altogether wasted as there is no cause for it. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Casey) is satisfied that there is no cause at all for the indignation of my hon. friend (Mr. Davin). The Government have looked into this Bill and we are satisfied, as has been explained on more than one occasion by the Minister of Railways, that the first six clauses which deal with the object of my hon. friend (Mr. Casey) has in view, can be legislated upon here; but the 7th clause is one which is clearly beyond the purview of this Parliament. It deals with a question which affects civil rights and is within the domain of the provincial legislatures. Last Monday night when we had this matter under consideration, the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) was absent from the House, and as I had not the benefit of previous conference with him, I had to allow the 7th clause to pass, although I had very grave doubts as to its legality. I then told my hon. friend (Mr. Casey) that we would consult the Minister of Justice, and if the Minister of Justice reported that the 7th clause was within the power of this Parliament we would let it go, but if the Minister of Justice found that it was not within the power of this Parliament, then I would ask the Bill to be referred back to the Committee of the Whole, in order to expunge this 7th clause, so that the rest of the Bill should pass.

Mr. DAVIN. I was under the impression that the motion made by the Prime Minister was to discharge the order.

The PRIME MINISTER. Exactly, but to refer the Bill back to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DAVIN. If the Bill, with the exception of the 7th clause is to be adopted, I candidly admit that substantial progress will have been made.

The PRIME MINISTER. I expected it was the policy of my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) to oppose the Government.

Mr. DAVIN. If the righteous indignation needs a salve, I can assure the right hon. gentleman that the salve will not be refused by me. I am glad to learn that the first six clauses are to be adopted, and I suppose when we go into committee there is nothing to prevent us moving a substitute for clause 7?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. So far as there having been any disposition on the part of the Government to frustrate the first clauses of the Bill, my hon. friend (Mr. Casey) will, I think, acknowledge that he had every assistance which is was possible for me to render in perfecting them.

Mr. DAVIN.

Mr. CASEY. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have devoted some little attention towards providing suggestions with regard to clauses 3, 4, 5 and 6, which I thought would make the Bill effective, and which were readily accepted by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey).

Mr. CASEY. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. An insuperable difficulty has arisen as respects the 7th clause and the subsections connected with it.

Mr. CASEY. The question apparently at issue is whether this course proposed to be taken will make an end of the Bill. We might as well argue the matter of jurisdiction in committee as now, but I do not wish to agree to this motion to discharge the order and go back into the Committee of the Whole if it is going to prevent the passage of this Bill to-night, in the shape in which it leaves the committee. We are well aware that this is probably the last night for Bills of this kind, as the Government, in the latter part of last week, made a move for taking Mondays. If the right hon. the Premier undertakes to see that the Bill, in whatever shape it may leave the committee, is put through its final stages to-night, I am willing to agree to the motion to go back into Committee of the Whole; otherwise I will have to take a vote upon it.

The PRIME MINISTER. In so far as the Government is concerned, there will be no disposition to delay the Bill; on the contrary, there will be every disposition to assist my hon. friend (Mr. Casey) in passing the first six clauses.

Mr. CASEY. There is another point I wish to refer to. I presume that any person can object to the Bill taking its several stages to-night?

The PRIME MINISTER. We cannot help that.

Mr. CASEY. We can only help that by not going back into committee. If any opposition of that kind arises I do not propose to go into committee with my consent; of course it will have to go to committee if the Government say so.

Motion agreed to, order discharged, and the House again resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I move that clause 7 be struck out.

Mr. CASEY. I am aware of the grounds urged for striking out this clause. I have been told, again and again, by the Government that it was beyond our powers. I have urged in reply that it seemed to me that the power to legislate in this direction was a necessary incident of our power over railways declared to be for the benefit of Canada. I have urged by way of analogy the case of real estate. Real estate is a matter placed under the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures; but in so far as real estate is a necessary incident of railway legislation, it has been admitted on all hands to be within the power of this House in regard to Dominion railways. Provincial legislation in regard to drainage, fencing, and so forth, has not been held to apply to Dominion railways on that ground. I have urged, and I still urge by analogy, that the relations between employers and employed in connection with Dominion railways are within the jurisdiction of this Parliament. We constantly make legislation in regard to contracts. In banking legislation we enact laws as to the giving of warehouse receipts. In this legislation matters of contract are involved, and I believe that contracts between the employer and employed in connection with Dominion railways are also within the jurisdiction of this House, with all due respect to the legal authorities that have been said to be against that view. Though I have asked the hon. Minister of Railways on several occasions to produce a written opinion of the Minister of Justice as to the unconstitutionality of this provision, I find that he has not yet had time to get it. Now, it would certainly have great weight with this House if such a written opinion were obtained, for we know that the Minister of Justice is a constitutional authority. I do not say that his opinion should be or would be decisive with every member of this House. We have each a right to form our own opinion on constitutional questions, irrespective of any legal opinion that may be given. We have a right to our own opinion on this question, which is a legal question, and not a party question, or one affecting the Government in any way. The Government whip tells me, while I am speaking, that the Minister of Justice is the adviser of the Crown, and not of the House. Well, I think probably the Crown might obtain the loan of one of his reports or opinions on this question for the use of the House. I have been waiting for that opinion, but it has not yet been produced. I have not heard the opinion of any of those lawyers who have dealt much with constitutional questions on this provision. From that statement I must except the right hon. Premier himself, whose opinion appears in this case to be adverse to me. I am afraid, however, that he has not had his attention called very earnestly to all the phases of the question. If it had come up in discussion with any lawyer, he might have gone more fully into it. I am not sure that he might not change his opinion if he went into all aspects of the question. For these reasons I am not willing to assent to the knocking out of this clause. It is the important clause of the whole Bill. The improvements which are asked for by the Bill in the equipment of railway cars, are being made with fair rapidity by the railways themselves in their own interest. The use of this Bill would be chiefly to hasten those improvements. But this clause is of supreme importance in establishing what railway men consider to be fair-play between themselves and their employers. Railway employment is a peculiarly risky one, and it is held by those who favour this Bill—who I think are the majority of this House—that special provision should be made in the case of such a risky employment—that the ordinary rules of law as to negligence should not be enforced, and that the employer in such a risky employment should be made subject to the risks arising out of the nature of the employment itself, and not simply those arising out of any special negligence on his part. I need not go over the whole ground. The British Parliament has taken the same view and has enacted something wider than this; but I am only proposing to legislate with regard to railway employment, which I think we have power to do. I am, therefore, obliged to oppose the motion of the Minister of Railways to strike out this clause. If the House think with him, they will have to vote that way, otherwise I ask them to vote for the clause.

Mr. MACLEAN. The way to test the constitutionality of this provision is to make it the law, and let it go to the courts and be settled there. The Government are not prepared to give an opinion to-night as to its constitutionality. With regard to compensation to workmen, what are the facts? In the United States, where the population is twice that of Great Britain, thousands of men are killed every year on the railways, whereas in England not a dozen people are killed in a year, because there they have better laws for the protection of the men who work on railways.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Has my hon. friend the statistics on the point?

Mr. MACLEAN. The statistics are in the reports of the Inter-State Commerce Commission. They are something alarming as to the sacrifices of human life on the railways, and the railway companies simply snap their fingers at the brakemen and engineers who are killed one after another. In this country we cannot get remedial legislation for railway employees. I would like to quote what is said in the paper of which the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) is the editor in regard to getting railway legislation through this Parliament. It says:

Things have apparently come to a pretty pass when no legislation can be passed without first saying by your leave to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and arranging a compromise with the company.

I hope this Parliament will rise superior to this state of things and pass this law, and let it go to the courts where it can be decided whether we have jurisdiction or not. Let us show the workmen on the railways that Parliament does take an interest in their calling, and put a law on the Statute-book in the line of the laws that have been enacted in England and in the United States. The Government are not prepared to-night to give their express opinion that this Bill is ultra vires of this Parliament. Then I say they are in duty bound to grant the petitions which have been sent here from one end of the country to the other, by passing this law.

The PRIME MINISTER. When this matter was before the House a week ago to-day, I undertook to consult the Department of Justice in order to ascertain whether or not this Bill was within the purview of the powers of this Parliament. The answer I received was that beyond doubt this clause is not within the purview of the powers of this Parliament, as it is a provision which clearly affects the law of contract with regard to civil rights. If that be so, I would point out to my hon. friend that it would be a very poor service to render to the class he wants to benefit to pass such a law. His argument is, let us pass the law, and let the question of its constitutionality be decided by the courts. It would be well enough to do so if the men who were to be the parties to the litigation were two powerful companies who would be quite able to carry the law from court to court until it should be finally determined by judicial authority. But if my hon. friend will remember that one of the litigants would be a poor working man, having neither the power nor the money to carry litigation to that point, I think he will see that by this Bill we would be rendering this man a very poor service indeed. By the civil code of the province of Quebec, whoever receives an injury upon a railway has a remedy against the company, so that no legislation is required in this Parliament, and the legislation proposed will introduce a new condition of things which does not exist under the laws of Quebec. If, therefore, that man were to sue under this legislation for compensation, it is certain he would not obtain any whatever. When the judicial authority of this Government is clear and beyond doubt the Parliament has no jurisdiction over this matter, I think it is better for us not to meddle with it and to refer the parties to the provincial legislatures for their remedy. Far be it for me to offer any objection upon the merits of this proposed legislation. Legislation is progressive in every country, especially to-day, and I know that during last summer, the British Parliament went very far indeed in the direction of providing compensation for injuries. The only objection I offer is that we have no power to pass such a law, and that we would be rendering no service to the workingman to put useless weapons in his hands.

Mr. MACLEAN. Where does the jurisdiction lie?

The PRIME MINISTER. In the provincial legislatures.

Mr. POWELL. I would like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister if, in consulting the Justice Department, he drew any distinction between railways that are under the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada and those that are not. When this Bill was before the special committee, I remember distinctly pointing out that clearly the Parliament of Canada had no right to infringe upon the jurisdiction of the local legislatures in the case of railways that were chartered by the local legislatures, and I did, at the same time, express some doubts as to whether we had jurisdiction in the case of Dominion railways. I would like to know if the Department of Justice drew any distinction between the two.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I have to say that this is a question that is not in doubt, so far as the courts are concerned. The very point now brought up was decided in the case of the Canada Southern and Jackson, 17 Supreme Court Reports. In that case the court decided that the Workman's Compensation for Injuries Act of Ontario, 49 Vic., c. 28, applies to the Canada Southern Railway Company, notwithstanding it had been brought under the operation of the Government Railways Act of the Dominion.

Mr. POWELL. It is not exactly the same point, but it is a kindred one.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It seems to me to be the very point my hon. friend has suggested, as to whether or not a provincial legislature would have the right to legislate in the case of a railway which was declared to be for the general benefit of Canada.

Mr. POWELL. No doubt it would be unconstitutional for this Parliament to deal with any railway that is entirely under the jurisdiction of the local legislature. But the point I raise is as to whether the local legislatures had jurisdiction over railways for the general benefit of Canada.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I cannot see the distinction in principle at all. The question here, at all events, is one of civil rights. It does not amount to anything else. Are you going to determine here what the rights are of an individual to obtain compensation for an injury suffered by him within the limits of a province? That is surely a question of civil rights beyond our jurisdiction. In the very case I have cited, Judge Patterson said:

It is not legislation respecting such local works and undertakings as are excepted from the legislative jurisdiction of the provinces by article 10 of section 92 of the British North America Act. It touches the civil rights of the provinces. The rule of law which it alters was a rule of common law in no way dependent or arising out of Dominion legislation, and the measure is strictly of the same class as Lord Campbell's Act which, as adopted by provincial legislation, has been applied without question to all our railways.

I cannot see the distinction between the two cases. If the hon. gentleman will read the report, he will see that it is identically the same point.

Mr. CASEY. What is the nature of this case ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. My hon. friend must be aware of the fact that there is legislation in Ontario exactly similar to the one he wants to introduce here.

Mr. CASEY. Not at all.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. 49 Vic., chap. 28.

Mr. CASEY. Was this a suit for wages ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It was a suit for compensation for injury. It is exactly clause 7.

Mr. CASEY. My hon. friend surely does not wish to create the impression that there is legislation in the province of Ontario similar to what I am trying to secure by this Bill. I know he is aware that such legislation does not exist in that province, and he could not wish to convey such an impression. But the point is not whether provincial legislation may be held to apply in certain cases, but whether Dominion legislation might not also apply. I hold there is concurrent jurisdiction. It is quite as clear in the constitution that real estate and every thing incident to it are under the control of the local legislatures as that civil rights are, yet it has been held, time and again, that legislation as to real estate, where Dominion railways are concerned, is within the power of this House, and by analogy it is quite as clear that there is concurrent jurisdiction in the question of the relations between employer and employee when Dominion railways are in question. One decision of a court on a local Act, in the absence of Dominion legislation, does not decide the matter. Previous to the legislation in the early eighties, when so many railways were declared to be Dominion railways for the benefit of Canada, local Acts did apply to them ; but as soon as this Parliament chose to legislate on the matter, it was held that our legislation overrode that of the local legislatures in regard to these particular roads declared to be Dominion roads, and the provincial legislation did not apply to them any longer. I believe the same thing would happen if we were to legislate in the direction I ask. If we were to pass a law determining the relations between employer and employee on Dominion railways, the courts would hold them to be constitutional just as they did our other legislation with regard to these railways. I am not a lawyer, but I have studied the constitution to some extent, as a member of Parliament must. All I can do is to listen to the legal arguments and offer my opinion, as a jurymen or an independent man, and I simply ask the House to do the same. No opinion from anybody is absolutely decisive until we have the decision of the highest court, and we have not had that on this question.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We have the decision of the highest court in this country. Without being a member of the Bar of the province of Ontario, I do know, and I presume the hon. gentleman ought to know, of the existence of the statute 49 Vic., chap. 29, which has for its effect the providing of compensation to workmen for injuries sustained by them on railways

Mr. CASEY. Not similar to this Bill.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It is absolutely the same.

Mr. CASEY. It is not absolutely similar, though it may be in the same class of legislation. I suppose what he wishes to point out is that it is legislation of the same class, but no similar legislation to this has been passed in this country yet.

The PRIME MINISTER. There is a statute of the province of Ontario upon this subject. I desire to draw the attention of my hon. friend (Mr. Casey) also to the law of the province of Quebec. In that province there is no statute applying to workmen on railways in particular, but we have a general law respecting the responsibility of parties in such cases. Section 1053 of the Civil Code, which is the common law of the province, says :

Every person capable of discerning right from wrong is responsible for the damage caused by his fault to another, whether by positive act, imprudence, neglect or want of skill.

Nothing could be broader than these words. A subsection says :

The responsibility attaches in the above cases only when the person subject to it fails to establish that he was unable to prevent the act which has caused the damage.

Now, here you have a section enacting the very reverse of what the hon. gentleman proposes here. He is putting the responsibility upon the company, without having to plead the contributory negligence of the employee.

Mr. CASEY. If contributory negligence can be proved, this Bill cannot apply.

The PRIME MINISTER. But here is enough to show that this new provision is antagonistic to the law of our province.

I say this merely to illustrate the likeness that exists between this and the legislation we were asked to pass in regard to the Sabbath. We found that there was legislation on the subject in every province. We rejected the Bill, though we had jurisdiction in the matter, because it was a Bill establishing a criminal offence. But here you have a direct invasion of the law of civil rights as it exists in the province of Quebec. Therefore, it seems to me the argument is overwhelming that we have not jurisdiction.

Mr. MACLEAN. Then, I understand that the Solicitor General and the First Minister recommend the railway men, if they desire legislation of this kind, to go to the several provincial legislatures, because the subject is not within the jurisdiction of this Parliament.

The PRIME MINISTER. Certainly.

Mr. POWELL. I am sorry to say that I cannot regard the argument of the Solicitor General or that of the Prime Minister as absolutely conclusive. There is no question, as the Solicitor General says, that this legislation is an interference with private rights. But I do not assent to the proposition that because legislation is an interference with private rights it is ultra vires of this Parliament. What private right can be more sacred than that of personal liberty, yet this Parliament can take away a man's personal liberties in case of infraction of its laws. I mention that merely to show that it is not conclusive to say that this is an interference with private rights and therefore we have no jurisdiction. When this matter was before the special committee, of which I was a member, I pointed out to the committee that I regarded this clause as it stood ultra vires in some aspects in which it could be looked upon as it applied to all railways in Canada, and those incorporated by the local legislatures are beyond the control of this Parliament. My opinion is not a matured opinion, or one that I would care to bind myself to act upon without further looking into the matter. This matter came up before our committee, and Judge Clark, who was present at the time, was of the opinion, so far as it applied to companies incorporated by the Dominion, it was not ultra vires, and that is my opinion, as far as I have formed an opinion, although I would not give it as a final opinion without further consideration of the matter. The Solicitor General says that inasmuch as it has been decided by the highest court of our Dominion that the legislation of the province of Ontario relating to workmen is applicable to railways, therefore it is conclusive of the proposition that this Parliament has not the right to legislate concerning it. I will bring to the notice of the hon. gentleman a perfectly parallel case. This Parliament has the right, and the exclusive right, to legislate on bankruptcy and insolvency. Yet, notwithstanding that, in the absence of legislation on these subjects, the legislature has certainly the right to go, not to the full extent of bankruptcy, and but to go far in that direction. Take the Ontario Act which dealt with subjects usually covered by the word insolvency. And that Act was carried to the highest court and went on appeal to the Privy Council and was decided to be constitutional. The legislation of Ontario will stand until this Parliament exercises its jurisdiction so far as bankruptcy is concerned. If it does exercise its jurisdiction over the subject of bankruptcy, and enacts provisions inconsistent with the Ontario Act, there is no question that the legislation of this Parliament would override that of the province. So long, then, as we have no legislation touching upon railway companies, in the matters touched upon by this Act, so long it is within the competency of the local legislatures, in the exercise of their jurisdiction touching civil rights, to pass legislation such as the Ontario Act. That does not say that we cannot legislate on the subject or if we did our legislation would not override theirs. Without giving an opinion by which I would care to be bound without looking further into the matter, I see the difficulties in the position of the Solicitor General, and see how his arguments are not conclusive. I will give a perfectly analogous case, one under navigation and shipping, which is relegated exclusively to the Parliament of Canada. Now, according to the argument of the Solicitor General anything that extended the rights of the sailor to his wages would be ultra vires of this Parliament.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Of course, my hon. friend (Mr. Powell) will understand that I do not agree that my argument went on that line.

Mr. POWELL. I certainly so understood it. If I misconstrue the hon. gentleman's words, perhaps he will be good enough to set me right.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Let the hon. gentleman go on and make his statement.

Mr. POWELL. I will take chapter 74 of the Merchants' Shipping Act, which may not be in force by reason of the last Imperial Act, but it was in force up to a short time ago, and acknowledged universally to be constitutional. By subsection 36 of that Act this Parliament went further than strict legislation in navigation and shipping, and conferred new rights, unknown to the common law, upon seamen in connection with their wages. This was a modification of the common law and a direct interference with civil rights a subject exclusively within the jurisdiction of the province. Another case is the Banking Act. This Parliament has gone so far as to override the provisions, express and implied, of the statutes of local legislatures by its legislation in respect to cove receipts, warehouse receipts—matters universally acknowledged to belong to the local legislatures as civil rights, and have overridden the provisions made by the legislatures with regard to the bills of sale. The matter before the committee is not one that I regard as free from doubt. It has never been expressly decided by the highest tribunal for the colonies, and it must have a judicial decision before we can say that the matter is free from doubt. It seems to me, however, at present that we have the jurisdiction. The advisability of passing this legislation is another thing. There is no doubt that in England the most socialistic legislation probably in the world is being enacted by Parliament.

These may be good provisions, or they may be bad. One thing is certain, that the growing socialistic influence in England has operated badly upon her trade and commerce within the last few years, and has seriously embarrassed her within the last twelve months. One feature of this Bill calls for remand—that under all circumstances negligence shall be imputed to the railway company and not to the individual, is a very hard and tyrannical provision, I think.

Mr. CASEY. There is no such provision.

Mr. POWELL. That is practically what it means. The Bill, I admit, was modified by us after it came before the committee. It virtually constitutes a railway company an insurance company with no premium paid for the risks they are undertaking. That seems to me a harsh provision, and it does not go to prevent the injured individual from going beyond and exercising his common law rights in addition. The provision seemed to me harsh at the time, and my objections to it were objections on the merits. This Bill, I think, might be allowed to go with a lot of other measures that have gone through this House, notwithstanding the opinion of the Solicitor General.

Mr. CASEY. I would like to correct the hon. gentleman's recollection in one respect. This Act says that if any employee or the representatives of any employee accept the compensation provided by this Act, he or they shall have no further claim at law against the company. If he accepts compensation he can proceed no further. But he can take his choice between the compensation given by this proposed Act and the compensation he could get at common law. He cannot have both.

Mr. POWELL. Our statutes are full of provisions of that kind. Take the cases of suing constables for violation of their duties; take the cases of suing justices of the peace for breach of duty; take the case provided in our Criminal Code by which, if a man pays a fine which is imposed for common assault, he shall be free from all civil suits thereafter. That provision strikes one as being, on the face of it, unconstitutional, and I have no doubt the Solicitor General will say that it was unconstitutional, yet it has been enacted and re-enacted two or three times since 1869 when it first passed. The proper course is to let the courts of the country decide as to whether this Bill is ultra vires or intra vires.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). I want to ask a question to enable me to vote intelligently. I want to know from the Solicitor General whether at the present time there is a law in Ontario to give an employee on a railway the same right that would be given to him under this Bill, if passed? If that is the case, I do not see why we should go any further. It is a matter of civil rights under the jurisdiction of Ontario, and we should not interfere. I wish to be enabled to cast an intelligent vote, and would like to have an answer from the Solicitor General.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I believe the Ontario Compensation Act goes quite as far as this provision of the law does.

Mr. CASEY. If the Solicitor General will take the trouble to read the Bill carefully, he will find it does not, that the Ontario Act proceeds on quite a different line. The Ontario Compensation Act gives compensation in case of negligence by the employer, and so forth. I have not got it here, as he has, and cannot give the exact terms, but that is the drift of it. This Bill presupposes, as the British Bill on the subject presupposed, as we think it ought to be presupposed, that the employer, in a specially risky employment, shall be responsible for accidents arising out of the nature of the employment itself, even where no negligence on his part has been proven. This Bill does not throw the blame of negligence upon the employer, it says that if a man is killed in this particular employment, or if he is injured, he shall have a certain moderate compensation, no matter whether there has been any actual negligence on the part of the employer or not. It says, however, that if the employer can prove negligence on the part of the employee, then he is not to be liable to damages, and if the employee or his representative accepts the compensation given by this Act, then he cannot proceed at law for any other compensation. It is possible that under the Workmen's Compensation Act of Ontario, the workman might get higher damages than this Bill gives, in some cases he probably could. But this Bill simplifies the proceeding, it does not require the man to prove negligence, and makes it much more convenient and fair for the employee. I am sure the Solicitor General has not read this Bill with sufficient care thoroughly to understand its bearing, or he would not say it is the same as the Workmen's Compensation Act of Ontario. The Workmen's Compensation Act of Ontario is practically the same as the Workmen's Compensation Act of England. I know the Bill that has been passed in England, referring to employees in risky occupations, is practically the same as my Bill, but my Bill is not a copy of theirs, and theirs was not copied from mine, although it happened that mine was in print and introduced to this House a year before theirs was passed, and is different in some of its details. But even if this Bill were identical with the Ontario Workmen's Compensation Act, that would not settle the case, because there are other provinces where the legislation is considerably different on the subject.

Mr. MACLEAN. I would like to point out for the information of the First Minister, when he says that if this Bill becomes law a poor workman, being a single man, would be unable to vindicate his rights against a powerful railway corporation, that these railway workingmen have large and strong organizations for the vindication of their rights, and that if they have this Bill on the Statute-book that they will find sufficient money, and they will be backed up by the public in having that law vindicated. I still think, notwithstanding the opinion that has been expressed here to-night, that this committee ought to pass this Bill and let it go to the courts that we may find out whether we have jurisdiction or not. The Minister of Trade and Commerce asked me: What are the statistics in regard to railway accidents. The statistics are such that unless some legislation like this is passed, and the railways are compelled to be more careful of life, then this widespread destruction of human life will continue. In Canada last year there were 213 people killed on our railways. Seven of them were passengers, 76 were employees, and 130 were other persons. In the United States the statistics are simply appalling, and show the necessity of passing some kind of legislation with a penalty attached, which will compel the railways to be more careful of the lives of their employees. The statistics in the United States for 1895 show that 1,811 railway employees were killed, and 25,696 were injured. Of passengers, 170 were killed and 2,375 were injured. Of other persons, 4,135 were killed, over 8 a day, and 5,677 were injured. The total shows 6,136 people killed annually in the United States by railways, and over 33,000 injured. Now, that is a state of affairs in Canada and in the United States which calls for legislation in protection of the life and limb of the people who are working on these railways. The way to secure that protection is to compel railways to adopt these safety appliances, and to attach a penalty to the law as we propose to do. That is all we ask, that is all the railway men of this country ask. From what the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) says, I believe this House has concurrent jurisdiction in this matter, and that if we pass this law the courts will vindicate it, and we will do simply what has been done in the old country in the way of putting a law on the Statute-book which will compel the railway companies to adopt such appliances as will guarantee a sure protection to life and limb. In the United Kingdom they do not kill thirty railway employees in a year, and a very small number of the public, and this is simply on account of the legislation which compels the railway companies to adopt life-saving appliances.

The PRIME MINISTER. It is advisable that we should understand where we are and what we are doing. If the hon. gentleman wants the House to pass legislation regarding appliances to secure the safety of life and limb, that is what we are doing by the first section of the Bill. So far as the first section is concerned there is no difference of opinion as to what the hon. gentleman is advocating. When the hon. gentleman says it is necessary to attach penalties for the non-observance of those requisites by the company, so far I agree with him. But that is not what is suggested by clause 7. That does not apply to any negligence on the part of the company as regards operating the road, but it undertakes to say what shall be the civil consequences of certain acts done by railway companies. This is very far from imposing a penalty. This Parliament has the right to impose a penalty, because it has jurisdiction over similar matters. But this Parliament has no right to determine by legislation what shall be the legal or civil consequences of a tort or wrong. This is an attribute of the local legislatures. I sympathize with everything that has been said by the hon. gentleman in regard to the railway employees. I think the men who work on railroads are as much exposed to danger as are soldiers, and they are entitled, to every sympathy and consideration; but, though so entitled, there is a way of giving them the protection to which they are entitled, and this Parliament can give a certain class of protection, and we do it by compelling the railway companies to use certain appliances for the protection of life and limb. But when it comes to the civil consequences of a wrong done by a railway company, we have no power, whatever may be our desire to benefit them or come to their aid. I therefore ask Parliament not to be carried away by any sense of the wrongs to which railway men are subjected—I agree with everything of that kind—but let us legislate within our power and purview. There are other legislatures. The railway men have undoubtedly rights, but there are proper tribunals to adjudge and legislate as to those rights. This is not the place to obtain the remedy as regards certain of those rights. But the remedy should be sought from the legislatures which have the power to deal with the question.

Mr. CRAIG. I intend to vote for the amendment to strike out the clause, for the reasons given by the right hon. Prime Minister. The grounds on which I oppose the clause are the same as those presented by the right hon. gentleman. Some of the subsections have been discussed, and I am not discussing them at present. I am not a lawyer, but I agree with the view expressed by the Solicitor General that we have not the power to pass a clause of this kind, that this deals with matters within the jurisdiction of the local legislatures. I wish, however, to reply to one remark made by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) when discussing this question. He seemed to insinuate, in fact he more than insinuated, that it was impossible to have any measure passed respecting the power of the railway companies because the House is under the control of those railway companies and powerful corporations. I have heard that statement made before, but I do not agree with it. I believe this Parliament is always willing and is ready to-day to do anything that may be necessary to restrain their powers, but hon. members should not feel compelled to do something which they do not deem desirable simply because it may be said that they are afraid to act. I do not feel under any obligation to either of the two great railway companies, and if there is any measure submitted in the interest of the country I am willing to support it no matter what these corporations may think. I scarcely deem it necessary to make this statement, but I do so because this remark has been made more than once, and the people of the country, may possibly think, if no contradiction is given, that there may be some truth in the idea.

Mr. POWELL. In the Railway Act I find two provisions that support the principles I have endeavoured to set forth. If section 241 of the Railway Act is to be taken as good legislation, this is probably so too. Take the case of cattle running at large. It is a civil right, and the Dominion Parliament has no power to deal with it as such, yet it is in fact dealt with in our legislation. Section provides as follows:—

No horses, sheep, swine or other cattle shall be permitted to be at large upon any highway, within half a mile of the intersection of such highway with any railway at rail level, unless such cattle are in charge of some person or persons to prevent their loitering or stopping on such highway at such intersection.

All cattle found at large contrary to the provisions of this section may, by any person who finds the same at large be impounded in the pound nearest to the place where the same are found, and the pound-keeper with whom the same are so impounded shall detain the same in like manner, and subject to the like regulations as to the care and disposal thereof, as in the case of cattle impounded for trespass on private property.

There is a case where jurisdiction has been exercised by this Parliament. I can see where the Solicitor General would attempt to draw a distinction.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He would succeed too.

Mr. POWELL. He would draw the distinction that the legislation was to protect the railway especially at crossings where cattle might be dangerous to the safe operating of the railway with safety. I will come in a moment to a clause affecting railways in respect to which the hon. gentleman cannot draw that distinction. That clause is in regard to weeds, and is 275. It reads as follows:—

Every company shall cause all thistles and other noxious weeds growing on the clear land or ground adjoining the railway and belonging to such company to be cut down early in July in each year, or to be rooted out.

Every company which fails to comply with this sections shall incur a penalty of $2 for every day.

My hon. friend may say that he has made that part and parcel of the criminal law. That would be an extreme contention. It is not ordinarily a part of criminal law; but I will not go to the extent of saying that this Parliament has not the power to create something not heretofore regarded a criminal crime. It has that power. The provision of this Bill relating to compensation to employees, it is argued, is not incident to railway legislation. In the case of shipping legislation, this Parliament had extended the right of seamen, where it is not necessary in the ordinary sense of that term. The judge in these matters is this Parliament, and so long as this Parliament exercises its judgment bona fide, it has the power. The Privy Council has intimated, that from the facts on the face of the legislation it may have been for some ulterior purpose, and not bona fide railway legislation, and consequently a fraud on our constitutional power. That may be so clear as to influence the court to decide that the statute is ultra vires. The question is this: Does this Parliament consider that this is so necessarily incidental—I do not mean absolutely necessarily incidental; we all know what necessary means in law—does this Parliament consider that this is so necessary to railway legislation that it should pass it. Take an extreme case: Suppose that under existing laws companies found it was difficult to get employees to work upon railway lines, and this Parliament thought it was an advisable means to meet that difficulty by providing that any man who worked upon a railway would be entitled to an allowance of $3,000, or any other sum, in case an accident happened to him. It would then be considered necessary by a court to enact such a law, and if that emergency occurred there could be no question at all about this Parliament having the power; but whether it would be advisable to exercise that power would be another matter entirely. I repeat that I lean to the view that this Bill, technically at least, is within our jurisdiction; whether it is in the spirit of our jurisdiction or not is a question that might be open to comment. However, I do not think that as a matter of expediency the time has arrived when it is desirable to have such legislation, or to give force and effect to the jurisdiction which is reposed in us.

Mr. BRITTON. I am in sympathy with the attempt of the promoter of the Bill to have some legislation of this kind, considering the number of accidents that have happened on railways and considering the desirability of protecting as far as possible the lives and limbs of those engaged in such employment. In regard to what some people have said, and some newspapers have said, I, for one, resent any statement or insinuation that this Parliament or any member of it is afraid of any railway company, or is afraid to vote against railway companies because of their power in the country or anything of that kind. We are prepared at all times to do justly by the railways on the one side and by the employees and the public on the other. There are two or three points in connection with this measure to which I wish to call attention. In the first place, the Ontario legislation does not go as far as this Bill does, and the Ontario Act is consequently very different from the one we are considering. The proposed Bill practically makes the railway company the insurer of the lives of its employees. Very few of us believe, who have had experience in the courts, that in one case out of twenty would a jury find that a man was guilty of negligence when an accident happens him. And when we go so far as to admit that, then practically if this Act did pass it would make the railway company the insurer of the lives of its employees and so it goes a great deal farther than the Ontario Act. Whether we have come to the time when such a law ought to be passed against railway companies is another matter, and I think, under the circumstances we perhaps have hardly come to the point when such a law as this ought to be passed. It will come, I dare say, and before long too, that either in the provincial or Dominion Parliament such a law will be enacted. Whether we ought to pass it just now, and merely upon the discussion that has taken place is another and a very different matter. There certainly is a doubt about our jurisdiction, and ought we in the face of that doubt, pass a law merely for the purpose of having it carried by litigants to the highest courts of the land.

Mr. POWELL.

Mr. MACLEAN. Yes.

Mr. BRITTON. I differ from my hon. friend on that. I do not think it is well to invite a poor man, or the family of a poor man who is injured, to carry litigation to the highest court merely for the purpose of testing his right. I admit that the hon. the Solicitor General has not convinced me that we have not to some extent jurisdiction to pass some such law as this. There are three phases involved in the Bill presented. First, so far as it applies to provincial railways I suppose it is acknowledged that we have no jurisdiction to legislate. Second, as to whether it applies to railways that are for the general benefit of Canada or railways that have their charter from this Dominion, it depends upon whether this question is one of civil rights pure and simple. It seems to me it is something more than that. Here is a corporation that for its very existence depends upon what this Parliament has done. If it depends upon that, surely we have a right to say something in regard to how that railway should use its statutory powers. If the railways chartered by this Parliament use their statutory powers in such a way that some one is injured cannot this Parliament say: Not that we are taking away the right of the individual and dealing with something that only the provincial Parliament has power to deal with; but that we are rather putting a liability upon the railway company, and which may be to a certain extent enlarging the rights of the individual who has been injured by this railway corporation the creature of the Dominion Parliament. Then again we unquestionably have the right here to deal with the Government railways.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The Bill does not profess to deal with Government railways.

Mr. BRITTON. If it does not then that is a different thing.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. In the absence of clear and explicit language involving the Crown it cannot apply to Government railways.

Mr. CASEY. The Bill says "all railways."

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is not sufficient.

Mr. BRITTON. That may not be sufficient, and this goes to show the difficulties that arise on the wording of the Bill. So that I think under present circumstances we perhaps ought not pass the 7th clause to-night. We should, I think, leave it for further consideration, and if necessary have it introduced at another session.

Mr. CASEY. It has been introduced often enough.

Mr. BRITTON. It has never been discussed before to my knowledge, and the attention of members has never been called to it as during the present session. Having had our thoughts directed to the importance of the measure, and having regard for the doubts and difficulties in the way, I think we ought not to go further with it at the present time.

Mr. CASEY. I am obliged to my hon. friend who has just sat down for having pointed out a very material consideration—that we have a right to impose conditions on the charters granted by this Parliament. I have always understood that it has been upon that line of argument that we have acquired our right to deal with questions of real estate when they concern Dominion railways. The hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) has shown very clearly, that when dealing even with what may be called matter of municipal police, like the running of cattle at large and weeds on the roadbeds of railways, this Parliament has exercised jurisdiction without question.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Surely there is no analogy between these cases.

Mr. CASEY. I quite agree with the hon. Minister that there is no strict analogy, because of the two cases the one that seems far the least likely to come within our jurisdiction is that regarding the cutting of weeds. If either of the two could possibly come within our jurisdiction, it is the treatment of their employees by the corporations which we create, whereas the cutting of weeds is a matter for the benefit of the adjacent farmer. Surely that is much further from what may be considered our powers than the relations between railways and their employees; and I am obliged to the hon. member for Westmoreland for bringing up that case. It has been urged by more than one that we should not pass this law so long as we have any doubts about its constitutionality. I do not think there is much in that. I think those who ask for legislation, if that legislation is desirable, ought to get the benefit of the doubt. You can never be sure that any legislation that passes this House is constitutional. Many a time we have passed legislation which has turned out to be unconstitutional when it got to the highest court in the realm. There was a great variety of opinion about it, as there is about this measure; but there is no way to have the question finally determined except by carrying it through the courts to the Privy Council. It may be that the Privy Council is not right in its decisions; but whether it is right or not, its decision is final. The Solicitor General has proven that in the absence of Dominion legislation certain provincial statutes have been held by the Supreme Court to apply to Dominion railways. The decisions of the Supreme Court have frequently been reversed by the Privy Council. We do not know whether they are good laws or not. But supposing they are, it does not follow that the Dominion Parliament could not legislate upon the same questions. Cases of concurrent and overlapping legislation have been cited, and must occur to everybody. As I have already pointed out, provincial legislation in regard to drainage, equipment of cars, coupling, and so forth, was held to apply until a large number of the railways were taken under the protection of this Parliament by special legislation, and now it is held not to apply. Dominion legislation, when it occurred, was held to override the other. I claim that the railway men should be given the benefit of the same doubt that was given to the railways when that legislation was passed; and I claim that the courts would be just as likely to hold with me, as in the other directions, if the case came to trial. This is a question upon which every one must form his own opinion. It is not a party question, and I ask everybody to vote according to his own opinion, and give the railway men the benefit of the doubt.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not imagine that any argument which I can address to the committee would convince them as to which is the correct view to take upon this question if they should decline to be influenced by the view which the Department of Justice, through the Prime Minister, has presented. I would, however, make an observation or two with regard to the arguments that have been advanced by some hon. gentlemen who are inclined to the opinion that this legislation is within our competence. My hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) rather inclines to this view, pointing out in support of it that Parliament has already in the Railway Act legislated in respect of two matters which he thinks are rather analogous to the present matter, one of these being with regard to cattle, the other with regard to the growing of noxious weeds on the railway. It seems to me to be abundantly clear that these powers may be entirely, as I have no doubt they are, within the competence of Parliament. Admitting that freely, it goes very far from establishing that the present clause is within its competency. Parliament unquestionably has the right to lay down provisions which will regulate the destruction, maintenance and operation of all railways which are incorporated by it, or which are declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada. What more germane to the subject of the safe and proper operating of railways than to provide that cattle shall not be permitted to run across the tracks of railways? Nothing could be more necessary to insure the protection of life and property. With regard to noxious weeds, what does Parliament undertake to do? It simply undertakes to provide how the roadway of the railway company shall be cared for.

Seeing that sparks will drop from passing locomotives and spread flame into the adjoining property, and thereby destroy it, it is necessary that some legislation should be had by the authority which creates that railway and gives it the power to operate, to protect property against that danger.

Mr. POWELL. Would the Minister allow me to make a remark? What he says might have a great deal of force were it true that noxious weeds were more inflammable than grass. But the provision applies simply to noxious weeds. The object must certainly be to prevent the seeds of noxious weeds spreading to the farms adjoining, not to prevent fire, because dry grass is just as combustible as weeds.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That may be, but we know very well that if on either side of the track, the vacant land is allowed to be cultivated so that grass may grow, the grass is cut. It is not allowed to remain, after it becomes dry, standing, but it is cut.

Mr. COCHRANE. If this Parliament has power to pass a law to protect individual property, why should it not have power to protect human life?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I was trying to point out that Parliament might very well have provided, as it provided here, for the protection of property in the neighbourhood or adjoining the track of a railway and for affording protection to life and property by prohibiting the running at large of cattle, but I fail to see why my hon. friend should feel justified in basing a conclusion upon that in favour of the 7th clause of this Bill. I admit that the question is a complicated one. I admit that it is possible to make an argument on each side of it, and I recognize the possibility—

Mr. POWELL. You have not a strong opinion either?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The more I think of it, the stronger my opinion is against the constitutionality of this clause 7.

Mr. POWELL. We are about in the same boat.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am not going to say that I would like to give a very positive opinion upon it, because I think it is a question that would require some study; but as far as I am able, from what study I have given to it, I am decidedly of the opinion that the clause is not within our competency. If Parliament were legislating in a general way, in respect of the manner or means or methods which should be adopted in the maintaining or operating of railways, and if in so doing it imposed duties upon railway companies, I admit at once that if a railway company disregarded those duties which the law imposed upon it, we might attach penalties in the form of compensation to the persons injured by reason of its failure to discharge those duties. Therefore, I would not like to go the length of saying that, under no circumstances or conditions, could Parliament be seized of a subject which would nearly approach that which is embodied in this Bill. But I think you only have to look at this 7th clause to see that you are not asking us to legislate in that direction. You are not dealing, as the basis of this penalty to be imposed upon a railway company, with the fact that they must follow out some duty which Parliament has cast upon it. That is where I think the strong argument lies against the constitutionality of this clause. This clause proposes to fix an arbitrary liability upon a railway company, even though that railway company had complied with every requirement as to its running, operating and maintenance, which had been imposed upon it by law. There is no connection at all between damages imposed upon a railway company under this Bill and its infringement of any duties which Parliament has imposed upon it. So that it seems to me impossible for any one to take up this proposed legislation and interpret it as being the natural outcome of parliamentary regulation for the running or maintaining of railways.

Mr. POWELL. I said the same thing. It is arbitrary and may be tyrannical.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It appears to me that in order to accurately determine whether Parliament is legislating within its competency, you must show that Parliament is pursuing a purpose which it is legitimate and proper for Parliament to pursue, in the exercise of its general power to plant railways over this Dominion. But under and by virtue of that you have no business to say that Parliament may legislate as to the remedies which shall attach between the company and its employees when there is an entire absence of any infringement of any duty imposed by Parliament or an entire absence of any ignoring of any statutory duty which Parliament has imposed. Read this section from beginning to end, and you can totally disconnect it from any duty or the observance of any duty or the carrying out of any regulation which Parliament has imposed on railways incorporated by it. That is my difficulty with regard to this clause, and therefore it appears to me that all the reasons are against our passing it. I do not think it would be proper for us, if we entertain grave doubts with regard to our competency to legislate in this direction, to do so off-hand. It is a subject which might well be considered, not only this session, but during recess, and be deferred to another session. No great harm can result from taking ample time in a question of this great importance. I am not going to comment at all on the merits of the clause. I am only remarking on the question of its constitutionality, and I do say that if there are good reasons why Parliament should add to the duties we now impose on railway companies, we should enact there more stringent regulations, whereby the running of roads would be attended with less risk and danger to public life and property. Let us do that. Let us ascertain and determine what it would be well for us to do by statute for the better protection of the lives of those employed on railways; and after we have satisfied ourselves as to what additional protection and regulations are required, we should impose upon railway companies the penalties we think right in the way of compensation to those who suffer from any accident attributable to a violation or disregard of the regulations Parliament has made. But you here, irrespective of whether the company has failed in any single particular to do its full duty, undertake to say that we shall give people who have unfortunately suffered injury a remedy against a company which may be absolutely innocent of the violation of any law, which may have done its whole duty and be absolutely free from the slightest cause of complaint.

Mr. MACLEAN. If the argument of the hon. gentleman means anything, it means that this legislation is within the jurisdiction of this House, but that it ought to be within the Railway Act. That may be a good argument, but it is simply an argument that we should incorporate this in the Railway Act rather than enact it by special legislation. The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) made the whole argument of our case, but like a great many lawyers, when he came to the conclusion, he ran away from it and left the railways in possession of the field. He says that we may incorporate railway companies and grant them all sorts of powers and give them millions of public money, but we must not say to them: When you kill or injure one of your employees or the public you shall pay. That hon. gentleman and the Minister of Railways admitted the whole case, but after the fashion of lawyers, they put up some little difficulties to get away from the consequences of their argument. Then the right hon. First Minister told us that we should not make any experiments in legislation. Why not? That is the proper way to ascertain the facts. Make the experiment, and send it to the courts to find out. Is this Government one which should say that no experiment shall be made? What is its record? It is that of a plunging Government. It plunged in the matter of our trade relations with the mother country and legislated without knowing what our constitutional rights were; and when told it was wrong, it brought down other legislation this session to correct its first experiment. The hon. Postmaster General plunged in the matter of postal rates. He then found out what the law was and he proposes now a new Bill to meet the case, he proposes to make the punishment fit the crime, and we are to have remedial and progressive legislation. Considering all the opinions we have heard, it seems to me that the way to meet this case is to pass this legislation and send it to the courts. If it is right it will be upheld, and the railway men and the public—because this will protect the public as well as the railway men—will get the benefit of it. It does not cost a great deal to send a case to the Privy Council—a few thousand dollars will do it—and the men have the money and are ready to spend it to vindicate their rights under this law if Parliament will give them the law.

Mr. POWELL. With respect to the comments of the Minister of Railways in section 1257 of the Dominion Act, I have to say that it seems to me that his arguments are quite inadequate. This section provides that every railway company shall cut down noxious weeds upon their tracks and on their right of way on adjoining lands early in July, or shall root them up. Now to cut them down does not mean to gather them up and take them away. But the words "or be rooted up"—as the hon. Minister will see as a lawyer, show that the object was to get clear of these noxious weeds so that adjoining farmers shall not suffer through them.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Will the hon. member (Mr. Powell) allow me. Does the hon. gentleman see any reason why Parliament might not declare that, as to the user of the portion of property which belongs to the company and which they are authorized by Parliament to acquire, by expropriation or otherwise, nothing shall be allowed to stand or be put upon the property which shall operate injuriously to the persons near there.

Mr. POWELL. That is precisely the line on which I was proceeding. Might not this Parliament, which has general jurisdiction over railways, entrench in its legislation upon railways upon the region of civil rights of the provinces and enact a law which indirectly affects civil rights. Take a special case. This Parliament has jurisdiction over railways, and therefore, over their employees. Might not this Parliament make enactments which will contravene the principle of civil rights of the province so far as those employees are concerned?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, Parliament may properly declare that the railway company which is exercising this privilege under charter from Parliament, shall not exercise it without such and such a regard to certain regulations, the violation of which shall result in the imposition of certain penalties.

Mr. POWELL. That is not the only matter.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It is all that is necessary.

Mr. POWELL. This is an incident in the mode of exercising jurisdiction whether there is a penalty attached or not.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No.

Mr. POWELL. I acknowledge that this is a grave constitutional point. I admit that I am arguing on this subject with the ordinary stock of information that I have; I have not looked into the matter specially since the committee sat on this Bill about a year ago. A similar question arose under a constitution which, in this respect, is similar to ours; I refer to the constitution of the United States. A year or two after that constitution had been adopted, two of the ablest men the United States ever had, Alexander Hamilton and Thomas Jefferson took diametrically opposite views of the right of the United States to incorporate a bank, which bank was afterwards incorporated and became known as the Bank of the United States. Hamilton laid down the principle, that inasmuch as the federal power had the right to control the revenue, it must have the power to control matters incidental to that power, and as the bank was the ordinary means of the country for dealing with money, the United States had a right to establish the bank. Jefferson took the opposite view. The matter came before the Supreme Court was decided by Marshall, the greatest jurist our neighbouring republic has had. Judge Marshall took the same view of the case as Hamilton had taken, and what seemed not necessary to the exercise of the power was declared constitutional; and this power was considered in the same light down to 1837 or thereabouts, when, under the influence of President Jackson—the Act was repealed. Now there is really very little difference of opinion between the Minister of Railways and myself when we get down to the bottom of the question. He says, if I understand him, that he is not prepared to give a positive opinion that this Bill is unconstitutional. I am not satisfied with the reason advanced by the Solicitor General or by the Minister of Railways. The argument of the Minister of Railways does not convince me of the unconstitutionality of the Bill, but it seems strong as to the inadvisability or inexpediency of passing it. Now, the point which caused the difficulty in my mind may be summed up in a few words. This Parliament, if it thinks that, in the correct exercise of its jurisdiction respecting railways, and the employees are part and parcel of the machinery of railways—to throw around those employees this protection which the Bill provides for them, may have the power to do so, just as under the Merchant's Shipping Act we have the power to go beyond the common law and confer upon seamen new rights and impose upon ship owners new liabilities. By analogy it does seem to me this Parliament has the power to impose new obligations and to impose on the employees new rights. Though I do not express a matured opinion as to the constitutionality, I think the proper thing to do is to enact the law and allow it to be decided in the courts. However, I will vote for the amendment of the hon. Prime Minister if my hon. friend (Mr. Casey), the promoter of the Bill, does not restrict it to railways within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada. My hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Britton) raised the question as to the Government railways. I did not hear the answer of the Minister of Railways, but I would point out to the hon. gentleman that there is a principle of statutory interpretation that nothing affects the Crown unless it is expressly stated that it does so. Therefore, Government railways are eliminated from consideration.

Mr. CASEY. So far as the proposal to restrict this Bill to railways within the jurisdiction of Parliament is concerned, I may explain that it was deemed advisable not to say anything about that, because it was held, that this Act could only apply to railways under Dominion jurisdiction. I am quite ready to put in these words if it is desired. They were left out because it was thought it would affect the scope of the Bill.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I find myself in a somewhat peculiar position in this question. As I understand it, all hon. members shall sympathize with the object of this Bill. The disposition of every person is to grant all possible protection to railway employees.

There is no difference of opinion on that subject. But the Government having, as they are in duty bound to do, looked carefully into this question, have come to the conclusion that if we pass this it would be ultra vires. Now, my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Powell), for whose opinion I have the greatest possible respect, says that he is by no means certain that this is not ultra vires, that although he regards it with an open mind he is not prepared to say that it is not. Under these circumstances I think that the wiser course for the committee would be to accept the opinion of the Department of Justice, and not enact a clause that is likely to lead, in the opinion of the Department of Justice, to very injurious litigation to persons who are mainly interested.

Committee divided on motion of Minister of Railways and Canals, which was agreed to by yeas 58, nays 18.

Mr. MACLEAN moved :

That the following be inserted as a new clause :—

That on and after the 1st of January, 1900, it shall be unlawful for any railway company to use on its lines any locomotives or cars not equipped with automatic couplers in proper working order so that such locomotives and cars can be coupled and uncoupled without its being necessary for men to go between the ends of cars.

He said : I may point out that this amendment is on the line of the one that has already passed the House. The amendment of the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) governs entirely the use of air brakes. Railway men have also asked for legislation enjoining on the companies the use of automatic couplers. This provision is simply to compel the railways after 1900 to adopt automatic couplers as well as air brakes, and is on the line of legislation adopted in the United States some years ago.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think it would be advisable for us to look into and consider a subject of this kind before we adopt it. I could not say off-hand. I would be in no position to advise the committee whether this clause could properly be passed now or not, or what the effect would be on the railway companies. We cannot ignore these considerations altogether, however much we may desire to do so. Therefore, I would suggest that the effect of the hon. gentleman pressing this additional section upon the committee would be to imperil the other portions of the Bill. If he feels friendly disposed towards the measure as it now stands, I think it would be wise for him to defer the submission of this new proposition, at all events until another session, when the matter might be well considered.

Mr. DAVIN. I think after what the Minister of Railways and Canals has said, that my hon. friend ought not to press that, because substantial progress has been made.

Mr. MACLEAN. Then I simply give notice that I will introduce it next session and put it first on the Order paper.

Amendment withdrawn.

Bill reported with amendments.

On consideration of Bill as amended.

Mr. CASEY. I think it is my duty to those who may be considered as my clients in this matter, to get the opinion of the whole House on this question, and I beg to move without discussion on my part, the following amendment :

That the Bill be not now considered as amended, but that it be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions to add the following section as section 7 :—

7. Every employee of a railway company injured while in the discharge of his duty shall, for every day during which he is thereby unfitted for duty be entitled to compensation from the railway company at the rate of not less than sixty per cent of the current rate of wages for men similarly employed by the company at the time the injury occurs, to be paid for not more than fifty-two weeks.

(2) Every such employee permanently disabled while in the discharge of his duty, shall be entitled to compensation from the railway company to the amount of not less than four years' wages at the rate thereof at the time of the accident.

(3) The family or dependents of every employee who is killed, or who dies from injuries received, while in the discharge of his duty, within six months after such injury, shall be entitled to compensation from the railway company to the amount of four years' wages at the rate thereof at the time of the accident, but not exceeding in all three thousand dollars.

(4) If any employee, or the representatives of any employee, accept the compensation provided by this Act, he or they shall have no further claim at law against the company.

(5) The rights under the foregoing provisions shall not be capable of being renounced or given up by such employee by any agreement or contract with the railway company, for value or otherwise, and the said provisions shall not be made void by any rules or regulations of the railway.

(6) The certificate of two duly qualified disinterested physicians shall be sufficient to prove permanent disability ; and the certificate of the attending physician shall be sufficient to prove unfitness for duty, for a period not exceeding ten weeks, after which time a monthly certificate of a physician named by the company shall be sufficient.

(7) The foregoing provisions as to compensation shall be void in the case of any employee whose injury disablement or death is caused by his own negligence,—the burden of proof of such negligence being upon the railway company ; but if such injury, disablement or death occurs by reason of the handling or use of trains, locomotives, cars or appliances which are out of repair, or insufficient, or not in accordance with the provisions of this Act, the railway company shall not be allowed to plead contributory negligence on the part of the employee so injured, disabled or killed.

(8) In any suit for damages by an employee against a railway company, the act, default or negligence of any fellow employee shall not be pleaded or given in evidence on behalf of the company as a defence to such suit.

Amendments made in committee read the second time and agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed.

ATTACHMENT OF SALARIES OF CIVIL SERVANTS.

On the Order :

Consideration of Bill (No. 14) an Act respecting the attachment of salaries and moneys in the hands of the Government as amended in Committee of the Whole.—(Mr. Richardson.)

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I would ask the hon. member not to press the continuation of this Bill. Since we had this Bill under consideration the other day, I have caused inquiries to be made into it, and for my part I have been struck by the arguments brought in support of it, and having looked over it carefully, I am prepared to give my support to the principle of the Bill. But I understand after consultation with the law officers, that the Bill will have to be considerably recast before it is passed into law, and therefore I ask that it be not pressed this evening.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the right hon. gentleman will say that the Government will deal with this question next session, I will bow to his request and accept the situation. I should have been very glad to have had the Bill passed, but I will not press it under the circumstances.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am not prepared to tell my hon. friend that I will make it a Government measure. But for my part, I think it is well founded, that the principle is right, that it is one which should be acted upon and carried into law.

DISMISSAL OF JOHN F. TENNANT.

House resumed further consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Quinn :

That an Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General for copies of all papers in connection with the dismissal of John Tennant, late Collector of Customs at Gretna, Manitoba.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Quinn) brought this resolution up, and it was allowed to go over. I desire to make a brief statement to-night, without, however, going at length into the subject. I should like to ask the attention of the House for a short time to the statement the hon. gentleman made in moving for the papers, and the few words I spoke in reply. The statement the hon. gentleman made in closing his remarks was as follows:—

Now, I do not wish to excite any religious feeling in this House. Rather do I wish to prevent any such feeling either entering this House or spreading throughout the country. But I deem it my duty, as an independent member of this House, I deem it my duty, as a citizen of Canada, as one loving his country and wishing to see that cordial feeling existing between the different races which will one day make up a glorious nationality, to protest in the strongest terms against this act—this act which has no other excuse than such as can be given for a political-religious dismissal. There is no single item of proof against Mr. Tennant in connection with this matter ; there is not a tittle of evidence against him that he was either guilty of active or inactive partisanship. There is nothing to prove that he did more than any man of honour would do, his religion and nationality being attacked by the Attorney General of Manitoba on that occasion referred to in these newspapers. There is not a particle of proof against this man in any way. Are we not, then, forced to the conclusion that it was not because he had neglected his office, it was not because he had been guilty of partisanship, it was not because he had used intemperate language that he was dismissed, but it was because he was an Irish Catholic and his place was wanted by some political heeler in that particular constituency. In entering the protest I do upon this question—and I do not limit this appeal, thank God, to the Irish Catholics of this House ; I do not limit it to the Catholics of this House—I call upon every man who has the true interest of his country at heart, whatever his nationality, whatever his religion, to join with me and protest by his vote, which I shall ask later, against this dismissal of a man because he was an Irish Catholic.

That was the deliberate statement of the hon. member for Montreal Centre. Another statement made by the hon. gentleman in the course of his remarks was as follows:—

Now, I do not wish to introduce into this debate, or into any other debate, any question of religion or nationality; but I expect that certain members on the other side, possibly the Minister who was guilty of this act of injustice—because I say it is an act of injustice, and I charge the Minister with having been guilty of it—possibly the Minister who was guilty of this act of injustice will repudiate the statements that are made concerning it, repudiate what has appeared in the public press, and will say that there was no question of religion or nationality in the matter at all.

I would say that the hon. gentleman's supposition, uttered in the words I have just quoted, was a correct supposition. I do repudiate the statements that appeared in the newspapers from which the hon. gentleman quoted certain articles. I do most emphatically repudiate the statements made by the hon. gentleman, and I wish that I could fully believe that he was entirely sincere when he said he had no desire to introduce questions of race or nationality in this House. But what are the facts in regard to this case in respect of which the hon. gentleman asks for papers? What will the papers disclose when they come down? What the hon. gentleman has alleged? Not one tittle of evidence of partisanship against this man. I think he will find himself wholly mistaken in that respect. He will find there a statement of a reputable member of this House declaring of his own knowledge, that he knew this man to be guilty of partisan conduct during the last Dominion elections. He will find a statement made by another gentleman of prominence in this country, also declaring that from his own knowledge this man was guilty of very extreme partisan conduct, for if I remember rightly his words were: that at a public meeting he addressed he had been subjected to more interruptions by this gentleman and others associated with him than he had on any other occasion. Yet the hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) says there is not a tittle of proof. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) says that Mr. Tennant was dismissed solely because, that in the provincial election when the Attorney General of Manitoba was making a speech, Tennant gave utterance to a sentiment which he has not established, which I would be sorry to know he could establish, and that because of that this gentleman was dismissed from office. I wish to tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) and I wish to tell the House, that whatever may have transpired during the provincial election did not enter into the decision of this question. What we had to deal with was the partisan conduct of this official in the last Dominion general election. And though there is a statement on file from the Attorney General of Manitoba, that during the provincial election this official was abusive, and had gone to the length of calling the First Minister of that province a liar, I believe was the expression; yet that did not enter into the consideration because we had nothing whatever to do with what took place during a provincial election. The statement of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) as to what took place on that occasion, is I believe founded on the statement of some one who may have made it to him, or of some newspaper in which he read it. Such a statement I am not prepared to accept, and in any case it does not concern this question at all. Now what did this official do? We have the testimony of an hon. member in this House over his own signature that this man was an active partisan—and the First Minister has stated that when a responsible member of this House will say that of his own knowledge he knows that an official has acted an offensive partisan part that he would be liable to discharge at the hands of the Government. My hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) might find fault with me perhaps that I should ask for more than his statement of the fact. I was not seeking the man's dismissal. The hon. member (Mr. Richardson) said to me: "Further proof can be given, if proof you require in reference to this matter. The question was not dealt with for some time. Many matters were engaging my attention; it was not unduly pressed by my hon. friend (Mr. Richardson); but when the case came before me with the proofs, then I found it my duty to report to Council and they dealt with it. My hon. friend (Mr. Quinn) says, Mr. Tennant was dismissed without any notice or without any chance being given him to defend himself. I have to tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) that when the charges were preferred by the hon. member, I wrote to Mr. Tennant stating that certain charges had been preferred against him, and I asked him to favour me with his reply, and he did so, and in the course of that reply, while he shielded himself as well as he might he was even then compelled in candour to admit that during a part of the election day of the 23rd of June he was in the polling booth, that he was there at the request of the Conservative scrutineer, but that he declined to accept papers at the hands of the returning officer. Oh, no, he would not do that, but he was in the polling booth. Mr. Tennant says further in this declaration as a proof of his innocence, that he did not act a partisan part, that he was not known as a partisan, that he had been pressed to take the platform and to speak against my hon. friend (Mr. Richardson) but he says: I would not do that. Well, I thought inferentially, though that did not weigh much in the case; yet inferentially it occurred to me that if a public officer in Her Majesty's service was known to be so strong a partisan that a party man would come to him and ask him to take the platform and expect him to do it; I thought that carried with it inferential proof that he was not known to be one who was devoting his whole time to the duties of his office. What further? It was stated that while Tennant was in the polling booth taking the place of the Conservative scrutineer, the American customs officer was in charge of the Canadian customs office in Gretna. I notified Mr. Tennant that this charge had been made, and he denied it and sent an affidavit of the American customs officer in which the latter admits that he was in the office during that day, but he was not in charge of it. Here was Mr. Tennant, the Canadian customs officer leaving his office, going to the polling booth, requested by the Conservative scrutineer to take his place there, remaining there, but refusing to take the papers. According to the two affidavits read by the hon. member for Montreal (Mr. Quinn), one made by the returning officer and one by the clerk, both state that Mr. Tennant was there and was requested by the Conservative scrutineer to remain in his place when he went out, that he did remain there, but that he refused to take the papers and to be officially recognized as the official scrutineer. What right had Mr. Tennant to be in that polling booth at all, if he was not an agent of one of the parties. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) perhaps knows the election law? Does he suppose that this man could be in there, be requested by the Conservative scrutineer to take his place and remain there, without being an agent of one of the parties. One would wonder that an hon. gentleman trying to make out a case, and a lawyer too, would have understood his case a little better and put it a little stronger. While the hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) read affidavits from the returning officer and from the clerk that this man was taking the place of the Conservative scrutineer, he also read an affidavit from the American customs officer declaring: I was not in charge of the office, but I was in the office. Here, then, we have an official whom a member of this House declared was guilty of gross partisan conduct, which statement was verified by the Premier of Manitoba, and we have affidavits read by the hon. member for Montreal (Mr. Quinn), that Mr. Tennant was in the polling booth, and remained in the booth at the request of the Conservative scrutineer. I ask again, how could he be there and what right had he to be there unless he was taking the place of that scrutineer. What right had he to remain out of his office, what right had he to remain in the polling booth, and how can he now shield himself behind the statement that he did not take the papers from the returning officer. He says he was there to poll his vote; then, Sir, his place was to have gone back to Her Majesty's customs office and to have taken his place there, but instead of that we find that when another gentleman goes to the office he discovers the American customs officer in that office alone. They may play on the words whether the American official was in charge of the office or not, but the fact remains that the Canadian customs officer was in the polling booth taking the place of the Conservative scrutineer at the request of the Conservative scrutineer, and remaining in the polling booth while the American customs officer was in Her Majesty's customs at Gretna. And yet, the hon. member (Mr. Quinn) says, there is not a particle of evidence against this official. I would ask hon. gentlemen opposite what they think of the case made out by the hon. member for Montreal (Mr. Quinn), who stated that he wishes to bring in no question of race or nationality. He told us indeed that he was trying to appease any such feeling, but yet he declared that Tennant was dismissed for no other reason than that he was an Irish Catholic. Well, as I had occasion to tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) the other day, I endeavoured to discharge my duty without regard to these considerations, and if with the proofs in his hands he was bold enough to say that I had acted through prejudice against either a certain nationality or a certain faith in this country, he had his answer to that in the fact that in the discharge of my official duties, although the question did not enter into the appointments at all, nevertheless many of that nationality and faith had been appointed to office by me. That in itself would be sufficient to disprove the charges made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn.)

I have been told since this matter was up before, that the very brother of this Mr. Tennant, though I was not aware of the fact, is a customs officer at Coutts in Alberta. He was a temporary officer employed there for some years; and in 1894, I understand, he applied to be placed on the permanent staff. It was not done at that time; but representations were made to me by a number of those who were cognizant of his ability, that he was a good officer, and deserving of a permanent appointment in Her Majesty's service. I recommended it, it was done by Order in Council, and he is to-day on the permanent list. Nevertheless, the hon. gentleman saw fit to quote an article from the "Catholic Register," a paper that has been most unfair in its statements, and that has been filled with untrue statements in regard to this case. I cannot see what object he had in doing so, unless it was to bring up the case of another gentleman whom it became my duty to relieve from official duties in the town of Cobourg. I refer to the case of Mr. McAllister, who was not dismissed, as I said hurriedly the other day when I addressed the House, but who was superannuated. I may be censured by members of this House for not having asked for the dismissal of that man instead of placing him upon the superannuation list. But I have regard to his length of service, I had regard for his family, and I had regard for the fact that he had been a good officer in the past; and I allowed my feelings to weigh in the matter, and instead of dismissal I recommended that he should be superannuated. And yet that case is brought up by the hon. gentleman as proof that I am prejudiced against a certain portion of the community. I think my whole official career and my whole political life gives the lie to the statement that I am in any way influenced by considerations of nationality or creed. Never have I been guilty of that, and I repudiate the hon. gentleman's charge. I had no wish to injure Mr. McAllister. He has not recognized that leniency was exercised in his case. He has evidently asked others to bring his case forward; but I notice that he has not asked the hon. gentlemen opposite to move for the papers in connection with his case. I now ask the hon. gentleman to move for the papers. The hon. member for West Northumberland (Mr. Guillet) has sat in this House all these months, and though Mr. McAllister is in his constituency and was a strong friend of his, he has not ventured to move for the papers. I want the hon. gentleman to do it. What are the facts in connection with that case? I am forced to refer to them because of the attack made upon me in connection with it. It was not a case of partisanship at all. It was a case of something more serious—a case of trafficking in public offices, a case that came, I am informed, within the Criminal Code of Sir John Thompson. That being the case, I could not pass his offence by; but, as I said before, having regard for his long services, and believing that he had not recognized fully the position in which he had placed himself, and making such allowances for him as I could, I recommended that he be placed upon the superannuation list, and upon the superannuation list he is to-day. And yet, Sir, in the face of this, the hon. member for Montreal Centre rises and charges me and charges the Government, for this was the action of the Government in both cases, with being influenced by feelings that would be unworthy of the members of any Government. I say to the hon. gentleman again, that if he asks me now, I will bring the papers down with reference to the case of Mr. McAllister.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the Minister bring them down without requiring a notice to be put upon the paper? Because it could never be reached in the regular order?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I say that if the hon. member for Montreal Centre will ask for them, I will bring them down.

Mr. QUINN. I know nothing about the McAllister case. I did not refer to it. I read an article in which the name of Mr. McAllister was mentioned. The hon. Minister, as usual, is trying to draw a herring across the trail—he is trying to draw the McAllister case across the Tennant case; but that will not wish. I want the papers in the Tennant case.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman says he did not refer to the Mc-Allister case. Why did he read that long article from the "Catholic Register," and embalm it on the pages of "Hansard?"

Mr. QUINN. Because it was in the article; that is the reason why I read it.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman brought the article here as proof positive of the unfounded statements he made.

Mr. QUINN. So it is.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Very well, if it be so, the hon. gentleman accepts those statements with referenceto to Mr. McAllister.

Mr. QUINN. If the hon. Minister wishes me to answer. I read the article in reference to the Tennant case. I did not wish to suppress any portion of the article; and so, in the course of the article, I was obliged to read the reference to Mr. McAllister. I know nothing of the McAllister case, and do not want the papers in connection with it, and the Minister is trying to confound it with the Tennant case, but he cannot do it.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman read from the "Catholic Register" what he need not have read at all; but he read it to allay racial or religious feeling, which is so abhorrent to him that he cannot bear any thing of the kind. For the purpose of soothing this feeling, and preventing it arising, he reads this article, which deals thus with the McAllister case:

Last week we gave a long list of the names of Catholics in the Kingston district who have been driven out of Government employment by the Liberals. The "Globe" had been denying only a few days before that Catholics have any grievances against the new Administration; but the chief Government organ prudently abstains from offering any defence of the dismissals enumerated. We had hoped to induce the organ to descend from virtuous and patriotic generalities and come down to plain facts and particular instances. But we may have been at fault ourselves in not offering direct proof that religious opinion was the evident "crime" of the Catholic office-holder in any stated case of dismissal.

The circumstances surrounding the removal of Mr. McAllister, of Cobourg, by Hon. Mr. Patterson, leave no room for supposing anything else than politico-religious persecution. This week we propose to take up another case in Mr. Patterson's department in which we are prepared to demonstrate a religious persecution beyond aye or nay.

It was not necessary for the hon. gentleman to read that at all. He could have read the whole thing, but no, he wanted to bring in this case of Mr. McAllister in order to strengthen the unworthy purpose he was engaged in trying to excite religious and racial animosity. The hon. gentleman was right when he supposed that possibly the minister, against whom he hurled these unfounded charges, would repudiate them. I do repudiate them. I have given the circumstances. I have given what the papers disclose, and I leave the case in the hands of the House. The hon. gentleman beside me (Mr. Richardson) points out to me that further proof has been furnished since this took place. I, however, shall not go into that, because that did not influence me in the decision I arrived at. I give what was before me when I arrived at a decision which I believed at the time, and still believe, was a just one. Mr. Tennant, instead of attending to his duties as customs officer, was engaged actively in promoting the candidature of the Conservative candidate, and on one occasion rendered himself extremely offensive to those opposed to him in political belief, and, moreover, acted as scrutineer in the poll which he had no right to do, remaining in that poll for a long time, while an American customs officer took his place in his office in Gretna.

Mr. DAVIN. Before the hon. gentleman takes his seat, will he tell us the occasion he has referred to when Mr. Tennant made himself extremely obnoxious?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The meeting that he disturbed was held during the Dominion general election at Gretna. It was a meeting that had been called, I believe, by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson).

Mr. DAVIN. What proof have you of that?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I have the statement both of the hon. member for Lisgar and of the Prime Minister, of Manitoba. I have also the statement of Mr. Tennant himself admitting that he attended one meeting.

Mr. QUINN. He does not say that meeting.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No, I do not think he would be apt to do that in his own defence, but I have the evidence of two gentlemen who testified distinctly that they did see him there, and I suppose I am entitled to accept that as proof, even if fifty other men said that they did not see him there.

Mr. DAVIN. That would depend. I listened with great attention to the speech of the hon. gentleman, as I was very anxious to hear his rebuttal of the charges made by my hon. friend from Montreal (Mr. Quinn), but while the hon. member was energetic and eloquent, and repudiated in a most vigorous manner having been influenced by any sectarian or racial feeling—and I would be very sorry to suppose that he would allow himself to be actuated by such unworthy motives—what we wanted was a rebuttal of the position established by my hon. friend from Montreal, that this man had not taken any part in the Dominion election. I have some papers which were placed in my hand, and which probably I would have brought to the attention of the House had not the matter devolved on an hon. member (Mr. Quinn) who could go into it much more effectively than I. But as the hon. Minister has not, in my opinion, at all repudiated what was proved by the hon. member from Montreal, I propose to refer to these papers. The hon. Minister has affidavits in his possession negating the charge that this man Tennant took any part as an offensive partisan in the Dominion election. He admits that he took part in a local election, but with the strong description ringing in our ears, given by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Railways, of the difference between what is provincial and what is Dominion. I should suppose that because this man took a part in a local election—no doubt offensive to the Attorney General (Cameron) of Manitoba—he should not be condemned as an offensive partisan in Dominion politics. The statement is made by my hon. friend the Minister of Customs that Tennant acted as a scrutineer. But he denies that most positively, and gives circumstances that made it impossible he could have acted in that way. He said:

The other charge made against me was that I acted as scrutineer on election day for the Conservative candidate in Gretna poll. This is not the fact, and I stated so to the Minister of Customs when asked. I can at any time send you, if wanted, affidavits from the deputy returning officer in charge of the poll, or any other official present, that I distinctly refused to act as an agent or scrutineer in the polling booth.

This statement is confirmed by what fell from the Minister of Customs, who told us that this man had refused to act officially, but implied that nevertheless, in some way or other, he actually did act. But he gives us no proof of that. All that he required to do, to place my hon. friend from Montreal (Mr. Quinn) in the wrong was to come forward with his proof that this man had acted the part of an offensive partisan, and my hon. friend from Montreal would be completely silenced. Instead of that the hon. Minister of Customs, who is an experienced campaigner, harked back upon the well-known artifice, that if you have a bad case the best thing is to surround it with as much thunder and blasting powder as you can, and people will think there is something behind.

The PRIME MINISTER. Do not use too much powder now.

Mr. DAVIN. There is no danger that I will offend in that way. The actual facts are that Tennant went in the afternoon to vote. He was asked by the scrutineer, Mr. Pearson, to take his place while he went outside for a while. This he refused to do officially or to take out any papers, as the law requires. Under these circumstances, my hon. friend has certainly failed. I think with the record before us and seeing how men have been dismissed, the fact that this man admits that he went out and gave a good Conservative vote on that day is ground enough for his dismissal. Now, my hon. friend states that an American officer was left in charge of his office by Mr. Tennant on that day. I will read the substantial part of the affidavit of that officer—and mind the papers are in the Minister's own hands.

I am an officer in the United States Customs, situated at Neche, North Dakota. In the regular performance of my duties I visit Gretna daily, and, while waiting the arrival of the south-bound train, I usually wait in the office of the Canadian customs. I declare that I have not been placed in charge of the office of the Canadian customs at Gretna on the 23rd June or at any other time, and I further declare that I was not requested by J. F. Tennant, sub-collector at that office, to do so on that or any other occasion.

Now, my hon. friend the Minister of Customs made an appeal to me whether I would take the testimony of two gentlemen. I said it depended. I would like to cross-examine them. If I would take the testimony of two gentlemen, why should I not take the sworn affidavit of one gentleman and the statement of another—one of these a gentleman who has served under arms.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I beg the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Davin's) pardon. May I ask if he read what was before him?

Mr. DAVIN. I did.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Where, then, did the hon. gentleman get that paper?

Mr. DAVIN. I read everything before me. I am told that it is the substance—

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I was watching the hon. gentleman. I may be mistaken. I have here the affidavit the hon. member from Montreal (Mr. Quinn) read, and I did not understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) to read the following:—"I was in the office of Mr. Tennant on the 23rd June, 1896." I did not hear the hon. gentleman read those words.

Mr. DAVIN. That is not here.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Then, the hon. gentleman should have the affidavit. He has read a sworn statement.

Mr. DAVIN. If my hon. friend (Mr. Paterson) will read it to me. I read all that I have here.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Ah, the hon. gentleman should have the affidavit before he began to speak.

Mr. DAVIN. Surely not; I have given—

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Who was to blame for putting the paper into the hon. gentleman's hands

Mr. DAVIN. Does any hon. gentleman say that when the affidavit is in the hands of the Minister of Customs, it is not perfectly proper for any member of this House to read what has been furnished him?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Who furnished it?

Mr. DAVIN. One of the foremost men in Canada.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I am reading from the "Hansard" the affidavit of this American officer.

Mr. DAVIN. Will the hon. gentleman send it to me by the page boy, and I will finish the reading of it.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) read what is on his paper?

Mr. DAVIN. I will not only do that, but I will send the paper to the hon. gentleman:

This is the substance of a statutory declaration made by P. Horgan—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, will the hon. Minister of Customs give me the affidavit.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. You have the "Hansard." There it is at page 4298.

Mr. DAVIN. Then, we will get it, and I will read it with pleasure. Has the hon. gentleman given me the page of the unrevised "Hansard"?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes, unrevised.

Mr. DAVIN—

I, Patrick Horgan, of Neche, North Dakota, in the United States, do solemnly declare that I am an officer of the United States customs at Neche, in North Dakota, and I am well acquainted with J. F. Tennant, ex-sub-collector of customs at Gretna, Man. In the performance of my duties I visit Gretna almost daily.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman in his previous reading said "daily."

Mr. DAVIN. The document I read says, "in the regular performance of my duties, I visited Gretna daily."

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. One of the foremost men in Canada has imposed upon you.

Mr. DAVIN. I will send this to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson). The affidavit in "Hansard" goes on as follows:—

I was in the office of Mr. Tennant on the 23rd June, 1896.—

If there is any comfort for the hon. Minister in that it must be the comfort that the drowning man gets when catching at a straw:

—I was in the office of Mr. Tennant on the 23rd June, 1896, as I usually wait there when meeting the train going south on the Great Northern Railway. I was no longer there on that date than on any other occasions. I was not in charge of said customs office at Gretna on the occasion nor at any other time. I was never requested by Mr. Tennant or any other Canadian customs official to look after said office on the 23rd June, 1896, or at any other date whatever.—

That makes it stronger.

—I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act, 1893.

(Sgd.) P. J. HORGAN.

Declared before me at Gretna Man., in the county of Manchester, this 28th day of December, A.D. 1897.

M. LONG,

A Commissioner in B. R.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That is all right.

Mr. DAVIN. If the hon. gentleman is thankful for having the whole affidavit read, he is thankful for very small mercies, for, if it were necessary to strengthen the operative part of the affidavit which I read, then, what had to be read strengthens it. I am in the judgment of the House in saying that. If the hon. gentleman finds it so necessary to squirm out of the position he took, why, surely, there is not ground enough for taking away a man's bread and butter, taking away his position in life. It is sailing very close to the wind indeed for the hon. gentleman to take such a course as that. I merely rose to say that I know, coming as I do from the North-west, that there is a very strong feeling in the North-west Territories that harsh treatment has been dealt out to this Mr. Tennant. I feel that the heart of the Minister is perhaps now wounded, that he feels that he has been misled. He laughs; but I perceive that it is not the joyful laugh of exuberant emotion, but rather the hysterical cachination that seeks to veil a feeling of repentance.

I can easily understand that the hon. member for Lisgar was animated with furious passion. He shakes his head, but I say that on the morrow of the 23rd of June, never in the history of Canada was such a spectacle witnessed as the furious passions that animated a certain number of gentlemen who were victors on that occasion. The victory was new to them, and to some extent it was unexpected, as it was undeserved; and the furious passions which have hardly now abated, were let loose upon everybody who happened to invite decapitation. Not only were people furious, but they were hungry, and they had hungry retainers behind them, clamouring for the heads of men to be thrown into the basket in order that they might get compensation. I can understand how the hon. member for Lisgar pressed this matter upon the Minister of Customs. Now when he gave his evidence, if we could have cross-examined him, and if some other reputable gentlemen came forward and made statements and we could have cross-examined them, does anybody suppose, knowing what was the state of things throughout this country, knowing the state of mind of these men, drunk with victory, excited beyond all past experience by the new sense of power—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. member is going a little too far. The hon. member for Lisgar has made a statement in this House that he was present on such an occasion, and I think the hon. member from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) must accept that statement without suggesting that a cross-examination would make him contradict it.

Mr. DAVIN. I was not disputing that. You misapprehend the position that I took. If I alleged that the statement made by the member for Lisgar was not true—and I do not say that—that would be out of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. member has suggested that if the member for Lisgar was cross-examined, perhaps he would obtain from him a statement different from the one he has made.

Mr. DAVIN. No, that is not what I say. I would not be so guilty, I would not so offend against parliamentary rules and etiquette, as to say such a thing. What I say is this, that if we could cross-examine the member for Lisgar we should then be in a position to know whether he was at the time a fit person to give evidence. That is a wholly different thing. Now, it is very doubtful to me if, on the 24th of June, or for three or four weeks afterwards, any of the successful candidates who were new to political life, were in a position to give evidence.

An hon. MEMBER. Were they all tight?

Mr. DAVIN. I do not say that. Mr. Disraeli said of Gladstone that he was intoxicated by the exuberance of his own verbosity. Villemessant said that the Marcellais used to get drunk on their own saliva. It all depends upon the constitution and the temperament, upon what they can get, or what they would like to get drunk. I will certainly say that on the morrow of the 23rd of June there were men drunk, but not with wine, and intoxicated, but with something more potent than either beer or whisky. Now, the Minister of Customs, after having had days to prepare, has not brought out a single thing in rebuttal of what was laid down by the member for Montreal. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister, in the first session, in 1896, laid down the law that only men who were guilty of offensive partisanship would be dismissed. We all accepted that, but I regret to say that that bulwark that was given us by the Prime Minister for men who had only voted, had only been true to their principles, has been but a small protection for only too many all through this country. I regret to have these cases come up, I regret it greatly in the interest of this poor man Tennant; but I regret still more in the interest of the public service, that such a charge can be made as has been made by the hon. member for Montreal, and that, after days of incubation, we can get from the Minister of Customs nothing better than a lame, an impotent, an inconclusive defence.

Mr. ROCHE. I promise the hon. members of this House that I will have rather more regard for their aural appendages, and discuss this question more calmly and with less vehemence of expression, than did the Minister of Customs. That hon. gentleman was, in my opinion, most unfair to the hon. member for Montreal (Mr. Quinn) when this question was up for discussion on the last occasion, in having accused that hon. member of deliberately trying to deceive the House by reading a newspaper article containing the statement that Mr. Tennant had been defrauded of his superannuation allowance, when the hon. member for Montreal knew the contrary to be the case. Now, had the Minister of Customs desired to be fair to a political opponent he would also have quoted the qualifying expression used by the member for Montreal wherein he stated that it was true that since that time Mr. Tennant had been paid a sum of money by the department in lieu of that which he had paid into the superannuation fund. So the Minister's feigned indignation on this score was entirely uncalled for. Now, the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), in discussing this question in that elegant diction of the slangy variety of which he seems to be a master, disposed of it in a free and off-hand manner as if it was entirely unworthy of serious consideration; and he even, to use his own classical English, accused the member for Montreal of having displayed a great deal of gall in championing the cause of Mr. Tennant. Well, while I am not disposed to contradict the hon. member for Lisgar, or to deny that he is an authority upon gall—I am quite willing to concede that point—still I think this question is deserving of more serious consideration than he appeared disposed to give it. It is true that he has likened it to another question and another case that has been championed by the hon. member for Montreal, but it was entirely foreign to the subject under discussion to bring in the name of the widow McManus, and to tell the House that she had handed out the contents of the post office at the point of a revolver. In doing this he was simply indulging in that extravagant language which robs any remarks that he might have to address to this House, of a great deal of the weight that would otherwise be attached to them. It is true that the hon. member has declared that he had been the cause of 15 political decapitations in his constituency. That is not a bad record for the hon. member, considering that he has been a member of this House for so short a time. Still, he disclaims any idea that any of those dismissals took place because of religion or nationality. In fact he instanced one case where he was the means of causing the dismissal of an Orangeman, and declared that he was accused of being an enemy to that organization while in this case he is accused of being an enemy of the Irish Roman Catholics. This only shows how very unpopular the hon. member is becoming with all factions and all sections of the people in his own constituency.

While I am not personally acquainted with the gentleman, Mr. Tennant, who has been dismissed from the sub-collectorship of customs at the port of Gretna, still he having been an officer in the Manitoba service, and I being one of the few representatives on this side of the House from that province, I consider it my duty to protest against the harsh and unjust treatment which he has received at the hands of this Government. The hon. member from Montreal has very fully and very ably presented the case, and it will not be necessary for me to engage the attention of the House for any length of time, and what I do say is not for the purpose of making political capital against the Government, but merely to try and convince the Minister of Customs, if any poor words of mine can have that effect, that Mr. Tennant has been harshly and most unjustly treated in denying to him the first element of British fair-play. At the last session of Parliament I placed a series of questions on the Order paper in reference to this case to which I received the following replies:—

1. Has Mr. J. F. Tennant, for several years sub-collector of customs at Gretna, been dismissed.

Answer. Yes.

2. Were any charges made against him? What was the nature of the charges, and by whom preferred?

Answer. Charges to the effect that he took an offensive and public partisan part in the last Dominion general election were preferred against him by the hon. member for Lisgar, and were supported by other gentlemen.

3. Was Mr. Tennant given the opportunity to defend himself?

Answer. Mr. Tennant was notified of the charges and his reply thereto received.

4. Is he entitled to any allowance under the Superannuation Act?

Answer. This question is still under consideration.

Now, it appears that in the early part of last year charges of active and offensive partisanship were formulated against Mr. Tennant, these charges being that he had absented himself from his office on election day, leaving a United States customs official in charge, while he acted as scrutineer or agent at one of the polls. To these charges that gentleman gave a most unqualified denial, and not only a denial in the ordinary way, but sworn declarations to the same effect. Mr. Tennant denies being away from his office a single day during the whole campaign, declares he only attended one meeting, and then merely as a spectator. He asked for and courted an investigation, so that he might have the opportunity of meeting his accusers face to face so sure was he as to his ability to disprove those charges. This reasonable request not to be condemned until he had a fair and impartial trial, a request that the humblest of Her Majesty's subjects is entitled to make, was denied him. Here was a confliction of testimony—charges preferred on the one hand and denied on the other; not only denied by Mr. Tennant, but a statutory declaration was made by the United States customs official who was supposed to have taken Mr. Tennant's place in the office, also denying the accusation; besides, other friends of Mr. Tennant were prepared to give evidence in rebuttal of these charges. Now, if I am correctly informed, Mr. Tennant was the only customs official in Manitoba against whom charges were preferred who was not granted an investigation, a Mr. McPherson having been appointed a commissioner to take evidence under oath in other cases.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Allow me to state that the reason was because I did not know of the partisanship on the part of the deputy collector of Killarney, and I did know, of my own knowledge, of Mr. Tennant's partisanship. In order that I might do no injustice to the sub-collector of Killarney, I asked for the appointment of a commissioner, and on the report of the commissioner, that official was dismissed. In the other cases, I had my own knowledge.

Mr. ROCHE. Why was not the same procedure followed in the case of Mr. Tennant? One would think that if those gentlemen who formulated these charges were in a position to prove them, they would have been only too glad of the opportunity to do so before a competent tribunal, and thus relieve themselves and the Government of the blame that is now undoubtedly attached to them by the majority of the people, irrespective of politics, because of their underhand methods of warfare. Why was he singled out for the vengeance of some hon. gentlemen opposite? I will tell you why. Mr. Tennant took no part or share as a partisan in the last Dominion election. This he positively denies, and we are bound by every sense of justice to believe him innocent until he has been properly proved to be guilty. What he did do is this. At the time of a provincial election the Hon. J. D. Cameron, now Attorney General of Manitoba, held a meeting in Gretna and grossly insulted Mr. Tennant and his co-religionists, who are in a small minority there, because of their opposition to the School Act, and accused them of disloyalty, and made use of some very violent expressions. Mr. Tennant, at that meeting, was called upon to refute those, what he and his friends considered to be slanders, which he did, and took Mr. Cameron severely to task for his uncalled-for attack. Now, while my opinions are not the same as Mr. Tennant's on the school question, I claim that in a matter like that, on a question of conscience, there is not a reasonable man in this House who will not say that Mr. Tennant did perfectly right under the circumstances. That gentleman's whole life gave the lie to such an accusation as disloyalty. He went to that country in 1870 as a member of the Red River expedition under Lord Wolseley; he has served his country in one capacity or another for the past twenty years, and it was not natural for such a man to sit quietly and hear so unfounded a charge without resenting it. Since that time Mr. Cameron and some other Liberal politicians have had it in for Mr. Tennant, and made the threat that he would be hounded out of office as soon as the Liberals came into power. How was he served? He held a magistrate's commission since 1872. His political opponents cancelled it, although he had on several occasions received the thanks of the provincial government for upholding law and order on the frontier. A commission for taking affidavits in the courts met the same fate, and this gentleman feels that he has been persecuted by the provincial government in every possible manner. And now, at fifty years of age, with a large family, he has been turned adrift, with no provision for the future. The amount he had paid into the superannuation fund—$201.60—having been returned to him, and all to make way for a political friend of the hon. member for Lisgar, who, by the way, has proved to be so thoroughly incompetent that he had to call in Mr. Tennant a short time ago to straighten out affairs for him, they had got into such a muddle that business had almost come to a standstill.

Now Mr. Tennant directed an appeal to the Prime Minister himself. He had read the expressions made use of on the floor of the House by the Premier, that whereas if any civil servant had taken his official life in his hands and had been a partisan, no mercy would be shown; but unless it came within the personal knowledge of the Minister—not as the Minister of Customs said, "within the personal knowledge of an hon. member"—unless it came within the personal knowledge of the Minister himself, the Prime Minister would see that an investigation was held and the act of justice done towards the official, of giving him an opportunity of defending himself. Mr. Tennant directed an appeal to the Prime Minister, believing the Prime Minister was a man of his word, and Mr. Tennant asked, not for mercy, but for a fair and impartial trial. Here is the letter of Mr. Tennant to the Prime Minister:—

Mr. ROCHE.

Gretna, Man. 20th May, 1897.

To Hon. Wilfrid Laurier, M.P., Premier of Canada, Ottawa.

Sir,—I beg the honour of addressing you briefly by way of an appeal to your characteristic sense of justice and charity in the case of one treated with undue harshness.

By an Order of the Governor General in Council dated 9th April, 1897, my services as sub-collector of customs at Gretna were dispensed with, no investigation being held or any opportunity given for defence. I was charged, of course, with offensive partisanship, but, though a commissioned officer in the civil service, my request for an investigation into the false charges was denied with the result that my many years of faithful and efficient service count for nothing, whilst I find myself, at nearly fifty years of age, with a large and expensive family, out of a position, with even my superannuation cancelled, although I have paid into the fund since 1888.

I might also explain, in case the Minister of Customs should take exception to my quoting this, that this was before the $201.60 was paid to Mr. Tennant.

As to my alleged active partisanship, I was not absent from my office for one day during the late Dominion election campaign. Inspector Young and the records of my office will substantiate this statement, the untruthful affidavits of my enemies notwithstanding, and only on one occasion did I attend a public meeting, and this in Gretna. I took no active part in this meeting or any other, by speech or otherwise, although repeatedly pressed by the Conservative organizers so to do. The only occasion upon which my accusers can truthfully or reasonably rely was at a meeting during the provincial campaign, to which I went as an ordinary spectator. The speaker was the Hon. J. D. Cameron, now Attorney General for Manitoba, who grossly insulted Roman Catholics (I being one in a very small minority resident here), and I, being called upon and named, took up the taunt and expounded hotly for myself and few co-religionists. We were charged with disloyalty, which I could refute in my own person, since I was a member of the Red River Expedition of 1870, and have served on the frontier ever since, on the Boundary Commission, as a land guide, &c., besides holding a commission of the peace from 1872 to 1896, a municipal councillor, twice mayor of West Lynne by acclamation, alderman of the city of Emerson, and finally customs officer (after passing the qualifying examination). Neither are my politics of the wild, uncompromising order depicted by Mr. Richardson, since I have voted with the Liberals in general elections, looking rather to the principles and sincerity of the candidate than to his stripe of politics. I will confess, however, that I hold my Catholic religion to be dearer than any politics, therefore it was that I was led into giving Mr. Cameron a chance of complaint.

Permit me sir, in conclusion, to say that I do not desire to cast all blame on the Government, knowing, as I do, that the harshness and injustice of my treatment is directly attributable to the animosity of a very few individuals. Neither do I care for mercy. Merely that you will exercise in my behalf that generosity with which you are everywhere credited, and order that simple justice be shown to me, and, that my punishment be made proportionate to my offence.

The granting of an inquiry will result, if granted, to a very great modification in my sentence.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

J. F. TENNANT.

After a long delay an assistant-secretary replied to the foregoing, that the letter was referred to the Customs Department, and without any word from the department up to date, the 24th February, 1898; this letter being pigeon-holed in the Minister of Customs' Department, and no reply even being deigned to Mr. Tennant. Now, Mr. Tennant's service to this country deserved better recognition than this; he had been a faithful and efficient officer, no charge of carelessness or incompetency had been made against him in all those years; his reputation as a citizen is above reproach, his veracity has never been impeached, and still those sworn declarations have been ignored, his official head cut off, without granting that very reasonable request, to allow him an investigation, treatment, in my opinion, most arbitrary in its character, and deserving of the severest censure, and I think the hon. member for Lisgar, in his hour of victory, might well have afforded to be more magnanimous in his treatment of that gentleman, to the extent, at any rate, of insisting that he should be allowed the opportunity of defending himself before a proper tribunal.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. He has had that opportunity.

Mr. ROOHE. No, he had not, and the Minister of Customs knows it, and I appeal to him even at this late day to do justice to Mr. Tennant and allow this investigation. By doing so, and if Mr. Tennant is not able to prove himself guiltless, the Government will have washed their hands of all responsibility and will have relieved themselves of all blame that is now attached to them.

