EASTER ADJOURNMENT

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister) moved.

That when this House adjourns on Wednesday, the 23rd instant, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, the 29th instant.

Motion agreed to.

WEDNESDAY EVENING SITTINGS

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN moved:

That on Wednesday, the 30th instant, and on all subsequent Wednesdays to the end of the session, the House shall meet at Three o'clock, p.m., and that the sitting on such days shall, in every respect, be under the same rules provided for other days.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my right hon. friend if the motion proposes to do away with the Wednesday evening adjournments?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. I am moving the resolution at about the usual time of the session, but I believe that on the first coming up of the motion it is not usual to press it if it is felt that the delay of another week would be convenient to hon. gentlemen on either side. However, the Government would like to have the motion passed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would like to suggest to the Prime Minister that he should follow the custom of previous years, unless there is some very strong reason why it should be departed from.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It will be observed that the motion does not propose to take Wednesday as a Government day, what is proposed is simply to sit for the entire day on Wednesday. If the hon. gentleman would prefer I will have the motion provide for another week's delay and follow it possibly by a motion to take Wednesday as a Government day later.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion stands.

TRADE WITH RUSSIA

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): Mr. Speaker, in view of the announcement that a trade agreement has been entered into between the Government of Great Britain and the Soviet Government of Russia, may I inquire if this Government has taken or is about to take any steps to promote trade between Canada and Russia?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, no particular steps have been taken of late. The situation as regards Russia and Canada is simply this—that any Russian subject has a perfect right to come to Canada to make purchases and provide for payment to the Canadians from whom he makes purchases; and Canadians have a perfect right to trade with Russian subjects. Notwithstanding the trade commissions that we sent to Russia, conditions in that country entirely apart from general world conditions, are not favourable to Canadian trade; but since the Armistice there has been no embargo on trade relations between the two countries.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, do the terms of the treaty which has been completed between Great Britain and Russia apply to Canada?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The treaty between Great Britain and the Soviet authorities has been concluded entirely irrespective of the self-governing dominions.

Mr. MURPHY: May I ask the right hon. gentleman if the conditions in Russia to which he referred militate against Canada to any greater degree than they do against Great Britain?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The conditions in Russia are equally unfortunate for both countries. They arise from the confused state of affairs in Russia itself and from the almost complete breakdown of transportation facilities there; those are the special conditions. Then, of course, there is the general trade condition of the world in the matter of exchange and credits.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PRODUCTION OF PAPERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. F. S. CAHILL (Pontiac): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Reid), in view of his statement regarding the resolution of the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Parent), if it is the policy of the Government that correspondence between the officers of the Canadian National Railways will not be produced in this House when asked for?

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, the answer I gave to the hon. member (Mr. Parent) was that the correspondence he asked for was not in the possession of the Government, and of course I could not produce it.

Mr. CAHILL: I would ask the minister whether he refuses to produce the correspondence? The matter has to do with his department.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): Does my hon. friend mean to imply that transactions relating to the Canadian National railways are not to be brought to the notice of this House, and that an hon. member cannot properly ask, subject to the usual rule regarding confidential matters, to have brought before Parliament any correspondence relating to any public matter in the Dominion of Canada?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): This is a subject that has come up very frequently, and the rule adopted by Parliament is, I think, well known. The board of directors of the National railways operate the system just as the board of directors of any other railway whose stock is not owned by the Government operate their system. The correspondence of the board of directors is in the possession of the National Railways, and it has not been the practice that this Government should ask that all matters of operation be submitted to it or to this House for review; they come before the House in the usual way in the annual report of the board of directors. That is the policy which has been adopted and which now prevails.

Mr. FIELDING: Subject to the general rule that confidential documents cannot in the public interest be produced, which we admit readily, does my right hon. friend imply that because the Canadian National Railways take the form of a company, in which the people of Canada are the owners of all the stock, therefore we cannot ask for papers relating to the transactions of that vast enterprise in which the people's money is invested?

Mr. MEIGHEN: This House has review of the work of the enterprise of course. But correspondence in connection with the operation of the road between the board of directors and anybody concerned is not in the possession of the Government, and is not the same at all as correspondence between departments of Government and others, which, of course, must be brought down upon resolution of this House. It has not been the practice, nor do I know how we can have such a thing as independent non-political operation of the road if the correspondence of the Canadian National system is to be produced. It is impossible. You must choose between one way and the other

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the Opposition): Does my right hon. friend recognize no obligations, by virtue of these being government-owned railways, to produce any correspondence as distinct from correspondence of a privately-owned corporation? Is there no obligation on the Government to produce any correspondence relating to the Canadian National railways?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have answered that as fully as I can. The question is not removed from difficulty, I admit. The Government of the country is the owner of the stock of the road. But if any matter connected with operation is, by means of the production of correspondence, to be brought before this Parliament for review, that means direct political control of the road, and that we are determined to avoid.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

OPERATION—CANCELLATION OF TRAINS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. GEORGE PARENT (Quebec West): May I ask the Minister of Railways if his department has anything to do with the cancellation of certain trains on the Canadian National railways?

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways and Canals): The Department of Railways and Canals has nothing whatever to do with the cancellation of trains or in fact with anything connected with the operation of the road.

Mr. PARENT: I wanted to find out from the minister, because on February 28 he answered that the Government had something to do with the cancellation of trains and was in possession—

Mr. SPEAKER: On the Orders of the Day there can be no cross-questioning of ministers; any answer received must be accepted.

Mr. JACQUES BUREAU (Three Rivers): Are the Canadian National railways operated under the Canadian National Railways Act passed by this Parliament some years ago?

Hon. Mr. REID: No, Mr. Speaker, that Act has not yet been brought into force.

SUPPLY—RULE 17C

On the Order being called for the House to go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. SPEAKER: Under Rule 17c the mere calling of this order makes it necessary for the Speaker to leave the Chair without question put, but the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Reid) has intimated to me that he would prefer to make his railway statement with the Speaker in the Chair. I therefore submit the question to the House, as to whether he shall have unanimous consent for the purpose of making his statement, following which, and complying with the rule, I shall leave the Chair.

Mr. BUREAU: Is this a motion?

Mr. SPEAKER: No. It does not abrogate the rule in any way.

Mr. CRERAR: Is this a statement by the Minister of Railways preliminary to the introduction of his estimates?

Mr. REID (Grenville): This is my annual statement in connection with the National Railways showing the results of operation for the year 1920.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. minister should have leave to make his statement?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ANNUAL STATEMENT BY THE MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair and the House is in Committee of Supply, I wish to submit my annual statement in connection with the Canadian National railways. I wish to follow the usual custom and make a statement in connection with the operation of our Canadian government-owned and controlled railway systems for the year 1920. The statement I intend to submit is compiled from statistical information which I will submit to the House before I close, and which was supplied me by the Board of Management who have charge of the operation of the National Railway system. Before going into the matter it would be well perhaps to explain how the operation of our National Railway system is being carried on. When the Government took over the Canadian Northern system and connected it up with the Intercolonial and Transcontinental railways, a policy had to be decided on as to how the roads would be managed, the Prime Minister of Canada, Sir Robert Borden, announced to the House and to the public what that policy would be. His announcement appears in Hansard, of the session of 1918, May 15, page 1999, when, speaking of the management of these railways, he laid this down as his policy.

As to the immediate future, I have already said that we do not intend to operate the Canadian Northern Railway system directly under a department of the Government; it is our intention to operate it for the present through the corporate machinery by which it has been operated in the past. There will be a reconstituted board of directors. We shall endeavour to get the best men we can and we shall not interfere with them. We shall leave the administration and operation of that road to be carried on absolutely under that Board of directors and we shall use every means available to the Government (and if necessary, we shall come to Parliament for that purpose) in order that anything like political influence, political patronage, or political interference—I am using the word political in its narrower sense—shall be absolutely eliminated from the administration of that road.

That was the policy laid down by the Prime Minister, and in accordance with it a board was constituted and has been in charge of the management of Canadian National railways from its organization up to the present time, and the operation has been carried on quite independent of the Department of Railways and Canals.

I regret they were not able to submit a statement as satisfactory as I would like. A year ago I announced the deficit for 1919 as $47,993,312. When final figures were available the actual loss was found to have been $48,242,536

Mr. FIELDING: Does that mean in operation only?

Hon. Mr. REID: No, that is operation and fixed charges. My statement explains these matters in detail. After I get through, if there are any questions I shall be glad to answer them.

When I made my annual statement of the operation of these roads a year ago I believed from discussions I had with the management I would be able to advise the House this year that the deficit of 1919 had been reduced in 1920. Instead of a reduction I must inform the House that the loss in operation alone for the year ending December 31st, 1920, is much larger, and is as follows:

Canadian Northern	$16,258,579 80
Canadian Government	10,449,876 43
Total operating deficit of the Canadian National Railways:	26,708,456 23
To which we add the operating deficit of the Grand Trunk Pacific, which since Aug. 23rd last has been under management of the Canadian National Board, amounting to	10,134,513 94
Making a total operating deficit of	$36,842,970 17

To this must be added the interest on bonds, etc., or what are called fixed charges and which have been paid or assumed by the Government, and are as follows:—

Canadian Northern	$24,155,988 48
Making the total deficit for operation and fixed charges	$70,331,734 88

And this does not take into consideration any interest or fixed charges on Transcontinental or Intercolonial railways.

A Canadian National income credit, which will be shown in the statement of detail, reduces this sum to $69,593,441, which is the loss on operation and fixed charges for 1920, as against 48 millions in 1919. The management explain this increased loss of twenty millions chiefly by increased expenditures in pay-rolls and fuel.

In carrying on maintenance the management explain that the cost of many materials and supplies had increased very much over 1919. They also state that prices of equipment such as locomotives and cars advanced very greatly, all of which have added, and will continue to add, to the cost of operation. In a word, out of every dollar earned we had to pay 75 cents for operating wages, and 20 cents for fuel, leaving 5 cents for all other requirements which totalled 29 cents.

The mileage operated by the Canadian National management last year was as follows:—

	Miles
Canadian Northern	9,859·78
Intercolonial Railway and branches.	2,221·86
Transcontinental Railway	2,006·58
Quebec & Saguenay and St. John & Quebec	234·07
Grand Trunk Pacific	2,732·40
Total at end of 1920	17,054·69

There were added during 1920, 140 miles by purchase of 236 miles on completion of of new construction.

To put in simplest form possible the earnings and operating expenses I submit the following statement:—

GROSS EARNINGS
Canadian Northern System	$66,695,398 80	$53,562,177 57

	$70,495,702 45	$49,004,545 46

The figures for 1920, while subject to minor changes, are practically complete.

The management emphasize the fact that maintenance deferred during the war made it absolutely necessary to as far as possible overtake this work at increased cost during 1920 to protect the property. They also found it necessary to improve to a large extent terminal facilities and main lines if they were to take care of the traffic satisfactorily to the public and be in a position to compete with other lines operating throughout the country.

Coming now to the year 1921, or the Estimates before you, the management figure on considerable reduction in the deficit in operation owing to curtailment of train services, reduction of maintenance forces and other economies. They also expect a re-adjustment in the price of materials, also in the wage schedules and working conditions, which should have a substantial effect in reduction of operating costs. The Estimates as submitted to the House were those submitted by the officials of the Canadian National railway, and in detail show the following for 1921:

Loss on Canadian Northern, including fixed charges	$23,074,847
Canadian Government Railway, operating deficit	7,000,000
Grand Trunk Pacific, deficit on operation and fixed charges	19,817,873
	$49,822,720
To this should be added $11,000,000 interest payable to the Finance Department for advances made to the Canadian Northern system by the Dominion Government, or a total of	$60,822,720

The votes passed by Parliament last session in order to acquire additional rolling stock and motive power to enable the system to properly handle its proportion of the traffic of the country was expended in the purchase of the following equipment:

LOCOMOTIVES

20 Medium Pacific, from Montreal Locomotive Works.
10 Heavy Pacific, from Montreal Locomotive Works.
25 Sante Fe, from Montreal Locomotive Works.
20 Switchers, from Canadian Locomotive Works.

FREIGHT

650 General service cars, from Eastern Car Company.
500 Box cars, from Eastern Car Company.
1,500 Box cars, from National Steel Car Co.
1,000 Box cars, from Canadian Car Company.
500 Refrigerator cars, from Canadian Car Co.
350 Ballast cars, from Hart-Otis Car Co.
150 Stock cars, from Canadian Car & Foundry Co.
80 Cabooses, from Canadian Car & Foundry Co.
20 Cabooses, from Preston Car & Coach Co.
6 Snow plows, from Eastern Car Company.

PASSENGER

18 Sleepers, from Canadian Car & Foundry Co.
12 Diners, from Canadian Car & Foundry Co.
20 Baggage cars, from Canadian Car & Foundry Co.
20 Express Refrigerator, from National Steel Car Co.

All of this has been delivered with the exception of the passenger train equipment. The sleepers are now arriving, and will be completed by the end of March. Baggage car deliveries commenced March 9, and completion is promised by the end of April. Dining car deliveries are promised commencing April 8, and completion of the express refrigerators has definitely been promised during the month of May.

With reference to the purchase of locomotives, cars and rolling stock in general, prices have been increased very much. I submit the following statement for the information of the House showing some of the increases, caused by increased cost and heavier power and steel construction:

Locomotives	$24,000	$61,250 to	$72,500
Standard sleepers	28,250		49,500
Dining cars	25,050		46,000
Baggage cars (wooden)	6,166	(Steel)	24,000
Freight refrigerators	1,640		5,025
Express refrigerators	4,642		12,240
General service freight cars	1,346		3,250
Box cars	1,150		2,960
Stock cars	846		2,640

These figures will show what the railways are up against.

Freight tonnage increased sixteen per cent over 1919 and passenger traffic by about a million, but while the quantity of freight and number of passengers increased, the haul in each case was shorter and returns not as great as expected.

Rate increases have been given from time to time in an effort to meet increased cost of operation under the McAdoo and United States Labour Board awards, under which the average wage per employee of the Canadian National system is now $1,850 as compared with $700 before the war. The result is the operating pay roll last year was $83,505,072 as compared with $40,606,170 in 1917. In addition wages on capital work required $12,222,045, making a total pay roll of $95,727,117. These figures justify immediate discussion between employees and management.

Of course, the railway situation in Canada, as elsewhere, is a product of the war. Every country in the world had to stand behind its railways during the war. We had no alternative but to follow suit and I am satisfied that, without the powerful support of the Government in the crisis which the war developed the railway situation would have been such that we would not have been able to carry on necessary war transportation facilities, and a collapse of our whole transportation system would have followed.

Let me refer briefly to the general railway situation throughout the United States. The total operating revenues for 1920, as reported by the Interstate Commerce Commission were $6,225,000,000, the largest in the history of American railroads, and $1,041,000,000 greater than for 1919. Operating expenses, however, consumed $5,826,197,000 of this, or $1,406,000,000 more than in 1919. The net operating income was only $62,264,421, as compared with an average of over $900,000,000 for the three years preceding the war. It is less than the roads should earn in one month to receive the six per cent which the United States Transportation Act prescribes as the measure of fair return on the investment; it is less than one-fourth of the various taxes payable by the roads, and represents a profit of almost exactly one per cent on the gross business done during the year, when the railroads handled more freight and passengers than ever before in their history. The sixty-two millions of net operating income was earned by about half of the Class 1 roads, the other half having deficits for the year. The United States Government has had to come to the rescue by a guarantee of about $600,000,000 for the six months' period following de-control. Of this sum about $200,000,000 has, it is stated, already been paid out for back wages under the Railroad Labour Board award. Only a special Act of Congress authorizing partial payments pending final settlement of the guarantee made it possible for many of these roads to avoid bankruptcy.

In England, passenger fares are seventy-five per cent above pre-war figures, and freight rates, from September 1st last, 112 per cent. Costs of materials have increased 200 per cent, and wages have increased 250 per cent. Further rate increases are contemplated, though short-distance freight has already commenced to move over the highways. In twenty months, the Government has had to provide about $350,000,000 under the Government guarantee, and claims are being made by the railways totalling $750,000,000 for arrears of maintenance, abnormal wear and tear, and replacement of stores. The British Government, therefore, faces a threatened loss of a billion dollars.

I hope I have made it clear that the result of the operation of Canadian National railways was not worse than obtained generally on the other side of the line and overseas. But that does not mean we should not take action to try and prevent these losses. At the present time the country is faced with permanent fixed charges as follows:

Interest public debt (including sinking fund)..	$142,800,000
Pensions..	31,816,000
Permanent expenditure for carrying on the affairs of the Government about..	127,000,000
Total, about..	$301,616,000

This without one dollar for carrying on public works, expenditures in connection with soldier settlement and re-establishment, and many other expenditures that must be provided for.

This means very heavy taxation for many years, and it would be a very serious matter to have increased taxation for railways to the extent of fifty, sixty or seventy million of dollars per annum to meet the cost of operation of railways.

As regard these heavy losses I must frankly admit I cannot see much hope of any management materially reducing the loss on Grand Trunk Pacific and Transcontinental railways for some years, but I do feel the losses on the other portions of the road can be reduced, and must be very materially, every year.

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

Grand Trunk Railway

The members should have a full statement with reference to the operations of the Grand Trunk railway, and when I say Grand Trunk railway I refer to the Grand Trunk Railway system now being taken over by the Government, the valuation of which is at present being decided by the board of arbitration.

I have not been able to get the annual closing statement from the Grand Trunk management up to the present time. Their staff is busy in connection with the arbitration proceedings. I had to send one of our expert auditors to secure from their books, and submit, a statement as to results of operations for the years 1919 and 1920, and he gives me the following report as approximately correct. After providing for operating expenses, tax accruals, income deductions, etc., the amount available for interest and dividends was, for 1919, $11,164,035.53; for 1920, $5,692,300.74. These amounts were available to meet interest and fixed charges on the following: 4 per cent and 5 per cent debenture stocks of the Grand Trunk, interest on all mortgage bonds of the Grand Trunk, interest on all mortgage bonds of the Grand Trunk Western, interest on all mortgage bonds of the Central Vermont, interest on secured notes of the Grand Trunk Railway, interest on equipment notes of the three companies, interest on guaranteed stock, first preference stock, second preference stock, third preference stock.

Out of the above amounts, the railway was able to meet in 1919 the interest on their fixed charges, but not on the share capital which includes the 4 per cent guaranteed stock, first, second and third preference stock, and ordinary stock. In 1920 the company falls short $6,563,091.33 of meeting interest on fixed charges. In justice, however, to the Grand Trunk management I should add that they had to pay $3,635,000 to the employees for back pay between May 1st and September 1st, when no increases for freight rates had been allowed.

In making this statement, however, it must be remembered that I am not taking into account the loss of $19,817,873 on the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, a subsidiary of the Grand Trunk railway, which the Grand Trunk Railway Company are responsible for, an amount sufficient to wipe out at any time all of the excess earnings as shown in the above statement. Later on in the session I hope to have from the management, further information in order to give more details.

What is the best way to improve the situation? I am ready to take, in fact I seek, advice from any or every member of this House, or whoever may be able to make any suggestion of value. Our present system of administration by a board entirely free from interference by any minister, by any department, or by the Government, is one which public opinion has demanded, and which, if we can carry it on and make the railways a success, is no doubt better for all concerned. The press and public opinion are very critical over our railway problem, and rightly so. Notwithstanding the dark side I have shown, I am still a firm believer in the ultimate success of our National Railways. But as in all other large institutions, success depends on how they are managed. This question is too big to be a political football. Might I ask the House to discuss it in its larger aspect rather than in some minor detail? Let us have instead a frank discussion of the whole railway policy.

The solution of the problem is one which will require joint action by the management and employees. Not only as employees, as operators of the road, but as citizens of Canada, their interests are identical, and I feel sure that if they, the management and employees, meet and take up the whole railway problem, they can deal with it in such a way as to preserve the good relations which have so far existed between them. Unless some action is taken, not only to reduce the annual loss occurring each year, but also to place the railways in a position to reduce the freight rates, I am satisfied the future advancement of the country will be seriously interfered with. Our railways were built to develop our natural resources, to build up our country, and to connect the East with the West in interprovincial trade. Good work has been done and it must not stop. Let me give you one or two illustrations of what high freight rates are doing. We in the province of Ontario have for many years required, in fact used, lumber and timber grown and manufactured in the province of British Columbia. To-day this trade is absolutely cut off owing to high freight rates, thus injuring British Columbia, and Ontario and our country as a whole. British Columbia requires the markets of the western provinces and even the eastern provinces for their products. It is impossible for British Columbia to grow and ship fruit and lumber at the present high rates of freight. The Prairie Provinces must live from the products of the soil. They cannot produce wheat and other products of their farms and ship it to foreign markets if these high freight rates are to continue indefinitely, and vice versa, things that are manufactured in the East that the people of the prairie and British Columbia require, cannot be produced and shipped to the western provinces if these high rates of freight are to continue. And if we are hindered in the production and manufacture of our natural products which improve our financial condition and add to the wealth of our country, does it not mean that the development of our country will be delayed until we are in a position to produce and manufacture on a basis equal to that of other countries? Surely this is a fair statement of the situation.

I must now conclude, but cannot do so without repeating my own honest opinion that our railways are a great asset for the future of Canada. If well and properly managed, and the press and public will only boost and not knock, it will be possible in a few years to show to the world just what a magnificent country we have in Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the House I would like to place on Hansard certain statistical and detailed information concerning last year's operations which has been suplied me by the management and which will be found of great value by hon. members.

These statements include comparative summaries of operating results and traffic statistics; a statement with regard to betterments and new construction during 1920, a comparative statement of equipment and some useful detailed information as to increased costs of rolling stock, material and supplies.

Mr. SPEAKER: The House, is of course, aware that only under exceptional circumstances are documents permitted to be inserted in Hansard when they have not been read. But, as the documents in question are of undoubted importance, I should like to know the pleasure of the House, whether it gives unanimous consent to their being incorporated in Hansard unread.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

The following are some of the larger items carried out during the year:—

Canadian Government Railways

At Halifax Ocean Terminals, the train shed and platforms were completed. Grading of engine terminal site at Fairview was 80 per cent completed.

Paving of city streets in the vicinity of stations, freight sheds and terminals was done at four locations.

Work of re-arranging the yards at Mulgrave, Stellarton, Sydney, Royalty Junction, Drummondville, McGivney and Amos, as well as several smaller yards, was carried out, the majority of this work being completed.

Double tracking between Truro and Belmont, Springhill and Maccan, Chaudiere Junction, and St. Nicholas, Bagot and St. Rosalie Junction was completed and put into operation. The cut-off from the St. John subdivision to the N.T.R. at the west end of Moncton yard was completed, with the exception of a small amount of ballasting.

Grading for engine terminal site at Moncton was completed and is now ready for the erection of new terminal buildings and yard tracks. The provision of this new yard and terminal along with the new connection at the west end of yard will permit of all traffic being handled in one yard and greatly facilitate the handling of trains and engines and make large reduction in the cost of conducting traffic.

At Island yard, St. John, nine new yard tracks having a capacity of 590 cars for the handling of export traffic were completed and put into operation.

The replacement of the substructure for a double track bridge over the Tantramar river near Sackville was 42 per cent completed during the year.

At Cape Tormentine it was found necessary to dredge the entrance channel and turning basin to provide greater depth of water, there being danger of the ferry steamer Prince Edward Island touching bottom during low tides and gales This work was 30 per cent completed.

Between McGivney Junction and Fredericton on the Fredericton subdivision grade and alignment revisions were undertaken at Durban and Taymouth. 55 per cent of this work was completed.

At Chaudiere Junction a commencement was made on the work of improving engine facilities which were inadequate and inefficient. The increased terminal facilities at this point will, when completed, permit of the abandonment of the G.T.R. engine facilities at Point Levis and the N.T.R. engine facilities at Bridge on the north side of the St. Lawrence river, the business of the three terminals being handled at Chaudiere. A connection between Charny and Quebec bridge to facilitate the operation of the railway was 25 per cent completed.

At St. Malo shops additional equipment, tools and machinery were installed and additional tracks provided.

Canadian Northern Railway (Western Lines)

New elevator at Port Arthur was put in operation.

Yard re-arrangement at Atikokan—Additional tracks were put in and existing tracks re-arranged to provide suitable yard accommodation to take care of business.

Fort Francis—At this point roundhouse, boiler shed and turntable were installed.

Additional machinery was added to Fort Rouge shops at Winnipeg to facilitate repairs to equipment, etc.

Work was commenced on shop, engine and yard facilities at Nutana.

Additional tracks, ash pits and general improvements made to yard at Humboldt.

At Eaton, on Elrose subdivision, new divisional point buildings are being erected and yard tracks, etc., being put in.

Prince Albert yard facilities were improved.

Canadian Northern Railway (Eastern Lines)

Alterations and additions to tracks and freight office building were made at Cherry St. yards, Toronto, on account of co-operation of C.N.R. and G.T. Railway. By doing this savings were effected.

A connection between C.N. Railway and G.T. Railway was made at Pembroke to allow C.N.R. train to use the G.T.R station. The C.N.R. yards at this point were enlarged to take care of combined business.

Temporary connection was installed between C.N.R. and G.T.R. at Napanee and Washago Restaurant and Express facilities combined at North Bay.

At Capreol on the C.N.R. a Y.M.C.A. building was finished.

Improving line and strengthening bridges on the St. Lawrence subdivision.

Grand Trunk Pacific Railway

Track diversions were made on the Lucerne and Fraser Subdivisions.

Improvements were made to car Ferry Slip at Prince Rupert.

Right of way fencing was done on Mountain Division on Cut Knife Branch.

Water supplies were improved at Colfax, Shontz, Prince George, Justice, Kinsella and Bruce.

Some of the station buildings constructed were located at Avonhurst, Lorlie, Gilroy, Domreny, Wakaw, Carruthers and Houston.

Culverts were installed and bridges filled at a number of locations.

General work of ballasting, ditching, riprapping and stuccoing stations was carried out.

During the present year it is proposed to continue works which were uncompleted at the end of last year and undertake new works of which the larger items are briefly referred to below:—

Canadian Government Railways

Continuation of the work of dredging at Cape Tormentine, double track bridge over the Tantramar river near Sackville, terminal facilities at Moncton, Island Yard, St. John, strengthening of Branch Lines in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Quebec, grade and alignment revisions on the Fredericton Subdivision, and engine facilities at Chaudiere Junction.

Large new works include the installation of automatic block signals between Maccan and Painsec Junction, Moncton and Pacific Junction, Charny and Bridge and the replacement of trestles on the Transcontinental Railway, Eastern and Western Lines.

In connection with the co-ordination of the C.G.R. and G.T.R. it is proposed to make extension of St. Rosalie yard and provide a new water supply, the present supply being inadequate.

On the Quebec & Saguenay railway during the past year construction work was done to complete the line for operation and line was put into operation on October 1st, 1920. This year it is proposed to provide riprap protection to embankments and make repairs to equipment.

On the Hudson Bay railway it is proposed to provide 170,000 ties and do a certain amount of ballasting and surfacing.

Canadian Northern Railway (Western Lines)

New bridges are proposed for crossing over Otter Tail river and on North Lake Subdivision also across South Saskatchewan river near Saskatoon.

At Winnipeg Terminals additional tracks are required and it is proposed to construct new yard at Nutana and make alteration to yard at Edmonton and commence new yard at Wayne.

New water supplies are required at Dana, Lloydminster and Kindersley to facilitate operation of trains.

It is considered necessary to relay a portion of the line on Hanna SD. with 85 lb. steel on account of heavy coal traffic originating at Drumheller Mines, also about 25 miles of the Main Line on the Kamsack Subdivision.

Light steel bridges to be replaced and trestles to be filled and replaced on Chester, Liverpool and Port Wade Subdivisions of Halifax & South Western railway.

Grand Trunk Pacific Railway

Track diversion at Firdale.

Station and restaurant building at Prince George; and station, baggage room, etc., at Prince Rupert.

Improve roundhouse facilities at Melville and Edson.

Water supplies at Melville, Hubbard, Archydal and on Riverhurst, Boundary and Cudworth Subdivisions.

Building large culverts preparatory to filling lumber trestles on Brulé and Evansburg Subdivisions.

Car Shops at Edmonton.

Salmon Wharf at Prince Rupert.

Co-ordination C.N.Rlys. and Grand Trunk Rly. and C.N. Rly. and G. T. Pacific Railway.

Joint committees were appointed for the purpose of organizing efficiency and the reduction of expenses by joint operation and joint facilities when possible. During the present year to consolidate facilities with the Grand Trunk Railway it is proposed to construct connections at Washago, Otter Lake and Napanee; construct additional trackage at North Bay and Napanee and provide various facilities at Hawkesbury and Rockland. To consolidate with the Grand Trunk Pacific railway it is proposed to construct new connections at Stony Plains, Alix and Calgary; provide additional trackage and consolidate existing trackage at Portage La Prairie, Stony Plains, Edson, Jasper and Riley; make track alterations to permit of the elimination of interlocking plants at Portage La Prairie, Yorkton, Mile 600, Evansburg Subdivision, Lampman and Regina.

Eastern Lines—

There was no work done on Eastern Lines in the way of constructing new branches, all this work during the year being confined to Western Lines.

Western Lines—

Grading—

During the year there was the equivalent of 141.5 miles of grading completed. By "equivalent" is meant that in certain places each mile may not have been completely finished so the percentage of this in yards to the whole yardage was taken to get the number of miles done.

Of this 141.5 miles of grading 88.8 miles were done on prairie lines and 52.7 in British Columbia on the Okanagan branch.

An appended statement gives in detail the branches on which this grading was accomplished, and is divided by provinces; this shows there was completed in Manitoba 14.4 miles, in Saskatchewan 52.6 miles, in Alberta 22.1 miles and in British Columbia 52.7 miles.

Bridges and Trestles—

On new lines in 1920, in the erection of 40 bridges and trestles 2,781,893 F.B.M. of timber, 79,682 lin. ft. of piling, and 139,910 lbs. of iron were used. There was also placed one 147-foot wooden deck Howe truss. Detail of where this work was done is given on an attached statement.

Tracklaying—

There was laid in 1920, 147.6 miles of track on new lines; 128.1 miles being laid on prairie lines and 19.5 miles in British Columbia on the Vancouver Island line. A detailed statement attached shows the branches on which this track was laid, and divided into provinces shows there was laid in Manitoba 0.0 miles, in Saskatchewan 73.9 miles, in Alberta 54.2 miles, and in British Columbia 19.5 miles.

In connection with tracklaying; 86 switches and frogs were placed for sidings and wyes on new lines, 20 sidings having been installed as well as 4 wyes. This used up 8.9 miles of track in addition to the main line track referred to above.

Ballasting and Surfacing—

In 1920 there were 182.5 miles of new track ballasted; 163 miles of this was on prairie lines. made up of 40 miles on the Alsask branch, 120 miles on the Oliver branch and 3 miles on the double track, Munson-Wayne, near Drumheller. The balance of 19.5 miles was done on the Vancouver Island line.

Buildings and Structures—Water Tanks—

Seven water tanks were completed in the season for new lines, and four pump houses and 6,400 lin. ft. of pipe line built to serve them.

Stations—

During the year four 3rd class; five 4th class stations, 17 freight and passenger shelters, 19 loading platforms and 15 stock yards were erected on new lines.

Section Houses—

Sixteen section houses were completed on new lines during 1920. The branches on which these buildings were placed is shown in the attached table.

Miles put in operation—

During 1920 on Canadian Northern Western Lines there were 85.23 miles of new lines turned over to the operating department for permanent operation, and in addition to this 120.8 miles of new lines were turned over to the operating department for operation on behalf of construction department, or a total 206.03 miles. Attached is detailed statement showing these lines and mileages.

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN: May I ask the minister—

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the hon. member proceeds, I must direct the attention of the House to the fact that it is questionable whether the minister may be interrogated at this stage. If hon. members desired to question the minister, their scope of inquiry at present would be very limited, and I think it would be far better, as I have no doubt the House will agree, that questions be deferred until the House is in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JACQUES BUREAU: I understand that we automatically go into Supply now, under the rules, and I would like to point out that there may be an opportunity for a general debate on the railway situation.

[Mr. J. D. Reid].

Mr. SPEAKER: I should have left the Chair without question put when the order for Supply was called in the first instance, but I then stated that I would ask the unanimous consent of the House for the minister to make a statement, following which I would leave the Chair, according to rule.

SUPPLY

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Entomology—$26,000.

Mr. MURPHY: Will the Minister of Agriculture explain the reason for the increase of $8,000 in this item?

Mr. TOLMIE: This item for entomology covers the study of insects which has a relation to agriculture, many of these insects doing damage to agricultural products, to the extent of something over $100,000,000 a year. The increase of $8,000 is made up, first, by a grant to the Imperial Bureau of Entomology amounting to $5,000. This Imperial Bureau has its headquarters in London, and consists of representatives of all the British dominions. It carries on investigation there, and gathers information regarding various insect parasites from all over the world. The Bureau is contributed to and maintained by the various Dominions that are interested in it. The Bureau also issues from time to time certain printed matter giving the latest information regarding the insects in question. This information is available to our Department at any time it is required, and where its value in particular comes in is, that in the event of any strange insect appearing among our crops in Canada from which we expect damage we can immediately find out the life history of that insect and all the particulars that are known concerning it, by applying to the Bureau in London. The other $3,000 is to cover extension work; certain extra assistance will be required in the fall this year in connection with the corn bore infection in the corn growing counties in southern Ontario; for extra printed matter and general expenses of the office.

Mr. FIELDING: The minister referred to a Bureau in London. By whom is Canada represented at that Bureau?

Mr. TOLMIE: We have no representative on the ground, but we contribute to the maintenance of the office and for that reason all the information gathered is available to us on application, in addition to the printed material that is issued regularly.

Mr. MORPHY: Will the minister state what other Dominions are contributing to the maintenance of this Bureau and the amount of such contributions?

Mr. TOLMIE: I am sure that India, South Africa, Australia and New Zealand are contributing, but I cannot at present give the hon. member the exact amount in each case.

Mr. FIELDING: I suppose the reports issued by the Bureau in question will show the manner in which these sums of money are being expended, and by reference to the reports we could get the desired information?

Mr. TOLMIE: Yes. I understand that information is printed.

Mr. BUREAU: Before this item carries I would like to have a point settled in connection with a ruling which was given by the Chair on Tuesday night. I do not dispute the ruling, and I am not going to argue the matter, but it was to the effect that when an item was carried in Committee of Supply any minister could call the estimates of his department, or could call the estimates of any department, practically at any time when the Committee of Supply was sitting, and the only way by which we could hold back the calling of the items of a special department which we had not agreed to discuss at the time, was not to let the particular estimate under consideration pass. Now, I do not desire to obstruct the passage of the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture; on the contrary my desire, if anything is that they should be put through with all possible despatch. But I notice that last night when the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) asked the Prime Minister what business would be taken up to-day he received the following reply:

> To-morrow is Government day. The orders to be taken up will include the motion to go into Supply upon the Estimates of the Department of Agriculture and any others that we may be entitled to consider.

Now that is rather a vague statement. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) will, I am sure, bear me out in the statement that in former years it has always been customary for the Government to make a definite statement each night when adjourning as to what work would be taken up next day. That has been the practice ever since Confederation. But now we seem to be drifting into rather a vague policy, and it is just as well to have the point settled now as to the right course to pursue, in order that there may be no misunderstanding in the future. For my part I am willing to further the dispatch of the business of the House, but it is desirable that in respect to the conduct of affairs there should be definiteness and not vagueness. If it is going to be a question of taking some small advantage out of this vagueness, I am prepared to discuss the matter to a conclusion. If we cannot have the required understanding then in my opinion hon. gentlemen on this side should continue speaking to this item until we are vouchsafed the information as to what is coming next. I think we are entitled to be treated with more deference than appears to have been the case, and I think greater progress will be made if we are given that information which we consider we are entitled to. I should draw the inference from the ruling made by you, Mr. Chairman, the other night, that the ministers have the right to take up on Thursdays and Fridays only, those items which have previously been considered, but that on all other days—they could take up anything.

The CHAIRMAN: If the Committee will allow me I shall draw the attention of the hon. member to the wording of the ruling which I gave on Tuesday evening. At page 1004 of Unrevised Hansard he will find that in answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) as to whether all hon. ministers could call the items of their respective departments on the same day, I stated:

> —that if the committee would consent to dispose of those Estimates with sufficient speed to allow them to do so, the ministers would have that right except on Thursday or Friday when their estimates had not previously been taken up.

The only Estimates that have heretofore been taken up are the Estimates of the Department of Agriculture, and for that reason, without the unanimous consent of this committee no Estimates of any other department can be taken up to-day.

Mr. BUREAU: And on Tuesday?

The CHAIRMAN: On Tuesday any Estimates can be taken up.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: On motion.

The CHAIRMAN: Yes, after a motion that Mr. Speaker leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Supply, has been agreed to.

Mr. FIELDING: This matter is rather one of courtesy than a rule of the House. I think the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) has correctly stated that it is for the convenience of the House as well as a courtesy to the Opposition that at the close of the business each night we shall have an announcement of what business is coming on next day; and if the order of business as announced be changed, it should be a matter of courtesy to so advise hon. gentlemen on both sides.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I quite agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. ROBB: Might I suggest to the right hon. gentleman leading the House that we might with considerable advantage follow the practice adopted in the British House of Commons and on Thursday of each week have a statement from the ministry of what business will be taken up on each day of the following week.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That would be sometimes difficult to do and would not always meet the convenience of the House. I think the rule as it has just been stated by the Chairman, coupled with the conversation we have had across the floor, will be sufficient.

Mr. BUREAU: While we are on the subject I am going to call the attention of the leader of the House to the fact that the statement made yesterday regarding the order of business for to-day is very indefinite. The Prime Minister then stated:

> The order to be taken up will include the motion to go into Supply upon the Estimates of the Department of Agriculture and any others that we may be entitled to consider.

I want to know if we are going to be left in that uncertain position. We should know definitely what is coming forward and then we can see what we will do.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Chairman has just ruled what we are entitled to do, but at the same time it is quite reasonable that whoever makes the final announcement in the evening should make it as definite as it can possibly be made. I am sure there is no other intention.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): We on this side of the House do not admit that the spirit of the rule is observed. The rule might operate towards destroying the privilege which members have of discussing any department when it first comes before the House in the Estimates. In Bourinot I find on page 424 the following:

> The object of the proviso is to permit of debate before first entering upon the Estimates of any department, but in practice, the consent of the House is generally given to taking up a department's Estimates without preliminary debate, under a general understanding that such debate will be entered upon at some more convenient time. The British Parliament has a somewhat similar rule.

As the ruling was made the other evening it would appear to me that the ordinary privilege members have of discussing a special department before we enter upon the Estimates of that department was taken away altogether. I think it would be well for the leader to let us know what the policy of the Government is in regard to this matter; otherwise, as my hon.

friend from Three Rivers has said, we might be under the necessity of preventing the passing of an item for fear the Government would call an item in another department that had not yet been considered.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think my hon. friend need have no fear that he will be ill-treated.

Administration and enforcement of the Destructive Insect and Pest Act, $180,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: What progress is being made in the work to which this vote applies? Last summer in the Maritime Provinces we were reading about the incursion of the army worm into the province of Ontario. Has the minister been furnished with any effective means of combatting this pest?

Mr. TOLMIE: I may briefly outline the work that has been carried on under this expenditure, which is rather large. We have a staff in the field continuously at work not only on what might be called the animal insects, but also the fungous or vegetable insects. We have been dealing with the cut worm in certain sections of the country—a pest which is very destructive to field and garden crops. We have furnished farmers with a reliable remedy, based on a mixture of molasses and arsenic with some common body such as bran or other suitable material, and this has been found very effective indeed. With respect to the wire worm, we have found that it is necessary to take considerable time to study this insect as it requires about four years to complete its life history. So far we have found cultural methods most useful in dealing with this pest. In connection with the grasshopper plague which we have had in the West, we have found three particular varieties of grasshoppers doing considerable damage in the Prairie Provinces and also in the States to the south. We figure that in co-operation with the Provincial Governments we have this year saved agriculturalists in the province of Manitoba about $17,000,000 by adopting certain combative methods for overcoming the grasshopper plague; in Saskatchewan it is estimated that 1,400,000 acres were favourably affected by our treatment; and in Alberta our operations have also been extensive during the past year. In addition to carrying on this work our department conducted a number of experiments. One was with what is known as a hopper-dozer, drawn by a team and consisting of a vessel containing coal oil and other ingredients, in which the hoppers are captured as the machine is drawn across the fields. This, however, was found not to be nearly so effective as some of the other methods. We also carried on tests with chlorine gas, but found it very expensive, it costing at the rate of about $20 per acre. It has also this disadvantage that there is considerable danger in using it, and changing winds might have very disastrous results. Then, again, if the gas was heavily applied we found that it destroyed the vegetable matter which we hoped to save. The most satisfactory remedy was the baiting system, that is, where we used bran as the bait. Some of our men discovered that if 50 per cent of its bulk was made up of sawdust a considerable saving could be effected. We mixed this bait with molasses to attract the grasshoppers, and then added enough arsenic to kill them. In that way we have destroyed a very large number of these pests and found it the cheapest and most efficient system to handle. We have also, as I pointed out a moment ago, carried on a considerable amount of work in combatting the European corn borer. This parasite comes in from the United States and affects some of the districts in Ontario where corn is grown to a considerable extent. The United States Government is so impressed with the seriousness of this parasite that last year they expended $400,000 in trying to prevent it reaching the corn belt and in stopping its ravages in those districts where it had already appeared. The fly lays its eggs on the corn plants, develops into a caterpillar and bores into the stalk of the corn and also up into the cob. We have given all the information we could in the various districts where the trouble has existed, and we have also issued 25,000 circulars dealing with the subject. We have also been dealing with the brown-tail moth, particularly in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, with considerable success. It has been found practicable to import certain pests that prey on this particular insect. We sent men to the United States to study the work done there in that connection, and a number of these parasites were brought here and released in districts where the brown-tail moth was causing trouble. We have also been dealing lately with what is known as the apple-sucker, a parasite supposed to be recently imported from Europe. We sent out a number of men to investigate the action of the army worm. We used poisonous remedies as in the case of grasshoppers, and also advocated the ploughing and digging of moderately deep trenches into which the army worm would fall when travelling across the ground—a mechanical method of fighting the pest. These suggestions on the part of the department have been found very helpful. We have also done excellent work in connection with the testing of various insecticides. As I have pointed out, the results in connection with the grasshopper work have been very satisfactory. It is estimated by the department that we have saved the farmers over $400,000 during the past season by suggesting cheaper remedies that were just as efficient as those that were used the year before. We are also carrying on inspection of nursery stock. We have fumigating plants at various points throughout the country—Vancouver; North Portal, Saskatchewan; Winnipeg; Windsor, Ontario; Niagara Falls; St. John, New Brunswick, and St. Johns, Quebec. All nursery stock coming from the United States must pass through these ports and is thoroughly fumigated before being released, our object being to prevent the introduction of the San Jose scale from the United States.

In connection with the botanical side, we are studying roots, vegetables and grains which are subject to the attacks of various fungi, and are disseminating such information in that regard as we are able to obtain from time to time. With regard to the increase of $10,000 this year, it is required to meet the re-classification, to provide for additional travelling expenses, additional expenses at our laboratories throughout the country, and also to carry on the corn borer work—of course, we cannot tell ahead of time how much this work will cost. The increase is necessary also to cover any emergency that may arise during the coming year.

We have been doing excellent work in combatting the cabbage maggot and the rose midge. All who are interested in agriculture know what a considerable amount of damage is done by the cabbage maggot. Shortly after the cabbage is planted it wilts and falls over, the result of the work of a little maggot which attacks the root, cuts off the stalk and ultimately destroys the plant. We handle that pest successfully by using a one to one-thousand solution of bichloride of mercury, or common corrosive sublimate. We estimate that we have saved the cabbage growers and rose growers of Canada during the past year over $100,000 by suggesting these remedies. We have also done good work in experimenting with and then advocating the use of dust applications to overcome these parasites, instead of the ordinary old-fashioned sprays. The dust applications are more efficient and cost less.

Mr. ROBB: Did I understand the minister to say that in certain sections of country where they were purchasing bran for mixing, to be used in the destruction of grasshoppers, the bran contained a very large percentage of sawdust?

Mr. TOLMIE: No, I said that by experiment we had discovered that we could fool the grasshoppers by substituting fifty per cent. sawdust, making a substantial saving.

Mr. GOULD: This question has been one of particular interest to the people of my district since 1918. In that year the southern part of the district was invaded by grasshoppers and for miles from the international boundary the crop was totally destroyed. Just about that time the Winnipeg strike was on, and we were therefore unable to secure supplies of arsenate of lead and Paris green for the purpose of destroying or preventing the spread of these insects which were coming into the district from North Dakota. We also found when we began to seek ways and means of combatting this evil that our departments in Canada were not as well advised of the necessary measures to adopt as were the experimental farms in North Dakota. As a matter of fact, two weeks before the information reached us from our own Department of Agriculture we got from the state of North Dakota and put into application the method of distribution of poisoned feeds over the affected areas. That is one reason why we are interested in seeing that means are provided whereby our scientific research department here may be able to carry on its work and find out the means of fighting these pests which attack our crops in the West. I myself am particularly interested because I have been affected to the extent of the loss of some thousands of dollars during the last three years. I have, however, much praise for our department on account of the hearty co-operation they gave the provincial authorities least year in combatting these evils. The increase of $10,000 in the Estimates this year should be commended by the committee. I brought this question up a few nights ago because I thought that the sum of $8,000 in the preceding item meant an increase in salaries for those who were devoting their time to research matters. I support the view that the policy of the Government should be one of retrenchment; yet after listening to the frequent declarations made by hon. members with regard to the importance of agriculture, I am somewhat disappointed to find that expenditures on agriculture are limited in the Estimates to approximately $5,000,000, while the expenditures for, say, the Department of Militia amount to $11,750,000. That is not bearing out in practice that which is preached in theory. If I were as big a man intellectually and physically as the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Finance would not frighten me; I would demand that agriculture receive its proper share of the appropriations. I have received many letters from my people in my constituency demanding a more equitable distribution of the funds available and asking that agriculture should receive its share. I repeat that our people heartily approve the efforts that are being put forth by the Department of Agriculture in an effort to combat the pests that are attacking our crops. I believe this evil is largely extant in our country because the minister is circumscribed in his sphere or in the amount of capital he has to invest in combatting it. While I am prepared to support a general policy of retrenchment, yet I believe the proportions are absolutely unfair to the great industry of agriculture in this country.

Mr. FOURNIER: I have a little bit of criticism to offer to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie), not that he is not spending money, but that he is not spending enough money for agricultural purposes. I have the same complaint as the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould) has. The amount spent yearly for the destruction of destructive insects is a miserable pittance, when we realize that parasites are destroying crops to an amount estimated at $125,000,000 yearly. The amount expended for good seed is altogether too small when one considers that an increase of one bushel per acre in Canada's crop would add about $80,000,000 to the country's wealth, and that is something worth considering. As regards the amount expended for agricultural instruction, it is a shame that such a small amount should be asked. In the midst of the social and economic battles which are being fought between nations in order to regain their equilibrium there is no more important and essential problem than that of agriculture. For the last six years, the great cry has been "Back to the land", that is to say, back to the economic truth. That cry has been heard by sound economists, bankers, railroad directors and business men generally, but what do we find? With such a small amount expended for agriculture, we find that the tide for the last thirty years has been flowing to the cities, and I submit, Sir, the more farmers, the more of everything,—railways, factories, towns, cities, churches, colleges, art schools, conservatories, music and all the apparatus and appurtenances of the highest civilization. The Government apparently does not desire such a condition, and with a lack of encouragement, the rural population is fast declining.

Agriculture should be the domain of high politics, politics of the first order, and I ask the minister, when he goes to the Council chamber, as solid as he is, to have the Estimates of his department approved, not to be too shy with his colleagues. If I were in his place, I would soon get a little money out of the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Militia, and the Minister of Railways and Canals. In private or in public affairs nothing goes forward if one is not able to display the necessary will, even to the point of being audacious. All those who work for the future must determine the scope of individual will and collective will as well. To move the collective will, politics should formulate, on essential points, principles and reforms that all groups must admit. It is necessary that vital questions should not fall the prey of faction, nor of ambitions. And vital questions are those which make national greatness and prosperity,—the moral value of population, social justice and material prosperity. To bring collective will to these questions, politics must bring forward sentiments and common interests, sentiments of generosity, justice and courage, interests of social and economic order. I commend these words to the minister.

Before resuming my seat, I wish to make a slight reference to a statement made by the hon. member for Dufferin (Mr. Best), when he was at his "best" yesterday evening. The hon. gentleman stated that many hon. gentlemen speak of farming when they know absolutely nothing about it. I must differ from that statement, so far as my part of the country is concerned. We closely observe the eleventh commandment which says: "Thou shalt mind thine own business." We do not care who goes on the land, whether it is an honourable judge, a lawyer, a physician, a notary or anyone else; in fact, we welcome anyone on the land, and we know that many things that are to-day employed in agriculture were not invented by farmers. The man who invented Paris green was a chemist, but Paris green is used extensively on the farm for the protection of the potato. The man who invented formalin is another chemist; and many presidents and officials of agricultural colleges do not farm for themselves. I commend these words to my hon. friend. I have not asked the minister for an experimental farm; I know he has not the money; but when he goes to the Council chamber and gets a little more money from his colleagues, if I am still a member of this House next year, he will hear from me when he comes before us with his Estimates again, if he has not more money to spend for agriculture.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am sure, after listening to the statement made by the Minister of Railways and Canals, (Mr. Reid) this afternoon, we must all feel that we cannot very consistently advocate an increase in expenditure for anything we can possibly get along without. I realize, however, that this is a very important item, and the work that can be done is certainly very great. I do not very often appropriate to myself credit for anything to which I am not entitled; but I believe if I have convinced the minister and the Government of the efficacy of bran for poisoning grasshoppers, I have done something during the time I have been in this House. If there is on hand any of the old bran, such as was used during the last few years, he should get a monopoly of it, put a little molasses on it and scatter it out. I think it will destroy most of the grasshoppers.

Perhaps the pest about which I wish to speak might more properly have come under the item which we have just passed. I refer to the white grub which is very prevalent in Ontario and which has destroyed vast areas of pasture land. I believe the department has an officer at Strathroy in East Middlesex. Can the minister give the committee any information as to the possibilities of combatting this pest that is destroying thousands of acres of the old pasture lands? In fact, the new land also that a few years ago was covered with a beautiful sod has been absolutely destroyed by this pest, and the land is now covered with weeds. I believe the white grub larvae is laid by what is commonly called the June bug, which we see flying around in such large numbers in the month of June. I think it would be well to have the experts inquire whether anything can be done to destroy this pest, and I should like to know what reports the minister has received on the matter from the officer at Strathroy, in which section of the country vast areas have been converted to grazing purposes during the past few years. This is a serious matter in those districts, because these lands have to be broken up and again brought under cultivation.

Mr. TOLMIE: I rgret I cannot give the hon. member any information as to the investigations that are now being carried on, but if this pest is creating as much trouble as my hon. friend says, I shall take steps to familiarize myself with the conditions at once, and see that such measures are taken as may be advisable under the circumstances. An investigation is going on, but I do not know just what stage it has reached.

Answering the question of my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Fournier), I am pleased to note he realizes the importance of agriculture in Canada. Certainly, there is a very great field for development. Agriculture, to use a western expression, "is Canada's one best bet." I might point out that while during the last five years our appropriations for agriculture have been in the neighbourhood of three millions a year, or slightly more, this year we are appropriating between five and six millions, which is a decided increase.

With regard to what my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Gould) has said about the grasshopper plague, we maintain a man in Manitoba at Treesbank and keep in close touch with the grasshopper work at all times. South of the line, where they have an earlier spring, it is only natural the Americans should get busy a little sooner than we do. So far as our staff is concerned, I think it is a very excellent one. It was organized by the late Dr. Hewitt, whose value was almost inestimable, but who unfortunately was lost to us by his untimely death about a year ago. He was making a reputation for himself throughout the whole world as one of its leading entomologists. He established our branch and brought it up to its present state of efficiency. We are doing our utmost to maintain that efficiency, and I am quite sure that the staff we have now will compare very favourably with that of any other similar branch in the world.

Mr. ROBB: Would the minister make a statement as to the duplication of work by the federal and provincial Departments of Agriculture? I notice in the minister's own publication, dated December, 1920, that full credit for combatting the grasshopper plague is given to the Department of Agriculture of the province of Saskatchewan. I gathered to-day from the minister that it was his department that did the work.

Mr. TOLMIE: I thought I was very clear in stating that we hade done this work in co-operation with the Provincial Governments. We maintain a staff of experts here in Ottawa who study these various insects, and are able to give very valuable information as to the methods that should be adopted. The life history of a number of parasites has been studied, because you must know their history before you can suggest any remedy. We have also assisted the provinces in experimental work with the various appliances, such as gas, the doser, and various insecticides. We also had men on the ground giving advice and studying the whole situation, and the provinces get the full benefit of any information they may gather.

Mr. ROBB: Are not the taxpayers in some cases paying the salaries of two men where one might do the work?

Mr. TOLMIE: Our men do the directing, and offer the results of the information they have gathered. There is no duplication of the staff we maintain here in any one of the provinces. The provinces carry out most of the work, and put up most of the expense.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): Do fumigation stations come under this heading?

Mr. TOLMIE: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): How many are there in Nova Scotia?

Mr. TOLMIE: None now; there used to be one at Digby. Our station is now located at St: John, N.B.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): I have been informed that plants coming from nurseries in the province of Ontario to Nova Scotia have to be sent to Digby to be fumigated. My own experience in getting roses for my garden has been that the insects are killed so effectually that the plants themselves are dead when they arrive. If this matter is not in the minister's department, I have nothing to say about it.

Mr. TOLMIE: There were stations at Digby and Truro, maintained in co-operation with the Provincial Government, but that agreement has expired, and we are not doing business at either of these points now. Our station in the Maritime Provinces is at St. John.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): Then plants coming to Nova Scotia from Ontario nurseries must first go to St. John, N.B., to be fumigated?

Mr. TOLMIE: Not necessarily. They can go direct to the purchaser in Nova Scotia, unless Nova Scotia provides otherwise. It is plants coming from the United States that we fumigate.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): I was speaking of plants coming from the city of Hamilton, in Ontario. I would suggest to the minister that if his department is going to continue that work, the most convenient point in Nova Scotia would be truro. It takes considerable time to send goods to Truro to Digby and back again to Truro, and then on to their destination. The plants are delayed so long on the way that it is injurious to them. I have not been able to understand how under the past arrangement Truro was not utilized instead of Digby, especially in shipments to eastern Nova Scotia.

Mr. TOLMIE: That inter-provincial trade is all taken care of by the Provincial Governments. I shall be very glad, however, to look into my hon. friend's suggestion with regard to Truro.

Mr. CURRIE: In the early part of this session members were deluged with a very alarming pamphlet about the prevalance of what is known as the bud worm in the spruce forests of Canada. As the exports of spruce products from this country amount to between forty and fifty million dollars a year, one would be led to believe by this pamphlet that in ten years all our forests would be destroyed. What department is that under? As we are now on an item which virtually covers it, may I ask if there is any department of the Government taking steps to stop that pest? I understand that it was in Quebec and is now in the Timiskaming region of Ontario. It is destroying the forest right and left, and I should like to know what, if anything, the Dominion Government is doing in the matter.

Mr. TOLMIE: There is at present a staff studying the spruce bud worm, and as soon as we have information available of any value we shall be glad to publish it. Indeed, we shall do that from time to time.

Mr. McDERMAND: What particular form of the European corn worm is affecting Ontario? This strikes me as a very important matter, and as a considerable quantity of seed is procured from affected districts to supply the rest of Ontario, it would be well to know whether the disease is conveyed in the seed.

Mr. TOLMIE: The European corn borer is a dangerous parasite and one that has created considerable alarm in the United States. We are alive to its importance, and I can assure my hon. friend that a staff is kept combatting it during the season. As regards its treatment, we advise cutting the crop as low as possible, cleaning up all debris and burning it, and then ploughing the land. The disease is not conveyed by the corn seed once it has been shelled, but there is a danger in shipping unshelled corn from affected districts. That, however, is prevented by our officers. We have been studying the question with care, and purpose giving it still closer study during the coming summer.

Mr. McDERMAND: I understand that those counties under quarantine are not allowed to ship seed at the present time. Will that regulation be continued?

Mr. TOLMIE: They are not allowed to ship seed on the cob. Future quarantines, I may say, will be enforced so long as we think the precaution necessary, that is to say, as developments occur.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am much obliged to the minister for the exhaustive information he has given us concerning the way in which he is battling with the farmers' enemies in the shape of insects. We have in Nova Scotia, and particularly in the part of the province from which I come, one enemy to which I shall now refer. There may be a special name for it in scientific nomenclature, but it is vulgarly known as the potato bug. It is a very destructive insect, and causes considerable damage. Is any progress being made towards exterminating this particularly troublesome pest, which largely destroys a splendid article of food? I know we have in Nova Scotia, under the provincial department of Agriculture, possibly with some assistance from the Dominion Government, demonstrators who go through the country showing the farmers how things can be done in various ways to improve agriculture; but I am not aware that they have been demonstrating any very effective means of wiping out this enemy of the farmer. When a man is advised to settle on the land in our part of the country he replies that he sees no good in going on the farm because, when he plants cabbages, or potatoes, these insects destroy them, rendering much hard labour absolutely futile, and that it is therefore not inviting to take up land. Now, we certainly want every man we can get to go on the farm, and we should put every means at his disposal to overcome these pests. I want to know especially what is being done to get rid of this potato bug. I understand that the germ stays in the soil from year to year, and perhaps some method might be found—I do not know whether any has been devised so far—of treating the soil in order to kill the germ. Perhaps the minister will inform the committee on this point.

Mr. TOLMIE: We give demonstrations in the use of both liquid and dust sprays to overcome fungoid diseases in potatoes, of which there are about half a dozen, and among other pests we encounter the potato bug. The treatment costs about a dollar or a little more per acre, including labour and material. What is known as the potato spraying machine is used; it covers several rows at a time. This particular pest cannot be controlled, so far as I know, by any treatment of the soil, but the other remedies I have mentioned, while not costly, are, I think, highly efficient.

Mr. DECHENE: The member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKENZIE), raised an interesting question in his reference to the potato bug, and I am sure the minister is aware of another potato disease, which is known in French as " la glande noire ". Last fall, in our part of Quebec, a large portion of the potato crop was lost as a result of this plague. Perhaps the minister will inform us what is being done by the Government in the way of co-operation with the provincial department of Agriculture in order to overcome, or at all events, to restrict, as far as possible, this harmful disease. Sometimes one takes up a potato that looks perfect, but on cutting it one finds several black rings in it. A farmer may store in the fall a crop of potatoes that have every appearance of soundness, but in a few months the whole thing begins to rot, and by January or February there is little of the crop left. If this plaugue is not checked, in Quebec and in other provinces as well, in a few years' time our potato output will be seriously diminished. I suppose the minister is aware of this trouble and if anything is being done by his department in the matter, I should like to have an assurance from him to that effect.

Mr. TOLMIE: In connection with these diseases, I may inform my hon. friend that we issue information from time to time. Furthermore, we have inspectors in the different districts who, besides giving information to the farmers, co-operate with the representatives of the departments of agriculture in the various provinces. These different varieties of rot are dealt with by proper spraying. In the first place, there is a careful selection of seed. which is examined for traces of the disease. Having assured yourself that you have good seed a rotation of crops should be followed so that you shall not next year plant potatoes on land that has been infected with one of these diseases. Place that land under some other crop and follow out a regular rotation. By following a rotation, adopting proper spraying, and making careful selection of the seed the matter can be remedied to a very great extent.

Mr. MICHAUD: Are there inspectors in the Maritime Provinces who are taking charge of importations of potato seed? Because sometines bad seed is brought in from the United States and it is highly desirable that our growers should be protected against such seed.

Mr. TOLMIE: We have a regular system of inspection of seeds, and the persons purchasing these seeds must protect themselves to the best of their ability, or consult our men and secure information from many of our establishments where they can get it for nothing. The information will be given to them freely and they will be instructed to purchase their seeds from those districts where good seed is procurable. There are certain sections of Canada where it is easily possible to obtain clean, pure seed, particularly in the newer districts—seed produced from plants grown on new land. By following the simple rules which I have indicated the farmer can protect himself fully. In addition to that we shall be glad at any time to furnish information in the shape of printed matter with regard to these potato diseases. To secure that information the farmer need only make application to the Central Experimental Farm.

Mr. CURRIE: I may say that the growing of potatoes is quite an industry in the riding which I represent, and it is a marked success. The Ontario Government have published a pamphlet on the growing of potatoes, describing how to take the seed and dip it in a solution that will destroy any germs that may be present in the seed. After the potatoes are planted, the growers are told how to treat them with solutions—for instance Bordeaux mixture and arsenate of lead. That is what they now employ largely instead of paris green where it is desired to grow potatoes in any quantity. The pamphlet referred to is an excellent one, and gives full particulars to anyone who wishes to grow potatoes. I do not know whether the pamphlet is published in French or not; nor I do not know whether the federal Department of Agriculture has published a pamphlet of a similar character. I believe they have issued one which is virtually the same. I am sure that the information given to the farmers in these pamphlets has increased the quantity of potatoes grown per acre fully fifty per cent. It is now known, after experimental work, that when potatoes have been treated several times with the common Bordeaux mixture there is no likelihood of danger to them at all, no matter what the soil conditions were previously. That shows the good work which has been done by these institutions to which I am alluding and speaks well for them. I have listened to a great deal of criticism from hon. members opposite with respect to the work of the Department of Agriculture since these Estimates have been under consideration. It is the first time in my experience in the House that a Minister of Agriculture has been criticized in this way or has been found fault with on account of the amount of money which he has expended. Now, I hope that no hon. member in this Chamber will find fault with the money spent in this direction. The Central Experimental Farm at Ottawa alone, by reason of its discovery of Marquis wheat has added some millions of dollars to the value of the grain crop of Canada; in fact it has yielded results that would pay for the cost of the farm more than a thousand times. Then, too, through the discovery of Banner oats by the Ontario Department of Agriculture, thousands of bushels of oats have been added to the oat acreage of Canada, and sufficient money derived therefrom to pay for the entire work of that department. I speak of the work performed by the department of the province of Ontario because I was associated for some time after I entered parliamentary life with the former Minister of Agriculture of the province, Hon. James Duff, who recently died. It may be a surprise to many members in this House to know that to the late Hon. James Duff is due the credit of establishing the system of district representatives which is resulting in so much good to the cause of agriculture not only in Canada but in the United States. The late Mr. Duff was the first Minister of Agriculture in the world to appoint district representatives. He took young men from college and placed them in various sections of the country so that there would be one in each district. These young men selected experimental plots; they taught the farmers how to spray their apples, how to grow corn, how to spray their potatoes, how to judge their cattle; and so they caused a revolution in the work of agriculture throughout the province of Ontario. The initiation of that work was due to the late Mr. Duff, when he was Minister of Agriculture for Ontario. I want that justice to be done to his memory; I want it known that he was the man who initiated that system. It was so good a system that it has been copied all over the United States. You cannot take up any American paper but you will read about these district representatives and the wonderful work they have done. All this work was first begun in the province of Ontario. Then the system of co-operation amongst the farmers was first put into effect in the province of Ontario. Hon. Mr. Duff established farmers' clubs where the farmers could meet and talk together and inaugurate co-operative marketing and work of that character. I am very sorry to say that after these clubs were instituted some people, more influenced by politics than common sense, turned the majority of these organizations into political clubs instead of retaining them as farmers' clubs which they formerly were. It never was intended by Mr. Duff when he established the farmers' clubs that they should become centres of discontent. I know that other clubs have been established throughout the country. The West has followed the footsteps of Ontario, and in many cases they have gone one better. The knowledge that is being disseminated through the various provinces is owing to the efforts of students who have passed through the College of Agriculture of Ontario. Take the United States and you can scarcely go to a state and ask "who founded this agricultural college?" but you will be told "so-and-so from the Ontario College of Agriculture." These men have led the way in the development of agricultural knowledge and work, and not sufficient credit has been given to them. They did not work for any political purpose; they worked to benefit humanity and to promote the interests of the farmer. To-day there is a great deal of outcry about the "poor farmer." We have had politicians going all through the country, especially in my own riding, crying out, "Oh, the poor farmer; the farmer has such a poor time farming in Ontario." Now the province of Ontario produces more farming wealth than any other province, and yet what happens? The late Minister of Agriculture for Canada stated not long ago that the farms of Ontario were deserted by the agriculturists, that the farmers were all going to the city. I say that is not true. The agriculturists from Ontario have gone West. The young man from the Ontario farm has shown his mettle in the West, and if you see a good farmer in the West you can depend upon it he is a young man from Ontario. That is where the surplus population from Ontario has gone. We do not begrudge the West those men. There is a certain amount of the population who will go to the city no matter what you do for them. I may say this for the benefit of the hon. gentleman who was the former Minister of Agriculture that I have for some time been taking the Fabian pamphlets published by the Socialists in London, and in one pamphlet after another and as a means of causing discontent among the farmers you find this question of rural depopulation raised. In fact the English socialists, the reds, over there are trying to cause all the trouble they can amongst the rural population of England. I wish further to say that the farms of Ontario and of the West would be worth exactly one hundred per cent more than they are to-day if we had less of these "whining Willies" going around and crying out about the poor farmer. The farmer organizations in the United States do not discuss such questions and cry aloud what poor people they are. Take the price of farm land in Wisconsin or Ohio—I have been in those states within the past few months—and take the price of farm land in the province of Ontario, which is nearer to good markets, and is superior to any kind of farms they have got over there. What do you find? You find farms in Ohio and Wisconsin selling at $300 an acre; but you do not find farms in Ontario selling at half that figure.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend forgets the difference in population.

Mr. CURRIE: There is no difference whatever. I have been on those farms and know their size and quality; they are not any larger or better than any we have in Ontario.

Mr. ROBB: They have a larger market

Mr. CURRIE: Nothing of the kind. The best farmers' market in the world is in the city of Toronto.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CURRIE: Hon. members may laugh, but I know; I live in the city of Toronto and I have to pay the price. Why, in Toronto eggs are always higher than they are in Chicago or in Buffalo; and so with the price of potatoes and other farm produce—there is a market right at the farmers' door. Everything he produces he can find a ready sale for in Hamilton, Toronto and other large centres. To my mind the man who goes around drawing a long face for the farmers of Ontario is wasting his time, and I think if a little more boosting was done for those farmers in regard to their land, cattle and crops it would be much better for them than the shedding of all these tears. These tears are simply for the purpose of boosting some political party. If you go along the roads and look at the fine brick farm houses and bank barns, you will discover on inquiry that their owners are not politicians, they are usually men supporting this side of the House; but if you find a tumbledown farmhouse and a barn with the roof off you may be certain that the owner is going around the country talking politics all the time.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that we are discussing item 42.

Mr. CURRIE: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman. I suppose we should come back to the bug question. I was dealing with political bugs rather than the bugs that are so destructive to our farmers. I do not think that the Minister of Agriculture has yet found a cure for the political bug, but I hope the farmers themselves will apply the proper remedy. The work done by the Dominion Department of Agriculture and the provincial departments of agriculture is not overlapping. The two departments work together in Ontario. There is the experimental department, and there are also the demonstration farms which are controlled by the Ontario Government. There is lots of room for improvement in every direction, and the less groaning and wailing there is about the lot of the farmer the happier he will be and the more work he will do. Why all this shouting about the sad condition the farmer is in to-day? We are told that a farmer will say: I am only going to put half my land under crop this year. What a terrible thing to cause all this outcry! I think it is a crime to allow bugs to grow either of the political or of the field kind; and it seems to me that the sooner we "get down to brass tacks" so far as the farmer is concerned and leave him a chance to speak for himself, and not have the grain speculators speak for him, the better it will be for the country at large.

Mr. MOLLOY: I would advise the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) to allow the Minister of Agriculture to speak for himself. I am sure the minister does not object to wholesome criticism of his Estimates, and I think if the hon. member will consult him he will say that he has been fairly used; and we on this side of the House all agree that we have been fairly used. We are asking for certain information in the interest of the people of this country, and my hon. friend in his tirade about our criticism of the minister is wasting time in saying nothing when he might have remained silent and allowed the minister to give us the information asked for. He has been making a sort of manufacturers' speech and attacking the farmers. The farmers are interested in what the Minister of Agriculture has put forth; the manufacturers are not interested to the same extent. So far as the province of Ontario is concerned, one would think, after listening to the hon. member, that that province was the whole earth. Now, Ontario may produce the finest looking men, the most beautiful women, the best horses, so on and so forth, but there are other places in the Dominion of Canada; there is the Great West and there is Eastern Canada. Some people run away with the idea that because they are from the province of Ontario that is the whole thing. I want to tell my hon. friend that although I was born in that province, there are farmers in the other provinces just as good as any man who ever came from the province of Ontario.

Mr. MAHARG: No doubt hon. members will expect me to talk about political bugs, but that is not the subject before the House at the present time. The hon. member for North Simcoe has sown a little seed about political bugs. Well, we will let them germinate, and when the proper time comes we will deal with that particular kind of bug. A few minutes ago the minister informed the committee that he had lost the services of a very valuable man in connection with the work that this item has reference to. I wonder if he would care to express his opinion as to just why he lost that very valuable official?

Mr. TOLMIE: Mr. Chairman, the official died.

Mr. MAHARG: I am sorry that is the answer. Still, there are other officials that the minister has lost from different causes. I have been looking over these Estimates; and while, Mr. Chairman, it may be a little out of order, yet the loss of officials of this department probably is of interest in connection with any of the items covered by the Estimates of the minister's department. I find that the salaries paid to officials and other employees in this department are very discouraging indeed. In one instance, where I think there can be no difference whatever in the character or degree of the work, I find that filing clerks in some other departments are paid $360 per year more than they are paid in this department. Has the minister anything to say at all in fixing the salaries of his staff?

Mr. TOLMIE: Mr. Chairman, as I pointed out yesterday, these salaries are fixed by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MAHARG: You have nothing to say in the way of recommending increases to the staff to make the salaries equal to those of officials in other departments doing similar work?

Mr. TOLMIE: As a minister I do not have any recommendations to make in regard to those salaries, they are fixed by the Civil Service Commission. In fact, I think you will find that it is rather against the law for the minister to take any steps along those lines.

Item agreed to.

Dairying, $175,000.

Mr. LEGER: I would like some information as to the disposition of this amount. In New Brunswick, we have several butter and cheese factories, and in the interests of the whole country I would like to see more of those factories in operation. We have one such factory in my county, not far from where I live, and it is doing very good work. In Moncton there is a co-operative dairy establishment which makes the butter for parts of the counties of Kent, Albert and Westmoreland. It is a great enterprise, and deserves much credit for the work which it is doing. I think we should encourage as much as possible the butter and cheese industries all through the province. I would like to know whether this vote is to encourage such industries, or is it simply to pay the butter inspectors who travel around the country?

Mr. TOLMIE: Last year the value of our dairy products was $252,000,000, the largest, I think, in the history of the country. The Dairy Branch is under the supervision of Mr. J. A. Ruddick, a man well known to dairymen all over Canada; a man whose reputation as an expert is world-wide. The showing for this year is, I think, very creditable indeed. As to the work which is carried on, I may say that we maintain at Finch, Ontario, an establishment for the manufacture of dairy products under ordinary commercial conditions, and I am pleased to say that this establishment, although Government-owned, pays a profit. We also have men who are engaged in promoting the cow-testing associations throughout the country. As hon. members are aware, no one can tell the yield of a cow by looking at her; very often a farmer, even one who is an expert, may be under the impression that his best cows are his fattest ones. When he takes advantage of these testing operations, he is in a position to know from which cows he is getting the best results, and may then profitably discard those which do not come up to what he considers to be a fair standard for profit. That line of work has done splendid service for the dairy industry, not only on this continent but also in Europe, particularly in Denmark, where it has been very thoroughly followed out. Down in New Brunswick we have men travelling about and promoting these various cow testing associations; Mr. Gaudet is one of them. The creameries and dairy organizations are under the supervision of the various provincial governments. We have a butter grader at the Port of Montreal, and we have five representatives in Great Britain, which is our best dairy market. We are doing all we can to ensure that our dairy products sold overseas shall be of the highest possible standard. We feel that when we are in competition with such countries as Denmark and Ireland we must maintain a high standard for our products if we are to be successful. In connection with the butter grading at the port of export, it is our intention to take steps to provide for an increased production and to ensure the better carrying on of the work. We propose also to appoint a dairy demonstrator, a person who will travel about the country from place to place demonstrating the value of dairy products as food, in comparison with other foods ordinarily found on the table. This person will also give demonstrations and exhibitions, make exhibits of dairy products or assist in making them, with a view to giving the consumer the fullest possible information as to the value of the products of the cow. This has been very successfully done in other countries. We are also carrying on practical experiments and investigations with regard to the various forms of manufacture. We propose to begin as soon as possible the manufacture of certain lines of cheese that are now generally imported—lines that are a little out of the ordinary; lines that we pay a very high price for in this country and which can be produced here just as well as in other countries. We feel that this will be a distinct encouragement to the dairy industry. We also carry on a system of cargo inspection at Montreal and Halifax. We administer the Dairy Act and the Oleomargarine Act. During the past year the convictions made for violations of the Oleomargarine Act were 12 in number and those in connection with the Dairy Act, 128; in 1919 the figures were 8 and 111 respectively. We also issue daily market reports, so as to give full information to the producer regarding the condition of the markets from time to time. We make arrangements with the railways to assist producers in securing a refrigerator car service. This department also handles a cold storage system under the cold storage bonuses that are given, which are referred to in an item to be taken up later. That, roughly, is the scope of the work carried on by the Dairy Branch. When you compare the value of the total dairy output for the year, $252,000,000, with the very modest appropriation asked for by the Department of Agriculture in connection with dairy work, you will agree that the proposed expenditure is not extravagant. It should also be remembered that we have something like 3,500,000 cows in this country which average less than 4,000 pounds each of milk a year. If that average was brought up to 7,000 pounds a year, the value of our dairy products would be tremendously increased. Nothing can render better service along this line than the cow testing associations and the improvement of our sires as carried out by the Live Stock Branch.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Will the minister explain just what he means by cow-testing associations?

Mr. TOLMIE: A cow-testing association is an association organized by one of our representatives, the object being to offer to the farmer an opportunity whereby, under certain conditions, he can send samples of milk to a creamery with which our department has already made an arrangement, and have that milk tested from time to time as to its butter-fat content. In that way, he is able to eliminate cows that are low in butter-fat. Some cows will run as low as 2 per cent in butter fat in the summer time when they are on the grass, in the flush-flow of milk. Some cows will give as high as 6 per cent of butter fat. By weighing his milk daily and marking the weight down in a chart, and by having that milk tested from time to time, the farmer is able to move out from his herd or dispose of in some other way cows that are unprofitable for the dairy business. By the use of a good sire and by the selection of his best cows, he can often double, in a short time, the output of his herd.

Mr. PROULX: Are those tests carried out at experimental farms or illustration stations?

Mr. TOLMIE: This testing is done throughout the country. We make arrangements with creameries in almost every district where cow-testing associations are established.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): I do not rise to criticize in any way the appropriations for which the minister is asking, because I think, in view of the work which he has outlined and which I know is being accomplished, the appropriation is a very modest one. I should like, however, to ask him if he has anything in view for the coming year as to the grading of cheese at the point of export?

Mr. TOLMIE: We are grading cheese at Montreal now, and we propose to extend the work in the near future.

Mr. CALDWELL: What steps will a farmer in any locality have to take in order to get a cow-testing association?

Mr. TOLMIE: If he will be good enough to drop a line to Mr. Ruddick, Dairy Commissioner, Mr. Ruddick will be very pleased to furnish full information; or the hon. member could write to Mr. Gaudet, who is in his own province.

Mr. DECHENE: The minister has just stated that our best market is in England. How much butter was exported to Great Britain during last season?

Mr. TOLMIE: I am sorry I can not give that off hand.

Mr. DECHENE: Can the minister state about how many million pounds approximately?

Mr. TOLMIE: About 10,000,000 pounds.

Mr. DECHENE: Do we export more to the United States than to Great Britain?

Mr. TOLMIE: No, our greatest field of export is Great Britain.

Item agreed to.

Cold storage warehouses, $26,000.

Mr. LEGER: Regarding cold storage, I should like to have from the minister some explanation in reference to a certain delegation which came from the Maritime Provinces last year and which was attended by many members from those provinces. Their application was to be looked into and a further report was to be made. Has anything been done in reference to the matter since that time? At that time, I was appointed one of a committee; but I am sorry to say that I was never invited by the chairman to attend any meetings of the committee and, therefore, I am not supposed to know if anything has been done in the matter. Cold storage is a matter which should be taken into serious consideration in the interest of the Maritime Provinces. The other day members for several provinces invited the minister to visit their districts and see how the matter stands. I would extend an invitation to the minister to visit the Maritime Provinces in order to see the situation in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. I think he could make up his mind in a short time that they are entitled to some consideration as regards cold storage, and they would be treated in that regard to an extent that, I think, would be only reasonable to all concerned.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Before the minister answers the hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. Leger)—the other day I drew the attention of the House to the question of refrigerator cars for the transportation of fish; but as we are now discussing this item, I am reminded that some years ago my hon. friend's predecessor, the Hon. Sydney Fisher, had organized a system of refrigerators for use in the fishing districts of the country. I do not know how those establishments have fared; but from complaints which I have received from the Gulf of St. Lawrence, it seems that they have not been a success. During the last few months, probably during the last two years, some gentlemen have organized co-operative societies in my county, the county of Gaspé, and I believe that if the organization already in the department for the establishment of those freezers, was transferred to those co-operative societies, perhaps they might be more successful in their operation than they have been in the past. This is a matter of great interest for the fishing communities of the counties of Gaspé and Bonaventure, and the north shore of the St. Lawrence. In those refrigerators they can do two things—preserve the bait when the bait is abundant and, preserve the fish until it is shipped either by cars or by boat to centres such as Quebec, Montreal, Three Rivers and even as far as Toronto and Central Canada generally. On the coast of Gaspé, there are times when, as I stated a moment ago, herring, which is used as bait, or squid, is very abundant; but as they come by schools, they also disappear by schools, and then the fishermen are running about to get bait in order to catch fish which is always very abundant on the banks nearby. It is proposed to have those freezers as reservoirs for the bait of the fishermen in case of need, so that, as operations do not last long, because the seasons are short in that part of the gulf of St. Lawrence, the fishermen will be given an opportunity of going on steadily with their fishing operations; and, second, the consumption of our fish in the centres of Canada will be encouraged. If fish can be kept fresh where it is caught and can be easily shipped, it would be to the advantage of the consumer. Fish is a very wholesome article of food, and I notice with pleasure that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has instituted a Fish Day for Canada. Of course, we who belong to the Roman Catholic church have our weekly fish day, and we know that a fish diet is very wholesome, not only from the religious, but also from the physical point of view. The consumption of fish ought to be encouraged, but if we wish to encourage its use as a food all over Canada the Government must be prepared to help the fishermen, and have the fishing community use refrigerators such as were started a few years ago by the Department of Agriculture, but which for some reason or other were not a success. I think that now, in view of the existence of these co-operative societies, which in the long run will be a great success with our people, the department would do well to consider whether it would not be feasible to adapt their machinery for refrigeration purposes to those of the co-operative societies.

Mr. TOLMIE: Coming from a seacoast province I fully agree with what the hon.

gentleman has said concerning fish as a food and its desirability on the table, but I think the matter he refers to really comes within the purview of the Department of Marine and Fisheries rather than that of Agriculture. Under our Cold Storage Act as amended some time ago, our assistance is only given to municipally-owned cold storage plants. With regard to what my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. Leger) had to say with reference to the establishment of a cold storage plant in the Maritime Provinces, at Halifax, I am sorry that he was not included on the committee at that time. The committee, I thought, was selected very carefully. Did I understand him to say that he had received no intimation from the chairman?

Mr. LEGER: That is it.

Mr. McMASTER: He was chosen but not called.

Mr. TOLMIE: We have looked into this matter vary carefully. We sent representatives of the Live Stock Branch to the Maritime Provinces to look into the supply of live stock that would be necessary to maintain a cold storage plant and abattoir. We found on investigation that the volume of the supply would not be sufficient, and on the recommendation of our Live Stock Commissioner we have assisted in the co-operative marketing of livestock down there, and in stimulating its production. Marketing is one of our principal features, because I have always felt that farmers will produce if they believe they can sell at a reasonable profit. We hope that just as soon as the volume increases sufficiently to warrant it, a cold storage plant may be established in some spot in that section of the country. When we take into consideration the export of dressed beef, there is no doubt that a large cold storage plant situated down there would be of the greatest importance. It has been suggested that cattle raised in Alberta and the Prairie Provinces should be loaded on cars and slaughtered at Atlantic Ports, but I have not yet received sufficient information to convince me that that would be a success. There are a good many objections. In the first place, a finished steer on the prairies will dress out about 60 per cent. of beef, so on every steer weighing only one thousand pounds—and that would be a light steer—there would be 400 pounds of by-product, which might just as well be kept in the West. But undoubtedly if shipments became general, we would need a cold storage plant in that section of the country as an assembling plant before loading on the ships. I have known one well-known western shipper of dressed beef, located in Calgary, who had to return a whole train load of beef to Montreal to have it properly iced and taken care of because it did not connect with the vessel on the Atlantic. I can assure my hon. friend that we are studying that situation and its prospects. At the present time with the prevailing price of beef, we cannot overlook the competition of the Argentine. They are able to produce beef very much more cheaply than we can. We are quite alive to the subject, however, and as soon as there is a sufficient volume of business, I shall be glad to assist in the establishment of a cold storage plant in that part of the country.

Mr. LEGER: The explanation given by the minister, that the available supply would not be sufficient to justify the establishment of a cold storage plant, is satisfactory. I think, however, that everything should be done to encourage the farmers in that part of the country, and I am sure that a cold storage plant there would encourage the production of beef. The production of beef cannot very well be increased at the present time, because we have not the facilities for receiving the meat. However, I am glad to learn that in a very short while when the available supply has increased, the minister will be glad to assist the farmers in that part of the country. I am sure that his statement will greatly encourage them.

Mr. TOLMIE: I might point out that any municipality, such as Halifax, can obtain assistance now from the Federal Government, to the extent of 35 per cent, in building a cold storage plant.

Mr. MICHAUD: Have you only one cold storage in the whole Maritime Provinces?

Mr. DUFF: Do I understand the minister to say that under the Act assistance is given to the establishment of cold storage plants, but not to those intended for fish or fish products? If the plant that is contemplated to be built at Halifax is built, would it not be able to take care of the products of the sea? I should like to know whether under our present Act the minister cannot assist in the establishment of a cold storage plant for fish purposes?

Mr. TOLMIE: Under our present Act we are only granting assistance to municipalities. Some of them, I understand, do store fish. At all events, they can store anything they want in the way of fish. Unless an establishment is municipally controlled, wo do not give a grant. There is one firm down on the Atlantic that is asking for a grant. It applied for a grant before the war, but after receiving permission they were not able to fill their part of the contract owing to war conditions. That matter has been given favourable consideration, I understand, and they are going ahead but have not signed up as yet.

Mr. DUFF: Is that the business in North Sydney, Cape Breton?

Mr. TOLMIE: Yes.

Mr. DUFF: What grant will the Government give towards the establishment of that cold storage?