Mr. GUILLET. It was most unfair for the Minister of Customs to make the comments he did on this case, in the absence of any papers bearing on it. The hon. Minister (Mr. Paterson) endeavoured, as the hon. member for Montreal (Mr. Quinn) declared, to draw a red herring across the track. He endeavoured to take credit to himself for having dealt in a generous manner towards another member of the civil service, while defending himself against the charge of dealing unjustly with Mr. Tennant. Well, if the Minister of Customs had a good case, he had neither reason nor right to travel outside of his brief, and he should have refrained from casting reflections on Mr. McAllister, who certainly was one of the most estimable and efficient officers of the civil service. Mr. McAllister was deputy collector of Customs at Cobourg for years, and he performed the duties of Collector for quite a length of time, owing to the illness of the Collector, Mr. Ewing. It is a fact that Mr.

Ewing expressed his determination to resign his position so that justice might be done. Mr. McAllister, and in order that his services might be recognized by the Government. Mr. Ewing had a claim for special consideration to superannuation under the Civil Service Act. He had performed special services, and had been assured by the Government that on his applying for superannuation they would give him the full benefit of the Superannuation Act, in view of these special services which he had rendered to the department in Montreal. Mr. Ewing conducted an investigation in Montreal which resulted in a very large sum of money being returned to the public revenue, and for which he got no extra pay. Mr. McAllister discharged the duties of Mr. Ewing's office during the long time Mr. Ewing was in Montreal, and also for a long period before the latter's death. Mr. McAllister felt, and his friends felt, and Mr. Ewing's friends felt that he, Mr. McAllister, had special claims on the office of Collector of Customs when Mr. Ewing should resign. Mr. Ewing expressed his desire to resign, but he said: I must be sure that I shall have my full superannuation allowance; that is, an allowance for 35 years, and he had been but 32 years a Government official. Although that statement was made known to Mr. McAllister, he took no action on it, until a Liberal friend of his, a Mr. Meagher suggested to Mr. McAllister that an effort should be made to guarantee Mr. Ewing this addition of two or three years to his superannuation allowance in case his resignation was accepted. Mr. McAllister consulted an able lawyer in Cobourg, and the result was that a document was drawn up under the terms of which Mr. McAllister undertook to guarantee Mr. Ewing against any loss, and guaranteeing him that the Government would do justice to him. This is all that was done by Mr. McAllister in the matter. Mr. McAllister had no promise that he would get the office. The Government had given no indication; they gave him no sign that they would do as was proposed, nor had he any assurance excepting the fact that I myself would be willing to recommend him, and so Mr. McAllister's friends induced him to put his name to the document which his solicitor, an able lawyer in Cobourg, advised him would meet the case, and as he assumed that that was the proper thing to do, he signed that document. Yet this is exaggerated here, and is spoken of as an offence against the Criminal Code. These hon. gentlemen know that no such charge would lay against Mr. McAllister, that in no court could it be sustained, that no grand jury would bring in a bill against him and no petit jury would convict him on any such charge. The spirit of the law was never offended against by Mr. McAllister. His offence was a technical and trivial offence, if it was an offence at all. There have been cases of the same kind committed by friends of hon. gentlemen opposite and reported in the public press. We know that the Liberal paper in Brantford stated that a certain county judge had expressed his willingness to resign if Mr. Hardy were appointed in his place, on condition that he be allowed to retain his position of registrar of the surrogate court and be appointed master in chancery. These facts being publicly known, both governments were committed to carry out that arrangement and they did so. I think this constitutes a far more serious breach of the law than Mr. McAllister's action, and yet it is looked upon as a matter of every day occurrence, and is not considered as any offence against the Criminal Code. Moreover, I venture to say that if the secrets of the Cabinet could be ascertained, the Government themselves would be found to have committed far more grave offences against the Criminal Code than are charged against Mr. McAllister. This case of Mr. McAllister is brought up here simply as a blind, in the attempt to show that sympathy and kindness have been shown, which the facts will not bear out.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have listened to the discussion that has taken place on two occasions on this question of Mr. Tennant's dismissal. Now, it appears to me that three points in connection with this case are very clear. In the first place, Mr. Tennant is charged with acting the part of a partisan by the elected member of the constituency in which he lived. We know very well that in 1896, when this whole question was before the House, a claim was brought before the House in which Sir Charles Tupper, the leader of the Opposition himself, secured the dismissal of Mr. Wade in Digby, simply and solely because he himself stated that Mr. Wade had been guilty of opposing the party in power. I consider that the word of a member of this House with regard to a party taking a partisan part in an election is just as good as the word of a Minister. Though Mr. Wade asked for an investigation, he was refused an investigation. In the present case, the member has declared that he personally was cognizant of improper conduct on Mr. Tennant's part. Mr. Tennant remained for some time in the polling booth, not merely as a voter, but as a scrutineer; and to prove the truth of that statement, the Minister of Customs has in his hand a certificate of the state of the poll at the close, in Mr. Tennant's own handwriting. I want to know if that is not positive proof that he was there acting as a scrutineer, and taking an active part in the election. He left his office during office hours, and went to the polling booth; he stopped there longer than was necessary to record his vote. In his absence from his office, he left an American customs officer in charge of it. I would like to ask my hon. friend from Montreal Centre, who has a law office in Montreal, if he left a clerk in his office, and during his absence that clerk went out to discharge the duty of a scrutineer, and went for an opponent and left him there to attend to the business of the office during his absence, and stayed away long enough to see the close of the poll and make a certificate of it, would my hon. friend say, "Well done, good and faithful servant?"

Mr. QUINN. Admitting for the sake of argument that the American officer was in the office, will my hon. friend assimilate the case of an American customs officer with the case of two political opponents on election day?

Mr. McMULLEN. I certainly think a man occupying the responsible position of collector of customs under Her Majesty's commission openly violated the duties he was appointed to perform when he went out and left another man in charge, leaving the door of his office open till he returned. I certainly think that in itself was an offence. I would like to know why hon. gentlemen opposite consider that the Government or any of their followers should be deprived of the same privilege that hon. gentlemen opposite exercised in 1896 when they were in power.

Mr. COCHRANE. Did you not accuse the Conservative party of wrong-doing in that case?

Mr. McMULLEN. I am saying that in 1896, Sir Charles Tupper stated that any man who acted the part of a partisan openly and in the face of a member of Parliament, who stated on the floor of this House on his word of honour that he had done so, ought to be dismissed, and on that ground he justified the dismissal of Mr. Wade. I would like to know if the word of a member on this side of the House is not as good as that of the leader of the Opposition. I certainly think we have the same rights; and my hon. friend the member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) has reported on his word of honour that this man did take an open part in that election by acting as scrutineer and giving a certificate of the state of the poll at the close, and that he was an unfaithful servant when he left his office in the charge of a customs officer from across the line.

Mr. WALLACE. In this case, I think there has been a very gross miscarriage of justice. According to British law, every man is innocent until proved guilty. When was this man proved guilty? We have simply the fiat of the Minister of Customs. In the absence of evidence, in the absence of a fair trial or investigation, the word of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) was taken, that this man had done various wrongs, and the Minister dismissed him. But what do the papers disclose? That there is not a tittle of evidence to substantiate the charges. What does the hon. Minister say? He says that Tennant was in the polling booth. Was not that a shame? Was not that trampling on the Liberal party, that he should have been permitted to go into a polling booth? But was there any law prohibiting him doing so? He was a loyal Canadian citizen, who has served his country in a dangerous expedition, and he surely was entitled to the privilege of any other citizen. But the Minister says he not only went into the polling booth but remained there some time.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I said more. I said that he was there as scrutineer.

Mr. WALLACE. There is not a particle of proof of that. I challenge the hon. gentleman to get up and give us the proof.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. How did he come to stay there, if he was not?

Mr. WALLACE. I will read the evidence and challenge the hon. Minister to contradict it. I ask him to get up now, and I will sit down and give him a chance to prove that Mr. Tennant acted as scrutineer. At the close of the poll, any elector has a right to be present. If there is not a scrutineer for both parties, anybody can be invited to come in and act as such, and if there is no scrutineer there at all, the deputy returning officer must invite some one to be present at the counting of the polls.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). He could not be there and be in his own office at the same time.

Mr. WALLACE. He was not in his office.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). He should have been there and have put the Yankee out.

Mr. WALLACE. We will come to the Yankee later on. What did he do in the polling booth? Here are two affidavits—the first from the polling clerk, and the second from the deputy returning officer. What does the polling clerk say? He says:

I was the poll clerk for Gretna to the polling booth of the Dominion general elections held on the 23rd June, 1896, for the electoral division of Lisgar, being so sworn in as such by the deputy returning officer, H. G. Bean, and was present at the opening and holding of the poll to its close on the said election day.

The other officials present in the polling booth on the said election day were: H. G. Bean, deputy returning officer; R. B. Fisher, agent and scrutineer on behalf of the Liberal candidate, Mr. R. L. Richardson, and J. Pearson, agent and scrutineer for the Conservative candidate, Mr. R. Rogers.

The said R. B. Fisher and J. Pearson presented properly executed agents' papers on behalf of their respective candidates, which were received by the deputy returning officer, who authorized them to act in the said polling booth as scrutineers or agents for their respective candidates in the said poll.

Mr. J. F. Tennant first entered the Gretna poll in the afternoon. He recorded his vote, and was requested to act as scrutineer or agent for R. Rogers.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WALLACE. Is that a crime for an elector to go in and give his vote ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. What about his office ?

Mr. TAYLOR. Had he not a right to leave long enough to vote ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. But then he remained as scrutineer.

Mr. WALLACE. He recorded his vote. Up to that, I suppose he was complying with the law. He then was requested to act as scrutineer or agent for R. Rogers. Was that any crime on his part ? The hon. Minister of Customs says "hear, hear," as if he had discovered a mare's nest. But what follows :—

J. F. Tennant refused to act in any official capacity in connection with the said election, and rejected the papers presented to him by the deputy returning officer appointing him agent and scrutineer for R. Rogers.

Was that breaking any law, regulation or rule ?

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). If he were not scrutineer, he should not have been allowed to stay in the poll.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Let me read one clause of the statutory declaration of the deputy returning officer to that poll.

Mr. WALLACE. I have it under my hand, and can read it myself.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Read it.

Mr. WALLACE. I am reading one now. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to finish this one.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly.

Mr. WALLACE. I am very glad indeed to find the hon. gentleman so gracious.

—but consented to remain as an ordinary elector if there was no question raised, and to this R. B. Fisher, scrutineer for R. L. Richardson, made no objection.

Mr. Tennant simply remained there in the absence of the two scrutineers as an ordinary citizen, was that taking an active partisan part ? I say that his dismissal, under the circumstances, was a totally unjustifiable piece of inexcusable tyranny. The affidavit of the deputy returning officer is similar in substance, in its first part, to the one I have just read.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Read clause 4 of that declaration.

Mr. WALLACE—

No other scrutineer or agent than Mr. Pearson was appointed to act for or on behalf of Mr. Rogers at the said poll on the said election day. In the afternoon of the said election day, the said J. R. Pearson left the said polling booth, and Mr. J. F. Tennant, who was in the said polling booth recording his vote, was requested to act as scrutineer for Mr. Rogers. Scrutineers' papers were offered Mr. J. F. Tennant ; he refused them, and declined to act.

Mr. WALLACE.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Read on.

Mr. WALLACE. There does not seem to be much consolation to the hon. gentleman in any thing I do read.

—but consented to remain under the clause in the Dominion Elections Act permitting an elector to be present in the absence of the agent or scrutineer, provided there was no objection raised to his presence by any person. R. B. Fisher, the agent and scrutineer for R. L. Richardson, said there was no objection.

He was quite agreeable to Tennant remaining there as an independent scrutineer to see that there was fair-play. J. F. Tennant remained, but refused to act in any official capacity to receive the ballots of any man in connection with that election. That is the statutory declaration of the deputy returning officer, and I am quite sure it does not afford a single ground for this disgraceful conduct towards Mr. Tennant. Now, this is the only crime that the Minister of Customs had against him. The only crime against him is that he went to the polling booth and remained there some time, and because he did that, this old servant of the Government was cast out.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. What does the hon. member for Montreal say : He said that Tennant was discharged because he was an Irish Catholic.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. member for Montreal (Mr. Quinn) stated what I have stated.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, I can quote his language.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. So can I.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. Minister of Customs must not say "no." But if the man was dismissed because of his religion then, so much more disgrace for the Minister of Customs ; so much more disgrace for the Government—that a man in this country should be ostracized or punished for his religion, no matter what he may be. Then, according to the Minister of Customs, the next crime he committed was that he went to a meeting and was asked to come on the platform. And the Minister says that inferentially he was a partisan. The Minister of Customs himself does not say that he took any part in the proceedings. But he was present at the meeting, and that is one crime ; he was asked to take the platform, and that is another. Inferentially, he must be a partisan or he would not have been asked to take the platform, says the Minister of Customs. If ever there was a flimsy excuse for the dismissal of a competent public servant—for I know he was a competent customs officer.

An hon. MEMBER. Why did you not appoint his brother ?

Mr. WALLACE. There is a question. A man is competent, so why do I not appoint his brother ? I did appoint his brother. But Mr. Tennant is said to have been a partisan because he was asked to take a platform at a meeting. The Minister does not say that he took a platform or took any part in the meeting.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes, I do.

Mr. WALLACE. The Minister did not say so and he will not say so now.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I say the declarations show that he took the part of a partisan in the meeting.

Mr. WALLACE. Whose declaration ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The declaration of two gentlemen I named.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. Minister says he named them. But has he any objection to state again who they were ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson).

Mr. WALLACE. Did the hon. member for Lisgar make a declaration ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. He made a declaration in his letter.

Mr. WALLACE. Oh, the hon. member (Mr. Richardson) wrote a letter saying : We want this man dismissed, and the Minister gets up and says that this is a declaration that the hon. gentleman has made.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I did not say a statutory declaration. The hon. gentleman must not—

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. member (Mr. Paterson) will please take his seat and allow me to proceed. There is a transparent fraud. The Minister gets up and says there were two declarations made, and when I ask him whose, he first shirks the question—

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) is misquoting me.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman will please sit down, unless he raises a point of order.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) says I said what I did not say.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman has no right to interrupt me except to raise a point of order. The Speaker can allow one on that side to interrupt when he will not allow one on this side to do so. The hon. Minister said there were two declarations made, when, as a matter of fact, there were no declaration made in the sense in which we are using the word to-night. The hon. Minister chips in and says : You did not read the other two declarations. I should like to see them. Why have they not been presented to the House ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Where is there any declaration, statutory or otherwise, that Mr. Tennant did not act as a partisan ?

Mr. QUINN. He never was called upon to defend himself against such a charge.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. Minister wrote a letter to Mr. Tennant. Why did he not call upon him to defend himself against this charge. Here is the letter that the hon. Minister wrote :

Ottawa, 17th February, 1897.

Jos. Tennant, Esq.,

Customs Officer, Gretna, Man.

Dear Sir,—I beg to inform you that I have received a statutory declaration in which the charge is made that one Patrick Harrigan, a member of the staff of the United States customs at Neche, in the state of North Dakota, was in charge of your office for some time during the 23rd of June, 1896. Please let me have your reply to this charge at your earliest convenience.

Yours truly,

WM. PATERSON.

Mr. QUINN. That is the only charge made against him.

Mr. WALLACE. That is the only charge. He sent a statutory declaration answering that amply and completely. And that is the only chance that was given—

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. You are wrong there.

Mr. WALLACE. I will read the declaration made by this man Horgan to disprove the only charge made against him.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No, no.

Mr. WALLACE. Was there any other charge ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. What does the hon. gentleman mean—that that was the only communication sent to Mr. Tennant ?

Mr. QUINN. That was the only charge made against him in writing.

Mr. WALLACE. I believe that is the only charge made against him. The Minister interrupts me, and when I ask if that is the only charge, he asks me a question instead of answering me.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman may go on if he likes ; but he is making statements that will not be borne out by the papers when they come down.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman had two chances to state his case and he does not seem to be satisfied.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The papers will come down.

Mr. WALLACE. Why are they not here now ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The motion ordering them has not been carried yet.

Mr. WALLACE. Why did not the Minister, when he made his speech, lay the papers on the Table. Here is the answer to the charge that Patrick Horgan was in charge of this office some time during the 23rd of June. Here is the answer, not in the form of a letter, but in the form of a sworn statutory declaration :

Dominion of Canada,
Province of Manitoba.

In the matter of J. F. Tennant, and his dismissal from the service of the Canadian Department of Customs :

I, Patrick Horgan, of Neche, North Dakota, in the United States, do solemnly declare that I am an officer of the United States customs at Neche, in North Dakota, and I am well acquainted with J. F. Tennant, ex-sub-collector of customs at Gretna, Man. In the performance of my duties I visit Gretna almost daily. I was in the office of Mr. Tennant on the 23rd June, 1896, as I usually wait there when meeting the train going south on the Great Northern Railway.

These are the courtesies usual between officers on the boundary. I presume the Minister of Customs knows better than almost any member of the House how necessary it is for officers on both sides of the boundary lines to be on friendly terms, in order to aid each other in the performance of their duty. It is necessary to the efficient performance of the duties of customs officers on either side. The declaration goes on :

I was in the office of Mr. Tennant on the 23rd June, 1896, as I usually wait there when meeting the train going south on the Great Northern Railway. I was no longer there on that date than on other occasions. I was not in charge of said customs office at Gretna on the occasion nor at any other time.

Now, there is a sworn declaration. Have we any contradiction to that ?

Mr. RICHARDSON. We have the declaration filed with the department by one Bryans of Morden, swearing that the office was in charge of this man Horgan.

Mr. WALLACE. In what way does he prove it ? He says that a statutory declaration was forwarded to the department from one Bryans, of Morden, that he found the Canadian Customs office at Gretna in charge of an American Customs official. But Horgan swears that, although he was in the office, he never performed any duties there, and was not in charge of it. What does Bryans swear ? He says he went there and saw him sitting in the office. He does not swear that he was performing any duties, he does not give one specific statement to show that he was performing any duties there. The member for Lisgar says further :

Mr. WALLACE.

I may say that so far as my own personal opinion is concerned, I did not think any investigation was needed in this case.

Of course not. He voted Tory, and so out he must go. He was not the only one that had to walk the plank in the exercise of his rights as a British subject.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the hon. member mention one ?

Mr. WALLACE. The sub-collector of Customs at Killarney, Thos. Shannon. I am prepared to discuss the case of the dismissal of Thomas Shannon with either the member for Lisgar or the Minister of Customs, or with both of them, and I give the Minister of Customs warning that that case will be brought up, and we would like to see the papers in that case before his Estimates are passed through the House. I have now disposed of this question of the Customs officer from the United States being in charge. There is not a line of proof that he was in charge. There is the sworn affidavit of the man himself that neither at that time nor at any other time had he been in charge of a Canadian Customs House. But Tennant was offensive, we are told. What was the offense ? The first offense was that he did not vote for the member for Lisgar ; the second was that he was offensive, and that he admitted attending a meeting. Well, is it a crime for a citizen to attend a meeting ; is it a crime even for a Government officer to attend a meeting ? He took no part in that meeting. It is true he did take an active part in the provincial campaign, but, surely, Mr. Speaker, is it to be a cause for dismissal on the part of this Government, that a man has committed an offence against the Government of Manitoba ? They tell us it was not for that offence he was punished, but it was for other offences. It was another case of the Minister of Customs and one of the supporters of the Government putting their heads together and saying : These men have been Conservatives, our friends want the offices, and we must drive them out of office. Here is a man who has served his country, and at a moment's notice is deprived of his office, and deprived of his honour by dismissal. He had been nine years in service, whereas it requires ten years service to entitle a man to superannuation. They did not even pay his money back until public attention was called to it, and then, months afterwards, they paid him back the money he had paid into the Government. I say in this case there is not a tittle of evidence to justify the Department of Customs in dismissing such a worthy and capable official as Mr. Tennant was. The hon member for North Wellington says his defence is divided into three parts. The first one was that Sir Charles Tupper did the same thing fifteen years ago. Why, the cases are as dissimilar as day is from night. The case he alludes to was that of a man who got up in a meeting of Sir Charles Tupper's, who was then a Minister, and abused him personally. When charged with it, he did not ask for an investigation, and admitted the truth of the charge. The man was dismissed. But there is no parallel between the cases at all. He never asked for an investigation, while Mr. Tennant did. Moreover, this other man was employed by the day, and could be dismissed at a day's notice, whereas Mr. Tennant was appointed by the Governor in Council, and could not be dismissed except for cause. What cause did they tell the Governor General? I believe that some representation was made to the Governor General which the evidence that is brought before this House to-night, proves was not true. In the next place, the member for North Wellington says that the statement of the poll was in Mr. Tennant's handwriting. Of course it was. That is what we stated, that he was an elector called upon, and could not refuse. It was after hours, because the Custom House closes at four o'clock and the polling closes at five. He was not neglecting his duties there. But the returning officer can call on any elector to step in and see that the thing is done fairly, and the elector cannot refuse. That was Mr. Tennant's crime, and it leads to the laughter of the hon. member for Lisgar, who thinks it is a huge joke. If he should go back to that constituency, which I am told he is not going to do, he would find there was not such a big joke in it. I would like to see him go down to Gretna and Killarney and justify the dismissals of these two competent men. I would like to go down with him to hear what he would have to say.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would be glad to have you come with me.

Mr. WALLACE. Then the third defence of the transaction by the member for North Wellington, was that the United States Customs officer was sitting there. If there ever was an unjustifiable case of the dismissal of a customs officer without cause, it is the one under discussion, next to the dismissal of Thomas Shannon, of Killarney, whose case we will investigate subsequently.

Mr. FLINT. In a general way there is ample proof before the House that the Minister of Customs was fully justified in recommending the dismissal of this officer named Tennant. But it must be borne in mind that the discussion arose on a motion for papers in the case and when those are produced—and the Minister has consented to the motion being adopted—the House will then be in a much better position to discuss the subject. At the present time we are at this disadvantage, that we have before the House only copies of such papers as have been used by the hon. gentleman who brought up this complaint, and who, of course, made the best he could of his case. It seems to be assumed by these hon. gentlemen, and also by the gentleman who drew up the affidavit, that Mr. Tennant had a perfect right under the law to remain in the polling booth after he had deposited his vote; yet the fact is that unless he was acting agent or scrutineer for one of the candidates, he had no right to remain in the polling booth even with the consent of those present. The Dominion statute gives no such power as to waive its provisions by not raising objections or acting by unanimous consent. The law is simply that an elector must enter the polling booth, give in his name, receive his ballot paper, mark it and hand it to the returning officer, and retire. Under no circumstances except the one circumstance that he remained as scrutineer and took the oath provided for scrutineers, had he a right to remain, and the presiding officer violated the law and the gentleman himself violated the law in remaining notwithstanding the fact that no objection was raised. I call attention to the manner in which this affidavit is drawn. I can see quite clearly that the individual who prepared it might not have intended that which the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) considered he intended. The affidavit says:

In the afternoon of the said election day, the said J. R. Pearson left the said polling booth, and Mr. J. F. Tennant, who was in the said polling booth recording his vote, was requested to act as scrutineer for Mr. Rogers. Scrutineer's papers were offered to Mr. J. F. Tennant: he refused them and declined to act, but consented to remain under the clause in the Dominion Election Act permitting an elector to be present in the absence of agent or scrutineer provided there was no objection raised to his presence by any person.

There is no such provision under the Dominion Election Act: there is no disqualification permitting any one to remain in the polling booth unless he takes the oath of a scrutineer, and Mr. Tennant could not remain and act as such without taking that oath.

Mr. WALLACE. I am afraid the hon. gentleman has not read the Election Act.

Mr. FLINT. I have it before me, and I shall be glad if the hon. gentleman can point out to me the clause which gives any further powers than those I have stated. The voter must either retire from the polling booth or take the oath of scrutineer, and if he remained then he was under the obligation and liability of a scrutineer. No doubt from the history, as shown by the papers, he was acting as a partisan, and there may be still further evidence when the papers are brought down to show a stronger case in favour of the Minister and the hon. member for Lisgar.

Mr. QUINN. After the many compliments that have been paid me by the hon. Minister and by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), it would be very difficult for me to allow the debate to close without exercising my right to devote a little attention to the argument, or rather to the language used in place of argument, in answer to the direct charge I have made against both of them. The hon. member for Lisgar has been good enough—perhaps he intended it as an insult, but I did not consider it an insult—to call me the O'Connell of the Canadian Parliament. Fortunately the laws of this country are such and the constitution is such that there is no necessity of an O'Connell in the Canadian Parliament; but if this Parliament were constituted of men like the hon. member for Lisgar, there would be required more than one O'Connell to show hon. members the right path, the path of honesty and fair dealing towards their fellow-subjects. The hon. gentleman has been good enough also to refer to the fact that I spoke in favour of a poor unfortunate widow, Mrs. McManus, who was attacked last session. It was stated by the hon. gentleman that it had been proved that the widow delivered the mail to applicants at the point of a revolver.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. QUINN. At the point of a shotgun.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Did I say it was proved in this House?

Mr. QUINN. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the hon. gentleman read what I did say?

Mr. QUINN. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. At the point of a shotgun—exactly.

Mr. QUINN. But the hon. gentleman a moment ago stood up and said that he stated nothing of the kind.

Mr. RICHARDSON. You said it was delivered at the point of a revolver.

Mr. QUINN. Then you split hairs between a shot gun and a revolver.

Mr. RICHARDSON. A shot gun is jocular and a revolver might be serious.

Mr. QUINN. The hon. gentleman made the statement that the widow when attending to her duties delivered the letters at the point of a shotgun. I challenge the hon. gentleman or any hon. member to show any evidence of that kind. On the contrary, the report of the investigation made was that the widow had been guilty of no offence, but that perhaps on account of the friction excited it would be better to change her to another post office, but instead of doing this the head of the department cut her head off. The hon. gentleman took hold of this matter. It is quite true that the hon. gentleman and other members whispered in the ears of members on this side of the House, declaring how useless it would be to defend a woman whose character was worthless; but none of the hon. gentlemen had the courage to make a declaration that the woman was unworthy of belief or of the position she occupied as postmistress at that time. But they did have the questionable courage to whisper, where they could not be reported, statements in the same way as they whispered statements in this case, into the willing ear of the Postmaster General, who acted on those whispers and dismissed the woman.

That is just what has been done in the case. There is no evidence against this man Mr. Tennant. I have stated so before and I state so now. The Minister of Customs has not been able to name one fact on account of which he has dismissed this man. He has not been able to stand up in this House since this debate began and to say: I dismissed Tennant because of such and such an action he committed as an offensive partisan; and I have in support of my action the uncontradicted statement or oath of any individual that Tennant so conducted himself. The Minister has not been able to point to one fact which has been proven, sufficient to hang the lowest dog upon, as a reason why Tennant should be dismissed. But the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) has lots of reasons. In the course of his address he gave us six reasons, and they were, first: Tennant took an active part in organizing committees; second: He was known as one of the most active organizers; third, he acted as scrutineer; fourth, he went to a meeting in the town hall of Gretna in the midst of a gang and was most offensive in his interruptions; fifth, he did not report his assistant, Mr. Bryan, who was absent attending to political business; and, sixth, there was a statutory declaration that one Horgan was in the custom-house on the day of June 23rd. But the Minister of Customs says: My ground for dismissing him was the letter written by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) supported by the statement of Mr. Greenway, Premier of Manitoba, and backed up again by the statement of the Attorney General of Manitoba Mr. Cameron. When driven to the last ditch that is the statement the Minister makes. But, is it why Tennant was dismissed? No. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) says: I did not think an investigation was necessary. The witness, the accuser, the Judge, the jury, did not think an investigation was necessary; he was the only one to be consulted. Is that in accord with the statement of the right hon. the Prime Minister recorded in "Hansard" in 1896? Is that in accord with the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce? It is not. Listen to what the premier said:

No Minister would pretend to dismiss any official unless he had an opportunity to defend himself. But when the case is in the personal knowledge of the Minister himself, under such circumstances there is no case for inquiry.

The right hon. the Prime Minister did not say, when it is within the knowledge of the hon. member for Lisgar, and he reports it second hand to Mr. Greenway, Premier of Manitoba, and he reports it third hand to Mr. Cameron, Attorney General for Manitoba, and they all club together and send their little statements to the Minister of Customs; that then the Minister is to dismiss an official. And what did the Minister of Customs tell us? He said there were two declarations against this man that he had attended a meeting. Now, what is the general acceptation of the word "declaration?" It is a statutory declaration; declarations such as I have produced in this House, declarations which are used in the legal language of this country as equivalent to an oath. That is what the Minister of Customs intended to convey to the House.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. It is not.

Mr. QUINN. That is what the Minister of Customs intended to embalm on "Hansard."

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. It is not.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. There is a statement made by the Minister of Customs that he never intended to convey that idea to the House, and that statement must be accepted by the hon. member (Mr. Quinn).

Mr. QUINN. I am bound to accept the statement, and I do so. But I do say that the manner in which the language was used showed an ignorance of the use of this word as it is generally accepted in the House. It showed an ignorance of the significance of the ordinary acceptation of the word "declaration" on the part of the Minister that it is very difficult to understand, but I am bound, to accept his statement, and I do so. When I spoke of a declaration, and when I spoke of the proofs which were put by Mr. Tennant before the Minister of Customs, I spoke of a sworn declaration; statutory declarations which are equivalent to sworn statements. The Minister was disingenuous enough to try and draw a herring across the trail in the first statement which he made to the House, by saying I wished to charge him with meanness, and that I made a false statement because I did not admit that Mr. Tennant had received a sum of money from the Department of Customs. If the Minister had paid attention to what I was saying, or if he had not been disingenuous, he would have heard my admission that a paltry sum had been returned to Mr. Tennant. But mark you, Mr. Speaker, when was it returned? It was not before Parliament met this session; not even before my motion was put upon the paper, but it was after my motion was put upon the paper that this money was returned to Mr. Tennant. If my motion had come up in the ordinary course, and if I had spoken on it then, I would not have been obliged to qualify my statement at all, for it would have been absolutely true had I used the words in the paper, that Mr. Tennant had been robbed of this sum of money. He was dismissed in May, 1897, and it was after the 4th February, 1898, that this money was refunded to him.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Your motion had nothing to do with it; not in the least.

Mr. QUINN. I do not know that it had, but I do not think the Minister of Customs is a fair judge of circumstantial evidence. If it were submitted to an impartial jury, the majority at any rate would say that probably my motion had something to do with it.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. May I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) one question. Does he say that Mr. Tennant made a statutory declaration?

Mr. QUINN. No.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Denying the charges?

Mr. QUINN. I never said so.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I thought the hon. gentleman had been speaking of declarations made by Mr. Tennant.

Mr. QUINN. Oh, no.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Certainly the hon. member for West York did.

Mr. QUINN. The only charge that was made against Mr. Tennant of which I have any knowledge, and the only charge which the Minister has mentioned, was that contained in his letter of the 7th February, 1897. I say that in answer to that charge Mr. Tennant wrote inclosing a statutory declaration of Horgan, and declared himself willing to make a statutory declaration if required, and subsequently he sent two statutory declarations of Byng and Bryan.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Did he make one himself?

Mr. QUINN. No, he offered to do so.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Roche) said he did.

Mr. QUINN. Tennant offered to do so in his letter to the Minister of Customs.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Roche) said he did, and I thought perhaps he might have done so.

Mr. QUINN. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) also tried to draw a red herring across the trail, and he endeavoured to display his generosity because a certain Mr. Barrett had not been dismissed. Now, Mr. Speaker, you must remark, and I am sure the country will remark, the great solicitude that the defenders in this case have shown in dragging in every other case, and mentioning every other possible man except Joseph F. Tennant, of Gretna, Manitoba. We are asked, why was not Mr. Barrett dismissed? What does the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) put up as his great defence for his conduct in this case? "Why," he says, "Mr. Barrett was the plaintiff in the great Manitoba School Case; if there was any reason in the world for dismissing a man surely this gentleman should be dismissed; yet in the generosity of his heart he says: I never asked that Mr. Barrett should be dismissed." I answer very properly to the hon. member for Lisgar, why, of course, people who act in that invidious manner, people who act unfairly, always try to cover up their unfairness and invidiousness; and the hon. member would not select Mr. Barrett, who had occupied such a prominent position in the constitutional history of this country, as one of his victims, because his reason for selecting him would be too easily apparent.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I had nothing to do with him. He was not in my constituency.

Mr. QUINN. I am only answering the statement the hon. member himself made. I did not say he had anything to do with him.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What statement did I make?

Mr. QUINN. The hon. member stated that Mr. Barrett had not been dismissed, although he had been the plaintiff in the Manitoba school case. I simply answer that if the hon. member for Lisgar had had the power, he certainly had the desire, but he did not consider it expedient to have Mr. Barrett dismissed, because the reason of his dismissal would be too easily known.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to tell him what I did say?

Mr. QUINN. The hon. gentleman has had his time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has stated that I said that Mr. Barrett was not dismissed because he took part in the school case. What I said was, that that gentleman had, in a newspaper he edited, attacked most violently every Liberal—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is not speaking to a point of order.

Mr. QUINN. The hon. gentleman also took a great deal of glory to himself because in the course of three years he had only dismissed one Irish Catholic, although he boasted of having fifteen scalps at his belt. He did not tell us how many Irish Catholics there were in his constituency. Perhaps he cleaned out all he could; but he did his best in the short time he was there, and I have no doubt he will carry on his meritorious work to the best of his ability for the rest of his life.

Mr. QUINN.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I appointed an Irish Catholic in one case.

Mr. QUINN. Well, I suppose the hon. gentleman is ashamed of that.

Mr. RICHARDSON. No, he happens to be a very decent fellow.

Mr. QUINN. The hon. Minister spoke of Mr. Horgan's affidavit, stating that it proved that Mr. Tennant was in the polling booth as a scrutineer, and that he, Horgan, had charge of Tennant's office. I ask the hon. gentleman, does he make that statement now, after he has had time to think about it? The hon. gentleman refuses to answer.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No, I do not.

Mr. QUINN. Well, I will wait for the answer.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I said, and I say now, that that affidavit shows that Mr. Horgan was in the Canadian Customs office, and the affidavits of the returning officer and the clerk show that Mr. Tennant was in the polling booth, having been requested to stay there as scrutineer by the Conservative scrutineer.

Mr. QUINN. The hon. gentleman has been good enough to modify his statement somewhat; but it is altogether different from the statement he made the other day. Yet, he does not modify it so much after all, because he says he consented to remain at the request of the others and act as scrutineer. Now, these affidavits do not prove anything of the kind. As a matter of fact, Mr. Horgan's affidavit, as read by me, proves that Mr. Horgan was in the office that day, as he was nearly every day of his life since he has been in that country, that he was there no more that day than any other day, that he did not have charge of the office that day, that he never had charge of that office, that he was not requested to remain there that day; and yet the hon. gentleman hedges himself behind the statement now, that because it appears in the affidavit that Mr. Horgan was in the office that day, he must have been there while Mr. Tennant was in the polling booth. There is no such thing in the affidavit. There is no affidavit in existence to prove that during the time Mr. Horgan was in there he did anything in execution of the duties of the office. There is no affidavit saying that he acted in any way as the custodian of the office. How easy it is to get some young man to go to the office after four o'clock, after the office is virtually closed, after the business of the day is over; and, knowing that Mr. Tennant has been up to vote, to get him to go there and see another man in the office, and have him make a statutory declaration that he went there and found Mr. Horgan in possession of the office. Will the hon. gentleman pretend that that is a fair or truthful statutory declaration? And yet that is the only statutory declaration that has been filed against Mr. Tennant. That is the only piece of evidence that has been adduced to support the charge against him, and it is most questionable. The hon. Minister also spoke about my statement concerning the money; but he must have known, though of course he could not have worked himself into the wrath he showed if he had admitted it—that I was reading from a paper published early in 1897, after the dismissal of Mr. Tennant and before a dollar of the money was paid. He knew that I was not using my own language, and that I was not reading from a recent paper, for I gave the date of the paper when I read it. I would interject here that when the Minister or any member of this House finds me making a misstatement of fact, it must be either through inadvertence or from a mere slip of the tongue, and as soon as my attention is drawn to it, I will take good care to make myself clear. I have not come into this House for the purpose of injuring my reputation for truth that I possess outside of this House, and I think it ill becomes a Minister of the Crown to distort the language of any member into making a false charge against an hon. Minister or any other hon. member of this House. The hon. Minister attempted to distract the attention of the House by daring me to ask for the papers in the McAllister case. What has that to do with this matter? He charged me with having dragged in that case, but the whole head and front of my offence consisted in Mr. McAllister's name having been mentioned in the article I read, and which was taken from the "Catholic Register."

Last week we gave a long list of the names of Catholics in the Kingston district who have been driven out of Government employment by the Liberals. The "Globe" had been denying only a few days before that Catholics have any grievance against the new Administration; but the chief Government organ prudently abstains from offering any defence of the dismissals enumerated. We had hoped to induce the organ to descend from virtuous and patriotic generalities and come down to plain facts and particular instances. But we may have been at fault ourselves in not offering direct proof that religious opinion was the evident "crime" of the Catholic office-holder in any stated case of dismissal.

Then comes the reference to Mr. McAllister:

The circumstances surrounding the removal of Mr. McAllister, of Cobourg, by Hon. Mr. Patterson, leave no room for supposing anything else than politico-religious persecution. This week we propose to take up another case in Mr. Patterson's department in which we are prepared to demonstrate a religious persecution beyond any or nay.

The Government campaign against Catholics is not confined to one district or province.

So the reference to Mr. McAllister was simply to point the moral of the article and not intended as a reference to that case. But the hon. Minister swelled out in importance, he was buoyed up by his own eloquence, and his voice resounded in these halls, as he dared me to ask for the papers in the McAllister case. I do not ask for those papers, because I know nothing of that case, but I have made the direct and positive charge that Mr. Tennant was dismissed, and I gave my reason for making it, and the papers brought down show that he was simply dismissed on the statement of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), supported by Attorney General Cameron and First Minister Greenway of Manitoba. No one who reads through the return can help coming to the conclusion that Mr. Tennant was dismissed without cause on the pretense of partisanship, but really because he is an Irish Catholic. It was no doubt very gratifying to the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) to be able, as it were, to kill two birds with one stone—that is to kill a Tory and a Papist at the same time. But I say that the gravamen of Mr. Tennant's offence, in the mind of the hon. member for Lisgar and Messrs. Greenway and Cameron, who furnished the only evidence in support of the charges made by the hon. member for Lisgar, and whose evidence is contradicted by much more trustworthy proof, is that the office-holder in this case was an Irish Catholic. No investigation was held, no chance was given this man to defend himself. He demanded an investigation, but got no reply, and the affidavits he has furnished in his own defence show how baseless were the charges against him.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a question of privilege. I deny most positively that the reason I asked for this man's dismissal was because he was an Irishman and a Roman Catholic. When I called for his dismissal, I did not even know his religion or nationality.

Mr. QUINN. I simply wished in conclusion to refer to the point made by the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), as to the right of Mr. Tennant to be in the polls. Subsection 2 of section 45 of the Election Act provides:

Such elector, if required by the deputy returning officer, poll clerk, or one of the candidates or agents, or by any elector present, shall, before receiving his ballot paper, take the oath of qualification in the form 8 in the first schedule of this Act.

I say that the words, "or by an elector present" imply that an elector may be present other than the deputy returning officer, poll clerk, one of the candidates or one of their agents.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Are you a lawyer?

Mr. QUINN. Yes.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Is that your legal opinion?

Mr. QUINN. Yes.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Good.

Mr. QUINN. I presume the hon. gentleman is not a lawyer?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That is why I put the question.

Mr. QUINN. My opinion on a legal question is as good as the hon. gentleman's on candies. Then the article provides:

Immediately after the close of the poll, if the candidates and their agents or any of them, are absent, then in the presence of such of them as are present, and of at least three electors, the deputy returning officer shall open the poll-book and proceed to count the number of votes given for each candidate.

By its very reading, that allows three voters to be in the poll, if the candidates and their representatives or agents or any of them are not there at the time. Under these circumstances, Mr. Tennant had a perfect right to be in the poll, if there was no representative of the other candidate in opposition to the hon. member for Lisgar present. He had the right to be there as an elector, as a voter, and if there was any doubt in the mind of the Minister as to whether he had the right to be there, that was time the matter was a fit subject for investigation.

Motion (Mr. Quinn) agreed to.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. TAYLOR. Will the hon. Prime Minister please inform us what business he intends to take up at the next sitting?

The PRIME MINISTER. We shall take up the Franchise Act.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 1 o'clock a.m. (Tuesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 10th May, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 137) to revive and amend the Act respecting the International Radial Railway Company.—(Mr. MacPherson.)

FAST ATLANTIC SERVICE—CONTRACT.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved the following resolution:—

Mr. PATERSON.

That the supplemental contract between Her Majesty the Queen and Messrs. Petersen, Tate & Co., dated the twenty-third day of April, 1898, respecting the fast Atlantic mail service, modifying, explaining and defining certain of the provisions of the contract (of date the twenty-fourth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven) be approved by the House of Commons, which said supplemental contract is as follows:—

This agreement, made this 13th day of April, 1898, between Her Most Gracious Majesty Queen Victoria, herein represented by the Honourable Richard Reid Dobell, one of Her Majesty's Ministers for the Dominion of Canada, of the one part, and William Petersen, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, in the county of Northumberland, England, and Arthur Tate, of same place, trading together together under the name and style of "Petersen, Tate & Co.," ship-owners (hereinafter called "the contractors,") of the other part.

Whereas this agreement is to be read, construed and take effect as supplemental to an agreement (hereinafter described as the principal agreement), dated the 24th March, 1897, and made between Her Majesty and the contractors, being an agreement for the establishment of a fast steamship service between Canada and the United Kingdom.

And whereas the contractors contend that by reason of the strike in the engineering trade they are entitled to an extension of time allowed by the principal agreement for the commencement of the service.

And whereas the Government of Canada, while not admitting the contractors' contention, are willing to allow an extension of time on the terms and subject to the conditions hereinafter mentioned, and are otherwise willing to modify or explain the principal agreement in manner hereinafter expressed.

And whereas the said Richard Reid Dobell has represented to the contractors that he has authority to bind the Canadian Government and the Minister by this agreement.

Now this agreement witnesseth that the contractors, for and in consideration of the premises and of the covenants and agreements on the part of Her Majesty hereinafter contained, for themselves their executors, administrators and assigns, do hereby warrant, promise and agree with Her Majesty, her heirs and successors, and Her Majesty, for herself, her heirs and successors, hereby covenants to and with the contractors, their executors, administrators and assigns in manner following: that is to say:

1. The time for commencement of the service shall be extended to the first day of May, 1900, and the contractors agree that on that day all four steamers mentioned in the principal agreement shall be ready and complete in all respects to commence the service, and that from that day the service shall be a weekly service respectively from and to Great Britain and Canada.

2. The Minister hereby approves Wednesday as the day of sailing from the port of departure in Great Britain and Saturday as the day of sailing from the port of departure in Canada, subject, nevertheless, to the right to change the day of sailing (but only by agreement with the contractors or the company) or to delay the sailing of a steamer as given by the principal agreement.

3. The Minister hereby approves the changes and modifications in the plans (figures and specifications) incorporated with the principal agreement which are shown in the modified plans (figures and specifications) which were submitted to the Minister during the month of February, 1898, and such modified plans (figures and specifications) are incorporated with and to be read and treated as part of this agreement, provided that the vessels are to be built under the supervision of the Admiralty, and in conformity with the requirements of Her Majesty's Imperial Government respecting armed cruisers and also of the British Board of Trade.

4. A permanent mail-room of 2,000 cubic feet capacity shall be erected on each steamer (in position shown on the said modified plans, or as may be approved by the Minister), and the contractors or the company undertake to find proper storage for any extra mail matter, as required under the principal agreement such as is the practice in the existing Atlantic mail services.

5. The draught of water of the steamers, when fully equipped, loaded and ready for sea, may exceed 25 ft. 6 in., if and so far as the steamers may safely and without infringing other conditions of this and the principal agreement be loaded deeper.

6. Section (a) of clause 2 of the principal agreement shall be read and construed as if the following words and figures, namely, "an average speed of 500 knots per 24 hours" were substituted therein for the words and figures "a speed of 500 knots in every 24 hours. Clause 18 of the principal agreement shall be read and construed as if after the words "500 knots per 24 hours" were inserted the words "in ordinary weather."

7. This agreement and the principal agreement shall be read and construed as if they were one instrument, and in this agreement and the principal agreement "The Minister" means Her Majesty's Minister of Trade and Commerce for the Dominion of Canada for the time being.

8. Provided terms and conditions satisfactory to the contractors or the company with respect to calling at an Irish port, and with respect to the compensation for the additional obligations imposed in consequence of the stoppages at such port and as to all other matters connected with such calling shall be agreed upon between the company and the Minister, the steamers shall, if required by the Minister, call at an Irish port to be hereafter agreed upon between the contractors or the company and the Minister.

9. The contractors covenant that on or before the 30th day of May next:

(a) The company contemplated by the principal agreement, and having a capital in shares and debentures, or either of them, of not less than £1,250,000 sterling shall have been incorporated and its capital responsibly subscribed;

(b) Proper contracts shall have been made by the contractors or the company with responsible ship-builders for the construction of the four steamers; and

(c) Two of the steamers shall be substantially under construction. If the contractors shall have failed to perform this covenant or any part of it then this agreement shall determine and the principal agreement shall remain in force as if this agreement had not been made.

10. This agreement shall not be binding upon either party unless Her Majesty's Imperial Government consent to contribute the proportion of £51,500 sterling of the subsidy under the terms of the principal agreement as altered by this agreement, and such assent is notified to the contractors by the Minister.

11. This agreement shall not be binding upon Her Majesty unless within a week of the date hereof the contractors give to the Minister a guarantee in a form to be approved by him for the sum of ten thousand pounds sterling from the North Eastern Banking Company (Limited), who furnished the guarantee under the principal agreement by which the said banking company shall bind themselves to secure the performance of the principal agreement as modified by this agreement, and so soon as this agreement becomes binding upon both parties hereto the guarantors shall be released from their guarantee under the principal agreement and this guarantee substituted therefor, and this guarantee, together with the deposit under the principal agreement, shall be held as security for the performance of the principal agreement as modified by this agreement.

12. If this agreement does not become binding under clauses 10 and 11 it shall be absolutely void and of no effect, and the principal agreement and all rights thereunder and the guarantee given under the principal agreement shall remain in force as if this agreement had not been made.

13. For all the purposes of this agreement time shall be deemed to be of the essence of the contract.

In witness whereof the said parties to these presents have hereunto set their hands and seals the day and year first above written.

E. L. COULTON,

Solr.,

It is further agreed that one of the four steamers mentioned in the above written agreement may usually be kept in reserve as a relief steamer, it being the intention that it is to be utilized as an extra steamer at such times as the Canadian traffic may warrant additional sailings or its being required to replace any of the other three steamers.

PETERSEN, TATE & CO. (L.S.)

Signed, sealed and delivered by the said Richard Reid Dobell per pro Charles Russell, solicitor, 37 Norfolk Street, Strand, London, authorized by letter dated 2nd April, 1898, from the said Richard Reid Dobell, in the presence of H. J. Brashier, clerk to Messrs. Day, Russell & Co., 37 Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

Signed, sealed and delivered by Petersen, Tate & Co., as above, in the presence of E. L. Coulton.

He said: I wish to direct the attention of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition and of hon. gentlemen, to the modified agreement of which notice has been given between Petersen, Tate & Company, and the Canadian Government, in pursuance of the agreement which was entered into last year the ratification of which agreement was made the 14th of June, 1897, and if my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) wishes to see the original agreement he will find it in our proceedings of that date. The only really important alteration that is made is this: That the time is extended as regards the first two steamers. The House will recollect that the original agreement provided that two steamers should be completed by the 31st of May, 1899, and the four steamers by the 1st of May, 1900. Instead of that we propose now to allow the contractors up to the 1st of May, 1900, to complete the whole four steamers, waiving the right to have the two vessels in readiness on the 31st of May, 1899. I may observe to the House that in the original contract there was a clause that if by reason of a strike on the part of shipwrights or on the part of engineers it was found impossible to construct the vessels on time, that should not be held to involve a forfeiture of the contract. The House is aware that during last year there was an extraordinary and protracted strike on the part of the engineers throughout England, and that almost all ship-building was suspended during that time. Her Majesty's Government in common with ourselves were greatly inconvenienced, as may be seen by reference to several speeches of the First Lord of the Admiralty on the subject, in which he explained to the House of Commons that it was utterly impossible to obtain the requisite number of vessels in consequence of that strike. Now, in the clause of this modified agreement, as I have said, the time for the commencement of the service in the original contract is extended to the 1st of May, 1900, as regards the first two vessels. That is the chief and important alteration. In the second section of the original agreement, no days were fixed, and we now propose to approve in section 2, of Wednesday as the day of sailing from their port of departure in Great Britain and Saturday in Canada. Certain modified plans have been submitted, they in all respects, I am advised, being rather an improvement on the original ones, which modified plans I will now lay on the Table of the House for the inspection of hon. gentlemen. The modifications do not in any way, I am informed, affect the original design or idea, but the vessels are a little longer and we believe a little better than they were to be before. Section 4 refers to the space allotted for mail room. This was not specified in the original agreement and it is specified in this contract. Section 5 refers to the draft of water, and it specifies that the draft may exceed 25 feet 6 inches; that is provided always that the steamers may safely and without infringing the other conditions of this and the principal agreement, be loaded deeper. In the 6th clause, after the words "five hundred knots per twenty-four hours" are inserted the words "in ordinary weather."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

That does not in any way modify the contract, but these words are inserted at the request of the English solicitors, to guard against the possibility of losing time by unavoidable stress of weather or detention by fog. In section 8, there is an understanding that the vessels will call at an Irish port, provided always that the matter can be arranged with the British Government. No stipulation to that effect was inserted in the original contract. I have also here a copy of the draft of the proposed agreement now being executed with respect to the additional guarantee of £10,000 on the part of the Eastern Banking Company (limited). They had become guarantors for Messrs. Petersen, Tate & Co., in the first instance, and of course their guarantee now requires to be amended, which has been done. Beyond these alterations, there is nothing of any importance in the agreement to which I need call the attention of the House. With respect to the prospects of Messrs. Petersen, Tate & Co., I can inform hon. gentlemen opposite and the House in general that I understand that a very good company has been formed, under the presidency, I believe, of Lord Tweedmouth, and having on its board several persons prominent in the shipbuilding world, and I am advised that the British Government have approved of these various alterations and are quite willing to extend the subsidy. On any other points that hon. gentlemen desired to be informed about, I shall endeavour to give all the information required.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The House will remember that when the Government announced that they had effected a very important saving of the public money with regard to this matter, and submitted for our approval the contract that was made between the Government and Messrs. Petersen, Tate & Co., I did not share the sanguine views that the Government then entertained upon this subject. I gave the House at that time my reasons for altogether disbelieving that Messrs. Petersen, Tate & Co. could command the necessary capital to carry out the contract which they had made. The House now learns that that opinion, which I ventured to express, was well founded. It was one founded upon the experience which I myself have had, acting under the direction of the former Government in Canada, to give all the aid and assistance I could to the parties who had a provisional contract for this service. The House will remember that His Excellency the Governor General assumed the responsibility of refusing to sign the Order in Council enabling the late Government to enter into this contract, although His Excellency could not but have been aware that the Act which had then recently passed the Parliament of Canada, authorizing the late Government to invite tenders and enter into that contract, had been passed unanimously by this House.

Because at that time, I need not remind the House, the Government of that day were entirely in the hands of the Opposition, who, owing to the expiry of the life of Parliament at an early day, were simply in a position to offer factious obstruction to any proposal that could come from the Government. They did not, however, venture to offer factious obstruction to this proposal, and therefore the Bill, which passed this House, authorizing us to invite tenders and enter into a contract, subject to the approval of Parliament, was an Act passed unanimously by this House. Notwithstanding that, His Excellency the Governor General interposed his prerogative and refused to sign the Order in Council. I did not know at that time that we should, at a subsequent period, be discussing the question of the contract in connection with a company on the board of which would be a brother-in-law of His Excellency as the chairman. But I pass from that to say that I felt the importance of this measure was of such vital consequence to Canada that I wrote a letter to the right hon. gentleman who succeeded me, suggesting that he should promptly obtain from His Excellency his assent to that contract with the Messrs. Allan, who, I need not tell the House, united as they were with the Glasgow firm of that name, presented a combination of capitalists, able of themselves to carry through this contract in the most undoubted and effective manner. Not only had they the financial strength that would enable them to carry it through, but, as pioneers of steamship communication between the St. Lawrence and Great Britain, they had a vantage ground for such a purpose certainly not possessed by any other parties who were proposing to take that enterprise up. My hon. friend, however, thought that he could do something better in the interests of Canada than adopt the suggestion which I ventured to make, and which I did make, because I felt that this was not only a vitally important question, but one in which any loss of time might be very serious. I cannot help thinking that the right hon. gentleman must by this time have come to the conclusion that he did not act in the interests of Canada in rejecting the suggestion I made to him on that occasion. It is true that a year ago we had paraded before this House the probability of a large saving of public money by this service being obtained upon much more reasonable terms than were presented by that contract, but it must not be forgotten that all the efforts made to obtain the necessary capital—I say it advisedly and unhesitatingly—by the parties with whom the Government contracted, signally failed; and no person knows better than the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Dobell) and the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), who had the best possible means of knowinig, that down to the time they left London, late last autumn, every attempt by Petersen, Tate &

Co. to obtain the association of capitalists of sufficient financial strength to deal with this enterprise, had ended in signal failure. It is quite true that on a memorable occasion, at a political banquet in Toronto, we had a telegram from the Minister of Finance to the right hon. leader of the Government published announcing that Petersen, Tate & Co. had put up a deposit that was to be forfeited by them in case they failed to carry out this contract. Well, they did fail, and what has become of the forfeit that the Government exacted? I knew at the time that not a pound of it would ever be exacted from the contractors if they failed, as the Government now confess they did, fail signally to carry out the contract they had entered into. It is very easy to get parties to put up money as a forfeit, provided they are well advised that the forfeit is a mere matter of form, that it will never be exacted by the Government, and that some excuse will be found for not carrying out that which the contract demanded in the interests of Canada. I say that, apart from the present war altogether, from the exasperation produced in the United States by the Dingley Bill, and the severe measures taken in connection with the passenger traffic between Europe and the United States, Canada has lost a golden opportunity such as probably she will never have again. Had my right hon. friend condescended to adopt the suggestion which I ventured to make to him as a matter of public duty, and obtained the prompt signature of His Excellency to the contract with the Messrs. Allan in 1896, we would have had on the first day of this month a fleet of ocean steamers running between Europe and Canada that would have compared favourably with anything that floats on the Atlantic Ocean or anywhere else; and those steamers would have derived great advantages resulting from the exasperation caused by the Dingley Bill among passengers coming from Europe to New York, and especially in connection with the present war, which I will not hold the hon. gentlemen responsible for not having foreseen. Had that contract received the prompt signature of His Excellency the Governor General, when my right hon. friend obtained the position to advise him, we would have had to-day four ocean steamers, sustained by men of the highest and strongest financial position and resources, and in the hands of the pioneers of Canadian and European Atlantic navigation, and with all the experience that is so very important to make a success, in the first instance, at all events, of such a great and important enterprise. Just imagine what the position of Canada would have been to-day if during the present summer we had such a line of steamers plying between Europe and the cities of Quebec and Montreal, filled with passengers from New York, Boston and every other part of the United States of America, who would have crowded these steamers throughout the entire season. That would have been a position which it would be vain to hope this fast Atlantic service could obtain during ten years under ordinary circumstances. I still do not believe that this contract will be carried out any more than the last contract was carried out, for the reason that a time when ships could be built certainly as cheaply as they can be built to-day, I had the experience of twelve months of communication with the strongest financial people in England, gentlemen connected with the largest ship-building enterprises in the United Kingdom; and, after a struggle of a year to get any parties connected with ship-building or with strong financial houses in England to take up the proposition authorized by the Parliament of Canada to pay $750,000 a year for ten years for such a service, without inducing any men of financial strength or standing in the United Kingdom to take up the enterprise, I went, at the request of the Canadian Government, to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and was enabled to get from the right hon. gentleman who now fills that important position, backed by the great strength of the Imperial Government and sustained by a great majority in Parliament, the assurance that the Imperial Government would contribute £75,000 sterling a year for ten years on condition that Canada contributed £150,000 sterling a year for ten years. Under the authority of an Act which was passed unanimously by the Canadian Parliament authorizing us to invite tenders, we succeeded in making a contract for that service with the best qualified people who could be found on either side of the Atlantic for the purpose of carrying it out effectually. I supported the proposal brought forward before by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, because hon. gentlemen opposite had made a contract, and they felt sure that they could carry it out. I then ventured to say that they would be entirely deceived—that the parties with whom they had made that contract never could carry it out; and the result has proved that my words were prophetic. I do not claim any gift of prophecy, because I had the personal experience which convinced me of the utter futility of those parties undertaking to carry out such a contract. It was said at that time that the Imperial Government had approved of this new scheme of bottle-necked or turret ships for the performance of that service. I think I may say that I am speaking with absolute knowledge when I say that Her Majesty's Government never expressed any approval of that class of steamers, further than this, that Her Majesty's Government required that the steamers should be of a certain speed and capacity and prepared to take an armament of a certain character whenever it should be necessary to turn them into transports for Her Majesty's service in case of Imperial necessity. Further than that, I believe I am thoroughly authorized in saying that no approval of this new-fangled project had been given. The fact remains to-day, as it did when this contract was made, that you may search the world over in vain to find any fast mail or passenger communication carried on by such steamers as are provided for in this contract. Some colliers and freight boats have been constructed on that principle; but such a thing as a fast steamship service constructed on that principle you will search the world in vain to find. I am prepared to support this project just as I supported the project a year before, because it is the best, under the circumstances, I suppose, that can be done. But I will say here that one of the reasons why I have no confidence in the contract which was presented to this House a year ago, and the reason why I have but little additional confidence in the contract presented to this House to-day lies in the fact that my right hon. friend selected to negotiate and carry out this enterprise, a gentleman who, while a member of his Cabinet, had publicly, at a meeting of the Board of Trade of the city of Quebec, denounced the whole project as one that he did not believe in at all. It appeared to me, when my right hon. friend selected the hon. member for West Quebec (Mr. Dobell) to deal with this question, as if he were trying how not to do it, instead of how to do it—as if he were putting his honourable colleague in a position to carry out his own views, which he had announced with so much force, with regard to this service, rather than to carry out the views to which my right hon. friend had been converted at last of the vital importance of having a fast Atlantic service between Canada and Great Britain. There is a feature of this contract to which, I think, great exception must be taken. I do not at all undervalue the importance of having every possible facility for parties in Ireland to come to this country, or to reach Ireland from this country. But, Sir, that is an altogether subordinate matter to the great question of Canada being able to compete with the fastest steamers that can be put on the line between England and New York. Every person knows that the great success that has attended the American line of steamships put on between Southampton and New York is mainly due to the fact that they have been able to compete so successfully in rapidity of passage with all the other fast Atlantic steamers running between these two points, because they are not obliged to call at Ireland. Why, the last time I came from Britain to New York, I came by a very fast steamship, the Teutonic of the White Star Line. But we were out-distanced and out-sailed by the steamer that left nearly twenty-four hours after we did, because she was not obliged to stop a long time at Mobile, as we did for the purpose of taking on the mails.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I would point out to my hon. friend that this is merely permissive.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am very glad to hear that. I would like to be understood as speaking even more strongly on the point, in the hope that my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce will endeavour to have that feature eliminated from the contract. Every person must see that the benefit of the geographical position which Canada enjoys in being so much nearer to Europe than any part of the United States is largely lost if you cause an enforced delay to which steamers competing with you are not subjected. I believe that, with steamers of the same speed and capacity, it is perfectly practicable to make the voyage between England and Quebec in summer and Halifax in winter in so much shorter time as to actually deliver passengers and mail matter in the city of New York twenty-four hours earlier than they could be delivered by steamers running direct to New York. But our advantage will be to a large extent lost, and the conditions will be all changed, if this contract provides for a long detention at either Queenstown or Mobile, as the case may be. I can see how comparatively easy it would be to give facilities to passengers from any part of England, to join the ship at either Liverpool or Southampton, so that whatever port may be ultimately decided upon, detention may be avoided which, if allowed to occur, would be a most serious defect in the plan.

In conclusion I desire to say that no person hopes more sincerely than I do that the contract now laid upon the Table will be successfully carried out. I have given you, Sir, the reasons for the grave doubts I entertain in the matter. I again express my great regret that the golden opportunity that Canada had has been lost. The delay will, no doubt, to a large extent, offset the small amount of money to be saved, even if it is saved—and let it be remembered that a large portion of the additional contribution which would have been made under the old contract would have come from the Imperial Government. I shall cheerfully support this motion, in the hope—though I cannot indulge the same sanguine anticipations as expressed by the hon. Minister—that the proposal now submitted to the House may be successful.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Though I cannot deny that in asking the House to sanction the contract laid upon the Table to-day we are confessing some disappointment, I submit to the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) himself that in this matter we have made reasonable and satisfactory progress. No man knows better than the hon. gentleman himself the difficulties that beset this scheme from the first. I have a distinct recollection that the idea of having a line of steamers equal to the best upon the Atlantic, was first mooted in the year 1888. Yet, it was not until eight years afterwards, in 1896, that the Government of the day, which had been in office all those years, were able to submit any practical suggestion to the Canadian people. During all these years the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) was then in the position of High Commissioner to England, and it is only due to him to say that he was, during all that time, pushing this idea forward to completion with the vigour and energy which he puts into anything that he undertakes. If it had been possible by vigour, energy and activity to bring this scheme to completion before the year 1896, it would have been done by my hon. friend. But, notwithstanding all the powers which he brought to the task, and all the efforts he made, it was eight years after the scheme was first proposed that, at last, a practical step was taken and the Canadian Parliament was asked to vote a subsidy. During that time, the matter had been a subject of negotiation—negotiation with the steamship companies, negotiation with the Imperial authorities, negotiation with this country. At last the plan in part materialized and the Government were enabled to ask for a subsidy of $750,000 a year for the scheme that had taken eight years to mature.

Now, my hon. friend says that if the Government, which came into office in July, 1896, had accepted the successful tender of the Messrs. Allan, we should by this time have had the line of steamers established and running. It is easy to prophesy after the event. It is easy for my hon. friend to say with a certainty that if we had ratified this contract we should have had this line of steamers in operation. But I have only to say that the hon. gentleman expresses more confidence in the successful issue of the scheme than the Messrs. Allan themselves felt. Though they were the successful tenderers, the hon. gentleman himself knows that their tender was not really a tender to establish a fast line. Under that tender Messrs. Allan did not bind themselves, the bargain they made was not a hard and fast contract; it was simply an offer and they wanted the Government to be bound, but they asked four months, if I remember aright, in order to complete their arrangements. The Government were in this position: We found before us certain papers, including the tender which my hon. friend says would have been ratified if his friends had maintained in office. But that tender would have bound the Canadian Government, while it would not have bound the Messrs. Allan, but would have allowed them four months to complete the agreement. Therefore, I am at liberty to say, that, though the hon. gentleman speaks with so much confidence as to the results that would have followed this contract, he shows more confidence in the scheme than did the Messrs. Allan themselves. As I say, it is easy to prophesy after the event.

But I must say to my hon. friend that though the late Government put themselves in a position to ask for tenders, and did ask for tenders, when they were received they were found to be no tenders at all according to the terms of the notice which had been published in the newspapers. I think my hon. friend is over-sanguine altogether in saying that he is quite sure that if those tenders had been accepted we would have had to-day a line of steamers in operation. He alluded a moment ago to the fact that when this Government came into office we did not ask His Excellency to ratify the contract which was ready, as he says, to be ratified. I fully acknowledge that my hon. friend, after we came into office, suggested to me the advisability of accepting that contract. I do not know in what spirit he made that suggestion, whether it was to blame His Excellency for having refused to ratify the contract which he asked His Excellency to ratify, because it is a matter of history that during the interval which elapsed from the 23rd of June to the time he left office on the 11th of July, my hon. friend wanted the Governor General to ratify a contract with the Messrs. Allan. But it should have been stated here, not by myself but by my hon. friend, that His Excellency, in refusing to ratify that contract, had the approval of Mr. Chamberlain, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, who thought it advisable that the contract should be submitted for the approval of a new Parliament.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not think the hon. gentleman is at liberty to refer to that, unless he will lay on the Table of the House the communications that passed between His Excellency the Governor General and Mr. Chamberlain.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I was under the impression that these papers had been brought down in the second session of 1896. But if they have not been brought down, I will look into the matter and see that they are laid on the Table of the House, as it is only reasonable that my hon. friend should have the satisfaction of seeing them. Such was the condition when we took office. We thought the terms proposed with the Messrs. Allan were such that they ought not to be accepted, and that we could make a better bargain, and I contend that we did make a better bargain in the following winter when we made a contract with Mr. Petersen. Mr. Petersen has not been as successful as he expected to be, but if he was disappointed in his anticipations there is a good reason for it. That reason is suggested by that clause in the contract contemplating the possibility of a strike which would prevent him from building the ships. The hon. gentleman referred to the fact that on a certain occasion I had read a telegram received from the Minister of Finance who was then in England, stating that Mr. Petersen had made the deposit which had been enacted in the contract. That is so. I read that telegram, and the telegram correctly stated that Mr. Petersen had made the required deposit, and the money is now on deposit. My hon. friend asks what it is for, if it is simply an ornament. He asks if the deposit has been forfeited. No, it has not been forfeited for the reason that it cannot be forfeited. We have no power to forfeit it, and the hon. gentleman knows well, if he has read the contract, that it is specially contemplated and enacted in the contract that if Mr. Petersen cannot build the ships on account of a strike, then the deposit shall not be forfeited. Everybody knows that the engineer's strike in England paralyzed the whole ship-building trade last year.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend will permit me to say that I think when this correspondence comes down, he will see it stated that it is as good as lapsed, unless some other reason is given on the part of Mr. Petersen for not fulfilling his contract.

The PRIME MINISTER. Whether it has lapsed or not, in matters of this kind it is not extraordinary that parties should not agree. But I state the fact that it is contemplated in the contract that if a strike occurred which prevented Mr. Petersen from carrying out his terms, he is to be exempted from the forfeiture provided for in the contract. My hon. friend has also alluded to the character of the steamers. He says that there are no such steamers now afloat between England and America of the character of the ships which we have adopted. We admit it, we claim that these new ships are a new design, a new model, wherein they will be superior. My hon. friend is aware, no one knows it better than himself, that the character of the mail steamers for the last forty years has been constantly changing, and we claim that in this new type we shall have a class of steamers superior to anything that is now afloat. One other remark I wish to make, and that is as to the ships calling at Ireland. There is great force in the remarks of my hon. friend as to whether these steamers should call at Ireland. But as has already been stated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that is optional with us. We have made it optional, because we fully recognize the objections which have been set forth by my hon. friend in that regard, and we may act in this instance upon his suggestion, and say that the ships shall not call at Ireland. But that is a point we have not yet determined, it is a matter for consideration.

But in view of the strong objections which have been set forth by my hon. friend, objections which have occurred to all those who have given attention to the matter, we think it better to leave that point optional and not to bind ourselves to require the steamers to call at Ireland. I may say that in this matter, as my hon. friend knows very well, we are bound to consult the wishes of the British Government, who are also parties to this enterprise. In this matter we are not absolutely free agents, and we have to act in conjunction with the Imperial Government.

Mr. DOBELL. I do not wish to discuss this matter in a controversial spirit, but only to say a few words in answer to the remarks of the leader of the Opposition upon this proposed new fast line steamship service. The leader of the Opposition stated that the difference in the two contracts amounted to only a small sum. Well, I do not know the hon. gentleman's estimate of what is a small amount, but I claim that if we are going to save £500,000 on this contract, and Her Majesty's Government are to save £250,000, they cannot be called small amounts. They are both considerable amounts, and I think they amply repay the expense of any member of the Government in making a trip or two across the Atlantic.

Mr. FOSTER. Will my hon. friend tell us how he figures out that saving?

Mr. DOBELL. Certainly. We save $250,000 a year for ten years. $250,000 a year is equal to £50,000 a year. Multiply that by 10, and you have £500,000. Now, the leader of the Opposition referred to a speech that I made before the Quebec Board of Trade. The hon. gentleman does not really and frankly state to the House what I did say. It makes all the difference in the world how things are stated, and I have not sat patiently in this House for two years without learning something as to the desirability of always being accurate, and in stating things as they are. Now, what I did distinctly state was that $750,000 a year was too extravagant a sum for Canada to pay for a fast line steamship service. I repeated that on the floor of this House, not intentionally, but having been reminded of it at the time, my inexperience led me to go off, and I repeated the statement that I did not believe this Government should give $750,000 a year. But, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that it is open to every member of this House to satisfy himself as to the nature of this contract. Take the contract as submitted by the late Government, read it carefully section by section, and then take the contract which is now in a fair way of being carried out, and I appeal to any impartial member of this House if the latter is not a business-like contract, while the other is positively a one-sided and unfair contract, binding the contractors to nothing.

Any class of steamers might have been furnished under the first agreement. The leader of the Opposition has stated that Petersen & Co. failed to carry out the contract. They have not failed. They deposited sixty days before the time required by the contract no less than £10,000. On the last occasion I was in England I looked into this whole question of the engineer's strike, and I found that counsel's opinion had been taken by Her Majesty's Government in regard to it, and I obtained the benefit of that opinion, which was that the contract with Petersen & Co. was covered by that strike, and also other contracts, including contracts with Her Majesty's Government, and it was stated by Mr. Goschen that it was not possible to expend the money voted by the British Parliament because the contracts could not be carried out on account of the strike. This strike, of course, largely increased the difficulty encountered by Petersen & Co., and those difficulties have been increased by no one more than by the leader of the Opposition. He and his friends had been thorough in their condemnation of this contract, and the leader of the Opposition has no faith now that the contract will be carried out. Let the hon. gentleman look at the names of those who are now to carry out this contract, let him look at the names of the directors and the chairman, and he will learn that no more practical, honourable and reputable set of men could be obtained to carry out this enterprise. I will not say a word more. Hon. gentlemen opposite have stated that the vessels were being built on a newfangled type or system. In my presence, Mr. Thompson, the founder and owner of the Thompson line of steamers, which is one of the most important lines that run from Liverpool to the Mediterranean and also to Canada, said that this type of steamer would revolutionize the Atlantic service.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I believe he is one of the company.

Mr. DOBELL. Yes, he is one of the company, and will have a large interest in it. He stated further that he would have to unlearn the knowledge he had acquired during the last thirty years as regards ship-building, so satisfied was he that this system would effect a perfect revolution in steamship building. For myself, I am perfectly satisfied that if this line of steamers is established, Canada will be proud of it, and that is what I want it to be; and we will seek to promote in the best way possible Canadian interests in our transatlantic service by adopting this type of steamer which we have taken up.

Mr. SPROULE. I desire to say—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. SPROULE. The indications of dissent may in some respects represent the bottle-necked ships and hon. gentlemen opposite do not like to hear about them. Is there any provision in the contract that these ships shall be available for war purposes?

THE MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. All these vessels are built under the special inspection supervision of the Admiralty, and it is on condition that they are suitable in case of war that, if I remember rightly, the Admiralty grant a special subvention to vessels so built, and in this case the subvention will be totally apart from the £50,000 we will receive from the British Government.

MR. SPROULE. It is a great pity that the contract was not entered into with the Allan Company, because if those ships had been available now, in view of the prospect of increased trade resulting from the war, we would have had that additional fleet on the Atlantic at the present time.

MR. DAVIN. It is desirable that we should know exactly what was said by the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) on previous occasions. On 16th September, 1896, this question was brought up, and the hon. member for Montmagny called attention to some remarks made by the hon. member for Quebec West, in which he said:

Mr. Dobell is reported as having made the following statement at a meeting held in Quebec the other day, as reported in "La Semaine Commerciale":—

"This meeting was of more than ordinary importance. The presence of a member of the Government gave rise to observations made on the question of the fast line of steamers, the bridge and other topics. Mr. Dobell stated that Quebec would not receive any advantage from the establishment of a fast line of steamers, as a line running 17 or 18 knots was sufficient for the needs of the country, and the fast line could only be useful to Quebec when other great enterprises shall have been accomplished, such as the Great Northern Railway, the bridge and the deepening of the canals.

Then the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) is reported to have said, and in order to be accurate, the hon. gentleman having emphasized the advantage of accuracy, I will quote his words:

I have no hesitation in replying to the hon. gentleman who has called my attention to the report of a meeting of the Quebec Board of Trade. I appeared there in my capacity as president of the board, and I spoke on the same lines as those I have followed for a great many years past. I have always called attention to the inadequacy of the passenger service that is now conducted between Quebec and Great Britain. The subsidy is too mean, it is not sufficient to maintain such a line of steamers as we should possess. At the same time, I have always claimed that a 20-knot steamer is too costly, and the wants of this country are more in the direction of having extra good accommodation, larger steamers, but at the same time the passage money, not more costly, that Canadians desire to cross the Atlantic with all the comfort that it is possible to give them, but they do not want to pay more than

MR. SPROULE.

$75 or $80 for the passage. We have not people in this country who are prepared to pay £100, which was often paid from New York, and if we had 20-knot steamers from Quebec, I believe the enterprise would end in disappointment. I do not think there is any more danger in running a 20-knot line of steamers from Quebec than an 18-knot line, but I believe it would be too costly as compared with any advantage which this country would derive from it. It would involve an outlay of $750,000 a year. An 18-knot service—I have never said 17 or 18 knots, and I have always claimed that we should have 13 knots—could be performed from Quebec to Liverpool in the same time as a 20-knot service would perform the voyage from New York to Liverpool. The working of this line would cause a saving of about half the cost, we would have accommodation in the way of cold storage, and more capacity for general cargo. Besides, I believe that before long power will be applied to steamers in a more economical way than is the case to-day.

So that in order to be quite accurate, it is worth while quoting the statements made by the hon. member, because it is perfectly clear from what I have stated that the representations presented by the leader of the Opposition were absolutely correct.

Motion agreed to.

ROYAL CANADIAN REGIMENT.

MR. CLARKE. I desire to ask the Prime Minister if any decision has yet been reached by the Government as to the stationing of the Royal Canadian Regiment in Toronto. I will ask the hon. Minister of Militia if any decision has been reached by the Government in connection with this matter.

THE MINISTER OF MILITIA. No decision has been come to yet.

PACIFIC CABLE—INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

MR. CASEY. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I have a question to ask the Government. About two weeks ago an Address passed by this House on my motion, calling for papers and correspondence in connection with the project of a Pacific cable from Vancouver to Australia. These papers are of two classes; one containing the report of the Imperial Commission on the subject which I understand cannot be published without the consent of the Imperial Government; the remainder of the papers, however, being reports from our own commissioners and largely departmental documents. My question to the Government is: Whether they have taken any steps to obtain permission from the Imperial Government to bring down such of these papers as are Imperial, and when we can expect to see on the Table of the House such as are Canadian departmental papers?

THE PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). We are waiting to bring all the papers down together, but I cannot give any answer to my hon. friend (Mr. Casey) to-day on this subject.

VACANCY IN BAGOT.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to remind my right hon. friend of his promise to state to-day, whether the Government had determined to interpose its authority between the warrant which the Speaker has issued for the vacancy in Bagot, and the opportunity of the electors in that county to elect a representative to this House.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). This is a subject which has given the Government some little anxious consideration. I conceive that there is a difficulty in the case which I hope my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) will himself realize. It was stated some time ago by my hon. friend or by some of his followers, that if the writ were not issued for the election in Bagot the county would be practically disfranchised for this session, and that there would be a discrimination as between that county and the electoral district of West Prince, P.E.I. I would call the attention of my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) to this. Mr. Perry, the late member for Prince, died in the last days of February, and my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) and the hon. gentleman beside me (Sir Louis Davies) and myself, referred to his death in this House on the 2nd or 3rd day of March. Within two days of that, notice was given to His Honour the Speaker of the death of Mr. Perry, and the Speaker's warrant was issued almost immediately. Our lamented friend, Mr. Dupont died, if I remember right, about the 14th of the month and a full month elapsed before any notice was given to Mr. Speaker of his death. If my memory does not deceive me it was about 20th April that the usual notice was given, and the following day the warrant of the Speaker was issued. In the one case notice was given to the Speaker within two days of the death of Mr. Perry and in the other case almost five weeks elapsed, and the warrant of the Speaker was not issued until the 21st of April. This shows clearly, manifestly, and conclusively, that neither party in this House was particularly anxious to have an election at that time in the county of Bagot. When the attention of Mr. Speaker was called to the death of Mr. Dupont, he issued his warrant, and I might tell my hon. friend (Mr. Bergeron) who is now looking up this matter that the warrant was issued on the 21st of April.

Mr. BERGERON. My right hon. friend is wrong as to the dates of the deaths of Mr. Perry and Mr. Dupont.

The PRIME MINISTER. No. I say Mr. Perry died about the last day of February, and if my hon. friend (Mr. Bergeron) will look to the "Hansard" of the 1st or 2nd of March, he will see the remarks which were made in the House relative to the death of Mr. Perry. If my hon. friend will then look to the "Hansard" of the 14th of March, he will see that on that date reference was made to the death of Mr. Dupont; and if he will look again at the "Hansard" of the 20th of April, he will see that the attention of the Speaker was called to the vacancy in Bagot. Under such circumstances there was no particular anxiety evidenced by one party or the other to have an election take place in Bagot. It was on the 20th of April only that Mr. Speaker's attention was officially called to the death of Mr. Dupont so that the warrant could issue, and at that time we were within measureable distance of the prorogation of Parliament. We are now asked to have an election in Bagot almost within sight of prorogation. It is argued that unless that is done the county will be disfranchised for the rest of the session, and my answer is, that even if the writ had been issued at the time the warrant of Mr. Speaker was issued, the county of Bagot would have been practically disfranchised all the same. I point out further that if you have an election at the present time, the consequence will be that certainly twenty-five per cent of the electors of that county will be disfranchised, because there has been no revision of the voters' lists for almost four years. Under such circumstances I leave it to the justice, and to the fairness and to the common sense of my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper), if it be not better to wait a few weeks until we can have the election upon a franchise which will give the right of voting to all those who are qualified to vote. If my hon. friend wishes to have the writ issued at the present time, he is bound to admit that the election will take place upon an imperfect electorate, and that certainly one-fourth of those who by the nature of things have the right to vote will be disfranchised. I think my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) will agree himself that it will be preferable not to have the election at this time, but rather to wait until the new Franchise Act is in operation.

Mr. BERGERON. Am I to understand, then—

Mr. SPEAKER. If my hon. friend (Mr. Bergeron) wishes to be in order, he had better move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. BERGERON. I will conclude with such a motion, Mr. Speaker, but I do not want to move it now because I wish the right to speak. I understand from what has been said by the right hon. the Premier that there will be no election in Bagot this session, and that we will have to wait until the new franchise law is in operation before the people of Bagot can send a representative to Parliament. I rise to protest against that. I repeat to my right hon. friend that not more than ten or twelve days elapsed between the death of our late friend (Mr. Perry) and the death of our lamented friend (Mr. Dupont). My right hon. friend made a mistake when he said that Mr. Perry died about the end of February; it was about the middle or the 20th of that month.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Bergeron) is quite mistaken.

Mr. BERGERON. I may be; I was looking up the date but my right hon. friend concluded before I had time to find it.

An hon. MEMBER. Mr. Perry died on the 24th of February.

Mr. BERGERON. Yes, and the attention of Mr. Speaker was called to that fact on the 3rd of March. The Government never then gave as a reason for issuing their writ for West Prince, the reason which they give now for not doing the very same thing in the case of Bagot County. Mr. Dupont died in the commencement of March, and for more than two months the county of Bagot has been disfranchised. Now, Mr. Speaker, we might as well say things here openly. I am going now to take a page out of the book of my hon. friend from Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) and talk openly. The real reason why the right hon. gentleman and his Government will not issue the writ is that they know they will be beaten in the county of Bagot. When my right hon. friend says that 25 per cent of the electors will be disfranchised, I tell him that there are 4,000 electors in the county of Bagot who are not represented in Parliament to-day. I do not want to make any comparisons to-day; but why grant an election in the county of Prince, in the province of Prince Edward Island, and refuse an election in the county of Bagot, in the province of Quebec. The reason given by the right hon. gentleman is not a good one. His Franchise Act is not yet law. It is true, a revision of the lists under the old Act might take place; but that could not be done before August or September. At any rate, it is decided now, by what the right hon. gentleman says, that the people of Bagot will not be represented in this House this session. I protest against it once more. The other day we heard in this House my right hon. friend and some of his colleagues telling the members on this side of the House to bring motions or questions before the House, and take the sense of the House, to see whether they were right or not. Why, Mr. Speaker, this is an occasion for getting an opinion from an independent tribunal, whether the Administration is right or wrong. Let us go before the people. The opinion of members of Parliament does not amount to a great deal, when we know that the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues are perfectly sure that any motion they bring before the House will carry. Where is the independence of the representatives on that side of the House? Why should the right hon. gentleman be afraid to go before the county of Bagot. He is positive that he has a majority of the people with him and his policy. Why should he disfranchise to-day 4,000 of the electors of the province of Quebec? They will hold him to account for it. The county of Bagot is an independent county, and if the policy of the right hon. gentleman is a good policy, he will have every opportunity to have it sanctioned by the majority of the electors of that county. But he dare not submit it to them. This is the true reason: The Government of Canada to-day are afraid to open a constituency in the province of Quebec. I move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, hon. members on the other side of the House seem to be very indignant at present because an election is delayed in the county of Bagot for a short time for apparently good reasons. This is not the first time that a constituency has remained unrepresented for a short time in this House. There have been occasions when constituencies have remained unrepresented in this House for a very long time. I myself was unseated in December, 1887.

Mr. BENNETT. What for?

Mr. EDWARDS. That has nothing to do with the case. It is simply sufficient to say that I was unseated. The session took place at the usual time in the year following, and the constituency remained unrepresented until within a few days of the close of the session. Then the writ was issued and the election took place. I think this is a flagrant case, out of all comparison with the case now being discussed. Even if an election had taken place in the county of Bagot, the representative would only be in this House for a few days. In the case I mention the constituency remained disfranchised for nearly a year. There is no comparison between the two cases. I mention this only to show that hon. gentlemen change their views according to the conditions that arise.

Mr. CHAUVIN. (Translation.) In rising now, it is not my intention to press upon the Government the necessity of a new election in the county of Bagot, but to ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether he does not deem it his duty to allow one of our friends to be returned by acclamation in that electoral district. So far as I know, —and the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Bernier) is here to correct me if I am not right, I believe that in 1896, at the time of the general elections, an agreement was arrived at between the members for Bagot and for St. Hyacinthe to the effect that both elections should be paired in those counties.

Now, if such an understanding were come to, it would only be courteous and even a matter of fair play, on the part of the Government, under the circumstances, to allow the electorate of Bagot to continue to a Conservative member for the balance of this Parliament, the seat vacated by the death of the late member.

According to our civil code, a lease is not cancelled by the death of the lessee, and that provision of the law ought to hold good in the case of vacant seats in this House. Now, if such a lease was executed by the two counties in question, it seems to me that the demise of the Conservative member ought not to interfere with the agreement entered into by the parties, and the Government should adhere to their pledge.

This pledge was not only taken by both candidates but, I presume, by both parties in the county of Bagot. Now, were it true that the Liberal party were willing to set off the loss experienced by them in the county of Bagot by the gain which was to accrue to them in St. Hyacinthe owing to the return of that member by acclamation, it seems to me it would only be fair now for the Government to redeem their pledge by allowing one of the political heirs of the late Mr. Dupont to be returned by acclamation, in the interest of the Conservative party, in Bagot County.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am very sorry, Mr. Speaker, that my right hon. friend has in this manner interposed the authority and power of the Government between the electors of Bagot and this House. My right hon. friend must recognize that every elector in this country has a right to be represented here during a session of Parliament, and every elector is entitled to have a representative ready to serve the Parliament at the earliest possible period. I find that it was on the 14th of March that this House expressed its deep regret at the loss it sustained by the lamented death of the late representative of Bagot. The right hon. gentleman is perfectly well aware that if the Government weigh at all in a matter of this kind they ought to weigh in the other direction. The Government should not lay itself open to the charge that it is using the power placed in its hands by Parliament to prevent a vacancy being filled on the opposite side with the same promptness that it would have been filled had it occurred on the Government side of the House. That is a principle which ought to commend itself to every hon. gentleman, and it is greatly to be regretted that my right hon. friend should have come to the conclusion to deprive, for an indefinite period, the county of Bagot of its representation in this Parliament. No one is able to say that the exigencies of public business will not require my right hon. friend to have this Parliament summoned for the despatch of business in the month of August. It is quite possible that matters might arise which would compel my right hon. friend to summon Parliament, and there is no possible reason why, in such an emergency, the county of Bagot should continue to remain unrepresented. The fact that the lists under which the election would require to be run are those under which the former election was run is no excuse. The lists now in force in the province of Quebec have given my hon. friend such an overwhelming majority in that province, that there is no reason why, even on party grounds, he should hesitate to interpose the authority of this his Government to prevent the electors of Bagot having the representation in this House to which they are entitled, as promptly as possible. The Speaker of this House has issued his warrant, but that warrant remains suspended by the action of the Government, and the course followed in the case of a vacancy on the Opposition side of the House differs from that which the right hon. gentleman pursued when the vacancy occurred on the Government side of the House. I can quite understand that plausible reasons may be brought forward for almost any course and under almost any circumstances, but I think it is very unfortunate that this House or the country should be led to believe that so important a duty as the giving of a prompt opportunity to the electors of every constituency in Canada which is unrepresented, to choose its representative, should be regarded from an altogether different point of view, according as the vacancy occurs on the one side or the other. It is quite true that my right hon. friend might possibly obtain some party advantage by having this election run under the new law now being enacted and not under the law now in force, and under which a constituency in Prince Edward Island, whose representation became vacant a short time ago, was called upon to fill that vacancy. I hope that my right hon. friend will reconsider the position and remove the suspicion that the Government of the day are going to take advantage of the position they occupy by dealing differently with a vacancy that occurs on the Opposition benches from that which occurs on the Government side.

Mr. LANDERKIN. If the Opposition were so anxious to have the election in the county of Bagot, why did they not, immediately after the death of the late lamented representative of that constituency—who died, I think, on the 12th March—notify the Speaker officially of the vacancy. In the case of the vacancy in Prince Edward Island, the hon. member for King's, shortly after his death, called the attention of the Speaker to the fact, but in the case of the vacancy in Bagot, whose representative died on the 12th of March, the Opposition waited until the 20th of April before calling the attention of the Speaker to the fact at all. The warrant was issued the very next day, and had the election been brought on immediately, it could not have taken place until after prorogation, so that if the constituency is disfranchised during this Parliament, that is due to the want of diligence and vigilance on the part of the Opposition. Why did they not follow the same course that they did in the case of the vacancy in Prince Edward Island? They were apparently ready in Prince Edward Island for an election, and they got the election, and what was the result? A Government supporter was elected by about 400 of a majority—a larger majority than was ever obtained in that constituency before. If they were so positive that the county of Bagot would vote in their favour, why did not the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), who talks so loudly now, draw immediate attention of the Speaker to the fact of the demise of the late member, so that the warrant could have been issued and the election held at the same time as that of Prince Edward Island. If it was in the interest of the Opposition that an election should be held at once, why did not the Opposition do their duty, and after neglecting their duty, they have no right to complain, because, as the right hon. First Minister has said, the election could not be held until after prorogation, and, therefore, it is not desirable to hold it on the old lists. In the case of the vacancy in Prince Edward Island, the Opposition were very prompt, but in the case of the vacancy in Bagot, which occurred on the 12th March, they neglected to inform the Speaker of it until the 21st April. We have any amount of precedents, under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, for the course the Government have taken. We know that when Mr. Patterson, the member for Huron, was appointed Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba, it was only eight months after his appointment that the writ for an election was issued. What was the reason for this delay? The hon. leader of the Opposition was not then in the House, but his friends were, and they believed that the proper thing to do was to leave the constituency vacant and not have an election held until the middle of the session. The case mentioned by the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) is another in point. I could go on citing precedents, one after another, and if these cases were good precedents then, why should they not hold now? But it is not the Government in this case that is to blame for the delay, but the Opposition. Within the last year, we have had five elections in the province of Quebec and what has been the result? In every constituency in that province, where there was a vacancy and an election, a supporter of the Government was returned.

Mr. BERGERON. What about Champlain?

Mr. LANDERKIN. The election in Champlain was more than a year ago.

Mr. BERGERON. But you did not win.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I do not say that we did, but we gained five elections since that.

Mr. LANDERKIN.

and we are prepared to in Bagot and will gain there too.

Mr. BERGERON. Better bring on your election before you brag.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Why did you not call sooner for the issue of the writ?

Mr. BERGERON. Did you not know the man was dead?

Mr. LANDERKIN. You are getting pot valiant.

Mr. SPROULE. The only trouble with the logic of the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) is that it does not square with his conduct in the past. He instances the vacancy in the county of Huron, where an election was not held until nine months after its representative had been appointed Lieutenant-Governor. Well, no one protested more loudly, in the interests of the people, against that abuse than did the hon. member for South Grey. Yet now he quotes that as a precedent why his own friends should do the same thing.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I did not say anything of the kind. I said that the Opposition have not done their duty in this case, as I did mine then.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman blames the Opposition in this case and yet praises them in the other. What will please him? He says that the intention of the Government was not drawn to the vacancy. But the Government were just as well aware of the death of the late hon. member for Bagot as every other hon. member of this House. The law provides that when a vacancy takes place the Speaker shall issue a writ, and it was the duty of the Government to carry out the law without any notice from the Opposition. They should have done their duty, and carried out the law without any hon. member on this side calling their attention to the fact.

Mr. LANDERKIN. When the hon. member for West Quebec died, he died while the session was going on, and when somebody asked the Speaker if he issued his writ, some two weeks after the death, the Speaker said that he had had no official notice of the death, and could not issue his writ until he got notice from some hon. member of the House.

Mr. SPROULE. Could not any hon. member on that side as well as on this have given the notice, if that were necessary?

Mr. LANDERKIN. We want to have all the electors vote. We want to have them vote on the new lists.

Mr. SPROULE. Cannot the hon. member (Mr. Landerkin) restrain himself for a few minutes, or is he—

Mr. LANDERKIN. I have restrained myself for months, while you have been speaking every day.

Mr. SPROULE. I want to speak about the statement of the Premier that if an election were held now 25 per cent of the people entitled to vote would be prevented from expressing their opinion. But what about the other 75 per cent who are not represented and who cannot be represented until an election is held? There are about 4,000 people who cannot be represented if the hon. gentleman carries out the proposal he has communicated to this House. In one case a fraction of the constituency is disfranchised, but in the other case the whole constituency is left without a member to represent it on the floor of this House. One cannot but be amused at the hesitation now shown when contrasted with the precipitancy with which hon. gentlemen opposite brought on an election in Prince Edward Island. But in the latter case they thought that a representative favourable to them would be elected. Did they say anything about an old list in that case? No, it did not matter to them then. They were quite willing to test the feelings of the people in a constituency where they thought that the election would be likely to result to their advantage. But in this case, where it is by no means so sure that a supporter of their party would be returned, they are not so ready to appeal to the people. And I presume that that is the only reason, or at least the important reason, that prevents them from carrying out what the law contemplates. I take it that the law designs that a constituency shall always be represented in Parliament by some person. As soon as a representative dies or is taken from this House by being appointed to office or otherwise, it is intended that an election shall take place at the earliest day. I believe also that the Government should be prepared always to test the sentiments of the people as to whether or not they endorse their management of public affairs. But in this case they seem to be reluctant to do so. They put forward what might seem, under other circumstances, a reasonable plea. There is no doubt that the list is an old one. If that was the real reason, we should be much more charitable towards the Government than we are. But we believe that that is not the real reason, that they have a much more important one than that. They say, in the first place, they did not have notice. But, if they had wished to do their duty this difficulty could easily have been overcome. It was just as much incumbent upon any member on that side as it was on any member on this side to give notice to Mr. Speaker. But notice has been given, and Mr. Speaker has issued his warrant, which remains in abeyance. And why? Because the Government will not name a returning officer and fix the day for an election. And the reason, as we believe, is that they are afraid that the people would condemn their management of public affairs, and either they want to stave off the evil day, or they want to have an opportunity to exert influences which will enable them to snatch a verdict in their favour. Unless they are able to give some better reason to the House and the country than they have given, I do not think they will be supported by public opinion in not bringing on this election.

Mr. MONK. I wish to add a word as representing a constituency in the province of Quebec. I do not think that the question is as to the duty of hon. members on this side or as to the duty of any hon. member of this House. I am not aware that there is any duty incumbent on any of us in regard to circumstances such as these. The question is as to the duty of the Government. I believe very strongly that you having issued your warrant, Mr. Speaker, the Government have no discretion, but it is its bounden duty to issue the writ. As I read the law, after proper notification has been given to the Speaker—and there is no special obligation upon us to fulfil that formality—the Speaker must issue his warrant, and then the writ for the election must issue. Section 8 of chapter 13 of the Revised Statutes of Canada says:

If any vacancy happens in the House of Commons by the death of any member, or by his accepting any office, the Speaker, on being informed of such vacancy by any member of the House in his place, or by notice in writing under the hands and seals of any two members of the House, shall forthwith address his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery for the issue of a writ for the election of a member to fill the vacancy; and a new writ shall issue accordingly.

It seems to me that, whatever may have taken place in the past, it is time for the Government to follow out this clear prescription of the law, and when Mr. Speaker's warrant has issued, to issue the writ immediately. Now, I will not indulge in any vain boast, after what has fallen from the lips of the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), but I do think that the difference in the treatment meted out to the Prince Edward Island constituency and that meted out to the constituency of Bagot points to a fear on the part of the Government which is hardly in accordance with the words of that hon. member. If the hon. gentleman, when the Government has decided upon election in that county, will come down and see how the election is carried on, I think he will have reason to regret the boastful words he has uttered to-day. There is one circumstance pointed out by the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Chauvin) which, I think, requires an explanation. He has pointed out, in the presence of the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Bernier) that, previous to the last general election, some agreement was arrived at between the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe and our lamented friend (Mr. Dupont) to the effect that no contest should take place in either county. If that is a fact—and we are willing to hear the contradiction of the hon. member if it is not—it is a singular comment upon the failure of the Government to issue the writ immediately. That arrangement, if it was made, holds for the remainder of this Parliament. It seems to me that the fact that the lists in the county of Bagot are old is a reason which would apply equally to the Prince Edward Island constituency, in which an election was held. It seems to me, on the other hand, that the numerous electors of the county of Bagot have a right to be represented and should not be required to await the good pleasure of the Government, and that is an injustice to them to keep the writ from being issued. I would like to know from the right hon. leader of the Government when the Government intends to issue the writ. Do they intend to wait until the new Franchise Act is in force? And if so, will they issue the writ immediately after it comes in force? Or will they continue to exercise their discretion, which I think they have no right to do, and spring the election upon the country suddenly?

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, in my humble opinion, the agreement entered into by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Bernier) and the late member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont) ought not only to hold good for one or two sessions, but for the whole duration of this Parliament; and therefore, I think it would only be fair to adhere to that agreement entered into in 1896. The late Mr. Dupont and the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe were not the only parties to that agreement, but it was also sanctioned by the leaders of both parties, and it was understood that both elections were to go by acclamation.

Now, I am of the opinion that this agreement should be adhered to and the election that is to come off in the county of Bagot should go by acclamation. The reason why I insist on that point is not that we are afraid to appeal to the electorate, because I am quite sure that we will carry the county of Bagot, just as I had the pleasure of carrying the county of Champlain. The only difference is that we feel much more confident in the issue of the contest in Bagot than we did in Champlain, owing to the memory of the late Mr. Dupont, which is still cherished by the electors of that county.

I maintain that the agreement referred to should be adhered to. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bernier) ought to give us the benefit of his opinion on that point, and I am satisfied that he will insist upon that election taking place by acclamation.

Mr. FOSTER. I have been waiting for some member of the Government to put in a plea for what the whole House must see and what the country will easily perceive is another illustration of the facility with which, now that they are in power, hon. gentlemen opposite break the promises which they gave, and set at naught every policy which they announced when they were striving to get into power. One wonders whether there are any stones left in that beautiful temple—that theoretical temple—which the hon. gentlemen erected with so much care during the seventeen years before they came into power, that are yet to be taken down.

ing at me, and in the person of my hon. friend who was here and is not here at present. was that it was done in the olden times, and done in a worse way than it is now. Does my right hon. friend who leads the Government base the action of his Government upon that? Does he consider that absolves him from the pledges and promises given by himself and his party, and adhered to through many years of opposition in this country? I do not think he does. I think the theory is a correct one, that he has no right to keep a constituency from being represented in this Parliament while Parliament is in session. Now, what is the hon. gentleman's excuse? His lame excuse, his halting excuse, stripped of its verbiage, was this: He kept the thing dawdling along for a month or two, and as it is now near the end of the session, the reason is all the greater that there is scarcely time for holding the election before the end of the session. I ask, as my hon. friend asked, Who is the guardian of the rights of the people of this House? Not any single member of the House. It should be the Government of the country, they should see that every constituency gets even justice, and it is even justice for every constituency to have its member here when the high court of Parliament is in session. It was not merely the duty of my hon. friend from Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) to call the attention of Parliament to the fact of Mr. Dupont's death, it was the duty of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government. In fact, with his theories, and they were correct as theories, it was his bounden duty to see that so soon as possible, decently after the death of the late sitting member, the electors of Bagot should have an opportunity to send their representative here, whether for the Government or against the Government. But we are asked to accept the paltry excuse that he could not act, forsooth, until the hon. member for Beauharnois had called the attention of Mr. Speaker to the fact of the demise of Mr. Dupont. On the 21st of April that was done, and the Speaker's warrant was issued. What happened? Why, has there not been an election? What is the reason that you have not to-day in the county of Bagot the contest in the last three days of its existence before its member should be elected? The reason is that the right hon. gentleman threw his whole length between the Speaker's warrant and the constituency, and obstructed the law from that day to this. Why, Sir, this House has absolved itself of its duty to the electorate the very moment the Speaker says he has issued his warrant for the election. What is necessary after that? The machinery to put the warrant into execution and to make the election sure. And what is that machinery? The will of the right hon. gentleman to name a man for returning officer, and to name a day on which the election shall take place. The hon. gentleman has obstructed the will of this Parliament, he has obstructed the main and plain teaching and intent of the law, he has thrown himself, for what reason I do not know, across the path which leads from the Speaker's warrant to the calling together of the people to vote for the man of their choice. To-day, if the hon. gentleman had not thrown himself in and obstructed the will of the people, obstructed the course of law, by refusing to name a day and to name a man, as I say to-day, the last day or two of the contest in the election, might have been on in the county of Bagot, and in three or four days more we might have had a gentleman from the county of Bagot to tell the right hon. gentleman how to do his duty—either from that side of the House, where it is sadly lacking, or from this side of the House where we try to do our duty, in a weak and feeble manner, I know, but still as well as we know how. Tired we are of that, because we have to tell these gentlemen their duty so many times, we have to warn them of their promises of only a few days ago as well as a few years ago. If the hon. gentleman had done his duty, the county of Bagot, if it were true to its traditions and had sent the same type and character of a man that it sent here before, I am quite certain that whatever side of the House he sat, he would tell the Government their duty and he would represent well the wishes of the people that he came to represent. The old lists, says my hon. friend, Has he just now taken such great care that 25 per cent of the people should not be disfranchised, when, as my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) said truly, he is disfranchising the other 75 per cent? The 25 per cent is an enormous quantity in the eyes of my hon. friend when he does not want to do his duty, and 75 per cent is as nothing. But are the lists much older than they were when my hon. friend held his other by-elections that have been going on? How much older? Not very much, not sufficient to found an excuse upon. But as I said, the hon. gentleman's fault is this, that he has, from the 21st of April, thwarted the plain intent of the law in order to keep these electors in Bagot from being represented here. Is the fine Italian hand of the Minister of Public Works not at liberty just now so much as it will be after the session is over? Are there certain adjustments to be made in and around that county that cannot well be made now in the hurry and turmoil of the session? Is the hon. gentleman distrustful of the uninfluenced and unbought will of the electors of Bagot? Is he waiting till all this hurry and turmoil of the session is over so that he may influence them, trusting to his Minister of Public Works, for whom, as he himself has said, nothing is too good, and before whom as he himself has declared before constituency after constituency in the province of Quebec, he bows down and worships as his better than true friend, as his organizer, almost his creator, but certainly his strong and his pliable supporter? Where is the Minister of Public Works? I wish he were here that we might ask him why it is that he wishes to keep his Conservative supporters in the county of Bagot from having a chance to send some one here to this Parliament.

Why, as has been truly said, the hon. Minister of Public Works presents himself as a strong guarantee and makes a strong appeal to the confidence of a certain portion of the Dominion on the ground that he was chosen by the leader of the Government to represent the Conservative party in his Government and Council. He should be present to-day to hear what plea is put forward for disfranchising the county of Bagot in a mean and underhand way by throwing himself across the path of the Speaker's warrant from the Dominion Parliament and thereby keeping the electors from being represented here. Why is their representative not here? Simply because the hon. gentleman and his party have prevented his attendance. The representative could have been here next week and for the five, six or seven weeks subsequently to register his voice and vote, and to do what is still higher and better, to represent a free constituency in this Parliament. There is no reason to the contrary. These excuses are lame and halting, and the hon. Prime Minister has shown himself again to be an opportunist and time-server and nothing more.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman is quite right in supposing that we do not propose to bind ourselves to follow the precedents established by himself and his hon. friends when they occupied the Treasury benches. In former times it was the habit of hon. gentlemen opposite, and God forbid that we should follow it, in order to suit their time and convenience to bring on elections some months after and almost a year after a vacancy occurred, and they brought on the elections simply to suit their own time and convenience. They did this without any remonstrance, simply because they were masters of the situation, and they could so act without venturing even to give reasons for the course they adopted. On this occasion, when our action has been challenged as to why the writ has not been issued, we have given what should be to every hon. gentleman, a valid answer. If we held the election at this moment twenty-five per cent of the electors would be debarred from exercising the sacred right which they possess under British institutions. But hon. gentlemen will say, what about the remaining seventy-five per cent? The answer is obvious. The electors representing the seventy-five per cent will have the same right to vote then as they have now; but if you hold an election to-day, twenty-five per cent will not have an opportunity to exercise the franchise. That is the reason why it is necessary to wait for a few days or a week or so. Take the two vacancies which have taken place in this House during the present session. It has been our misfortune to lose two members of this House. Mr. Perry died in February. In March the writ was issued. By whom was notice of the vacancy given? Not by the Government but by the hon. member for King's (Mr. Macdonald), who expected that he would capture the constituency. As to Bagot, they were not so sure. They waited four or five weeks; they waited until the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) had had an opportunity of visiting the constituency, and having done so, he supposed the time was ripe, and the Speaker was asked to issue his writ. This was on 1st April. He had waited more than five weeks before he gave notice to Mr. Speaker. If we want to be technically correct in our action, a writ should issue immediately; but if we desire to act reasonably, it is better to wait until the new measure has been passed. Hon. gentlemen opposite say we are not implementing our promises. We are trying to implement our promises at all times; we are trying to remove anomalies that prevailed some years ago. We hope to have this law in force within thirty days, and as soon as the electoral roll of Bagot is ready, full and complete, so as to enable the electors to pass judgment on the conduct of the Government, we shall be only too happy to lay our conduct before them and ask them to pass judgment upon it. The hon. member for Beauharnois, talking a moment ago in a very cocky manner, said we were afraid to submit the record of our conduct to the electors of Bagot. For what reason? As has been stated by the hon. member for South Grey, on every occasion we have consulted the electors of Quebec the verdict has been such as not to render us afraid of consulting them again. We consulted them in Temiscouata; and what was the result? An election by acclamation. We consulted them in Rimouski, and the result was an election by acclamation. We consulted them in Quebec Centre, and the result was another election by acclamation. We consulted them in Drummond and Arthabaska, and the result was almost 2,000 majority. Later on we consulted them in Nicolet, and the Government were vindicated, the candidate who had been defeated by 30 at the former election, being returned by 300 majority.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. BERGERON. Through what means?

The PRIME MINISTER. Yet the hon. gentleman talks about our being afraid of consulting the electors! I make no boast as to the probable result in Bagot, and I do not go so far as my hon. friend and say that we are going to carry that constituency. Bagot is one of the gerrymandered constituencies of the province of Quebec, one of the constituencies which was gerrymandered in 1892. The parish of Ste Pie, which gave a Liberal majority of 200, was detached from the constituency, and the parish of St. Marcell, which gives a Conservative majority of 30 or 40, was added to the constituency. Thus it was gerrymandered, and I make no boast as to carrying it, but I am quite satisfied the verdict will be such that the Government will not only be supported but will receive proof of the increased confidence of the people. The hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Chauvin) made an appeal and stated that there should be an election by acclamation in Bagot and that a Conservative should be returned, because at the general elections there had been an understanding arrived at by representatives of the two parties that a Conservative should be returned. The hon. gentleman must be aware that the Government has nothing to do with the fact as to whether an election is contested or not, and that an election by acclamation is a matter entirely in the hands of the electors. The Government has no right, and it does not presume to dictate to the electors of Bagot what course they should pursue. If it is the will of the two parties in Bagot to return a candidate by acclamation, the Government will accept their verdict; and if they decide to have a contested election, the Government will also accept their verdict.

Mr. DAVIN. The right hon. gentleman has not met the case presented from this side of the House. Our contention is that an injustice has been done to Bagot by the right hon. gentleman preventing the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery issuing his writ. The right hon. gentleman, with his fine sense of humour, must have laughed at the position in which he placed himself the moment the sentence escaped from his lips, for he told us that when a certain Bill now before Parliament shall have become law, and when this House will have separated and Bagot has returned a member, then he will be most happy to lay his policy before the people of Bagot. The thing is perfectly absurd. The case that will appeal to the country is, that here we are entering—to use the language of the gentlemen in the press gallery—on the real business of the session and we have only got to the vestibule. The millions of dollars in the main Estimates have yet to be voted, and the complaint is that this Parliament is deprived of the counsel of the member that would be returned from Bagot. That is the grievance. The right hon. gentleman and others of his friends have referred to what was done by their predecessors in office. Suppose their predecessors did wrong, will two blacks make a white? I had hoped, judging from the language of the right hon. gentleman himself and judging from the language of the "Globe," that hailed him as the beginning of a new era; I had hoped that we should not see what we are seeing every day: Not merely a certain halting imitation of what was wise in the policy of the right hon. gentleman's predecessors, but a slavish copying of whatever was sinister. The right hon. gentleman professes to be greatly influenced by what takes place in England, and I will read to him from May what is the law in England with regard to the issue of writs:

On the receipt of the Speaker's warrant the writ is issued by the Clerk of the Crown and transmitted through the post office, in pursuance of the provisions of 53 George III., cap. 89. Neglect or delay in the delivery of the writ, or any other violation of the Act is a misdemeanour, and in the event of any complaint being made the House will also inquire into the circumstances.

That is the law in England, and when our Parliament passed the legislation quoted by my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) it is perfectly clear that Parliament meant the same should take place here. I say to the Government: By the course you have taken you have confiscated the electoral rights of some 4,000 electors in Bagot, and while the weightiest portion of the business of this session is being transacted, the chair of Bagot is vacant here. Why, Sir, it is a perfect mockery of the right hon. gentleman to say that thirty days from now, when this House shall have dispersed, then he will be in a position to issue the writ for Bagot and then some 25 per cent of the electors will have the right to vote who have not that right now. Does he not see that according to the theory of all constitutional writers, even if this 25 per cent had not a vote they would be represented by the gentleman sent to Parliament by the 75 per cent. Sir, the position that has been taken by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House has not been impinged on by the right hon. gentleman, and the fact that we see him adopting one policy in the case of Prince Edward Island and a different policy in the case of Bagot, shows, I am afraid, that it is not a regard for the condition of the electors that induces his conduct, but a less worthy motive.

Mr. CHARLTON. It strikes me that the course taken by our hon. friends opposite in denouncing the Government in reference to this matter, is not warranted by all the circumstances of the case. It is the principle under free governments, that the representative of a constituency should be actually the representative of the electors, and the condition of the voters' lists at the present moment renders it impossible to secure a true representation in any constituency in the Dominion of Canada. We have a voters' list four years old; a voters' list that was two years old, through the negligence of the Conservative Government, when the last elections were held. The present Government have been seeking to secure a franchise law that will afford a voter's list calculated to give to the electors of any riding in this Dominion a voice in choosing their representative to this Parliament. I hold that it is perfectly proper and consistent with the requirements of public policy, that the Government should refrain from issuing a writ until the franchise law now before this House can be made legislation and the time arrives when all the electors of that riding can have a voice in selecting their representative. In view of the fact that a real and just franchise law is about to be enacted, I would almost consider it an outrage on the rights of the people to hold an election that would be decided upon a voters' list four years old; decided upon a voters' list by which 25 per cent or 30 per cent and even 40 per cent of the electors entitled to vote under a fair law would be debarred from the exercise of the privilege of citizenship in this country. Our hon. friends opposite are making much ado about almost nothing, because the course of the Government in this matter is entirely justifiable. The Government will give to this country a fair franchise law as soon as the factious opposition that has been offered to the Franchise Bill will permit, and when that law is in operation the constituents of Bagot, or of any other riding, will have a proper opportunity of expressing their wishes as to their representative in this House of Commons. I hold that it is perfectly proper to wait until such time as every elector in that riding shall have an opportunity to get his wishes respected and to cast his vote.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) were seriously impressed with the views he has expressed, then he would be an earnest advocate of the English system which would involve this Dominion in a general election after this session should the Franchise Bill be adopted by Parliament. And the Prime Minister himself, if his right for the representation of the new voters be sincere and earnest; he would be prepared to take the House into his confidence in a very short time with reference to a dissolution of Parliament.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That is what you dread.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman says that would be absurd.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I said that is what you dread.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not in the slightest. The Opposition is always ready for any accident of that kind, but, judging from certain things that have happened this session, I have no doubt that the Ministry are in no particular hurry to go to the people, certainly they are in no particular hurry to go to Bagot. I am told by those who ought to know as well as the Prime Minister, that the difference between the electoral lists would not amount to 25 per cent of the voters, but a mere 2 per cent.

Mr. BERGERON. At the most.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I rose particularly to call attention to one thing which this discussion has evolved to an extraordinary extent. I listened carefully to the Prime Minister. His answer, in large part, was his usual answer since his triumph, particularly in the province of Quebec. If we show him that he has treated with contempt his old promises and pledges, if we show him that he is adopting the practices of his predecessors which he most loudly denounced, his answer always is, and to-day was repeated: "We won; we are successful; we are endorsed; whether we keep faith or break faith, we are successful." That was his answer to-day. He did not deal with the very serious subject which comes up in this connection. He did not deal with the attitude he invariably took on such questions when sitting on this side of the House, and explain, as he ought to be able to explain, if he is now governed by any well-considered principle, how it comes that he is treating with contempt all the doctrines he announced when sitting on this side of the House. Not merely did he upbraid the Conservative Administration for delaying the issue of the writs and the appointment of returning officers and the fixing of polling days for by-elections, but he upbraided them because they were assuming to themselves the right to exercise a discretionary power beyond and above the mere selection of the returning officers and the fixing of a convenient day—because they were taking to themselves the right to say when, in the interest of the people, there should be an election. The right hon. gentleman to-day tried to find grounds for the exercise of that discretion which he at one time denied the Administration of the day. Has the right hon. gentleman forgotten the assistance he gave to a Bill introduced by a prominent member of this House, by which it was proposed to make impossible the steps he is now taking, for any cause or reason, no matter whether good or bad, political or otherwise? Has he forgotten the active support he gave to that hon. gentleman's Bill, which, if carried, would have prevented him interfering with the election in Bagot for any reason whatever?

Mr. BERGERON. Get an answer to that.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I presume the right hon. gentleman has forgotten, or he would interrupt me and say he remembered it quite well. I will refresh his recollection. I refer to a Bill which was introduced into this House by an hon. gentleman whose absence and the reason for whose absence from the House to-day every one regrets. I refer to the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). The Bill of that hon. gentleman proposed to cut away from the Administration altogether the power to intervene between the Speaker's warrant for the issue of the writ and the holding of an election, and the right hon. Premier supported that Bill.

Mr. BERGERON. By a long speech.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. At any rate, by a strong speech. The hon. gentleman cannot reconcile the views he propounded on this side of the House with the action he is assuming to-day, when he is adopting, as he then considered them, the very worst practices of his opponents. In those days he boasted that he was a democrat up to the hilt, ready at all times to throw himself into the hands of the people. To-day, while boasting of his victories in the province of Quebec, he is unwilling to let the people of Bagot say whom they wish to represent them in this Parliament.

Mr. McMULLEN. I desire to say just a few words on this point. I do not think any member who has sat in this House for many years will deny that as a rule the writ for the return of a member for a constituency should issue as early as possible after a vacancy takes place, and that rule should only be departed from when good reasons for the exception can be given. The rule is a good one, but it would cease to be a rule if it had no exceptions. I have sat in this House for sixteen years, and if during that time there has ever been a case in which an exception to the rule has been justifiable, it is the case of the county of Bagot. In the first place, the voters' lists of that county are now over four years old. In the next place, supposing we had an election in the county to-morrow, the new member would not at all likely reach this House in time to take his seat before the House rises. Moreover, the Franchise Bill has practically been passed through this House, it is going to the Senate, and in all probability will become law; and that Franchise Bill will enfranchise every man in that riding who is entitled to vote. The election can then be held, and the member elected will represent a constituency in which every man will have had the right to exercise his franchise, which is unquestionably a desirable thing. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has said that after the passage of the new Franchise Bill, a general election should be held. At any rate, when a county is vacant, an opportunity should be given to the electors to exercise their franchise under the new law. I do not think there is any injustice done in that. The county of Bagot is suffering no inconvenience whatever. Had that county been vacant at the time the House met or immediately afterwards, and had it been kept vacant during the entire session, there would be some ground of complaint; but remembering the date at which the death of our hon. friend took place, which we all very seriously deplore, and considering the period which must necessarily elapse before an election could take place, the new representative of that county could not have been here more than a few days before the close of the session. In that constituency there is no doubt a large percentage of men from twenty-one to twenty-three years of age whose names are not on the voters' lists, and it would be exceedingly unjust to bring on an election without placing their names on the lists and giving them a chance to vote. I quite agree that the rule for holding an election as soon after a vacancy as possible should be sustained, but if ever there was a case in which an exception to the rule should take place, it is that of the county of Bagot.

Mr. COCHRANE. The hon. gentleman always has a particular case when he wants to go back on his previous record.

Mr. McMULLEN. Not at all.

Mr. CLANCY. We have been rarely treated to such an exhibition of special pleading as we have had this afternoon. The right hon. First Minister told us that he did not take as an example the conduct of the late Government. Well, I do not know that he would find a more striking example of what he and his friends have charged against the former Government than the course the present Government have taken to-day. Why should the writ for the election in Bagot be delayed a single day? One would imagine that there was some great public question before the country on which the Government desired to consult the whole electorate and have a full vote, which moved the Government to delay this election. But we know that no such reason can be given why the election should be delayed. It does not make one particle of difference, so far as the judgment of this House is concerned upon public questions, whether the election is held under the recent franchise or whether we wait for a revision of the lists. The hon. gentleman also must be aware that when he states that 25 per cent of the electors in Bagot would be disfranchised, if the election were now held, he is stating what is contrary to the facts. He does not know whether the new law will increase the number of voters there 5 per cent or not.

Mr. BERGERON. Not 2 per cent.

Mr. CLANCY. My hon. friend says not 2 per cent. I am told that the franchise of the province of Quebec is infinitely more restrictive than is the Dominion franchise, and the probability is that if the election in Bagot were to be held under the Dominion franchise law, there would be more voters on the list than under the law now proposed. After what we have heard this afternoon, the only conclusion which the people can come to is that a pretext has been urged for delay and not any reason. There is absolutely no reason but merely a pretext, and the pretext is that the Government want the new lists. If they had not held an election in one of the counties of Prince Edward Island a few weeks ago, they might advance that pretext with some show of excuse, but we did not on that occasion hear the right hon. First Minister declare that the election should be held under the new lists. Yet the new Franchise Bill had then been introduced and distributed and was under consideration, and to have been consistent, the right hon. gentleman should have declared then that no election should take place in Prince County until the new lists were in force. What reason can there be for requiring the new lists in one case and not in the other? The only reason that can be assigned for the course of the Government is that the chances of the Government electing one of their own supporters were infinitely greater in Prince County, P.E.I., than they are in Bagot. We have now the clearest evidence of the most utter inconsistency on the part of the Government, but it is only one more added to the long list of their inconsistencies. The only thing in which they are consistent is the keeping up their policy of inconsistencies since they came into office.

Mr. MOORE. I only desire to occupy the attention of the House for a moment. I understand the position taken by the Government to be this, that if the vote be taken on the old lists, a large portion of the electors of Bagot will be disfranchised. Well, under the Dominion franchise law, which is now about to be superseded by the new Franchise Act, $150 worth of real estate entitles a man to a vote. But under the present law of the province of Quebec, which is to be adopted under the new Franchise Act, it requires $300 worth of real estate in cities and $200 in other municipalities to entitle a man to vote, so that if the election in Bagot is held under the new law, a great many of the electors will be disfranchised, who would have the right to cast their votes under the present law.

Mr. BERGERON. I do not think that Parliament ever heard such flimsy reasons advanced as those which have been given by the Government for not granting the electors of Bagot a representative in this House during this session. The only argument advanced by the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) for delaying the election was that the Opposition did not ask for the writ sooner. But we are not here to rule this House. I, myself, when I found out that the Government would not order the issue of the writ, did, at the solicitation of some of the electors of Bagot, notify you, Mr. Speaker, that the county of Bagot was vacant. I did so, and on the 21st April you informed the House that you had already issued your warrant. Ever since then we have been pressing on the Government to bring on the election, as it was our duty to do, and as it was also the duty of hon. gentlemen on the other side to do, if they have any regard for what they used to say in the past. The hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) in his best bombastic style, declared that the Government would carry Bagot. I need only refer the hon. gentleman to what has fallen from the lips of his leader, who clearly indicated that, in his opinion, the Government would be defeated in Bagot, and the conduct of the Government gives convincing evidence of that belief. My right hon. friend, the leader of the Government, said what was not correct—and I am sure he had no desire to make an incorrect statement—when he said that I only called the attention of the Speaker to the vacancy after I had paid a visit to the county. That is not the case. I was in the county of Bagot at the funeral of our late lamented colleague, and since then I have not been in that county. The right hon. gentleman boasted of his successes in Quebec up to the present. That is a subject which he should not speak about. I think it is most humiliating for the Prime Minister or any man representing the province of Quebec in this House to remind Parliament of the elections which were held in that province since the general election. No doubt the result of the general elections of the 23rd of June was very humiliating to us, still we can explain that result, but when the right hon. gentleman tells us that he has since consulted the province of Quebec, he is making what he knows to be a most unfounded boast. He boasted of having carried the county of Temiscouata in which a vacancy occurred by the death of one of our colleagues, and of having carried it by acclamation. Does he want me to remind him of the circumstances of that election? Why, there was a quarrel in that county, which presented a most humiliating spectacle. The man who represents that county here does not represent its people. It was Mr. Pouliot who was nominated by an overwhelming majority, and the hon. Minister of Public Works went down there and promised that Mr. Pouliot would secure the county. But its present representative stood in spite of all that, and if Dr. Grandbois, who sat for that county for eighteen years in the Conservative interest, wanted to represent it, he would be here to-day. Our friends, however, for reasons peculiar to themselves did not want to take part in an election and the Government were not opposed. The county of Rimouski was opened by the appointment of Mr. Fiset to a senatorship, and the right hon. gentleman also boasted that he carried that county by acclamation. But why did he do so? Because our friends did not want to run an election. They did not see the advantage of making a fight in an immense county like Rimouski, and those who know the province of Quebec know that that county is not at all a sure one for hon. gentlemen opposite.

Now, my right hon. friend speaks of the county of Quebec Centre. The right hon. gentleman should never open his mouth about that constituency. The people have witnessed there one of the most scandalous transactions ever known in the history of this country. Why, the late member for Quebec Centre sat in this House for two years with a nomination as judge in his pocket. Hon. gentlemen opposite, who, for eighteen years when upon this side of the House, talked against the Government holding out promises of situations to members sitting behind them, have not a word to say when it is shown openly, clearly, notoriously before the country that for two sessions the man who represented Quebec Centre sat here with a letter from the Prime Minister himself promising him a position. And that gentleman succeeded in getting upon the Bench in Quebec—as some people say, he kicked himself upon the Bench. There was no contest in that county, our friends did not care to enter into an election in the face of the influences that were at work there. The Government of the province had just been carried to power by the same influences which carried hon. gentlemen opposite to power, influences which the people cannot account for. So here are three counties that the right hon. gentleman has boasted of carrying, but which, for reasons I have given, he should have been ashamed to mention. Then he spoke of Drummond and Arthabaska and the majority of 1,200 that he had there. But it had been carried before by about the same majority by the gentleman supporting hon. gentlemen opposite who ran on the 23rd June. There was an election there because the Conservatives wanted it, insisted on it—and they got it. But they did not lose a vote that they previously had.

Mr. BENNETT. How was that constituency opened?

Mr. BERGERON. It was opened by another breach of the professions of hon. gentlemen opposite when in Opposition and the appointment to the Bench of the gentleman representing the constituency. Now, the right hon. gentleman speaks of the county of Nicolet. He went into that county himself, and he knows by what means it was carried. He knows that there was a quarrel between the representatives of different railways, each side anxious to get from the Government more than their rivals, while the Government held up before them the bribe which united them in support of the Government, with the expectation on the part of each side that they would be favoured in the granting of subsidies, of which, I suppose, we shall hear more before the end of the session. The hon. gentleman went through there with his henchmen promising subsidies to the men on both sides who were asking for them. There was an open row between the hon. Minister of Public Works

(Mr. Tarte) and the then member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Bernier). The men there said: We will work under Mr. Bernier, but if the Minister of Public Works puts his foot in the county, we will vote against you; and so the Minister of Public Works remained at home. Yet the hon. gentleman knowing these circumstances speaks about public sentiment in Quebec being in his favour. Why, I repeat it, the men of my blood and my nationality must feel sorry that the Prime Minister has spoken of these bye-elections that were held in the province of Quebec. We feel badly about them, but we feel all the worse to know that the facts are known to others outside. And now, by an unforeseen and most regrettable accident, the constituency of Bagot has been opened. The people there are not seeking for public favours, they are not after railway bonuses or public works or appointments to office. They are independent farmers, who will express an independent opinion. There is no way to bribe them. They are good, honest, respectable people. The right hon. gentleman speaks of the county being gerrymandered. He knows that it has not been gerrymandered so far as the local elections are concerned. And yet he knows that it was carried by Mr. McDonald, Conservative, by a majority of 75. That is not an immense majority; it is not one that the hon. gentleman should be afraid to face if he believes in his own policy, if he believes that the people of the province of Quebec are satisfied with the way he has carried out his promises and administered the affairs of the country. Let him call upon the people of Bagot to say if they are satisfied. The right hon. gentleman speaks of twenty-five per cent of the electors being disfranchised owing to the voters' lists being old. He is not serious in that. He knows that there will not be more than two per cent of a change from that cause. And, as the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Moore) has said, there are likely to be fewer electors under the new proposed Franchise Law than under the old Franchise Law. This brings me back to what I said in the first place, that the Government know perfectly well that they could not carry the county of Bagot. They know that that county represents the province of Quebec, and that the province of Quebec has been shamefully deceived by the present Administration, and therefore the Government dare not appeal to the electors of that county.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

THE QUEEN VS. SKELTON ET AL.

Mr. DAVIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the Solicitor General if he could give me the information he promised me the other day in the case of the Queen vs. Skelton?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). I promised that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) should have an answer to his letter. I have no doubt that he will have the answer before many hours go by.

I.C.R.—CONTRACT FOR FARM GATES.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. With the consent of the House, I would ask leave to present a motion :

That the papers accompanying a return to an order of the House of Commons of the 30th March, 1898, respecting a contract for farm gates on the Intercolonial Railway, with one McNeill, of New Glasgow, be referred to the Committee on Public Accounts.

I sent notice of this across the floor to the hon. Minister of Railways, and he told me he had no objection to the motion.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 13S) further to amend the Companies Act.—(Mr. Fielding.)

THE ELECTORAL FRANCHISE.

Order read for consideration of Bill (No. 16) to repeal the Electoral Franchise Act and to further amend the Dominion Elections Act, as amended in the Committee of the Whole, was discharged.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). I move that the amendments as reported from the committee be not now further considered, but that the Bill be referred back to the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering suggested amendments to provide for the printing of the voters' lists by the Queen's Printer.

Motion agreed to, and the House again resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The intention is simply to provide for the printing of the voters' lists by the Queen's Printer. I have had a certain number of copies of the amendments printed and distributed among the members of the House, and it will be necessary, in order to understand the intention, simply to read the suggested amendments. The intention is to provide that within ten days after final revision of the voters' lists, a certified copy should be sent to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, whose duty it shall be to hand it over to the Queen's Printer for the purpose of having it printed. This shall take place every year after each annual revision of the list. Then these voters' lists in the hands of the Queen's Printer shall be accessible to all for the purpose of the election, and any copy of the list printed by the Queen's Printer shall be considered as an authentic copy of the list. This is for the purpose of avoiding the difficulties that have been pointed out during the course of the debate.

Mr. FITZPATRICK

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That list will be certified under paragraph 16. I suppose ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Who fixes the price of the list ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We do ; it is provided for in the amendment. They are 10 cents a copy. The intention is to have this clause inserted after clause 9. I will now read the new clause :—

10. Within ten days after the final revision of any and every list of voters for the purposes of provincial elections, it shall be the duty of the custodian thereof to transmit to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, by registered mail, a copy of such list certified under the hand of such custodian, and having every alteration, addition or erasure therein identified by his initials. The fees to be paid for such certified copy shall be those fixed by the provincial law for furnishing such copies to applicants therefor, and if there is no fee fixed by the provincial law, shall be twenty-five cents for each one hundred names, including additions and descriptions, and fifty cents for the certificate.

(2) For the purpose of Dominion elections such certified copy shall be deemed to be the original and legal list of voters for the polling division for which the list of which it is a copy was prepared, so long as that list remains in force, subject, however, to such changes and additions as may subsequent to revision be made in such list under the provisions of the provincial law.

(3) It shall be the duty of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery immediately upon receipt by him of such certified copy of a list of voters to cause the same to be printed by the Queen's Printer, and he shall thereafter retain such certified copy of record in his office.

(4) Immediately after printing any such list the Queen's Printer shall send, by registered mail, four copies thereof to the sitting member for the electoral district to which the list belongs, and two copies to the defeated candidate at the last Dominion election therein, and the Governor in Council may by regulation provide for the issue to members and candidates of such additional copies as may be thought proper.

(5) The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery and the Queen's Printer shall supply copies of any lists so printed to any person applying for the same and paying therefor a price proportionately sufficient to cover the cost of printing the same, but such price shall not exceed ten cents for each copy of the list for a polling subdivision.

(6) All voters' lists printed by the Queen's Printer shall be authenticated by his imprint in the same manner as other parliamentary documents, and every copy of a voters' list bearing such imprint shall be deemed to be for all purposes an authentic copy of the original list of record in the office of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery.

(7) If, under the provincial law, any changes in or additions to a list of voters have been made since the final revision, it shall be the duty of the official having a record of such changes and additions, upon the request of any person presenting for the purpose any such printed copy of the list, and paying or tendering the sum of fifty cents, to make corresponding changes in and additions to such printed copy, and to certify under his hand as to the correctness of such changes and additions, and such printed copy with such changes and additions, and so certified, shall be deemed to be for all purposes an authentic copy of the list of voters as the same exists and is in force at the time of such certification.

(8) The Queen's Printer shall keep standing in type every list of voters so printed by him until he shall have been furnished by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery with a duly certified copy of a later list for the same polling division, or of a later list or later lists showing some change in the polling division, whereupon he shall correct the same so that it shall correspond with such later list or shall make such other changes as may be necessary, and he shall then keep such list so corrected, or any new resulting list or lists standing in type, until he has been furnished with a certified copy of a later list or lists affecting the same, and so on, so that there shall always, as far as practicable, be kept standing in type a correct copy of every finally revised provincial list of voters.

(9) Every officer or person who under the provincial law is the custodian of any list of voters, or has the official record of any changes in or additions to any such list since the last final revision thereof, and who refuses or omits to perform any duty imposed upon him by this section is guilty of an indictable offence, and for each such refusal or omission shall incur a penalty of not more than one thousand dollars and not less than dollars.

(10) So long as, and whenever for any reason, a certified copy of any list of voters as finally revised has not been transmitted to or received by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, pursuant to the provisions of this section, the original and legal list for Dominion elections shall be the same as that for provincial elections.

Mr. INGRAM. I would draw the attention of the Solicitor General to the fact that in cities and towns the registered list of voters will not be completed within the ten days after the final revision.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. In regard to difficulties that may occur in Ontario constituencies, I have not been able up to the present time to devise any scheme to overcome them. I should be glad to consider any suggestion made by hon. gentlemen opposite. I have asked officials of the department to take this matter into their consideration, but I must say that hon. gentlemen opposite have pointed out some difficulties that appear to be practically insurmountable as regards the cities and towns of Ontario.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I should like to inquire especially as regards this very long and important amendment, whether the hon. gentleman proposes to have the Bill reprinted when it comes out of committee and before the third reading is moved?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That would be perfectly fair and right.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I wish to make an amendment in section 9 by inserting the words "six months" instead of "one year," this change being applicable to voters' lists. The amendment is made at the suggestion of the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Clarke).

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Could not the hon. gentleman make it three months?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No.

Mr. CLARKE. I think six months would meet the case.

Mr. BENNETT. If the provision goes into effect it must mean this: there must be a provincial list and afterwards a federal list, which will mean doubling the expense. It will not make any difference to the people in cities because they have their local revisions, but it will be an important matter in the country districts.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The lists in Manitoba are revised only once every four years. A voter must reside three months in the district. It was in order to meet this point that I suggested three months. However, I am prepared to accept six months, on the principle that half a loaf is better than no bread.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I now desire to call the attention of the committee to an amendment of some importance. In section 13 I propose to insert after the words "revising officer" the words "shall be guilty of indictable offence," so as to make the point absolutely certain that we are creating an offence here so that our right cannot be disputed. These are the only changes I have to suggest now. I may say it is understood that we are to have the Bill reprinted with these new clauses inserted and then it will come up for the third reading. In the meantime I understand that my hon. friend will consider the question as to how we are to amend the Bill so as to make it applicable for the printing of the voters' lists in the cities and towns of Ontario.

Mr. BENNETT. What is meant by that—the original list or the one that is printed?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The copy that is sent by the provincial custodian. The original remains with him, and he sends a copy to be printed by the Queen's Printer, and this copy, for the purposes of the election, is practically the original list.

On subsection 4,

Mr. BENNETT. My recollection of the old Act was that ten copies were given to each member. As these lists will be printed, I think the Solicitor General might see his way clear to permit the distribution of a greater number than one copy.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am willing to accept any number the committee suggest, because it is intended to try to help those engaged in elections.

Mr. BENNETT. Let each member have ten copies.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I think the same number should be sent to the defeated candidate as to the sitting member.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). No.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Yes, because in the large majority of cases the defeated candidate will be the next candidate, and I think we can afford to put him in the same position as the elected candidate.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am satisfied with that. Say twenty copies to each.

Mr. WILSON. Are these to be printed every year down here?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The type will remain standing, and each year the list, as we have it at the printing office, will be revised and corrected according to the returns sent in by the provincial officer. If a list is wanted for an election at any time, we shall have a correct copy right up to date.

Mr. WILSON. How long before an election will it be distributed?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I provide for that in another section. If the list is not obtainable in consequence of an accident, there is a provision that the last list available will be used. This is practically the old law in that respect.

On subsection 7,

Mr. BENNETT. What case is this to meet?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. In the Revised Statutes of British Columbia, chapter 67, section 11, provision is made for a list of voters called the register of voters, which is made up by the collector. It is provided in paragraph "c" of that section that after the list has been finally revised by the county judge any man may go before the collector and make a claim to have his name put on the list; and the collector, after putting a series of questions to him, and getting satisfactory answers, may put his name on the list. The collector then posts the list up, and if no objection is made to the name within two months, the man becomes a qualified voter. So that after the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery becomes possessed of the list, it is possible that other names may be added; and this is to provide that these names which are added by the collector may be put on the printed list here.

Mr. INGRAM. This section does not apply to any other province than British Columbia?

Mr. BENNETT.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No other that I know of.

Mr. POWELL. Might there not be a little conflict between this and the first subsection of section 10? That might be construed as a final revision.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think not, because an application to the collector may be rejected by him. It seems to be almost optional with him whether a name should go on or not. I think that the final revision under the Act would be the revision before the county court judge.

On section "a."

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Is not that sentence a little wide, "Such other changes as may be necessary"?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Add the words "to make it so correspond."

Mr. INGRAM. If that becomes law, each member and defeated candidate will be entitled to a printed list each year.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think that these words might lead to abuse.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I should bear in mind the suggestion. I do not care to alter the section now as it has been carefully framed, but if at the third reading, any verbal changes are required, we might consider them.

Mr. POWELL. In the case of a division of the list, is not that a list of the separate polling division that is made by the returning officer himself? There would be no printed copy of that subdivision, which is made on the eve of an election.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The only objection is the looseness of the phraseology, and we can easily remedy that later on.

On subsection 9,

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This is a very important provision. I understand the hon. gentleman is going to make some change in clause 14 by which the returning officer is empowered to obtain voters' lists. The hon. gentleman had some doubt as to our jurisdiction to confer this authority. It imposes a duty upon a provincial officer.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I have not the slightest doubt myself, but I do not like to set my opinion against that of other gentlemen, and therefore I thought I could meet the difficulty suggested by practically creating an offence, although that is another thing I do not care to do.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This is rather interesting, in view of the position which the hon. Solicitor General took not long ago in connection with the Bill for the better observance of the Sabbath. The question arose as to whether we could impose this duty upon a provincial officer and make him liable to a penalty. To get round that difficulty, the hon. gentleman proposes to constitute the refusal of the provincial officer a crime; and, therefore, under our jurisdiction here to legislate as to crimes, it is suggested that the difficulty would be overcome. I think, however, that the position which the Solicitor General took a little while ago this session was that if we legislated on a subject-matter within the exclusive jurisdiction of the local legislatures, we could not snatch jurisdiction by making the neglect to carry out our law an offence. If we have not the jurisdiction to adopt clause 14 as it originally stood, this provision will not put us on better ground. The hon. gentleman may have some authority to which he can refer, but my recollection is that, so far as this general subject is concerned, it has come up only in connection with the judges. It came up, at any rate, in connection with an election case, when the question arose as to our right to impose duties on provincial judges, and it came up also perhaps in connection with the probate courts. In considering these cases, my recollection is that the courts proceeded largely upon the ground of the judicial character of those offices, and the spirit and intention of the British North America Act, under which, it was contended, that while these judges were constituted officers of provincial courts, they were charged with the duty of administering the laws of Canada, and I think the point was raised also that this Government paid them their salaries. It was held, I think, that as their office was established for the purpose of carrying out the laws of Canada, this Parliament could add to their judicial duties by imposing on them jurisdiction in connection with the laws of Canada, but I have no recollection of the courts going further than that. I know of no case, for instance, where the courts intimated that we might take to ourselves the officers of the local legislatures and add to their duties in a singular particular. This opens up a very interesting question, and of course one too large to fully discuss at this stage and in committee. The question probably will, in some form or other, yet come before the courts in connection with this very subject, because if we can go this far and take advantage of the machinery of the local legislatures and add to the duties of the officers of these legislatures, which they have to carry out under local legislation, it seems to me that the question of provincial rights is presented in an entirely new aspect, and it would be very difficult indeed for the autonomy of the local legislatures to be preserved. If in this round-about way we can impose this duty upon officers paid salaries or fees, we can in the same way take complete charge of the whole machinery of any local legislature. I shall be glad to hear from the Solicitor General how it is that he thinks we can impose these duties upon these officers, in the first place, or how we can, by saying that neglect on the part of these local officers to do certain things for us, can fairly be made a crime.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. My own opinion is that the mere declaration on our part that this is a crime will not make it so. But after having conferred with some of the officers of the department who are of a contrary opinion I have come to the conclusion that it would be safer for me to defer to their opinion in a matter of this sort. This is not a new departure so far as the franchise law is concerned, because my hon. friend will remember that under the Franchise Act of 1885 we utilized the provincial machinery. Under section 15 it is provided that "the revising officer shall, as soon as possible after taking the oath of office obtain a certified copy or certified copies as the case may be of the last revised assessment roll or rolls," and so on.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is our officer.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. By section 16 it is enacted that the registrar shall cause "one copy of each list to be posted up in the office of the clerk or other corresponding officer of each municipal or parochial, or other known territorial division." Under section 17 every sheriff, warden, clerk of the peace, treasurer, parish court commissioner, or other officer to whom two copies of the said list are to be mailed shall forthwith after receiving them post one up in a conspicuous place in his office, and so on. Thus it will be seen that the Franchise Act imposes duties on the local officers.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Is there a penalty imposed for neglect? I do not think so.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am not prepared to say further than to draw attention to section 40 of the Franchise Act:

Every officer or person who is by any law the custodian of any assessment roll or list of voters prepared under the laws of any province, or of any other list or document, or any duplicate or certified copy thereof, which, under the foregoing provisions of this Act, the revising officer is required to obtain and use for the purpose of revising any list of voters under this Act, shall furnish the same, or a certified copy or copies thereof to any revising officer who applies for the same, and as by him required; and every such officer or person who refuses or omits to furnish the same to such revising officer within a reasonable time, upon being paid or tendered the cost of preparing the same, according to the fees or rates allowed therefor by the laws in force in the province to which such assessment roll, list or document relates, is guilty of a misdemeanour, and shall be punished accordingly.

Then Mr. Clement, in his work on the constitution, page 437 says :

It is, of course, open to the Dominion Parliament to utilize existing provincial machinery, or to confer upon "boards" or bodies of provincial creation powers and authorities in relation to the enforcement of Dominion laws, but, quoad the duties imposed by Dominion legislation, the members of the municipal bodies or "boards" are not provincial officers.

I apprehend that that would cover what we are attempting to do even if we had not the precedent of the Franchise Act.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think that the case of the Franchise Act stands upon the same footing, following the reading of the Solicitor General; but I do not recollect that the point was ever raised or discussed.

Mr. POWELL. This matter received a great deal of discussion, I may say to the Solicitor General, when the Manitoba Remedial Bill was passing through the House, and there was not an hon. gentleman on that side who did not hold a very strong opinion on the matter. The hon. gentleman from Charlottetown (Sir Louis Davies) expressed a very strong opinion that this Parliament had no power whatever to impose obligations upon the Governor in Council in the province of Manitoba in relation to the school board. That opinion was also expressed very strongly by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). It was acquiesced in by Professor Weldon. It was assented to by the present leader of the House. It was acquiesced in by the present Minister of Justice. In fact, I do not know a legal gentleman who was opposed to the Bill but expressed in the strongest terms—or assented to the strongest assertions of those who expressed opinions—the opinion that we have not the power to do it. However, I think it must be conceded that the Dominion of Canada has the power to seize upon any person it likes and require him to perform any duty it sees fit. Because a person happens to be an official of the local legislature, it is foolish to argue that he loses the duties and obligations that attach to his citizenship in the Dominion. But the point my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) raised, it strikes me, goes a little further than that. There is no doubt that under these decisions that have been given we have this power to impose a duty upon a provincial office. But the point is have we the power, not to single out the municipal officer and say that he shall do so and so—there is no question about our power in that way—but to meddle with the lists prepared under powers conferred by the local legislature. Suppose the local legislature should declare that no person should give these lists to the public until a certain day, and this Act came in and declared that a man should be punished if he did not give a copy before that time, there would be a plain clashing of jurisdiction, and this law would be ultra vires. But there is no use raising the point. This side is stopped from doing it by their action in the case of the old Act, and I suppose the matter will have to go.

Mr. WILSON. I may be dull, but I have not noticed any clause that says at what time these lists shall be distributed for an election.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. An amendment which has not yet been printed provides that they shall be distributed immediately after they have been printed.

Mr. CLARKE. I suppose this Bill will be reprinted before it is read the third time?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That has been agreed to.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In connection with the interesting point that was referred to a moment ago, if the clause we have been discussing is within our power, to constitute a crime on the part of a local officer by his failing to produce a document that he has prepared as an officer under provincial authority, it will be difficult to say that we could not make it a crime on the part of the provincial secretary to fail to produce any document in his possession or under his control when demanded—such as an Order in Council, for instance.

Bill reported and amendments read the first and second time.

SUPPLY—THE CASE OF JUDGE SPINKS.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies) moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would like to call the attention of the Solicitor General to the fact that an official inquiry was held into the conduct of Judge Spinks in the province of British Columbia. I do not remember whether a motion was made and carried for the papers, but if an order was passed, I will be glad if the hon. gentleman would expedite the return of the papers. When his estimates are reached, I would like to discuss the subject.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). I am under the impression that there are no papers in the department connected with it. That is my information, but I will see.

Motion agreed to, and the House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Fisheries Protection Service..... $95,000

Mr. SPROULE. What is being done about that Collingwood case, the Noble Brothers?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Nothing has been done. After I became Minister of Marine and Fisheries, Mr. Osler, the counsel of the Messrs. Noble, asked to have a hearing before me to make comments upon the evidence, and I said I had no objection. But after consideration he said he would leave the matter rest until he saw the decision of the Privy Council, inasmuch as the question of the Dominion right to control these fisheries, or the provincial right to control them, was pending before the Privy Council, and if it turned out that we had no rights in the matter at all, he would take some other course. I said, You can please yourself about that, and nothing of any kind has been done.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What has become of the tugs that were seized?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They were handed back by my predecessor before I came in, and some kind of bond was given.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What was the decision of Judge Johnson?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is a long time ago since I read it, and I could not tell you off-hand. I think the papers have all been brought down. The evidence was voluminous, and I have never mastered it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I will refresh my hon. friend's recollection about that matter, so that he may look into it. Several years ago, when I was at the head of the department, these tugs were seized in the ordinary course of the duties of the officers who are instructed, as the hon. gentleman knows, to seize and confiscate boats that are used in violating the close season. These people were without license, fishing in the Georgian Bay waters, and thwarting the department. These vessels were ordered to be sold, and after I left the department they were given back to the Noble Brothers and a bond was given to answer in the event of an investigation, which had been granted to them, turning out against them. The hon. gentleman has said that this investigation, which they courted and which was granted to them, resulted in an adverse decision. In the ordinary course, the duty of the department would have been to take action upon that bond. I thought there ought to be a limit put to this indulgence of coming before the department through counsel. They had one investigation in my time which resulted adversely to them. After I ceased to be Minister, they claimed another investigation before a judge because they challenged the fairness of the officer of my department who was the first commissioner. They then failed to show any case before this judge, and as the hon. gentleman says, nothing has been done except to let counsel be heard at some time not yet fixed. A year must have passed since the decision of Judge Johnson was given. I recollect that the papers were brought down last session, consequently a long time has elapsed. If the hon. gentleman has agreed to hear Mr. Osler before finally dealing with the case, I think no more delay should be allowed. I speak on the matter rather from an interested position for this reason, that I was subjected personally to a great deal of abuse and misrepresentation, and was put in the position of a vindictive head of a department who desired to pursue these people unfairly. Public attention was called to the matter in so extraordinary a manner that boards of trade took the subject up. Boards of trade in different Ontario towns represented the matter, the press took the case up, and the department was very seriously criticised, and particularly the head of it. For that reason, indulgence, and it was great indulgence, was extended, largely on the ground of public interest, and the first commission was appointed by myself. Since then the people have shown extraordinary indulgence, and I should like before I depart this life to ascertain the result. I have no doubt whatever as to the result, even in the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The question was raised as to who had jurisdiction, and whether we had any jurisdiction whatever. That was decided by the Supreme Court, and an appeal was taken to the Privy Council. I attended all the arguments before the Privy Council in this case. We hoped judgment would be given in November. It was the strongest bench that ever sat in the Privy Council of England, and we have been awaiting their decision, and it would be unfortunate for any action to be taken just now.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The parties will not press the case for a decision because they have got the boats and all the Government have got is the bond, whatever it may be worth. Unless the Government are active in the matter, it will not be pushed. Mr. Osler will never press for a hearing, especially with an adverse judgment.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have no doubt whatever as to the result.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I wish to call the attention of the Minister to a case, in regard to which there has been some correspondence. I refer to the dismissal of David Ross, who for a long time had been in the service of the department in the county of Inverness, and who, in my time, was a very efficient and intelligent officer. He perhaps possessed more than ordinary intelligence for work of that kind. He was overseer at East Margaree for eighteen years, and no charge was ever made against him either under one Government or the other. He remained in office for twelve months during the hon. gentleman's regime. On the 21st May, 1897, he was informed by the Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries that under an Order in Council dated 19th May, a reorganization of the fishery service in the county of Inverness was about to take place, and with a view to promote efficiency and economy his services as fishery overseer had been dispensed with. Of course, I understand exactly what a reorganization of that kind involves. It is an opportunity, and a very proper one, to get rid of inefficient officers and supply their places with efficient officers, but I am satisfied that neither the representative of the county of Inverness or any one familiar with Mr. Ross's work would declare that he was inefficient or inattentive to his duties. I am also satisfied, from my knowledge of him, that no report of that kind was made. I contend that in a reorganization men who are not inefficient should not be dispensed with. I should like to know from the Minister what the exact reason for his dismissal was, and who was appointed.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There was no politics in the matter. A reorganization has to be made, and I had to depend on the report of the member representing the county. His report was not that Mr. Ross was inefficient, but that he was getting old and was not very efficient.

Mr. BERGERON. An offensive partisan.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No. He was removed for the reason I have stated and another man was appointed.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The Government informed the House last year that they would act on the statement of representatives or of defeated candidates in the last Dominion elections, who took the responsibility of making positive statements that an officer had been guilty of acting as an offensive partisan. But surely the hon. Minister is not going to hand over to the most respectable member behind him the administration of his department, or the duty of deciding as to the efficiency of the officers who serve under him. The most humble man in the service is entitled to be judged on his merits, and it is a dangerous principle to suggest in connection with the efficiency of public officers that nothing more should be required than the statement of an hon. member who is not clothed with any responsibility whatever in that connection. I would be sorry to suppose that the Minister was going to dispense with the services of officers in the department simply because they may be represented by members of Parliament or any one else as being inefficient.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman misunderstood me. When I took charge of the department, I called on Prof. Prince to prepare a statement with respect to the standing and efficiency of every fishery officer in the department. That report was placed before me. Certain men he classified as very excellent and efficient officers, who did their duty well. As far as I can recall to mind, I have never allowed one of these men to be disturbed on the representation of any one. Then, there was a second class of men who were reported as fairly discharging their duties: some of them in a perfunctory way, but there was really no charge against them. They were there and pottering along as well as they could. In the third class were included inefficient officers who were not doing their duty satisfactorily and with respect to the third class, when the member for the county recommended a change and I found the man in the third class, as an inefficient officer I was ready to remove him.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is no practise that this man was classed as inefficient.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is certain that he was not classed amongst the very effective officers.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Is the Minister in a position to say that?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes. I am in a position to say it for the reason that I never dismissed a man who was classed among the first effective officers. He was either classed as a fair officer against whom there was no positive wrong-doing charged, or he was among those who were utterly inefficient. When I went through the organization of Inverness County, I naturally and properly consulted my hon. friend (Mr. McLennan), whose local knowledge was of great service to me, and I took the benefit of his advice.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If the hon. Minister tells me that this officer was reported to him as inefficient—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I would not say inefficient; I say he came within one of the two classes.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He was either efficient or not efficient?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He was not classed amongst those who were reported as very effective and efficient officers. He may have been classed as fair; that is a man against whom no charge was made and who had just gone along year after year, and some of them—I do not say this man—did nothing but just make their returns. He may have been amongst that class or amongst the inefficient.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would ask the Minister to bring down before concurrence, such report as he has had against Mr. Ross.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not say it was against him.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Well, referring to him, because, from the hon. gentleman's point of view that is an entirely different position from acting on the representation of any hon. gentleman who has no official responsibility. I do not think the hon. member for Inverness—and that fortifies me in pressing the Minister for such report as was given him—I do not think the hon. member for Inverness would say that Mr. Ross was an inefficient or inactive fishery officer. My recollection of Mr. Ross was entirely official, not in any sense personal, and his reports were amongst the best that were sent to the department in my time.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will take care to bring it down.

Mr. McINERNEY. There is a net increase of $5,000 in this item, and I would ask the Minister if he has increased the number of inspectors or overseers or guardians in the Dominion?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No. This increase arises almost entirely from the necessity for extra protection in the lobster service. Out of this vote a certain sum is to be paid for the building of two steam launches for the protection of the lobster fisheries.

Mr. McINERNEY. In the county of Kent there have been three overseers dismissed out of a total number of five. What is the intention of the Minister with regard to replacing these overseers who have been dismissed?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. In many places where we found the overseers unnecessary, we simply put an end to the office. I went carefully over all the maritime province overseers with the commissioner, and I found there were too many in some counties and the number was reduced. In the case mentioned by the hon. gentleman (Mr. McInerney) the number was reduced by three.

Mr. McINERNEY. The overseers who have been dismissed in Kent were in the most important fishing districts in the county, namely, Cocagne, Carleton, and the parish of St. Louis. At present, in the Dundas end of the county, near the town of Shediac, a gentleman from Wellington in the adjoining parish discharges the duty of overseer for the parish of Dundas. The same thing happens in the two most important northern parishes of the county, Carleton and St. Louis. A gentleman from Richibucto performs the duty of overseer in these two northern districts. From what I can learn, I do not think that system conduces to the proper discharge of the duties nor does it carry out the intention of the law in regard to overseers. It would be better if overseers were appointed in these three districts instead of simply having guardians there, and having the work of the overseers done from the adjoining districts of the county. I have heard particular complaints about it specially when I was home at Easter, and the people of these districts feel that they have not been rightly used in this regard. I bring the matter to the attention of the Minister thinking that perhaps when he looks into it he may do justice.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I shall bring it to the attention of Mr. Commissioner Prince. Of course in a matter of that kind I acted on his judgment.

Mr. BERGERON. In what class does the name of Mr. John Kelly appear? He was formerly overseer for the Fisheries Department in the district of Beauharnois, and there never was any charge against him. However, Mr. Kelly was dismissed by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and I am anxious to know under which class he has fallen?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think his district was changed.

Mr. BERGERON. Mr. Kelly was dismissed completely. He is a very good Conservative, and I suppose that would be enough to settle the question of his dismissal. I wish to ask the Minister if he has given strict orders about illegal fishing in the district of Beauharnois, which has in the past caused a great deal of disturbance, and which has almost depleted Lake St. Louis and Lake St. Francis of fish. I am under the impression that the Minister did issue very strict orders, but as I told him the other day in private conversation, I do not believe these orders are carried out. I understand there were two men appointed to replace Mr. John Kelly. One of them is Mr. DeWitt, and I know him to be a good officer, but I do not think he is allowed to carry out his instructions. No doubt he does everything in his power, but he is not obeyed, or rather the department does not give him the necessary backing. I was told the other day, on reliable authority, that the fishing with these destructive implements is still going on in Lake St. Francis and Lake St. Louis, and I call the attention of the Minister publicly to it. Who was the other overseer appointed to replace Mr. John Kelly. I know Mr. DeWitt, but I do not know the other?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I cannot give the names now. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) was kind enough to bring this matter to my attention privately, and now that he has made public mention of it, I will speak to Mr. Prince, who has the matter under consideration. I am very much obliged to the hon. gentleman for having brought it up again publicly, and I will take care that Mr. Prince reads "Hansard" to-morrow to call his attention to it again. There have been some seizures there lately. The officers are showing a good deal of efficiency and activity.

Mr. BERGERON. My hon. friend, I have no doubt, has heard from the Minister of Public Works the reason John Kelly was dismissed, and who has replaced him. I would ask the hon. Minister to bring down the names of the present overseers.

Mr. TAYLOR. I notice that this vote is for salaries and disbursements of fishery inspectors, overseers and guardians. When the Minister of Marine and Fisheries assumed office he made the promise to this House that no officer of his would be dismissed without an investigation. A few days ago I submitted to the Minister two questions—one respecting Mr. Samuel Boddy, and the other respecting Mr. William Hicks, two fishery officers. Mr. Hicks had been in the employ of the Government for twenty or twenty-five years, and was a most efficient officer, and Mr. Boddy, a young and active man and a very efficient officer also, had been in the employ of the Government for ten or twelve years. The reply I got in respect to Mr. Boddy was that he had been dismissed on the ground of economy and efficiency, and that his successor was appointed in the person of Mr. A. J. Flood. The ground for the dismissal of Mr. Hicks, given in the reply of the Minister, was inability to attend to his duties on account of old age, and alleged gross mismanagement of his district. I asked who his successor was recommended by, and the hon. Minister said by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. His successor was Mr. Sheldon Y. Bullis, of the village of Athens. Shortly after the general election Mr. Sheldon Bullis was a most offensive partisan and wanted a position, and I am credibly informed that he put up the sum of $100 and preferred a charge against the postmaster of the village of Athens. An investigation was held, and it was found that Mr. Berney, the postmaster, had voted in two constituencies—for my hon. friend the member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) and for myself in the county of Leeds. The fact of his having voted twice, of course, constituted a charge against him of being an offensive partisan, and he was dismissed. Mr. Bullis expected the appointment; but the Grit committee of the town met, and in place of nominating Mr. Bullis, they nominated another individual. This made Mr. Bullis very mad, and he was going either to burst the Government or to get an appointment somewhere, and the next man to be sacrificed was this old and faithful servant, Mr. Hicks, who had performed his duties so faithfully and well, that a few years ago the Anglers' Association requested the Government to increase his salary. Although his salary was only $75, he devoted the whole of his time to the duties of the office.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The salary was $125.

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, it was increased at the request of the Anglers' Association, and he was given charge of Charleston Lake, a body of water devoted to the propagation of fish. But a place had to be found for Mr. Bullis, and Mr. Hicks was thrown out without saying by your leave, the Minister says, for inefficiency and old age. But he is just as smart a man as the man appointed in his place. I know both of them well, and I know that Mr. Hicks can outrun Mr. Bullis, because he weighs about 150 while the latter weighs 250. Mr. Bullis could not go out in a boat if he tried, for he would be in danger of overbalancing it. He wanted to show that he was doing something, however, and this is what he did. A few neighbours in the locality this spring, after the ice went out, took their guns and went out on the creeks to shoot suckers. Every person knows that suckers run up the creeks. Here is a complaint laid by Mr. Sheldon Bullis, charging that William Mackay "did unlawfully fish for, catch and kill fish by the use of firearms in the waters known as Foster's Creek"—a little stream that enters Charleston Lake, over which he had jurisdiction. This man was brought before Mr. Loverin, a Grit J.P. of Athens, and he fined Mr. Mackay $5, together with $1 for hearing and summons, $2.23 for constable's fees, 50 cents for witness and mileage, and another 50 cents for the use of the court room, making $9.23 fine for shooting one sucker. Mr. Herbert Hull, for the same offence, had to pay $7.95. Mr. Charles Hull $9.98, and Mr. Edward Tanner $2.25. In each case the fine had to be paid within ten days, or else the accused had to go to jail for thirty days. And the magistrate charges 50 cents for the use of the room to try the case in. It is the first time I ever knew a magistrate to make such a charge. This is the conduct of the fishery overseer my hon. friend appointed to succeed the old and faithful servant, Mr. William Hicks; he has brought up some respectable farmers on a charge of having gone out to shoot suckers. Another question I submitted with regard to the dismissal of Mr. Hicks was:

Did the Minister of Marine and Fisheries promise this House that no officer in his department would be dismissed without an investigation?

To that question the Minister answered no ; but I am satisfied that it is known to every member of this House, and it will be found in "Hansard" that the hon. gentleman, standing in the place he occupies at present, made the pledge that no officer of his would be dismissed without investigation.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, no.

Mr. TAYLOR. Now he says he did not make that promise at all ; but there are hon. members here who heard him make it. I want to know now from the Minister what salary he is paying to Mr. Bullis, and what he pays to Mr. Flood ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think I shall hardly be called upon to discuss the two cases which are sub judice ; we had better leave the courts to deal with them. The hon. gentleman has undertaken to defend the parties supposed to be guilty of poaching.

Mr. TAYLOR. They are not.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They have been fined by the magistrate and they have appealed. If it turns out on appeal that they have been improperly fined, well and good ; but I am not here to censure the officer for having discharged his duty by prosecuting them. The men who have been appointed do not receive any greater salary than those whose places they took. They are appointed under the same salary.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I want to ask the hon. Minister of Marine what condition the fish hatchery of Sydney is in at present and who is in charge of it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am sorry I cannot answer that question, but will be very happy to give the hon. gentleman the information at the very earliest moment.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I took the proper course in the earlier part of the session to get at this information, and the hon. Minister refused to give it to me. I put a question first on the Order Paper as to what parties were dismissed from positions in the fishery service.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. And I asked the hon. gentleman to move for the papers.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I acted on his advice. He said that the lists of dismissals would be too long and would entail too much work to be brought down in a short time and asked me to move for a return. I put a notice on the paper, but every time the notice came up, hon. gentlemen opposite called out "stand."

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Does the hon. gentleman say that there was a dismissal there ?

Mr. McDOUGALL. Yes. I was prevented from either putting my question or my motion, and now the hon. gentleman is in his place and refuses the information.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not refuse the information. The hon. gentleman is entitled to it and will eventually get it. He will understand that while very desirous to give him every possible information, I cannot carry in my head the names of all these men. I have looked over the list most carefully of changes made, and I cannot see that there was any made in this case.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I think I am correct in stating that he dismissed every official in my county but one.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Give me the name of this one.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The man's name was William James Dunlop. He was in charge of the fish hatchery. I may remind the hon. gentleman that the fish hatchery is not doing the work it usually did a year or two before that.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think it was running at all and that is what bothers me.

Mr. McDOUGALL. This man was in charge of the fish hatchery.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There was a man there paid for looking after a hatchery that was shut up and no longer in existence.

Mr. McDOUGALL. It was not shut up, and if I am correctly informed, there was a man appointed in his place.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No.

Mr. McDOUGALL. That is my information. The hon. Minister does not seem to be posted with regard to that case.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I was posted, but for the moment the hon. gentleman rather misled me I have a list here of every change and I see no such name.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Can the hon. gentleman give me any information about the dismissal of Burke and Hickey, McDonald and Quinan, fishery overseers.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They were guardians, not overseers.

Mr. McDOUGALL. No, they were overseers, paid $120 a year. I am not referring to the guardians, although they were also dismissed.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They were merely employed temporarily.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I know that, but those were permanent officials of the department. Take, for instance, the case of Mr. McDonald. I think he filled the position of fishery overseer for something like twenty years and so did Mr. Quinan.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What McDonald was that?

Mr. McDOUGALL. Alexander McDonald. Mr. Hickey was appointed only some five or six years ago, and is a young, active man. Burke was appointed six or seven years ago, and is also a very active man. They were all efficient officers.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Burke was the keeper of a lighthouse, was he not?

Mr. McDOUGALL. No, the hon. Minister dismissed the keeper of the lighthouse also. That was J. P. Burke. This one is William Burke. I would like him to give some reasons for those dismissals.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I shall have to give the reason in each particular case. I told the hon. gentleman that I would bring down the information in each particular case, and I will give it to him to-morrow if he likes.

Mr. WALLACE. Why was it not brought down before?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It was not moved for.

Mr. WALLACE. The motion was on the paper, but the hon. gentleman was asked several times to let it stand.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I moved for the return on several occasions and the hon. Minister himself was the very gentleman who asked me to let it stand.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My hon. friend is wrong.

Mr. McDOUGALL. It was the hon. gentleman who got up, in the first instance, when I put the question, and said that the list was too long and would entail too much work or something of that kind. That was the excuse. He refused the information.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman is not going to be denied the information. I want to give him all the information I can, but I thought the better plan would be to give it in the form of a return. I do not think it advisable to lumber up "Hansard" with a large number of names. I shall give him the return, and he will not have to wait any time for it.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I wish to ask the hon. Minister also with regard to the visit of Premier Murray from Nova Scotia and the Hon. Mr. Ross, a few days ago, to this city. I see by the papers that they were here on a delegation asking for an extension of the lobster fishing season for the Island of Cape Breton. Is that a fact?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes. They and a number of other gentlemen waited on me to ask for an extension of the lobster season, and I, as in duty bound, listened courteously to their representations and took a note of them. I called in my commissioner also to listen to them. We argued out the question, and I tried to show how utterly impossible it was to make a local extension without making it general. We thoroughly discussed the question, and I got a lot of information from them and from other sources. I have furnished the material part of that information to the inspector, and asked him to make a report. I expect shortly to have a report from Inspector Bertram, of Cape Breton, and from the other inspectors, and will not come to any decision until I get their report.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The hon. gentleman is not then in a position to say what he proposes to do.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have not yet finally decided. I am bound to receive statements coming from influential public men, such as the Premier of Nova Scotia and Mr. Ross, and any person engaged in the lobster fishing industry, and shall give full weight to their statements in coming to a conclusion. There are strong reasons why, in a particular locality along Cape Breton, the time should be somewhat extended, but the difficulty is if you extend in one locality, you have to extend it in others. It is not a question that can be solved in half an hour, but is one that has worried me more than any other question that has come under my consideration.

Mr. McINERNEY. What reason did they give for the extension?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That the fishing does not begin as early there as in other places, and that the fish that come in there do not go to other places and that there is no diminution in the catch along that coast. The ice coming down the coast keeps them from fishing in the earlier part of the season, and therefore makes the season a very short one; and unless some small extension be granted, they say it will be impossible for them to carry on the industry. They urge that we can grant the extension there without granting it generally. I have referred the facts to my officers.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I am strongly in favour of extending the season to the people of Cape Breton, in view of the position they occupy as compared with other lobster fishermen on the southern coast. We have ice up to the present, although this has been a fairly open season, and it is impossible for our fishermen to begin fishing.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Has there been any diminution in the size of the fish?

Mr. McDOUGALL. None has come to my notice, and I have not heard anybody complain of anything of that kind. The hon. gentleman admits that the Premier of Nova Scotia and other gentlemen headed the delegation here in respect to this question. Did not the necessity for the influence of these people in respect to the extension of that season arise from the fact that he himself, when he occupied a seat on this side of the House found fault with the Administration then in power when they came before the House and made a proposition for the extension, on the ground on which it is now applied for? If the hon. gentleman will look at his remarks in "Hansard," he will see that it was because of the position that he himself then took that it was deemed necessary to send this influential deputation. I suppose the hon. gentleman thought it of some political advantage to the Prime Minister of Nova Scotia, and when the change was decided on, that hon. gentleman was invited to come up here and ask for it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I rather gather from my hon. friend's remarks that he supports the Premier of Nova Scotia.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I do. I believe that the lobster season should be extended in Cape Breton because the fishermen there are unable to begin their fishing as early as do those on the southern coast of Nova Scotia, and because the size of the lobsters has not been reduced by over-fishing or anything of that kind.

Now, I see it reported in the papers a few days ago that the local member for Cape Breton, after being up here and discussing this question with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, went across to England to make some arrangement with regard to cold storage with a view to getting the assistance of the Government for pushing some scheme into operation for the shipment of lobsters in cold storage to Great Britain. I would like to ask the hon. Minister if that proposition was made by Dr. Kendall, the local member?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, Dr. Kendall made the proposition to me and asked if I would submit to my colleagues the propriety of giving a small grant in support of a scheme to ship lobsters to England, in cold storage, pointing out that if this trade could be established it would be a great boon for the lobster catchers along the coast. I conceded that it would be a great boon if satisfactorily solved; so great that it will hardly be measured in dollars and cents. He promised to obtain data showing how the scheme could be carried out. He thought that a few hundred dollars would be sufficient to make the experiment, and I promised that I would submit the matter for the consideration of my colleagues, and said I hoped to be successful in inducing them to agree to the appropriation of a small sum, $500 or $600, for this purpose.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I am glad the hon. Minister looks forward to helping this industry in that way. Would he tell me if there is, in connection with this proposition, any proposition as to how these lobsters would be shipped from Cape Breton? There is no direct communication between Cape Breton and Great Britain, and I suppose the lobsters would have to be shipped to some shipping port such as Halifax.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I understand so.

Mr. McINERNEY. Why not Charlottetown.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is no reason why not Charlottetown. But the suggestion came from a Cape Breton gentleman who had taken a good deal of pains to work out the details. I told him that it was impossible for the Government to take charge of such a scheme, but that I would submit to my colleagues the proposal to make a small grant in order to carry out some investigation and experiment, and I felt reasonably sure that it could be done. I shall be very well satisfied if it can be done from Charlottetown.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I cannot understand how the Government can expect, by any such grant as that, to cover the cost of collecting lobsters along 150 or 200 miles of coast of Cape Breton where the lobster fishery is carried on. I take it that it is in the gathering up of the lobsters and bringing them to a central point that the expense will be formed.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. But the experiment must be made on a reasonable scale. We are not going to collect and ship lobsters to Great Britain without first trying to find out whether it can be successfully done. A few crates can be collected and shipped in the first place.

Mr. McINERNEY. That is why I suggested Charlottetown. That city is the centre of a larger area in which the lobster fishery is carried on than any other place. Boats properly rigged could take lobsters out to the cold storage steamers. I would like to know whether the hon. gentleman intends to grant the pound-net licenses to Mr. Logie in the northern part of my county.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am afraid not.

Mr. McINERNEY. Has the hon. gentleman considered the inequality that exists in the payments to the guardians in the Miramichi River in the county of Northumberland and the guardians in the county of Kent? It seems to me that for a long time there has existed a decided inequality.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Is the hon. gentleman speaking of guardians or overseers?

Mr. McINERNEY. I think it affects the guardians more than the overseers. Can the hon. gentleman tell me what he pays guardians per day in the county of Kent?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is a small sum fixed, $40 or $50 per year, depending on the district the guardian has to watch and the time he is engaged. That is generally settled by Mr. Prince. I have interfered to the very slightest extent with the salaries of the officers, except in discharging a number of them that were reported to me as unnecessary, and in cutting down a few of those that were, relatively to the others, over-paid. But so far as I know, there is no marked discrepancy between the payment made to the guardians in the hon. gentleman's county and those in the adjoining county of Northumberland.

Mr. McINERNEY. I think there is a great discrepancy between the payments made to the different officers.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the hon. gentleman will give me the names, I will examine closely into that. I think he is wrong, for I went over the names of every one with Mr. Prince.

Mr. McINERNEY. Take the case of Mr. Robinson, for instance, Mr. Abbott and Mr. Fraser.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Mr. Abbott is an overseer, and a very excellent officer.

Mr. McINERNEY. There is no better officer than Mr. Hanna.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. His salary was increased since I came in.

Mr. McINERNEY. I understand the guardians are now paid at the rate of $1.20 a day. In the county of Kent, when they only do a part of a day's work in one day and a part the next day, the two parts are put together and made one day, for which they are paid only $1.25.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman does not complain that I am paying them too much.

Mr. McINERNEY. No, I do not. But I claim, and I urged it on the previous Government, that these officers ought to be paid more in the county of Kent, because they do the same work as the men in the county of Northumberland who are paid three or four times as much.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman will hardly contend that the inland fisheries in his county compare with the fisheries in the county of Northumberland.

Mr. McINERNEY. No; I contend that the shore fisheries surpass them.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The same inspection is not required for the shore fisheries.

Mr. McINERNEY. I think it is, excepting salmon fisheries.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The salmon fishery is the great fishery.

Mr. McINERNEY. How does it compare with the lobster fishery, or the smelt fishery, or the mackerel fishery, or the cod fishery in the amount of revenue that is brought into the Government in the way of licenses? It does not compare at all. It is a nice fishery for men who go angling; but as a matter of commerce and revenue to the Government, it does not compare with the fisheries that I have mentioned.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I shall be glad to talk over with the hon. gentleman the relative payments made to these overseers.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I had not quite finished my questions with respect to the mission of Dr. Kendall to England. I would ask the Minister if the aid which he promised to this scheme of Dr. Kendall, is not given for the purpose of assisting that gentleman to take a trip to England?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No; I did not know he had gone to England at all.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I am quite certain that not a cent of any aid that the Minister will give in this way, if he only gives $500, will ever reach a fisherman on the island of Cape Breton. I feel positive of that.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think I did not make myself understood by the hon. gentleman. I said an experiment was about to be tried as to whether lobsters can be sent home in cold storage to England. That experiment must be on a limited scale. I told the gentleman who came to me, that the department would not undertake that experiment and carry it out in detail, nor take the responsibility of its failure; but that if I had the assurance of men who would carry it out, and if the details were submitted to me and I approved of the scheme, I would recommend a sum of $500 or $600 towards the expense, to insure them against loss.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. A scheme in which private capital is invested?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes. I did not go any further than that. I have not yet submitted the matter to my colleagues. But if the hon. gentleman is opposed to this, I would be glad to hear his arguments against it.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I am not opposed to it, if the Minister can make it successful. But it seems to me an absurd thing to grant merely $500 or $600 towards the enterprise of these men, and that they must begin by sending a man over to England to ascertain whether cold storage for lobsters is possible between Nova Scotia and England.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I would like the hon. gentleman to understand that I told the gentleman who came to me that I could not give any aid, either to him or to any one else, who did not understand the business. But I told him that if an experienced lobster packer engaged in the enterprise, and I was assured that the scheme was bona fide, I would recommend a small sum to test the experiment in the first instance. That experiment cannot succeed unless the packer who undertakes it, sends somebody to England, not only to open up the market, but to see if these fish can be put upon the market in proper time. You cannot start a new industry in England without sending somebody there to look after it. I cannot understand the hon. gentleman. Is he opposed to the Government giving a small sum in aid of the experiment?

Mr. McDOUGALL. I am not opposed to it at all. What I am opposed to is the way it is being done. Why not send a fisherman or competent man who is capable of going to the English market and talking about lobsters, instead of sending a medical doctor in order to reward him for the part he took as a candidate in the election against myself and my colleagues.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Oh, is that the objection?

Mr. McDOUGALL. It is because of their admiration for this gentleman that they are aiding him to go to England with this scheme. Any man who knows anything about this fishery business knows that it is not necessary to go to England to ascertain whether lobsters can be successfully sent there in cold storage. It is absurd to make such a proposition. On the other hand, it would be equally absurd to say that there is no market in England for lobsters, and that a man has to go there personally to open up a market. In this way we are providing a trip for a man to England, and giving $500 or $600 towards his expenses. After he comes back he knows no more about it than he ought to have known before he went. Our poor fishermen will not get the benefit of one single cent. I would suggest to the Minister to assist this scheme in such a way as to help the fishermen in bringing their lobsters to a terminal point for shipment in cold storage to market.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Tell me how, in what way, except by opening up a market and finding proper connections at home.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Cold storage is already provided for, so far as the steamers are concerned, and all the Minister requires to do is to see about getting the lobsters from the fishermen to the point where shipment is made in cold storage. What I object to is that this thing is done under pretense of being an assistance to the fishermen.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If the Government undertakes this, I suppose there will be another vote?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I said I had not submitted it yet to my colleagues.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would call the hon. gentleman's attention to some valuable information that is in his department. Some years ago an experiment was made, sufficient to demonstrate the feasibility of such a scheme. If you can get the lobsters to the London market, there is no trouble at all in selling them, the difficulty is to get them across alive. In this experiment that has already been made and reported upon, while it was not a success, on account of the large loss of lobsters on the voyage, the remnant that were landed alive were so valuable on the market that they actually paid the expense. Of course there being no profit, the business was not followed up. The difficulty experienced was to keep the water at the temperature which the lobsters required. The point established was that the market for lobsters in England is the very best, and although very few reached the market alive, the sale of those few paid on that occasion the cost of the whole shipment.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I believe there are great possibilities in the enterprise.

Mr. GILLIES. I am ready to commend the hon. Minister for any effort put forward in making the shipment of live lobsters to England a success. It is a business capable of great expansion, and no doubt can be made successful if conducted on business principles. The proposed vote of $500 or $600 is, however, entirely out of proportion to the effort that must be put forward in that direction, and I am ready to support any reasonable sum which the Minister may think necessary to ask in order to carry out any well digested scheme. It is certainly a subject that is well worth looking into, because if we compare the lobster business now with what it was a few years ago we will at once see to what proportions it has developed, and judging by the past, we can readily see to what proportions it may increase in the future. I therefore commend the hon. Minister for the step taken in this direction. As regards the party in charge, I doubt whether he is the proper one.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have not put anybody in charge of it.

Mr. GILLIES. I am not going to say a word more on that point. I desire, however, to impress on the Minister the real necessity, and I have taken the opinion of experts upon this point, of extending the fishing season on the Cape Breton coast. Since I have been in Parliament, eight years, year after year it has been pressed on my attention, and I urged it on the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) when he was head of the department. I had great difficulty in pressing on that hon. gentleman the wisdom of extending the season, he contending, supported by his officers, whose actions I thought he was always too ready to defend, that it was not in the interest of the industry itself that the season should be extended. I pressed upon him the fact that the coast was subject to storms, that even after May a storm might come along and sweep away the traps and deprive the lobster fishermen of their season's work. I repeat that I always had great difficulty in impressing on the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries the wisdom and necessity of extending the fishing season; but the strongest opposition came from the present Minister himself, when sitting on the Opposition side of the House, and the strongest arguments that will confront him when endeavouring to make an extension were the arguments he used himself when in Opposition. However, I hope he will be able to knock over the arguments he then put forward. I must tell the hon. gentleman that I was considerably surprised to ascertain that he had been waited on by a delegation from our part of the province to advocate the very matter I am now seeking to impress on the hon. gentleman. I think he will find sufficient intelligence among the five members from the island of Cape Breton to show him in its full entirety the necessity for this extension, and it is entirely unnecessary for the hon. gentleman to call in any outside assistance from Premier Murray or William Ross or anybody else. The members from Cape Breton are quite competent and are ever willing to communicate to the Minister any grounds that can possibly be advanced for this extension, and in the future it will be entirely unnecessary for the hon. gentleman to call in any such assistance. If any such assistance should be volunteered the hon. Minister he can quietly tell the parties that the island members are ready and willing and able to put forward every argument that can be advanced in favour of the extension. I again ask the hon. Minister, in the interest of a class of people who deserve every care, that he will, if possible, give the extension now asked. The coast is a wild one, the calling is a precarious one, and the industry is one that should enlist the sympathy of the hon. Minister, as I am sure it will do, and if he grants the extension asked he will confer a great benefit on these fishermen, who should be the care of all enlightened governments.

Mr. MARTIN. I wish to say that any efforts made in regard to shipping fish in cold storage will have my support. The item is not now before the committee, but I hope the Minister will take up this question and introduce a scheme that will be beneficial. When the item comes up in the Supplementary Estimates, I trust the scheme will be a feasible one and it will be then discussed. What I desire especially at this moment to call attention to is the fish-breeding establishment in Prince Edward Island and the lobster hatchery. I wish to ask two questions, and to call the hon. Minister's attention to the hatchery at Duck River.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It was burnt down years ago.

Mr. MARTIN. I want to know if the Minister proposes to do anything towards rebuilding that hatchery. Also, I should like to know whether the Minister intends to do anything in regard to distributing fish fry in Prince Edward Island.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am sorry to say that I am not in a position to ask Parliament for money to rebuild the fish hatchery. It was built there many years ago, and burned down many years ago, and I do not think the necessity for it is such as would justify me in asking for the money necessary. As to the distribution of fish fry in Prince Edward Island, the rivers are sufficiently stocked naturally by the fish going up them, and if you can only prevent poaching the distribution of fry would not be necessary. There are some good trout rivers on the island, and if we can only protect them reasonably well there will be some good fishing. Last year in the main river, the Morell, we kept a patrol boat for four or five weeks at the mouth of the river with two armed men, and we succeeded in protecting that river, with the result that there was magnificent fishing during the season up the river. There is no necessity, in my opinion, nor in the opinion of the officers of the department for distributing fry there.

Mr. MARTIN. There is no doubt that poaching exists to some extent, and even fishing in the legal season has depleted the waters around Prince Edward Island. I question very much whether the opinion of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries that there is no necessity for the distribution of fry in Prince Edward Island is a sound one. Some years ago there was a distribution of fry and there was excellent fishing years afterwards. I would like that in this distribution of fry the province of Prince Edward Island should not be overlooked.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Is it the intention of the Minister to reopen the hatchery at Sydney?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No.

Mr. McDOUGALL. This hatchery has done a great deal of good and I cannot see why the Minister insists on closing it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not insist on closing it. It was closed when I came into the department.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Yes, it was closed through an accident; but this hatchery was built at some expense to the country and it has done a great deal of good and should be reopened.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will be very glad to talk the matter over with Mr. Prince.

Mr. INGRAM. Does the Minister exclude the press from investigations into charges against officers in his department?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. As a rule I do. I see no necessity for the press being present at departmental investigations. The officer incriminated is always present and represented, and I see no necessity for the press reporting the proceedings.

Mr. INGRAM. I understand the Minister to say that the officer charged is there himself?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, always.

Mr. INGRAM. Then the Minister is not aware of all that is transpiring in his department, or that is done by the officers of his department.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Does the hon. gentleman tell me that any officer charged in my department was not allowed to be present at the investigation. I have read every investigation that has taken place and I do not think that occurred.

Mr. INGRAM. What I say is that when your local officer was charged, he was not in attendance at the investigation which took place, and which involved his position. Would the Minister consider it unfair that the investigation should take place if the officer charged was not present?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I would.

Mr. INGRAM. I have no desire to blame the hon. Minister for certain investigations which took place in my riding, but I wish to place on "Hansard" some of the facts with respect to the investigation in reference to the fishery overseer of the district of East and West Elgin, opposite Lake Erie. Mr. William Freeland is the fishery overseer there, and he was charged with allowing gill-nets to fish without paying a license, and without the sanction of the department. Mr. O. B. Shepherd, inspector of fisheries, Toronto, was instructed to investigate that charge in St. Thomas. Mr. Shepherd went there and Mr. Freeland was there, and the press wished to gain admittance but they were not allowed. Those who made the charge against the fishery overseer did not put in an appearance, and Mr. Shepherd discovered it was a trumped up charge for the purpose of annoying the fishery inspector, and I presume for the purpose of humbugging the hon. gentleman's department. Mr. Shepherd was so satisfied that the officer had done his duty that he paid no further attention, and I presume made a report to the department to that effect. Later on I find that certain charges were made which led the department to believe that an investigation was necessary in East and West Elgin with respect to fishery licenses in the district. The hon. gentleman wrote this letter to Mr. Shepherd on the 15th January, 1897:—

15th January, 1897.

My dear Sir.—A question has arisen with respect to the fishermen of Lake Erie opposite the counties of East and West Elgin, which requires investigation at your hands as soon as you can conveniently make it. I inclose you herewith a confidential memo. which I have received from Mr. George E. Casey, M.P., setting forth the grounds on which he urges that existing fishery licenses should be withdrawn from the parties now holding them. I would be inclined to act upon these grounds, but I want an investigation made by you so that the parties cannot allege that I acted ex parte or without giving them a hearing. You will, therefore, read the confidential memo., which, of course, you will keep for your private instruction, and return it to me with your report. You will communicate with Mr. Casey by telegram, and fix a date when it will be convenient for him to enter upon the investigation, and having made the arrangements you will proceed at once to St. Thomas and there place yourself in communication with Mr. Casey and Dr. Wilson.

I do not propose that this investigation should be a formal court, held with counsel on both sides, and all the paraphernalia and red tape of a court. The main feature is that the facts shall be obtained by you and the parties interested shall have full opportunity of putting their case before you. I rely upon your tact, prudence and discretion in carrying this out, and hope to soon receive your report.

I will instruct the officers of my department to forward you the complete file of official papers relating to this matter, which you may produce or not as you deem desirable. Of course, you will allow Mr. Casey and Dr. Wilson access to this file when required. I do not want the matter to be mentioned to the press, nor do I want a newspaper controversy at all. I rely upon your tact in carrying this out without unnecessary publicity.

The part of Mr. Casey's memo. having reference to gill-nets will not require any comment from you.

I take this letter from a return brought down the other day and I find that a number of the documents in it are not signed by any person nor is this letter signed.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is my letter.

Mr. INGRAM. Yes, I judge so. What I wish to bring to the attention of the Minister is this. I have no doubt the hon. Minister fully expected that the fishery overseer in that district would surely attend that investigation because in that district he had the carrying out of the instructions of the department. But instead of Mr. Freeland, the fishery overseer being present on that occasion, Mr. Casey, who represents West Elgin, was the chief pusher with respect to how the investigation should be conducted. Men who should have been present there, who had licenses in East and West Elgin, and who owned the nets, were not present at the investigation; yet some of these same men were deprived of their licenses. Some of the documents which would have been important factors in the investigation, and which the overseer had full knowledge of were not there. I claim that had the fishery overseer been there, knowing all the facts in connection with the fishing licenses in East and West Elgin, he would have been able to show that Mr. O. B. Sheppard would not have been justified in making such a report to the department as he did make. At that investigation it was stated that certain parties were not the owners of their nets. I hold in my hand the bill of sale agreed to between Mrs. E. J. Treble and Mr. Hoover.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Who is Mrs. Treble—an American citizen?

Mr. INGRAM. Yes.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. And it is alleged, I do not say with what truth, that these bills of sale were bogus—that the parties were really fishing for this American, though under their own names.

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken about that.

Mr. INGRAM.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Perhaps I am, but that is the allegation.

Mr. INGRAM. I know as a matter of fact that Mr. Hoover owned these nets, and I can prove by the documents and by a strong supporter of this Government, who formerly occupied a seat in this House, Mr. Couiter, that Mr. Hoover and his people are respectable people, owning a considerable quantity of land in the county of Haldimand, and well able to pay for the nets and the licenses. I say that if Mr. Freeland had been present on that occasion he would have shown Mr. O. B. Sheppard that the statements made by Mr. O'Brien and others should not have been taken with regard to some of the gentlemen who held licenses. I understand that some charges are made against the fishery overseer at Fort Burwell on Lake Erie. Mr. Sheppard, I understand, has been there and has investigated the charges made against him, and so far as I can learn, he has satisfied Mr. Sheppard and is still doing his duty. That being the case, it seems to me that the hon. gentleman should take some steps to prevent Mr. O. B. Sheppard from holding these investigations unless the officers engaged by the department are present to advise him in the interest of the department and in the interest of the fisheries which they are appointed to guard and control. I take this opportunity of expressing myself in this way, and during the next session of Parliament, as it is too late this session, I will take the opportunity of entertaining the hon. gentleman for an hour or two with respect to the contents of this return—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I shall be very happy to discuss it with you.