Mr. TOLMIE: About 35 per cent of the cost of the plant, on condition that it meets with the approval of our commissioner.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): I am sorry to hear the minister say that the grant is available only to municipally-owned cold storages, because we have in Saskatchewan what is known as the Saskatchewan Creameries Limited, owned by the farmers co-operative concern, and they also provide a cold storage plant in connection with the creameries. I am a believer in public utilities, and when a municipality is slow to go into that business and a number of people co-operate and start enterprises of this kind, I think the minister should consider very seriously aiding such enterprises, because the idea of co-operation is spreading throughout Canada to-day. I trust the minister will seriously consider this matter. Does he think that the amount asked for, of $26,000, is sufficient to encourage the building of cold storage plants?

Mr. TOLMIE: The present Act was not always confined to municipalities, and in previous years we made grants in Saskatchewan, one in Moosejaw, one in Regina, one in Saskatoon, and one in Vonda. With regard to the appropriation asked for now, we are of opinion, judging from past years, that it will be sufficient to meet the present situation.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): Have the Saskatchewan Co-operative Creameries Ltd. asked for any moneys in connection with the cold storage plant being built at Yorkton?

Mr. TOLMIE: No.

Mr. DECHENE: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: It is now six o'clock.

Mr. DECHENE: I desire to point out that the item is not carried.

[Mr. Tolmie.]

The CHAIRMAN: No.

At six o'clock the committee rose and the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Mr. DUFF: With regard to cold storage, in looking over the report of the Minister of Agriculture I noticed that under an Order in Council passed on May 26th, 1919, the payment of subsidies under the Act is limited to public cold storage warehouses directed and operated by the municipality, or other governing body. I understood from what the minister told me that a cold storage warehouse that was being erected or has been erected in Cape Breton is receiving aid. I wondered if that Order in Council had been rescinded, or under what statute the thirty-five per cent of the cost of this cold storage plant was being paid by the department.

Mr. TOLMIE: The authority given under the old Cold Storage Act was not limited to municipalities, but about two years ago, I think, the Act was changed so as to apply to municipally-owned plants. Previous to that time this aid was given to privately owned plants.

Mr. DUFF: I understood that the cold storage plant in Cape Breton is a new concern, and that it is only now being erected.

Mr. TOLMIE: As I explained before dinner, this concern made application under the provisions of the Act and the application had been accepted previous to the war. Owing to the war conditions they were not able to carry out their plans. We have decided to allow them to go ahead, but up to the present they have not, I understand, signed up.

Mr. DUFF: What is the name of the concern?

Mr. TOLMIE: I am sorry I cannot give the name off-hand, but I will be very pleased to get the information for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DUFF: Can the minister give some information as to the objects of these cold storage plants?

Mr. TOLMIE: I understand they are for all the ordinary purposes of cold storage —the storage of fresh fish, fruit, beef, eggs and other food commodities.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queen's, P.E.I.): There is a reference in the minister's report to an arrangement that is being made with the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, with respect to a cold storage plant. Is the arrangement with them on the same principle as in the case of the cold storage plant in North Sydney?

Mr. TOLMIE: The cold storage plant being constructed in Montreal by the Harbour Commissioners is not receiving any assistance from us.

Item agreed to.

Fruit, $145,000.

Mr. LEGER: I would like to know from the minister what this item is for. If it is intended for the purchase of fruit we on this side have not yet received any. However, I suppose the vote is for the purpose of encouraging fruit growing, but I would like to have some explanation in reference to it.

Mr. TOLMIE: This vote covers district fruit inspection, the travelling expenses of the fruit inspectors, office help, and certain experiments that we are carrying on in connection with cold storage fruit cars. We made some experiments last year in carrying fruit from British Columbia to eastern points. In doing so we used the ordinary brine tank car and we found that by making very simple changes it was very suitable for the carrying of fruit. We are also making demonstrations in various ways with regard to the production of fruit, and we are issuing market reports. During the shipping season from the Maritime Provinces we keep in close touch with the British market by cable, and we issue these market reports to all the people interested in shipping to that export market, which reports have been found of the greatest possible assistance. We are also helping to organize co-operative selling associations. Then there are expenses in connection with administering the Fruit Market and Sales Act. It will be remembered that last session we passed an Act regulating fruit packages and we hope in a very short time that small fruit packages will be of uniform size throughout the Dominion. We are rendering general assistance in every possible way to the industry, but particularly in helping along the successful marketing of our fruit products. We are also engaged in demonstrating the best methods of packing and spraying, as I have already described, and assisting in the exhibition of our fruits in various places where we think it might tend to promote the sale of our fruit. Last year we had a meeting of fruit inspectors from all over Canada at which fruit conditions in the various provinces were fully considered. We find that this bringing together of representatives of fruit associations from different parts of Canada at intervals has had a very excellent effect in assisting in the sale of Canadian fruit, while a general discussion of the conditions with respect to fruit growing and packing all over Canada has been highly beneficial.

Mr. DUFF: Will the minister give us the names of the fruit inspectors for the province of Nova Scotia?

Mr. CHISHOLM (Inverness): And also where they are located?

Mr. TOLMIE: The inspectors for the Maritime Provinces are: A. S. Alcorn, Berwick, Nova Scotia; W. S. Potts, St. John, New Brunswick. The temporary inspectors are: S. C. Dimmock, Windsor, Nova Scotia; A. H. Milner, Annapolis Royal, N.S.; A. T. Morse, Bridgetown, N.S.; F. B. Westcott, Gaspéreau, N.S.; W. J. Sangster, Falmouth, N.S.; J. B. Wilson, Waterville, N.S.; G. E. Hutchinson, Morristown, N.S.; G. A. LeCain, Annapolis Royal, N.S.; R. B. Neily, Middleton, N.S.; H. G. Woodworth, Berwick, N.S.; H. F. East, Melvern Sq., N.S.; S. B. Marshall, Clarence, N.S.; G. H. Ruffee, Wolfville, N.S.; W. P. Fox, Lower Gagetown, N.B.

Mr. DUFF: These inspectors seem to be all located in two counties.

Mr. MICHAUD: They are all in Nova Scotia.

Mr. DUFF: And New Brunswick; but I am speaking of Nova Scotia. I notice practically all these inspectors are located in the two counties of Annapolis and King's. It is quite true that perhaps the greater proportion of the fruit grown in Nova Scotia comes from those counties; but while I do not want to boast of my own county, still I think the minister must know that the county of Lunenburg is renowned for its fruit, and its quality is as good as that of the fruit grown in Annapolis and King's, although the quantity perhaps is not as large. It seems to me that we should have at least one inspector in my county, in justice to the fruit growers there.

Mr. TOLMIE: While these men happen to be located in these two counties as their home centres, their activities are by no means confined to those particular sections; they travel all through the province and visit every district where they can render active service to the fruit growers.

Mr. DUFF: That explanation leaves a little food for thought. I was just wondering whether these men were appointed by the Civil Service Commission or under the old patronage system, for it seems rather strange that they should all be located in the two counties, although they have to travel all over the province. It would be cheaper for the country and be more satisfactory to the fruit growers to have those inspectors distributed throughout the province; for instance, there should be one or two located in the county of Lunenburg and one or two in the county represented by the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. McMASTER: They grow tomatoes in that country.

Mr. DUFF: That was in the old days. But a great deal of fruit is grown in several counties besides Annapolis and King's, and I would suggest to the minister the desirability of seeing if those inspectors cannot be located in various centres in the province instead of being all grouped together in one or two counties. While I am not speaking for my own county particularly, I may say that we have three or four fruit warehouses and have shipped thousands of barrels of apples to the Old Country, and it seems to me that we are entitled to at least one inspector in the county of Lunenburg. By distributing their inspectors throughout the province the department would save a great deal of expense incurred by their men travelling to and from their present centres. Looking over the list of the amounts paid last year for travelling expenses, I find that Mr. Alcorn's were $1,069.86, Mr. DeVany's $112.05, Mr. Harri's $608.45, Mr. Le Cain's $693.81, Mr. Milner's $581.42, Mr. Neily's $484.70, Mr. Vroom's $1,556.80, and Mr. Woodworth's $777.50. These were men located in Annopolis county. I think the minister will agree with me that that money was practically wasted, because if these men were located throughout the province their travelling expenses to and from points within their respective districts would be practically nil. There is between $7,000 and $8,000 expended by these men in travelling from King's and Annapolis counties all over the province (and that money might just as well have been saved. I would suggest to the minister taking up the matter with the Civil Service Commission or the patronage committee, whichever it is, with a view to seeing if these men cannot be sent back to their farms and other men appointed in every county. That is the practical and businesslike way, and it would be in the interest of the fruit industry and of the country. Does not the minister think my suggestion a valuable one?

Mr. TOLMIE: I have made a note of the hon. member's suggestion. I may point out that nearly all of these men were appointed by the Civil Service Commission, and I presume that that commission selected them for their ability in their particular line of work. Naturally, those two counties being very largely engaged in fruit growing, the most able and experienced men would be easily secured in those particular sections. The fruit inspectors would visit those points in the province where the big crops were being grown so that they would have an opportunity for demonstration work in the way of spraying, packing, and so on. They do not devote their time to the counties in which they are located, but travel around so that they may give the fullest possible service whereever they are required in the province. With the present high cost of travel it is almost impossible to avoid a certain amount of expense in connection with the activities of these inspectors. However, I will look closely into the details, and if an improvement can be made I shall be very glad to follow the hon. member's suggestion.

Mr. DUFF: The minister said a moment ago that he thought these men were appointed by the Civil Service Commission because of their ability and knowledge of the fruit business, gained in their home counties. I want to say that in other counties in Nova Scotia there are just as capable men in the fruit growing business. I cannot understand how three commissioners sitting in the Hunter building in Ottawa can pick out men in Annapolis and King's who are thoroughly qualified to inspect fruit in the province of Nova Scotia. To my mind the minister or his deputy is the right and proper man to pick out these inspectors, and not Dr. Roche, Mr. Jameson and Col. Larochelle. The quicker we get back to first principles in the appointment of these men the better it will be for this country. I do not know how these inspectors were chosen, but their selection seems rather strange, and if the Civil Service Commission advertised in the proper way I do not understand how only men from King's and Annapolis were appointed. In fact, I am very doubtful if there was not some underhand work in their appointment.

Mr. DOUGLAS: No, no.

Mr. DUFF: I can quite understand the prospective senator from the West saying "no, no." I hope he will very soon be able to say "yes, yes," in the other Chamber. I think the minister understands that this is rather a serious business. Last year, something like $7,000 was paid in travelling expenses—not salaries—for these men to get to and from their respective home counties to other parts of Nova Scotia. That is bad business, and I think the minister should have a change made and so save a large sum of money to the taxpayers of this country. Wherever fruit is grown, in any county, that county should have an inspector, instead of all the inspectors being grouped as at present in the two counties of Annapolis and King's. I trust that the minister will look into the matter and see that this state of affairs is remedied.

Mr. MAHARG: We are not large producers of fruit in the Prairie Provinces, but we have felt the need of an inspector in connection with our purchases. Has the minister given that much consideration?

Mr. TOLMIE: Inspectors who work actively in the field during the summer are at work in the markets inspecting fruit in the winter.

Mr. MAHARG: In markets from which the fruit is sold, or where it is delivered to the consumer?

Mr. TOLMIE: Where is it delivered to the consumer?

Mr. MAHARG: We have had great difficulty in the West in getting in touch with these inspectors. We have had some shipments of fruit, over which, I am sure, there was not much supervision while the packing was being done. How are these inspectors distributed throughout the West?

Mr. TOLMIE: We have three at Winnipeg, one at Calgary, one at Saskatoon, one at Brandon, one at Edmonton, four in British Columbia.

Mr. MAHARG: I notice that the two great consuming provinces in which there is little fruit produced have no inspectors at all. I suggest that the minister at least arrange for an inspector at each of the large centres from which the fruit is distributed.

Mr. LEGER: The minister may have named some inspectors who are working in New Brunswick, but so many of them were stated to be in Nova Scotia that I thought they were all there. I hope that he will take into consideration the needs of our province in this respect.

Mr. TOLMIE: We have one inspector at St. John and one at Gagetown.

Mr. McMASTER: Throughout the Eastern Townships orchards have been diminishing in number during recent years. We have had some extremely severe winters which have been very hard on the trees. Would it be possible, by experiments conducted throughout the Eastern Townships, to determine what trees are best suited to the hills of that part of the country? It occurs to me that very valuable advice in this connection might be given by the Experimental Farm. The farm sent me some trees which they developed recently, some new varities which I am trying in my own orchard, and I wonder whether this plan could not be extended somewhat in order that it might be ascertained what kind of tree is best suited for that part of the country.

Mr. TOLMIE: If the hon. gentleman will apply to the Central Experimental Farm he will receive full information. At Lennoxville and at Morden, Manitoba, we are carrying on experiments with a view to producing hardy fruits for those sections of the country where fruit does not thrive under ordinary conditions. We have a man scouting through Northern Canada on the lookout for hardy varieties of trees which can be crossed with softer varieties so as to produce a hard variety that will withstand the more severe weather conditions. The United States has for some time had a man in our northern country engaged in similar work.

Mr. FAFARD: Upon examining the Auditor General's report I find that an amount of $70 was paid to Roger Gagnon, Rivière du Loup, for "travelling expenses" Of course, we cannot grow fruit in Quebec as it is grown in British Columbia, but in some parts of my county fruit growing is quite extensively carried on. I can quite understand that in having a Minister of Agriculture from British Columbia we have to pay for a little, but I think we are at least entitled to our share in this matter.

Mr. CHISHOLM: On looking over the Auditor General's report I find the names of a number of persons working in one county under the Destructive Insect and Pest Act. Would that come under this item?

The CHAIRMAN: That item was passed, but if the hon. member was not here when it was discussed, perhaps he will have the unanimous consent of the committee to put a question concerning it.

Mr. CHISHOLM: On page A-18 of the Auditor General's report, volume 1, I find the names of ten or twelve men who are evidently doing the same work in one county. The name of Mr. Baker is among them; he is from Middleton, Nova Scotia. I am anxious to know what these men are doing.

Mr. TOLMIE: These gentlemen operating under the Insect and Pest Act are engaged in investigating the ravages of various insects found to be injurious to agriculture, such as the wireworm, the cutworm, the brown-tail moth, the spruce bud worm, the army worm, parasites injurious to turnips and other roots, and all those which I described this afternoon. The hon. gentleman will find a full report of that in to-morrow's Hansard; I gave it shortly before dinner.

Mr. CHISHOLM: What are the particular qualifications of these men? Has location anything to do with their appointment?

Mr. TOLMIE: Some of them are graduates of agricultural colleges. They go into the field first as assistant or temporary inspectors, and as they work with men who are well versed in the business they become qualified to act as permanent inspectors.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Do they send reports to the department?

Mr. TOLMIE: Yes, reports are sent in by all these field men at regular intervals.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I am anxious to know how it is that ten or twelve inspectors are appointed in one county while in other counties there are none at all. Are these insects entirely confined to the counties in which men are appointed?

Mr. TOLMIE: If the hon. member will look at their expense accounts he will find, I think, that their activities are not confined to one county. These men may be selected from one county; I do not know anything about that. All I care about is whether they have the required qualifications and whether they render satisfactory service to the department. They may be sent anywhere we wish to send them. In fact, in the engaging of all these men, the arrangement is generally made that they can be moved to any part of the country where their services may be required. In the case of a serious outbreak we could move them from British Columbia to the Maritime Provinces, and so on.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Are they appointed by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. TOLMIE: Yes.

Mr. CHISHOLM: My hon. friend (Mr Duff) gave a list of names of men who were, I think, all located in one county.

Mr. DUFF: Two counties.

Mr. CHISHOLM: My surprise is that I find all these men are located in that county also, and some of them are costing this country as much as $3,700, a good deal of that being travelling expenses. It appears to me extraordinary that one county should be selected as a place from which all these officials should come, and in that they should confine their operations mainly to that county.

Some hon. MEMBERS: What county?

Mr. CHISHOLM: If my hon. friends will look up the Auditor General's report, they will find out what county it is. It is not right that the people of this country should be paying travelling expenses in order to have these men located in one county. I would be delighted to see some of them in my county. The minister says that they are graduates of colleges. We have college graduates throughout the country. While I know the minister is desirous of doing all he can—and he is doing well—I am sure his object would be attained much more successfully if he were to scatter these men throughout the province, and I am speaking just now of Nova Scotia. In that case, I might be able to say to my friends in Inverness county when they came up against such a proposition, that such a man was located at such a place, and they could apply to him. But if I have to tell them that they will have to go down to this county, which I will not name, it might be difficult for them to get in touch with the inspector. It would be much better if the minister would scatter these officials throughout the province, one here and another there, in counties where they can do the most effective work and where their efforts will be of most benefit to the people. It is the service to the public that will issue from their efforts that I am considering, not the accommodation of some gentlemen in a particular county. I dislike being unduly critical, but when you consider the fact that this county is selected and fifteen, twenty-five or thirty officials, who are engaged in a particular effort, are confined to one county, while their duties must be scattered throughout the province, such a condition of affairs is extraordinary.

Mr. BEST: I understood the minister to tell us that these inspectors were selected by the Civil Service Commission, and I understand that every civil servant has to pass a certain examination. It can, therefore, be readily seen that all these civil servants may be in one district and this is one of the faults that I have to find with the Civil Service Commission. As the two hon. gentlemen have said, it is possible for every civil servant in any particular branch to be selected from any one county in the Dominion, because the Civil Service Commission send circulars throughout the country and those who stand highest in the examination get the positions. It may be in this case, that the circulars were sent throughout the different counties, and the fruit inspectors were all appointed from those two counties. That is one of the evils that I see in the Civil Service Commission, and as the hon. member (Mr. Chisholm) states, it is not fair to the Dominion, or to the different counties, that men are appointed to different positions, not only in the Department of Agriculture, but in every other department, all in a few counties, whereas, if we had some other system, especially in the outside service, appointments would be distributed over the various counties. I can readily understand that the minister has no power or control whatever to see that these people are appointed in different counties, because they are appointed by the Civil Service Commission under an examination system, and they may all happen to be from one county. I hope this evil will be remedied in the near future.

Mr. DUFF: I cannot agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Best) that the minister has no responsibility or control in the matter. If the minister requires twelve inspectors for this particular branch of his department for the destruction of insects and pests of all kinds, it is his duty, or that of the deputy, when he sends word down to the Civil Service Commission, that he requires twelve inspectors, to say that he requires them for certain counties.

Mr. BEST: Would he not be breaking the rules imposed upon to the Civil Service Commission if he did that? I understand the Civil Service Commission claim that he would.

Mr. DUFF: I do not think he would be breaking any rule. If the Department of Agriculture requires twelve inspectors, it is the duty of someone in the department, when the request is sent to the Civil Service Commission for the appointment of these men, to say that they are to be located in certain counties, and not to leave the matter wide open so that the Civil Service Commission, when they send out the notices and receive the applications, will, for instance, appoint twelve men in Victoria county, which is the most northerly county in Nova Scotia, when their work will be principally in Yarmouth, Queen's and Shelburne, and Digby. That is a stupid way of making appointments. Some responsibility must attach to the Department of Agriculture, and if it has failed to instruct the Civil Service Commission that these men are to be in different counties, the department has failed in its duty to the public. I have no complaint as regards where these men live; my complaint is that the people of this country are paying seven or eight thousand dollars in travelling expenses for these men, when that money could be saved. I have no complaint because they live in one county and have more knowledge and consequently receive the appointments; I am proud this county is able to produce this number of inspectors; but after receiving the appointments, they should be sent into the different counties of the province to do this work, thereby saving this large sum of money in travelling expenses.

Mr. TOLMIE: It is really an advantage to have these inspectors located in those particular counties in which the bulk of their work is to be carried on, because when an inspector lives at home, he costs us nothing for hotel expenses. While I am very glad indeed that the hon. gentleman has brought this to my attention, I might point out that under the Civil Service Act the minister cannot name any particular man he wants appointed.

Mr. DUFF: I did not suggest that the minister should name the man, but that he should designate the county for which he wants him appointed.

Mr. TOLMIE: The Civil Service competitive examinations are open to the whole country and the men are appointed, I understand, according to their standing in the examination. However, I will bear in mind what the hon. gentleman and other hon. members who have spoken along the same line have said, and see if we cannot break up some of these groups.

Mr. ROBB: What the minister says about appointments is probably true, but surely the Department of Agriculture has authority to dictate where the inspector, whoever may be appointed, shall reside, thereby saving a certain amount of money that might be more profitably used than in the travelling on the railways.

Mr. TOLMIE: The bulk of the fruit work is in only two counties.

Mr. McKENZIE: It seems to me there is too much travelling done in the province of Nova Scotia by these officers, and that there are far too many inspectors appointed. There are twelve or fourteen of them, and there are only eighteen counties in the province. I understood the minister to say that these men are all located in one county. That does not strike me as business, herding them all in one county. There cannot be work for them all there.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Does the hon. gentleman refer to apple inspectors or to what officers?

Mr. McKENZIE: I am told they are inspectors who go around seeing if there are any pests. I do not know whether my hon. friend from Digby and Annapolis (Mr. Davidson) feels the pest coming up his spine or not, but from the fact that he is coming to his feet one would think it is coming home to him. Perhaps he has particular knowledge of who these men are, and where the flies are that they are chasing all the time. My point is that if there is work to be done all over the province, these twelve or fourteen inspectors should not all be located in one county, but in different parts of the province at a convenient distance from their work. In that way they could be consulted more readily, and it would save the expense of travelling from one end of the province to the other. I can readily understand that the minister cannot provide against who shall be appointed, if the appointment is based upon a competitive examination open to the whole Dominion, but he certainly should be able to say where these officers shall be located, so as to give the best service to the country and to avoid unnecessary expense.

[Mr. Tolmie.]

Mr. DAVIDSON: I think there is an entire misapprehension in the minds of hon. gentlemen in reference to this matter. I think all will agree that if the Civil Service Commission are going to appoint apple inspectors it is only natural that they should go to a county where they would find expert apple growers, men who knew the business. It is also not unnatural to suppose that these people should reside where the work is to be done. Now, as a matter of fact, as hon. gentlemen on the other side who have spoken and who come from Nova Scotia know very well, there are practically only three fruit counties in Nova Scotia. They are Hants, King's and, most important of all, the county of Annapolis. These constitute practically the fruit belt of the province. There are a few crab apples grown in the county of Lunenburg, but as a matter of fact, probably 95 per cent of the apples grown in Nova Scotia are grown in the three counties I have mentioned. The fruit inspectors are divided pretty nearly equally between those counties. There are fewer in the county of Hants, because fewer apples are grown there. There are more in the counties of King's and Annapolis, because they are the two largest fruit growing counties. My hon. friend from Inverness apparently resented the idea that these men were not located in his own county.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I had no reference at all to inspectors, but was referring to men who were working under the Destructive Insect Pest Act.

Mr. DAVIDSON: The duties of these men are largely to suggest means of combatting the pests which visit the fruit belt; that is their primary duty. Now it would be very absurd to send an inspector for brown tail moth, caterpillar, or something of that kind, away up into the desolate wastes of Inverness county where there are nothing but rocks and that kind of thing, for there would be nothing there for him to do. Consequently, it is only natural to find that those gentlemen whose duty it is to safeguard the fruit industry, and to prevent the ravages of insects, should be located and do their work in the fruit districts.

I want to say just a word in regard to the matter brought up by my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster). He suggested that the Department of Agriculture might discover some hardy variety of apple that would grow in his constituency and not be killed by the severe frosts which visit that locality. The minister intimated that the department were endeavouring to make some investigation along that line, and I dare say the department are getting some good results, but I want to point out to my hon. friend from Brome a fact which he as a free trader will very well appreciate, and that is that it is better to allow a county that is adapted to growing apples to grow apples, and to allow a county that is adapted to growing maple sugar to grow maple sugar. If my hon. friend wants shade for his farmers in Brome, and wants trees which will not be killed by the frost, I believe it would be better if he gave up altogether the idea of growing apples and stuck to maple sugar instead. Maples would afford quite as good shade as apple trees, and would be better suited to the climate in that locality.

Mr. DUFF: In the course of my remarks I distinctly stated that the counties of King's, Annapolis and Hants were the principal fruit growing counties in Nova Scotia. You will notice, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member for Digby and Annapolis said that the only apples that grew in Lunenburg county were crab apples. That certainly was a very statesmanlike remark; it could fall only from the lips of a statesman. We all remember how the hon. member for Digby and Annapolis took an oath that he was a statesman. I am not in that class, and consequently I am not going to say that the only fruit they grow in his country is crab apples. My point is this: If, as the hon. gentleman says, the counties of Annapolis and King's are the principal fruit growing counties of the province, most of the work done by these twelve men would be done in those two counties. Therefore, why is there such a large amount charged in the Auditor General's Report for travelling expenses? My objection was not that these men were from Annapolis and King's, but that this country was spending $7,000 or $8,000 in travelling expenses, and that money must have been expended in travelling between Annapolis, Lunenburg, Yarmouth, King's, Shelburne, Colchester and Cumberland counties, and perhaps as far down as Inverness, Cape Breton and Victoria. I say that in the interests of the country the amount so spent in travelling expenses should be saved, and that instead of these men being located in King's and Annapolis counties, they should be located in different parts of the province.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I did not for a moment wish to make any disparaging remarks about the county which is represented by my hon. friend from Lunenburg. As a matter of fact, he represents a very fine county, a much better county than you would naturally think, and I do not mean to say that the only fruit grown there is the crab-apple.

Mr. DUFF: That is what you said.

Mr. DAVIDSON: They do grow chokecherries there, and the county is a very prosperous one, but I think my hon. friend will admit that it is not a great apple-growing county. The agriculturists in Lunenburg county, while excellent in other directions, are not particularly proficient in the art of horticulture, and in view of that fact, one would not naturally expect to find very many efficient apple inspectors in that locality. As a fact, nearly all the work of these inspectors, especially of apple inspectors, is done, so far as I know, in the three counties I have mentioned, and in the city of Halifax, which is the shipping port. An inspector is kept there and must be paid travelling expenses, and he is allowed a per diem charge while on duty in that port. My hon. friend will discover, I think, if he takes the trouble to investigate, that very little of this money, the expenditure of which grieves him so much, is really spent in his county. There is not much occasion for these officers to do work in that particular locality, and I do not see that the hon. gentleman has any great reason to complain of extravagance on the part of the Government in this connection. Now, he referred to the fact that I had taken an oath on one occasion that I was a statesman. Well, let me say that I have never heard that statement contradicted in Canada.

Mr. DUFF: Mr. Chairman, we do not need to argue about the knowledge which the hon. member for Digby and Annapolis has regarding my county, or any other county than his own. We have only to use our eyes to size up the situation in a few moments. I am not contending that my county is the biggest apple growing locality in the province from which I come, but the hon. member displays his absolute ignorance of matters of fact when he says that we do not grow many apples in Lunenburg.

9 p.m. Let me say that the fruit grown in that county is second to none in Canada. Besides, we export thousands of barrels to London, England.

Mr. PARENT: Is there any arrangement between the Federal and the Provincial Governments with regard to inspection?

Mr. TOLMIE: There is not.

Mr. PARENT: I am sorry there is not. In our part of the country, and also in Kamouraska, a famous plum was produced a few years ago, but for certain reasons which I do not know, its culture has been discontinued. At any rate, it is no longer marketed. Has the minister taken any steps to see that this particular fruit is again cultivated and put upon the market?

Mr. TOLMIE: We had in that district an expert who was familiar with the conditions there, but, unfortunately, he was killed in the war, and so far we have not been able to secure a first class man to take his place. As soon as one is available, however, we shall see that he is assigned to that district.

Item agreed to.

Health of Animals, administration of the Animal Contagious Diseases and Meat and Canned Foods Acts, $1,410,000.

Mr. McMASTER: What indemnities are paid to farmers whose herds, wholly or in part, are destroyed because of disease? I understand there is a difference in treatment between accredited herds and ordinary herds. Perhaps the minister will shorten the discussion on this item by succinctly telling us what the operation of the Act is in this respect?

Mr. TOLMIE: As regards compensation paid for animals, it is immaterial whether a herd is accredited or not, except in the case of tuberculosis. We pay compensation for animals destroyed under the accredited herd system and also under the municipal system. In computing the compensation for grade cattle, we pay two-thirds of a maximum valuation of $80, or $53.33, assuming the maximum is paid. For pure bred animals the maximum valuation is $250, and compensation on the two-thirds basis would represent $166.66. In either case the inspector exercises care to ascertain the actual market value of the animal at the time of slaughter.

Mr. PARENT: How much has been paid for cattle slaughtered throughout the country under this item?

Mr. JOHNSTON: May I ask, before the minister answers this question, whether the compensation is paid in respect of all breeds?

Mr. TOLMIE: Yes, it is applicable to all breeds. Last year we paid $21,827.94 for accredited herds.

Mr. PARENT: Where?

[Mr. Parent.]

Mr. TOLMIE: Throughout the whole Dominion.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queen's, P.E.I.): For how many animals?

Mr. TOLMIE: Two hundred and twelve.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queen's P.E.I.): What disposition is made of the debris?

Mr. TOLMIE: That goes to the owner; but where the carcase is found to be unfit for food, it is destroyed. Now, while these figures are large, I may point out that the accredited herd system covers only pure bred herds of cattle. In such herds where there are a few grade animals, it is necessary, of course, to eliminate them so as to make the herd perfectly clean. That is why we handle grade animals in these herds. Under ordinary conditions the system deals with pure bred herds altogether.

Mr. JACOBS: I do not want to pose as an expert in matters of this kind, for the reason that the shoe-maker should stick to his last. However, I have a recollection that the minister told us a few days ago, when discussing the question of the British embargo, that we have not had a serious case of contagious disease among our animals for nearly two generations. Now, it seems to me that $1,410,000 for a department which I gathered at the time, of the minister's speech, was really not functioning at all because there was no necessity for it, is a rather large sum, more particularly as we are increasing it this year by $390,000. This is very much like Mark Twain's patent medicine advertisement which stated: "One bottle cured me, please send another dozen."

Mr. TOLMIE: There is no country in the world that I am aware of where the herds are absolutely free from tuberculosis. What I said the other day in discussing the embargo was that we had not had pleuro-pneumonia in this country for thirty-four years, and that that particular outbreak—the last one we had on this side—was found in a shipment of cattle from Europe. The disease was discovered in quarantine, and the animals were destroyed and the premises disinfected. I said further that we had not had foot and mouth disease for thirty-six years, and that particular outbreak also was found in quarantine. I drew attention to the fact, too, that the Health of Animals Branch was able to protect the boundary line of some four thousand miles between this country and the United States when the highly infectious foot and mouth disease occurred there on three or four different occasions, and when that country lost millions of dollars in consequence. That is what I said. I notice that some hon. members, in referring to what I had stated, went so far as to assert that I suggested that the country was absolutely free from disease. I did not make that statement, and I do not want such an impression to get abroad, because it would be ridiculous to any veterinarian familiar with conditions throughout the world. Now, while we have some attacks of tuberculosis in this country we are no worse off than other countries, and Great Britain could not possibly keep our cattle out on that account, for it is a well-known fact that some British herds are also affected with tuberculosis. We have been doing a very large business in pure bred cattle with the United States. The United States took up what is known as the accredited herd system and it was adopted in this country on the 20th September, 1919, having been followed since. This was adopted in this country on 20th September 1919, and we have been following it up since. I think it will be proper for me to give the hon. members a brief account of what the accredited herd system is. We accept only pure bred herds of cattle. We test them with tuberculin under certain conditions, destroying those animals which are infected, or isolating them under what is known as the Bang system, thoroughly disinfecting the premises. After the cattle have passed three tests within twelve months, or two tests a year apart, without finding any disease on the premises, the owner is given a certificate that he possesses what is known as an accredited herd. That herd must be taken under the supervision of the Health of Animals Branch. The owner must not allow any other animals on the premises without being tested to the satisfaction of the Veterinary Director General, and there are certain other stringent rules under which he must maintain this herd. When he has done that the United States government will accept his herd, provided it has been tested within twelve months, without any question whatever and there be no testing at the boundary line. We have arranged with the United States government to accept their cattle under similar conditions.

I feel that it would be an immense undertaking to attempt to clean-up tuberculosis in a country-wide way. In the first place we have not the efficient help that would be necessary, and it would be useless to tackle it in a country as big as this is without the approval of the farmers and livestock men in general. So that through the medium of this accredited herd system we will be cleaning up certain herds throughout the country, and in that way educating the farmers as to the value of keep disease-free herds. Out in the province of British Columbia—a province that has perhaps made greater progress than any other in Canada in cleaning up tuberculosis—I may say that when the tuberculin test was first introduced amongst dairy herds we met with a good deal of opposition; but after a while certain herdsmen began to clean up their herds and the dairy districts began to get free from tuberculosis. In a very short time we found that the cities were beginning not to accept milk except from herds that were free from tuberculosis, and the result is that whole districts are now free from this disease, and the farmers have experienced a very direct benefit from the cleaning up of their herds. We hope to educate the farmers throughout the country by beginning first with the accredited herd system. Afterwards, from time to time, as seems practicable, further steps may be taken along these lines. In handling these cattle of the accredited herds the Veterinary Director General must be advised very fully of any movement of these cattle—the sale of cattle from these farms or the purchase of cattle for stocking them—breeders are obliged to work under very strict rules, and careful sanitary measures must be observed on the farm. Failure to comply with these regulations will result in the cancellation of their accreditation.

In regard to the increase in our appropriation for which we are asking at the present time, I may say that this is largely due to the popularity of this particular movement. It has become popular much faster than we had anticipated. The people of the country have taken it up, or rather the pure bred stock breeders, in a wholehearted way and the result is that more money will be required next year than is needed at the present time. To give you an idea of the extent of our operations I may say that we now have about 463 applications and 150 of these are on the waiting list, it being very difficult indeed to secure a sufficient number of expert veterinarians to carry on this work. We are now using what is known as the triple test wherever possible. In the first place they used what is known as the subcutaneous test under which we took an animal's temperature for several hours and then injected tuberculin, and followed this up the next day by taking the temperature of the animal every three hours. As a result of this we came to a conclusion as to whether there was a sufficient rise of temperature or not. Whenever the animal's temperature showed no rise we considered that animal a healthy animal; and in other cases where the temperature went up three degrees we considered the animal was affected with tuberculosis. There have been a number of improvements lately and we are now using what is known as the intra-dermal test in which we inject only about three drops of tuberculin into the layers of the skin, and we form our diagnosis by the swelling or enlargement at the point infected. We also have what is known as the ophthalmic test in which a little plaque containing tuberculin is placed in the eye and, as a result, in the diseased animal there ensues an inflamed eye with a certain amount of discharge a few hours afterwards. It is very important to have these tests for the reason that some unscrupulous breeders are attempting to frustrate them by saturating their animals with tuberculin; but the triple test has greatly increased the difficulties in the way carrying out any such fraudulent trick as that. The facts which I have narrated account very largely for the increase in our appropriation. This is a very valuable work indeed. To give you an idea of how popular it is in the United States, I may state that they now have over there 5,000 herds fully accredited at the present time, and 27,842 herds under test. They are very much behind in their work however, for the same reason that we have experienced—they find it is very difficult to obtain a sufficient number of properly qualified men for these duties.

Then again during the past year we had a number of outbreaks of hog cholera which has made it necessary to pay rather more compensation than is customary. The handling of the enormous number of cattle in the mange area in the West was a work of extreme difficulty. They number some 220,000 and the whole of these were dipped twice in a bath of hot sulphur and lime at a temperature of 120 degrees. All this work was done within a few weeks. It was necessary to have a large number of inspectors for this work and in addition we secured the co-operation of many cowboys who ranged over an area of some 2,600 miles in order to see that a clean drive was made and that no animal was left behind. This year has been a very busy one indeed in connection with the health of animals work. We expect the coming year will be one in which there will be a great deal more work to do along the lines I have indicated.

Mr. PARENT: The minister has made a very admirable statement and we are very greatly indebted to him for it. He has mentioned that out of a vote of $1,410,000 about $20,000 have been spent in connection with the slaughtering of cattle. Will he be good enough to tell us what breeds of cattle these were?

Mr. TOLMIE: I have not the information as to the breeds of cattle. It would require a return to bring down all the information for which the hon. member asks.

Mr. PARENT: The $20,000 must have been spent very quickly.

Mr. TOLMIE: If the hon. gentleman is anxious to get the information I shall be very pleased to get it for him.

Mr. PARENT: I should like very much to get it.

Mr. LEGER: In the province of New Brunswick we have good farmers and good stock raisers and any information we can get upon topics of interest to them will be welcome. I would like to ask the minister whether there is more than one veterinary surgeon employed in the province of New Brunswick and, if so what their names are. I would also like to know who is the inspector of meat and canned foods for that province?

Mr. TOLMIE: While the deputy is looking up that information I would like to state the effectiveness of the work of the Health of Animals Branch. Previous to 1914 the disease known as dourine prevailed among range horses in Western Canada causing serious losses. The compensation paid in the year was no less than $48,000 for that one disease. We had a very efficient staff handling that work, including our present chief pathologist, Dr. Watson. That officer was able to discover a method of testing the blood of these animals thus rendering the diagnosis very easy. The following figures show the excellent results of the work done. In 1914, $48,000 was paid in compensation; 1915, $32,000; 1916, $17,000; 1917, $3,000; 1918, $1,340; 1919, $261; 1920, $70; and in 1921 nothing.

Mr. MORPHY: Before the minister leaves this item I would like him to state what the difference is between tuberculosis and pleuro-pneumonia in cattle?

Would an animal affected with tuberculosis be rejected as a food product, and also would an animal affected with pleuro-pneumonia be rejected as a food product? And what is the difference, if any, between the two diseases?

Mr. TOLMIE: We may have tuberculosis in a number of stages. An animal might be affected with tuberculosis without any external symptoms whatever. In fact, I have seen cattle shown at our exhibitions that were beef fat and yet they were fairly putrid with tuberculosis. The chronic form might be found located in any part of the body, usually in the lymphatic glands, very often in the lungs, and sometimes in the intestines and in the liver and other organs; in fact, it might appear anywhere in the skin. In contagious pleuro-pneumonia you have the pleura and the lungs affected principally and the animal lives only a short time. In pleuro-pneumonia cases the carcases would be entirely destroyed. In tuberculosis all animals pass through our public abattoirs under inspection, and where the disease is generalized, that is, where it has reached a stage to indicate that the whole system may be affected, the animals are destroyed; but where only a few small organs are affected in a slight way, or the disease is incapsulated, those affected parts are destroyed and the carcase is passed as fit for food. That is done in all abattoirs in every country and is considered a perfectly safe practice.

In reply to the hon. member who enquired regarding employees in New Brunswick, I may say that we have the following veterinary inspectors: D. McCuaig, McAdam Junction; J. A. Ratte, Edmundston; J. H. Shonyo, St. John; and one car inspector, Howlett, St. John. There are no meat inspectors there. The meat inspection system of the Health of Animals branch is carried on only in those abattoirs that slaughter for export or interprovincial trade. It is true that a good deal of the meat slaughtered under those conditions is used locally. But we do not maintain any inspection of slaughter houses which kill for local business only. That inspection is supposed to be within the purview of the municipalities and the provincial governments.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: In reference to the inspection of animals slaughtered for export and interprovincial trade, it has always appeared to me to be a very peculiar state of affairs that we exercise such extreme caution in those cases and throw very little safeguards around the food that is consumed by our own people. It is true, as the minister has just said, that is left to the municipal authorities, but we all know that they do little or nothing in that respect, and surely if any people are deserving of these safeguards it is the people right in our own country. With reference to the accredited herds, it seems rather remarkable to me that only 212 head of cattle have been slaughtered under this system for which compensation has been paid.

Mr. TOLMIE: That was for last year.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Well, I know of one herd where over 80 head were slaughtered, and I know of other herds where various animals were slaughtered and in all those cases compensation has not yet been paid. I think the excuse given was that the department did not have funds to meet those particular claims. Is it not a fact that where many animals have been found to be suffering from tubercular trouble they have not been slaughtered, but have been disposed of in order to clear the disease out of the particular herd? I understand it is a common practice for dealers to purchase diseased animals from such herds and ship them into some other part of the province for sale by auction. Has the minister any information as to this practice?

Mr. TOLMIE: When a person applies to come under the accredited herds system he hands his herd over entirely to the Veterinary Director General and his Health of Animals branch, and any animals condemned for slaughter, if not generalized, are shipped to an abattoir where they are slaughtered strictly under inspection of the Health of Animals branch. We do not permit a man to remove his animals from the premises and send them to another place to be auctioned off. While I am on this particular item I may say that the hon. member for Frontenac the other night in referring to a case where the Health of Animals branch had destroyed some animals for glanders, stated:

> As it was, the farmers could not prepare their ground for the next year's crop; they could not even get out their potatoes or anything of that kind, and on the whole they were left in a very bad position as regards their crop for this year.

On making inquiry at the Health of Animals branch I find there were twenty-seven horses quarantined in the outbreak referred to divided among twelve owners.

Of five horses destroyed, three belonged to one owner, and of these one was a colt and could not be worked. This particular owner bought two new horses, giving him the same number of work horses that he had before. The other two horses belonged to two different owners. So that they suffered inconvenience to that extent while these changes were being made; and these men lost two horses.

Then, again, the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) criticized the Health of Animals Branch on account of their action in connection with an outbreak of hog cholera on the farm of one Alderson. He stated that Alderson said that his hogs were not infected with hog cholera and were free from disease. I am quite sure that the hon. gentleman was not fully informed or he would not have made the statement. In the first place, the ordinary garbage inspector who was sent down to inspect these hogs—this being a garbage feeding plant—had no difficulty whatever in diagnosing the disease among those hogs as hog cholera. He immediately advised the Health of Animals Branch inspectors; a careful inspection was made, and they had no difficulty in confirming the lay inspector's diagnosis. I may say that we permit the feeding of garbage to hogs only under license, for the reason that a great deal of this garbage-fed pork, particularly if imported, may communicate hog cholera. Unless pork is thoroughly cooked it may produce hog cholera if it comes from a hog which has had cholera or a hog which has had the double immunization treatment which is given in the United States. On these premises the inspectors found garbage that was not cooked, and any one breaking that rule forfeits the right to compensation. The son of the proprietor, who was on the premises at the time, admitted after some conversation with the inspectors that some hogs had already died. Under the rules he should have at once reported that to the Veterinary Inspector-General's Branch. I am sure that the hon. member for South Oxford and the hon. member for Frontenac would not have made the statement they did had they had the full information. It is only fair to our inspectors that this explanation should be made; for I am sure they are trying to do their best to keep our animals free from contagious disease.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: With reference to the last remark of the hon. minister, I think I made it quite clear the other night when I referred to it that the man who had suffered the loss stated most emphatically, and his son made an affidavit that no disease existed on his premises, that no hogs were sick and none had died. Since making that statement I have received a report from the head of the Health of Animals Branch with regard to this matter which has given me some information that I did not have at that time, but which, I believe, emphasizes the justice of the claim made by the person whose two hundred and twelve hogs were destroyed by the inspector. It is true that the business he was carrying on was located near Toronto; it was what was known as the old Humber piggery, erected by the Government of Ontario many years ago, and he has been carrying it on for quite a number of years. He has been breeding hogs as well as buying them. He claims that when the inspector came there he had in a separate pen some of the culls from the different litters. It is well known to any stock breeder that there are often some unthrifty pigs in a litter and that it is good business to separate them from the larger and more thrifty ones; so this man had a few unthrifty ones in a separate pen. The inspector looked at them and said: "Why, there must be something the matter with these pigs." He took their temperatures; he killed one of them and asserted that the pigs were diseased; that there was cholera among them and that they would all have to be destroyed.

The minister has stated to-night that this man's son admitted that a number of the pigs had died. Well, my information from the proprietor and his son is that they did not make any such admission; that they had not lost a pig in two years except some small pigs which had died while they were with the brood sows. Now, the one who should know whether or not there was disease among the animals would surely be the man who owned them. As to cooking the garbage, he has a complete outfit for that purpose. Before he could get a license from the Government he had to waive all claims for damages unless he could prove that the disease had been brought in from some outside source, so he would be careful to see that the garbage was well cooked. I understand that there is no piggery in the country that has been kept better or in a cleaner condition than this one, and the minister will find that his inspectors reported to that effect on previous occasions. When the inspector took the temperature of a number of these pigs and informed the proprietor that they were to be slaughtered, the proprietor asked the privilege of taking some of them after they were slaughtered and dressing the carcasses because they were almost fit for market. A number of them were picked out that did not have any symptoms of disease. As a matter of fact this man stood outside the pen while the animals were driven out of twelve different pens and selected as they came out some of those that were fit for market—that is, that were fleshy enough and would meet the demands of the market. Thirty-three of these animals were dressed by the proprietor; the intestines were left alongside where the inspector could examine them, which he did—and not one animal of the thirty-three was found diseased.

It may be said that hog cholera will remain dormant. My experience has not been very great but I know of an instance that occurred a few years ago where inspectors went into a certain district, destroyed all the hogs in a certain locality and placed a valuation on them which was the most absurd that could be imagined—one would almost think that the men had never seen a hog before, judging from the valuation they placed upon these animals. The result was the appointment of an independent commissioner to take evidence in the matter and to place a value on the animals, and the matter was satisfactorily adjusted. The minister tells us that these men are above reproach; that they are the best men that can be found in Canada or in the world. We have heard that statement very often in reply to criticisms that have been levelled against men who are in the Department of Agriculture. Well, these men are like a good many others who go into the Civil Service, who have a soft job as long as they live and do not get too busy or pay too much attention to their work. That has been my experience, at least. In this case the person aggrieved makes the request that an independent commission of practical men take evidence in regard to the matter, and he is prepared to abide by the result. But he objects strenuously to being practically ruined by the act of some inspector. When animals of that kind were selling at the high price prevailing in April of last year, it is a serious matter to have 212 hogs slaughtered by an inspector under those conditions, particularly in view of the fact that the man, his son and his manager are prepared to substantiate every statement that they have made; that there was no disease in their herd; that not an animal died from disease, and that the food was cooked properly because they have all the appliances for cooking it. There is a straight denial by the owner, his son and his manager of the statement of the inspector in this department, which we are told is composed of men who are the best to be found in any country. In any case, the action was a pretty high-handed one. These 33 hogs, which were not picked out because they did not show any signs of disease, but which were picked out by the proprietor who stood outside and selected them as they were driven out of different pens, did not show any signs of disease after they had been slaughtered, and they were all disposed of by him. The rest of the animals were destroyed. The proprietor claims that there was no disease; the minister's official claims that there was disease and that the man is not entitled to any compensation.

Mr. MORPHY: To whom were the 33 animals disposed of and by whom?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: By the owner of the animals to either some packing house or dealers in Toronto.

Mr. MURPHY: With the consent of the inspector?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes.

Mr. MOLLOY: Were those animals condemned by a lawful veterinary surgeon, an inspector under the Health of Animals Branch?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am not sure whether he was a qualified veterinary surgeon. He was an inspector under the Health of Animals Branch. I could not say what his qualifications were, but from the information I have received, I do not think they were very good. It is impossible for a man to do business except under a heavy fine unless he has a license from the department, and when he gets a license he has to sign a statement to this effect:

> In consideration of the granting of a license to me, I hereby agree to maintain my hogs in a clean, sanitary condition, to sell no hogs except for immediate slaughter, to notify the veterinary inspector if sickness appears among my hogs, to forfeit all claim for compensation in case it is necessary to destroy any of my hogs as a result of hog cholera unless it can be shown that the infection came from some other source than from feeding garbage.

He has to show that the disease had entered his herd from some other source than the feeding of garbage. In this particular case, the man claims that there was no disease; that his hogs were perfectly sound and healthy except for a few culls from litters that were put in a pen by themselves on account of their unthrifty condition. That is rather a remarkable document to compel a man to sign before he is granted a license. These regulations, to which I have referred to-night, are not embodied in the Act for compensation for the slaughter of animals when diseased; they are made by virtue of power given to the department to make regulations. I am not objecting to that power remaining in the hands of the minister and his department if it is not abused; but I am satisfied by past experience that some of these men are not competent or safe men to be travelling around this country inspecting herds and doing the things they have done. I remember where one of these inspectors came to half a dozen farmers in my riding and in a sneering way went around, shot their hogs on their farms wherever they were to be found, and left without giving them any satisfaction. Eventually other inspectors and a commissioner had to be sent there in order to have the matter adjusted, and by the exercise of a little common sense the matter was satisfactorily adjusted. In view of the seriousness of the results, under conditions such as this to which I have referred, we ought to be very careful before we place unlimited power in the hands of any of these inspectors to go around the country in a high-handed manner and to do the things which have been done.

Before we pass this item, I should like to have some assurance from the minister that a further inquiry will be made into this matter, and that it will not be cut off by a statement of one or two of his inspectors: I have not the slightest doubt that, had the minister himself or the head of the Health of Animals Branch had some personal knowledge of conditions in that case, the matter would have been much more satisfactory, and I understand that they are placed in a somewhat awkward position by reason of some officials in that branch who have not been showing as good judgment as they might have done. If, as we are led to believe from statements of those inspectors, hog cholera was prevalent in that herd, then I contend that they are absolutely unfitted for the position which they hold if they permitted thirty-three animals to be slaughtered and placed on the market in this country. If hog cholera was through this herd of hogs to the extent to which we are led to believe it was, those animals should all have been condemned and destroyed instead of being placed on the market as food. It what better way could the disease have been spread broadcast, if this disease is as dangerous and deadly as we believe it is.

When hog cholera enters a herd, there is no doubt in the mind of the owner or anyone else in the course of a very few days whether the disease is there or not. The matter is not open for argument or dispute at all, because the animals' lives will be very short; they will be turning up their feet in short order. I am sorry I have had to speak so strongly as I have in this matter. The other night, I referred to the fact that I had the temerity to write to the head of the branch in reference to this case a few months ago at the request of the owner who was born in the county of Oxford, who has lived there, whom I have known practically all his life, and who is a man of good standing. His son is a most exceptional young man, a man whose word I would consider to be beyond reproach, and who lived in the town of Ingersoll until a few years ago. If the owner, his son and the general manager are prepared to make the statements that they claim they are willing to make—and I believe the son has already made an affidavit to that effect—then a further inquiry should be made into this matter and the question cleared up, for the satisfaction, not only of the department, but of the people in general. I am satisfied that if that is done, it will be found that some of these inspectors have not shown as good judgment as we would like them to show.

Mr. MOLLOY: I should like to say a word on this question of the competency or incompetency of inspectors generally. I think it was in the fall of 1905 that I happened to be appointed to that position myself in the province of Manitoba under the former government. Hon. Mr. Fisher was Minister of Agriculture at that time, and Dr. Rutherford was Veterinary Director General. The disease we had to deal with at that time was glanders entirely. The province of Manitoba and the whole of Western Canada was over-run with glanders, as can readily be proven by the records. That the chief inspector, myself and one or two others who were employed on this work at that time encountered great opposition is true. I remember very well in 1906 going to the town of Rathwell, to the barn of a livery man of the town, who was also a large farmer in the immediate district. It would be about the 1st of August; I am speaking from memory, but that was the date approximately. The number of horses I tested would be about 15, and if my memory serves me right, all but one reacted. The owner of these horses and his neighbours in the town appealed to me to let him have the use of the horses until he cut his crop. I went out and viewed the crop, and it was a splendid one. I was not the chief inspector, but was working under Dr. C. D. McGilvray, who is now principal of the Ontario Veterinary College. I wish to say for Dr. McGilvray, that there is no abler man in the veterinary profession in this country to-day; there are others just as able, but none abler. I tried to communicate with him, but I could not get in touch with him either by telephone or telegraph. The only thing left for me to do was to wire to Ottawa. My telegram was answered by Dr. Hilton, and by the way, in answer to a question the other night I was informed that the Chief Veterinary Inspector was Dr. Hilton. I am well satisfied that he is. The office was new to me, and that is the reason I made the inquiry. He told me to use my own judgment. The day following the test of these fourteen or fifteen horses I went to Indian Ford, about six miles away, and there I condemned at least six or seven horses out of ten or twelve that I tested. The owner happened to be a widow, and she appealed to me because the news had been carried from Rathwell to Indian Ford as to what I might do there. In the meantime I had not received the telegram I have mentioned. The next night I went back, and I received the telegram telling me to use my own best judgment.

Foolishly for myself, I consented to leave these horses in the possession of the owners. They cut their crop, a matter of about a month or five weeks, and got it out of the way. The Veterinary Director General of that day demanded that the horses be destroyed on my report. I was busy in other parts of the province, and Dr. McGilvray was sent out to destroy these animals. The stage was all set. The owner of the horses in Rathwell had three veterinarians on hand from the district immediately adjacent to the town, and they were prepared to put up a fight. They said: "There are no symptoms of these horses being glandered." In the meantime let me add that I first demanded that the livery horses and those that were clinical be taken out to be destroyed, and I did destroy three or four of them. These other horses had no outward symptoms of glanders. The only thing that was against them was my report, made after a very careful examination—I never make any other kind—and I had condemned them as being glandered.

Well, Dr. McGilvray, who was chief in Manitoba, went out to handle this case. They had these three veterinarians on hand prepared to fight. There were no symptoms that a layman could see that these horses were glandered, but the symptoms in a clinical case are very simple and easily understood by the owner or by a passerby. Being somewhat of a diplomat, Dr. McGilvray said to the owner "I will do this. Pick out your best horse"—if I remember, there were eleven—"put on as a valuation, whatever you and your confreres here may think fit, and if that horse is not glandered I pledge myself, and my position, that the Government will pay you the price of that horse, and no other horse will be destroyed unless this one is proven to be glandered. Those that are destroyed will be paid for." The owner said "Very well." The horse was destroyed by Dr. McGilvray and he and the other three veterinarians made a post-mortem examination. They took a section of the lung of that horse, sent it to Dr. Bell, the city bacteriologist of Winnipeg, and awaited his report. In the meantime the people in the neighbourhood were saying that the Government would pay for this man's horse. I am sorry I have not the owner's name, but I did not know this matter was coming up to-night. What happened? Dr. Bell of Winnipeg made a thorough examination, microscopic and otherwise, and his report was this—"The best specimen of a glandered lung that I have ever examined."

The result was that the owner willingly consented to the destruction of the other ten and received his compensation, and I allowed him fair compensation. When I gave him that compensation sanctioned by the Parliament of this country, I gave him more than the government of any other country in the world was paying for a diseased animal, particularly a glandered animal. Canada at that time was paying more for diseased stock than any other country in the world, and since that time the compensation has been increased. We can well afford to increase the compensation, because the disease has largely disappeared from Canada.

I stand by the Health of Animals Branch of this Government, and of the previous Government, until some stronger evidence is laid before the House than was given by my hon. friend from South Oxford to-night. I say that these men are qualified, and I stand by the Minister of Agriculture, I stand by the Veterinary Director General and by his assistants until my hon.

friend or anyone else can satisfy me or prove to the majority in this House that the people's money is being paid to inspectors who do not know their duty.

In the Indian Ford case, which I dealt with myself, Dr. Rutherford said: "I have your report. Go out and re-test these animals, and if they re-act destroy them." What did I find when I arrived? I found there the local veterinarian from the town of Holland ready to find fault with anybody and everybody because he did not happen to do the work. I re-tested those animals in this man's presence. He came there to work his game of bluff, but everybody does not succeed in working that on me; at least he did not. I took out these animals and destroyed them, and in doing that, I did that family a great favour. I want to warn the Minister of Agriculture, if warning is needed, and the Veterinary Director General, to advise their inspectors to be careful in exercising any leniency in a case of glanders or any other disease. Within six miles of my home in the year 1906—this was in November and the others were in August—I also granted the use of three horses to a man to do his fall ploughing, and that man gave me more trouble than the Tory party ever did. I went out of my way and risked my reputation as a veterinary inspector to give him a chance to do his fall ploughing, and what did he do? He promised faithfully that when he finished his work he would consent to the destruction of the animals. Did he do it? Well, I guess he did not. He called for a veterinarian from the town of Emerson, and in the meantime he defied me to go to his place. It was a waste of his time to tell me that. When I arrived there, however, I found that the other man was already on the scene. The test was made and the animals reacted. I destroyed them and through the laws passed by a former Government I paid him more for diseased animals than the law in any other country would allow. I paid him the compensation allowed for animals not worth 5 cents. In 1906, in Manitoba, two human beings, two young men, died as a result of contagion from contact with glandered animals. I am not acquainted with my hon. friend's case. Perhaps he is right; I am not prepared to contradict him. He is not a young man, and he is not a fool. He is a member of this House and has made what I consider to be a serious statement. If I made such a statement as that made by the hon. member for South Oxford, I would do one of two things—I would either press the charge to the hilt, or I would do the other thing.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: How would you go about it?

Mr. MOLLOY: How did these people go about it? They brought in all the assistance they desired; they even brought in political assistance. Now, I did not want to say that at first, but I say it now. They brought in veterinarians opposed to the Government of the day, opposed to me, and opposed to my chief. They had these men there. That animal was destroyed in the town of Rathwell, in the presence of perhaps two hundred persons, and a section of the lung was taken by Dr. McGilvray and put into a glass jar. All this was done in the presence of these people, and the jar was afterwards sealed and expressed, the cost being defrayed by Dr. McGilvray, at his own expense. Would my hon. friend try to make me believe, if I were the owner of 240 hogs, and they were condemned for hog cholera, and I were convinced as a layman that they were not infected, that I would not have done exactly as those people did? I have no fault to find with those who acted in that way to me, except that I went out of my way to do something for them and they turned upon me like an adder. But it was proven to the hilt that I was right and they were wrong. I would do as they had done if I were convinced, as my hon. friend from South Oxford is certainly convinced by the statement of the owner and his son, that the animals were not diseased. Why did he stand by and allow them to be destroyed? The Government of Canada was responsible for what was done. They can be held responsible, and that is the ground on which I would have proceeded. There was one other case. In this case the horses reacted but were not clinical and I left the animals in the possession of the owner, Mr. Walsh. When I was ordered back to make the re-test, the animals reacted and I destroyed them. That is the only man I dealt with, to whom I extended a kindness, who did not resent it afterwards so far as I was concerned. I will stake my reputation as a veterinarian, that the man who condemned the hogs, if he was a veterinarian employed by this Government, or by the former Government, knew his work, and carried out his orders and the chances are that the man who owned the stock and the people in that neighbourhood have been benefited in consequence.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It is quite evident, from my hon. friend's last remarks, that it would be futile to attempt to convince him, for the reason that he is convinced already, that the inspectors were right.

Mr. MOLLOY: I convinced the other inspectors.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I have no doubt the hon. member would exercise diplomacy and good sense in dealing with a case such as I have mentioned, but I think he will admit that there is a wide difference between a horse with glanders and a hog with cholera. There is no comparison between them; the conditions are not similar. The hon. member knows a great deal more about veterinary science than I do, and I think he will agree with me that when hog cholera breaks out in a herd there is not much doubt in the mind of the owner, or of anybody else, as to whether the disease exists or not. It does not require much time or insight to ascertain the fact; there is abundance of evidence to prove it. I pointed out that the owner's son had made an affidavit to the effect that the food was properly cooked, that there was no sick animal there, that none had died from the disease, and that hog cholera had not been found in the pens while he had been there for nearly a year and a half. That affidavit was forwarded to the department. Now, the hon. member for Provencher asks: why did he not prove this matter if he was in doubt? I may point out to him that the inspector valued these hogs and led the owner to believe that he would be compensated. He put a valuation on every animal slaughtered, and that information is in the hands of the Veterinary Inspector General to-day. The hogs were destroyed. It was impossible to get evidence. All the evidence available was the fact that he had dressed and disposed of hogs for food from this destroyed herd. The hon. member will agree that it would be difficult for him under the circumstances to get evidence. The inspector told him: "We are going to kill every animal. Clean up as many as you can to-day, because I am going to shoot every hog on the premises to-morrow." And he did so. These thirty-three hogs were driven out of a number of different pens. I understand from practically every pen, with the exception of one, where there were some small common pigs, was cleaned out. He has given evidence to that effect and expects that the Government will be reasonable before he takes steps. It will be readily understood that it is a difficult matter to collect compensation from a Government or from a department if they refuse, as they have done in this case, to consider the matter, simply brushing it aside.

When I spoke before I referred to the experience which we had a few years ago with some of these infallible inspectors. The evidence that was reported on that occasion demonstrated clearly to my mind not only that they are not infallible, but that some of them are not even reliable. I do not say that is true of all of them. I believe that the Veterinary Director General is as careful in connection with these matters as it is possible to be, but here again you have a system under which men are not selected because of their judgment or because they are diplomatic—they are selected at random by the Civil Service Commission, sitting here in Ottawa, who do not know whether or not a man is competent for that work. The man may pass the examination to which he is subjected, he may be a graduate of a veterinary school, but that does not mean that he is either a reliable person or one suitable to undertake the duties which will be entrusted to him. I do not know any of these inspectors. Many of them, I recognize, are suitable men and would perform their duties all right. I am not criticizing them. I know nothing good, bad or indifferent about these different inspectors who inspected these animals, but I repeat again that when the owner and when his son, a most estimable young man, made affidavits that no disease existed in the herd and that no animals had died, they were entitled to consideration. The inspector who examined these hogs made a valuation and allowed the owner to believe that he would be compensated. Therefore I say it is pretty high-handed work on the part of the department to act as it did, and for the minister to get up here and declare that he has the best system of inspection in the world, and that these inspectors are almost infallible and beyond reproach. There are two sides to every story, and, from my knowledge of the men on whose behalf I am speaking to-night, I affirm that they are just as responsible and just as reliable as any of the inspectors of the department, and that may be saying a good deal.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): Were the 33 hogs that were infected selected from the rest of the herd?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): And were the rest of the herd not condemned?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: They were all condemned.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): Were they all inspected?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I presume they were.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): You are not sure?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Well, the whole herd was condemned. Every hog on the premises, and some for which compensation was sought were the best finished that this farmer had. The owner did not take the hogs out of the pens; they were driven out by the inspector. The owner stood outside and pointed out to the inspector the ones he thought were fit for the market.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): They had been condemned previously?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, sir.

Mr. TOLMIE: I was very much interested to hear what the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Molloy) had to say in regard to his experience with glanders. Any veterinarian who has done a certain amount of service under the Health of Animals Branch has had the same experience over and over again. Therefore it may be interesting for him and the rest of the committee to know that the Health of Animals Branch, which is praised by hon. gentlemen on one side of the House and abused by hon. gentlemen on the other, has reduced the amount of compensation paid for glanders from $147,851 in 1905 to $6,000 in 1921.

With regard to the hog cholera situation and the facts in this particular case, I may say that when hog cholera appears in a herd it will very often show itself only slightly at the beginning. The first case will be indicated perhaps by a hog refusing to eat. Some morning when the rest of the hogs are busy he is inclined to lie down and hide away in some other part of the pen. There is a condition of feverishness and there is a slight discharge from the eye, which perhaps would not be noticeable to the ordinary layman feeding those hogs. Afterwards the infected hog may show a little wavering in his walk owing to weakness in the hind quarters. Then possibly acute symptoms develop, with redness on the abdomen and the back of the ears. These symptoms are familiar to veterinarians. As the disease progresses you might get a lot of acute cases, and very often a week or ten days, or sometimes less, will make a very big difference in a herd where the infection has just been introduced.

With regard to our veterinary system, I have not said that the inspectors were infallible. What I did say, and what I repeat, without fear of contradiction, is that we have one of the best qualified veterinary services to be found in any country in the world, and to prove it I have only to say that we have less contagious disease in Canada than in any other country on the globe that I know of; and on that one ground alone if there is one country which is entitled to ship cattle to Great Britain it is the Dominion of Canada. Our inspectors are not selected at random. First of all, every inspector has to be a graduate of a recognized veterinary college. In the second place, he has to pass a special examination, a professional examination, before he is appointed at all, and finally the appointment, under the system which now prevails, is made by the Civil Service Commission. These men are experts in their particular line. I worked fourteen years in this profession. I was chief inspector for British Columbia for that length of time, handled hundreds of cases of hog cholera and am fairly familiar with the details. Hence, I consider myself fairly efficient to form a judgment in such matters, as compared with the average hog owner. These inspectors are fully qualified, and there is no object in their causing hogs to be destroyed that should not be destroyed. It is very much easier to go on to a man's premises and tell him that he has a clean bill of health than it is to destroy his hogs.

It is a very interesting story that the hon. member (Mr. Sutherland) has told to-night—very interesting indeed. I have heard it time and time again west of the Rocky Mountains. I have heard men frequently say: "There is nothing wrong with my hogs but look out for my neighbours." In this particular case had the work been done by a newly appointed veterinarian there might perhaps have been the least doubt, but as it happened the inspector was one of our very best men on this work, Dr. Hall, a man who has been in the service for twelve or thirteen years, and whose word I would take any day of the week before I would take that of a man who was not qualified and had not received the proper training of an inspector. How are we going to carry out the requirements of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act in this country if we cannot rely on our inspectors? How are we ever going to keep disease out of the country, and maintain the enviable position we now enjoy in regard to contagious disease, if we are going to turn down the statement of our experts and accept the word of the hog owner. The mere fact that only thirty-three out of two hundred and thirty-five hogs were found free from disease, is an indication that there certainly was hog cholera in that herd. The veterinary director general in his report states:

> If prompt notification had been given, the loss would have been very materially reduced, and instead of finding over 200 hogs so badly diseased as to be a total loss and only 33 that could be saved, the figures would have been reversed and over 200 would have been saved and only 33 lost.

In regard to garbage feeding, it is recognized in every country and particularly in this country where we import pork from the United States to a considerable extent, that garbage is a dangerous feed to give to hogs. I had a very excellent opportunity to study this sort of feeding in British Columbia, where in the cities of Victoria, Vancouver, New Westminster and Nanaimo large numbers of Chinese were raising hogs on garbage feed. They had all sorts of ramshackle premises and very poor cooking plants. They did not cook the feed properly, and hog cholera was always present, with the result that the disease would scatter over the country and we had hog cholera all through the province. Then we introduced a system of feeding regulations and insisted on those men keeping their premises perfectly clean. I left that department in 1917 to become the representative of Victoria in this House, and at that time we had succeeded in compelling those Chinamen to keep their premises in such clean condition, and we maintained such a close watch on them, that for years British Columbia had been entirely free from hog cholera. The feeding of garbage to hogs is very dangerous except under careful regulations. We have in force certain rules under which this feeding is permitted. One of those rules is that all the garbage must be thoroughly cooked, the cooking being necessary to sterilize and make it perfectly safe for the hogs. In this particular case to which the hon. member for South Oxford has drawn attention, our inspectors found garbage not thoroughly cooked. While the owners of those hogs may be very respectable men, and I am willing to accept his word for it, yet we know that our inspectors are reliable men who have been in the service for a long time, there is no reason to think they did not tell the truth, and until the opposite can be proved we are bound to accept their word. The owners of those hogs broke the rule not only in failing to cook the garbage thoroughly, but also in not reporting that the disease existed on their premises, and therefore they forfeited their right to compensation. All the thirty-three hogs were slaughtered under inspection. In the United States they have a double immunization test, introducing on one side of the hogs a serum which does not contain living germs, and on the other side injecting a virus from the blood which does contain germs. In that way, while these hogs might have passed inspection as hogs that had been doubly immunized, still the pork from those animals, if fed in an uncooked state, might convey hog cholera to hogs. Hog cholera is not a disease that is communicable to man. The carcases of those thirty-three hogs were passed by competent men of the department, and were therefore fit for food just the same as if they had passed through an ordinary abattoir. Had those two hundred and thirty-five hogs passed through an abattoir two hundred and two of them would have been condemned as affected with hog cholera, and thirty-three would have been passed as fit for food in the usual way. I feel the hon. member for South Oxford is very much interested in this case, and I was very glad to hear what he had to say in regard to it, but if we are not going to enforce these rules as to the feeding of garbage we are going to have hog cholera all over the country as we used to have in British Columbia. These cases are all passed on by qualified veterinarians of the department, and their reports are then submitted to the veterinary director general and carefully considered by him.

To give you an idea of the danger of uncooked garbage fed to hogs, a short time ago one of our inspectors, I think during last summer, happened in his ordinary rounds of inspection to visit premises where hogs were kept. Only the day before a young hog had been slightly hurt by other hogs in one of the pens and he had been placed in a temporary pen on the outside to give him a chance to recover. He had sufficiently recovered to be able to walk around, and was able to reach a place where garbage was unloaded and put in the boiling vat. At that particular point were some boards covered by some of this garbage in an uncooked state, and the little pig was gnawing off what he could of this garbage. The inspector called the owner's attention to it and told him "You will have hog cholera in this pen within a certain number of days." On his return there a few days after, sure enough, he found this little hog infected. That shows how infectious the disease is if the rule regarding proper feeding is not strictly observed. Therefore if we are to carry out these regulations we must accept the verdict given by the reliable men whom we have appointed to see to their enforcement.

Mr. NESBITT: I always understood that whenever hogs were killed on account of hog cholera the owner received compensation, and I have been listening anxiously to know why the minister did not allow compensation in this case. I think the minister is perfectly right in insisting that garbage should be thoroughly cooked before being fed to hogs. That was one mistake made by the owners, the other was in not reporting the disease. As to this latter mistake, it is quite possible that they did not know the hogs were infected, and I would suggest to the minister that it is always wise not to be too strict in matters of this kind, where a man might have erred in ignorance. As an illustration, I may say that I had hog cholera among my own hogs. I knew there was something the matter with them, but I had no more idea than the babe unborn what was the real trouble. I sent for a veterinary, and he diagnosed the case as hog cholera, and immediately sent for an inspector. These hogs of mine were fed with nothing but the best of meal from my own grain and skim milk from my own dairy, and I could not account for the disease, neither could the inspector, nor the veterinary, because there was no hog cholera within fifty miles of us. The only cause we could suggest was that as the railway ran through the paddock these hogs frequented, perhaps some infection from a car of hogs being shipped through might have been washed down upon the track as it slanted into this paddock, and my hogs thus became diseased. In that case I was compensated by the Government—the late Conservative Government. A good many of my hogs from pens that were not quite adjacent to those containing the hogs that were infected when slaughtered showed no signs of cholera at all. I know these people myself, and I think they are absolutely honest and decent. It is quite evident that they were ignorant of the existence of cholera among their hogs, and I would rather err on the side of clemency than on the side of strict regulation in this case. I rose merely to urge the minister to exercise a little clemency, because the man mention by my hon. friend from South Oxford is not able to stand the loss without some remuneration.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): I would just like to second the remarks of the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt). I can quite conceive that it is not always possible for a farmer to diagnose cholera at an early stage, and in this case the owner should not be blamed for not reporting it. I quite agree that the minister must accept the advice of his scientific advisers, but when it comes to matters of adjustment, whether in this department or in connection with pensions or anything else, I do not think the final authority should be left to some official who is more or less independent of Parliament and independent of the people. We must take the humane view of it; we cannot stand by and see people ruined, even through their own fault—in this case, probably through ignorance. But it is strange—perhaps there is an explanation of it—that only thirty-three of these hogs were tested and that those thirty-three were found to be fit for the market. Why did they not inspect the rest of them? At least more—perhaps one hundred or one hundred and fifty—might have been found sufficiently free from disease to permit their being disposed of, thus reducing the loss. The fact is that this man has sustained a serious loss apparently through the neglect of an official, who should have determined whether these hogs were or were not fit for consumption. If they were fit for consumption, he should have been allowed to sell them; if they were not, the public should not have been allowed to buy them. I submit that in testing only thirty-three of these animals, selected promiscuously—all of which were found in fit condition—and in simply slaughtering the remainder without compensation to the owner or without determining whether they were in condition for the market, the inspectors have condemned themselves. I would not advise the minister to stand behind a record of that kind, especially if the Government is not going to compensate the owner for his loss. I agree with the member for North Oxford that the minister should take this matter in his own hands, give it a little human consideration, and see whether it is possible that justice can be done.

Mr. TOLMIE: The usual practice in cleaning up a bunch of hogs affected with cholera is not to hold post mortems on those clinical cases in which the disease is easily discernible. In such cases the animals are destroyed; it is usual to pick out for careful post mortem only those animals which are apparently healthy, to destroy the hogs when lesions are found, and to allow those cases to pass in which no disease is evident. No doubt this was the course followed by these men; it is the course followed by inspectors everywhere in dealing with outbreaks of hog cholera.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): May I ask the minister whether it actually was followed? The member for South Oxford says it was not. That is quite important.

Mr. TOLMIE: I understand from the Veterinary Director General that the usual course was followed. However, I will get further information.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: How many of these animals were tested by the inspector?

Mr. TOLMIE: What do you mean by "tested"?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Whatever test they apply.

Mr. TOLMIE: There is no test. The animals are slaughtered and a post mortem held in those cases where there are no external symptoms of hog cholera. If you saw a hog waddling along the road with ears red and abdomen red, showing all the symptoms of hog cholera, it would be a waste of time to examine him. A post mortem is held only in those cases where no external symptoms are evident; where the hog appears from an ordinary physical examination to be healthy. Then, if on post mortem lesions of hog cholera are found, the carcass is condemned, and if entirely free from disease, it is passed. The raising of hogs which are fed on garbage is a very profitable business, because city garbage can be furnished as food at comparatively small expense. Owing to the danger which accompanies the feeding of garbage we insist upon the regulations with regard to cooking, etc., and as the member for North Oxford has pointed out, when a license is taken out the owner agrees that no compensation shall be paid where outbreaks occur on garbage-feeding premises unless he can prove that the disease comes from some source other than the garbage. He undertakes that before he gets a license to feed the garbage at all, and in this case, although he had reported the disease, and although the garbage was found to be thoroughly cooked, unless he could prove that the disease came from some other source, he would not be entitled to compensation.

Mr. TWEEDIE: I wish to direct the attention of the minister to another matter in connection with the slaughter of animals in Alberta, near the city of Calgary. A large number of dairymen have establishments in the vicinity of the city, and recently some of their cattle have been found to be infected and have reacted to the tuberculin test. The result is, of course, that the cattle have been ordered to be slaughtered. Compensation is afforded to the owner at the rate of two-thirds of the value of the cattle, the owner bearing one-third of the loss. But the difficulty is that the Government has fixed arbitrarily the maximum compensation to be paid per animal; I think it is $80. The dairymen feel that that amount is not coommensurate with the loss they sustain when their animals are destroyed and they have sent a petition to the Government asking that the maximum compensation be increased to $120. In discussing the question of the embargo last week the minister fixed the value of dairy cattle at anywhere from $125 to $175 or $200. It will be seen, therefore, that $80 is no compensation to the dairyman for the loss of his cattle. Besides, in the destruction of his cattle the dairyman is deprived of his means of livelihood. Another difficulty arises; when the cattle are slaughtered, there is no one who has authority to make immediate settlement with the owner in order that he may have the necessary funds to buy other cattle to replace those which have been destroyed, and it is a matter of weeks, sometimes of months, before he receives the compensation to which he is entitled. That being the case, it is almost impossible for him to replace his herds immediately after the cattle are destroyed. The dairymen desire, therefore, besides the increase of the maximum to $120, that when cattle are slaughtered someone shall have authority to make settlement at once, and, furthermore, that the Government inaugurate some system under which destroyed dairy cattle can be replaced immediately from the Government herds within the provinces, the dairymen to pay a reasonable price for the animals thus obtained. This matter has been before the Minister of Agriculture for some time, and I should like to have him state to-night, if he possibly can, whether or not the Government have arrived at any decision as to the stand they purpose taking in connection with the matter.

Mr. TOLMIE: I have been giving a good deal of attention to this question of the slaughter of those cattle. I presume the hon. member is referring to cattle at Calgary.

Mr. TWEEDIE: Yes.

Mr. TOLMIE: Those cattle are being slaughtered under our arrangements with municipalities in cleaning up milk supplies to the cities. If cities will make it necessary for milk supplies to come from herds free of tuberculosis we will undertake to test herds supplying milk to those cities. We have now in Canada about a dozen cities, one of which is Ottawa, that have taken advantage of this offer to clean up their herds and ensure a healthy supply of milk. As regards valuation, our valuation for grade cows is $80 and for pure-bred cows $250, of which we pay two-thirds, or $53.33 for grade animals and $166.66 for pure-bred animals. In the United States only $50 is paid for grades as a maximum, and $100 for pure-bred cattle, so that we are more generous than they are to the south of the line. We also leave the carcass in the possession of the owner. The animal is slaughtered in an inspected abbatoir under the inspection of our meat inspection man, and it is treated there just the same as it would be in the case of any ordinary animal shipped to an abattoir for food purposes. In some cases the tubercule might be no larger than a pea or a walnut, perhaps isolated and in a calcareous condition, and in that case the carcass would be fit for food, so that in addition to the compensation of $53.33, the owner would receive the beef value. In addition to that the owner can dispose of the offal of any one of those animals to the abattoir. There is the hide and the head, and there are also various organs which, in a diseased animal are useful for fertilizing purposes. They are cooked up at a high temperature so that they are only fit for fertilizing purposes. The compensation we give is very favourable in comparison with that of other countries. At one time we allowed on grade animals compensation on a valuation of only $60, but this was increased to $80. The great tendency in the cattle market is not towards an increase in price, but rather towards a reduction; from 1914 to the present date, there has been a decided falling off, and at present the department does not see its way clear to recommend that the amount of compensation be increased. What is a diseased cow worth once you know that she is diseased? You cannot sell her in the market according to law, and we do not purpose paying a full valuation for any animal of that kind. As regards prompt payment of compensation, the point taken by the hon. member is very good, and while recently there has been a little delay in issuing cheques for compensation, I have made arrangements only to-day whereby those cheques will be sent out as promptly as possible after animals are destroyed.

Mr. McMASTER: Have these animals to be pure-bred or grade in order that compensation be given? Can a man receive compensation for the ordinary common animal, which is neither a grade nor a pure-bred?

Mr. TOLMIE: The common garden variety of animal is also eligible for compensation under those conditions.

Mr. TWEEDIE: Has the department considered making arrangements whereby animals that are slaughtered can be replaced promptly from Government herds within the province?

Mr. TOLMIE: No arrangements are made along those lines. That is a matter that could very nicely be taken up by the provincial Department of Agriculture.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Before leaving this item, which is a very considerable one, and which shows a big increase, I should like to have a moment or two to refer to some of the arguments advanced by the minister why no compensation should be paid in the case to which I have referred. He says that these men have placed themselves outside of the class of those who ought to be compensated because the garbage was not properly cooked, and also because they had not reported the disease. I think he gave us the names of two inspectors who are very competent men. In looking over some of these papers, I came across an affidavit made by the son of this man, and it reads in part as follows:

I, Alfred E. Alderson, of the township of Etobicoke in the county of York, do solemnly declare that I am the manager of the piggery owned by George B. Alderson in the township of Etobicoke aforesaid and have held the same position since the first day of May, 1919.

That during the whole period of my employment as aforesaid all garbage fed to the hogs in the said piggery has been properly and efficiently cooked.

That from the said first day of May, 1919, until the destruction of the above-mentioned hogs by the Government inspector, all of the hogs in the said piggery were always in a healthy state and we never had in the piggery during that time a case of cholera.

That is a very clear statement to be made by the son, and yet that is not to be considered at all. The minister has referred to two inspectors whose word he is prepared to accept. I have here a statement signed by inspector T. H. Richards, who inspected the hogs and valued them, and it is not Mr. Hall, or the other inspector mentioned by the minister, who was there and examined those hogs and permitted the man to dress as many animals as he could in that day. Mr. Alderson states himself that he could very well have handled many more, but he had only the one day to do the work in, and with the help he had, 33 hogs were as many as they could attend to. I see by the Public Accounts that Mr. T. H. Richards is a Toronto inspector. I do not know whether he is a veterinary or lay inspector. It is possible he may be a veterinary inspector. In view, however, of the clear and definite statement made by the owner and by his son that to their knowledge no disease existed amongst their herd, I do not think they should have been considered as having waived all rights for compensation. Knowing this young man as I have known him for many years when he was in business in the town of Ingersoll begoing to work at this place, I am satisfied that when he made an affidavit of that character, he believed absolutely every word he was saying.

Consequently, I say that it ought to be beneath the Government of this country to pass such an act as the Animal Contagious Diseases Act—no, it is not the Act, but the regulations that have been drafted, and which he was compelled to sign, and waive all rights unless he could establish that disease had come into his herd from some outside source. It is absolutely impossible for him to establish that for he says there was not any disease. The inspectors say there was. There is a conflict of opinion, and it would be a very difficult thing to prove now that the hogs have been destroyed. The hogs were ordered to be destroyed and their carcasses to be deeply buried with lime. Mr. Alderson has waited for a considerable time in view of the statement made by Richards that he was valuing these hogs. Mr. Richards did value them, and sent in to the department his valuation, showing that he was under the impression that Alderson was entitled to compensation. I think this is a matter that ought to receive a little more consideration from the minister than it has, and I think that if he realized the character of these men, and the positive statements they have made in this case, he would see that further consideration be given to it. It is a pretty serious matter to have that many head of hogs destroyed, with prices as high as they have been, and for the man to have his premises closed up. He was not permitted to continue business there, nor has he done so since that time. I trust the minister will see the seriousness of the position in which the man is placed.

Mr. MORPHY: I would like to add a word in support of the case made by the hon. member for South Oxford. I have read the letter of Mr. F. Torrance, Veterinary Director General, and it is quite clear to me that some subterfuge has been employed to deprive this man Alderson of compensation for his hogs. On the face of it, it is quite clear to me that the Veterinary Director General has strained a point to try and deprive the man of his right, and I think the minister would be well advised to look at the language the director general uses. In the first place, the director general's report takes two or three pages to deal with what the minister knew very well was the law. When you get down to the real facts, you can see the subterfuge that has been employed. He is attempting to becloud the issue and deprive the man of compensation by specious language. That shows on the face of the report itself. I direct the minister's attention to the following:

Mr. Alderson's premises were visited from time to time and were found in a satisfactory condition until April 19, 1920, when Inspector Baker visited the premises and found several of his hogs showing signs of sickness.

No hog cholera, no suggestion of cholera.

Mr. TOLMIE: That man was a lay inspector.

Mr. MORPHY: It does not make any difference. Nobody in this report says the sickness is hog cholera. It goes on:

This officer who is a lay inspector in charge of the garbage feeding, took a temperature of one hog and found it was 105⅘. As Dr. O. Hall of this office was in the Toronto district at the time he proceeded to the premises with Inspector Baker and two or three other officers who were conducting accredited herd tests in the district also accompanied Dr. Hall to the premises.

Then on page 4 of the report I find this:

Dr. Hall slaughtered the hog which Inspector Baker suspected was affected with hog Cholera.

It does not say the inspector suggested it was hog cholera. Inspector Baker does not say that himself. Neither does the director general. Inspector Baker reported that a number of hogs on the premises were showing symptoms of illness and the director general turns that into hog cholera without any authority, without any mandate, if one may use the term, without any foundation in any report that anybody had made up to that time. No report had been made that it was hog cholera, according to this very report of the director general. It goes on:

As Dr. Hall had to attend to other work Inspector Richards took charge of the case.

He is the third man.

He corroborated Inspector Baker's report that a number of hogs on the premises were showing symptons of illness.

Nothing about hog cholera yet.

Out of 245 hogs, which were slaughtered, there were only 33 of these hogs fit for pork, and a license was issued permitting the owner to dispose of the carcasses of these animals.

Who ascertained that? There is no report of that on record. The director general says so, but he has not the word of Hall, Richards or Baker for it, that any inspection was made. It was just the statement of the director general.

Mr. TOLMIE: This information is reported to the office on regular forms. It will be on file in the office.