Mr. INGRAM—to show, I was going to say, the rascality that has been practised. I want to tell the hon. Minister that some men hold licenses who have not a dollar to pay for them, who did not get them in the first instance for the purpose of fishing, but only for the purpose of trafficking and trading in them.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I want to say one word, otherwise the House might be under the impression that I had acted hastily and without proper evidence. Complaints were made to me some time ago that the fishery licenses in that locality were monopolized by non-residents, men who had no business there, and who were only fishing for Americans under the guise of their own names. It was not a political matter at all. Hon. gentlemen on this side of the House pressed me to make changes, and others pressed me not to make changes. I did the best I could with the evidence before the department, and I came to the conclusion that an investigation by the local fishery officer would not be sufficient—that he was too much mixed up with them. So I instructed the inspector for the province of Ontario, a gentleman not appointed by me, but who was in office when I came in, to proceed to this place and make a thorough investigation, and to keep himself unentangled as much as possible from local influences. He went there, made his investigation, and reported. The report is a very clear, business-like one. After receiving it, I received a deputation from Mr. Coulter, a former member of this House, on behalf of Mr. Hoover, who I must say appeared to be a very respectable gentleman. Mr. Hoover came down along with Mr. Coulter, and they pressed upon me that the report was unjust to him. I was also waited on by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who also pressed upon me that the inspector's report was not quite fair to Mr. Hoover. I communicated again with the inspector, sent for him, went over all the papers with him; I spent more time over this case than any other case in the department, because I was waited upon by half a dozen deputations of Mr. Hoover and his friends; but I have not seen my way clear to alter the decision come to by the inspector of Ontario, who seemed to me, under all the circumstances of the case, to be very fair. I had a great deal of sympathy with Mr. Hoover, and if I could have seen my way clear to grant him a license under the circumstances, I would have done so; but a very strong argument on the part of the local residents is that the fishing belongs to their immediate locality and should not be licensed to people two or three hundred miles away—that they have the prior right. As my hon. friend says, the papers are very voluminous, and we shall have to take next session for the discussion of them, which will occupy a long time.

Mr. INGRAM. With regard to the fishermen engaged in fishing along the shores of Lake Erie, from Essex to Buffalo, these men, after supplying the local demand, had a surplus of fish, which they sent to Buffalo, where they were able to sell them at the highest price. Some of them traded necessarily with the fish dealers in Buffalo, who advanced them more than they were able to pay for with fish afterwards, and were compelled, in order to save their own, to take chattel mortgages on some of the nets and other paraphernalia used in fishing, with the hope that in the following season the fishermen would be able to pay their claims. It was by that means that two or three fishermen got involved with Mr. Treble. It is well known that Mr. Treble was a good friend of the fishermen along that coast. As a matter of fact, he came out thousands of dollars behind in his dealings with them. I say, therefore, it is hardly fair to abuse Mr. Treble, though he is an American, for having become involved in trying to help these fishermen along.

Mr. KAULBACH. I take this opportunity of bringing to the attention of the hon. Minister the dismissals of two fishery overseers in my county—two men of sterling worth, who thoroughly understood their business, and whose intelligence and knowledge with regard to the habits and locations of the fish could not be surpassed. I can not say too much in praise of their character, for it is far beyond that of the ordinary class of overseers. Mr. David Evans is a man of very great experience, who had been overseer for 12 or 15 years, in the eastern part of my county; the other is Mr. W. H. Solomon, a man of very great intelligence and knowledge as respects the habits and condition of fish and the fisheries, who made that subject almost entirely his study. He was a sort of theorist on fish and fish culture, and I consider it a crying shame to dismiss those men from office without any cause whatever. Before the election took place, I called upon them and said: You received your appointment through me, and I do not feel satisfied that men holding office should feel themselves entirely free from active strife, and I want you to do what you can for me. They both positively refused, and to my knowledge never used any influence whatever in my behalf, at all events in any public manner. They attended no public meeting that I am aware of. I never met them at any meeting, and I attended a great number, nor did I even find them outside at any meeting. At all events, investigations, I believe, were held, and nothing was elicited to show that they were, in the slightest degree, guilty of partisanship of any kind or description or any infraction of the laws or regulations of the Fishery Department. I feel that their dismissal is a severe blow to the interests of the fishing industry, and I am satisfied that it is exceedingly unfair for the department to have allowed itself to be led by influence from outside—the influence of office seekers—to deprive those parties of office. The salaries paid them were very small, and they both have told me that they are just as well without the position; but at the same time, I do not believe that it is right, in the interests of the public, to allow this sort of thing to be carried on. Who are the parties who received the offices rendered vacant by the dismissal of these men? They were the warmest and most earnest and most offensive partisans and the earnest workers of hon. gentlemen opposite at the time of the election. It seems to me that if one man is dismissed on a charge of partisanship it is certainly very wrong to replace him by another, who is a most earnest, active and unscrupulous partisan, as were the two men who were put in the places of those I have mentioned. I felt in duty bound to bring this matter to the attention of the hon. Minister. I am sure that if he knew the character of those two men, removed from office, or decapitated, if he knew their integrity and sterling worth, and their fitness for the position of fishery overseers, he never would have thought of dismissing them at all. He must have been induced to act as he did by misrepresentation.

Reference was made with regard to aid to be given for the transportation of lobsters along the coast to marketable centres, by means of subsidies to steamers or in some other way, for the benefit of fishermen along the Cape Breton shore. I do not know how the hon. Minister would be able to draw the line of demarcation. I contend that if a favour of that kind is granted the fishermen on the shores of Cape Breton, that favour should be extended to the fishermen from Cape North to Cape Sable, and I therefore ask the hon. Minister not to overlook the county of Lunenburg, although its representative is not a supporter of the Government.

With reference to the extension of the lobster fishing season, I think that is a dangerous subject to handle. There are numbers of persons in my county asking for an extension, and there are also numbers who do not want the season interfered with. The lobsters are small now, and if you extend that season, we will have them exterminated altogether, or they will become so small that they will not be worth catching. It is a matter that should be gravely considered before anything is done.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). The impression might be created, from the observations made this evening, that hon. gentlemen on this side took very little interest in the question of the importance of extending the season for lobster fishing in Cape Breton and Prince Edward Island. I think the hon. Minister will bear me out when I declare that gentlemen representing constituencies in eastern Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, and myself in the Island of Cape Breton, constituted themselves into a delegation to wait upon the Minister and press upon him the necessity of this extension. While this was the case, and while the hon. Minister gave us every attention and promised to consider the matter, I submit that there was nothing derogatory to our position as members of Parliament that the same Minister should listen to a delegation from these localities, which delegation may be supposed to add to the information already given him by members of Parliament. It must be conceded that members of Parliament are not expected to know everything concerning what constitutes a successful prosecution of the fishing or any other industry, and, therefore, I do not consider that it is at all derogatory to our position that the hon. Minister should give respectful attention to a delegation coming from any part of the Dominion to urge upon him the necessity of pursuing this, that or the other course with regard to a certain industry. Since I have had the honour of a seat in this House, I have observed delegations from all parts of Canada with respect to the various industries, and I am sure that the representatives of the various constituencies from which these gentlemen came never raised any objection to any Minister giving a respectful hearing to these appeals. I therefore cannot see why hon. gentlemen here should object to a delegation coming from their part of the country with respect to so important an industry as the lobster fishing industry. For my part I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, and the House that I would be glad to see as many more delegations come from these localities in order to strengthen my hands and impress upon the Minister the importance of extending the lobster fishing season in the island of Cape Breton and in some parts of Prince Edward Island as well. I may say, with regard to the mission of Dr. Kendall to England, I had quite a long conversation with him before he started, and I find that he has very thoroughly studied the different processes of preserving fish.

And although he is a medical doctor, there is nothing in his profession to prevent him having a good knowledge of what is necessary in the preparation of so valuable a food as the lobster. But the difference between the proposition of Dr. Kendall and that of the hon. member for Pictou is that whereas the latter proposed that the lobsters should be shipped alive and boiled in England—for it is well known that lobsters for food must be boiled while alive—Dr. Kendall proposed that the lobsters should be boiled in this country and then chilled to such a degree as to preserve them until they arrive on the English market. Notwithstanding previous experiments, there is so much that is new in this that it was considered best, and I think wisely, to send Dr. Kendall on this mission.

Mr. MOORE. The discussion is getting somewhat monotonous and perhaps uninteresting; at the same time it may be both necessary and useful. I do not rise to criticise the Minister of Marine and Fisheries for the appointment of the late member for the county of Stanstead as the overseer on Lake Memphramagog, but what I wish to call his attention to is, that in the past the appropriations have not been sufficient to enable the department to give sufficient protection to the salmon trout in that lake. The poachers on either side combine and make it impossible for the men employed there to protect the fish. As this vote has been increased, and as a further appropriation may appear in the Supplementary Estimates, I hope the hon. Minister will be able to place in the hands of the overseer a sufficient sum to enable him to employ competent men, and that the protection will be better than it has been in the past. Under Mr. Mackenzie's Government a different course was adopted from that which is now followed. The Government did not employ the men living near the lake. The men who are most useful in that business are the men who are accustomed to boating, and these are usually the poachers. And so the Government have been compelled to hire men who have been accused of poaching to guard the fish, and this has not given the moral support to the law that is necessary. Under Mr. Mackenzie's Government water policemen were sent out from Quebec. These men gave much more efficient protection than had been given previous to that time, or, as I think, than has been given since. But if the protection is to be at all efficient, a larger number of men must be engaged. Either the Government should give adequate protection to the fish and prevent poachers from taking them, or they should withdraw the form of protection, repeal the law and let the law-abiding people have their chance at the fish as well as the poachers.

Mr. CLANCY. I would like to ask the hon. Minister whether it is the inflexible rule to exclude the press and to prevent counsel from appearing in the investigations of charges against officers. I can understand that there are some cases that involve so little that one side must be prevented from hiring counsel, otherwise it would mean the hiring of counsel on both sides even where the questions involved are not worth it. But I am unable to see why the press should ever be excluded. I can understand why the hon. gentleman might well say to those who are asking questions on these matters that it is better to have the facts come down by way of return, because those whose heads have fallen into the basket have become so numerous that to spread the cases on "Hansard" would be a serious matter of printing. Though the employment of counsel is forbidden, I am satisfied that manifest injustice has been done in some cases. I wish to call attention to one case which Mr. Sheppard investigated. I am not making a charge; I only ask that a man should be heard, whether he has a good case or a bad one. Mr. Sheppard undertook an investigation. The man whose conduct was to be investigated lived two or three miles from a post office, and by some means he did not get the notice until the day after the investigation. He asked to have a re-hearing, but I believe Mr. Sheppard reported against the re-hearing.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What is the name?

Mr. CLANCY. This is the case of Mr. Pelletier, of Dover township. If there has been a miscarriage of justice, it arises through the act of the officials themselves. A report in that case was given against a re-hearing. Mr. Sheppard heard only one side of the case. I do not reflect upon the men who gave evidence, but it is only fair to say that they were men imbued with party feeling and the case came up just after a contest in which there was a good deal of party bitterness, and it was particularly unfair, under the circumstances, to hear only one side. I am not making any charge, but I think that in fairness this man should be allowed a re-hearing.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am obliged to the hon. gentleman for calling the matter to my attention. I think the case was referred to Mr. Sheppard to ask if the case demanded a re-hearing or not. I believe that he reported against it. Now that attention has been called to some facts which are worthy of consideration, I will make a note of the matter. If the man did not get his notice it appears plain that the investigation should not have been gone on with in his absence. I hope hon. gentlemen are now in a position to allow this item to pass.

Mr. FOSTER. There is another matter to which I would like to call the attention of the Minister. I asked him a question the other day with reference to a fascine fishery in Charlevoix County.

Mr. FOSTER asked:

1. Was any objection made by D. and A. Gauthier, of St. Irénée, Charlevoix County, to the reissue of a license for erecting a fascine fishery in front of D. Gauthier's property by one Paulémon Gauthier?
2. If so, what was the objection, and to what extent did it prevail?
3. To whom was the license granted, and on what grounds?
4. What is the rule of the department in regard to the licensing of fascine fisheries in front of properties owned and occupied, when applications are made by owners and non-owners?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are: as follows:—1. Yes. 2. The ownership of the property in which the fishery was set; their claim to the fishery was not admitted. 3. Mr. Paulémon Gauthier, who had been an occupant of the fishery for twenty years. 4. Other things being equal, if a license were granted the owner would get the preference; although the department does not necessarily recognize riparian ownership as carrying with it the right of such license.

I find from the correspondence that matters had progressed a little differently from what my hon. friend was probably aware when he made the answer. I have a letter of the 25th of August, 1897, from Mr. Gourdeau, the Deputy at Ottawa, to Messrs. D. and A. Gauthier, in which he says:

Referring to your letter of the 14th ultimo, stating that Paulémon Gauthier has a brush fishery in front of your property in the parish of St. Irénée, I am to inform you that on inquiry, the department finds the facts to be as stated, and as you object to the setting of the fishery in front of your land, Overseer Bhereur, to whom I am sending a copy of this letter for his information and guidance, will notify Mr. P. Gauthier that his license for that berth will not be renewed another season.

This was in 1897. The allusion was to the issue of a license for 1898. Now, on that, the deputy, after thoroughly looking into the question, had come to certain conclusions, which I suppose were the conclusions of the department, namely, that an objection by a gentleman owning a farm to another person having a license in front of his farm and erecting a brush fishery was a good objection. It was acceded to by the department, and he said :

As you object to the setting of the fishery in front of your land, Overseer Bhereur, to whom I am sending a copy of this letter, will notify Gauthier that his license for that berth will not be renewed another season.

The objection, then, seems to have held good, and that Mr. Gauthier, not being willing that another person should fish in front of his farm, should have the preference, even though Paulemon Gauthier had the license of the fishery before, and as it seems for years before. On the 10th of January, in acknowledgment of a letter from Mr. A. Gauthier, one of these two gentlemen, he is written to by Mr. Gourdeau that the application for fishery licenses has been received, and will receive due consideration. The matter was not settled, evidently, and Mr. Gourdeau was written to again on the 8th of March. He acknowledges receipt of a letter from Mr. Anicet Gourdeau, of the 25th of February, relative to the application for a fishery license, and says that the matter would receive consideration. On the 9th of April, 1898, Mr. Hardie writes to Mr. A. Gauthier :

Referring to your letter of the 3rd of January last, applying for a fascine fishery license in the St. Lawrence River, in front of Lot 100 in the parish of St. Irénée, in the county of Charlevoix, I am to inform you that your request cannot be granted.

On the 9th of April, the same date, the same answer is made by Mr. Hardie to D. Gauthier, to the same effect, that his request for a license in front of his own farm could not be granted. Since that the license has been granted to Mr. Paulemon Gauthier, the very man to whom Mr. Gourdeau said, in answer to the full exposition of the subject by D. and A. Gauthier, was notified that his license for that berth would not be renewed for another season. Now, unless there is some very good reason indeed, it would seem fair that a man owning a farm should have the preference of erecting a fishery in front of that farm for the purpose of fishing. It involves, I suppose, some use of the frontier and certainly entering upon the property to a certain extent. Any way, I do not see any reason in equity or in justice why the owner of the farm should not have the preference for fishery. The department saw that in the same way, and they notified Mr. Paulemon Gauthier that his license could not be renewed. But I believe that Mr. Paulemon Gauthier is a very good Liberal, and Messrs. D. and A. Gauthier happen to be very good Conservatives, and in the end I suppose the exigencies of the party prevailed, the alien got the fishery license, and is going on there in front of the farm of Messrs. D. and A. Gauthier with his work, whilst the owners of the property itself have to look on and see the fish being taken out without being able to participate in the profit which I think should belong to them.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Personally, I am not aware of the facts in the case. But I beg to assure the hon. gentleman that so far as I know, politics have not anything to do with it at all. The reason I know that is this : I have been subjected to more pressure to cancel licenses that have been in existence for 20, 30 or 40 years along the shores of the St. Lawrence down to Gaspé, than on any other subject whatever, and I have invariably refused. The fact of the matter is these people have had for 20, 30 or 40 years licenses there, and I have not been able to bring my mind to concede to the pressure brought that they should be cancelled and should be given to other people, even although they are opposite the farms owned by the other people. The riparian ownership, other things being equal, ought to give a man a prior right, but if a person has fished there for 20 years, good grounds must be given me to induce me to cancel it. He acquires a vested interest, very valuable, out of which perhaps he and his family have been living for a quarter of a century, and to take it suddenly at one swoop and give it to the owner of the land, would be very often doing an injustice. I fancy some difficulty may have arisen from the absence of Commander Wakeham, who is always consulted upon these matters, and generally the department acts upon his advice. In 1897 he was away on the Hudson Bay expedition, and it is possible that the department may not have had the benefit of his advice at the time, but they would have the benefit of it in April, 1898, when he was here.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like the Minister to make a note of this case, and give at a later date information as to why the department changed its mind. I can see the justice of being very conservative in taking away from a man a right which he has been exercising for three or four years, which has been his means of living, or a part of his occupation. On the other hand, my hon. friend will admit that the man who owns the property has some rights in the matter, too.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. With reference to the hon. gentleman's Estimates, I want to mention the case of the lighthouse keeper at Cape Despair. He has been dismissed without inquiry, concerning which I do not want to embarrass this proposition, for offensive partisanship. I desire to call attention to the fact that he is an old man, that he has been twenty-seven years in the service, without having been guilty of any offence, except, if it is an offence, that of being a Conservative.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What is his name?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER John Beck. He paid in regularly to the superannuation fund. He is now absolutely dependent on his friends for his support, and he applied, after the verdict had gone against him on the charge of active partisanship, for superannuation. He was told that having been dismissed for cause, his petition could not be granted. The Minister may not be willing to reconsider the case, but under the Act of last session, the Minister may be able to make full restitution of the amount paid in by him to the superannuation fund, with interest.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is no question as to that. He will receive the amount with interest. I will make inquiry into the case.

Mr. BERGERON. I observe by some papers which I have in my hands, that the Department of Public Works has transferred to the Department of Marine and Fisheries a wharf at St. Anicet on Lake St. Francis. Is it to be the policy of the Government that all wharfs built by the Department of Public Works are to be transferred to the Marine Department?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is the law.

Mr. BERGERON. How many wharfs have been transferred? I know many that have not been transferred.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the hon. gentleman will give me the names of any that have not been transferred, I shall be obliged.

Mr. BERGERON. I know a number. There is the wharf at St. Timothy, at Coteau du Lac, at the Cedars, at Isle Perreault, and the wharfs at Beauharnois. I could name a great many more for the hon. gentleman's information. The first letter on the subject, I find, according to the return, is dated 25th August, 1896, and is from Mr. Gobeil, Deputy Minister, to E. F. E. Roy, secretary, Department of Public Works, as follows:—

Please write to the Department of Marine, transferring the wharf at Ste. Anicet for their management.

The next is dated 28th August, 1896, and is addressed by E. F. E. Roy, secretary, to F. Gourdeau, Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries, as follows:—

I am directed to transfer to the Department of Marine and Fisheries, in accordance with the provisions of the Act, 40 Vic., chap. 17, the wharf at Ste. Anicet, Quebec.

Then there is the receipt by the Department of Marine and Fisheries, conveyed in a letter from F. Gourdeau, Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries, to E. F. E. Roy, secretary, Department Public Works, as follows:—

I have to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 28th inst., transferring to this department the wharf at Ste. Anicet, and in reply I am to request that you will be good enough to favour me with a sketch of the wharf referred to.

There is an acknowledgment of the Department of Public Works, signed Louis Coste, chief engineer, addressed to E. F. E. Roy, secretary, Department of Public Works:

I have noted the wharf at Ste. Anicet has been transferred to the Department of Marine, and I now return file 173409.

I see by one of the letters that the transfer was made in accordance with 40 Victoria, which is many years ago. For sixteen or seventeen years nothing has been done. The reason this transfer was not made is very simple. These wharfs were built by the Department of Public Works, and they proved most useful to the public and served a very good purpose. They are small wharfs, and allow the farmers and people along the river to use boats for the transportation of their provisions, which is a great deal cheaper carriage than by cars. In the old times the Department of Public Works built these wharfs and transferred them to the parish or municipality for public use, the parish or municipality taking care of them. The plan worked very well. They were free wharfs, no dues were paid, and the accommodation was very much appreciated by the public. In consequence of this transfer, I understand from the correspondence certain dues are to be charged farmers for the use of the wharfs. They have not been accustomed to pay dues. I am informed by outside information that the steamboats have been called upon to pay dues. At Isle Perreault wharf there was some difficulty in regard to this matter, and people almost came to blows. A row occurred with the owners of the boats, and at last they said they would pay the wharfage dues, but they would charge them against the farmers. That created another row. Do the Government intend to pursue this practice with regard to all the wharfs built by the Department of Public Works in the past, and do they intend to charge dues?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. BERGERON. How much has been collected as dues from the wharf at St. Anicet? The transfer was made on 25th August, 1896?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Only twelve months had elapsed up to 1897.

Mr. BERGERON. If it is the law and the object in view is to collect dues from the farmers, I want to know whether one cent of the dues has gone into the public treasury, or whether the money has gone into the pockets of the man who has been appointed, a partisan of the present Administration. I have already made inquiries on two occasions in regard to this matter. The Minister in the first instance stated that he could not answer the question; and on the second occasion he said he would take a note of it and give me the information. I have not heard anything since. I am still under the impression that not one cent has gone into the department, although I am told that Mr. Dupuis has collected over $200, for which he has not accounted to the Department of Marine and Fisheries. This is looked upon as a very undue charge upon the farmers using those wharfs, especially when the Government does not get a cent in return. The men in charge collect the dues and put the amounts in their pockets as their own salaries. That is why I call the hon. Minister's attention to the matter once more, and if he does not furnish me with the information, I shall be obliged to again call attention to it, because it is unjust and my impression is that the Minister does not intend, if this charge is levied on the farmers, that these officials shall simply collect the money for their benefit.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am much obliged to the hon. gentleman for bringing it up. I could not tolerate that an official should receive money and pocket it himself. It is a very serious charge against the man, and I should be very sorry to imagine it could possibly be true without making inquiries. I shall take care that an inquiry is made the first thing in the morning and I shall try and let the hon. gentleman know.

Mr. McDOUGALL. What has the Minister accomplished with reference to oyster culture in the Bras d'Or Lakes?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Mr. Kemp is down there now.

Mr. McDOUGALL. There was a boat employed there last fall which was owned I understood, by a particular friend of the Minister from Prince Edward Island.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Who was that?

Mr. McDOUGALL. I cannot remember the name now, but I know that he called Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

at my place quite frequently when he was employed there. This man frequently came into my place and talked a great deal about his relations with the Minister, and the reasons why he got employment for his boat and all of that. It was very amusing to us to hear of his relations with the Minister.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Who is he?

Mr. McDOUGALL. The Minister must know him; I cannot recall his name.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It may be Mr. Paul Paoli; he is a very decent man.

Mr. McDOUGALL. He spoke very highly about the good points in the character of the Minister of Marine and of the reasons why he got this appointment. Does the Minister intend to spend any more money on these oyster beds at Bras d'Or?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Mr. Paoli's boat is not being employed this year.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Is this work going to be continued?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It will depend on what report Mr. Kemp makes to me.

Mr. McALISTER. Before this item passes I wish to refer very briefly to the dismissal of J. Albert Verge, fishery overseer for the counties of Bonaventure and Restigouche.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It was discussed at great length last year.

Mr. McALISTER. No. I asked for the correspondence last session, but when it was brought down it was too late to refer to it. I find in the first place that the complaint was made by Mr. Fauvel, then member for Bonaventure, in the following letter, dated October 2nd, 1896:

House of Commons,

Ottawa, 2nd October, 1896.

Hon. L. H. Davies, Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Sir,—I have the honour to lay before you a request for the dismissal of four fishery officers in my electoral division, and I beg to offer my reasons to make valid a most reasonable and justifiable request.

1st. I will deal with M. J. Albert Verge, fishery officer, partly in my county and extending into the neighbouring one of Restigouche. During the recent electoral contest, Mr. Verge made himself specially obnoxious by making a personal canvass amongst the smelt fishermen and acting in his capacity of fishery officer threatened the non-renewal of their licenses, should they support the Liberal candidate, a most dangerous and effective canvass, and worse than any mandement from the hierarchy—the result was a minority instead of a majority in that locality for me, and in his place I will recommend Mr.

Charles Brown, of Escuminac, who, I am confident, will prove a most effective officer.

I have the honour to be,
(Sgd.) W. L. B. FAUVEL.

Now, any person who knows Mr. Verge would know that he would not make himself offensive to any person, for he is one of the most gentlemanly men you could meet in any community. He lives in my county, and not on the Bonaventure side. There are more smelt fishermen in the county of Restigouche than in Bonaventure, and not one complaint was made against him in the county of Restigouche that he interfered with them in any way. However, if Mr. Verge did go over to the county of Bonaventure during the campaign it was for a very short time indeed, and I believe he was not there for one day altogether. I am not prepared to say that he was not in Bonaventure, the chances are he was. Mr. Verge is a gentleman who would make no threats against any person as to refusing the renewal of his license if that person voted against the Conservative candidate. Mr. Verge did not receive any notice of a charge being brought against him, but merely a notice of his dismissal, and I state here that it was harsh and unfair to treat him in that manner. I find several letters from Mr. Verge written to the department after his dismissal denying the charge and offering to prove his innocence if an investigation were granted, but to the last of these letters no reply whatever was given. The Deputy Minister replies to one merely acknowledging the receipt of the letter without making any comments. In the face of these facts, it is only fair to Mr. Verge that an investigation be granted, and if upon investigation the charge is proved, then I for one will say nothing in his behalf. But until the investigation is granted Mr. Verge, I maintain that he has been harshly and unjustly treated. Mr. Fauvel, in making the charge did not say that he had personal knowledge of the alleged offence. In fact, I know he had not. I know that Mr. Verge did not see Mr. Fauvel during the whole campaign. Mr. Fauvel made that charge upon the strength of a complaint that was made to him, and that complaint was made by Mr. Charles Brown, the very man who was appointed in place of Mr. Verge. Mr. Charles Brown is one of the most offensive and active partisans in the county of Bonaventure. He is a delegate to every political convention held in the county, and since he was appointed fishery overseer, he has still carried on his electioneering practices. During the last local election and during the by-election in the county of Bonaventure, Mr. Brown was one of the most active canvassers in the county, and charges were made against him that he threatened to cancel licenses or to refuse renewals in the event of the fishermen not supporting his candidate.

Mr. FOSTER. Was he an officer at that time?

Mr. McALISTER. He was an officer at that time and for several months before.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No such charge was ever made to me in the department.

Mr. McALISTER. Charges were made by parties over their own signature in the press. I do not know that they came to the Minister's notice. I am sorry I have not got the papers with me, but an address was presented to the present representative of the county of Bonaventure (Mr. Guité) after his election, signed by a committee of three, of whom Mr. Brown was one, congratulating him upon his election, and speaking in complimentary terms of the Government and commending their policy. There is another complaint which came to my knowledge. The present fishery officer in the district of Bonaventure, Mr. Forest, I think, when the by-election in that county was in progress in the winter of 1897, sent a notice to two or three fishermen, one of which I have seen, informing them that their licenses would not be granted for the next year. When I saw that notice last winter, I put a question on the Order paper asking the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if any authority had been given to this man to refuse licenses to these parties, naming them. The Minister answered that no authority, so far as he knew, had been sent, and that he had inquired of the officials in his department, and not one of them knew that any such authority had been sent. A short time after that the licenses were issued, the officer ascertaining that the matter had been brought up in Parliament. I think that such partisan officers as these are dangerous in a community; they are injurious to the public interest, and I think an investigation should be held into their conduct. So far as Mr. Forest is concerned, I have no right to ask for an investigation, because he is not in my district; but the jurisdiction of Mr. Verge extended over the county I represent, and I have a right to ask for an investigation in his case, which the Minister in all fairness should grant. If it is found that he took an active part in the election of 1896, and made threats against the parties who supported the Liberal candidate in the county of Bonaventure, that their licenses would be refused, I have nothing to say.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I feel a little awkward in speaking of this matter because of the fact that I acted on the personal and written representations made to me by Mr. Fauvel.

Mr. McALISTER. He had no personal knowledge.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He not only said that he had personal knowledge—and it was a long time before I yielded—but he told me that he was prepared to stand up in the House and prove his charges if they were challenged ; but he said he did not think any man would have the hardihood to challenge them. He wrote that letter stating that this man's conduct had been outrageously offensive. I understood that he spoke in the body of the letter from personal knowledge. However, he gave me assurances that he acted from personal knowledge. One reason why I yielded was that the cost of holding of investigations in that part of the country is something dreadful. Investigations which in the maritime provinces would cost $30 would involve a cost of $300 in the hon. gentleman's district.

Mr. McALISTER. I can inform the hon. gentleman that Mr. Verge is not a partisan in any respect, and I am satisfied that if the Minister knew him as I do, he would not have dismissed him without an investigation. As I have said, if an investigation is granted, and it proved that he acted offensively, then he has nothing to complain of ; but I am satisfied he did not.

Mr. GILLIES. I want to bring a matter before the Minister of Marine and Fisheries which I shall have no opportunity to bring on any other occasion. I wish to bring to his notice two dismissals among many which took place in my county, which I think he will find it very difficult to justify. From considerations within my own knowledge and from evidence which has been communicated to me and upon which I can rely, I think the hon. Minister should not have made these dismissals without further inquiry. I refer to the dismissal of two fishery inspectors in my county—Mr. Lenoir, of Isle Madame, and Mr. Duncan Cameron, of the St. Peter's district.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman is perhaps not aware that the papers in regard to these dismissals were brought down in a return to the Senate at the instance of Senator Miller. If the hon. gentleman wishes to discuss them, I would prefer that he would read the return, because I think he will find some evidence there, particularly in regard to Cameron's case, which will make him wish not to discuss it publicly. It was not politics that Cameron was dismissed for.

Mr. GILLIES. Was it politics in the case of Lenoir ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It was not politics in his case either.

Mr. GILLIES. Then it could not be on grounds of inefficiency in the case of Cameron.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, but it was grounds of inefficiency in the case of Lenoir. It was for carrying on the sale of liquor without license under the Scott Act that Cameron was dismissed ; and if a man is breaking the law by selling liquor without license, it is perfectly absurd to keep him in a position where he is expected to maintain the law.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

Mr. GILLIES. The hon. gentleman is not speaking with a knowledge of the facts, because the Scott Act was never in force in the county of Richmond. How, then, could he be selling liquor in contravention of that Act ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Then he was selling in contravention of the license law.

Mr. GILLIES. Has the hon. gentleman made inquiry as to that ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I know that he was fined and paid the fine. I do not want any more evidence than that.

Mr. GILLIES. My hon. friend will not set that up as a justification for the dismissal of a competent fishery officer.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, I will.

Mr. GILLIES. I am going to make this statement. Mr. Cameron was, for a long time before I ever came to this House, fishery inspector for the county of Richmond ; and when the present re-arrangement was made by the hon. member for Pictou, though Mr. Cameron did not support me at my first election, so good was his record as fishery overseer that I recommended him as such for the new district. I am not going to push this matter any further. My hon. friend gives me as reason for his dismissal that he was fined for selling liquor without a license ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. GILLIES. Notwithstanding the fact that he was a good officer in every respect, and filled the position satisfactorily for a great many years, the reason for his dismissal my hon. friend cannot give.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Inefficiency.

Mr. GILLIES. Was there any inquiry in the case of Lenoir ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No ; he was reported to me by Mr. Prince, the Commissioner.

Mr. GILLIES. What knowledge had Mr. Prince ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Mr. Prince is in constant communication with these men and has better knowledge than you have. He knows who discharge their duties and who do not.

Mr. GILLIES. If there was any communication from Inspector Bertram, I could understand it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. In this case Mr. Bertram made no communication, but Mr. Prince has the reports of the department for years before him, and is in constant touch with these overseers and able to form a judgment whether a man is a competent officer or not. When I came into the department, I asked him to make out a tabulated statement of the standing of the different officers, and in that he said that Lenoir was an inefficient officer whose services ought to be dispensed with, and on that report I dispensed with them.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Do I understand from the hon. Minister that he considers it a sufficient reason for dismissal when he finds a man engaged in the sale of intoxicating liquors in a county where the Scott Act is in force?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I say that when a man is fined for breaking one law of the land, it is not my duty to pay him out of the public treasury for enforcing other laws.

Mr. McDOUGALL. If I can prove—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am not taking any theories, but dealing with a case that has transpired.

Mr. McDOUGALL. If I can prove that the hon. gentleman appointed a man to an important position, who is engaged in the sale of liquor, in open violation of the Scott Act, would he promise me to dismiss him?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. When I see the evidence the hon. gentleman produces, I will pronounce judgment.

Mr. McDOUGALL. That is a case in point, and I will give the evidence if the hon. gentleman will promise to cancel the appointment.

Mr. POWELL. The hon. Minister announced his policy to-night with respect to these traps. I have been requested to make application for a license, and I would like to know if any further licenses are going to be granted?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, I have refused to grant any more. The only two I did grant were granted after great pressure brought upon me.

Mr. GILLIES. Was there any one granted to Prince Edward Island?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, for years, but they do not catch salmon. The reason they are not granted in New Brunswick is because they are at measurable distance of the mouth of the Great Salmon River.

Mr. POWELL. Those gentlemen who asked me to press their applications for licenses, informed me that a man in Prince Edward Island, who has a license, is not even a British citizen.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He has been there for thirty years and is one of the largest fish merchants in the island.

Mr. POWELL. But is still an American citizen and cannot vote?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He may be nominally an American citizen, but his sons are all there and they vote.

Mr. POWELL. I am told that just before the election he made a sort of turn in his political creed.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The license was not granted by me.

Mr. POWELL. But just about the time of the renewal of the license, there was a very remarkable conversion of that hon. gentleman in his political creed.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am sure that the person the hon. gentleman refers to has never changed his political opinions. For 25 years I have known him to be a consistent Liberal.

Mr. POWELL. Before the last election, the reports are to the contrary, and the case of the sudden conversion of St. Paul on the road to Damascus was not a patch to this man's sudden change of his political creed. The miracle which the hon. Minister worked in him just about the time of the election was something remarkable, and the conversion from Judaism to Christianity was nothing compared to the suddenness of this translation from Toryism to Liberalism. There is another matter to which I would call the hon. gentleman's attention. Why is it that Mr. Monroe, fishery inspector, was dismissed?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I cannot recall the reason at the moment, but there was a reason. There were many of these dismissals. I remember the man and remember his dismissal.

Mr. BERGERON. So many were dismissed, you cannot keep track of them.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. A great many were dismissed but not for political causes. The hon. gentleman knows very well that if you have four hundred or five hundred officials, you will find lots of reason compelling you to dismiss them without having recourse to politics.

Mr. POWELL. Why was Robert Goodwin dismissed?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not remember him at all.

Mr. POWELL. And Mr. Deacon, of Chad-iack?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He was dismissed, after full investigation, for offensive partisanship.

Mr. POWELL. I wish simply to state the facts in Mr. Munro's case. I understand that the charges brought against him consisted of three. In the first place, he had taken his father to the poll to vote for me. The truth of this charge may be judged when I inform the House that his father was dead six years before that. The second was that he ceased to take the "Telegraph," and would not allow the old gentleman to feast upon the political literature dished up in that paper, but if he had an opportunity of reading the "Telegram" at all, he must have looked at it from the vast empyrean above this earthly sphere and read it at considerably long range. The third charge was akin to that. Whether they trumped up further charges, I do not know, but I will say that while without doubt Munro is a Conservative, he was not an offensive partisan. He is one of the most respectable men in the whole county of Westmoreland, and he would come up to the full measure standard of any man in total abstinence even of the hon. Minister of Marine, for I do not think he ever tasted liquor in his life.

Mr. GANONG. Perhaps I can aid the hon. member for Westmoreland in determining the reason for some of these dismissals. Although I have been an employer of labour a great many years, I have never been forced to give as mean a reason for the dismissal of an employee as has been given by the department. I have been very hard-up many times, but never did I discharge an employee for the reason that I was too poor to pay him. But we had some dismissals in Carlisle County, and the only reason given was that sufficient appropriation had not been made to pay the salary. The hon. Minister will find that that was the reason given for the discharge of Mr. Martin on the island of Grand Manan. Also I believe another gentleman at Deer Island was dismissed. But the ink had scarcely dried on the dismissal before his successor was appointed. I supposed he has been living on faith and will continue to do so until this vote goes through. I would like to ask the Minister for a little information with regard to the Bay View fish hatchery. Does the hon. Minister consider that that lobster hatchery has been a success?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I can hardly tell the hon.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

gentleman. I have talked the matter over with Mr. Prince time and again. I do not think he has reached any more definite conclusion than I have. I have reached no conclusion in its favour.

Mr. GANONG. Can the hon. gentleman tell me how the distribution is made from that hatchery?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the hon. gentleman had brought it up when a previous item was under discussion the other day, I could have given the information, having the papers with me. I can only tell him that ninety million lobster fry were distributed from that hatchery last year, that the hatchery cost $1,697, and that the salary of the keeper is $450. The method of distribution is stated in the fishery report.

Mr. GANONG. I failed to find it. Was the distribution made on requisition?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I believe so.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The lobster fry are not distributed on requisition, I believe. They can only be handled by tugs and they are taken out by tugs around Northumberland Strait.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the hon. gentleman wants the information, I can get it for him.

Mr. GANONG. That is all I desire, and I shall be glad if the hon. gentleman will get me the information. I would like to ask the hon. Minister also on what principle licenses are issued for building fish weirs. I find from the report of Capt. Pratt that 309 licenses were issued in the district, but only two-thirds of these were built. I would like to know if it is possible for men, year after year, to tie up these locations for fish weirs without building them. There must be some principle which governs these matters. It does not seem fair to the people who are living by this industry that a man should be able, by paying $5, to continue to hold a fish weir idle that would give a living to from fifteen to twenty-five people. It takes eight grown men to work these weirs and take the fish out of them.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I suppose the hon. gentleman does not insist that if a man takes out a license for a fish weir he must perforce build it and keep it in operation. He may take out a license for five fish weirs and find that he will get more fish by building and working only one.

Mr. GANONG. But that gives the worst kind of monopoly against the interest of the fishermen at large. Merely because a man has money enough he can take out these licenses and build very few weirs.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not say that a man can do this because he has money enough. I say that if he takes out licenses from Capt. Pratt he has a right to them, and ought to be free to build and operate the weirs as he pleases. There has been no change in the system since I took office.

Mr. GANONG. That may be. But I bring this forward in the interest of the fishermen. I do not believe that it is just to allow a man on paying $5 a year to keep fifteen to twenty-five people out of the opportunity of making a living.

Mr. POWELL. Will the hon. Minister tell us at the same time what policy has been decided upon with regard to the oyster beds?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Mr. Kemp visits these different localities every summer and makes a report, and where he finds an opportunity to plant a bed he plants it.

Mr. POWELL. But some of these beds are now in a condition to be worked. How is that done? Are licenses issued?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Take the two beds that were planted in Prince Edward Island. They were doing remarkably well and we had them watched and kept them as preserves. Last year we gave notice to the licensed oyster men that the oyster beds would be open at six o'clock in the morning on such a day. The men went there and took out seven or eight hundred barrels of oysters in two or three days. After the beds had been fished sufficiently they were at once closed. The same principle will be applied this year to the Shediac beds.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am informed that the Shediac beds have been largely spoiled by the poaching; that, in fact, they have been so seriously injured that they are not in a condition to be fished.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The same information came to me, furnished by an apparently reliable person, and in almost the same language as the hon. gentleman has used. I communicated with the officer in charge and informed him that if I found that this allegation was true, I would not hesitate a moment to dismiss him. It would be criminal to allow such poaching. The officer wrote back that there was not a shadow of foundation for the charge and inviting investigation.

Mr. POWELL. Who is the officer?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not remember his name. It is a French name.

Mr. McINERNEY. Narcisse Leblanc.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has not answered the question as to weirs. Is the number of weir licenses that can be issued in a year limited?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not that I know of. The matter has been left largely to the discretion of Capt. Pratt. I have never interfered and have not until to-night heard any complaints of the exercise of Capt. Pratt's discretion. I must admit that I am not sufficiently informed to give the hon. gentleman the answer. I have not looked into the matter, because I have never heard of even the slightest complaint.

Mr. FOSTER. To limit the number of weir licenses and allow a man to buy more than he could use would be to establish a monopoly.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think so.

Mr. GANONG. It is quite evident that there was some object for some one to take up 309 licenses in the county of Charlotte.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. You do not mean to say that one man or ten men took them all up?

Mr. GANONG. No, there was a total of 309 licenses all taken out to build fish weirs, as only two-thirds of these were built evidently the other one-third was tied up for some purpose. Charlotte County is essentially a herring and sardine county. Nearly all the fresh herrings sold in Canada are exported from the county of Charlotte, and all the sardines, in fact, that are packed in America are virtually packed from fish caught in the county of Charlotte. One million cases were packed in Eastern Maine last year, according to the reports, and every one of these fishes went from our waters.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What advice does the hon. gentleman wish to give the House?

Mr. GANONG. I have had a good many inquiries, with which, however, I have not troubled the department, of people who have wished to build fish weirs, but when they made application to the overseers, they were told it was under license to Tom Jones, or somebody else, but so far, and for several years, no fish weirs have been built at these particular locations. It seems an outrage that people who have a disposition to take advantage of the possible output, should not be able to do so. Some of the best privileges along the coast are tied up by people who themselves have built fish weirs, and have an object in preventing other people from increasing the output. I only wish to draw out the general principles upon which these fish weirs are licensed. I think the department are not doing justice to the people at large in allowing a man to hold a license year after year without building a fish weir on it, and without allowing anybody else to do so.

Mr. BERGERON. Does the Minister know whether the lobsters which are cured at the Magdalen Islands are labelled American lobsters or American-Canadian lobsters?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not know.

Mr. BERGERON. They are Canadian lobsters, of course, but they are put in boxes and labelled American lobsters, and sent over to the Boston market.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What would be their motive?

Mr. BERGERON. Because Canadian lobsters sell better in the American market than American lobsters. I called attention to that some years ago, because I think it is anti-Canadian.

Mr. HUGHES. I would like to know the names of the officers whom the hon. gentleman has appointed as guardians in Victoria County?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman knows that guardians are different from overseers and inspectors. The names of the guardians are not placed in our book, they are temporary employees.

Mr. HUGHES. I think they should be there.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will get the names for the hon. gentleman

Resolutions to be reported.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 11th May, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 139) to incorporate the Anglo-French Telegraph Company (Limited).—(Mr. Morrison.)

GANANOQUE DRILL HALL SITE.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). Mr. Speaker, I beg to move for leave to lay on the Table of the House a letter written to me by Lieutenant-Governor Patterson, formerly Minister of Militia, which was referred to on a recent occasion in this House, and which relates to the purchase of a drill hall site in Gananoque. On the last day that the matter was brought up, I sent a telegram to the Governor and received the following answer:—

Mr. GANONG.

Winnipeg, Man., 10th May, 1898.

Hon. F. W. Borden, Minister of Militia and Defence, Ottawa.

I have no objection to my letter re Gananoque drill shed site being brought down, and thank you for your courtesy in having withheld it pending my consent.

(Sgd.) J. C. PATTERSON.

The letter is as follows:—

(Private.) Government House,
Winnipeg, 19th December, 1896.

My dear Minister,—I have to thank you for your very courteous letter requesting to know what my intentions were with regard to the site of the proposed drill hall at Gananoque.

I visited Gananoque at the express wish of the late Sir John Thompson, when he was Premier, with a view to the selection of a new site, and after examination came to the conclusion to recommend to my colleagues the lot known as Turner's lot. I told Sir John about it on my return, and also my Ontario colleagues—certainly Mr. Haggart. As you are aware, the death of Sir John upset all our arrangements, and when Sir Mackenzie Bowell formed his Cabinet I declined to become a member of it. I only temporarily retained my portfolio at his earnest request. I did not feel at liberty then to take up any new work in my department. I formally retired a couple of months after, and during the greater part of the session of 1895 I was absent from Canada. Had I retained my portfolio I should certainly have submitted an amount for the purchase of the lot in question to my colleagues in my departmental estimates.

I consider that the late Government were to a certain extent bound by my action, but I am not prepared to say that this extends to you.

I trust that you are well, &c.

Believe me,

Yours very sincerely,

(Sgd.) J. C. PATTERSON.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. Minister might treat this as a supplementary return, in which case it will not require a motion.

Mr. FOSTER. Is there anything that it fits into, so as to make it a public paper?

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes, an incomplete return, which was complained of by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor).

Mr. TAYLOR. It is incomplete yet.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is more complete, I suppose. At any rate, it does not require a motion.

THE EDMONTON BRIDGE.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

What penalties, if any, have been imposed on the contractors for building piers and abutments of the Edmonton bridge?

If any penalties have been imposed, have they been paid?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). There were no penalties imposed on the contractors.

DREDGING AT GRAND ETANG.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness) asked,

1. Whether it is the intention of the Government to dredge between the new piers at Grand Etang, Inverness County, this season? If so, how soon?

2. Whether the appropriation by Parliament in 1897 for the providing of a wharf at Whycocmah, Inverness County, is to be applied to that purpose during the present financial year?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. It is doubtful if it will be possible to send a dredge to Grand Etang this season. 2. Steps are being taken by the department in that direction.

GOVERNMENT TELEGRAPH LINES— DISMISSAL OF INSPECTOR GISBORNE.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

1. Why was Mr. Gisborne dismissed from the position of inspector of Government telegraph lines in the North-west?

2. Who has succeeded him?

3. On whose recommendation was this done?

4. Was Mr. Gisborne not efficient?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. Mr. Gisborne's services were dispensed with. 2. John S. Macdonald. 3. Mr. Macdonald was recommended by persons in whom the Minister has entire confidence. 4. The Minister did not consider Mr. Gisborne efficient enough, and made the change in the public interest.

ALIEN LABOUR LAW—ENFORCEMENT.

Mr. CLARKE asked,

1. What officers have been appointed in the province of Ontario to enforce the Alien Labour Law?

2. What is the date of the appointment of such officers, and where are they located?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The following are the agents who have been appointed by the Government under the Alien Labour Act:—A. C. Paterson, acting sub-collector customs, North Portal, N.W.T.; H. Tennant, acting sub-collector customs, Coutts, N.W.T.; J. A. McMartin, acting sub-collector customs, Huntingdon, B.C.; A. Lawrence, acting sub-collector customs, Gretna, Man.; T. J. Mather, acting officer, Gretna, Man.; G. G. Allen, preventive officer, Emerson, Man.; W. Mills, acting officer, Emerson, Man.; W. F. McCreary, immigration commissioner, Winnipeg, Man.; James Lawson, collector of customs, Fort Erie; Robert Rush, provincial constable, Sault Ste. Marie, Ont.; Arthur Boyle, collector of customs, Niagara Falls, Ont.; Jas. H. Kenning, collector inland revenue, Windsor, Ont.; F. Spain, Bridgeburg, Ont.; W. B. McMurrich, Toronto.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

What effect has the announcement made by the Finance Minister as to the rate of interest in the post office savings banks had on deposits? Have deposits decreased? Have withdrawals increased in numbers and aggregate amounts?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). In answer to the hon. member (Mr. Davin), I have to say that full returns have not been compiled for publication in the "Gazette" for the month of April, the only complete month since the Estimates were laid on the Table. So far it does not appear that the announcement made has had any appreciable effect on the deposits. By the returns already in, the withdrawals during the month exceeded the deposits during the month; but this is usually the case during the month of April, money being withdrawn for use in business. By the returns of the chartered banks last published in the "Gazette," it is shown that the decrease of deposits in those institutions during the month of March last amounted to nearly $3,000,000.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—PORTER AT STELLARTON.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked,

Is J. H. Murray, formerly freight porter at Stellarton, in the service of the Intercolonial Railway?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). J. H. Murray is still in the service of the Intercolonial Railway, as porter at Stellarton.

S.S. "LA CANADIENNE."

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Bergeron) asked,

1. Was the SS. "La Canadienne" chartered last season of navigation by the Government?

2. If so, to whom?

3. For what trade?

4. What was the rate the ship was chartered for?

5. Was the charter money paid regularly?

6. If not, how much was paid, and how much is due?

7. What was the marine insurance placed on the ship, and how does the sum so placed compare with the valuation of the steamer in the Government accounts?

8. When was the charter party signed?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. Yes. 2. Robert Gillespie. 3. For carrying passengers and freight between Montreal, Quebec and Gaspé and intermediate ports in Gaspé county. 4. $750 a month. 5. No. The "Canadienne" collided with the "Yantic" on 6th October. 6. None has yet been paid, but the Department of Marine and Fisheries secured itself by claiming a sufficient sum for payment of rental due from the subsidy earned by the steamer. 7. The sum of $11,500 payable to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. In the Government accounts the steamer is valued at from $20,000 to $25,000. 8. The charter party is dated 2nd August, and signed by Robert Lindsay.

THE QUEEN VS. SKELTON ET AL.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

Has an application been made to the Minister of Justice for a new trial in the case of the Queen vs. Skelton et al? If so, has the application been accompanied by affidavits? If so, will copy of the affidavits be laid on the Table?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Yes, the application has been made, but it was returned by affidavits, but the affidavits cannot be brought down until the matter has been disposed of.

REGISTRY OFFICE, REGINA DISTRICT.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

Will there be an item in the Supplementary Estimates for building a Registry Office and a Land Office for the Regina district?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). This matter is now under consideration.

EDWARD LINLOFF.

Mr. GILLIES asked,

1. When was Edward Linloff appointed a lockman upon the St. Peter's Canal?

2. How long was he employed in the position of lockman?

3. When were his services terminated?

4. Was he efficient and did he give satisfaction while in the employ of the Government?

5. Was Mr. Linloff dismissed? If so, at whose request?

6. Were complaints lodged against him? If so, what were they, by whom laid, and were they investigated?

7. Who was appointed to Mr. Linloff's position, and by whom recommended?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. Edward Linloff was appointed lockman on the St. Peter's Canal in October, 1880. 2. From October, 1880, to the 7th March, 1898. 3. On the 7th March, 1898. 4. No complaint was made as to the manner in which he performed his duties. 5. Mr. Linloff was laid off as usual at the close of navigation and was not re-employed at the opening of navigation. 6. No complaints as to the manner in which he performed his duties were lodged against him. 7. William Murray, junior, of Point Michéau, was appointed in place of Linloff.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

BUOYS AT ARICHAT HARBOUR.

Mr. GILLIES asked,

Is it the intention of the Government or of the department during the present session to provide buoys for the western entrance of Arichat harbour, as pointed out by a letter of date 16th September, 1897, from Mr. Gillies, M.P., to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, to which the following letter was a reply:—

Ottawa, 25th September, 1897.

Sir,—In reply to your letter of the 16th instant to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, inclosing a letter from Captain Kelly relating to buoys for the western entrance of Arichat, I have by direction to inform you that the matter is receiving consideration.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

(Sgd.) F. GOURDEAU,

Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Joseph Gillies, Esq., M.P.,

Sydney, Cape Breton, Nova Scotia.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The department received an application for a bell buoy, but it has been ascertained that such a buoy is not necessary. The department is now awaiting a report respecting suitable buoys for the western entrance of Arichat harbour.

POSTMASTER, GRAVENHURST, ONT.

Mr. BENNETT asked,

1. Is J. P. Cockburn postmaster of Gravenhurst, Ontario?

2. If not, was said J. P. Cockburn dismissed? What was the age of the said J. P. Cockburn? Was there any investigation or complaint?

3. Who is now postmaster at Gravenhurst? What is the age of the present postmaster?

4. Upon whose recommendation was the present postmaster appointed?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). In the absence of the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), I beg to say in reply to the hon. gentleman:—1. J. P. Cockburn is no longer postmaster of Gravenhurst, Ontario. 2. He was not dismissed; he resigned the office. His age is not known to the department. There was no complaint or investigation. 3. Mr. John A. Cockburn is now postmaster at Gravenhurst. His age is not known. 4. He was appointed on the recommendation of Mr. H. H. Cook, of Toronto.

LIGHT KEEPER, POINT JEROME.

Mr. GILLIES asked,

1. When was Joseph E. McNeil appointed light keeper at Point Jerome, St. Peter's, Richmond county?

2. What was his age at the time of his appointment?

3. Was he efficient and satisfactory in every respect as keeper of this light?

4. Was McNeil dismissed? If so, when and why?

5. Were complaints lodged against him? If so, of what character, and by whom were they laid?

6. Who has been appointed as keeper to fill McNeil's place, by whom was he recommended, and what is his age?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. On the 1st November, 1892. 2. His age was 49. 3. No. 4. Yes. By Order in Council of the 1st November, 1897, as charges of political partisanship on the occasion of the last Dominion election, on being investigated, were fully proved. 5. Charges were made by E. P. Flynn. 6. Mr. James McAskill was appointed as temporary keeper on recommendation of Mr. Joseph Matheson. Mr. McAskill's age is 53.

REBELLION CLAIMS COMMISSIONER.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan) (by Mr. Hurley) asked,

1. Was Thomas McKay, of Prince Albert, N.W.T., employed by the Dominion Government as a rebellion claims commissioner?

2. If so, how long was he employed?

3. What salary did he receive?

4. Was he paid any money for expenses?

5. Was he paid for Sundays?

6. How much did he receive in all from the Government for salary and expenses during the time he was employed as rebellion claims commissioner?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. Yes. 2. 645 days. 3. $15 per day. 4. Yes. 5. Yes. 6. $14,898.96.

QUESTION—CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. CRAIG. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to make a request of the leader of the Government. A letter has been published in some of the newspapers dated April 7th from the Minister of Justice in answer to a letter, I suppose, to the Premier of Prince Edward Island, as to the powers of the provinces to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors. The request I have to make is that all this correspondence be laid on the Table of the House before the third reading of the Plebiscite Bill is moved.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). This is a matter as to which I cannot give the hon. gentleman an answer at this moment. I shall have to consult the Minister of Justice.

Mr. FOSTER. There should be no objection to bringing down this correspondence.

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not know the nature of the correspondence at all.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. MILLS. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works when the return ordered by the House on the 30th March last and to which I have called attention several times, will be laid on the Table. I understood from the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries that it was already before the Department of Public Works and would be down in a short time, but I have not yet seen it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). I will ascertain the facts for the hon. gentleman and let him know.

MINING AND DREDGING LEASES.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) if progress is being made with the returns ordered some two months ago as to the mining leases. I have before stated several times that it is a very important matter, and it is quite impossible, in my opinion, that the House can get through its business without having that subject thoroughly ventilated. I would ask my hon. friend to facilitate the bringing down of this return.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I was under the impression, after the instructions I gave to the chief clerk, that all the available force of his office was at work on this return. But the chief clerk had misunderstood my instructions and his staff was engaged in preparing a return as to the timber licenses in the Yukon district. The return that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) has asked for will comprise about 8,000 to 10,000 pages; and, in despair of getting it ready in time for the use of members of the House, I have had prepared, and now lay on the Table, a statement giving a schedule of all information that I think the House will require. Then, if any hon. gentleman will specify any particular application in respect of which he wishes the correspondence brought down, I will have the correspondence laid on the Table. This schedule gives the names of persons who have applied for leases to dredge for minerals in the submerged beds of rivers in the North-west Territories, including the Yukon district, also for leases for hydraulic mining in the said territory. Leases for dredging portions of rivers in the Yukon district were issued under authority of an Order in Council dated 18th January, 1898, and the leases for portions of rivers in the North-west Territories under the authority of an Order in Council dated 29th July, 1897, and under this order, as amended. Copies of the said orders are annexed hereto, also forms of leases. No regulations have been framed for the issue of leases for hydraulic mining. One lease has been issued for hydraulic mining, in favour of Robert Anderson, under the authority of an Order in Council dated 12th January, 1898, annexed hereto. I think this will contain all the information that my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) or any member of the House will require, unless the correspondence with regard to any particular application is desired. If any hon. member will be good enough to let me know, the application the correspondence with regard to which he desires, I will at once bring down the correspondence desired. I am not responsible for the fact that the correspondence has been so voluminous that it is next to impossible to bring it down.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask whether the statement referred to takes in all the applications?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Yes, all the applications, whether granted or not.

Mr. FOSTER. With the post office address of the applicants?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. I beg leave to move, with the consent of the House, that the rule be suspended, and this be sent to the printer to be printed at once.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I have no objection.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I think I will object to that.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, your objection does not count.

Motion agreed to.

BRITISH COLUMBIA COAST—MR. COSTE'S REPORT.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask my right hon. friend if he could furnish the House with the report of Mr. Coste, who was charged with the important duty of collecting such information as he could in relation to the best points of communication on the coasts of British Columbia.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I shall have much pleasure in bringing down that report to-morrow.

NATIONAL MUSEUM.

Mr. BELCOURT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to lay before the House a matter which I consider of great importance, not so much to the constituency I represent, as to the country at large; and in order to conform to the rules of the House, I shall conclude by moving the adjournment. During the course of last session, it was my privilege to direct the attention of the House, and particularly of the Government, to a matter of very great importance, as I have said, not only to the city of Ottawa, but to the country at large—a matter of great necessity and of immediate urgency. I refer to the erection at Ottawa of a national museum. I had intended to ask the House to adopt the resolution which I have on the Order paper, calling for the establishment of such a museum.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot take advantage of a motion to adjourn to discuss a motion he has on the paper.

Mr. BELCOURT. I do not intend to discuss that motion, but I wish to explain that I had intended at one time to move the resolution standing in my name; but in view of the approaching end of the session, I propose to make now the remarks I intended to make on that motion.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot at this stage drop or withdraw a motion which is on the paper. That cannot be done until it is reached.

Mr. BELCOURT. Then, I shall not withdraw the motion, but simply make the remarks I have to make on the subject.

Mr. SPEAKER. On a motion to adjourn it is impossible to anticipate a discussion upon an order which is already on the paper.

Mr. BELCOURT. I do not intend to refer to that resolution at all.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman is not going to speak on the subject of the national museum, concerning which he has put a motion on the paper, he is at perfect liberty to go on, but otherwise he cannot.

MILITIA—ANNUAL CAMP DRILL.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask a question on behalf of our militia officers, who requested me to do so, as to what portion of the militia will be called into camp this year?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA (Mr. Borden). It is my intention, if the necessary funds are voted, to drill the balance of the militia who were not drilled during the autumn of last year.

Mr. HUGHES. I would like to ask the hon. Minister if those who were drilled during the autumn of last year will be debarred from drilling during the autumn of this year?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA. Within the financial year, from the 1st of July last to the 1st of July next, we propose to drill all the militia. Those who were not drilled since the 1st of July last will be drilled before the 1st of July of the present year.

OAK BAY MILLS POST OFFICE.

Mr. McALISTER. I would like to draw the attention of the Postmaster General to the fact that the correspondence that was brought down in the matter of the Oak Bay Mills post office does not include a telegram from Mr. Guité to J. I. Tarte. That telegram is referred to in the letter to the Postmaster General and I would ask the hon. gentleman to bring it down.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). I am not aware of anything having been omitted from the papers produced, but will have a search made for the telegram referred to, and if it is omitted, have it brought down.

GOVERNMENT HARBOURS, PIERS AND BREAKWATERS.

Bill (No. 135) further to amend the Act respecting Government harbours, piers and breakwaters, was read the second time, and the House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I explained this Bill on its first reading, and it seemed to meet very general approval. It is to enable the department to lease the wharfs, from which very small revenue is derived, to the municipalities in which they are situated for a rental equal to annual average of three years' receipts.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Has the hon. gentleman any information on the point raised some time ago in regard to the Department of Public Works obtaining control of wharfs already built?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have asked my department, and so far as they are aware, there are none. The department are under the impression that these wharfs had all been transferred, but in view of the statement made last night, the necessary official letters are passing in order to ascertain if any have not been.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

PROTECTION OF NAVIGABLE WATERS.

Bill (No. 136) further to amend the Act respecting the protection of navigable waters, was read the second time, and the House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. COSTIGAN. The consideration of this Bill affords me an opportunity of referring to another Act regulating the protection of navigable waters. The law as it now stands prohibits, from the 1st of May, the throwing of saw-dust into any of the rivers of Canada. We all remember that the saw-dust question occupied the attention of this Parliament for a good many years, and I am afraid we are not done with it yet. I do not wish to prejudice the claims of any mill-owner in Canada who object to the law because it is too stringent, from their point of view, but I wish to point out to the House that there is a class of mill-owners in Canada who have an exceptional ground of complaint. The object of the law as it stands to-day is to prevent the pollution and obstruction of navigable waters, and with that view, of course a very desirable object to attain. A Bill was passed prohibiting the putting of saw-dust in any of our rivers, and for the protection of the fisheries as well. The class of mill-owners I refer to who are prejudicially affected beyond others by the operation of that Act, are those who have their mills upon international waters; and they complain that it is very hard on them to oblige them, unnecessarily and in some cases at great expense, to comply with a law that really accomplishes nothing. They say, with great force, and it cannot be contradicted, that it is not sound policy to undertake to keep a river clear of saw-dust and of refuse when you only control one side of that river, and that it is unfair to the Canadian mill-owners on the Canadian side of the river to restrict them, while you cannot exercise control, and while, in point of fact, no control is exercised, on the American side of the river. Our mill-owners feel to-day that they have a sufficiently hard struggle in competing with the mill-owners on the southern side of the boundary. The effect of the law to-day is that on international rivers, the mill-owners on the other side continue to pour their saw-dust into the rivers, while, if this restriction were carried out and enforced against the Canadian mill-owner, he would have to go to great expense in order to prevent his saw-dust from falling into the river, while such restriction will accomplish nothing at all in the way of keeping the river clear from refuse. Therefore, I say their case ought to be considered; and while, as I said in the beginning of my remarks, I did not wish to prejudice the claims of other mill-owners in other parts of Canada, I do say that those holding properties on international waters have a fair claim to ask the consideration of this Government and Parliament to relieve them until such time as the authorities controlling the other side of the river will agree with the Canadian authorities to enact similar restrictions or regulations for the protection of the rivers. Then it will be quite proper for the citizens on both sides of the river to join in a united policy. But under the present condition of things, you attempt to enforce a law to keep refuse out of a river the practical result of which is that you will only impose additional burdens upon our citizens, and you will accomplish nothing by it; because as long as the refuse goes in from the American side, you get no benefit at all from the restrictions you impose upon Canadians on the Canadian side. Now, speaking for the eastern section of Canada, this argument applies to the River St. John, following it down as far, I will say, as 15 or 16 miles below Woodstock, because above that point, the international boundary line which leaves the River St. John some four miles above Grand Falls, runs almost parallel with the river to Woodstock, and all the tributaries flowing into the St. John from the western side, come from the State of Maine, on all of which that are of any size, there are mills. Therefore, that part of the River St. John and the St. Croix River should be exempted until at least the American authorities join the Canadian authorities in making regulations for the preservation of the rivers. Until that time I think these restrictions should not be made operative against men doing business under the conditions I have just stated. I simply take advantage of the discussion of this Bill to bring this matter under the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and of the House, because I do think that to enforce that law against mill-owners situated as I have described, would be a hardship. I know from past experience that the department might not take a very active part in enforcing that law against these men, realizing that they are occupying such a position. But the Minister will remember that these men, since the 1st of May, are exposed, not to the officers of his department, but to any man who has any spite or ill-will against any mill-owner on these international rivers, and he can simply set the law in motion and fine them, and even close up their business.

Mr. ELLIS. While there is something in the contention which the hon. gentleman makes, there is no doubt whatever that in the case of every law it rarely happens that it operates equally or equitably upon every person. There is no doubt that the general object of this law is for the benefit of the country, and it is quite time that steps were taken, and that is not only the policy of this Government but it was the policy of their predecessors, to stop the pollution of the rivers and streams of the country by throwing saw-dust into them. And every one who has paid any attention to the subject knows that the fisheries in the rivers are very much impaired by the saw-dust and waste which goes into the river from the mills. If the Minister relaxes the law in one case—while there is something I admit in the contention put forward as regards the tributaries of the St. John River—the moment the Minister allows an exception in the case of one mill or a set of mills, he will be given reasons why he should make similar exceptions in all parts of the country. It seems to me, looking at the general advantage and taking into account the general benefit to the country, the hon. gentleman cannot very well make the exception referred to. I do not want to prejudice the mind of the Minister against making this concession, if he sees his way clearly to do so; but I can point out reasons why he should not enforce the law at the mouth of the St. John River, but I will not do so, because my mind is influenced entirely by the idea that the policy of the Government, enunciated long ago, should be carried into effect now.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I agree with the ex-Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Costigan) that a strong case should be made out for exempting these rivers over which this Parliament has not complete control. I have always been a strong advocate of the most thorough enforcement of the prohibition of the deposits of saw-dust in rivers frequented by fish, but I think that reason points out that the efforts of the Government should be confined to waters over which this Parliament has complete control. The hon. gentleman knows it is a matter of grave doubt as to whether in the case put forward and under the circumstances stated we can enforce the Act, when our people see foreigners committing these irregularities, they being people against whom the Government cannot proceed, and when, according to the laws of their own country, they are so allowed to conduct their business. In that event it would be much better that there should be no efforts put forward, and I do not think it reasonable that persons in Canada in a similar position should be proceeded against. I think every fair-minded mill-owner, however much he might dislike legislation of this kind, would not complain of proceedings not being taken in the case of these two international rivers, all these rivers that are not within the absolute control of the Government. I should like to see the Government adopt or carry out practically the course already followed. There have been no complaints made in that section of the country. Those waters were exempted under the old powers, but the complaint was made in regard to waters wholly in Canada which were exempted, and which indicated either special circumstances or an intention to give preference to a certain district. That was the cause of heartburnings, that it was which made the administration of the law more difficult in the old days. I do not recollect, however, that special exemption applied to the rivers mentioned, certainly not to the St. John and its tributaries.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The present Bill does not touch the question under discussion, but so far from deprecating discussion, I invite it, and I am much obliged to hon. gentlemen who have introduced the matter. The importance of the question cannot be denied. It may be a very grave legal question whether the Act as it now stands does really apply to rivers over which this Parliament has not absolute control. That is a matter which will have to be considered, if a case should arise; but so far as I am concerned, I am strongly inclined to the opinion that there are overwhelming arguments in favour of the position which the hon. gentleman has taken. In the case of these international rivers, where our neighbours deposit saw-dust, it would be simply folly and useless to prevent our owners of saw-mills depositing it likewise. So far as this department is concerned, I have instructed the officers along these rivers not to take any action in regard to the mill-owners, but to report all the facts to the department; and before sanctioning the instituting of actions, I should have to be convinced, first, that it is clear the law covers cases of international rivers, about which I am not at present satisfied; and second, that it would be good policy to interfere to execute the law. I have no power to exempt the St. John River or any other river, the discretion which remains in the hands of the Minister has been withdrawn. But I must state that there are two conflicting interests on the St. John River, as the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis) has stated, which are warring against each other. The people interested in the fisheries contend, and they are backed up by the officers, that this river, which was one of the finest fishing rivers in Canada, has to a large extent been depleted and destroyed by reason of the saw-dust and slabs deposited in the river, and that this river or the higher reaches of it would become, if this practice were prohibited, as valuable a fishing river as it once was. In that river saw-dust comes down a certain distance, and at each spring freshet it is carried still further down. I am entirely in sympathy with the expression of opinion given by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). I do not intend to enforce the law in respect to these rivers, where I think our right is disputable at least. There is a grave question of law which should be submitted to the Department of Justice as to whether any one could prosecute for infractions of law on international rivers over which the Parliament of Canada has not sole control; and even if we had sole control, I should consider it to be very poor policy to endeavour, as regards the owners of mills on the Canadian side, to enforce as drastic a measure as that on our Statute-book. The hon. gentleman is not absolutely correct as regards all the tributaries of the St. John in the state of Maine, because most rigorous measures are taken on some of the tributaries to protect the fisheries from saw-dust deposits.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The law in the state of Maine permits the depositing of saw-dust.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Either that, or certain parties have obtained the legal right to the rivers. In that way they may be able to prevent the deposit of saw-dust in the streams. I can give the hon. gentleman the assurance that so far as the department is concerned it will proceed with the greatest care and caution, recognizing that the mill-owners have very large interests, and that they should not be jeopardized by hasty action on the part of any fishery overseer.

Mr. GANONG. In regard to the rivers in the state of Maine, within the last six months I have had a conversation with the engineer of the Department, Mr. Robinson, who was examining the waters of the St. Croix River, in respect to dredging it, and removing slabs and saw-dust deposits. He informed me that while the mills in Maine could not dump saw-dust in the navigable portion of a river, yet if a mill-owner built a mill one hundred yards above the navigable portion of the stream, or on a small tributary, he could deposit all his slabs and saw-dust in the waters of that stream.

Mr. McINERNEY. Why is the operation of this Bill limited to tidal waters?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This is a Bill to prohibit steamers and other vessels from throwing ashes and refuse into waters of less depth than twelve fathoms. Harbour masters and others have brought it to the attention of the department that this practice has resulted in filling up the rivers. The Bill is to prevent that. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Ganong) brought up a question which is dealt with under another statute, because no doubt he thought he might take advantage of this opportunity to bring the matter before the House.

Mr. McINERNEY. This Bill does not say that the refuse shall not be thrown from vessels.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Certainly; I want to make it general.

Mr. McINERNEY. Then why limit it to navigable waters?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Because the existing statute covers the other case.

Mr. McINERNEY. I do not think chapter 91 does cover it.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

THE COMPANIES ACT.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 108) to further amend the Companies Act. He said: This Bill passed by the Senate amends the Companies Act under which persons obtain letters patent for incorporation. Under section 5 of the existing Act provision is made that a certain portion of the capital of the proposed company shall be paid up and deposited in a chartered bank to the credit of the company or of trustees for the purposes of the company. It has been pointed out that this provision may be evaded, and perhaps has been evaded, by paying the amount into the bank and afterwards drawing it out. The amendment proposes that the amount shall be paid into a chartered bank to the credit of the Receiver General who will see that it is afterwards applied to the purposes of the company, after the signing of the letters patent.

Motion agreed to. Bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, and read the third time and passed.

THE OFFICER COMMANDING THE MILITIA—INCREASE OF SALARY.

The resolution adopted in Committee of the Whole on the 5th May, instant, respecting the salary of the officer commanding the militia, was reported and read the second time.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA (Mr. Borden) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 140) to amend the Militia Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPPLY—MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION—ADDRESS TO THE HOLY FATHER.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call your attention to a matter which is not strange to the House. It will be in the recollection of hon. gentlemen that in the Speech with which His Excellency was pleased to open the second session of this Parliament, the following paragraph appeared:

Immediately after the last session, the Government of Manitoba was invited to hold a conference with my Ministers on the subject of the grievances arising out of the Act of that province relating to education passed in the year 1890. In response to that invitation, three members of the Manitoba Government came to Ottawa, and after many and protracted discussions, a settlement was reached between the two Governments, which was the best arrangement obtainable under the existing conditions of this disturbing question. I confidently hope that this settlement will put an end to the agitation which has marred the harmony and impeded the development of our country, and will prove the beginning of a new era to be characterized by generous treatment of one another, mutual concessions and reciprocal good-will.

To that Speech from the Throne the House made the following reply, which was moved by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), and seconded by the hon. member for Two Mountains (Mr. Ethier):

We learn with satisfaction that immediately after the last session, the Government of Manitoba was invited to hold a conference with His Excellency's Ministers on the subject of the grievances arising out of the Act of that province relating to education, passed in the year 1890, and that in response to that invitation, three members of the Manitoba Government came to Ottawa, and after many and protracted discussions, a settlement was reached between the two Governments, which was the best arrangement obtainable under the existing conditions of this disturbing question: and we share His Excellency's hope that this settlement will put an end to the agitation, which has marred the harmony and impeded the development of our country, and will prove the beginning of a new era to be characterized by generous treatment of one another, mutual concessions and reciprocal good-will.

In the discussion of that paragraph in the Address, hon. members on this side of the House charged the members of the Administration with not carrying out the pledges which they had made to the people representing the minority interested in the Manitoba school question. In reply to that charge, the hon. Minister of Public Works took up the defence of the Government, in very strong language, and read to the House a document which he stated was a copy of a petition which had been forwarded by himself and some forty-four other members of the Senate or of the House of Commons to the Holy Father on the subject of the interference of the Catholic hierarchy in the previous election in connection with this particular question. I do not propose to read the whole document, because I must say that I, as a member of the Catholic Church, felt pained, as I believe a great many other hon. members of this House did, to find that the hon. Minister would bring into this House a document containing such charges as were contained in that document. I also felt pained to find that the Administration, as shown by their subsequent actions, were unwilling to place on the records of this House, where they had placed that document, the reply which they had received to it. The document began as follows:—

We, the undersigned, members of the Senate and members of the House of Commons of Canada, and representing therein the Liberal party, represent ourselves before Your Holiness as respectful and devoted children of Holy Church, to complain of the existence of a state of things which, if allowed to continue, might be extremely dangerous to the constitutional liberties of this country, as well as to the interests of the church itself, &c., &c.

The hon. Minister read the whole document to the House, and is on "Hansard" of March 30, 1897, and made very strong statements in regard to it, in addition to the strong language contained in the document. He told the House that a group of Roman Catholic public men belonging to the Liberal party took the means of securing the coming out to Canada of a papal delegate. He said, in reference to the hon. leader of the Opposition :

I thank the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) for having done so, because it has given us an opportunity of stating our case before this Parliament, before the British Empire, and before the whole civilized world.

He also said :

Sir, as I have said, I take the full responsibility of my signature to the document that I am now going to read.

He also said :

Sir, this document, I am not afraid of saying—I am proud to say—has been signed by forty-five of us. I say as a member of this Government that I signed it, and I am proud to say so.

What I complain of, and what I think hon. members of this House will agree with me in, is the injustice done to those venerable gentlemen in the province of Quebec by having a document of that kind circulated broadcast throughout this country, put on the publications of this Parliament; and then, having thereafter received a reply from the Holy Father, as I maintain every member of the Catholic community in Canada did, they did not fulfil what was their plain duty, by placing that reply on the same records of this Parliament, which was the judgment of the Holy Father after hearing the charges and evidence. To do that would be only common justice to the humblest citizen in the land. That is my complaint, and the complaint of a great many people in this country, against the members of the Administration who signed that document and the hon. gentleman who read it to the House. They have refused to acknowledge having received the slightest answer to that document from the Holy Father. Sir, in the early part of this session I took occasion to put the following question on the Order paper :

Has the Government or the Minister of Public Works any knowledge of a reply being made to the document addressed to the Holy Father and signed by 45 members of the Senate and House of Commons, and which was read to this House by the hon. Minister of Public Works on the 30th March, 1897? If so, what is the nature of the reply?

The reply made to that question, which was put by me on the 14th of February last, was made by the right hon. First Minister, and it was to the following effect :

The Government have no knowledge.

Feeling satisfied that the Government must have knowledge, or at least that the Catholic members of the Administration had knowledge, as every Catholic member of the community had, of the reply of the Holy Father to the representations made in reference to this question, I felt that it was the duty of the Administration, or at least the Catholic members of the Administration, to give us the answer across the floor of the House. I followed that by putting the following question on the 16th of February :—

Has the Hon. J. Israel Tarte---

This is the gentleman who took the full responsibility of the document when he read it to the House—

Has the Hon. J. Israel Tarte, a member of the Government, any knowledge of a reply being made to the document addressed to the Holy Father and signed by the said Hon. J. Israel Tarte and forty-four Senators and members of the House of Commons and was read by the hon. Minister of Public Works on the 30th March, 1897? If so, what is the nature of the reply? If not, does the hon. Minister of Public Works expect an answer? If not, why not?

You, Mr. Speaker, ruled that question out of order, and justified the Government in not making a reply. I could not see the good reason for that, although it was my duty to obey your ruling, Sir. I could not see the reason, because of the fact that in the Speech which His Excellency was pleased to open the second session of this Parliament this question occupied the place of the second paragraph of that Speech.

Mr. SPEAKER. Unless the hon. gentleman raises the question of order—and I cannot see how he can raise it at this time—I do not think it is parliamentary to question a past ruling of the Speaker.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I am not questioning your ruling, Mr. Speaker. I said that, as was my duty, I submitted to your ruling. I simply said to you and the House what my own opinion was. Whether I was absolutely wrong in taking the position I took at that time or within my right.

Mr. SPEAKER. I may say that I gave the reasons for my ruling at the time.

Mr. McDOUGALL. And I submitted. I followed up the question by putting it in the form of a notice of motion on the paper in the following language :

For copies of all correspondence, letters, memorials, documents, &c., forwarded to the Holy See, signed by the Honourable J. Israel Tarte, a member of the Government, or by any member of the Government, and forty-four or any other number of members of the Senate and House of Commons, and referred to on several occasions by the hon. the Minister of Public Works in the House of Commons during the session of 1897, and of all answers thereto received, directly or indirectly, by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, the hon. Minister of Public Works, the hon. Solicitor General, or any other member of the Government.

I endeavoured to get that motion passed on several occasions, but each time it came up, the request was made from the Government benches to have it stand. On the 25th April, it was again reached, when undiscussed motions were called, but as my object in putting that motion was to have a discussion, and as it was then impossible to have it discussed before the close of the session, I withdrew it, and I see no other way of obtaining the object I have in view than by taking the course I am now adopting. The Government having refused to give the slightest information to this House of any knowledge on their part of a reply from the Holy Father with respect to the representations that were made to him through that petition and through other channels which the Administration, or certain members of it, made use of to reach His Holiness with respect to their complaint against the position taken by the Roman Catholic archbishops and bishops and clergy of the province of Quebec, I feel now that it is my duty to do that which the Government have refused to do, namely, to give to this House the answer which every Catholic in Canada received to those representations that were made to the Holy Father. In all communications between the bishops or other members of the Catholic Church in Canada and the Holy Father, the usual course followed is to send those communications and receive replies to them through His Eminence the Cardinal Archbishop of Quebec, and, therefore, the encyclical which contains the reply of the Holy Father to the representations that were sent to him came through the administrator of His Eminence the late Cardinal Taschereau. It reads as follows:

POPE LEO XIII.

To Our Venerable Brothers, the Archbishops, Bishops and other Ordinaries of the Dominion of Canada, having peace and communion with the Apostolic See.

Venerable Brothers, Health and Apostolic Benediction:

In addressing you, as we most willingly and lovingly do, there naturally occurs to our mind the continual interchange of proofs of mutual kindness and good offices that has ever existed between the Apostolic See and the people of Canada. The charity of the Roman Catholic Church watched by your very cradle, and she has never ceased since she received you into her maternal bosom to hold you in a close embrace, and to bestow benefits on you with a prodigal hand. If that man of immortal memory Francis de Laval Montmorency, first bishop of Quebec, was able to happily accomplish for the public good such deeds of renown as your forefathers witnessed, it was because he was supported by the authority and favour of the Roman Pontiffs. Nor was it from any other source that the works of succeeding bishops, men of great merit, had their origin, and drew their guarantee of success. In the same way, to go back to earlier days, it was through the inspiration and initiative of the Apostolic See that generous bands of missionaries undertook the journey to your country, bearing, together with the light of the Gospel, a higher culture and the first germs of civilization. It was these germs, rendered fruitful by their devoted labours, that have placed the people of Canada, although of recent origin, on an equal footing of culture and glory with the most polished nations of the world.

It is most pleasing to recall these facts, all the more so because we can still contemplate their abundant fruits. Assuredly the greatest of these is that amongst the Catholic people there is an ardent love and zeal for our holy religion, for that religion which your ancestors, coming, providentially, first and chiefly from France, then from Ireland, and afterwards from elsewhere, faithfully practised and transmitted as an inviolable deposit to their children.

But if their children have faithfully preserved this precious inheritance it is easy for us to understand how much of praise is due to your vigilance and your labours, venerable brothers, how much also to the zeal of your clergy, for all of you have laboured with unanimity and assiduity for the preservation and advancement of the Catholic faith, and (for we must pay this homage to the truth) without meeting with disfavour or opposition from the laws of the British Empire. Hence it was, that when moved by the consideration of merits, common to you all, we raised, a few years ago, the Archbishop of Quebec to the Cardinalite dignity, we had in view not only to recognize his personal merits, but also to pay a tribute of homage to the piety of all your Catholic people.

With the education of youth, upon which rest the best hopes of religious and civil society, the Apostolic See has never ceased, in conjunction with you and your predecessors, to occupy itself. Hence were founded in great numbers institutions destined for the moral and scientific instruction of youth, institutions which are flourishing under the guardianship and protection of the Church. Amongst these the University of Quebec, adorned with all the titles and enjoying all the rights which Apostolic authority is accustomed to confer, occupies a place of honour, and sufficiently proves that the Holy See has no greater preoccupation, nor desire than the formation of youthful citizens, distinguished by intellectual culture and commendable by reason of their virtue. Wherefore it was with extreme solicitude, as you can readily understand, that we turned our mind to the unhappy events which in these latter years have marked the history of Catholic education in Manitoba. It is our wish, and this wish is a duty, for us to strive to obtain, and to effectively obtain, by all the means and all the efforts in our power, that no hurt shall come to religion among so many thousands of souls whose salvation has been specially committed to us, especially in a country which owes to the Church its initiation in Christian doctrine and the first rudiments of civilization. And since many expected that we should make a pronouncement on the question, and asked that we should trace a line of conduct and a way to be followed, we did not wish to decide anything on this subject before our Apostolic delegate had been on the spot. Being charged to proceed to a serious examination of the situation, and to give an account to us of the state of affairs, he has faithfully and diligently fulfilled the command which we have given him.

The question agitated is one of great and exceptional importance. We speak of the decision taken seven years ago by the Parliament of Manitoba on the subject of education. The Act of Confederation had secured to Catholic children the right of education in public schools, in keeping with their conscientious convictions: the Parliament of Manitoba abolished this right by a contrary law. By this law a grave injury was inflicted, for it is not lawful for our children to seek the benefits of education in schools in which the Catholic religion is ignored, or actively combated: in schools where its doctrine is despised and its fundamental principles repudiated. If the Church has anywhere permitted this, it was only with reluctance and in self-defence, and after having taken many precautions, which, however, too often have been found unequal to parrying the danger. In like manner one must at all cost avoid as most pernicious those schools wherein every form of belief is indifferently admitted and placed on an equal footing—as if in what regards God and Divine things it was of no importance whether one believed rightly or wrongly, whether one followed truth or falsehood. You well know, venerable brothers, that all schools of this kind have been condemned by the Church, because there can be nothing more pernicious or more fitted to injure the integrity of faith, and to turn away the tender minds of youth from the truth.

There is another point on which even those who differ from us in all else will agree with us, namely, that it is not by means of a purely scientific instruction, nor by vague and superficial notions of virtue, that Catholic children will leave school such as their country desires and expects. They must be more deeply and fully instructed in their religion if they are to become good Christians, honest and upright citizens. The formation of their character must be the result of principles which, deeply engraven on their consciences, will impose themselves on their lives as the natural consequences of their faith and religion, for without religion there is no moral education worthy of the name, none truly efficacious, seeing that the nature and force of all duties are derived chiefly from those special duties which bind man to God, to God who commands, who forbids, and who has affixed a sanction to good and evil. Wherefore, to hope to have souls imbued with good morals, and at the same time to leave them deprived of religion, is as senseless as to invite to virtue after having overthrown its very foundations. For the Catholic there is but one true religion, the Catholic religion; hence in all that concerns doctrine, or morality, or religion, he cannot accept or recognize anything which is not drawn from the very sources of Catholic teaching. Justice and reason demand, then, that our children have in their schools, not only scientific instruction, but also moral teachings in harmony, as we have already said, with the principles of their religion—teachings without which all education will be not only fruitless, but absolutely pernicious. Hence the necessity of having Catholic teachers; reading books and text-books approved of by the bishops; and liberty to organize the schools so that the teaching therein may be in full accord with Catholic faith as well as with all the duties that flow therefrom. For the rest, to decide in what institutions children shall be instructed, and who shall be their teachers of morality, is a right inherent to paternal authority. When, then, Catholics demand, as it is their duty to demand, and to strive to obtain, that the teachings of the masters shall be in conformity with the religion of their children, they are only making use of their right; and there can be nothing more unjust than to force on them the alternative of allowing their children to grow up in ignorance, or to expose them to manifest danger in what concerns the supreme interests of their souls.

It is not right to call in doubt or to abandon in any way these principles of judging and acting which are founded on truth and justice, and which are the safeguards both of public and private interests. Wherefore, when the law in Manitoba struck a blow at Catholic education, it was your duty, venerable brothers, to freely protest against the injury and disaster inflicted; and the way in which you all fulfilled that duty is a proof of your common vigilance, and of a spirit truly worthy of bishops; and although each one of you will find on this point a sufficient approbation in the testimony of his own conscience, learn, nevertheless, that you have also our concurrence and our approbation; for the things which you sought and still seek to protect and defend are most sacred.

The difficulties created by the law of which we speak, by their very nature showed that an alleviation was to be sought for in a united effort. For so worthy was the Catholic cause, that all good and upright citizens, without distinction of party, should have banded themselves together in close union to uphold it. Unfortunately for the success of this cause the contrary took place. What is more deplorable still is, that Catholic Canadians themselves failed to unite as they should in defending those interests, which are of such great importance to all—the importance and gravity of which should have stilled the voice of party politics, which are of much less importance.

We are not unaware that something has been done to amend that law. The men who are at the head of the Federal Government, and of the province of Manitoba, have already taken certain measures with a view to decreasing the difficulties of which the Catholics of Manitoba complain, and against which they rightly continue to protest. We have no reason to doubt that these measures were taken from a love of justice, and from a laudable motive. We cannot, however, dissimulate the truth; the law which they have passed to repair the injury is defective, unsuitable, insufficient. The Catholics ask, and no one can deny that they justly ask, for much more. Moreover, in the remedial measures that have been proposed, there is this defect, that by reason of changed local circumstances they may easily become valueless. In a word, the rights of Catholics and the education of their children have not been sufficiently provided for in Manitoba. Everything in this question demands—and it is conformable to justice—that they should be thoroughly provided for, that is, by placing in security and surrounding with due safeguards those unchangeable and sacred principles of which we have spoken above. This should be the aim, this the end to be zealously and prudently sought for. Nothing can be more injurious to the attainment of this end than discord. Unity of spirit and harmony of action are most necessary. Nevertheless, since, as frequently happens in things of this nature, there is not one fixed and determined, but various ways of arriving at the end which is proposed and which should be obtained, it follows that there may be various opinions equally good and advantageous. Wherefore, let each and all be mindful of the rules of moderation, gentleness and mutual charity; let no one fail in the respect that is due to another, but let all resolve in fraternal unanimity, and not without your advice, to do that which the circumstances require, and which appears best to be done.

As regards especially the Catholics of Manitoba, we have every confidence that with God's help they will succeed in obtaining full satisfaction. This hope is founded, in the first place, on the righteousness of their cause; next, on the sense of justice and prudence of the men at the head of the Government, and finally, on the goodwill of all upright men in Canada. In the meantime, until they are able to obtain their full rights, let them not refuse partial satisfaction. If, therefore, anything is granted by law, or custom, or the goodwill of men, which will render the evil more tolerable and the dangers more remote, it is expedient and useful to make use of such concessions, and to derive therefrom as much benefit and advantage as possible. Where, however, no remedy can be found for the evil, we exhort and beseech that it be provided against by the liberality and munificence of their contributions; for no one can do anything more salutary for himself, or more conducive to the prosperity of his country, than to contribute, according to his means, to the maintenance of these schools.

There is another point which appeals to your common solicitude, namely, that by your authority, and with the assistance of those who direct educational institutions an accurate and suitable curriculum of studies be established, and that it be especially provided that no one shall be permitted to teach who is not amply endowed with all the necessary qualities, natural and acquired; for it is only right that the Catholic schools should be able to compete in learning, culture and scholarship with the best in the country. As concerns intellectual culture, and the progress of civilization, one can only recognize as praiseworthy and noble the desire of the provinces of Canada to develop public instruction, and to raise its standard more and more, in order that it may daily become higher and more perfect. Now, there is no kind of knowledge, no perfection of learning, which cannot be fully harmonized with Catholic doctrine.

Especially Catholics who are writers on the daily press can do much towards explaining and defending what we have already said. Let them, therefore, be mindful of their duty. Let them sacredly and courageously uphold what is true, what is right, what is useful to the Christian religion and the state; let them do it, however, in a decorous manner. Let them avoid personalities; let them never overstep the bounds of moderation. Let them respect and religiously take heed to the authority of the bishops and all legitimate authority. The greater the difficulties of the time and the more imminent the danger of dissension, the more studiously should they endeavour to promote unity of thought and action, without which there is little or no hope that that which we all desire will be obtained.

As a pledge of heavenly gifts and a testimony of our paternal goodwill, receive the Apostolic benediction, which we lovingly impart in the

Mr. McDOUGALL.

Lord to you, venerable brothers, and to your clergy and people.

Given at Rome, from St. Peter's, on the 8th day of December, 1897, in the twentieth year of our Pontificate.

LEO P. P. XIII.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is the English translation of the encyclical which the Holy Father sent in reply to the representations that were made on this question, and with regard to the part taken by the Catholic hierarchy of the province of Quebec and other provinces of this Dominion upon the question. Acting under the authority vested in his Grace by the Holy Father, the Archbishop of Quebec has addressed a pastoral to the clergy and Catholic people of Canada. In doing so, that pastoral contains certain interpretations, divided into three parts, on the subject of the encyclical. The first part is with regard to the principles of the Church in respect to education; the second part regards the appreciation of all the events relating to the Manitoba school question from the law of 1890 to the present day; the third part deals with the duty of Catholics on all such questions in the future. I think that in view of what has already been placed upon "Hansard," I am acting quite properly in quoting to the House these interpretations.

PART FIRST.

Principles of the Catholic Church in the matter of Education.

In this first part, Leo XIII teaches:

1. That the parents above all, under the guidance and with the concurrence of the Church, are bound to provide for the education of their children and to assure them that kind of instruction which is proper and adapts itself to their religious belief. That is the reason why, in the laws of 1890 which afflicted our co-religionists of Manitoba, must be seen not only a violation of the federal fact but also a regrettable injury against the unforfeitable rights of the Church and of parents. "As to deciding," says His Holiness, "in what institutions their children shall be brought up, what masters shall be called to teach them moral precepts, that is a right inherent to paternal authorities."

2. Leo XIII energetically condemns, as he has already often done, mixed and neutral schools. Speaking of the latter, he says: "Must be shunned at any cost, as most pernicious, those schools where all beliefs are indifferently harboured and placed on the same footing, as if, in what concerns God and things divine, it mattered little to have or not sound doctrines, and to adopt truth or error."

3. Leo XIII defines the Catholic school, that which is held by "Catholic teachers, whose readers and text books are approved by the bishops," and whose entire system harmonizes with the religious wants and duties of the young pupils. Without these conditions, the school exposes Catholic children to the gravest dangers, and it is a sovereign injustice (the word is Leo XIII) to force fathers of families to expose thereto those whose care the Author of nature has confided to them. "When Catholics demand—and it is their duty to thus demand and claim—that the teaching of the masters agree with the religion of their children, they make use of their own rights. And nothing could be more unjust, than to place them in the alternative either of letting their children grow up in ignorance or of casting them into a sphere which constitutes a manifest danger to their souls."