Mr. MORPHY: But the director general does not say so on his report. So far as this report shows, it may be only hearsay evidence of the three inspectors. The report goes on:

Mr. Alderson at the time of Inspector Hall's visit took the attitude that he did not know there were any hogs sick. As, however, Dr. Hall found so many of them exhibiting symptons—

Of what? Exhibiting symptoms of illness.

—he questioned the owner, and finally was informed that a few hogs had died a short time previous.

This is absolutely denied. The issue is clear between what Dr. Torrance says the inspector was told, and what the man himself says. There is direct evidence in the one case, and indirect evidence in the other. What was alleged is denied. Now it does seem to me that the position taken by the hon. member for South Oxford in a case like this, which is not well made out by the director general's report, ought to be considered by the minister in the light of the subject as against the state. Here is a man who has lost $7,000 or $8,000, if I figure it correctly,—a man who has been in the business for many years, against whom there has been no previous complaint, and of whom this very report says that up to the 19th of April his premises had been from time to time inspected and everything was well ordered, kept in good condition. There was nothing slovenly; the man was not careless, but was one of the best men feeding hogs on the garbage system. Now a man of that class, who is careful, who is reputable, who has suffered a severe loss, surely has the right to appeal to the highest court open to him, the court of Parliament, against an extraordinary and drastic remedy that Parliament has, and I suppose the appeal which the hon. member for South Oxford has made on behalf of a citizen of this country. The minister should not be bound hard and fast to the members of his staff, should not take for granted that every inspector under his jurisdiction is telling the truth and that everybody else is telling falsehoods. The least that can be done in a case like this, where the subject through no fault of his own has been deprived of the compensation that the law allows, is that he should be given a chance of having denials made on a more sound and substantial basis than I find in this report. The least the minister can do, I think, is to consider that the man has been a great sufferer, and where the state exercises drastic remedies, as in a case like this, the least it can do through its responsible ministers is to say: As the action of my executive officers has been seriously challenged, and as the report of the director general has been made on hearsay, we will take this matter into consideration and have a thorough investigation made, take evidence on oath, and satisfy ourselves whether or not this young lad perjured himself, whether the man who suffered the loss perjured himself, or whether some of the officers of the department are trying to gain kudos from the minister in bolstering up a case that will not stand the light of investigation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There is a considerable increase in this item over previous years, and in view of the attitude of the minister in regard to the case I have brought before the department, and others that have been laid before him, to which very little attention has been paid, I think we ought to know something more as to why we are voting an increase of $390,000, and where the money will be spent. I for one want to know whether men who are going to have such authority vested in them will go all over the country regardless of regulations passed by this House. Will those regulations be ovserved, or will there be substituted for them others framed by the officers in the various departments? I think we are somewhat too lax in this respect. I have in my pocket a letter I received in the mail last night in connection with a Bill put through last year, and there are no fewer than six pages of finely printed regulations passed by the department by virtue of a clause in the Act which gave the minister authority to make such regulations. These regulations have been passed by officers of the department, with the consent of the minister—not the present minister, but some of his predecessors—and I think that when a man suffers a loss of $7,000 or $8,000 he is entitled to a little more consideration than apparently this man is receiving. Now, before we increase the number of these inspectors—and it is quite apparent from the way in which they flocked around that part of the country that there was no dearth of inspection, at least judging from the report of the veterinary inspector general—in view of the difficult conditions that face us just now, I think that $390,000 is a large additional sum to vote, and we are entitled to know just what it is to be used for. We should not be in any great hurry to declare it carried. I venture to say that nine out of ten of those hon. gentlemen who are shouting "carried" do not care a fig, and do not know a button, about what these inspectors are appointed for. My experience has been just as I have stated to-night, and I must say that I am anxious to have some more information as to what these inspectors will do since you are increasing the staff to such a great extent. I believe that we have at the present time in some of the packing houses in the country a number of men going around as inspectors who are doing absolutely nothing. I am sure that there are great temptations in the paths of some of these people, and that they are not doing their duty as they should. I say this, knowing something of the conditions that prevail in some of the stock yards of the country where inspectors are supposed to operate. Stock is going to these yards, and instead of being examined and slaughtered it is being taken out and sold for food. My experience convinces me that your inspectors are not quite as infallible as we are led to believe, and instead of increasing their numbers and sending them all over the country into every place it is possible to send them, some of them now on the job ought to attend to their work a little better than they are doing, particularly in the big stock yards. It is well known to the provers that there is no difficulty in sending to those stock yards and there disposing of them, stock that ought to be condemned. I have not so far heard an explanation from the minister for this increase of $390,000.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. HAY: I desire to say just a word in connection with the matter brought up by the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland). I agree with him that this man should receive justice at the hands of the department. I am glad the hon. member brought this matter up, because this is clearly a case in which justice is due, and we, as representatives of the people, should see that it is meted out and full investigation held. I understand that before the hogs in question had been slaughtered a promise had been made that the owner would be compensated, and now the department is seeking to evade responsibility in the matter and refusing to pay for the animals. I think this is unfair. They have practically put the man out of business and I feel that an injustice has been done. I should like to see a thorough investigation made of the whole case. I agree with the view of the hon. member who introduced this subject that we should look for justice to all classes of people. I do not conceive it to be the duty of the inspectors in the different departments to harry a man out of business in which he is lawfully engaged. I do not think it is their duty to do anything that would deprive him of compensation to which he is entitled. That could hardly be the intention of the Government in appointing these inspectors, and I would strongly urge upon the department the necessity for a full investigation into this case.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. FIELDING: Mr. Chairman, may I say—

Mr. SUTERLAND: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. FIELDING: Pardon me; I did not intend to speak on the item. I thought it was carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Before the item is carried, I think that my request for some explanation as to what is going to be done with this $390,000 of an increase is but a reasonable one. But the minister apparently does not regard it as worthy his attention. He simply sits there and is prepared to have some of his henchmen in the back benches and opposite, declare the matter carried. I think there are others in this House, however, who just as much right to be heard as those who loudly say "carried." The sum of $390,000 is a considerable item. I have seen some of our friends opposite trotting up and down the back stretches of the province of Ontario within the last few years, crying about the terrible injustice which the farmers of the country had been suffering. Yet they sit here to-night with their mouths shut and have not a word to say. Nor do they say a word on any occasion when any matter affecting the farmers comes up in this House. I suppose, as the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg), would say, they are exercising their political sagacity. Well, I have not been exercising political sagacity during all the time I have been here.

Mr. MAHARG: I rise to a point of order. I never made that statement which the hon. member attributes to me. What I said was that we had been credited, by some hon. members opposite, with exercising political sagacity.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: My recollection of the hon. gentleman's statement is as I have stated. However, I will accept his correction. But it is rather remarkable, Mr. Chairman, that while these Estimates are under consideration—

Mr. McMASTER: I also rise to a point of order. I understand that we are discussing the item:

Health of animals, administration of the Animal Contagious Diseases, and Meat and Canned Foods Acts.

And I am quite unable to see what any reference to the political opinions or practices of the United Farmers has to do with that item. The item has been very thoroughly discussed and if there is to be further talk upon it I think it should be more relevant. I submit that with all respect, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am not going to accept any responsibility for the density of the hon. member for Brome. I do not think it is necessary to show the connection between those members who are calling "Carried, carried" and the item itself. There is, however, a direct connection because of the desire of these gentlemen to get away from this item without having the matter discussed, or without having any explanation from the minister. I think we are entitled to some further explanation other than we have yet received as to why there is an increase of $390,000. We are entitled to know what these men are going to do and whether the minister is going to accept their statements in preference to the statements of responsible citizens of this country. I have given the statements of reliable citizens from their affidavits to-night and yet you are not prepared to admit—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must draw the attention of the hon. member to the rule that all remarks must be addressed to the Chair. It would be well if that rule were strictly adhered to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MAHARG: I desire to ask a question. It is quite evident from the remarks you are making—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Address the Chair.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. member is out of Order.

Mr. MAHARG: The point is this, Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the hon. member if he is of the opinion that I am one of those who have been shouting "carried" to-night?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It is not necessary for me to answer the question. I think it is evident from the direction in which a good many of the interjections originated.

Mr. MAHARG: I rise to a point of order again. I have never at any time to-night said "carried" to any one item.

Mr. CURRIE: That is not a point of order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The interjections during this discussion have been somewhat significant and remarkable. I do not want to prolong this debate nor do I want to be unreasonable. I think that I have been both fair and reasonable in my presentation of the claim of this party who has suffered loss at the hands of these inspectors. I think that I have a perfect right to have some further information from the minister as to why there should be an increase of $390,000 for the appointment of more inspectors in his department at the present time.

Mr. TOLMIE: For about two hours I have been trying to tell the hon. member for South Oxford and other hon. members what we propose to do with the amount asked for, and I think nearly everybody has now got a fair idea of how the money is to be expended. With regard to this particular case I have no particular objection to reviewing it personally and looking into the matter. I do not want to do anything that is unfair but up to the present moment I must say, that having received a report from the Veterinary Director General and getting further information in conversation with him, I have not seen anything to indicate that this man complied with the law and that he is entitled to compensation. However, if the committee, or any particular member of it, so desires I shall be only too glad to go into the subject very carefully, and if there is reasonable ground for going any further I will do so.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I have listened, I think, as patiently as any hon. member has done to the minister's statements with reference to the item before us, and I have not heard him give any explanation as to why there should be this large increase in connection with this branch of his department.

Mr. TOLMIE: My experience in this House has not been as lengthy as that of the hon. member for South Oxford, and perhaps I have been unable to explain myself sufficiently but I have heard no objection from any other member in that particular regard.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No, Mr. Chairman, before leaving the item I think we might well learn something about the men who are at present in the service of the government before we place the power in the hands of the minister to have a lot more inspectors appointed through the Civil Service Commission, without any well defined knowledge as to what their qualifications are. I notice in the Public Accounts that there are a great many of these men who are receiving, I shall not say very high salaries, but very good stipends, and a bonus is also given to most of them. I would like to know from the minister whether or not it is intended to have this bonus continued. The bonus was given a few years ago as a "war" bonus and a great many of these men did not go to the war. The word "war" was afterwards omitted and the grant called a straight bonus. I now wonder if that bonus is going to be perpetuated, and I would therefore ask how much of this proposed expenditure is for bonus and how much for straight salary.

Mr. TOLMIE: The bonus will end on the 31st, March and after that date these officers will be treated in the same way as other civil servants.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Does the item provide for the payment of the bonus or does it not?

Mr. TOLMIE: No, Mr. Chairman, it does not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It covers the amount that is in the Estimates for the present year?

Mr. TOLMIE: Yes it does.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I notice there have been payments made for hogs slaughtered in a great many other cases. I observe that payment has been made for hogs slaughtered in the case of W. Reid of Brampton and F. Staggs of Brockville, the amount being $3,256.56. What inspectors examined those hogs and how wide-spread was the disease? Was there more evidence of disease in those cases than there was in the other instance to which I have drawn attention? Could the minister give us any information as to the extent of the disease in the herds where these large amounts were paid?

Mr. TOLMIE: I regret that I am unable to give that information off-hand.

Mr. MOLLOY: What are the minimum and maximum salaries of inspectors at the present time?

Mr. TOLMIE: $1,800 and $2,000.

Mr. MOLLOY: The amount of $1,800 is the minimum?

Mr. TOLMIE: Yes, sir.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: How many of these inspectors have been receiving bonuses?

Mr. TOLMIE: All of them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: How many new inspectors do you propose appointing under the increased vote?

Mr. TOLMIE: I did not hear your question.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am not often accused of whispering in this House, and I think I spoke loud enough for any one not afflicted with ear trouble to gather the purport of my question. My request was to know how many inspectors you purpose—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: —how many inspectors the minister purposes to appoint under the vote he is asking for tonight.

Mr. TOLMIE: There may be more inspectors appointed, and there may not be; it depends entirely on the amount of contagious disease that we have to deal with in the coming year. As to that, I have no information as to what may occur in the future.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I see that a considerable item here is under the Meat and Canned Foods Act, and I also notice that the minister has a motion on the order paper—which I presume will become law before we leave here—in connection with the permanent manufacture of oleomargarine. I would ask him if he is anticipating appointing a whole raft of inspectors to take charge of this work?

Mr. TOLMIE: I am not proposing, Mr. Chairman, to appoint a whole raft of inspectors to take care of the manufacture of oleomargarine. That does not come under this Act except in regard to the inspection of margarine manufactured in the packing houses, and we already have a staff to take care of that particular work.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: In connection with the staff that you already have—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: —that the minister already has taking care of this particular work, I would like to know whether they make a special report to him as to the prices and the proportions of the ingredients that enter into the manufacture of this commodity by the packing houses. Is there absolute information furnished the minister by those inspectors as to these matters?

Mr. TOLMIE: These inspectors, and all inspectors of the Health of Animals and of the Meat Inspection branch, make reports from time to time as to exactly what they are doing. With regard to the manufacture of oleomargarine, no particular standard is laid down; it varies in different packing houses.

[Mr. Tolmie.]

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Well, we are getting a little information that we did not have before, and it may be useful later on. Mr. Chairman, I have never yet in this House made any effort to unnecessarily prolong discussion; I think hon. members will give me credit for that at least. And I think I have been reasonable in asking for information in connection with this item to-night; but if the minister does not see fit to give an answer to what I consider is a perfectly reasonable request, I will have to adopt some other method, that is all.

An hon. MEMBER: Come over here.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Mr. Chairman, I do not propose letting the matter drop here. If it is the desire of the committee that the item should be adopted, well and good. I beg to move that this item be reduced by $390,000 and leave it exactly where it was last year.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry? In my opinion the noes have it. I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I would like the vote to be counted.

The CHAIRMAN: When I pronounced the words, "In my opinion the noes have it," five hon. members should have risen in their places in order to have the vote counted. As no hon. members did rise, the Chairman could not call for a vote. I declare the amendment lost and the motion carried.

Amendment (Mr. Sutherland) negatived.

Mr. FIELDING: I hope the minister does not desire to go further to-night. We on this side of the House have been giving him all the help we can. There is now only half an hour left of St. Patrick's day, and certainly my right hon. friend the Minister of Justice should not be kept here any later.

Progress reported.

On motion of the Right Hon. C. J. Doherty the House adjourned at 11.25 p.m.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 31, respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—Mr. Mewburn.

Bill No. 32, to incorporate The Canadian Transit Company.—Mr. Kennedy (Essex).

Bill No. 33, respecting the "Crédit Foncier Franco-Canadien."—Mr. Chabot.

Bill No. 34, respecting The London and Lake Erie Railway and Transportation Company.—Mr. Glass.

REPORT

Report of the Department of Labour for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1920.—Right Hon. Arthur Meighen.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Verchères) moved:

That the Public Accounts of Canada, and volumes 1, 2 and 3 of the Auditor General's report, for the fiscal year ending March 31st, 1920, be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

Motion agreed to.

PRISONS AND REFORMATORIES ACT AMENDMENT

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 35 to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act. He said: There is one provision of this Bill which is of general application; its purpose is to raise the age at which persons defined as children may be committed to reformatories instead of to penitentiaries or goals. The present age limit is sixteen years; the Bill proposes to raise it to eighteen years. There have been pretty widespread representations on the desirability of this change. Furthermore its desirability has been impressed upon my mind from observation of cases of very young people, slightly over sixteen years of age, who have been committed to the penitentiaries, which, under the present law, was the only place to which they could be committed. The other provisions of the Bill are to meet proposed changes in the reformatory system in the province of Nova Scotia, in order to adjust our legislation to meet those changes which are desired by the provincial authorities. I think there will be an opportunity later on of fully explaining those proposed changes.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BANKRUPTCY ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (George Etienne Cartier) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 36 to amend the Bankruptcy Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Explain.

Mr: JACOBS: Mr. Speaker, this is a Bill to amend certain sections of the Bankruptcy Act in order to enlarge the scope of the Act which was passed last session. I may say that this amending Bill is introduced at the suggestion of the judge of the bankruptcy court for the province of Quebec. It is felt that the Act would operate more successfully were these amendments made.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BANKRUPTCY ACT (FRENCH VERSION) AMENDMENT

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (George Etienne Cartier) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 37 to amend the Bankruptcy Act (French version).

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Expliquez en français.

Mr. JACOBS: Mr. Speaker, seeing that the Bill is derived from the English law, perhaps I may be permitted to explain it in English. This is a Bill to amend section 9 in order that both the English and the French versions may harmonize. In the French version it is declared that certain property shall be movable and immovable; while in the English version it is declared that the property shall be real and immovable.

Motion agreed to, and the Bill read the first time.

OPIUM AND NARCOTIC DRUG ACT AMENDMENT

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (For Hon. J. A. CALDER) moved:

That to-morrow the House do go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the resolution to amend the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, Chapter 17 of the Statutes of 1911, as amended by chapter 31 of the Statutes of 1920.

Mr. BUREAU: May I ask the right hon. gentleman who is Minister of Health for the time being?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hon. Mr. Calder.

Motion agreed to.

RESIGNATION OF SIR HERBERT B. AMES

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the declaration of Sir Herbert Ames, which was communicated by you to the House yesterday, and which appears duly recorded in the Journals of the House at page 104 of the Votes and Proceedings of March 17, I desire to ask the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) for an explanation of the answers which have been made to certain questions asked in this House respecting the resignation of the former member for St. Antoine. The declaration to which I have referred is as follows:

To the Honourable Speaker of the House of Commons:

I, Herbert B. Ames, member for the House of Commons of Canada, for the electoral district of St. Antoine, Montreal, do hereby resign my seat in the said House of Commons, for the constituency aforesaid.

Given under my hand and seal at Ottawa, this fourteenth day of February, A.D. 1921.

Herbert B. Ames. (L.S.)

Witness, W. S. Middlebro.
Witness, Howard P. Whidden.

I would direct the attention of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister to the fact that it is set forth in this declaration that it was given under the hand and seal of Sir Herbert Ames at Ottawa on the 14th day of February, 1921. The 14th of February was the day of the opening of the present session of Parliament. I would also direct his attention to the fact that the witnesses to the declaration are the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) the chief whip of the Government party, and the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Whidden). It is known that Sir Herbert Ames has not been in Canada during the present year; he has been in Europe and has been there for some months.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I regret to have to remind the hon. gentleman that while I wish to allow every latitude in the statement which he is making for the purpose of leading up to a question, it would be highly improper on his part to make any argument on the Orders of the Day when there is no subject before the Chair. The hon. member, if he desired to go into the question fully, would have an opportunity to do so at any time on a motion to go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no desire to present an argument, but I regard it as material to an understanding of the significance of the questions which I am about to read that I should direct the attention of the House to the date to which I have just referred. The first question with reference to the resignation of Sir Herbert Ames was asked by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) in the course of the debate on the Address. This question, which was asked on March 2 and will be found on page 489 of Hansard (unrevised), was as follows:

There is another matter to which I wish to direct your attention, Mr. Speaker. On July 21, 1920, the hon. member for Ste. Antoine, Montreal (Sir Herbert Ames), delivered a very eloquent address before the Empire Parliamentary Association in London on "The Dominions and the League of Nations." This address was printed, and I have a copy of it in my hand. With your permission, I will read the following words from page 5:

"Now, I have just returned from a hurried visit to Canada. Mr. Balfour has alluded to the double capacity which I occupied at that time, and for the moment still occupy. For sixteen years I have been the representative of Western Montreal in the Canadian House of Commons. My resignation is in the hands of the Speaker because I have found that my new work is quite enough to occupy all the time and attention that I am capable of giving to it."

This was on July 21, 1920. Why should the electors of St. Antoine, Montreal, be disfranchised? Why has the resignation of Sir Herbert Ames been kept secret and withheld? I am sure that it must have been intercepted on its way to Your Honour, because you could not have it in your hands without acting upon it—but that is always the humiliating method of avoiding an election and evading a defeat. Shall this be permitted to continue? Will the Canadian people stand for that much longer?

To this question, you, Mr. Speaker, made the following reply immediately upon conclusion of the speech of my hon. friend:

Mr. SPEAKER: Two references in the speech of the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) make it highly essential, I think, that the position of the Chair should be stated clearly and beyond all question. ....

The second reference to which I wish to allude has to do with the statement credited to the hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) that his resignation was in the Speaker's hands. The House will at once realize that it would never do for the impression to go abroad that the Speaker was a party to withholding a document of that character.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER: I therefore deem it my duty to make it clear to the House that I have not in my possession the resignation of the member for St. Antoine, nor have I ever received a document which was, or which purported to be, the resignation of his seat in this House.

On March 3, the day following, I addressed the following question on the Orders of the Day to the right hon. Prime Minister. It will be found on page 506 of Hansard:

THE MEMBER FOR ST. ANTOINE, MONTREAL

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: Is the Prime Minister aware, of the hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) having made any public declaration to the effect that he had tendered his resignation as a member of this Parliament? Has the Prime Minister or any other member of the Government received an intimation from that hon. gentleman of his desire or intention to tender his resignation?

To this question the right. hon. the Prime Minister replied:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN: I have seen no public declaration made by or on behalf of the hon. member for St. Antoine, nor have I received any communication that I can give to the House.

On March 4 the following question by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) appeared upon the Order Paper; it will be found in Hansard, page 608:

REPRESENTATION OF ST. ANTOINE, MONTREAL

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Is it true that the member for Saint Antoine, Montreal, has sent in his resignation as a member of the House of Commons?
2. If so, when was it received by the Speaker of the House?

It was replied to as follows, by you, Mr. Speaker:

Mr. SPEAKER: The answer to the first question is, No. The second question is answered by the reply to No. 1.

In justice, Mr. Speaker, to Sir Herbert Ames himself and to hon. members of this House, I should like to ask the Prime Minister how it comes that this document, bearing the signatures of hon. members opposite as witnesses, happens to be dated at Ottawa on the 14th of February, of the present year, when Sir Herbert Ames, so far as is known, was in Europe at that date and has been in Europe all of the present year? Assuming that the declaration was made on the date set forth, the second question I should like to ask my right hon. friend is, who is responsible for having withheld this important document from you, Mr. Speaker, for over a month, from February 14 until March 17? The third question is, in view of the existence of this declaration by Sir Herbert Ames, what explanation has the Prime Minister to make of the answers given to the questions I have just quoted?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): Noting, as I have, the formality with which the leader of the Opposition has framed his questions and the rather long recitals which preceded them, I suggest that it would have been fairer had he given me notice of the subject matter; but that has not been his practice. However, there will be no difficulty at all in replying to his questions. Every answer given in this House by the Government as read by my hon. friend is absolutely correct. I knew of no public declaration Sir Herbert Ames had made; if Sir Herbert Ames himself had stated—I had not seen the statement before—that his resignation was at the time mentioned in the Speaker's hands, it could not have been correct. His resignation was not in the Speaker's hands until shortly before the time Mr. Speaker announced it. The fact is that Sir Herbert Ames had his resignation made out and left with a friend, to be dated within certain limits fixed by him. His instructions were fully carried out and the resignation forwarded accordingly.

TEMPERATURE OF THE CHAMBER

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): I would like to direct the attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. McCurdy) to a matter which, while not of urgent public importance, is of some importance to the members of this House. I refer to the temperature of the Chamber. For a week or more the Chamber has on frequent occasions been extremely draughty and quite cold, and I would like to ask the Minister whether it is not possible for him to make such arrangements as will enable us to do business in ordinary comfort.

Hon. F. B. McCURDY (Minister of Public Works): The complaint which has been made by the hon. member has come from various parts of the Chamber, and concurrently complaints have come from other members that the temperature is too high. The official in charge of heating has instructions to keep the temperature of the Chamber as near as possible to 67 degrees, which, I believe, is proper for a House of this character whether on the Government side or in the shades of Opposition.

INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. JACQUES BUREAU (Three Rivers and St. Maurice): I see by an Ottawa despatch in the Montreal Gazette that the Prime Minister has notified all parties interested in the Lake of the Woods control legislation to appear at Ottawa to present their case on Monday next at 11.30 o'clock. Have the parties representing the Americans and the parties representing Canada on the International Joint Commission also been notified? I will put the question otherwise. Has the International Joint Commission been notified to appear with the Manitoba, Ontario, and other people interested?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): That is, on Monday at 11.30?

Mr. BUREAU: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. Monday at 11.30 has been fixed as the date on which any parties interested in the legislation who wished to make representations against it may be heard by the Government. The International Joint Commission, neither American nor Canadian section, has, so far as any knowledge has reached us, any objection to this legislation.

CANADIAN LOAN TO ROUMANIA

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Verchères): I should like to call the attention of the Government to an article appearing in the Montreal Gazette this morning regarding the Roumanian bonds. The article reads:

> Roumanian bonds pay no dividends. Canada's chances of securing interest soon are very slim. Canada's chances of securing payment of the interest on the bonds representing the $25,000,000 loaned to the Roumanian Government two years ago as a trade credit has practically disappeared for the present.

The article further states:

> The Roumanian Government now states that it is unable to pay these bonds, and proposes that they be renewed for one year, offering to pay interest at the rate of 8½ per cent instead of the 5 per cent originally fixed.

Is the Government aware of these facts, and has any proposition been made to the Canadian Government regarding a settlement of bonds and interest?

Hon. Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Minister of Finance): My recollection is that this matter has already been dealt with by a formal question and answer already given to the House. It is not new. The interest has not been paid. The only thing Roumania is now suggesting is that we should agree to defer our claim for interest, so that that interest would not be in default.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Has the Government arrived at any decision?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The Government is endeavouring to collect the debt.

[Mr. Bureau.]

TRADE WITH RUSSIA

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. THOMAS VIEN (Lotbinière): There appears in this morning's papers an article relating to the resumption of trade between Great Britain and Russia. Is it the intention of the Canadian Government also to resume trade relations with Russia, and in that case, will the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) have his trade agents instructed to see what business openings are available for Canadian trade or will he leave Canadian interests to look after the trade themselves. I would point out to the right hon. gentleman that, owing to the difficulties of communication with Russia at present, it might be preferable that his trade agents be instructed to look out for business openings.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): If my right hon. friend will kindly refer to Hansard of yesterday, he will find my answer to a question which is almost precisely the same as his.

Mr. McKENZIE: May I ask the Minister of Finance if there is such a thing now as a Russian national currency?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Minister of Finance): I am afraid that that is a question of which due notice ought to be given.

CATTLE EMBARGO

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (George Etienne Cartier): I see by the press that Mr. Lloyd George has declared that a commission is to investigate shortly the matter of the embargo on Canadian cattle. Has the Government any official knowledge of that and, if so, does it intend to be represented before or on that commission?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): The Government has received a communication from the High Commissioner to the effect that such a commission was promised by the British Prime Minister. The terms of the commission have not yet reached the Government. It will depend upon the terms of the commission what action we should take, but I would think, undoubtedly, the Government would see to it that the facts in support of Canada's contention will be fully and carefully laid before that commission.

THE IMPERIAL CONFERENCE

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): Has the Prime Minister observed a despatch stating that the Prime Minister of Australia intends to acquaint the Australian Parliament with the subjects to be taken up at the approaching conference in London and to give that Parliament an opportunity of discussing them? Is it my right hon. friend's intention to give this Parliament the same statement and a like opportunity?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): I had not observed any statement by the Australian Prime Minister to the effect described by the hon. gentleman, but I had myself moved in the matter and a little earlier than he. I have already given this House, in outline, the subjects that will probably be discussed. The exact agenda has not yet reached us, but the three important topics that had been suggested were stated in an answer made about three weeks ago to the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault) and the answer to his question went on to state that, should it appear the desire of a substantial number of members that special opportunity be afforded in this House for discussion, it would be provided. Ever since that, at any time on occasions when subjects such as that might be brought up, the subject might have been discussed. Should further information reach us making certain that other important topics would be considered, I will feel it my duty to state those topics or their substance to the House.

SUPPLY

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Item No. 4 Justice—salaries—contingencies—

Mr. BUREAU: The consent of the House is necessary before this item is called, because the Estimates of this particular department have not been taken up before.

Mr. DOHERTY: We had understood—I hope, not misunderstood—that we would be permitted to go into Justice. Might I remind the hon. gentleman that I did not absolutely insist on my rights the other evening and, perhaps, one good turn deserves another.

Mr. BUREAU: I claim that a minister who wants to go on with his Estimates like this, should, before going on, ask for the consent of the House.

Mr. DOHERTY: I quite concede that. If I was under a misapprehension, I am sorry, but I thought the House understood that I was to go on.

Mr. FIELDING: It was announced definitely last night that agriculture would be taken up.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And Justice.

Mr. FIELDING: The Prime Minister said any others might be taken up.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I said Justice as well.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Members of the House must consent to that. The announcement of my right hon. friend is not sufficient.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I quite agree with that, but let me read what I said last night:

> Mr. Fielding: What business will be taken up to-morrow?
> Mr. Meighen: The motion to go into Supply.
> Mr. Fielding: On the same Estimates?
> Mr. Meighen: On the same Estimates and those of the Department of Justice, and any others that we may have a right to go on with.
> Mr. Bureau: That is rather vague.
> Mr. Meighen: I do not think that there are any others that we have a right to go on with, consequently they could not be taken up but by consent. If we do ask for consent it will be on the Estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce. If all those go through, we will proceed with Government orders.

So the Department of Justice was specially mentioned, it being the understanding, as I was informed by my hon. friend, that he would be permitted to go on, in view of the fact that he did not insist on his right to go on with his Estimates on Tuesday night, I think it was, when they were reached.

Mr. BUREAU: My object is not to raise any opposition, but to affirm a right. I do not think this vote should be called by the chairman before a formal motion is made asking for the unanimous consent of the House. There is no objection to giving unanimous consent, but it ought to go on the record that that is the proper procedure.

Mr. DOHERTY: I quite recognize that I am not entitled to proceed without the consent of the House, and I beg through the chairman to ask whether the House is prepared to consent to my taking up the items I have mentioned.

The CHAIRMAN: The point raised by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) is, of course, as admitted by the right hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) well taken. The Estimates of the Department of Justice having not yet been taken up this session, and this being Friday, it is necessary that the committee should give its unanimous consent before these Estimates can be considered. Is it the unanimous desire of the committee that the Estimates of the Department of Justice be now considered?

Mr. BUREAU: Carried.

Mr. CAHILL: If the objection of one member is sufficient to prevent the Justice Estimates being proceeded with now, I wish to object.

Mr. FIELDING: May I ask my right hon. friend what is the difficulty about proceeding with the Agriculture Estimates? We were in the midst of a very interesting discussion last night, and we do not want to lose the thread of our thoughts.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no objection at all to proceeding with Agriculture first, but I understood from the Minister of Agriculture last night that there were only four items left, and we thought it would likely expedite matters if we went on with the Justice Estimates first, and took up the four remaining items in the Agriculture Estimates later. I think the long experience of my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's will lead him to concur with me in that expectation.

I do not want to call attention to the fact that the Government might have insisted on its right to go into the Justice Estimates the other night, especially as it promised that ample opportunity would be given for a motion on going into Supply on another day on the Justice Estimates. That having been done, I think it is hardly fair that objection should be raised. However, it has been raised, and we will go on with the Department of Agriculture.

Department of Agriculture—Publications, $34,500.

Mr. LEGER: Would the minister explain what these publications are?

Mr. TOLMIE: Our Publications Branch was located at 66 Queen Street, but we are now moving to the Robinson Building on the same street. We publish what is known as the Agricultural Gazette. It is published about six times a year, and has in its columns all the latest information regarding agriculture. It is distributed to the Departments of Agriculture in the various provinces, institutions of learning, agricultural societies, and members of Parliament. The Publications Branch also maintains a distribution office, through which the reports and bulletins of the department are issued. During the last five years this branch has distributed some 13,000,000 bulletins and during seven months of the present year 1,150,000. The branch also prepares press notices.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. LEGER: Are these publications intended to be distributed to the agricultural societies in the different provinces? If that is not already being done, I think it would be a very good idea, because while these societies may get instructions from other sources, direct instruction from the Minister of Agriculture by means of these reports would be of great assistance to the farmers.

Mr. TOLMIE: Is my hon. friend referring to the Agricultural Gazette?

Mr. LEGER: Yes, and other publications of the Branch.

Mr. TOLMIE: The general course followed is to distribute the publications to those who directly apply for them. We have found that if distributed freely, the publications often fall into the hands of men who have no particular interest in them, do not read them, and consequently do not benefit. But when a man takes the trouble to write a letter for a certain publication, we assume that he takes an interest in the work in question, and the publication is sent with some beneficial object in view. We do not distribute except to people who send in an application, but we gladly send our publications to those who do.

Mr. LEGER: I would suggest that the different publications be sent either to the Governments of the different provinces, or to the secretaries of the agricultural societies in each province. In New Brunswick we have about eight or ten agricultural societies. I think this would afford a direct channel of instruction to the farmers throughout the country, and would prove very valuable.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Does the minister think that the nation gets full value from the expenditure on the Agricultural Gazette and these various leaflets? This item is not a very large one, and I have no desire to obstruct, I need not tell my hon. friend, but we all realize the need of economy, and it has got to be begun somewhere. There is nothing I am more struck with in connection with government generally than the deluge of printed matter that descends upon the heads of members of Parliament and, I assume, upon the Senators also. It would be a mistake for me to judge the activities of my fellow-members by my own, so I will content myself with saying that I have not time to read anything like all the material that is sent to me, not only from this department but from other departments of the Government. If I did, I should have no time for the Scriptures, and that would be a very serious matter for me, as for other hon. members. I see my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) smiles, but it is not quite a smiling matter, I may tell him. Is the minister quite sure that we get value in these publications? Thirteen millions of leaflets is a tremendous crop. I am not sure that all the crops raised under the Department of Agriculture bear anything like a fair relationship to this one. But I am confident that if this particular crop is meant for seed, then more of this seed goes to waste in the ground than most of the other crops raised under the direction of my genial and able friend.

Mr. McKENZIE: Perhaps the minister will allow me to ask a question before he replies to my hon. friend. Is there any systematic scheme of circulating these blue books that are printed in the department? From my own knowledge the information contained in some of these publications is valuable and so long as money is expended in printing them, and the postage is free, I think it is unfortunate that this literature should not find its way to the farmers. I am sure it would do them some good. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), says that his whole time is occupied in reading the Scriptures. Well, if he does not gain any better results from his reading of the blue books than he does from his perusal of Holy Writ, I would say let us publish no more blue books. However, that is a mere aside. When the money in connection with this work is spent and the pamphlets are published, it is really too bad that they should be thrown away from year to year. But it is evident that they must be discarded if they are not sent to the farmers, and a little extra labour would put them into circulation so that the people generally, and particularly the farmers, would be able to get the benefit of the information thus published. Let me urge upon the minister the necessity for the widest possible circulation of all literature prepared by his department.

Mr. TOLMIE: First of all, for the information of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), I think that excellent results are obtained from the distribution of these bulletins. We do not distribute them except to those who send in their names with a request to be placed on our mailing list. Those who desire to have these publications select bulletins dealing with the particular line of work in which they are interested, and the mere fact that they go to the trouble of writing to the department and requesting that they be supplied with these publications, is abundant evidence that they are interested and are anxious to have information. As a pratical farmer and stock man I have derived a great deal of benefit, not only from our Canadian bulletins, but from United States publications. For a number of years I kept my name on the mailing list at Washington for agricultural bulletins, and I can assure the committee that on various occasions the information contained in a single publication, if followed, was enough to ensure success, while ignorance of the instruction imparted would, in all probability, mean failure. Now, let me make it clear that we carefully watch the situation in order to prevent any waste in these pamphlets, and the plan of sending publications only to those who request them has worked out as economically as any scheme could.

Mr. DECHENE: How much per year is spent on the Agricultural Gazette?

Mr. TOLMIE: The expenditure for this year is $18,000.

Mr. STEIN: Will the minister be kind enough to see that copies of all his publications are distributed throughout the county of Kamouraska? I had occasion to refer to this matter the other day. The agricultural school at St. Anne de la Pocatière, as I was informed by the professor a few days ago in a letter which I sent to the King's Printer, has not been receiving all the bulletins published by the department. The same thing applies to the classical college in the same place. The greater part of that institution was destroyed by fire last winter, and the library containing over 35,000 volumes was completely wiped out. I wish the Minister would note these facts and see that these institutions are properly supplied. I might add that the school of domestic science for girls at St. Pascal is also in need of such publications of the department as are suitable for the work there. I am sure the minister recognizes the needs of these schools. As I said the other day, his deputy frequently visits the county of Kamouraska and is aware of its importance, and I think he will agree with me that the requests of these colleges for these publications are only reasonable.

Mr. TOLMIE: Both these institutions are now on the mailing list, but if they are not receiving a sufficient number of copies of any publication, or, as the hon. member suggests, are not receiving some publications at all, I shall be only too glad to look into the matter and see to it that they are both properly supplied.

Mr. STEIN: The minister is evidently overlooking the third. May I remind him of the school for girls at St. Pascal?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I have seen in the press the statement that the department has decided to discontinue the publication of the Gazette, the explanation being that the ground is so well covered by agricultural magazines throughout the country that there is no great necessity for this particular publication. I have in my hand another publication issued by the department, and one which has been very freely distributed throughout the western part of Ontario in all public places such as banks and post offices, where there is a fine stack piled up on desks for people to make use of. There is on the cover of this publication a map showing the location of the various farms, and the following inscription accompanies the picture:

In the above map, note the location of experimental farms and stations. The superintendent of the experimental farm or station nearest to you will be pleased to give you any information in his power. Why not communicate with him?

Well, it is rather unfortunate, as one may discover from a study of this map, that the experimental farms are practically all in Eastern and Western Canada. It is true that about five hundred miles west of here there is a little tobacco farm in the county of Essex, I think, or Kent. But many of the people throughout Western Ontario are not very much interested in the growing of tobacco. I would suggest that if it is not the intention to provide experimental farms in western Ontario, then this circular should be distributed where it is more acceptable, because it is an absolute waste of money to publish this pamphlet and leave it in public places in that part of the country for distribution when there is not one person out of a thousand in Western Ontario who is greatly concerned about the growing of tobacco, and that is the only farm with which people could communicate. More than that, this circular has, in the past, been very largely circulated in the Old Country, having been available there in the emigration offices, and I want to point out that it conveys a very unfair impression to the prospective immigrant regarding this country. He looks over this map and sees the location of these farms, and finds that Ontario is scarcely recognizable on the map. West of the Great Lakes you will see the circular dotted with experimental farms and stations, there being no fewer than thirty-one altogether, while in Western Ontario, there is a little farm in the bush, away north on the Grand Trunk Pacific, and a little tobacco station at Harrow. If the minister wants to economize, I suggest that he send no more of these publications into Western Ontario until there are some radical changes in the experimental farm system.

Mr. DECHENE: I have frequently read some very interesting articles in the Gazette. They are usually not written by officials of the department, and I wonder whether the contributions are paid for.

Mr. TOLMIE: They are free contributions.

Item agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: I now repeat the request made by the Minister of Justice for the unanimous consent of the committee to take up the Estimates of the Department of Justice. Does the committee give its unanimous consent?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Justice—Salaries, $190,832.50; Contingencies, $25,000.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): I notice a good many increases. I presume they are statutory increases allowed from year to year.

Mr. DOHERTY: They also include the results of the recent reclassification.

Mr. PROULX: Who is the Assistant Deputy Minister?

Mr. DOHERTY: Mr. Edwards.

Mr. PROULX: Who is the senior advisory counsel?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not in a position at the present moment to mention who is the senior. But the accountant of the department will be here in a moment or two and then I will be able to give the hon. gentleman that information. I may say that this ranking of seniors results from the classification of the Civil Service people who divided the counsel into senior advisory counsel and junior advisory counsel fixing different salaries according to the position.

Mr. GOULD: I notice that the Deputy Minister of Justice receives a salary of $10,000 a year whereas the Deputy Minister of Agriculture only receives $5,500, and the deputies of other departments $6,000. Does the minister consider that discrepancy fair and equitable?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not in a position to say what would be a fair and equitable salary for the deputy minister of agriculture, or the deputy minister of another department; but parliament in 1913 or 1914, fixed the salary for the deputy minister of justice at $10,000 and it has continued at that figure ever since. I am quite confident we would not be able to obtain the services of a counsel of the eminence and high qualifications of the gentleman who is at present Deputy Minister of Justice at any lower figure than the salary that is provided.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I see there are eight lawyers employed in the department as counsel—3 senior advisory counsel, 2 advisory counsel and 3 junior advisory counsel. Has any one of these eight gentlemen any special duties, is he supervising any part of the law department, or are they all on the same footing and working in the same branch?

Mr. DOHERTY: They are all working under the direction of the deputy minister, taking up such matters as he assigns to them. I may say that we have two gentlemen who are especially qualified in the law of the province of Quebec, and who occupy themselves principally if not entirely with matters under that law. I can now inform my hon. friend (Mr. Proulx) that the senior advisory counsel are Mr. Renaud, Mr. Chisholm, and Mr. Bill.

An hon. MEMBER: Bill who?

Mr. DOHERTY: It is not an undue familiarity. That happens to be his surname.

Mr. PROULX: There are two other advisory counsel and three junior advisory counsel. The designations are new, I never saw them in the Estimates before.

Mr. COPP: It is the work of Griffenhagen.

Mr. PROULX: How many lawyers have been appointed to the department since 1911?

Mr. DOHERTY: The designations to which the hon. gentleman refers are the result of the classification as applied to existing officers. I do not think we have made one addition to the number this year, in fact the estimates show that 4 p.m. to be the case. As the hon. member knows, the department was classified in common with all the other departments, and this system of classification was adopted in which the lawyers employed in the department were divided into senior advisory counsel, advisory counsel, and junior advisory counsel.

Mr. PROULX: Are they appointed by the Civil Service Commission and are their salaries fixed by that body?

Mr. DOHERTY: Their salaries were fixed by the Civil Service Commission. They were already in the department before the present Civil Service system came into effect. If the hon. gentleman will refer to the Estimates he will see that there are no new appointments.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will the minister say which of these officers appoints the lawyers who represent the department before the different courts in the respective judicial districts?

Mr. DOHERTY: I think that as a rule the lawyers are selected because of the nature of the different cases. It is not a matter of practice to appoint a lawyer to do all the business in a district. In many instances it does happen there is one lawyer who deals with practically all the cases; but as I understand the practice, lawyers are selected rather with a view to particular cases and the particular business to be done. That selection is usually done by the assistant deputy minister in consultation with the deputy minister, and occasionally with the minister.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The reason I ask the question is that I happen to be in the courts quite often and I see the Department of Justice represented in many cases, but in no single case during the last few years have I seen a lawyer who happens to be a Liberal representing the department. In these days when there is "no political patronage" I would like to know what officer it is who knows the lawyers so well as to always select the few Conservative lawyers, in the city of Quebec for instance, when there is a case in which the Department of Justice is interested?

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall make enquiry as to who has that particular scent.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is a matter of intuition.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: It must be a matter of instinct.

Mr. BUREAU: I understand there are law officers in every department of the Government. Do these officers relieve the counsel of the Justice Department of any of their work, or do the latter take up en banc the various questions that are submitted to their department after the law officers have passed on them?

Mr. DOHERTY: Everything is subject to review by the Department of Justice as provided in the statutes. When matters call for litigation, or serious questions arise, they are always submitted to the Department of Justice. I understand that these law clerks—I think it is rather a misnomer—are in the different departments for the convenience of being available with regard to purely routine matters that require to be dealt with from day to day.

Mr. PROULX: When the Crown is represented in the courts by the officers of the Department of Justice—the deputy minister or some of these counsel,—and costs are allowed to the Crown, who gets those costs, the department or the counsel?

Mr. DOHERTY: The Crown gets the costs—when they are paid.

Mr. McMASTER: It seems to me that when a lawyer acting for the Crown is successful and gets costs, surely that should be enough to encourage him to do as well the next time or better.

Mr. COPP: Every lawyer does the best he can at all times.

Mr. DOHERTY: That argument is of general application, but we are fortunate in having lawyers who do so well that they need no encouragement to do better.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: Has the vacancy caused by the retirement of the warden at St. Vincent de Paul filled; and if so, by whom?

Mr. DOHERTY: That really comes under the penitentiary item which we shall be dealing with in a minute or two, but I have no objection to giving the information now. The warden at St. Vincent de Paul has retired, and the question of appointing his successor in going through the machinery of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): I notice on page 75 of the Estimates that one law clerk stenographer receives $2,100, but no others received more than $1,200. I also notice that the highest-paid senior law clerk stenographer gets $1,740. How does it come about that one clerk who apparently is not a senior is receiving so much more than even the senior law clerk stenographer?

Mr. DOHERTY: I believe the explanation of that difference is that that particular officer is under the old system under which law clerk stenographers got an annual increase, and it is simply by the number of years that that law clerk stenographer has been in the service that that result has been brought about.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): Has he the same duties to perform as those who get only two-thirds of his salary?

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not know that the duties can be described as being much heavier. t was the law though, and this lady—I am sure that will appeal to the hon. gentleman—gradually acquired this large salary by reason of the additional number of years she has been in the service; and I suppose, from a lady's point of view it is worth a good deal to have to admit the acquisition of those additional years. However that may be, I may say that that particular employee is about to retire, so the anomaly will disappear.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): I do not suppose that, like the laws of the Medes and Persians, this system cannot be changed. It seems to be very unfair.

Mr. DOHERTY: Of course, it would be very unfair where a party was appointed under a certain system, and acquired a right under that system, to deprive her of that right. However, the lady is retiring very shortly.

Mr. MICHAUD: What is the duty of the confidential messenger?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: He is a political booster.

Mr. DOHERTY: No, the position is purely non-political. The confidential messenger is a personal messenger of the minister, and it must be apparent that many things have to be dealt with, other than those political, where the minister needs a messenger in whom he can place implicit confidence.

Mr. PROULX: I see in the Estimates "Allowances to Private Secretaries." Has the minister two private secretaries?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes; and I am blessed in the fact that they are both bi-lingual. One is a gentleman whose mother tongue is English and the other is a gentleman whose mother tongue is French. We have a very considerable French correspondence in the department, and I do not think we would be able to get along with less assistance in that regard.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Does not the minister think that that would be a good rule for all the departments?

Mr. DOHERTY: I always seek to set the kind of example that ought to be followed.

Mr. COPP: What salaries are being paid to these private secretaries?

Mr. DOHERTY: One gets $3,360 and the other $3,180.

Mr. COPP: Does that include $600 allowance to each?

Mr. DOHERTY: No, that is the salary without allowance; but that $600 is divided between the two secretaries.

Mr. COPP: The allowances to private secretaries are given at $1,200.

Mr. DOHERTY: The other $600 is for the secretary of the Solicitor General.

Mr. COPP: I have never been able to understand why these allowances are made to private secretaries in addition to their salaries. Why should not their salaries be inclusive?

Mr. DOHERTY: That is a survival of an old practice also, and it applies to all private secretaries appointed under that system.

Mr. COPP: I know it does.

Mr. DOHERTY: Under the old practice, when a private secretary was appointed he became a clerk in the department with the salary attached to whatever class he was assigned to, and this $600 allowance was made because of the fact, as I understand it, that the private secretary of the minister—differing in that respect from other clerks—is not called upon to attend simply during the fixed hours of the day; he has to be at the disposal of the minister late and early when the minister needs him.

Mr. COPP: Late possibly rather than early.

Mr. DOHERTY: In some instances more often late than early. But it may be a little more burdensome on some persons to be late. I understand that is the reason why that special allowance was fixed. With regard to those to whom it still applies, they are gentlemen who were in that position when that was settled, and to take it away from them now would be equivalent to reducing their salaries.

Mr. COPP: I have no desire to suggest that it should be taken away. I only wanted an explanation, because I find it all through the Estimates and I really did not understand why their salaries came from two sources.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: What is the name of the purchasing agent of the department?

Mr. DOHERTY: Mr. Dillon.

Mr. PROULX: Is that gentleman still in business as a druggist?

Mr. DOHERTY: Not that I have any knowledge of.

Mr. PROULX: Is it not the rule that the purchasing agent of a department must not engage in any outside business; that he must give his whole time and attention to the work of the department?

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand there is such a general rule, not with regard to the purchasing agents particularly, but with regard to Civil Service employees.

Mr. PROULX: Can the minister say that Mr. Dillon is not engaged in the business of selling drugs?

Mr. DOHERTY: I have no knowledge of his being engaged in that business. There is a firm which is managed and administered, so far as my knowledge goes, by other people; I do not know whether or not he is a stockholder in the concern: I can ascertain that if the hon. gentleman is interested to know. I know that Mr. Dillon has given most active and energetic service to the department; I have never found that he was not available when needed.

Mr. McMASTER: Shortly before the session opened, the members of Parliament received a circular letter from a gentleman who described himself, if I mistake not, as the head of a purchasing commission, which had been formed in direct contradiction to the will of Parliament. The matter was brought up last session and the session before and an attempt made to form a purchasing commission, but the measure was not carried because hon. gentlemen on both sides were opposed to it. Shortly before the session opened a commission was formed by Order in Council. This being the case, why should there be any purchasing agents for the different departments?

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken when he suggests that a purchasing commission was appointed in direct opposition to the decision of Parliament. He is quite mistaken, and so is the hon. gentleman who shakes his head, because I do not think either of them know the nature of the commission that was appointed under Order in Council. It was a totally different thing from what was contemplated by statute; it made provision for general supervision and direction, by one body, of the purchasing of the different departments. Even when we had a purchasing commission with the wider powers, appointed under the War Measures Act, that commission acted in direct communication with the purchasing agents of the different departments, who submitted to the Purchasing Commission their operations. When the supervisory or directing commission to which the hon. gentleman refers was appointed, the same system continued as between them and the purchasing agents of the different departments.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Was there a purchasing agent for the Department of Justice before the War Purchasing Commission was instituted?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: The same one?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: What is the name of the confidential messenger?

Mr. DOHERTY: Mr. Pearson, a gentleman whose services we had to dispense with during the war because he was engaged in the trenches. Of course, his position was retained for him.

Item agreed to.

Justice—Miscellaneous Expenditure, $10,000; living allowance for judge of Atlin district, B.C., $1,200; office expenses of purchasing agent, $2,000.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): I would like to ask why an appointment of a judge has not been made in the Yorkton judicial district. Since the death of Judge Parker some time ago, that district has been without a judge. A court house has been erected at a cost of between $150,000 and $200,000. I am informed that the judicial district of Yorkton is the second largest in Saskatchewan, and the Law Association there are very anxious that an appointment should be made.

Mr. DOHERTY: We had a general intimation from the provincial authorities that they were contemplating such regroupings as might result in a diminution of the number of judges to be appointed. We did not, therefore, make haste to fill all the vacancies that existed.

Mr. PROULX: What is comprised in the item "miscellaneous expenditure"?

Mr. DOHERTY: The item covers costs of administration of justice in the Northwest Territories as now constituted and in any unorganized territory; expense incurred in connection with extradition cases and cases of fugitive offenders from or to other parts of the Empire; expenses of commission of inquiry; copies and translations of evidence required in dealing with applications for clemency; sundry small expenses not otherwise provided for. This is the usual amount that we ask for. The expenditure last year was $7,560; in 1918-19, $8,361; in 1917-18, $9,905.34. I do not think it is possible to estimate it any more closely.

Mr. PROULX: Why is there a living allowance for the judge of Atlin district, B.C.?

Mr. DOHERTY: It was provided for at the time of his appointment. We went into the question a year or two ago whether the conditions still justified the payment of this living allowance, and we satisfied ourselves that they did. It is further to be said that the gentleman accepted the appointment with that provision made at the time. Quite apart from that, however, the district is a remote one and I think that the conditions fully justify the granting of a living allowance.

Mr. PROULX: Is the cost of living any higher there than elsewhere?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not prepared to give the details just now. As I stated, we went into the question a couple of years ago, and we felt satisfied that it was preferable to continue the allowance. It must further, of course, be considered whether it would be right, years after the gentleman had accepted the appointment with this allowance attached to it, for us to intervene now to take it away. Such action might, perhaps, be open to question. In any new cases, we have avoided providing such allowances, and with the exception of the Yukon where an allowance is provided by law, this is the only case of the kind.

Mr. LAPOINTE: As questions concerning judges are now in order, I should like to ask an explanation regarding what appears to be a conflict of opinion, or a misunderstanding, with regard to the number of judges in the judicial district of Quebec. Last year, according to the new law concerning the organization of tribunals in that province, the number of King's Bench judges was increased. As my right hon. friend will remember, the judge who was sitting for the district of Beauce (Mr. Justice Flynn) was appointed to the King's Bench court, and the district of Beauce has been deprived of a judge for over a year until recently a new judge, I think (Mr. Justice D'Auteuil), was appointed for that district. What happens is this. One of the judges of the judicial district of Quebec, Mr. Justice Cannon, died some time ago, and the vacancy has not been filled. Is it the intention of the minister to appoint a judge to replace Mr. Justice Cannon, or is it true that this vacancy will not be filled? There is a misunderstanding about the matter.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is not the present intention to make a nomination to fill the vancancy to which the hon. member refers. In the first place, the delay in regard to the district of Beauce in particular, was, I think, attributable to the fact that a modification of the provincial law is in contemplation so as to do away with the attachment of judges to particular districts. At one time, it was anticipated that that modification would go through more promptly than has proved to be the case. When it became evident that there was to be a delay, we filled the position in the district of Beauce. I think there was a misunderstanding about an additional judge in the district of Quebec. At the time that the system in the province was changed, whereby the number of judges in the court of appeals was largely increased and the number of judges in the superior court was decreased, legislation of the province was so enacted as to call for a new additional judge. At the time I felt very strongly in regard to the matter, and I called the attention of the Attorney General of the province to the fact that, when there were being made in the constitution of the courts in our province, changes involving such a large additional burden upon the Dominion treasury, it seemed to me to be not an occasion for increasing the number of judges, but, on the contrary, an occasion on which an effort ought to be made to avoid such increases as that. I may say that I believed the strongest justification for a change in the system was that it ought to conduce to making a lesser number of judges necessary. I am not suggesting that there should be a reduction from the old number, but the change ought to conduce to avoiding the necessity of an increase in the number. At the time that legislation was under discussion between us, I clearly pointed out that I thought there should not be an increase at that time, and in the legislation which I proposed should be enacted in this House, I did not contemplate making provision for both the numerous increases that were involved in salaries and a further increase in the number of judges. It is true that, if we read our statute as we passed it last year, there is room under it for an additional judge. That was the result of an error, pure and simple and this is how it came about. Under our previous statute there were enumerated a certain number of judges for the district of Montreal and a certain number for the district of Quebec, and the section went on to say that when the Chief Justice was in the other district, one of the fixed number would be the acting Chief Justice. In drawing up the new statute provision was made in a separate section for the acting Chief Justice, and then precisely the same number of judges was repeated when it came to deal with the puisne judges, it being overlooked that we had taken one of those and provided for him under the title of acting Chief Justice; so that when I went over the number for the purpose of satisfying myself that we were not increasing the number, I found that, owing to the fact that I have just mentioned, we did not apparently in words at all events, increase the number. I think our friends in Quebec ought to realize—and I trust there is a disposition to do so—that they should not press at the present time for an increase in the number of judges. Let the new system have a trial, and let us see whether it will produce, what I think we all agree in hoping it will produce, namely, results which will make it possible to carry on with a smaller number of judges. One would think the concentration ought to produce that result. For these reasons, I did not have in contemplation making a nomination for that additional judgeship at the present time.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The net result is that there is one judge less for the judicial district of Quebec, and legal business is suffering very much on that account. There is, at the present time, an accumulation of cases, and all the lawyers and, of course, their litigants are complaining about the matter. If there is no change such as my right hon. friend suggests, namely, that all the judges should reside in Quebec and administer justice there, and tour the district, I do not see what the remedy will be.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am assured by the Premier of the province, who has transmitted to us a Bill for that purpose, that he intends to put the Bill through this session. I do not, however, want to tie that hon. gentleman down, because something may happen. And I cannot control the matter. Moreover, I rather understood that any immediate overcrowding that there was, was in large measure due to the unfortunate fact that certain of the judges were not in good health and, therefore, not able to carry on their work at the moment. I think the hon. gentleman will realise that the remedy for a momentary condition like that is not by increasing the number of judges, because we hope these gentlemen will recover their health, or in case they should not recover, they will be replaced by gentlemen capable of carrying on the work. I have every hope there will be goodwill enough in the province, in which I have confidence, and in that particular district of it, at all events, to give us a fair opportunity to try out the system and see whether we cannot carry on without an increase in the number of judges.

Mr. PROULX: What is the limit of leave given to a judge who is in poor health and who is not able to fulfil his duties?

Mr. DOHERTY: The law makes no absolute provision as to what leave you can give. Of course when a judge is so ill as not to be able to go to court and do his work, it does not make very much difference whether you give him leave or not, because if he is in a condition where he cannot do the work, the work will not be done because you refuse to give him leave. Last year—and I am pleased to mention this, and I should like hon. gentlemen to think it over—I did give notice of a resolution looking to a petition for such modification of the British North America Act as might make it possible for the Government in instances where a judge's usefulness had entirely ceased, without its being a question of misbehaviour on his part, to have the facts established and to have the judge removed. I gave notice of that resolution, but did not proceed with it because I was given to understand there would be very strenuous opposition to it and I did not desire to propose a resolution looking to an amendment of our Constitution unless there would be substantial agreement upon it among the members of this Parliament. I take this opportunity of mentioning it again, and I would be glad if hon. gentlemen would give a little thought to the matter, and see if they cannot alter their attitude, in which event I should be glad to re-introduce the resolution.

There is a very serious difficulty that arises under the present provision of the British North America Act. A judge is appointed for life—he is appointed, rather, during good behaviour. I think that is an excellent provision so far as it goes. It, of course, makes the judge absolutely independent; he is quite beyond any governmental control, and I think that in principle that is quite right. The only method by which, even if you charge him with misbehaviour, any action can be taken looking to terminating his holding of office is by an impeachment before both Houses of Parliament, and every one will realize that that is a very cumbersome mode of procedure, even if it be applicable in all cases.

Then there is this other consideration. The judge is appointed, as I have said, during good behaviour. Now it is perhaps susceptible of suggestion, perhaps more than suggestion, that the mere fact that a judge has ceased to be physically able to do his work is not a case of bad behaviour—though I may say, speaking for myself, personally I would be disposed to believe that where a judge has become incapable of doing his work, it can hardly be described as good behaviour—for him to insist on holding his office and refrain from resigning. Now we have in different parts of the country some cases, at all events, where I think that is fairly the situation, and it was to enable us to deal with such cases that I made the suggestion last year.

Mr. PROULX: I approve the minister's suggestion. I do not think any distinction should be made between Supreme Court and County Court judges in the matter of incapacity to perform their duties. If a County Court judge is not capable of performing his duties, and does not want to ask for superannuation, the Government can force him to retire. I do not see why that should not apply also to Superior Court judges. There are some judges who have not performed their duties for many months, and perhaps have no prospect of performing them in the future, but they do not want to ask for superannuation because they are drawing a higher salary than they would receive if retired. But the interests of the litigants suffer, and I think it is only proper that the Government should be given power to force those judges to ask for superannuation.

Mr. FORTIER: With regard to the reorganization in the province of Quebec, I have already drawn the attention of the Minister of Justice to how it is working in a part of the province, especially the district of Hull. I think the reorganization has not proved a great success, especially in that part of the province. In principle, centralization was good for the larger centres. It gave them the advantage of having a greater number of judges, but in the rural districts, especially those that are remote, such as the district of Hull, the result has been to deprive them of the judges who were administering justice. I drew the minister's attention to that state of affairs lest sesion. Since the new law has been in operation, I have no complaint to make of the Chief Justice in Montreal, but our district has not had the advantage of having the requisite number of judges to administer justice. Under the reorganization, Quebec and Montreal have been considered the two main centres of the province, but there are also two other centres of some importance, Three Rivers and Sherbrooke. I think the city of Hull should have been included with these two, on account of its importance. In the matter of population it is larger than either Three Rivers or Sherbrooke, and for these reasons and in view also of its remoteness from Montreal, I think it should have been included with these other two cities. Whether it is on account of the small number of judges, or because we are a considerable distance from Montreal, the fact remains that we did not have a judge to attend to our term. We used to have one residing judge, and a second judge administering justice in Hull, and we used to have twenty or twenty-one days of term every month. It was necessary for the expeditious despatch of business that two judges should administer justice there, but since the new law has been in operation, we have not had five days of term every month for the administration of justice. We have, however, sometimes had the advantage of a judge from Montreal, and we appreciate that very much. I think it is my duty to call the minister's attention to this state of affairs, and I hope he will confer, if necessary, with the Chief Justice in Montreal, or with the Attorney General of the province, in order that the necessary number of judges for the administration of justice may be appointed, and also in order that this reorganization may be amended in order to have the city of Hull placed on the same footing as Three Rivers and Sherbrooke, so that we will have the privilege of residing judges in the future, as we had in the past.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman doubtless appreciates that I am quite powerless with regard to determining how the districts shall be divided, or where the judges shall reside. That is a matter absolutely for the provincial authority to determine. As for conferring with the Chief Justice, or with the Attorney General or Prime Minister of the province, I certainly will always be most happy to do so whenever they may think that my advice or a conference would be of service, but the hon. gentleman can understand that I have no quality to go forward and force any opinions of mine upon either of these gentlemen, whose duties are perfectly clearly defined. However, if I should be consulted on the matter, I shall be glad to bring to their attention what the hon. gentleman has represented with regard to conditions in his own particular district.

Item agreed to.

Exchequer Court, Canada, $8,333.34.

Mr. McKENZIE: In this court, I understand, we have two judges, and if I remember rightly, provision was made a couple of years ago to appoint a third. Does the Government intend to make that appointment shortly?

Mr. DOHERTY: The matter is not in contemplation at present, although I should not like to speak positively. My impression is that the provision for the third judge was repealed. I may be wrong, but I had that idea. At present there is a president of the court and one judge. We have had no representations recently of there being any pressing need for a third judge, and the matter was therefore not in immediate contemplation.

Mr. McKENZIE: I remember distinctly that provision was made for a third, and it never occurred to me that it had been repealed.

Mr. DOHERTY: I will send for the Judges' Act of last session. I am rather of the opinion that that Act made no provision for more than one judge in addition to the president of the court.

Mr. VIEN: Whilst the Chief Justice of the Exchequer Court is acting on the Grand Trunk arbitration, is there a judge ad hoc?

Mr. DOHERTY: No judge ad hoc has been appointed. We have not had any representation upon the subject, but in the statute there is a provision for such appointment if necessary upon representation.

Mr. VIEN: Is it the intention of the Government also to appoint a judge in Vice Admiralty in the district of Quebec in the near future? I may point out that last year there were several cases pending before the Exchequer Court in Admiralty district, in the district of Quebec, and we were long delayed in the hearing of them because we had to wait until a judge in Vice Admiralty of the district of Montreal, who is at the same time a judge of the Superior Court of that district, could come down to the city of Quebec, a thing which I think could easily be avoided if, as heretofore, a special judge were appointed. Since the death of Sir Basil Routhier, no judge has been appointed in the Vice Admiralty district of Quebec. Does the minister intend to appoint one in the near future?

Mr. DOHERTY: I cannot at the present time announce a decided view upon that subject. We have in the past appointed a judge of the Superior Court or, in some cases, a judge of the Court of King's Bench, to act as Vice Admiralty judge. There was one such judge in Montreal and one in Quebec. It has been suggested from respectable quarters, and there seems to be a good deal to say for the proposal, that there is no special reason why we should pick out a particular judge to discharge these duties. It has been said that the business might be more expeditiously disposed of if we left it as a matter in which all the judges of the court should have jurisdiction, without appointing a special Vice Admiralty judge. Of course, there has to be a Vice Admiralty court. As I say, I am not prepared to announce any final decision on the subject, but it has been under consideration, and we should come to a conclusion shortly. There would then arise the question, even if we decided to maintain the appointment of a distinct judge, whether there is really business to call for two judges in Vice Admiralty, in the province of Quebec. However, the matter will have careful attention.

Mr. VIEN: I would suggest that a judge in Vice Admiralty be appointed instead of giving jurisdiction to a number of judges. Cases in Vice Admiralty, though numerous in the course of a year, are not so numerous as ordinary cases, and jurisprudence in Vice Admiralty cases is also quite different from ordinary civil jurisprudence. Now, if a judge were specially appointed, he would be better qualified to administer justice in Vice Admiralty cases than would be an ordinary judge of the civil court, no matter how devoted the latter might be to the performance of his duties. In this respect I think we were very fortunate in the past, as much in Montreal as in Quebec, in having judges well posted on precedence as well as on general jurisprudence in Admiralty cases; and I venture the suggestion that for the proper administration of justice it would be preferable to appoint a judge to have special jurisdiction in these cases. Such a man would be more familiar with the jurisprudence and law on these subjects than a judge who did not specialize in this direction.

Mr. DOHERTY: There is certainly force in the suggestion.

Mr. PROULX: The Chief Justice of the Exchequer Court hes been acting as a member of the Grand Trunk arbitration board for some months. Is he paid a salary or does he get fees for acting as arbitrator?

Mr. DOHERTY: There is a provision in the statute for remuneration to be paid by both parties to this particular arbitration. I do not think that the amount of the remuneration has been fixed.

Mr. STEIN: I would suggest to the minister to allow the judges in the different judical districts in the province of Quebec to act as judges under the Bankruptcy Act. In the judical district of Kamouraska, we have had a few assignments already under that new law, and we have encountered great difficulty and inconvenience by reason of the fact that we have no local judge. We have to apply to the judge in Montreal, and I think that the judge appointed under the Bankruptcy Act in Montreal will find enough to occupy him in the district of Montreal alone. All local judges should be appointed as judges under the Bankruptcy Act.

Mr. JACOBS: I oppose that contention of my hon. friend.

Mr. STEIN: You want them all in Montreal.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is well I did not speak before I discovered where you stand.

Mr. JACOBS: As I understand the Act, the object of appointing one judge for each province was to obtain uniformity in the new law respecting bankruptcy. Under the Bankruptcy Act, the judge can delegate certain powers he has to the local judge from time to time. Bue when it comes to dealing with large and important questions under the Bankruptcy law, it is well to have one judge in order that there might be no difference of opinion between the local judge and himself. Judges differ in the same way as lawyers, and if we had twenty-five or thirty superior judges, dealing with bankruptcy, the effect of the law would be rendered nugatory before we get very far. I think my hon. friend knows that under the Act the registrar has certain considerable powers; and when necessary, the Bankruptcy judge visits these districts from time to time to apply the law. I am opposed to the view of my hon. friend.

Mr. CANNON: I think the contention of my hon. friend from Kamouraska (Mr. Stein) is a very good one. If the argument advanced by the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) were to prevail, the minister should appoint one judge for the whole of our province. Then we would have uniformity.

Mr. STEIN: Civil and criminal cases are just as important as commercial litigation. Criminal cases require celerty of treatment; that is why we require a local judge in each district. In one case that is pending I submitted some objections that I had to our registrar who argued that he was not authorized to allow them. We wrote to the judge and he would not then had to our registrar, who argued that he express any definite opinion. We had no time to wait until that judge came to the district, and our local judge had no authority to act.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not sure that this is a matter that rests with the Minister of Justice to deal with. If my recollection of the Bankruptcy Act is correct, the Minister of Justice is empowered to appoint a judge on bankruptcy for each bankruptcy district so to speak. Now I believe each province is a bankruptcy district. I am of opinion, however, that power is vested in the Secretary of State to divide a province into districts and create a larger number. That would be a preliminary condition before the Minister of Justice could take action in the matter. My own understanding of the Bankruptcy Act, and I speak with deference in the presence of the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) is, that through the powers which the judge in bankruptcy can confer upon his colleagues there is ample provision to meet the immediate wants of a particular district. In that, however, I may be mistaken. Of course, there is this further fact to be pointed out: If the provincial legislation to which I referred a little while ago should be carried out you would not in that event have in each district a resident judge even if you made him a bankruptcy judge. It had occurred to me, however, that if that legislation were carried out it might be a proper thing in the province of Quebec to create four bankruptcy districts, and in the province and there would then be four districts where there would be a resident judge. However that is not my function to determine, it is the duty of the Secretary of State. I shall be glad to confer with him on the subject, see what his view is, and try to establish a balance between the conflicting views of my hon. friend from George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) and my hon. friends from Kamouraska (Mr. Stein) and Dorchester (Mr. Cannon).

Mr. VIEN: Should not these districts harmonize with the judicial districts which now exist? It seems to me that there should be no distinction, and in that event the judges in each district could act under full authority with respect to the Bankruptcy Act as they do under any other Act. Further, in answer to the objection which the minister finds in the fact that the judges now residing in four main places of the province I would say this: These judges attend to the administration of justice in their districts at least once a month, so that there would be very litle delay if they were empowered to deal with these other matters—when they came to administer justice generally they could dispose of the other litigation as well. I think the ends of justice would be better met if they were empowered to act in these other cases, and if the districts created under the Bankruptcy Act were made to harmonize with the judicial districts generally. There is another question I would like to bring to the minister's attention. Under this item we are voting the salary of the Marshal in Admiralty in the district of Quebec. Under what title does it fall?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am informed the registrar is paid by fees. I know that was the practice when I had occasion to deal with the court in Montreal and I should suppose that the same practice prevails now.

Mr. VIEN: We have in Quebec a Vice-Admiralty district. The district is organized, but unfortunately the registrar is obliged to provide all the stationery,—books, pens, ink and other material—and he receives a meagre pittance as far as fees are concerned. We are very fortunate in having a Mr. Bradley, the present registrar, a most competent man, and I think this faithful servant of the state should receive a little better consideration from the Government. I would urge the Government to grant this gentleman a salary, and also to provide him with all the necessary stationery and other supplies which are absolutely essential for the decent upkeep of the office in Quebec. This gentleman is very competent, well posted in the law, very faithful in the discharge of his duties, and should receive better treatment. I would urge the minister to give him a fixed salary, as the fees are so uncertain and vary so much from year to year that it will be impossible when this gentleman, who is over seventy years of age, passes away—at least it will be very difficult—to find a successor.

Mr. DOHERTY: I will be glad to look into the circumstances. Of course the hon. gentleman will see at a glance that if the business is so small that the fees do not provide a living for the registrar, it makes it a serious question whether we should maintain two separate admiralty courts in the province instead of having only one where the business would be sufficient with the fixed fees, to adequately remunerate the registrar. However, I shall look into the matter. It is not the first time I have heard of Mr. Bradley's good qualities and I shall give the subject sympathetic consideration.

Mr. VIEN: As to the volume of business done I may point out to the minister that although in some years the amount is small, in other years it is really very considerable so that the court cannot be abolished. It would be a great inconvenience for those who are subject to Admiralty law in the district of Quebec if the court there were abolished. I would rather recommend to the Minister that he should change the present system; that he should make the fees payable to the Government and pay a fixed salary to the registrar so as to ensure to the department the services of a good man.

Mr. POWER: I was not in the Chamber when my hon. friend from Lotbiniere (Mr. Vien) first spoke, but from what I have gathered he has been protesting to the Minister of Justice because no judge in Admiralty has been named in Quebec since the death of the late Judge Routhier. Now it is very inconvenient for pleaders in Quebec, and for the shipping concerns in that city and district, to be obliged to go to Montreal and pay the extra fee which they have to incur by reason of the transfer of cases to that city. I understand that the bar of Quebec have protested against this and have asked the Minister of Justice to name some judge to replace the late Judge Routhier. I understand that it is possible for the Minister of Justice to nominate a practicing barrister to this position; and there is no real reason why he should not do it. I might say that the leader of the bar in admiralty practice in that province has had considerable experience, and, besides his professional qualifications, is eminently qualified from the standpoint of the minister—he has been a stern unbending Tory for many years, and as one of the pillars of the party in Quebec he has supported his party in its darkest days. Therefore it seems to me that there should be a certain amount of gratitude, even in Tory breasts, and that the minister ought to reward men of that type who have served their party so well and faithfully in the past. I hold no brief for Mr. Pentland. His qualifications are well known to the bar and to the shipping interests of the city of Quebec, and they all agree that he should be suitably recognized. I would recommend to the minister that he take this into consideration, and also the fact that such an appointment is necessary and would meet with the desires of the business community and of the bar.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have already said all I could say upon this subject of the admiralty court. I promised the hon. member for Lotbiniere (Mr. Vien) that in any event we would have a prompt decision. Perhaps I need hardly add that I have taken a note of the very high encomiums passed by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) on our friend Mr. Pentland. I shall treasure up those observations and endeavour to give to each one its due and proper weight. I had not quite realized that the member could make an appeal to which my heart would be so absolutely responsive as the one he has just made.

Item agreed to.

Yukon Territory, $42,300.

Mr. PROULX: The expenses of the administration of justice in the Yukon Territory seem to be very high in proportion to the population.

Mr. DOHERTY: We have managed to decrease them $2,000 this year. I think it must be admitted that the administration of justice in the Yukon costs fairly heavily in proportion to the population of the territory, but it must be remembered that we cannot cut down the expenses as the population dwindles. For instance, we have a judge with a fixed salary; and the other expenses are similar. Certainly we are anxious to keep the expenditure within the limits of what will "carry on" the territory, but we must "carry on."

Mr. VIEN: I think, we should not let the minister run away with the credit for the decrease in the expenditure.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not want any credit.

Mr. VIEN: It would be illuminating to the committee to consider that it is more the good character of the population of the Yukon Territory which is responsible for the decreased expenditure by $2.000, for that decrease has taken place in the item for the maintenance and transport of prisoners, and I would imagine that the number of prisoners has dwindled.

Mr. DOHERTY: And that decrease in the number of prisoners is attributable to the excellent system of government under which crime has disappeared. Surely there can be no higher tribute to the Government.

Mr. VIEN: If the right hon. gentleman takes it in that light, that the increase or the decrease in the number of prisoners is closely related to the good or bad character of the Government, it may be dangerous for him, for we might point out that according to the judical statistics the number of prisoners who are now in our jails has greatly increased as compared with the number there in 1911.

Mr. DOHERTY: I will give an explanation of that when the time arrives.

Mr. VIEN: I know the minister has always a good explanation to offer—at least apparently. However, I quite appreciate the explanation given by the right hon. gentleman in this instance, that the cost of administration of justice is not only dependent on the population, but also is dependent to a considerable extent on the area of the territory to be administered.

Mr. PROULX: I notice a big item for the transportation of prisoners. Is there no jail in the Territory?

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand that prisoners are detained in the Mounted Police establishments, which in the Yukon Territory, as in fact in any unorganized territory, generally serve the purposes of jails.

Mr. JACOBS: I notice that this item includes the maintenance and transport of prisoners. Have we gone back to transportation days? Have we any local Botany Bay? What is meant by "transport of prisoners?"

Mr. DOHERTY: Just what is meant by the transportation the hon. gentleman pays for—but I suppose he does not pay for it—when he comes from Montreal to Ottawa.

Mr. JACOBS: Is the second item, living allowance of Judge, $5,000, in addition to his regular salary?

Mr. DOHERTY: The judge has a salary of $5,000, and in addition has a living allowance of $5,000. That allowance has been attached to the position ever since it existed. I may say that until a few years ago we had three judges in the Yukon, each at a salary of $5,000 and a living allowance of the same amount, but we arranged, quite a number of years ago, with the reduction of business, to reduce them to one. It will be noticed that the salary of this judge is considerably less than the salary of High Court judges in other provinces; against that he has his allowance of $5,000.

Mr. VIEN: Do the officers of the court and the police magistrate receive a living allowance?

Mr. DOHERTY: The police magistrate receives $1,400 as a living allowance; the other officers receive $1,800.

Mr. CANNON: Is the travelling allowance for the judge paid to him whether he travels or not?

Mr. DOHERTY: No; he sends in his bill, just as any other judge does, for his travelling expenses.

Mr. CANNON: How much did he get last year for travelling expenses?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am informed that he got nothing. Dawson and White Horse are the only two places where judicial business is required to be carried on. In fact, the judicial business of the Yukon is not very extensive. We keep a judge there not because there is work, but because, of course, we owe it to that population, small as it may be, to provide means for the administration of justice.

Mr. PROULX: The minister has said that the salary of the judge is $5,000. On page 13 of the Estimates the salary of the judge, territorial court, Yukon territory, is given as $7,000, an increase of $2,000 over the preceeding year.

Mr. DOHERTY: Of course, that is merely for information; the salaries are settled by the statute. I may say that the judge waited on me last week to represent the grave injustice he had been subjected to because his salary had not been increased. At the moment, however, I cannot find any provision in last session's statute increasing the salary of the judge of the Yukon. I think it must be an error in this statement—which, of course, is not, properly speaking, in the Estimates; it is information as to what is to be paid under statute. However, I will make certain and let my hon. friend know.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): I understood the minister to say that the judges are paid travelling allowance according to the actual mileage travelled. Am I correct in that?

Mr. DOHERTY: It is not a matter of mileage. The judge is entitled to his transportation expenses, to $6 as a living allowance for every day he serves elsewhere than at the place he is by law to live, if that place is not a city, and $10 a day if it is a city. They do not send mileage bills; they set forth what were the transportation expenses incurred, how many days they were away, and where they were.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I find in the Auditor General's report that the net sum of $500 was in a great many cases paid for travelling allowance last year. I was wondering how it would work out at $500 in all these cases if the amount of the account depended upon the number of days that the judge served while travelling about.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think the hon. gentleman will find that these are district court judges of Ontario who, I believe, receive a fixed allowance of $500.

[Mr. Cannon.]

Mr. CANNON: Do they get it whether they travel or not?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, it is provided by statute.

Mr. CANNON: How can the Auditor General get over that? How can $500 be paid to a judge for travelling when he does not travel?

Mr. DOHERTY: Parliament thought that in view of the conditions in these districts the judges ought to receive that allowance, and we pay what Parliament has said they ought to be paid.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Have these judges passes on the Government railways?

Mr. DOHERTY: I have no information, but I should think not.

Mr. VIEN: It is quite true that the expenditure authorized by statute covers the salary of the judge in the Yukon Territory, but it seems to me that before we vote the item in respect to the living allowance of the judge, we should be quite positive as to the exact amount of his salary under the statute. I do not object to this gentleman getting $7,000; I think he should get it; but if he gets $7,000 a year as his salary, I would be inclined to think at first sight that his living allowance could be reduced. With $7,000 a year of salary, $5,000 for living allowance, and $500 for travelling expenses, that gentleman would get $12,500, that is to say, $2,500 more than the Chief Justice of Quebec or the Chief Justice of Ontario, and $3,500 more than judges of the superior court or the high courts of justice, or the Court of King's Bench in Quebec. I would not be absolutely definite on the point; but if it is the intention of the minister, as the item would indicate, to increase the salary of this gentleman to $7,000, I would like to study this item of living allowance a little further.

Mr. DOHERTY: The printing of what was intended to be a copy taken from the statute is no indication whatever of any intention in my mind. I would not propose to alter a judge's salary by vote of Parliament. We are not going to vote that $7,000; we are not going to say anything about it. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that, if this gentleman had $7,000 a year of salary, he ought not to have $5,000 of living allowance. I am practically positive that that $7,000 is an error, and I am quite prepared to assure the hon. gentleman that, if this item goes through

I shall verify the fact and if there be any doubt about it, I shall see that a correction is made. I may say that my practical certainty about the matter results from the fact that, within the last week, I have been waited on by the judge urging me to make his salary $7,000 and his living allowance $3,000, and I think the judge would know if his salary was already $7,000.

Mr. VIEN: What is the interest of the hon. gentleman then to urge the minister to introduce a change?

Mr. DOHERTY: If his salary was $7,000 and his living allowance $3,000, the gentleman is of an age to begin to look forward to a cessation of his usefulness, and his pension would be based upon his salary, not including his living allowance.

Mr. VIEN: And it would be fair?

Mr. DOHERTY: I think so.

Mr. VIEN: What is the living allowance of the police magistrate under the item $6,800?

Mr. DOHERTY: It is $1,400.

Mr. VIEN: In addition to his statutory salary of $4,000?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—expenses of litigated matters conducted within the Department of Justice, $13,000.

Mr. PROULX: What is this amount for when we have so many lawyers in the Department of Justice?

Mr. DOHERTY: This is not to pay lawyer's fees at all. This is to carry on litigation which is not litigation which pertains to particular departments and which, of course, we carry on, but the payment of the expenses of which is provided by the other departments. This is for whatever litigation we have to carry on on behalf of the Government which is not chargeable to any other department. It may be that, in cases where we have to retain lawyers on the outside, their fees are paid out of this appropriation. Last year we spent $7,655 for this purpose; the year before, $1,259, and in 1917-18, $5,146. The amount varies from year to year. For a long number of years past we have inserted the same amount in the Estimates.

Mr. VIEN: What is the meaning of the expression "within the Department of Justice"?

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand it would cover items such as this: When applications are made to the Privy Council, we have to provide money to pay counsel who appear to make answer; or when we have occasion to send counsel over, when the matter is conducted by the deputy minister himself, as in many instances it is, where we have no outside counsel, we have to provide for expenses of that kind for carrying on litigation which the department—I was mistaken in referring to outside lawyers—carries on without the assistance of outside lawyers. There is always, in carrying on litigation, expense other than the payment of fees to lawyers.

Mr. VIEN: Do I understand the minister to say that none of that amount goes towards paying fees to lawyers?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not in a position to say absolutely whether it would include any payment to an outside lawyer, but the general nature of the expenditure is what I have indicated, that is, the expense that arises in connection with litigation which is being carried on in the department itself.

Mr. VIEN: Would the minister point out to us in the Auditor General's Report the expenditure of $7,655 which was incurred last year?

Mr. DOHERTY: That would be rather difficult.

Mr. VIEN: Or give us details of the item?

Mr. DOHERTY: I would be very glad to get the details, item by item, for the hon. gentleman if he is interested in them.

Mr. McMASTER: Might it be proper on this item to suggest to the minister the advisability of limiting as much as possible appeals to the Privy Council? Of course, sometimes the Department of Justice will be the respondent and will have to follow the litigant wherever he goes, but in other cases the department may be the appellant. Might I point out to the minister what I am sure is quite unnecessary, that appeals to the Privy Council constitute a depressing element upon our Supreme Court. Our Supreme Court can never rise to the position which the Supreme Court of a nation should occupy so long as it is not the court of final result for the nationals of that nation.

Mr. JACOBS: I am in thorough accord with what my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) has said on this matter. The Supreme Court is a child of our own creation and it does seem to me that the Government ought to see that the child it has created should be treated with proper dignity and respect. We, at least, ought to be satisfied with the decision of the highest court we have created. I concur with every word my hon. friend has said with respect to that.

Mr. VIEN: Does the item on page L-118 in the Auditor General's Report, litigated matters, $7,635, apply to this vote?

Mr. DOHERTY: This must be the vote, because that is the exact amount of which I have a note here as having been spent last year.

Mr. VIEN: I also see this: Exchequer Court of Canada, law stamps, $800. Do I understand this to mean that the Department of Justice when they have litigation pay the law stamps to the Exchequer Court?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, we pay just like any other litigant.

Mr. VIEN: I understand that the law stamp is a tax. Now, kings and sons of kings pay no tax.

Mr. DOHERTY: Does not the hon. gentleman know that the different departments pay customs taxes on what they import? We pay our law tax just as anybody else pays it. It comes around in the end, I fancy, to the same pocket, but just the same we pay it.

Mr. VIEN: Then it amounts to the King paying taxes. That is an unsound principle.

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall communicate with His Majesty and ask him whether he feels badly about it.

Mr. McMASTER: I should imagine it is a mere question of book-keeping between departments. At the same time it is an expense to the Government, as my hon. friend (Mr. Jacobs) has pointed out, to pay customs brokers for passing entries for the different departments. That appears to me to be extravagance, and a work of supererogation.

Mr. DOHERTY: Perhaps my hon. friend will get after the Minister of Trade and Commerce on that subject.

Mr. McMASTER: We will.

Item agreed to.

Annual contribution to the Canadian Law Library, London, England, $500.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Where is that library?

Mr. DOHERTY: It is in connection with the office of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. There is maintained there a law library for the use of Canadian counsel, and we have for a long time paid this annual contribution towards its upkeep.

Mr. McMASTER: That would be saved if appeals to the Privy Council were done away with.

Item agreed to.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Are there any further items under the heading "Miscellaneous"?

Mr. DOHERTY: No, I do not find any. Call Item 35.

Mr. VIEN: May I ask the right hon. gentleman if he does not think that a nation which has attained full nationhood, as Canada has, should dispense with appeals to the insular tribunal of England?

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman will have to give me a little while to take in the full effect of the description of the tribunal as "insular." That may make a very great difference. I would just call the attention of the hon. gentleman to this fact, that the jurisdiction of his Majesty's Judicial Committee continues to exist because this Parliament thinks it ought to exist. When the Parliament of Canada makes up its mind that there will be no more appeals from the Supreme Court to the Judicial Committee, there will not be any more appeals, and when the legislatures of the provinces make up their minds that they do not want appeals from their ultimate court of appeal to the Judicial Committee, there will, as I understand it, be no more appeals. I have never been able to understand why people had to use adjectives like "insular" and others more or less flattering, to express what seems to be in their minds—a sort of resentment of the existence of a jurisdiction which exists because the people of Canada are willing it should exist.

Mr. VIEN: The minister has not answered my question.

The CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. gentleman that there is no item before the committee, and that a debate upon the abolition of appeals to the Privy Council would certainly not be in order upon the Estimates which we have just disposed of.

Mr. VIEN: May I point out to the Chairman that we were discussing item number 296, and if the committee has passed it I must have missed the Chairman's intimation to that effect. The Chairman was very quick indeed in passing that item, because so far as I am concerned I never heard the judgment of the committee to the effect that it had been voted. If it has not been voted, as I believe, I submit that I am quite within the rules, when discussing a grant to a library near the Privy Council, to speak of that institution itself. I await the ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: The item was certainly passed and declared "carried" by the Chair.

Mr. VIEN: Nobody heard it.

The CHAIRMAN: The Minister of Justice was further asked what would be the next item called, and after looking through the list he asked me to call item 35. I think the other members of the committee are all aware of that fact.

Mr. VIEN: I would like to call the attention of the Chairman to the fact that before passing an item, the question should be put to the committee. I do not believe the question was put on this item.

The CHAIRMAN: I have already stated to the hon. member that the question was put to the committee and the item was declared carried.

Mr. VIEN: I might point out to the Chairman that on the next item I shall watch for that feature.

Penitentiaries, $1,371,600.

Mr. McMASTER: I see that large increases are provided for the penitentiaries, especially in connection with the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is a reflection on the province.

Mr. McMASTER: It would appear to me that some explanation why the expenditure has increased so greatly in the province of Saskatchewan is due to the committee, in view of the character and demeanour in this House of the representatives from that province, which somehow gives one the idea of respectability, honesty, and other virtues.

Mr. DOHERTY: There are two explanations, neither of which reflects upon the virtue of the province of Saskatchewan. We have made Saskatchewan the scapegoat, having laid upon her the sins of the province of Alberta in the matter of penitentiaries, so that she is now carrying a double burden of fault. That was done for motives of economy, as I think everyone will realize. We can carry on, with overhead expenses of one penitentiary, much more economically than if we had two institutions to the same number of persons. In addition to that there have been very considerable necessary improvements to the penitentiary buildings themselves at Saskatchewan. If hon. gentlemen will turn to the details which are given immediately underneath they will see wherein there are increases. There are increases in salaries and retiring allowances, attributable, in the first place, to the reclassification, and in the second place, to the fact that we have a larger number of officers because the number of convicts, if not double what it was, has very largely increased. In the item "Lands, buildings, and equipment" there is an increase of some $60,000, all of it rendered necessary, as I am instructed, and as I have reason to know, from work that has been going on for some time, by the necessity of enlarging the accommodation afforded by these buildings.

Mr. EULER: Has there been any great increase within the past year in the number of convicts as compared with previous years? If so, what is the reason?

Mr. DOHERTY: In the western provinces there is no increase in the sum total of criminals. In the eastern provinces though, I am sorry to say, we have an increase of between 70 and 80 per cent in our penitentiary population. At Kingston I believe the increase is 70 per cent.

Mr. EULER: Between 70 and 80 per cent?

Mr. DOHERTY: I was in error in that respect. Taking the entire eastern part of the country the increase would be about 48 per cent.

Mr. EULER: What is the nature of the crimes for which the prisoners have been sentenced?

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand they are very largely crimes of violence, in which there has been an increase.

Mr. McMASTER: Can the minister state the increase in crimes for the province from which we both come?

Mr. COPP: Is it a crime to come from that province?

Mr. DOHERTY: The superintendent tells me that a year ago the penitentiary population of St. Vincent de Paul was 465; it is now 554.

Mr. JACOBS: Probably there has been an increase in population.

Mr. DOHERTY: There is an increase of 89 prisoners in the total number.

Mr. FIELDING: What about Dorchester?

Mr. DOHERTY: The increase there is from 229 to 336.

Mr. EULER: Can the minister give us the number of prisoners confined in the respective penitentiaries?

Mr. McMASTER: Where is Dorchester?

Mr. DOHERTY: In New Brunswick; it serves the three Maritime Provinces. The convicts in the various penitentiaries are as follows: St. Vincent de Paul, 554; Kingston, 722; Manitoba, 195—which is chargeable partly to Alberta—Saskatchewan, 194; British Columbia, 142; and Dorchester 336. These figures are as at the last day of last month.

Mr. JACOBS: What is the cost per head of these convicts?

Mr. DOHERTY: Including all expenditures, such as buildings and every other sort of outlay, it is figured that the convicts cost $1.61 per head per day.

Mr. PROULX: What has become of the property of the Alberta penitentiary?

Mr. DOHERTY: The surface rights of the property are still owned by the Government. There are valuable mining rights in the property, such as coal deposits, which mining rights have been disposed of. We called for tenders for the sale of the property, but the prices were not satisfactory, and we are confident that the part of wisdom is to wait until a better opportunity offers rather than to try to sell now.

Mr. PROULX: What has been done with the buildings themselves?

Mr. DOHERTY: The buildings in part have been removed, the materials having been found valuable for use in other penitentiaries. I am told that we utilized in that way for other purposes $185,000 worth of material, all turned to good account.

Mr. PROULX: Were the buildings demolished?

Mr. DOHERTY: They have not all been destroyed. One of the cell blocks was demolished and the material carefully taken out preserved for use elsewhere, thus being of greater advantage to us than it would be if we tried to sell it. The demand in the market for penitentiary buildings is not particularly great.

Mr. JACOBS: I understand that the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary convicts are working overtime at election ballot boxes. Is that true?

Mr. DOHERTY: I have not heard that they were working overtime.

Mr. JACOBS: Well, devoting all their time to this work.

Mr. DOHERTY: Penitentiary labour has been utilized, I believe, in the making of ballot boxes, at the instance of the Chief Electoral Officer.

Mr. VIEN: Will those boxes be used shortly?

Mr. DOHERTY: We expect they will be used in the temperance referendum.

Mr. COPP: What is allowed each prisoner in the way of discharge expenses?

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand that each man on discharge gets $10, with transportation expenses to the place from which he came. Besides this, he gets a suit of clothes, including an overcoat.

Mr. COPP: Are those clothes made in the institution?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. PROULX: Are the clothes made in the penitentiaries sold outside?

Mr. DOHERTY: No, we do not sell anything outside.

Mr. JACOBS: Who is the present warden of the Dorchester penitentiary?

Mr. DOHERTY: Mr. William Meighen.

Mr. JACOBS: Was he recommended by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes. He was appointed through the Civil Service Commission and by promotion.

Mr. EULER: What articles are manufactured in the Kingston penitentiary?

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand the men are instructed in practically all the trades—mason work, stone cutting, carpentering, tailoring, boot and shoe making, blacksmithing, machine work. They also bake bread, do quarrying work, and carry on farming on a very extensive scale. We do our utmost to furnish them with employment of as diversified a kind as is possible.

Mr. COPP: When did the vacancy occur in Dorchester penitentiary to which Mr. Meighen was appointed?

Mr. DOHERTY: I think at the beginning of March about a year ago.

Mr. COPP: When was the appointment made?

Mr. DOHERTY: It took some little time I think as the mills of the gods grind slowly.

Mr. COPP: It would be better for the minister to say "the mills of the lords."

Mr. DOHERTY: At all events regardless of whose mills they are they do not grind as fast as they might. I believe it was in June that the finished product was turned out.

Mr. COPP: Who occupied the post prior to that appointment, and what was the cause of the vacancy?

Mr. DOHERTY: Mr. Pipes occupied the position and he was retired on account of failing health.

Mr. COPP: Was anything paid to him in the way of an honorarium, and if so, how much?

Mr. DOHERTY: He was paid the gratuity to which he was entitled under the provisions of the statute.

Mr. COPP: How much was that?

Mr. DOHERTY: I believe $6,000 was the amount. He had been for a lengthy period of years in the service.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queen's, P.E.I.): Was there no superannuation allowance?

Mr. DOHERTY: No.

Mr. VIEN: Was he retired at his own request?

Mr. DOHERTY: He resigned.

Mr. COPP: Upon request?

Mr. DOHERTY: Well, his state of health was such that he would naturally want to retire.

Mr. COPP: Was he not requested to retire by the Government?

Mr. DOHERTY: I think when it became quite evident that his health was not such as to enable him to properly per-6 p.m. form his duties, the officers of the department in the discharge of their duty would call his attention to the fact. I think that was done.

Mr. COPP: I should have thought he would have realized that himself.

Mr. DOHERTY: If the hon. gentleman had as much to do with public employees as some other people have he would not be so willing to assume that a man is always ready to recognize when the days of his usefulness have gone by.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not referring to some people who have a sure and certain knowledge of the general public demand. I am talking about gentlemen who are occupying salaried positions, and we find there is not a terrible readiness on their part to come forward and say "I am not as well as I used to be."

Mr. COPP: I quite agree with my hon. friend. I have not had the long experience that he has had, but if his experience were mine I would be willing to retire when people wanted me to.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have no doubt the hon. gentleman would, but I think he would be surprised to learn just how soon the people would want him to retire.

Mr. COPP: That is the way with my right hon. friend.

Mr: FIELDING: How would the minister define the difference between the dismissal of an officer and a demand for his resignation? What is the difference?

Mr. DOHERTY: Well I should not say there would be any very material difference between the dismissal of an officer and a demand for his resignation; but an intimation, or rather a suggestion, to an officer that in view of his condition of health it would be proper for him to retire, seems to me to differ from a demand for his resignation.

Mr. FIELDING: It is a case where a wink is as good as a nod.

Mr. DOHERTY: I must say that I think that the officer in charge would be sadly failing in his duty if he did not call the attention of an official who was breaking down in health to the fact that it would be better for him to resign. I think it would be only the part of kindness not to leave such official there until the person in authority felt compelled to dismiss him, leaving him without any opportunity to obtain what the law intended him to attain when, owing to broken down health, his usefulness has ceased.

Mr. VIEN: There is a regulation shortening the time of prisoners in the penitentiary. What is the nature of that regulation and how does it work?

Mr. DOHERTY: Roughly speaking a man with a fairly long sentence may gain about one-third of his time. If my memory serves me, during the first six months a man earns six days in the month of remission of his sentence until he has completed seventy-two days. After that he may earn ten days in the month. I think the system works satisfactorily and it is an incentive to good conduct. A man who misbehaves is liable to have so much of his remission struck off, and I think perhaps a strong motive working on the mind of the prisoner is the desire to shorten the period of his imprisonment.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. COPP: No, the item had better stand until after six o'clock, we have some other matters to bring forward in regard to it.

At six o'clock the committee rose and the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

NORTH AMERICAN TRUST COMPANY OF CANADA

On motion of Mr. Fripp:

that the House go into Committee on Bill No. 15, to incorporate the North American Trust Company of Canada, and recommending that the title be changed to "An Act to incorporate the Scottish Canadian Trust Company of Canada."—Mr. Mowat.

Hon HUGH GUTHRIE (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, in regard to the first Bill on the Order Paper, number 15, to incorporate the North American Trust Company of Canada, I would ask either that the Bill stand over or that it be referred back to the Committee on Private Bills in regard to a change of name. As the House will see, the name of the company incorporated under this Bill is the Scottish Canadian Trust Company of Canada. Obviously, there is a difficulty in that name; but besides that there is a company doing business in Canada at the present time known as the Scottish Trust Company. That company desires to be heard, and states that it had no notice of this proposed change of name, because the Bill, as originally introduced, provided a name for the new company of the North American Trust company. That, however, has been changed by the Private Bills Committee to the name now appearing on the Order Paper, namely, the Scottish Canadian Trust Company of Canada. As the Scottish Trust Company had no notice of the change and desires to be heard, I think the Bill should be referred back to the Private Bills Committee for further consideration, and I would so move.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would point out to the minister that the motion before the House is, that I do now leave the Chair for the House to resolve itself into Committee of the Whole. Action on the specific Bill will have to be in Committee of the Whole, and it would not be competent at this stage to refer it back to the Private Bills Committee. I have no doubt that the Order can stand.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into Committee on the Bill—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Progress reported.

THE CANADIAN BAR ASSOCIATION

House in Committee on Bill No. 3 to incorporate the Canadian Bar Association. —Mr. Jacobs.

On the preamble:

Mr. FORTIER: I expressed my disapproval of this Bill before the Private Bills Committee, and I want to repeat my objection. I do not think the Canadian Bar Association should be allowed to use this title. We have our bar associations in the various provinces and the members of those associations are precluded from practising law outside their own province. So although I might be a member of this Canadian Bar Association I would have the right to practise law only in my own province. Therefore the name is a misnomer. I do not discuss in any way the objects of the association, I think probably they are commendable, and I am only opposed to the Bill on the ground that an association with such a name would apparently entitle members to practise anywhere in the Dominion, whereas such would not be the case. The name might be changed to the Association of Provincial Bars of Canada. I think the Committee will appreciate that my objection is well founded, as the practise of the law in Canada is a matter of provincial right. There can be no such thing as a Canadian Bar Association according to our law, and therefore I think that this Bill should be referred back to the Private Bills Committee in order that some other name may be given to the association.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think everybody will agree with the hon. gentleman that the different bars are provincial in their organization and scope, but that they do not designate themselves by the name "association." I do not think the adjective "Canadian" as applied to this association is intended to be applied for the purpose of designating that there is a Canadian Bar; but it is applied to the association, which is a bar association solely because it is composed of members of the various provincial bars of this country. In other words, it is an association of Canadian lawyers. It is to be borne in mind that although this association is now being incorporated, it has been in existence for a number of years past and has become known under that name, without conveying to any one the idea that it has any pretension of creating a Canadian bar. The provisions of the Bill itself make it perfectly clear that a bar society is not being created in the sense in which we have those societies in each of the provinces; but rather an association is to be incorporated to which all members of our provincial bars are eligible, and it is in that sense, and in that sense only, that it is called a bar association. I do not think any evil can come to us as members of the provincial bars because we recognize the existence of a Canadian association composed of the members of all those bars. The association is certainly doing excellent work for the profession in particular and for Canada as a whole in bringing together from all the provinces representative members of the profession. These men get together in this association and discuss on the plane of our common Canadian interests matters that particularly pertain to the profession. It seems to me that perhaps the hon. gentleman is a little too apprehensive of the possible meaning that might be attached to the name of this association. I think the Committee should hesitate before depriving this recognized association of the name by which it has been known, and for which it has earned a very creditable reputation, and a name that I think Canadian lawyers as a whole would like to continue to be attached to the association which they have formed, composed of lawyers without distinction of the different bars to which they belong.

Mr. PROULX: I am of the opinion of the right hon. Minister of Justice. I think the objections of my hon. friend from Labelle are not well founded. In the English provinces the name "Bar" has not the same signification that it has in Quebec. I understand that in Quebec the Bar is the body that regulates the admission to the study and practice of law; in Ontario we do not use the word "Bar" in that sense. The corresponding institution in that province is the Law Society of Upper Canada, a very old organization, dating from 1792. If we adopt the title suggested by the member for Labelle, it might be mistaken for some other bars which have been abolished in the different provinces. A Canadian Bar Association was formed about twenty-five years ago, and has since carried that name. I submit that the objection made by my hon. friend is not well founded and that there should be no change in the name.

Preamble agreed to.

Mr. VIEN: I rise to a point of order. I do not find a copy of the Bill on my file, and I cannot get it. I note further that it is not printed in French. I ask therefore, that the consideration of the Bill be deferred until the rules are complied with.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member in charge of the Bill may consent to its being allowed to stand, but as a strict matter of right I must say that any objection to the fact that the Bill is not printed in both languages must be raised before the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. VIEN: Under what rule, please?

The CHAIRMAN: The rule asked for by the hon. member from Lotbinière (Mr. Vien) will be found on page 508 of Bourinot. It reads as follows:

> The letters E.F. on the Order Paper will show whether that has been done. If any objection be made on that ground, it will prevent the Bill being taken up for its second reading on that day. But if the motion has been made and the debate allowed to proceed thereon, it will be too late then to raise an objection as to the printing in French.

Mr. FORTIER: I really think that the Bill has been printed in French; as a matter of fact, I saw a copy of it in the Private Bills Committee. But that reminds me of another objection I have to make. In the French translation the Bill reads "bill pour incorporer la 'Canadian Bar Association'." I think that the name also should be translated so as to read, "L'Association du Barreau Canadien."

Bill reported read the third time and passed.

GILMOUR AND HUGHSON LIMITED

House in committee on Bill No. 14, respecting Gilmour and Hughson, Limited, and recommending that title be changed to "An Act to amend an Act to incorporate Gilmour and Hughson, Limited"—Mr. Fripp.

Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—distribution of purchase money and interest ratified.

Mr. CAHILL: Would it be in order for the hon. member in charge of the Bill to give some explanation at this time of the reasons why this matter should be brought before Parliament in the form of a Bill instead of being dealt with in the usual way, through the department of the Secretary of State?

Mr. FRIPP: This Bill simply asks that the Dominion Act respecting Gilmour and Hughson Limited be amended to allow the shareholders to distribute among themselves a certain sum of money which they have received in part payment for the sale of their assets. Gilmour and Hughson have sold all their limits and assets to the Riordon Company and have been paid $500,000 on account. Nobody is interested in this sum except the two families, the Gilmours and the Hughsons; there are no creditors. It is simply asking Parliament to amend their Act so that the moneys may be distributed among those entitled to them as they are paid in, and until the purchase is finally concluded. The purchase price can only be paid out under the proposed legislation by the unanimous consent of all the shareholders, and, as I have intimated, there are no shareholders except the two families.

Mr. MARTIN (Halifax): Was that Bill not before the committee yesterday and deferred for further consideration?

Mr. FRIPP: No, the Bill was in committee yesterday and thoroughly discussed and, as it now appears, was unanimously approved.

Mr. VIEN: I do not quite understand the hon. member's explanation. Why is special legislation necessary in this case? Could not these moneys be distributed without special legislation?

Mr. FRIPP: The distribution of the assets cannot be made under the original Act unless the company is wound up. They do not want to apply for a winding-up order, because if they did, they would be asking for something that might be very injurious to them if all the payments of purchase money were not made in due course. the only way that they can distribute the first instalment of $500,000 amongst the shareholders is by having their Act amended giving them that power. That is all they are asking for by this Bill.

Mr. VIEN: The hon. member assures the committee that there is no objection to the Bill from any interested party?

Mr. FRIPP: None whatever.

Preamble agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: There is a recommendation from the committee—this can, of course, only be carried out on the third reading—that the title of the Act be changed to "An Act to amend an Act to incorporate Gilmour and Hughson Limited."

Bill reported, and read the third time.

Mr. FRIPP moved that the said Act do now pass and that the title thereof be "An Act to amend an Act to incorporate Gilmour and Hughson, Limited."

Motion agreed to, and Bill passed.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING

Bill No. 24 for the relief of Frank Alexander Staunton.—Mr. Smith.

SUPPLY

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Penitentiaries, $1,371,600.

The CHAIRMAN: When the House rose at six o'clock, the Estimates of the Department of Justice were under consideration. We had reached item No. 35, penitentiaries, $1,371,600. The item had been discussed, but the discussion had not yet terminated.

Mr. COPP: I notice quite a large increase amounting in all to $275,000, the increases going all through the different penitentiaries. Can the minister give some details in regard to the Maritime penitentiary situated at Dorchester? For instance, the first item, salaries and retiring allowances, amounts to $83,000 this year, whereas, last year it was $60,000. What is the reason for the increase? How many officials are in the institution and what are their salaries? How many have retired?

Mr. DOHERTY: The increase is attributable to the classification. The classification affects not merely the amount of salary, but the amount of retiring gratuity, the retiring gratuity consisting of a certain number of monthly payments, I think a month for each year that a man has served, but based on his average salary for the the three years preceding his retirement. Thus an increase in salary means also an increase in gratuity to those retiring, and the increase in this particular penitentiary is almost entirely attributable to this cause.

Mr. COPP: Has the minister a list of those proposed to be retired during the coming year who will come under this? An increase of $28,000 for one institution is very large.

Mr. DOHERTY: As regards retirements that may happen in the future, we can proceed only by an estimate; we cannot say now in advance that a certain man will be retired during the coming year. If we did, that man might die before he was due to retire.

Mr. COPP: Of shock?

Mr. DOHERTY: We do not retire people indiscriminately at a fixed age. A man's retirement depends upon his usefulness. If he breaks down so that he cannot be useful to the penitentiary, we will retire him. There may be men to-day in possession of all their faculties and capacities—we cannot determine in advance that they may have to be retired—but in the course of a year they may fail. We can proceed only by making an estimate based upon past experience of what we anticipate will be required for that purpose.

Mr. COPP: Is that item of $50,000 for lands, building and equipment, for the purchase of land, or what?

Mr. DOHERTY: It does not include the acquisition of any land; it is for the completion of a new cell wing, the installation of proper waterworks, and the maintenance of the necessary building repairs.

Mr. MICHAUD: I understand the Government in the past bought a large farm adjoining this penitentiary and that the convicts are working on it, cultivating it, daily during the summer season. Has this farm been a paying proposition during the last few years? What kind of crops are grown? Are cattle raised? What is the income from the farm?

Mr. DOHERTY: The income from this farm last year was $21,000. If we take the penitentiaries as a whole, the value of the products of last year, taken at ordinary wholesale prices, was some $94,000. I think we have every reason to recognize that our farming operations have been carried on to advantage.

Mr. MICHAUD: How many acres does the farm comprise?

Mr. DOHERTY: About 900 acres at Dorchester. I am told most of it is marsh land; it is not all available for cultivation.

Mr. EULER: The minister told us this afternoon that in the Kingston Penitentiary the number of inmates was 722. What staff of officials and employees is required to take care of those inmates?

Mr. DOHERTY: The permanent staff at Kingston penitentiary is at present 98.

Mr. VIEN: Are the various supplies necessary for the maintenance of the penitentiary purchased by tender? Let me cite a few items: woollen from the Amherst Woollen Mills, Truro, $5,639.

Mr. DOHERTY: Tenders are asked for and the purchasing is supervised by the Purchasing Commission. In this particular instance, tenders were asked for.

Mr. VIEN: Was the contract awarded to the lowest tenderer?

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand contracts are always awarded to the lowest tenderer. The purchasing is done under the control and direction of the Purchasing Commission.

Mr. VIEN: And the minister is responsible to Parliament so far as that commission is concerned.

Mr. DOHERTY: I take my responsibility for the purchasing, and I am assured that in this instance, as in all instances, the contract was awarded to the lowest tenderer.

Mr. VIEN: Were tenders also called for in connection with that item of $4,523, purchased from the Canadian Cottons at Montreal?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am told that tenders were called for in that case that in fact they are called for in the case of all purchases, the calls being sent out by our own purchasing agent under the direction of the Purchasing Commission.

Mr. VIEN: How are they called?

Mr. DOHERTY: The forms are sent out under the direction of the Purchasing Commission.

Mr. VIEN: To whom?

Mr. DOHERTY: To all those from whom the Purchasing Commission considers you could expect to purchase goods of the kind.

Mr. PROULX: Has the department purchased any supplies for the penitentiaries from the Militia Department? I see by the newspapers that some distributors in Ottawa, Smith and Carey, for example have blankets, sheets, and comforters for sale, from the Department of Militia. If these could be supplied to the penitentiaries, they would not cost as much as if they were bought from the wholesale merchants.

Mr. DOHERTY: We have had quite a number of articles transferred from the Militia Department and from the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, without payment, of course, the goods belonging to the Government. As the result of the cessation of the war there has been an overplus in the Militia Department of some goods, and where there has been an overplus of articles in any department that we required for the penitentiaries we have had them transferred to us.

Mr. CAHILL: By what authority is the Purchasing Commission operated?

Mr. DOHERTY: The Purchasing Commission as I explained this afternoon, is operating under an Order in Council providing for the supervision and direction of the purchasing operations of the different departments. There has been some confusion—I do not know whether the hon. gentlemen has that same thing in his mind —between the Purchasing Commission so operated, and the Purchasing Commission which existed with special powers under the War Measures Act. The present commission is a commission appointed by the Governor in Council to supervise the general purchasing operations of the different departments, so that there may be one common direction.

Mr. CAHILL: I do not wish to get into a discussion about the Purchasing Commission, but I have a recollection of an attempt to pass legislation in this House in two previous sessions creating a purchasing commission, and I merely wish to know if this present commission has been foisted on the public by Order in Council after it had been refused by Parliament. Is it the same commission, the same personnel?

Mr. DOHERTY: It is a body with quite different powers. The Purchasing Commission which it was proposed to constitute by statute would have been a body exercising authority and power under the direct statutory enactment of this Parliament. The present Purchasing Commission is purely a body appointed by Council—Council having the supervision of the purchasing of all the departments—to exercise a power of supervision and direction over the purchasing operations of the departments generally. It is quite a different body from what was contemplated under the proposed statute which never was enacted. If the hon. gentleman will carry his memory back he will remember that Parliament voted a special sum of money to provide for the expenses of this purchasing body, the explanation I am giving now having been given at that time.

Mr. CAHILL: Is the personnel of the present commission the same as that of the other commission?

Mr. DOHERTY: The personnel of the present body is not the same as the personnel of the Purchasing Commission under the War Measures Act.

Mr. VIEN: Would the minister cite the statutory power which the Government had to pass such an Order in Council appointing such a commission?

Mr. DOHERTY: I can give no specific statutory power that we had to do that, but the Government has not only the power but the duty to administer the business of the country, and each one of the departments makes its purchases subject to its responsibility to the Government. The entire Government is responsible for the operations of each department. That being so, it was thought wise to appoint a body that should endeavour to co-ordinate these different operations and see that some common principle ran through them all, but the entire power of that body is the power of the Governor in Council. Its functions are to assist the Governor in Council in carrying out that part of its duty of administering the public affairs which involves seeing that the purchasing is done, so far as possible, under the best circumstances.

Mr. VIEN: But the right hon. gentleman will not tell this House that the Governor in Council has the right to appoint a commission without statutory power, general or specific? What I wish to know is: what general or specific power had the Governor in Council to pass the Order in Council referred to by the minister?

Mr. DOHERTY: As I tried to make clear, but evidently did not succeed—

Mr. VIEN: I understood very clearly what the right hon. gentleman said, but he did not say everything I wanted.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am afraid it would be quite impossible for me, adhering strictly to the truth, to say all the things the hon. gentleman wants me to say. There are some limitations put on a man when he is trying to tell the truth. Perhaps it does not always happen that the hon. gentleman wants to hear what is the truth. As I said, the Governor in Council is responsible, because it is the executive body, for the administration of the public business.

Mr. CAHILL: Not responsible to Parliament?

Mr. DOHERTY: Of course, it is responsible to Parliament. I did not conceive it was necessary to add those words. We are responsible to Parliament, and through Parliament to the people of Canada, for the proper administration of the general public business, and part of that business that devolves upon the executive is the purchasing of those things required for the Government. The Government adopts what seems to it the best method of ensuring that that purchasing is properly supervised so that the public interest may be fully taken care of, and it designates certain employees to do that. The mere fact that these people are called a commission does not alter the situation in the slightest. The authority of the Government to select people to do the best they can to see that the purchasing is properly co-ordinated is the inherent authority that necessarily follows from the fact of this duty being the Government's. So far as the constituting of that particular body is concerned, the authority of Parliament was given by the vote of Parliament. Parliament voted the money to provide for the constitution of a body of that kind, and it was explained what the purpose of that commission was.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the committee understands clearly that the Purchasing Commission, to which my hon. friend is now referring, is acting under a different authority from that which would have been exercised by the commission that would have been appointed under the Bill introduced last session, had that Bill become law. What is the difference between the function and nature of the Purchasing Commission, as appointed under the Order in Council, and those which would have existed under the Bill as drawn last session?

Mr. DOHERTY: If the Bill had been passed that commission would have been constituted as a statutory body, not dependent upon any particular department, but with functions of its own exclusively. As the matter stands now, it is merely a body of employees whom the Government has designated to supervise the purchasing, and to endeavour to effect the necessary co-ordination so that purchases of similar things for different departments may be made through, and with the co-operation of a body that has knowledge of the requirements in different departments, the knowledge acquired in connection with one transaction being available when dealing with another. The purpose is to establish one common principle that will apply to all departments. The other body, on the other hand, would have had authority of its own. Whereas the present commission acts for the departments, the other body would have been in a sense a distinct department, entitled on its own authority to determine these matters, and to make all purchases. Under the other system, the commission would have been a sort of purchasing department. Here it is a mere committee or commission—the word is immaterial—of officials selected by the Government, to supervise and direct the purchasing of the different departments.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister nas made it clear that there may be a difference in names. But what is the difference in function between this commission or committee existing now and the body that would have exercised purchasing power under the Bill had it been passed?

Mr. DOHERTY: It is a difference between servants of departments, and of the united departments as represented by the Government, and a body constituted by Parliament to control purchasing of its own authority. That is the difference. These are the employees of the executive Government, with no functions assigned to them by Parliament exercisable otherwise than under the direction of the Governor in Council.

Mr. MACKENIE KING: The minister has not answered my question yet. He has elaborated on the difference in the nature of the composition of the two bodies.

Mr. DOHERTY: Let me make it as short as I can: The other body was a statutory purchasing authority; this is a body acting under the authority of the Governor in Council, which is charged with purchasing and responsible for its being done. Now, I do not know whether I have made myself clear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Leaving aside the question of authority, what would the other purchasing body have done, which this particular commission now is not doing?

Mr. DOHERTY: It would have exercised that authority to determine matters itself which this body does not do. I am endeavouring to make the positon clear, but the thing is so palpable to me that I cannot understand how there can be any room for misapprehension.

Mr. DUFF: It is as clear as mud to us.

Mr. DOHERTY: Well, I am sorry the mud is so thick over there that the light is not able to penetrate. That, however, is not my fault.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me put the question another way. Are there any purchases which this particular body might make to-day which the other body would not have been authorized to make and, vice versa, would the other body have had power to make certain purchases which this body has not the right to make?

Mr. DOHERTY: I have not before me the enumerated powers of the other body, but the substantial distinction is this: the other body would determine what should be bought and how it would go about buying it. It settled those transactions on its own authority. This body supervises the operations of the different departments and co-ordinates them, and its authority begins and ends with the authority of the Governor in Council. It is derived from the Governor in Council. The other body had authority of its own which might operate adversely to the decision of a department. It controlled the purchasing, which was taken as a substantial thing by itself and put into its hands. The present body simply supervises and co-ordinates the purchasing. The provisions of the proposed statute, which was not enacted, intended to create a purchasing commission as a distinct body standing on its own feet.

Mr. CAHILL: Were the members of this commission or purchasing body appointed by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. DOHERTY: No; they were not appointed by the Civil Service Commission, but by Council.

[Mr. Doherty.]

Mr. CAHILL: Under what authority were they appointed by Council without reference to the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. DOHERTY: They were not under the Civil Service Act at all.

Mr. CAHILL: Apparently they are under no Act at all except the act of the Government, which is not a very good one.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think the hon. gentleman will have to be satisfied with my statement.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the personnel of this commission which is purchasing under the authority of the Governor in Council?

Mr. DOHERTY: The commission is at present composed of Mr. Howard, chairman, and Col. La Fleche.

Mr. CAHILL: Only two?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. VIEN: I think the law provided that the Civil Service Act should of necessity apply to the appointments of all servants either in the inside or outside service. Will the minister tell us how, after passing the Civil Service Act, they can appoint servants of the State, civil servants, without the formality of submitting such appointments to the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. DOHERTY: These positions are not clerical in the sense of embodying in them civil servants of the country. These men were appointed to exercise particular supervision on behalf of the Governor in Council. It was judged at the time that it was possibly open to the Governor in Council to appoint them to perform these duties, and they were appointed. It did not seem to us that they came under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission. If we are open to criticism in that regard, well we will have to consider it from that point of view. Personally, I confess it is the first time it occurred to me that there should be any question with regard to their being appointed by the Civil Service Commission. Perhaps I may be permitted to point out at this stage that we have travelled a very long distance from the estimates for the penitentiaries.

Mr. VIEN: May I answer the right hon. gentleman in this way—that I asked some questions as to how the purchase of certain articles falling under the item we are now considering, that is to say the penitentiaries, was made. The right hon. gentleman told us that the purchase had been made by a commission appointed under an Order in Council; and I say that we are strictly within the rules of the committee, and are adhering closely to the point, when we put questions to the minister as to the character of the commission. Its personnel, its appointment, and any questions in reference to that commission, are, to my mind strictly in order. Since the right hon. gentleman has told us that the members of that commission were not statutory officials of the Government but that they were servants of the state—"ordinary servants" to use his very words—I wish to ascertain from him how he can escape from the rule laid down in a statute, sanctioned by this Parliament, which made it obligatory on the part of the Government not to appoint any servants of the state except through the authority of the Civil Service Commission, or by virtue of a special Act. The right hon. gentleman has told us that there was no special statute in this case—that the Government were acting under the general powers which are vested in His Excellency the Governor General in Council and that in the exercise of that authority they had appointed the purchasing commission in question. I want to go a step further and ask my right hon. friend a very simple question: Are there any members of the Civil Service in Ottawa who can be appointed without the authority of a statute and without the authority of the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. DOHERTY: I must decline, in advance to go into an enumeration of the powers of all the other departments, but so far as my knowledge goes there are employees who are appointed without the intervention of the Civil Service Commission. Now as to the question of the regularity—

Mr. VIEN: Would the minister be good enough to point out some instances?

Mr. DOHERTY: With all respect I do suggest that I should not be called upon to enter upon an accounting with respect to other departments than the one with which I am concerned. I will be very happy to discuss the general question of the appointment of a purchasing commission, and of the nature of the present one, upon a proper occasion; but I am asking no vote whatever in connection with that body. It is not a body attached to any department in any way—it is a general body appointed for general purposes. My hon. friend and myself seem to have to differ in opinion as to the method by which the commission ought to be appointed. I have expressed my view upon the subject. It does not meet the approval of the hon. gentleman, and I have to admit that I do not see how I am going to convince him that my view is right. Unfortunately his views differ from mine, and that is all that I can say about it.

Mr. VIEN: There is something further to be said. Is there not an Order in Council which prohibits the Government, in the case of contracts amounting to more than $5,000, from accepting those contracts except upon tender, the tenders to be opened by the minister himself in the presence of the secretary of the department?

Mr. DOHERTY: It is not to my knowledge that there exists any such Order in Council. I do understand—

Mr. VIEN: Is there a statute?

Mr. DOHERTY: I do understand that there are statutes with regard to certain departments and the purchases to be made by them, but I am not aware that there exists an Order in Council such as the hon. gentleman refers to.

Mr. VIEN: Well, let us say a statute then. Is there not a statute which makes it obligatory for every department of the state not to purchase any articles, or award contracts, for any higher amount than $5,000, except upon tender called for by the department, and opened by the minister himself in the presence of the secretary of the department?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not aware of any such general statute. I believe that there are statutes with regard to specific departments. If my memory serves me, there is a statute containing such a provision with regard to the Marine and Fisheries Department. I think there is a similar statutory provision with regard to the Public Works Department; but I can only say to the hon. gentleman that I, this evening, do not know of such a statute as that to which he refers. Of course I do not pretend to know all the statutes that are in existence. I came here prepared to discuss the Esti mates of my own department.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I can promise to quote the statute in question to my right hon. friend before the evening is over.

Mr. DOHERTY: Of universal application?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, a general statute.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have not denied that there exists such a statute. I have said in reply to the question put to me that at this moment I cannot recall that a general statute exists. However, I am quite fallible; I may be mistaken.

Mr. McKENZIE: We have perhaps drifted far afield—

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, we have.

Mr. McKENZIE:—but perhaps I can say a word further along that line. Now as to the appointment of these commissioners I do not follow the reasoning of the minister in saying that he, or any other minister, or any department, has inherent power to make appointments. I do not think they have. The Government, and every department of Government, is created by statute. There is no such thing as a minister of common law; there are no common law ministers. They, and every department of Government are created by statute, consequently you must go to the statute to find the powers of a minister or the powers of a department. The statute which created each department governs it; and if it does not give a minister such power, I would say, with all due respect to the minister, that no such power exists at all. Therefore these appointments cannot be made under an inherent power which, in my judgment, does not exist. If there is a statute giving such powers in a general way, then of course there would be the inherent power of carrying out what was incidental to the real purpose of that statute; but we have statutory provisions made with respect to all these departments governing the appointment of a purchasing agent. That statute is supposed to have provided for all that is necessary in each department; but I cannot agree with the minister that he can go beyond that and create another body for the purpose of having the general supervision of the purchases in all departments. I submit it is irregular for the Government to make such appointments, and in doing so and undertaking to pay salaries to such parties, they are acting utterly without authority.

Mr. CAHILL: Could the minister tell us when the commission was appointed under the Order in Council referred to?

Mr. DOHERTY: It is difficult for me to recall the exact date. While I have no desire to unduly limit hon. gentlemen in the discussion, at the same time they should appreciate the fact that this commission was not appointed in my department. I have not come here prepared to discuss a question of this kind. It may be a very debatable question, and I shall be glad to discuss it at the proper time. If I had had any notice that it was going to be brought up I would have come prepared with these dates and with the terms of the Order in Council itself ready to discuss the reasons why—whether they be sufficient in the eyes of hon. gentlemen opposite or not—it was thought proper for the members of that purchasing commission to be appointed as they were appointed. I shall be glad to look into the whole of the circumstances and to facilitate the further discussion of this matter. But I think hon. gentlemen opposite will appreciate that we cannot get any very satisfactory result in trying to continue this discussion with a minister who avowedly has not come here with the necessary information for which hon. gentlemen very naturally ask.

Mr. CAHILL: I only asked the minister in order to get him out of his present dilemma by having him tell us when the purchasing commission was appointed. I understand my hon. friend from Lotbiniere asked a question regarding an item that was purchased in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1920. I do not think that this Purchasing Commission was in existence under Order in Council or otherwise at that time. Perhaps the minister can give us a different answer to that which he originally gave, and in that way overcome his difficulty regarding the present Purchasing Commission, which is illegally constituted and is causing him additional worry.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am very much obliged to the hon. gentleman for trying to extricate me from my troubles. My recollection is that the commission was appointed in the month of July.

Mr. CAHILL: Of what year?

Mr. DOHERTY: The vote was passed in the last days of the last session of Parliament, which I think terminated on the 1st July; but I would not undertake to be accurate in that statement.

Mr. VIEN: Will the minister tell us under what department that Purchasing Commission operates?

Mr. DOHERTY: The Commission reports to the Department of Finance.

Mr. VIEN: It is under the Finance Minister then?

Mr. DOHERTY: So far as it is under a specific minister, because it is dealing with all the departments.

Mr. VIEN: I quite appreciate the answer given by the minister a minute ago, which I think was quite fair, that he is not ready to discuss the whole subject of the commission. the right hon. gentleman said also that he had not been given notice of the question; otherwise he would have been prepared to answer fully. I might point out to him that this discussion was absolutely sprung on us by reason of the fact that the minister told us that the purchases under review had been made through that commission. This was all new to us, for the simple reason that the War Purchasing Commission was abolished at the expiration of the War Measures Act. It is true a bill was introduced last session to give the Government power to appoint a permanent purchasing commission, but that bill was withdrawn. Then notwithstanding the fact that Parliament had not granted authority for so doing, we find that a commission was appointed by Order in Council under no statutory powers except the general powers vested in his Excellency in Council. We find moreover that these officials are not statutory officials but that they are servants of the state, although the provisions of the Civil Service Act are flatly in contradiction of the minister as to the powers of the Governor in Council to make appointments to the inside service at Ottawa. But I will not insist further on this point. I think it is only fair to defer the discussion to a later date to enable the minister to get the information of which he stands so much in need tonight, so that when we take up the subject again he may be able to supply the committee with the facts.

Mr. DOHERTY: It will also afford hon. gentlemen an opportunity of discussing the subject with the minister to whom it properly belongs.

Mr. VIEN: Yes. But I think it was only proper that the minister should give this committee some information as to how the purchases are made in his department. I asked him how the purchases were made of some specific items, namely, from Green at Kingston, amounting to $9,900; from the Amherst Woollen Mills, Truro, $5,639; from Canadian Cottons, Montreal, $4,523; from Canada Cement Company, Montreal, $2,-314. The minister has told this committee that these purchases were made through the Purchasing Commission; but a few minutes later, in answer to a question from the hon. member for Pontiac, he replied that the commission had, to the best of his recollection, been appointed in July, 1920. The items to which I refer were for the year ended 31st March, 1920, so that the commission could not have been in existence at that time.

Mr. DOHERTY: There was a previous commission in existence.

Mr. DUFF: Not for those purchases; that was the War Purchasing Commission before.

Mr. VIEN: The right hon. gentleman will not contend that the War Purchasing Commission was functioning up to the 31st March, 1920. If the Purchasing Commission created by Order in Council in July 1920 was not the commission to which he referred, why did he answer the hon. member for Pontiac that the commission had been created by Order in Council of that date? Will the minister tell us something about that previous commission which did the purchasing at that time?

Mr. DOHERTY: As I said before, I am not in a position to give the hon. gentleman the details of these two commissions which succeeded each other.

Mr. VIEN: Was it the War Purchasing Commission?

Mr. DOHERTY: A commission was created under an Order in Council passed by virtue of the War Measure Act. my impression is that that commission continued in existence until the end of the last session. Then a commission was appointed afterwards. I spoke of that subsequently appointed commission in answer to the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill); because hon. gentlemen were discussing a commission which, as they represented it, had been created by Order in Council and in spite of the refusal of Parliament to pass a statute. I was talking, therefore, about the particular commission to which they applied that description. As I said before, if the hon. gentleman desires a discussion that will involve the details of the constitution of these different commissions I shall be very glad to enter into that discussion with him, but certainly I do not think that either he or I have under our hands at the present moment the material necessary to make that discussion useful.

Mr. VIEN: I am satisfied for the time being, Mr. Chairman, I think that this further discussion will not be useless, because it will enable the right hon. gentleman to produce the information asked for with regard not only to this last commission, but to all previous commissions created by Order in Council or under the War Measures Act. I would like some information as to the purchase from McKelvey and Birch, of Kingston, of various articles aggregating $9,783, as set out on page L23 of the Auditor General's report. Were tenderers asked in connection with the purchase of these articles, and if so, from whom were tenders received?

Mr. DOHERTY: I can get the details of the particular contracts if the hon. gentleman is interested in them, but for the moment the only answer I can give him is that these purchases were made under the system followed in the case of all purchases,—that is, offers were called for, and under the supervision of whichever commission was at the time in existence, the purchases were made from those whose prices were found to be the lowest.

Mr. VIEN: Then I understand that the purchase was not made directly by the Department of Justice?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not in a position to say whether the final purchase was carried out through our purchasing agent with the assent and approval of the commission, or whether it was carried out through an officer of the commission. I shall be very glad to obtain that information for my hon. friend.

Mr. VIEN: In view of the answer given by my right hon. friend I wish to point out that it is not proper for a minister of the Crown to come before the committee unprepared to give full information concerning expenditure reported by the Auditor General for the previous year. We are now called upon to vote $1,371,000 for the maintenance of penitentiaries. Last year the amount was considerably less. For the Kingston penitentiary the appropriation last year was $71,000 less; for St. Vincent de Paul, $65,000 less; for Dorchester, $49,000 less, and so on. It is with a view to the furnishing of full information that the Estimates of a department are not brought up in the House until the Auditor General's report is laid on the Table. In answer to the leader of the Opposition the other day the Prime Minister clearly stated that no Estimates would be taken up until the report of the Auditor General in respect to the departments concerned had been brought down. The minister, assisted by his officials on the floor of the House, is supposed to give full information concerning each item set forth in the report. I might commend to the right hon. gentleman the example of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) who gave the fullest particulars concerning his Estimates and who satisfied both sides of the House with the information he furnished, to the point that he got a certificate of ability from the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon). I will not say that the Minister of Justice is not capable, but I do say that there is a lack of preparation on his part in connection with the presentation of his Estimates which this committee should lay stress on. Now, I should like to ask the minister how the following items were purchased as set forth on page L-23 of the Auditor General's report: basin cocks, 46 at $1.45; bends, 21 at $1.40; branch headers, 20 at $6.25; brass bolts and nuts, 250 at 15 cents, etc., to the amount of $9,783. I have my suspicions, Sir, that these various items were not purchased by tender. In this case of plumbing supplies it would seem to be better to make the purchases wholesale. If they were purchased wholesale, tenders must have been called.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have already stated that tenders were called for these as they are called for everything. Now, I am at a loss to know in what respect the hon. gentleman finds fault with me for not having the particulars or details. Does he want the papers about each particular purchase? If he is satisfied with a general statement, all of these things were purchased after proper tenders were called for them. No doubt where quantities were large enough to enable us to buy wholesale, we bought wholesale. But if only a couple of taps were wanted, one could not very well go and buy a large enough quantity to make one's order a wholesale order.

Mr. VIEN: In this item, there are purchases amounting to $9,000 from one firm for one penitentiary in one year. It seems to me that those supplies, particularly in view of the fact that we have so many penitentiaries, should always be purchased wholesale. When they purchased from McKelvey and Birch in Kingston, hard rubber stops, 603 at $32.25, I have serious doubts that these were purchased by tender. The minister told us a minute ago that purchases were made by tender when the quantities were sufficient to warrant a purchase by wholesale.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think I said that we purchased them from wholesalers when the quantity was sufficiently large to make that possible.

Mr. CAHILL: Were the tenders opened in the department of the minister or by this "fly-by-night" commission?

Mr. DOHERTY: They are opened in the presence of the Purchasing Commission or their representative, by the purchasing agent of the Department of Justice.

Mr. CAHILL: The minister does not attempt to divest himself of responsibility as to purchases made through the Purchasing Commission?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am here carrying full responsibility for the purchases, and nothing is purchased excepting after the requisition has been submitted to me and initialled by the minister. Under the general practice, purchases under $500 may be initialled by the deputy minister; but if the amount is over $500, before the purchase is made, the requisition has to be initialled by the minister, and I have the full responsibility. Tenders are not opened by myself personally. I do not think that was ever done in the Department of Justice, and with the great respect that I have for the positiveness with which certain hon. gentlemen are convinced that they can produce a general statute with the requirements that they have mentioned, I think it will be found that they are mistaken in that regard. The practice that is followed is the practice that has been followed from time immemorial. Everything that we bought and what we paid for it are in the public accounts; the documents in connection with it are absolutely available if any one wants to inquire into them, and certainly they will be readily and willingly produced and subjected to any scrutiny that may be thought desirable. This is the first time that it has been suggested to me that, in not coming myself with, at my finger-ends, the details of each particular purchase that can be found in the Auditor General's Report, I have come showing a very grave lack of preparedness. If I had anticipated that there would be a desire for such detailed information, I would have brought it. I shall see that the hon. gentleman gets it with regard to any item whatever which he thinks calls for further inquiry and, of course, as is the case with the entire Public Accounts, those relating to my department are open to the closest possible scrutiny and investigation in the proper place—before the Public Accounts' Committee.

Mr. VIEN: The minister's long parliamentary experience will tell him that all ministers of the Crown, the Minister of Public Works, the Minister of Agriculture and the ministers of each of the other departments, always come fully prepared to answer questions put as regards expenditures. I do not want to be obnoxious or unduly annoying to the minister; I am simply pointing out to him that we are now called upon to vote an appropriation of $1,371,600. The information that I seek to obtain is for the purpose of assuring myself that the purchases for these penitentiaries, the requirements of which are practically the same, are done on a general system which would save the department undue expense that would be occasioned by purchases being made at local retail stores. The requirements of all the penitentiaries are practically the same. If the minister's contention is right that these purchases were made through a Purchasing Commission, it does not appear to me that it should be necessary to have all the details that the Auditor General's Report contains, showing separate purchases here and there. I should think that the requirements would be purchased by the commission in large volumes, kept in a central store and given out to the various penitentiaries as required. This expenditure may be largely curtailed by a proper system, but the committee has not been able to ascertain, as a certain fact, whether these articles were purchased through the commission or the department.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might quote to the minister the chapter I had in mind, chapter 39 of the Revised Statutes of Canada in relation to Public Works. In the interpretation clause, there is this definition:

"Public work" or "public works" means and includes any work and property under the control of the minister.

Section 36 reads:

Whenever any works are to be executed under the direction of any department of the Government, the minister having charge of such department shall invite tenders by public advertisement for the execution of such works, except in cases,—

(a) of pressing emergency in which delay would be injurious to the public interest; or,

(b) in which from the nature of the work it can be more expeditiously and economically executed by the officers and servants of the department; or,

(c) where the estimated cost of the work is less than $5,000.

That is the section to which I referred.

Mr. DOHERTY: The only works we have to do in our department are done by the convicts. We do not get public works done for us. We have to get the material to be put into the works, but the works themselves are done by the convicts so that we never have a contract for a public work. These articles that are bought are either for use in the penitentiary or to be used in the construction work which the convicts carry on.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does the minister not regard material he has bought for construction work, as property under his control?

Mr. DOHERTY: I can see no application of that statute to things that are referred to here. You cannot make a public work out of a tap. Amongst things an hon. gentleman mentioned were taps that were purchased, I have no doubt, to be placed in the penitentiary, and the work is all done by the convicts under the supervision of instructors in the different trades within the penitentiary. We never have a contract to give for a public work.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does the minister not regard the spirit of the statute as an instruction given by Parliament in regard to calling for tenders?

Mr. DOHERTY: I should like to see the statute, because there are specific statutes with regard to specific departments. If the hon. gentleman will let me look at the statutes, I think I shall be able to point out to him that it does not apply in the present instance. Here it is; An Act respecting the Public Works of Canada. In this Act.

(a) 'Minister' means the Minister of Public works;

(b) 'Department' means the Department of Public Works;

(c) 'public work' or 'public works' means and includes any work or property under the control of the minister.

That is, under the control of the Minister of Public Works. This is entirely a statute with regard to the public works of Canada, and all the provisions are subject to this definition that 'Minister' means the Minister of Public Works, and that 'public work' or 'public works' means and includes any work or property under the control of the minister. That is, of the Minister of Public Works; the paragraph immediately preceding tells us that. I do not think we need go any further to see that this Act has no application in this case.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

There is a statute about the Department of Justice. There is a Penitentiaries Act, which deals with the manner in which penitentiaries are to be carried on, and so far as the statutory law is concerned, those are the statutes that govern the operations of the department. I think the hon. gentleman is quite in error in thinking the word 'Minister' there to mean any minister at all, in view of the fact that we have a definition of what 'Minister' is in this Act. The hon. gentleman will find there are other departments in regard to which an analogous provision about contracts exceeding $5,000 is expressly made. Now if the clause the hon. gentleman cites had the general application he is trying to attach to it there would be no reason for making this provision with regard to other departments. I do not think there is need for me to go any further. The section I have read makes it quite clear. The Act is divided into two parts. Part 1 applies exclusively to public works under the control of the Department of Public Works.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Part 2 contains the section to which I have referred; that is the point. My right hon. friend will see that Part 2 includes all the departments.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman has not indicated where in the Act the purchasing of goods is described as a public work, and our contracts are for the purchase of goods.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister will admit that he was mistaken when he said that this Act was confined to public works.

Mr. DOHERTY: Part 2 confines its application in a general way to public works.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: To any department of the Government.

Mr. DOHERTY: But we are not executing any public works at all. We are simply buying goods.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It says: 'public work' or 'public works' means and includes any work or property under the control of the minister. Does the minister say that the material he uses is not property under his control?

Mr. DOHERTY: But 'Minister' is specifically defined as being the Minister of Public Works

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is in relation to Part 1, but not in relation to Part 2.

Mr. DOHERTY: Where do you find the reference in Part 2?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In section 36.

Mr. DOHERTY: If the hon. gentleman will indicate a case in which this department has been excuting a public work, then we may consider the matter, but our contracts are purchases of goods pure and simple.

Mr. EULER: Will the minister tell us which items in the Estimates comprise these purchases?

Mr. DOHERTY: These are the Estimates of what we expect to spend next year. It is not the money that we spent last year that is in these Estimates.

Mr. EULER: What is covered for example, by the item "working expenses?" In the case of Kingston penitentiary, there is a very large item of $7,000 for working expenses and $25,000 for industries. Just what is meant by that?

Mr. DOHERTY: I believe the largest single item included in working expenses is the purchase of coal. To carry on a penitentiary, among other things that we have to do is to heat it.

Mr. EULER: I think that would come under maintenance.

Mr. DOHERTY: Maintenance refers to the maintenance of convicts, that is, the feeding of convicts; whether that is the best possible way of expressing it I do not know. The term "working expenses" is used to cover the entire expense of working the penitentiary. I understand that it covers all the supplies, other than the feeding of the convicts, which are necessary to carry on a penitentiary.

Mr. EULER: What comes under the heading of industries?

Mr. DOHERTY: Industries are the works we carry on by which we earn some money. We have made mail bags, for instance.

Mr. DUFF: And ballot boxes.

Mr. DOHERTY: We made some ballot boxes too. We carry on a boot-making industry. We make all the boots for all the convicts and all the officers, as well as all the clothes the convicts and officers wear.

Mr. EULER: Are any of these industries revenue producing?

Mr. DOHERTY: We make no sales outside the penitentiaries, except certain things we have made for the use of the Government. We have repaired mail bags, for instance, and have made some clothing for the Indian Department.

Mr. VIEN: What is the limitation of the purchasing power of the superintendent of the penitentiary? Can he purchase directly?

Mr. DOHERTY: The superintendent has no purchasing power.

Mr. VIEN: The local authorities cannot purchase anything directly?

Mr. DOHERTY: In an emergency they may purchase something that is absolutely called for at the moment, in the case for instance of a bursting pipe or something of that kind, but they have no general purchasing power. The purchasing is done through the department here.

Mr. VIEN: I should like to illustrate the argument I put forward a moment ago as to the advisibility of having a central system of purchasing for the penitentiaries. For instance, if the minister will look at page 123, he will find that he purchased 1,200 bags of flour from the Lake of the Woods Milling Company at $5.40 per bag, and he purchased also six hundred bags of flour from McBroom, Kingston, at $6.35. So that there was a difference of 95 cents a bag between these two purchases of flour. I will not bother the minister for details because he is not in a position to give them, but he will see that there is apparently a lack of system in purchasing.

Mr. DOHERTY: There may be, and there may not. You buy what you require at the time you require it, or at the time you think you can purchase to the best advantage, and I have no doubt that these purchases were made at what was considered the most opportune and advantageous time. The purchasing agent has to use his judgment as to the best method of making purchases. Would the hon. gentleman suggest that it would have been better for us to have bought all that flour at the time we paid $6.35? As a matter of fact, it turned out that some other day we were able to purchase flour at $5.40. We have to exercise our best judgment in purchasing, and it may therefore be wiser at a certain time to buy a limited quantity, looking forward to being able to buy on a greater scale to better advantage later on. I am not myself an expert in matters of this kind, but I am advised by those who are experts that the best way to obtain the final, general, good result is to entrust someone who is competent to exercise good judgment as to the best time to lay in your supply. That we have done, and I am satisfied that the general results would convince the hon. gentleman that our purchasing has been done to the best advantage.

Mr. VIEN: I quite appreciate the argument of the minister, but as regards the system of purchasing, I think he might give us some further enlightenment. I admit that it may be advisable to purchase a limited quantity when prices are excessive, but what I should like to know is just how this purchasing is done. The minister told us that it was done by his department, either through the purchasing agent, or through the commission; he did not know. However, we shall probably have occasion to come back to this question when the commission is under fire.

Mr. DOHERTY: The modus operandi is this: When they require certain articles at a penitentiary, they forward their requisition to the superintendent, who looks into it and passes it if he finds that the requirements are justifiable.

Mr. VIEN: Do they do that periodically, every three or six months, or every month?

Mr. DOHERTY: For things with which they require to be supplied for long periods, they do, such, for instance, as groceries and meats that are a matter of steady supply. Of course, there are some things they require one year and not another. At all events, as supplies are required, and as they anticipate the wants of the institutions, so far as they can be anticipated in things of the kind I have spoken of, they forward their requisition to the superintendent. He passes judgment upon it from the point of view of its propriety, and he then submits it to the purchasing agent. The purchasing agent examines it and also passes upon its propriety, and upon any suggestions that may be contained as to where the things ought to be bought, or as to prices that should be paid. Starting with the warden's certificate, with the vise of the superintendent, and the vise of the purchasing agent, it comes to the minister, who passes it if he thinks it right and proper. Then it goes back from the minister to the superintendent, and from him to the Purchasing Commission, and the purchasing agent, under the direction of the Purchasing Commission, calls for offers for the supplying of the goods. These offers, when received, are opened, I think, by the purchasing agent actually in the office of the Purchasing Commission, or, at all events, in the presence of its representative, and the order is awarded to the person who makes the lowest offer. That is the modus operandi.

Mr. COPP: I do not want to press unduly for information, but I feel with my hon. friend (Mr. Vien), that when the Auditor General's Report is laid before Parliament it should be compared with the Estimates, because it is the foundation of our study of the year's Estimates. I can understand the minister finding some difficulty in answering questions off-hand in regard to the Auditor General's Report, but it does seem to me that if he cannot at this time give the information sought, he should bring it down later and let the item stand until he is prepared to answer questions fully.

Mr. DOHERTY: If my hon. friend desires that, I have no objection.

Mr. COPP: I have in my hand a report of last year's operations of the maritime penitentiary situated at Dorchester in my own constituency. I know something about the work done in that institution. As I glance through this report, page after page, my curiosity, at least, if not my suspicion, is aroused, and I cannot help thinking that the minister is not properly advised as to the way in which things are conducted there. The country surrounding that penitentiary at Dorchester, and the city of Moncton adjoining, as well as the city of Sackville, do considerable business in flour and food-stuffs generally, and yet, with few exceptions, in the case of small items which might be called emergency purchases, this report shows only one man in that locality who has supplied anything to the institution during the year. That man has a small business concern situated in the parish of Dorchester, and he gets about $17,700 worth of business from the penitentiary. I find that the flour and meat are purchased in Montreal, although a very large proportion of the cattle and meat dealers in Montreal and other cities come right down to my own county, buy beef and take it back to Montreal, when they get the contract to re-ship this meat back to the same locality to feed the convicts in the penitentiary. I do not insinuate that the minister is apprised of the real facts, but it is obvious that there is something wrong somewhere. A dealer in Montreal cannot possibly sell flour in Dorchester cheaper than a dealer in the Maritime Provinces can, and it does not seem proper that we should get things from outside and pay extra freight, bringing them to the Maritime Provinces from Montreal, Toronto, and elsewhere. Then, I see, Mr. Chairman, if they want a few pounds of clover and grass seed for Dorchester penitentiary a firm in Ottawa furnishes it. I note that 400 pounds of clover seed were purchased in that way; and I suppose at Dorchester they had to wait until word was sent to Ottawa and the purchase made there, although there are at least twenty business houses located not very far from the penitentiary that make a specialty of selling clover and grass seed as my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Elkin) well knows.

Mr. EDWARDS: Where do they get it?

Mr. COPP: They get it from the west, and other places. They bring it in and have it on hand, and a telephone order for the articles would bring a response inside of six hours. But no, when they wanted clover seed they had to send to Ottawa for it. It arouses one's curiosity why these things happen. Then too, I notice that when they wanted some cotton duck they sent to New York for it. There were 808 yards of cotton duck bought from a firm in New York for the Dorchester penitentiary. This is but a small matter, but when such things occur year after year it arouses one's curiosity if not one's suspicions; there is a fear that something is working from the inside that the minister does not know about. I would like to have an explanation given why this is so, and why it is that these people at a distance are getting all the business for Maritime Provinces institutions, when the same articles can be obtained in the locality of the institution and at less cost, I believe, than is apparent under this item.

Mr. DOHERTY: I suppose my hon. friend noticed that I was criticized by the gentleman who preceded him because I did not buy everything in the same place.

Mr. COPP: No, I did not notice it.

Mr. DOHERTY: Now I am criticized because I do not distribute the purchases.

Mr. COPP: My right hon. friend misunderstood me. I was not attempting to argue that. I was arguing that everything should be bought by tender, and I agree with him that contracts should go to the lowest tenderers in all cases, wherever it may be possible; but to me these purchases seem utterly inexplicable.

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall be very glad to take up the items that the hon. gentleman refers to and send him precise information in regard to them. With respect to Mr. Palmer who was mentioned as having supplied goods to the amount of some $17,000, I understand the great bulk of it was coal purchased in the neighbourhood, which is a coal producing country. I have no doubt it will turn out that coal was purchased to the best advantage, and by tender. As regards the purchase of clover seed in Ottawa I would be quite willing to look into it, but I think the hon. gentleman rather conceded himself that if it had been purchased in Moncton the dealer would have been obliged to obtain the clover seed somewhere else.

Mr. COPP: That may be but there is a dealer there.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have not any doubt but that the Purchasing Commission got the colver seed where they could get it to the best advantage. However, I shall be quite happy to look into it and get the necessary information.

Mr. COPP: The firm in Ottawa would have to purchase the clover seed and resell it; they do not make it.

Mr. DOHERTY: Of course they do not gather it in the streets of Ottawa. I do not know what the circumstances were, put perhaps this particular firm in Ottawa were in a better position to handle clover seed at that moment than other firms were. All these purchases were carried out under the system which I explained a little while ago, but as regards any particular transaction, I shall be more than glad to furnish the hon. gentleman with the exact information in connection with the matter.

Mr. PEDLOW: In view of the fact that the minister is not in a position to-night to give us the exact details of the expenditure during the past year, I purpose dealing with the summary statement as it appears before us for a few minutes. In the first place, I would like to know just how the several totals and increases that appear in the summary statement of the Estimates have been arrived at. I find there is a general summary statement covering the totals for the various penitentiaries. That summary statement covers the amount of $1,371,600 asked for under this item for the current year. Against that we have a total for the year 1920-21 of $1,096,600, so that this estimate for the current year shows an increase of $275,000 over last year. That is in round figures an increase of twenty-five per cent on the entire estimate. Now, taking the details given in the summary statement under the different headings for the various institutions, we find that in Kingston the average increase is about twenty-five per cent, and the same with the other institutions all down the line. But when you come to the details you find a wide range of variation. That is the reason that prompts my question as to how these several totals and increases have been arrived at. Is it due to specific reasons in each case or is there a general average for the whole of the Estimates? I find in connection with Kingston penitentiary, under the heading of "salaries and retiring allowances" an increase of $24,500 or an increase over last year of about 19 per cent. I may explain that I have made these calculations hurriedly. I find the salaries and retiring allowance for St. Vincent de Paul augmented by $30,000, or an increase of 35 per cent over last year. I find that the salaries and retiring allowances for Dorchester penitentiary are larger by $23,000, or an increase of 36 per cent over last year. I find that the salaries and retiring allowances for Manitoba penitentiary are larger by $27,000, an increase over last year's Estimates of 66 per cent. In the case of the British Columbia penitentiary the increase for salaries and retiring allowances is only $9,000, or an advance of 17 per cent compared with last year. In the case of Saskatchewan penitentiary the salaries and allowances are $29,000 more, or an increase of 75 per cent as compared with last year. There seems to be an anomaly here. If increases under this heading are required there should be, I submit—without knowing the reason for these variations, because they have not so far been explained—a general average for the whole service. That is to say that the reasons for an increase with respect to one institution should apply to practically all of the penitentiaries with regard to the same class of work.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think the hon. gentleman will find that, subject to particular circumstances in particular institutions—some of which I dealt with this afternoon when I think he was not present—increases attributable to the same causes worked out at a fairly average percentage. Taking first the increase of $275,000 in the total expense, the sum of $142,500 is required to provide for salaries and retiring gratuities. Of that amount over $100,000 is attributable to increases due to re-classification, $11,000 to promotions of keepers called for under the re-classification, $10,000 to the creation of a school teacher class; and $21,500 to increases in the staff due to increased population, and increases in gratuities resulting from the augmentation of salaries under re-classification. It has been found necessary, also attributable to the increase in our prison population, to make a provision of $24,000 additional for the maintenance of the convicts. That increase in the number of convicts is 391 in twenty-two months, or an increase of twenty-three per cent, and it is estimated that if that rate of increase should continue to March 1922 we would require a further vote. As to the remainder of the additional requirements, there is a sum of $15,000 to complete the work on a new boiler house at the Kingston penitentiary. Some of the boilers there have been in use for over thirty-five years, and we have endeavoured to get the last ounce of usefulness out of them. Now we find it is necessary to replace them and to construct, of course by convict labour, a new boiler house. We have also found it necessary to provide an estimate of $20,000 to cover possible additional cost for coal during the course of the year. Last year our experinece was that we had to pay very much higher prices than we had anticipated.

In Saskatchewan, as I pointed out, there is a much larger increase in the amount asked for than in the case of the other penitentiaries. I explained that, I think, before the hon. member came in. It is attributable to the fact that there we are completing new cell accommodation, which is absolutely necesary because of the increased number of prisoners, mainly due to our making that one penitentiary serve now not only for the province of Saskatchewan but in large measure for the province of Alberta, the balance of Alberta's convicts being provided for in the Manitoba penitentiary. The Alberta penitentiary having been closed this will necessarily work out a very material economy, though at the outset it necessitates some additional expenditures elsewhere. I think I have covered all the observations made by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. PEDLOW: While the minister has covered considerable territory, he has failed to quite grasp my wishes in regard to information. I am sorry that I was not in the House this afternoon when he gave his explanation regarding the increase of $60,000 for land, building and equipment in connection with the Saskatchewan penitentiary. But I find there, as I have already said, increased salary and retiring allowances of $29,000, or an increase over last year of 75 per cent, as against only 19 per cent increase for Kingston and 17 per cent for British Columbia. I find too—

Mr. DOHERTY: Would the hon. gentleman allow me to deal with his questions one at a time?

Mr. PEDLOW: That is what I wanted the minister to do, but he covered the whole field.

Mr. DOHERTY: Let me take this one item of the greater percentage of increase of employees at the Saskatchewan penitentiary as compared with similar increases at the penitentiaries. The answer is to be found in what I have already pointed out, that the Saskatchewan penitentiary this year takes over a double burden. We had until the middle of last year an additional penitentiary in Alberta. We have closed that penitentiary and have transferred the bulk of its convicts to the Saskatchewan penitentiary, and of course with this abnormal increase of inmates there necessarily goes an unusual increase of employees to take charge of them. Then, furthermore,—and this applies to all the penitentiaries—we have had to increase the number of employees to meet the very strong representations—and I think justifiable representations—that we ought to make such provision for men tied down to the kind of work that our guards have to do as would enable us to give to each man at least every eighth day off. That would not account for the greater percentage increase in Saskatchewan, but it does account for the increase that runs through the number of employees. Then the classification has added very materially to what we have to pay those employees, and that has involved, as I explained also before the hon. gentleman came in, our making a larger estimate in looking forward to the gratuities that may have to be paid, because their amount is governed by the amount of the salaries paid. The classification also has carried with it the necessity of engaging a larger number of employees owing to the manner in which the duties are now distributed.

Mr. PEDLOW: I suppose, Mr. Chairman, the classification was inaugurated by the Griffenhagen Company or the Arthur Young Company.

Mr. DOHERTY: No, we entirely escaped the claws of the Griffenhagen.

Mr. PEDLOW: The minister evidently believes in Home Rule in penitentiaries as well as in other parts of the world. The next item is maintenance of convicts. I find that whereas in the Kingston penitentiary the maintenance increase is 14 per cent; in St. Vincent de Paul it is 40 per cent; in Dorchester it is 50 per cent, in Manitoba 66 per cent; in British Columbia there is no increase whatever; in Saskatchewan the increase is 66 per cent. I think whoever is in charge of the penitentiary in British Columbia deserves to be well paid for his services, because he is evidently managing that institution along the right lines.

Mr. DOHERTY: He manages it so well that he does not get more people coming in there, and that makes a great difference in the percentage increase of cost of maintaining the convicts. That percentage increase in Kingston is very much larger than in the other penitentiaries, but the simple explanation is that the percentage increase of population to be fed, clothed and provided for generally is very much greater in that institution than in the others. If I am not mistaken the percentage increase of population in the Kingston penitentiary is between 60 and 70 per cent; in St. Vincent de Paul I think it is about 48 per cent; and very naturally you have a difference in the percentage increase of cost of maintenance corresponding very accurately I think to the different percentage increase of population. In British Columbia they have no increase of population, and it is natural enough therefore that they should have no percentage increase in the cost of maintenance. Saskatchewan and Manitoba have had to divide between them the penitentiary population that in previous years had been provided for by the Alberta penitentiary, which has been closed; therefore this year they have an unusual percentage increase in expenditure of every kind that attaches to maintenance.

Mr. PEDLOW: I notice that although the cost of textiles, fabrics, etc., which would be used in connection with the industries carried on in the penitentiaries, is decreasing, the appropriations under this head are in most cases considerably increased this year. For Kingston the increase under the head of "industries" is $10,000, or 66 per cent; for St. Vincent de Paul, 50 per cent; for Dorchester, 35 per cent; for Manitoba, 100 per cent. In British Columbia, where there is good management apparently, there is no increase at all. The person in charge there should receive the commendation of the Government; he must be running the institution along the right lines. In view of the fact that materials of all kinds are from 25 to 33⅓ per cent less expensive than last year, I cannot understand why these appropriations should be so much higher. In Saskatchewan the increase is only a slight one, about 8 per cent.

Mr. DOHERTY: The gentleman for whom my hon. friend has so great an admiration has no increase because he has had no increase in convicts; consequently, he has practically no increase to provide for his industries. The hon. gentleman says there should be a decrease because materials are lower, but the fact is that the bulk of the increase at Kingston, for instance, is for the purchase of machinery.

Mr. PEDLOW: Would machinery not cost less for the current year than it did last year?

Mr. DOHERTY: Last year we were not buying any, or very little. We are trying to develop these industries and we have had to procure machinery for that purpose. These are not things which we shall be buying every year, but that expenditure will have to be incurred in Kingston this year. The increase at St. Vincent de Paul under that head of $5,000, is explained by the fact that we are buying less machinery at St. Vincent than at Kingston. At Dorchester the industries are of less consequence and we are investing less in them. At Manitoba also the industries do not play the same important role that they do in the larger penitentiary in the East. We have a smaller provision made in British Columbia; as I say, the industries there are comparatively small. There is nothing in the way of development; therefore we have no additional outlay to make this year. In Saskatchewan the industries play a minor role, though there is an increase of $4,000; some machinery is required there, I believe, for the carpenter shop and the machine shop. But farming is the great industry of the Saskatchewan penitentiary.

Mr. PEDLOW: I would like, if possible, to get information with regard to the details of these different items; that is, how much the minister proposes to spend for machinery and farming implements for the different institutions, and how much for textiles, woollen materials, fabrics, and so on.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have not the information with me to-night, but I shall be glad to get it for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. PEDLOW: We should not pass these items without knowing how this money is to be spent. I suggest, therefore, that we report progress until such time as we have that information.

Mr. DOHERTY: Of course, if the hon. gentleman thinks he requires it, I shall be happy to get it for him, and if he thinks that these items should stand until we can get this additional information—if he deems that essential to the proper performance of his parliamentary duties—I suppose we shall have to suspend them for the time being. I suggest, then, that we pass to the agricultural items.

Mr. McKENZIE: We can make progress and deal with those later.

Mr. DOHERTY: If hon. gentlemen consent to that, I should be glad if the item could be passed; it is the last one I have. Hon. gentlemen may count upon it that I will furnish all this information and, if necessary, make an opportunity for giving it to them. Certainly the opportunity will be forthcoming on the Supplementary Estimates, if not on some other occasion.

Mr. CAHILL: Did I understand the minister to say that the increase in the number of convicts in the Kingston penitentiary is greater than the increase at St. Vincent de Paul?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, the increase at St. Vincent was from 465 to 554, and at Kingston the increase was between 60 and 70 per cent the present population being 721.

Mr. CAHILL: Can the minister give us any idea of the cause of the larger increase in Ontario as compared with Quebec?

Mr. DOHERTY: Well, it would be difficult for me to give the reason. It is fair to Ontario to say that the Kingston penitentiary does get a certain number of convicts who are not chargeable to Ontario—women for instance, and also those convicts who are looked upon as specially incorrigible or dangerous. It is thought that there is better provision in that penitentiary for assuring the detention of exceptionally violent people, and in that way you must not charge to Ontario all of the surplus population of Kingston penitentiary. Of course, I can appreciate that the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) looks for greater virtue in our province than in the other provinces.

Mr. CAHILL: The minister has apparently no idea that the restrictive legislation would have any bearing on the excessive number of convicts over those in other provinces.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not know what restrictive legislation the hon. member is dealing with. We do not get in the penitentiaries, to any appreciable extent, offenders against prohibitory laws; such offenders go to the jails. The increasing severity of such a law ought not to find itself reflected in an increasing number in the penitentiaries. I do not know that an increased thirst would operate to increase the tendency to crime.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Referring to the Purchasing Commission, we were told by the minister that there were two commissioners, but he did not tell us how many of a staff these commissioners have employed.

Mr. DOHERTY: The staff and so forth of that commission is something entirely outside of my department. I would be glad to get the information, but I do not have it with me. I have not any personal contact with the direction of that department, and consequently, I have not that information.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): It appears to apply generally to all the departments of the Government, including the department of the minister.

Mr. DOHERTY: It serves us also, only that I have no connection with its practical operations. It supervises my purchasing as it supervises all the purchasing of the Government; but I am never brought into contact with it, and I never had occasion to inquire how many employees it had. I shall be glad to get the information. The commission reports to the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), and on some occasion when he is being subjected to the examination of the committee, I have no doubt he would be glad to furnish all details of that kind.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I would suggest that we have the Order in Council under which this commission is appointed. We have spent a good deal of time discussing this matter, and I should like to know just where we stand.

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall be glad to get it.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): It has been pointed out to the minister that the authority of the Government to appoint this commission has been challenged by the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie), who says that the Government has no authority to appoint any commission without a statute. While I have been in the House, I think the practice has been to come to Parliament for statutory authority to appoint commissions. That was the case until the war started, and then the War Measures Act was passed under which a large number of commissions were appointed. The War Measures Act has expired, and the Government has undertaken to appoint a commission without statutory authority, and if it can appoint this commission in that way, I presume it can appoint any commission. The question that makes this matter look a little serious is that on two occasions when the Government came to Parliament for authority to appoint this special commission, opposition developed to the proposal largely on the Government side of the House, and the Government found that it was probably unable to push the matter through. After several attempts to do so, the Bill of last year was withdrawn, and my recollection is that, after it was withdrawn and after Parliament prorogued about the 1st July, in that very same month, the Government, behind closed doors, without authority of Parliament, did the very thing which Parliament refused to give authority to do. The Government appointed a commission by Order in Council, and whether it had authority or not, I submit it was bad practice to do that. I want to ask the minister now, when he comes before the committee again with his Estimates, to produce the Order in Council under which that commission has been appointed.

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall be glad to see that the Order in Council is put before the House, but I confess I do not see that it is pertinent to my estimates. I have no desire in the world to avoid the fullest possible discussion of this question of the commission, but I cannot see the usefulness of attaching it to my estimates because that only creates an embarrassment. We have before us no definite question about this commission; we are trying to decide whether I should be voted so much money to carry on the penitentiaries, and we tack on to that a discussion whether this commission was lawfully appointed or not. I think, in the interest of the discussion itself, it would be better that it should not be attached to something to which it has no special relevancy in any event. I do not want to enter upon a discussion, but I would like to point out one or two things in connection with the statement of the hon. gentleman. According to my judgment, the question is: what powers were given to the body that was called a commission? It is not because it was called a commission or was not called a commission that the Government had or had not power to appoint it. The question is: did the Government give to that body of men any powers which it was not authorized, as the executive Government of Canada, to give? In other words, as I look at the matter: had the Government the right to take precautions to have the purchasing of the different departments supervised? That is, at all events, the question as it presents itself to my mind. As to the second point of saying that Parliament had just refused to pass a statute and that we went out and appointed a commission which ought to have been appointed under that statute, if hon. gentlemen will look up the Estimates of last year, they will see that Parliament voted us a sum of money, I think it was $50,000—I have forgotten the exact amount—for the establishment of that commisssion.

Mr. VIEN: Would the minister say that the vote of a sum of money would give impliedly the right to the Government to appoint a commission?

Mr. DOHERTY: I have always understood that a vote by Parliament of money to be employed by the Government for a specific purpose necessarily involves authority to the Government to do that specific thing. There is another question which the hon. gentleman raised; that is, whether, assuming that we could constitute that commission, we should have gone to the Civil Service Commission to appoint the individuals. I would be happy to discuss all those questions in proper time and place, but I would suggest that, perhaps, the committee might be willing to act upon the suggestion of the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) and let this one item, which is the last item I have, pass, with the assurance that upon the Supplementary Estimates, or if I have to make a special occasion, I will give a further opportunity for discussion about the penitentiary purchases; I will procure for the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. Pedlow) the information he desires, and if the hon. member for Lotbiniere (Mr. Vien) desires special information about the special items he has mentioned, I will furnish it.

Mr. VIEN: I will not insist upon the details. I only wanted to point out to the minister what occurred to my mind, namely, that a proper system of purchasing should be instituted. The minister told us that the purchases were made through a commission, and naturally we wished to know the character of the commission, information which the minister could not give us. Would the minister be good enough to lay on the Table the Order in Council so that it will be available for the information of the whole House? That would apply not only to the commission created by that Order in Council of 1920, but to all commissions to which the minister has referred to-night.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think the Orders in Council have been laid on the Table on different occasions. I will, however, see that the hon. gentleman gets copies of both.

Mr. CAHILL: Is the commission a permanent or a temporary commission? I ask that question because, if it is a permanent commission and the minister is shielding himself behind this commission, we might be more critical of the Estimates than we would be if the minister were prepared to furnish the House with information as to expenditure in his department.

Mr. DOHERTY: There is nothing permanent in the sense that that commission could not be dispensed with to-morrow if it was thought desirable to do that. There is no fixed period of time—I am speaking from memory, but I feel pretty confident—for which these gentlemen are appointed. However, we will be better able to discuss that when we have the papers before us.

Mr. VIEN: The minister knows that the appointment of a servant of the state by Order in Council creates what is known as a permanent civil servant, as distinguished from a civil servant temporarily employed under the authority of a minister, and I think if we take the ordinary meaning of the word "permanent" as applied to a civil servant or a commission under the Crown, this is a permanent commission as distinguished from a commission appointed for a specific purpose.

Mr. DOHERTY: I will find out whether it is or is not a permanent commission, and then we will not have to take time discussing what the meaning of the word is. As I said before, I am not here with the information at my finger tips, but I will see that it is procured.

Mr. CAHILL: I wish to ask the minister one more question about the commission?

The CHAIRMAN: The chairman has been very lenient to-night, but he must now rule that the constitution of the commission and of previous commissions, while the matter has been allowed to be discussed, is not strictly relevant. The right hon. Minister of Justice has pointed out that fact three or four times, and the chairman must now so rule.

Mr. CAHILL: I was just going to ask whether in future all purchases are to be made through this commission?

Mr. DOHERTY: So long as the commission exists, my department will welcome its supervision. We have no desire in the wide world but to have our operations submitted to all possible supervision. As I have already said—I may be blameworthy in that respect, but it never occurred to me that this was a matter to be dealt with in all the fullness of detail incidentally to the penitentiary Estimates—I am not prepared this evening to give the details with regard to this commission, to discuss its constitution, its past, and above all its possible future, but I shall be glad to discuss that question some other time.

Mr. PROULX: This afternoon we voted the salary for a purchasing agent for the Department of Justice. Now if all the purchases are to be made through a commission, I do not see the necessity of having a purchasing agent for the department.

Mr. DOHERTY: It may be it is unnecessary, but this is what was thought was wise: although the departments were empowered to do their purchasing, it was thought a wise thing to have the purchasers supervised and to have some co-ordination. I do not say those are the words in which the commission was appointed, but that is the purpose for which it was appointed. We have a number of departments with purchasing agents, and it was thought desirable that you should have some centre that would both see what was going on, supervise what was going on, and give direction as to how purchases could best be made. It is possible that was not absolutely necessary, but at all events, wisely or unwisely, it was thought to be a useful precaution. But that does not alter the fact that the purchaser retains his functions as purchaser for his particular department. The only difference is that he carries out his work under his general supervision.

Mr. PEDLOW: I appreciate what the minister has said as to not being prepared to give detailed information to-night, and in view of that I would suggest that the committee rise and report progress. I should like, however, to ask a question regarding the penitentiary in Alberta. I find that $5,000 is provided for that institution in the Estimates for the current year. I was under the impression that this institution had been closed up.

Mr. DOHERTY: It has been closed up, but we still own the property, and there is need for a watchman in charge, and certain other small expenses in connection with taking care of the property. It is a very valuable property, and we hope to dispose of it to very considerable advantage. We are asking this vote of $5,000 so that we may have something at our disposal to enable us to take care of the property. It may not all be spent.

Mr. PEDLOW: Has this property been advertised for sale?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, and tenders were called for, but we got no offers that commended themselves to our judgment. I have had the property valued by a gentleman absolutely disinterested, and most highly commended to me, and he puts a very substantial value on the property, but it does not seem to be a fortunate moment to dispose of it. Therefore, we think it is the part of wisdom to hold the property in the meantime and naturally that entails some small expense in taking care of it.

Mr. VIEN: If I read aright the Government's publication there is a substantial reduction in the cost of material and of living generally, but in the Estimates under working expenses and other headings connected with the penitentiaries I find considerable increases. Does not the minister expect that within the coming year there will be a considerable, or at least a certain reduction along these lines?

Mr. DOHERTY: We hope for a reduction in the cost of living, but if the cost of living keeps going down and the number of people you have to feed keeps increasing, you cannot expect to feed them on a lesser amount. As to working expenses, if the hon. gentleman had been in the House a little while ago, he would have learned that under this heading are many items that are not affected by the cost of living. For instance, this year, as I explained, we are purchasing in connection with industries a certain quantity of machinery necessary for their operation. These are not things that will be purchased every year, but this year we are seeking to develop our work and have provided for this machinery. But we cannot make comparisons from year to year of expenses of that kind. I had tried to make that clear.

Mr. VIEN: The minister says that he does not expect to have to purchase every year the machinery that he will purchase this year. Does he purchase machinery for all penitentiaries?

Mr. DOHERTY: No.