PART SECOND.

Appreciation of all the events relating to the Manitoba school question from the passing of the law of 1890 to the present day.

1. Since the law of 1890 constituted a real injustice towards the Catholic minority of Manitoba it was the duty of the bishops to take the defence of that minority. They did so, and Leo XIII is pleased to give them praise therefore in the following terms:—"Wherefore, when the new law inflicted a blow on Catholic education in the province of Manitoba, it was your duty, venerable brethren to protest openly against the injustice and against the injury that it had received, and the manner in which you have fulfilled that duty is a striking proof of your common vigilance and of a zeal truly worthy of bishops. And although, on this point, each one of you meets with a sufficient approbation in the testimony of his conscience, know nevertheless that we add thereto our assent and our approbation. For those things which you have sought, and still seek to guard and defend, are truly sacred."

2. All honest men, all Catholics especially, should likewise have been united in defending a cause the importance of which cannot suffer comparison with mere political interests. Unfortunately party spirit intervened to prevent the fulfilment of that sacred duty, and the Holy Father bitterly deploras it.

"What is more deplorable still," says His Holiness, "is that Canadian Catholics themselves did not succeed in agreeing to defend interests, the greatness and gravity of which should impose silence on the interests of political parties, which are of a far inferior order."

3. The agreement effected between the federal authorities of Ottawa and the provincial government of Winnipeg, an agreement to which they would like to give the name of settlement of the school question, is declared defective, imperfect, insufficient, and therefore cannot be accepted as an equitable solution of the question. "That which the Catholics demand," says Leo XIII, "and which they have—as nobody doubts—the right to demand, is far greater. To sum up the whole, the right of Catholics and the education our children in Manitoba have not yet been sufficiently provided for." It is, therefore, with reason that that agreement has been repudiated by the Episcopate, and that the Manitoban minority would not submit thereto.

PART THIRD.

Duties of Catholics and of all citizens regarding the question in future.

It is not enough to state the injustice committed and the insufficiency of the means heretofore proposed for the reparation thereof; it is important to trace out a line of conduct for the future. And this is done by Leo XIII in the last part of his Encyclical.

1. Catholics are bound to strive to reconquer, by all legal means at their disposal, all their rights in their fullness. "Such," says the Pope, must be the aim in view, such the object to be pursued with zeal and prudence."

2. In this difficult struggle, in which all should have the same ambitions and the same desires: To render entire justice to the minority, if honest differences of opinion may occur, nevertheless these various sentiments, stated with all moderation and charity, finish by being effaced and blended in a certain manner into a common sentiment and a brotherly unanimity. The principle of such action, is the episcopal authority and direction, without which nothing must be done nor undertaken: Non sine consilio vestro.

3. The Catholics of Manitoba must be disposed, as they have always been, to accept, without ceasing to obtain entire justice, the partial reparation which they may obtain, provided, naturally, that they agree with the doctrines of the Church and cause to disappear from the schools the neutral teaching condemned by the Sovereign Pontiff.

4. The Holy Father, trusting in the excellency of the cause of the Catholics, expresses the hope that, owing to the equity and the real prudence we have a right to expect from our governments, owing also to the good-will and the spirit of justice of all Canadians, this thorny question will finish by receiving a thoroughly satisfactory solution. He also greatly relies, to reach this end, on the loyal and enlightened concurrence of journalists, whose task is so noble and so important, but who may worthily fulfil their mission only by respecting the rights of truth, of justice, of religion, and by obediently following the episcopal directions: Vereantur ac sancte observent episcoporum auctoritatem.

5. As long as justice will not have been obtained, the Catholics will aid with their alms in the support of the Catholic schools of Manitoba, and they cannot perform a better and holier work. For our part, we desire that the "work of the Manitoba school-pence," approved by the Holy See, be encouraged by all the Catholics of our diocese.

6. The bishops must provide by their authority, and with the aid of those who direct educational establishments, that a full programme of studies be carefully and wisely elaborated and that such only be admitted as professors who are endowed with the qualities requisite for the functions of a solid and profoundly religious teaching.

Such, our dearly beloved brethren, is the Encyclical of Leo XIII, of which the official translation into French was sent to us by the Holy Father himself. What it declares, what it prescribes, what it counsels, we have just made known to you, in the fulfilment of the office of our pastoral charge, and we interdict, as most disrespectful to His Holiness, all contrary interpretations.

Nothing remains to us now but to appeal to that spirit of faith and submission with which we know you to be animated towards the Holy See. We are desirous to proclaim it aloud: We are above all political parties: We have no intention to be bound to any. What we desire is the triumph of a sacred cause and not the triumph of a party. And this triumph, we hope that all men of heart, all friends of justice and liberty will help us to obtain it.

There is no question of coming back upon an unfortunate past; this is the hour for a complete, entire reparation that we expect, and that hour, all sympathies, every noble courage, every generous kindness must strive to hasten. Let public men therefore unite together and have recourse to the means that wisdom and patriotism shall inspire them to put an end to the violent state of things we are all enduring. They know the means of action authorized by the constitution. Let justice come from the Government of Winnipeg, induced to repair the injustice committed; let it come to us from the Federal Government, by an efficacious and abiding law, as we have already demanded, or even, were it possible from the Imperial Government we shall rejoice thereat, and the heart of the Sovereign Pontiff—we know it—will be consoled.

In the name of justice, in the name of that harmony that should reign among all the citizens of the same country, we invite Protestants—whom the diversity of belief does not prevent from being our brothers—to give us their hand and to work with us. Already many of their number, by what they have done in the past, have deserved our gratitude, of which we here offer them the sincere expression. All, such is our hope, will listen to our voice; they will treat that small but valued minority of Manitoba as they would be treated themselves were they in their place.

We rely upon them, and—let it be known to them—the victory that we shall win will be theirs as well as ours, for it will be the victory of right and of liberty.

The present pastoral letter shall be delivered and published at the throne in all churches and parochial chapels or others, where public worship is held and in chapter in religious communities, the Sunday following its reception.

Given at Quebec under our signature, the Seal of the Archdiocese and the counter-signature of our secretary the 9th January, 1898.

L. N. ARCHB. OF CYRENE,

Administrator,

By order of His Grace.

B. Ph. Garneau, Priest,

Secretary.

My desire from the outset was to place within the reach of every man, woman and child who read the charge made by the Minister of Public Works in that document of 30th March, 1897, and the strong supplementary charges he made as to what was contained in that document—my desire was to place those documents I have read, the Government having refused to acknowledge them up to the present moment, within the reach of every one who has seen the document read by the Minister of Public Works. I feel that it was not my duty to do so, so much as it was the duty of the hon. gentleman who brought forward that document and its contents, and in view of the language with which he supplemented those contents before the House. I expected that one of his first acts after Parliament met was to come before the House and say that he had now an answer to the representations he and his colleagues made in regard to the Catholic hierarchy and what was considered to be an answer full and complete, and which it was his duty as a member of the Catholic Church if not as a member of the Government, to have laid before the House. I believe now, as I did at that time, that when the hon. Minister placed that document and the language with which he supplemented it on the pages of "Hansard," he placed there the greatest blot that had ever been put on the "Hansard" of this House. I submit that he aggravated this wrong by refusing to acknowledge the documents or what was contained in them in the form of an answer from His Holiness which I have read. Only a few days ago I asked a question in regard to the mission of Mr. Russell, the solicitor of the Government, to Rome, whose letter to His Eminence Cardinal Rampolla is on the records of this House—that letter which I submitted and asked the Government as to their knowledge of its contents. You, Mr. Speaker, know and every hon. member knows that the right hon. First Minister answered that question to the effect that he was not aware of the existence of any such document. That may be a very convenient answer for the First Minister to make, but those of us who are familiar with the manner in which communications to the Holy See are conducted, are unable to accept the answer made by the First Minister. I will not occupy the time of the House at greater length. I feel that I have accomplished what it was my intention to accomplish at the early part of the session, and which the Government endeavoured to shut off from the time I brought the matter before the House up to the present.

Mr. McDOUGALL.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I have no observations to offer in reply to the remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McDougall). I want simply to correct an impression which he should not have allowed to be conveyed. The hon. gentleman has asked the Government to produce any answer to the complaint made by certain Catholic members of Parliament with respect to the conduct of the Quebec hierarchy in the elections of 1896. He has read to the House the encyclical letter of His Holiness the Pope, dated 8th November, and the comments thereon by the archbishops and bishops of Quebec. He has insinuated that the documents had been sent to us. He knows that the documents were not addressed to us, they were addressed to the whole Catholic world. The Government have no knowledge of them officially, and the hon. gentleman should know that they were not in the possession of the Government.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I desire to say a word in explanation. The First Minister has said that I asked for the production of the papers. The initial step I took was to ask the Government if they had any knowledge of the existence of such papers. That was a matter which I thought certain members of the Government would have admitted to the House. The First Minister is not correct if he confines his statement to my having asked for the papers. My first step was to ask whether any member of the Government had any knowledge of the existence of such papers, and I was refused that information, after which I asked for the correspondence.

Mr. BERGERON. I had intended to speak on this question which my hon. friend has brought before the House to-day. I did not expect it would have been brought up so soon, but as I intended to bring the matter up later, I might as well address myself to it now. The question on which my hon. friend spoke a moment ago, and which is still very fresh before the minds of the country, is an important one. It was important from the commencement by its very nature. It has become very important from the way in which hon. gentlemen opposite have worked it during the five years which the question was before the courts of justice in this country and in the old country. It was always important by the use hon. gentlemen opposite made of it. Some hon. members in certain parts of the Dominion using it in one way and hon. members in other parts of the Dominion using it in another way, but both designed to hurt the Administration then in power, which was doing everything in its power to settle the question, on which hon. gentlemen opposite were seeking to bring themselves into power, as their policy on everything else did not ensure them the confidence of the country. Under these considerations I am bound to consider this question a most important one. To my surprise since this session commenced, especially after the heralding of the settlement of the question by hon. gentlemen opposite had been used, questions have been asked in this House and asked somewhere else, and it has been asked if the Ministers have answered them fairly or not fairly, but they have answered in a way that leads me to believe that they wanted to evade answering truthfully to the questions put them. I myself asked in the House some time ago, whether any document signed "Wilfrid Laurier," the name of the Prime Minister, had ever been sent either to His Holiness the Pope or to the Sacred Propaganda in Rome—which Roman Catholics in this House will know is the political tribunal of Rome—touching the Manitoba schools. I was answered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) that he did not know that any such document had ever been sent either to His Holiness the Pope or to the Sacred Propaganda. Now, either the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) knew that there was such a document and would not tell me, or he did not know. Sir, what is the fact. When that question was put to the Government and answered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I had that document here which is entitled: "Document to Help towards a Knowledge of the Manitoba School Question, with explanatory Notes." Sir, that document was printed in Rome in 1896, and it is signed "Wilfrid Laurier," under date Ottawa, 23rd November, 1896. I repeat that the Minister of Trade and Commerce either knew of this document or he did not know of it. If he knew of it it was his duty to tell me that such a document had been sent to Rome, and if he did not know of it, what sort of a Government have we when the Prime Minister, forsooth, can have communication with a foreign Government—because the political Roman Government is a foreign Government—and his colleagues be completely ignorant of it. This document is a very important one; it is important because it does not convey what I consider to be the truth upon this whole question. For five years the Liberal party deceived the people of this country with regard to this question. In Ontario they tried to raise the fanaticism of that province by saying that the Conservative Government were under the thumb and the foot of the bishops of the province of Quebec; and in the province of Quebec, the Liberals under the banner and direction of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) promenaded through the province, declaring the Manitoba minority would never obtain justice because the Conservative Government at Ottawa was under the thumb and foot of the Orangemen of Ontario. They did that beautiful work in this Dominion, where for the sake of our welfare such questions should be avoided, and they went to the country, after preventing the Conservative Government from passing a Bill which had the sanction of the Manitoba minority. It may not have been a complete Bill, it may not have been as much as they wanted, but it had their sanction and it was accepted by them. As we know, the Liberals in this House in the session of 1896, knowing that Parliament expired by efflux of time, took advantage of that to prevent that law passing. I am repeating this which may be looked upon as ancient history, but it is necessary in order to explain what we find in this document later on, a document signed by the Prime Minister of Canada. The Liberals went to the country telling the people of Ontario that there would be no coercion of Manitoba, telling the people of Quebec that the Conservative Government did not want and never did want to give justice to the Catholic minority; telling them in Quebec that the Remedial Bill was a sham—and in one of his speeches in that province, the right hon. gentleman in his own constituency said that he would bring in a measure which would give more to the Manitoba minority than was ever promised by the Remedial Bill. The right hon. gentleman told the people that we would try conciliation first of all, sunny ways, for he was convinced in his soul that the soft heart of Mr. Greenway and the magnanimous heart of the present Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) would thaw under his benevolent eye. He told the people he would do everything in his power to obtain justice for the minority from the Manitoba Government, and if he did not succeed in that, he would then take hold of the constitution of the country and would see that the Roman Catholics of Manitoba would obtain complete and entire justice. You will see, Mr. Speaker, the very unfavourable circumstances under which the Conservative party had to appeal to the electorate of Quebec, in view of the doctrine preached by the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues for the people of Quebec believed that if the right hon. gentleman would come into power he would give more justice to the minority than had been offered by the Remedial Bill. As the Liberal papers in the province of Quebec used to say: The Catholic Laurier would give more to the minority in Manitoba than would the Protestant Tupper. In view of these doctrines which were hurled broadcast through that province, it is a surprise to me that even a few Conservatives from Quebec are back in this House, for as I have said the people of that province believed in those declarations. But there was more than that. The right hon. gentleman himself stated, and his colleagues stated, and I heard it in the ten or fifteen counties which I had the honour to visit during the election: that as soon as Wilfrid Laurier was at the head of the Canadian Government he would have a commission appointed immediately at the head of which would be Sir Oliver Mowat. In our province, Sir Oliver Mowat was mentioned as the best man that ever lived in the province of Ontario, because although speaking English and not being of our faith, he was as good a friend of the Catholics as was Wilfrid Laurier himself. There were, of course, many in the province of Quebec who did not know that Sir Oliver Mowat, in 1863, had voted against separate schools, at a time when the Protestant Sir John Macdonald and the Orangeman Bowell were voting for them.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Bowell was not here then.

Mr. BERGERON. That was in the Parliament of old Canada; you were not there either.

Mr. LANDERKIN. No, but I understand it.

Mr. BERGERON. All this and more was promised by the Prime Minister to the people of Quebec, but has the Prime Minister carried out his pledge? To-day I hold the Prime Minister of Canada to his promise. Did the right hon. gentleman appoint a commission, at the head of which was Sir Oliver Mowat? He did not. He sent the Minister of Public Works there, and why? I was not present when the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) and the right hon. the Premier met after the elections. But I can imagine the conversation that took place between them. There is no doubt in the minds of those who were here at the time the right hon. gentleman, as leader of the Opposition, moved the six months' hoist. His idea was to carry the Protestant provinces of the Dominion. For the minority in Manitoba he did not care any more than he did the first day he sat in this House. But he wanted to obtain power, and on that question he wanted to carry the majority of the Protestant provinces of the Dominion. So far as Quebec is concerned, the Minister of Public Works had told him very often that with his French name and his reputation for eloquence, which is a great thing with our people, he could always carry enough members from the province of Quebec. But it was the other provinces that he had to carry, if he wanted to cross from this side of the House to the other side. Well, Mr. Speaker, on the evening of the 23rd of June, when these hon. gentlemen met and found that the right hon. gentleman was defeated in Ontario, that the province of Manitoba had given a majority against him, that the province of British Columbia had only given him a slight majority, that the maritime provinces, taken together, did not give him a majority, and that all his majority was in the province of Quebec: still, having a sense of all the responsibility that rested upon him, he said to his friend and mentor, "What shall we do? We are here by the grace of the majority of the province of Quebec; we cannot grant the minority any remedy; we have burned our vessels; we have prevented the only relief we could give to the minority; and what shall we do now?" And it seems to me I hear the Minister of Public Works, who is always full of expedients, saying, "Do not despair; I will go to Manitoba, and I will settle that question; I will say it is settled, my paper will say so, all the Grits will say so, and a great many people in the province of Quebec will believe it." That programme was carried out. Instead of the Government sending the Minister of Justice (Sir Oliver Mowat) to Manitoba, it was the Minister of Public Works who was sent; and what did he do there? That hon. gentleman for four or five years had been writing in his paper most violent articles against the then Administration, saying that it was under the thumb and under the feet of the Orangemen, that it would never render justice to the minority, that it was entirely sold to the province of Ontario.

Mr. BERGERON.

An hon. MEMBER. It is true.

Mr. BERGERON. It is not true, and the man who says that knows it is not. The Minister of Public Works, having written these things, and said them everywhere went to the province of Manitoba, and he settled the question in what way? He met Mr. Greenway; he met Mr. Sifton, at that time Attorney General of that province. Did he go to the minority or to those who represented the minority, and had their confidence, and try to effect a settlement between the two? Because, Mr. Speaker, a settlement means something—it means an arrangement between two parties; it does not mean an arrangement with one party only. But the hon. gentleman went to one side only, and gave them everything they wanted. As we shall see by-and-by from these documents, he never consulted the minority. But he wired from Winnipeg to the province of Quebec that the school question was settled and settled most satisfactorily; and "La Patrie" and other Grit papers in the province of Quebec joined in the tune, and said that the question was settled. Now, Sir, that settlement was not accepted by the minority. The minority complained: it would not accept the settlement. Those who represented the minority—who represented the majority of the minority, if I may so speak—refused to accept it. It is true, a few of the minority, who were employed by the hon. gentleman, or were promised some positions which they have been granted since—

Mr. FOSTER. Judgeships.

Mr. BERGERON. Yes, and we will come to that later. A very few may have declared themselves satisfied, like a gentleman named O'Donahue, who came before the Privy Council here and declared that he was satisfied with the way the school system of Manitoba was carried on. We know why; he only represented himself. But the majority of the minority expressed themselves as completely and entirely against the so-called settlement of the question by the Minister of Public Works. Appeals were made to the only quarter where those people could appeal. Then, we find this little document, prepared by those who had perpetrated the deal, who had deceived the province of Quebec, who had deceived the minority of the Dominion of Canada, who had deceived the minority of Manitoba, and who, trying to transfer their action to a higher plane, as they themselves admitted, sought to deceive the head of Catholicity, and to get something to put before the bishops, so that they could say, "We have settled that question, and there is the answer from Rome telling you to accept the settlement." But it did not succeed. If there is one thing that convinces me that the authorities in Rome have their eyes wide open, and are inspired, and know what kind of a judgment to render, it is the answer which Rome gave to the settlement of hon. gentlemen opposite. They were deceived, Mr. Speaker, and I am surprised that hon. gentlemen opposite did not succeed, for they had everything in their favour. They commenced by sending to Rome Father Proulx, the curé of St. Lin, in the county of L'Assomption, where the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was born. Father Proulx went to Rome. I hope we shall find out some day, going through the Public Accounts, who paid all these expenses. Yesterday in the Senate, we got on the inside track a little way, but we will learn more later on. At Rome Father Proulx, as a priest, and a good priest, well received, tried to make the Papal authorities believe that the settlement was the best that could be made under the circumstances—that there was no doubt that the present Government had done everything in their power; that the Prime Minister of Canada was a Roman Catholic and a French Canadian, and that consequently it was better to pass over many things rather than expose his position; and that the Minister of Public Works, who had been sent to Manitoba, was the purest and most Catholic man in the whole province of Quebec. Well, Father Proulx did not succeed. Another gentleman was afterwards sent to Rome, Chevalier Drolet, an old Pontifical Zouave; and those who have been in Rome, and know the opinion held there of Pontifical Zouaves, will be able to realize how smart, how cute, it was on the part of the Government to send there Chevalier Drolet, covered with medals, which were won at Rome when he was there as a soldier—a man who had gained a good name there, and who was looked upon with favour by the two Governments of Rome, the religious and the political. Mr. Drolet was there a long time. He did not seem to very greatly succeed, for he was called back. What was to be done then? There is no doubt that the Prime Minister was saying to the Minister of Public Works: "That settlement of yours must be approved at Rome, or else we shall never be able to succeed in carrying the province of Quebec, upon which we are depending principally to keep us in power."

Mr. SPROULE. Is that the Drolet who has got so many mining licenses?

Mr. BERGERON. I do not say he got them for that at all. I make no reflection upon him for having got mining licenses. I was simply repeating the history of the whole question, so far as I know it. That is not all. Later the Solicitor General of Canada was sent to Rome as the representative of the Irish Catholics in the Government. He was sent there in conjunction with Mr. Russell, a very eminent lawyer of London, England, and the son of the Chief Justice of England, I may say in passing, the Government cast aside the old legal firm which had done at least 40 years of service for Canada, and gave its legal business to Mr. Russell. Mr. Russell was despatched to Rome with the Solicitor General, and according to current rumour, the Solicitor General was accepted in Rome as the representative of the Dominion of Canada and honoured with the title of Excellency. The mission of these gentlemen was likewise a failure, because shortly afterwards the right hon. gentleman himself, covered with the well-worn honours showered on him at the Jubilee, went to the Holy See. He went as a good Roman Catholic and knelt at the foot of the Pontifical Throne, and no doubt did all that was required of him as a good Roman Catholic, for which I cannot do anything else than congratulate him. He there pleaded the cause of his Government. Did he succeed? I do not believe he did, if I read aright the mandement of the bishops of the province of Quebec, based on the reply of the Holy Father himself. What comes out of all this? It follows that the right hon. gentleman and his Government were carried into power on false pretenses and false issues, so far as the Manitoba school question is concerned, and I do not propose to go into anything else, because it would be very hard indeed to go into all the promises they made before they came into power and did not carry out.

After they had made a settlement, which was no settlement at all, after they had completely ignored the minority of Manitoba, they tried to deceive those whose support they required so that they might be able to tell the people that they carried out the promise which they had made to the electorate of at least a certain portion of the Dominion. That is not all. When my right hon. friend came back, the same tactics were pursued in the press, at any rate of the province of Quebec if not elsewhere, supporting the Government. That press claimed that everything that could have been done had been done, that it was impossible to do more, that the right hon. gentleman was perfectly satisfied, and that the bishops and clergy of the Roman Catholic Church were satisfied. Owing to the pressure made at that time upon the court of Rome by Mr. Russell and the Solicitor General, every bishop in the Dominion was instructed by the Holy See not to say anything upon the question, and not to direct their flock upon it until an answer was sent from Rome. The result was that in the election of Drummond and Arthabaska, whenever any one would open his mouth to speak on the school question, immediately the Liberal candidate and his friends would cry out: You must not talk about that, it is forbidden, the bishops have given strict orders that nobody is to talk about the school question until Rome has spoken. The same cry was raised in Nicolet and everywhere else, and the right hon. gentleman and the Minister of Public Works succeeded in this way in winning the by-elections. But I might add in passing that every Liberal candidate in the province of Quebec solemnly pledged himself to the people to submit to the judgment of Rome. They went further than any Conservative in this country would go, because we are not in the habit of doing bad things and then seeking afterwards to obtain the sanction of Rome, especially when we deceived Rome. These gentlemen, however, swore, from the first down to the last, that they would abide by the decision of Rome. I have in my hand this document of my right hon. friend, and I am very sorry that the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has always been in ignorance of it, because if there is one man in the Cabinet who should know everything, it is he who is looked upon as the best man in it; and the idea that the right hon. gentleman should have sent this to Rome and not tell his hon. colleague, surprises me very much indeed. There are many things which I have no desire to put in "Hansard," because they are in it already. There is the first judgment of the Privy Council.

Mr. WILSON. You will get them altogether, if you put them there now.

Mr. BERGERON. This is in French, and I would have to translate it. Then there is the second judgment of the Privy Council, which I shall not read either, because it is well known, and it would be very tedious work indeed to read, although I have it here in English. I think, however, it has been in "Hansard" before, and I shall not read it again.

The commencement of this document reads as follows:

PRELIMINARY REMARKS.

These various documents, scattered around, as they were, here, there and everywhere, are here combined in one single volume, in order to facilitate, for parties interested, a study of the Manitoba School Question, which for seven years past has caused but too much excitement in Canada, and still threatens to destroy for many a day civil concord and religious peace.

They are given, generally speaking, without lengthy comments; Roman perspicuity will certainly have no difficulty in realizing their full import. A few foot-notes have been added with the object, in most cases, of elucidating certain accompanying circumstances and certain extraneous conditions which cannot be surmised from the text.

It is in those remarks at the bottom of the pages and those explanations given of the text, that there is found a shading to deceive those to whom these papers were sent, as we shall see for ourselves.

To sum up all in one sentence, a perusal of the volume will show that the Judicial Committee of Her Majesty's Privy Council did not, in any sense whatever, order the re-establishing of the Manitoba separate schools.

That is not what the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) was preaching for five years.

That the Bill introduced in Parliament in March, 1896, by the Government of Sir Charles Tupper, and the settlement which he, at the time, caused to be submitted to the Manitoba Government, granted really and practically but a small part of their former school privileges or rights to the Catholic minority of Manitoba; that in relation to the said Bill, there was given in too many quarters—

There is a little hit at the hierarchy.

—especially in the province of Quebec, a religious direction most painful for the great majority of the Catholic population; and that the settlement just made by Mr. Laurier, the present Prime Minister of Canada, with the Manitoba Government, is more advantageous than that which was prepared by the Government of Sir Charles Tupper.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Will the hon. gentleman permit me to interrupt him? I understood that he was citing a memorial written by myself. Does he pretend that this was written by me?

Mr. BERGERON. It is signed in the right hon. gentleman's name.

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not know about that, but if it purports to have been written by me, I will qualify it as a forgery. I never wrote that.

Mr. BERGERON. I will come by and by to the last page, where the name of the right hon. gentleman is, and if he denies that, we will take his denial for granted until we have other authority.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman has said that I signed this document to Rome. I never wrote anything of the kind. The hon. gentleman may have something I have written—I have written a good deal upon this question—or that is signed by myself. I have written several memorials on that question, and the hon. gentleman may have one of them. But what he has been reading from at the moment and what he has given as written by me or dictated by me, I qualify as an absolute, entire, unmitigated forgery.

Mr. WALLACE. Or signed by yourself?

The PRIME MINISTER. Or signed by myself.

Mr. BERGERON. It may be that this was written by somebody else. This document was ignored by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

The PRIME MINISTER. That document was certainly ignored by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, because it was not signed or written or dictated by me.

Mr. BERGERON. This document certainly has not fallen from heaven direct into this House.

The PRIME MINISTER. Will the hon. gentleman kindly send me the document?

Mr. SPEAKER. When an hon. member states that a document quoted as having been signed by him was not signed by him, another hon. member must accept that statement. The Prime Minister said that it was a forgery. Of course, the hon. member (Mr. Bergeron) may not agree with that fact, he may think that the hon. gentleman who states it has forgotten, but, for the purposes of debate, he should accept a statement of fact absolutely within the knowledge of an hon. member.

Mr. BERGERON. We have had this question before us for the last two years. We have been deceived with regard to the whole matter for the last two years. Why, it has been impossible to obtain the truth concerning the question and I—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. BERGERON. I shall show to the House that in another part of this building questions have been put or letters have been submitted as having been sent by the Government and they have been denied. But anybody reading these documents would know that they have not been forged. I ask the hon. gentleman, since he has perused the document, is that a document that he knows?

The PRIME MINISTER. It is a document that I know perfectly well. I know perfectly well where it came from. It is a collection of documents compiled in Rome, in which is to be found a memorial prepared by myself, a sermon of Monsieur Lafleche, an opinion by Mr. Langelier, and so on. But the hon. gentleman stated a moment ago that I had penned certain things in that document. That is not the case. The hon. gentleman will find at the end, as I say, a memorial prepared by myself. I have it here.

Mr. BERGERON. Surely the right hon. gentleman does not want to hide behind flimsy excuses of that kind. Let us speak about this thing in a manly way. Here is a whole document. When I say that the hon. gentleman has signed it, he does not deny it. I do not say that the hon. gentleman sat down at his desk, and, with his nicest pen, wrote every word of this. But will he take the responsibility of this document?

The PRIME MINISTER. No, certainly not.

Mr. BERGERON. He will not?

The PRIME MINISTER. No.

Mr. BERGERON. The right hon. gentleman does not take the responsibility of what is in this document?

The PRIME MINISTER. No.

Mr. BERGERON. The right hon. gentleman signed the last paper.

The PRIME MINISTER. Not at all. Be kind enough to let me have the document again. This is a collection of documents to help to the understanding of the Manitoba school question, with explanatory notes.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Where was it printed?

The PRIME MINISTER. It was printed in Rome in 1896. Here is a table of the contents:

1. Judgment of the Privy Council. 2. Second judgment of the Privy Council. 3. Remedial Bill.

4. The opinion of Hon. Mr. Geoffrion. 5. Opinion of M. F. Langelier, advocate. 6. Letter of Father Lacombe to Hon. Mr. Laurier. 7. Peroration of speech of Hon. Mr. Laurier. 8. Collective letter of the Archbishops and Bishops of the province of Quebec of 6th May, 1896. 9. Sermon of Mgr. L. F. Lafleche, Bishop of Three Rivers. 10. Conference of Hon. Mr. Laurier on Catholic Liberalism. 11. Speech of Hon. Mr. Laurier on the Jesuits' Estates Bill. 12. Opinion of Mgr. Labrecque, Bishop of Chicoutimi. 13. Opinion of Mgr. A. A. Blais, Bishop of Chicoutimi. 14. Opinion of Mgr. Grand C. Vicar of Charlevoix. 15. Opinion of Mgr. N. Begin, Archbishop of Cyrene. 16. Opinion of Mgr. E. Gravelle, Bishop of Nicolet. 17. Opinion of Mgr. J. Cameron, Bishop of Antigonish. 18. Opinion of Mgr. Langevin, Archbishop of St. Boniface. 19. Opinion of N. Prendergast, advocate. 20. Opinion of M. Beausoleil. 21. Memorial of Hon. W. Laurier on the school settlement of Manitoba.

That is the table of contents.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BERGERON. I am at a loss to know what the hon. gentlemen are so proud of. Is this the right hon. gentleman's work or not?

The PRIME MINISTER. That is not my work. In that document there is a peroration of a speech I made on the Remedial Bill.

Mr. BERGERON. Is it correct?

The PRIME MINISTER. Of course it is. There is also a speech I delivered on the Jesuit Estates Bill.

Mr. BERGERON. Is that correct?

The PRIME MINISTER. Of course it is. I suppose that the sermon of Bishop Lafleche, which is also there, is likewise correct.

Mr. BERGERON. I did not put it there.

The PRIME MINISTER. Neither did I.

Mr. BERGERON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am very much surprised, and I am very sorry, that in the House of Commons of Canada we should discuss matters in this fashion. We are discussing one of the most important questions brought before the people of the country for many years. Here is a document that has been printed in Rome.

Mr. LISTER. A collection of documents.

Mr. BERGERON. Let the chairman of the Drummond County Railway investigation (Mr. Lister) understand he is not to rule here. This document has not been printed here by the Conservative party of this country certainly. It is a document directed against the bishops and clergy of Quebec. It accords perfectly well with what the hon. Minister of Public Works wrote to Rome, when he sent this document signed by a long list of names, which I will read, to His Holiness Pope Leo XIII. :

Most Holy Father.—We, the undersigned, members of the Senate and members of the House of

Mr. BERGERON.

Commons of Canada, and representing therein the Liberal party, present ourselves before Your Holiness as respectful and devoted children of Holy Church, to complain of the existence of a state of things which, if allowed to continue, might be extremely dangerous to the constitutional liberties of this country, as well as to the interests of the church itself.

Your Holiness has already been made aware of the conduct and attitude of certain prelates and of certain members of the secular clergy who, during the general elections in this country, in the month of June last, intervened in a violent manner in restraint of electoral freedom, taking sides openly for the Conservative party against the Liberal party, and going so far as to declare guilty of grievous sin those of the electors who would vote for the candidates of the Liberal party.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BERGERON. It is a lie.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BERGERON. This statement is a lie.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) is quoting from the speech of an hon. member of the House—

Mr. BERGERON. It is not a speech. I will explain. I know what you mean, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understood the hon. gentleman was quoting from "Hansard."

Mr. BERGERON. It is something I find in "Hansard." It is a communication addressed to His Holiness the Pope, prepared by an hon. gentleman opposite and signed by himself and a number of others. I will read the names.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would suggest to the hon. member that he might find some other English word that will express his view of the case.

Mr. BERGERON. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am a French Canadian. If I were more familiar with the English language, I might express myself in other words. But I think, Mr. Speaker, everybody understood what I meant. I say that this statement—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. BERGERON. I am not surprised at hon. gentlemen opposite. I have no doubt that what I say hurts them. I say, Mr. Speaker, that in this document addressed to His Holiness Pope Leo XIII., when it says that the clergy "intervened in a violent manner in restraint of electoral freedom, taking sides openly for the Conservative party against the Liberal party, and going so far as to declare guilty of grievous sin those of the electors who would vote for the candidates of the Liberal party"—it states something that is not true. The person who wrote this designed purely and simply to deceive the person to whom it was addressed. The very contrary of this is the truth. If you go down to the province of Quebec and ask the people there, you will find that if the clergy in the province of Quebec had done what some people thought they should have done, the result would have been far different. Now, it goes on to say—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BERGERON. This is worth listening to, and hon. gentlemen opposite might as well listen. I have pretty good health, and can stand a good deal, and I intend to finish what I have to say, whether they like it or not. Their interruptions will only make it necessary for me to take more time. This goes on :

Sincerely attached—

I do not believe this is written by a Liberal. My conviction is that it was written by the Minister of Public Works, because he is in the habit of communicating with Rome. This is what he says :

Sincerely attached to the institutions of our country, which ensure to us Catholics the most complete liberty, we respectfully represent to Your Holiness that these democratic institutions under which we live, and for which Your Holiness has many times expressed sentiments of admiration and confidence, can only exist under perfect electoral freedom.

Far be it from us to refuse to the clergy the plenitude of civil and political rights. The priest is a citizen, and we would not, for a single instant, deprive him of the right of expressing his opinion on any matter submitted to the electorate ; but when the exercise of that right develops into violence, and when that violence, in the name of religion, goes to the extent of making a grievous sin out of a purely political act, there is an abuse of authority of which the consequences cannot but be fatal, not only to constitutional liberty, but to religion itself.

If, in a country such as ours, with a population consisting of persons of various creeds, and wherein the Protestant denominations are in a majority, Catholics did not enjoy, in all matters relating to legislation, the same political freedom as their Protestant fellow-countrymen, they would ipso facto be placed in a position of inferiority, which would prevent them from taking the legitimate part which they are entitled to take in the government of the country, with the possibility, moreover, of conflicts between the various groups of the population, which history shows to be ever fraught with danger.

Then again, an active and violent intervention of the clergy in the domain of political questions submitted to the people must, of necessity, produce against a great mass of the Catholic population a degree of irritation manifestly prejudicial to that respect which religion and its ministers ever inspire and command. Some twenty years ago—

That is why I think I see the hand of the Minister of Public Works.

Some twenty years ago, His Holiness Pius IX, your illustrious and lamented predecessor on the pontifical throne, acting through the Sacred Congregation of the Propaganda, deemed it his duty to put a stop to certain abuses of a similar character, and forbade the intervention of the clergy in politics. This prohibition was generally respected so long as His Eminence Cardinal Taschereau was able to guide the Church in Canada—

There is a compliment to Cardinal Taschereau who was dying, after they had heaped abuses upon him when he was in full health.

—so long as His Eminence Cardinal Taschereau was able to guide the Church in Canada, but since old age and infirmities have paralyzed his guiding hand, the abuses to which Your illustrious predecessor had put a stop, have begun again,—

By whom? By the bishops of Quebec, and this is a point I want the House to understand. I want to show that this document which has been sent to Rome is independent of the other one I have mentioned :

—and threaten once more to create trouble among us, and to compromise, not only Catholic interests in this country, but the peace and harmony which should exist between the various elements of our population.

Again affirming our absolute devotion to the faith of our fathers—

I never saw anything so religious as a Grit when he is in need of some political favours.

Again affirming our absolute devotion to the faith of our fathers—

After attempting to deprive the Catholic minority of Manitoba of their rights and privileges.

—and to the Church of which you are the supreme head, affirming our respect and attachment for the person of Your Holiness,—

As long as he is on their side.

—our attachment to the interests of our country and to the Crown of Great Britain, its ægis and protector, we beg that Your Holiness will renew in our behalf the most wise prescriptions and prohibitions of your predecessor; protect the consciences of the Catholic electors, and thus secure peace in our country by the union of religion and of liberty—a union which Your Holiness has many times extolled in those immortal encyclicals whose precious teachings we desire in all things to follow ; and, lastly, grant to the children of the Church now addressing Your Holiness the Apostolic benediction.

Yes, they needed the benediction. They needed many to cover their sins. Now, let us see who are those pious children that the Church of Rome has in this country, principally amongst the politicians :

Hon. Wilfrid Laurier, Premier of Canada ; Hon. Joseph Israel Tarte, Minister of Public Works ; Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick, Solicitor General ; Hon. R. W. Scott, Secretary of State ; Hon. C. A. Geoffrion, Minister without Portfolio ;—

They have put it here : " Minister of Cabinet."

—Hon. C. A. P. Pelletier, Speaker of the Senate ; Hon. J. R. Thibaudeau, Senator ; R. Préfontaine, M.P. ; O. E. Talbot, M.P. ; C. R. Devlin, M.P. ; L. B. Brodeur, M.P. ; L. C. A. Angers, M.P. ; T. M. Guay, M.P. ; F. Langelier, M.P. ; C. Beausoliel, M.P. ; R. Lemieux, M.P. ; A. A. Bruneau, M.P.; J. A. C. Ethier, M.P.; D. Monette, M.P.; M. E. Bernier, M.P.; J. A. C. Madore, M.P.; P. V. Savard, M.P.; H. G. Carrol, M.P.; T. Fortin, M.P.; P. A. Choquette, M.P.; O. Desmarais, M.P.; C. J. Rinfret, M.P.; G. Turcotte, M.P.; J. H. Legris, M.P.; H. S. Harwood, M.P.; Joseph Lavergne, M.P.; H. Dupuis, M.P.; C. Bazinet, M.P.; Joseph Gauthier, M.P.; T. Proulx, M.P.; N. A. Belcourt, M.P.; J. B. R. Fiset, M.P.; J. H. R. Bourassa, M.P.; R. M. S. Mignault, M.P.; A. Bourbonnais, M.P.; C. Pouliot, M.P.; Joseph Godbout, M.P.; A. M. Dechène, M.P.

Now, these are the Catholic children that Rome has in the House of Commons of Canada, and they are obliged to give a certificate to show that they are good Catholics. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have read this to show that this document which has been signed by nearly every Liberal member sitting in this House, of the Roman Catholic faith, is merely preliminary to the document which was sent afterwards, and I am surprised to see that the right hon. gentleman seems either to be afraid of this document, or to deny its authenticity, although he accepted most of it, and would have been very glad, I have no doubt, if this document had never been put before Parliament, because we are now told that if anything of that sort had been seen either by His Holiness the Pope or by the Sacred Propaganda, everybody ignored it. I was reading the preliminary remarks, and had nearly finished when the hon. gentleman got up. I was speaking about the Tribunal. It says :

Thus, the highest tribunal in the Empire declares that the Manitoba legislature did not go beyond its powers—

This is a remark which is made by the writer, whoever it is, the man who has prepared this document. This is what he says at the end of the judgment of the Privy Council, on the 30th of July, 1892 :

Thus, the highest tribunal in the Empire declares that the Manitoba legislature did not go beyond its powers in passing the School Act of 1890 ; that the Act is intra vires, constitutional. One may think otherwise.

Now, I want to show the difference between this language which is put before Rome and the language used in the House of Commons in Quebec and in this House. The right hon. gentleman and his followers say : Why did not the Government of Canada veto the Act of the Manitoba legislature? I have heard the Minister of Public Works state in his most eloquent style that it would put an end to it, and why did the Government not do it when they had the power in their hands. The writer states :

One may think otherwise—one may deplore and strive to remedy the legal position created by that judgment ; but after all, practically, it must not be lost sight of. Dura lex, sed lex.

The language used by hon. gentlemen opposite when speaking before the Catholic electors of Quebec was not the same used when those gentlemen went before the Pope, and asked him to sanction the bad settlement they had made with the Manitoba Government. I pass over the judgment of the Privy Council of 1895. The right hon. gentleman admits it ; it is on record, and I want to come to the gentleman, whoever he was, who sent that document. He states further :

Mr. BERGERON.

By this judgment the Privy Council does not reverse that rendered on 30th July, 1892.

That is the judgment which led the Dominion Government to come to the help of the suffering minority. Here is what is said by the writer of the document :

The first judgment decided that, given the kind of privileges guaranteed to the Catholics by the Manitoba Act in virtue of the law of custom existing prior to the union, the Manitoba Public School Act of 1890 is constitutional, and does not exceed the legislative powers of the provincial legislature in the matter.

Pleading in Rome against what we had been claiming here for five years in favour of the minority. Again, the writer says :

The second judgment declares that in view of the state of things created by the legislation subsequent to the union the Public School Act of 1890 affects the rights and privileges of the Catholics.

That is correct.

But be it noted that the Privy Council does not pronounce on the method to be adopted in order to remove those grievances.

I call the attention of hon. gentlemen to this : "The Privy Council does not pronounce on the manner to be adopted in order to remove those grievances." Members of the House who remember the four or five months discussion in 1896 can recall the utterances of hon. gentlemen opposite against the Orangemen of Ontario, etc., but this document says to the Pope, "The Privy Council does not pronounce on the methods to be adopted."

Secondly, it affirms that it is certainly not essential to re-enact and again put in force the provisions of the laws which established the separate schools.

This again goes to show that everything done by hon. gentlemen opposite during the last five years in this connection has been for political purposes, and that the representations made in regard to it in the province of Quebec were not the truth.

Thirdly, it is of the opinion that it would be good to preserve the system of public instruction contained in the Acts of 1890.

They were pleading before His Holiness the Pope that it would be a good thing that the system adopted in 1890 should be continued and preserved.

Fourthly, it suggests that the grievances of the minority would be removed are simply modifying and supplementing this system in a suitable manner.

This has been stated, not precisely in order to approve of each and all of the conclusions, but in order to set forth the position just as it stands before the public, and show that the obstacles confronting the statesmen who are striving to find a real, practical and effectual solution of the difficulty.

Those statesmen went to Manitoba to make a settlement with the Greenway Government, and they brought back Mr. Sifton, who entered the Cabinet, but they left the suffering minority in the position they occupied before. We have the Remedial Bill incorporated in this document. We all know its terms.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read it.

Mr. BERGERON. We all heard it for a long time when it was under discussion in this House. I will, however, read the conclusions at which the writer of the document arrives :

To sum up : First, defect of the Bill—

He had to show that the Bill was bad.

—the appointment of a superintendent and members of the council of the separate schools by a hostile government.

They were working hand in hand.

Secondly, no government grant to maintain poor schools on the same level of capacity as rich schools enjoying such grant.

And the Government are going to ask Parliament to give within a few days $200,000 for public schools, and we know we could have done the same thing if we had obtained justice in regard to this Manitoba school question.

Thirdly, overcharging of compulsory taxes, really unbearable, when the heads of families would have been but few to support a separate school.

Those gentlemen who have read the discussions on the Remedial Bill, which continued for weeks and months, can see evidences of deceit all through this document.

Fourthly, parents left the option of getting rid of separate school tax by conforming to the far less expensive system of the public schools.

Fifthly, permanent danger of conflict between the separate council and the Council of Public Instruction, both being endowed with collateral powers to establish regulations on one and the same subject-matters

Sixthly, a complicated machinery, which in practice and even apart from the want of money, would have rendered impossible the working of the separate schools.

Seventhly, the absence of religious instruction for the children of those numerous, no doubt, parents who would have elected in favour of the public schools.

Eighthly, absolute control, definitively, by a hostile government over the separate schools.

Ninthly, impossibility of rendering the law better hereafter, since it was accepted as a final settlement of the school question.

And many other defects, but this is enough.

To complete these remarks, we refer our readers to the opinions following, which emanate from two learned jurists. The remarks and opinions given will, we feel convinced, suffice to prove that the Remedial Bill was sufficiently defective to permit at least a contrary opinion as to its merits, and that it could not be authoritatively declared that it must receive the votes of members and the approval of electors who were honestly convinced of its radical defects.

And still this bad measure, as they call it, was accepted by the Catholic minority of Manitoba, accepted by men representing that minority and by the Archbishop of Manitoba and by the bishops of Canada generally. There is here the opinion of "Mr. Alphonse Geoffrion, Queen's Counsel, professor of law at McGill University of Montreal," and in order to give a good certificate to my friend without portfolio, as he is called, he is described as "advocate for the Seminary of St. Sulpice." He will be very happy to know that he is set forth there as such a pillar of the church; and he is further described as "Counsel for the Seminary of St. Sulpice, Montreal, and jointly with the Hon. Mr. Taillon for His Grace the Archbishop of Montreal in the action brought by the Canada 'Revue,'" a Liberal paper published in the province of Quebec. This document says further :

As Mgr. Langevin, Archbishop of St. Boniface, on 5th May, 1896, in a sermon delivered from the pulpit at Joliette, stated that he had seriously consulted judges who enlightened him on the constitutional and legal questions; as, a few days later, from the pulpit of Laprairie, he repeated: "The legal part was a matter for lawyers, and I have consulted two jurists in Manitoba, men of each of the two religious persuasion and asked their opinion;" as, in his sermons, he gives the substance of these consultations, it is well, in order to form a true idea of the constitutional and legal part of the question, to listen to jurists of the very highest standing, who hold a different opinion.

Surely hon. gentlemen will not believe that this document has not been sent by the right hon. gentleman or his Government. It is easy to see. I imagine that I hear the right hon. the Prime Minister's eloquent words in these sentences :

For that reason we quote here, as to the value of the Remedial Bill, the opinions of Mr. Geoffrion, one of the most eminent jurists consults of the bar of Montreal, and of Mr. François Langelier, the most distinguished professor of law of the University of Laval, Quebec.

The Minister of Public Works and that eminent jurist were not good friends twenty years ago when the Minister of Public Works wanted to have him censured by Rome for holding liberal opinions.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 104) respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company.—(Mr. Belcourt.)

Bill (No. 119) to incorporate the Dawson City and Victoria Telegraph Company.—(Mr. Morrison.)

NORTH AMERICAN TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 120) respecting the North American Telegraph Company.—(Mr. Hurley.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 7,

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The solicitor of the company would like to have this section struck out as being unnecessary. I think the committee will have no objection to that, because the original Act provides :

The head office and chief place of business of the company shall be in the city of Kingston, in the county of Frontenac and province of Ontario, but the board of directors may establish one or more offices in other places in Canada and elsewhere, and may legally call and hold board meetings at other places in Canada, as may be determined by by-law made from time to time.

I think that is the usual clause.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Clause 7 is entirely unnecessary.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Quite unnecessary. The committee would not grant the clause as amended in the original Bill, so that this is merely a repetition of the clause in the original Act of incorporation.

Section 7 struck out.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY—MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION—ADDRESS TO THE HOLY FATHER.

Mr. BERGERON. Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock, I was speaking of the opinion given by the hon. member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion), one of the members of the Administration, and I was reading some of the remarks which accompany that opinion in the document of which I have spoken. I was down to this :

After having heard and studied these powerful and argumentative statements, it must be admitted that the efficacy of the Remedial Bill is, to say the least, doubtful, and that it certainly is one of those perplexed questions as to which one may have a personal opinion.

Mr. Geoffrion's opinion is taken from his speech, in Parliament, of the 4th of March, 1896. Then, there is the opinion of Mr. Langelier, advocate, Queen's Counsel, Professor of

Mr. BERGERON.

Law in Laval University, Quebec, who has since that time been appointed a judge of the Superior Courts of the province of Quebec. His opinion will also be found in "Hansard," so I will not read it. There is published in this document a letter of Father Lacombe to the Hon. Wilfrid Laurier, at the time leader of the Opposition, which I believe, en passant, was a private letter, addressed to the right hon. gentleman on the school question. Father Lacombe is an old missionary, and having been in the North-west for many years, he was much interested in the minority having the rights and privileges which had been enjoyed by them for years; and therefore he took upon himself to write this letter to the right hon. gentleman. For some reason or other that letter left the possession of the right hon. gentleman and was published, and these are some of the remarks which accompanied the publication of that letter, which again I find in the document signed at the end by Wilfrid Laurier.

The PRIME MINISTER. Mr. Speaker. I call upon the hon. gentleman to be careful of what he says. He says this document is signed at the end by Wilfrid Laurier. He knows very well that that is not the case. That book contains, among other things, a memorial signed by myself.

Mr. BERGERON. Does the hon. gentleman want to read the book once more? He had it in his hands, and he acknowledges his signature at the end.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman has no right to speak in that way.

Mr. BERGERON. I am speaking of a document which at the end is signed "Wilfrid Laurier." Is that true or not?

The PRIME MINISTER. It is not true. Mr. Speaker, this is a most miserable subterfuge. That book contains, among other things, a sermon of Bishop Lafêche, several speeches by myself, a memorial signed by myself, and because my name is at the end of that memorial, to hold me responsible, not only for that document, but for the sermon of Bishop Lafêche and everything else in the book, is most ridiculous.

Mr. BERGERON. I find in the index of this book a letter from Father Lacombe to Hon. Wilfrid Laurier. This letter was published in all the papers at the time. The hon. gentleman is very sensitive. I am speaking of a letter which has been published, and which the hon. gentleman acknowledges was written to him by Father Lacombe. Does the hon. gentleman acknowledge that?

The PRIME MINISTER. That is not what the hon. gentleman was talking about.

Mr. BERGERON. Whether this document was written by one man or by another man does not matter to me. I am reading the remarks which accompany the letter of Father Lacombe, as follows:—

This letter contains extraordinary things. A charge d'affaires, who claims to represent the bishops (what bishops? the bishops of the North-west? the bishops of the province of Quebec? the bishops of the whole Dominion?—this we have never learned), a man entrusted with this important mission, asks the leader of a great party to vote for a Bill which nobody knows, which he himself cannot as yet know, worst of all, which is not yet drawn up. This is astounding; but more astounding still, he threatens that leader, if he does not comply with his request, with the opposition of the whole episcopacy, which, he says, will rise as one man united with the clergy; and the episcopacy did not then know what the Bill would be.

After such a letter as this, which became public, and which Mr. Laurier did not answer through the press, after such an attempt to impede and suppress the liberty of a public man, without offering other motives of persuasion than threats, is it surprising that the leader of a political party, composed of Protestants as well as Catholics, should have felt bound to answer it, at least indirectly, with some warmth?

Now, I come to the part, which the hon. gentleman has acknowledged as his own, the peroration of the speech of the Hon. Wilfrid Laurier, delivered in the House of Commons of Canada on the 3rd of March, 1896. I think it better to read that peroration, so that the House will understand that whoever made those remarks upon it was a friend of the right hon. gentleman, if it was not himself, and he denies that it was himself. This is what the hon. gentleman said in his peroration, and as I at the time had the honour of presiding over this House, I remember it well:

I cannot forget, at this moment, that the policy which I advocated and maintained all along has not been favourably received in all quarters. Not many weeks ago I was told from high quarters in the church to which I belong that unless I supported the School Bill, which was then being prepared by the Government, and which we have now before us, I would incur the hostility of the great and powerful body.

He there referred to the letter of Father Lacombe.

Sir, this is too grave a phase of this question for me to pass it by in silence. I have only this to say: Even though I have threats held over me coming, as I am told, from high dignitaries of the church to which I belong, no word of bitterness shall ever pass my lips as against that church. I respect it and I love it. Sir, I am not of that school, which has been long dominant in France and other countries of continental Europe which refuses ecclesiastics the right of a voice in public affairs? No, I am a Liberal of the English school. I believe in that school, which has all along claimed that it is the privilege of all subjects whether high or low, whether rich or poor, whether ecclesiastics or laymen, to participate in the administration of public affairs, to discuss, to influence, to persuade, to convince,—but which has always denied even to the highest the right to dictate even to the lowest. I am here representing, not Roman Catholics alone but Protestant as well, and I must give an account of my stewardship to all classes. Here am I, a Roman Catholic of French extraction, entrusted by the confidence of the men who sit around me with great and important duties under our constitutional system of Government. I am here the acknowledged leader of a great party, composed of Roman Catholics and Protestants as well, in which Protestants are in the majority, as Protestant must be in the majority in every part of Canada.

Except in the province of Quebec.

Am I to be told, I, occupying such a position, that I am to be dictated the course I am to take in this House, by reasons that can appeal to the conscience of my fellow Catholic members, but which do not appeal, as well to the consciences of my Protestant colleagues? No. So long as I have a seat in this House, so long as I occupy the position I do now, whenever it shall become my duty to take a stand upon any question whatever, that stand I will take, not upon grounds of Roman Catholicism, not upon grounds of Protestantism, but upon grounds which can appeal to the consciences of all men, irrespective of their particular faith, upon grounds which can be occupied by all men who love justice, freedom and toleration.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BERGERON. It must be pleasant to the right hon. gentleman to hear his words of two years ago still so well acclaimed.

So far as this Bill is concerned I have given you my views. I know, I acknowledge, that there is in this Government the power to interfere.

I want the right hon. gentleman to remember that.

There is in the Parliament the power to interfere, but that power should not be exercised until all the facts bearing upon the case have been investigated, and all means of conciliation exhausted. Holding these opinions, I move that the Bill be not now read the second time, but that it be read the second time this day six months.

That was two years ago, and we know what conciliation has been tried since then. Now, these are the remarks which accompanied that splendid peroration of my right hon. friend, when it was sent for the inspection of the chief of Catholicity.

Ten lines of this speech, divorced from the context, quoted without giving the letter of provocation which called for them, were condemned by His Lordship the Bishop of Three Rivers, as may be seen under No. IX.

Another attack on the bishops of the province of Quebec, and always from the same quarter.

Do the incriminated words mean that Mr. Laurier will ignore the teachings of Christianity in order to form his personal opinion in the conduct of public affairs? Clearly not. But merely that when he addresses himself to Protestants in order to convince them, he will not appeal to Catholic dogmas which they reject—this is as plain as A, B, C. He will appeal to the motives of justice, liberty and tolerance; and what can be more Catholic than these three motives? It must not be forgotten that nearly two-thirds of the population of Canada is Protestant.—

That is the appeal made to Rome from that side.

—and that two-thirds of the members of Parliament are Protestants. Will the Catholic religion compell a Catholic, under all circumstances, for the mere pleasure of showing off his faith, to use language which will prevent him from attaining to the highest offices.

This shows the greed for power.

—in the state? If so, it would be a disadvantage to be a Catholic, whereas in the eyes of the Church, it is an advantage. Evidently Mr. Laurier's words are susceptible of a different interpretation; why not adopt it? "Favora sunt ampliandi, odia restringenda."

Supposing that one were more struck by the bad interpretation of which the words might be susceptible—before condemning, in the name of faith, in the name of conscience, and as invoked in grave delinquency, the leader of a great political party, and causing incalculable harm to the party—should he not have been called upon to furnish some explanation.

That is addressed to the Bishop of Three Rivers, and we can see there that the right hon. gentleman was trying to explain to the Holy Father his peroration of the 3rd of March, 1896. This is followed by the mandement of all the archbishops and bishops of the province of Quebec upon the school question. This also I shall not put in "Hansard," as it is in there already.

Now, I come to another part of it. The person, whoever it is, who was commissioned to put this before the Pope took advantage of all the good things that the right hon. the Premier claimed to have done since he entered public life. Of course, he brought out the conference of the Hon. Wilfrid Laurier on Catholic Liberalism, which was given in Quebec on the 26th June, 1877. Amongst the remarks—and there are a great many remarks about this matter, in fact, the whole conference is explained nearly word by word, and I do not put it on "Hansard," because anybody can have the pleasure of reading it by turning up the speeches of the right hon. gentleman in the library—I find the following:—

In a single day Mr. Laurier has attained to the rank of a statesman, and has brought us back to the sound and sturdy notions which, developing from age to age, have made the constitutional system the model of all governments.

Now, I may come to a letter which was addressed to Mr. Tessier, lawyer in Rimouski, by the Bishop of Rimouski. And in the remarks which accompany the letter—the letter itself would not be important to the case—I find the following:

1. The greater number of the Catholic electors found (they showed it by their votes on the 23rd June, 1896) that Mr. Laurier had declared, at least implicitly, that he would follow the pastoral letter of the bishops.

This is sent over to Rome:

2. This principle, proclaimed by the high authority of the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda, is in no way impugned in this pamphlet; accepting it to its ultimate conclusions, it cannot prejudice the cause herein presented, for it is not applicable in this matter. There has, in truth, been no law which the bishops have accepted.
Mr. BERGERON.

I may say the right hon. gentleman knew perfectly that the Remedial Bill as presented to the House was thoroughly accepted by the Archbishop of St. Boniface, who at that time represented the minority which was aggrieved. I read further from this document which was put before His Holiness:

We repeat it, never have the bishops of Canada (and Canada does not consist merely of Manitoba and the province of Quebec; there are also five other provinces: Ontario, British Columbia, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, and four territories—Assiniboia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Keewatin) taken as a whole, either by a collective pastoral, or by individual pastorals, or any other official document, make known to the Catholics of the country that they had, for the settlement of the Manitoba school question, accepted a law.

Now, considering that the Remedial Bill which was before Parliament did not become law simply because hon. gentlemen opposite prevented it becoming law, we must admit that they had the strongest ground for saying it did not become law.

Those who affirmed it misled—in good faith we would gladly think—but misled the electors; and in an authoritative pronouncement (direction)—

This refers to the bishops' mandement——such an error of this kind is, it will be admitted, fundamental.

If such a law is accepted by all the bishops—by the majority of the bishops—let ambiguity be dropped, and let it be stated, and let us be told where, when and by what document.

The bishops will have a crow to pick with my right hon. friend.

By Père Lacombe's letter? By Mgr. Langevin's telegram of 22nd February, 1896, made public on 12th March?

This has been read in the House and it is unanswered.

It is stated therein that: omnes episcopi—approbare debent. If they are to approve them, they have not as yet approved of it, nor consequently accepted it.

The hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) laughs; this is probably some of his Latin.

The telegram of the same Lord Bishop,— —that is the Archbishop of St. Boniface——wherein he asks the House of Commons to pass the Remedial Bill in its entirety, as a final settlement of the school question? The act of accepting that defective Bill as a final settlement is given here only as the desire and act of Mgr. Langevin alone.

So that the right hon. gentleman or the person who wrote this, states that the Archbishop of St. Boniface was entirely wrong.

The discourses of the Archbishop of St. Boniface at Montreal, at Laprairie, at Joliette and elsewhere? Even though that conclusion might be drawn from his words, it will be admitted that that is not an adequate and sufficiently formal notification to bind the conscience of the Catholics of the whole country.

What a defender of the whole body of Catholics of this country.

The Conservative newspapers? Of a truth they repeated it in every possible key.

There was, in the province of Quebec, the collective letter of 6th May, 1896; but after explaining to the faithful the true doctrine on the power of the bishops in politico-religious matters, and having given, in relation to the circumstances of the moment, sage counsel to the voters and candidates, this letter asks for nothing else than "a measure of a nature to afford an effective remedy for the evils from which the Manitoba minority is suffering."

Now, this document pleads before Rome that the mandement of the bishops never asked support for the Remedial Bill, but simply favoured "a measure of a nature to afford an effective remedy for the evils from which the Manitoba minority is suffering." But, this afternoon, when I read this document and said it was not true, I was told that I was using too strong a word. The document I read this afternoon said that the whole episcopacy and clergy of Quebec gave undue influence in favour of the Conservative party and the remedial measure before Parliament. This document says the very reverse. There is the answer to the document sent by the Minister of Public Works and signed by a number of hon. gentlemen opposite. The bishops, "after explaining to the faithful the true doctrine of the power of the bishops in politico-religious matters, and having given in relation to the circumstances of the moment, sage counsel to the voters and candidates." That is true. I repeat what I said. The episcopacy of Quebec, according to the opinion of a great many of us who knew the motives of hon. gentlemen opposite, did not go far enough, and I have here the proof of it from hon. gentlemen themselves. Nobody can have a word to say against the bishops giving "sage counsel" in these matters. There is not a man, no matter what his faith, who can object to the bishops giving such counsel to the voters and candidates. We are told here that the bishops' letter "asks for nothing else than a measure of a nature to afford an effective remedy for the evils from which the Manitoba minority is suffering." Could there be a more complete vindication of the bishops' mandement which has been decried in some other parts of the Dominion, than I have just read from this document signed by the right hon. gentleman himself? There is also a circular of His Lordship Bishop Cameron, addressed not to his whole diocese, but to the single county of Antigonish. We are told that "a special promulgation made in this small corner of the globe"—but when the Grit candidate speaks there, they say it is the greatest country in the world—"is not sufficient to bind the consciences of the people of Canada." There is a slap at Bishop Cameron.

There are the letters of some bishops and parish priests to lay voters, stating directly, or in effect, that the Remedial Bill is the Bill accepted by the Bishop. Personal views and political leanings may very well be manifested in this manner, but it cannot in any sense impose upon the whole country, under pain of grievous sin, an acceptance whereof the duties and obligations should be promulgated by all or by each one of the bishops.

I repeat that my right hon. friend will have a great bone to pick with the bishops of this country, because this document makes a serious charge against them. Now, a gentleman who was formerly a member of this House, but who has unfortunately been taken away by death—I speak of Mr. Pouliot, the late member for Temiscouata—had a long correspondence with his bishop. I find in his answer what, in fact, is said by all the Catholics on the other side:

I think, my lord, that you are mistaken when you say that the Catholic Liberal members have not undertaken to support an effectual Remedial Bill which would be approved by the bishops, in accordance with the collective pronouncement of the bishops, for I have watched the newspapers since the promulgation of the pronouncement, and I have always seen the Liberal candidates declare that they were prepared to follow out the directions of the bishops in accordance with the mandement, and this in presence of their constituents.

That also is sent to Rome. Now, my hon. friend formerly represented Rimouski in this House, and who is now occupying a seat in another House, exempted from the turmoils of elections, Mr. Fiset, this is what he said to his bishop:

I am not aware that the bishops, collectively, have approved of the Remedial Bill introduced last session. I consider that the said proposed measure is not complete, and does not do full and complete justice to the Catholics of Manitoba.

He is not satisfied with the Remedial Bill, he wants more.

—which does not prevent me from approving of the principle of the Bill.

But he voted against it.

My sincere conviction is that in the present state of the Manitoba school question, no one but the Hon. Wilfrid Laurier can settle it in a just and equitable manner.

What great expectations were held out to the people of Quebec! We shall see by and by how they were realized. Now, I am coming to the famous settlement of the Manitoba school question, between the local Government of Manitoba and the Federal Government of Canada, the great settlement which was arrived at by the Minister of Public Works and Mr. Sifton. It is not necessary for me to read the whole settlement, I will read the explanations of it given by the Government to His Holiness to make him approve of that settlement, if possible :

The advantages of the settlement arrived at between the Government of the Hon. Mr. Laurier and the provincial government of Manitoba.

Now, those who are acquainted with the terms of the settlement will find running through these explanations quite a distinctive shade of incorrectness.

1. Catholic schools equivalent to separate schools wheresoever the Catholics are greatly in the majority.

2. Catholic teachers in all sections where Catholic children number, 25 for the country, and 40 for the towns.

3. Catholic instruction in all schools, even though Catholic minority consists of but 10 children.

4. In all cases children forbidden to follow a system of teaching different from that selected by their parents ; consequently, in practice, Catholic children are forbidden to follow Protestant teaching.

5. Free admission of the priest, under the law, into the school for the purpose of teaching his flock the Catholic doctrine.

At what hour? Half-past three o'clock in the afternoon.

Finally, the teaching of French where French parents desire it.

I pretend that is not in the settlement. It is a bi-lingual teaching English in the French language to a French boy, and teaching English through the German language to a German boy. But that is not teaching the French language nor the German language. Still, it is attempted here to convey the idea to the Court of Rome that there is in that settlement provision for teaching French where French parents desire it.

7. No increase of taxes on Catholics, while they secure to them both religious instruction, good school-houses and competent teachers.

Mr. TALBOT. Hear, hear.

Mr. BERGERON. The hon. member for Bellechasse will find out that they are more difficult to please over there than he is, because they did not accept this settlement.

Mr. TALBOT. The member for Bellechasse is all right.

Mr. BERGERON. He is all right tonight ; he may not be all right after the general election.

8. Simplicity in working of Manitoba School Law so amended, as compared with the complicated machinery involved in the Remedial Bill.

Mr. BERGERON.

9. Peace established in Manitoba in place of religious and political divisions.—

Created by hon. gentlemen opposite.

—which must have been continued and increased by the compulsory imposition of a law which was repugnant to the majority of the population.

This settlement was considered by the ultra-Conservative Protestant press to be so advantageous to the Catholics that it undertook against Mr. Laurier a campaign of fanaticism and detraction ; and, quite recently also, at Hargrave, in Manitoba, the ultra-Conservative Protestants burnt in effigy Messrs. Laurier and Greenway.

There must have been some other reason, surely.

In one word, Mr. Tupper's Remedial Bill promised more than it gave, and Mr. Laurier's settlement gives more than it seems to promise. We shall see now by the views of two prominent sincere and practical Catholics—

An hon. MEMBER. Whose letter is that ?

Mr. BERGERON. These are notes and explanations given to the Holy See concerning the settlement, in case the Holy See would not understand it themselves. But instead of explaining it correctly, there is a shade of incorrectness running through it. But they were not deceived over there.

We shall now hear the views of two public men, sincere and practical Catholics, men of thought, practical men, thoroughly skilled in constitutional questions, perfectly in touch with popular sentiment, and whose authority must be weighty in this matter, for they have long struggled and suffered, and made great sacrifices for the redress of the grievances complained of by the Catholic minority in Manitoba : Hon. Messrs. Prendergast and Beausoleil.

The sufferings of Mr. Prendergast are now assuaged, for he is now occupying a seat on the Bench somewhere in Manitoba. He does not suffer so much as he did. The sufferings of the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) do not spring from that cause, but from the conduct of the Minister of Public Works towards him. He is still suffering, and he runs a great risk of suffering more. Now, both of these gentlemen are presented to His Holiness.

Mr. Prendergast was a member of the Manitoba Government when Mr. Greenway introduced the measure so justly complained of by the Catholics. He did not hesitate to throw up his portfolio and sacrifice many material advantages, in order to defend his co-religionists ; and has ever since been a skilful and intelligent exponent of their invaded rights.

That is not correct. In order to state the truth, the writer should have gone on to say that Mr. Prendergast swallowed the settlement in order to obtain a position on the bench. We do not see much reference to the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) and there are not many compliments paid to him in this document which has been published under the eye or under the instructions of the Minister of Public Works.

Now, I come to the memorial in relation to the Manitoba school question, which is signed, and acknowledged to be signed by the right hon. First Minister, and which I will ask permission to read. I will read the language of the hon. gentleman in the memorial, but I will omit references to the Act of Manitoba and other Acts which already appeared in public documents, and need not therefore be reprinted in "Hansard," also the petition signed by the bishops of the Dominion to the Governor General in Council, which has already been placed on the pages of "Hansard." I will read what the hon. gentleman penned :

MEMORANDUM.

In relation to the Manitoba School Question.

With an explanation of the reasons which induced the Liberal party to adopt a policy of conciliation which was finally accepted by that province.

This is trying to make the Roman court believe that this settlement prepared by the Minister of Public Works has been accepted by the province of Manitoba. But it has not been accepted by the minority, and that is what the hon. gentleman should have stated :

•In order to form a correct estimate of the line of conduct followed by the present Government in the settlement of this question, it is of the utmost importance that the constitutional points raised during the discussion should be well understood.

Manitoba is one of the seven provinces constituting the Canadian confederation. These provinces have exclusive jurisdiction in relation to certain subjects, amongst which is education. That jurisdiction is subject to certain restrictions in those provinces (and in those only) where the right to separate schools existed prior to their entering into confederation.

Here appear sections of the Manitoba Acts. Then the memorandum proceeds :

In the year 1871, the Manitoba legislature passed a law authorizing the establishment of separate schools by the Catholics and the Protestants. In pursuance of that Act the Catholics established schools wherever their numbers warranted it, but of necessity in many sections of the country where the population is sparse, Catholics and Protestants united to constitute common schools.

My hon. friends from Manitoba can follow this and see whether the explanation is correct :

This state of things lasted until the year 1890, when the Manitoba legislature repealed the Act authorizing separate schools and established a system of national schools, for the support of which all denominations were taxed alike.

Under the constitution the Dominion Government has the power to disallow provincial Acts, within the year following their adoption. Immediately after the adoption of the Act abolishing separate schools, the Archbishop of St. Boniface, in his capacity as chairman of the Catholic section of the board of education, presented to the Governor in Council a petition asking for the disallowance of that Act. That petition was followed by others from Catholic laymen and their representatives in the legislature. These petitions not having been favourably entertained by the Conservative Government of the Day.

This is a blow at the old Administration :

His Eminence Cardinal Taschereau—

The cardinal, who had become so old, according to the hon. Minister of Public Works, that he was no longer useful.

—and the archbishops and bishops of the Roman Catholic Church in Canada united in order to present to His Excellency the following petition :—

Then appears the petition, which is already on record, signed by all the bishops of the Dominion. After reciting this petition, the memorandum proceeds :

This judgment was considered to be final by the majority of the people of Canada, and accepted by the province as confirming its contention that the Act which constituted Manitoba a province of Canada had given to no religious denomination the right to establish separate schools.

This is not what hon. gentlemen said when they were denouncing the late Government for not all disallowing the Act of the legislature of Manitoba.

The decision of the highest court was so clear that it seemed to leave no hope of reviving the claim of the Catholic minority.

But the Dominion Government, in its answer to the Catholic bishops in the month of March, 1891, while refusing to touch the Manitoba legislation, declared that if the Catholic minority did not succeed in the Courts, the constitution provided for them a further recourse to the Dominion Government in order to secure protection against the decision of the legislature affecting their rights and privileges in relation to education.

That was not quite so bad for a Conservative Government.

Hence Archbishop Taché again forwarded in September, 1892, to the Governor in Council, a petition recalling the answer given to the petition of 1891, and declaring that the time had come for the Catholics of Manitoba to demand redress of their grievances in pursuance of paragraphs 2 and 3 of section 23 of the Manitoba Act. The Dominion Government again refused to entertain the request for remedial legislation made by the Catholic minority, but decided to submit to the Supreme Court of Canada the question as to whether the decision of the Privy Council precluded any further intervention on the part of the Dominion Government. The Supreme Court of Canada decided that the judgment of the Privy Council was final, and that the Parliament of Canada had not the power to restore to the Manitoba minority its rights and privileges.

I may say here that it would have been an act of justice to have said that it had always been the policy of the Conservative Government to place the whole matter before the courts and act according to the decision of the courts, and so avoid arousing political passions, which hon. gentlemen opposite had been sowing for five years in respect to this question. In justice this should have been stated in behalf of the Conservative Administration.

The minority appealed from that decision to the Judicial Committee of the Imperial Privy Council, and in the month of January, 1895 the court gave judgment on the points submitted. The conclusions of the Privy Council were expressed as follows:—

I need not read this portion because it is on "Hansard" already.

By the first judgment of the Privy Council, the court decided "That no right or privilege of the minority had been violated or affected by the Act prejudicially," whereas the second judgment expressed a contrary opinion, thus showing the differing and contrary opinions which existed amongst the Law Lords on the subject.

That is true.

In pursuance of that judgment the Canadian Government determined to hear the appeal of the minority, and decided that it was well grounded. The Cabinet passed an Order in Council calling upon the provincial legislature to redress the grievance which the latter judgment declared to exist, intimating that in the event of a failure to comply with the request, the authority of the Canadian Parliament might be invoked in aid of the minority. The Manitoba legislature refused to accede to the demands of the Dominion Government.

He might have added, helped by the Dominion Opposition at that time.

This action of the legislature shows clearly that the province had determined to maintain its rights, and to resist any intervention on the part of the Dominion Government, and appeals were made to the Protestant element in the other provinces of Canada, asking them to support the position taken by the Manitoba Government.

Yes, appeals were made by the friends of the right hon. gentleman in the province of Ontario, principally:

During the Dominion session of 1895, the Government notified their supporters that remedial legislation would be submitted to Parliament, but no action was taken in that direction, and at the close of the session the Government declared that at the beginning of the next present Parliament would be called especially in order to deal with the question. In accordance with that declaration the Government submitted to the House of Commons during the session which opened on the 2nd of January, 1896, a Bill called the Remedial Bill, but which, in the opinion of many lawyers eminent in constitutional law did not enable the Catholic minority to establish their schools in opposition to the provincial and municipal authorities. Moreover, the Bill contained no provision whatever granting to the schools a share of the public funds of the province; it being admitted that Federal legislation could not compel the province to take any money whatever from its treasury in aid of the schools of the minority, and it is acknowledged that without pecuniary aid the schools of the minority cannot be maintained.

The right hon. gentleman might have also said, that at that time the Government of Canada had money belonging to the local Government of Manitoba, in relation to their Crown lands, for educational purposes, and that it would have been feasible for the Federal Government, whether it was Conservative or Liberal, to grant a part of that money to the minority for the benefit of their schools. The right hon. gentleman forgot all about that.

While this Bill was before the Canadian Parliament the Manitoba legislature protested most solemnly.

The right hon. gentleman has now become the advocate of the Manitoba legislature who took away the rights of the minority, and for which minority he said he had been fighting in Parliament and the province of Quebec for five years.

The Manitoba legislature protested most solemnly, and on the 26th February, 1896, by a vote of 31 to 7, against the passing of the Bill, which had been introduced into the House of Commons of Canada, and urged several reasons in support of its opposition. The resolution concluded as follows:—

"That the said Bill is a futile but unjustifiable attack on constitutional rights of the legislature and people of all the other provinces of Canada, and a violation of the principle of provincial autonomy which is without a precedent in the history of Canada."

The right hon. gentleman continues:

Notwithstanding that Parliament met on the 2nd day of January, 1896, for the special purpose of adopting the Remedial Bill, the second reading of the measure was moved only on the 3rd of March, about six weeks only before the legal expiration of Parliament. The Opposition to the Bill was so strong that the consideration of its merits made but very small progress.

But the right hon. gentleman forgot to inform the Roman Court about how easy it is to speak against time in this House, and the hon. gentlemen opposite did speak against time for all they were worth.

And the Government finally withdrew the Bill. Why did the Government withdraw the Bill? The right hon. gentleman says:

And the Government finally withdrew the Bill, acknowledging thereby that they were unable to carry it, notwithstanding their very large majority in both Houses.

What does that mean, and what does the right hon. gentleman mean to imply by it? He is seeking at the Court of Rome, approbation for his settlement, and he tells the Court of Rome that the Conservative Government withdrew their Bill in spite of their big majority because they found it was impossible to pass it. But the right hon. gentleman did not give the proper and the only reason, namely, that it was because of the expiry of Parliament, and the impossibility in view of the attacks and opposition of gentlemen opposite to carry through that measure in time.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Other hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BERGERON. Those who are clamouring on the other side of the House were not here in that Parliament, but those who were here cannot say to the contrary.

Mr. CAMPBELL. How many over there opposed it, too?

Mr. COCHRANE. You did, anyway.

Mr. BERGERON. The right hon. the Prime Minister goes on to say:

Had Parliament adopted the Bill, or any other like it, the province of Manitoba would certainly have contested its validity,—

The right hon. gentleman is now giving arms to those he has been fighting against.

—and the consequence would have been another long period of agitation and turmoil, to the great detriment of the Catholic minority in the other provinces. The belief that any legislation of the kind would not bring about a final settlement of the question amply justified the opposition which the Liberal party offered to the Government Bill.

What a reason for the head of a Government to give the tribunal from which he wants approval of his Administration.

The agitation caused by this question had lasted for six years, and a strong Protestant feeling had arisen in all the provinces except Quebec against the granting of special privileges to Catholics.

By whom was that feeling provoked? It is provoked by the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite in the province of Ontario, when we had the other cry to the contrary blown over the province of Quebec by the friends of the right hon. gentleman under the leadership of his Minister of Public Works.

The peace and harmony which had previously reigned between Protestants and Catholics throughout Canada were seriously disturbed to the great detriment of the Catholics, who are in a minority in all the provinces but one. The Conservative party had been in power during these six years, and the Government, in place of dealing promptly with the matter before the public mind became inflamed,— Inflamed by whom? Inflamed, Sir, by the hon. gentlemen opposite.

—allowed the question to drag along from 1890 up to the present time. Then it became manifest that the province of Manitoba was determined to oppose any Federal interference. It became the evident interest of the minority that the question should be settled on such a basis as to ensure the good will and approval of the Protestant majority, not only of Manitoba, but throughout the whole of Canada.

And the right hon. gentleman was asking the approbation of Rome upon the basis of such reasons as those.

The importance of an amicable settlement will become more manifest in considering the following facts:—

Mr. TAYLOR. Whose letter are you quoting from?

Mr. BERGERON. I am quoting the memorial signed by the right hon. gentleman, the Premier.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron), but I cannot possibly avoid noticing that the leader of the House has three or four times denied that he signed the document, and the hon. member (Mr. Bergeron) does not accept the denial. I cannot make the hon. member accept the denial, but I can say that unless an hon. member accepts such denial, it is usual for him to undertake to personally prove that he is right and that the other hon. member is wrong. In taking the responsibility of contradicting the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), that is the least the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) should do.

Mr. BERGERON. I am willing with a great deal of pleasure to abide by the ruling of the Chair, but I wish to remark that I am now reading from a document which at the commencement of the discussion the right hon. gentleman acknowledged as being his own. The right hon. gentleman is there and if this is not his own document he can say so himself. This is a memorial signed by him and he has already acknowledged it.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman is reading from a part of the document that the right hon. gentleman admits having signed, then, of course, there is no objection. But I understood that several times the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) had been reading parts of the document which the right hon. gentleman denied having signed. If I misunderstood the hon. member (Mr. Bergeron), I regret it very much.

Mr. BERGERON. I am sure His Honour the Speaker misunderstood, because what I am reading now is what has been accepted by the right hon. gentleman as being his memorial.

The PRIME MINISTER. That memorial has been signed by me.

Mr. BERGERON. I am in order, then, Mr. Speaker. I continue:

The population of Manitoba at the last census was 152,506, of whom 20,571 were Catholics, disseminated over 90 different municipalities. The total number of Catholic schools in 1890 was but 97, and 28 of these schools were in the city of Winnipeg, at St. Boniface and at St. Norbert. In all the rest of the province there were but 69 schools. The number of children attending the Catholic schools of the province was 3,316, but the average attendance was only 2,267.

I want here to make a remark. The right hon. gentleman here gives a strong reason why the settlement should not be approved, when he himself shows how impossible it would be for children to have the tuition which he said he wanted to obtain for them by a settlement; for he shows that at least 33 per cent less than the number on the books of the schools were in the habit of attending those schools. This shows once more that the settlement made by the Minister of Public Works for having a Catholic teacher for forty children attending in the cities and towns and for twenty-five children in the villages and rural districts was purely and simply a sham.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. BERGERON. The right hon. gentleman is very courteous, I admit; but I cannot make a mistake, for I am reading what has been written by his own pen.

The PRIME MINISTER. The answer is this, that the settlement provided that where there were a certain number of children they would have a Catholic tutor, without the consent of the municipal authorities, and where a municipal authority provided for one, they would have one whether the number of children was forty, or twenty-five, or ten, or any number.

Mr. BERGERON. Here is what the settlement says:

In the schools in towns and cities, where the average attendance of the Roman Catholic children will be 40 or more, and in the schools of villages and rural districts, where the average attendance of such children will be 25 or more, the commissioners shall, if they are required by the parents or guardians of those children, employ in those schools at least one Roman Catholic teacher, duly qualified.

In the schools in towns and cities where the average attendance of children, not Roman Catholics, is forty or more, and in the schools of villages and rural districts where the average attendance of such children is 25 or more, the commissioners shall, if they are required by the parents or guardians of those children, employ at least one teacher not a Roman Catholic, duly qualified.

The PRIME MINISTER. Read the first condition now.

Mr. BERGERON. I have read everything that can be read upon that subject.

The PRIME MINISTER. Not at all.

Mr. BERGERON. This is the settlement of the right hon. gentleman, and what he says is that out of 3,000 children, only 2,000 go to school.

The PRIME MINISTER. Send it over, and I will show you what it says.

Mr. BERGERON. I am very glad to do so, because the right hon. gentleman has forgotten all about it.

The PRIME MINISTER. The first paragraph says there shall be religious teaching in the schools if a petition is presented in a municipality to the commissioners where there are twenty-five children in towns and ten in villages; and there shall be religious teaching also if it is authorized by a majority of the school commissioners, independent of the number of children.

Mr. BERGERON. Where is the point for the right hon. gentleman? There is no use playing on words. I have said that by the settlement it is compulsory to have Roman Catholic teachers in cities and towns where the average attendance of children is forty or more, and in villages and rural districts where the average attendance of children is twenty-five or more.

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes, and if religious teaching is authorized by a majority of the school commissioners, there shall be religious teaching, if there is only one child.

Mr. BERGERON. That is so far as religious teaching is concerned, but not other teaching. The right hon. gentleman knows that what is provided for where there are forty children in cities and towns and twenty-five in the country, is not religious teaching, but simply Roman Catholic teachers, to teach according to the programme of the public schools—nothing more. The right hon. gentleman has applied to Rome for approbation, and he knows it has been refused to him, just because the authorities at Rome have found that his settlement is not a just settlement or a true exposition of the desire of the minority in Manitoba. I continue to read this document:

It is, therefore, evident that half the Catholic children of Manitoba were of necessity obliged to attend the common schools, or to be deprived of the instruction that could be given therein. Considering all the circumstances, the Liberal party became convinced that the policy of coercion which had been adopted by the late Administration was not a wise one, and destroyed the peace and harmony which previously prevailed between the several Christian denominations throughout Canada; and, moreover, the Liberals believed that if the people of Manitoba were approached in a conciliatory spirit, that people would comply with the wishes of a Catholic minority and make to them such concessions as would satisfy their just claims.

Have they done so?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BERGERON. They have been approached with every possible conciliation that could be imagined. The right hon. gentleman has used all his conciliating powers, and he sent to Manitoba his right arm, the Minister of Public Works, who, I suppose, promised everything he could promise. Still, have the minority been granted what they wanted?

Mr. MCGREGOR. They are satisfied?

Mr. BERGERON. No, they are not satisfied, and whoever says that says what is not correct.

Mr. JAMESON. They are satisfied.

Mr. BERGERON. They are not satisfied. I am coming to that later on. The document continues :

The Liberals consequently decided to adopt a policy of conciliation as the basis of their platform in their appeal to the people of Canada at the last elections. It is well to state that in that contest the Liberal party received the support of the majority of the electors in all parts of Canada.

That is not correct. The right hon. gentleman has not said there to His Holiness entirely what is correct, and he should not deceive those to whom he applies for approbation. The right hon. gentleman did not have a majority in the province of Manitoba, the province which was the seat of all this trouble. The people of the province of Manitoba gave a majority against him.

Mr. JAMESON. When ?

Mr. BERGERON. At the general election ?

Mr. JAMESON. Why, we have five Liberal members.

Mr. BERGERON. That was written on the 26th of November, when there had been no by-elections. At that time the majority in Manitoba was opposed to my right hon. friend.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. BERGERON. Yes. The maritime provinces did not give him a majority, and in the province of Ontario the majority was only one or two, when this was written. The only majority he carried on the 23rd of June came from the province of Quebec, and for the reason I gave before. This document continues :

The late Administration was defeated at the polls, and compelled to resign.

The late Administration, Mr. Speaker, was defeated at the polls and compelled to resign because the Prime Minister of Canada at that time did his duty. If the Prime Minister of Canada, Sir Charles Tupper, when he went to the country on the 23rd of June, 1896, had said that he dropped the school question, if he had declared that he was new in the country, having been only here three or four months, that he had nothing to do with the question, and could not be responsible for what had been done before, and if he had abandoned the rights of the minority of Manitoba and gone to the country simply on the general policy of his party, he would be sitting to-day in the place now occupied by the right hon. leader of the Government.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. BERGERON. The right hon. gentleman knows that I am telling the truth. The leader of the Opposition would not have lost any more seats in the province of Quebec than he did, if he had dropped the school question, and he would have carried the other provinces. And if he sits in opposition to-day, it is because he did his duty in standing by the constitution of Canada, and it came with very bad grace from the right hon. leader of the Government to denounce a gentleman for having lost power, when he lost it because he stood by the constitution of his country, which is the only guarantee for the Roman Catholic minority of the Dominion.

The late Administration was defeated at the polls, and compelled to resign. A new Administration was formed, with a Catholic as Prime Minister. The great majority of the electors throughout the whole country pronounced themselves energetically in favour of the conciliatory policy of the leader of the Liberal party.

I say no.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. BERGERON. I say no. I come from the province of Quebec, and I know what I am talking about when I say that the majority of that province which elected the right hon. gentleman to office, did so because they were convinced, after hearing him and his supporters, that if he came into power he would give the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba more than the leader of the late Government was prepared to give them.

Some hon. MEMBERS. So he did.

Mr. BERGERON. He did not.

The total representation of the House of Commons is 213. Of that number 66 belong to the Catholic Church, and of that 66 Catholics 45 belong to the Liberal party.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BERGERON. If I were a Catholic Liberal, nothing in the world would pain me so much as the plaudits of hon. gentlemen opposite—applauding what I look upon as a political dishonour.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BERGERON (reading),

The new Administration, of which Mr. Laurier is the leader, formed on the defeat of the Conservative party, is supported in the House by 45 Catholics out of a total of 66 Catholics, as just stated. Immediately after the formation of the new Administration, negotiations were opened with the Manitoba Government.

Negotiations were opened, not by sending Sir Oliver Mowat.

Concessions were secured from them which will, we venture to hope, give satisfaction to the minority and restore peace and harmony to that province.

Where are the concessions obtained from the Manitoba Government ? What has the Manitoba Government yielded to the Government of Canada, through its sunny ways and the instrumentality of the Minister of Public Works? Nothing at all. The Manitoba minority are to-day in a worse position than they were then, because time has made it more difficult for them to obtain what they were clamouring for.

In pursuance of the negotiations concluded between the two Governments it is the Manitoba legislature itself which will effect remedial legislation.

Well, Mr. Speaker, that legislature has sat twice since then, and what have they done? Have they done anything? Let one man on that side get up and point to any law the Manitoba legislature has passed granting the relief which was promised by the First Minister, not only to the people of this country, but even to Rome. They have not done anything yet, and this is another point on which the right hon. gentleman deceived the people from whom he desired an approval of his policy.

The legislation enacts that there shall be religious instruction in the schools, so soon as the parents express a wish for it, and in places where the number of Catholic children attending the schools justifies it, the minority shall be entitled to a teacher holding their own faith.

But what will he teach? He will teach according to the books of the public schools—these schools out of which the Minister of Public Works made such capital in the past. Are they going to concede anything the minority want? No, they will have to adopt the system of the public schools which the Minister of Public Works is now perfectly satisfied with.

In districts where, owing to their being in the majority, the Catholics have heretofore had their own school commissioners, they shall continue to enjoy that privilege, which practically will give them as complete control of their schools as they have enjoyed before the abolition of the former system, with the further advantage of getting the Government grant for the schools, subject only to inspection, from time to time, and to the condition of employing only qualified teachers, while in the districts where Catholics are in a minority and where the schools are common, Catholics will be entitled to privileges which they did not before enjoy, namely, the benefit of receiving religious instruction, and in many instances of having a Catholic teacher.

This is the way the Court of Rome has been instructed on the settlement of the Manitoba school question.

There is no doubt whatever, but after the new system has been in operation for a certain period—

Yes, until a general election, I suppose.

—it will be found to work in a satisfactory manner, and that peace and harmony will once more reign among the people of Manitoba.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BERGERON. I never anticipated such a success, Mr. Speaker. I am not accustomed to be applauded on that side of the House. Now, this document is dated Ottawa, 23rd November, 1896, and signed "Wilfrid Laurier."

Mr. BERGERON.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BERGERON. And when some time ago in this House, I asked whether anything had been put before the Court of Rome, either before the Holy Father or the Sacred Propaganda, which is the political Government of Rome, any document touching upon the school question and signed in the name of Wilfrid Laurier, who is the right hon. gentleman himself—I was told by one of his colleagues that he had never heard of any such document. This is the way things are carried on by the Government of to-day.

The PRIME MINISTER. Does the hon. gentleman pretend I signed the document to Rome?

Mr. BERGERON. I do not pretend that at all, but I will tell the right hon. gentleman what I do pretend. I pretend that I have read a document which was printed in Rome and to which I find the name of the right hon. gentleman appended. I ask purely and simply the question: Has a document concerning the Manitoba school question, and signed "Wilfrid Laurier," ever been put before the Holy Father or the Sacred Propaganda? That is what I ask.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman has quoted from a book which is a compilation of documents intended to help to an understanding of the school question. Among the documents there is a memorial prepared by myself which he has just read; there is also a sermon of Bishop Lafleche; also the opinion of several bishops; also copies of three or four speeches delivered by myself at different times since 1877; also a letter from Father Lacombe; also two judgments of the Privy Council. This is the compilation that the hon. gentleman is quoting from. My memorial has found its way into that book as have all the other documents. My memorial found its way into that book just as the judgment of the Privy Council found its way into that book; just as the letter of Father Lacombe found its way into that book; just as the sermon delivered by Bishop Lafleche found its way into that book.

Mr. BERGERON. The right hon. gentleman will not get out of it like that. Here is a whole document—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BERGERON. I do not mind these interruptions. We have plenty of time. Here is a document which contains a sermon by Bishop Lafleche. The right hon. gentleman knows that Bishop Lafleche did not send this to Rome. Here is a document which contains the opinions of the Hon. Mr. Geoffrion. Was it he, a colleague of the right hon. gentleman, who has written this document ?

The PRIME MINISTER. I think not.

Mr. BERGERON. Members of this Government do not know what other members of it are doing. There is an opinion here of Mr. François Langelier. Did Mr. Langelier compile this before he went on the bench ? Here is a letter from Father Lacombe, addressed to the right hon. gentleman—a private letter.

The PRIME MINISTER. A public letter.

Mr. BERGERON. It was a private letter before it was published. There is a peroration from a speech of the right hon. gentleman, a good peroration, one of the most eloquent he has ever delivered, not such a peroration that he could not send to Rome. That is not sent without the knowledge of the hon. gentleman, or does he have somebody who does things which he should not do ? There are here a collection of the letters of the archbishops and bishops of the province of Quebec, and also a conference of the right hon. gentleman upon Catholic Liberalism. Has that been sent to Rome without his knowledge ?

The PRIME MINISTER. Certainly.

Mr. BERGERON. It has, certainly.

The PRIME MINISTER. Of course.

Mr. BERGERON. We shall find something else later on. Here is a speech of the right hon. gentleman. That has been sent without his knowledge, I suppose ?

The PRIME MINISTER. Certainly.

Mr. BERGERON. Well, certainly they will be happy to know that in Rome, to know that this has all been a sham and that the right hon. gentleman has never known anything about it. Here is the opinion of Monseigneur Lebreque, Bishop of Chicoutimi ; here is the opinion of Monseigneur Blais, Bishop of Rimouski ; the opinion of Grand Vicar Marois, the opinion of Monseigneur Begin, the opinion of Monseigneur Cameron, the opinion of Monseigneur Langevin, Archbishop of St. Boniface. I admit the hon. gentleman is in first-class company. But all this is done without his knowledge.