Mr. VIEN: Do the working expenses show an increase for all penitentiaries?

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall be glad to begin all over again and go over the details, but it does seem a little unfortunate that hon. gentlemen should keep on passing in and out while I am giving explanations.

Mr. VIEN: I withdraw the question.

Mr. DOHERTY: I try to explain these items as well as I can, but I shall be glad to repeat anything that has not been understood.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Dispense.

Mr. FIELDING: Take it as read.

Mr. CAHILL: Is the minister sure that the item in the miscellaneous list will be passed by the Minister of Finance? In what way will these items be passed? I refer to page 64.

Mr. DOHERTY: My past experience has been that we have never asked for anything under this head—they are only small amounts—which the Minister of Finance or any one else called upon to pass them, has not found to be unreasonable. For example, I do not think it is an unreasonable thing that we should ask for $300 for possible unforeseen expenses in connection with Dorchester penitentiary. I should think that would commend itself as reasonable.

[Mr. Doherty.]

Mr. CAHILL: I do not think the minister grasps my point. I find under the general item of miscellaneous in the Estimates there is an item of $80,000 for the Purchasing Commission, I merely wish to know how we are to ascertain which minister will pass these items.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have explained that. As I understand it, the Purchasing Commission reports to the Minister of Finance and—

Mr. CAHILL: The Minister of Finance will pass the item?

Mr. DOHERTY: I anticipate there will be no difficulty in having the items passed upon.

Item agreed to.

Agriculture—International Institute of Agriculture, $10,000.

Mr. PROULX: What work is done in connection with this item?

Mr. TOLMIE: The work carried on by this institute is in connection with the International Bureau of Agriculture which has its headquarters in Rome. All the principal nations in the world are represented, and our branch in Ottawa handles the business for Canada. It handles crop reports received from headquarters. The institute furnishes information concerning supplies of various agricultural products throughout the world, prospects for the future, the growing of crops, probable yields and various statistics of a similar character. We maintain a valuable library in which all this information is gathered for the use of the department or for any one interested.

Item agreed to.

Live Stock, $1,000,000.

Mr. PROULX: What is the reason for the increase this year?

Mr. TOLMIE: The increase is due to increased travelling expenses, additions to some exhibitions that have qualified under the standard for such exhibitions during the past year, to necessary extension work, to the execution of policies already under way, and to general development along these lines. A sum of $25,000 has been set aside to meet probable expansions during the coming year.

Mr. PROULX: The minister spoke the other night about some sires the department lends to different counties. He said that we would deal with this subject when we reached this item. How many sires are lent altogether to farmers' clubs?

Mr. TOLMIE: There have been lent to two hundred clubs 2,963 head.

Mr. JOHNSTON: About two months ago, early in January, a club was formed in Last Mountain constituency and they made application for a sire. That application was turned down in the first instance, the departmental officers expressing the opinion that the club did not need assistance because they were able to buy an animal for themselves. The matter was referred to me and I got into communication with the department, with the result that they reconsidered their decision and agreed to supply an animal. So far, however, that has not been done, at least to my knowledge. The last intimation I had was that the chief of the cattle branch had gone west and hoped to be able to purchase an animal at the spring sales. Two evenings ago, while discussing these Estimates, the member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon), informed the committee that some time ago about eighty animals had been supplied to his constituency. Now, the people in my constituency will wonder why it is that it takes them so long to get one animal when eighty can be supplied to some other constituency. Of course, I am aware, that this did not take place during the present minister's regime. Nevertheless, it is the business of his department, and I felt rather keenly the fact that my constituents were not accorded the treatment they deserve. So far as I know, the club at Davidson, Saskatchewan, is the only one in that constituency, and these people are naturally anxious to go ahead. As a matter of fact, they intend building silos and going into the dairy industry in good shape, and I hope the minister will see that their application is honoured and that they are supplied with a sire at an early date.

Mr. TOLMIE: If this club is qualified, as the hon. member says, there should be no serious delay in supplying it with an animal. Our buyers have been purchasing at the spring sales. One was held at Regina this week, and a number of bulls were purchased, so that my hon. friends constituents will suffer no further delay. However, I shall look into the matter and expedite it as well as I can.

Mr. PROULX: Are these bulls obtained in this country, or are they imported?

Mr. TOLMIE: They are bred in Canada and bought at the sales here, and what we cannot obtain at sales we purchase privately.

Mr. PROULX: Are different breeds supplied?

Mr. TOLMIE: We supply any breed demanded by a club, but if any club secures an animal for two or three years and then gets another, we do not permit any change in the breed, because we do not encourage cross breeding. We like to keep to certain lines and develop that particular type of animal.

Mr. PROULX: The minister said the other night that these animals were lent for a period of three or four years. At the end of that term, should they not be returned, what action does the department take?

Mr. TOLMIE: Of course, we see that they are returned at the end of the term. They are usually sold by the agent for beef if they are not fit for further use, but if they are, they are lent to some other club.

Mr. PROULX: I think the hon. member for Dorchester said last year that some of those lent to his county were not returned.

Mr. TOLMIE: That was before my time.

Mr. PROULX: Does the minister know what became of those bulls?

Mr. TOLMIE: No. I understand this occurred about four years ago. I cannot give the details as to the disposition of these bulls offhand, but I will be glad to look it up and if the hon. member cares for further information I will be very pleased to give it to him.

Mr. PROULX: I certainly would like the information, because if the statement of the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston) is true that eighty head were loaned to the county of Dorchester when the rest of us cannot get any stock for our counties I think we should know what became of them.

Mr. TOLMIE: There was no such number as eighty head loaned to Dorchester county. I never heard of any county getting that number. Altogether, there were only a few bulls, but I cannot offhand give the exact number as the transaction occurred some years ago.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The statement with which I am credited did not originate from me. I simply repeated what the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) said the other evening.

Mr. CAHILL: Before the item passes I wish to ask the acting leader of the Government if it is intended to take up any other estimates this evening.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not think we will ask the committee to take up any other estimates after the passage of the few remaining estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. TOLMIE: I would like to finish the Estimates of the Department of Agriculture. Only two or three items now remain.

Mr. VIEN: Will the minister explain what he proposes to do with this vote of $1,000,000.

Mr. TOLMIE: With pleasure. First of all we spend money in federal assistance to horse breeding. That is we form stallion clubs throughout the country giving them a certain bonus amounting to about one-third of the cost to assist them in securing animals of high value and in improving the quality of the horse stock of the country. These animals must all pass a careful examination by a veterinarian, must be free from hereditary disease, and be of good weight and good quality. I may say that this is along the line of what is known as the Scotch Premium system for improving horse stock and has been followed with great success in Great Britain.

Mr. VIEN: What amount is to be devoted to that particular purpose?

Mr. TOLMIE: It will amount to about $90,000 altogether this year in that particular line.

Mr. VIEN: How long has the system been in force?

Mr. TOLMIE: It has been in force about four years. In addition to that, we have a distribution of pure bred sires which I described, I think, the other evening. Under this plan in any district where there are no pure bred sires to be obtained the farmers are permitted to form clubs of ten, and on making proper application to our department we will furnish them with a pure bred sire, loan it to them absolutely free, ship it to the district and pay the freight to the nearest 11 p.m. station. The animals must be maintained by the club and the loan will be for a period of from two to three years. The benefits particularly derived are these: First, it improves the quality of the cattle in that district; and after five or six years instead of having a number of scrub cattle there we find animals that are pretty well graded up and of fairly good quality. In the second place it is an educational feature of very great value inasmuch as it educates every member of that club to the value of using a pure bred sire. I may say that last year of the cattle inspected and killed in our inspected abattoirs less than ten per cent were fit for export to Europe, showing how necessary it is to raise the quality of our cattle in this country.

Mr. VIEN: What is the amount of that item?

Mr. TOLMIE: This year the amount is $60,000.

Mr. VIEN: What system of supervision is followed to ensure that the animal is maintained in good condition?

Mr. TOLMIE: Inspectors visit these various places and inspect the bulls from time to time. Unless they are maintained in proper condition they are taken away and that club's license is cancelled.

Mr. VIEN: Are the animals returned on demand from the department?

Mr. TOLMIE: Yes, they are returned to the department, and, as I pointed out before, are loaned to new clubs or, if their usefulness is over, are sold for beef and the money turned over to the department. In addition to that we have the "Canadian record of performance," which is a system whereby we carry on tests of pure bred dairy cattle throughout the country. For instance, a dairyman has a pure bred dairy herd and he wishes that herd to establish a reputation as a producing herd. On application we send a man to his premises, and he goes through a certain form in entering one, two, three, four, or five cows —whatever number he happens to have at that time. This man instructs the owner in the work to be carried on. The cow's milk is recorded every day. If she is milked twice, it is marked twice; whatever number of times she is milked is recorded. The information is all marked down on a sheet which is kept in the stable in a prominent place. Then our inspector visits the premises regularly from six to eight times a year, takes tests of the butter fat of these herds and carefully inspects the figures regarding the cows, comparing them with the notes he has taken during the two days he remains on the premises. At the end of the year he is able to tell the amount of the milk yield, and also the amount of butter fat produced by each animal. This system is very valuable indeed in several respects. In the first place it vastly increases the value of that man's herd. I may mention that we have had one cow in British Columbia that produced as high as 33,000 pounds in a year. Similar results, or very nearly as good, have been obtained in other parts of Canada. Such a record gives that cow in that particular locality a special value; not only so, but when the farmer goes into a herd produced from a pure bred sire he is able to look at the record in the pedigree of that animal, and procure a producing animal rather than one which is simply a good looking animal but not descended from producing stock. We are having very great success in connection with this system. Quite a large number of animals have been entered in this record of performance and the number is increasing every year. Up to the present time we have had 15,960 applicants.

Mr. VIEN: What is the amount to be expended for that purpose?

Mr. TOLMIE: $23,880 this year. We likewise have what is known as the car lot policy. I pointed out a moment ago that there are thousands of head of cattle passing through our inspected abattoirs that are unfit to compete in the British market with Argentine or Australian produced beef. The number that is fit amounts to less than ten per cent. These cattle come to our abattoirs in a thin condition, not properly finished and small in size, so that we are doing all that we possibly can to encourage the finishing of livestock in this country. We have therefore introduced what is known as the car lot policy to help to improve cattle along these lines. We will pay the reasonable expenses of a man from the country down to the nearest livestock market and back again, providing he purchases down there one carload of upwards of fifty cattle to take back to his farm.

Mr. VIEN: On what basis is the subsidy given to the man who purchases a car lot of cattle to be finished?

Mr. TOLMIE: We simply pay him his ordinary expenses into the market and out again.

Mr. VIEN: Do you pay the freight going and coming?

Mr. TOLMIE: Not unless he takes breeding animals. This is simply his own fare and reasonable hotel expenses.

Mr. VIEN: The item involves an expenditure of how much?

Mr. TOLMIE: About $4,000. Then we have what might be called our rescue policy. During the dry years throughout our western country thousands of young female cattle, sheep and swine that were sent to market either for export to the United States or to be taken by the abattoirs were in such poor condition that when dressed they weighed only from 250 to 350 pounds per head, whereas well-matured animals should dress easily up to 800 pounds. We paid the freight on those animals back to the country points, and in that way since the introduction of that policy we have been able to rescue some 65,000 head of cattle, 60,000 ewes and 350 sows, which are now back on the farms and being used for breeding purposes. Last year on account of two very dry seasons in succession in the southern parts of Alberta and Saskatchewan, followed by a very heavy winter which began early in the fall and did not let up until pretty well on in April, if the settlers had been left to their own resources the losses of cattle would have been tremendous. We co-operated with the Provincial Governments and with the railway companies and paid the freight on hay from many other points in Canada for the relief of those cattle. The amount paid out by this department for that particular work was around $500,000. That was one-third of the total, the other two-thirds being contributed by the provincial governments and by the railway companies.

Mr. VIEN: That included freight on the feed?

Mr. TOLMIE: Yes, just simply to carry out our rescue policy. I understand that in some other departments of the Government it was found necessary to give food to the people themselves.

Mr. VIEN: Was that on the basis of a loan or a grant?

Mr. TOLMIE: A grant. It was simply a case of rescuing those cattle that otherwise would have perished, and many farmers in those sections would have been ruined.

Mr. VIEN: Is it contemplated to continue that help?

Mr. TOLMIE: No. We have been blessed with one of the best winters we have had in the West for many years, and cattle are coming in in such good condition that many car loads of good fat grass cattle are going to market three or four weeks earlier than last year.

Mr. VIEN: Out of the $975,000 which was expended last year, I understand there was an item of $505,000 for the purpose just mentioned by the minister.

Mr. TOLMIE: No, this is an extra item not included in that particular one. It was in the Supplementary Estimates last year.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): Have the members of a cattle club any opportunity to make a selection of the bull or bulls which they require? The reason I ask the question is that I have seen several of the Shorthorn bulls put out by the Department of Agriculture, and they are not up to the size they ought to be. As a consequence many of our fat steers are not fit for export, and if we do not have a heavy type of sire, especially for the beef breed, we will not get the heavy export steer.

Mr. TOLMIE: Nearly all these bulls are yearlings, Mr. Chairman, and unless they are carefully taken care of they will not develop as rapidly as they should. But I think the real cause of the steers not being fit for export, particularly where a pure bred sire is used, is that in many cases the feeding of these animals in their younger years is not carried out as well as it might be. In fact, we all know that in some of the range sections where the grass is pretty well eaten out, the cattlemen depend too much in winter time on a diet of oxygen for their stock and do not give them enough feed.

Mr. VIEN: What were the regulations under which that grant of $500,000 was distributed?

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): I still maintain that I am quite right in my statement that the bulls which I have seen, especially the Shorthorns, are not of the heavy type. I should add that this was of course before my hon. friend was in charge of the department. I do not care how well you feed the small type, Mr. Chairman, you will never get the weight in the steer that you will if you have the heavy beef type.

Mr. TOLMIE: These bulls are what might be called the ordinary field bulls. We do not buy the very highest type of thick low Shorthorn bulls, because they would run into too much money to cross with scrub cows. However, these Shorthorns are coming down in price now and we will be able to get a very much better quality of animal than we have been able to secure in the past. I admit that some of the bulls sent out by the department have not come up to the handle because with the very high prices prevailing and the keen demand for Shorthorn cattle it was difficult to get the proper type; and, besides, in many cases people demanded the dairy type of Shorthorn.

Mr. GOULD: I understand that the discretion which the members of a horse club themselves have as to the type of heavy draft horse they will breed, that is, Clydesdale, Percheron, Shire, or others of that nature, does not extend to the lighter grades of horses.

Mr. TOLMIE: It only extends to the heavy class of horses because the motor car has had a very serious effect on the light type of horse in this country. For the heavy horse there is always a good market. In some sections of the country there is such a great excess of light horses that we have tried to sell them in Europe in the shape of corned beef in barrels and in boxes, without any great success. I think last year the number of animals of this type which could not be used or sold ran to something like 26,000 head in Alberta, and in British Columbia we have large numbers of light horses and many bands of them running absolutely wild in the valleys. Therefore, on account of the very slight demand for this type we have not encouraged its breeding. Good road horses are still in demand, and also horses that can be used for hunting or saddle purposes.

Mr. GOULD: If a club commences with a Clydesdale horse, does the department demand that the club shall continue the breeding of Clydesdales?

Mr. TOLMIE: We use our best efforts to have them continue along those lines.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I should like to get some information from the minister about the clubs that he spoke of as being formed for the purpose of getting stallions for horse breeding. I am not sure that I understood exactly what he said in regard to them. I remember that last year a delegation from my own constituency representing local horse breeders came to Ottawa with the idea of endeavouring to comply with the regulation of the department in order to get one of the grants mentioned by the minister. I understand that some difficulty had been experienced in complying with the regulations on account of the number of farmers who had to sign before anything was done. Is it the case that ten owners of horses are sufficient to form a club?

Mr. TOLMIE: Yes, there must be ten owners in these clubs, and we assist them by paying one third of the fee.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): What I want to know is whether the rules have been modified recently.

Mr. TOLMIE: No, I do not think they have been modified; we have found them acceptable all over the country. I should be very glad to furnish the hon. gentleman with a copy of the rules, and also to meet him and give him any further details he may desire.

Mr. PEDLOW: If an animal loaned for breeding purposes dies while in possession of the farmers' club, who stands the loss?

Mr. TOLMIE: We do. We see, however, that the sire is kept in proper shape. We have travelling inspectors who inspect them from time to time.

Mr. PEDLOW: And if the animal died from neglect or abuse or lack of proper care, what then?

Mr. TOLMIE: We stand the loss, and in a case of that kind the man responsible would never be furnished with another of these animals. But with our system of inspection we usually get there before the trouble goes so far.

Mr. PROULX: These animals are not insured?

Mr. TOLMIE: No.

Mr. VIEN: Will the minister give me now the information for which I asked?

Mr. TOLMIE: The amount of freight paid was totalled up and we paid our share, one third, the provincial government and the railways each paying one third.

Mr. VIEN: Who distributed the money?

Mr. TOLMIE: Our Live Stock Branch took care of our end of it.

Mr. VIEN: Item 49 does not include any expenditure of the kind referred to by the minister.

Mr. TOLMIE: No, it does not include this special relief work.

Mr. VIEN: It seems to me that we are still very far from a million dollars, the amount of this vote.

Mr. TOLMIE: Oh, I had not finished. In addition to that we carry on a cattle market system, a system of district promoters. All our livestock yards are under propert regulation; we control them in everything they do—in the handling of feed, the fees charged, and so on. We see that the yards are kept in a sanitary condition. In this respect I think we are considerably in advance of our friends to the south of the line. On the 14th of January of this year I attended a meeting held in El Paso, Texas. I attended a similar meeting held there about four years ago, and at that time they were clamouring for such regulations as we now have. When I went down there last year I found they had not even then secured the adoption of such regulations; so we have made good progress along this line. We have a system under which we issue market intelligence from these different yards and furnish market prices that are accepted by the press throughout Canada. The information is sent from one yard to another and to the head office in Ottawa, and we have found that the effect has been beneficial in stabilizing the livestock markets of this country. In addition to that we have promoters out in the country who are encouraging the farmers to sell co-operatively, and the effect has been very marked, particularly in the Maritime Provinces, where the farmers get together and ship co-operatively in carload lots to such markets as Montreal and Toronto, thus securing much better prices than would be received had the animals been sold locally. This has been carried on in connection with our sheep and lamb markets, with very good results. Then, we have assisted in wool grading. We began by grading the wool for our local sheep associations, some of which have now formed a central association with headquarters in Toronto. They handle a large proportion of the wool produced in Canada through a central wool warehouse, and I am glad to learn that they have sold all the wool that has been placed in their hands up to the present time.

Mr. VIEN: What is the nature of the assistance given by the department?

Mr. TOLMIE: We began by assisting these associations, doing the wool grading. At first we did it in the field in various sections of the country from the Atlantic to the Pacific; now we do most of it in the central warehouse at Toronto. Very much better prices have been obtained through the sale of this wool co-operatively rather than through itinerant dealers. In some cases the wool is worth about twice as much as it was at the time it was clipped; in fact we are now getting from 24 to 26 cents as compared with about 15 cents at the beginning of the season.

Mr. VIEN: Is the central warehouse a government property?

Mr. TOLMIE: No, it is rented by this association. What we have been able to do through this wool warehouse compares well with what has been done in the United States. While we have been able to dispose of all our wool, only from 30 to 40 per cent of the pooled wool in the United States has yet been sold. Another thing has been gained as a result of our grading; we find that our Canadian manufacturers are using more Canadian wool this year than they ever did before, and the wool owners, hearing about the success of this co-operative associations, have started the movement of their wool through the co-operative warehouse.

Mr. VIEN: How much is the Government spending for that purpose?

Mr. TOLMIE: On the wool grading service this year, about $8,000. In connection with the handling of eggs, we have formed egg circles throughout the country, through which last year we were able to sell 300,000 dozen eggs out of a total export of 600,000 dozen. This system is carried out in a big way in Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Ontario. The farmers agree to market co-operatively through a collector. These egg circles join other egg circles, secure a paid salesman and market to the best of their ability, thus securing very much better prices by keeping their eggs in proper condition. Under the old system they took their eggs into the country store and traded them for groceries, and as the eggs were often retained there for much longer period than they should have been, the city consumer was not always satisfied when the product finally reached his table.

We have had developments along similar lines in connection with dressed poultry. We are also carrying on a system of market reports in connection with the egg business, so that producers are continually informed as to egg market prices and are thus always able to get the best prices. We also carry on egg inspection for interprovincial movement and export; that is, eggs passing from one province to another and eggs that are exported to Great Britain. We are also carrying on now a record of performance for poultry. That is something that was not thought of in past years. We have set two standards—the hen that will lay 150 eggs in a year or a flock that will average 150 eggs per bird for a general record, and then the accredited hen with a high record of 225 eggs per year. The owners of hens producing those numbers of eggs are given a certificate to that effect, and cockerels or young roosters are registered when they come from dams possessing such records. In that way we produce a high standard of poultry, and by careful selection and breeding we have been able to bring the production of a single hen all the way from an average of 65 to 300 eggs in a year. Let me give an illustration to show what that is worth. If the produce of the 40,000,000 hens in Canada to-day could be increased by only one dozen eggs per hen in a year, that would amount to nearly $13,000,000 a year, so that it can be seen that there is an immense field ahead of us in increasing the production of our poultry.

Mr. VIEN: What is the nature of your service and assistance in that line?

Mr. TOLMIE: As regards the improvement of the eggs, the work is carried on at our experimental farms, and as regards the hen registration, the records are taken by representatives of our Poultry Branch which is connected with the livestock Department.

Mr. VIEN: Is there any grant?

Mr. TOLMIE: No, but there are wages, travelling expenses and so forth to pay in that connection.

Mr. VIEN: For the officials?

Mr. TOLMIE: In connection with the livestock service, we control the export under the Livestock and Livestock Products Act. The operations of stock yard management and the fees are controlled by our department. The operations of members of commission firms are under our department. The commission men are bonded, so that in the event of a commission man making a sale of cattle and getting away with the funds, we can recover. We carry on a bying service for farmers. Our representatives are always at the yards, and if a man is inexperienced in taking over a lot of cattle, he can go to one of our men who will give his assistance and start him on his way, and also give him information how to ship to the best advantage.

Mr. LONG: As regards the bonding of these commissioned men, I understand a little while ago there was a serious failure in connection with one of these firms in Winnipeg. How is the amount of the bond established? Is there a sliding scale, or is the bond just a fixed one?

Mr. TOLMIE: There is no sliding scale; the fixed sum is $10,000. We have been carrying on a system of exhibits at exhibitions. Many hon. members who have visited our big exhibitions have, no doubt, seen our exhibits of wool and eggs, candling eggs, and also some very temping looking samples of lamb and pork which were made of plaster of Paris and properly painted so that they made a very good imitation of the real article, the idea being to show the people the particular types demanded by the market and the most profitable ones to produce.

We have given grants to our summer fairs, and this year we have set aside a sum of $98,000 while the sum set aside for grants to winter fairs amounts to $25,000. We add prorata to the amount given by the fair in prizes up to $5,000. If a fair will give $2,500 in prizes, we add dollar for dollar to that. These winter fairs are fat stock shows, and this assistance is given with a view to encouraging the finishing of our cattle.

Mr. VIEN: Do you give these grants to all country fairs?

Mr. TOLMIE: No, only to those that can qualify under the cash system.

Mr. VIEN: What is the minimum in prizes that the local fair has to put up?

Mr. TOLMIE: A summer fair must pay at least $4,000 of its own money for livestock before receiving assistance.

Mr. VIEN: Are those grants limited to livestock?

Mr. TOLMIE: Livestock and poultry. We figure that the smaller country fairs come within the purview of the Provincial Government. We are giving our assistance to the big exhibitions. We are giving $25,000 a year to the Royal Agricultural Winter Fair Association of Toronto. This is a new exhibition established there along the lines of the big international show in Chicago. The big show in Chicago is one that has rendered a very valuable service to the livestock interests on both sides of the line, and on some occasions our Canadian breeders have been able to go over and compete with American breeders and win out. Anyone visiting that show would be astounded at the size of it and the high quality of the cattle exhibited there.

Mr. VIEN: May I point out to the minister the advisability of the department assisting these county fairs, not only the livestock or poultry ones, but all country fairs? As I pointed out when discussing the item of experimental farms the other night, very few methods of assisting agriculture generally are more progressive and practical than these county fairs which permit farmers to get together in the principal place in the county and see what has been done by the best and most progressive farmers of the districts. These county affairs are assisted by the Provincial Governments, but I think the Federal Government should also give assistance along that line. Last year, for instance, I tried to obtain a grant for the county fair of Lotbinière, which is one of the finest county fairs in my section of the province and which has been commended by the local Minister of Agriculture for its progressive methods. I would like the Department of Agriculture to take these county fairs into consideration and to see whether they could not divert some of the money or ask a vote from Parliament for assisting these county fairs in their local exhibitions.

Mr. STEIN: I should like to endorse the suggestion of my hon. friend from Lotbinière, not only as regards his county, but also the county of Kamouraska, of which I have spoken twice already during the discussion of the Estimates of this department. At St. Pascal, the county seat of Kamouraska, we not only hold a county fair each year, but we have there a large, splendid permanent building, built especially for exhibiting cattle. The father of my hon. friend from South Quebec (Mr. Power), who died last fall, had a farm in the county of Kamouraska and he was in the habit of exhibiting a great many thoroughbred cattle in this building at the county seat. I think in view of all the efforts that have been made in the past by the people of the county of Kamouraska for the development of agriculture, they should certainly receive some share of the money that is allotted by the department for these fairs.

Mr. FAFARD: Notwithstanding what has been said by my hon. friend from Lotbinière and my hon. friend from Kamouraska, their county fairs are not to be compared with the county fair we have in L'Islet.

Mr. VIEN: I take strong objection to that statement.

Mr. STEIN: Kamouraska is the only county that has a permanent fair building.

Mr. FAFARD: If I can persuade the minister to make a grant towards the fair in our county, I shall be very glad.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queen's, P.E.I.): Those of us who are interested in a practical way in agriculture have heard with pleasure the description that has been given by the minister of the activities of the Livestock Branch in the marketing of livestock and livestock products. I think we in Eastern Canada have probably come closer to the officials and have had a better opportunity of seeing how the money was expended among the farmers to encourage co-operative marketing than have other parts of Canada, and I want particularly to say that a great deal of benefit has been derived during the past few years, and especially during the past season, through the assistance of the department's representatives in the marketing of livestock. There is one thing that the farmers in our co-operative associations are not very expert in, and that is in securing proper means of transportation over long distances. In that respect we have received a great deal of benefit during the past year from the livestock representative stationed at Moncton. We have also received a great deal of benefit in a general way from the Poultry Branch. I find on looking over the Estimates that the minister has brought down that the appropriation for the general conduct of the department this year is smaller than last year by about $250,000. The large item of $390,000 for the Health of Animals Branch represent an increase, but there have been decreases in the other items. I hope it is not the intention of the minister in any way to decrease the staff in the marketing or Livestock Branch, who are assisting the farmers in the marketing of livestock, hogs, sheep, poultry and eggs. It is important from the standpoint of the agriculturists of Eastern Canada that the expenditure on that work be increased. If we do not keep pace with the times and follow up the work that has already been done, we are apt to lose the benefit of what has already been accomplished. Speaking from personal knowledge of conditions in Eastern Canada, I think this Parliament and the people of this country generally would endorse the expenditure of more money in giving assistance to farmers' associations that have organized themselves in a co-operative way to reach the larger markets of Canada. As is well known to the members of this House, in marketing our livestock it is necessary for the farmers in Eastern Canada to ship to the city of Montreal, where the nearest stockyard and abattoir are located. We have none closer to take care of the surplus stock for which there is not a market in Eastern Canada, and it is necessary that the assistance that has been given during the past year be increased next season. If I judge correctly the sentiment of our people, and the progressive spirit they are showing in co-operating with the agents of the department in marketing their livestock, I am sure that a larger number of stock will be shipped to the stockyards of Montreal and Toronto next year than during the past year. I would particularly urge upon the minister to persuade, if possible, his associates in the Government to allow him a little more money than he has asked for in his Estimates for the development and carrying on the work of the Livestock Branch.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): I wish to say a word in reference to the bonding of livestock commission men on the stock yards. The minister said that they were bonded so as to safeguard the stockmen who ship their stock to the yards against loss and so that they would be sure of receiving their money, but that is not always the result. Reference has already been made by the hon. member for Battleford to the failure of a firm in Winnipeg last fall. I have been informed that several stockmen lost heavily on shipments of stock through the failure of that firm. I think a bond of about $10,000 is not sufficient; the amount ought to be very considerably increased.

I also wish to say a word or two in regard to the work of some of the officials of the Live Stock Branch, and particularly in regard to the work being done by the official stationed in the city of Winnipeg. Mr. Johnson is doing excellent work there in educating the farmers to ship on the co-operative plan. The farmers will accompany a carload of steers to the stock yards, and in that way they see just what a fat steer ought to look like, and learn to judge just when their cattle are fit to ship. Then there is this further advantage, that they can ship back again a carload of steers for stockers. I wish to congratulate the minister upon carrying on this work and I hope he will see that it is continued. I would also impress upon him the importance of giving careful attention to the bonding of the livestock commission merchants.

Mr. TOLMIE: That question is under consideration at the present time.

Mr. CALDWELL: I should like to endorse what my hon. friend from Queen's P.E.I. (Mr. Sinclair) has said as to the assistance the farmers have received from the officials of the department in the shipping of their livestock. I have been chiding my hon. friend since he sat down for not going far enough. As he has said, we have to ship our stock to Montreal because we have no nearer market in the Maritime Provinces for our livestock. The other evening the minister said that an abattoir and cold storage plant had not been built in the Maritime Provinces because there was not enough stock in sight to keep it running the year around or make it profitable. Personally I think there never will be unless the abattoir and cold storage are started first. The plant could be started on a small scale, and once started, I am sure that business would increase very rapidly. At the present time our livestock must be shipped to Montreal or some other point in order to get the facilities of the abattoir and cold storage plant. Then the meat products have to be shipped back to us in Eastern Canada and we are therefore in the position of having to pay freight both ways. We pay freight on the livestock to the abattoir, and our dealers pay freight on the meat going back again to the eastern provinces. In the eastern provinces our winters are long and severe. Most of our farmers who have any stock to sell have to dispose of it at a time of year, towards the fall, when cattle are not easily fattened in the warm weather, principally by grazing. At that time there are no facilities for handling stock to be sold in the Maritime Provinces and the farmer gets a small price for his cattle. Unfortunately, we do not do enough winter feeding. If we had enough fat stock for sale at the time of year, round about Easter, when high prices obtain, and if we had facilities for handling cattle in the Maritime Provinces, the stock industry would develop very rapidly. We have a good country for growing stock, but we lack facilities to enable us to take advantage of the opportunities that offer. With regard to the grants to agriculture, I was interested to hear the minister's statement on this subject. Has any grant been applied for by the agricultural society with headquarters in Woodstock, Carleton county, New Brunswick? If so, what prospect is there of this grant being given?

Mr. TOLMIE: No formal application has been made. Judging from the report for last year, they have apparently qualified for the grant this year.

Mr. CALDWELL: I should think so. I heard hon. members boasting about the exhibitions they have; they claim they have the best buildings and grounds for exhibitions. I would invite, not only the Minister of Agriculture, but those members who have been bragging about their facilities for holding exhibitions, to go to Woodstock, New Brunswick, and see one of the most beautiful spots on earth for an exhibition.

Mr. VIEN: We shall be delighted.

Mr. CALDWELL: It is on an angle of the St. John river, reached by a bridge. I do not know the exact amount expended by that society in the past two years, but I know that they have spent something like $80,000 for buildings and a race course. People from the United States go to the exhibitions there and they tell us that the ground at Woodstock is the most beautiful they have ever visited. I hope, therefore, the minister will see his way to give us a substantial grant to assist our society.

Item agreed to.

Seed and Feed Control, $240,000.

Mr. VIEN: Will the minister give us some explanation of this item?

Mr. TOLMIE: In connection with the seed department, during the winter and fall months we carry on a system of inspection of seeds. These seeds are carefully examined at our different laboratories which are established in various parts of the country, the object being to secure a supply of pure seed to the farmers. In summer, we encourage the growing of good seed in communities, and aim at having them grow particular kinds of seed, so that purchasers may buy in carload lots. We also establish seed fairs, and have field men demonstrate the necessity for the use of good seed and how best to produce it. Our experimental farms carry on experiments with new varieties, or with varieties they have already produced. When these are found to be of substantial value, they are taken out by the seed branch and further developed along commercial lines in centres where we attempt to get as many good first class farmers as possible interested in the production of A1 seed. This is of the very greatest possible importance to agriculture in Canada. Poor seed is like poor stock; you cannot expect good results from poor seed any more than you can expect good results from a scrub bull. So that, excellent results have been obtained. We also have a system of producing what is known as pedigreed seed. A pure strain is secured and developed, and after a careful selection running over a period of three years, when the varieties reach that state of purity that satisfies the inspector, after they have gone through the full process, they are accepted as pedigreed seed.

Mr. VIEN: Does this item comprise grants of seed, or grants of money as prizes for first class grain?

Mr. TOLMIE: The sum of $60,000 is granted to seed fairs, and in the marketing of seeds there is an organization in the local seed centre, and interprovincial and export trade is developed. Through the action of this particular branch we have been able to secure our own root seeds. We have greatly increased the production of timothy and other grass and clover seeds. Many of these seeds before the war were entirely imported. We carry on a publicity campaign with a view to directing attention to the value of Canadian grown seed, and we have also done a certain amount of work in connection with development of fibre flax and the inspection of potatoes. We have inspected during the last year, in the St. Lawrence valley, 171 car loads of seed potatoes. We also carry on seed grading at the terminal elevators. Seed is graded according to standard for home use and export. This particular branch carried on what was known as the Seed Purchasing Commission during the war with a view to securing a supply of pure seed so as to encourage greater production, and they were able since 1916 to do a business amounting to nearly $16,000,000 of clean and graded seed. The seed is forwarded to any person in Canada on application, and is shipped on sight draft. After expending all this money, I am glad to be able to say that they were in a position to get returns for every dollar, to pay all expenses and a fair rate of interest on the money. This particular branch controls ordinary feeds, such as bran, shorts, etc., under the new Act passed last year. Our men receive complaints from time to time regarding the condition of these feeds, and they make investigations to see that the law is complied with. But in view of the fact that the law has been in operation only a short time, our work so far has consisted largely in a campaign of education. Our men go into the various mills where feeds are mixed and take samples of them before they go into the hopper in order to secure information showing the value of the seed and as to whether the producer or manufacturer is complying with the law as to the ingredients he uses in various feeds. That is the general line of the work which is being carried on by this branch, which we consider one of the most important in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. ARGUE: Will the Seed Commission be continued in existence this year?

Mr. TOLMIE: Yes, it will.

Item agreed to.

Grant to National Dairy Council, $3,000.

Mr. VIEN: What is the National Dairy Council?

Mr. TOLMIE: This Council is composed of representatives from all the dairy associations in the various provinces of Canada.

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS

BILLS WITHDRAWN

Bill intituled: "An Act to amend the Dominion Controverted Elections Act."—The Solicitor General.

Bill intituled: "An Act to amend the Corrupt Practices Inquiries Act."—The Solicitor General.

Bill intituled: "An Act to amend the Disfranchising Act."—The Solicitor General.

CORRUPT PRACTICES BILL

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Acting Solicitor General) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 39, to amend the statutes relating to corrupt practices at elections.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Explain, please.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Speaker, this Bill is intended to take the place of the three Bills which appear on the Order Paper and which at my request have to-day been withdrawn. At first it was thought proper to amend the three separate Acts, namely, the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, the Corrupt Practices Inquiries Act, and the Disfranchising Act. The amendments were all consequential amendments, consequent upon the passage of the Act last session known as the Dominion Elections Act. The House will remember that prior to the enactment of the Dominion Elections Act at the last session we had an offence under the former law known as the offence of "corrupting practice" or "corrupt practice". In the law passed past session we added an offence of irregularity, known as an "illegal practice", so that now we have these two irregularities in our law, the "corrupt practice" and "illegal practice." The Dominion Controverted Elections Act, the Corrupt Practices Inquiries Act, and the Disfranchising Act, were drawn in reference to the law as it formerly stood, and as these Acts appear on the statute book to-day, they take no cognizance whatever of "illegal practices." The Chief Electoral Officer has prepared the Bill which I ask for leave to introduce, to meet this difficulty and to apply as an amendment to the three Acts which I have just specified.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

RESTRICTION OF IMMIGRATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. F. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question based upon an interview given by the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, Mr. E. W. Beatty, in which he is reported to have said something in regard to immigration into this country, giving it as his opinion that the present regulations should be modified. I desire to ask the Government if it is their intention to bring down legislation at this session making the immigration laws less restrictive with regard to the nationality of immigrants coming into Canada.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): The Government has no legislation under consideration on the subject at the present time. If any is to be brought down, announcement will be made in due course.

PONTIAC CENSUS COMMISSIONERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. FRANK CAHILL (Pontiac): I wish to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) when the census commissioners for the county of Pontiac will be appointed.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The census commissioners for the county of Pontiac have been appointed.

REPORT OF TARIFF COMMISSION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. PIUS MICHAUD (Restigouche): Is it the intention of the Government to submit soon to this House a report from the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) of the information secured lately from all persons interested in every province in connection with the revision of the tariff?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): The Minister of Finance is not present to-day. I may say, however, that other committees of inquiry into the tariff have sat in the past and held inquiries, and to the best of my knowledge no formal report was ever submitted by them. The object of such commissions is to secure information upon which a tariff may be based.

NORTH AMERICAN TRUST COMPANY OF CANADA

The House in committee on Bill No. 15, to incorporate the North American Trust Company of Canada, and recommending that the title be changed to "An Act to incorporate the Scottish Canadian Trust Company."—Mr. Mowat.—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—incorporation:

Mr. MOWAT: In view of the discussion which took place in the House at the last sitting, when objection was taken by another company, and having regard to the fact that it is not the desire of the promoters of the Bill to take any undue advantage, I would ask that the matter stand and that the Bill be referred back to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is there any connection between this company and the North American Life Assurance Company?

Mr. MOWAT: My hon. friend will see, from the report of the committee, that it is proposed that the name be changed to the Scottish Canadian Trust Company. But some objection has been made even to the change in name, and it is thought that the Banking and Commerce Committee can better dispose of these differences than they can be disposed of here.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Mowat moves that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Before this motion is adopted I desire to say a few words as chairman of the committee. When the matter came up on Friday last I was in my place and had intended to speak at that time, but it appeared to me that the procedure was not strictly in accordance with the rules of the House, inasmuch as the motion was put when the Speaker was about to leave the Chair. This special Bill should not have been mentioned at that time; the motion usually is that the House go into Committee of the Whole on private bills, no specific bill being mentioned. Now, we have endeavoured in the committee to arrive at satisfactory conclusions on the matters that have come before us. It would be well for this committee to look at rule 91, which refers to this matter and which distinctly states, on page 51, that when an application of this kind is made—

> The name of the proposed company shall be stated in the notice.

In this case, we had three names stated in the notice, and at the request of the promoters of the Bill, the change was made from the "North American Company to the Scottish-Canadian Company." During the six weeks that this Bill had been advertised, no objection was taken to the words "Scotish-Canadian." I think the committee will realize that it is very difficult to get a name that does not conflict with the ideas of someone with regard to incorporations. For instance, the word "Empire" occurs five times, and the word "Canada" probably occurs twenty times in lists of incorporations that have been made within recent years, so that it is difficult to get a name that suits all parties. The desire of the committee is that the name shall be distintive, and as regards the use of the words "Scottish" and "Canadian," if they the used together in any one Act, the name apears to me sufficiently distinctive. But in this particular case, if I am properly informed, though there is a company styled the "Scottish-Canadian," incoporated by an Act of the province of Quebec, that company has not been organized and is not doing business. I could not say definitely as to that, but that is my information. If that be the case, and it does not appear in the records of the House that we have ever granted an incorporation under that name, it would appear to me that it is not taking too much for granted if we allow the name "Scottish-Canadian" to stand. I do not want to take any ground that will jeopardize the rights of any company; as chairman of the committee, I am desirous that we should avoid doing so; but this House has power to fix the name and the committee has not.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Was any objection taken to the name while it was advertised?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: No, and the proposed incorporation was advertised for six weeks. Up to the present moment, I have, as chairman of the committee, had no intimation that the name was objected to. The first intimation I had was on Friday last when it was moved, without discussion, that the Bill be referred back, and I had no knowledge of the reasons for that action. We had three names to choose from—North American, Scottish-Canadian and Metropolitan. It is quite possible that the name "Metropolitan" will be objected to, so that the committee will then be powerless to give the Bill a name. It is particularly provided, under the rules of the House, that the final motion is that the Bill be passed and the title be as in the Order Paper, or some other name which the House is willing should be placed on the Bill. If there is material evidence to offer to the committee with regard to the objection of using the name "Scottish-Canadian," certainly we could have no objection to hearing that; but up to the present, I have had given to me no reason that I think at all sufficient to warrant the referring back of the Bill. I would suggest that the Bill be considered in order to find out if there is anything else to which objection might be taken, and then if it is thought of sufficient importance by this committee to refer it back, that action might be taken.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have no personal objection to the Bill as it stands, but I might remind hy hon. friend that the three names which have been suggested for this trust company are, to my personal knowledge, already used by insurance companies. I was mentioning one a moment ago.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: This is not an insurance company; it is a trust company.

Mr. LEMIEUX I know that, but the names are used by some big insurance companies. The North American Trust suggests the idea that it might be a subsidiary of the North American Life Assurance Company, the Metropolitan Trust suggests the idea that it might be a subsidiary of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, and the name "Scottish-Canadian" is, if I am not mistaken, used by the old London and Lancashire Insurance Company of Montreal, which has changed its name to the Scottish-Canadian Insurance Company. I happen to know this through some business which I did not very long ago with that company. I do not at all object if the committee is agreeable to giving that name to the trust company, but I warn my hon. friend that, perhaps, some interested parties might object to it. Perhaps, if we should refer the Bill back to the committee, after Easter it could come before the House again. I have no personal objection; I am only pointing out that all three names are suggestive of three life assurance companies, and my hon. friend, I know would be the last man to injure, even by implication and through a name, any other firm.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I know nothing about this particular case, except that on Friday night last at about five minutes to eight o'clock, the solicitor for the Scottish Canadian Trust Company or Scottish Trust Company of Canada—I do not know exactly which it is—came to me and asked me to request the committee to refer this Bill back in order that further consideration might be given to the name. There is an evident blunder in the name as it appears in the Orders of the Day. It is called the "Scottish Canadian Trust Company of Canada," so that there is an unnecessary duplication, and it would be necessary to refer it back on account of that. The complaint made to me was that when the Bill was originally advertised, it was advertised in the name of the North American Trust Company. It is true two alternative names were submitted, but any one glancing at the advertisement would think it was the North American Trust Company. It happens there is a Scottish Canadian Insurance Company and a Scottish Trust Company of Canada, both of them having their head office in Quebec. If the name is referred back to the committee the matter can be settled without great difficulty, and those persons who are interested or who think they have a grievance can appear and state their cases.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I should like also to say to my hon. friend (Mr. Cockshutt) that, as regards the use of the words "Royal" or "Empire," some years ago, that is, prior to 1911, an Order in Council was passed by the Federal Government at the request of the Home Government that the Canadian Government do not issue letters patent to or incorporate companies using those names. I know the rule was strictly adhered to, and I do not know how it has happened that since then we have allowed any companies to use the name "Empire" or the name "Royal."

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I quite recognize the force of the hon. gentleman's argument. I want to point out—I do not think I did so before—that we were limited to those three names, all of which my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) says will be objected to.

Mr. LEMIEUX: They might be.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I understood my hon. friend to say that they would be. I am pointing out that, under the rules of the House, it is necessary that the name shall be stated and that it shall be advertised for six weeks. A period of six weeks at this stage of the proceedings is quite a serious item. It would be probably a week or two before the advertisement would appear, so that it might be eight weeks before this Bill could again come before the House, even if we succeeded fairly well in getting a name that is not objected to. The rule is that the name has to be advertised, and we could not violate that rule without special permission.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): What is the name of the company?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: At present, as appears on the Order Paper, "The Scottish Canadian Trust Company of Canada."

Mr. MACLEAN: "Where does the word "Royal" come in?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: It does not come in at all. That word was just mentioned as a precaution, that we should not use it in any alternative name. The words "of Canada" are tautological, and should be struck out. The mover of the amendment did not notice that at the time, and I was going to move that those words be struck out. This committee could do that without referring the Bill back. I want the committee to understand, however, that under the rules, if one or other of these three names is not selected, it will be necessary to have another six weeks' advertising in the Gazette.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It has been done many times without it.

Mr. NESBITT: May I suggest that the committee can fix it in a few minutes. You could adopt one of these names. The name, North American Trust Company, does not conflict with the name of any other trust company that I know of.

The CHAIRMAN: I might point out to the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) that on Friday evening no motion was made concerning this Bill whatever. When the Order was called for the House to go into Committee of the Whole on this Bill the motion, which will be found on page 112 of the Votes and Proceedings, read as follows:

> Mr. Fripp moved, That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of the Whole on Private Bills (pursuant to rule 109); which was agreed to.

This Bill was not considered in Committee of the Whole owing to the objection made by the hon. the acting Solicitor General, upon the motion to go into committee. Concerning the request which has now been made that the Bill be referred back to the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, I must rule that the Committee of the Whole House has no right to make this reference. It will therefore be necessary for this committee to report progress to Mr. Speaker, and a motion made in the House to refer the Bill back to the Banking and Commerce Committee, will then be in order.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Perhaps I might be pardoned, Mr. Chairman, for drawing your attention to how the matter appears in Hansard, for that is where I was looking. It appears by Hansard that Mr. Fripp moved:

> That the House go into Committee on Bill No. 15, to incorporate the North American Trust Company of Canada, and recommending that the title be changed to "An Act to Incorporate the Scottish Canadian Trust Company of Canada."—Mr. Mowatt.

I think the Votes and Proceedings is correct, and that Hansard is incorrect.

The CHAIRMAN: The mistake in Hansard is easily explainable by the fact that the motion was made immediately after the Clerk Assistant had read that order, though it was a different motion that was submitted from the Chair.

Progress reported.

Mr. MOWAT: I beg to move:

> That the Order of the Day for the House to go into committee on Bill No. 15, An Act to Incorporate North American Trust Company of Canada, be discharged and that the Bill be referred back to the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

THE HOUSING PROBLEM.

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF A FEDERAL HOUSING BOARD

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (West Toronto) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the general interest of the people of Canada will be served by making it possible for every industrious, frugal and thrifty citizen to become the owner in fee simple of a house and lot; that the Government of Canada should grant assistance to make that possible; and to that end, the sum of ten million dollars should be appropriated annually for a period of five years to buy land and build houses for men of good character who can make a small initial payment and undertake to liquidate the indebtedness incurred by monthly instalments as may be agreed upon; that a Federal Housing Board be appointed to carry out the plan which, for the first year—or such longer period as in the opinion of the Governor General in Council may be desirable—shall be confined to men who have served overseas.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): Before the hon. member proceeds, Mr. Speaker, I beg to raise a point of order. Although I should be very glad to hear the arguments which the hon. member might advance, yet I should like to have a ruling of the Chair on the motion as it reads, calling as it does for the expenditure of public moneys. I desire to know what the ruling of the Chair is on that question.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): Perhaps I may be permitted to say a word or two on the point of order. This is a general resolution which undoubtedly involves the spending of money, but in this respect it differs from the resolution to which I took exception the other day, moved by the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Campbell). I am not going to argue that this resolution is in order, but I would point out that it might be held to be in order, while the other was ruled out of order, for a reason which I shall now advance. There is nothing in this resolution which, if the House saw fit to pass it, would involve a charge at any definite time upon the public treasury. The resolution of the hon. member for Nelson, however, had it carried, would have involved a charge this year on the public treasury. I was not in the House when your Honour's decision was given on that resolution, but it would seem to me that any resolution so reading should be held to be without the powers of a private member of the House. The present resolution is different and I do not wish to apply my argument thereto, but in my judgment it is well worthy of consideration whether it is not also beyond the competence of a private member.

Mr. SPEAKER: The point of order raises a question which involves a principle affecting to a rather marked degree the rights of private members of the House. In earlier years the practice was to exclude resolutions of this character as being money resolutions, and therefore not competent to be moved by private members. However, in recent years the tendency has grown up to relax the rule and to regard these resolutions, although in their own terms intending to involve the expenditure of money, as being merely an expression of opinion on the part of the hon. member who moves them, or of the House of Commons if the resolution should be adopted. Perhaps I should say also that as far as I can gather the spirit which has prompted speakers heretofore to not regard these resolutions as money resolutions in the sense that they ought not to be adopted is, that they were to be deemed merely an expression of opinion, and that the Government was not ipso facto to be bound to implement the expression of opinion contained in the resolution. In other words the constitutional rule and duty of the Government to be responsible for initiating financial legislation was not to be impaired in any degree.

As I said the other day my feeling with respect to such resolutions is this: that it seems to be in the highest degree desirable that hon. members should have as much latitude as possible to discuss all manner of questions affecting the public welfare, and that they ought not to be restricted by the application of the rigorous letter of the law. My own tendency is to so interpret the rules of the House as to always permit the widest possible measure of discussion. I shall not give a final opinion at present upon this resolution but will take further opportunity of looking into the matter. I have already indicated what my own view at the moment is, having regard to previous decisions, having regard to previous acts of this House, and having regard to the decision I gave a few days ago —which I may say I found out afterwards was confirmed absolutely by a considered opinion given by Mr. Speaker Sproule in this House a very few years ago, and I may add in connection therewith that it was a judgment reversing a decision of his own of the day before so that it was his matured opinion. At that time he restored to the Order Paper a resolution which on the previous day he had ruled out, a resolution which in its terms called for the expenditure of public money on the part of this House. As at present advised I am inclined therefore to regard this motion as being in order, but I shall take the question into consideration and acquaint the House with my decision in due course.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not rise, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of questioning your ruling. On the contrary what your Honour has just stated seems to be most reasonable—that private members should have a right to express a pious opinion about public matters. In the present instance, however, my hon. friend (Mr. Hocken) seems to be going so much against the rules of the House—because he mentions in his resolution the desirability of making an annual appropriation of $10,000,000 for a period of five years—that I would suggest to him that if he were to amend the resolution by avoiding the mention of that sum of money I think there would be no question as to its being in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The suggestion of the hon. member for Maisonneuve is certainly an admirable one. If it meets with the wishes of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken), I am sure no question will arise with respect to the resolution under the rules of the House.

Mr. HOCKEN: Mr. Speaker, I am quite content to amend the resolution in the manner suggested by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux). I do not think, and I did not think, that I could do much more at this time than ventilate this question in the House. The resolution expresses an opinion that I have had for many years; and the more deeply I have studied this question, the more convinced I have become that the proposal to place every head of a household in this country in possession of his own house and lot is good, sound public policy. I scarcely expected that the Government would have $10,000,000 to appropriate off hand for this purpose, and perhaps I may be accused of having a good deal of assurance in presenting such a suggestion; but I feel satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that that amount of money could not be expended by the Government to better advantage than in the way that I suggest, and I will at least endeavour to show why a broad policy on this question should be adopted.

In the past, Mr. Speaker, the accepted function of a government was to build railways in the West, and wharves in the Maritime Provinces, and, occasionally an armoury building in the province of Ontario. Such will always be an important part of national administration. As the country develops construction must proceed, and I am not arguing that there should be any cessation of expenditures that are necessary for such purposes. But we have reached a time in the history of the world when the common people look for something more from the Government than the construction of roads and public buildings. Some people say that the war has brought this about. My judgment is that it was coming years before the war; it may have been accelerated by the great conflict but was not caused by it. Slowly, during the past generations, a conviction has been growing in the minds of the common people that the needs of the masses demand more attention from those who administer the affairs of the nation. The first manifestation of this is to be found in municipal government, as far as my experience goes. Fifteen years ago there was a great awakening, Mr. Speaker, among the thoughtful men and women as to the responsibility upon the part of government for the amelioration of the conditions of life among the least fortunate portion of the community. We find this exhibited in the new method adopted in all progressive states and provinces for the treatment of those who have been incarcerated in prisons for violations of the law. Not so long ago the one idea in handling criminals was their punishment; to-day the dominant idea in dealing with them is to bring about their reformation. I mention this as one of the outstanding developments of a more intelligent study of human needs that distinguishes this generation. I might follow it in many directions, because the same spirit is displayed in dealing with defectives of all kinds, and in providng for those who lack opportunities for self-development, physically, mentally and morally. The underlying motive of all this is the betterment of the people—the betterment of the common people, and by that term I mean the great majority of our population who must always be employed as wage earners. Those who have the organizing ability and business capacity to become employers do not need financial assistance from the Government to provide the ordinary comforts of life or to make provision for old age. In every country, however, these constitute but a fraction of the total population; the majority will always be in the ranks of the artisans, labourers, and clerks. It is the welfare of this large class of citizens on whose behalf I am trying to say a word to-day. They are not paupers, they are not looking for charity; but in my judgment they have a right to expect from the Government such reasonable asistance as will enable them to properly organize their homes and so secure for their children places to which they can look back in later years with happy recollections.

There are many thousands of industrious citizens in this country who have not been able to acquire owership of even the most modest house and lot. They have striven to educate their children and to maintain their families in a state of decent comfort, and this has absorbed their entire earnings and deprived them of the opportunity of saving enough to purchase homes. On the other hand, Sir, it is true that there are many thousands who, by sacrifices, known only to themselves, have secured a start in this direction and by slow degrees have extinguished the mortgages they had to assume and carry over a period of years. This class of people are the very salt of the earth. They have uncomplainingly and, as a rule, cheerfully, submitted to domestic economies that no man or family makes from choice; they have submitted to those economies with their eyes on the future.

With every year that passes it becomes more difficult for a man to make such a start. In most of our cities and towns the price of house property has advanced to such a point that the initial payment necessarily demanded by builders is beyond the capacity of the average workman. Consequently the difficulties have increased so enormously that the need of 4 p.m. assistance is greater now than at any time in the past. Moreover, the cessation of building operations during the war has left this country with a shortage of homes, estimated by officials of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada at between 45,000 and 50,000 houses. The result is that two or three families are compelled to live in one house which was designed to accommodate one small family.

It must be apparent to hon. members that heroic measures are justified to relieve such a situation. It is that kind of thing, Sir, that leads to dissatisfaction, intensifies unrest, and awakens in the individual a sense of injustice, making him an easy prey for radical and revolutionary agitators. An industrious man with a family crowded into inadequate space becomes a disheartened and careless citizen. Every man needs some incentive to inspire him to make the best of his opportunities and to properly develop his talents, but such personal development is impossible without wholesome and happy home surroundings, and unfortunately these cannot be obtained by many thousands of artisans in the towns and cities of this country. Let such conditions prevail over an extended period, and we will establish here some of the most deplorable features characteristic of urban life in Europe. Those are the conditions that breed communism and anarchism; whereas the individual home where one family can live in privacy with a reasonable degree of comfort inevitably produces a better type of parent and a better type of child. So I take the ground, Sir, that all governments should be concerned with the material and moral welfare of those they govern.

The problem of housing has become so acute that the need for extraordinary measures must be apparent to every observant person. As I have already stated, officials of the Trade and Labour Congress of Canada have declared that there is a shortage of 45,000 houses. We find that the situation has become a matter of deep concern to the provincial legislatures, for I see by the press that legislation to place restrictions upon landlords has been suggested in the Legislature of Quebec, while in the province of Ontario the exorbitant rents charged by landlords, due entirely to the shortage of houses, has led the Government of that province to introduce a bill to establish a fair-rent court. This surely is an extraordinary measure and one which a few years ago no one would have dreamt of suggesting.

Addressing the Town Planning Convention at Toronto on February 17 last, Archbishop McNeil, said:

> There are few of the six-roomed houses in Toronto that have not got two families in them, and sometimes lodgers besides. * * * Last year we had 7,784 marriages in Toronto, and at least 5,000 houses at reasonably low prices were called for. How many such houses were erected? Only 61. And we find that 116 houses were pulled down during the year, while 79 dwellings were converted into business places. So, you see, we have been progressing backwards.

I think I need go no further in elaboration of my argument of the necessity for a vigorous programme of house building in our towns and cities. The condition is so obtrusive that it is scarcely possible for any person to be ignorant of it.

It will no doubt be argued that the responsibility for improving housing conditions rests with the provincial governments. I admit the force of this argument, but it seems to me that this Parliament, being the chief legislative authority in the Dominion, might well undertake, in co-operation with the provincial and municipal authorities, a programme that would relieve conditions which are so unsatisfactory and which must tend towards the degeneration of our people. I appreciate what this Parliament has done in appropriating $25,000,000, of which $10,000,000 has been expended through the provincial authorites. However, that does not seem to me to go far enough. While the British North America Act may impose upon the provinces the responsibility of settling social questions of this kind, I do not think that that entirely absolves this Parliament of responsibility to take cognizance of, and to provide remedies for, conditions of so unsatisfactory a nature.

The germ of my proposal in this resolution is not to provide any temporary expedient, but rather to create a permanent body that would constantly be available to prevent the intensification of this problem and to work in the direction of assuring to every man an opportunity to acquire his own home, providing he will make any real effort himself. This is not socialism, Mr. Speaker, it is individualism. It is not giving our people something for nothing. It is putting them in a position where they would be encouraged to exercise thrift, to develop industrious habits and thus steadily to liquidate the indebtedness that they must incur to become their own landlords.

The possession of real estate, no matter how small a portion, has a peculiar effect upon a man, and it is an effect that is shared by his family. It raises his standing in the community. It gives him a sense of dignity. That is one of the strongest incentives to self-development that any person can have. He becomes deeply interested in the good government of his municipality because he is a direct taxpayer, and this interest in municipal affairs inevitably leads to closer study of all other branches of government that we have. He follows the course of political discussions. He applies more intelligent methods in reaching dis decisions as to his political future. He feels himself to be an important unit in the body politic. Who can estimate the value to the country of converting the easygoing, rent-paying artisan into an earnest, property-owning citizen? The effort to acquire a home in this way arouses in the average man an ambition to develop every talent that he possesses. We have all through this country manufacturers and employers of labour who owe their present position in business to the thrifty habits acquired by the purchase of a home in their early years. It develops all that is best in a man, because he is not actuated by purely selfish motives; the welfare of his wife and family is the dominant idea in his mind. Thus the finer impulses of his nature are stimulated; he takes a pride in his little property because it is his, no matter how large the mortgage may be. A spirit of emulation causes him to employ his spare hours in making improvements and keeping his little property in the best condition he can. And, Sir, the effect upon his family is proportionate to that upon himself. His wife is as deeply interested in and is as proud of her ownership as her husband. Upon her falls a great deal of the necessity for thrift, and she benefits in every way by the responsibilities which she carries in common with her husband. The children in such a home are necessarily taught industrious and frugal habits, and such teaching in childhood has its effect throughout life. The very obligations assumed by the parent are shared unconsciously by the children; at a tender age they learn to understand the value of economy, and ultimately see its reward in the liquidation of the indebtedness on their home and the better conditions under which they live. These things cannot be taught in school; it is only by the everyday experiences in the home that a child can be made to understand that self-denial in the small things is necessary for the accomplishment of a purpose which makes for the permanent welfare of the family. Such lessons as forming a part of the child's education should not be lightly regarded. So that for the man, for the woman, and for the child there is educational and moral value and the development of civic virtue in the ownership of a home.

Contrast the conditions outlined by Archbishop McNeil, where two or more families live in a six-roomed house, with the occupancy of a house by one family. A whole speech might be made on this phase of the housing problem. It is essential to the proper care and training of children that there should be privacy in the domestic circle. That makes for obedience to parental authority; it enables parents to bring up their children in their own way and without the dangers through associations beyond their control. The house with two or three families in it can never be dignified by the name of home. It may be a place in which to sleep, but all the wholesome influence of home that men cherish throughout their lives and which restrain them from excesses of all kinds are absent from those habitations where two or three families are herded together in six rooms. We make complaints about the inefficiency of the churches, and then we allow conditions to be created that render all the wishes of religious teachers to care for the spiritual welfare of the people difficult if not impossible of accomplishment.

In my judgment, Sir, the time has come when the state must do all that it reasonably can to restore the home to the place of power and influence which it ought to occupy and which in times past it did occupy; for to its occupancy of that place we are indebted to-day for the morality of our people and the stability of our institutions. We are now going through a crisis in this world as the aftermath of the great war, but it is a crisis that never would have arisen, I venture to say, if the common people of all the civilized nations had been in possession of their own property. Ownership of real estate makes a man a steadier citizen. Having made the sacrifices inseparable from the acquisition of a home his whole interest lies in maintaining it. He is not fuel for agitators or revolutionists; on the contrary, he is an impediment to the agitator; he is the most desirable force in the country for orderly government and constitutional procedure. I take an ilustration from my own city, Sir, a community of half a million people. The extremes of wealth and poverty are to be found there, in a form quite as acute as in any city of the Dominion. Looking at it upon the surface, it would seem to be fertile ground for communist activity, but it passed safely through that period of unrest which affected similar communities in this country more seriously. What is the explanation, Mr. Speaker? It lies in the fact that forty-seven and one-half per cent of the houses in Toronto are occupied by their owners. Roughly speaking, one-half of our population have a deep sense of responsibility for good gevernment and the maintenance of order, to a degree that would not be possible if they had not been influenced by the possession of small properties which to them are as great as the plants of the wealthiest manufacturers. Is it not worth while, Mr. Speaker, for this Parliament to take cognizance of such a situation, and even to take extraordinary measures to bring about, by degrees, that state of affairs in which every man will have the same incentive to be an industrious and thrifty citizens? These periods of unrest will recur, we have not seen the last of them in Canada; and I submit that the best means that can be adopted to prepare to deal with such crisis is to develop to the highest degree that we can those qualities that make for sobriety of temperament, steady observance of the law, and intelligent co-operation for personal and community improvement.

We have been fortunate in this country in that we have so few large cities, and so many cities of from ten to thirty thousand population. I wish that the two or three large cities we have could be reduced one-half in population, and that the other half of their population could be spread throughout the smaller communities. I am sure that this would produce a much more wholesome state of affairs. My own province of Ontario is the best example that we have of the existence of few large cities. There are in that province scores of flourishing communities of a population of from ten to thiry thousand, where workmen have their half-acre to cultivate and their own little cottage,where contentment and ideal domestic conditions prevail. There are cities like Kitchener, Guelph, Stratford, St. Thomas, and a score of others that ilustrate the point I am trying to make. In these places strikes are almost unknown, for employer and employee live together in harmonious relations, and in the last analysis, Mr. Speaker, It will be found that this state of industrial harmony can be traced to the ownership by the operatives in the factories of their own homes. They are better workmen because they are contented with the conditions under which they live, the most important factor of which is domestic felicity. They are good neighbors to one another because of the influence of happy homes. Let illness overtake one family in such a community as I am trying to describe, and from all sides will come assistance and sympathy and helpfulness, because they have been welded into one great family by long associations and intimate relationship.

Nor can we overlook the importance of a permanent abode in the life of a man and his family. Those who are at the mercy of landlords may live a year in one place and a year in another. Continual changes of residence are costly to the family; they lessen the ability of parents to own their own property, while they have a sad effect upon the children.

The ownership of a house and lot is insurance against unemployment and old age. In great Britain large sums of money are paid out in old age pensions and unemployment doles and there are advocates of like measures in this country. I do not entirely disagree with their view, but I look upon such payments as a form of charity that self-respecting men must accept with repugnance. It is better for the people, and for the State, to preserve the finer sensibilities of our citizens by putting them in a position to meet such emergencies by their own efforts. One who has not rent to pay monthly can get through a period of unemployment much more easily than one who must raise a definite amount for a landlord as the months roll by. The payment of rent has been the most difficult feature of the unemployment situation with which we have had to deal in our city during the last few months. The fear of eviction, added to the anxiety of enforced idleness, has intensified the distress of many a family. With that obligation eliminated, it is astonishing how long a family can carry on with small means, and in most cases it is possible to get through several months of unemployment. Unemployment usually occurs in the fall and winter months when the need of shelter is imperative. As spring opens up in this country, work is resumed in many lines in which it is impossible during the rigorous winter season, so that if we could put the masses of our people in a position to tide over the few months of unemployment, which will always be an inevitable feature of Canadian life, we would accomplish a great deal for the wage earner.

Ownership of a home would also act as a provision for old age, and it would be more effective provision than the small dole which is the best any country can pay to the aged and infirm. Given a home in which to live, an old couple will require but little additional assistance to maintain them. That little, in nearly every instance, could be provided by the children who might share the home belonging to their aged parents. The amount which they would pay in rent would meet this obligation; or if the children have homes of their own, the rent their parents could receive from their own home—and there will always be a renting class—would be sufficient for the modest needs of the parents, so that the possession of house property, of a home, by a man and his wife, forms, to my mind, the most self-respecting provision that can be made for unemployment or old age.

An appropriation provided for this purpose would be, not an expenditure, but an investment, and one more certain of return than the vast sums which we are providing for the railways. The experience of loan companies in Ontario is that not one per cent of men who purchase homes on the instalment plan fail in meeting their obligations. Their first care is to meet the interest and principal payments, and they submit to economies of the most drastic kind when that is necessary to protect their little properties. Therefore, it must be conceded that there would be no losses to the treasury from such an undertaking.

I have proposed in the resolution that returned soldiers should have the preference in the expenditure of moneys appropriated for such a purpose. We owe that to them at least; we owe to the returned soldiers a great deal more than we ever can pay; many of them have come back and have not been able to settle down in homes and are still at the mercy of landlords. The services that they rendered to us overseas require us to see that, whether they are living in the country or in the city, unusual measures are taken to bring about their re-establishment both in their occupation and in all the other phases of civil life. In fact, this is part of the re-establishment of the returned men. Those who live in the cities receive their gratuities, those who are able to go on to the farm receive a good deal more; and I think something more might be done than has been done in the way of re-establishment for soldiers having their domiciles in the cities or the country. This is one way that would prove effective and, I think, desirable, from their standpoint.

Perhaps the greatest criticism that can be brought against a proposal of this kind is: How would the fund be administered? The resolution suggests the creation of a Housing Board. My idea is that that should be composed of permanent officials, at least one of whom should be from the Department of Public Works, and that that Housing Board could, on behalf of the Government, enter into arrangements with loan companies now in existence and doing business in the Dominion of Canada. Those loans companies have had long and successful experience in conducting exactly this kind of transaction, and I have no doubt that arrangements could be made with such companies to take this money and lend it out under their direction, control and responsibility. We would then have a responsible local body, assuring to the purchaser of a home that it would be properly built; that when a contract was let to a builder, there would be such inspection as would ensure that all the specifications would properly be carried out. The money would not be paid to the builder except in proportion as the work went on, and the great profits made by speculative builders would be eliminated. At the present time the speculative builder buys a lot; he puts up two or three houses; he puts what money he has into them; he borrows what the loan company will lend on them, and then when he sells them he takes second mortgages for all he can get. Under the plan I suggest, the prospective house owner would apply to the loan company; he would have the benefit of the advice of that company; and the profit of the speculative builder—and in many cases that is a considerable item—would be saved to him. Another feature that is important in a plan of this kind is the collection of periodical instalments. If a Government board undertook to do that work, it would have grave difficulties, but that work can be done through loan companies which would be financially interested, both in the building and in the collection of the accounts, and which would give the business the personal attention of a large and experienced staff. In that way the borrower would not be liable to the Government and could not come making a poor mouth; he would be liable to and would be required to deal with a business organization in a business way.

The reason why so many people desiring homes are unable to get them is that they must be prepared to pay down a sum equal to at least 40 per cent of the value of the property. Loan companies will lend about 60 per cent as a maximum. My proposition would be that a man should be able to get a home if he can pay down 10 per cent. If the Government were so deeply interested in the matter as to provide money, they could stand behind the loan company to the extent of 30 per cent. The man buying the house would be required to pay down at least $300 or $400—let us say $300, for the sake of illustration—on a $3,000 house. The Government would stand behind 30 per cent of the remainder, and the other 60 per cent the loan company would stand behind. It is certain that if we do not make it easier in the future than it has been in the past for men to own their own homes, the housing shortage will not only continue but will be aggravated, and conditions that are so bad now will become very much worse with almost every year that passes.

Mr. GEORGE BOYCE: Did my hon. friend ever know a person who got out of the hands of a loan company after getting into them?

Mr. HOCKEN: I have known a great many people who have got into the hands of a loan company and got out satisfactorily. I got out myself once; that is the best answer I can give my hon. friend. I thought I had cleared up that point when I said that not one per cent of the people who buy houses from loan companies fail in meeting their obligations. That looks as though they got out and got out quite satisfactorily.

Under this plan it would be possible for groups of workmen to get together who have not the capital to form companies of their own, and then take from the loan companies contracts to build these houses. I think if that were done you would get more efficiency from the builders than you have been getting in the past. During the past year brick layers were laying 700 to 800 bricks a day, and in some cases down to as low as 500. But if two or three bricklayers had a contract to put up a brick house they would lay from 1,500 to 1.800 bricks a day. As a matter of fact, on the new King Edward Hotel being built in the city of Toronto they laid 1,400 bricks a day this winter, while last summer they were laying only 600 to 700. I think if you got a group of carpenters, bricklayers and painters to co-operate, drawing their money as the work went on just as they would their wages, you would get a standard of efficiency in house building that has not been possible in the past and is not possible under any other conditions.

My idea is that the Housing Board would prepare a certain number of plans of six-roomed houses, and perhaps five-roomed, and even up to eight-roomed houses. These plans could be accepted and materials standardized. I think in the standardization of materials for the construction of such houses, and perhaps the purchase on the credit of the Housing Board of large quantities of such materials, enormous savings could be made. Each man building a house would be able to get his materials, or the greater part of them, through this Housing Board and would thereby effect a very substantial saving—and economy is an essential feature of a programme like this.

I have not attempted to work out all the details, Mr. Speaker, because that can only be done from experience. I do not think any man could to-day lay down a plan that would not require considerable adjustment in future, but experience will enable us to make those adjustments. The point I want to lay before the House is that we are faced with a tremendous need in this country, and it is a need which if not filled will make for more difficult, and perhaps disastrous, conditions in the country. On the other hand, if the need is met and filled, we shall have entirely the opposite condition. Shall we attempt to solve this matter as a great social problem, or shall we say it is beyond our power? To say the latter would be, to my mind, the counsel of timidity. There are obstacles, of course, in the way of carrying out such a proposition, but we are here to overcome such obstacles. We are elected to look after the welfare of the people of this country, and if we are incompetent to overcome these obstacles, that should only be decided after we have made an earnest attempt to find a solution. What is needed, Sir, is vision and courage. I believe that the bonds for such a purpose as I suggest would be taken up by our own people, and the money to meet the interest would be provided year after year as the work went on. I know there is a disposition not to increase the debt of this country, but this is not a debt, it is an investment. It is a form of social legislation that is already being practiced in some places where conditions have been allowed to grow up that made legislation absolutely imperative. The British government has carried out large housing schemes. Why? Because they had to, because conditions got so bad there was nothing else for them to do. If they had started fifty or a hundred years before living conditions in Great Britain would be very much better than they are to-day; and if we go on another forty or fifty years as we are doing, and the Government does not take any cognizance of the difficulties of the average workman and artisan of the country, conditions will grow up in our great cities similar to those in the great cities of other countries. To my mind that would be deplorable.

I do not think the need can be met by private capital. I think that has been demonstrated by our experience of the last year or two. To get a real solution there must be governmental assistance. So, in view of the urgency of the need, and of the enormous benefit that would accrue from the successful carrying out of the idea, I believe this is a matter that should enlist the sympathetic consideration of the Government, and one that warrants unusual methods on the part of this Parliament.

Mr. EDWARD WALTER NESBITT (North Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I agree with my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) in his remarks on the benefit to citizenship that comes from men owning their own homes. No better illustration of that could be given than conditions in the smaller cities and towns throughout the country, to which he pointed, where nearly all the working men own their property. That is the ideal situation for the community, because it makes these people take an interest in all that goes on in the community, and at the same time take an interest in their country. These men are very intelligent voters. There are seldom any strikes or troubles between labour and capital in the smaller cities and towns of this country. These men, however, in the past have been able, without any assistance from the Government, to acquire their property, and in a great many instances have been able to pay for it, either through private loans or through loan companies or corporations of that kind. No matter how they acquired their property, they have acquired it. They have saved, and in so doing have shown their character. They have been able to buy their own properties and in a great many cases they live just as comfortably as anybody else in the land. I perfectly agree with all my hon. friend has said along that line. It would be a very desirable thing if we could get everybody in this country to own their own homes, and to take an interest not only in their local community but in the country at large. But he proposes that the Dominion Government should go into the loaning business. Now, I do not agree with my hon. friend when he says that where three families live in a six-roomed house, that is perhaps a good place in which even to sleep. I think the opposite. I do agree, however, with his statement that the possession of real estate has considerable effect on a man. I have experienced the truth of that several times, but the effect is perhaps not the same as that implied by my hon. friend. The effect has been a very undesirable one sometimes, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. HOCKEN: You had too much of it.

Mr. NESBITT: I had too much of the kind. This question Mr. Speaker, came up before the Re-establishment Committee in the fall of 1919, and I think it is one that should go to the Re-establishment Board which is operating now. It came up before them and they submitted it to the Re-establishment Committee of this House, who considered it very carefully and reported against it because they thought that it was too dangerous an experiment for the Dominion Government to undertake. I should like to see every man own his own property, as my hon. friend suggests. He pictures the very happy condition that would exist if that were the case, and I agree absolutely with all that. But as to the Dominion Government undertaking to go into the loaning business, my hon. friend knows, as does everyone in this House, that there seems to be a peculiar feeling throughout the country that when any moneys can be got from the Government it does not matter very much whether they are repaid or not. For that reason I cannot share his confidence that the Government would not lose money by the proposal he makes. A few years ago, if I mistake not, we passed a Bill in this House, authorizing the loan of $25,000,000, guaranteed by the provinces. I understand that most of the provinces have not availed themselves of that offer, although Ontario has to a certain extent; and I know that in some places in that province the scheme will entail a great deal of loss, because they are building houses which they cannot sell for anything like what it cost to put them up. I know whereof I speak, at least in one instance. In my judgment, while the hon. member who introduced the resolution is perfectly right in all he set forth this afternoon as to the desirability of people owning their own property, and on that account taking an interest in the country, and so forth, if there is any one outside of the corporations or private individuals who is going to lend money it ought to be the municipality. The municipalities have the means of knowing exactly the character of the borrower, and in the loaning of money, years of experience have taught me that a great deal more depends upon the character of the indivadual who borrows money then frequently upon the nature of the security itself. You can safely loan money to certain people with very little security, while you cannot loan it to others who offer what would apparently be good security, because, as we all know, securities depreciate very much sometimes. I have known them to go down fifty per cent in the course of ten years. And especially do securities in housing depreciate very materially through lack of care taken of the property. Some people take such excellent care of their property that after they have occupied it ten or fifteen, or even twenty years, it is in as good condition as it was when built, if not better. On the other hand, occupied by some other people, it would not, after such a period, be worth twenty-five per cent of what it originally cost. Let me repeat, that if there is any one going into the loaning business it should be the municipalities, for, as I say, they are able to obtain accurate knowledge as to the character of the borrower, and can judge accordingly. The municipality can lend money just as well as the Dominion Government, and they would know, by the character of the borrower, exactly whether they were running any risk in making a loan. My hon. friend suggests another commission. In my opinion, we have quite enough commissions already. I am opposed to another commission.

An hon. MEMBER: Call it something else.

Mr. NESBITT: A rose by any other name—you know the rest. After all, it would be a commission, and it would have to be paid for the work it undertook. They would have to be paid by the Government, or else take their expenses and their salaries out of the people to whom the loans were made, and that would not be beneficial to the borrower. Now, I am not going to take up much more time. I must, however, reiterate that I am absolutely opposed to the Dominion Government going into the loaning business.

Mr. BALDWIN: Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of saying—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member (Mr. Nesbitt) has not yet concluded his remarks.

Mr. NESBITT: I would commend to the mover of the resolution the suggestion I offer, that the municipality should take hold of the question, if it is a pressing one, in the city of Toronto. I know that the municipality from which I come will not ask the Dominion Government to loan them money. If they think that loans should be made they will look after this themselves.

Mr. W. K. BALDWIN (Stanstead): It is not often that I agree with the mover of the resolution, but in one respect he is right in the principle that people should own their own property. Times have changed wonderfully in my day. Forty years ago practically every one was trying to get a piece of land on which to build a home, but since that time there has been a continual exodus to the cities and now there is more land for sale and there are more deserted homes in the country than there were, say, twenty years since. People seem to want to shirk responsibility. Very many young people will spend exorbitant sums in immoderate wedding presents, and often there is more money involved in the outlay of a wedding than would buy a small farm. People do not want to shoulder the cares and responsibilities of rural life and are therefore flocking in large numbers to the cities, where there seems to be the greatest frivolity. One has only to look at the picture shows, the candy shops, and other attractions, to see the inducement that is held out for country people to come to the city. I think that the Government, instead of helping people to own their own homes in the cities, should do something to retain the rural population on our farms. Any assistance given by the Government in the way of helping people to build homes, should be given with the distinct understanding that the occupants will be kept busy producing something or other. Everything can be said for the person who owns his own house on a plot of land, however small, from which he derives an honourable livelihood. In my opinion, the Government will have to put a tax on a good many things if they want to keep people from leaving the country and coming into already overcrowded cities. What is needed more than anything else in my section of the country just now is good roads. I made an offer, through the public press, of from $20,000 to $40,000 to the township I live in towards the construction of stone and gravel roads. I could not get them to accept my offer even though I proposed to in that way bear one-third of the cost of the entire work that needs to be done.

Now, with respect to what the Government has done in the way of helping the returned soldier let me say that from my observation a great many soldiers who have gone upon the land have made a success of it, but still a large number of the farms that were taken up for this purpose have been thrown back again on the hands of the Government. And I believe it can be taken for granted that in the first place the Government paid for these farms far more than they were worth; in other words many of these farms could have been bought for fifty per cent less than was paid for them had the purchase been conducted in a businesslike manner.

The principle of the resolution is in the right direction but how are you going to carry it out? If you go into the rural sections of the country you will find in every township vacant houses. Surely it is not proposed to build more houses in the cities in view of the fact that the urban centres are already full of people that cannot get work. I read a short time ago that in the Niagara district they were running the great industries there at only twenty-five to thirty per cent of their capacity. While there are vacant houses in the country districts some steps should be taken to induce people to live in those houses and cultivate the soil. While the idea of everybody in the country owning their own house is a good one, and while there is not the least doubt that in the people who own their own dwellings you have the finest force of constabulary that you can possibly have, I do not think it would be wise to embark upon such a large expenditure of public money as the resolution contemplates.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

Mr. WILLIAM GARLAND McQUARRIE (New Westminster): I should have been much better pleased if the mover of this resolution had asked for a further grant under the scheme which the Federal Government adopted in 1918, whereby it advanced money to the provincial governments, and the provincial governments in turn advanced money to the municipalities for the purpose of making loans to soldiers to enable them to build their own homes. So far as my experience has gone that plan worked out very well indeed, and I think the dwellings which were built were very much needed. In my opinion the building of those houses was a very good thing for the returned soldier. The object of that scheme has not yet been fully attained. The conditions still exist which would warrant the building of more houses for returned soldiers, and I think we might very well now ask that further grants be made under similar conditions. Before I left home I was handed a memorandum by the Great War Veterans' Association of New Westminster. The memorandum sets out certain arguments in favour of a further grant which I think are perfectly sound. These arguments are as follows:

1. The object of the first appropriation has not been attained, viz; the alleviation of the shortage in housing accommodation. Rents are as high or even higher than in 1918 and the same shortage of houses exists.

2. It is universally admitted that a community of people owning their own homes is a much greater asset to the state than a community of rent-payers. The ownership of a home creates a spirit of civic pride and fosters an interest in public affairs and community welfare which acts as a sedative to the present unrest and discourages the irresponsible agitator.

3. To the returned soldiers, many of whom have only since returning from overseas assumed the position of head of a family, the scheme is of paramount benefit. The settling of these men in their own homes, where their tenancy is secure and they are not subject to exorbitant rents, and which puts within their reach a substantial dwelling which they would probably be unable to acquire otherwise, is one of the most effective means of turning a soldier into a fully re-established citizen.

4. The continuation of building operations at the present time would tend to relieve the present unemployment situation.

5. The inauguration of a building programme at this time would necessitate large purchases of lumber and other supplies. This would have a stabilizing effect on the lumber market and would benefit the lumber mills which are now preparing to resume operations after a period of depression and uncertainty in the lumber trade. The purchase of other supplies from dealers in different trades would also tend to keep money in circulation and prevent stagnation in business during a trying time.

Now the member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) has said that if any one is going to loan money for the purchasing or building of houses it should be the municipalities. Well, that is exactly what this scheme contemplates. The Dominion Government, as a matter of fact, only finances the provinces and they in turn finance the municipalities, so that the municipalities are really the ones who assume the responsibility for the indebtedness. The Dominion Government has a perfectly good security when it has the bond of the provincial governments, and the latter have a perfectly good security when they have the backing of the municipalities. My hon. friend from North Oxford also said that the municipalities could borrow the money just as well as the Government could. In that view I am afraid he was mistaken. My hon. friend, of course, has a good deal of knowledge in respect to financial matters, but I am inclined to think he made that statement without giving the matter much thought; it is well known that a municipality cannot borrow money on such good terms as a government can do; and the security of the Dominion Government is much better in the markets of the world than that of any municipality. The hon. member for North Oxford said furthermore that in his town they would not think of asking for any loan of this kind. That fact does not need to affect the situation in any way. My hon. friend's town does not necessarily have to take advantage of this plan, neither does any municipality which does not deem it advisable to go into the loaning of monies under this scheme. The municipality has to decide on the applications which are made, and if it considers it is not advisable to proceed with the scheme there is no obligation on its part to do so. It seems to me that the plan to which I have referred is a good one and should be continued. I know there are a large number of soldiers who find themselves more or less homeless and who would gladly take advantage of the opportunity of borrowing more money under the scheme which has been in force. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I would urge upon the Government the continuation of the former scheme of lending money for the purpose of helping our returned men to build homes.

Mr. F. S. CAHILL (Pontiac): Mr. Speaker, I was opposed to the legislation passed in 1919 permitting the Government to loan money to the provinces, to be in turn loaned to the municipalities; and I am also opposed to this resolution. I am not a socialist, nor do I believe in paternalism in government. We have had entirely too much of that form of government in recent years, and we have loaned money so freely that the credit of the country has been jeopardized in every way that any hon. member opposite could think of. We have come to the time when our national credit is more or less strained, and when every hon. member should be aiming to devise ways and means for economizing in our expenditures and conserving Canada's credit.

My hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr Hocken) is fairly consistent with the average Ontario Tory—he is quite willing to get something for Ontario. The opinion seems to prevail among most of the people in that province that the other provinces exist solely for the purpose of spoon-feeding Ontario. They must have protection for their manufactured goods—ploughs, for instance; they must jeopardize the national credit in order that they may be able to sell those goods to foreign countries that will never repay the loans we have advanced them; and they must have at every session special legislation in support of the peculiar industries of their province. I see in the Public Accounts ending March 31, 1920, that under the $25,000,000-loan proposition Ontario got $8,750,000, while the other eight provinces availed themselves of the loan only to the extent of $2,990,000. In other words, Ontario got two and a half times as much money from this Government as all the other provinces combined.

Mr. HOCKEN: That was the fault of the other provinces.

Mr. CAHILL: The "fault" of the other provinces was that their credit was better than the credit of the Dominion in some instances and better than the credit of Ontario. The province of Quebec availed itself of that $25,000,000 loan only to the extent of $60,000, because their credit was better than the credit of the Dominion; they could borrow money cheaper themselves. They did not believe in special legislation, and they did not believe in paternalism in government.

At the present time the business of this Government is not socialism, its business is to take care of the wants of all the people. This country offers sufficient opportunities to men of enterprise and energy to make their own way without being spoon-fed by the Government; perhaps there is no country in the world that offers such ample opportunities to everyone. And yet we are called upon from day to day to pass special legislation taxing one citizen to enable other citizens to live in comfort and, in many cases, in idleness. Let each individual stand on his own feet. Let the Government legislate for all the people instead of giving special privileges to particular classes, and let the Government not interfere with trade unless that trade interferes with the rights of any of our citizens. Then we will have a country that will attract the best class of immigrants, because they will recognize that their success depends on their own initiative and resolution. Let us give all our people an equal standing. No man wants anything more; no man is entitled to anything more.

Mr. SPEAKER: It chanced that I was absent from the Chamber when the mover of the resolution concluded his remarks. Had I been in the Chair my intention was to put the question to the House whether it would concur in the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Maisonneuve. I hope the House will concur, because then there will be no question whatsoever about the propriety or form of the resolution. The proposed amendment is:

That the words "the sum of ten million dollars should be appropriated annually for a period of five years" be stricken out, and the words "an annual appropriation should be made," inserted in lieu thereof.

Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to amend his motion accordingly?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. GEORGE BOYCE (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I did not expect to say anything on this resolution, not knowing that it would come up to-day, but I was a little taken aback by the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) indulging in his usual hard knocks at the province of Ontario. Now, I did not think that this resolution had anythink in particular to do with the province of Ontario, but that it related to the whole Dominion. Although this resolution comes from a gentleman of very great ability, still, I consider it a very dangerous proposal, for several reasons. It would mean that the cities would take advantage of the proposed appropriation, as the country places would have no occasion to avail themselves of it—but of course they would have to do their share toward finding the money. Further, if this resolution became law we would have to organize a new department at great expense, and by the time we had paid the salaries of an architect and other officials to carry out the regulations a large sum of money would be spent apart altogether from that devoted to encouraging the building of homes. No doubt as long as the Government would do the building there would be any number of people ready to take the houses; and there is no question that there would be a very small return on the money loaned. But, apart from the heavy expenditure this proposal would entail, it would have the further disadvantage of taking away from our young men any incentive to exert themselves to provide their own homes—and we all know that in times past we had to work very hard to become our own landlords. And where is this going to end? We have old age pensions, we have soldiers' pensions, pensions for unemployment are going to be proposed, and I do not know what other suggestions of a similar kind. Any legislation to help our soldiers I am heartily in accord with, but legislation such as this resolution suggests would not enure to the general advantage of the country, and the Treasury cannot afford it. Our national debt stands at the stupendous figure of over $2,000,000,000, and with our other financial commitments I think we ought to be very slow to build houses for those who do not intend to work for themselves. But I think if one stipulation had been inserted in this resolution it would be very beneficial to our young men, namely, that the picture shows and theatres be closed so that what those young men earn during the day they may not spend at night. Then they might be able to save some money to build homes of their own. I think we would do well to restore to as great an extent as possible that free and independent spirit that prevailed in Canada among the early settlers in connection with their getting themselves established and building up homes in a new country for themselves and their families. I am against the resolution for the reasons which I have stated, although I support the idea that we should do all we possibly can for those deserving people who are in poor circumstances and cannot own their own homes. But as for encouraging the younger man or any man to waste his time or to indulge in habits of idleness in making him the offer of a house under the terms suggested, I will vote against it every time.

Mr. HUME CRONYN (London): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the general remarks of the mover (Mr. Hocken) of the resolution. I believe, as I think we all do, that the home is the foundation of character and the foundation of our country, and coming as I do from a city the majority of whose inhabitants own their own homes, I know the value to a community of a home-owning population. If, therefore, I attempt to criticize some features of the suggestions made, I do not do so from any desire of decrying the main idea.

In the first place, it has been suggested, not by the mover but by a subsequent speaker, that the Government might enter the lending business. That, I think, would be a grave mistake. In 1914, and early in 1915, the Government saw fit, under extraordinary circumstances, to make large grants to certain of the farmers in the West—grants which in the majority of cases resulted in a wonderful return both to the men themselves and to the country at large. I believe that—speaking from memory—out of about $12,000,000 advanced for seed grain, fodder and relief at that time, there is still owing on account of principal, not taking interest into consideration, something like $2,000,000. It is difficult to persuade borrowers from a government to repay, as they will and must repay a private corporation. I was much struck by a speech delivered in Moose Jaw not long ago by Mr. Dunning, the provincial treasurer of Saskatchewan, in which he was reviewing the operations of the Saskatchewan Farm Loan Board. He pointed out that in respect of loans made over a period of some three years—I do not think the board has been operating longer than three years—amounting to about $6,000,000, there were now $300,000 of interest in arrear. Mr. Dunning said in the frankest way, as is his wont: "When a man borrows from the government, about the last thing he seems to think it necessary to do is to repay, and I tell you gentlemen, unless our borrowers change their methods, our whole scheme will break down."

However, the mover has suggested that instead of the Government entering the lending business, money should be advanced, as I understand it, by Government through loan corporations who would be entrusted with the lending of the money and with the perhaps more arduous task of collecting repayments. I do not know that that is impossible, but it could hardly be done free of charge. I have been able to go into calculations as to the cost only since the resolution was moved this afternoon, and I am afraid that difficulties might be produced which are not in the minds of hon. members. Take the case instanced by the mover, of an investment in a property of $3,000, ten per cent being provided by the borrower and the balance, $2,700, being obtained by him through loan. I take it that the amount mentioned, $3,000, was supposed to be sufficient to pay for both lot and building, otherwise the loan would have to be larger or the borrower would have to put up more money. Well, if we assume that the lot and the building would cost $3,000—and I am afraid that the cases in which both could be obtained for that amount are somewhat rare—we have first to agree what rate of interest would be paid; nothing was said about that. I have to guess the rate; I place it at seven per cent,—that is distinctly below the present market rate in a good many of the provinces. The Government could hardly borrow to-day any considerable amount of money in Canada at less than six per cent. Then, the company charged with the supervision of lending and collecting would have to get about one per cent per annum, and even at that rate they would not be too well paid if the work were properly done. With interest at seven per cent; with taxes at an average rate of thirty mills; with an assessment at the rate of ninety per cent of the value of the propery; with insurance, and with a certain amount by way of repayment on principal, a payment of about $400 a year would be required from the borrower of $2,700, at least for the first few years,—his interest bill would, of course, decrease as his principal was reduced. Now, I leave it to the House whether the average borrower who put up ten per cent, or $300, at the outset, could fairly be counted upon to supply $400 per annum with which to carry on. Much would depend, of course, upon his occupation, his rate of wage, and his success in finding work throughout the year.

It is quite true, as was said by the mover, that the number of foreclosures or sales by loan companies, at least in Ontario, has been very small. That has been due, perhaps, to two causes. In the first place, prices, both of real estate and of building, have generally been rising, and if the original borrower were unable to pay he could always find some one to take over his bargain—some one, perhaps, in a better position to meet the debt and finally pay it off. In the second place, we must not lose sight of the fact that while, in the pre-war days, loan companies were prepared to lend up to, say, sixty per cent of the value of a house as established by an independent person, I doubt very much whether they would agree to-day to lend more than fifty per cent, having regard to present values and prices. Nor is it difficult to understand why, because in the February issue of the Labour Gazette, page 250, the index number on the first of January of this year relating to the wholesale prices of building materials—the prices of forty-eight different kinds of materials in various sections of the country being taken as a basis—was 347.1, as compared with 140.6 for January, 1913. In other words, building materials have increased in cost nearly two and one-half times in the last seven years. I happen to know that some companies, while they are prepared to lend half the value of real estate, limit their loans on buildings to 33⅓ per cent of their present cost. If under the plan suggested we are to make a loan of 90 per cent of the present cost and to insist upon repayments of principal—and this is the only safe method of conducting such a business—we have an entirely different situation from that confronting loan companies lending 50 or even 60 per cent of the cost. I for one would fear that in many cases there would, of necessity, be default, and if the loan company were compelled, as I presume it would be, in carrying out its bargains with the Government, to take proceedings, too often the original builders or owners would lose such money as they had put into their homes. There is a vast difference between an owner who has an equity of 40 or 50 per cent in his home and one who has an equity of 10 per cent. Something was said, I suppose jocularly, to the effect that you never get out of a loan company's hands. The last thing in the world a loan company wants is to get property on its hands; that is not its business. I can only speak for the mortgage company with which I am connected, and I can say that for thirteen or fourteen years at least, we have had no property on our hands. As a matter of fact, while twenty years ago, we were lending to farmers and others in the immediate vicinity of our offices millions of money, we are to-day borrowing from those same men an equal or greater amount which in turn we lend to others who are starting in life as they did. We are lending it out very largely to western farmers who, I have every belief and hope, will repeat the experience of their Ontario brothers and be, before long, in the market as lenders rather than as borrowers.

One word as to the soldiers. We have, as has been said, considered this question more than once. To my mind, the great difficulty arose from this question: If we are to have a scheme for allowing a soldier to build a home, and if we are to advance to him 80 or 90 per cent of the cost thereof, what can we say to the soldier who has a mortgage already on his home? Must we not make an advance to him if we can get that money at a lower rate? What can we say to the man who wants to buy out a business? Must we not advance money to him to enable him to establish a business? Is not that essentially re-establishment? And are there not many other proposals equally deserving, equally of advantage to the country, to which we could hardly say "no," if we start in the business of advancing money to soldiers for any other purpose than that one now in force, namely, agricultural settlement?

Mr. H. M. MOWAT (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I think we are indebted to my hon. friend and colleague in the next constituency to mine (Mr. Hocken), for bringing this matter before the House, and I desire to say a word or two in support of his resolution. He has pictured in a very lucid manner, and apparently as a result of much thought, a condition of domestic life which is not attended by proper comfort and safeguards. His experience for many years as controller and mayor in a large city has enabled him to speak with authority on these matters. I have been told by others, and I know myself, that in large cities now the housing situation is becoming so acute that something must be done, because the congestion makes a squalor which is bound to have an evil effect upon families and, indeed, one might say that it affects the morality of the people. A condition where there are three or four families in a seven-roomed house with a community of kitchen arrangements, and that sort of thing, cannot but have an evil effect and get us into the same condition which has been fought now for fifty or sixty years in the slums of the large cities of Europe. England and Scotland have known that, despite all the arguments against such a proposition from an economic standpoint, it is not the theory of economics that must be considered, but the condition that exists that must be met. That shows the importance of dealing in a serious manner with the resolution which is now before the House.

It is quite true that many of the remarks which fell from the lips of the hon. member for Oxford North (Mr. Nesbitt) may be agreed with, and yet dissented from on the ground that this is a condition of affairs which is fast becoming desperate. The remarks of my hon. friend, whose advice on these matters is always listened to with attention in this House, should not have too much effect upon hon. members, because of the very careful, cautious manner in which he deals with a business proposition. The result of his remarks was to throw a wet blanket, so to speak, upon an admirable proposition. You cannot look at these things solely from a business standpoint at the present time, because with the return of the men from the war and their inability to cope with conditions of life on account of either mental or physical derangement, such a situation has been produced that the country must step in and, to some extent, be paternal in its efforts. I think the lending of money in the Northwest for grain is a totally different category from the present idea. Lending on wheat is lending on personal property, making a personal loan, and if some of that—only $2,000,000 as it appears—has not been repaid, that is unfortunate, but it is due to the condition that it is personal property and you have only the personal promise of the individual. But erecting buildings by Government, financing and keeping as security the buildings which you erect, means a loan which must be listed, in a totally different category. There is the building and the lot which cannot be removed, and you have not merely the personal promise of the occupant, but the building and the land themselves. Therefore, the security is infinitely better, and I do not think the House should be influenced to frown upon a motion of this kind where the security always seems to be in hand and not dependent altogether on the personal character of the borrower. It is true a careful loan company will get reports on the personal character of those to whom it proposes to loan money, and if it finds that the applicant is reckless or a spendthrift it will not lend to him—but that is largely for their own convenience because they do not wish to have to take over land on which they have loaned money.

The great advantage in a scheme of this kind, of building many houses, is that the cost is made so much less because of the standardization of the different parts, and because of the wholesale purchase of materials. Bricks and lumber, for instance, could be got wholesale from the manufacturers instead of each man buying individually, and by standardizing window frames and other articles you would get a very much cheaper general cost.

My hon. friend from London (Mr. Cronyn) has put in a word of caution against going into a scheme of this sort as an aid to returned soldiers, on the ground that it may be demanded that the scheme be extended to men who wish money to start up in business, to men who already have houses on which there is a mortgage and which they ask to be relieved from, or to men who wish to obtain their money at a cheaper rate. These difficulties no doubt exist, and the demands may be made, but if you have a clear-cut proposal in the first place for the building and financing of houses in order to alleviate the dreadful condition in some of our cities, I think we can look with equanimity on what is likely to happen in the way of demands from other sources. If it is not possible for us to go further than this particular scheme, let us say so, and not refuse to go into a good scheme simply because other and further demands may be made.

Mr. BALDWIN: It has been said that these houses would not be removable, therefore, I presume they would be of fire-proof construction. But if not fire-proof, who would pay for the expense of insuring the building, and for repairs, and so forth?

Mr. MOWAT: My idea is that each different item—taxes, insurance, rent, and so forth—should be paid in one instalment, so that the man would know exactly what he would have to pay.

Mr. BALDWIN: What would you think the overhead charges would be? Some one would have to look after the repairs, insurance, and upkeep generally.

Mr. MOWAT: My idea on that is very clear. This scheme cannot be put through except in a community or block, and every community should run its own business affairs. Overhead expenses and depreciation should be provided for jointly by the community and the householder. Of course, I speak now more with reference to the scheme referred to by my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) with regard to block communities near large cities, meant chiefly for returned soldiers who are not able to obtain housing accommodation under present conditions. My hon. friend is mistaken if he thinks that matter is not before the Pensions and Re-establishment Committee this year as it was before. I have not pressed it very hard because I have had in mind that the people of this country have not yet appreciated what has been done in the Old Country and the United States along these lines. When we think of the immense increase in the value of property in the model villages in the Old Country, owing to scientific management, architectural design, and beauty of landscape, we need not be alarmed at all as to any losses occurring. I am told that properties in Letchworth have increased by one-third in appraised value, just because of the popularity of the life which these model villages afford. This refers to a model village or block town near to a large centre. Undoubtedly, despite the protest of my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Boyce), these are meant for the town man. We have already looked after the farmer, or those who can become farmers, by our Soldier Settlement plan. But there are other men who are in the most unfortunate position of having given up their little business or trade in the town when they went to the war, and who find when they come back that they are not able to make their way. Now those men should be looked after by the country just as much as, if not more than the men who can go on the farm and make a success of it. While the object of the motion is to provide these residences in towns, for city men, I do not think the people of this country will dissent from that at all, because they know of so many men who have been unable to make their way and provide proper housing for themselves and their families. The man from the city who comes back from the war and finds that he cannot get back the business he practically sacrificed is in a dire plight. He may by vocational training, perhaps, learn to make his living in some other way, yet he has not the money to house his family properly, and this is a scheme, not to give him the money, not to provide any dole or charity—because the instalments to be applied on purchase should be rigidly insisted on—but to assist him in getting a home for himself and his family. Of course, if you are going to play the game of giving in to every man who cannot pay his instalment, who makes a poor mouth and writes letters to the paper, and gets ill-advised people to fight for him, the scheme will fail. The commission must rigidly insist on the terms of purchase being complied with; And if that is done, the country will be at no loss. On the other hand, these little communities will increase in value and will greatly contribute to the happiness and content of a vast number of people, and will prevent many from slipping into slum life and becoming degraded both in morals and living conditions generally.

Mr. W. F. COCKSHUTT (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, I am not able to agree with my two estimable friends from Toronto, for, contrary to the expectation of my hon. friend from Pontiac (Mr. Cahill), I am not one of those who believe the government should go into a housing scheme on a wholesale scale. I have had a little experience in houses myself, and if the Government want to lose money I would recommend them to go into a housing scheme on a large scale. I do not think we are in a position to risk the finances of our country in such a scheme as my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) has laid before us. The reason houses are scarce to-day is because it does not pay to build them; that is the reason pure and simple. If you can make housing a profitable investment, capital will be found to build houses, but under the conditions which now obtain in the building trade it is not possible to buy land and build a house in any of our towns and cities and make 5 per cent clear. That has been my experience, and I think I am well within the mark. I believe one would make a good deal less than 5 per cent. After the local taxation is paid, and after insurance repairs, burst pipes, and all the rest of it, are attended to, owners of houses will find that their rental bill has dropped very materially, and I leave it to any hon. gentleman who has experience in the renting of houses—I am speaking of those that rent at a moderate rate—whether it is not a very poor-paying business, and one that brings endless trouble to owners. I want to point out that if the Government is going into the housing scheme, it is going to drive out individual effort along that line. That fact should not be forgotten, and that is precisely why fewer houses are being built to-day than should be the case. Private investors have become afraid that the Government is really going into building as a business. I have just made a rough calculation that there are probably 2,000,000 homes in Canada, that is, allowing about four and half to five persons per home—and I think that is a moderate estimate. Suppose twenty-five percent of these required government help to house them properly—that would be a fair proposition. That would leave 500,000 homes to be provided. Take these at the moderate price of $3,000 each and you have $1,500,000,000 invested in homes for twenty-five per cent of the people, or a proposition about equal in magnitude to the nationalization of the railways of Canada. Now, if the Government is going to take the place of the private investor, it ought to take the whole field, because the private investor who has to pay 7 per cent for his money cannot compete with the Government, or with government-aided houses that are paying 5 or 6 per cent. Private investors, under such circumstances, will not enter the field. I have seen some very good articles in British reviews lately on this question. Lady Selborne, I think, has written two or three articles, after very close consideration of the housing scheme, and she gives an analysis of the question with which the British Government is faced, the situation there being very much more acute than in Canada; and she points out that if the Government implements the scheme it has under consideration, it will tax the national financial capacity to its utmost. Surely, in the present state of the finances of Canada, we do not want to embark on a scheme that will cost as much as I have stated, and not $50,000,000 as this resolution suggests. Why, $50,000,000 could be consumed in the city of Toronto alone.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Hear, hear.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: And in the city of Montreal there would have to be spent a considerably larger sum. Every town and city in Canada would also call for some expenditure, if the Government took hold of the proposition on a proper scale. In the finality, the scheme practically amounts to the nationalization of the homes in Canada, by which I mean those houses which people cannot afford to build for themselves.

Now, the returned soldier is in quite a different position. If he wants help, I say by all means let him have it, whether it is to build a home or to establish himself in business, or on a farm. For that I hold up both hands, if the country can afford it. But if any great industry—and I speak now as one who is somewhat interested in industry—finds its own men are not properly housed. I say that it is the duty of the manufacturer to put up houses, to see that his employees are housed as they should be. I stand for that; I believe it is a sound principle. I think that some manufacturers in Canada have done this, and all model factories that want to look after their hands properly know that one of the first considerations in the problem of maintaining stable help is to have employees well paid, and well housed, as far as possible, in fairly close proximity to the works. Of course, it is not possible to house them too close to the factories, but accomodation could be found for them away from the smoke and annoyance of their work and yet within easy walking distance. That is possible in all our smaller towns and cities, although it is out of the question in Toronto, Montreal, and two or three of the larger centres. My contention, in brief, is, that the sum required for housing the people of Canada should not be spent for any one city, but for all our cities, and for the country as well if the people there require it. I say, house every one if you are going to enter into this business at all. If you are going to lend money to builders of all houses that are required, I believe my figures will be found to be fairly conservative, and I estimate that it will take about $1,500,000,000 for the initial expense of a housing scheme at present. Building material is at present out of sight, so to speak, and you will not get houses to-day for $6,000, which five or six years ago you could build for $3,000. The present, therefore, is not a good time at which to embark on the building business on a large scale, because the man who builds to-day on 5 per cent money may find that within two or three years his margin of 2 per cent on interest will have shrunk to such an extent by the falling market, which I expect in the near future in building materials, and possibly in labour, that this $6,000 house will have shrunk to $4,000. So that if he had a margin of safety of $2,000, that would be wiped out under existing conditions of building. If he built a $4,000 or $3,000 house he ought to have from $30 to $35 per month for it, and that is a large rent for a working man to pay. It is more than he should be called upon to pay, but it is not more than is demanded in all our towns to-day. People are asked to pay from $30 to $35 and even more per month. Therefore, with all deference to my hon. friend from West Toronto, I hope he will not try to induce the Government to embark on a scheme of such magnitude as this would undoubtedly be. It cannot be undertaken on a small scale if it is to be equitable, and as the scale it calls for is out of the question, I trust that the House will not sanction this proposal involving an expenditure of $50,000,000, because it would not settle the question. This sum is a mere bagatelle to what is required, and would not be of any benefit to those who borrow money and build to-day, because they would lose on their proposition by the shrinkage I have pointed out. And as the resolution stands, it calls for something which this Government has never been asked to do before. Let the cities, and the manufacturers particularly, look after the housing of their own people, and if the soldiers require homes, as I think they do, then that should be looked after by the committee that has been appointed, and which will probably bring in a recommendation on the subject. I trust the motion will not be seriously considered by the House.

Mr. G. W. ANDREWS (Winnipeg Centre): I have listened with a great deal of interest to the many arguments in this debate, and I am still firmly of the same opinion as at the outset, namely, that there is a great shortage of houses in Canada. I am under the impression that if our health by-laws were properly enforced in Winnipeg, we should have somewhere in the neighbourhood of 20,000 people without homes at all. This is a state of affairs that has to be met some time, somehow, and if we are not competent to meet it, I have not the slightest doubt that some other bunch of legislators will come who will be able to deal with the matter. People have to live in decent houses, and, as I say, by some means or other, this problem must be faced. I was somewhat annoyed by a remark of one hon. gentleman who said that he was not in favour of this Government going into schemes of this kind, because he believed in people standing on their own feet. I feel compelled to point out to that hon. gentleman that there are many citizens of Canada who have not two feet to stand on; they lost them in the war. My particular object in rising now is to refer to that phase of the subject.

The hon. member who moved the resolution referred particularly to the returned soldiers. Now, we already have a Special Committee sitting which is empowered to investigate their affairs, and as it is very apparent to my mind,—as I am sure it will be the wish of hon. members—that if any class at all should receive consideration it should be this class, and bearing in mind the fact that they undoubtedly would be the first class to receive such consideration, I think the debate has reached the stage where we might well pass the subject on to the Soldiers' Committee. Under the circumstances, with the permission of the House, I would move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

At Six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at Eight o'clock.

PROPOSED RIGHT OF MINISTERS TO SIT IN EITHER CHAMBER

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve) moved:

[Mr. Cockshutt.]

That, in the opinion of this House, it is in the interest of good government, that Ministers of the Crown should be permitted to sit in either Chamber, whenever measures and policies are introduced affecting their respective departments.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I regret that the Government benches are practically empty. In the good old days ministers were in their seats betimes, but after having passed through so many embarrassments of late perhaps the tardy attendance of the members of the present ministry is not to be wondered at. At all events, Mr. Speaker, I shall proceed with my resolution. I have brought it forward with a view to expediting the business of the House, believing it to be a reform well worthy of adoption by this Parliament.

At Confederation we adopted the bi-cameral system. I know there are some people in the country, and perhaps in this House, who think that we should be satisfied with one chamber; but I believe that there is a large body of public opinion which stands for an upper chamber. No doubt our upper chamber might with advantage be reformed in certain respects, but I am confident that I am in the right when I assert that the mass of the people are in favour of the continuance of the bi-cameral system.

Personally, I am in favour of an upper chamber. First, because it was instituted for the protection of minorities in our Confederation. Second, because the representatives of certain of the provinces which united to form the Dominion feared that the predominance of the larger provinces in Parliament might perhaps prejudice the interests of the smaller ones, and they therefore insisted on the establishment of an upper chamber. Third, because I have an ingrained respect for the pact of Confederation itself. That pact is sacred to all the provinces, and their representatives should see that no encroachment is made on our constitution. And then, as Sir John A. Macdonald said, when he pleaded in favour of an upper chamber at the time of the Confederation debates:

A second chamber has been recognized in all democratic countries as a check against ill-considered and hasty legislation.

If this was true under normal conditions, it is still more so to-day when the world is passing through a crisis and as an aftermath of this great war there is in all parts of the world an agitation for reconstruction. The term " reconstruction " may cover many iniquities, and in order that we in this country may have the advantage of a real reconstruction—a reconstruction which will be in the best interests of the country and which will be carried out in a spirit of respect for the constitution and for the rights of all classes of the community—I believe that an upper chamber is perhaps even more necessary now than under normal conditions.

And Sir, much as the upper chamber might be criticized, I believe that on many occasions it has given evidence of real independence of thought and action. Not later than two years ago many senators, appointed by the present Government, were not afraid to cast their votes against what I believed was ill-considered and hasty legislation, a legislation which may perhaps very seriously involve the future of Canada itself. I refer to their vote on the very important issue of the acquisition of the Grand Trunk Railway system.

I do not say, Mr. Speaker, that there is no room for Senate reform. For instance, I believe that there should be an age limit, and perhaps a change in the mode of selection of the gentlemen who occupy seats in the upper chamber. I have always thought that the election of senators might in itself be a very good reform—election by legislatures, boards of trade, universities, and such public bodies. Of course, that is another question; I simply mention it this evening because I do not wish it to be thought that this resolution means something which it does not mean. Some of my friends on both sides of the House have thought that perhaps I was favouring the appointment of Cabinet ministers to the Senate. Mr. Speaker, we cannot afford to allow the upper chamber to be without representatives of the Government; we must face the situation that there will always be at least a leader representing the Government in that body, and occasions will arise when it will be necessary to have Cabinet ministers in the Senate. I do think, however, that mostly all Cabinet ministers should occupy seats in the popular chamber and that the less there are in the upper chamber the better for the Government and better for Canada. At all events, if any Cabinet ministers have to sit in the upper chamber, it is to be hoped that the Government, whether Liberal, Conservative or Agrarian, will always see to it that ministers in charge of spending departments sit in the popular chamber. I think that is a sound principle.

In England we have the time-honoured House of Lords; several ministers of the Crown sit in that chamber. I do not know how many members of the present British Government sit in the House of Lords, but I know that certain of them do, and not the least important of them, at that. In England there have been cases where even the Prime Minister sat in the upper chamber; I recall the names of Lord Beaconsfield, Lord Salisbury, Lord Rosebery. But in all those cases, which were exceptional cases, the Government was represented in the popular chamber by most brilliant and distinguished men who really carried public opinion with them,—Gladstone, Balfour, Asquith, Lloyd George; and I could name several others. But I believe that in England the day has gone by when prime prime ministers shall sit in the upper chamber. Though tradition means much in that country, yet with the new wave of public opinion and with the reforms which have come gradually—indeed, the constitution itself is made up of precedents which come slowly down from year to year—I believe that the force of public opinion in England will not now stand for that practice and in days to come the prime minister, representing public opinion, representing the new democracy, will have a seat in the popular assembly and there propound the policies of the government. Of course, the government will always be represented by some very eminent minister in the upper chamber.

The Commons, Mr. Speaker, has been and is to-day the great inquest of the nation. To the Commons belongs the most important problems of government. To the Commons must be announced the policies of the government. Indeed, the House of Commons is the great lever of the British constitution. True it is that no Bill, no Act of Parliament, is perfect or complete without the sanction of His Majesty the King; all measures are sanctioned by His Majesty the King, the House of Lords and the House of Commons. But everybody feels that the great driving power in matter of legislation belongs to the House of Commons, and it is right that it should be so.

Now, Mr. Speaker, though I am a traditionalist—and I am not ashamed to say that I am a traditionalist—the realities of life will perforce bring some radical changes. Of course, as I have intimated, as long as we have the bicameral system—and I hope we shall maintain it—the government of the day must be represented in some way in the Senate.

But I do not see why a minister sitting in the upper chamber or in the House of Commons should be debarred from appearing in the other chamber, without having a right to vote. I do not see why a minister of the Crown sitting, for instance, in the upper chamber, should not have a right to appear before the House of Commons to explain the policies of his department and to answer questions when the Estimates of his department are scrutinized in the House. Nor do I see why the gentlemen who occupy the Government benches in this House should not be allowed to appear in the upper chamber to give there such explanations as may be required of them. There is nothing new under the sun. This system which I am now propounding is the system followed in France, where it is not necessary that a minister of the Republic should even be elected by the people, and I suppose that would suit many of my hon. friends who have, at the present moment, cabinet aspirations. This happens very often. But presently, M. Briand is a member of the Chambre des Députés. The old tiger, M. Clemenceau, was also a member of one of the two Houses, I forget whether it was the Senate or the Chambre des Députés. M. Leygues, who was defeated a few weeks ago, is a member of the Chambre des Députés. The ministers at all events are not necessarily members of the French Parliament, and ministers in France can be summoned to appear on different occasions before either the popular assembly or the Senate. Last year I was a very close follower of the sessions of the French Parliament, and I could see one afternoon, for instance, a minister of the Republic appearing before the popular assembly, giving explanations, answering questions and passing from that assembly to the Senate sitting at the Luxembourg Palace. It is simply common sense that ministers of the Crown in Canada should have the same privilege. Both Houses should have the same right, because I claim as a right, on the part of any member, that when a policy is presented to the House, if the minister who has prepared, laid out, planned and initiated that policy, sits in the other chamber, he should be amenable here to explain that policy, to answer questions, to accept amendments. When the budget of such a minister's department is being debated before this House—and this is the only branch of Parliament which can discuss and debate at length the budget of a department and move for its reduction at the request of a member. I think it is simply commons sense that members of this House should have the right to summons the minister whose policy is questioned or whose budget is criticized. I stated a moment ago that in such an occurrence I would not give to the minister, belonging to the other chamber and appearing before this House, a vote; but he would speak freely in the House; he would explain as many times as necessary, and he would, therefore, help in framing the legislation and in directing the policy of the Government which, in the final result, becomes the policy of Parliament.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Would the hon. member allow a minister sitting in a chamber other than the one to which he belongs, to make a motion?

Mr. LEMIEUX: That, of course, is a question of detail which might be framed in the amendment which would be necessary to the rules of the House; but at first sight, I would say: No. I would say that he could suggest to one of his colleagues, or to any other member of the House, the main features of the motion, and he would be allowed to speak in support of it. I would not give him more power than he is entitled to. We, the members of the popular branch of Parliament, are vested with special powers; our rights, so to speak, are sacred. We hold those right directly from the people; we have a right to discuss; we have a right to condemn; we have a right to amend; we have a right to denounce, under certain rules. My object, it seems to me, is a common sense one. I will give some concrete examples of what trouble can be caused by the absence from this House of ministers who have seats in another chamber. My object is to bring ministers sitting, let us say, in the Senate, before the House of Commons, to explain their policies, to defend their Estimates and to accept whatever amendments are suggested by the House. At the present time, three ministers of the Crown have seats in the upper chamber, the Minister of the Interior, the Minister of Labour and the Postmaster General. The Minister of Labour is, it seems to me, essentially a representative of the people. I perhaps can understand why the present incumbent is in the upper chamber. I certainly will not minimize the ability and, I believe, the honesty of purpose of the present Minister of Labour I had some dealings with the hon. gentleman when he was president of the Telegraphers' Union, and I was Minister of Labour in a former administration, and I wish to say openly and publicly that my official relations with him at that time were certainly of the best, and undoubtedly in the interests of labour. I am sure you will appreciate, Mr. Speaker, that the place of the Minister of Labour is essentially in the House of Commons. He represents the labouring masses of this country, among whom we know there is at present quite a feeling of unrest. We may be called upon at any moment to pass legislation directly affecting the labouring masses. In fact, the most important legislation to come before us, the tariff legislation, affects labour to a very considerable degree. It therefore seems to me that the Minister of Labour ought surely to be in the House of Commons, but the Government, in the exercise of their right, have chosen to appoint him with a seat in the upper chamber.

Leaving aside for the moment the publication of labour statistics and the Labour Gazette, let us consider only one phase of his work, the administration of the Industrial Disputes' Act. The wise administration of that Act, affecting as it does, all public utilities in Canada, is certainly of the utmost importance to the country. Last year, my right hon. friend the leader of the Government (Mr. Meighen) was in charge of a Bill initiated by the Labour Department, amendments were sought affecting the Industrial Disputes Act, and my right hon. friend with all his ability, with all his astuteness, had to report progress on two or three different occasions because he was not sufficiently informed on the matter. Now if there is a man in the House whose legal acumen is admitted by all, it is certainly the leader of the Government, but on that piece of legislation I well remember that he was obliged to report progress in the dying days of the session in order to confer with his colleague the Minister of Labour. There was a case which I think shows the necessity of an amendment to our rules so that the minister would be in a position when legislation affecting his department was before the House to come and explain his policies to the House.

Take the case of the Minister of the Interior. If I mistake not, there has been grafted upon the Department of the Interior the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. Now, every member of this House, and nearly every family in the ridings which we represent, is deeply interested in the civil re-establishment of our soldiers. Then as to the Department of the Interior itself, it is a vast department affecting the whole of the Northwest Territories, with its wonderful, potential natural resources. It would not be too much to say that the future of Canada lies, in great measure, in the wise and safe administration of that department. My right hon. friend the leader of the Government, who presided over the Department of the Interior for a few years, knows that it is certainly one of the most important departments of the Government. Well, it so happens this year that the minister in charge of that department is the leader of the Government in the Senate Chamber. Is it fair, Mr. Speaker, that this House should be deprived of the ability of that hon. gentleman, for he is certainly one of the ablest men I have met, and of the benefit of his explanations when matters affecting his department are under discussion? Is it fair that he in turn should be deprived of the benefit of the constructive criticism that we sometimes have to offer to the very involved legislation that from time to time is initiated in connection with his department? I think every one will admit that if the Minister of the Interior had a seat in this House instead of in the upper chamber, it would be far better for the country. But it so happens that he sits there and I again put the question I put a moment ago: Does not common sense dictate that we so amend our rules as to bring that minister into this House whenever legislation affecting his department is under consideration here?

I now come to the Post Office Department. Here is a large spending department, which affects every constituency, every city, every town, every village, from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean. The Postmaster General not only looks after the administration of his department here in Ottawa, but from my own experience I know that the reports from the various inspectors come directly to him and that no post office is opened in even the smallest village in Canada without the matter first coming under his survey. One can see by the questions that are put on the Order Paper, and by the motions for the return of papers, how the administration of that department concerns every member of the House of Commons. The Postmaster General sits in the upper chamber; and I know that for many years, because of the absence of that minister in another House, we have not been able to have even a proper debate on the huge expenditures of the Post Office Department.

This is not satisfactory; it is not fair; it is not just. And if the Government will persist in keeping the Postmaster General in the Senate, which is contrary to common sense, and against the best interests of the people, surely my resolution ought to be adopted, because of all ministers the Postmaster General should, on occasion, be able to appear before the House of Commons and give those explanations which are required of him. Now, he has not only the administration of the post offices in his purview. A few years ago we adopted rural mail delivery, and I claim some credit for that reform, Mr. Speaker. It was under our Government that the system of rural mail delivery was established in this country, and it has created a revolution in rural Canada, having brought the farmer closer to the city and more in contact with the markets than heretofore. In the organization of rural mail delivery, naturally the electors will call upon their representatives to explain why one route was selected in preference to another. And we know, also, that the revision of the mail contracts makes for an enormous pile of correspondence with members of the House of Commons. Therefore, not only as regards the Postmaster General, but so far as the Minister of the Interior, and the Minister of Labour are concerned, I think that my resolution fully applies and meets the case.

I do not wish, Mr. Speaker, to make this a party resolution. I am speaking as an old parliamentarian, very anxious to expedite and facilitate the business of the House, and I believe that my resolution can be construed as having only that object in view. But speaking about the Postmaster General, does it not strike you, Sir, that the Government is somewhat in the wrong? Obviously so. The Postmaster General was a candidate at the last general election in two constituencies: he stood for election in Champlain and also in Laurier-Outremont. In both constituencies he was defeated, horse, foot and artillery. He was defeated hopelessly, but the Government waited for a few months and then appointed him to the other House. The minister did not even resign; he remained in office, and finally, on the eve of a session, the Government, against all British precedent, and against all parliamentary tradition, appointed him to the Senate. Let us draw a contrast between the British system of Government, and the Canadian Tory system. In England, the other day, the Secretary for Agriculture, Sir Arthur Griffith-Boscawen, was defeated, and defeated largely on a Canadian issue. He was a member of the Government and ran in the constituency of Dudley, where he was defeated. Do you think the Right Hon. Mr. Lloyd George would take upon himself to appoint Sir Griffith-Boscawen to the House of Lords? No, because there would be a revolt in public opinion if that were done in England. Sir Griffith-Boscawen will run in another constituency, and the whips of the Unionist party in England are at present looking for a riding where he may run as a candidate with a view to becoming Secretary for Agriculture. I have just read this despatch in one of the papers:

London, March 14.—Col. Denis Boles has offered to resign as member of Parliament for the division of Taunton, in order to give Sir Arthur Griffith-Boscawen, the recently appointed Minister of Agriculture, who lost the by-election in Dudley, another opportunity to find a seat.

It seems to me that another opportunity should be given to the present Postmaster General to be elected by his peers. My right hon. friend would probably say: Well, they appoint ministers of the Crown in England to the House of Lords. Yes, they do. I notice in this morning's papers that a peerage has been offered to Mr. Bonar Law, but he has declined it. I can understand that a gentleman who has served his country brilliantly and with distinction, as he did for several years, may be offered, as in the case of Mr. Morley, a seat in the House of Lords. There can be no objection to his taking that honour. But, generally a public man does not take it with a cabinet portfolio. If he does, it is exceptional, and the department over which he presides is not an important one which would come under the everyday survey of the House of Commons.

I expressed the hope that my right hon. friend, who I know is British at heart, having at least said so during the last elections, and, indeed, having always lived up to British ideals, will in this matter maintain British tradition. I appeal to him and say: Be British! Here is a concrete case in which you have an opportunity to show your love of British tradition. You have the county of Yamaska, where my hon. friend, the present Postmaster General was born and brought up. That constituency is open at the present time, and there is a chance for him to appear before his peers, and get a mandate from the people. However, as I said a moment ago, this is not a party resolution; this suggestion is only an aside, and I say it in all candour. I should like the members of the House on both sides to consider the feasibility of the application of my proposal. I move the resolution because I believe that, if adopted, it will facilitate and expedite the business of the House. It will demonstrate that the Government has some regard for the popular chamber. Above all, if the resolution is adopted, it will be an object lesson that in Canada we are in accord with the principles of responsible Government; and it is above all on that principle of responsible Government that I appeal to the House and ask it to support my resolution.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when I first observed this resolution on the Order Paper it struck me as one of the most interesting and striking suggestions that I had seen on that paper for many years. At the time I had not heard that a change in our system had previously been suggested. But on referring to the records of both Houses for years gone by, I found a discussion of the same question taking place in the upper chamber in 1908. At that time the Government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier was in office. I am not aware how many ministers of that Government sat in the upper chamber, but not less, I believe, than two; and it was a matter of comment that so few ministers found their seats in the upper chamber, and a matter for a very general expression of regret, particularly in that chamber itself.

My hon. friend in urging this motion assumes, by way partly of an aside, that there are too many ministers of the present Government in the Senate, and particularly those who are at the head of the departments that should be especially responsible to, and in intimate association with, the House of Commons. I know that an argument to that end is not to the purpose of the resolution, but it might be worth while to refer to his contention in this regard for a moment. It is noteworthy that in the debate that took place in the Senate in 1908, a resolution was moved by a supporter of the Administration of that time, the Hon. Mr. David, a supporter indeed of the same party to-day, and in that resolution he expressed regret at the smallness of the number of ministers in the upper chamber. The resolution then proposed by Hon. Mr. David was as follows:

That the Senate, while not desiring to pronounce finally upon the numerous and various projects of reform which have been proposed and discussed in connection with the Senate, yet in view of the differences of opinion on this subject, and until these projects have had time to mature, believes it opportune to declare that it is desirable in order to increase the efficiency of the Senate, that more legislation be initiated in the House, that more ministers of the Crown have seats therein, and that any minister personally may introduce and defend Government measures in both Houses.

That was moved by way of amendment to a resolution of the Hon. Mr. McMullen, and a further amendment was moved to this resolution. A debate ensued, but it must be admitted that the discussion of the proposal brought forward was by no means so thorough or so interesting as that which the hon. member has been able to present to-night. Anyway, the reference I have made indicates that there was manifest at the time, and the debate shows it pretty definitely, a regret that there were not more of the ministers of the Crown in the upper chamber, and that more legislation did not initiate there. Nor was there any comment, in the course of that debate, on the subject of the special portfolios that might be held by ministers who had their seats there.

I followed closely the argument of the hon. member. He contended, with much emphasis, that it was unfair to Parliament that ministers of important departments, and particularly spending departments, should have their seats in the Senate and not in the House of Commons; but my perception must be wrong if there was anything in the argument which he presented that would not apply to the minister of any department in the service of the Crown.

Every department is a spending department—some, of course, much more so than others. The largest spending departments are by no means the three that now are served by ministers in the upper chamber; but in so far as the spending of money is concerned that all comes before the Commons and the Commons alone. The Commons and the Commons alone must vote each and every individual item; and therefore, in that regard the power of consideration and criticism is vested in this assembly and its opportunity for that is ample. From that standpoint I am not able to appreciate the difference between the wisdom of having a minister at the head of a department sitting in the Senate and of having a minister sitting here—the difference between a minister sitting here and the minister of another department sitting in the other House. I know not what department may be chosen to which the argument of the hon. gentleman would not, in the main, apply. If we take for example, the Department of the Secretary of State and the Department of the Minister of Justice; these are not great spending departments, but they are large and important ones. They are departments having to do with the administration of affairs of vital and prominent concern, affairs in respect of which the representatives of the people must be in close and intimate touch from day to day; and there is no argument the hon. member has presented against the Postmaster General being a member of the upper house, that would not equally apply to show that the Secretary of State, or that the Minister of Justice, should not be a member of that House.

Mr. BUREAU: What about the Solicitor General?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Solicitor General is not in the Commons a duplicate Minister of Justice. The Solicitor General, at all events since I occupied the office, has functions and duties in which, in no sense, does he review or come into direct contact with the work of the Minister of Justice himself. He takes a special line of work. I know what it is. That work he discharges; but that does not bring him into contact with the work discharged by the Minister of Justice nor with the superintendence of the various services over which the Minister of Justice presides. It seems to me that, while we have the bi-cameral system, there must be a number of ministers in the upper chamber, or the upper chamber cannot serve even that share of the public duties which it now serves; minor, I must say, in very many respects to those served by this chamber; it cannot serve even those, if we are ever still further to reduce the representation of the Government in that House. The hon. member argues, and argues well, that the bi-cameral system has many supporters in this country, has a very large proportion of public opinion behind it, and argues still more forcibly that whatever that proportion may be, it is very likely to continue in this country, in some form, for many years and decades to come. It is rooted in considerations that go to the protection of minorities —considerations that are particularly applicable to conditions in this Dominion. Consequently, though its functions may not be as important as was anticipated by the Fathers of Confederation, nevertheless it is bound for many years to come to remain one of the three estates of this country.

Coming to the real logic of the resolution, it seeks to have this House affirm that ministers of the Crown in this chamber should have the right to pass to the other chamber "whenever measures and policies are introduced affecting their respective departments" and speak thereon, and, similarly, that ministers of the Crown in the other chamber should, under like conditions, come here and enjoy the same privilege. I must say that much for which the hon. gentleman contends appeals to me, and I can see a very great deal of advantage indeed in such a system as he urges. On the other hand, there is very much to be considered before we launch definitely on any such scheme. One point was raised by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean). For example, if a minister of the Crown in the Senate is to be allowed to come to the Commons to speak in relation, say, to his own Estimates, but not to make a motion or to vote, he virtually cannot conduct his Estimates through this House at all, because every discussion in the passage of Estimates arises on a motion, express or implied, that a certain vote appearing in the Estimates be made by this House. He cannot make that motion, consequently it must be assumed to be made by some one else. He is here to discuss it. But many discussions arise in this chamber where it would be very difficult to decide just whether it affected sufficiently the department over which presides the minister having a seat in the Senate to warrant that minister coming into this House and taking part in the debate. I presume it would be for the Speaker to decide just what the relationship was between the discussion and that department. But it would seem to me that if you go a certain length you must go all the way, and you must admit that a minister in either House can speak in the other House in relation to any subject that he desires to discuss. I think there would be very many practical difficulties in drawing a line and saying, "On subjects within a certain line you may come into the other House and address the Chair and the members thereof; but upon subjects beyond that line you must stay where you are." Anyway, I do not know that there would be very much to be feared if a minister were permitted to come into this House from the Senate and discuss any topic that is before us; or, vice versa, that a minister might go from this House to the Senate and discuss any topic that is under discussion there. In practice it would be availed of only in such cases as seemed to call for the attention of the minister in question in the other House. Very likely it would work out in that way and there would be very little abuse of the privilege.

There is, though, this point that I should like to raise. The resolution, of course, only affirms a principle and does not in any way indicate how it is to be carried out. It would occur to me questionable indeed, whether this House or the upper house could, by its own resolution alone, enable one of its members to come into the other House and to take part in its proceedings as is intended by this resolution. Is it within the power of this House of Commons by resolution to enable a member of the Upper House to come and take his seat among us and to exercise in debate his influence upon the votes and decisions of this assembly? If that is to be done, must it not be done by amendment to the constitution itself? And if that is the proper procedure, then an Address from both Houses to the British Parliament would of course be the appropriate action leading to that end. It was suggested in the debate in 1908, I think by the Speaker of the Senate at that time, that there was power in either assembly by resolution to give this right to ministers sitting in the other House. But no argument was presented in favour of that contention, and its mere assertion did not appeal to me as sound. Anyway, I apprehend that neither this House nor the other House is going to take a step so important as this—because it is a very important step—after only one discussion, however thorough. It is naturally a question that should be debated not only in the two Houses of Parliament, but by the people, through the press, before we launch upon such a course. The debate which we have had will serve the purpose of bringing the question before the people, and I for one am very glad indeed that this resolution has been introduced by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, for he is well qualified from his historic knowledge and his parliamentary experience to debate the subject with profit to us all.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I think that probably the House will be disposed to agree with the right hon. the leader of the Government (Mr. Meighen) in his view that the House could hardly be expected to adopt the resolution at the present time; and I fancy that that was scarcely the intention of the mover of it. To a certain extent I am disposed to agree with the principle enunciated in the resolution, that members of the House of Commons who are members of the Government should be permitted to go to the Senate and there take the direction and control of measures which originate in this House. Speaking generally, it has in the past, I think, been the practice to have but one representative of the Government in the Senate. It is true that on certain occasions there have been two or more, and at the present time there are three members of the Government sitting in the upper chamber. I remember, however, when for a considerable time there was but one minister sitting in the Senate, and that was the leader of the Senate, Sir James Lougheed. The practice of having as few members of the Government as possible holding seats in the Senate has always been adhered to, and I think it reflects the spirit of our Constitution. Support of this view will be found in the fact that during our whole history the major portion of every ministry have been members of the House of Commons. That practice is true of the British Parliament as well. There are very many reasons why this practice should prevail, but it is not my intention to detain the House in discussing them.

Coming back to my statement of a moment ago, that ordinarily but one or two members of our Governments have held seats in the Senate, that is easily accounted for by the fact that there would be but one minister available there for actual work, as has occurred on many occasions. It is utterly impossible—perhaps I should say unfair—to expect one member of the Government to handle in the Senate all the Government business originating in this House. I remember when the whole direction of Government business in the Senate was entirely in the hands of Sir James Lougheed, the present Government leader in the Senate. It was a marvel that he was able to take care of that large volume of work and those numerous parliamentary duties as he did, in such a very excellent manner. I think it is hardly fair to Parliament or to the country that such a vast amount of business should be laid upon the shoulders of one person. Should there be but one member of the Government in the Senate it is not difficult to imagine that on occasions he might be ill or incapacitated for one or more reasons and unable to handle Government legislation. It does seem to me, therefore, that it is quite a rational suggestion that members of this House who are members of the Government should have the privilege of going to the Senate and there taking direction or control of Government legislation, or at least assisting the Senate in the consideration of it. For that reason I would think that such a proposed amendment as is incorporated in the resolution of the hon. member from Maisonneuve is a rational one and in the public interest, and to that extent I desire to express my hearty approval of it.

Now, it may be asked if I approve the resolution to that extent, why should I not go further and say that members of the Government holding seats in the Senate should be enabled to come to this Chamber. Well, I think if that were permitted, abuses might very easily creep into our parliamentary practice. For instance, if a government were very weak it might have the major portion of its membership in the Senate, contrary to the spirit of the constitution and probably against the wishes of the people. That, I think, would be one serious objection. Then, the reasons in favour of the suggestion that senators who are members of the Government should come to this Chamber do not apply to the proposal that members of the Government sitting in this Chamber should go to the Senate. There usually are sufficient members of the Government in this Chamber to handle expeditiously the Government business or the public business, whereas, as I have pointed out, that condition might not always prevail in the Senate. So that the reason for my suggestion is stronger than the reason that may be advanced for the broader suggestion contained in the resolution.

I am not disposed to agree with the suggestion made by Mr. McMullen, a former member of the Senate, referred to by the right hon. leader of the House, to the effect that there was not sufficient representation in the Senate of members of the Government. I do not know that we can ever get much enlightenment from former debates on any abstract resolution. It might happen that a Government would be in the minority in the Senate and I doubt very much whether the Senate would be bound to respect Government legislation introduced by a member of the Government in a body where his party or his Government did not hold a majority, as they would be bound, I think, to respect legislation coming from the popular chamber where the Government was supported by a popular majority. I think upon this ground one might urge very substantial objection to the suggestion which was made in the Senate in 1908 as indicated by the extract from the Senate proceedings just read to the House by the Prime Minister.

I have nothing further to say, Mr. Speaker, except to repeat in a word, what I have already said: that the suggestion that members of this House who are members of the Government be permitted to go to the Senate is eminently a proper and a rational one, and I trust that at some time in the early future an amendment to our parliamentary practice will be made or the necessary steps taken to enable that to be done. On the other hand, I do not think that reasons so strong can be advanced for permitting members of the Senate who are members of the Government to come to this Chamber.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to express a settled opinion upon the proposal that has been made. It is certainly a most interesting one, and while I would be prepared to concur in the view that practical advantages might result from its being carried out, I think it is one which calls for careful consideration before arriving at a final decision and, above all, before taking action.

There is one phase of the matter to which I would like to direct the attention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux) who made the motion, and the attention of the House generally. It seems to me that the proposal involves a fundamental change in our system of government and, really, in the British Constitution. Our parliamentary system is based upon the conception of the existence of two distinct bodies deriving their authority, if I may use that word—their right of action, from two totally different sources. We have the peoples' Chamber, and then we have the other Chamber which does not derive its authority directly from the people, which under our system is composed of nominees of the Crown, and which under the original British system was composed largely of representatives of a particular class of the people who sat there because they belonged to that class. Now, resulting from the different sources from which these two bodies derive their authority, there has grown up a system under which particular things belong specially to these two bodies. Take, for instance, everything that touches the voting of money; that belongs to the popular Chamber. It has been suggested that there would be advantages in a minister, being a member of the Senate, coming into this House and discussing his Estimates. What quality would he, as a member of the Senate, have in the discussion of the moneys that the people's representatives ought to vote? Is it not consistent with the spirit of our Constitution that the people's representatives should act absolutely independently of any other influence when they are dealing with matters of that kind, matters which pertain specially to them; matters in regard to which it is for the people through their chosen representatives to speak? It may be said that it is not suggested that that member of the Senate should vote. So far, so good; but the deliberation is, I think, at least as important as the vote. Can you conceive of this popular assembly being guided, in a matter pertaining to the voting of the people's money, by a gentleman who is not a representative of the people at all, a gentleman whose role in the parliamentary work of this country is to be and act as a member of a body, constituted, after all, to exercise a species of supervising and, perhaps it might not be a mistake to say, moderating influence upon the actions of this chamber? On the other hand is it proper that into the deliberations of this body constituted for the purpose of exercising that supervising and moderating influence, a body which in consequence, ought to approach the measures that come to it from this assembly in a—I do not think it would be a mistake to say—quasi-judicial frame of mind, there should be interjected a member or members of this House whose action, in a general sort of way, those who are responsible for the constitution, thought it desirable should be submitted to the reconsideration of a body not so directly, as this body is, under the immediate influence of the popular feeling of the moment. I do not say that these reasons are, perhaps, conclusive against this proposal, or some proposal along these lines, being adopted at some time. But I would invite the House to consider these things that I have pointed out, and to realize that if, in its wisdom, it should decide that it is desirable to recommend a change of this kind, it is recommending a very fundamental change. If this proposal is adopted, we shall have a new system of parliamentary government. We shall have brought into combination two bodies which, up to the present time, the constitution has looked upon as absolutely distinct bodies called upon to exercise absolutely distinct functions, the one to be the immediate or direct mouthpiece of the people of the country, the other, a body that may serve, when need may be for that, because such things happen, as a species of moderating, supervising body, a body which, therefore, should approach matters with which it is called upon to deal, in the frame of mind that belongs to people who are taking up the action of others, to consider whether it was wise or not.

I, perhaps, may stop there because my purpose really is only to call attention to what seems to me to be the very fundamental nature of the proposal. But looking at it from a practical point of view, might we not have very undesirable situations created, if you have a member of this House taking part in the deliberations of the supervising body and, perhaps, feeling himself called upon to act as a sort of advocate for this House of Commons? It does not seem to me that that would be a desirable situation. I am not quite sure that it would be conducive to the perfect free play of the functions of the two bodies or to the maintenance and preservation of the harmony, whether they agree with regard to particular measures or not, that it is certainly most desirable, should be preserved between the two bodies. I would earnestly invite the House, before coming to a conclusion upon this matter, to give most serious thought to just what is involved in the change that is proposed.

Mr. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my only excuse for intervening very briefly in this debate arises from the fact that, in the session of 1918, I moved a resolution dealing in some degree with the same subject, and it has always interested me since then; so much so, that in 1919, I had on the Order Paper another resolution dealing with the matter, which resolution, however, never came to debate. The resolution that I had on the Order Paper in 1919 read:

> That in the opinion of this House all members of the Cabinet holding portfolios should be members of the House of Commons or become such within three months after their appointment.

That is somewhat different in principle from the resolution moved by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux). I will admit that the proposal made by my hon. friend would effect some improvement as compared with the present condition, but I do not think it goes far enough, or that it is the correct solution of existing conditions. Briefly, my opinion still is what it was in 1918 and 1919, and it is this, that it is not in accordance with the principles of democratic government, to which we all say that we adhere, to have senators in charge of portfolios. All the portfolios in the Cabinet should be held by members of the House of Commons, for the reason, that the spending of money and the framing of policies should be definitely in the hands of men who are the chosen representatives of the people of Canada. When I say that, I have no reflections to make upon the Senate as a body, nor upon senators as individuals. I am quite prepared to say that there are men of wide practical experience in the Senate and men who, although they were appointed as partisans, may now have a sufficiently detached frame of mind to look upon public questions without prejudice. I think that is rather unlikely; but after all, we have this condition prevailing, that members of the Senate are not representatives of the people and, in some instances —and we find it exemplified in the present Cabinet—they are men who are exactly the reverse. In at least one case, that of the Postmaster General, there is a gentleman in charge of a portfolio who was rejected by the people of Canada as a member of the House of Commons.

All of the arguments that have been adduced by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) are good; but I would attain the result that he desires, not by bringing members of the Cabinet who are senators into this House by permission, but by ensuring that all members of the Cabinet are members of this House, so that they, by right, may appear here to make such explanations of their Estimates and policies as may be necessary.

The argument has been advanced that the privilege which the hon. member for Maisonneuve seeks for members of the Cabinet to appear in both Chambers obtains in France. That may be all right so far as it goes. Perhaps I am radical when I say that the mere fact that a certain condition or practice obtains in another country is not altogether conclusive, to my mind, that it is proper in this country. In Great Britain, they still have the House of Lords. To some extent, our Senate corresponds with the British House of Lords, but I should like to point out that only two sessions ago we decided in this House that we were not in favour of hereditary titles or offices or anything of that kind. So we are bound by the British practice in that case in any sense whatever.

We have at the present time in the Cabinet three ministers who are not members of the House of Commons, but members of the Senate. I should like to impress upon the House that at least one of these portfolios is of such importance that it should not be administered by any other than a member of this House; I refer to the portfolio of Labour. Again I say, I have no reflection to cast on the hon. gentleman who holds the position of Minister of Labour. I believe he is a very capable, very earnest, and very sincere man, but I do think he should be able to come into the House of Commons direct as a representative of the people. He will have a great many important problems to deal with in the days to come. The League of Nations embodies certain principles in connection with labour matters that will be of direct interest to us, and call for action, by this House—such matters as are mentioned in the speech from the Throne—unemployment insurance and old age pensions; also the eight-hour day, unemployment insurance, equal pay for equal work, abolition of child labour—all these things are embodied in the compact of the League of Nations, and if this country is going to live up to its position in the League, and the position that is claimed for it, we are in duty bound to deal with these subjects. But can we do so to the best advantage if the man directly in charge of labour matters in Canada has not the privilege of coming into this House? Instead, therefore, of saying that the senator who is a member of the Cabinet shall have the privilege of coming into this House, I would say: So arrange it that members of the Cabinet shall be members of this House, and have the inherent right to be here, because they are elected by, and represent the people.

I believe that there is some force in the argument that there should be some connecting link between the Commons and the Senate so long as we have a Senate. Personally, I believe the Senate might be abolished, but so long as we have the two Chambers I would say, let us have one or two members of the Senate in the Cabinet, but not holding portfolios. I say that when it comes to a portfolio, the minister in charge of that department, and who is spending the people's money, should be a member of this House, a representative of the people, chosen by the people. I have nothing further to say on that, except that I want to go on record as being directly opposed to the placing of men at the head of the spending departments of this Government who are not members of this House. When I brought my resolution up two or three years ago, the then acting Prime Minister, still supposed to be the member for Leeds (Sir Thomas White) took exception to my resolution on the ground that it would involve a great constitutional change, perhaps an amendment to the British North America Act. I do not think that is necessary. The Prime Minister this evening has stated that in order to carry out the purpose of the resolution that has been offered, it might be necessary to amend the British North America Act, but if the Government followed my humble suggestion nothing of that kind would be required. If Parliament declared itself in favour of an unwritten law, that only members of this House shall be members of the Cabinet holding portfolios, no constitutional change would be necessary. It would simply be a matter of acting in accordance with that view—a view which I believe will meet with the wishes of a great majority of the people of Canada.

Mr. F. B. STACEY (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few words to add to the discussion. I wish to say that I am in full accord with those hon. gentlemen who have expressed themselves in sympathy with the idea that ministers of the Crown should have a seat in this House. With very much of the argument adduced by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) I am in full accord, I think it is evident to every private member that all matters affecting Estimates can be discussed as a rule, more intelligently, at any rate, with greater satisfaction upon the representations made by the minister in charge of the department than when presented by any other person.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) has stated in the course of his address that the resolution if adopted suggested, if not demanded, constitutional changes inasmuch as the Senate was not representative of the people. Sir, that gives me my clue. The right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) also said that in his judgment, if the adoption of the resolution did not involve a constitutional change, at any rate it would be better to have the matter thoroughly discussed throughout the country, in the press and elsewhere, before such a radical change were brought into effect.

Now I have one criticism to offer, and I am speaking as private member, neither as a friend nor as an opponent of the Government, for in this matter, I take it, there is no partisanship whatever. It appears to me Sir, that neither the motion as submitted by the hon. member nor any remarks so far made have gone quite far enough. I believe that the country at large is more concerned about another phase of this question than as to whether or not ministers of the Crown who are in the Senate should have seats here. I believe that the great body of the people of Canada are thinking seriously about the best method of selecting senators if the upper house is to continue. I cannot bring myself to believe that it can much longer continue to be the right—it may be the legal right—but I cannot bring myself to believe that it is the moral and democratic right of any government to decide who shall constitute the senate of this country. I am convinced of this fact, that if it is desired to give the senate a stronger hold on the sympathy and the confidence of the people of Canada than it has to-day, the best way to bring that about would be to have the people themselves choose or elect the Senate. The method of so doing is not for me now to discuss, or even to suggest. It might be by some system of grouping constituencies by which the electorate of the country could determine who should constitute the Senate of this Dominion. Personally, I think we shall have two Houses of Parliament for a long time to come, perhaps always. But at this period in the history of Canada it occurs to me that it is a most opportune time for the country, for the press, for the Government, and for Parliament, to consider whether or not some such change should be made in the British North America Act. Is it not advisable to give to the electors of Canada the right to say who shall represent them in the Senate? I believe that the Senate should represent the people rather than the Government of any day. I think the Senate should be elected for a stated time; not perhaps, for such a short period of four or five years, but for a longer specified time; and they should be responsible to, and be elected by, the people. If that were done, the principle involved in the resolution would not perhaps present insuperable difficulties. While I admit that a change was suggested by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), I had hoped that he would develop it more fully, and I have ventured to express at least my own opinion, and what I believe to be the opinion of a very large number of the people of this country, namely, that the time has come when the Parliament of Canada should consider the advisability of taking such steps as are necessary in order to give to the people the right to elect, not merely the members of the House of Commons, but also the members of the Senate of Canada.

two points of view from which the resolution of my hon. friend may be considered and from which indeed, it has been discussed this evening. In the first place, there is what would be involved in the way of constitutional change should the resolution go into effect. The other point of view is the practical purpose of the resolution itself,—which I take to be the discovery of more effective channels of information between the two Houses of Parliament where matters of great public concern are under consideration. To discuss at this moment what may be involved in the way of constitutional change, seems to me apart from the question, because the extent of constitutional change will depend upon what practical steps may be necessary to give effect to the resolution which my hon. friend has proposed.

In listening to the right hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), I was struck by the fact that he dwelt at considerable length on the fundamental change in the constitution which would be involved in allowing ministers who have seats in the other chamber to guide legislation in this House. I do not see that the resolution, as drafted, pre-supposes any such privilege or right on the part of ministers in the other chamber. All that it suggests is that ministers of the Crown should be permitted to sit in either chamber. I do not wish to play upon words. I presume my hon. friend in introducing the resolution, intended that such ministers should not merely have seats, but should also be permitted to speak. But there is a difference between ministers on the one hand, answering questions asked from one side of the House, and giving the House information, and, on the other hand, attempting to guide legislation. My hon. friend had no thought in his mind of allowing ministers from the other chamber to attempt to influence this House in the guiding of legislation. What on the contrary, I think he has in mind, and what all of us on this side of the House have felt very much the need of, is discovering some means of getting full and explicit information in regard to matters that form the subject of discussion here.

We on this side of the House have been finding it increasingly difficult to get information touching questions of great public concern and policy, not only in regard to those departments which are not represented here by ministers, but even in regard to departments that are ministerially represented in this House. Take one of the departments, that of Railways and Canals. I suppose more questions have been put on the Order Paper this year with respect to the expenditures of that department than with respect to any other department, and more motions have been made for the production of papers and correspondence regarding that important branch of the public service than of any other. No department of the Government has involved the country in such vast expenditures, expenditures colossal in amount. Yet, whenever we on this side of the House request information on these matters, we are told that they are under the control of a board of directors of the railways, and that the ministry has practically freed itself of all responsibility in the matter of giving information to Parliament. Take the Department of Marine and Fisheries. Since the Mercantile Marine has been established, some $70,000,000 has been spent in the creation of the Merchant Marine. We on this side of the House have tried to get information as to how the money has been expended, how much has been spent in this particular direction, and how much in that. But we are told that this is not to be given to the people's representatives because the control of the Merchant Marine is in the hands of a board of directors for that particular purpose. In other words, the Government frees itself from what is, or what ought to be, its first obligation to the Commons, namely supplying the fullest information possible on questions of great public interest and concern.

As has been stated by my hon. friend, the departments that are in some respects among the most significant, are the Department of Labour, the Post Office Department, and the Department of the Interior. When we come to discuss matters of legislation affecting these departments, these matters are taken up by some of the hon. gentlemen opposite, and if they are not informed, they tell us that they regret they cannot supply the information off-hand, and as sometimes happens, the debate is adjourned to another day.

I am sure it has been the experience of everyone on this side of the House, who has tried to take part in any debate on questions pertaining to those departments, that it has been very difficult to obtain the information required to enable hon. members to proceed intelligently. Is it not conceivable that some plan might be devised whereby a minister who has a seat in the other chamber might be permitted at least to sit beside the minister in this House who is giving information to Parliament in regard to the subject under discussion? or that would permit him to answer the questions that are put in regard to his department? At the outset if thought advisable we need not go so far as to permit him to speak. But he might be present to give necessary information to some other minister who is in the chamber and who has the right to answer questions. As we are circumstanced at present, there being no one here who has the knowledge to speak with authority for ministers who are in the other chamber, the power of this House to get such information as it needs is circumscribed to that extent. I think my hon. friend has had in mind in his resolution, the necessity of in some way restoring to this chamber the right of the people's representatives to the fullest possible information on all matters that are of public importance, not merely with respect to measures that are introduced, but also with respect to all expenditures and matters that come up in the Estimates and others that are of public concern. The need being what it is, it seems to me that my hon. friend is rendering a public service when he suggests to the ministry the absolute necessity of discovering some means whereby this House can be more fully informed on all phases of questions which it is considering. Information is the basis of all intelligent legislation. It is information that we from this side of the House have been seeking and which we are getting in less and less measure from hon. gentlemen opposite. It is to remedy that tendency that my hon. friend has made the suggestion which is embodied in this resolution, and I think, looking at it from that point of view, we can all strongly endorse the object he has in view, though we may well agree with hon. gentlemen opposite in admitting that once some plan has been decided upon, we should carefully consider what may be involved in the way of fundamental constitutional change in giving effect to the resolution.

Mr. LUCIEN CANNON (Dorchester): The resolution before the House has been introduced by an hon. member who is eminently competent to discuss it in all its bearings. The hon. member for Maisonneuve is a constitutional student whose parliamentary experience is long and ripe, and I think that of all the members of this House, he might be considered probably the most competent to introduce and intelligently discuss a question of this nature. The manner in which the hon. member has discussed this resolution shows that my estimate of his qualifications is fairly good. The question is one of great importance; and as the Prime Minister said it is a matter in which the House should move very slowly before coming to a final decision. My hon. friend from Maisonneuve has made historical comparisons. He has spoken about the French constitution, and the British constitution, and he slightly touched on the American constitution. Well, Mr. Speaker, if you examine these three constitutions you will conclude that it is pretty difficult for any student of constitutional law to arrive at any satisfactory decision in this matter, because the constiutional conditions in all these countries vary. As far as the Senate in France is concerned, for instance, we have to bear in mind that first the members of the Senate are elected by the people. The senators are representatives of the people in the Senate of France to exactly the same degree and to the same extent as are the members of the Chamber of Deputies. The only difference is that the senators instead of being elected for a short period, are elected for a much longer time and one-third of them are replaced after an interval of three or four years, if I am not mistaken. Therefore the senators of France, being representatives of the people, are entitled to receive from the members of the government all the information which must be given to the deputies.

Still the French senators do not stand in the same position as do the senators in the Canadian Senate who are not representatives of the people but have been chosen by the Government.

Another consideration we have to bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, is that in France responsible government as it exists in Canada is not recognized. In Canada the Government is responsible to Parliament. Not only is that the case, but each minister bears a joint responsibility with all the other members of the Cabinet—which means, for example, that should the House of Commons to-day vote non-confidence in the Minister of Militia or in the Minister of Justice, all the other ministers would have to interpret that vote as being a vote of non-confidence in the whole Cabinet, and the Cabinet would have to resign. But in France, the chamber may reject one minister and the rest of the Cabinet remain untouched. Therefore, when we consider these two great differences between the French constitution and our own, it makes it difficult to accept the French system as being as effective in Canada as it might be in France. Another great difference, which was demonstrated by my hon. friend from Maisonneuve, was that in France not only does ministerial responsibility not exist, but the members of the Cabinet have not to be members of either the Senate or of the Chamber.

Taking the American constitution, we see that the representatives of the people, both in the Senate and in the House of Representatives, are under no compulsion to listen to the members of the Cabinet—that is to say the ministers at Washington have not the right to appear before either House. Nevertheless, if you examine the workings of the Congress at Washington you must come to the conclusion that legislation there is fairly good at times, although none of the ministers have seats in either chamber. When they do give information to Congress it is by appearing before one of the various committees, either of the Senate or of the House of Representatives. Hence, the example of our neighbours to the south shows that government can be carried on very satisfactorily, even though the ministers there are not elected representatives of the people and cannot appear in either House. If now we compare the Canadian constitution to that of England, we again meet with very great difficulty from the fact that the House of Lord is not a chamber whose members are elected by the people or appointed by the government. The gentlemen who sit in the House of Lords in England sit there by virtue of an hereditary right.

Mr. McMASTER: From the accident of birth.

Mr. CANNON: It may be the accident of birth. Some might consider it a very happy accident, while others might deem it a very unfortunate accident. Nevertheless, the members of the House of Lords are there in accordance with rights which they possess as members of the nobility. Again, in England you have certain ministers sitting in the House of Lords. Very few do so, the vast majority of the ministers sit in the House of Commons; but I think that all hon. gentlemen here will agree on one thing—that the British system of government as it is carried on to-day is probably the best in the world. I have not studied the question as thoroughly as some other hon. members may have done, but I do not think the question of having ministers given the right to appear and speak before both Houses has ever been raised in England. The system as it exists to-day is somewhat similar to our own, and seems to have given satisfaction. The hon. member for Maisonneuve has stated that if his resolution were carried into execution it would give very satisfactory and profitable results. One of the results which the hon. member pointed out, and rightly so in my humble opinion, is that the members of both Houses of the Canadian parliament would be given better and more complete information concerning departmental matters. I do think, Mr. Speaker, that it is a great inconvenience, for example, when matters relating to the Department of Labour, or the Department of the Interior, or the Post Office Department are before the House and the heads of these departments are absent. On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, we have again to bear in mind that every minister is responsible for the policy of these departments; and therefore every minister in the House ought to be sufficiently well informed to give the proper information desired by hon. members. If in former years satisfactory information has not been given to the House, as it might have been given, I contend that it is not the fault of our actual constitutional system but it may be the fault of the actual government. Every minister in the Cabinet, being responsible for the policy of every department and for every act of his colleagues—decided upon within the Council Chamber—ought to be in a position to present better information than that which is given to the House by the Government in many instances. It might be that the adoption of the resolution would result in expediting the business of this House, but if, on the other hand, it were permitted to a member of the Senate to come into the popular chamber and enter into discussion with the members here on an equal footing, we would have the rather extraordinary spectacle of a man who is not a representative of the people, a man who has not been elected by them, but has been simply chosen by the Government, coming into the House of Commons and discussing matters with those who represent the people and who possess rights and privileges that that senator does not possess. I think, too, that if we had members of our House who are members of the Cabinet crossing over to the Senate Chamber and there discussing with those who are not the elected representatives of the people, legislation initiated in this Chamber, we would be giving to the Senate an importance that should not belong to that body. The value attaching to legislation originating in the House of Commons arises solely from the fact that that legislation is adopted after having been considered and approved by the representatives of the people, and if the senators were given the privilege of discussing openly with the ministers elected by the people, matters of legislation, the Senate would then have as much importance in the country as the House of Commons now has, and I think that would be a great danger. And my contention, so far as that is concerned, is borne out I think by what has happened in the United States. When the Fathers of American Independence framed their constitution the important body was to be the House of Representatives, but on account of the ministers not sitting in that House, and on account also of the Senate in that way having about the same influence as the House of Representatives, after a certain length of time the Senate became the important body, and to-day legislation of great importance is always originated in the Senate. I do not think we can compare the two bodies of the American legislative machinery, because one has very great influence and the other is of only secondary importance in the working of the constitution.

This is a very important resolution, and the question arises: Should such a radical change be introduced, would it be for the good of our Constitution? I cannot say. But I venture to offer this suggestion, that a solution might lie in a middle course. We might adopt the system which is followed in England. When ministers of the different departments are members of the House of Lords, under-secretaries represent them in the House of Commons and act as the representatives of those departments in giving information or in discussing legislation connected therewith. Or else, as was suggested by my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), a happy solution would be that all ministers holding portfolios should sit in this House, and then all the inconveniences mentioned by my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) would disappear. The only province where the dual system exists is the province of Quebec.

Mr. FIELDING: And Nova Scotia.

Mr. CANNON: I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker; and also Nova Scotia. I do not know what custom is followed in Nova Scotia, but in our province the ministers sitting in the Legislative Council are as a rule ministers without fortfolio, and those who hold portfolios sit in the elective chamber. As the hon. member for Waterloo represented, this does away with nearly all the inconveniences mentioned by the introducer of this resolution.

The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) has asked, how this change, if it were to be introduced, would be put into effect. Could it be carried out simply by a resolution of this House and of the Senate? Or would we have to follow the usual procedure indicated in our Constitution, that is, go over to England with an address to the British Parliament to amend the British North America Act? This brings me, Mr. Speaker, to the subject of our powers to amend our Constitution. I regret that this question has not been more fully discussed in Parliament. It is a very important question, and I hope before the Prime Minister leaves for London to meet the Prime Ministers of the other Overseas Dominions an opportunity will be given to this House to discuss it. Should we in the future do as we have done in the past, apply to the British Parliament; or should we take upon ourselves the power of amending our Constitution the same way that other dominions have assumed that power? That is a momentous question, and one that this House ought to be called upon to discuss either by a member on this side or by a member of the Government, so that the Prime Minister will have an expression of opinion thereon before he leaves for London.

Mr. H. M. MOWAT (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, the objection to the present method and the inconveniences incident thereto seem to divide themselves under two main heads: the first being that the information given by proxy in this House by a minister who is a member of the Senate is not of a sufficiently satisfactory character; the second being something that very often looms up in this House, the suggestion that the Senate is inferior to the House of Commons because it is not composed of direct representatives of the people. It seems to me that this latter suggestion is mainly the reason for any dissatisfaction that has been expressed. If one looks back at the discussion preceding Confederation, it will be noticed that the point as to whether the Senate should be an appointed or an elected body was ably discussed, and that the two old parties did not at all divide on political lines. The chief opponent of an elective Senate was the principal Liberal representative from Ontario, the Hon.

George Brown, who was most emphatic in his arguments that the Senate should be an appointed body. His principal reason, as I remember, was that the senators being a smaller body, great inconveniences would arise in that they would have to represent districts, and that as Canada was not then well settled and consisted of very extensive electoral divisions, it would be too much of a burden upon any senator to present himself for election. Mr. Brown's arguments prevailed; the majority of the Quebec conference were in favour of an appointed Senate, and that is the system that has prevailed ever since Confederation. The question arises, is not the country now in favour of a change to an elective system? I am informed that a very large number of the members of the other House would be in favour of such a system.

Mr. BELAND: After they are dead.

Mr. MOWAT: The opinions of individual members may differ. I do not feel, however, that the Senate is given, in the minds of the people, the position to which it is entitled. The whole question raised by my hon. friend from Maisonneuve would, it seems to me, be settled if the charge was not so continually made that the senators do not represent the people. I am of the opinion that the desirable end could be brought about by gradually making the Senate an elective body; if necessary in order to bring that about, an amendment to the British North America Act could be petitioned for. As there are a limited number of senators, each senator would necessarily have to represent groups of constituencies. In Quebec no doubt they are nominated for districts, but not so in Ontario, and very often we find that two senators come from some district, perhaps from one small town, while hundreds of miles of territory adjoining is without senatorial representation. If we could agree on this very simple expedient the difficulty which this resolution has in mind would largely disappear. Each senator now in the upper chamber would be nominated to represent a certain district comprising either a number of constituencies or blocks out of the several provinces. The senator would then be known as the senator from such-and-such a district, and when he resigned or died the vacancy would be filled by election. The term should be for, say, twelve years, so that you would hold out to a man who was desirous of serving his country in the Senate the prospect of twelve years of legislative life, and if he could not make a name for himself; if he could not give good service during that twelve years in his country's behalf, it would be almost irrefutable evidence that he was not qualified for the position. Under the plan proposed there would be no disturbance of the hon. gentlemen who are at present in the other Chamber, but gradually the Senate would become an elective body.

It may be said that the objections urged by Mr. Brown at the Quebec conference are valid now as they were then. But that is not altogether so, because with the construction of railways and the building up of the country a man who is well known in his district is likely to be well known in the districts around about. He would be a prominent man; he could not expect to be elected unless he were a well known public man. Being elected for twelve years and knowing that he would be a member of the Senate during that period without cavil and without interference, he would be an independent representative and would be in a position to command a great deal more respect and honour than he is now able to get from the country. We would then have a system very much like the American system, where in some of the states the senators are elected by direct vote of the people and in others by the state legislatures. If a senator did not properly fulfil his duties; if he did not seem to be representative of the growing life of the country, somebody would be put in his place at the expiration of his term. It should be a long term; a senator should not have to go back frequently for election as we do, because the burden of representing and conducting frequent elections in a very large district is too great for the ordinary man to have to bear. But under the system which I propose the Senate would gradually assume a position infinitely superior to that which it now occupies and would be very much more satisfactory to the people. If this were done and we lived for twenty-five or thirty years to see the desirable reform accomplished, we would not have, because we were representatives of the people, a constant feeling of, might I say jealousy of those legislatures which had not that advantage. I sincerely hope that this proposal, which I have advocated for years and which I have written about, will be adopted. It may be a little beyond the exact wording of the resolution before the House, but it has been taken up by other hon. gentlemen during the course of the debate, and that is my excuse for offering it to the House at this time.

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome): Mr. Speaker, I did not have the pleasure this afternoon and this evening of listening to all that was said by the member from Maissoneuve (Mr. Lemieux). This I regret, because I know that to a question of this kind the hon. gentleman brings the research of the student, the mind of the statesman, and the experience of a parliamentarian of many years standing. I have, however, listened with a great deal of enjoyment to speakers on both sides of the House, and it would appear to me that this is a question of a very abstract nature because it has been surrounded by much sweet reasonableness from both sides of the House.

We have been referred to British precedents in regard to this matter. As I recall it, Mr. Speaker, down to the middle of the last century even cabinets organized by Mr. Gladstone contained as many members of the upper House as, if not more than, they did of the lower House; that is an example to be avoided in this country. The British people have, indeed, only apparently a bicameral system. There were two Houses operating or functioning in the British Isles when the Liberal party was in power, but when the Tory party was in power the House of Lords was a mere registry office for registering the legislation passed by the Tory majority in the House of Commons. That is another thing which we wish to avoid.

I am at one with the member for Maisonneuve in his desire that when we are discussing Estimates or legislation for which a department is responsible, the minister in charge of that department should be in this House. Where I differ from my hon. friend is in that he desires to bring the minister temporarily from the other chamber; I say that the minister should not be in the other chamber at all. I rise, therefore, to support the attitude taken by the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). I would, however, make one exception; I think it would be reasonable that as, under our system, a minister without portfolio has no emolument and as the leadership in the Senate demands the full attention of the member, not only during the session, but between sessions, the Government of the day should be allowed to have in the upper house one man holding a portfolio and that one man should be a Government leader in the upper house. But I would not have that one man in charge of what I would call a great popular department. The Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) stated that all departments were spending departments. That, of course, is true; but they differ so much in degree that there is a distinction in fact to be drawn between a great spending department, such as the Department of Railways and Canals and the Department of Public Works, and lesser departments which spend hundreds of thousands of dollars where the larger departments spend millions. It is nothing short of a scandal that, in a democratic country like Canada, the Ministry of Labour should be represented in what amounts to our House of Lords. It is something which should be repugnant to our democratic institutions, and it is a great reflection upon the Government, because the Government should be able to elect a labour man in the country to support them if they really represent the working people of the country, and the fact that they take this worthy gentleman—I have nothing to say against him for the moment—and place him in the upper chamber, is as unconstitutional under our democratic practice as it is ridiculous. The idea that the Postmaster General, beaten in two constituencies, should be taken and placed in our House of Lords to misrepresent the views of the province from which he comes, in spite of the emphatic protest of the electors of two constituencies in both of which he lost his deposit, if I mistake not, is, to my mind, unconstitutional.

Mr. EDWARDS: That is not correct.

Mr. McMASTER: Perhaps he lost his deposit in only one constituency and nearly lost it in another.

Mr. EDWARDS: That is not correct.

Mr. McMASTER: I know that in one constituency, that of Champlain, the minister in question received a few hundred votes against thousands that were given for his adversary. As regards the other constituency of Laurier-Outremont, I have not the figures under my hand at the moment.

Mr. SPEAKER: I hope the hon. gentleman will not pursue this phase of the subject too far, because it is not really germane to the subject at issue.

Mr. McMASTER: I agree with you, Mr. Speaker, and I find that, as regards the constituency of Laurier-Outremont, I was wrong, and I hasten to withdraw the statement. He was beaten there by 1247. The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) stated that we might get rid of the question by having the Senate elected, and one hon. member from British Columbia, who spoke in this debate, was very strong for an elective Senate. The question of an elective Senate is certainly a very interesting one, and it seems consonant with our practice and our constitutional outlook, if I may use the expression, that the Senate should be elective. If I mistake not, the old Legislative Council in Upper Canada prior to confederation was elective.

An hon. MEMBER: In its last years.

Mr. McMASTER: Yes, and I think there is a good deal to be said for an elective Senate. Of course, it must be remembered that there is a kind of man who is capable of serving the public well and who has a desire to serve the public, who is nevertheless not a good candidate, who has not the popular graces that are required to ingratiate him with the public, and there is something to be said for placing in the Senate a certain number of those men. I would keep the number very small, but the matter is worthy of consideration. I will say this for the House of Lords, that, in recent years, the utterances of a number of members of the House of Lords on international questions, have been in terms which have found an echo in every liberal-minded heart throughout the civilized world. We may find liberalism in very unexpected places at times. But will an elective Senate get rid of the difficulty? I do not think so. If you had two elective bodies, in both of which were ministers in charge of portfolios, with similar rights of initiating and explaining legislation and directing policies, you might very easily have deadlocks. The House of Commons, that House which is closest and which would be closest to the people even under our electoral system, whereby senators were elected for a longer term in rotation, say one-third of them retiring every four or five years, is the chamber in which the spending departments should be managed and in which those responsible for the spending departments should take and have their seats.