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes ; certainly.

Mr. BERGERON. I see here also the opinion of Mr. Prendergast, the opinion of Mr. Beausoleil, and the memorial of the right hon. gentleman which he acknowledges. And it appears that this memorial has found its place in this document, and the right hon. gentleman never heard anything about it.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Was this document ever printed in Canada ?

Mr. BERGERON. No, it is printed in Rome. In the Imprimerie Befani—we will put it on "Hansard" in case we may have to refer to it later on—Rue Celsa 6. 7. 8. and printed in 1896. I did not make this document.

The PRIME MINISTER. Neither did I.

Mr. BERGERON. But I have not written anything in it, and my right hon. friend admits that he wrote this memorial in it, and surely he has had more to do with it than I had. If I am not mistaken the right hon. gentleman has a copy before him now.

The PRIME MINISTER. No, I have my own memorial here.

Mr. BERGERON. What I have read here is a correct copy of what the right hon. gentleman has before him ?

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes.

Mr. BERGERON. Now, of course, my right hon. friend will say that he does not know why this book has never been published in Canada, why it is that Canadians who, more than any others are interested in knowing what there is in these documents have not had the advantage of reading them. Now the point I want to make is this : Whatever the right hon. gentleman says, whether he denies this or not, whether he says he did not know anything about it or not, whether it has been sent to Rome with his knowledge or not, the whole of the school question by the Liberal party, from the very commencement since 1890 has been marked by deceit. The Conservative party have been sincere. Those Conservatives who were in favour of the proposed settlement (the Remedial Bill), said so openly, and those who were opposed to it said so openly. I do not blame those hon. gentlemen opposite who were not in the last Parliament, although, I suppose they knew all about it. But I do accuse those who have been here of insincerity and having used this question unfairly as a means of obtaining power. I say the hon. Premier has deceived the Catholic population of this country during the five years that this question has been before Parliament, and I say that the right hon. gentleman, in not putting this document before the country has deceived the Protestant population of Canada by withholding from them this means of judging whether he was right or wrong. What is the result of all this pleading before the Court of Rome ? I am as good a Roman Catholic as any one of those who have signed petitions to Rome, so good a Roman Catholic that I do not need to sign petitions to Rome to prove it. And I say it is an unfortunate day for Canada when the Government of this country has to go to the head of the Roman Catholic Church to make its bad policy on the school question acceptable to the people of that denomination in Canada. The Conservative party have been trying whether in power or out of power to manage the affairs of this country so as to win the approbation of the best element of the population, and that best element is the clergy, whether Protestant or Catholic. But the right hon. gentleman, if he had made a good settlement of the Manitoba school question, one which would have satisfied the just claims of the minority, would he have had to go to Rome to ask the Holy Father's approbation of his policy? Not at all. But, having gone to Rome, having solicited the approbation of Rome, it was the duty of the right hon. gentleman to take the answer that Rome gave him. And what was the answer from Rome? The answer was that his settlement of the school question was insufficient, inefficient, and not acceptable. And he wanted to avoid letting the Protestant population of Canada know that he had been down on his knees seeking the approbation of Rome of a settlement which was not just to the minority in Manitoba. But, Sir, he is not the only one who ignores these things. In another part of this building some questions have been asked. I have here a question put to another member of the Government, and would call the attention of you, Mr. Speaker, and of the House to it. This question was put:

Whether the present Government or the Prime Minister or any member of the present Administration, has had, directly or indirectly, or is having, directly or indirectly, any negotiation, either with the government of Manitoba or any member thereof or with the Catholic religious authorities of Manitoba on the subject of the question called the schools question?

And what is the answer? Mr. Mills, the Minister of Justice, answers:

I may say in answer to my hon. friend, that the Government have not had any negotiations with the government of Manitoba or the Catholic religious authorities of that province on the subject called the school question, nor has it authorized any member of the Government to hold any such negotiations.

That is the answer of one of the Ministers. What does another Minister say?

The present Government had a conference with the Government of Manitoba, and they came to an agreement which was confirmed by the Manitoba legislature, and that is the end of it, so far as the public are concerned.

One answer was given on the 25th of April, 1898, and the other on the 2nd of May in the same year. The two Ministers gave two different answers. Now, another question was asked concerning Mr. Russell, who has been acting for the present Government since they came into power, and who accompanied the Solicitor General to Rome. There was a letter from Mr. Russell, dated at Rome on the 26th of November, 1897, and as it has been read, and I think is in the "Hansard," I need not read it again. What is the answer given in the Senate regarding this letter? Here is the answer, taken from the organ of the party:

Hon. R. W. Scott said that neither the Government or any member of the Administration had had any negotiations with the Holy See on the question, on the above or any other subject. He quoted Todd and Bourinot to show that a Minister of the Crown was not bound to answer a categorical question which dealt with a private matter between any member of the Government and the authorities of the Church to which he belonged. So far as the Government was concerned there had been absolutely no communications or negotiations of a public character.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I said at the commencement, this is a most important question. It is this question which has put the right hon. gentleman in power, and it has not been settled yet. It is to-day in a worse position than it was when he came into power. The right hon. gentleman has deceived both the Catholic minority before the elections, and the Protestant majority since the elections. Whenever we ask information from the Government we cannot get anything reliable from them.

Mr. MCGREGOR. The people are satisfied with us, anyway.

Mr. BERGERON. Some hon. gentlemen opposite will have great difficulty in explaining some things to their electors the next time they meet them. Now, I want to ask the hon. gentleman whether he did not call the Archbishop of St. Boniface to come down here and meet him after the last session. I think the right hon. gentleman can answer "yes" or "no" to that question. Perhaps he thinks it is safer not to answer. Now, I will conclude my remarks by saying that the present Government sought to obtain power on this question, and they did obtain it. Are they happy over it? They may say so. But, Mr. Speaker, whenever we go upon the streets of Montreal, out of ten Liberals that we meet, eight of them are dissatisfied with the present Administration. And for good reasons. The present Government, in seeking to obtain power, were not moved by any motive of the public good, they were not returned to power on any policy in the interest of the Dominion of Canada. The proof of it is that they have adopted the fiscal policy of the late Conservative Government. What have they done during the two years that they have been in power? They have dismissed public employees, but they have not accomplished anything in the interest of the country. Sir, this school question has put the Minister of Public Works where he is to-day; the school question has brought the Minister of the Interior into this House; the school question has given to the Liberal party a master in the person of the Minister of Public Works. But fortunately there is something above every one of us. The Minister of Public Works is aiming at something, and everybody knows he cannot get it. But he is bound to stay here, and surrounded by men who have no confidence in him, if we may judge by the declarations of the Liberal clubs in Montreal. The clubs in Montreal have meetings every week where they pass resolutions asking the Prime Minister to get rid of the Minister of Public Works. But the Prime Minister cannot get rid of him, and I would advise him not to get rid of him. They have tried to pass the Drummond County deal, but they have not succeeded; they have tried to pass the Yukon deal, but they have not succeeded. They have been practising deception in everything that they have tried, and they will keep doing so until they go before their masters. The Minister of Public Works stated one day that the people of this country had changed masters. He made a mistake. He is the servant, not the master of the people of this country. It is the people of this country who are our masters. Hon. gentlemen opposite can enjoy what they call the sweets of office until they go before their masters whom they have deceived once, but whom they will not be able to deceive a second time.

ADJOURNMENT—DEATH OF MR. McCARTHY, M.P.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). It is my very sad duty to convey to the House an intelligence which perhaps is not altogether unlooked for, but which will be, at the same time, received. I am sure, with great sadness by this House. I have just been informed that our colleague, Mr. Dalton McCarthy, died a few minutes ago. Under such circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I am sure I am but anticipating the wishes of the House, and in this I have the concurrence of my hon. friend who leads the Opposition, in moving the adjournment of the House. We have just lost one of the most eminent men in Canada, one of the most important members of this House, a man who added dignity to public life, and who was an authority in his profession. Those who have been in the House in former years are aware that Mr. McCarthy held a unique position in this House. He had been for a long time a Conservative, he had differed somewhat from his party, though he had never been closely allied with the Liberal party. He had his own views and ideas, and of those who may have differed from him upon many questions, I am sure that no one who knew him, no one who heard him, but respected his character, respected his views and respected his opinions. The country has met with a great loss, the House has met with a great loss, and as I said a moment ago, I believe I am only anticipating the wishes of the House in moving that we proceed no further with this sitting, and that the House do now adjourn.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I rise to second the motion made in such appropriate terms by the leader of the House. It is but as yesterday that Mr. McCarthy was here in the enjoyment of all the health and vigour, both physical and intellectual, that we know characterized him. To-night he has for ever left this earthly scene. It shows us what shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue. I regret to say that my relations with that hon. gentleman were not of the intimate character of those of the leader of the House; but every member of this House cannot but recognize that the profession to which he belonged has lost one of its most distinguished ornaments, and we all long since recognized the great ability he brought to the discussion of public questions in this House. I believe his untimely and lamented death will be received with universal regret, not only in this House, but throughout the country.

Mr. WALLACE. In rising to move the adjournment of the debate, I wish to add a word to the remarks made by the right hon. the First Minister and the leader of the Opposition. During the last few years the late lamented member for North Simcoe and myself were brought more closely together than we had been for years previously, and as I became more closely intimate with him I was led to admire above all other qualities, his great earnestness and sincerity. He had strong convictions, which he followed out no matter whither the conclusions led him. I think this was one of his distinguishing features, and it is an admirable feature in any man's character. This country will sustain a very great loss by the death of this eminent citizen of Canada, because he set an example to Canadians of earnestness and uprightness in his public career. It is a singular coincidence that his death should have occurred when this House was engaged in the discussion of a question in which no member took a warmer or deeper interest than the late lamented member for North Simcoe. I wish to add my tribute to his worth and the loss which this House and country will sustain by his death.

Motion to adjourn the debate agreed to.

The PRIME MINISTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 9.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 12th May, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

NEGOTIATIONS WITH NEWFOUNDLAND.

Mr. RODDICK asked,

Is it the intention of the Government to reopen negotiations with the Government of Newfoundland with a view to bringing the island into confederation?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). In reply to my hon. friend, I beg to say that, in the opinion of the Government, the moment is not opportune to reopen these negotiations.

WORKS ON THE CORNWALL CANAL.

Mr. BRODER (by Mr. Taylor) asked,

What work is to be done on the upper entrance of the Cornwall Canal under the tenders asked for in the advertisement published by the Department of Railways and Canals under date of 8th April, 1898? Was not the improvement of this part of the Cornwall Canal completed under the plans of the late chief engineer of canals, Mr. Page? If so, has anything since occurred to necessitate a change? What is the estimated cost of the works proposed to be done, and what benefit will it be to navigation? What is the reason for particular haste in the completion of the proposed new work? Why is the lump sum of $17,000 named in the advertisement as the amount to accompany the tender, when it is found on inquiry and on reading the specifications that there are three separate contracts to be let, and therefore three separate deposits required, the amounts being $2,000, $5,000 and $10,000?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The work to be done on the upper entrance of the Cornwall Canal under the tenders asked for in the advertisement published by the Department of Railways and Canals under date of 8th April, 1898, is as follows:—

Approximate quantities of work—

340,000	cubic yards	earth excavation.
20,000	do	boulder do
3,300	do	broken stone protection.
1,100	lineal yards	bank preparation for stone protection.
2,000	lineal feet	fencing.

The improvement of this part of the canal was not completed under the plans of the late chief engineer, Mr. Page. The execution of this work is the carrying out of his plans. No change is being made from Mr. Page's plans. The department does not deem it advisable at present, and pending the receipt of tenders and award of contract, to make any statement as to estimated cost of the works. The object of the work is to allow large vessels entering the canal to clear themselves from the cross current and prevent their being carried over the Long Sault Rapids. The reason of having the work done at this period is to have a safe entrance for large vessels upon the opening of the canals for 14 feet navigation. The object of the $17,000 deposit security, is to secure the carrying out of the tenders for each of the three works covered by advertising, viz.: Cornwall, upper entrance improvement, $10,000; Hamilton Island section improvement, $2,000; St. Regis section of Lake St. Francis improvement, $5,000, each of which works may be contracted for with separate contractors.

Mr. WALLACE.

ALIEN LABOUR ACT.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall complete the answer I gave to the member for Toronto (Mr. Clarke) yesterday with regard to the appointments of agents by the Government, under the Alien Labour Act. The following is the list of agents appointed under "the Alien Labour Act," and dates of appointment:—

W. F. McCreary, Winnipeg, Man.	23rd July, 1897.
James Lawson, Fort Erie.....	13th Sept., 1897.
Art. Boyle, Niagara Falls, Ont.	13th Sept., 1897.
Jas. H. Kenning, Windsor, Ont..	23rd Sept., 1897.
R. Rush, Sault Ste. Marie, Ont..	25th Sept., 1897.
A. C. Paterson, North Portal, N.W.T.....	18th Oct., 1897.
H. Tennant, Coutts, N.W.T....	18th Oct., 1897.
J. A. McMartin, Huntington, B.C.	18th Oct., 1897.
A. Lawrence, Gretna, Man.....	18th Oct., 1897.
T. J. Mather, Gretna, Man.....	18th Oct., 1897.
G. G. Allen, Emerson, Man.....	18th Oct., 1897.
W. Mills, Emerson, Man.....	18th Oct., 1897.
F. Spain, Bridgeburg, Ont.....	19th Apr., 1898.
W. B. McMurrich, Toronto, Ont..	11th May, 1898.

Mr. BENNETT. Is it the intention of the Government to put the Act in force on the north shore of the Georgian Bay, where, I am informed, a large number of Americans are now being employed?

The PRIME MINISTER. The matter is doubtless under the consideration of the Department of Justice. I cannot give an answer to-day, but will inquire.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS—AGREEMENT WITH MR. HARRIS, MANAGER.

Mr. FOSTER. Would the hon. Minister of Railways be kind enough to lay on the Table a copy of the agreement made with Mr. Harris, who was appointed manager of the Government railways. There is no opportunity now for making a formal motion as the session is so far advanced, and

I hope my hon. friend will have no objection to bringing this down without a formal motion.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I cannot lay any agreement on the Table, because we have none.

Mr. FOSTER. No agreement?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No. There are certain instructions accompanying the notice of appointment, which I shall be very glad to bring down. That covers everything.

CHARGES AGAINST LIEUTENANT COLONEL DOMVILLE.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence if he would, without formal notice, bring down copies of all charges made against Lieutenant Colonel Domville, commanding officer of the 8th Hussars. I understand that these charges were made and that the General refused investigation, and the only method now is to have the papers called for. I trust my hon. friend will bring them down without formal motion.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I think that is a very unusual request to make. I may say to my hon. friend that I have not yet seen the charges to which he referred. I have heard that there were some such charges. I wish he would allow the matter to rest where it is, and I will be able to give him a reply.

DISMISSAL OF DR. ORTON AS INDIAN MEDICAL SUPERINTENDENT.

Mr. SPROULE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to say that I hold in my hand a return to the order of the House of 18th April, 1898, for copies of all letters, papers and correspondence or reports between the Minister of the Interior or any of his departmental employees, and any Indian agent or agents regarding the dismissal of Dr. George Orton as medical superintendent of Indians in the province of Manitoba. I find that all the correspondence brought down consists of one letter dated Ottawa, 18th February, 1897, to the effect that Dr. Orton's services were dispensed with by Order in Council. This letter is signed by Hayter Reed, Deputy Superintendent, and addressed to E. McColl, Inspector of Indian Agencies in Winnipeg, Man. I know that there was more correspondence than this, and, therefore, the order of this House has been disobeyed, for what reason I do not understand. I do not think there can be any justifiable reason why all the correspondence should not be given to the House as I do not believe any of it was private. I would like to know whether the order of the House is to be obeyed or not?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Mr. Speaker, all the correspondence has been brought down so far as I have any knowledge of, or so far as it is known to the officers of the department.

Mr. SPROULE. I know all the correspondence is not brought down, for I have copies of letters that have passed between officers of the department and Dr. Orton, and there is only one here, and that is a letter sent to Mr. McColl, inspector of Indian agencies, notifying him that by Order in Council Dr. Orton had been dismissed.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. All I have to say is that the order was sent to the Secretary of the department and he was told to send all the correspondence. When the return was prepared he was asked if that was all the correspondence, and he said it was. If the hon. gentleman will give me the information he has I will have the matter looked into.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). I would like to call the attention of the leader of the Government to an order passed on the 18th of last month in connection with the death of two young men in the west. I sent the note to the Premier with regard to the matter. The return has not been brought down so far as I know.

SUPPLY—MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION—ADDRESS TO THE HOLY FATHER.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding:

That Mr. Speaker do leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply.

Mr. WALLACE. On a question of such importance as that which is now brought before the House, it is a matter for regret, I think, that there is no conclusiveness in the way the subject has been introduced for discussion, and also in the fact that we were not informed in advance that it would come up for our consideration. However, it is now here. We listened yesterday to the statements with regard to the Manitoba school question and the mode in which the Government had dealt with it. I was much surprised indeed that in the whole of the discussion yesterday the question was regarded largely, if not wholly, from the point of view of the interests of a certain church and by members of that church. I think it is a reason for regret that the debate did not take a wider range. In the observations I have to make to-day I shall speak, not as a member of any church or any sect or any denomination, but as a Canadian citizen, jealous of the rights that have been given to us under responsible government as Canadians and jealous of the rights that have been handed down to us as British subjects. British subjects all over the world have a freedom and liberty enjoyed by no other people. The debate so far as it has gone, has disclosed facts which are disturbing if not alarming to those who value our freedom as Canadian citizens and British subjects.

The late Government of Sir Mackenzie Bowell formulated a policy with regard to this question, which, when brought before this House, was very fully discussed. A general election followed immediately afterwards. In that election the present leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), then the leader of the Government, inherited this Manitoba school question as a legacy from his predecessor, and had, I must admit, a hard battle to fight. But he fought with his usual courage and ability, although, so far as the province of Ontario was concerned, he fought almost single-handed as a Minister. However, the matter was discussed very thoroughly before the country. By the consent of both parties it was really made the great issue before the electors in the general election of 1896. The result of the elections was that the present right hon. Premier received the confidence of the majority of the electors of Canada, and his policy with reference to the matter was approved of. So far as that went, a great many Conservatives, if they did not give hearty assistance to him in the programme he had laid down, gave passive assistance at any rate, and viewed with a great deal of composure the accession to power of the right hon. gentleman and his party. The right hon. gentleman laid down as his programme in this House and before the electors during the campaign that he was opposed to coercing Manitoba, that there were to be no separate schools so far as we were concerned and that the Government of the Dominion of Canada would propose no remedial legislation. Sir, that programme was fairly well carried out. We hear, particularly from the member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), and the junior member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) that different promises were made in other parts of the Dominion. With that statement I am not going to concern myself, particularly just now. If the right hon. Premier made promises different from those I have stated, he will have to settle with the electorate where those promises were made. I shall not discuss that matter now. Well, Sir, after having obtained the approval of the people of Canada for their settlement of this question, and after coming into power, this Government referred the matter to the province of Manitoba, and the question was settled by the people of Manitoba, as they had a right to settle it. Under the constitution the people of the province have control of educational matters. If the people of Manitoba choose to adopt a system of separate schools for the province, those of us who live in other provinces would have no possible right to object. If they choose to go back to the old system, it is quite within their right to do so. But they, while making some moderate concessions to the minority, refused to adopt the principle of separate schools. And we were told that there was a settlement of the case so far as the people of this country were concerned. We have the evidence in many quarters that that was the view expressed by the members of the Government in the House and out of it, and by their supporters as well. But immediately that that was done, what do we find? That the Government who had displayed, at any rate, the courage of carrying out their pledges, turned round and adopted a different programme. Immediately afterwards we find them sending emissaries to Rome. The first one who went to Rome, as mentioned by the hon. member for Beauharnois, was, I think, Abbé Proulx. A number of other gentlemen went to Rome on the same business. Chevallier Drolet was sent to Rome, and I believe that our Solicitor General made one visit, if not more than one visit, to Rome.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). Only one.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Charles Russell, I am told, was sent to Rome on a special mission, to obtain the interference of the Pope of Rome in a settlement that had been made in the Dominion of Canada. Why, Sir, I thought this was a Canadian question, that it had come before the Canadian electorate for their consideration, that when the Canadian people had pronounced upon it, their will should be law, and that their will having been carried out, we had no occasion to go to a foreign potentate or to anybody else to obtain his approval of the course that had been mapped out by a majority of the Canadian people. But we find that we were mistaken. This settlement that we were told was a final settlement, a complete settlement, we are now told on the authority of this gentleman was not a settlement at all. Mr. Russell, in a letter which I have here, says:

We do not solicit His Holiness to sanction as perfect the concessions obtained, but that in his wisdom he will be pleased to regard them as a beginning of justice. With the aid of time, and thanks to the patient work of persuasion by their compatriots, the Catholics of Manitoba may hope to obtain satisfaction.

That is the language of an agent of the Government, that is not a privately expressed opinion, but it is the authoritative opinion of an agent of the Government who was sent there, I presume, by the Government, who was doing Government work, and who was making those representations to His Holiness the Pope. Why did they do this? Had the Government lost faith in themselves? Were they not satisfied with the settlement that was made? They expressed themselves to us as satisfied with that settlement, and that it was the conclusion of the whole matter, so far as they were concerned. But we find that from that day almost down to the present day, negotiations have been going on, and going on in a way that I think should meet with the condemnation of every right-thinking Canadian. Last year it was stated to this House by the Minister of Public Works that a petition had been sent by forty-five legislators, members of Parliament and of the Government, and Senators. We are told, I believe, that these gentlemen signed that petition as private individuals. Mr. Speaker, there never was a more transparent farce than the pretense that they went as private citizens. They state in their petition that they are legislators. The first name on that petition, I believe, is the name of the right hon. First Minister; then come the names of members of the Government who signed it, and then other members of Parliament and Senators. This was an emanation from a political party, from the political party that administers the affairs of this country to-day, and they cannot dissociate themselves as private persons from their position as members of the Government and rulers of this country. I say, Sir, that they are primarily responsible to the people of this country for whatever act they do in that regard; they cannot separate their position as members of the Government, as rulers of this country and claim to go there as a number of private individuals. They were particular to tell His Holiness the Pope that they were there as legislators. In that petition, I believe, Sir Wilfrid Laurier signed his name as Premier of Canada. At any rate, others add their titles, so that they went there, not as private citizens, and they cannot pretend that they went there as private citizens. There was a Cardinal at Rome much addicted to swearing.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. Don't spoil a good story.

Mr. WALLACE. Who was admonished by his chaplain against such a bad practice. His reply was that he did not swear as a Cardinal but as a Prince of the Roman Empire. The chaplain said, then if you are damned for swearing as a Prince of the Roman Empire, what becomes of the Cardinal? And so I say that the conduct of these gentlemen in this respect is utterly indefensible as members of the Government. The leader of the Government is to be condemned utterly for the course he has taken. Now, Sir, in reference to that petition, we had a visit from the ambassador of the Pope last year, Monseigneur Merry del Val. His visit here was looked upon by many people in this country with great suspicion, and with a good deal of dissatisfaction as well, because the Canadian people recognize the fact that we are amply and abundantly able to regulate our own affairs without the interference of outsiders, no matter where those outsiders come from. But, Sir, what follows? The Government was sending their agent to the city of Rome under the pay of the Canadian Government, because we find from a statement given in answer to a question in the House some days ago, that Chevalier Drolet, who was in Rome many times on the business of the Government in this connection, has been very abundantly rewarded, not with regular fees, it is true, but with mining claims which disclose, in my opinion, a gross piece of corruption, and something that the Minister of the Interior will be called to account for before he gets through with this matter. This Chevalier Drolet receives, not a cash payment, because they could not very well manage that, but he receives a number of valuable mining claims in the richest mining district in the world. The Government propose to give Mackenzie & Mann those mining claims on the land, and Chevalier Drolet and some others of their friends those on the water. Between the two, there would be no very great wealth left in that part of our North-west Territories. Now, it appears that Mr. Charles Russell, who was their confidential adviser, went to Rome on more than one occasion to get the sanction and approval of the Pope of Rome for the course that a Canadian Government had taken in matters affecting the Canadian people. Now, I remember the right hon. Premier, on more than one occasion, in this House and out of it, telling the people of Canada that the model statesman, the man whom he admired above others, the man who was the best living exponent of British Liberal principles, was the Hon. Mr. Gladstone. I know that he has on many occasions given us the privilege of hearing political truths that were laid down by Mr. Gladstone. I regret that in this connection the right hon. gentleman has failed to read Mr. Gladstone's opinion concerning just such matters as the reference of this school question to the Pope of Rome, or that if he had read it, he has not taken the sound advice given by that distinguished statesman. Sir, what does Mr. Gladstone say about the Pope of Rome and his interference in civil matters? He speaks very decidedly upon that matter, and I will trouble the House with reading a quotation which I think very accurately states the position that the free Governments of Great Britain and of our own Canada should take with regard to any interference of that kind. Mr. Gladstone published a celebrated pamphlet some years ago on the subject of Papal infallibility. Part of it is as follows:—

Absolute obedience, it is boldly declared, is due to the Pope, at the peril of salvation, not alone in faith, in morals, but in all things which concern the discipline and government of the Church. Thus are swept into the Papal net whole multitudes of facts, whole systems of government, prevailing, though in different degrees, in every country of the world. Even in the United States, where the severance between Church and State is supposed to be complete, a long catalogue might be drawn of subjects belonging to the domain and competency of the state, but also undeniably affecting the government of the Church, such as, by way of example, marriage, burial, education, prison discipline, blasphemy, poor relief, incorporation, mortmain, religious endowments, vows of celibacy and obedience. In Europe the circle is far wider, the points of contact and of interlacing almost innumerable. But on all matters respecting which any Pope may think proper to declare that they concern either faith or morals, or the government or discipline of the Church, he claims, with the approval of a council undoubtedly ecumenical in the Roman sense, the absolute obedience, at the peril of salvation, of every member of his communion. It seems not as yet to have been thought wise to pledge the council in terms to the syllabus and the encyclical. That achievement is probably reserved for some one of its sittings yet to come. In the meantime, it is well to remember that this claim in respect of all things affecting the discipline and government of the Church, as well as faith and conduct, is lodged in open day by and in the reign of a Pontiff who has condemned free speech, free writing, a free press, toleration of non-conformity, liberty of conscience, the study of civil and philosophical matters in independence of the ecclesiastical authority, marriage unless sacramentally contracted, and the definition by the state of the civil rights (jura) of the Church; who has demanded for the Church, therefore, the title to define its own civil rights, together with a divine right to civil immunities, and a right to use physical force, and who has also proudly asserted that the Popes of the middle ages, with their councils, did not invade the rights of princes—as, for example, Gregory VII of the Emperor Henry IV, Innocent III of Raymond of Toulouse, Paul III in deposing Henry VIII, or Pius V in performing the like paternal office for Elizabeth.

This is the doctrine laid down by Mr. Gladstone. He says, further :

The state will, I trust, be ever careful to leave the domain of religious conscience free, and yet to keep it to its own domain, and to allow neither private caprice nor, above all, foreign arrogance, to dictate to it on the discharge of its proper office. "England expects every man to do his duty," and none can be so well prepared under all circumstances to exact its performance as that Liberal party, which has done the work of justice alike for Nonconformists and for Papal dissidents, and whose members have so often, for the sake of that work, hazarded their credit with the markedly Protestant constituencies of the country. Strong as the state of the United Kingdom has always been in material strength and its moral panoply is now, we may hope, pretty complete. It is not, then, for the dignity of the Crown and people of the United Kingdom to be diverted from a path which they have deliberately chosen and which it does not rest with all the myrmidons of the Apostolic chamber either openly to obstruct, or secretly to undermine. It is rightfully to be expected, it is greatly to be desired, that the Roman Catholics of this country should do in the nineteenth century what their forefathers of England, except a handful of emissaries, did in the sixteenth, when they were marshalled in resistance to the Armada, and in the seventeenth, when, in spite of Papal chair, they sat in the House of Lords under the oath of allegiance. That which we are entitled to desire we are entitled also to expect; indeed, to say we did not expect it would, in my judgment, be the true way of conveying an "insult" to those concerned. In this expectation we may be partially disappointed. Should those to whom I appeal thus unhappily come to bear witness in their own persons to the decay of sound, manly, true life in their Church, it will be their loss more than ours. The inhabitants of these islands as a whole are stable, though sometimes credulous and excitable; resolute, though sometimes boastful; and a strong-headed and stout-hearted race will not be hindered, either by latent or by avowed dissents, due to the foreign influence of a caste, from the accomplishment of its mission in the world.

Mr. WALLACE.

Those are the sound views which should prevail with the right hon. First Minister, more especially as he has all his life proclaimed that Mr. Gladstone was the ablest exponent of British statesmanship and policy living to-day, or perhaps who has lived in the history of the country. But, Sir, what does he do? The Pope of Rome, so far as we know, has not thrust his intervention in this matter at all. If so, I am mistaken; but the Premier goes to the Pope of Rome, he sends his agents to the Pope of Rome. What does he say? Mr. Russell, in a letter I have here, and which I assume is genuine and authentic, says as follows, the communication being addressed to His Eminence Cardinal Rampolla, Secretary of State to the Pope of Rome :

Eminence,—I have just arrived at Rome once again, at the urgent request of the Catholic members of the Government and of the Parliament of Canada, in whose name I have already presented myself to you. Although I have come so far, I do not dare to present myself to Your Eminence, because I would not in the least like, at this moment, to seem to be bringing pressure to bear or wish to impede the complete liberty of His Holiness. Moreover, I know how busy Your Eminence is, and I remember with what patience Your Eminence has so many times before heard our representations on the subject of Manitoba, which, besides, Your Eminence now fully understands.

I should not even like to give you the trouble to read this letter if I had not been very particularly asked to go to Rome by those whom I represent.

Who are those he represents? The Premier of the Dominion and the Catholic members of the Government of the Dominion. He goes to Rome. What was the necessity of these visits to Rome? It was thought at the last election that the First Minister was given power to settle the question and that we, as Canadians, had the settlement of our own affairs. We were rudely awakened, however, when we found by these letters published the other day that the Prime Minister holds a different view from that which the people of Canada as a whole entertain on this subject. We are now told this for the first time, what we perhaps have suspected and known in a general way, but the citizens of Canada are told now that their agent received in cash or sent in as bills no less than $12,000 for the short period he has been acting as Canadian agent, the principal portion of which has been for visits to the city of Rome. I do not indeed care what they represent, but I venture to say that the people will be called upon to pay expenses of Mr. Charles Russell in this matter. The people have no right to pay a dollar of this money.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. They have not paid any.

Mr. WALLACE. Accounts for more than $8,500 remain unpaid. Is it because these bills have to be covered up?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is not the case. There is not a single item in the account for visits to Rome.

Mr. WALLACE. Do you think there would be entered, trips to Rome, £100 or £200? They know better than that. Why were not the bills brought down before the Public Accounts Committee?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. They were. These accounts were asked to be brought down before the Public Accounts Committee by the hon. member for Pictou, and instructions were given to the Deputy Minister to produce them there.

Mr. WALLACE. So far as I know, those bills have not yet been produced.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The member for Pictou can state whether that is the case or not.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have an idea, although of that I am not certain, that I asked for these accounts to be produced before the committee. I have not seen them, and I do not know that they have been brought down.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. One word of personal explanation. The hon. member (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) asked me if these bills would be brought down, and I told him that if he would drop a note to the Deputy Minister of Justice they would be produced forthwith.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I accept that statement fully, but I never wrote the note.

Mr. WILSON. The Solicitor General told the Deputy Minister of Justice to bring down the accounts of Mr. Russell to the Committee on Public Accounts.

Mr. WALLACE. The Solicitor General also asked me to write to the Deputy Minister and I did so immediately, but have received no reply, so that the accounts are either not down yet, or if they are we have not been notified as we should be.

Mr. FOSTER. The course always taken is that when a member asks for papers, and the order is made by the Public Accounts Committee, the secretary of the committee sends a note to the person asking for them notifying him that they have been brought down. The hon. member who asked for these papers has not yet got the notification and the presumption is that they have not been brought down.

Mr. WALLACE. That is the usual course, and I have received no notice that these papers have been brought down. But, Mr. Speaker, what I said was this: The Solicitor General is not going to present the accounts for the visit to Rome, because the Government have told us that the visit was on private business, but I can safely say that since these solicitors were appointed the legal agents of the Canadian Government in London have presented bills for £2,450, and I state that they have not earned £2,450 sterling in the service of Canada. This Mr. Russell says that he was fully credited on behalf of these members of the Government and of the Parliament of Canada, and I presume that hon. gentlemen opposite will not repudiate that statement. This gentleman has told the Pope of Rome that this is only an instalment of justice to the minority in the province of Manitoba, although we were told by members of the Government in this House that it was a full and final settlement and that so far as the Parliament of Canada was concerned it would no more be heard of here. But when the members of the Government of Canada and those supporting them in this House write to the Pope of Rome and send that emissary to him, they tell the Pope that the settlement of the Manitoba school question is only a first instalment of justice and that further justice will be done later on. Sir, this is an attempt to deceive the Canadian people who believe so far as the Government of Canada was concerned they would hear no more of this question, which as I believe should never have come before this Parliament. But there is another and a serious matter. Mr. Charles Russell in writing to Cardinal Rampolla, makes this statement:

My instructions enjoin me again to renew to Your Eminence the desire which I had already honour to express to you, that His Holiness will be pleased to name a permanent delegate to Canada.

These gentlemen opposite may say—I do not know whether they will or not—that this refers to religious matters. Well, Sir, with regard to the religion of any hon. member or of any citizen of Canada we have nothing whatever to do; nor have we the right to interfere in the smallest degree with the full exercise of his religion no matter what that religion may be. But, Sir, the Government will not dare to say that this is a religious question, because the Roman Catholic Church has her ministers, and her bishops and her archbishops in Canada to attend to these religious matters, and the members of this Government would not dare to interfere in the appointment of an Apostolic delegate on purely religious grounds. What kind of a delegate is this? For what purpose is His Holiness the Pope of Rome asked to send a permanent delegate to Canada? Sir, it is with a view of interfering with our legislation in the Parliament of Canada or in the various legislatures.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. WALLACE. Well, he had better not. I ask some hon. member of the Government to explain what is the meaning of this permanent delegate to the Dominion of Canada and what are his duties to be, because we know that it cannot be in regard to religious matters that the members of the Government have asked the Pope to send a delegate here? For five hundred years, Mr. Speaker, the British people have protested against the interference of a foreign potentate in their internal affairs. Every dynasty, every century has seen conflicts in this direction, and the people of England in all these hundreds of years have been steady in their determination to conduct their own affairs as they desire. I believe, Sir, that the people of Canada are actuated by the same impulses, by the same love of liberty, and by the same determination to manage their own politics. The people of Canada will resent the appointment of a permanent delegate to this country from the Pope of Rome. We have no need of such an officer in this country. We are perfectly competent to manage our own business. We have enjoyed responsible government in this Dominion for fifty years, and although we may make mistakes we can correct them. This country has been governed in accordance with the wishes of our people. We have a greater amount of freedom here than any other country, not even excepting England herself. We have had liberty to pass our own laws as we think they should be passed, and, Sir, we will resent the appointment of a Papal delegate to interfere with the Canadian people in anything they may desire to legislate upon. Sir, I am surprised that the First Minister is giving his sanction in any way to such a proposal. It is wrong policy; it is something that will not be tolerated by the Canadian people. An American writer puts the position of affairs in a most comprehensive style and I will trouble the House with a brief quotation from him. This was not written within the last thirty or forty days since our friends to the south have become exceedingly friendly to Great Britain, but it was written about three years ago by a gentleman who, I believe, is a Roman Catholic himself and who recognizes the fairness of Great Britain and her just dealing towards every class of her subjects. He says:

Mr. WALLACE.

Though the most Protestant, yet, confident in her strength, she is the most tolerant of nations; without question or price the refugee of any and of all countries finds shelter in England. There the socialistic Gentile, the hunted Jew, or the persecuted Jesuit can flee, and find a home and protection; none have ever been proscribed because of their "poverty," their politics, their race or religion—can any other nation boast a like freedom? Only one condition is exacted, "obey the law, for England is governed by law, not by mood or sentiment."

The writer of this is Mr. Edward Phelan, of Concord, Mass. I think it expresses accurately the attitude of Great Britain, as well as that of Canadians, and I think this Government has made a very grievous mistake in going outside of the Dominion of Canada and asking a foreign potentate to interfere in the regulation of our domestic affairs. As I have said, the people of Canada are amply able to transact their own business, and they will deal fairly with any class of our citizens. The minority in Canada, I care not of what religion that minority may be, will find that the majority will in all cases deal honourably and fairly, and more than fairly, with the minority. That has been the history in the past, I believe, in every province of this Dominion; and this Government who we were told had settled this question, immediately afterwards sent their agents and emissaries, one after another, to the city of Rome, for no purpose that can be commended by the Canadian people. The right hon. First Minister asked the confidence of the people of Canada to legislate on this matter; the people of Canada gave him that confidence, and he should have been satisfied with that, and not have gone out of our country for the sanction or approval of any foreign potentate. This country, Mr. Speaker, is governed by Canadians for Canadians, in the interest of Canada and the British Empire, and I say that we in Canada will always resent any foreign interference in our domestic affairs.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, before the debate is continued, I would like to say one word in reference to Mr. Charles Russell, whose name has been introduced. The hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), I have no doubt, has reason to say that he understood me to ask for these accounts, though I have never as yet had the slightest curiosity to see them, and have no recollection of having asked for them.

Mr. WALLACE. I asked for them.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think probably some one else asked for them, but that is a small matter. The Auditor-General's accounts, which were before the Public Accounts Committee, show only a small advance to Mr. Russell. But knowing Mr. Russell as I do, after a somewhat long acquaintance too, it is right for me to say, lest I should be understood as suspecting him of any dishonourable conduct, that he is a gentleman of the highest standing in his profession as a solicitor in London, that he did excellent work for Canada at Paris, where he rendered the most valuable assistance in the conduct of the British side of the case, in connection with the Behring Sea question, and that he is the last man in the world whom I would suspect of doing anything that would reflect upon him either as a solicitor or as a gentleman. Nor do I believe that he would attempt indirectly to make any charge for services for which he was entitled to charge. He would render such an account, I believe, as he thought he was entitled to render, and then leave it, as other members of the profession do, for those to whom it was rendered to decide what they would pay. While saying that for Mr. Russell, while I am on my feet, and without the slightest reflection upon him, I may give this as my opinion of the significance of his visits to Rome. It is quite likely, as I view it, that Mr. Russell, having had a great favour conferred upon him in being appointed to the very distinguished and valuable position in London of solicitor of the Canadian Government at the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite, was doubtless ready to render a favour to those gentlemen, or any of them—the Solicitor General, for instance—at his own cost and charges, to do them a good turn, if asked. That he did them a good turn no one can doubt. At the same time I have not the slightest suspicion that he would endeavour to be paid out of the public funds if he were not entitled to make a charge. The extraordinary favour that is done him I do not grudge, except in one way. I would have been very glad, at the time I was a member of the Government, if I could have myself utilized his valuable services in London in connection with the public departments, but a firm of great respectability, who had been established for many years in London, the firm of Bischoff, Bompas & Bischoff, had acted as agents and solicitors for the Conservative Government and the old Reform Government of Canada for very many years; and much as I would have liked to have done Mr. Russell that good turn, so far as it was a good turn, I never could understand how, for no good reason, that firm could have been given up as they were, and another gentleman taken in their stead.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I do not see that the question which has been introduced by the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), and has afterwards been taken up by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), requires any remarks at all at my hands. I have only a very few words to say in answer to some insinuations which were made by the hon. member for Beauharnois, and afterwards repeated and extended by the hon. member for West York. It is quite plain and quite evident that the speech which we heard to-day from the hon. member for West York is a very apposite commentary on the speech delivered yesterday by the hon. member for Beauharnois.

Mr. BERGERON. Would my right hon. friend allow me one word before he goes further? The right hon. gentleman has spoken already, and I am very glad to hear him again. But I claim the same privilege afterwards.

Mr. SPEAKER. There is no doubt that both hon. gentlemen have already spoken on this question. If either wishes to speak a second time, the usual course is to do so on a motion to adjourn the debate.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I move that the debate be adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER. I was going to say that it is quite plain and quite evident that the speech which we have heard to-day from the hon. member for West York is a very legitimate and apposite comment on the speech delivered yesterday by the hon. member for Beauharnois. The hon. member for Beauharnois yesterday thought it advisable, thought it opportune, thought it fitting, for reasons which I may just as well abstain from investigating, to endeavour to resuscitate the Manitoba school question; but it was evident to those who listened to him from first to last, by his innuendoes, his remarks and his comments, that he was carefully preparing a brief for the hon. member for West York, and giving that hon. gentleman the opportunity, of which he has now availed himself, of delivering a no-Popery speech on the floor of this House. The hon. member for Beauharnois yesterday pretended to advocate the cause of the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba; but by the result which he has already achieved, it is plain and evident to everybody that his professed friendship was nothing but a betrayal—was nothing else than the kiss of Judas. To-day the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) took for the text of his remarks the speech delivered yesterday by the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), and we have witnessed a repetition of the same tactics practiced for years and years by the Conservative party upon this question of the Manitoba schools, of having one speech for Catholic Quebec and another for Protestant Ontario. The hon. member for Beauharnois yesterday wanted to make it appear that I appealed to the Papal See. This is how he opened the subject:

I myself asked in the House some time ago, whether any document signed "Wilfrid Laurier," the name of the Prime Minister, had ever been sent either to His Holiness the Pope or to the Sacred Propaganda in Rome—which Roman Catholics in this House will know is the political tribunal of Rome—touching the Manitoba schools. I was answered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) that he did not know that any such document had ever been sent either to His Holiness the Pope or to the Sacred Propaganda. Now, either the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) knew that there was such a document and would not tell me, or he did not know. Sir what is the fact? When that question was put to the Government and answered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I had that document here which is entitled: "Document to Help towards a Knowledge of the Manitoba School Question, with explanatory Notes." Sir, that document was printed in Rome in 1896, and it is signed "Wilfrid Laurier," under date Ottawa, 23rd November, 1896. I repeat that the Minister of Trade and Commerce either knew of this document or he did not know of it. If he knew of it it was his duty to tell me that such a document had been sent to Rome, and if he did not know of it, what sort of a Government have we when the Prime Minister, forsooth, can have communication with a foreign Government—because the Roman Government is a foreign Government—and his colleagues be completely ignorant of it.

Now, there was the charge—I do not know that I should qualify it as a charge and I do not accept it as such—but there was the statement made by the hon. gentleman that I had sent to the Holy See a memorial bearing upon the Manitoba school question, and that my colleagues in the Government were not aware of it. I have only this to say in reply, that the hon. gentleman, before making such a statement, should have made himself aware of the facts. The memorial he read yesterday, and which is to be found in the volume he had in his hands, never was sent by me to the Holy See or to the Propaganda or Cardinal Secretary of State. I shall explain in a minute how and under what circumstances I wrote that document, but that I ever sent it to Rome is a statement which is not true. Not that I would not claim the right to send a document to Rome if I choose. I am a Roman Catholic and a British subject. I have no other temporal sovereign than Queen Victoria, but I belong to the Church which, in religious matters, acknowledges the supremacy of the Pope of Rome, and I would have been quite within my right if I had done so. I did not do so. I never appealed to any authority upon the Manitoba school question other than the authority of the Canadian people. I once, in the fall of 1896, signed an appeal myself, in conjunction with several of my fellow-countrymen and co-religionists, to His Holiness, Pope Leo XIII. I did it, Sir, not upon the school question, but upon other questions, and I shall read once more the petition which I sent upon that occasion, so as to convince every man here that in that appeal, which we sent to His Holiness, there was not even the remotest idea of the Manitoba school question. Here is the document:—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

To His Holiness Leo the XIII :

Most Holy Father,—We, the undersigned, members of the Senate and members of the House of Commons of Canada, and representing therein the Liberal party, present ourselves before Your Holiness as respectful and devoted children of a state of things which, if allowed to continue, might be extremely dangerous to the constitutional liberties of this country, as well as to the interests of the Church itself.

Your Holiness has already been made aware of the conduct and attitude of certain prelates and of certain members of the secular clergy who, during the general elections in this country, in the month of June last, intervened in a violent manner in restraint of electoral freedom, taking sides openly for the Conservative party against the Liberal party, and going so far as to declare guilty of grievous sin those of the electors who would vote for the candidates of the Liberal party.

Sincerely attached to the institutions of our country, which insure to us Catholics the most complete liberty, we respectfully represent to Your Holiness that these democratic institutions under which we live and for which Your Holiness has many times expressed sentiments of admiration and confidence, can only exist under perfect electoral freedom.

Far be it from us to refuse to the clergy the plenitude of civil and political rights. The priest as a citizen, and we would not, for a single instant, deprive him of the right of expressing his opinion on any matter submitted to the electorate; but when the exercise of that right develops into violence, and when that violence, in the name of religion, goes to the extent of making a grievous sin out of a purely political act, there is an abuse of authority of which the consequences cannot but be fatal, not only to constitutional liberty, but to religion itself.

If, in a country such as ours, with a population consisting of persons of various creeds and wherein the Protestant denominations are in the majority, Catholics did not enjoy, in all matters relating to legislation, the safe political freedom as their Protestant fellow-countrymen, they would ipso facto be placed in a position of inferiority, which would prevent them from taking the legitimate part which they are entitled to take in the government of the country, with the possibility, moreover, of conflicts between the various groups of the population which history shows to be ever fraught with danger.

Now, this is the document to which I appended my signature. There is not a word in it invoking the aid or support of His Holiness upon the Manitoba school question. The only thing of which I complain in it was the attitude which had been maintained by the clergy against myself in particular and the party with which I am acting.

Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman who last spoke, the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), and I stand, upon many and many a question, religious and political, at antipodes. I need not go into particulars on that point. But, Sir, I never yet, at any time in my career, would allow any power to interfere with the legitimate exercise of the electoral freedom of the Canadian people. But when it came to this, that electors, poor men, farmers, labourers and so on, were ordered to violate their own consciences, when they were told from the pulpit that they must not exercise the right of suffrage as they thought fit to do, when they were told that it was a grievous sin to vote for one party or the other—I care not at this moment which—what was I to do? Was I to allow these things to go on? Sir, as a dutiful Roman Catholic, I thought it my duty and the duty of those who were associated with me—not in the Government, not in Parliament, but in many walks of social life—to appeal to the head of the church to declare that we were not inferior to any other class of men, that we could exercise our civil and political rights just as our countrymen of the Protestant persuasion do; that the privilege they had we had. Why, Sir, if the doctrine which was preached to us had not been checked by the head of the church, we should have been but pariahs in this land. That is why we appeal to the head of the church to say that Roman Catholics were the equals of other men. The hon. member for Beauharnois stated, forsooth, yesterday that the Roman Catholic clergy had nothing to fear in the local elections. Sir, he has said that the members of the Liberal party had promised to the electors that they would be still more dutiful to the church than were their opponents. But, Sir, if the Roman Catholic Liberal candidates made any such promises, why is it, I want to know, that bishops and priests declared it was a sin to vote for the candidates of the Liberal party? I do not want to go into these questions. I do not want to discuss them here; I would rather discuss them in the province of Quebec, where the Roman Catholics have the majority. That is the place for this discussion. The question was not introduced here yesterday by me, but by the hon. member for Beauharnois, who, let me tell him, played a part of which he will have no reason to feel proud hereafter.

I repeat that I signed this appeal. The hon. member for Beauharnois yesterday alleged, and to-day the hon. member for York reaffirmed, that I had appealed to the Holy See on the Manitoba school question. The hon. member for Beauharnois said that I had written the memorial and had sent it to the court of Rome. Sir, he read that memorial yesterday. I have no reason to complain that he brought that document to light. I think that those who have perused it have not found, nor will those who peruse it in the future, find a word in it that can be objected to. I prepared that memorial in order to vindicate the course of the Liberal party in this matter and to set forth the reasons which had induced them to adopt, with regard to this question of the Manitoba schools, a policy of conciliation instead of a policy of coercion. I wrote that document and signed it on the 23rd November, 1896. I sent it to several friends and to several opponents, ecclesiastics and laymen, perhaps a dozen all told. It found its way to Rome, as the sermon of the Bishop of Three Rivers found its way to Rome. It found its way to Rome as the text of the decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council found its way to Rome. It found its way to Rome as the letter of Father Lacombe found its way to Rome. But, Sir, when the hon. gentleman pretended that I had written that document and sent it to Rome, let me tell him that he had not mastered his own brief, that he had not read his own book. If he had studied that book, he would not have commenced by assuming, as he did, that I had prepared that book myself. Everybody saw that my hon. friend, when he began to address the House yesterday, thought that I had prepared the book from which he was reading. He was obliged afterwards to accept my statement that I had not prepared that book. That book is a compilation—by a friendly hand, that is quite evident—but a compilation as to which I had nothing to do. But, if the hon. gentleman had read that document he would have found on my own memorial evidence that would have shown him that I had not myself sent that document to the Holy See. I had the pleasure of perusing that document for a short time to-day. I am sorry that I have not it with me at this moment. It contained a note at the head of the memorial prepared by me. I beg pardon for quoting it, as it is too eulogistic for me to quote, but I must lay the evidence before the House:

We will add no commentary to this memorial that the First Minister addressed to his friends and to his opponents, to all men of good-will. This document speaks of itself in calm dignity and candid frankness.

Had the hon. gentleman looked he would have found that on the very first page, the evidence that this document was not addressed by me to the Holy See, nor to any one in particular, but that it had been addressed, as I have just stated, to a certain number of friends and opponents, both lay and clerical, to explain why the Liberal party had adopted a policy of conciliation.

Now, I do not intend to say anything more. I see that it is the intention of the hon. gentleman to resurrect the Manitoba school question. I am quite prepared to meet him on that ground. If he chooses now or at any time, not merely to speak in more or less vaporous language, but to bring forward a motion and challenge by a vote the policy followed by the Government on this question. I am quite prepared to meet him and vindicate the policy that we have followed. Sir, we have effected a settlement of this question. Far be it for me to pretend that that settlement is perfect. But I say that so far as this Parliament is concerned, perfect or imperfect, there it stands. I am bound to say that it has been my privilege since that settlement was made, to ask and to ask more than once, the Government of Manitoba to be generous toward the minority, to grant to conciliation what they would have refused to coercion. I am bound to say that this prayer has been well received by the Government of Manitoba, and that they have endeavoured to make many reforms so as to meet the legitimate demands of the Catholic minority in that province.

Mr. BERGERON. I desire to say only a few words in answer to the remarks of the right hon. gentleman, and as they will be chiefly personal to myself, I shall make them very short. Everybody in the House has been able to see the impression made upon the right hon. gentleman by what I said yesterday. He has declared that I had prepared a brief for the hon. member for York (Mr. Wallace), and that this afternoon the hon. member for West York spoke upon it. I want to say to the right hon. gentleman that neither directly or indirectly have I done so, neither on this occasion nor at any other time since I have occupied a seat in Parliament. I have only done what I thought was my duty, irrespective of the opinion of others, whether they sat on this side or on the other side of the House. Now, the hon. gentleman has spoken a word which I think comes with very bad grace from his mouth.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BERGERON. Mr. Speaker, I understand that some of those hon. gentlemen opposite are not very well pleased with this discussion. I do not want to make any comparison, but we know that usually when anybody is lashed, they show it by jumping up. I do not think they will make their case any better by refusing to listen to me. If they do not like to hear me, they are not obliged to remain in the House. As I said, the right hon. gentleman has uttered one word which he has applied to me. He knows me, he has known me very well for many years.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. He ought to.

Mr. BERGERON. I will address my remarks to others at another time. I am now speaking to the chief. The right hon. gentleman has said that I have done the work of Judas when I spoke upon this question. Sir, I have never betrayed anybody. Who is a Judas? It is he who betrays, and principally he who betrays his friends. The first one who bore that name betrayed his most intimate friend. The right hon. gentleman, when he was in Opposition, pretended to stand very firmly in favour of the Catholic minority of Manitoba, and he has betrayed them. I need not say any more than that. Now, Sir, the right hon. gentleman says that we are beginning again in the Parliament of Canada a discussion which was carried on in years gone by in which there was one speech for Ontario and another speech for Quebec. Sir, they have the patent for that kind of talk on the other side of the House. The Conservative party did not try for five years to raise discussion of that sort in any province of the Dominion. They devoted their efforts, while in power, to settle that question; but it was the work of hon. gentlemen opposite to go into the different provinces and try to raise a cry which might land them in power, and they succeeded. But I find it queer on the part of the right hon. gentleman to attempt to give us lessons in this respect. We have always spoken the same thing on this side of the House, we have always held the same speech, whether in Ontario or in Quebec. The hon. gentleman has not done so. He has not said in the province of Ontario what he said in Quebec East, that after he had tried his sunny ways and found they were unsuccessful, he would take the constitution in his hands and give the Manitoba minority their rights and privileges. Now, the right hon. gentleman says that the document of which I spoke yesterday, was never sent to Rome by him. Sir, this is a childish excuse, it is unworthy of the right hon. gentleman as Prime Minister. Whether he took it there in his pocket himself, whether he sent it by mail, whether he sent it by his Solicitor General, or whether he sent it there by his lawyer, Mr. Russell, what difference does it make to the people of this country? There was a document sent to Rome. Whether it was drawn up or not by the Minister of Public Works makes no difference to the people of this country. The people of this country wish to know why it is, and that is my justification for rising now, that during the three months we have been sitting in Parliament, every time we asked the Government to lay that document before the House, they have denied that there was any such thing. They are bound now to acknowledge it. The Prime Minister comes here and says from his seat in Parliament: I have never seen any document. It is true I had written a few confidential letters right and left, and a friendly hand—he admits that—has put that memorial of mine into a document which was delivered to the Holy Propaganda. But I had nothing to do with it, and it is quite natural that my colleagues did not know anything about it. Well, Sir, I am willing to let the people of this country say whether they will accept this explanation. The right hon. gentleman admits that he drew up a memorial, he admits that he sent that to some of his friends, even to some political opponents, as he said a moment ago. Why did his colleagues know nothing about it? Will he pretend that this is a private document? Will he pretend that this memorial, that he did not wish anybody to see except those to whom he had written it, will he pretend that some of his colleagues dared to take that private memorial and attach it to a document that was put before His Holiness at Rome? If he pretends that, nobody will believe him. Now, the right hon. gentleman has been thinking this matter over, and he is surprised that I should have risen in this House and have mentioned that question. Why, Mr. Speaker, for six years we have been hearing about the Manitoba school question. More than anybody else, probably, I have heard about that question while I was sitting in that Chair from Monday afternoon at three o'clock until Saturday night at twelve o'clock, hearing and seeing hon. gentlemen opposite saying and doing everything in their power to prevent the Remedial Bill from passing this House, a measure, which, in spite of all they may say, was accepted by the minority in Manitoba, and by Archbishop Langevin, representing that minority. And knowing as I do in my conscience that hon. gentlemen opposite have never been sincere in their course upon the Manitoba school question, I would be recreant to my duty as a member of Parliament if I had not risen in this House and told those hon. gentlemen what I know about them, and given the proofs of it, as I did yesterday. Now, the right hon. gentleman knows one thing, and I know it too. He cannot declare here on his word of honour that he did not know there was a document put before the Holy See. He knows that his Solicitor General went to Rome. He knows that he had a paid lawyer in Rome, Mr. Russell, he knows that he went to Rome himself. I do not blame him for having gone to Rome. He said just now that he was a Roman Catholic, and he went there as such. I do not blame him for that. I have been there myself; but I did not go there to deceive the Pope, I did not go there to deceive the Papal authorities. The hon. gentleman tries to cover up his tracks. He says that he knows very well that in some quarters in this Dominion he will be charged with having taken both sides on this question. He thought he could get that settlement accepted by the Papal authorities, and that he could come down here at the same time and declare, as he has done, that he had nothing to do with it. Now, he has made a mistake on both sides. He has not succeeded over there, and here he will have to bear the odium in the minds of some portions of our population of having done what he should not have done. Now, in order to protect himself, he says: I could have gone to Rome as a Roman Catholic. Well, he did go; he says it was for some other reason than the Manitoba school question. We are bound to take his word, but it will be very hard for anybody in this House to believe that, under the circumstances, a settlement having been made which was not acceptable at Rome, the right hon. gentleman should have gone to a place which he knew would acquire him a good deal of credit in some portions of this Dominion, and that there he should not have mentioned the school question at all. He may say that he went there for some other purpose, but the people of this country may not be willing to believe it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What did you yourself go to Rome for?

Mr. BERGERON. I went there to pray for you. Now, Sir, the right hon. gentleman has given the best proof that his arguments do not stand scrutiny. He has read that memorial which was sent to the Holy Father prepared by the Minister of Public Works, and signed by the right hon. gentleman himself. He said that he had a right to sign that, being a son of the Catholic Church. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that the deeper he goes into that question, the worse is the position in which he finds himself. He would have done better frankly to accept the position in the first place, and boldly said that all he did on this question was to get into power, and he has succeeded. But now he tries to cover up his steps, and puts himself in a worse position than he was before. Now, what does he say in this document that he signed:

Your Holiness has already been made aware of the conduct and attitude of certain prelates and of certain members of the secular clergy, who, during the general elections in this country, in the month of June last, intervened in a violent manner in restraint of electoral freedom, taking sides openly for the Conservative party against the Liberal party, and going so far as to declare guilty of grievous sin those of the electors who would vote for the candidates of the Liberal party.

He has signed that. What do we find later on? We find these words in a letter, which I read yesterday and commented on, and I am surprised the hon. gentleman should not have thought of them before he rose and made a statement this afternoon:

We repeat it, never have the bishops of Canada (and Canada does not consist merely of Manitoba and the province of Quebec; there are also five other provinces: Ontario, British Columbia, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, and four territories—Assiniboia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Keewatin)—

Then the letter goes on to say:

—taken as a whole, either by a collective pastoral, or by individual pastorals, or any other official document, made known to the Catholics of the country that they had, for the settlement of the Manitoba school question, accepted a law. Now the right hon. gentleman knows that the bishops of Quebec, all the bishops of Quebec—the Minister of Public Works smiles, but he knows it is the fact—published a mandement prepared in such a way that when the people came out of church they would say: Did not the bishops say that we should vote for Laurier. That is the kind of mandement prepared by the bishops of Canada, and every hon. member from the province of Quebec knows it. The right hon. gentleman says he stands by Canada. Yes; he stands by Canada when he is in Parliament. Did he stand by Canada when he was at Rome? The hon. gentleman knows this is a critical position, and he is trying to get out of it by saying, I stand by Canada. There is not a man in Canada who can move from one side to the other so quickly as the hon. gentleman, there is not a man in this Dominion who can change his views as rapidly as can the hon. gentleman on anything. I have heard his speeches on the hustings delivered before the farmers. Then he declared that as between the farmers and the manufacturers of the country, he was all the time behind the farmers, and he said so when talking about the tariff to manufacturers.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BERGERON. And the Grits cheered, as those hon. gentlemen do. In the manufacturing centres he declared that as between the great manufacturing classes and other classes, I stand by the manufacturers, taking off his hat to them.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BERGERON. I have heard the hon. gentleman declare that he was a democrat to the hilt, and still he comes back with decorations from the other side of the Atlantic. More than that, the hon. gentleman goes to the other side and comes back with the Cobden medal, and yet he is the head of a protectionist Government. This is proof of his capacity to have two ideas, to be on two sides. I have heard the right hon. gentleman very often say that he belongs to the English school, that he adheres to the principles of the English school. What are the principles of that school? He does not belong to the English school. He belongs to the school of the Minister of Public Works, and it is a mighty little school. When the Prime Minister declares that he belongs to the English school he forgets that if such were the case, he would not be permitted to keep a Minister who declared under oath that he had deceived Parliament. It is easy to say that he belongs to the English school, but it is not easy to carry out the principles. The right hon. gentleman has said that I shall feel sorry at having brought up this question. I have always in the past been able to stand by my opinions, and I will do so again. It would have been the privilege of any hon. member to have taken up this question, but the task happened to have fallen to me; I have done it, and I am very glad I have done it, because I have brought before the people the true facts in regard to the school question. When the hon. gentleman says—and I was passing over this point—when in fact the hon. gentleman complains about the bishops working against the Liberal party. I say they did not work against the Liberal party as a party. The hon. gentleman should have said there might have been some priests—I do not want to deny the charge—who spoke against the Liberals on the school question, but not against the Liberal party as a political party in the province. The right hon. gentleman when he signed that document should have given that explanation. The right hon. gentleman stated a moment ago that we on this side of the House want to resurrect the school question. No, we do not want to resurrect the school question. Why should we wish to do so? How could we do it? There sits the right hon. gentleman, supported by a large majority in this House, not one of which majority, from any province, would vote for the minority of Manitoba. They have been elected to stand by the right hon. gentleman, and they know well this motto "United we stand, divided we fall," and they will stand together. No, we do not want to resurrect the school question. We will allow to rest on the right hon. gentleman the odium of having ill-treated the minority of Manitoba, in support of whom he spoke during five years in this House. We want only to place before the country the facts of the case as they are. The right hon. gentleman said a moment ago, turning to the faithful on his side of the House, the Manitoba school question is settled. It will remain settled by the right hon. gentleman, and he will stand before the country in the future entitled to any satisfaction he may be able to derive from such settlement.

Mr. SPROULE. I only want to add a very few words to what has already been said on this subject, because I do not consider it to be of very great importance to continue the debate at any great length. I desire to reply briefly to the First Minister, who started out by saying that there was an understanding between the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) and the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) and that one had prepared a brief for the other. I think the hon. member for Beauharnois has effectually refuted that charge, so I need not refer to it further. But I may say in regard to the position taken by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), that it is one which can be taken and justified by Canadian subjects throughout the broad domain of Canada, and it is that there should be no interference in the right of the state to govern the country, either from Rome or from any other foreign country. The objection I take to this document which was presented to His Holiness, and a portion of which was read by the right hon. Premier to-day, is this—and to it I think many members of the Reform party will likewise object—is that the following should appear at the beginning:—

ada, and representing therein the Liberal party,—

The Liberal party to-day represents the Government of the country because it is the controlling power for the time being; but if it was only the Catholics of the Liberal party, as Catholics who were appealing to Rome, as the Premier says it was, then it should have been set forth in this document that the Catholics only were appealing to Rome, whereas it is set forth as if those appealing to Rome represented the Liberal party in the House of Commons and in the Senate, Protestants as well as Catholics. I should like to ask hon. gentlemen opposite the grounds on which they have stated that no effort had been made to invoke the power of the Pope to support them? Do they think their rights were interfered with and put in peril? If an appeal were made to the constituents at an election, in a Protestant constituency it would not be pretended that this document represented the Liberal party but only the individual members of that party who are Catholics. It is put forward as representing the Liberal party, and we have a right to hold to it as such, because the very words in this document set forth that it represents the members of the Senate and House of Commons of the Liberal party of Canada.

—present ourselves before Your Holiness as respectful devoted children of the Church—

The document does not say: "We, the Roman Catholic members of the Liberal party," but the document purports to represent the whole Liberal party, and it includes every member of that party no matter to what creed he may belong.

—to complain of the existence of a state of things which, if allowed to continue, might be extremely dangerous to the constitutional liberties of the country.

In this sentence they distinctly complain of an interference with the civil rights of the people; the rights of certain citizens of Canada to use the franchise. And, Sir, to whom do they make this complaint? They complain to His Holiness the Pope, that there is this interference with the political and civil rights of the people. What I take objection to is this: We have a law on our statutes to punish those who interfere with the civil or political rights of the people in that respect; we have a law to prevent intimidation of the electors by priests or laymen, and why, I ask, did they not invoke that law? If there was no law to punish those guilty of such interference, then, Sir, it was their duty to enact such a law, and under no circumstances had they the right to appeal for aid to a foreign potentate. That is the objection we take. We have nothing to do with the religion of the individual, but when the Parliament of Canada or the Government of Canada appeals to the Pope of Rome, or to any other foreign potentate to help them to redress political grievances within our own country, then, Sir, they are going beyond their rights as a Parliament, or as a political party, or as subjects of the Queen. We have nothing to do with the dispute between individual members and the authorities of their church, but when they invoke the power of the Pope of Rome to help them to stop interference in the political liberties of our people, then we have a great deal to say in the matter, and it is our duty to make a solemn protest against it. Sir, the people of Canada will hold the Reform party responsible for that appeal to Rome, because that document declares that it represents the Reform party, be its members Protestant or Catholic, and the Reform party to-day governs Canada. To that extent the appeal to Rome represents the Government and consequently it speaks in the name of the Government of Canada. It is to that we object.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) has been repeating over and over again: "That is what we object to," and his concluding sentence gives the keynote to the whole situation, for he says: "The Reform party to-day are governing Canada." That is really what he objects to; that is what all hon. gentlemen opposite object to, and that is what the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) objects to.

Mr. BERGERON. The Liberals did not get into power honestly; that is what I object to.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. member for Beauharnois has done a service to the Reform party and to Canada in bringing up this matter as he has, although in his speech of yesterday he indulged in many misconceptions of the facts before him.

Mr. BERGERON. How do you know?

Mr. CASEY. Because I have the common sense to understand, that when the hon. gentleman had to admit he misunderstood the fact, then he was labouring under a misconception.

Mr. BERGERON. Who has admitted that?

Mr. CASEY. The hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron).

Mr. BERGERON. I have not, Mr. Speaker. No one has yet denied what I have said.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. member (Mr. Bergeron) started out with the statement that the bundle of documents he held in his hand was one document, and that it was signed by the right hon. the Premier.

Mr. BERGERON. So it is.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman is getting back to his misconception. That bundle contained documents some of them issuing from bishops, some from priests, others from different parties, and only one of the lot was signed by the right hon. the Premier, and yet the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) pretended that the Prime Minister was responsible for all the documents.

Mr. BERGERON. Yes, and I say so still, and it is true.

Mr. CASEY. Then I take back my statement that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) has corrected his misconception, for he is again trying to force his misconception on the House.

Mr. BERGERON. I know it to be true, and I have something else for another time that will prove it.

Mr. CASEY. I am very glad to hear that he has another misconception to present, because it all helps us. Whether the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) did or did not prepare the brief for the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) with a deliberate intention that the hon. member (Mr. Wallace) should take advantage of it, rests with the conscience of the member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), but the fact remains that the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) and the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) have used the brief of the hon. member (Mr. Bergeron) and they have both made bitter anti-Popery speeches based on it. On the next 12th of July you will find in the celebrations all over Canada, that the hon. member for Beauharnois will be quoted as authority for the statement that this Government has been appealing to Rome, and that it was a very wicked thing for the Government to do. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) will be celebrated in every Orange lodge in Canada; I hope he will be glad of his notoriety, and I hope it will do him good with his constituents, although on that point I have my doubts. Sir, it has not been seriously pretended by anybody—except by the hon. member (Mr. Bergeron), and that is not serious—that the Government, or the Premier, or anybody else made an appeal to Rome on the school question. The fact is that certain members of the Catholic Church, feeling that they had not been well used by those who locally wielded the power of that church in the province of Quebec, appealed to the head of their church against the local representatives. The ground of their appeal was, that those who had been taking certain steps against them were not acting consistently with the view of the church, and the appeal was from the local representatives to the head of the church. Now, Sir, what could be more proper, than for those who felt that their political freedom was in danger by the action of the local representative of the church, to appeal to the only power which could control the local authorities.

Mr. CASEY.

I say as a Protestant, as the representative of a peculiarly Protestant constituency, that no course could be more proper than that. My hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule), who spoke a few moments ago, has another remedy; he says you ought to fine the priests and put them in jail, instead of appealing to the Pope against them; and my hon. friend from Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) sits quietly and hears him say that without a word of protest. For my part, as a Protestant, I feel like protesting against those words of the hon. member for East Grey. I cannot sit silent, like the hon. member for Beauharnois, and hear that proposal. I think the proper course is to appeal to the authority who can act on the hearts and consciences of those who are alleged to have offended, and to bring them to reason. As an hon. friend suggests, if the children have erred, the proper course is not to call in a policeman, but to speak to the father of the children, and ask him to correct their errors in a proper and parental manner. I, as an Ontario member, have nothing to object to in my leader signing that appeal to the Pope. I think he was acting quite within his rights. He was not doing a political or governmental act; he was simply asking for liberty for himself and his co-religionists in the province of Quebec. But before I sit down, I want to know who is going to make a motion on this subject. There is surely going to be a vote.

Mr. BERGERON. You would like to vote? We will give you a chance on your railway Bill.

Mr. CASEY. I would like to have a vote, but I do not think the hon. member for Beauharnois would.

Mr. BERGERON. You did not vote on the Yukon Bill.

Mr. CASEY. I always vote according to my convictions.

Mr. BERGERON. You did not vote on that. You flew away.

Mr. CASEY. I will vote on this question according to my convictions, as I always do.

Mr. BERGERON. You might fly again.

Mr. CASEY. When the hon. member for Beauharnois got up a second time, I felt sure that he was going to move a motion. When he sat down, I thought that the hon. member for East Grey was going to move it. We are now expecting that it may perhaps be moved by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke), the hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), or half a dozen other good Protestants or good Catholics on that side of the House. They seem to be agreed. The only natural outcome of the talk we have had, the opening of this great bagfull of wind, would be a strong no-Popery resolution, protesting against Papal interference in the affairs of this country. If the hon. member for Beauharnois will not move it, perhaps some of his Orange friends will; or perhaps he would himself move something, taking the Catholic view of the case, for which his friend the hon. member for West York would be happy to vote. I am sure it would be perfectly easy to harmonize the hon. member for West York, the hon. member for Beauharnois, and all the others on that side of the House, on some motion on this subject; and we hope to see it done. Without that, the whole agitation is a mere piece of clap-trap, a mere attempt to create a false impression in the country, and to maintain the old union that has been so successful on many occasions, between the lodges and those who pretend that they speak on the floor of this House for the Catholic Church, I do not think that union is fully cemented yet, and it will not be until they have united on a motion on this question.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend—

Mr. CASEY. Ah, here is the motion now.

Mr. McNEILL. I did not intend to speak on this question, and would not have risen but for the remarks made by my hon. friend (Mr. Casey) opposite. I cannot avoid expressing astonishment at hearing a member of the great Liberal party of Canada announcing the doctrines which that hon. gentleman has laid down here to-day. I had always thought that the Liberal party, above all others, was the party that would have stood in the breach at all times against any attempt on the part of the ecclesiastical authorities to interfere between the people and their civil liberties.

Mr. CASEY. Just what we are doing.

Mr. McNEILL. And I should have thought that they would have been the party of all others who would have objected to its being laid down as proper that a foreign potentate ought to be called in to endeavour to secure those liberties for the people of this country which it is the duty of the Government to see that they possess. My hon. friend said that we objected because the Liberal party were governing the country in this regard; but I say we object because the Liberal party were not governing the country with regard to this matter. We object because the Liberal party laid down the reins of government, and asked the Pope to take them up for them. We object because we say that it is contrary to the whole tendency of the history of the people of England for centuries past, that we should recognize the Pope of Rome as having any right whatever to interfere with reference to the civil liberties of the British people. We say that we are able to protect our own civil liberties. We say that we do not require the Pope of Rome to come to protect our civil liberties for us. I do not desire to be understood as objecting to members of the Roman Catholic Church going as members of that church to the head of their church, if they have religious grievances. That, of course, no reasonable man would object to. But what I do object to is members of the Government of this country having gone to the Pope, as members of the Government did go on this occasion, and having requested that he should interfere for the protection of the civil and constitutional liberties of the people of this country. That is not a question of religion; that is a question of civil liberty, which I say the Government of this country are bound to protect, by the powers that are entrusted to them by the constitution of the country. As has been said, if the existing laws require to be implemented in that regard, then have them implemented. That is the objection we bring in regard to this matter, and I am astonished that any member on the Liberal side of the House, at all events, should have risen in his place, as my hon. friend did a moment ago, and said that he and the Liberal party endorsed the course which the Government had pursued in this regard.

Mr. GIBSON. He did not say so.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman says that the hon. member who has just addressed the House was not endorsing the course pursued by the Government in this respect. I am very glad to hear that he did not, and I hope my hon. friend does not endorse it either. But I understood that he was endorsing it, and that is why I rose to speak.

Mr. GIBSON. You were read out of the party.

Mr. McNEILL. That has nothing to do with it. If the hon. gentleman has nothing better to say with regard to a grave question of this kind that to utter a childish interruption of that sort, I am sorry for him. I would like to know from the hon. gentleman who interrupted me (Mr. Gibson) whether he approves of the Government having asked the Pope to interfere to protect the civil and constitutional liberties of the people of this country.

Mr. GIBSON. Certainly not, but the Government did not do anything of the kind.

Mr. McNEILL. I may be able to convince the hon. gentleman that they did when I refer to the document.

Mr. GIBSON. The hon. gentleman asked me a question and I would like to ask him another. What authority is he reading?

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman says that the Pope was not appealed to.

Mr. GIBSON. No, I said they had not done so in their official capacity.

Mr. McNEILL. I am speaking of members of the Government who appealed to the Pope and described themselves as "We, the undersigned, members of the Senate and members of the House of Commons of Canada, and representing therein the Liberal party." Whether you call that official capacity or not, I do not know, but I should consider it sufficiently official capacity. Then the appeal continues :

Your Holiness has already been made aware of the conduct and attitude of certain prelates and of certain members of the secular clergy, who, during the general election in this country, in the month of June last, intervened in a violent manner in restraint of electoral freedom,—

Does the hon. gentleman approve of an appeal to the Pope to protect electoral freedom in this country? He said a moment ago that he did not. Will he repeat that statement now?

Mr. GIBSON. Yes.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman does not approve of it.

Mr. GIBSON. No.

Mr. McNEILL. I am glad he condemns the actions of the present Government in that particular.

Mr. GIBSON. I say that the Government never did appeal.

Mr. McNEILL. I say that members of the Government did, and you condemn their action.

Mr. McMILLAN. They did not do it as members of the Government but as members of the Catholic Church. You have garbled the document; you did not read it all.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman should not say that any member of this House garbled a document.

Mr. McMILLAN. The hon. gentleman read a part of the document and did not read it all.

Mr. McNEILL. I am reading that part which is necessary in order to bring out the point to which I am referring. I need not read a quantity of matter not material to the question we are discussing.

Mr. McMILLAN. But you did not read all that was material.

Mr. McNEILL. I will read the whole of this paragraph, if it is any benefit to the hon. gentleman

Your Holiness has already been made aware of the conduct and attitude of certain prelates and of certain members of the secular clergy, who, during the general election in this country, in the month of June last, intervened in a violent manner in restraint of electoral freedom, taking sides openly for the Conservative party against the Liberal party.

Does that make it any better for my hon. friend—taking sides openly for the Conservative party against the Liberal party? I did not read that. It was not material to what I was endeavouring to show, and I do not think it strengthens the case of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. McMILLAN. But there is another portion you did not read.

Mr. McNEILL. I shall read it for the hon. gentleman's benefit.

—and going so far as to declare guilty of grievous sin those of the electors who would vote for the candidates of the Liberal party.

Now, I do not care what they say in any other part of the document, there is that statement which in itself shows that these members of the Government appealed to His Holiness the Pope of Rome, to protect the electoral freedom of the people of Canada, and I want my hon. friend to take back what he said, when he said that I was garbling the document. If he is so fair a man, as I believe he is, he will do so.

Mr. McMILLAN. When that document was read by the hon. gentleman, he read it to show that they had appealed as members of the House of Commons and of the Senate, but the whole tenor of the document shows that they appealed as members of the Roman Catholic Church to the head of that church to exercise his authority over his clergy in Canada and prevent their interfering with the exercise of civil liberty.

Mr. McNEILL. I am sorry that my hon. friend had not the courtesy to withdraw his charge that I had garbled the paragraph. However, it makes no difference. I have read the paragraph in extenso.

Mr. McMILLAN. I will not withdraw it, because you did not read the statement I have repeated.

Mr. McNEILL. I have shown the House not only that I did not garble, but that if I had continued to read, I would have made the case stronger against the hon. gentleman. He has, of course, not in the slightest degree met the point to which I was referring. The point is not that members of the Catholic Church had appealed to the head of their church, but that members of the Government asked the head of the Catholic Church to intervene here in Canada to protect the electoral freedom of the people of Canada. That is the point.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend is mistaken there. The members who signed that petition did not ask His Holiness the Pope to protect the freedom of the people of Canada. The Parliament of Canada can do that. But they asked him to declare that political freedom was a part of their common religious belief and thus protect the consciences of Catholics.

Mr. CLANCY. Did anybody ever deny that?

The PRIME MINISTER. It was denied in so many words, when people were told that it was a sin to vote in a certain way.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman has not, as far as I can see, in the slightest degree, met the difficulty. The difficulty is this, that for centuries past there has been a struggle going on between the secular and the religious power in reference to just such matters as these. The bounds are difficult sometimes to define. It is sometimes difficult to define where the one ends and the other begins, but there is no difficulty at all in deciding that electoral freedom is something which is within the control of the secular authority; and when my right hon. friend endeavours to answer what I have said, I should like him to meet the point straight and squarely. I do not wish to copy my hon. friend from the other side, and to say that he deliberately failed to do so—I do not mean that for a moment—but I do mean to say this, that he has appealed to the Pope to interfere in a matter which, of all others, is one of the things within the control, and the sole control, of civil government, and something with which the Pope of Rome has nothing whatever to do, and something with which, I say, it is most dangerous to the liberties of the people of this country to ask him to interfere. I do not wish to take up the time of the House unduly, but I recollect having made some references to this matter during last session, or the session before, and I know there is another paragraph in this petition which brings the matter, if possible, even more clearly to the attention of any one who feels inclined to deal with a matter of this nature. Unless my memory deceives me, I shall find that paragraph, and when I find it I shall take an opportunity to call my right hon. friend's attention to the matter again. It is sufficient for my purpose that here in the paragraph I have read, unmistakably, the Pope is asked to interfere for the protection of liberties which it was the duty of the Government to protect.

Mr. BOURASSA. Mr. Speaker, I feel confident that all the members on this side of the House and most of the members on the other side had hoped that this third session of the present Parliament would have passed without having forced upon us a discussion of this kind; without having obliged us to listen once more to the passionate appeals to racial and religious prejudices such as we have heard in this debate. I have always been of the opinion that this was not the place to discuss religious matters. And I have always thought, as a citizen of the province of Quebec, and as a true friend, I trust, to the minority in Manitoba, that many of the discussions that were heard during the last Parliament should never have taken place. In this I do not wish to speak for only one side of politics. I hope this is the last time that this question will come before us as a political question. We have heard the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), the supposed leader of the province of Quebec on the Conservative side. But, unfortunately, his intention expressed in the end of his second, or, we may say, his third speech, is not at all in accord with the beginning of his speech, and therefore I find only one explanation of all his speeches, and of the position he has taken yesterday and today; it is, that not finding any sufficient grounds for opposing this Government on business questions, or even on this very school question, he has decided to continue the policy of passionate appeals to prejudice, for which appeals there is no foundation. The Conservative party, in the course of its history, has very often resorted to such appeals. I do not, in speaking thus, include all the membership of the Conservative party, because I know that there were and are still men in that party who do not like that kind of appeal, or the policy that dictates them. Generally, when appeals of this kind were made, there were members of the Conservatives of Quebec wing who rode the Catholic horse, and members of the Ontario wing who rode the Protestant horse. The hon. member for Beauharnois has thought proper to ride both horses at the same time. I acknowledge that the hon. member has many of the qualities of a political clown, though he has not many qualities to assure him any other position in the political arena. But this time he has failed even in that. I suppose he was afraid that his friend and colleague the hon. member for West York would forget to ride the Protestant horse, and he would show him some movements of that animal to be practiced next time in Ontario. If anything is to be gathered from the long speech, divided into three parts, of the hon. member for Beauharnois, it was that the Liberal party has deceived the Catholic electorate of the Dominion, that they had deceived the Protestant electorate of the Dominion and that they had deceived the Pope. I do not think it is necessary to argue these points at any length. But, as for the first, I will say for myself, as a Liberal of the province of Quebec and a Roman Catholic, I can speak for the people of Quebec as well as can the hon. member for Beauharnois—and, I think, much better—and I can say that the Catholics of Quebec have not been deceived. We do not say that the settlement achieved by the right hon. Premier and his colleagues is a full and complete settlement. When we consider that such a question as the Manitoba school question had been treated on most unsound principles for five years, had been so handled as to develop racial and religious passions, we could not expect it to be settled altogether satisfactorily in the first instance. The Government coming into power had to settle the question so as to do substantial justice to everybody, and not deceive anybody, and this has been achieved. I do not want to enter again upon the quarrels of the past. I think we have already had too many divisions between the two parties on this question. I do not pretend that all the members of the Conservative party were deceitful in their policy on this question. As to the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), I, a young man, do not wish to be understood as having said that he had pursued a deceitful course in this matter. I believe the hon. leader of the Opposition and some members of his party were sincere. But I believe that, by reason of the elements in his own party in different provinces of the Dominion, the hon. gentleman could not possibly have settled this question. If the hon. gentleman were not still in political life, I think that he, as well as Sir Mackenzie Bowell, could tell, with regard to this question, that it was impossible for him to achieve success, because he was in the midst of a nest of traitors. Supposing even that the Conservative party had been returned to power, and had sought to carry out their policy of putting into force remedial legislation, I believe that with the elements in their own party, and with the condition of public sentiment in the country, they could not have settled the school question, even after the Remedial Bill was passed. But these are things of the past, and we must face the question as it stands to-day. The first duty of the present Government on coming into power was to calm national and religious prejudices, before they attempted to do anything else—and in that they succeeded. There was also one special question to be considered, and that was the situation of the Catholic Liberals of the province of Quebec. The leader of the Liberal party, because of his attitude upon this question, had been represented in the province of Quebec as a traitor to his race and religion. Sir, I do not intend to bring up in this Chamber difficulties that arose between the Catholic clergy and the Liberals of the province of Quebec. This is no place to discuss such questions. This is not the place to discuss religious questions at all, and especially such religious questions as interests only the laymen and clergy of one particular faith. Sir, we have a right, as British subjects, to go where we like to settle matters of our own church. In saying that, I know I have not only the approval of Catholics but of independent Protestants in this House who wish this country to be free to everybody, of whatever creed or nationality. During long debates in this House we often boast about our country, about its size, its resources and its splendid growth. Everything we say should convince us that there is room for all kinds of people, but there is no room for national prejudices, no room for narrow views or for that kind of politics that the hon. member for West York has tried to impose on this House and this country for many years, and that, misled, I am sorry to say, by the example of the hon. member for Beauharnois, he has tried to impose on us again. The conduct of the hon. member for Beauharnois, the stand he has taken upon the question, would make me ashamed of my province, but that I know that the feelings expressed by him are not the feelings of the people in the province of Quebec.

Sir, I do not often trouble this House with the local politics of Quebec, but I think I may say that the province of Quebec is just as liberal and just as British as any other province in the Dominion of Canada, and we intend to keep her so. We say that in this matter the province of Quebec has not been deceived, and her people have given proofs of it time after time since the general elections. I will not attempt to answer the ridiculous accusation that the Catholic Liberals of the House of Commons and of the Senate have tried to deceive the Pope. The hon. member for Beauharnois spoke of the Pope in such a way as to please the member for West York (Mr. Wallace), but he must not think that the members of this House are so ignorant or so prejudiced as not to know better the character of Pope Leo XIII. Many Protestant countries are proud to entertain cordial relations with the Pope. There are good Protestants in this House, and there are also good Catholics, but I do not think there is a Protestant in this House that would accuse Bismarck, the late Iron Chancellor of Germany, of having betrayed the Protestant interests of Germany in favour of the Catholic minority of that Empire. When a dispute arose between Germany and the Kingdom of Spain upon a point of deep interest to the German people, to whom did Prince Bismarck apply to obtain a settlement of the question? He applied to Pope Leo XIII, and when judgment was rendered against Germany in favour of Spain, did you hear the official press of Germany crying out against the decision, and endeavouring to excite the feelings of the Protestants against the Holy See because the decision had been rendered in favour of a Catholic country and against a Protestant country? No, Sir. There is sufficient breadth of mind in Germany and in many other countries; there is sufficient breadth of mind in this country to enable the Protestants to realize the beneficent effect of the Papacy in this world. I do not say that the Pope should interfere between Catholics or Protestants in civil matters, nor has he attempted to do so. Sir, one of the great statesmen of France, one of the greatest philosophers of this century, who was a devoted Protestant and at one time Prime Minister of his country, Guizot, said once that the Catholic Church was a great school of respect. Let not my Protestant fellow-countrymen fear because we Catholics desire to exercise the right of going to the head of our church to settle difficulties that may arise among ourselves. Let not our Protestant friends in this House be uneasy. The more we are attached to the Holy See as Catholics, the greater our respect for the rules of our church, the deeper will be our attachment. Let me assure our Protestant friends, to the political authority of this Empire, the deeper will be our attachment to the civil rights of Canada and of Great Britain. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) made us a very fine offer, as he often does. Whenever we have difficulty with our priests he suggests that we should send them to jail.

Mr. SPROULE. I wish emphatically to contradict that, and I am surprised that the hon. gentleman should attempt to misrepresent what I did say. I said that in case of interference on the part of the priesthood with the political or civil rights of the people, we have laws upon our statute-book punishing such interference, and I asked why the Prime Minister did not invoke that law.

Mr. BOURASSA. Well, the hon. gentleman has explained himself much better on this occasion than he did before. He has simply said in fifty words what I made him say in ten. Sir, what is that interference which the clergy of Quebec have been accused of exercising during the last election? Certain bishops of the province of Quebec and some members of the clergy, took a certain stand in the last election, and held that Catholic voters could not vote for Liberal candidates. They based their interference upon the ground that it was the duty of Catholics to vote for remedial legislation, and that the just rights of the Catholic minority in Manitoba on the school question could not be restored to them unless some remedial legislation was passed. There was no division amongst the clergy of the province of Quebec or amongst the laymen, as to the rights of the Catholic minority, nor as to the duty of the Government to restore them in some way. There was no division upon that point then, and there is no division upon that point to-day. The only difference of opinion that existed was as to the interpretation of the constitution in regard to that question. Let me quote for the benefit of my hon. friend a letter that was addressed by Cardinal Ledochowski, Secretary of the Propaganda, to the bishops of the province of Quebec, in which he urged them not to ask the Dominion of Canada to do anything contrary to the sovereignty of the British Empire, or that would bring them into conflict in any way with their Protestant fellow-citizens.

Mr. BERGERON. Will you read the letter?

Mr. BOURASSA. I have only the French text of the letter, but I will read the paragraph, and afterwards give the translation:

Maintenant que, en vertu de la décision récente du Conseil privé de la Reine en Angleterre, le gouvernement fédéral est certainement pourvu de l'autorité requise pour traiter cette très grave question, il y a lieu d'espérer qu'elle trouvera enfin cette heureuse solution que réclament et les droits les mieux établis et le bien de la religion et de l'Etat.

Now that, in virtue of the recent decision of the Queen's Privy Council in England, the Federal Government is certainly provided with the requisite authority to treat this very important question, there is reason to hope that a solution will finally be found which will be in accordance with well-established rights, as well as with the welfare of religion and of the state.

A difference of opinion was manifested among the members of the clergy in Quebec as to the application to be given to that decision of the Privy Council. All that the Catholics of Quebec were asked to do was to vote for men who would put in force the judgment of the Privy Council. But we Liberals claimed the right to decide for ourselves as to what means should be taken to apply that judgment, and to secure to the minority the rights which we believed they had been deprived of. We claimed that liberty then, and we claim it now. I must apologize to the House if I touch upon certain points that are perhaps not interesting to all the members of the House, but I do so in order to explain what was our position. We have now the proof that our contention was good, because in the encyclical to which the member for Beauharnois has referred, it is stated in plain terms that we are at perfect liberty in respect to the means to be taken to procure a settlement of that question.

Mr. BERGERON. Is that settlement accepted by the encyclical?

Mr. BOURASSA. The hon. member for Beauharnois has treated that settlement with great severity. He has been more Catholic than the Pope. But I doubt his sincerity.

Mr. BERGERON. That is not an answer. I want to know from my hon. friend whether that settlement has been accepted by the encyclical issued by the Papal authorities?

Mr. BOURASSA. That settlement has been termed by the Pope in almost the same spirit as was expressed a moment ago by the Prime Minister when he said that he knew the settlement was not a perfect one, but that it was a settlement as far as the intervention of this Parliament was concerned.

Mr. BERGERON. Not at all. I want to show the hon. gentleman—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; order.

Mr. BERGERON. The hon. gentleman allows me to interrupt him. I want to remind him that His Holiness the Pope, in the encyclical which he has just mentioned, says that the settlement which has been come to is ineffective and unacceptable.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. He says nothing of the sort.

Mr. BOURASSA. The hon. gentleman must read the encyclical with a little more care. When he says that this settlement was inspired by the false disposition of this Government, of the Prime Minister and of the Liberals of Canada, he is flatly contradicting the words of the Pope, because the Pope says that this settlement was inspired by a spirit of justice. I do not wish to boast about my religious principles or my national attachment in this House or on the platform, but I say to the hon. member for Beauharnois that when the Roman Catholic Church is not satisfied with what has been given to her, she will be able to speak for herself and be heard as well as that hon. member. I am a firm believer in the Catholic Church and in the destiny of my race, because I know that in America under our British rule there is freedom for every creed and freedom for every race. I am a believer in the rule of my church, and if I am a firm believer in the future of my race it is because the politics and policy affirmed by the hon. member for Beauharnois and the hon. member for West York are not the policies and politics that are going to prevail in this country. I believe firmly that this school question will be settled, and settled on account of the position taken by this Government, a position which has been met by the good-will of the Greenway Government, which has given more since this Government came into power than during the whole time when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office. I hope this is the last we shall hear of this question, not because we are afraid of it or afraid of the position that we and this Government have taken. We are able to meet hon. gentlemen opposite in the province of Quebec, and there are members from the English provinces who are able to meet the hon. member for West York and the hon. member for East Grey on their no-popey platform. I trust that so long as this party is in power questions of this kind will be met in the same way. I think hon. gentlemen opposite include men of good-will, and I know that there are hon. members sitting not far from the hon. member for Beauharnois and the hon. member for West York who are also desirous that this question should be settled in a just manner, and that cries and appeals like those made during the last day or two will never be repeated in Parliament. I thank the hon. members for the kind attention to which they have listened to my remarks; I had no intention of speaking so long, but I think I had to express the views of my fellow-countrymen in the province of Quebec on this question.

Mr. BERGERON.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. My views on this very important question have been expressed on the floor of Parliament and outside of this House so frequently that I feel it would not be right or proper for me at the present moment to take up more than a brief time for the purpose of expressing my views as to the question which has been brought up at the present moment. I ventured on a former occasion to express the opinion that unless justice were rendered to the minority, outside of any question or consideration of religion, outside of any other question than the constitutional one, which awarded to the different classes of the community rights that were prescribed under the constitution, this school question would be coming up time and again before the country and before Parliament. Sir, as a Canadian, as one who sincerely wishes to have peace and harmony exist between the different classes of the community, between the different nationalities which must shake hands over their difficulties and differences of opinion for the purpose of making of Canada the country which we Canadians would feel proud to see it become, I feel it is of the greatest possible importance that any question that could arouse divisions as to race, nationality and creed should be avoided. But questions of principle have to be discussed at whatever cost. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) seemed to me to be misstating the question altogether when he stated that it was not right or proper for the Pope to send out a delegate to decide between Catholics questions affecting Catholics alone. I do not believe the hon. gentleman has studied the question so thoroughly as to be able to express an opinion on this point. I can understand perfectly well that the people and hon. members could object to interference by the Pope in matters affecting the rights of citizens, the relations of the different churches one with another, and the position which as British subjects we have a right to hold irrespective of church or nationality; but for the hon. gentleman, with his wide experience of the great and important control which is exercised outside of the Catholic Church, to tell me that the Pope cannot send out a delegate to Canada to meet the Catholics and discuss points of difference between them, is a misinterpretation of the meaning of the British constitution and of the rights of British subjects under the British Crown.