Is it wise to do what the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) suggests? Is it wise to bring into this Chamber men from the other Chamber? Is it wise to do what one of the members for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) suggests, namely, that we should take our members from this Chamber into the Upper House? If we opened the door to a practice of that sort, that is, bringing in men from the Upper Chamber into this House, what would a Government, having lost the confidence of the people like the present Government, do, supposing some of their members were taken from them? We all hope they will not be; but supposing a calamity of any nature overtook some of them; for instance, supposing four of them were riding in an automobile and the automobile overturned and they went to their reward sooner than they expected. The portfolios would be left although the ministers were taken, and it would be necessary for the Government to fill those four portfolios. What would a Government like this do? It might very possibly, very improperly, of course, choose four senators and give them the portfolios; and then if the plan of the hon. member for Maisonneuve had been adopted, when we said: "It is not right to have these portfolios held in the Senate; we should have an opportunity to have these men face to face with us in the House of Commons," the answer would be: "You are beating the air; we have a right to have these men come when their Estimates are under discussion; we will lead them into this Chamber and you will ask them questions and then afterwards they will go out to their safe seats in the Upper Chamber." That might be the reply of a ministry constituted as is the present ministry because, of course, a ministry firm in the confidence of the people would have no difficulty in filling such portfolios by elections in the usual manner. Therefore, I am afraid that what the hon. member for Maisonneuve suggests would be, not to treat the wound in a scientific manner, but rather just to put a plaster on it, and all doctors will say that if you put a plaster on a wound, you may cause gangrene to set in. What I want to do is not to bring ministers from another House temporarily into this Chamber. I want to have a general election, and to have a Government which has the confidence of the people elected. Then I want that Government which has been elected by the people to choose its members from members of the House of Commons, with perhaps one minister in the Senate for the purpose of transacting the Government business that has to go there.

Mr. BELAND: Without portfolio.

Mr. McMASTER: I would give him a portfolio with salary. I would be just as generous to my political enemies as to my friends. There is another thought which has been expressed by the Minister of Justice with which I agree. I think it is wise to keep portfolios out of the upper house in order that it may retain that quasi-judicial character which an upper house should have. I agree with the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) that it is not often that we get that attitude of mind, but it is an attitude of mind that should be cultivated by an upper chamber. I feel that I have detained the House sufficiently long, and I will now take my seat.

Mr. J. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention when I entered this chamber of taking part in this discussion, and I shall not now occupy very many minutes. I think the resolution moved by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) is one that deserves very serious and careful consideration. In general it commends itself to me as a reasonable proposition to be made to this House.

In regard to certain changes which have been suggested in the Senate, it seems to me it would be a good idea if every person appointed to the Senate were to vacate his seat upon reaching the age of seventy. I think the Senator who has reached the age of seventy, after being actively engaged in political life, should step down and out and devote the rest of his life to preparing for the next world.

I do not agree with the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. McMaster) in regard to a member of the Senate occupying a seat in this House. Conditions may arise in this country, and have done so, where it would be advisable to have a gentleman appointed to the Cabinet who could only be appointed by giving him a seat in the Senate. We had an example of that in the last general election. In the province of Ontario we all know that the tide ran very strongly in one direction. We also know that in the same election the tide ran just as strongly in the opposite direction in the province of Quebec. If my memory serves me correctly, sixty-two out of sixty-five constituencies in the province of Quebec elected opponents of the Government, but there were thousands of votes polled in the province of Quebec by people who thought just as the majority of the people in Canada thought; there is no question about that. They did not succeed in getting their candidates elected to this House, but there were thousands of people in the province of Quebec who did give an expression of opinion in favour of the policy laid down by the Government. Now there was no way of giving those thousands of people representation in this Government except by electing one of their number to a seat in the Senate, and that was done. The hon. gentleman has referred to the hon. the Postmaster General, as he has on former occasions, as misrepresenting the province of Quebec. Once more allow me to call his attention, and that of certain other gentlemen in this House who have on former occasions made similar allusions, to this fact: It is true the present Postmaster General ran in two constituencies. It is true that in one constituency he lost his deposit. In the other constituency he succeeded in polling 6,196 votes. That was not sufficient to elect him, but it was an expression of opinion from 6,196 people in the province of Quebec, and that was more than twice as many people, yes, more than four times as many, as expressed themselves in favour of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster).

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: How many votes did the Postmaster General receive in the province of Quebec, without counting the soldier vote?

Mr. EDWARDS: If the hon. gentleman refers to the civil vote, the Postmaster General polled 4,855 civil votes, in addition to that, there were polled in the province of Quebec 208 soldier votes. That makes over 5,000 votes polled by the Postmaster General by people residing at that time in the province of Quebec. While I am at it, I daresay it would be of interest to the hon. gentleman to know how many votes were polled in the province of Quebec by the hon. member from Brome. He succeeded in pulling down altogether 1,913 civil votes, and succeeded in getting 5 soldier votes; that is, he received less than 2,000 votes altogether in the province of Quebec. Yet the hon. member for Brome would be horrified if any person were to hint for a moment that he did not represent the people of the province of Quebec or of his constituency, yet all told only 1,926 people said they wanted the hon. member for Brome to have a seat in this House, while 6,196 said they wanted the Postmaster General to have a seat in this House. Let me give my hon. friend a little more information. Let me tell him that there are thirty-five hon. gentlemen sitting on the other side of the House elected from the province of Quebec who polled fewer votes in 1917 than did the hon. the Postmaster General. Yet I daresay every one of those hon. gentlemen thinks he represents the sentiment of the province of Quebec.

Mr. McMASTER: How many civil votes did the hon. gentleman receive in Frontenac?

Mr. EDWARDS: I cannot say offhand, but I know I received within seventeen of a two thousand majority. There is no doubt,—

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret to interrupt the hon. member. I felt it was his right to reply to the reflection implied in the question of the hon. member for Brome, but I do not think it would be wise to pursue the point further because it bears no relation to the question before the Chair.

Mr. EDWARDS: Mr. Speaker, I was endeavouring to answer the statement of the hon. member for Brome, that the Postmaster General misrepresented the province of Quebec, and should not have been appointed to that position. The hon. member said further that it was wrong for any man to have a seat in the other House as a Cabinet minister. With that I do not agree, and I have cited as a reason for that opinion the course the election took in 1917. There was no opportunity for tens of thousands of voters in the province of Quebec to be represented in the Cabinet, except by giving a seat in the Government to a man who could sit in the Senate. That is the point I desired to make, and I certainly think that under the circumstances it is a wise provision that a man who occupies a position in the Cabinet may have a seat in the Senate. I agree at once with those who say that it is inadvisable that very many members of the Cabinet should sit in the Senate. I will go further and say that it would be advisable, if possible, to have all Cabinet ministers sit in this Chamber. Now, it seems to me that the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Maisonneuve is one which touches this very point. I did not have the pleasure of listening to his remarks, but I believe he appreciates the fact that circumstances might arise in this country wherein the only way in which representation might be given to an important class in the community would be by giving a seat in the Cabinet to a man who is a member of the Senate. It is not advisable to carry that principle further than the point of absolute necessity. What objection can be raised to a Cabinet minister, who sits in the Senate, coming into this House when his Estimates are under discussion? He is the one who should know more about those Estimates than any one else. For my part, I can see no reason why he should not occupy a seat in this House when his Estimates are under consideration or when matters particularly affecting his department are before the House. As it appears to me, therefore, the resolution is one which should receive very full and careful consideration by the Government, with the object of putting it into practice. I see no reason whatever why it should not be implemented, and there are a good many reasons that suggest themselves to me why it would be generally advantageous if the suggestion contained in the resolution were given effect to.

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX: Just one word before I withdraw my motion, because I only brought it forward in order to elicit as much information as possible from both sides of the House and to place the question before the public at large. I believe, from what I have gathered this evening, that a general sentiment exists in favour of some amendment to our rules for the purpose of obtaining from ministers of the Crown, sitting in either Chamber, such information as is necessary to carry on the affairs of the country in a business way. The debate has been most interesting, and I have personally learned a great deal from what has been said by hon. members on both sides. The discussion, however, has wandered somewhat from the main object of the resolution. I did not intend to discuss this evening the constitution of the upper Chamber, nor did I wish to raise the issue of the reform of the Senate. That is another question which might well be discussed on some other occasion. But I have no hesitation in saying that I stand for the upper Chamber, with perhaps a reform as regards the age limit, and perhaps election in the second degree,—election by public bodies such as universities, boards of trade, and provincial legislatures, or even, as it has been suggested, on one occasion, the selection of senators by both the leaders of the Conservative and the Liberal parties, appointing representatives in the upper Chamber under a certain procedure which was elaborated, I believe, the last time we discussed this question on the motion of Mr. German, the ex-member for Welland.

I have listened with great attention to the able argument of the right hon. Minister of Justice. He seems to be under the impression that there is involved in this resolution some constitutional change. Far be it from me, Mr. Speaker, to suggest that we should constitutionally change our system of government. I regret that my resolution was not framed in such a way as to appeal more clearly to the mind of my right hon. friend. I did not intend at all to change our system of government. I did not have in view any change in the powers of either Chamber. What I had in mind, however, is the establishment of more modern and more practical channels of communication between the two Chambers. That, I think, would involve only an amendment to our rules. But I never had in mind having a joint address presented by both Houses to the Imperial Parliament seeking to amend our Constitution. Such an object can be read into my resolution. I simply wish to find means of conveying more information, because under our system of government there will always be some ministers sitting in this Chamber and in the upper Chamber. I do not share the optimism of my good friend from Brome in the matter of the appointment of minister in the upper Chamber. We are all human, and so long as our system endures I believe that the Conservative party, or the Liberal party will as things come and go on, always appoint some faithful to the upper Chamber occupying a Cabinet position. It has always been so since Confederation, under Macdonald, under Laurier, and under Borden. It is so to-day under Meighen, and it will be so in days to come, unless we abolish the Senate, deciding that it has lost its usefulness, which I do not believe.

The Senate may have lost some of its ininfluence, it may not have been, of late years, the great factor it was after Confederation and even at the time when I entered Parliament. I remember long before I entered this House that one would approach with awe and reverence the precincts of the Senate. There were great men in the Upper Champer formerly—men of unusual ability, men who had occupied the highest positions in their own province, and in this House. That there has been a change within a few years, and that some appointments of to-day may not be what others were twenty-five or forty years ago, is quite possible. But at all events the Senate is there as an institution. I said a moment ago it is liable to be reformed; but taking it as a fact that the Senate will remain as it is for many years to come, I wish to improve the relations between the two chambers. It is a matter of procedure, and at the same time it is a matter of common sense, that we should have the opportunity of exchanging ministers whenever occasion arises. Let us suppose an important Bill is drafted by the present leader of the Senate. It may be a measure concerning the civil re-establishment of our soldiers, the administration of his department, or the natural resources of Northwest provinces—the oil resources for instance, to mention only one important feature of his administration. The policy is planned by him, but the Bill is introduced in this chamber by another minister who has not been able to study the question as much and to master it as thoroughly as the drafter of the Bill who sits in the other chamber. What objection is there, Mr. Speaker, that that minister should, through some amendment to our procedure, be called upon to explain the new policy to the House, or even to defend his estimates when they are scrutinized and criticized in this chamber? So once more le me say, Mr. Speaker, that the main object of my motion is not to bring about a constitutional change. I simply wish to amend our system of procedure and facilitate the exchange of ideas, and the explanation of policies as presented in both Houses. I shall withdraw my resolution, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the House for the attention it has given to the discussion of this question.

Motion withdrawn.

On the motion of the Right Hon. Mr. Doherty for the adjournment of the House.

Mr. FIELDING: What business will be taken up to-morrow?

Mr. DOHERTY: We expect to take up the Estimates, including those of the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Department of Labour, and the Department of the Interior.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, before that motion is put—

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion is not debatable.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I do not desire to debate the motion; I wish to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to refer to a former order for the purpose—

Mr. SPEAKER: Unless the Minister of Justice is prepared to withdraw his motion it is not competent for the hon. member to do so.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 11 o'clock p.m.

Tuesday, March 22, 1921

The House met at Three o'clock.

COMMITTEE ON RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (Lambton East) presented the first report of the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph lines.

REPORTS

Detailed Statement of Remissions of Customs Duties and the refund thereof for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1920.—Sir Henry Drayton.

Annual Report of the Secretary of State of Canada for the year 1919-20.—Sir Henry Drayton.

VACANCY—MEDICINE HAT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received a notification of a vacancy having occurred in the Electoral District of Medicine Hat, by the decease of the Right Honourable Arthur Lewis Sifton, sitting member therefor. I accordingly issued my warrant to the Chief Electoral Officer to make out a new writ of election for the said Electoral District.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT (PUBLIC HARBOURS)

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 40, to amend the Canada Shipping Act (Public Harbours). He said: The purpose of this Bill is to enable the Governor in Council to increase existing penalites for the pollution of harbour waters by the discharge of waste oil from oil-burning steamers.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

WEDNESAY EVENING SITTINGS

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Wednesday, the sixth of April, and on all subsequent Wednesdays to the end of the Session, the House shall meet at Three o'clock, p.m., and that the sittings on such days shall, in every respect, be under the same rules provided for other days, and that Government Notices of Motions and Government Orders shall have precedence over all business except Questions by Members and Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): There is already on the Order Paper a motion standing in my name, dealing with the question of the hours of meeting and closing our business on Wednesdays. I regret that the Prime Minister, in this motion, is abandoning at once the Wednesday evening recess. There are strong reasons which can be urged in favour of continuing that recess. I am confident it makes, not only for the comfort and convenience of members, but for the efficient administration of the business of the House. If members know that they will have one evening a week on which they are free to make engagements, they will adapt themselves to that; but if they have no evening free in which they can make engagements, they will take an evening off whenever it suits them, and there will be a lack of attendance. As, however, the whole question will come up again on the motion that stands in my name. I do not know that any good purpose can be served by continuing the discussion at this stage.

Motion agreed to.

FRENCH TREATY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw the attention of the Government to an item which appeared on Saturday in the Montreal papers regarding the commercial treaty with France. The item states that the commercial treaty with France, signed on behalf of Canada by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) in the month of January last, will become effective on the 27th of this month. I might say that I have on the Order Paper a motion for the production of that treaty. When the motion came up on March 4, the Prime Minister asked that the motion stand, and on March 7, the same answer was given. Is it true that the treaty was signed on behalf of Canada in the month of January, and that it will become effective on the 27th instant? Why is the Government keeping the people at large, the manufacturers who wish to do business with France, and members of Parliament, unaware of the contents of that treaty until it becomes effective?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I will answer the last question first. The Government has not been keeping the contents of the proposed agreement secret to the detriment of manufacturers or any other business men of this country; rather the opposite was the point held in view. It is true that an agreement was come to, and that it was signed by myself when I was on the other side in the month of January, and it was signed by the then Minister of Commerce, Mr. Isaac. But it is also true that a little after that a change of Gevernment occurred in France, and consequently the signature by the preceding Minister of Commerce was not effective. The measure had itself to be examined and agreed to by the succeeding ministry, so that there was no treaty that was effective, either in esse or in the future, until it became established that the succeeding Government was of the same mind as the preceding and would carry out the effect of the agreement. That was not ascertained until last week. Now, let me say a word as to why the treaty could not just at this moment be laid before the House. I signed for Canada the proposed agreement. Both copies of it were sent to the French Government through the British Embassy; and when the French Government were in a position to sign—and that would not be until the succeeding Government had approved the agreement—the two copies of the agreement were to be signed in Paris and one copy sent to the Canadian Government. So that really we have not the authoritative treaty or agreement until we receive that signed copy which belongs to us and which is now on the way from France.

Hence, if I had give out the contents of the agreement as made between Mr. Isaac and myself, I might have been misleading the whole people of Canada, because it might never have gone into force. At the present time I have what I believe to be pretty close to an exact transcript of the agreement as it now stands after having been signed by the French minister, and I am going to take the responsibility of laying that before the House at an early date—with the remark that there may be some slight deviations, not very important, in respect to the articles of the agreement as a result of its examination by the minister in France who succeeded Mr. Isaac.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Is it true that the treaty will become effective on the 27th of this month, that is, at the end of this week?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is the contents of the telegram that I have received from Mr. Roy.

Mr. FIELDING: Can it become effective in Canada until it has been approved by this House?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: A commercial treaty?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. CURRIE: When did this House authorize the making of the treaty with France? Are members of this House not to be consulted at all in these matters? I have a distinct recollection of one government in Canada being defeated on that very question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CURRIE: I should like an answer.

Mr. BELAND: May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if there is any special reason why communication with the French Government should be made through the British Embassy, instead of through the Canadian High Commissioner in Paris?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It has always been the custom that these trade agreements that are made are made through the privity and through the medium of an official of the British Government. I sent the copies which I myself signed through the British Foreign Office. They reached the French Government through that medium, and I expect they will be returned through the same medium.

Mr. BUREAU: That was prior to our becoming a nation.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Oh, no. It is said that Canada became a nation a long time ago, during Sir Wilfrid Laurier's time.

BOOK ON PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS ARCHITECTURE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (West Toronto): In view of the fact that this magnificent building is full of historic carvings and that almost the whole period of Canada's history is represented in it in some form or other, is it the intention of the Government to have the architect write a book descriptive of the building before his duties are discharged?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): I am not aware Mr. Speaker that any pressure has been brought to bear on the architect to write a book. I am always very slow to write books myself, but I can assure my hon. friend that this matter will be brought to the architect's attention.

CIVIL SERVICE BONUS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): May I ask my right hon. friend if anything has yet been decided regarding the bonus to be paid to the Civil Service this year?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): I expect to be able to make a statement on that matter tomorrow.

INCOME TAX FORMS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. F. KAY (Missisquoi): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance when the new forms for income tax returns will be issued.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Minister of Finance): My understanding, and I think the fact, is that the forms are already issued.

Mr. KAY: I tried to get some last week at my post office, but could not do so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Where is that?

Mr. KAY: In the county of Missisquoi.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And the post office?

Mr. KAY: Philipsburg.

LAKE OF THE WOODS CONTROL

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JACQUES BUREAU (Three Rivers and St. Maurice): May I ask the Prime Minister whether he or any member of the Government has received any communication from the International Joint Waterways Commission with reference to control of the waters of the Lake of the Woods either since or prior to November last?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): I am not aware of any being received from the International Joint Waterways Commission since November last.

Mr. BUREAU: Or from any branch, American or Canadian?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would not say that no communication has been received, but I cannot bring to mind at the moment any received since that date. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would put his question on the Order Paper.

Mr. BUREAU: I just want a yes or no answer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will make a note of my hon. friend's question, and have it answered tomorrow.

THE AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly-Verchères): As a member of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts I should like to ask the Minister of Finance when he expects to lay on the table of the House the fourth volume of the Auditor-General's Report.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Minister of Finance): I expect it will be tabled at the end of the month.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): I should like to ask the Secretary of State—I presume we have a Secretary of State, although I do not know who he is—when returns may be expected to some thirty motions that were passed at the last session of this House for the production of papers, and which orders of the House have not yet been complied with.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Minister of Finance): I shall have very great pleasure in looking into the matter. Perhaps my hon. friend could facilitate matters by letting me have a list of these motions.

SUPPLY

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—AMQUI STATION

On the motion of Right Hon. Sir George Foster for Committee of Supply:

Mr. F. J. PELLETIER (Matane): Mr. Speaker, if I am in order I should like to ask the Government one or two questions before the House goes into Committee of Supply. My attention has been called to certain conditions existing on the Intercolonial Railway at Amqui station. May I ask my right hon. friend the Prime Minister whether he received on or about the 10th day of March a communication from Mr. J. E. Beaulieu, Registrar of Amqui, asking why certain changes pertaining to the night and day agents at Amqui station had been made. I understand from a copy of this communication that the day agent at Amqui station goes on at eight o'clock in the morning and leaves at five in the afternoon, and that the night agent goes on at eight o'clock in the evening and leaves at four in the morning. This leaves the station without an agent between the hours of 5 p.m. and 8 p.m. and between 4 a.m. and 8 a.m. Mr. Beaulieu states that during the time neither agent is on duty trains Nos. 32, 33 and 34 pass through Amqui, and the people are not in a position to get their freight or express on account of there being no agent there at that time. Any merchandise on No. 32, for instance, is carried on through to Campbellton, and does not return until the following day on another train, and vice versa. If the people of Amqui wish to express goods in the opposite direction they have to send their goods out to Mont Joli, to be returned later. I should like to ask my right hon. friend whether he has referred this matter to the proper department, that is, if he has received the communication. A copy of it was sent to me and I wrote to the General Superintendent enclosing him a copy, but I have not yet received an answer from him. Whether it is because officials of the road are instructed not to answer communications or not I do not know. It seems rather strange now that when we ask on the floor of the House for certain information we are not able to secure it. May I ask my hon. friend whether he has also received a copy of the resolution adopted by the Council at Amqui, complaining of the same thing, and if so, whether he has given the matter his attention? We trust that this matter will be taken into consideration.

Mr. SPEAKER: I may point out to the hon. member that if he has any further remarks to make, or suggestions to offer, he had better avail himself of the opportunity now, because he is limited to one speech on this motion. Similarly, the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen), in his reply, will be limited to one speech.

Mr. PELLETIER: Very well, Mr. Speaker. The resolution that was adopted by the Council at Amqui gave a wealth of details, showing that the village has a population of nearly 4,000, and that there are three other parishes east of Amqui itself. All the goods that have been shipped on the trains I have mentioned are loaded at Amqui for shipment. Now, these people certainly want to have the present condition of affairs remedied, and I sincerely trust that my right hon. friend will attend to this matter in the near future. He may have transmitted it to some other department, but, as I have stated, I have not been able to obtain any answer. I should be glad to see an agent appointed who would be at the station at all times. It seems unreasonable that these trains should pass by that station, which is an important one, without an agent being there. In the communication of which I spoke, of the 28th February, I mentioned the fact that the officials of the Canadian National Railways at Amqui had allowed certain people to pile lumber on the south side of the station in the yard, in the immediate vicinity of which there are quite a number of private residences; and I pointed out that the owners of these houses were obliged to pay the same rate of insurance as is paid by the lumber yards. I submitted this question to the superintendent of the district, but he informed me that he could do nothing. This lumber could just as easily be piled on the northwest side, where there are no buildings nearby; and there are sidings on that side of the yard as well as on the other. I should like to have a satisfactory answer from the Prime Minister, who I trust will give his best consideration to this matter.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): I should be only too glad to reply to the hon. member, especially as he very seldom addresses the House. I cannot do so, however, if what I say now is to be regarded as exhausting my only opportunity for speaking on this motion. The hon. member asks about a communication which he is informed was sent to me, and I rather gathered that he added later on that he had written me himself. Is that correct?

Mr. PELLETIER: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I must have misunderstood my hon. friend. Now, it may be that my office received the letter to which he refers. If it was received, it would be dealt with by my secretary without direct reference to me and would be submitted to the Railway Department for reference to the Canadian National Board. If the hon. member wrote me personally himself the letter would come to me direct, and I am sure I would have answered it by this time. I cannot recall having received that communication.

Mr. PELLETIER: There were two mailed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no doubt they were received in my office, but they would not come to me personally unless they were so directed. However, I shall look into the matter and see that proper steps are taken in respect of both.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

MANAGEMENT—INFORMATION LAID BEFORE PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the Opposition): I desire to move an amendment as follows to the motion which is before the House:

That all the words after the word "that" be struck out, and the following substituted therefor:

Subject to the reservation that in exceptional cases there may be documents of a confidential character which, in the public interest, may properly be withheld from publication, the House declares that it is the undoubted right of Parliament to demand and receive copies of all reports, accounts, correspondence and papers in relation to the management of every department of the public service including the affairs of the Canadian National Railways, whether operating directly under the control of the department, or under corporate form.

The necessity for this amendment, Mr. Speaker, is the attitude taken by the Government during the last session of Parliament, and which is being taken anew at the present session, of refusing to give hon. members of the House information with respect to the Canadian National Railways in answer to questions which are addressed to the ministry, and in response to motions for the production of papers containing information with respect to the affairs of the Canadian National Railways. It is further necessary, in view of the declaration made by the Prime Minister in this House on Thursday last, which was, if I do not misinterpret his words, to the effect that the Government would not give to this House information respecting the Canadian National Railways if by any chance that information happened to relate to correspondence held with the Board of Directors in charge of the management of the roads. In other words, the Government's position is this: It is one of government ownership of railways and government control and operation without government responsibility.

The Government of their own initiative, have created a nominal company to which they have assigned the management of the affairs of the Canadian National Railways. They have themselves of their own nominees constituted a Board of Directors who are to have a free hand in managing all the affairs of the railway system. But when it comes to the public, who are the owners of the system, and who are to meet the liabilities for any shortages occasioned by its management, we are told that the representatives of the people in Parliament shall not have the right to obtain information respecting essential matters of management and detail. We have had from the Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Reid), a statement as to the consequences of the methods which have been adopted by the Government in the management of its railways. We were informed on Thursday last that there is a deficit for the past year of something like $70,000,000 in the operation of the roads, and the Minister of Railways stated that the question had become so grave that he and his colleagues were virtually at a loss to know how to deal with the situation one way or the other. I say, Mr. Speaker, that when a government comes before Parliament and confesses its incapacity to deal with any situation, it is time for that government to resign and make way for some other body capable of managing the affairs of the country. However, altogether apart from that, the minister stated that the Government would be pleased to receive from the members of this House suggestions as to how the situation could be improved. Well, I think there are many hon. members who would be glad to make suggestions. But I would point out, Sir, that it is impossible for any hon. member to submit an intelligent suggestion unless he has information on which to base the suggestion which he may desire to make. We are all anxious to treat this great problem with the great care and caution with which it should be surrounded. We recognize that Canada has not been faced, except during the period of the war, with a situation that was ever quite as grave as that which is produced by the railway problem to-day. It is certainly the first question pressing for solution, it is in every way the most baffling problem with which the country has been confronted. But the only way in which a problem of such magnitude can be solved, if it is to be solved at all, is through the people's representatives in Parliament having the fullest information in regard to all its aspects.

Now, Sir, the reasonableness of the demand in this resolution, will, I think, be wholly apparent. All that the resolution requests, is, that as respects the Canadian National railways, which are a branch of the Government public service, this House shall have the same right as it has in respect to all other branches of the public service, viz.—the right to the fullest information with respect to matters of great public concern. May I point out that the Government's attitude in refusing to give this House any information, is really placing a premium, so far as the management of these railways are concerned, on inefficiency and on incapacity, if not also on absolute dishonesty. Take the position of the members of the board of directors of the Government railways as it is constituted at the present time. They are virtually told by the Administration that they are to have a free hand in carrying on the affairs of these roads, that they may do as they please; that when the people's representatives in Parliament ask for information as to how the affairs of the national railways are being conducted, no information will be given. The directors may do what they please, but they will be screened in the matter of any unwise or unjust measures by a refusal on the part of the Government to give any information to the people in regard to the Government railways and their management.

I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that this attitude on the part of the Government is unfair in very many directions, as well as being very prejudicial to the interests of the taxpayers of this country. It is unfair to the labour that is employed on the railways of this country. Since the announcement has been made of this great deficit, there appears to have been an organized propaganda to create the impression that, in some way or another, labour, because it has been receiving high wages, is responsible for that deficit. How is labour to have its position properly put before the country unless the opportunity is given to the people's representatives in this House to find out whether there are not other causes—such as unnecessary service, unnecessary duplication of operations, waste, extravagance, inefficient management and the like—which are accountable for the large deficit with which the country is faced. Until we get the fullest possible information it is impossible to say what the real cause is.

I should also like to say that it is unfair to that large body of the public who are advocating a system of government ownership, that facts respecting the operation of these roads should be withheld from Parliament. This is not the time to argue the merits or demerits of public or private ownership; but it is just to all persons, whether they are advocates of private ownership or advocates of public ownership, that the fullest amount of information should be placed before Parliament, so that an intelligent public opinion may be formed as to which of the two methods is likely to prove more in the public interest.

The only argument the Government has urged against giving information is the specious one that for it to do so would lead to the affairs of the national railways being brought into party politics, that it would lead to a political control of these roads. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that I think the direct opposite is the truth. The danger of the railway system of Canada being used for political ends lies in the fact that their operation is being surrounded by the secrecy with which the Government is surrounding it at the present time. The one and only safeguard against political interference and control is the frankest, freest, and fullest publicity in regard to all the affairs of these railways. I need not do other than quote from an authority, which hon. gentlemen will recognize as one that is friendly, to show that the present system is not regarded as in any way freeing the railways from political control. In an editorial in the Montreal Gazette of March 21 on the railway situation, will be found the following sentence:

> The pretence that these railways are now free from politics deceives nobody.

Nothing could be clearer than that. The impression that the public entertains today in a word is this: that the Government has constituted a board of directors, nominees of its own, friends of its own, gentlemen who have connections with other large industrial enterprises, and has left them a perfectly free hand to use this vast railway system of Canada as a great instrument for furthering business interests in which the country may be interested, but in which they themselves may also be interested. In other words, the fact that Parliament is denied a full and free knowledge of every fact surrounding the situation, is leading to the impression throughout the country that our national railways are being converted into a gigantic political machine for the purpose of furthering the interests of the Government and its friends. Now, Sir, there is only one cure for that impression, there is only one way in which that impression can be removed, and that is by the Government giving to Parliament the fullest information with respect to any questions which hon. members care to address to the ministry in regard to the national railroads.

Let me just say this further word: If public opinion is to be formed in an intelligent manner on this important question it can only be so formed by having before the country the fullest available information on which to base opinion, and that information is possible only by the Government supplying it through the medium of Parliament. I think the amendment is so reasonable on its face that it requires no argument for its support.

I would draw the attention of the House to this one feature in conclusion—while the amendment does assert the right of Parliament to full information, as one of the fundamental rights of a body such as this—which is representative of the people at large and with respect to a great property which is owned by the people themselves—it says nothing as to the form in which that information is to be supplied. It is customary in this House to have information given in answer to questions addressed to the ministry, or on motions for the production of papers; and sometimes the information is given through special committees. Nothing is said in this amendment as to the particular form in which the information is to be given; that is for the Government to decide; but it does assert the undoubted right of Parliament to the fullest information in respect to any property that is owned by the people of Canada, the management of which is in the hands of the Government and for which the people, as taxpayers, become liable, especially when, as in the present instance, there are gigantic deficits to meet.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have to thank my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) for extending to me the courtesy of notice that this motion would be brought before the House to-day. He did not, however, err on the side of generosity, as the first intimation of it came to me half an hour before the debate at 2.30 this afternoon. I am glad, though, that the motion embodies a subject that is well worthy of the consideration of Parliament, and I shall take the opportunity later to invite, through a fitting channel, expressions of opinion from both sides of the House after the pros and cons are laid before hon. members as fully as is possible during the course of this debate.

When the railways of this country were assumed as a national property, the question at once confronted the Government as to what system of management would be the best, having regard to the public interest for the operation of those roads. The Government, two or three years ago, found itself in possession of some 17,000 miles of railway, with all the appurtenances that go with a great railway system in these times, and with the tremendous staff of employees and all the subsidiary activities that circle around anything of the nature of the Canadian Northern or, as it is now, the Canadian National Railways. Until then this country had never faced such a problem. We had for many years operated a railway between the Maritime Provinces and the city of Quebec, and later the city of Montreal—the Intercolonial railway. That railway was constructed and operated not exclusively as a business enterprise. It was constructed in large degree for laudable political purposes, and in its operation through all the years under the Department of Railways and Canals undoubtedly regard was paid to the fact that it was so originally constructed, and there was general consent that it was not being conducted on the hard and fast business lines that would be essential were it treated solely as a business enterprise. But even though there was that reason for the operation of the Intercolonial railway under the Department of Railways and Canals in the manner in which I have described, it cannot be said that the results of that operation were anything like wholly satisfactory to the people of Canada, or that the experience of that operation was such as to warrant the adoption of the same methods were another system to come into our possession. Much less was the experience of that operation such as to permit the Government seriously to contemplate the operation under the direct control of the Department of Railways and Canals—in other words, under direct political control—of a system of the immense magnitude of the Canadian National railways.

I cannot conceive that any Government that had first concern for the well being of such a railway system, or of the country that was the owner of that system, would for a moment think of undertaking the operation of that system—the largest in point of mileage in the world to-day—merely as a departmental activity, as we operate other services under the Crown. The conclusion then arrived at all hon. members know. It was decided to try the plan of corporate operation; to give this system the same chance to succeed as a business enterprise that other rival or corresponding systems had the world over; and to see what success that system could have under the best conditions that could obtain.

That decision having been arrived at and having been approved by Parliament, the question then presented itself, as to how far it was consistent with the operation of our Canadian National Railways thereunder, that questions concerning only the relations of the operating board to the patrons of the road should be subject to the daily review of Parliament—in a word, to that summons, review, and control of Parliament that undoubtedly Parliament historically has exercised, and must exercise, in relation to services directly under departments of the Government. Well, if it has not been manifest to hon. members not so closely associated with the work as those of us in the Government, it must at least be manifest to those who come closely in contact with operations, that if all matters between the board of directors and the patrons of the road—all things connected with its operation—are to be subject to motion in this House and to disclosure by the production of documents and papers from day to day, the same as any activity of a department of Government, we are right back where we were with the Intercolonial; we are under political control. And we reach a position that to my mind seems to be anomalous, and wholly inconsistent with the corporate management of the road.

While there is corporate management, there remains the answerability and responsibility of the Government for the success of the system. That we cannot dispute. But there is no immediate accountability for the day to day procedure of operation. If there is to be then our officers subject to our direction must operate the road; but our officers subject to our direction are not so operating. The board of directors is independent of Government control and direction; and that being so the Government from day to day cannot be answerable for details of operation, or for what takes place in the ordinary routine of operation between the operating directorate and the patrons of the road.

Now, let us assume that the Government should demand from the directorate, and bring down to Parliament from day to day, all correspondence that takes place between the directorate and patrons of the system having relation to, say, the price of coal purchased at one point or at another point; or in relation to the situation of a pile of lumber in a little village, or as was instanced already this afternoon, whether that pile is on the northwest or the south side of the track; or in relation to details of purchases; or in relation to details of contracts—let us assume that these are exposed in Parliament, say, and attacked by the Opposition. In that event, is the Government in a position to defend? Those matters did not take place under the direction of any officer subject to our control, they took place under officers subject to the board of directors, for whose general conduct of the system the Government must be answerable, but for the details of whose conduct from day to day those directors are answerable as the directorate of the system. Therefore, there would be no one in a position to defend, there would be no one who could possibly be in possession of information that would enable him to defend.

But even a greater absurdity than that would arise. Owing to the immensity of the system it would be wholly impossible for Parliament to do its work, if it were to attempt from day to day as part of its duties to review the operations of that system, and if the Government were called upon from day to day to account for this or that action of the board of directors in matters of daily operation of the road. Consequently, a position from both those points of view would be taken which could not be sustained—could not be sustained, on the one hand, because the time of Parliament could not be directed to it, could not be absorbed in the effort, and, on the other hand, because it would result in holding the Government responsible from day to day for that which, unless it exercised direct political control from day to day, it could not possibly assume the responsibility.

There is another consideration, too. This system is in daily competition with the greatest railway system in the world, the Canadian Pacific railway, a system with a mileage somewhat less than ours, but which, in the various activities that come under it and in the immensity of its operations, is as yet the greater; a system perhaps the best managed of any very great business enterprise in the world to-day. Now, our system is in competition with that system. In the great body of its activities, it must, in order to have work to do, in order to get a paying business, perform services in competition with the Canadian Pacific Railway system. I want to put it to this House: how is the Canadian National Railway directorate going to make a success in that fight for business, going to make a success of its efforts to compete with the Canadian Pacific, if every day it is subject to having every action of the board of directors and of its agents and officers disclosed to the public and to its competitor while on the other hand the competitor need disclose nothing at all?

In that connection, the hon. gentleman has said: Unless you are ready, in some form or other, to bring down all the information concerning the operation of the road—and I am good enough, he says, not to tell you the form in which it should be brought down; I do not know what difference the form makes; if it has to come down it has to come down and this is the only way to get it down—unless you do as you did with the Intercolonial, answer in the House for, and expose to Parliament, every detail of operation, then the system will be generally suspected in the public mind as being merely a great instrument or engine of political patronage. That is the only way, he says, in which you can preserve this road from the suspicion of being a politically controlled organization. Well now, is that the fact? The Canadian Pacific Railway Company would refuse to any man or to any parliament the disclosure of business that is its own; it knows that it cannot conduct the administration of that great enterprise and at the same time disclose to everybody just what it is doing from time to time. Not that what it is doing is wrong, but every business enterprise knows that it is impossible successfully to conduct a business, impossible to get the advantages which every business must get if it is to succeed, if everybody doing business with that enterprise and the public generally is to know all its moves on all parts of the chess board from morning till night and from day to day. But because the Canadian Pacific does not have to do that, is it shrouded in mystery? Not at all. Why should it be shrouded in mystery any more than any other business? Why should the Canadian National Railway system be shrouded in mystery any more than any other road? Or why should it be enveloped with the suspicion that because it conducts its affairs in the way any other enterprise must conduct its affairs, it is merely an engine of political patronage? Again is that the fact? The hon. member reads from a newspaper—a newspaper which, I regret to say, though quite within its right, has always opposed the absorption by the Government of these roads, notwithstanding the fact that no thinkable alternative presented itself except the one we adopted; a newspaper which doubtless still takes that attitude. But has the hon. member brought anything forward to support the conclusion arrived at by that newspaper? What is there in the way of evidence that the Canadian National directorate are to-day merely the spokesmen, the instruments of this Government for political purposes? Everything in the way of evidence shows exactly the contrary. The manager of that system is on record time and again, the last time not later than a few weeks ago, as saying that from the hour that he took control of that system as manager there has not been an effort or the shadow of an effort to influence him politically one way or the other. Whatever may have been the success of that system under Mr. Hanna and the board of directors that now control, one thing is certain, that nothing in the way of failure can be attributed to influence brought to bear by this Government or by this Parliament. The Government has given them every opportunity to make the road succeed under the business conditions that prevailed. There has been no political control; there has been no patronage of any sort. No one connected with the road, from the bottom to the top; no one on that directorate, would to-day say that there has been any attempt whatever to influence him or to influence the directorate in the control that we said in the first place would be theirs if they took the responsibility of managing the system. Consequently, there is nothing whatever in the contention—I care not from what source it comes, whether from Montreal, from Toronto, or from anywhere else in this Dominion; whether from low or high estates—there is nothing in the contention and nothing whatever in the suspicion, nor does the suspicion generally exist, that there has been anything in the way of political interference with the management of the Canadian National Railways.

I think it will be obvious that if the Canadian National directorate are to be compelled to answer to resolutions, which by the dozen may be put upon the Order Paper of this House every day, calling for copies of correspondence, for the disclosure of every fact and of every deed connected with the operation of the road, they will be put under a disability that their great competitor is not under at all. Should we do that they might well say: You shackle us in the management of the road; you refuse to give us that latitude and freedom of management that every successful business must have; you therefore will have to take the responsibility of failure—we do not. That would be the position they would logically assume. I venture to say that no board of directors, no president and general manager who would be big enough for the tremendous task of operating that system to-day, would undertake to assume such responsibility under conditions that would be brought about were this amendment to be adopted.

I am quite aware that there is to be said from the other standpoint much that is plausible and much that is more or less difficult to answer. I know that it is a fact that the board of directors of the Canadian National railways are dealing virtually with the funds of the people of Canada. I know that Parliament, and Parliament alone, is responsible to the people for the disposition of the moneys raised by taxation; consequently I know that there must be ample facility for the exercise of the control that goes with and is inseparable from responsibility. The difficulty has been to envolve a line up to which you can go in disclosing to Parliament the affairs of the system and beyond which you cannot go if the system is to succeed. Just where that is to be it is very difficult indeed to say. We have brought down certain particulars in relation to the management of the road. Some questions have been answered where it appeared to the Government quite certain that the answering of them or the furnishing of the return to an order of the House could not prejudice the position of the company. I do not think that as yet any very clear principle has been evolved. It is true that the report of the board of directors comes down from year to year, and it is true that that shows what the board of directors of a private system discloses to its shareholders. I do not know that it is impossible to go further than that; I would not like to assert that it is wholly impossible. I know there must be such information at some time as will enable Parliament properly to judge as to the general management of the sytsem and to say whether or not the board of directors that we have put in charge have, in the main, properly discharged the responsibility placed upon them. That information must be given; but if this resolution passes, it is certain that much that is unfortunate will happen, but very improbable that what is most desirable will actually result. This resolution means simply a return to the old system of political control; it stops nowhere short of that end. Pass this resolution, and you put the system under political control. What is to be done? It has occurred to me that if Parliament set to work, say, through a committee of this House, to study this specific question in order to evolve some rule that could be followed, looking to the discharge of the obligations of Parliament, it would likely result in something definite and concrete. That committee could bring before them those who have to do with the operation of the system, the officers of the road, the president of the road, and if they so desired, touching the subject committed to them they could bring as well officers of the competing road or of other business enterprises of this country. Having done so, they would clearly see just what it would be impossible to do, and I think likely they would be able to evolve something that it would be possible to do, and that would be amply sufficient to put Parliament in possession of all the information that Parliament would require to come to an intelligent decision on those issues that Parliament alone can decide. It is said: "This resolution states that anything of a confidential nature need not be brought down, but that everything that is not confidential must be brought down." What is there that in its nature is confidential?

For example, suppose the Canadian National railways has been engaged, as it is, in the purchase of coal; suppose it buys at one price at one point and at another price at another. Its competitor does that. Now, it takes twenty cents out of every dollar of the earnings of the road to pay for its coal, so coal is a great factor. Its competitor is able to buy just as cheaply as it may at that point or at this. At some points its competitor can get its coal cheaper than at others. If the Canadian National Railways is to compete on anything like even terms with its competitor, it must be able to do the same.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Is there any duty on coal used on the railways in this country?

Mr. MEIGHEN: 53 cents a ton. In the West they are using Alberta coal.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): Will the Prime Minister say that the price of coal is not public property at every point in Canada where coal is sold? Is the price not known to everybody?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am informed very definitely that it is not, and I think that will be the conclusion of the committee if one is appointed. Under the old system, though, that was the case; the very fact that the disclosures had to be made to Parliament from day to day resulted in the system having to pay the very same, and that meant the very highest, price at every point all along the system. It is possible, if we pay the price, to do that with the Canadian National Railways. Put it under political control, and that is one result that is going to occur. But that does not put it in a position to compete with the Canadian Pacific, or to conduct its enterprise with those attributes of success which are the property of every business enterprise that gets along at all. That is only an illustration; but could it be said that the price of coal or the correspondence relating ot the purchase of coal is a confidential matter? There is nothing confidential about it that does not appertain to virtually every matter connected with the operation of the road. Therefore, the reservation that is embodied in the resolution is no reservation at all; That reservation would not protect the resolution, because it would not protect the system; it would not allow to the system anything at all of the latitude it must have, unless it is to be so shackled and bound down that a success cannot be made of it. Consequently, it seems to me impossible that the resolution, as drawn, can be accepted. I need not refer to the obvious fact that, moved in amendment to Supply and particularly moved as it was by the leader of the Opposition in terms of criticism of the course which the Government has pursued in this regard, it is a motion of want of confidence as well.

I want to say this as well in relation to it. The senior hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) has on the Order Paper, if I am in order in referring to it, a resolution in which he calls upon the House to establish a Select Standing Committee on Canadian National Railways and Shipping. That resolution has not yet come up for discussion. It has been suggested—and the suggestion appears to me to be one well worthy of sympathetic consideration, that when the resolution comes up, it might be well for the House to consider whether or not the first duty with which that committee, if it is appointed, should be charged, should be the determination of this very subject that is launched in the resolution now before the House. I think I have said enough to convince hon. members on both sides, especially hon. members who have had to do with business matters, and particularly in connection with great business undertakings, with such closeness as to make them see what is going to result if the resolution passes, that a resolution in such terms cannot receive the favour of Parliament, because the carrying of it out is a reversal of the policy which this Parliament has adopted; it is a reversion to a policy which, applicable to one very small system, failed, and which, applicable to a system of the immensity of that which we are now responsible for, must result in little less than chaos.

Mr. CRERAR: The leader of the Government (Mr. Meighen) has referred to a resolution standing on the Order Paper in the name of the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean). That resolution is considerably down on the Order Paper and, in the ordinary course of events, it might not be reached. Might I ask my right hon. friend if he will give an opportunity for the discussion of that resolution so that it may be considered?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have, of course, no right to postpone the time of any member in relation to his deciding when he will move a resolution standing in his name; but the Government would be pleased if this resolution came on to-morrow.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): Mr. Speaker, the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) is, in one sense, like a lady's letter, the pith of which is generally found in the postscript. I find that my right hon. friend, while arguing for a time in the spirit of what I suppose he thought was sweet reasonableness on the merits of this question, a moment or two before he sat down suddenly cracked the party whip and said: "This is a vote of non-confidence." If my right hon. friend had felt strong on other grounds, he would not have introduced that at the last moment. A motion of this character is only a vote of non-confidence when the Government sees fit to treat it so. It is quite possible, I understand, in our Parliamentary institutions, to present a motion of this kind which will not be a motion of non-confidence and which should not be treated as such. There are many precedents, if time permitted one to cite them, in which motions made in amendment to Supply are accepted by the Government because they assert some sound proposition which the Government do not wish to oppose. There have been many such cases. In my own experience as Minister of Finance I have voted for amendments moved to Supply, if my memory is not mistaken, and I think myself that when my right hon. friend insists on making this a party issue he is not acting wisely. I would personally have been very much better pleased if he had said: "Why, this asserts one of the first principles of free parliamentary government, and I am going to accept it and stand by it." That, I think, would have been the wiser policy, rather than to have told his friends that they must vote against the amendment because it is to be deemed a vote of want of confidence. There is unfortunately a tendency in parliamentary government, perhaps everywhere in these modern times, to move perhaps towards autocracy. It is complained even in England to-day, in the Mother of Parliaments to which we look for guidance and direction, that there is a tendency for the government there to take to itself too much power and make members of parliament, even those supporting the government, feel that after all there is not very much for them to do. If that tendency exists there, certainly it exists in a more marked degree in Canada. It has been a just cause of complaint that hon. gentlemen opposite have again and again resorted to government which ignores parliament. I do not want to go back to the days of the war. They had to do many things then by Order in Council which I approved of, and I am not censuring them for that. But in these days the tendency of this Government from day to day is to undertake to do things and be absolutely indifferent as to what Parliament thinks about it. Why, the right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) comes here to-day and tells us that he has made a treaty with France. He has not told us up to this very moment the exact terms of the treaty, he has not even told us who signed it, except that he signed it himself. Then, a little later, he said that it was customary to do these things through the British Embassy, but we do noe even know whether the British Ambassador signed it. My right hon. friend coolly tells us that he will bring down a document which he thinks will be something like the treaty, and lay it on the Table, and in the meantime he is going to put the treaty into operation at once. That is the way hon. gentlemen opposite treat Parliament. That has not been the custom in the past, and every hon. gentleman in this House, no matter on what side he sits, should resent such a tendency, and show his disapproval of the growing autocracy of the Government.

We had another case in connection with the luxury taxes. This House spent many days, and properly so, in assisting my hon. friend the Minister of Finance to prepare a system of luxury taxes;—I am not criticising his bringing down those taxes, but I say we spent a great deal of time considering them. He received the help of Parliament; there was no adverse criticism; on all sides he was helped. Then one day in the middle of the Christmas season he coolly steps in, and by Order in Council abolishes the tax. We are always told about Christmas time that we ought to buy early. The shopmen say they hope we will buy early, that we should have regard for the hard-working clerks, and that it is to our own advantage to have a large field to select from. All wise men, I suppose—and that would include members of parliament and their families—observe that principle and buy early. Last Christmas, after they had made their purchases, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance stepped in at the eleventh hour and abolished the tax; so the late comers did not have to pay the tax at all. It is undoubtedly the right of the Governor in Council to reduce taxation, while they have not the power to increase it, but I question the wisdom of a sweeping change of that kind made by Order in Council, even in the direction of reducing taxation.

These are illustrations, I say, of the tendency of this Government to play the part of the autocrat and to ignore Parliament, and never have they ignored Parliament in a way that was more open to criticism than in the case that was presented to-day when with respect to the great railway service of this country, involving an admitted loss last year of $70,000,000, we were told we have no right to ask for information, for that is really what it means. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister said that if we had all these details, Parliament never could attend to them, the time of Parliament would not permit. That would have some force if the right hon. gentleman were right in his assumption that all these details were going to be brought before Parliament. We have the right to-day to bring all the details of the Department of Public Works, for examples, before Parliament, but nobody does it. There is here and there a case in which information is asked for and brought down but we do not burden Parliament with all the details of the Department of Public Works. It is the same with the Department of the Interior, a large department that spends great sums of money; we have the right to ask for all the details in connection with that department, but we do not do it; we ask only for certain details on matters of prominence, matters which have been questioned by somebody, or matters of particular concern to some section of the country; and we get the information. If we were to carry out with respect to all the departments what the right hon. gentleman implies we are trying to do with regard to the railways, we could not carry on business at all. My right hon. friend raises this ghost of massed details which we could not handle when he knows perfectly well that if we had the right to get all these railway documents we would not demand the full details at all. What is the difference, as a matter of principle, between the details of the Department of Public Works or the Department of the Interior and the details of the railways? I have not seen any explanation of that. If we have the right to ask the Government to lay on the Table a return in regard to an expenditure in the Department of Public Works, or the Department of Militia and Defence, or the Department of the Interior, by what principle can it be wrong if we ask for similar information regarding the railways of Canada? The only difference is this: In the one case they are spending a good deal of money, but in the case of the railways they are spending such tremendous sums that they are getting beyond the comprehension of the people of Canada, and we are practically told by the right hon. gentleman that with regard to this immense railway business we have only one privilege and that is to step up to the captain's office and settle when the Minister of Railways tells us he is $70,000,000 behind. That is the position to which he would reduce Parliament. He will not permit us to get any information, but we can have the glorious privilege of paying at the end of the term. My right hon. friend takes exception to our reservation. The reservation is made in conformity with the general principle we desire to assert. It should be a simply elementary principle in this House that Parliament has the right to demand and receive the public documents in relation to every dollar of public money expended, no matter how expended. My right hon. friend says that that would be making politics of the railways. I do not see what ground there is for that. I do not want to discuss the principle of public ownership; there are some things we ought to discuss to-day,—and some things we had better lay aside for a later date; there are some things we ought to discuss and some we ought not. We are not called upon to-day to discuss the general principle of public ownership. We are not called upon to-day to discuss the wisdom of appointing a committee to deal with the railways; that is on the Order Paper and we will reach it in due course. We are only called upon to consider this one question: Is it the right of the representatives of the Canadian people in Parliament assembled to receive an accounting of every dollar of public money that is spent from the treasury? That is the principle; that is all the principle. But "Oh", they say, "this is going to make politics of the railways." Sir, there are different kinds of politics. Politics is not necessarily a mean business; politics is the business of the people, and, using the word in its proper sense, I want to see politics in connection with every administration of the public affairs of Canada. It is not going to frighten us to say that this will make politics out of the railways. Wherever you have a dollar of public money expended, in connection with that you will have politics, using the word in its proper sense; and any attempt that is made to withdraw that expenditure from what you call politics means to withdraw it from the consideration of Parliament and to deny yourselves the criticism of the public expenditure, which is the first and most essential right of the Parliament of Canada. I shall not be afraid of politics of that kind, and if, as my hon. friend apprehends, we shall have it, then I say the more of that sort of politics we have the better it will be for the country. You cannot, Mr. Speaker, take these roads out of politics,—using the word, of course, in its better sense. Politics, I say, when it means the safeguarding of the rights of the people and the proper care of their business, is desirable, and wherever you have the expenditure of the people's money, you should of necessity have politics in that better sense, which means the right to inquire into matters and to be given information as to how public moneys are expended.

I do not desire to discuss the principle of public ownership to-day. It is not in issue at all. But I am going to make this statement concerning that question, that if public ownership can be maintained only by a policy of secrecy; if it can be carried on only by suppressing from Parliament the information to which the people, through their representatives, are unquestionably entitled; if it can exist only by the practice of dark-lantern methods, then I say unhesitatingly that that is enough to condemn it. Why, says the right hon. gentleman, you cannot make these things public. Nonsense! In nineteen cases out of twenty, what my right hon. friend describes as a mystery is nothing but a dream. He declares that dreadful things would happen with regard to coal if disclosures were made. Well, the Intercolonial bought coal for a great many years, and for a time I had something to do with that matter when acting minister of the department. I know the tendency of the coal people to get good prices, and in that respect, let me say, they do not differ from people in other lines of business. But that is a question which you can always meet. And when there was a combination of the coal companies it was always in the power of the Government to overcome that situation and get coal at a fair price. What prices do we pay to-day? Why, Mr. Speaker, who thinks that we are going to get coal cheaper by hiding in the dark and pretending that we are going to pay less for it than is demanded? And there is no mystery about the rates. The rates, which concern the public, are fixed by the Railway Commission; and the purchase of coal, as well as of various other supplies, presents no more difficulty to the Railway Department than the purchase of supplies does to my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works. There is not a single argument advanced to support the supression of information on this subject which would not apply quite as well to the suppression of information regarding the Department of the Interior or the Department of Militia and Defence, or of any other department of Government. The principle should be recognized in this instance, as well as in every other, that the people have a right to the fullest possible information on matters so vitally affecting their interests, and if my right hon. friend pretends that you cannot carry on business in that way; if he cannot conduct affairs without recourse to this secrecy; if he is going to build up a system of public ownership based on the suppression of facts and the refusal to inform the people of matters in which they are greatly concerned;—if public ownership is to be carried on in this way, then I say that every man interested in the question should stand up to-day and demand that the whole system be brought into the light of day and that things be properly done. Let us confine ourselves to the point under consideration. We are not considering the principle of public owernership or the appointing of a committee, or the probability of any vote of want of confidence; let us ignore all these herrings drawn across the trail and recognize the one fact that in this motion we are dealing with the right of the Parliament of Canada to be fully informed regarding the expenditure of the people's money. That is the question upon which this House is asked to vote.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): If we were considering this question in the light of an ordinary department of Government, then frankly, at once, I should have no hesitation whatever in supporting the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition. But it does seem to me that this question is not at the present time in the category of an ordinary department of Government. It is a time-honoured principle, universally recognized in British Parliaments, that in the matter of departmental expenditures the people have the right to the fullest and most complete information regarding the details of expenditures. But when that principle was first adopted, or put into practice, it was under conditions where the whole expenditure was outgoing and there was no corresponding income. Now we are faced with a different situation. I quite agree with my hon. friends that this is not a proper time to discuss the principle of public ownership. In view of the statement presented by the Minister of Railways the other day, what this House has under consideration now is the question, how we can best handle a difficult, perplexing and very discouraging situation. Now, there is a great deal of force, I think, in the argument advanced by my right hon. friend who leads the Government (Mr. Meighen). If we take the stand that every detail of expenditure in connection with our national railways shall be placed before the House at the wish of any hon. member, in what position do we place the management of our national system of railways in competition with, for instance, the Canadian Pacific Railway? It is an elementary principle of business that a good business man, one who conducts his affairs successfully, never discloses the full and intimate details of his business to his competitors; and it does seem to me that that is the position in which we should be placing ourselves if we adopted the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition. At all events, the Government, as I interpret the amendment, would be committed to bring down any information that was asked for, saving such information as might be of a purely confidential character. Now, information of a purely confidential character in connection with the administration of our railways would probably be confined to a very narrow field. At the same time, however, I recognize that the people have to foot the bills in connection with the deficits on these roads, and that does place upon Parliament, in connection with the administration of the national railways, a responsibility which we cannot evade. The whole question is one filled with difficulty at the present time. In my judgment it is one that should be approached in a spirit free from any taint of partisanship, and for that reason I am quite in accord with the suggestion, as I understood it, that came from the Prime Minister that a special committee selected from the House, should take into its consideration the whole scheme of operations of the railways, and all matters that might be submitted to the House in the interests of efficiency and success in the management of the roads. We have on the Order Paper, as my hon. friend has pointed out, a resolution to be moved by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean). Now, it does seem to me that the spirit of that resolution is the best approach to the consideration of the question at the present time. If we are going to discuss in a partisan way across the floor of the House the success or failure in the management of these railways, attributing blame here, finding fault there, defending in one place and explaining in another, how much progress shall we make towards a satisfactory and sensible solution of the question? I, for one, Mr. Speaker, am profoundly anxious to see the consideration of this difficult problem removed, if possible, to the atmosphere of the committee room. I have observed in my experience in this House that when hon. members consider questions in committee, we can get a clearer and fairer consideration, a more intimate discussion, and a more unprejudiced exploration into the facts of a case, than we can possibly obtain in the House, where it is natural for us to divide according, shall I say, to our party views upon any matter. And this being a perplexing question, a question fraught with great difficulty and involving immense consequences to the country, I for one should like to see us approach the consideration of it at the present time without any partisanship.

Now I am quite free to say that I am in hearty accord with my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) when he states that this should not be regarded as a motion of want of confidence in the Government. Let me say at once that if I considered it purely a motion of want of confidence, I could not vote confidence in the Government. But I do not consider it as such. I am endeavouring to approach this question from the point of view of what will afford, or offer, the most satisfactory solution of it. In what way can we approach the question and discuss and consider it, free from partizanship, that will afford the greatest possibility of finding a satisfactory solution for the difficulties we are in in connection with it? For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I shall feel bound to vote against the amendment of the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. gentleman has intimated to the House that he is favourable to the resolution standing in the name of my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean) which is that these matters might be referred to a select committee. Is it my hon. friend's understanding in that connection that such a committee shall have the right to ask any question with respect to these railways that may be thought in the public interest and have it answered?

Mr. CRERAR: If I am in order in answering the question, Mr. Speaker, I would say that I certainly think so. In that connection I may add that such a committee could bring the president or the management of the road before them, and secure intimate and direct information in a way that cannot be secured when a motion is made asking that an ordinary return be brought down to the House. In that way you can explore the whole situation, you can get full information, you can have the opportunity of estimating the efficiency and the ability of the management of these roads in a way that is not at all possible by moving for the production of correspondence regarding the purchase of coal, the selection of a station site, the purchase of lumber, or anything else. It certainly does seem to me that this is the sensible manner in which to approach this proposition.

Mr. FRANK S. CAHILL (Pontiac): I would advise the Prime Minister to peruse the report in regard to the railway situation presented the other day by the Minister of Railways. The Prime Minister this afternoon talked of success as though the government railway undertakings were a success. As a matter of fact, the people are called upon to pay the sum of $70,000,000 for a failure not for a success. The right hon. gentleman also advanced the argument against the amendment that information with respect to the national railways could not be brought before Parliament in the regular way. Now, I understand that the Intercolonial and the Transcontinental railways are subject to audit by the Auditor General's department. I would ask the Minister of Railways if that is not correct?

Hon. Mr. REID: They are subject to audit by the Auditor General's department, but I may say for the information of the House that the Intercolonial and the Transcontinental railways are being managed by the Board of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. CAHILL: That is my understanding. So it is a fact that all expenditures on the Government railways, outside of the Canadian Northern, are subject to audit by the Auditor General's department. I would like to draw the attention of the leader of the Agrarian party to this fact. I learn by the report presented by the minister on March 17 that operating deficits on the Canadian Government railways increased thirty-eight per cent, and operating deficits on the Canadian Northern increased 151 per cent. Now the Government railways still subject to the audit of the Auditor General's department consist of about one-third of the total mileage of what my hon. friend wishes to call the Canadian National railways. That one-third of the total system makes a better showing because its accounts are submitted to the Auditor General's department. My hon. friend, I think, does not get the point.

Mr. CRERAR: Oh, yes, I get it.

Mr. CAHILL: One-third of the system at the present time, that is the Intercolonial and the National Transcontinental Railways, are subject to the audit of the Auditor General's Department, and the deficit on that one-third increased, according to the minister's statement, by 38 per cent, while the deficit on the remainder of the government system, under the dark-lantern method as conducted in Toronto, increased by 151 per cent. That would naturally indicate that there must be some information that should be brought to the attention of Parliament. If one-third of the system, operated under the old method, shows better results than the railways operated under the new method, it would be natural for members to inquire into the cause. For that reason we should have questions in reference to the government railways answered in Parliament. The Prime Minister in discussing the old method of management on the Intercolonial deplored the conditions under that method. I have the report of the Department of Railways for the year ending March 31st, 1920, and it shows—

Hon. Mr. REID: What page are you quoting from?

Mr. CAHILL: Page 103. My hon. friend will find by a reference to that part of the report that the operating deficits in the year 1912 amounted to, in round figures, $40,000; in 1913, to $47,000; in 1914, to $160,000; in 1915, to $330,000; in 1916, to $450,000. Then the new method of management was introduced and in the following year the operating deficit was $1,200,000. The following year it was $6,000,000; in 1919, $5,800,000; and in 1920, $6,800,000. So I do not see that the old method of operation was so very bad, so far as results go, compared with the present method; the expenditures now are three, four and five times greater than they were under the old method. It is just possible that a part of this deficit is due to bad management without control. It is just possible that if the management were responsible to Parliament a better system would be followed, and that they would be more careful in their expenditures.

As to secrets in connection with the operation of the Canadian National Railways I do not believe there is one thing that goes on in connection with that operation from one end of Canada to the other that the Canadian Pacific are not familiar with twenty-four hours after it goes into effect. Let us consider the operation of trains on the Grand Trunk Pacific between Winnipeg and Saskatoon. They have a train leaving Winnipeg at six o'clock in the evening, and another one leaving at nine o'clock, three hours later, and both trains arrive at Saskatoon within an hour of each other. How are the management fooling the Canadian Pacific in that regard? Why, the Canadian Pacific know what bad business it is to have two first-class trains arriving at Saskatoon one almost on top of the other. The management of the Government Railways are not fooling any person by that class of methods. Neither do they fool any person in the matter of the purchase of their ties. The Canadian Pacific go into the market to buy their ties, so do the Canadian Northern and the same with the rest of the national railways. There is nothing to be gained, but very much to be lost by this method of secrecy. Yesterday I thought when the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) came in with the fore-runner of his resignation that he would not have been here to-day to continue this discussion. The hon. minister said to us that he had no solution, and that he would like the co-operation of Parliament. The Government through the minister, is responsible for the administration of the affairs of the Canadian National Railways. They come to Parliament year after year asking on an average for over $100,000,000 annually to sink in this undertaking. The minister says that he has no hope of any better prospects for this railway system. Under those circumstances the logical thing would be for the minister to hand in his resignation, and for the Prime Minister to accept it. But under existing conditions the leader of the Government could not replace him, for there is no constituency that he dare open; therefore the minister is left to muddle along in the same old way. He has no solution, the Government has no solution. There is only one solution, and that is the resignation of the Government. If they acknowledge their inability to deal with matters coming before them, they should resign; and if the succeeding administration are not able to cope with the problems of government they in turn should resign, until finally we do get men who are able to administer the affairs of the country in a businesslike way. Otherwise government is a farce; it does not mean anything. The members of this administration acknowledge that they cannot handle the questions coming before them for solution, yet they hang on to office for dear life.

My hon. friend in his wonderful statement the other day gave some more or less inaccurate details. At page of 1052 of Hansard he stated:

> In a word, out of every dollar earned we had to pay 75 cents for operating wages, and 20 cents for fuel, leaving 5 cents for all other requirements which totalled 29 cents.

The minister was referring to 1920. I am quite satisfied that his statement is accurate, because he took good care to read it, and I am sure he had some assistance in the preparation of it. Now, if he will turn to the report of the department of Railways and Canals for the year ended March 31, 1920, he will find this sentence on page 19:

> It is of interest to note that for every dollar earned in the last year the railway had to pay out over 75 cents in wages.

That was in 1919. Now, the minister comes down here and tells us that in 1920 he had to pay 75 cents in wages, and he proceeded to show by implication that the increase in wages is at the root of all the trouble. He stated:

> Rate increases have been given from time to time in an effort to meet increased cost of operation under the McAdoo and United States Labour Board awards, under which the average wage per employee of the Canadian National system in now $1,850 as compared with $700 before the war. The result is the operating pay roll last year was $83,505,072 as compared with $40,606,170 in 1917.

That would lead the public to believe that there had been an enormous increase in wages. Well, if my hon. friend will turn back to page 11, of his annual report for 1919, he will find, under the heading of Wage Increases that the total wages paid in 1919 were $73,000,000. So that the total wage increase, acording to his own statement, is only $10,000,000. And on top of that is given a table of the number of employees on the road, showing that they have been increased by 3442. According to his own statement the average wages would amount to more than $6,000,000, so that the employees of 1920 apparently are only getting about $4,000,000 more than they did in 1919, which is not a very great difference. But his operating deficit has increased $12,000,000; his earnings have increased $13,000,000, leaving a difference of $25,000,000 in that item. There is only from $4,000,000 to $10,000,000 taken up in wages, and yet my hon. friend would attempt to lead the country to believe that the whole difficulty is caused by excessive wages.

Now, we have asked from time to time for particulars, and we have also asked to be informed of the policy of the Government. This afternoon the Prime Minister said that the Government was responsible for the management. I agree with him. There is no question about that; the Government must be responsible. But his general manager on the question of rates said just a few weeks ago, as reported in the Pembroke Observer of February 3:

I made this statement, that if you would give us in Canada the same rate as South Australia (I am speaking of the whole National system) I will pay 5½ per cent on the Government debt of 2½ billion dollars and 5½ per cent on another billion dollars, and then I shall have 100 million dollars to spare to play with.

Mr. CURRIE: Who said that?

Mr. CAHILL: Mr. Hanna, the general manager. He advocates an increase of three times the rate.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I do not rise for the express purpose of interrupting the hon. member who is now speaking, but to draw the attention of the House to the fact that when an amendment has been made to a motion that Mr. Speaker do leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Supply, the discussion must be strictly relevant to the amendment until it has been voted upon or otherwise disposed of. The amendment presented by the hon. leader of the Opposition declares, that it is the undoubted right of Parliament to demand and receive copies of all reports, correspondence and papers in relation to the management of every department of the public service, including the affairs of the Canadian National railways. In my opinion this amendment does not open the door sufficiently wide to enable hon. members to discuss in detail the administration of the Canadian National railways.

Mr. CAHILL: Mr. Speaker, I was just going to point out that there must have been some correspondence between the minister and his general manager on this subject of rates, although there is this apparent conflict between them. It is all in line with our argument asking for information. The general manager makes one statement, the minister makes another. We want to have particulars of the correspondence between them. In his statement the other day the minister said:

It is impossible for British Columbia to grow and ship fruit and lumber at the present high rates of freight. The Prairie Provinces must live from the products of the soil. They cannot produce wheat and other products of their farms and ship it to foreign markets if these high freight rates are to continue indefinitely.

The minister apparently is in favour of decreased rates; his manager apparently is in favour of increasing them threefold. I merely point this out to show the necessity for giving members of this House some information on which to base a fair judgment on the operation of this railway system. It is impossible to arrive at any conclusions if the ministry insist that they cannot give us information from day to day. I do not think there has been any question put on the Order Paper asking for information that could be considered as strictly confidential, but the minister has replied day after day with his usual stereotyped form that in regard to this service it is not in the public interest to furnish the information desired. I think the Government would be well advised, at this time, when the people are looking to them for a solution of this railway problem, to take the House into their confidence in every detail of the operation of our national railways and to give us the fullest information possible.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, in saying a very few words upon the resolution before the House I should desire very much to avoid what I am bound to call the unwonted heat of my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). That unwonted heat seemed to me to go so far as to blur my hon. friend's memory. He declaimed against the dragging of red herrings into the discussion, and he himself did a good deal in the way of dragging red herrings in—amongst others, the luxury taxes, which had no immediate connection with an amendment regarding railways on going into Committee of Supply. His memory in regard to the luxury taxes, I am quite sure, is not the same as that of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), when he says that no adverse criticism was offered to the luxury taxes at the time of their introduction. My recollection is that a good many hon. gentlemen sitting very close to the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's passed a good many criticisms upon those taxes. I was under the impression that I had criticised them somewhat myself. Now, I object to the proposition that is put forward by my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's that every view not consonant with his on either the railway question or any other question is a "red herring." We must all have the right to express ourselves honestly and sincerely on various public questions that arise.

On first sight there seems to be a good deal in the contention of my hon. friend who leads the official Opposition that the Government have brought this motion on themselves because through their Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) the other day they appealed to every member of the House for assistance in the solution of the railway question. It would appear to be a little difficult to give full assistance without full information, but that is only at first sight. A great many general considerations in regard to the management of railroads can surely be discussed in this House that the accounts in regard to the railroad have no bearing upon whatsoever. Apart from that, however, I do not know that my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition offered any argument, except perhaps the old argument that Parliament ought to have full control of the money affairs of the departments of the Government. There is the crux of the whole question. These railroads, for better or for worse, were taken out of the hands of a government department and put under corporate management. I think that the motion of the leader of the Opposition is, to say the least, premature, having regard to the fact that, in the first place, we are going to have at a very early day a general discussion, I understand, upon railroad matters following the statement of the Minister of Railways; and, in the second place, that the tendency of the resolution before the House this afternoon is to prejudge the whole question of Government ownership and damage the experiment of this country in that direction.

5 p.m.

I should have thought that before bringing up what I have ventured to call this premature resolution the mover of it would have had some information to give the House as to what is done in regard to roads managed by the government in other nations of the Empire and in other nations of the world. No information of that kind has been given either by the hon. leader of the Opposition, or by my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's. All that was contained in either speech was a general statement of principle with which everyone in this House agrees—the principle that government departments in their expenditure should be supervised by Parliament. Now, I am not in a position to give the information about what is done in other countries where government ownership has been adopted, but I am trying to put the case that this motion is premature and meant to damage government ownership, and I judge that that view is supported strongly by the source from which the motion comes.

[Mr. Clark.]

I think my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) gave a view to the House that was very strong and very much calculated to impress people who are impartial upon this subject. It had an evident effect upon my hon. leader (Mr. Crerar). If all the information usually kept by a business company from a competing company is to be given by the officials of the government road to the officials of a private road which is in competition with it, is it not obvious that the government road is at once put in a position of disadvantage as compared with the competing road? I think that there is no getting away from that proposition. But the ground I want to take is simply this: that Government ownership was undertaken under financial conditions with regard to these roads that bristled with difficulty and that certainly were not the creation of any one party in the state and certainly not specially the creation of the party at present sitting opposite to me in this House. I want to impress this further consideration: that confronted with these difficulties the nation, through its Parliament, has made a new departure on a colossal scale, and if that departure is to be successful it must have a reasonable chance, it must have common justice meted out to it. Therefore I consider that the resolution before the House is premature and not supported by the information which we should have had before it was brought up at all.

I distrust any attitude on this great question which is obviously born in an atmosphere of suspicion. I prefer very much to approach this question in the spirit of the helpfulness and co-operation which are absolutely necessary not only among the various political parties in this country, but among the people of this country, if we are to make this great railway system the success which we have faith enough in Canada to believe it can be made.

Now, I would not like to use stronger language than I can justify, but what is the meaning of the talk about "dark lanterns" in this connection? One would suppose that every hon. member who does not jump up in a state of great heat and support a resolution brought at very short notice before this House has burglarious intentions upon the assets and the good things of this country. That is the only attitude of mind which can dictate the use of such language as "dark lanterns". Personally I resent that suspicion as far as it pertains to myself. I have had no experience in burglary and I am not carrying a dark lantern. I am approaching what is the greatest public question of the day, I repeat, in a spirit of helpfulness and co-operation, and that spirit I shall maintain until I see better reasons to discard it than I have seen in anything that has been advanced this afternoon.

I do not think the question of parliamentary control of the public purse is, strictly speaking, germane to this discussion, or that it should weigh with any hon. member in giving his vote. This is a new departure. I do not say that, if Parliament is still sitting next year, I should not vote in a different way from what I do now upon this question. It may be that the committee that is to be appointed will disclose matters that will change our views. The hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) laughs at the idea that I might vote differently next year from the way I do now on a public question. That only shows his hide-bound partisanship and my openness of mind. They say that the man who never changes his mind has no mind to change, but I would not apply that for a moment to my hon. friend. I do not see that the principle of parliamentary control arises. We are facing a new departure. The Government, as far as I can see, have been open and above-board in their appeals upon this question. I have a firm conviction that the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen), who is a young man and who has a political future before him, is engaged in an honest, straightforward and sincere attempt to give this great question fair play, to give a fair trial to the principle of government ownership in regard to our railroads which had got into an intolerable mess and a condition of bankruptcy. As long as that is the spirit which animates my right hon. friend and his Government, he can rely upon my support.

Mr. F. L. DAVIS (Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, I can understand the difficulty of men who have seen an attempted cross between responsible government and co-operative management, and who have been in doubt which of the parents this hybrid creature most resembles. But I am not going to pursue that line of thought; I will simply say that it explains, perhaps, much of the confusion of mind in which many numbers of the House may rest.

I want to deal with just one side of the question. I am quite sure that the great solution of our trouble is in economy; that the people of the country have not yet recognized the necessity for that economy. That can be effected only by a reduction of many train services from daily to tri-weekly or twice-a-week services. As regards taking trains off, the other day I went down to the commission and asked them for certain figures. I found that the train which runs from Moncton to Campbellton was earning about 52½ cents a mile one way and about 65 cents a mile the other way, whereas it costs $2.50 a mile to run a passenger train in this country. That train had been on for years running over a route on which two other trains ran. Are you going to ask this House to decide whether—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must direct the hon. gentleman's attention to the circumstance that the motion before the House, the amendment, has to do with the production of documents, and the question of the operation of the railways, as such, is really apart from the main question. There is, perhaps, no objection to a reference to the railways, but a discussion of the railway problem in general is certainly not the main subject.

Mr. DAVIS: I think, Sir, had you allowed me to finish, you would have seen the pertinence of the illustration, because that is all that I am making. That train has been on, as I said, for years. Are you going to submit to this House every decision of the management with regard to the taking off of a train or the making of economies? It is those particulars that the House would attempt to review rather than those which the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) presented this afternoon as to the purchase of coal or supplies, and the railway's dealings with individual customers. The House will take up cases where a train runs through, perhaps, three or four constituencies, and where the constituents are up in arms against what the management considers must be done for economy. Those constituents bring the case to Parliament, and it is a case of "You scratch my back and I'll scratch yours," to use a very vulgar expression. One member says, "I am going to have this very same trouble; support me, and I will support you." In other words, this is not the forum in which to consider such questions as that. Consequently, I say: Let us try out the question of co-operative management and see whether that will get results. I am very much in the position of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark). If that method does not succeed, I am prepared to change my mind about it, but I do not see any prospect of success at present by going out on the lines which we followed in connection with the Intercolonial and getting a repetition of the very evil results we got there.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I very much regret that the official leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) has not couched his amendment on sufficiently broad grounds, so the whole question of the administration of the public railways of this country could now be discussed. I realize clearly that the whole House is seized of the fact that the resolution has been placed before us more in a partizan than in a public spirit, and for that reason, I do not see that any member on this side of the House will have any difficulty in voting it down. It is extremely unfortunate, at this stage in the discussion of the railway question of this country, that we should start playing politics with it, because it is a great issue, and we are going to destroy this country entirely unless the wisest heads in this House on all sides get together and discuss this question soberly and honestly, as the leader of the Agrarian group (Mr. Crerar) has done to-day—give our best judgment and arrive at some conclusion. Because I must confess that, so far, I see nothing ahead but failure. I am one of the members of this House who were strongly in favour of bringing about the nationalization of our railways. I am in no sense a believer of communistic theories or of socialism. I believe, however, in Ruskinism. John Ruskin was the first to advance the theory of government control of public utilities. He went no further, and that far I am prepared to go. It is quite evident that it is not enough that we people who put up a few cheques for income tax can look around and say: "Well, we have contributed one-half, or one-fourth of the railway deficit." With all our trouble to contribute to the income tax, we contribute only about 50 per cent of the losses on the national railways. Something must be done. It is a matter of regret that this resolution was not broader so that we could discuss the whole question. The only thing that we can discuss in reality is the question of the production of papers. That resolution brings us back to the old control that we had before we took over the Canadian Northern, the Mackenzie and Mann road. I am not one of those who believe that the Intercolonial was badly managed under government control; the Intercolonial railway was well managed under government control. I have travelled upon it many a time, and I know that its trains were just as good as those on any road in America; even the New York Central or the Illinois Central did not have better trains or better service; they were not better managed. The road was in as good or in better condition than any other road at that time in the United States or Canada. As a matter of fact for many years until recently the railway has shown a profit on its operating expenses.

Now what are we going to do on this question? Are we going to sit back and twirl our thumbs and say there is nothing than can be done, and go back to the old idea of management and have all the old troubles? Or are we like sensible men going to discuss the question here dispassionately without regard to politics? This is a time I say when there is a great industrial war on, and we should all get together the same as we did when any other war was on. Unless we on both sides of the House divest ourselves of our partisan minds on this question, the people of this country are going to sweep out of this Parliament every man who plays politics on this grave issue; for the people look with horror upon these terrible deficits that the railroads are showing. I confess that under this resolution I cannot enter into any discussion as to what causes these deficits, the only thing I can say is that certain documents should or should not be brought down. The question of whether we should have a committee or not will be discussed under another resolution. The idea to my mind is a splendid one but I cannot give any reasons in favour of it under this narrow resolution that has been brought in to-day which is an extremely partisan one and was intended for partisan purposes. I expected that we were to have a broad resolution and a continuous debate over some days on this railway question when we could openly discuss everything in connection with the roads. This is no time to talk about autocracy. The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) says that we have autocracy in this Government. As a matter of fact while there may be a little bit too much autocracy in government, yet the members of this House have shown a self-denying spirit in the matter of railways, for we put this railway question entirely out of our hands. We have placed it in the hands of an independent body with a view to eliminating entirely parliamentary partisanship and patronage from the management. I say that was self-denial, the entire opposite of autocracy so far as we are concerned. Whether the question was approached by us in the proper way or not I cannot say. I do not quite agree—I did not at the time—with the method by which the Government put the railways in the control of this directorate. I pointed out at that time that it was a very great mistake for the Government of this country to sign a blank cheque to any Board of Directors in charge of any large work of that kind. I said it would prove fatal to government control of these roads if there was no supervision and that it was wrong in principle. At the same time I did not push the matter further, but the results have demonstrated that there is no control whatever over the management of this road. The directors who have been appointed do not control the management; they do not know what is going on there at all. It is entirely wrong to put a business man in charge of a railway enterprise. Of course, I know there are a lot of business men and professional men running all over the country who can tell you more about railways in five minutes than could Lord Shaughnessy, for instance; they know it all. I say this is a question for specialists in railroad operation. To my mind, the people who should have been put in charge of the road should have been the best expert operators in their particular line that could be found in America. We should have had on the Board the best specialist in freight traffic, the best specialist in passenger work, the best specialist in engineering, and so forth. If we did that, we should have exactly the same condition that prevails on the Pennsylvania road, and on the New York Central in New York state, two great systems that will compare with the Canadian system. These roads, instead of putting business men on their directorates and making them vice-presidents, appoint the men who know how to operate a road, and make them responsible to the shareholders. The idea of the guinea pig director so far as the management of large enterprises is concerned, this idea of putting rich men on the directorate, is entirely wrong and antiquated.

As I said, the question before us is whether or not we are going to revert to the old system. I agree with the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark); I have not made up my mind on any of these matters. I want to see the whole question discussed; I want to have the facts and the figures. It may be correct for us to vote for this resolution, but if we have all the facts before us, we may find out that it would be wrong to do so. For that reason, I intend to vote against the resolution, and I do not think there is anybody on this side of the House within sound of my voice but would agree that it would be dangerous for us to take any decided stand on this question until we have all the facts before us. The question is such a serious one that we must approach it with an entirely open mind, and give it our very best consideration. The best business minds in the House, the best legal talent, the best thinkers must give this matter their personal consideration, and we must approach the question without any party spirit at all. Otherwise, we are liable to lead this country into bankruptcy, and we are mighty close to it now.

As to what happens at a little railway station, well, I have had information handed to me about these railways that would shock hon. members. I have heard rumours of hundred-dollar doors being put on woodsheds and that sort of thing. I cannot say whether those rumours are true or not. I do not know whether our roads pay more for coal than they should or whether they take on three hundred men immediately after the Canadian Pacific dismissed them. But rumours of that kind are floating around, and I feel satisfied that the proper thing for this House to do—and the Prime Minister has hinted that he is going to do it—is to appoint a committee to go into this whole question and discuss it dispassionately without politics entering into it at all. Let a committee composed of the three groups in this House discuss the whole question, with power to call for witnesses and papers, and take evidence under oath; I am sure that a committee of that sort that went into the whole question thoroughly would reach a conclusion very easily. I have never seen a committee of the House fail to come to a wise conclusion, if left alone, on any great public question. Take the question of the soldiers' pensions. No country in the world has found a better solution of the pension question than has Canada, and it was largely due to the fact that there was a wide-open committee of members of both sides of the House which went into the whole question.

There is no doubt that there is a tremendous war on between the Government railway and the railway controlled by the Canadian Pacific shareholders and directors. It is a matter for very much regret, because if that war continues, it is going to pull both roads into the hole, and I think the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific are reaching that conclusion when we see the great fall there has been in the securities of that road. This is a condition that should not exist, because Canadian Pacific shares are one of our premier securities, and it should never be thought by the people of this country that we as a people or as members of Parliament have any idea of destroying the interest or undertaking of that large corporation. If any such a thing should occur it would be destructive to all our securities in this country. There is no doubt that there is a certain amount of jealousy and fighting between the officials of the two systems, and something should be done to stop it. I am satisfied, however, that the lesson has been learned by both managements, and that after we have had this matter thoroughly discussed by a committee of this House and the question has been fought out here, some sensible conclusion will be arrived at. This is a time when we should be more patriotic and desirous of helping our country than of keeping up the political war mind. The question is too serious. The deficits of these railways alone are as great, almost, as the total expenditure of the Government when I came into this House; and when I think of that fact I am shocked and appalled. People cannot think in these millions. We must get down to business. If there are too many trains running we must discontinue some of them, if there are too many men employed for the work to be done, we must make necessary reductions. I have considered the facts as disclosed by the Minister of Railways. The hon member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) seems to think the only test that can be applied to discover what is wrong in the railway system is the amount of the operating expenditures. The actual test is the cost per ton train mile. We have not reached that point in the argument and the figures have not been disclosed. The expense per train ton mile will doubtless show that the percentage of expenses this year are much greater than last year. If the tonnage has not gone up in proportion to the expenses but has rather gone down, then something must be wrong with the management, because if tonnage goes down and expenditure increases, it is obvious that we are employing too many men or spending too much money in the operation of the railways.

[Mr. Currie.]

Mr SPEAKER: I hope that hon. member will bring his remarks more closely to bear on the subject.

Mr. CURRIE: I shall do so, Mr. Speaker. I regret very much that the motion was not framed in wider terms, because I think there should be an open discussion in this House of the management of the railways. That, however, has not been done, and I can only say that I cannot see my way clear to vote for the resolution, and I think that any man of independent mind will reach the same conclusion.

Mr. L. J. GAUTHIER (St. Hyacinthe): I desire to go on record on the amendment of the leader of the Opposition. To my mind it serves no other purpose than to becloud the issue that faces the country to-day. Why is this resolution before the House? Public opinion, stirred up by the newspapers of the country in consequence of the statement delivered to the House by the Minister of Railways, is now in a frenzy of unrest. Is the motion a solution of the problem? Is it a cure, a remedy? What is the situation? We are actually controlling 17,000 miles of railway under government ownership, and when the Grand Trunk Railway system will have been acquired we shall own, 22,500 miles, the greatest railway system in the world. When the Government of the day decided to go into the ownership of railways, it was on certain conditions and in the face of certain opposition. I for one have opposed public ownership. I believe that it is not sensible in view of the competition of privately owned companies. But there are some people in this country, as there are members in this House, who have faith in the principle of public ownership; and there is a Government that went on record as being confident in its soundness. Therefore it is the duty of members in this House to give to everyone who believes in public ownership an opportunity to prove whether or not it is feasible and profitable.

Mr. McCREA: How long a time do you require to prove that?