Mr. WALLACE. No.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I took down what I supposed was the hon. gentleman's expression of opinion, but if I am wrong, I am subject to correction, although I thought I understood him properly.

Mr. WALLACE. I said that with their religious concerns we had nothing to do and had no desire to interfere, but when they interfered with affairs of state, properly relegated to the Parliament of Canada, then we have a right to interfere.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Let the hon. gentleman show me that the Pope or his delegate attempted to interfere with political matters, and I am prepared to say that I stand by the constitution; but I am not prepared to allow the hon. gentleman to tell me that as a Catholic I am to be subject to his dictation as to how and when I shall approach the head of my church. But I trace the trouble far beyond what hon. gentlemen have indicated. When public feeling was running high indeed, in the province of Quebec, especially, on this question, it was not the religious side of the question that was affecting public opinion in that province, but it was a belief that the French Canadian minority in Manitoba was not receiving what it was entitled to under the constitution. By such appeals were the people of Quebec won over to the Liberal party. I charge the right hon. gentleman and I charge his party with having attempted to blow hot and cold upon the question. It was impossible to settle such an issue except by a man of strong nerve, who would come forward as Sir Mackenzie Bowell and the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) did, with a defined proposition like the Remedial Bill, so that the people of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific, Catholics and Protestants, would know how the grievances of the minority were to be remedied. The Conservative party were warranted in bringing in that Remedial Bill, because the highest judicial tribunal of the Empire had laid it down that the rights of the minority had been trampled under foot. The late lamented Sir John Thompson, at the outset insisted that every tribunal to which an appeal could be made should be appealed to, as to the power of interference by the Canadian Parliament. Sir John Thompson did not view it from a religious standpoint, but he viewed it as the guardian of the liberties and privileges of British subjects in Canada; he viewed it as the guardian of the constitution, and he held that it was the duty of the Canadian Parliament to carry out that constitution as interpreted by the Imperial Privy Council. If in the old French province of Quebec the rights of Protestants were ever invaded by such legislation as that passed in Manitoba, not I alone, but the public opinion of the Catholic majority in Quebec, would protect the rights of the Protestant minority. We believe that by reason of the concessions made to the Protestant minority in Quebec at different times, we have achieved the choice blessing of seeing Englishmen and Frenchmen, Catholics and Protestants, living side by side like brothers, and ignorant of any conflict because of divergence of religious opinions. Sir, the Protestants of the province of Quebec approved of the course of the late Conservative Government in this matter, as I have had ample opportunity to know during the election campaign. The Protestants of the province of Quebec felt that in fighting for the rights of the minority in Manitoba they were appreciating their own rights in the province of Quebec. They knew that in the province of Quebec the evil day would never come when the friendly feelings existing between Catholics and Protestants would cease. The policy of the right hon. gentleman was conciliation in Ontario, but in Quebec it was an entirely different thing. His appeals to the people in that province were couched in language like this: Can you understand that I, a Catholic, and the leader of a great party, if I come into power, would do less for you than those who are now at the head of the Government? Change of climate and change of entourage affected him so much in Ontario that when he spoke there his cry was: Hands off Manitoba. Don't interfere with the autonomy of the province. To the conduct of the right hon. gentleman I trace all the difficulty which has arisen upon this question ever since the hour it was first brought to the attention of the public. But the Prime Minister says that the Conservatives have revived this question to-day, and that they make a speech for Ontario and a speech for Quebec. If that be so, then it is the first time the Conservatives have ever followed his bad example, and if they have done so on this occasion, I am happy to say they do not frequently sin in that respect. The right hon. gentleman talked about the Remedial Bill as a policy of coercion. If to restore the rights of a minority in this country, under the authority of the highest tribunal in the land, if that is coercion, then it is a very strange thing indeed. I deeply deplore that this question should be brought up again, because it is one of those unhappy issues which may have an effect upon the friendly intercourse existing between the different nationalities in this country. But if it does come up again it is because of the vacillating policy of the right hon. gentleman, and because he did not carry out his promises. He went before the people and he said the Remedial Bill was insufficient, and that it was not comprehensive enough to protect the rights of the minority; and he said, "If the Liberal party comes into power, trust us with the destinies of the Manitoba minority, and we will give them full justice. The result of their coming into power was, of course, that the Remedial Bill was dropped. My hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) said that the leader of the Opposition could not have settled this question. I want to ask the hon. gentleman, with his experience of parliamentary practice and parliamentary history, whether the second reading of that Bill did not show that the Conservative party were able and prepared to settle that question.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. You did not settle it.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am going to give you the reason why we did not settle it. It was because of the obstruction of the Liberal party, an obstruction unprecedented in the parliamentary history of any country. Parliament was just at its end; it was impossible to extend it beyond a certain period, and taking advantage of that condition of affairs, the Liberal party stayed here night after night, offering us an obstruction such as had never before been encountered in our parliamentary history. Well, Sir, hon. gentlemen deceived the people of Canada on that question, and they came into power through that deceit, but let me tell them that I believe the very question on which they obstructed will be the cause why they will be hurled from power, and again sent to the left of the Speaker.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Hon. gentlemen may say "Oh," but these cries in Parliament have no significance. It is the people who decide; it is when the voice of the people of Canada is heard in a general election that these great questions are settled. Now, with reference to the appeal which was made to the Pope, I am not one of those who consider that it is a heinous crime to consult the head of the Catholic Church upon matters affecting Catholics in Canada. I do not belong to that extreme wing of patriots. I belong to the people who believe that every man has a right to go to his own church, whatever that church is, and I would be the last man to interfere with any man in doing what he conscientiously believes to be right. The right hon. leader of the Government stated that he had nothing to do with sending that appeal to Rome. I was somewhat disappointed at that statement from the right hon. gentleman, and for this reason—I want to be perfectly frank. It is impossible for me to understand his position as the leader of a great party—that a document of that importance should be sent to Rome or anywhere else without being submitted to him and receiving his approbation. It is impossible for me to imagine that his followers and supporters, his henchmen who were fighting his battles, in Parliament and out of Parliament, would have drawn up a document of that importance, to be sent to the Pope, without consulting my right hon. friend. If I were in his position, I would feel much aggrieved if my friends and supporters had taken such an important move without consulting me. But that is a matter on which I hardly expect the hon. gentleman will be very more confidential with me than he was with my hon. friend (Mr. Bergeron) who spoke yesterday, and whose speech I had not the pleasure of hearing. I conclude by saying simply this. Whether the right hon. gentleman uses sunny ways or whether he, like any other practical statesman, takes the constitution as we have it, and imposes upon one province or another which is violating that constitution, the duty of obeying it, and grants to the minority what the Privy Council of England has declared to be their rights. I believe that time after time, session after session, general election after general election, that question will come up again, because the people of Canada feel that one section of her people have not been treated with the fairness and equality which is enjoyed by other members of the community.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Motion (Mr. Campbell) to adjourn the debate negatived.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who leads this House, in the course of his remarks, asked if it was the intention of the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House to resurrect the school question. We cannot have any such intention, because only a corpse can be resurrected, and the school question never died. The school question never died because it never was settled. It is true, Sir, that an attempt was made to reach a settlement, and I am satisfied that those who took part in the negotiations did their level best to arrive at a satisfactory arrangement. But they made a great mistake, at the very start of the negotiations, by not bringing in the party that was most concerned in the question. These negotiations were carried on ex parte between this Government and that of the province of Manitoba, while the minority was never consulted and was never asked to be a party to the meeting that took place on that question. But before discussing that question, I think that, without going into further details of the school question, which is well known to most members of this House, because it has been discussed on several occasions before, it is, perhaps, a good idea to begin ab ovo the history of that question. I am glad to see the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) in his place when this feature of the case is gone into. That hon. gentleman from the start took a great interest in the settlement of the school question. I must give the hon. gentleman credit for this—that when he started the movement in the province of Quebec towards the settlement, he was, as I believe, thoroughly in earnest. And I may add that, had the question been settled on the lines he advocated at the time, it would have been a most satisfactory settlement for the Roman Catholic minority in the province of Manitoba. As early as 1892, the hon. gentleman wrote, over his own signature, the following:

THE TIME HAS COME.

There is every reason to believe that our Winnipeg correspondent is well informed in connection with what transpires at Ottawa.

The Government and the representatives of the Queen are formally pledged by the report issued on the 21st March, 1891. That state paper bears the signature and the seal of the Crown. Parliament has acquiesced in the same.

It may, therefore, be said that our position, solidly grounded on its intrinsic value, is unassailable in the eyes of the civilized world. We are a minority protected by the constitution and special statutes, and the intervention of the federal powers has been solemnly pledged, should the proceedings instituted before the judicial tribunals by the Government on their own behalf prove inadequate for the future of our claims.

We decline to sally out of the citadel. Let the Governor in Council take action on the petitions which are now before them, and which will be soon followed by others to the same purpose.

The Greenway Acts should have been disallowed. The Government were afraid of the fanatical element in the elections of 1891.

They have pledged their word, in case the judicial controversy should prove a failure, to resort to the means put at their disposal by clause 22 of the Manitoba Act.

The time has come for them to redeem their pledge, and to mete out justice to a minority which demands nothing else.

Whether the separate school system finds favour or not with certain elements of the population, such is not the question at issue. The existence of that system is part and parcel of our political, national and religious patrimony. Whether or not that system is defective, it is our business to remedy such defects in it as we think fit.

Let them, if they like and if they can, despoil us of our rights to our schools through sheer violence and the club law; the whole responsibility for the consequences will fall upon the authors of that spoliation. As to securing our consent, we say—Never.

Yet this is what they are aiming at, this very hour. They propose to us to barter our rights for the appointment of a Catholic Prime Minister, Sir John Thompson. The question is as to whether the fact of having one of our co-religionists appointed to that position would be an unalloyed benefit to us. Be that as it may, we decline to favour or be a party to any ministerial combination, by the means of that school question.

I am aware my Conservative friends are paving the way to re-organization, which would bring into the Cabinet Mr. Meredith and Mr. Angers. Sir John Thompson would then become Prime Minister.

The Conservative party is powerful. They boast of a majority of 70 votes in the House of Commons. Will they flinch before the threats of any intolerant school which sets up as a principle that the majority are not bound to respect for their pledges and the constitution?

If Sir John Thompson is a man, now is the time to show it.

Is it true that the emissaries, presuming to speak on behalf of Ministers, are asking Archbishop Taché and other bishops for statements?

It is the Ministers' fault if we have to bear the consequences of the judgment of the Privy Council of England. Owing to the great confidence with which his ability inspired us, we have been led to make concessions the reckless character of which is now patent.

I do not wish to recriminate, I merely wish, in mentioning this fact, to explain why I cannot listen to any demand for composition.

(Sgd.) J. ISRAEL TARTE.

These are the views held by the hon. gentleman, and which he expressed in his organ over his signature, "La Canadien," October 28th, 1892. A little later, the same hon. gentleman wrote another article on the same subject, which he also signed. I find it in "Le Canadien," of 11th November, 1892. I am, of course, giving a translation of these articles which were written in French. This article is entitled "The Manitoba Schools," and reads as follows:—

The new Minister of the Interior, Mr. Daly, has declined to state his views on the question, when he told his constituents:—"The Privy Council of Canada is called upon to exercise judicial functions on this matter, and it would be a breach of propriety to pronounce myself, before the parties have been heard."

Mr. Tarte then went on to comment on this:

I am quite ready to grant that it was scarcely reasonable to expect that Mr. Daly should, under the circumstances, define the policy of the Government. The appeal of the Catholics will soon be heard. The Greenway Government will reply, and the Governor General in Council will point out to the Manitoba Government what action he deems necessary to be taken by them in order to enforce the provisions of section 22.

But I may be allowed to say that the words "judicial functions" seem to be unacceptable. The Dominion Executive is the chief guardian of the constitution. And it is in such capacity that it is bound to interfere in the matter. The Government and the Parliament of Canada, under the Act of 1870, pledged themselves to see that the separate school system should be maintained in the new province which they were creating. Between the people of Manitoba and the Dominion the issue is not a question of fact; the good faith of the country is involved. If the authorized organs of the Dominion Government, that is to say, the Government and Parliament of Canada, have used dubious language, and not made clear their meaning in the drafting of the Manitoba charter of 1870, are the Catholic minority to suffer from it? Does that preclude the incontrovertible fact that a distinct provision has been enacted and a positive arrangement entered into with regard to the Manitoba separate school system?

The political question takes the lead and overshadows all the technicalities, all the quibbles through which Mr. Greenway tries to render illusory one of the fundamental principles of the Act of 1870.

That the phraseology of the Act is somewhat twisted may be surmised from the statement of the Privy Council to that effect. But, if so, the Governor General in Council, and, if needs be, the Parliament of Canada, should interfere in order to remedy this deficiency and make clear the meaning of the Act.

The newspapers which believe that the majority is right openly declare that the Manitoba Government will not comply with the decision of the Governor General in Council, and will defy the Parliament of Canada. We are not surprised at hearing such language. We were quite prepared for it by the attitude of the "Mail" and its allies previously to the reception of the judgment of the Privy Council in England. Being satisfied that it would be adverse to their pretensions, they freely declared that they would disregard it. It is a matter of great concern to us that the sectarian feelings of these people should be known. The peace and harmony, and interests of the Dominion are of no consequence to those apostles, to those champions of national disintegration. I sincerely believe that there will be found in the House of Commons enough members ready to mete out justice to the minority, to maintain unsullied the fair name of the Dominion, and to inspire confidence in the honesty of the Government of the country, irrespective of the party which may be in power. We are called upon to decide whether the spirit of our constitution must prevail or else whether we will allow it to be infringed upon by ward politicians.

(Sgd.) J. ISRAEL TARTE.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Is that the Minister of Public Works?

Mr. LaRIVIERE. He was not at that time, but is now. These were, at the time, the opinions not only of the present Minister of Public Works, but of the leader of the Liberal party. These gentlemen did not then, as they do to-day, put in the shade their opinions, but came forward openly and boldly declared themselves in favour of the intervention of the federal authorities in the Manitoba school question in order to bring, if not an amicable settlement, a settlement by coercion, as it is called to-day, on the plea that constitutional usage had to be accepted, and that justice had to be rendered. Well, those principles I support to-day as I did at the time those articles were written by my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works. The only difference between him and me on this question is that while I upheld those principles in 1892, I did not change my opinion because at that time the friends I was supporting were in power, and I have not changed them to-day, while the friends of the hon. gentleman are in power. I have never changed my views in this matter, but have always followed the same course. But, Sir, a couple of years afterwards we had the honour of a visit in the province of Manitoba from no less a high personage than the then leader of the Opposition, the present leader of this House. The right hon. gentleman who now leads this House paid a visit to Manitoba in 1894, and he was approached on that occasion by the Catholic community of the city of Winnipeg. They laid before him the case of the Catholic minority, and after expressing his astonishment at the state of facts, he used this language, as reported in the "Cultivateur," another organ of the Minister of Public Works, in its issue of the 8th September, 1894:

The provinces have the power to decide the question of education, but if any right is violated, if any injustice is perpetrated, the minority has a remedy under the Canadian constitution. The appeal is provided by the British North America Act. If the case made out in your address is as I have just heard, I believe that the Catholics have the strongest reason to ask for remedial legislation. If I were in power I would have an investigation made, and if it was shown that the facts are as indicated, I would apply a remedy.

These are the words of the right hon. gentleman on that occasion in the city of Winnipeg, as reported in "Le Cultivateur," the Liberal organ of the Minister of Public Works at the time. Those were the opinions of the hon. gentlemen opposite before they came to power, before the general elections which brought them to the Treasury benches. I will not dwell upon what took place during the election; I will not repeat that promises were made of one kind in one part of the Dominion, and of another kind in other parts of the Dominion. That matter has been already fully discussed. But I wish to come at once to the negotiations that took place for a settlement. At the opening of this House, in the session of 1897, I gave notice that I would put the following questions to the Government, which I did on the 1st of April. They were as follows:—

His Excellency the Governor General having informed the House: "That after many and protracted discussions a settlement was reached between the two Governments which was the best arrangement obtainable under the existing conditions of this disturbing question" (the Manitoba school question), will the Government inform the House what were the propositions made to the Government of Manitoba, what concessions were asked for, and which of these, if any, were not granted?

On that occasion the Prime Minister gave me the following answer:—

The negotiations were verbal; there is no record of them. The papers connected with that subject will be brought down.

The only papers on that subject that were brought down was merely a copy of the agreement that had been arrived at between the two Governments. We could not get at the records of what took place on that occasion, we could not find who had negotiated, we could not find what instructions had been given by the Governor in Council to the parties entrusted with the duty of effecting a settlement on that occasion, we could not get at what took place between the delegates of this Government and those appointed by the local Government of Manitoba to deal with this matter. Everything has been concealed from this House, and that is one of the great complaints we have against this Government, that they would not take the House into their confidence and tell us what took place, not only on that occasion, but on several other occasions in connection with the Manitoba school question. Well, Sir, a so-called settlement was arrived at. It was made the subject of a chapter in the local statutes of the province of Manitoba. I do not know that I need to put on record the whole statutes, which is well known to most members of this House. The statute, or the settlement, as it is called, is a very slight amendment of the law that existed before, and that was so much complained of, that is the law of 1890. It provides for religious teaching between the hours of half-past three in the afternoon and four o'clock in the same afternoon. That was provided before in the former law, but there is a different way of arriving at such teaching, namely, by petition from the parents, or by resolution of the school trustees. It provides also that when ten pupils in any school speak the French language, or any language other than English, as their native tongue, the teaching of such pupils shall be conducted in French, or such other language, and not upon the bi-lingual system. We must notice here that while it has been contended on several occasions that the settlement provides for the teaching of the French language in the schools, the law does not read so, and the explanations given by the Attorney General of Manitoba when the Act was passed confirm that view. The law reads: "Shall be conducted in French," that is if ten of the pupils are of that nationality. Now, when that Act came before the legislature there was, of course, a long debate upon it, the reading of which I will not inflict upon the House. But I will make a few extracts which will show the spirit of the settlement as interpreted by the Manitoba Government and as put before that legislature which accepted it. The Attorney General, Mr. Cameron, in the course of his remarks:

Expressed a hope that the second reading, or at any rate a third reading of the Bill, would prove to be the final stage of what had been a very vexed and at times a very burning question. Proving that he thought this settlement would be final, and should be accepted as such. He then discusses the Remedial Bill that was attempted to be passed in this House on a celebrated occasion we all remember, and he discusses also the mission of Messrs. Smith, Desjardins and Dickie to the province of Manitoba on a former occasion, when they were entrusted by the Federal Government with a mission to try and arrive at a settlement of the question. Now, Sir, this so-called settlement made by the present Government is considered by the Attorney General of Manitoba as a triumph. Here are his words:

He regarded the terms of the settlement arrived at as a distinct triumph on the part of this legislature and government. This province was to be congratulated upon such a moderate solution of what appeared at one time to be a very great problem indeed.

He might as well have boasted that it was a triumph because he had at his knees the members of this Government praying for a settlement of the question. But their prayers were not very fretful, because they only brought a settlement quite unacceptable to those who were most concerned about it. Section 10 provides:

That when 10 pupils in any school speak the French language, or any other language than English, as their native language, the teaching of such pupils shall be conducted in French, or such other language, and English upon the bi-lingual system.

It is absolutely necessary, adds the Attorney General, that in French, German and Mennonite settlements the pupil should learn English by the best methods.

This puts an end to the contention of hon. gentlemen that the settlement provides for the teaching of French in the Manitoba schools. It now remains to ascertain as to how this so-called settlement was received by the Catholic population in Manitoba after its enactment. I have here a copy of a series of resolutions adopted at a public meeting held in the city of Winnipeg, where the English-speaking Catholics of that city protested most energetically against the so-called settlement. The report of the meeting is pretty lengthy, and I will not occupy the time of the House by reading it in full. But, Sir, the expressions used on that occasion were very energetic, and most of the resolutions were moved and seconded by leading citizens of Winnipeg, some of whom are strong Liberals, belonging to the party of hon. gentlemen opposite, who on that occasion did not fear to put aside their political proclivities and express openly their disapprobation of the arrangement arrived at between the Government of this Dominion and the local government of Manitoba. The fact of the matter is, Sir, that the city of Winnipeg occupies a worse position so far as the Catholic minority is concerned than any other part of the province. I have on another occasion stated in this House that the Roman Catholic minority of Winnipeg, besides having to support their own independent Catholic schools, which were formerly the public Catholic schools of the city, have to pay taxes for the support of the other public schools. Worse than that, Mr. Speaker. Their own school-houses, which they use to-day in order to keep their separate schools, are taxed to the extent of $300 for the support of the public schools in the city, from which they do not derive any benefit. I do not know any other province in the Dominion where such a state of things could occur. I know that in the great city of Montreal there are private school buildings, under no denomination, but belonging to private persons, that are exempt from taxation, owing to the fact that they are school-houses, and open to the public. But in the city of Winnipeg, under the existing law, even our Catholic schools, and when I speak of the city of Winnipeg I wish to indicate that the same condition prevails in country places where there is a mixed community, are taxed for the support of the public schools, which sometimes are on the opposite side of the street, while the Catholic minority do not derive a single cent of taxation for their support from the Government. Has this so-called settlement altered the position; has any change taken place since the enactment of the law of 1897: are the Catholic schools of Winnipeg in a better position than they were before? It is true that in some of the country places where the Catholics form the controlling element, where they can elect their trustees, after having for eight years been compelled to support their schools out of their own resources, without receiving any support from the municipalities or the government, to-day, owing to a relaxation of the school laws, those people are compelled to come under the law, not to accept the law, but to come under it, in order to save their schools from being closed. And because those things happen, and because the people are compelled to submit to the law or otherwise starve, I hear hon. gentlemen opposite say: The settlement is all right, the Conservative minority is satisfied with the law. There is a case cited in history when the people were compelled "to believe or die," and that is exactly the position of the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba—they must accept the law or have no schools at all. That is the position we occupy under this so-called liberal and acceptable settlement arrived at by hon. gentlemen opposite. I have mentioned the protest entered by the Catholic minority of Winnipeg. In every parish, district, town and village in the province where there is a Roman Catholic population of any consequence, meetings were held, and similar resolutions were adopted protesting against the so-called settlement of the school question entered into between hon. gentlemen opposite and the local government of Manitoba. But besides the people themselves, the Archbishop of St. Boniface did not accept that settlement, and the encyclical letter which has been put on record by the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) contains a reference to this subject, and I fail to see from it that this settlement is approved by His Holiness, to whom hon. gentlemen opposite have appealed on another subject. And while I am speaking on that question, I may say that I do not find fault with the Catholic members of the Liberal party for appealing to His Holiness on a question which they thought was one within the province and jurisdiction of His Holiness. What we may find fault with is that the ground on which they based their petition and memorial was not such as was represented by them. But, Sir, I fail to see that any one has the right to contest the propriety of any Roman Catholic member of this House appealing to the authorities of his own church if he so chooses. However, the contrast between the course pursued on different occasions by my hon. friends opposite when these very delicate questions are being discussed in this House, is very marked indeed. What a scandal they now try to raise from the fact that my hon. friend from Beauharnois prepared, as they say, a brief for the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), and which brief has been used also by the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) and the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill). Well, Sir, these gentlemen opposite were not so much scandalized a few years ago when these very same members worked in harmony with them to help them defeat the Remedial Bill. The right hon. gentleman and his friends were not scandalized to vote then with the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) and the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) and the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill). They were not scandalized when they themselves during long sessions of this House acted on the instigation of the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) and scrupulously carried out the programme he had prepared for them. He was their leader at the time, but they did not feel scandalized because of that. These hon. members avail of the speech made by my hon. friend from Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) to discuss a question that should not be introduced in connection with the Manitoba schools, but my hon. friend from Beauharnois has no responsibility for that. There is no foundation whatever for the allegation that my hon. friend (Mr. Bergeron), or I, or any others of us, are acting in concert with these hon. gentlemen, as the Premier and his colleagues acted in concert with them to defeat the Remedial Bill. In the course of some remarks made by the Prime Minister, he threw out this threat with reference to the so-called settlement of the school question: "Perfect or imperfect," he said, "there is the settlement and there it will stand." The right hon. gentleman and his Government, who were the first to support the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba, who insisted on the then Conservative Government settling the question, now, that they have made what I would call in vulgar language, a botch of the settlement, come to us and say: "Perfect or imperfect, there it will stand." But my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), in his very nice speech delivered this afternoon, had quite a different story, and his opinion was: We do not say that the settlement is full and complete. Well, what then? If it is not full and complete, do you mean to complete it later on? Surely that does not agree with the statement of the Prime Minister: Perfect or imperfect, there it will stand. Which of the two gentlemen are we to accept as the spokesman of the Liberal party? I am afraid that the Prime Minister has said what he means, because since the very beginning of this question his action has been such as to warrant us in the belief that he never intended to arrive at a just settlement, that he never wished to go any further than some of his supporters would allow him, and that he never intended to act boldly and do justice to that poor handful of Catholics in the province of Manitoba. These hon. gentlemen opposite were bold enough in championing the rights of the minority when they were out of power, but since they have assumed the responsibility of office, they have given up the idea of seeing that justice shall be done to the Manitoba Catholics. Sir, the school question is not settled, and it will not be settled until the minority in Manitoba have got complete justice, and have restituted to them the separate schools to which, under the constitution, they are entitled.

ALIEN LABOUR LAW—ENFORCEMENT.

Mr. CLARKE. I take this opportunity to draw the attention of the First Minister to a telegram which I have just received respecting the appointment of an Alien Labour Law officer in Toronto. It will be within the recollection of the House that on Monday last the announcement was made by the Prime Minister that an officer had been appointed to enforce the law in that city, and the answer was made to-day by the First Minister that he was appointed only yesterday. This is the telegram which I have received :

Toronto, May 12.

W. B. McMurrich has gone to Muskoka. Will not return till next week. Flagrant infringement of Act still continues. Does Government not intend to protect us? Aliens should be deported at once if Act is to be effective.

(Sgd. D. CAREY,
Pres., Trades' Congress.
J. McFAYDEN,
Pres., Shoe Workers.
W. IRWIN,
Pres., Upholsterers.

I again draw the attention of the Government to the fact, that notwithstanding the statement made by the First Minister and some of his colleagues, so far the workmen of the city of Toronto have not been given the protection which it was intended they should receive when the Alien Labour Law was put on the Statute-book.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). I would say to the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke) that the statement made by the First Minister was quite correct, that Mr. McMurrich had been appointed to represent the Department of Justice in the city of Toronto for the purpose of enforcing the Alien Labour Law. Of course the Government do not, and the Government cannot undertake that their officers shall always remain in one particular spot. If the officer is absent, steps will at once be taken to see that some person is in residence there, able and willing to attend to the duties assigned to him.

Mr. CLARKE. I may say, with the permission of the House, that the gentleman who was appointed, had received no instructions in the matter from the Government up to yesterday. Whether they were sent last night or not, I cannot say; but as late as yesterday he had received no instructions as to the enforcement of the Act in that city.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am not aware that the hon. member for West Toronto can know of his own knowledge whether or not that statement of his is correct. Of course, he believes it to be correct; but all the same his information may be incorrect.

Mr. CLARKE. Will the hon. Postmaster General state that it is incorrect?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I cannot say, for it is not in my department; but I am quite satisfied that instructions have been sent to Mr. McMurrich to act for the Government in connection with the enforcement of the law.

CLAIM OF CAMPBELL McNAB.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a word in connection with a claim which I understand has been presented to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), and I do it simply at the request of the claimant, so far as my doing so may be valuable to him, and for the purpose of giving my recollection of the circumstances surrounding the matter. It is a small claim, amounting, I believe, to some $400, which is asked by Mr. Campbell McNab, of Rivière du Loup, for certain expenses connected with the repair of an old yacht that belonged to the Department of Marine and Fisheries. Unless my memory is at fault, as to any memorandum that may have been in the department at the time, and may be there now, the circumstances were these. This yacht was in a very bad state—indeed, was not utilized by the department at all. Mr. Campbell McNab had for some thirty years been giving his attention to the catching and destruction of porpoises in the Gulf. The destruction of these porpoises was of great value to the fisheries; and in connection with that enterprise, on which he had spent a large amount of money, he made the request to the department that we should allow him the use of this old boat, which he intended to put into condition. Of course, we had no authority to give him the boat, or to do anything further than I did; that was, practically to authorize him to use the boat. In fact, I may have gone further than that. I may have told him that the department would never want the boat, and that he could take it and use it for the destruction of porpoises. I have no doubt I led him to believe that we would not take the boat back; or, at any rate, that if we had ever occasion to use it, we certainly would not take it back at his expense, or leave him to bear the expense he would go to in putting it into condition. I do not, of course, know what expense he went to; but he has told me that he paid out $400 odd upon it. I understand that the department now requires the boat, and all I want to say is that my recollection of the matter is that under the circumstances he would be fairly entitled to be paid the amount; and certainly, if I were in the responsible position, and wanted that boat back, after what had occurred, I would ask the necessary vote to reimburse him for the expense he went to.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). There is nothing at present on file in the department showing what action the Minister had taken. I assumed that the statements he had made to the party were verbal statements. I will take occasion to read the hon. gentleman's statements to-morrow.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—TEMIS- COUATA ELECTION.

Mr. GAUVREAU. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a personal explanation. The hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) has made a statement on the floor of the House against which I wish to enter my protest, in my own name and on behalf of the county of Temiscouata which I have the honour of representing here. In his remarks on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, on the 11th February, the hon. gentleman touched upon the Temiscouata election. I did not deem it my duty at the time to protest against that statement, as I considered under the circumstances that silence was the best policy. But as the saying is "in spite of one, nature will always assert its rights," and I find that the hon. gentleman has again referred to the question in such terms that I cannot pass them over in silence. The hon. gentleman says that I am not the member elect, the representative of the electorate of my constituency, a contention so much the more extraordinary as I was returned without any opposition.

It is true that there were two Liberal candidates in the field, and whether the candidate who resigned acted with more wisdom than I did, I shall not attempt to say; at all events, Mr. Pouliot withdrew from the contest in a most honourable manner, after an agreement was arrived at and without any pressure being brought to bear upon him, and that is the reason why I was returned by acclamation. I may further say this, Mr. Speaker, that had we both remained in the field up to polling day.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

the Conservative candidate would have met with an overwhelming defeat, just the same as at the local election. I do not wish to take up the time of the House, but I could not allow to go unchallenged what I consider as a gratuitous aspersion on my constituents without entering a solemn protest against the statement of the hon. member for Beauharnois.

Motion agreed to, and the House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In Committee.)

Ontario—Dominion Public Buildings—

Renewals, improvements, repairs, &c.. $10,000

Mr. FOSTER. We would like to know on what buildings this sum is to be expended.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). This is the usual vote; but I may give the names of the places which have made calls upon us: Amherstburg, Cayuga, Chatham, Cornwall, Galt, Goderich, Gananoque, Hamilton post office, Kingston post office and custom-house, London custom-house, London inland revenue office, London post office, Napanee public building, Niagara Falls public building, Pembroke public building, Peterborough post office, Strathroy public building, Walkerton public building and Windsor public building. In all these places we have calls made upon us, and during the fiscal year there will no doubt be other calls. That is only for the general repairs made every year.

Toronto Dominion Public Building—

Improvement, renewals, repairs, &c.... $7,000

Mr. CLARKE. Might I ask the hon. Minister on what buildings this is proposed to be expended, and whether any appropriation is to be made for the completion of the work on the new drill shed?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This sum has no relation whatever to the drill shed. The drill sheds are not under my control, but under that of the Minister of Militia. I only make the big repairs for the drill sheds. This appropriation is for the following purposes:—Examining warehouse, $1,704; custom-house, $650; inland revenue, $2,375; general post office and branches, $1,775; and there are $500 for incidentals.

Mr. QUINN. What are the incidentals?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is impossible to say. In every public building there are little repairs to be made every year.

Mr. QUINN. Does this item cover the expense of the clerk of works in each case?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It does not.

Mr. QUINN. So that we will not have any more dry goods clerks employed as clerks of works?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No; in the case of small works the caretakers are generally employed in that capacity.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON. I would like to ask whether any provision has been made in the Estimates for the repairing of the Toronto custom-house? The wood work, outside and inside, and the iron work are in a most disgraceful condition, and have not been painted for twenty years.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This item will provide for the re-painting of the outside of the building.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON. I am advised that the wood and iron work is in a most disgraceful condition. The iron work, in many cases is absolutely rusting away for want of proper attention on the part of officials. Do I understand that part of this appropriation will be devoted for that purpose?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, part of that appropriation is for the painting of this building.

Arnprior post office, custom-house, &c., under contract (lapsed amount)..... $4,900

Mr. CLANCY. A report was made to this Department a few days ago, which we have not yet seen, but which I judge is not at all favourable in many respects. To what extent the report has gone I am not prepared to say, but it would seem to reflect unfavourably upon some person, whether the clerk of works or the Minister I do not know, but of course the Minister never does wrong. He always says he is extremely anxious and honest in these matters. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will explain whether it is his intention to retain the clerk of works sent there, and who, it would seem, is accountable for the work not having been constructed in some respects according to the plans and specifications.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. As my hon. friend followed the inquiry that was made in the Public Accounts Committee, he knows just as much as I do. I do not think that the department can be charged with any laxity in that work. Several of my officers went to Arnprior to visit the works on different occasions. After I heard the evidence of one of the witnesses, I sent Mr. Adams, one of the oldest officers in the department, to Arnprior, and he made a report. He was heard as a witness, and swore that the building was very well erected indeed and the work well done, but that some little defects existed, which will be remedied before the contractors are paid. I shall instruct immediately my officers to bring the report before the House.

Mr. CLANCY. No one knows so far how great those difficulties are. Of course the House has not the report, and it is easy to minimize the extent of the defects, but we had it clearly stated in evidence that material was used which had already been in use, and which would not have been allowed if it had been detected by the officers of the department. It was clearly stated also that that was contrary to the plans and specifications. The hon. gentleman says that the defects are very small, but if I remember rightly some other questions were asked Mr. Adams, and he replied that as he was not there he was unable to give the information wanted. I am not going to charge the hon. gentleman with not having sent the officers of the department to inspect the work. But there is one thing that seems perfectly clear, and that is that the officer should visit Arnprior more frequently than in the past, or the clerk of works should be changed. I have not heard the hon. gentleman say who is to blame. He said it is not the officers of his department. Is it the clerk of works?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The defects found to exist will amount to $200 or $300, the chief architect tells me. Those defects will be remedied. Whether the clerk of works has done his duty, I am not prepared to say. I am going to investigate, and if I find that the man is not competent I shall dispense with his services.

Mr. WILSON. I should like to have some explanation of the dismissal of the caretaker in the town of Napanee?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If my hon. friend (Mr. Wilson) will permit me, I would suggest he will be able to discuss that dismissal when the item of $70,000 for caretakers comes up. I shall be glad to give him any information I have.

Mr. FOSTER. I attended the meeting of the Public Accounts Committee and heard some of the evidence that was given. I think the hon. Minister will agree with me that it is not the best plan to employ as clerk of works on important public buildings a man who is not a builder or at least a mechanic of some kind. I have no desire to prejudice this case, but I think that it was brought out that the gentleman who held the position was not a practical builder. He cannot know mason work as a builder knows it, nor can he supervise any part of the work with expert knowledge. Mr. Adams stated that lath had been put in which was not up to the standard. Had there been an efficient clerk of works this would not have been allowed to go in. As to the strapping, we do not know how much bad material has gone in, as it has been covered up. I think, as I have said, that the man employed as clerk of works in such a case as this should be a builder or a mechanic.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) is right. He knows as well as I do, that in the past, incompetent men have been employed in such positions, and I am afraid that in this case the man is not as competent as he should be.

Mr. TAYLOR. I presume that the hon. Minister of Public Works will admit that when he took charge of this work the foundation was partially built. He had a practical builder as clerk of works at $75 a month, a gentleman who was mayor of the town and contractor and builder all his life. The only charge against him was that there were several Liberals wanting places, and this gentleman had to be removed to make room for one of them. They appointed in his place a gentleman who was a clerk in a dry goods store, who, from information received, was very active in assisting the Liberal party in revising their voters' list and other work, and so had to be paid somehow at the country's expense. He was put on at $2 a day for Sunday and every day. At the same time he was permitted to attend to his dry goods store, coming over to the work now and again. During the time that Mr. Stafford, a practical man was there as clerk of works, the Government inspector was in the habit of calling once every month. But after Mr. Tierney was appointed the inspector called only once a year. Mr. Adams did not visit the work once from the time Mr. Stafford was put off until the other day. As he stated in evidence the other day the lathing was done and he could not tell what the strapping looked like, and could only make a cursory examination of the building as completed. The information we have is that this inspector was away sometimes a week at a time, but he was still drawing his pay, while strapping was drawn from a pile of cull lumber that had been thrown out to rot. Ten or fifteen loads were taken from that pile, both for binding timbers and strapping. As I understand it, until this investigation took place, it was supposed that this building was all right. Mr. Tierney had reported monthly, the money had been paid, and everything was satisfactory. I received a letter giving me some information with regard to the matter:

When Mayor Stafford was local inspector on the post office here, before 15th October, 1898, the Government inspector was in the habit of calling once every month. Since Tierney was appointed the inspector has called only once a year.

No work at all was done on the building from November, 1896, to May, 1897—the foundation only being built before that time.

From November, 1897, to 25th April, 1898, the building was practically closed up, except when one Baldwin McCreary, supposed to be caretaker, was occasionally around.

Yet Tierney was drawing his pay Sunday and every day, having got his position because he was an offensive partisan and must be paid at the expense of the country for the party services he had rendered.

The stonework on the inside is not plastered under the laths, which leaves the building cold, and the strapping to which the laths are nailed is taken from McLachlin's dump.

The archways over the doors and windows are falling in, and the contractor was cementing small stone around them on Wednesday last.

Tierney was down at the Quayon for some time this spring buying and disposing of the stock of O'Meara & Hodgins. He has been this last while back in Renfrew attending to the buying and selling of bankrupt stock.

That is a portion of the information I got, and when the matter was investigated, we found that the information I had received was correct in every particular. Mr. Stafford gave evidence, the carter who drew the stuff from the dump pile gave evidence. The contractor and clerk of works stated that nothing was taken from the dump pile and that first-class material was used. Yet, when the true evidence came, it was shown that this bad material had been used. The clerk of works made the statement that he had constructed several buildings, yet gentlemen who knew him well in Arnprior say that he has always been a dry goods clerk and that he could not have constructed such buildings. This is simply a case of getting rid of an efficient officer in order to find a place for a Liberal partisan who had assisted the Liberal party to get into power, even though a public building is put up so badly that it is already falling to pieces.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not see why my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) should try to magnify these things. The chief architect tells me—

Mr. TAYLOR. He has not been there.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. But he has received the report of a most competent officer, and he says that there are some small things about the buildings which will be remedied and which amount in all to about $200 or $300. These things may happen in the erection of any building. Now as to the inspection of the works, my hon. friend is altogether misinformed. There have been seven inspections by special officers since the work has been going on.

Mr. TAYLOR. I agree with that, five of them were while Mr. Stafford was superintendent, and two since.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Adams went there twice.

Mr. TAYLOR. Twice while Mr. Stafford was there, and once the other day.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Mr. Shearer, who is a very competent man, went once, Mr. Routhier, who is a very competent man went twice. I think the officers of my department have done their duty.

Mr. POPE. It is evident from the remarks of the Minister that the difficulty is that he has not got a man on the spot. I am surprised that so practical a man as the Minister of Public Works pretends to be, should have entrusted the construction of that building to a person who was not a competent builder in any sense of the word. Then he comes to this Parliament and says that although his officers from time to time visited that building and inspected it, between the times of their inspection, bad work is done, and the country is called upon to pay twice the same bill.

Kingston drill hall..... $10,000

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The site of this drill hall was the property of the Militia Department, and we are taking it over. The officers of my department, after several consultations with the Militia Department, have come to the conclusion that perhaps we will spend about $40,000 or $45,000. We have been as moderate as possible.

Major's Hill Park—To complete stone and iron fence $4,500

Mr. QUINN. We would like to have some explanations.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That park was transferred to the Government in 1885 by the city of Ottawa, and since that time it has been under the control of my department. We are building a fence which was begun two years ago.

Mr. POPE. Is that work done by contract?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, by day's work, under the supervision of a very competent man, and of the chief architect himself.

Mr. POPE. How is this stone obtained? Do you go to the quarry and obtain it by day's work?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The chief architect buys the stone, and then it is cut and put in proper place by day's work. The chief architect tells me that the work will cost about $14,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Is not this a well defined piece of work? You are not tearing down something and taking out old stuff and putting in new?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We are building a new stone and iron fence along Mackenzie Avenue.

Mr. FOSTER. But you are going to do new work to the extent of $14,000?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My chief architect tells me that the whole work when completed will have cost $14,000, including what we spent last year.

Mr. FOSTER. What you did last year you did by day's work?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. What proportion of that still remains to be done?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. About $10,000 worth.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, I want to ask my hon. friend if that is keeping faith with the public, if that is the way he proposes to administer his department. There is a good excuse sometimes for doing things by day's work when you have to tear down and build up, because then no man can make an estimate. But this is clear. There is a certain kind of stone you want, a certain kind of fence that must be built, it is all done by specifications on plans drawn by your own officers. If anything can be contracted for, it is such a work as that, but the hon. gentleman is lilly-dallying along with his day's work and building $14,000 worth of stone fence. I do not know how he squares his conduct with the rules of his department and with the Orders in Council that have been passed. Little jobs may be done by day's work, but outside of that, the rule and the Orders in Council require that tenders shall be called for and the work contracted.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am asking Parliament to vote the sum of $4,500 because I want to do this year a certain piece of work which will not exceed that amount this year. I am not bound to spend $14,000, I shall not spend that sum, I want to build that work gradually. My hon. friend knows how estimates are prepared. You have to remain within a certain figure, your estimates must not exceed so much. The Minister of Finance sometimes finds himself out in his estimates. My hon. friend says: I do not want you to exceed such a sum this year. I am not violating the rule nor the Orders in Council. When I ask for $4,500 for a certain piece of work that will not exceed that amount, I am within the rule. I think I have not had a very long experience in the Department of Public Works, but I must say that the system of public tenders is not always the best. The ex-Minister of Finance will agree with me that on many occasions we have had a lot of trouble with public tenders. But I may say en passant that the rule does not apply in this case, because here I am asking for $4,500 for a specific piece of work that will not cost more than that.

Mr. FOSTER. If a man eats a carcass of mutton, he does not eat it at one meal but in sections. If a man puts up a building, he does it by sections, a part in one month and so on. Even sometimes it will take two years to repair a building or three years to finish it. But does the hon. gentleman justify his departure from the contract system by saying that he is going to spend $5,000 this year and $5,000 next year and so on? He is going to spend in the end the whole sum of $14,000, and he is going to do the work without its having been put up to public competition. He is in fact doing it by day's work, calling in men that he and his company in this city want to employ, the faithful, the rank and file who are to get the benefit of it. I have seen them—two or three men working for a few moments and then gazing around at the horizon, watching every person from the time he comes into sight until he disappears out of sight, attracted by every little new thing and making a new thing out of every old thing, and taking time for their work so as not to unsettle their bones or destroy their backs, with a proper number of men to oversee them. The hon. Minister is doing that. The hon. gentleman knows he has really given no excuse, but this is on a line with what he is doing straight through, and examples we shall call to his attention as we pass through the Estimates. The hon. gentleman is ignoring the principle of tender and contract, he is doing it in case after case, even after he had solemnly promised Parliament that the work would be executed by contract. That is what the hon. gentleman is doing, and the time has come when his colleagues should pull him up.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I think the hon. gentleman is unfair. One of the greatest complaints made against me in this city is that I have not dismissed a great many Conservatives. I have dismissed some of them, but I have kept a great number. The hon. gentleman has stated that I am employing men at my own sweet will. I must protest against that charge. I have employed a good many of my political friends—it is my duty to do so as a Minister.

Mr. FOSTER. You are doing that part of your duty first-rate.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. But at the same time I have been fair and I have kept many Conservatives. There are men I would not dispense with, because they are good and competent officers, but at the same time I am trying, to the best of my ability, to do justice to my own political friends. It is my duty to do it.

Mr. BERGERON. When was the fence around Major Hill commenced?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. When the season opened I commenced the work, I did not lose much time.

Mr. BERGERON. I do not mean this year; but when was the work as a whole commenced?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The first part was built by the city before Major's Hill was taken over by the department.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. BERGERON. Since when did the hon. gentleman commence his own fencing?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I got a vote last year and spent it.

Mr. BERGERON. I understand it is not being done by contract, but by day's work?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. BERGERON. Where did the department get the stone?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I understand that the chief architect got the stone from Hull, where there is a first-class quarry.

Mr. BERGERON. Is it the intention to put any railing above the stone work, or to allow the fence to remain as it is now?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My chief architect tells me he wants to put an iron railing around.

Mr. BERGERON. Has the hon. gentleman any idea where he will buy the railing, whether it will be bought by tender, or by pieces?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I cannot say now.

Mr. BERGERON. Will the cost come out of the $4,900?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No.

Mr. BERGERON. Then this is simply for the stone work?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, only for that.

Mr. BERGERON. Is it intended to carry the fencing beyond the Printing Bureau?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is intended to build 1,140 feet of stone fencing 5 feet in height.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. How many feet have been built by the city?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. About one-fourth of the whole.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What did the city pay for the quantity it built? I understand the department is undertaking to build a fence of the same character as the city built, and we should know whether that work was done by contract or by day's labour, and what it cost.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It was built several years ago.

Mr. HAGGART. What did the part built last year cost per yard?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The chief architect cannot tell now, but I will bring the prices down.

Mr. BERGERON. The hon. gentleman had better let the item stand.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have no objection to allow it to stand.

Mr. WALLACE. What is the use of building this fence around the public park?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman will surely not say that a public park should not be surrounded by a fence. At present there is only an old board fence.

Mr. BERGERON. Fences are being taken away from all public parks. The fence around Viger Garden at Montreal has been removed.

Mr. McMULLEN. If the item is to stand, the House should be put in possession of the expenditure from the time we took possession of Major Hill park, for each year, up to the present time.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the item is allowed to stand, I would ask when did the department undertake to do this work?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In 1885 the park and some of the approaches were taken over by the Department of Public Works, and since then we are bound to keep the park under that agreement.

Mr. FOSTER. Does that obligation to keep the park make it necessary to build a $14,000 fence?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Part of the fence was built and we had to continue the work. The old board fence there at present is disgraceful, and surely I cannot be expected to change the style of fence that has been commenced.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend is not justified in taking the hard-earned money of the people to build a $14,000 fence around a small park. Is this fence meant for defensive purposes? If the hon. Minister wanted to be economical he could have built a nice fence there for one-tenth of the money.

Mr. BERGERON. It does not need a fence at all.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I cannot spoil the appearance of the park by making a sham fence. I took the advice of my architect that we should continue the fence in the same style in which it was begun.

Mr. WALLACE. Is it not fifteen years ago since that part of the fence was built?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not know.

Mr. MONK. I have seen that fence, and it is altogether useless, and when finished will cost a great deal to keep in repair. We are all aware that in the case of public parks, in Montreal and elsewhere, fences are considered quite obsolete, and they are taking them down. Here we are building a $14,000 fence which is altogether unnecessary.

Mr. BERGERON. We will have to pay to take it down again.

Mr. MONK. It reminds me of the fence around the Quebec Parliament Buildings, which cost $140 a foot. It is a perfectly useless expenditure.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. How many acres in this small park?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I cannot say. Every member of the House knows it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Are the officers of the department not able to give the slightest idea of the extent of the park?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The chief architect says he is not able to tell now.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Can they give no idea of the extent of the park that they are asking $14,000 to fence?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. They do not know now.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is a disgraceful thing that the officers have no idea of the extent of the property they want to fence in and take care of. If an ordinary steward or manager asked an individual owner for money to fence in a property that he could not tell the extent of or how much fencing was wanted, he would lose his position. I suppose they are ashamed to mention the acreage in view of the huge expenditure.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The size of the park has nothing to do with the money I am asking for.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Certainly it has. The size and the importance of the park should be considered in the cost.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We are not going to fence the whole park.

Mr. McNEILL. What length is the whole fence to be?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We will build about 1,140 feet this year, and I am asking $4,500 to build it.

Mr. McNEILL. What is the whole length of the fence for which $14,000 is asked?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not know. I am asking to build 1,140 feet this year.

Mr. McNEILL. Then, the Minister is asking $14,000 to build a fence the length of which he does not know.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am not asking that at all. Why does the hon. gentleman say that? Let him look at the item.

Mr. McNEILL. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the cost of this wall would be $14,000. Did my hon. friend say that or not?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I was asked about the cost of the whole work when it would be completed, and my chief architect told me that the whole work would cost about $14,000. Of that, I am asking from Parliament this year $4,500 to build 1,140 feet.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Is this to complete the fence?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, it is not to complete it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then it is extraordinary that the item should say: "To complete stone and iron fence." Now, we are told it is only going to complete about one-third of the stone, and none of the iron. I think the item should stand.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have no objection. Any man who has been Minister knows that the Minister cannot control all these details. I just give the answers that are given to me by my officers. There must be some misunderstanding here.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask my hon. friend if he is the author of this idea of building a five-foot by two-foot stone fence there?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose it is the First Minister's idea, and that this is the first step towards the realization of the Washington of the North idea—to have all the public parks surrounded by stone fences five feet by two feet.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I believe the interests of Ottawa should not be altogether overlooked. My hon. friends make a great deal of fuss about this little item. This park is one of the ornaments of the city of Ottawa, and, instead of embarrassing me, I think hon. gentlemen should help me. Our properties here are national properties; and, without indulging in any extravagance, I think we are bound to do the right thing for the city of Ottawa, as nearly as possible.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend wants to do the right thing for Ottawa, why is he keeping the Maria Street bridge in the state it is in?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The Maria Street bridge will not be kept as it is.

Mr. FOSTER. But the Maria Street bridge has been kept as it is for months; and when the hardy soldiers, I think the Yukon detachment, were going over it the other day, they had to be sent over it in little squads. That bridge is not safe. What good to the city of Ottawa is a $14,000 stone fence five feet by two feet around Major Hill Park? If you are going to do anything for Ottawa, do it somewhere where it will help the people. Use this $14,000 to help the people of Ottawa to pay their high water rates and the high cost of fire protection; and put the bridges in repair, so that their wives and children will not be in terror of their lives when they cross them.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If the Maria Street bridge is in such a dangerous state, I want to know whose fault it is. The arrangement by which the Maria Street bridge was taken over by the Government was made in 1885, when my hon. friend was Minister of Finance, and since that time the bridge has been in the disgraceful condition in which I found it.

Mr. DAVIN. May I ask the hon. gentleman who designed the fence?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The fence was designed by the chief architect of my department.

Mr. DAVIN. The reason I ask is that I think it offends against all true canons of art. It is a hybrid monstrosity. It is composed of five feet high of stone, and then you have little iron rails. If the Minister had made a fence all of stone, there might be something to say for it or if he had made a fence all of iron, of an artistic design, it would appeal to the æsthetic sense of the people of Ottawa; but a fence made partly of stone and partly of iron, I must say—for I have seen it—is an unsightly thing. To spend $14,000 for even a handsome fence would be what my hon. friend would call a superfluity of naughtiness—certainly a superfluity of fencing; but to pay $14,000 for an unsightly fence, an ugly fence, a fence that offends against the canons of art—that seems to be carrying Ministerial perversity very far. What I should advise the hon. gentleman to do is to suspend operations, and get an artistic design of an iron fence that will be at once cheap and beautiful to look at. I venture to say that he could put up a fence much finer than the one he is now putting up for one-third the cost. A chief architect is not a man to design a fence. A chief architect is a good man to design a post office or a custom-house, but not to design a fence to surround a park. I agree with my hon. friend that the park is an ornament to the city. There is no pleasanter place than that park to take a stroll in; but the pleasure of walking through the grounds and taking a look over the river is dashed and disappointed by the disturbing effect of looking at a fence that offends against all the canons of art.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Last year I got from Parliament $4,500 towards this work.

Mr. FOSTER. Parliament had not got on to it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My hon. friends opposite are just as responsible as I am for this work. They have allowed me to go on with it without opposition, and it seems to me that it is rather late in the day now to take exception to it. They agreed to the work last year, and they did well. It is a useful and necessary work, because this Parliament will not expect that such an ugly fence as the one now around the park should be maintained.

Mr. McNEILL. Will the hon. gentleman say what his officers compute such stone-work to be worth per perch or rod?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I cannot make up that calculation now, but will find out.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not believe there is any defence for this work at all. I was thinking that perhaps the reason for it was that the trees are now beginning to leave.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I never thought my hon. friends would be so unfriendly to the city of Ottawa.

Mr. TAYLOR. The Minister of Public Works informs the committee that last year 600 feet of this fence were built, which cost $5 per foot. This year he proposes to build 1,140 feet, and is asking $4,500, or $4 per foot. Why is this difference between the prices of the two years?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I shall bring down to-morrow the exact length of the fence.

Mr. POPE. And the size of the park?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, and the size of the city of Ottawa also if that will satisfy my hon. friend.

Mr. QUINN. And also information as to where and when the stone was obtained, and what quantity will be required and what arrangements were made for its purchase.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. Minister now shelters himself behind the position that we did not find fault with the item last year. His only reason for continuing this fence is that he found part of it built. Might it not be well for him to retrace his steps and not build any more. I think he must conclude that it was a mistake to have undertaken to build it all, because it is wholly unnecessary. We have reached the day when fencing of public parks is very unusual.

Mr. GILLIES. Fences of this kind are entirely obsolete except in small towns where there is danger of cattle straying into the parks or on penitentiary grounds, or something of that sort.

Mr. CLARKE. Why were not public tenders called for? I understand that last year the work cost $5 per foot, and this year it is expected to be done at $4.

Mr. POPE. The principle is laid down by the hon. Minister that we are responsible for every item in his Estimates, if we do not strongly oppose him. Does he intend to carry that out literally, because if he does he will be here a long time?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman is perfectly free, and I think I was only fair in stating that last year there was no opposition to that item.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And no explanation of it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. None was asked for, and Parliament is just as responsible for it as I am.

Mr. POPE. Then we shall have to be particularly careful. There is only one more remark I wish to make in this connection, and that is with regard to the system which the hon. Minister says he has to follow in engaging the men to do the work. He says he must be true to his political allegiance. It has already been said by the hon. gentleman that he is in the Government to represent the Conservative element of this country, that he remains true to his early allegiance and is still a Conservative. He stated this in evidence under oath. Under those circumstances, I do not see what right he has to dismiss a single Conservative that may be employed in his department.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I may remark that the item under discussion hon. gentlemen have agreed to allow to stand, and there is nothing before the Chair.

Mr. POPE. The item is still before the Chair until allowed to stand. I wish to draw the hon. Minister's attention to the false position in which he has placed himself. I appeal to him on behalf of the Conservative employees in his department, and who are engaged in and about the city to maintain them in the service as he is bound to do, under the circumstances, and I shall be very much disappointed and surprised if I hear of any other dismissal by the hon. gentleman on account of the party dismissed being a Conservative, and if he engages others, I shall expect him to engage Conservatives rather than Liberals.

Mr. TAYLOR. Before the item stands, I want to draw the hon. Minister's attention to the information which appears in last year's Supplementary Estimates. He charges us with having voted this money last year without asking for information, but I find in the Supplementary Estimates, page 5, this item: "Major's Hill Park, to complete stone and iron fence. $4,500." That is the information he then gave, and in giving it he misled the committee because he now asked for a further sum to complete it. And we gave him the money to complete the work. Now, he comes down for a similar grant for stone work; and this will not finish the iron work. Why did the hon. gentleman mislead the House last year by putting in the Supplementary Estimates this amount to complete the work? Let him explain to the House why he misled the House and let him go to the "Hansard" and see what he said on this subject last year.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) is very unfair. I did not intend to mislead the House. All those who have been Ministers know the Minister himself does not prepare the estimates. There has simply been a mistake.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) is a member of the council of Ministers and he must take his estimates into that council and every item has to be voted by the Council. And when he takes a wrong estimate there he is incurring a grave moral responsibility.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not intend to blame my officers, but in this case I can say that I did not do it myself.

Mr. FOSTER. You did it in Council. The doctrine of Ministerial authority must be maintained or the hon. gentleman will slip out of our control altogether. Before this is allowed to stand, I would ask the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) to take into his earnest consideration the great principle of letting work by contract, so that he may give us his views on it to-morrow.

Port Colborne building—Mansard roof for caretaker's quarters, &c..... $1,200

Mr. McCLEARY. How much money does the hon. Minister intend to spend on this building?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This vote is to make provisions in accordance with the estimate of the chief architect for replacing the old roof with a mansard roof and fitting up quarters for the caretaker in the attic. The apartments in the basement now occupied by him being extremely unhealthy.

Mr. McCLEARY. Has the work been completed?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. McCLEARY. Were tenders called for?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The architect made an estimate of the cost and applied to a contractor to know if he would do the work at that price. It would not be practical, in such cases, to call for tenders.
Mr. TAYLOR.

Mr. McCLEARY. Who did the work?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Messrs. Mackintosh & Griffin, of Woodstock, who were very strongly recommended to me.

Mr. McCLEARY. The reason I ask is because I cannot understand why the Minister should send to Woodstock to do this work when there are in Port Colborne plenty of mechanics, friends of the Government, who would have been glad to do it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The work has been very well done indeed. I am sure my hon. friend (Mr. McCleary) will agree with me on that point.

Mr. McCLEARY. Who recommended these gentlemen from Woodstock?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I cannot recollect exactly now. At any rate I am responsible for it.

Mr. POPE. In a case such as this, does the department submit the work to more than one firm of contractors or only to one?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It depends. Where the work is for a small amount and we have a man whom we know or who is well recommended, we do not ask for tenders from several people for the work.

Mr. QUINN. I understand that it was estimated last year that this work would be done for $1,000. It now appears that it is to cost $1,200, an increase of almost 10 per cent over the cost estimated by the chief architect.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Some changes were made. The first estimate was made by Mr. Watts, if I remember right, but it was found that the plan did not cover all that was required.

Woodstock Public Building..... $5,900

Mr. FOSTER. What is to be the cost of that building?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The plans are not yet made. We have not taken any steps so far.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the site been obtained?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No.

Mr. HENDERSON. What is to be the nature of this building, is it for a post office or a custom-house?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It will be what we call usually a public building, a post office, Customs-house, inland revenue office, &c.

Mr. HENDERSON. I would like to draw attention to the suggestion I made to the committee last year with reference to the public buildings in towns like Woodstock and smaller places. I think the present system is a great mistake. The putting up of a large public building necessitates the employment of a caretaker, and the money invested is too great in proportion to the revenue received. We should put up smaller buildings. Take, for instance, the county of Halton, which I have the honour to represent. It has five incorporated towns and villages. Now, I suppose the building in Woodstock will cost $30,000.

Mr. FOSTER. It is said it will cost $40,000.

Mr. HENDERSON. Well, let us put it at $30,000 to be within the mark. Instead of putting up one building at a central point in the county, let five buildings be erected at a cost of say $6,000 each. At the present cost of material, stone, lime, brick, lumber, and so on, and the present cost of labour, a building quite sufficient for the purpose could be built in any town even the size of Woodstock, at any rate in a smaller place, for not more than $5,000 or $6,000.

Not only a building sufficient for the purposes of a post office, but one in which the postmaster himself can reside, can be erected for $5,000 or $6,000. There is no question about that, if the Minister is economical in his expenditure. In that case we would derive a revenue; instead of giving an allowance to the postmaster each year for rental, we would obtain from the postmaster a rental for his residence. Certainly, in this way, great economy could be exercised, and then in every town and village throughout the province we could have a suitable building erected for public purposes. I hope that the Minister, before proceeding with the expenditure of such large sums in different counties, will take into consideration the plan of dividing that money up and expending it in a way that will give benefit to all the smaller towns throughout the country.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman comes a little late with his ideas of economy. I grant we should not expend too much money on public buildings, but the hon. gentleman has been for many years a supporter of a Government which were very careless of economy. I have here a statement showing the sums spent by the late Government on public buildings in Ontario. In Almonte there was a public building erected at a cost of $22,181; at Amherstburg, one at a cost of $27,306; in Barrie, one at a cost of $42,000; in Berlin, one at $30,351; one at Belleville, costing $44,125; one at Brantford, costing $23,681; one at Brockville, costing $52,000, and so on. So my hon. friend comes late in the day to preach economy. Still I agree that there is a great deal in what he says. We must not erect public buildings too expensive, and I may add that we must not build too many.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to remind the Minister that only last year I drew his attention to this same circumstance and asked him then to take the matter into consideration. I do not think it is fair for him to shield himself by quoting the expenditure under the late Government. We all know that they were a very extravagant Government, and that the present Government came into power under the promise that they were going to be very economical. But now we find an entirely different state of affairs under the present Government from what we were led to expect. They are simply adopting the policy of the old Government instead of making any change, adopting the National Policy, for instance, and many other things. There is no change, no improvement. I think it is time the Minister should show some signs of change, and I hope he will drop some of these items this year; at any rate, as he has not expended any money on this Woodstock building, I hope he will leave it over with the view of practising greater economy at a future time.

Mr. QUINN. It seems extraordinary to me that we should be asked to vote a sum of $5,000 for a building when the Minister says he does not know whether it is to be a post office or a custom-house, or what kind of a building it is to be.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I said quite the reverse. I said it was a public building for all purposes, that is to say, for inland revenue, post office and custom-house. But I did say that the plans were not yet ready, that the site was not yet bought.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If I understand the hon. gentleman, he is satisfied now that this building is intended to be occupied by all the departments represented in the town. I may say that I agree to a certain extent with the hon. member that economy ought to be observed in the erection of public buildings. As I understand it, true economy is getting value for the money expended, whether by Parliament or by a municipality. I would like very much to see a building erected in the town of Woodstock; at the same time I may say that unless the Government intend to erect a building worthy of the town, in keeping with the other public buildings, and with the business of the place, they can strike that item out altogether. We do not ask it as a favour. When the late Government were in power and were erecting buildings throughout the country, I, along with other members, called the attention of the Government to the principle that ought to govern the erection of public buildings in the Dominion. I may say right here on this first vote, that unless they are prepared to erect a building that would be creditable to the place, and suitable for the purposes of the Government, for the officers who are to occupy it, we do not want it at all.

Mr. FOSTER. Where is Woodstock ?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I suppose that is quite in keeping with the general knowledge of the ex-Finance Minister. It often occurred to me that if the hon. gentleman knew something more of the important places in the Dominion, he would have more liberal views on many questions that come before the House. It is a little larger than Marysville, where they have a public building erected. It is a town that has the most business and affords the largest revenue of any town in the Dominion of Canada where a public building has not been erected, and is very much larger than a great many towns in which public buildings have been erected. I would not like to see one dollar improperly expended on a building ; all I ask is that the building, if erected, should be in keeping with the other public buildings, with the business buildings in the town, and one suitable for the purposes for which it will be used ; otherwise, we do not want it at all.

Mr. COCHRANE. I do not propose to find fault with this vote, but I disagree entirely with the policy propounded by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Sutherland), that he does not regard the expenditure of an enormous sum of money with any alarm so long as the Government get value for the money. I think we should erect public buildings on the line of economy so that more than one town should be able to get public buildings. We all remember how loud-mouthed those hon. gentlemen were when sitting on this side of the House, and how they found fault with the Government for extravagance in expending, as they said, such enormous sums of money in erecting public buildings in the towns and cities of this Dominion. During long years hon. gentlemen opposite denounced the Conservative party for erecting public buildings at different points on the ground that they were buying up constituencies, and now that those hon. gentlemen have reached the Treasury benches, after having preached economy so long, the reply made by the Minister is simply : You did it when in power. How absurd is such a defence. Hon. gentlemen opposite deceived the people by telling them that they were going to do business on different principles, and practice economy, and yet the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) is ready to vote for these grants. No doubt he sees some particular circumstances to justify his action in supporting extravagant votes.

Mr. McMULLEN. I did not rise to justify extravagance. No doubt Woodstock should have had a public building many years ago, and it would have been given to the town except for the fact that the constituency was represented by my hon. friend (Mr. Sutherland). It contributes $15,000 or $16,000 a year to the revenue. There are buildings in that town which cost from $40,000 to $50,000 each, and a building in proportion to the importance of the town should be erected. I wish, however, to see economy practiced, and not such a monument of folly erected as the post office at Napanee, where the clock cost $1,800 and the granolithic sidewalk $2,000, the total cost of the building being $54,000. I do not want to see that folly repeated. We want public buildings erected with care, prudence and economy. There is not a town in Ontario that needs a public building so much as Woodstock. It is a large and progressive town in the centre of one of the finest districts, and the only reason why it did not obtain a post office before is because year after year it continued to return the present member for the constituency. I agree with a good deal that has been said by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson). I believe that in many places post offices could be erected for $5,000 or $6,000, which would be sufficient to accommodate the business. In some places hon. gentlemen opposite expended $23,000 to $30,000 on post office buildings that stand as monuments of disgraceful extravagance. I do not want the Government to pursue that policy, but I wish them to erect buildings carefully and prudently and not put up clocks costing $1,800 and expensive granolithic sidewalks around the buildings.

Mr. QUINN. What will be the total cost of the proposed building, and will there be a clock and granolithic sidewalk connected with it ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The plans have not yet been completed, and I am not able to answer the question.

Mr. SPROULE. The information given is not sufficient upon which to pass a money vote. The hon. gentleman has not stated the purpose for which the building is required, but the Minister asks simply a vote of $5,000 for a public building to commence operations. We have no statement as to whether it will cost $15,000 or $50,000. The hon. member for North Wellington does not care so long as the work is economically done ; but the committee should have information as to the probable cost. The hon. gentleman is willing to go it blind to-day, although when in Opposition no member was more anxious to obtain specific information as to the cost and the purposes for which a building was needed. The hon. gentleman now takes it for granted that the work will be done economically and wisely, although he does not know anything beyond the fact that the grant is for a public building. We have no Estimates as to the total cost of or the purposes for which the building is intended, or any information to enable the committee to wisely vote money for such an expenditure.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Although the plans are not complete, the chief architect has put in my hands a statement, which perhaps may throw some more light on the subject. The estimated cost of construction is $16,000, internal fittings $3,500, heating $1,200, fencing and sidewalk $800, together with items for clerks of the works, incidental and travelling expenses, bringing the total cost up to $24,000.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the purpose for which it is to be used?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. For the post office, custom-house and inland revenue office.

Mr. SPROULE. There is much greater reason now for the passing of this vote in view of the information given than there was at the outset when the hon. Minister stated that he had no information. Woodstock is a very lively, active town, and entitled to a public building, especially if it can be made convenient and suitable for these purposes. As to the $800 for the sidewalk, I presume that work will be in keeping with the building.

Mr. GILMOUR. The Minister of Public Works need not be afraid to stand up in this case and say that he is going to put up an efficient public building in Woodstock. I know of no town between Toronto and Sarnia that is more progressive and has better prospects before it than has the town of Woodstock. I would be sorry to think that the Minister would erect a small and inefficient building in that town, and I agree with the member for Oxford when he says that it would be better to put up no building at all than to put up one not in keeping with the place, because Woodstock is going to grow, and grow largely. I agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Henderson) in what he has said, but I would point out that Woodstock deserves a substantial public building, and the remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) will not apply to that town, and I do not think he will say that they do. For my part, I trust that the Minister will erect an efficient and suitable building there.

Mr. MACLAREN. I corroborate what has been said by my hon. friend from Middlesex (Mr. Gilmour) with regard to Woodstock. It is a flourishing town and it is deserving of a post office, and a good one. I can say for Oxford County that it is one of the finest counties in western Canada, excepting, of course, Perth. I have much pleasure in supporting this vote for the erection of a public building in Woodstock.

Mr. SPROULE. The danger now is that he will run up the expenses too high. Is this contract to be done by tender?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Certainly.

Rat Portage public building, the proper site given free of cost by municipality. $5,500

Mr. FOSTER. Where is the site?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It has been given by Mr. Scovills, and is 100 by 100.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What is the estimated cost?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. $24,000; about the same as Woodstock, but I hope it will be completed, fittings and heating, &c., for $22,000.

Mr. SPROULE. In the case of these towns where public buildings are being erected, has the Minister endeavoured to get free sites. Many towns in Ontario are willing to do that, and where a live town is getting a building of that cost it ought to be asked to give a site, or one at a very low price.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I tried that on several occasions, but I have not succeeded every time. I have been confronted by the fact that in the past that has not been done.

Public Buildings, Ottawa—Grounds—New sidewalks and footways on Parliament Square $9,000

Mr. DAVIN. Who is the contractor?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The Sicily Asphaltum Company of Montreal. When I came into the department I found that some of the paving in front of the building was done at a price of $2.65 per yard. I allowed the contractors to complete that part of the work, but as there was no appropriation, I did not continue it. Public tenders were called for and the lowest was from the Sicily Asphaltum Company at $2.19 per yard. I awarded the contract in the ordinary way and the work was splendidly done. It is one of the finest pieces of paving in Canada.

Mr. HENDERSON. I cannot agree with the Minister that it is one of the finest pieces of work in Canada. It is very inferior compared with what is done in the city of Toronto. It seems to be breaking, and to a large extent it is somewhat unsightly. I believe they used some kind of rock asphalt, but if they had used Trinidad the work would be more sightly and more durable.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The part of the work done under the late Government is all cracked, as the hon. gentleman says, but that is not my fault.

Mr. HENDERSON. I refer to the work in front of the building, which was done under the present Government, and it is a very rough piece of work indeed.

Mr. SPROULE. How much work will be done for which the Minister is asking an appropriation now?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No work is to be done; this is to pay for work already done.

Mr. FOSTER. Is this $9,000 to pay for work already done?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. If the work is already done, this is not the place where the vote should appear. It should appear in the Supplementary Estimates for the present year.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I quite admit that from a strictly book-keeping point of view, my hon. friend may be right.

Mr. FOSTER. It simply swells my hon. friend's estimates for next year, and keeps down his estimates for this year. The worst of it is, if the men have done their work, why should you keep them five or six months out of their pay?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The Supplementary Estimates will be available at the same time as these. That would not make much difference.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That same remark applies to the Port Colborne work?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. QUINN. Was the work done by contract or by day's work?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It was done by contract, after public tender, and given to the lowest tenderer.

Public Buildings, Ottawa—Grounds—Removal of old sheds in rear of courthouse building and erection of new green-house..... $5,000

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That vote was taken last year. Was anything done?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, nothing has been done yet.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Is the old greenhouse there?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What condition is it in?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is not in a very good condition, I am sorry to say. Public tenders have been asked, and I will take the House into my confidence.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I see that $1,000 has been spent of the $5,000 taken last year.

Mr. HENDERSON.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No. We hope before the 1st of July to spend $1,000.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Is the old building still in use as a greenhouse?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Has anything been done since last year?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, nothing.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is not informed in instructing the House, for he got the vote on the 23rd of June, 1897, by assuring the House that the foundation of that building had gone, and had to be replaced immediately; yet not a dollar has been used. His advice was very bad.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The advice was given to me, that the foundations were in a bad state.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The statements had no foundation.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I would not say that at all; but the foundations were not in a good condition. They had been simply propped up.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Still, the hon. gentleman needed $5,000 at once, and he has not spent a dollar.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My hon. friend knows better than that. He knows that every year there are revotes.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend was going to take the House into his confidence.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I was going to say that I asked for public tenders, and I am going to decide on these in a day or two.

Mr. FOSTER. Will this include the expense of tearing down the old building?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Then my hon. friend is doing by contract a piece of work which there might be a fair justification for doing by day's work, seeing that he is taking down an old building and constructing a new one; but in constructing a fence the cost of which he could estimate by the cubic foot, he is doing the work by day's work. He is very virtuous in one case, but not in the other.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There is no use in my hon. friend trying to draw any distinction between yesterday and to-day—I am always virtuous.

Mr. FOSTER. On what principle, then, does the hon. gentleman call for tenders for the greenhouse and not for the fence?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. As my hon. friend knows, the law obliges me to ask for public tenders for a work exceeding $5,000. In the case of the fence, I am asking only $4,500.

Mr. FOSTER. But my hon. friend could get out of that in a moment; he could just ask for $4,500 for this. Is the hon. gentleman simply trifling with the House?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am not at all.

Mr. FOSTER. It looks very like it. The hon. gentleman finds a law the intent of which is to have Ministers call for tenders and construct works by contract. He avoids that entirely by taking a vote for $100 or so less than $5,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, no.

Mr. FOSTER. The whole thing is a perfect farce, if the Minister is going to do that.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There is no farce at all. These Estimates are not made by me. My officers come to me with their Estimates, I discuss those with them, and I take them as they are.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That does not agree with what the hon. gentleman said a little while ago, that the Minister of Finance told him he could have only so much money, and that he must decide how much he could have for this, and how much for that.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No. What I said was this. I was reproached for building a fence to cost $14,000. The ex-Minister of Finance was telling me I should ask for tenders. I said I was only asking Parliament to give me $4,500 for a specific piece of work.

Mr. SPROULE. Will the hon. Minister tell us what is going to be the full cost of this building?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I cannot say at the present time, but I hope the tenders will not exceed that sum of money. I have not yet decided on these tenders.

Mr. SPROULE. This is another case like the one submitted a while ago. I do not think the hon. Minister should commence a building without having some estimate of what the total cost will be. It is commencing an expenditure without any knowledge of what the end will be. It seems to me he should be able to submit to the House more information than that.

Mr. DAVIN. This is a violent defiance of the Gospel, which says that "No man goeth to build a house without counting the cost."

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Minister certainly has an estimate from his officers, because in discussing these matters in Council, the estimated cost is always inquired into.

Mr. TAYLOR. As I understand, the way they run matters in Council, each Minister is the boss of his own department, and does not require to go to Council at all. He simply makes up his mind how much money he wants, and it is all right. There is no Council about these items.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the hon. Minister tell me what the estimate of his architect is? Surely he must have that.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Because the tenders have not yet been adjudicated upon.

Mr. MONTAGUE. He must have had some estimate made before calling for tenders. Does the hon. Minister mean to say that he decides to call for tenders and let contracts without having an estimate from his officers?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not say that at all. I have an estimate of the work, but I do not think it would be wise to make it known.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. Minister has given an estimate in a case in which the tenders are not yet in, and surely there can be no objection to give it when the tenders are in.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. After consultation with my officers, they tell me there is no great objection to giving the estimate, but I am bound to say that there are times when to do so would be dangerous. Supposing after opening the tenders, I made up my mind that none should be accepted, I would have placed myself in a false position.

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am not so sure of that.

Mr. FOSTER. In answer to a question put to-night, did the hon. gentlemen not say that the Woodstock post office was estimated to cost $16,000, and there are no tenders in for that contract.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I gave that information after a good deal of hesitation.

Mr. FOSTER. Every Minister has given it every year since confederation.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In the case of Woodstock, I said I thought it would cost so much, but I did not pledge myself, because it would be very unwise to do so. I shall, however, give the information in this case, although it may be unwise. The estimate of the chief architect that the greenhouse will cost $10,000.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What portion of that is for the removal of the old one?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The chief architect tells me that he has allowed in his estimate about $200 for the removal of the old shed, but the whole thing has been estimated en bloc.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The new greenhouse will then cost $9,800 ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is an extraordinary greenhouse. What did the old one cost ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS I do not know.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think in all reasonableness, if we are to build a $10,000 greenhouse, we should have the items of that expenditure.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have no objection to that, but I am surprised that my hon. friends should be astonished that the greenhouse for large public buildings, such as the Government buildings, should cost about $10,000.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have no knowledge of what these greenhouses cost, but I think my hon. friend will admit that the amount must strike the committee as a pretty fair sum any way.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I think it is a very cheap building. A good many private greenhouses cost more than that.

Mr. MONK. What is this $10,000 greenhouse for ? I am very much astonished at our having to spend such a large amount. In Montreal there are very few greenhouses that cost any way near that, even our public greenhouses. What are we going to do with it when it is built ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That greenhouse, which my hon. friend may see to-morrow, is intended to keep the flowers and plants in, which are used during the summer season on the Parliament grounds.

Mr. SPROULE. Where is the hon. gentleman going to put it ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That greenhouse has been maintained for years and is out of shape now. We have only to replace it. It is no new policy of mine. It will be on the site of the old one.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the size of the building ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It will be 130 x 20 feet, built of iron and glass on a stone foundation.

Mr. SPROULE. Is it to be the same site as the old one.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE.

Mr. SPROULE. Is the building to be removed to the shed in read of the Supreme Court.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Beside that greenhouse which is to be removed, there are old sheds which will have to be removed also.

Mr. DUGAS. Will not the foundation of the old greenhouse be used for the new one ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No.

Mr. GANONG. What is the expense of running the greenhouse ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That is included in the maintenance of the grounds for which there is an item of $5,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that by contract ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, it was given last year.

Mr. GANONG. Has the Minister ever attempted to find out for how small an amount he could have these plants furnished ? Here is an amount of $10,000 which at 3 per cent means $300 a year. There will probably be $1,200 of $1,500 more for maintenance. For this sum of say $1,500 a year a great many plants could be supplied.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I think it is well to be conservative in these things, and I follow the policy that has been followed for years, except that I have practised some economy in maintenance.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not wish to criticise unduly, but I adhere to the statement that a building of the dimensions given by the hon. Minister will be extremely dear at $10,000, unless the hon. gentleman is going to build it in a very artistic way, which is not required by the nature of the case. I understand that it is to be a work of utility pure and simple, and for such a work this sum of $10,000 would be very large indeed.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. On that point I can only give the information I have received. The architect of the Public Works Department is a practical man and I act on his advice. The fact that he estimates an expenditure of $10,000 does not prove that we shall not get a lower tender.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not desire to cast any reflections on the chief architect because I think he is a first-class man. But first-class men may have ideas that are quite out of keeping with the economy that hon. gentlemen opposite promised us. The chief architect may be preparing a plan on a much more expensive scale than is necessary.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I instructed the architect to prepare plans of a substantial fireproof building, and that may be why it is more expensive.

Mr. SPROULE. I suppose you intend to raise all kinds of flowers in this greenhouse—including orange lilies. I understood the hon. Minister to say that the walls were to be of iron or stone.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The foundation walls will be of stone and the structure will be of iron.

Mr. SPROULE. What height does the hon. Minister propose the building shall be?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The foundation walls will be about 4 feet, I understand.

Mr. SPROULE. I suppose the building will be heated with steam.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. With hot water.

Mr. SPROULE. I suppose this estimate includes the cost of the heating apparatus.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There are boilers, of course, in the existing building.

Mr. POPE. They are old.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. But good. The present system can be used with some additions.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There is one greenhouse in the park and one on the Parliament grounds. Is it intended that the new building shall make it possible to do away with both of these?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The building I am asking for is only to replace the present building on the Parliament grounds.

Mr. SPROULE. For a building of 130 x 22 with foundation walls 4 feet high, it seems to me this is a very extravagant sum.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I give the estimate of the chief architect as it has been given to me. I am not an architect or an expert in this business. We may only hope that we shall receive a tender lower than the estimate.

Mr. SPROULE. There is a refreshing innocence about this proposal that we cannot but admire. This is for a greenhouse. But it seems to me that there is more green than house about it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. When this item came down last year, there were really two purposes, which, I suppose, are still adhered to. The hon. Minister spoke a few moments ago about the desirability of meeting the wishes of the city of Ottawa as far as possible, saying this in order to disarm criticism about the fence. The hon. gentleman last year, asked for $5,000 for the removal of the old sheds in rear of the Supreme Court building. That was one object of the vote. The other object was the conservatory. The first as the hon. Minister knows, was a simple matter. He has stated that the old sheds can be removed at a cost of a few hundred dollars. But, ever since he took his vote the sheds have been in such a position as to make the whole surrounding of the Supreme Court most unsightly and disgraceful, an eye sore to the people who have to go to that court. It really means that the court is backed up into a back yard with sheds opening near the room in which the court is held. Though Parliament gave the hon. gentleman this amount of money in 1897 to handle that little job, he left it undone and undertook the building of a $12,000 fence in Major Hill Park. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he has any idea when these sheds will be taken away if this item is voted.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Is not the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) a little unfair? Those sheds were there for years and years while he was a Minister. For twenty years, I suppose, the sheds have been there, and they have been in bad shape for ten years. Perhaps I have not moved as quickly as I might have done, but the hon. member must not forget that I have not been in office for very long and that it is impossible for me to do everything at once. We have waited for ten years, and I think we might wait for six months more without any great danger to the public interests.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The sheds have fallen into a miserable condition. Last year the hon. gentleman told us he was going to move immediately. He pointed out that the foundations of the buildings were rotten, and he could not wait a month.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I instructed my officers to prepare the plans as quickly as possible. The chief architect and his staff have been overworked in preparing plans, and they could not get them ready any sooner.

Mr. SPROULE. Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to tell us if this greenhouse is the first instalment of the Washington of the North that the Prime Minister promised to the city of Ottawa?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. All the promises made by the Prime Minister in the past, as my hon. friends know, have been redeemed, and the promise that he has made to make this Capital of Canada the Washington of the North, will also be redeemed. All Canada will then be proud of the national aspect that will have been given to this city.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does my hon. friend really think that his followers behind him believe that all the pledges of the Government are being fulfilled?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have not the slightest doubt of it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then all I can say is that this greenhouse is only half the proper size.

Mr. POPE. I wish to enter my protest against the expenditure of this much money on the greenhouse. It is at least double what is necessary for taking care of sufficient plants to ornament these grounds around the Parliament Buildings.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think this expenditure is entirely too great, and my hon. friend ought to cut it in two. I have had the opinion of practical builders around me, who tell me that such a building as he is to construct, a fire proof, iron structure, with thoroughly good foundations, can be built for $5,400. I move that the sum be reduced to $6,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I was asked for the estimate of the chief architect, and I said his estimate was $10,000, but I added immediately that I asked for public tenders.

Mr. FOSTER. What are these gentlemen putting in tenders upon? They are putting in tenders upon plans and specifications furnished by the chief architect, and he has arranged these plans and specifications on an estimate of a $10,000 building. My hon. friend knows that the probabilities are that the tenders will be more rather than less, and tenders are asked upon these specifications. I want to know if my hon. friend is going to leave the matter in its present shape. He is a most interesting gentleman, is the Minister of Public Works. I have watched him with the greatest interest on such occasions as this, as upon others. He came out a little while ago with a great show of obeying the law. He said: Let all men understand that I am going to obey the law. The law is that if the work costs more than $5,000, he must ask for tenders, and the work must be done by contract. Behold the Minister of Public Works uphold the majesty of the law. What has he confessed. He had for another work asked a vote for $14,000. Did he not consider that the law in its spirit compelled him to give the work out by contract? Now, how did he avoid the law? By cutting it into three or four different pieces and making each part cost less than $5,000, so that in the course of three years the work would have been carried out in this way without contract. The hon. gentleman, however, must obey not merely the letter, but the spirit of the law. Does the hon. gentleman really think it is necessary to build a $10,000 greenhouse, with all the expenses attendant? He now lets out the care of the grounds by contract. How are these grounds laid out? Mostly in lawn, and that does not require much expense, and then there are bulbs planted, which form the large part of the late spring and early summer show. Outside of those features, the show of flowers on this hill is very small indeed. At Major Hill Park there is a larger show of flowers, but they are not of expensive kinds. They are composed of the good, old-fashioned common flowers, which make a good show, are substantial and are not very costly. Is it necessary to build a $10,000 greenhouse, with all the expense of carrying it on, in order to put out a few plants. It would surely be more economical to buy those plants each year. They could be purchased very cheaply, and of course the contractor would set them out. This proposed expenditure would cover the price of two or three farms such as many of our people would be very glad to own. Why should this country pay $10,000 for a greenhouse and $14,000 for a fence when these structures are not required, and there are so many works necessary in different parts of the country?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman has been kind enough to tell me that he takes a good deal of interest in me; I tell him that I take a great deal of interest in him. I also take much interest in what the hon. gentleman has done in the past, because to-day he is simply going back on the policy pursued by him and his associates. When did the Finance Minister agree to purchase plants outside? He never adopted such a course. I have already reduced the expense of maintenance of Major Hill Park and these grounds by $3,000 or $4,000. My experience is that when public contracts are opened tenders are sent in much below the estimates of the chief architect. I find that occurs every day, and still I do not consider the chief architect a very extravagant man. The estimated cost of the chief architect is $10,000, but I hope to obtain tenders for a less sum.

Mr. SPROULE. This seems to be an awful figure for this building. The building can be erected of either brick or stone. Suppose it is built of brick, there will be 2,430 cubic feet in the building, and that will give a 2-foot wall. The total number of bricks used will be 31,611. The cost would not be more than $12 per thousand in the wall, which will give a total cost of $379 to put up the walls, which will form the most expensive part of the building. This building is to be only twenty-two feet wide. The top portion is covered with glass; but when the most expensive portion of the building can be put up for less than $400, there is a wide balance between that and the amount this building is to cost, viz., $10,000. This seems to be the worst kind of extravagance. I should like to obtain the opinion of the hon. member for North Wellington upon it. If such an expenditure had been proposed to be made by a Conservative Government, the hon. gentleman would have gone over the province and told the people that it meant the cost of two big farms with brick houses and frame barns, and that the Government were spending this amount to build a greenhouse in which to store a few flowers to meet the wishes of the people of Ottawa. Then the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMullan) must surely consider this outlay extravagant. How could he defend before the farmers an expenditure of $10,000 on a greenhouse for such a purpose? If he could do so, he must have changed his views. There is strong justification for the amendment that the amount be reduced by one-half.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My motion may be somewhat out of order because the whole vote is not stated. I shall now propose an amendment that will suit the case. I am not taking this action in order to be captious, or in order to find fault with the officers of the department, in whom I have confidence. But $10,000 is a large sum to invest in a structure for this purpose. I am told by builders that $4,500 would do the work, and I am therefore giving a margin of $2,000. If a greenhouse cannot be constructed here for that sum, we had better go out of the plant business altogether. I beg to move that the item be amended by adding the following words:—

The cost of the removal of the old structure and erection of new greenhouse not to exceed $6,500.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I answered a question that I was not asked, and perhaps I should not have answered.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes. The estimate of the chief architect does not prove that I am going to ask $10,000. I am only asking $5,000 now.

Mr. SPROULE. But you are committing the country to an expenditure of $10,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. When I am asking for more money, then the time will come to complain.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. SPROULE, The proper time to protest is now when you are commencing the work. If you ask $10,000 now, probably the House would not give it to you, but you will come later on and say: We have spent $5,000 now and we must complete the work.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The course of my hon. friends opposite is very unfair, because I am only asking $5,000 here now.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Minister should not say our course is unfair. I leave it to the judgment of any one of his colleagues whether this is not the time to protest against the expenditure of $10,000 which the Minister has assured us is the estimate of the chief architect. We propose to give $6,500, and that is enough in all reason.

Mr. MONK. For my part I protest against building this greenhouse at all. My experience as a school commissioner in Montreal where we have the administration of ten or twelve schools with large grounds around is that for $300 a year we can get all the flowers necessary for ornamentation, and I might add that we have thrown down the fences and opened up the grounds as is done in similar cases all over the world. I believe that all the flowers on the grounds around these buildings could be purchased for $200 a year. It is now proposed to construct a greenhouse that will cost $12,000 when it is finished, and which will be perfectly useless. And, Sir, as a defence or excuse the Minister has nothing better to tell us than that he is following the example of his predecessors. Sir, this Government has come into power with promises of economy and this is an occasion in which they can exercise economy. For my part I will take every opportunity to protest against such a wasteful expenditure of money as this.

Motion (Mr. Montague) negatived: Yeas, 26; Nays, 31.

Sarnia public building..... $5,000

Mr. SPROULE. Is this for the commencement of the new building?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the estimate of the cost of completing these buildings?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The same as for Woodstock and Rat Portage; between $22,000 and $24,000.

Mr. HENDERSON. Is it the intention of the Government to purchase what is known as the Alexander lot?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have not made up my mind as to any site yet.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is strange that a vote of this kind should be asked for without the Minister knowing in what part of the town the building is to be erected.

Alexandria Reformatory $9,000

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Last session the Minister got a grant of $9,000 to wipe out the contract for the building of this reformatory. What was done with that money?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I thought that sum would be sufficient last year, but Mr. Bourque declined the offer that was made, and after a good deal of negotiation the department and Mr. Bourque agreed to refer the matter to arbitration. The result of the arbitration has been that $16,500 has been awarded to Mr. Bourque. Out of that sum he had received previously $2,500. The work was to be a very expensive one. It was to cost about $800,000, and I made up my mind that it was better to make that arrangement than to go on with the work.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What the hon. gentleman said last year, when obtaining the vote of $9,000 was, that he had a confidential report; so that I suppose he was informed by his officers that $9,000 would cover the work that was done.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. At that time I had not gone very fully into the matter. However, I had recourse to the only means that was left to me, to refer the whole matter to arbitration.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Who were the arbitrators?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The arbitrators were Mr. Roy, of Montreal, who, I may say, belongs to the same political persuasion as hon. gentlemen opposite, and Mr. Lafontaine, one of the officers of my department. They agreed to the amount of $16,500.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Can the hon. gentleman tell us how that amount was made up?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Here are the details: To expenses connected with the McPhee quarry, the excavation and transportation of stone to the building, $2,749.50; to expenses in opening the Lochiel quarry and extraction of stone prepared for the construction, part of such delivery on the premises, and the balance being at the quarry, $4,247.55; to expenses connected with the purchasing of the McPhee and Lochiel quarries, and to pay judicial expenses incurred, $1,235; to 304,000 bricks delivered on site, $2,736; to excavations and concrete ready to receive the foundations, $1,469.75; to 1,800 feet of water pipe from waterworks to building to supply water for the works, $675; to preparations for the construction and purchase of derricks, $1,000; to travelling expenses, $500; to construction of stable, kitchen and office, $750; to stone dressed at the quarry of Mr. Alexander Robillard, Ottawa, and at the Hull quarries, $1,137.22; making a total of $16,500.02.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What was done with the material for which the Government had to pay?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The materials are still here. We will try to sell them.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Who made the confidential report which the hon. gentleman referred to when taking the $9,000 vote?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I really do not remember.

Mr. TARTE.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What is Mr. Lafontaine's position in the department?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. He is one of the assistant engineers. He is a very able man.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. How long has he been in the department?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. About a year and a half. He is a very capable officer and a highly educated man. He has studied in England, Belgium and France.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What is his salary?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. His salary is $5 a day.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He is not on the permanent staff?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No.

Mr. WALLACE. Whose place has he taken?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There have been some changes. He has not taken the place of anybody.

Mr. WALLACE. He is an additional appointment, then?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My hon. friend will find that I have reduced the expenditure by about $33,000.

Mr. MONK. In this case we are paying $16,000, and we have nothing at all. Is that it?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, it is that.

Mr. MONK. It is a very deplorable result.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I will tell you all about it, if you would like to know.

Mr. MONK. That is quite enough to know.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. When the hon. gentleman took the vote for $9,000, he did not tell the House that he proposed to appoint as one of the arbitrators an extra clerk who had been in the department only a year. It was a year ago that this subject came up. It is usual, when appointing arbitrators on the part of the Government, to appoint men of experience in the service or from outside. In old times, when arbitrations were frequent, Mr. Page used to be the representative of the department of Railways and Canals, on account of his great experience and high rank, and I think the Minister was running considerable risk, as the result shows, in handing the interests of the department to this newcomer, instead of appointing a higher grade officer and one of more experience. The Minister says he cannot say who gave him the confidential report on which his estimate of last year was based. I have no doubt it was his chief architect or some one else in high standing; and the difference between that estimate of $9,000 and this one of $16,000 is, I think, the result of the Minister's departure from the rule that has hitherto prevailed, in selecting arbitrators to look after the public interest.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The reason I chose Mr. Lafontaine was that he had a great deal of experience in public buildings. He has been a contractor in Montreal; he has erected a good many public buildings, bridges, etc.; and I thought it was better for me to appoint him, because he would not cost anything extra, whereas an outside man would have to be paid.

Manitoba—Dominion Public Building—
Renewals, improvements, repairs, &c.. $5,000
Portage la Prairie post office..... $8,000

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The Portage la Prairie building will be completed in a month. The contract was given on the 29th July, 1895. The total cost will be $49,568.91.

Mr. FOSTER. How much was expended on it before the change of site?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have not got that now, but gave it last year, and will turn it up in the "Hansard."

Mr. FOSTER. The history of this post office is a little peculiar. We had the promise of the hon. Minister that no change would be made until he had asked for a vote. He sometimes does not give the whole truth, and then afterwards gives as a reason for not telling the truth that he was afraid other people would lie if he did. In this case, he pledged the House two or three times that he would not remove that post office until he came down and asked for a vote with which to do it. Nevertheless after Parliament prorogued, he went to work and made the change. I think he promised about seven times, with reference to the lighting of these buildings, that he would call for tenders. Has he done so?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have done what I am convinced I will prove even to the hon. gentleman was right.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no arguing with the Minister of Public Works. After he distinctly pledges his faith, as a Minister, to Parliament, that he will do so and so he then goes and does the exact opposite, and when we tax him with it afterwards he wants to argue the question. The fact is we cannot quite tell, when the hon. Minister gives a reason for passing an estimate, whether he is giving the whole reason and will stick by what he said. The first thing he is bound to do is to keep his word with regard to the Estimates. In the first of these cases, he would not have got the vote at all unless he had made the pledge he did, and having made that pledge he had no business going outside it and then proceed to give the reason why he did so. When the House passes an estimate on a distinct understanding, that understanding should be adhered to. The House considered that the lighting contract matter should be given out by tender, and seven times the hon. Minister pledged himself that he would do so, but he then went to work and gave it out without calling for tenders. How are we to know that in the case of any single vote he asks us to pass, he is going to do what he tells the House he will? Now, this may be Machiavellian, but it does not seem to be a thing that ought to be supported.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I take in good part what the hon. gentleman has said.

Mr. FOSTER. I say it in sadness, you know.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I know that. I have all sorts of failings I know. But one thing I have never been accused of is failing to keep my word. I keep my word to the letter. If everything my hon. friend says were accurate I should have failed to keep my word, but what he says is not accurate, and I am going to prove it. The hon. gentleman has been a Minister and he knows that in matters of this kind circumstances alter cases. The case was settled and discussed last year, and I do not think my hon. friend is quite in order in going back to it. Last year I gave all the explanations in my power and they were accepted. Public pressure and sentiment was so strong that I felt bound to make the change. Now let us come to the gas and lighting contract.

Mr. FOSTER. I should suggest that my hon. friend leave that until we come to the item for it, it must be discussed. I merely sought to illustrate what was being done in this case by referring to the gas business.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am quite ready to wait until the item comes up, but I wish to protest against the charge the hon. gentleman has made. I am in a position now to give the figures the hon. gentleman asked for. The amount spent when the change was made was $8,860. Of course there is nothing of that lost.

Mr. FOSTER. There must have been something lost. Was not a portion of that for a foundation of the building?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My hon. friend will remember that last year the House gave $5,000 additional to have the change made. That is all it cost, and I admitted it frankly last year. This site had been forced upon the Public Works Department, it was shown, when Mr. Boyd was in the House, that the site upon which the building had been begun was chosen against the opinion of the chief architect, against the wish of the department and contrary to the opinion of practically all the people.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman changed it under political pressure.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No.

Mr. FOSTER. There was no other purpose. Mr. Boyd fought that out when he was in the House. The contract had been let and the building commenced, and Mr. Boyd faced an election after the site was chosen, and his majority was not less strong there than before. But the Minister of Public Works has introduced the principle that he may take any contract for a public building and change it, he may change the site on which a public building is being erected, and he can put his hand into the public Treasury and pay out thousands in order that he may yield to the pressure of his political friends. This is the principle he has introduced. He speaks of public pressure. Of course, there is pressure every side.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There was pressure from members of both political parties.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. I think this question has been often enough discussed in this House, and I do not know that lengthy explanations are necessary. The site for the post office at Portage la Prairie was selected when Mr. Boyd was the representative in this House of the constituency of Marquette. The site was in the extreme western portion of the town, in a position very unsatisfactory to the people.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The town is divided into two, is it not?

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Not now. It has changed greatly, and is consolidated into one town instead of being three as it used to be. This site was at the extreme western end of the business portion of the town. The site was extremely unsatisfactory not only to the majority of the people of Portage la Prairie but to the inspector of public buildings, who reported against the site which was, however, insisted on by Mr. Boyd and two or three of his political friends. There has long been in Portage la Prairie what is known as the east and west end pull, which was injurious to the best interests of the town. This, I am glad to say, has been much less a practical evil since the selection of the present site was made. The Minister yielded to the pressure of the town council, the board of trade and other residents of the town, and his doing so has had a very happy result. It has settled the position of the town for all time to come. So far as the $5,000 to make this change is concerned, while that may appear to be an extra charge upon the people, it is not really so. The citizens of Portage la Prairie subscribed over $5,000 and purchased a new site, which was well worth the money and presented it to the Government, so that the Government is well recompensed for the $5,000 expended on the change. This site is worth five or six times as much as the site originally chosen. The site secured by the hon. gentlemen opposite when in power was paid for at the rate of $75 a foot. I was present at an auction sale of property a few months afterwards, when the land immediately adjoining that site could not be sold for $20 a foot, while it was an impossibility to buy the land on which the building has been erected for less than the $80 a foot which was paid for it. This is a most defensible transaction. It has removed a grievance which would have existed as long as the town stood. In connection with this matter great credit is due to the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) tell us the distance between this site and the old one.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. The distance is not very great. I do not know the size of Marysville, but perhaps the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) has never lived in a small town. If he has he would have known that it was a grievance for the residents at one end to be obliged to walk to the other for their mail.

Mr. McDOUGALL. And the smaller the town the greater the grievance.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. What the hon. gentleman (Mr. McDougall) says is quite true. We have no street cars, and in cold winter weather the citizens would have to walk from three-quarters of a mile to a mile and a half to get their mail. The post office always has the effect of attracting business about it, and this was felt as a grievance by some property owners.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The town council, the board of trade and a vast majority of the citizens applied for the change, and as the site was bought and would be presented to the Government, I thought the people who were so much in earnest should have their way and that I should not hesitate to make the change.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the distance between the two sites?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I think about 800 feet.

Mr. FOSTER. I thought the distance was not very great, but when the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Rutherford) was speaking, and talked of it being in the extreme western end, I thought maybe I was wrong, and that perhaps there was a mile or two between the two situations. Can my hon. friend say who is right, he or the hon. gentleman who has just spoken? I understood the Minister to say that the whole cost of the removal to the new site would amount to $5,000, whereas the gentleman who has just spoken, says it does not cost anything.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. What I meant to convey is that when I made the bargain I agreed to pay the contractors $5,000 additional, but in return I got the site. So that my hon. friend is correct.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. The site was worth $75 a foot when the hon. gentleman bought it, but the town has grown since, and it certainly ought to be worth more money now.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman said a moment ago it was worth only $20. He changes his argument to suit the time.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. That is the result of placing a Liberal Government in power. But when the Conservative Government were buying post office sites it cost $75.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I made up my mind that the $5,000 was well invested, that the public interest required me to make the change.

Public Buildings, North-west Territories.. $5,000

Mr. DAVIN. I want to know from the Minister why it is that so small a sum is asked for as $5,000; because he must know that the land titles office in the Regina district, with documents representing millions of dollars, is a most disgraceful building, not fire-proof; and if a fire occurred, all the valuable documents, the title of deeds of settlers in a vast district, would be destroyed. It is perfectly disgraceful. Here we have had to-night evidence that $14,000 can be squandered on a fence that may be properly characterized as a hybrid monstrosity; and $10,000 spent on a greenhouse not necessary at all. But here is a vast portion of the Dominion of Canada left by the hon. gentleman for two years without any attempt made to supply a building for the land titles office. Moreover, there is no building for the Dominion Lands Office. That office is at the present time held in a brick veneered structure that is rented. The hon. gentleman had in the Estimates the first year an item for putting up a proper building that would not only house the Dominion Lands Office, but also the registrar. I want to know why that is dropped, why that building was not proceeded with last year. The Minister of the Interior visited the Land Office, and I understand that he expressed himself as disgusted at the state of things there.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman should know that the small sum of money I am asking is for repairs only. He should know that in the main Estimates we never place items for new work, but only for work which has been begun. I do not know what the Supplementary Estimates will contain about public buildings in Regina, but if there is anything asked this year for that purpose, it will be in the Supplementaries.

Mr. DAVIN. In the Supplementary Estimates of the hon. gentleman the first session he had an item of $10,000 for housing these two offices, nevertheless nothing has been done. I want to know whether it is intended to put an item in the Supplementaries for building a house for the land titles office and the Dominion Lands Office.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The Supplementary Estimates have not yet been discussed before Council.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) says there is no place in Regina to keep the public records, and that it is a scandal to this country. Well, if it is a scandal to this country, it is a scandal to hon. gentlemen opposite. They have spent of public money in Regina alone, on public buildings, $365,000. I asked a return two years ago myself, and that return is to be found in the records of Parliament, showing that $365,000 has been spent in Regina on public buildings. If there is no place to keep the public records, it is a disgrace to the hon. gentlemen opposite. I want to say to the Minister of Public Works. I am not going to threaten him, but he had better be very careful in any estimate he brings down for public buildings in Regina. What has become of that $365,000? Where has it gone?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I may say that in spite of that vast amount of money spent in Regina, the member for Assiniboia is right in saying that there is no place for the safe-keeping of the public records.

Mr. DAVIN. I am glad to see that my hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. McMullen) is showing some of his former force and fire when he was the gutter of the Auditor General's luminous volume, and used to enlighten this House on the subject of economy. The hon. gentleman who a short time ago slunk out of this committee when there was a vote coming on, the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) now comes and lectures us in regard to expenditures at Regina. He says he will not threaten the Minister of Public Works. He can threaten no longer and the Minister need not fear him. The Government have him, and he is their very humble servant; the charge of his pistol is drawn; he is an extinct volcano with a vengeance. When the hon. gentleman rises and makes a criticism, we know that he is a toy with which children in the galleries might be amused, when he pulls his own wire and gives off a galvanic spark such as we have witnessed. Let me tell him that the building where the land office was formerly was burnt down, but it was not burnt down under the same auspices as the Western Block here was burnt down, for it was destroyed a short time before the Minister came into office. The member for North Wellington has intimated that although $325,000 were expended in Regina, there is not a public building there fit to house the land titles documents. A land office was built there with that scrupulous economy which sometimes characterized the predecessors of hon. gentlemen opposite. It was a small frame building, and we were always looking forward to the time when that important department would be brought into the building I have spoken of, if it had not been burnt down. The Minister of the Interior, as well as the Minister of Public Works, is aware of the need that exists for a public building at Regina for the purpose of which I speak. With respect to the money spent there, the hon. member for North Wellington should remember that it is a town surrounded by a good farming country, where a court-house and post office had to be built, and it is moreover the Capital of the North-west Territories. It is also the principal seat of the mounted police and was the headquarters of the Indian Department when an Indian commissioner lived in the Territories instead of in Winnipeg. Among the buildings to account for the $325,000 expenditure, where a jail for the Territories, a court-house, post office, Indian commissioner's office, legislative buildings, buildings for the Territorial Government and Government House, where at one time we thought the hon. member for North Wellington would be the presiding deity, but it is going to be the member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron). At this hour of the night, I will not pause to dwell on the enormity of a man like the hon. member for Huron sitting here, voting and speaking—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. DAVIN. I see I am out of order, and I will anticipate the chairman of the committee. Returning to speak of Regina, I may say that we have also barracks for 200 mounted police. Taking the scale of Estimates such as we have considered tonight, $10,000 for a greenhouse and $14,000 for a fence, partly stone and partly wire, it is astonishing that such a large number of public buildings should have been erected there for $325,000. The public needs require that we should have a proper building for the Land Titles' Office and for the Dominion Land Office, and I will ask the Minister of Public Works to disregard the threat of the hon. member for North Wellington, who I am sure has not a pistol in his revolver pocket, and provide means for meeting the public requirements in the matter on which I have commented.

Mr. DAVIN.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman has said that in Regina there is a Government House. We ought to have two Government houses there. One was built at a cost of $27,000. What has been done with that building?

Mr. DAVIN. It is there still.

Mr. McMULLEN. Then there was another Government House built, at a cost of over $40,000.

Mr. DAVIN. It is there still.

Mr. McMULLEN. Cherry blinds were sent there from Montreal at a cost of $19 a set. That is characteristic of the manner in which $365,000 have been spent at Regina. It would be better for hon. gentlemen opposite if all these buildings were burnt down as they are standing monuments to their folly. The hon. gentleman has twitted me about going to Regina. If there is one thing that would deter me from going there, it is the fact that the hon. gentleman resides there. I admit that I have met him in Regina. But joking aside, we cannot afford to spend money recklessly either in Regina or anywhere else. There should be a building in which to store the public records, and if there is not one there now, it is a disgrace to hon. gentlemen opposite who expended that large amount on public buildings.

Mr. POPE. I am much astonished at the remark made by the hon. member (Mr. McMullen). We voted on an item of $10,000 for the construction of a greenhouse which nearly half of the committee considered extravagant, and although the hon. gentleman was in the House when the item was being discussed and when the vote was about to be taken, he had not the manly courage to remain in the Chamber but sneaked out the back way.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. POPE. He complains of the cost of the shutters at Government House, but the cost of the greenhouse would have bought 800 pairs of shutters, and when the vote was being taken on that he left the House. It was a most inconsistent position for the hon. gentleman to take. For a man so well versed in parliamentary proceedings, he placed himself in a very miserable position indeed.

Mr. McMULLEN. Had I been in the Chamber I would have voted against the greenhouse. Call for a vote of this House, with the ayes and nays, and I will vote against it.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) will have to reconsider his antipathy to being in a place where I am, because I intend to get to heaven, and if he does not wish to be with me, then he will have to go below.

Mr. POPE. I should like to know why the hon. member (Mr. McMullen) left the House when the vote on the greenhouse was being taken.

Mr. McMULLEN. I did not leave because a vote was about to be taken. My hon. friend will not insist upon a response as to why I left?

Mr. POPE. Certainly.

Mr. McMULLEN. Well, gentlemen have often got to leave the Chamber of this House. Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but I have been in this House for sixteen years, and I defy any man to say that I ever shirked a vote once.

Mr. POPE. Why did not the hon. gentleman protest against the greenhouse expenditure when he was in the House?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order. That has nothing to do with the item under discussion.

Mr. POPE. But we are protesting against extravagant expenditure here, and we say the hon. member for North Wellington is helping us.

Mr. McMULLEN. There will be another opportunity of moving that that item be struck out.

Mr. POPE. I regret that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) had to leave the Chamber under such painful circumstances when the vote was being taken.

Victoria Public Building—Treasury vault. $16,000

Mr. MONTAGUE. What about this vault?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This vault has been applied for by the Department of Finance.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Where does the estimate come from?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We asked for tenders and we accepted the lowest.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How many tenders were received?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Two; Goldie & McCullough and J. J. Taylor.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Which got the contract?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. J. & J. Taylor.

Dominion Buildings, British Columbia—
Repairs, &c..... $5,000

Mr. BERGERON. What is this for?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This is the ordinary vote taken every year.

Mr. BERGERON. Who is this estimate made out by?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. By the chief architect, on the report of the local officer, Mr. Henderson.

Mr. BERGERON. This sum is voted every year. It looks like a standing vote. Is the Minister sure that that amount of money will be needed.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am sure that $6,450 has been estimated for. We always try to keep down the cost of the repairs as well as we can.

Mr. MONK. This item of $16,000 for a treasury vault seems to me to be very large. I suppose J. & J. Taylor will only put in the doors?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. They will do the whole work, except the foundations.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. In the original plan, a vault of a plain character was shown; but we wanted a more modern vault, as considerable money is kept there, and a plan was made for a vault corresponding with those in the Eastern Block.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We asked for tenders from those who manufacture that kind of work.

Public Buildings Generally..... $9,000

Mr. INGRAM. I do not rise for the purpose of finding fault with this item. If anything, it is perhaps too small. I simply rise to point out to the hon. gentleman that some little repairs in the post office in St. Thomas are required, and have been for some time. So far as I am concerned, I am not particular whether the hon. gentleman makes the repairs or not. I simply wish to say that some parts of the building are disgraceful, and the department will be doing a good act by spending a small part of this sum to repair it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The chief architect tells me that there is something in the Supplementary Estimates for the St. Thomas post office.

Mr. BERGERON. What is this special item of $5,000 for? We have a separate vote for each province, and we have this supplementary vote besides.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is the usual vote, which is taken for things that cannot be classified as works. For instance, it includes the travelling expenses of our officers, stationery, sundries, and so on.

Mr. BERGERON. To say it is the usual vote is no answer at all. It might have been bad in the past. The hon. gentleman speaks about stationery. That is something new, and needs some explanation.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If my hon. friend had been as careful of the public interest in the past as he is now, he would have found that the details of this expenditure have been given every year in the Auditor General's Report.

Mr. MONK. I do not think that is an answer to the hon. member for Beauharnois at all. We are told that it is expended on stationery. That is to me pre-eminently unsatisfactory. I do not intend to insist on the details now, but if this vote is asked for next year, I will ask for details.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am surprised at the hon. gentleman taking that position, as he is a man of experience, and knows that there are many little expenditures in connection with public buildings that cannot be estimated for.

Mr. INGRAM. I think this is an item that can be thoroughly justified. The public buildings we have in Canada are largely used by the public, and there must be many expenses resulting from the wear and tear of those buildings that cannot be provided for in the regular Estimates. In my judgment, the amount should be increased.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I frankly say that we are not getting enough. The explanations I have given of the item are the same that have been given for the last fifteen years.

Mr. BERGERON. That is not an answer.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What I understand the hon. Minister to mean is that the item given above for the premises are what he has estimated for, but that this item is to cover unforeseen repairs that may be required during the year. The vote, however, is misleading as it appears.

Mr. POPE. I think the hon. Minister will satisfy the committee by assuring us that there will not be any boodle in this thing.

Experimental Farms—New buildings and improvements, renewals, repairs, &c., in connection with the existing buildings, fences, &c..... $6,000

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This vote is to provide for the construction of a laboratory at the Central Experimental Farm and for renewals, repairs, &c.

Mr. POPE. What is the estimated cost of the construction of the laboratory?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am informed that it will cost about $6,000.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Is it intended to provide for the construction of a shelter for visitors?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No.

Resolutions to be reported.

Mr. BERGERON.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What will be the business to-morrow?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We will take up the Post Office Bill and then proceed with Supply if we have sufficient time.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 1.15 a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 13th May, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. SPROULE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to a portion of the report which appeared in the "Citizen" of this morning of what I said in the House yesterday. I have no doubt the error was unintentional, but it conveys a different impression entirely from that which I intended to convey and which I think my words would convey. The discussion was on the subject brought up by the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall). Speaking with regard to the petition which was sent to Rome by the parties who, it was said, represents the Reform party, this report says:

Dr. Sproule strongly reprobated the idea of any interference in the affairs of Canada by any representative sent from Rome, as would be the case, doubtless, if a Papal delegate came to this country.

Now, I have only to say that I made no mention of a Papal delegate, nor have I the slightest objection to a Papal delegate or any number of them coming to regulate the internal affairs of the Church, which I have always understood to be the object of their visit and not that they were brought here to interfere with the rights of the people or of Parliament. The objection that I took was to application being made to a foreign potentate to assist the Government of the day or the party in power to secure to the people their civil rights. The right to use their electoral franchise freely without interference or intimidation, and to vote for whom they desire, is a right secured to the people by our laws; and it is the duty of the Government to enforce the law so as to maintain this right rather than to apply to a foreign power to do what the Government ought to do.

CONTRACTS FOR SUPPLIES FOR N. W. MOUNTED POLICE.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I called the attention of the Government recently to certain facts which seemed to disturb the Pacific Coast Canadian cities in connection with the instructions issued with reference to the granting of licenses at the passes; and the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), according to his promise, subsequently made a statement which confirmed in part the news that I brought before the House. I deem it my duty now to bring to the attention of the Government further information which is disturbing the Pacific Coast cities with regard to the transport of troops or munitions for troops, a subject which was recently referred to in the House and upon which no definite statement has been made. After I have drawn attention to a newspaper article I have here, all I would ask, at this stage, is that the Government would be good enough to make a statement of the exact facts of the case. All the information we at present have is that a contract was given to the Grand Trunk Railway, over its American connections, for taking certain supplies to the Yukon, and I do not think it was said that any of the troops were going by that route. But, in the Seattle "Post-Intelligencer" of May 5th, 1898, there is a sample of various items of news concerning the management of our affairs and transportation matters which, as I say, is not at all pleasant reading to those who are interested in the Canadian shipping ports:

WILL GO BY WAY OF SEATTLE.

Canadian Government Comes Here to Make Alaska Shipments.

Sifton Lets a Big Contract.

Arranges with a Local Transportation Company to carry to the mouth of the Yukon the latter part of May, 200 troops and 400 tons of freight—Are for Mounted Police in the Yukon Country.

The Canadian Government has entered into a contract with the Boston & Alaska Transportation Company for the delivery of 400 tons of freight and over 200 troops into the Yukon district of the North-west Territory. The entire shipment of freight will be routed by way of Seattle, and will be carried by the company's steamship Laurada, which leaves this city for the mouth of the Yukon the latter part of the present month.

While no information of a definite character has been received here concerning the intentions of the Dominion Government, it is known that a large number of troops and mounted police will be taken into the Yukon district this season. Supply stations will be established at Fort Selkirk and at Dawson, with possibly a third station somewhere on the Stewart River, which will be the rendezvous of hundreds of gold hunters during the ensuing summer.

The fact that the Canadian Government found it necessary to come to Seattle to secure transportation facilities for this important shipment of supplies for the troops and mounted police is but one of countless incidents that have afforded proof of the absolutely supremacy of Seattle as the outfitting and transportation centre for Alaska and the gold fields of the far north. The contract with the Boston & Alaska Transportation Company was entered into on behalf of the Government at Ottawa by Dominion Minister of the Interior Sifton. Mr. Sifton's act constitutes an official recognition of a fact that has long been apparent to Alaska travellers and the public generally throughout the country, that Seattle is the terminus of practically all of the important steamship companies operating between the States and Alaska.

The Dominion Government will send its 400 tons of supplies for the mounted police and the troops to Seattle, where they will be loaded on the steamship Laurada. The shipment, it is understood, was taken at tariff rates, $200 per ton.

A Post-Intelligencer reporter, learning yesterday of the contract between the Canadian Government and the steamship company called at the offices of the company for confirmation of the story. General Traffic Manager Cronenwett was at first inclined to be reticent concerning the shipment. Finally, however, he admitted that the business had been secured by the company and that the freight was to be forwarded by steamer from Seattle to the mouth of the Yukon and thence up the Yukon by the earliest river steamers to be despatched by the company this season. Time is an essential element in the contract, said Mr. Cronenwett, and it will be the aim of the company to rush the shipment as rapidly as possible.

"Negotiations have been carried on between the representatives of this company and the Canadian Government for three months past," said Mr. Cronenwett. "These negotiations ended by the shipment being awarded to us. That is all there is in the story. You can be assured that the Ottawa Government would not have entered into the contract with our company had they not fully satisfied themselves that we were equipped to handle the consignment and to rush it through to destination upon an agreed schedule.

"We are gratified that the shipment has been routed via Seattle. This, of course, constitutes a recognition from a most valuable source of the fact that Seattle is the main port of departure for Alaska points. You can see that all of the influence we can bring to bear to fortify the position already occupied by Seattle in relation to the northern trade and transportation will be utilized to that end."

The value to Seattle of the contract made by the Dominion Government will appear when it is known that it has been the policy of the Dominion Government to patronize Canadian transportation lines exclusively. This is no more than natural. It is also recognized everywhere that the Dominion Government is constituted on business principles. The conclusion from these two propositions is that Minister Sifton found, after making a careful investigation of the facilities afforded for making the shipment at Victoria and Vancouver, that they were not to be compared with those of Seattle.

The Laurada, Capt. Scott, will sail for New Boston, at the mouth of the Yukon, about May 28.

I need not comment upon the importance of the statements contained in this article. I would ask that as soon as possible the Government should state exactly the full facts—we have only had them partially stated—touching the arrangements for the supplies and what quantity of them will be shipped by this route.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). As far as the Department of Militia is concerned, I have very little to add to what I have already said. The hon. gentleman who has read this is, I think, to a certain extent, playing the game of the Seattle people who have inspired this article, by giving it the prominence which he has given it. However, I do not charge that he intends to do anything of the kind. Now, the facts are simply these: The Boston and Alaskan Transportation Company, as I said before, are carrying 250 tons of freight to Fort Selkirk for the Government of Canada. About one-third of that freight is taken on board steamer at Seattle; the remainder is going from Vancouver. Not a single soldier is going from Seattle or Vancouver on board those steamers, except two men who we think necessary to send forward with the freight in order to watch it and see that it is properly looked after. Therefore, the statement with reference to troops or a very large quantity of freight being carried that way, is absolutely without the slightest foundation in fact. The attempt on the part of this newspaper to boom the city of Seattle through misstatements of this kind, ought to be too transparent to require serious consideration. I have already authorized telegrams to be sent to Vancouver contradicting the statement, and I hope that we shall now have heard the last of this matter.

Mr. FOSTER. Would the hon. gentleman state what tonnage of the supplies goes by way of Vancouver, and whether those supplies are put on this company's boats there; also whether there are not British vessels which are plying from Vancouver and Victoria through the Yukon River to the Yukon district, and whether any negotiations were had with any of these?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I may tell the hon. gentleman that the quartermaster general, Col. Lake, has had charge of this whole matter. He was in communication with various transportation lines, including the two old established lines known as the Alaskan and the North American and others; and he was unable to find any line prepared to take freight to Fort Selkirk. The two old lines to which I have referred, would not undertake to carry a single pound of freight even to Dawson City, and we were really unable to make any satisfactory arrangement for the transportation of freight by any other company. Col. Lake, after taking every means to ascertain the capabilities of this company, recommended very strongly that arrangements should be made with them. I am not aware that any English companies were at that time—there may be now—in existence who would undertake to carry that freight. The report I have received is as I have stated, that this was the best arrangement which could be made. This company insisted that a certain portion of the freight should be taken over at Seattle, they wished to divide it between two of their boats; one of their boats was willing to call at Vancouver, and the other they did not think would go forward as rapidly as desired, and they did not wish that boat to call. Consequently we agreed that the smaller portion of the freight might be taken on at Seattle, that portion being shipped partly over the Grand Trunk Railway and partly over the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I want to say one thing about the other vessels not being available. Captain Irvine, of the Canadian Pacific Navigation Company, informed me personally months ago that he had had communication with the Minister of the Interior, in which he protested against a shipment, very early this year or in December, by some American line to the Yukon.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The hon. gentleman is confusing different matters. That was in connection with a shipment from Vancouver to Skagway, with regard to which there was no question, and the voyage was very easy to accomplish.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I want to say—

Mr. SPEAKER. Hon. gentlemen are drifting into a debate.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I merely wish to make a remark which may be of importance to the Government. This information given to me was that having protested against these American vessels being called in to carry Government supplies from Canadian points to the Yukon, he received an assurance from the Minister of the Interior, that it would not occur again, and it had only occurred once when the department were in a great hurry, and were not aware of the facilities that the Canadian Pacific Navigation Company could afford.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Perhaps I may be permitted to say, in explanation of the hon. gentleman's statement, that the apparent neglect of the Canadian Pacific Navigation Company was due entirely to the fault of their agent. Inquiries were properly made for the purpose of ascertaining if the goods could be shipped by their boats in the first place, and their agent apparently misinformed Mr. White, the Comptroller of the Mounted Police, and I found, when inquiring into the matter, that Mr. White was not in any respect to blame, the fault lay with the company and its agents. The transportation which the hon. gentleman has thus referred to, is an entirely different matter from transportation by way of the Yukon. Anybody that has a seaworthy steamboat can take freight to Skagway, but it is an entirely different matter to get a guarantee by competent parties to deliver goods in the Yukon district, covering the navigation of the Yukon River for 1,600 or 1,700 miles.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I wish to add one word in reply to the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). The Canadian Pacific Navigation Company has been employed, as I stated before, to carry all the troops and the supplies that they were taking with them for some six months, to the Yukon. When we asked whether they would take our supplies by the Yukon River, they offered to do so at a price very much higher than the price we are paying, and they did not offer to give a guarantee of delivery at as favourable a time as we desired.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to let the House have the papers relating to this transportation?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. We would like to have all the papers in reference to this matter in the possession of the Government. I see a difference between sending stuff up by the Yukon and sending it to Skagway. But it is an interesting question, and the House would like to have all the papers.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Does the hon. gentleman want a statement of what has been done?

Mr. FOSTER. I think the House would like all the papers in connection with this transportation.

Mr. MORRISON. I rise mainly to make a suggestion to the senior member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper).

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member can ask a question of the Government, but he cannot make a speech.

Mr. MORRISON. I am asking the permission of the House to draw attention—

Mr. SPEAKER. This is not the time or place to draw attention, unless the hon. gentleman has a question to ask from the Government.

Mr. MORRISON. I desire to make a suggestion, and in order to make my remarks—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman, I understand, wishes to move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MORRISON. The suggestion I wish to make most respectfully is this: Let the extract which has just been read from the Seattle "Post-Intelligencer," be the last extract from an American newspaper read in this House and put upon the "Hansard," thus enabling it to be afterwards circulated throughout the country in the various newspapers. It has been several times done here. One instance was in the case of the "San Francisco Examiner," a paper that is known in journalistic parlance as a yellow journal; and another was the Seattle "Post-Intelligencer," which is not far behind it in that respect. They published interviews that never occurred, they published articles which have been read on the floor of this House and given an important prominence which they should not receive, but which were intended to get into the hands of the hon. gentlemen opposite, and for all I know are inspired from here.

An hon. MEMBER. From Ottawa?

Mr. MORRISON. I will not go so far as that. There is, of course, that inference to be drawn. The point I want to make is, that hon. members on both sides of this House should strongly deprecate this practice of reading similar extracts from Pacific Coast American newspapers. The Seattle "Post-Intelligencer" has shown how this matter can be worked. They got up a fake interview, pointing out that Seattle had been selected not only as the central point of shipment by the American people, but by the Canadian Government, as in fact the only point from which to tranship and start for the Yukon country. I do not think the hon. gentleman intended any such use should have been made of this article. But the effect is the same. Seattle is boomed from this House as being the only place from which people should start for the Yukon. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman would, perhaps, have accomplished more if he had not made any reference on the floor of the House to this article which appeared in a Pacific Coast newspaper, and I hope this will be the last time such interviews appearing in American newspapers will be quoted in this House. In making this suggestion, I make it most respectfully, and I trust the hon. member will understand that I do not mean to impute that he adopted this course with any ulterior purpose. There is the effect, no matter what the intention has been; and I believe in due course we shall see in the Seattle "Post-Intelligencer" a notice of this debate and the prominence given to the port of Seattle on the floor of the Canadian Parliament.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I shall without doubt take the advice of the hon. gentleman who has addressed the House for what it is worth, and no more. The trouble in this case, I am sorry to observe, has not appealed to the hon. gentleman's mind, because he should have been equally disturbed when, notwithstanding what the yellow journals may say or what the Seattle "Post-Intelligencer" may report, the Minister of Militia substantially endorses the head lines of the article, the important statement in the article I read to the House. Whether these articles will do harm or not from being read in this House, the hon. gentleman will agree with me that if he thinks them harmful, the fact that they are substantially true and are so represented by a responsible member of this Government, will surely do a great deal more harm. What is the main fact brought out by the "Post-Intelligencer" and confirmed by the Minister of Militia? The hon. gentleman admits that the article is injurious to Canadian interests, and the headings say: "Canadian goods will go by way of Seattle. The Canadian Government come here to make their shipments." The hon. gentleman tells us that this matter should not be stated openly, but it should be whispered: but there is the fact that the Minister of Militia states that it is true, that over 200 tons of Canadian goods are to be sent from an American port by an American vessel to a Canadian destination. The hon. gentleman will see, therefore, this is a matter to be deplored, and those journals are not wholly inaccurate in the statement made that our Government, above all other Governments, has chosen to send their goods by an American port and on board an American vessel at the very time when the Congress of the United States has made it impossible for their Government, if they ever thought of doing such a thing in that country, to use British vessels to carry American goods shipped from one of our ports to an American destination.

Mr. MORRISON. After what the Minister of Militia has stated, is it fair to assert that Seattle has been selected by the Canadian Government as the port of shipment?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is the fact. This was stated by the Minister, and the hon. gentleman will explain in private to the hon. member what he said in public. It is a fact that 200 tons of Canadian goods and supplies have been shipped from that port.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). About 100 tons.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is, then, only this difference, as to whether the quantity was 200 tons or 100 tons. But the point is made by that newspaper at Seattle that the port has been selected for shipment of goods by the Canadian Government, and this has been done by a Government that has pretended for some time their willingness to adopt the policy of Canada for the Canadians. And yet the Government are doing what is beneficial to that city, and which hon. gentlemen well know, if they will not admit it, is detrimental to the rival cities of Victoria and Vancouver; and yet, forsooth, the hon. gentleman says that these facts should not be mentioned. This is the place to mention them with a view to prevent repetition, and instead of criticising any hon. member, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Morrison) should be willing to join in any pressure brought to bear on the present Government to prevent the recurrence of this state of things. Then the hon. gentleman, instead of criticising my remarks, should have come to my rescue and to the rescue, which is of far greater importance, of his own constituents; but he lectured the House and suggested a new mode of doing business. The procedure I adopted was the usual parliamentary method, and when the hon. gentleman has remained here a little longer, he will understand that if these matters are not brought up, as this matter has been brought up, the very evil, which he practically admits already to exist, will grow rather than decrease. So I would tender back a little advice to the hon. gentleman, and that is, to watch this Government, which he supports, a little more closely, and to help to advocate the interests of his own people and not be terrified from reading American journals in this House.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I have listened with some surprise to the hon. gentleman in his criticism respecting the loss of trade suffered by Canadian ports. This Government which the hon. gentleman criticised most severely went to a great deal of trouble at the early part of the session for the purpose of ensuring that a large amount of the trade should come to Canadian ports, and I think the House and country will learn with a very great deal of surprise that it is the desire of hon. gentlemen opposite that this trade should be done by Canadian ports. Judging by the attitude and the action of these gentlemen and their friends here and elsewhere, it might be very fairly assumed that it was the policy and the intention and the desire of these hon. gentlemen, that the trade should be driven away from Canadian ports rather than that it should come to Canadian ports. We endeavoured to tell these hon. gentlemen at an earlier period of the session what was going to happen if the policy of the Government was not carried out, and if the plans which we adopted for the purpose of securing this trade for the Dominion were not approved by the Parliament of Canada. But we were told in the most contemptuous terms that this was all a bugaboo, a creature of the imagination, that no such untoward results would follow, that there was no necessity for the railroad that we desired to have constructed, and that there were plenty of other ways of getting into the Yukon country. What happened? My hon. friend the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden) is called upon to secure the transport of his men and supplies. If our policy had been followed up, these supplies would have gone from Vancouver, a Canadian port, in a Canadian vessel, up the Stikine River and across a Canadian railway.

Mr. MONTAGUE. May I ask my hon. friend (Mr. Sifton) when this Stikine road was to be completed?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. It was to have been completed by the 1st of September.

Mr. MONTAGUE. May I ask my hon. friend (Mr. Sifton) further: Did he intend to hold these supplies until the 1st of September?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Yes, Sir, that is exactly what it was proposed to do. The supplies that my hon. friend the Minister of Militia is sending by this transportation company are the supplies for the next year and a half for the militia, every pound of which would have gone over the Stikine and Teslin Lake Railway if it had not been for the obstruction to and destruction of that Bill.

Mr. MONTAGUE. May I ask my hon. friend another question?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Certainly.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I understand that this is only a portion of the supplies.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Only a portion.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How are the other supplies going?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The boat is going to call at Vancouver, but it is an American boat. I suppose that all this talk about the transfer of trade from Vancouver to Seattle amounts to this: That instead of the boat calling at Vancouver to pick it up at the wharf there, it is going to pick up the hundred tons off the wharf at Seattle. That is all it amounts to. But I will call the attention of my hon. friend to the real trouble. The real trouble is not that the boat takes 100 tons from off the Seattle wharf instead of the Vancouver wharf, but that it is an American transportation company which is carrying these provisions. It is Americans with whom we are compelled to do the business, and I can tell my hon. friends more, that when we required to get a supply of provisions for the mounted police force and for the officials of the Interior Department in that district for the next year, owing to the defeat of this railway Bill, we have been compelled to contract with the American transportation companies or else run the risk of our men starving to death during the next year. The hon. gentleman has now got the first instalment of the result of the policy in which he and his friends have indulged.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I was about to say, in not such forcible language as my hon. friend (Mr. Sifton) is able to do, but in substance, what he has stated.

Mr. SPROULE. The forcible language is not forcible argument.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I meant forcible argument. When I was asked to send a detachment of troops into the Yukon, we proposed to send the men up the Stikine River and across from Glenora to Teslin and with them a hundred tons of freight, being sufficient for their sustenance for perhaps six months. I have adhered to that part of our programme and our troops are going up.

Mr. MONTAGUE. When were you going to send them?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. As they are going now, without the assistance of the railway, because we intended to send them as soon as navigation was open. That part of our programme we have adhered to, and some 100 tons of freight with the 200 men will soon be on their way up the Stikine River to cross from Glenora to Teslin and thence down to Fort Selkirk. But it was also our intention to have sent forward at a later period 250 tons of freight over the Stikine Railway, which, if our policy had been carried into effect, would have been constructed and ready to take that freight after the 1st of September. That was our programme. When that railway policy was defeated by hon. gentlemen opposite, then, if we were to send these troops in there at all, we were compelled to take other means, and on account of the very great expense of sending this freight overland, we have accepted the best offer we could get and the only offer we could get, and we are sending the supplies on American ships as a small portion from an American port. We have taken the best means at our disposal, in consequence of the defeat of the railway Bill, and hon. gentlemen opposite are entirely responsible for our being obliged to do so. But, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me an extraordinary thing that these hon. gentlemen should express such abhorrence at our sending—not American goods, but Canadian goods purchased here—over an American wharf into a boat which is the only means by which we can get these goods into that country. These are the gentlemen who a few years ago paid out lavishly the money of the Dominion of Canada to build a railway through the whole length of the state of Maine. These gentlemen opposite are remarkably virtuous now, but, Sir, their insincerity is so transparent that it will recoil upon themselves.

Mr. DAVIN. Before I deal with the extraordinary argument made by the Minister of Militia and the Minister of the Interior, I wish to explain to my hon. friend from British Columbia (Mr. Morrison) why we on this side are estopped by reverence from taking his advice as to our conduct of public business. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Morrison) advises us that we must not quote from American newspapers, but he forgets that we have an illustrious example in the Minister of the Interior, who made an elaborate argument in favour of this very Yukon Railway from an article in an American paper. And, Sir, as throwing a light on the more serious aspect of this little debate, I want to point out what that quotation by the Minister of the Interior was. On February 16th, the Minister of the Interior, in order to prove to the Canadian Parliament that his Yukon deal was a very good one, quoted from the New York "Commercial Advertiser" of February 4th. February 4th, mark you, was the day following the meeting of this Parliament, and therefore somebody or other must have been very anxious to post the New York "Commercial Advertiser" as to the policy of the Canadian Government. And, Sir, if we did not know, we could easily infer that there is a well-known journalist in the employ of the present Government who flits across the line and goes to Washington and goes to New York, and just at the right time places articles in American newspapers that can be quoted back by Ministers of the Crown in order to support any position they may take. It is not possible that without being thus posted the New York "Commercial Advertiser" could have been in a position to write the article that was quoted by the Minister of the Interior, and which will be found in "Hansard" of February 16th. Let me ask the hon. gentleman from British Columbia, who with great modesty began to lecture a member on this side of the House, who has been a long time in Parliament and a long time a Minister of the Crown, as to his parliamentary demeanour—how can we, with the example of the Minister of the Interior before us, take his advice? Does he not see that he has been rather inattentive, as has been hinted by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), to what has been taking place in this House, or he would not give this backhanded slap to the Minister of the Interior? Hon. gentlemen have with great self-gratulation seized on the fact that they have themselves diverted into American channels what should have gone through Canadian channels. They have seized on that as a means of reproving the Opposition for doing what? For asserting a policy which was endorsed yesterday in the Liberal caucus. Why, Sir, the Liberal caucus has endorsed the policy of this Opposition, which was to say that the Yukon deal, as stated by the Minister of the Interior, was a bad arrangement, an expensive arrangement, and was not needed, and that the arguments that were used to support it were not just. Take the arguments that have been used here to-day. They are precisely some of the arguments that were used to support that Yukon deal. What is it hon. gentlemen say? That if we had allowed them to build 150 miles of railway, forsooth, thousands of tons of freight would have been carried over thousands of miles of distance next September—freight that they now have to send in by a roundabout way. Why, Sir, the thing is an impudent invention, made in the effort to get an argument against the Opposition—an impudent invention by the Minister of the Interior to try to cover his ignominious retreat—a retreat in which he is flying, not before the Opposition merely, but before the arrows sent after him by his own supporters. Why, Sir, I would astonish the Minister of the Interior if I were to tell him what has been said to me in confidence by leading members of the Liberal party in regard to what the Opposition have done for the Liberal party.

Mr. BORDEN (King's).

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name.

Mr. DAVIN. I will tell you what was said to me by a leading member of the Liberal party.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name; name.

Mr. DAVIN. Do not be too much alarmed. I will tell you what he said.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I thought you said it was told to you in confidence.

Mr. DAVIN. In confidence as to his name.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. I will tell you what he said. He said: "The Liberal party ought to be thankful to the Opposition; they have got it out of a big hole."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name.

Mr. DAVIN. There are gentlemen around me who heard that same gentleman say it. I will not give the name; the chances are that if his views are not attended to, you may hear from him direct without my giving his name. Now, I think I have pricked the contemptible bubble set afloat by the Minister of the Interior. That hon. gentleman's first elaborate speech consisted in blowing the same kind of impudent bubbles, and the moment they were touched by the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), and some others, they vanished into the thinnest of thin air. Reverting again to the hon. gentleman from British Columbia, not only did he strike between the eyes the Minister of the Interior for his gross impropriety in quoting from an American journal to buttress up a Canadian Government's policy, but he struck at the leader of the Government. Why, Sir, the first time the leader of the Government announced his policy, he announced it through the medium of a Chicago newspaper. So that my hon. friend from British Columbia should be a little careful before he lectures this side of the House as to parliamentary demeanour. I have often given members on that side of the House good advice, and I would give a piece of advice to the Minister of the Interior and to the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden, King's, N.S.) that however daring they may be, not to be quite so daring as to put forward childish arguments such as we have heard here to-day, that because a railway of 150 miles in a vast region had not been arranged to be built by the end of next September, therefore, they have to send by a roundabout way a portion of the trade going into the Yukon.

Mr. WALLACE. The Minister of the Interior said the country would learn with surprise that the Conservative party desired that these goods for the Yukon should go by Canadian ports. Mr. Speaker, that accusation does not require any refutation from any Conservative member of this House, because the history of the Conservative party in the past would give the lie direct to any such insinuation. Sir, what is the history of the Conservative party? That for eighteen years, during which they have been in power, they have constantly been building up Canadian industries and Canadian lines of communication with other countries, and looking after Canadian interests generally. What during that time has been the course of these gentlemen who are to-day on the Treasury benches? Commercial union was their programme until a few years ago. Suppose they had been successful in 1891 in having a policy of commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity, or whatever you may call it—it is all the same thing—adopted, and that policy were in force to-day; where would Canadian goods for the Yukon be? Not a dollar's worth of Canadian goods would go to the Yukon, because American goods would then come into Canada absolutely free of duty. Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of this House, and it has been called by other members, to the fact that the Government have not shown themselves alive to the importance of promoting Canadian business with that Yukon country. The customs authorities for a long time were doing nothing. They sent an agent to Washington in the person of the Minister of the Interior, who knew absolutely nothing of the customs business and the customs requirements, but who came back and said that he had made an arrangement, but we found that it was no arrangement, but that as month after month dragged along, the commercial ports of Vancouver and Victoria were sending telegrams here, day after day, complaining that the statements that had been made by the Minister of the Interior that we were to have customs facilities through American territory were not being carried out. The whole matter was neglected, and we hear to-day that the first instalment of supplies for our contingent going to the Yukon is going by American ports and in American vessels. We have Canadian ports, and why not have those Canadian goods sent from Victoria or Vancouver. Every move these hon. gentlemen make is in the interests of the American states and to the detriment of British citizens on the Pacific Coast and Canadian trade. When the hon. Minister (Mr. Sifton) asserts that the Conservative party are responsible for this, inasmuch as if we had consented to the building of this railway, this would never have happened, he is advancing what he knows to be an utterly sophistical argument. If we had consented that our law should be violated and the contract given out without public tender or public competition—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot refer to a past debate.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. Minister of the Interior did so.

Mr. SPEAKER. He touched upon it.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. Minister of the Interior, in his last statement, said that if the policy of the Government had been carried out, the road to the Yukon would have been built, and the Government would have sent our goods over that road, but, he said, that policy was defeated by the influence of the Opposition in the Senate. I was in reply giving the reasons why the Opposition opposed that policy, but as I have given them already or some of them, it may not be quite pertinent to the subject before the House to refer to them more than I have done. But just imagine 200,000 pounds or more of freight have, according to the Minister of Militia, been sent around by an American port in American vessels, when they could have been sent by a shorter and more speedy Canadian route, because if they had been sent to Vancouver, or better still, perhaps, under the circumstances, to Victoria, they would have been right on the route of those steamers which leave those ports for the Yukon, so that the whole course of the Government appears to have been in the interests of American business and to the detriment of Canadian interests.

Mr. McMULLEN. My hon. friend has tried to show that the history of the Conservative party, for the last eighteen or twenty years, shows that they continually patronized Canadian institutions and railways and Canadian industries. I want to draw my hon. friend's attention to the fact that when the Department of Public Works, not many years ago, wanted dredges, barges and tugs, did they get them in Canada? No, they went to the United States. They sent Mr. Arnoldi over there, and he got all those dredges and barges from the United States, and hon. gentlemen opposite signed the bargain, and he got in addition to that "The Jolly Joe" as a gift for having placed the orders in the hands of Americans. Take another case. My hon. friend forgot that we built the Printing Bureau not many years ago when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power. Where did they get the machinery for that bureau? They went to the American side for it, and the Americans paid out, in order to get the order, commissions that were never accounted for and which constituted a loss to the people of Canada. Yet my hon. friend has the hardihood to get up and say—

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid that although the motion allows a large reference to the trade of the Yukon, it hardly covers the ground the hon. gentleman is entering upon.

Mr. FOSTER. He can go as far as a stone fence, but not the Printing Bureau.

Mr. McMULLEN. I was simply replying to my hon. friend who is responsible for any divergence from the subject before the House, and I must apologize if I am out of order. With regard to the question before the House, I contend that it is a matter of very great regret—and I believe the people of Canada as a whole regret it—that hon. gentlemen opposite did exercise such a powerful influence on the Senate as to secure the rejection of the Bill that would have brought about the construction of a railway to that country by the first of September next, without the cost of a dollar to the country, over which we could have done all the carrying freight of the Dominion to and from that section. If the hon. Minister of the Interior is compelled to utilize American lines, it is simply because hon. gentlemen opposite prevented the carrying out of a scheme that would have given us an independent line to that country. Hon. gentlemen opposite have got themselves into a very awkward position and so have the Senate, and they are now suffering in public esteem for the unfortunate course they saw fit to adopt.

If to-day this House were to pass that scheme and the Senate were to ratify it, and we were to ask the same men to carry it through, whom we asked three months ago, they could not undertake to do so, for they could not to-day, on the London market, finance the money necessary to do so, if they had all the territory offered them in that contract. Mr. Hamilton Smith made an offer, but could not secure the money to carry it out, and it was a great misfortune for this country that hon. gentlemen opposite should have prevented the carrying through of that scheme, which would have insured the construction of that road without cost to the older portions of the Dominion. We would have had all the advantages of an easy and favourable means of ingress and egress to and from that country, which is so desirable; but instead we have to build a wagon road and adopt other means of communication. The people of that country, as well as those going there, will bear in vivid remembrance the manner in which hon. gentlemen opposite prevented the carrying out of that contract which would have given the people of this country an easy and advantageous way of transport to and from it. Now these hon. gentlemen complain because we are compelled to utilize American lines and other Canadian lines, but they should not forget that they supported the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway road down to its connection with Seattle. I believe that a part of those goods went over the Canadian Pacific Railway to Seattle, and the other part went to Vancouver; and the transportation company, no doubt, in its own interest and for its own convenience, asked that part of the goods should be laid at Seattle and part at Vancouver, so as to enable it to transport them more rapidly, which is what the hon. Minister of Militia desires. It is much to be regretted that we have not under way the road we were so anxious to get constructed, the construction of which would have given employment to a large number of individuals and have resulted in a development of trade that would have been a credit to us and an advantage to the Dominion.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not intend to discuss with my hon. friend who has just spoken (Mr. McMullen) the question as to whether the policy of the Conservative party was a Canadian policy. That is a matter which is written in the history of this House and this country, and does not need to be discussed at this late day. There is one point, however, which I think ought to be referred to, and that is why, in the light of the subsequent discussion, the hon. member from New Westminster (Mr. Morrison) rose at all. He rose for the purpose of reading a lecture to my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) for reading false statements from an American journal, and he was rather severe upon the hon. gentleman for having transgressed what he regarded as a good Canadian rule in that respect. Now, it has come out in the subsequent debate that the statements made in that Seattle newspaper are substantially true, and that consequently the strictures made by the hon. member for New Westminster fell to the ground, and I think that now he ought to express his regret to the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) for having severely criticised him. He ought to express regret to my hon. friend for having criticised his defence of the interests of the coast cities, which the hon. member for New Westminster was sent here to defend, but which, I am afraid, he has deserted in this Parliament this afternoon. An extraordinary statement fell from the mouth of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). We have had various reasons why this American port was selected, and why the goods were shipped from Seattle instead of Vancouver or Victoria. In the first place, we were told by the hon. Minister of the Interior that it was impossible to ship them in any other way. Then we were told by the Minister of Militia that there was another reason, namely, the expense. And we are told by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) that these two reasons were supplemented by another, and that was the desire to divide the carrying trade in connection with these Yukon supplies between the two great railways of Canada.

Mr. McMULLEN. No.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) said this: That he supposed a Canadian railway, the Grand Trunk Railway, had applied for the privilege of carrying a portion of the supplies, that this had been granted by the Government, and they were allowed to deliver the supplies at Seattle.

Mr. McMULLEN. My hon. friend (Mr. Montague) misunderstood me. What I said was that the transportation company of the Pacific, no doubt in their own interest, had stipulated that a portion of the goods should be laid down in Seattle and a part in Victoria. I assumed that it would be a convenience to them that that course should be adopted.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Now, my hon. friend has not made his case any stronger. In the statement he has just made he has given a reason why the Minister of Militia should not have accepted the offer of this company, but why he should have accepted the offer of another company in competition. Surely it has not come to this, that an American transportation company can, at its bidding, control the Government of Canada? But that is what the statement of the hon. member for North Wellington amounts to, if it amounts to anything.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) allow me to assure him that, so far as the transportation of goods up the Yukon River and into the Yukon district is concerned, we are absolutely—on account of the policy hon. gentlemen opposite have pursued—in the hands of American transportation companies.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Now, my hon. friend (Mr. Sifton) falls back on that very tender spot of his, that spot which is just as tender to the touch of hon. gentlemen behind him as it is to the touch of hon. gentlemen on this side.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. It appears to be a tender spot with hon. gentlemen opposite; it worries them to have it mentioned.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Not at all. What are the facts given by the Minister of Militia? He has declared that these goods were delivered at Seattle and they were shipped from Seattle because better terms could be made. I fancy I am correct in stating that.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I said that the only arrangement I could make to get goods carried up to Fort Selkirk were by this company, and I said that the company required a certain portion of the trade to go to Seattle, as they were shipping in two steamers from the Pacific up to the mouth of the Yukon, and about one-third of the freight they required to go on board at Seattle. The remainder of it would go by Vancouver.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) said, as far as I remember, is that he had made this arrangement because it was a cheaper arrangement—a cheaper guarantee for delivery. So, if my hon. friend's statement is correct, we have the competition of an American company submitted to in order to save a small expenditure on transportation of these supplies, and as an hon. gentleman beside me suggests, to injure the trade of the Canadian cities of the coast. As to the Minister of the Interior, I am sure that this House regards with some surprise the tone of severity, the tone of almost anger with which he dealt with this subject. That hon. Minister reaches out his hands in gestures of anger and gives us to understand that, so far as this conduct is concerned, it is a portion of the punishment which the hon. gentleman intends to inflict upon the Opposition as Canadians and upon Canadians generally, because his celebrated Yukon Railway Bill was rejected in the Senate. And we are told, Sir, that this is only a first instalment, that we are to apprehend still further punishment because the pet scheme of my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior was defeated in the Parliament by votes of Canadian Senators, who have a perfect right to express their opinion on every subject which comes before them. The Minister of the Interior says that these goods had to be sent by this route because of the defeat of the Stikine-Teslin Railway Bill. But I would remind him that, even if this Bill had been carried in this House, even if it had not been defeated in the Senate, the railway would not have been constructed at this time. So the fact of its defeat can have no influence upon the shipment of these goods.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I am sure the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) does not wish to misrepresent the matter. I think I explained that we are sending about 100 tons of freight for the troops now. This is in accordance with the original arrangement. This will be sufficient for some six months. But we have to send some supplies for a year from next autumn, and those supplies could have gone by the road from Glenora to Teslin if the Bill had gone through Parliament authorizing the construction of the road.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then, I wish to remind my hon. friend, the Minister of the Interior, that another body has spoken upon this Yukon trade. I refer to the legislature of the province of British Columbia. This body has expressed preference for the route from the coast into the Yukon country by Teslin Lake. And this, to my mind, offers the severest criticism of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. McGREGOR. Not at all.

Mr. MONTAGUE. "Not at all," says my hon. friend (Mr. McGregor). I fear that he does not go into the matter very carefully, having decided to support his friends in power under any circumstances. The question comes down to this—whether or not the Government have guarded in the strongest possible manner the interest of the Pacific Coast cities of Canada, whether they have used every advantage which was afforded them to increase the trade of those cities as compared with Seattle, Tacoma and other cities upon the American Coast. It is the opinion on this side of the House that they have not. It is the opinion of American newspapers that they have favoured American cities instead of Vancouver and Victoria, and, I think, we may well take the judgment of the newspapers upon a matter of that kind, a matter in which the interests of the two classes of cities are in conflict. I still say that the hon. member, instead of criticising the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) should have criticised the course the Government have pursued in adopting this policy rather than a Canadian policy.

Mr. MAXWELL. I do not rise with the intention of intensifying the feeling which has been generated with regard to this question. I am very glad to see and to recognize the interest which hon. gentlemen opposite are taking in the cities of the coast. It is not often that they have taken an interest in those cities. Their repentance is late, but it is better late than never. One would suppose, to hear their speeches, that these hon. gentlemen were the only individuals who knew anything about the feelings of the people on the coast. I happen to represent a coast constituency, and, perhaps, one which is as deeply interested in this question as any other. The trouble is, as I gather from the speeches made by hon. gentlemen opposite, that the Government have made some arrangements with an American company. Now, so far as my knowledge of hon. gentlemen opposite goes, I find that when Americans will serve their purpose, they are never slow to use them. What have we seen here but lately? A gentleman by the name of Livernash came within the precincts of this House. He was a newspaper man from San Francisco.

We all know how tenderly hon. gentlemen opposite nursed that gentleman, quoted him, almost went down on their knees before him, in order to extract from him something that might be used against the policy of the present Government. Not only so, but we are aware to some extent of the action of the Senate towards the policy of this Government with regard to the Teslin Lake and Glenora route. Well, I must say, as one representing the coast, and knowing something of the feeling of the people of the coast, that that policy was entirely endorsed by almost the whole people of the coast. That policy was recognized out there as being one thoroughly advantageous to almost every interest on the coast. Even the leading newspaper representative of the Conservative party on the Pacific Coast heartily endorsed the policy of the Government in this respect. I shall wait with considerable interest to hear the hon. member for Pictou, when he goes before a constituency on the coast and attempts to justify the policy of the Conservative party in rejecting the policy of this Government.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I may tell the hon. gentleman that one of his colleagues, the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. McInnes) will likely have an earlier opportunity.

Mr. MAXWELL. Oh, I understand all about that; we are all in the dark about that. I think I am on more intimate terms with the member for Vancouver than is the hon. member for Pictou, and I know exactly how he stands on that matter. We are all familiar with the action of the Senate, and we are aware that while they have rejected the policy of the Government, they have taken up that of another gentleman, and they have pushed his Bill through the House, a Bill which is, so far as the interests of the coast people are concerned, diametrically opposed to every interest they have. This is the man whom hon. gentlemen opposite are quoting, and still they tell us that they, and they alone, have the interest of the coast at heart, and that it is the interest of the coast that makes them speak to-day, because they feel that it is being sacrificed to the Americans. Now, I just want to say this before I sit down. I know something about Vancouver before the present day. I know what Vancouver was under the rule of the Conservative party. Why, we were in a state of stagnation; there was hardly any business, there was little or no progress in Vancouver for four or five years. What is it to-day? Why, Sir, any man going out there to-day would hardly know that city. Business is going on with a rush, men have had to extend their premises, and we have out there at the present moment a scene of life, of activity and of bustle that perhaps cannot be eclipsed by any other city in Canada to-day. What is the meaning of all that? Why, it is the policy of the present Government. The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) spoke of the action of the British Columbia legislature in reference to this railway. Why has the legislature of British Columbia taken such an interest in this route? Why have they granted a bonus of $4,000 a mile for building this road? Because the people of the coast are indignant that the policy of the present Government has been rejected, and now they demand of their own local government, over which they have, to some extent, control, that they shall do all they possibly can to carry out the policy which the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite have rejected. The people on the coast do not feel indebted to the hon. gentlemen one bit for the small interest they are taking in them at the present time. The policy of this Government to-day is making the coast cities full of life, full of bustle and full of excitement, and I believe that so long as this policy is continued, just so long will the coast cities enjoy a prosperity which they have never experienced before.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me the hon. gentleman should be the last man in this House to get up and make the speech he has just made. He speaks as if he were familiar with the coast. But I see that the hon. gentleman has just gone out of the Chamber, and I will refrain from saying anything of a man who cannot stand his ground.

Mr. MORRISON. I wish to make just one reference to the misrepresentation of a remark of mine by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) and the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). What I said was that I deprecated the action of hon. gentlemen opposite in making this House of Commons a medium of advertising the American Coast cities. That is all I said, that is the purport of my remarks, and by no twisting or turning could a meaning be attributed to those remarks which the hon. gentlemen have sought to put upon them. I did not intend to condone the patronage of American transportation lines or American seaports on the part of this Government or any other Canadian Government, unless a proper excuse could be shown for so doing. I am second to none in my advocacy of the patronage by this Government of Canadian seaports and Canadian transportation companies, and I wish to see Canadian money expended in Canada. I deny that what the Minister of Militia and Defence has done, or what the Department of the Interior has done, is open to criticism from either side of the House. I contend that the action adopted by the Government, under the circumstances was justifiable, and has been justified.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that he approves of that way of shipping these goods, because they could be shipped cheaper by Seattle?

Mr. MORRISON. Under the circumstances, after hearing the explanation of the Minister of the Interior and of the Minister of Militia and Defence, I certainly approve of their action, because there was absolutely no other course open for them. It was absolutely necessary that these provisions should be hastened forward, that no time should be lost. Owing to the action of hon. gentlemen opposite, directly or indirectly, other means of transportation into that country have been cut off, and unless steps were taken at this juncture in order to get around the Aleutian Islands into the Yukon, it would be too late to send such a large bulk of provisions into that country this year. I repeat that I entirely deprecate the habit of reading extracts from American newspapers which tend to advertise American towns as against Canadian towns. There is no analogy between the circumstances attending the reading of the extract from the Seattle "Post-Intelligencer" this afternoon, and the extract which was read from the "Commercial Advertiser," of New York. In the case of the "Commercial Advertiser," what was stated was a fact: in the other case, the statement was substantially untrue and misleading to the extent that it stated that the town in question was the only point recognized by the Canadian Government as a point of shipment. We all understand that the interview in the Seattle paper was not consistent with the facts. As regards the clipping from the Chicago newspaper, the circumstance is so fresh in the minds of hon. gentlemen present that it does not require to be controverted now and here. It was an instance of publishing an interview which, we are assured, never occurred.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 141) respecting the Great Northwest Central Railway Company—(from the Senate).—(Mr. Morrison.)

ALIEN LABOUR LAW.

Mr. MONTAGUE. May I be permitted to inquire of the Government whether they will lay on the Table a copy of instructions sent by the Department of Justice to the officers appointed for the purpose of carrying out the Alien Labour Law?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I will mention the matter to the Department of Justice.

DISMISSALS—INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to papers he promised to bring down the day before yesterday. These returns refer to the dismissal of William James Dunlop, William Burke, Francis Pennock, Richard Hickey and Alexander Macdonald.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I will take a memorandum of what the hon. gentleman requires.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I desire also to ask the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Public Works if they will be good enough to give me information which I endeavoured to secure from them respecting the dismissal in their respective departments in my constituency. If these papers are brought down, the work of passing the Estimates will be facilitated.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). There is a memorandum in my department referring to this matter, and I will make inquiries.

Mr. GILLIES. I ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries also to note that papers regarding Joseph E. McNeill, lighthouse keeper, have not yet been brought down.

Mr. QUINN. I draw the attention of the Minister of Customs to the fact that on 18th April a return was ordered of names of employees relieved from duty or dismissed from the Montreal custom-house from 13th July, 1896, to 1st March, 1898. Also, I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Railways to an order passed for the names of employees released from duty or dismissed on the Lachine Canal. These returns have not yet been brought down.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish to ask the Minister of the Interior if he will bring down the return respecting the Crooked Lake Reserve?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I will make inquiries, and, if possible, bring it down to-morrow.

SUPPLIES FOR NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE.

Mr. CLARKE. In regard to supplies for the Yukon country, I desire to ask a question from the Minister of Militia, or, in his absence any member of the Government who may be prepared to answer it. Is it a fact, as has been stated repeatedly, that part of the supplies forwarded by the Grand Trunk Railway, by the American route and in an American vessel, and shipped from Seattle, consists of rapid-firing guns and ammunition that may be used by the troops in the Yukon district?

Mr. MONTAGUE.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I will call the attention of the Minister of Militia to the matter.

THE POST OFFICE ACT.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock) moved second reading of Bill (No. 110) further to amend the Post Office Act. He said: In moving the second reading of this Bill, I desire to make a few remarks in regard to some of its leading features. One of the sections about which I think there can be no possible dispute proposes to afford free transmission of books for the blind. Another section proposes to decentralize, to a certain extent, the dead letter branch which is now centred at Ottawa. The reason for that proposition is in the public interest and is as follows:— At present under the Act, dead letter matter of all kinds, and mail that is not called for, has to be transmitted to Ottawa from the most remote parts of Canada, to be returned to the senders. Owing to the vast extent of the Dominion great delay is thus occasioned to the public, and at times serious loss, and it is proposed with due regard to the secrecy and safety that is observed in the dead letter office at Ottawa, to establish in certain cities and towns branches of the dead letter office so that the service may be performed from those centres. This will not involve any additional expense, it will simply mean that the work now done in Ottawa will at less inconvenience, I think at less expense, and to the great advantage of the public be discharged nearer the points of delivery of these dead letters. With regard to the other two propositions in the Bill, the one looking to the reduction of the 3-cent letter rate—the domestic letter rate as it is called—to 2 cents, and the other looking to the re-imposition of postage upon newspapers; inasmuch as these are to some extent companion propositions it is right that I should refer to them at some little length. I presume that no hon. gentleman would object in the abstract to the reduction of the rate from 3 cents to 2 cents. Public opinion favours the cheapest and freest possible communication by mail throughout all parts of the country, and I feel sure that no argument is necessary to commend such a proposition to the public favour. But one might reasonably ask what effect upon the revenue this reduction will have, and, therefore, upon that point I shall trouble the House with a few figures. Some days ago my hon. friend (Sir Adolphe Caron) inquired as to what effect on the revenue the reduction from 3 to 2 cents would in all probability have, and the evidence before the department, furnished by the accountant, a gentleman of long experience, is to the effect, that assuming that the volume of business does not increase or decrease it would result in a present loss to the revenue of $650,000 a year. That is assuming the worst phase of the question financially, but I shall endeavour to establish by precedents that a reduction in the letter rate is always followed by an increased volume of business, and upon that point I venture to give some statistics from Great Britain and other countries. For example, the letter rate in Great Britain prior to the tenth of January, 1840, was sixpence-halfpenny per letter. It was a mixed rate, but that was the average. At that time the rate was partly based upon the distance the letter was carried, and partly upon its contents, even the number of pieces of paper having to do with it, but the average rate was sixpence-halfpenny. On the 1st of January, 1840, the penny post came into operation. That reduction of the letter rate amounted to 84 per cent. and it apparently wiped out over four-fifths of the revenue of the department from carrying letters. In the year 1839, prior to the introduction of the penny post the revenue derived by the postal department in England was £2,390,763. and during the first year of the introduction of the penny post the revenue fell to £1,359,466. That was a loss of revenue of 43 per cent. but the number of letters carried in that year increased 122½ per cent. Year after year the revenue from this source recovered, and in 1851 it had more than equalled its former position, and since then, as we all know, it has assumed very great proportions. It is stated, with what correctness it is not for me to say, that Rowland Hill, who was instrumental in the introduction of the penny post, attributed the unpopularity of it when first introduced to hostile action on the part of officials and those who had to do with the administration of postal matters throughout Great Britain. However that may be, the recovery rapidly took place, and in the eleventh year of its existence the revenue was larger than it had been previous to 1840. In 1850 the Netherlands reduced their letter rate 50 per cent. The gross revenue of that country in 1849 was £112,547, and in the second year, 1852, the revenue recovered all that it had lost and a great deal more. In 1852 it had become £115,000, and in 1853 £120,000. That is, in the fourth year, the revenue had recovered, and had become 7 per cent better than it had formerly stood.

In the United States, prior to 1845, the average rate was between 12 cents and 15 cents per letter. It was a mixed rate, with conditions somewhat analagous to those that obtained in Great Britain. In 1845 the United States reduced their letter rate from between 12 and 15 cents to 5 cents per half ounce within a certain radius, and 10 cents per half ounce for letters going beyond that radius; the radius, I think, was 300 miles. What was the result on the revenue? Under the old rate, in 1845 the revenue was $4,237,288; in the next year, 1846, it fell to $3,489,199; in 1847 it had increased to $3,955,893; in 1848 it had attained the sum of $4,371,077. That is, in the third year after the change of rate, the revenue recovered and had attained a figure in excess of what it had been under the former rate of between 12 and 15 cents. Subsequently, in 1852, the United States reduced their letter rate from 5 cents to 3 cents. That was a reduction of 40 per cent. The change took effect in the year 1853. The revenue of the United States under the 5 cent rate in 1852 was $6,925,971. In 1853 the revenue fell about $1,000,000, the figures being $5,949,725. In 1854 the revenue recovered all that it had lost, attaining in that year the sum of $6,955,586. That is, in the second year of the change the revenue of the United States recovered the $1,000,000 which it had lost, and more, and in the following year, 1855, the revenue became $7,342,136. That is, in the third year it recovered not only all that it had lost, but it had become half a million dollars greater than it had been for the 5 cent rate.

Then I turn to France. In 1878 France reduced her letter rate from 5 cents to 3 cents. The result on the revenue was as follows:— In the last year of the old rate, 1887, the revenue was 113,934,424 francs. In the first year in which the reduction was in force, namely, 1878, the revenue fell to 96,139,309 francs.

Mr. WALLACE. Before the hon. gentleman leaves the United States, would he give us the result of the reduction from 3 cents to 2 cents?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I will come to that in a little while. In 1879 the revenue in France increased to 97,215,925 francs, in 1880 to 105,203,888 francs, and in 1881 to 115,214,953 francs. That is, in the fourth year after the change France recovered all she had lost, and her revenue had grown in excess of what it had been under the previous 5 cent rate.

Now I come to Canada. Prior to the year 1851 the domestic letter rate in Canada was 18 cents per half ounce. In 1851 the rate was reduced 66⅔ per cent, or from 18 cents per letter to 6 cents per letter. Our fiscal year ended then, as now, on the 30th of June. I leave out the year 1851, because in that year the statistics give us the revenues under the two rates; and I take the last clear year we had under the old rate, and the first clear we had under the new rate. In 1850, under the old rate of 18 cents, the revenue amounted to $362,065; in 1852, the first clear year under the new rate, the revenue was $230,629, a loss of $132,000; in 1853 the revenue had grown to $278,587; in 1854 it had grown to $320,000; and in 1855 it had grown to $368,166. That is, in the fourth year after the change, the revenue had recovered all that it had lost, and showed a surplus besides.

Mr. WALLACE. In which of these years was the control transferred from Great Britain to Canada?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I cannot give the hon. gentleman that information.

Mr. WALLACE. Was it not in 1852?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am unable to say. A further reduction took place in Canada on the first of April, 1868. In the interval the rate had become 5 cents, and in that year it was reduced from 5 cents to 3 cents per half ounce. That reduction took effect on the 1st day of July, 1868. The revenue for the year ending the 30th of June, 1868, under the 5 cent rate, was $1,024,702; in 1869, under the 3 cent rate, it was $973,056, a reduction of about $50,000; in 1870, it had increased to $1,010,767; and in 1871, it was $1,079,768. That is, in the third year it had recovered all it had lost, and showed a surplus. The records also show that in the year succeeding the reduction in the letter rate from 5 cents to 3 cents, there was a most pronounced increase in the number of letters transmitted through the Canadian mails.

In the year 1868, under the 5 cent rate, the total number of letters sent through the mails—I am speaking always now of domestic letters—was 18,100,000. In the year 1869, under the reduced rate of 3 cents, the number of letters sent through the post office had increased to 21,920,000. In other words, the reduction in the rate of postage was followed immediately in the succeeding year by an increase in the number of letters of over 21 per cent, or a gross increase of 3,800,000. It might also be said that at the very time that the reduced rate from 5 to 3 cents took place in Canada, there was also a reduction in the letter rate from Canada to Great Britain from 12½ to 6 cents, and that alone accounted for a large portion of the $50,000 reduction which followed in 1869 the reduction in the rate that took place on the 1st of June of that year. My hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace) asked me about the United States reduction from 3 cents to 2 cents, and I shall now give him the information. In 1883, the United States reduced its letter rate from 3 to 2 cents per half ounce. At that time, the unit of weight in the United States was half an ounce. It was subsequently increased to one ounce, and we followed the same course. I may say that the increase in the unit weight in the United States from half an ounce to an ounce took place in 1885. The reduction in the rate from 3 cents to 2 cents per half ounce took place in the United States in 1883, and in 1885 the unit of weight was increased from half an ounce to an ounce. The following are the figures of the United States revenue for the five years following each reduction: In 1883, the last year of the 3 cents rate, the revenue was $45,508,693.

Mr. WALLACE. Is that the whole revenue?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think that is the revenue from the letters alone. In the year 1884, the revenue was $43,325,959, a reduction of a little over $2,000,000. In 1885, the revenue was $42,560,844. It will be observed that that was the year in which the unit of weight was changed from half an ounce to an ounce, and that must have had, for the moment, an appreciable effect on the revenue. But notwithstanding the increase in the unit of weight and the reduction in the rate from 3 cents to 2 cents, the only result was a loss of revenue between 1884 and 1883 of something like $800,000. In 1886, the revenue was $43,948,423. In 1887, it was $48,837,609. Thus, in 1887, the revenue had recovered its former size, $45,500,000, and some $3,000,000 better.

Mr. WALLACE. What were the corresponding expenses of those years?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not think that bears upon the question of revenue. I am not prepared to say what the expenses of the United States were, but they have not managed their post office as successfully as Great Britain has managed hers.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the hon. Minister give us some figures from 1887 to date in the United States?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have not got their figures since. I do not think that that is material, because the statistics will show that since these dates, the volume of receipts has been continually increasing. I have taken the figures prior to those changes, during the changes, and for a reasonable period after the changes, and did not think it necessary to burden the record with further statistics.

Mr. WALLACE. The increase might be due very largely to the increased expenditure in extending the service.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I quite recognize that there are many causes which contribute to the increase of postal revenue. Where you have a great country with a growing population, no doubt there are many elements that affect the revenue advantageously.

Mr. WALLACE. I am told that the deficit of the United States last year was $11,000,000.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think it was $12,000,000, but I do not think that any person who is familiar with the working of the United States system attributes that at all to the letter rate. It is attributable by those who know, for instance, Mr. Loud, one of the greatest authorities in the United States, to the extravagance of the Government in connection with their railway mail service. The railway companies of the United States are charging the Government, I think, six times as much for carrying the mails as are charged for ordinary first-class express matter. I wish to speak with respect, of course, of the United States service, but I can quote, at least, the opinions of others, who say that the deficit in the United States is attributable to the extravagant prices paid for transmission of their mails. At all events, I venture to say that these statistics establish beyond all question that the reduction in the letter rate promotes an increase in the number of letters, in the volume of business and in the revenue, and at any rate it is essential to the interests of the country that there should be the cheapest possible mail communication, and for that reason the moment is one that should commend itself to the good sense of the people and meet with their approval, and I hope to the approval of this House. At all events, this change is asked for. Numerous appeals have been sent from time to time to Parliament in favour of this measure, and the time has almost arrived when it should become law. The question of ways and means necessarily has to be considered.

Mr. SPROULE. Could the hon. gentleman give us any information as to the number of letters that were carried through the Canadian mails? He tells us that in the event of making this reduction, there would be a loss.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The number of letters carried through the Canadian mails last year was 123,000,000.

Mr. POWELL. Has the hon. gentleman any statistics relating to the increase of revenue on domestic letters in Canada during these corresponding years? It may have been due to business inflation, and that may have been more marked than in the United States.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have not the figures for those years, I have given the hon. gentleman all the statistics that I thought bore upon the subject. I have covered a period prior to, during and subsequent to the respective changes. Now, as I was about to remark, as the question of ways and means has to be considered in connection with this change, I propose to invite the attention of the House to one matter that will assist on the early introduction of this change. I refer to the question of the re-imposition of postage on newspapers. In 1882, Parliament passed an Act providing for free transmission of Canadian newspapers. In 1889 the department ascertained the tonnage of free papers passing through the mails, and it amounted to 9,428,498 pounds. In 1891 the weight had increased to 11,108,835 pounds, an increase of 17 per cent in two years. In 1897, six years later, the weight of papers was again ascertained, and, for the year ending 31st December last, it amounted to 16,557,490 pounds. That is to say, the volume of newspapers offered to the post office for free transmission increased in two years, 17 per cent, and in eight years, 77 per cent, and there is reason to believe that it is increasing at an equally rapid ratio still. The sixteen and a half million pounds of papers carried free through the mails last year represent, at an average of ten papers to the pound, not less than 175,000,000 papers, distributed without cost to the publishers or subscribers and at the expense of the Government. During the same period, as I stated to my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule), the total number of letters carried through the mails was 123,000,000, representing a weight of about 5,000,000 pounds. The country paid for this service and for such other services as the Post Office Department performed, in round numbers, $4,197,000. The bulk of the service consisted in carrying 175,000,000 newspapers free and carrying about 123,000,000 letters, and performing other services at a charge to the country of about $5,000,000.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Five millions of dollars in what period?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. In a year. Now, the practice of the countries in regard to the carriage of newspapers may, to some extent, be instructive.

Mr. POWELL. Before the hon. gentleman passes to that point, may I ask him what is the anticipated revenue from this tax?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The re-imposition of the postage upon newspapers, at $\frac{1}{2}$ cent per pound, if levied upon, say, 16,500,000 pounds, would amount to \$82,000.

Mr. POWELL. But a large portion of them would be exempt under this Bill as being circulated within a radius of ten miles of the office of publication.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The exemption, if every publication coming within the class named in the Post Office Act, were free, would involve a reduction of about $17,000 in the revenue I have named. But, since that Bill was introduced, representations have been made to me which have led me to believe that it may be wise to reduce the class of exempted newspapers. If the suggestions which I propose to make in committee on that point meet with approval the reduction from the $82,000 of revenue will not amount to the figure I have named, but will be represented by a very much smaller sum.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would state what changes he proposes in his scheme.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It has been represented to me that it would be advisable to reduce the exemption contemplated by the Bill by limiting it to publications of a frequency not greater than weekly.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Then the dailies would pay ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The dailies would pay. I was about to give to the House some statistics as to the rates charged upon newspapers in other countries. In Great Britain, the rate is $\frac{1}{4}$ d. per copy, which is estimated at 6 cents per pound. In France the rate is $\frac{1}{2}$ cent per 50 grammes, or $3\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound; Germany, 5 cents per pound; Austria, $\frac{1}{2}$ cent per paper; Belgium, $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound; Denmark, $1\frac{1}{4}$ cents per pound; Greece, $3\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound; Holland, $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound; Italy, 1.08 cents for daily papers; Norway, 1.60 cents per pound; United States, 1 cent per pound. I give now the rates in some of the British possessions: British India, 1 cent for four ounces or 4 cent per pound; New South Wales, local papers not weighing over 10 ounces apiece, free, local papers over that weight, 1 cent for 10 ounces or 1 6-10 cents per pound, all other newspapers, 1 6-10 cents per pound; New Zealand, 8 cents per pound, 1 cent per copy; Queensland, 1 cent for 10 ounces, or 1 6-10 cents per pound.

Mr. WALLACE. What is it in Great Britain ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Half a cent per copy, it would average about 6 cents per pound. There are a number of countries that afford free transmission, not British countries, some of which I will enumerate: Servia, Chili, Costa Rica, Honduras, the Bahamas, the Bermudas, and a number of small countries. Now I propose to refer briefly to the character of some of the papers that are being carried free at the expense of the ratepayers of Canada. When I introduced this Bill, the leader of the Opposition declared that the proposition to impose a postage upon newspapers was an attempt to tax knowledge, to keep the people in darkness, to prevent the circulation throughout Canada of information as to the doings and iniquities of this dreadful Government. Nobody took him seriously, he was not even serious himself. At all events, whether he was or not, I propose to refer briefly to the objects of some of these papers that are now being transmitted free through the post office. I do not know whether these characteristics that I am about to read describe all the newspapers and all their objects; but they are prepared by one of the officers of the department under instructions to go through the newspapers and give me a summary that I might make use of, and which would fairly represent the general character of the papers that are now being carried free. The first that I find upon the list are papers engaged in advertising, chiefly for the promotion of the liquor trade and hotel business.

Mr. CLARKE. Where are those papers published ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The paper I refer to is described as the "Licensed Victuallers' Gazette," of Montreal.

An hon. MEMBER. You had better not read the names.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Of course, there is nothing in this list I desire to withhold, the hon. gentleman will find a return of those papers laid upon the Table. Some days ago I laid upon the Table a list of all the papers that are registered in the department, and entitled to free transmission. I think my hon. friend from Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) captured that return, and some of the members are not able to obtain access to it.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I did not capture it. Here it is.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. At all events, if hon. gentlemen desire detailed information I will give them the privilege of examining my own list containing the names of hundreds of papers of the classes to which I am about to allude. They are arranged alphabetically, according to the places of publication.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the hon. Minister give us the numbers of each of these different classes ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have not got it in that form. I was proceeding to give to the House information showing the objects of some of the publications that pass through the mails. Hon. gentlemen will find in the return that I have laid upon the Table all the information that I am summarizing here, they will find the number of pounds of each newspaper carried free through the post office, and will be able to understand to what extent the carriage of these papers becomes a burden upon the people. I find first here papers whose general object is the promotion of temperance, and publications on behalf of Sunday.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And you put them alongside the "Licensed Victuallers' Gazette," that advertises strong drinks ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I say that the people of Canada are at present paying for the free transmission of papers promoting temperance doctrines, and also advertising strong drinks.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. So they balance.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The next class I have here are periodicals devoted to the interests of Sunday schools. Then we have papers promoting the sale of books, badges, medals, &c. Next is a paper called "Secular Thought," papers of that class, some of them relating to works on agnosticism. Then we have publications in the interest of agriculture, papers for the promotion of the sale of dental instruments, papers relating to fraternal organizations, insurance business, surgical instruments, drugs, patent medicines, patterns, banking, law books, stamp business, pianos and musical instruments, banking and insurance, bicycles, paints, painters' materials, railway guides, stationery, banking business, mining, fruit trees, horticulture, wheelmen's associations, mining and mining materials, printers' materials, building and contract business, homeopathic medicines, engineering, metal trade, dry goods business, manufactures, school books, confectionery, cigars, printing, tobacco trade, commerce, hardware. Those are some of the subjects that are specially treated by papers carried free through the mails at the present time. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the general taxpayer is not called upon to pay for the distribution of a large portion of the information that is supposed to be contained in any of these journals. They are private enterprises for the promotion of private gain. They are not purely philanthropic, but are engaged for motives of private gain, each one appealing to a special constituency. Of course many of them, and for that matter I may say the majority of them, are engaged in good work as well, but there is a business side to it. If they make money out of the business, that money goes into the pockets of the promoters of those publications, and what they make is made largely out of the taxpayers of Canada by reason of the free transmission.

Mr. WALLACE. This applies to only a portion?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Only a portion.

Mr. WALLACE. What proportion?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Well, I leave it to the hon. gentleman to analyse the returns that are laid upon the Table, and they will be able to draw their own conclusions. There has not been any classification made in that way. Hon. gentlemen will see by the return that some daily papers, ordinary journal publications, have a very large circulation, some weeklies have a very large circulation, and they will to that extent account for a large portion of the 16,500,000 pounds. But it is to be borne in mind that the total charge on the country is not merely for carrying papers through the mails, but it is for handling them at all points in the cities, on the trains and in transmission when received and delivered. There is a continuous expense from the commencement to the end, and the rate of increase will go on, and unless checks are applied and arrangements to increase the revenue are carried out, the burdens in the near future will become extremely onerous on the public of Canada. I have endeavoured in considering this measure to have as much regard as possible to existing interests. I conceive that to suddenly introduce a measure of this kind and to bring it into full force at once would perhaps disturb the financial arrangements of newspapers and publishing houses. As a rule, their year's subscription expires at the end of the calendar year, and this Bill having been placed before the public only a few weeks ago, if it became law the first effect will not be felt until 1st January next, and then there would only be a trifling imposition of $\frac{1}{2}$ cent per pound. Six months will elapse before the other quarter of a cent takes effect, and I trust those affected by it will give the Government credit for having sought to introduce the measure in a way at least as little disturbing as possible.

Mr. CLARKE. I do not think the hon. gentleman has referred to the reduction asked in regard to drop letters.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have no proposal at present to submit to the House in regard to drop letters. Drop letters are local letters. We are now dealing with 3-cent letters, that affect the whole public. The drop letters are at present charged at 2 cents. That was the rate imposed some years ago by the last Administration, and while my own bent of mind favours at all times the reduction of the cost for postal communication within reasonable limits, I am not prepared at this moment to make any proposition in regard to rates on drop letters. I am aware there are two sides to that question. The public in cities enjoying free delivery, have to pay more at present. If it were proposed to have free deliveries in the cities at one cent per letter, probably those not benefited by the delivery would feel they were being unfairly treated. Whatever may be the reason that moved the late Government, for I presume there was some valid reason, they provided that cities having the benefit of free delivery should pay more than the farmers in districts who had to travel to the post office for their letters.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). Has the hon. Minister ever considered the matter of free delivery in the country?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I cannot say that I have given any serious consideration to that subject yet. I am aware that in some countries free delivery takes place in the country districts. In Great Britain this prevails to a very large extent, but it is a different matter to adopt free delivery within comparatively small area, inhabited by 40,000,000 of people, than it is on a vast continent like Canada, and a sparsely settled country at that. I was about to refer to the connection between the imposition of this rate upon newspapers and the reduction of rates upon letters. I submit that the reduction of the rates on letters is a decided advantage, and that even if at times some people have to pay a little more for their newspapers—even admitting that argument—the subscribers will have had the advantage at all events of the reduced letter rates. An hon. member, when this Bill was introduced, spoke very sneeringly of the result of this change as regards certain classes of the people: what did they care for reduced letter postage; how many letters a year did they write, certainly not more than three or four. If a gentleman writes only three or four letters, he will save three or four cents per year. If the letter rate is less, he will probably write more letters; but whether he wrote three or four or more, he would get his letters forwarded at a lower rate and the newspapers would share the burden. That is my doctrine. I will be told that the revenue from the imposition of postage on newspapers will go only a short way to make up the deficit that will arise from the reduction of the rates on the letters. But however little it may be, the amount will go some distance, and if the number of letters increase, it will to that extent make it possible for the revenue of the department to overtake the expenditure and permit the introduction of reduced letter rates. As to the time when this reduced letter rate will be introduced, I may say that it will not take effect at once, but by Order in Council. When I took charge of the department there was a deficit for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1896, amounting to $780,000. That deficit in the first year fell $200,000, and for the year up to 30th June last the deficit was $580,000. We are now closing another year, and in six weeks the exact result of the year's operations will be made known. I do not wish to speak with any degree of certainty as to the result, because there are yet six weeks of possible change; but I think I am not far from the mark when I say that the deficit of $580,000 with which we began this financial year will be reduced to $100,000 at the close of this year. Another six months will pass, from 1st July to 1st January, before the one-quarter of a cent on newspapers will go into effect. I expect that on 1st January next the department will be self-sustaining, the revenue will be equal to the expenditure, and we will start on 1st January next with a self-sustaining department, with no tax on the public except the tax paid directly for the use of the mail service; and if the House sees fit to adopt this measure, we will commence to impose postage on newspapers, and if the country becomes more prosperous even than it is to-day under the present Administration, if the volume of business increases, the revenue of the department will increase with that enhanced prosperity, and it will be possible when we introduce a rate on newspapers to effect likewise a reduction in the rate on letters.

Mr. SPROULE. May I ask the hon. gentleman, does he mean it will be self-sustaining, without charging any postage on newspapers?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Yes, I do; I mean to say that by the first day of January next, this department will be self-sustaining, without any revenue derived from the postage on newspapers, but it has to be borne in mind—

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. How are you going to make it up?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. By economy and by the improved revenues of the department.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And notwithstanding the reduction that may take place on the letters?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No, Mr. Speaker. The reduction of the rate on letters will involve a loss on the letters, unless it is recouped by the increased number of letters.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then you speak apart from that reduction?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Yes. Suppose the number of letters does not increase, then we would lose $650,000 by the reduction. But even if we did lose $650,000 by the reduction of the rate from 3 to 2 cents, is it not better to have a rate of 2 cents and a deficit of $650,000 than the old rate of 3 cents and a deficit of $780,000?

Mr. SPROULE. What increase in the number of letters would be necessary to make up the loss?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. We have to carry about eighty million or ninety million letters.

Mr. SPROULE. I make it 32,500,000.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I defer to the hon. gentleman's figures for the moment. At all events, I submit that the two measures are in the public interest. They are entwined together, and whilst the imposition of the rate upon newspapers will not pay the whole cost of this boon that will be conferred upon the public, yet, to the extent that it produces a revenue, it will aid to that amount, and it will be, I trust, a check upon the burdens that are cast upon the people to-day by the bringing out of newspapers of a useless kind—fake newspapers some call them; I would not use such a term, I do not know the meaning of it. A constant demand is made upon the public to carry newspapers that succeed in getting registration, comply with the requirements of a newspaper set forth in the statutes, but which are nothing but agencies in disguise to promote private enterprise and private gain. Putting the matter on a business basis will, I trust, help to ward off some of these evils and make it possible for the country in the near future to have the advantage of the 2 cent rate without any extra cost.

Mr. BRITTON. I notice that under section 2 the Postmaster General has to decide what is a newspaper. Suppose it complies with all the conditions described in the Act, and he decides it is a newspaper within the meaning of the Act, I presume it is the intention of the Postmaster General that subsection "c" is to apply, and that in order to get the benefit of newspaper rates it must be delivered either to a bona fide subscriber or to a newspaper agent.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I may say that this Bill is a re-enactment, word for word, of the existing sections of the law, applicable to the status of newspapers, and declaring under what conditions they shall be entitled to free transmission. The only change in the section is the incorporation of the words which are necessary to carry out the reduction of the letter rate and the imposition of the rate on newspapers.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Would my hon. friend allow me to suggest that as this question of the reduction of the domestic rate on letters is under consideration and has a direct bearing upon the measure which the hon. gentleman proposed, but was unable to carry out, I think that would be an appropriate time for my hon. friend to give an explanation to the House of the authority under which he proposed to act, and as to what prevented his carrying out the arrangement in regard to the reduction of the rate on letters outside of Canada. What does my hon. friend propose to do in that regard?

Mr. FOSTER. It all bears on the question of revenue.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) has had sufficient experience in various positions to know that I am not free to make the communication to the House that he asks. He is quite aware that in negotiations between the colonies and the mother country, there are communications which for the time being are confidential. That is the position of affairs at this moment, as I announced to the House some time ago, when my hon. friend from Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) asked for certain papers. The time will come when all these papers will be made public, but this is not the time.

Mr. CLARKE. Did those reasons exist during the Toronto election last fall when the announcement was made by a responsible Minister of the Crown that the reduction would take place on the 1st of January, 1898?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. That announcement was made then and it was intended to take effect at that time, but in deference to the request of the Imperial authorities, it was postponed in order that there might be a conference of the representatives of the whole Empire with a view to adopt a larger scheme of inter-Imperial preferential postage, and that is why it was deferred. I trust the result will be the carrying out of the announcement made in Toronto in November last.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not ask my hon. friend (Mr. Mulock) in regard to confidential communications between this Government and the Imperial Government, but it is due to the House that the hon. gentleman should do what he is perfectly entitled to do, namely, to state under what authority he proposes to act. He has explained what difficulties occurred, but the House should know on what authority he undertook to make that reduction in postage, and what subsequent steps were involved in connection with it.