Mr. GAUTHIER: I am willing to discuss the railway situation whenever the question is under consideration. But I claim that the submission to this Parliament of every bit of correspondence, and every communication relative to the railways, will not provide a remedy for the situation. The evil is in connection with the management, and you cannot eradicate it by any ventilation of all this correspondence in Parliament. You must have an up-to-date management; you must have supervision; you must have the strictest economy and the highest efficiency. You will not find this in Parliament; you will find it in the management which you will secure for the roads. And I hope that the Government of the day will be strong enough to give to all those who favour public ownership an opportunity to show whether it can be made a success or not. In taking that position I do so against my own opinion. But I believe in the rule of the majority. The majority has decided that we should undertake the experiment of public ownership. Then let the majority rule; let them have a chance to show whether or not public ownership will be profitable. Do not try to becloud the issue; do not try to stir up feeling against those people who believe in the theory. I say, give them a chance, and when the question of public ownership of railways is brought before the House, then everyone will be at liberty to suggest any remedy which, in his opinion, is capable of solving the problem which confronts Canada to-day.

Mr. LUCIEN CANNON (Dorchester): If I rightly understood the remarks of the last speaker, the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe, there may be some doubt as to his position on this question. He is in favour of private ownership; he does not favour public ownership; nevertheless, he is willing to change his opinion at the expense of the country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. GAUTHIER: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member has no right to put into my mouth, for the purpose of bolstering up his argument, words which I never used.

Mr. CANNON: The interpretation I have given the speech of my hon. friend I honestly base on my understanding of his remarks. The hon. gentleman said most explicitly that he did not believe in public ownership, but that nevertheless he was willing to alter his views—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Not at all.

Mr. GAUTHIER: I never made such a statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule is very clear, that if an hon. member makes a statement, it must be accepted by the House. On the other hand, however, it is quite competent for an hon. member to give his own interpretation of the remarks of any other member and base an argument thereupon. The remarks of the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe will appear in Hansard and will stand as he stated them.

Mr. CANNON: I do not want to be unjust in any way to the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe. He has delivered his speech and it is open to interpretation by every member of the House. Now, coming back to what I was saying. I say that the hon. gentleman declared that he was opposed to public ownership, but nevertheless would vote against this amendment so as to allow the Government to run the railways of this country in the way they have been running them for the last three years—and we know what results have attended that administration. The question before the House is much wider, broader, more general, than hon. members, including the member for St. Hyacinthe, have seen fit to consider it. The stand taken by the Opposition, Mr. Speaker, is that the Government of Canada —no matter whether it is a Liberal, a Tory, a Farmer or a Nationalist Government—cannot spend the public moneys of this country without rendering due account to the people's representatives. The amendment is not simply to be narrowed down to the railway issue in Canada—the issue is the very general one as to whether this Government is responsible to Parliament. The railway issue has been discussed. We might also discuss the matter of the Canadian Mercantile Marine; we might discuss every expenditure made by this Government for the last three or four years. The Opposition says to the Government: "If you wish to have money for the coming year then before these moneys are voted, you must do what every other Government in a constitutional country does—render proper accounts to the members of this House." This has not been done. Whenever information is sought, whenever information is demanded, the members of the Government—for some reason or other—have always refused to give us that information with respect to many matters of vital importance to the Canadian people.

Referring briefly to the side issue of railways, and putting aside the very general issue of the responsibility of the Government to the House of Commons, I say we have reached a stage in Canada where the railway situation has to be discussed openly, frankly and sincerely. I agree with all the members who have spoken on either side, that the issue is so big, so vast, that it is not to be discussed in a partisan way. I, for one, do not intend to so discuss it. But the Government cannot run away from its own record, and the Government is responsible for the situation as it exists to-day. Who took over the Canadian Northern railway, who took over the Grand Trunk railway, who took over the Grand Trunk Pacific? This Government, or its predecessor; and the financial situation we are facing to-day is the direct result and consequence of the policy adopted by it. This is one fact that we cannot ignore. Another fact is that, in the light of the present unfavourable financial situation, if we had the facts put before the House, if the officials of all the public departments would give to us the information to which we are entitled, we would come to the conclusion that the East once more is paying for the West; and every business man in the eastern provinces is realizing to-day that on account of western demands they are facing a situation that cannot last much longer. I have not been surprised at the attitude taken by the Agrarian group on this question. It is in the interest of that group, it is in the interest of the western farmers at large, to see that the eastern people, or rather the population of the eastern provinces, do not realize exactly the liabilities and the obligations put on their shoulders by the situation that exists in the West. I do not wish to insist much longer on this phase of the question, but I say that it does not matter whether you belong to the Liberal party, whether you belong to the Tory party, or whether you belong to the Agrarian party—some day you will have to solve the whole financial and the whole railway problem in Canada. Then the eastern provinces will demand from the Government whether they are to continue paying for the western provinces, and much will depend on the answer that shall be given. Those who say that this question should not be discussed from a political point of view are absolutely right. It must be discussed from a national point of view, and in the correct solution of the issue will be found the settlement of the question of our national unity in the future. The East has done very much for the West. The West has been built up by the East. And it seems, Mr. Speaker, that the East must continue to pay for the West, and the West will refuse to pay anything for the East. These are very grave questions and I think they should be discussed thoroughly, either before the House itself or before committees appointed for that purpose. I shall support the amendment presented by the leader of the Opposition because it embodies the high constitutional principle of parliamentary responsibility, and I say that this Government has no right to spend public moneys without giving to the representatives of the people that information to which they are entitled.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): From time to time there has been criticism of the acoustic properties of this Chamber. To whatever defects may exist in that regard I must attribute some of the speeches we have listened to this afternoon in opposition to the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). Let me, Sir, supplement the efforts that you have made to keep speakers to the question before the House by again repeating the material part of that amendment. It is in these words:

> —it is the undoubted right of Parliament to demand and receive copies of all reports, accounts, correspondence and papers in relation to the management of every department of the public service including the affairs of the Canadian National railways, whether operating directly under the control of the department or under corporate form.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in that declaration to justify the more or less open charges that have been made against the leader of the Opposition, that in moving that amendment, he was actuated, either by opposition to public ownership or by a desire to introduce politics. As a matter of fact, Sir, if any politics has been introduced this afternoon that introduction was made by the Prime Minister, who, after discussing the amendment and several other things besides, turned to his followers and stated that this amendment was a motion of want of confidence, and he asked his followers to vote it down. Now right here, I am going to ask my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) which horn of the dilemma he prefers to be impaled upon. The hon. gentleman said that if this was a want of confidence motion, as he had no confidence in the Government he would, of course, vote for it, but that he did not regard it as a want of confidence motion, and therefore he was going to vote against it. But, Sir, may I point out to my hon. friend, with all respect and in all friendliness, that the hon. gentleman in thus interpreting the amendment was assuming, a little before the proper time, the role which, it is likely he may in the course of time, fill in this House. But at the present moment he is not the Prime Minister. The interpretation to be placed upon this amendment rests, after all, with the Prime Minister leading the House. That right hon. gentleman has interpreted this amendment—improperly, I submit— as a want of confidence motion; and therefore my hon. friend the member for Marquette, to be logical, should vote for the amendment to carry out his own profession of lack of confidence in this Government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. member permit me a question? Does he contend that every amendment moved in this House, no matter what its terms, which becomes a motion of want of confidence must be supported. Irrespective, I say again, of its terms, by any who have not confidence in the general policy of the administration?

Mr. MURPHY: Mr. Speaker, with all respect to my right hon. friend, I have been too long in this House, and I have crossed swords with him too often, to be drawn into any argument of that kind. If I were to remind the House to-day of the resemblance that the right hon. gentleman bears to the famous character pictured by Butler, it would not be the first time that I had done so, because on a former occasion I likened him to Hudibras of whom Butler said:

He could distinguish and divide
A hair twixt South and Southwest side.

Now, Sir, following your endeavours to keep hon. members to the amendment before the House, I desire to run over briefly some of the arguments that have been advanced in opposition to this amendment. As I have said, the only politics that has been introduced was introduced by the right hon. gentlemen himself. All that is said in this amendment is, that if you are going to discuss it from the standpoint of the Canadian National Railway system, then, as that system is a public undertaking, we, as the representatives of the people, are entitled to the fullest possible information regarding that undertaking. That is all this amendment says, and less than that we could not say if we are to discharge properly our trust to the public who send us here. Then, Sir, I object to the insinuation, no matter from what quarter it comes, that anybody on this side of the House, any more than any other hon. gentleman sitting in any other quarter of this chamber, is actuated by a desire to introduce politics or to discuss the merits or demerits of public ownership. These questions do not enter into this amendment, and I decline to discuss them. The amendment should be discussed simply in accordance with the language in which it is expressed.

In his speech this afternoon my right hon. friend, following the example set by the hon. Minister of Railways a few days ago, invited expressions of opinion from hon. members on both sides of this House. That invitation we on this side have responded to, and when we do respond, the charge is made against us, either that we are opposed to public ownership, or that we are introducing politics. The invitation, Sir, I am bound to say could only relate, having regard to the language and attitude of my right hon. friend, to a discussion of the latter part of the amendment dealing with the Canadian National Railway system. But as pointed out by the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) and by my hon. friend who sits to my right (Mr. Fielding) this amendment raises a much wider question than that. It goes to the whole root of responsible government, and it brings directly in issue the question of ministerial responsibility to a parliament representing what is supposed to be a free and democratic people. That is what this amendment is designed to bring before this chamber, and not what has been discussed by the majority of the hon. members who have spoken in opposition to the amendment.

Now, let me run over briefly some of the things that were said by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. In the course of his remarks he admitted that the Government was responsible for the success of the Canadian National system; but he said that they were not immediately accountable for day-to-day operation. Well, Sir, that may be useful perhaps as an admission, but it does not go to the root of the matter raised by this amendment, and the only observation that I desire to make upon it at the moment is that in view of what the right hon. Prime Minister admits, that the Government is being responsible for the success of the system, therefore the Government must also be responsible for the failure of the system—a failure that was put forth the other day by the Minister of Railways and Canals in terms that have staggered the whole Dominion.

Further, the right hon. gentleman said that if details of day-to-day operation were to be given the business of Parliament would he held up and made impossible. But here may I point out to the right hon. gentleman and to the House that neither in the amendment itself, nor in the speech supporting it delivered by the hon. leader of the Opposition, was any specific method mentioned as to how this information, to which the representatives of the people are entitled, should be given to Parliament. That question was left entirely in the large, and I submit, Sir, that acceptance of the terms of this amendment would not at all have the effect which was foreshadowed by the right hon. Prime Minister.

Then the right hon. gentleman went on to point out that in his opinion, if information were brought down as requested by this amendment with reference to the Canadian National Railway system, that would operate to the injury of the Canadian National Railway system, for the reason that such information would become the property of its great competitor, the Canadian Pacific railway. Well, I have only to repeat what my hon. friend from Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) and other hon. gentlemen have said, namely, that there is nothing done by the Canadian National Railway system or by its board or by any of those connected with its management that is not known within a very few hours to the management and directors of the Canadian Pacific railway. The Canadian Pacific railway is, as has been stated, one of the most successfully operated and best managed transportation systems in the world, and no amount of information that might be brought down in this House or before any committee of this House would add anything to the information of those who are charged with the duty of managing and operating the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Therefore I dismiss that argument, and so will any practical business man, without any further consideration.

The right hon. gentleman also asked if the Canadian Pacific railway was shrouded in any mystery, and he answered his own question in the negative. That answer was correct. But then he added that neither was the Canadian National Railway system shrouded in any mystery. Well, that is just exactly where we join issue with him. We say it is shrouded in mystery, and the proof of our assertion is that whenever information is asked for from this side of the House it is denied on the ground that it would not be in the public interest to bring that information down. That is where we say the shrouding in mystery comes in in regard to the Canadian National Railway system. But there is also another difference to be pointed out in this regard, namely that there is no necessity for shrouding the Canadian Pacific railway in mystery. That road, as I have already said, is a successfully managed road and produces dividends; the reverse, according to the Minister of Railways and Canals, is the case with the Canadian National Railway system. And there is this further difference, that the Canadian Pacific railway, if it did make deficits, would not, as is the case with the Canadian National Railway system, come to this House from time to time and ask the representatives of the people to vote moneys to make up those deficits. Then the hon. gentleman proceeded and asked, what is to be done? I took down his exact words. He said: "If Parliament set to work through a committee of this House to evolve some rule that could be followed, it would evolve something definite and concrete." Now, Mr. Speaker, just mark that sentence, and at once you trace the resemblance to the historic character with whom I compared the right hon. gentleman a few moments ago. Let me read that again: "If Parliament set to work through a committee of this House to evolve some rule that could be followed, it would evolve something definite and concrete." In that you have the right hon. Prime Minister's solution of this whole railway question.

Then the right hon. gentleman expressed a preference for a committee—at least, he seemed to do so. I should not make any very definite statement with regard to anything my right hon. friend says or does; I have known him too long and too well to do that. But the right hon. gentleman, following the sentence that I have just quoted, seemed to indicate some interest in any event in the resolution which stands on the Order Paper in the name of the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) and intimated that if the committee provided for by that resolution were appointed, parties could be brought before it and all necessary information given there by officials connected, not only with the Canadian National Railway system, but with other roads as well.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at Eight o'clock.

Mr. MURPHY: Mr. Speaker, just before you left the Chair at six o'clock, I had mentioned that the Prime Minister had based one of his objections to the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition, on the fact that the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) had, standing in his name on the Order Paper, a motion providing for the appointment of another standing committee in addition to those already appointed by the House. The right hon. gentleman spoke in approving terms of the proposed new committee, and in the course of his observations with reference to it, he said that it might well be considered as likely to meet the situation raised by the amendment of the leader of the Opposition. That language evidently appealed to the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), as in the course of the remarks that he made following those of the Prime Minister, my hon. friend also expressed his approval of the creation of this new standing committee, and in answer to a question addressed to him by the leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Marquette said that he thought that any question could be asked and the answer could be obtained before this new standing committee. That reply seemed to me to be based on an erroneous idea of the scope and powers of a standing committee of this House. Let me point out to my hon. friend in the first place that, when such a committee is appointed, it remains an inert thing; it does not function; it remains just so many names on a piece of paper until something is referred to it by this House for inquiry or investigation or report. Even when that has been done, in order that it may discharge the function which, it seems to me, the hon. member for Marquette had in mind it would perform as a matter of course, it must also receive from this House authority to send for persons, papers and records. Besides that, it must receive authority to examine witnesses under oath, and then under an Act it has power to administer oaths to such witnesses. In order to accomplish what the hon. member for Marquette seemed to think this new committee would accomplish, all that I have mentioned would, in the first place, have to be done. In the next place, as I have stated, something would have to be referred to that committee, and in order to get the information that my hon. friend thought such a committee would get, the whole railway situation as it affects the Canadian National Railway system at this time, would have to be referred to the committee and the committee would have to be invested with the powers and jurisdiction which I have just outlined before any information worth having could be obtained. If the hon. member for Marquette can have that done, or if there is a possibility that such a thing would be done by the Government, I admit that the hon. gentleman would have some ground on which to base his argument. But if that is not done,—and I have very grave doubt that any such thing would be done,—with all respect I would point out to my hon. friend that his argument along that line and on that point proceeds from an error with regard to the facts.

Now, if such a committee were appointed, let me direct the attention of the House to the fact that my hon. friend and those who argue with him would then be impaled on either horn of another dilemma. My hon. friend, following the lead of the Prime Minister, had urged very strongly, against the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition, that in the getting of the information which they seemed to think would be got by the adoption of this amendment, information would be given to the great rival of the Canadian National Railway system, and that the giving of such information would operate to the injury of the government-owned and operated railway. If the suggestion of the hon. gentleman be followed, if this committee be appointed, and if this committee is not to be a body conducting its investigations after the manner of a star chamber, if this committee is to sit in public and to examine publicly persons, records and documents, then the information that will be elicited will be information, not only for the Canadian Pacific railway, but for all the world. So I ask my hon. friends who were urging against the amendment of the leader of the Opposition, the argument that to adopt it would mean the giving of information to the Canadian Pacific how they are going to get away from the greater volume of information that would be given by holding sessions of such a committee as that. They are impaled on either horn of that dilemma, and I leave the hon. gentlemen to select which of those horns they prefer.

Let me deal with this matter very briefly from another and, perhaps, a more important point of view. The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Reid), a few days ago, and the Prime Minister this afternoon, invited discussion and suggestions, and hon. members who spoke from this side, and, indeed, from all quarters of the House, expressed their willingness to accept the invitation and to give such assistance in the solution of the railway difficulties that confront us as they would, in the exercise of their best judgment and their greatest diligence, be able to give. Some doubt was cast, without any reason whatever, upon the bona-fides of statements of that kind emanating from the Opposition. Without going into that, let me point out that in order to discuss a thing, you must know what that thing is. If we are to discuss the railway situation, we must know all the facts that produced that situation. If we are to discuss the conditions which have brought about the situation with which the country is confronted to-day, and for being the cause of which I, in any event would not think of blaming hon. gentlemen who now sit opposite—if, we are to discuss that situation and if we are to suggest the remedies which, in our judgment, should be applied, to change that situation, to put an end to those huge deficits and to put the railway system, owned and operated by the Government, on a proper basis, surely it is elementary that before we can do that, we must have before us the facts relating to the whole situation.

Let me point out a few things bearing on the proposition which I have just laid down and which, I submit, cannot be successfully refuted. On the 14th of the present month, the gentleman who at present occupies the position of chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners of Canada delivered a speech before a club in this city. I refer to the Hon. F. B. Carvell, whose speech on the occasion to which I have referred attracted nation-wide attention. In order that I may not transgress the rules of the House, and for the purpose of keeping strictly to the amendment that is now before us for discussion, I will quote just two sentences of the speech as bearing on the subject at issue. In the Ottawa Journal of March 15, there appears a report of the speech in question, and Mr. Carvell is represented as having made these statements:

> The Government railway losses last year were far greater than recently reported. They are very much more than what has appeared on the surface.

I am not going to comment upon those statements, but I am going to draw the attention of the House to what was said a day or two later by one of the leading journals in this country with reference to those statements. In the Toronto Globe of the 17th instant, there appears an editorial, the title of which is "Are these charges true"? Again, in order to confine myself strictly to the amendment, I will read just those portions of the editorial which bear upon the matter which we are discussing. In the course of that article the Globe said, referring to the statements which I have just cited as being made by Mr. Carvell:

> If words mean anything, Mr. Carvell charges the board of management of the Canadian National railways or the Minister of Railways, or both, with making false representations as to the condition of the people's railways. The losses, he asserts, are very much more than what has appeared on the surface. Is Dr. Reid content to let this imputation of deceit and concealment rest upon him?

Those are not my words, nor do I associate myself with them at the moment. Later on in the editorial there are these further observations:

> Are the figures false, and presented to Parliament with the intent to deceive? If they are, Mr. Carvell will do the people of Canada a service by stating wherein they are untrue.

These are the comments of one of the leading newspapers of Canada upon that portion of the speech of the Chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners to which I have just drawn the attention of the House. Certainly no more serious comment could be made upon that statement than those that are made in that editorial of the Globe, and if for no other reason than to place himself right, my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals, and the Government of which he is a member, should, I submit, welcome the earliest possible opportunity, and any method that offers itself, to place all available information before the public so as to disprove the gravity of the charges contained in the speech delivered by Mr. Carvell.

Now, the speech itself was not alone the only serious statement that went forth to the Canadian public. A statement made in this House a day or two later by the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals, in disclosing the railway situation as it exists in Canada at the present time, has stirred several journals supporting the Government to give expression to their views in very plain terms. I am not going to quote from them at any great length, nor in fact will I refer to any but one, and in doing so I will again confine myself to that part of the article which is germane to the subject under discussion.

The Ottawa Journal in its issue of the 15th instant, in referring to the disclosures made by my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals in this House in presenting the statement to which I have alluded, said this:

The people appear willing to assume the burden, and that attitude would justify the utmost frankness upon the part of the Minister of Railways. At the moment they are asking for full information as to the exact volume of the burden involved, and that is a reasonable desire. The burden itself neither swells nor shrinks under the light of truth. To say that "this total does not include fixed charges on the Intercolonial and the National Transcontinental" falls short of meeting the popular desire for information in a spirit of perfect candor.

That language, Mr. Speaker, is not the language of a Liberal. That language is not the language of any hon. member sitting on this side of the House. That language, Sir, is not the language of an opponent of this Government. That language is the language of a journal than which there is no stronger supporter of the present Government in the whole Dominion of Canada, and surely, Sir, the Government will take notice of this statement of the Journal, speaking of the people that—"At the moment they are asking for full information as to the exact volume of the burden involved, and that is a reasonable desire." Mr. Speaker, that language applies aptly to the terms of the amendment introduced by the hon. the leader of the Opposition, and in support of which I am citing this editorial for the information of this House. Then how true it is as the Journal states further: "The burden itself neither swells nor shrinks under the light of truth." And how well deserved this reproof is in the concluding part of the extract in which the language used by the minister is quoted, when the Journal observes: "To say that 'this total does not include fixed charges on the Intercolonial and the National Transcontinental' falls short of meeting the popular desire for information in a spirit of perfect candor." Now, Sir, I submit that from this source, from this newspaper favourable to the Government, comes the very strongest endorsation of the position taken by the hon. the leader of the Opposition in his amendment.

But, Sir, there are a couple of other incidents that illustrate the need for information to which I might with propriety allude before I resume my seat. Occasionally we do get some information from the Government, but no sooner do we get it than one of two things happens: either it is pointed out the next day that the information is erroneous, or, as happened with reference to two statements made by the Government on different occasions, there is such a direct conflict of fact that further information is absolutely necessary. Now, to illustrate the first point, I need only remind the House that a short time ago my hon. friend, the Minister of Railways and Canals, in replying to a question asked by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) with regard to the number of locomotives built by the Montreal Locomotive company for this Government since the year 1917, and replying to a further question as to the value of these locomotives, gave an answer to the House one day saying that the value was $1,300,000 odd. On that day he also stated that his colleague, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, was a director of the locomotive company which manufactured these locomotives. Then, Sir, on the following day, my hon. friend, the Minister of Railways and Canals, rose in his seat and corrected the figures that had been given to him to present to the House the previous day, and said that the value of the locomotives built by this company since the year 1917, this company of which his colleague, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, is a director, instead of being $1,300,000 odd was thirteen millions and some odd thousand dollars. Now, Mr. Speaker, in the light of errors of that kind in information furnished by the Government itself, and directly bearing on the railway situation in this country, surely we are entitled to the fullest possible information as to the whole series of contracts given this locomotive company,—as to the type and size of locomotives they built, as to the comparison of costs between these locomotives when built by that company and the same locomotives when built by any other company. Further, I submit, we are entitled to another comparison, a comparison of the cost of these locomotives, and locomotives of the same type and size when built for a private-owned and privately operated company. Further than that, we are entitled, I also submit, to this additional information: we ought to know how much locomotives of the same type and size cost in the United States as compared with the cost in Canada.

I am only citing these as one branch, and a very small branch, of the inquiry that ought to be made and of the information that ought to be given before any hon. gentleman in this House or any citizen of this country can intelligently approach the discussion of what is generally referred to as the present railway situation.

One other illustration and I have done. At the time the Estimates were brought down in this House a statement was given to the newspapers by the Government in explanation of the appalling state of affairs disclosed by these Estimates. In that statement reference was made to the amount of operating loss, and the amount that was then mentioned was a few days later proved to be quite incorrect and much below the actual figure when the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals made his official statement in this House. This incident, illustrating the unreliability of the figures given to this House, and illustrating further, the fact that the hon. the Minister of Railways apparently cannot depend upon those who are responsible for furnishing him with this information was dealt with in a communication to the Montreal Star. from which I intend to quote a few sentences. The Star has begun the publication of a series of articles on the railway situation contributed by Mr. J. L. Payne, a gentleman who under this and former Governments occupied the position of Chief Railway Statistician for the Dominion of Canada. The first of these letters appeared in the Star of Saturday last, and a supplementary letter was published yesterday. In this supplementary letter Mr. Payne makes reference to the discrepancy to which I have just alluded, in the following terms:

The newspaper figures—that is to say, those handed out by the Government concurrently with the introduction of the Estimates in this House.

—had placed the operating loss at $21,250,000 from which I deduct 5,000,000 on account of probable net operating earnings by the Grand Trunk; but Dr. Reid showed that the loss for the past year from operation had been $36,842,-9'0.17. To the extent of the difference between $21,250,000 and that sum, the deficit for the current year may be taken as having been increased.

So that whether we are denied information, or whether we get information which is immediately afterwards proven to be incorrect, it is quite evident that neither we in this House, nor the citizens of the country at large, are in a position even to approach the discussion of the railway situation until there is available a far greater volume of information than that which we and the people now possess, and until that information is obtained through sources upon which we may rely as being absolutely correct.

My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark), in discussing the amendment presented by the leader of the Opposition, took exceptions to it upon two grounds. In the first place, he said it was premature; and besides that, he contended that it was not supported by information which we should have had before the amendment was introduced. Well now, I submit to my hon. friend that not only is this amendment not premature, but that the time has arrived—indeed that the time has passed—when this House should take a stand, such as that proposed by the amendment, to assert its rights and privileges with regard to information to which members of Parliament are entitled as representatives of the people of Canada. I cannot for a moment admit, therefore, that the amendment is at all premature. As regards the argument that the amendment is not supported by information which we should have had before it was brought forward, I confess that I do not quite understand this contention of my hon. friend. It is quite unlike him. He is usually remarkable, not only for clarity of speech, but also for clarity of thought. But without labouring that point, may I draw his attention and the attention of the House to the fact that his objection is baseless. He says that the amendment should be supported by information which we ought to have had before it was brought into the House. Well, Sir, we tried to get information and were refused it, and to-day we are seeking the very thing which the hon. member says we should have got. From that point of view, therefore, I invite my hon. friend to revise the opinion he expressed this afternoon, and to be logical, as he usually is, by voting with the members of the Opposition in suport of the amendment.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): The question involved in the amendment of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) is not without difficulties, and I desire to say a word or two thereon before voting upon the question. Notwithstanding your very excellent voice, Mr. Speaker, which usually covers this chamber to the satisfaction of every hon. member, I am sure it is not to be presumed, upon a single reading of a motion, that it has been clearly followed by hon. gentlemen, and I should like to read the amendment again for my own satisfaction, and possibly for the information of the House. It is as follows:

That subject to the reservation that in exceptional cases there may be documents of a confidential character which, in the public interest, may properly be withheld from publication; the House declares that it is the undoubted right of Parliament to demand and receive copies of all reports, accounts, correspondence and papers in relation to the management of every department of the public service, including the affairs of the Canadian National railways, whether operating directly under the control of a department or under corporate form.

After a reading of that resolution, and a careful observance of the text, it may be that hon. gentlemen are not far apart, even accepting the views already expressed to-day as being the judgment of the House generally. The amendment uses the term "confidential," which is the qualifying portion of the resolution; and I think it of some importance to inquire just for a moment as to what that word means. I assume that the leader of the Opposition, in incorporating that term into his amendment, did not wish thereby to imply that the only documents that were to be withheld from Parliament were those merely which had been marked "confidential" by the writer, or which had been so considered by the recipient of the letter. I assume—in fact I hope—that he did not intend to use the word in that restrictive sense. I should think that he meant that if the Government considered that any special document asked for by Parliament should not be disclosed to the House or to the public, because it was against the public interest, therefore it would be a confidential document. If I unfairly interpret the hon. gentleman's use of that particular word I trust he will correct me. The Canadian National Railways, of which the people of Canada are the shareholders, is a business institution and, as has been pointed out by several speakers during the course of the debate, it has its competitors. As every hon. gentleman knows, there is in all business affairs a great deal that cannot be divulged to the public. This, I think, is regarded as a safe principle which is always followed by corporations and their shareholders, who usually protest against the disclosure of facts to the public, except through the medium of shareholders' meetings. This principle is regarded by private individuals as a sound one, and it is one that is usually observed. Therefore, when I say that in all business affairs there is much that is confidential and must not be disclosed to the public. I think I am stating what is axiomatic and which will be accepted by every hon. gentleman in the House. If I am right in my interpretation of the qualifying section of the amendment I would say that if upon a motion for documents, the Government believe that disclosure or publication of the same would be against the national interests, would be against the interests of the Canadian National Railway system, they would refuse to divulge or publish the same on that ground and therefore those documents would be regarded as confidential. It is true that the Government must take the responsibility of determining what information shall be given to the public, what documents relative to the administration of the Canadian National railway system shall be divulged. It may be that the opponents of the Government might differ from them in their view as to what was confidential and what was not confidential, as to what information should be divulged and what should be maintained as purely for the guidance of those interested. In that event Parliament would have to judge as to who was right and who was wrong; and ultimately it would be the right and duty of the public, who are the proprietors of the railway system, to determine as to whose position was correct—that of the Government or that of their opponents. If my interpretation of the amendment of the leader of the Opposition is correct—and it does seem the proper one, it does seem the natural and obvious interpretation—so far as I am concerned I cannot see any objection to it. It expresses a principle which it seems to me would be very dangerous for this Parliament to oppose or to deny. After all, it is within the power of the Government to determine what information they judge to be in the public interest to divulge and what they deem not proper to divulge. I therefore fail to see upon what principle the amendment should be denied by the House.

I should be reluctant to oppose the amendment upon another ground. A few days ago the Minister of Railways presented his annual statement upon the railways owned and controlled by the Government, and I think the statement as to form was a very excellent one. Upon reading it, subsequent to its deliverance, I find that not only is it in splendid form, but it gives a very great deal of information. The minister stated there would be a deficit of $70,000,000 this year in operating and fixed charges. He also estimates that for the current year there will be a deficit of $50,000,000 for operating and fixed charges. When one reflects upon the world-wide conditions to-day, when one recalls the commercial and financial conditions in all the leading countries of the world, he might be pardoned if he did say that the deficit in the current year would probably be as large as it was last year. Now this deficit, Mr. Speaker, must be made up by the people of Canada in the form of taxation. There is no royal road by which we can secure that amount of money to square the accounts of the Canadian National Railway system, except by obtaining it through taxation upon the people of the Dominion.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): We might save on the railroads.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): That would lessen the amount to be taken from the people by taxation, but the principle would not be varied by the difference in amount. It being true that this enormous deficit must be made up through taxation from the people I, at least, shall be very reluctant to give adherence to the principle that Parliament must not, in the general sense at any rate, be afforded the fullest information that it deems necessary in connection with the operation of that railway system and which goes to make up a deficit for which the people have to be taxed. It is quite true that a great deal of information might well be denied Parliament and the public by the Government and by the management of the railway system, but speaking in the general sense, I say, they are entitled to all information. The exceptions can only be determined as the cases arise, and when they come before us in a concrete form. Then, and only then, I submit can we determine what information should be refused the public and Parliament by the Government and by the management of the railways, and all one can do at the present time is to either affirm or deny the general principle embodied in the amendment which is now before us for consideration. Very much has been said this afternoon in connection with the operation of the National railway system that is commendable. For the present at least we are the proprietors of these railways, the mileage of which will be enlarged when the Grand Trunk system is acquired. It does not follow from my remarks, or from the fact that we are the proprietors of this National railway system, that members of Parliament should ask all sorts of questions, and move for the production of all sorts of documents, without discretion and without discrimination. Many questions are asked, I think, which are not informative to anybody, which are not perhaps in the national interest, and which are not perhaps in the interest of the railway system itself. I admit, Sir, it is sometimes difficult to determine, as a matter of fact, what questions are relevant, what are important, what are informative, and what are or are not in the national interest. The answers to some questions, it has been suggested by some hon. gentleman this afternoon, may be quite satisfying to curious and inquisitive people outside of Parliament, but it does not necessarily follow that it is in the public interest that such questions should be asked, and only questions that are in the public interest should be asked. Nor does it follow that because some persons, whom some of us in this House represent, desire questions to be asked, the time of Parliament should be taken up either in the asking or in the answering of them. It was inevitable, Mr. Speaker, that the issue involved in this motion should have arisen. I assume that every hon. member felt that when the policy of government ownership and control was adopted, this very issue was bound to be projected into Parliament. It is one of the difficulties incident to and inherent in Government ownership, and we must make the best of it. It may be true that the privilege of asking questions and demanding the production of documents has not up to the present been abused. I am hardly in a position to state that it has been. Probably we will acquire a better standard as to what should be required in this connection by having no rule whatever rather than attempting to regulate it by standing orders or by rules. But I am sure we will all agree that having accepted the tremendous responsibility of becoming the owners and operators of 17,000 or 18,000 miles of railway, that railway should be given a fair trial, and it should not in any way be prejudiced by the attitude taken by hon. gentlemen.

Now I have admitted, Mr. Speaker, that Parliament is entitled to a great deal of information. If the people are to be taxed to meet large deficits in future, as they will be, it naturally follows that they will expect a great deal of information from Parliament. But while the people and Parliament are entitled to this information, still we should contrive some method by which such information should reach Parliament and the people other than through the Order Paper or the ordinary channels. Reference has been made to my motion now upon the Order Paper asking for the establishment of a standing committee upon Government-owned railways and shipping. I am not going to discuss that motion, but I propose to debate it at the earliest opportunity. I might say, however, that one of the reasons which moved me to place that motion upon the Order Paper was the hope that this committee would work out some method by which Parliament and the people might be kept better informed in future on railway affairs. I also entertained the hope that some regulations or standing orders might be set up which would in some way control the means by which Parliament and the people would be kept informed, thus saving much of the time of Parliament.

In connection with our railway questions, I think I am uttering but the simple truth when I say that Parliament and the people require information. During the past fifteen or twenty years, at least during the time that I have been a member of this House, it seems to me, reflecting on the years that have gone by, that Parliament has abdicated its functions, particularly in relation to railway matters. We were not informed thereon, and it would appear that we did not take care always to be informed; too blindly did we follow the Government's view of or perhaps some section of public opinion. But I submit that we have reached the time when Parliament should become informed upon this great national issue, in which is involved a problem that will confront us for many years to come. In the absence, however, of an alternative method of informing Parliament upon that problem and of dealing with the very issue raised in this amendment, I think the amendment does contain a principle which should be affirmed, though in practice it should perhaps be strictly qualified, and therefore I propose to support it.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, without attempting to throw blame on any one in particular, the thought strikes me that it would have been better in so far as the aim of the discussion was to really accomplish something which would be profitable in the way of understanding the present railway situation, and, after understanding it, to take measures to improve it, had a more opportune moment been chosen when the discussion would have been placed upon a somewhat wider plane and would, I think, have issued in better results. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) knew very well that the motion which was placed on the Order Paper by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) would probably be reached within a day. Why was it necessary then, by injecting a motion in amendment to the Government's motion to go into Supply, to bring up the question on a narrow basis, rather than approach it as a whole House from both sides in the only proper spirit in which it can be approached—an entire negation of any desire to make party capital on one side or the other, and a full purpose in a very solemn and a very careful way to front the problem than which no more important problem has been before the Parliament of Canada since Confederation? If there is anything that should make a parliament sober and earnest and honest with itself, it is a situation such as that which confronts us to-day.

I do not think that men on this side or men on that side of the House, if they are going to arrive at a proper solution of this problem, have any time to waste in throwing boquets one at the other as to who was the way-back cause of the present situation. I think it should make some of us very humble in our criticisms if we let our memories go back to the antecedent times during which the bases were formed which have eventuated in the situation confronting us to-day. I for one do not propose to go into ancient history as to which particular party or government was in part or in whole to blame. The fact is that we have a very serious proposition before us upon which the economic and financial and national progress depends in a very essential way.

That is my view of the situation and the way in which we should approach it, and my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition does not appear to me to have taken the best course in the light of that broad, general interest by interjecting this amendment on the motion to go into Supply. He will take my criticism as a kindly criticism. I could have hoped that we should have been spared this and should have come to the discusion of the situation on broad, general lines.

My hon. friend, the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean), has endeavoured to define the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition. I tried to follow his definition, and it seemed to me that he took about three different positions in that regard. I followed him sympathetically in the first; I then had to reverse the engine and follow him sympathetically in the second, and so with the third, and I got confused and troubled about it. I think I shall have to have some further light from my hon. friend before I can exactly see the point towards which he was going. My hon. friend who leads the Opposition knows the English language and the meaning of its words; he knows not only the colloquial meaning but also the official meaning of the word "confidential." Looking through his vocabulary, without having to go to the dictionary—because I am sure he has a vast choice of words—my hon. friend chose that one word "confidential," and put it into his motion, and it is an essential part of that motion. If the word "confidential" meant what the member for Halifax read as its meaning in his first interpretation of it, the leader of the Opposition would have been just as well up in business, just as far up in the line, if instead of putting into his motion something about confidential information he had incorporated in it the affirmation that as a rule the sun rises every morning and sets every night—a self-evident truth. If "confidential" means what the member for Halifax had in mind, what kind of information will my hon. friend get, and those who vote for his amendment, if the amendment carries? Exactly the information which the Government chooses to give him in the light of the public interest and no more.

Talking about the privileges of the House and the different disposition of powers of government and claims of justice to members of Parliament, has anybody ever taken the position that as this chamber votes the money, so this chamber has the right to know to the last dollar how it has been expended? I have not heard that position taken in this House, but if it is true, it is equally true that a government is a mere automaton and has neither the right nor the power of existence in fact if it does not face every now and then the question as to what information it is in the public interest that it should give out. If the Government thinks it is not in the public interest that information should be given at a certain time or on a certain line, it is not only the right but the absolute duty of that government to withhold the information. One principle is just as necessary in government as the other; one is just as strongly entrenched in the constitution and in the general division of powers as the other. So that I would like to know the answer of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition as to his coincidence with interpretation number one given by the senior member for Halifax. Is that the meaning of his resolution? If it is, my hon. friend from Halifax will vote for it; if it is not, can he vote for it? There ought to be some finality about this, or a vote may go astray. To some members of Parliament it does not matter much whether a vote goes astray or not, but for either the leader of the Opposition or my hon. friend from Halifax to have a vote go astray is a matter of some importance. Will these two gentlemen please settle between themselves what is the meaning of the word "confidential" and so inform us? We shall gain a vote or we shall lose a vote according as there is agreement or otherwise between them.

Let us look at it a little further. Two kinds of confidential documents are envisaged by my hon. friend; not all confidential documents are to be withheld by the Government, but only that division of confidential documents which it would be against the public interest to bring down. All other confidential ones are to be brought down. We must keep that in mind: only those documents are to be refused the production of which would not be in the public interest. In a word, "confidential" having its general meaning and its special meaning, if the amendment is carried and becomes imperative, you will leave as it is now, in the discretion of the Government, the decision in all special cases whether a paper or document may or may not in the public interest be brought down, and you will have a standing battle between the Government and the Opposition or the seeker of the information on the question whether the Government is right in its interpretation or whether it is assuming autocratic or plenary powers and exercising great liberty in the production of information asked for. What I want to make plain is this: if the leader of the Opposition confines himself to confidential documents you will have to proceed then upon the division, first, into confidential documents the bringing down of which would not be prejudicial to the public interest and, second, confidential documents the bringing down of which would be prejudicial to the public interest. How will my hon. friend find those confidential documents? In a government department you find them easily. The minister or officer who indites a document or a letter marks it "confidential" or does not so mark it; if he marks it "confidential" he puts a seal upon it and it remains in that category. But in the case of a person or a corporation or a railway company carrying on business, how many of the documents or letters, how much of the correspondence, how many of the transactions, are initialled as confidential by the only one who can initial them as such? Not one per cent of them, I venture to say. So that if my hon. friend's amendment passes he will be able to ask for nearly every document, every item of correspondence which exists in connection with the administration of a great railway. I think there is no getting away from that. Well, when it comes to that I think we are up against a very important problem.

My hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) got a little excited this afternoon, I think, and used naughty words—very naughty words for a man of his age and wisdom, but they got the better of him this afternoon, for a moment, and he used them. He used the word "autocracy" and threw it at us with very great vim and very great energy. He then used the "dark lantern" illustration, as if we were a band of professional burglars in this respect and were going around with dark lanterns looking for our neighbours' goods to appropriate them to our own advantage. There is no need of using hard words when you come to the contemplation or discussion of a question as important as this. But the fact that they were used just illustrates my objection of a few moments ago that the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) got off the broad road of facing a great situation and discussing it in a cool and deliberate manner, and got on to the little, narrow road, not the narrow road which the Bible deals with, but the little, narrow road which is known to party politics, and he slid along it with more than his accustomed celerity and quickness. He would not have used those words if he had come up to the discussion of the question in a broad general way. But the words "autocracy" and "dark lantern" do not lend weight to an argument; they rather mark a divergence from the path along which you proceed to a reasoned and cool discussion of a subject, to the narrow path of which I spoke where you approach the subject from traditions of partyism and from tendencies towards partyism.

But that is not the way in which we will settle this question. My hon. friend compared a public department with the operations of a great railway system under corporate management. My hon. friend, if he comes to think of that for a minute, will see that there is no parallel between those two. The Department of Public Works is not in competition with any other agencies, private or corporate or public, along the same line of work. It receives a certain amount of money from this House; it has indicated what it wants that money for; it is for the public service, and this House has a right to the last dollar to have an explanation of that expenditure, and the Public Works Department within its own domain, is engaged simply upon the outlined, delineated public services which this House authorizes it to carry on. How the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's could, for a moment, be led into the assertion that there was a parallel between the Department of Public Works and a great piece of enginery for the administration of eighteen or twenty thousand miles of railway in this country, I cannot understand; but the House can easily see that those are not parallel. While I agree with him up to the last in his assertion that the House has a right to have a full explanation of all those departmental expenditures, and that it must have them; when it comes to the other point, there are big interests upon which we have embarked; we have made a decision, that after these roads came to us—and they came to us; they pressed themselves upon us; they were taken in hand—they should not be carried on by government agency; that they should be in the form of corporate management, and we thereby divested ourselves of their direct management. Someone, with the usual lack of thought which the best of us sometimes may suffer from, has made the assertion that this great system of railways, as it exists today, is nothing more nor less than a party political machine. I am quite sure that the hon. member who made that assertion did not quite think how far it went. Is it a party political machine? Has it been so used? Is it a hot-bed of patronage? I quite understand what patronage means, and I have my friends behind me—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CAHILL: 24,000 census enumerators.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The very mention of the word "patronage" puts joy on the faces of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. COPP: We like to hear the admission.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: When we refer to patronage, oh, joy, joy!—hon. gentlemen opposite are thinking of the time when they will hold the reins of power. That is why we hear such cheers and clapping from the other side of the House whenever the word "patronage" is used. It is like a sweet morsel that they roll under the tongue, of infinite gratification to them. Do they want to come in and have its trials as well as its joys? I know what patronage means.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: From the time that the Intercolonial and the Canadian Northern shortly afterwards went out from the line of patronage, I have seen, and I have lived partly, in a different atmosphere. From the time that the new organization took hold, although I have been sometimes asked to get this man and that man and the other man a place within the administrative staff of that railway, I have never succeeded in doing so and I have never attempted to do so. There is no man, either outside of the ranks of those administrative officers or inside of them, that can controvert that statement with reference to myself. What does that prove? It proves that the Government, having laid down its policy, divested itself from the patronage in connection with the railways and held the management liable for the administration, the appointment of its staff, the promotion of its men and the general working out of the system. I have never interfered, and I think what is the fact as stated by myself would be the fact as stated by my colleagues as well. I will tell the House what I have heard. I have heard a good many pretty bitter remonstrances that in the old times it was possible to apply to a minister and get a man into a position, but now since the administration has been changed, that period has passed away and no one can seemingly get in by that path. But for a man to make in this House the statement that the whole of it is simply under a political patronage system and being run in that way, marks him, I am afraid, as a little bit thoughtless or a little bit reckless, whichever he may take as being the softest epithet to apply to himself.

I think I have stated all that it is necessary for me to state. There is but one thing more, and this bears out what the right hon. gentleman who leads the party has stated. I think that we members of Parliament, on both sides of the House should get as closely together and as quickly together as we possibly can, and try to find a solution for the situation which lies immediately in front of us. I think our reputation as members of Parliament depends upon that. I think that the country is looking to see Parliament come to some solution of that kind. They send their representatives to Parliament, those representatives are paid their emolument in Parliament, and are supposed to do their duty in Parliament, and I submit that it is the duty of this Parliament and succeeeding Parliaments to let bygones be bygones and partyism be partyism in the past, to be resumed in some dim and distant day in the future, if it is ever resumed, and for the time being to approach at least this one question with a sincere desire not to bother any one, but to get at the roots of the question—better still, to get at some sensible, sane method for solving the problem. We will not solve it by declamation nor by chucking words one at the other, whether it be "dark lanterns," "autocrats" or anything of that kind. We have enough brain, good will and business ability in this Parliament to settle upon a solution which, though it must be gradual, will be effectual and pull us out. I agree with the sentiment uttered by my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark). I am not pessimistic enough to think that Canada, with her future prospects, cannot draw herself out from this difficult railway situation of today and, with courage, persistence, and hopefulness, carry on and carry through for one, two, three, maybe several years more, until the development of the country comes even with the splendid facilities of transport that we have provided for it, and when, as a consequence, the revenues of these roads will approach the supporting point and some day or other pass it and perhaps become feeders of our revenues. But we will not get to that situation without the most careful thought and without a union of effort mental and moral, of both parties and both sides of the House towards obtaining the solution of one of the most important questions that ever devolved upon a parliament.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I had not intended to take part in this debate, but the temptation to participate in a discussion which has been honoured by the right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) taking a part in it. is perhaps a little too strong for me to resist. I wish to make a few observations on the motion before the House, and possibly a few remarks upon the speech which has just been made by the right hon. gentleman.

Ever since I have had anything to do with public speaking either in this House or out of it, I have always tried to cull some material from the speech of the man who was talking against me, to use in my own speech. I have listened to the speech of the right hon. gentleman with all the attention I could bring to bear for material, but—and I say this with all respect—beyond hurling half a dozen dictionaries across the floor I know of nothing substantial that the right hon. gentleman has said. He was very much bothered about the definition of "confidential"; that word bothered him very much. He almost committed himself, however, to this, that if we on this side of the House agreed upon what "confidential" meant, and if it was the same as the amendment, possibly he would vote for it. I am prepared to tell the right hon. gentleman that those of us who have been in this House for the last sixteen or twenty years know what the practice of Liberal and Conservative governments have been in respect to withholding matters that they considered confidential, and bringing down matters that they did not deem confidential. In the seventeen years I have been in this House I never heard of a motion from either side, Liberal or Conservative, finding fault with any government or minister for having to refuse to bring down documents on the ground that they were confidential and that the bringing of them down was not in the best interest of the country. It was always left to the judgment of the minister and the Government as to whether or not they should be brought down. There might perhaps be a little fault finding but never within my memory has there been any motion censuring a government or minister for deeming such and such matters to be confidential.

There is not the slightest question about what is meant by this motion. The motion allows for the exercise of discretion on the part of the Government as to what shall be deemed confidential, and therefore to be withheld. That certainly was the purpose of the language of the motion; otherwise, it would have had no meaning at all. I absolutely agree with the definition given by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean), who called upon the leader of the Opposition to correct him if he did not agree with him. There was no correction and the hon. gentleman went on with his speech. Consequently, I submit to the right hon. gentleman that the leader of the Opposition agreed with the position taken by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) and that the amendment as put forward bears the meaning and intent which the senior member for Halifax puts upon it. That being the case, I will call upon the right hon. gentleman to support this amendment, and to advise his friends to support it, because according to the view I take, it is left largely, if not altogether, to the Government as to what shall and shall not be brought down.

The attitude that some wise men take is peculiar. The right hon. gentleman says that this amendment is premature. He says that we should not move this amendment until we have the information. Suppose we had not moved it until we had information. Then he would have said we were ridiculous for moving for information which we then possessed. What shall we do with gentlemen of that kind? We are moving for this information at the psychological moment, as my right hon. friend would say. How could we move for information of this kind except on a motion for the House to go into Committee of Supply? What is the object of this rule, which obtains both in Great Britain and here, that there must be a motion made before Mr. Speaker leaves the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Supply? This House goes into Committee of the Whole on public and private Bills and a host of other Bills, but it is only in the case of the House going into Committee of Supply that a motion must be made that the Speaker do leave the Chair. Why is that? Because the Government are coming to the House and asking for the expenditure of the people's money, and it is the right of the House to say whether or not they have put themselves in such a position as justifies the granting of that money. Now, the idea of this amendment is that the whole circumstances in connection with the expenditure of moneys in the Railway Department shall be thrashed out. I am here representing a certain number of people, and when I go back to my constituency, they will naturally be anxious to know something about this $70,000,000 deficit in connection with the Government Railways. I shall say that I do not know, that we were just told there was a lump sum, and, having asked the Prime Minister for information, were informed that it was not in the interests of the country that we should have that information, the railways being under the control of some incorporated company, and that we should therefore refrain from asking anything about them. Well—this is what my constituents will say—did you ask anyone else for information? Yes, I will reply; we asked the Minister of Railways, but he just parroted out the same words as uttered by the Prime Minister, to the effect that it was not in the public welfare that the people should be told anything about the railways. My electors, if we did not introduce such an amendment as this, would then want to know why we voted for the expenditure of these moneys in the blind way in which this House is called upon to do. Why should the House be expected to play "blind man's buff" in matters of this kind? Why, Sir, seventy or eighty millions of the people's money is at stake, and we desire to be able to tell the electors that we did all we could to induce the Government to submit the facts, dividing the House upon the question, even though there might be a majority on the other side to vote us down. This is the kind of Government we have to-day, in the face of the situation with which we now have to deal; and my right hon. friend finds fault with the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), because that gentleman in his opinion, uses strong words! I do not quite understand this Sunday school simplicity of my right hon. friend.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: A simple mind.

Mr. McKENZIE: From the superficial knowledge which we can gather of this Government, it is not only hard words that they need. They need that instrument which a better man than the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's made use of; someone should take hold of the cord and whip them out of their seats. That is what should be done, and my right hon. friend should be thankful that he has not been brought into contact with some more material, more drastic and more painful instrument of persuasion than mere words and allusions to dark lanterns. Now, we are told by the Prime Minister, in his most solicitous and attractive tones, that he is very anxious to give us information. He wants to tell us everything about the expenditure of moneys in connection with the railways, but the Department of Railways is not to be trusted; we cannot get it through that department. But, he says, the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) has found a remedy for all these evils; he is going to appoint another fifth wheel to the coach and add to the many standing committees we have now. He is going to appoint a standing committee before which—says my right hon. friend—you shall go and drink in abundantly all the information you require to your heart's content, and the public will know nothing about the matter. Did anyone ever hear a more childish proposition than that? I have been attending committees in this House for the last 17 or 18 years, and, Mr. Speaker, I never saw a committee sitting behind closed doors. I never saw a committee on any business of importance where we did not have rail-birds all around us, representing every newspaper in the country, gobbling up every sentence worth hearing. Does the right hon. gentleman think that when this great carcase is produced and thrown into open daylight, these same rail-birds will not again be on the scene? I think he is presuming too much if he thinks that their curiosity is so satiated with the deliverance of the Minister of Railways that they will not be on the qui vive for further trade. My belief is that they will, and, as the immortal Burns puts it, if they get any information, they will "prent it," and the country will know exactly what this great concern is doing.

If we are to have information, why not let us get it through the proper channel? I submit that the Department of Railways is the legitimate, proper and constitutional source from which to get information about every dollar of money expended in connection with the railways in this country. Neither I, nor the members supporting the Government, nor any other member of this House, should be charged with the responsibility of chasing around after witnesses outside of this House in order to get information. We are maintaining a department of railways with a large staff. If that staff is not adequate in order to supply this House with such information as is absolutely necessary, I am willing to accord them whatever assistance they require to obtain that information so that we may have it in the constitutional way, from the mouth of the responsible minister at the head of the department.

The floor of Parliament is the place to inquire for and obtain information concerning every department, for the benefit of the people. That is the position we take, and I think it can be supported before any intelligent audience, either in this House or outside. I am very much surprised that any earnest, intelligent member of this House should think of voting against the amendment. We have in this country nineteen or twenty different departments, every one of them a spending body. The right hon. gentleman said there was no legitimate comparison in the matter of expenditures between the Department of Railways and Department of Public Works. But, Mr. Speaker, is it not entirely a question of degree? One spends more money than the other, undoubtedly, but they both spend money. If one spends ten millions and the other three hundred millions, are we not just as much entitled to information in the latter case as in the former? If the people of the country are entitled to know what moneys are expended in the Public Works Department, are they not, logically, equally entitled to be informed as to the expenditures in connection with the Department of Railways? I urge these arguments upon all sane men in this House representing the people. We have the following departments: Public Works, Militia and Defence, Marine and Fisheries and Naval Affairs, Interior, Agriculture, Immigration and Colonization, Finance, Mines, Justice, Labour, Post Office, Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, Customs, Trade and Commerce, the Department of the Secretary of State, the Department of the Solicitor General, the Department of External Affairs, and the Railway Department. There we have seventeen departments apart from the railways. Now, this amendment says that we are entitled to get an accounting of every dollar spent in every department in connection with the Government. Suppose we leave out the Railway Department, we say, in effect, if this amendment is not adopted, that in connection with seventeen departments, spending millions of money, we are not entitled to any information; and I gather from the attitude of the right hon. gentleman and those supporting the Prime Minister, that they contend, and will so vote, that we should have no accounting at all from any of these departments. When the members supporting the Government go back to their constituencies they will be questioned about the expenditures in the different public departments, and they will be asked "Did you vote that the House should have the information asked for?" They will have to reply truthfully "No, we voted against the amendment of the leader of the Opposition," and the people then will realize that they are not to have any information at all as to these matters.

Mr. BUTTS: I would like to know whether or not my hon. friend is arguing for a reduction in the workingmen's pay?

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not think my hon. friend could have been in the House when the amendment was read, or he would fully understand that it has nothing whatever to do with the increase or reduction of the workingmen's pay. When my hon. friend reads the amendment itself he will find that my version of it is absolutely correct. Now, Sir, I pointed out that we have this large amount of money to spend in nineteen or twenty departments, and we have hon. gentlemen sitting in this House, and we have a Government who tell us that we are not to have any information whatever about that expenditure except what the Government, in their graciousness and good nature, may possibly bring down. We are to be something like the woman who said that she would be perfectly satisfied by feeding on the crumbs that fell from the table of her lord. We are therefore to recognize the right hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House, and his confreres in the Government, as lords of that type. We must sit down at their feet and wait for some little crumb of information to be thrown to us which they may regard as worthy of our acceptance. That is the attitude taken by the Government, and that is the position in which we are placed.

I am astonished and surprised at the stand taken by my good friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) who has come to us in this country, from the very feet of Gamaliel and who is telling us occasionally, and almost all the time, that he imbibed his Liberalism from the great Gladstone himself. Now if there is anything that Gladstone taught more strongly than another it was the principle of the people ruling and governing, of the people being placed in full possession of every item of information that was necessary for the proper carrying on of the business of the country. I am surprised, therefore, that my hon. friend should lay himself open to the chage of sinning against the light; that he should come here evidently prepared to cast in his lot with the scribes and pharisees on the other side of the House who are willing to shut out every particle of information from Parliament. I think we have demonstrated beyond all question, Sir, that we are entitled to proper information about the moneys that have already been spent, and the moneys that are to be spent in the current year. What becomes of the argument that secrecy must prevail about the business of this Government? We are satisfied to get the information that is to be found in the Auditor General's Report with respect to every department, and we should not expect to go any further. That report deals with business that has been done and finished with nearly a year ago. Is this secrecy to last forever? If railway ties or locomotives have been bought and paid for, if millions have been spent on betterments for the national railways, and the transactions are finished and closed, surely the information with respect to them can be brought down to Parliament? Could anything be more absurd than to say that the policy of secrecy and exclusiveness is to last forever, and that after a transaction is closed and everything with respect to it is done, we in this House cannot find out how it was carried out and what has become of our money? Surely, as I have already said, what is true about accounts that we find in the Auditor General's Report should also be true, and the same practice followed in connection with the Department of Railways.

I lay down the principle, and I am not laying down aything new, when I say in regard to every department of Government that we cannot in this House depart from the principle of ministerial responsibility to the extent of one inch. We cannot do it; there is no safe ground outside a firm maintenance of that principle. The moment you abandon the principle of the responsibility of ministers in connection with the expenditure of public money you have no safe ground upon which to stand, and the people are deprived of responsible government in this country. The moment you switch the responsibility for all kinds of expenditures to any corporation, or any body of men, who are not called upon to come before Parliament and, through the proper channels, explain the situation in which they stand and the way in which they have expended public money, that is the situation with which you are faced. The Government is not simply coming to us to-day to make good the amount of $70,000,000, although that itself is a very large amount. Somebody, during the debate, spoke about it as being more than the entire expenditure of the Dominion of Canada some twelve or thirteen years ago. When the right hon. gentleman, who a short time ago was Prime Minister of Canada, issued his manifesto in 1911 he told the people that the expenditure of eighty-seven millions of money was in itself evidence of recklessness and corruption—that it evidenced that money had been mis-spent in this country. We are close to that amount to-day in the deficit in one department of Government, and yet we are told that we must shut our mouths and have nothing to say about it. What would my right hon. friend say if things were reversed, and he was standing on this side of the House and supporting the present amendment? There would then be no dictionaries thrown around; the missiles would be hard rocks and they would be hurled at us in such a way that the life of nobody in our ranks would be safe. But now the right hon. gentleman is suave and calm and finds fault with any man who writes his name in black letters on white paper because it might look like "a dark lantern," or something which reflected on the character of the saintly gentlemen who sit on the treasury benches. Not only are we asked to make good this sum of $70,000,000, but any person who looks at pages 34, 35 and 36 of the Estimates will find that in connection with railways alone we are called upon to vote in the vicinity of $165,000,000, which money will have to come out of the hard earned wages of the poor people of this country. Yet we are to sit here and accept the general statement of the Minister of Railways, which gives us no information at all upon which a right conclusion could be reached. Finally, let me say that we are asking for nothing but what is fair and reasonable when we demand that Parliament and the people be given the fullest possible information about expenditures in every department, including the Department of Railways.

Mr. BUTTS: Will my hon. friend allow me just one question? Who are the members of the dark-lantern brigade?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

SUPPLY

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Trade and Commerce—Salaries, $371,612.50; contingencies, $22,000.

Mr. CAHILL: Before the minister explains this item I wish to ask the Government if it is their intention, if this item passes, to go into Supply on any other department.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not aware of any reason why the question should be specially answered. The Government intends to go on with Supply according to the announcement of last night—such Supply as we can reach within a reasonable time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then my hon. friend intends to proceed with the Estimates of another department?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. CAHILL: I want to get an answer to my question because I understand it has been customary in this House, at least since I have been here, for one item to be taken at a time—I mean, one department—unless with the consent of the Opposition. If my hon. friend wishes to follow out the contention he made the other day that he has the right to go into Supply in any department, he may mention one day, all the departments and then the next day go into all departments, taking one item at a time, thus preventing the Opposition from proposing any resolution on the motion to go into Supply. It is not fair; if the attitude taken by the Government on the first items of Supply is to be followed out and it is their intention to take up two or three items in one night on one motion to go into Supply, the only protection the Opposition has is to prevent the Government from passing the first item of Supply until they tell us how many items, or how many departments they wish to go into at the one sitting.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think I see the point the hon. member has in mind. He has not expressed himself, though, correctly; he says "items" when he means "departments." Certainly we intend to pass such items as the committee feel they can fairly consider. As to the departments, I see the point the hon. member has in mind; it is that if we take up more than one department to-night we are permitted on Thursdays and Fridays to enter those departments without the consent which the rules call for. That he wishes to avoid, and I can see that there is some fairness in the contention. I would think a fair interpretation would be this: if hon. gentlemen opposite will advise us that they desire to move a general resolution against any department, I think it would only be fair on our side that we should not go into that department except on a day specially appointed so that the resolution could be moved. On the other hand I do not think it is right that the Government should deny itself the privilege of going into more than one department on the same day; otherwise, I do not see how we are going to get on with the Estimates; the House will be delayed too long. The rules of the House permit it. If on Tuesday—for quite a time—the only day available for that purpose—we take only one department at a sitting we shall be going into only one department per week, and if we do that the session will be insufferably long. We have no desire in the world to avoid a motion in amendment on going into Supply if the Opposition wish to challenge any department in that way, and if they will name the particular department they wish to challenge we shall see that a motion to go into Supply, directed chiefly to that department, is made. That seems to me to be fair.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may point out to my right hon. friend that we may wish to discuss other matters than simply those relating to one department. There are a good many subjects we would like to discuss on going into Supply. My right hon. friend knows that he can cut us off in the matter of discussion by passing from one department to another in the same night. What we are trying to reserve to ourselves is the right of discussion, not to be cut off in discussion as we have been cut off this afternoon, for example, in the matter of information. My right hon. friend was hardly fair to the member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) when he intimated that the hon. gentleman had not expressed himself in a way that could be appreciated. I put the question specifically to my right hon. friend as to departments and he answered that he intended to go into other departments if possible. Why does he say to my hon. friend who has just spoken that he has not presented the matter intelligently?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because he mentioned items instead of departments and items do not mean departments.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I mentioned departments.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know my hon. friend did, and I expressed the intention of the Government. But I do not intend to exercise that intention against the right of the Opposition to challenge a department. I think that is as fair as any government can possibly be. I do not know that the Government is bound to be giving opportunities all the time, aside from the rules of the House, to the Opposition to talk about anything at all. But I do think it is fair on the part of the Government to afford opportunities to the Opposition to challenge any department, notwithstanding that we have full power under the rules to pass from one department to another. I can see that we could abuse that power, but I do not intend to do so. But surely we are fair in saying that if the Opposition will only name the department or departments that they purpose moving resolutions against, we are ready to give them an opportunity to do so by going into Supply on the department concerned. I do not think any government has ever gone that far; I am pretty sure no government will ever go further.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Why should we be confined to the departments?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the purpose of the saving clause in the rules providing that we may not go into Supply on Thursday or Friday save on some department that we have been on before—so that in relation to that department a motion can be made: We do not intend to violate either the letter or the spirit of the rule.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We might wish to discuss the civil service, for example, which is not a department. Why should we not have that right?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It can be done; there is nothing to prevent it.

Mr. CURRIE: I suggest that this whole discussion is out of order. It is purely hypothetical.

Mr. BUREAU: The discussion is not out of order. I raised the point the other night when the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) wanted to call the estimates for his department. What we wanted to avoid was being debarred from making a motion against that particular department simply because it had been called on that particular night. Just about the time I raised the point the Prime Minister left the chamber and I suggested to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) that there be some understanding in the matter. During the twenty years that I have been here it has always been the rule that just before the House rose, the Prime Minister or the minister leading the House would tell the Opposition what particular business and the Estimates of what particular department would be taken up the next day. On the night before, the Prime Minister had said: "Any department which the Government might see fit to take up" or something to that effect. I have not the exact words, but it was repeated the next day, and I called it vague. I thought it was an answer that we did not deserve; that it was an answer that lacked courtesy. I stated at that time that, as a matter of courtesy, it had always been the rule of this House that the Opposition be informed of the work to be taken up the next day, and that the answer of the Prime Minister left the door open by him to taking up, during the discussion of Supply in Committee as to-night, items of the Estimates of more than one department thus debarring the Opposition from making a motion on Thursdays and Fridays.

Mr. CURRIE: I again ask for a ruling that this discussion is out of order. No question is now before the Committee.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CURRIE: I ask for your ruling, Mr. Chairman. We are night after night discussing the same question, and under this item a discussion of this question is out of order.

Mr. BUREAU: May I correct a statement I made?

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) has risen to a point of order. If the hon. gentleman desires to say anything on the point of order, I would be glad to hear him.

Mr. CURRIE: I will speak to the point of order. For several nights, this House has been entertained with a discussion on this question, which is purely hypothetical. If the Prime Minister makes a motion to go into Supply required by another department the question might properly arise; but that question is not before us now at all, and a discussion of that question is altogether irrelevant to the matter which is before us and which is an item of supply. As regards the matter of discussing what is to come before us, I have sat in this House for a long time, and I have listened to the right hon. gentleman who led the House previously and also to the present hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) discussing this very question. I notice that when the answer was given to the question, the leader of the Government of the day did not confine himself to one department; that many times as many as four departments were mentioned, and then followed the statement "any other matters that might come before the House." Apart from that altogether, I claim that a discussion of this kind is purely hypothetical, and that there is before the committee nothing that we can discuss this question on.

Mr. BUREAU: I want to correct what I said just now. I said that we could not make a motion on Thursdays and Fridays. What I meant to say was that we could not discuss the point.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. member is not discussing the point of order.

Mr. BUREAU: My hon. friend has talked about past governments. All that I am saying now is in regard to what has happened within the past week.

Mr. CURRIE: We have heard enough.

The CHAIRMAN: I would ask the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) to remain within the rule and to speak to the point of order.

Mr. BUREAU: According to your ruling, if this item passes, any minister may call an item of another department, and then on Thursdays and Fridays, we will go into their estimates automatically.

Mr. CURRIE: That is not the point of order.

Mr. BUREAU: That is the point of order. There is nothing else before the Chair. I submit the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. CANNON: We have heard a military man explaining the law; I will try, as a lawyer, to discuss the point of order as I understand it. I understand, when the Government moves to go into Supply, the rule is—

The CHAIRMAN: The point of order now before the Chair is whether or not hon. gentlemen have a right to discuss the point of order to which the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) is about to refer.

Mr. CANNON: I was just going to explain that I have a right to discuss the point of order just mentioned, and I wish to discuss it. The point of order is whether we can be precluded by the Government from moving an amendment to the motion to go into Supply if items in connection with more than one department are discussed at one sitting. If this is not the point of order, I think it about time that the Chairman should explain to the committee what the point of order really is.

Mr. LAPOINTE: (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted, I should like to discuss the point of order. The question submitted to us seems to be this: Have we the right, before discussing the first item that has been submitted to this committee, to know beforehand from the Government whether or not they intend to proceed with the Estimates of any other department.

I am very glad, indeed, to have been able to find out what is the real question put before you. I think we have that right, in order to avoid such a misunderstanding as we had last week. It is important for the Opposition that this question be settled once for all. It is true that we are entitled, I believe, even after discussing a few Estimates of the various departments, to introduce resolutions on the motion for the House to go into Supply, barring Thursdays and Fridays, but we could not move concerning a particular department after the Estimates of that department had been previously considered.

Mr. MORPHY: Mr. Chairman, will the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Certainly.

Mr. MORPHY: What is the point of order?

[Mr. Currie.[

Mr. LAPOINTE: The point of order is to know—as I have stated previously—whether, before taking up the Estimates, we have the right to secure from the Government a statement to the effect that they will not consider to-night the Estimates of any other department. I believe that the point of order raised by the hon. member from Simcoe (Mr. Currie) is not well taken and that we are entitled to proceed with that discussion.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) has risen to a point of order which has been fully discussed by the hon. members for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) and for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe). The point of order raised by the hon. member for North Simcoe is whether or not any hon. member has the right to question the leader of the Government concerning his intentions in regard to the passing of Estimates and the number of departments which are to be taken up at the present sitting. The question now before the Committee is item No. 21 which provides for the salaries and contingencies of the Department of Trade and Commerce. Strictly speaking, the point taken by the hon. member for North Simcoe is well taken, as the question asked is not relevant to that item. The Chairman would, however, hesitate to rule that a question concerning the conduct of the business of the Committee could not be asked at any time with a view to securing a better understanding between the two or three parties in the House, and thus expediting the business of Parliament. The question asked while it was not relevant, was a very reasonable one and the answer having been given, I will now ask hon. members to return to a discussion of the item under consideration.

Mr. BUREAU: I notice an increase of about $9,000 in the item for salaries.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The amount asked for is $371,612.50 for salaries, and $22,000 for contingencies. The total number of employees provided for 1921-22, as will be seen by the details, is 278, for which the total annual salaries amount to $371,612.50. The original Estimates for 1920-21 provided for 221 employees at $291,089.50. To that there has been added by the transfer of 57 employes under P.C. 2958, $49,763. That Order in Council provided that permanent temporaries employed in the different departments who came in before a certain date, and whose services were efficient and satisfactory, should be put upon the permanent list by the Civil Service Commission. Instead of these transfers being carried by outside votes, they have been transferred to civil government. That accounts for $49,763. Then the reclassification raised the salaries to the amount of $20,862.50. Adding these together we get the Estimate for the coming year of $371,612.50. For 1921-22 the staff remains at 278 employees, exactly the same as it was before. The net amount required for salary increases is $9,897. So we have in the whole service exactly the same number of employees, the increases being due to transfers and reclassification.

Mr. VIEN: What are the duties of the Director of Commercial Intelligence?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The present Director of Commercial Intelligence is one of the oldest and most experienced of our trade commisioners. He commenced service in South Africa, was afterwards in South America, and afterwards went to the war where he served two or three years. Then he was sent on a mission of inspection of trade commissionerships throughout the world. He has now taken the position of Director of Commercial Intelligence Service. He has under him the whole staff of trade commissioners. He has also the direction of the whole staff of Commercial Intelligence, which includes instructions to our commissioners in different parts of the world, the reception of reports therefrom, their examination, their editing, their publication in the Weekly Bulletin, and all the correspondence with business men in Canada who have more or less trade in connection with these different countries in which our trade commissioners exercise their functions. He is, in fact, the head of that very large and important branch.

Mr. JACOBS: Where is he now?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In the office here in Ottawa. He has returned from his visit of inspection. He was promoted to his present office after competition.

Mr. JACOBS: How many trade commissioners are there altogether?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I could answer that more fully on a more appropriate item, but I might say we have between twenty and thirty trade commissioners.

Mr. VIEN: Has the Director of Commercial Intelligence the duty of organizing trade agencies abroad? Does he advise the minister on the organization of such agencies?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Absolutely so.

Mr. VIEN: Has he recommended any trade mission or agency in the United States?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No.

Mr. VIEN: Has he studied that question?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Perhaps I might give my hon. friend a short statement which would bring that matter up in a better way. We have not as a policy instituted trade commissionerships in the United States. We have none there now; we never have had.

Mr. VIEN: Why?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Before the war, I commenced to study with my officers the question of the advisability of extending the service to the United States and considerable progress was made in the examination of the whole question. The war, however, intervened and it was not carried through. After the armistice I took up the question again, and since then the matter has been pretty thoroughly examined. We have not as yet adopted the policy of extending our trade commissionerships to the United States, but the matter is now under consideration, and I hope we shall arrive at a decision in respect to it before the close of this session, because if it is decided to extend them to the United States we shall have to have legislation providing therefor.

Mr. JACOBS: I would suggest that they be called "truck-and-trade" commissioners.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My own view from the first has been that there was not the same necessity for a system of trade commissioners in the United States as in more distant countries. The United States lying alongside of Canada for a distance of 3,000 or 4,000 miles, having the most intimate relations both as regards our resources and the demand and supply of both countries, with the best facilities for quick travel to and fro, with an intimate knowledge of markets and market possibilities, with the numerous interminglings commercial and otherwise between the United States and Canada, the knowledge that existed was so much greater and so much more widely distributed with reference to the United States than to other countries that there was not the same necessity for trade commissioners. Besides, we have taken up this matter of trade commissioners in a gradual way, and the expenses in connection therewith are, of course, proportionate to the distribution. If we undertook to put commercial agents in the United States, it would be very difficult to avoid placing a large number of them there. The United States covers a wide territory, and our commercial activities extend from one coast to the other, and from the forty-ninth degree down to the southern limit of the country. All these considerations have contributed to delay and have been the reasons why the department, under former governments as under the Government of the present day, has not thought fit to extend the system to the United States.

Mr. VIEN: I do not wish to be—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to interrupt him. I might say to him that if we agree to bring up these matters when we come to the votes for them, I think we should be able to expedite the business of the committee.

Mr. VIEN: I beg to remind my right hon. friend that I am strictly within the purview of the vote.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am not raising any question as to my hon. friend's right to put questions, and I will answer him. I am, however, just suggesting that we proceed from item to item in an orderly way. I have an item of two or three hundred thousand dollars for trade commissionerships and trade extension, and in connection with that, I think we can discuss to better advantage the matter which my hon. friend is now dealing with. I just put that to my hon. friend.

Mr. VIEN: I put a question to the minister a moment ago: Has the Director of Commercial Intelligence the duty of recommending to the minister the organization of trade commissions abroad? The right hon. gentleman said; yes. Then I put another question: Has the minister received any suggestion from that official as to the establishment of trade commissions in the United States? The minister replied in the negative. He said: No, he has made no such suggestion, but I have myself, with the assistance of my expert on that question, studied the matter, and thus far, owing to the war and other prevailing conditions, we have not deemed it advisable to establish such trade commissions in the United States. Now, I say that the item which is now before the committee is a proper one in connection with which to discuss the policy of establishing trade commissions in the United States, because according to the answer given by the minister, it is within the scope of the duties of the Director of Commercial Intelligence to suggest such organizations and appointments. I must offer to the minister a humble suggestion, not in the way of drastic or destructive criticism, but for the purpose of assisting him. He is of opinion that the time is not opportune to establish trade commissions in the United States; but that time may arrive before this session is very much older, and then it will mean a vote of a large amount of money to provide for such commissions.

Mr. CURRIE: May I ask the hon. member what he means by "trade commission"? I fail to grasp his meaning, although I have been waiting patiently to gather the significance of his remarks.

Mr. VIEN: A trade commission is an institution, and the trade commissioner is the officer who discharges the duties appertaining to that commission.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Listen and learn something.

Mr. VIEN: My hon. friend no doubt receives the weekly bulletins issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce, and he should know what a trade commission is, and what are the duties of a trade commissioner. By the way, may I congratulate the Department of Trade and Commerce on the publication of these weekly bulletins, which are extremely interesting and which should be of value to the trade and commerce of Canada generally. Unfortunately, in my opinion at any rate, they are circumscribed in their application, because we have no trade commissioners in some parts of the world where we should have them. The minister says that up to the present time there has been no necessity for them in the United States. On the contrary, I contend that we should have had them there for some time past. Our proximity to the United States is absolutely immaterial to the question which we are now studying. The purpose of establishing trade commissions, and appointing trade commissioners in the United States, is to open new markets in that country for Canadian industries. The situation is not affected by any question of space, for the same distance separates us from each other. Yet the American Republic have consuls in Canada, being represented in almost every town. What are these commissioners doing in Canada?—because these American consuls accomplish here what our trade commissioners do abroad. They collect information as to the openings that exist in Canada for their manufactures, and they send that information to their State Department and keep their industries posted on opportunities that offer in Canada. The right hon. gentleman says we need not have any trade commissions in the United States because of our proximity thereto.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Perhaps it might be of some importance to say that I did not say that.

Mr. VIEN: That is what I understood.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Then my hon. friend went further than my words would warrant. What I did say was that up to the present time none had been appointed. I did say also that under all administrations no appointments had been made, that I had taken the matter up before the war, had suspended it, and then took it up again after the armistice, and that it was now being very carefully looked into. I gave my own opinion as I viewed the matter in the light of the past. I then said that the government was considering the subject, and that their policy would be announced before the close of the session.

Mr. VIEN: The right hon. gentleman said that but he also said a minute ago that we were so close to the Republic to the south.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I did and I said so because it was an argument why, to my mind—and it seems to have been an argument which commended itself to the department—as matters stood it was less necessary for us to have trade commissioners there than in other countries.

Mr. VIEN: On the contrary to my mind it was much more imperative that we should have trade commissioners there.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is all right; my hon. friend has a perfect right to his opinion.

Mr. VIEN: And it is a right which I am now exercising with due respect to the right hon. gentleman. To my mind it is more imperative to establish trade commissioners in the United States because we trade more with that country. The American Republic did not hesitate, nothwithstanding the close proximity of the United States to Canada, to appoint American consuls here. What was the net result? The net result was that they have developed an export trade to Canada of nearly $900,000,000 a year. Our lack of organization has, to a great degree, prevented the expansion of our export trade to the United States. Such an organization would have been a great assistance in the development of Canadian trade with the United States. These trade agents, established in numerous centres of the American Republic, would have opened the eyes of the Trade and Commerce Department of the Dominion to the business openings which offered to Canadian manufacturers, and in turn that department could have kept our manufacturers posted with respect to those opportunities. Then we probably could have developed an export trade with the United States which would have offset, to a certain degree at least, the present adverse trade balance which is so injurious to the credit of Canada. I think, Sir, that the time has come, in fact it is long overdue, when we should pay closer attention to our relations with the United States with a view to developing our export trade to that country. That opinion must have been entertained by the present Government when they brought down legislation creating the position of Canadian Ambassador at Washington. When they did that they contended that the time had come when a Canadian representative should reside in Washington and look after Canadian interests. I do not share the opinion of the Government as to the method they then suggested. I think that our representative in Washington should by no means be linked up with the British Embassy. He should not be the vice-ambassador of the British Empire in Washington, he should be absolutely untrammeled and should represent Canadian interests exclusively: If we pay for a Canadian representative at Washington, or for Canadian trade agents in that country, it is only fair that they should work for Canada first. If we send a representative to Washington who will be attached to the British Embassy the results of his work will be compiled and will be available for the benefit of those in whose interest the British Embassy is established. We know that England does not send financial agents, or trade commissioners, or consuls, or consular agents, to the United States to produce a wider market for Canadian manufacturers. They are live wires, they look out for British manufacturers and they act wisely in so doing. If Canada wishes to develop her trade with the United States her duty is not to reply upon other representatives, whether they be British consuls, vice-consuls, or consular agents. Canada should see to it that Canadians who have only Canadian interests at heart are appointed. They should work for Canada. They should not report to the British Ambassador, but report directly to our Minister of Trade and Commerce for the benefit of Canadian industries. Who could blame the British Embassy at Washington for collecting and sending to British manufacturing the information that the trade agents of England collect in the United States? Nobody could blame them; they are appointed for that very purpose and they are paid out of the British Exchequer. If we want to develop our export trade to the United States we should imitate England's example. We should not put our Canadian representative under the guidance and control of the British Ambassador, but place him under the exclusive control of the Canadian Government. To my mind this is one of the steps which this Government should take and I humbly offer the suggestion to my right hon. friend, adding that in my opinion it was imperative to have done that long ago but more imperative than ever to-day.

Mr. CURRIE: I am very much interested in the remarks which have fallen from the hon. gentleman, and I would like to ask him a question before we pass from this topic. He is indulging in what he himself calls constructive criticism. Following that line I would ask him in what particular line of manufactures we could increase our export to the United States to a greater extent than we are now doing?

Mr. VIEN: In all kinds of manufactures.

Mr. CURRIE: My hon. friend is merely speaking in general terms.

Mr. VIEN: Let my hon. friend wait a minute. We have in Canada a number of manufacturers, but what is the prevailing condition? Canada is a narrow strip of four thousand miles in length and only sparsely populated. We have in Quebec city, for example, a manufacturer of boots and shoes. What must he do to market his goods? He has to travel three thousand miles to find a mere handful of customers in Vancouver or Victoria. The closer he is to the consumer the better. Now across the international boundary line, only fifty or one hundred miles away from his factory, there is a population of millions who could use the boots and shoes which he manufactures. There is a great market at his very door, but he has not trade commissioners to assist him in obtaining it. He has not developed that market, and yet boots and shoes enter the United States duty free. If instead of catering for a handful of customers in Victoria and the other cities of British Columbia he tried to organize his market to the south of the boundary line, although he would have to meet competition there, yet he would have equal chances with his American rivals, because he can produce just as cheaply as they can.

Mr. STEVENS: May I ask my hon. friend a question? Why could not that manufacturer send a traveller fifty or one hundred miles south, as my hon. friend suggests, just as easily as he could send him 3,000 miles west without a trade commissioner shepherding that traveller?

Mr. VIEN: We are now discussing trade commissioners, and if the argument of my hon. friend is sound it would apply to our trade commissioners all over the world.

Mr. STEVENS: Not necessarily.

Mr. VIEN: We have trade commissioners in England, Holland, Denmark, France and other European countries. Why should not the Canadian manufacturers send their agents over there—as so many do—and dispense with our trade commissioners? That would be the argument of my hon. friend.

Mr. STEVENS: I did not make an argument; I simply asked a question of my hon. friend.

Mr. VIEN: Make it a suggestion, then. That suggestion of my hon. friend applies as well to the trade commissioners that we have already established in every country as to trade commissioners in America.

Mr. STEVENS: Not at all.

Mr. VIEN: The Department of Trade and Commerce is established, not to supersede the activities of our manufacturers, but to help them out. And if it has been found a happy medium to develop our trade in other countries, why should it not be an equally happy medium to develop our trade in the United States, where we do such a great volume of business? That is the reason why I say that trade commissioners established in the United States would be able to give valuable assistance to our manufacturers in developing export business there.

Mr. CURRIE: I have no desire to delay the item, and I regret very much that the suggestion of the right hon. gentleman (Sir George Foster) was not accepted in order that we might have a more thorough discussion of trade commissioners at a future date. Evidently the hon. gentleman who has just sat down is of the opinion that the business men and manufacturers of Canada are not wide awake to the American market.

Mr. VIEN: That is quite true.

Mr. CURRIE: He is entirely mistaken.

Mr. VIEN: You are correct.

Mr. CURRIE: If there is anything going on in the United States in the way of business, or if there is any market opening for any of the products of the factories of Canada, our manufacturers are quite ready to do business. In fact my hon. friend will find that the very item he has referred to—shoes—is exported to the United States by our manufacturers. The functions of the commissioners operating in the United States as compared with the functions of the American consuls are entirely different. The American consul gets information, but I never yet saw one in Canada shepherding a bunch of American commercial travellers through the country. If he did so we would very much resent it.

Mr. VIEN: I may tell the hon. gentleman that I have come in contact with American consuls trying to help their manufacturers to find a market in Canada.

Mr. CURRIE: I must have been particularly unfortunate, for I have never seen any of them. The principal thing they do, so far as my knowledge of them goes, is simply to take a fee when you make an affidavit before them and draw big salaries. They are not functioning any more than the British ambassadors are in the way of finding markets. They supply information, of course, to their government, but they are not going around looking for orders.

Now, I will say this for the Department of Trade and Commerce: In my personal experience of world trade I can safely say that no finer lot of business men could be sent to foreign countries than have been sent by the department within the last four or five years. The Canadian manufacturers owe a deep debt of gratitude to the young men who have been sent, for instance, to China, India, Japan, Australia, New Zealand and South America. They take great pains to establish connections with our manufacturers here and to instruct us as to what line of goods we can sell there to advantage, and millions of dollars worth of Canadian goods have been sold in those markets through the instrumentality of those men. Nothing more useful has been done for Canada in fifty years than the work these men have accomplished in the last five or six years, when we needed markets badly, and when the markets of the world were open to us because German and other foreign competition was withdrawn. The fact that Canadian factories have taken the place of the factories of the Entente and supplied millions of dollars worth of goods to those countries is largely due to those clever young men sent out by the Department of Trade and Commerce. I wish to bear testimony to the very effective work they have done, and to say that this country can do nothing that is too good for them. Of course, occasionally a square peg gets into a round hole, but that has not occurred very often recently, and the work of these commissioners must commend itself to every Canadian who has had anything to do with them.

Unfortunately, for the moment our trade with Australia and New Zealand, which had reached very large proportions, is now cut off, largely due to the fact that those two Dominions have no credits with Canada. I do not wish to trespass on the rules of the House, but I would suggest that the Government should seriously take into consideration the granting of credit to Australia and New Zealand so that that trade may be continued until such time as those two countries have reached the point where normal conditions might be said to have been re-established.

Mr. VIEN: What is the nature of our shipments to those countries?

Mr. CURRIE: All kinds of manufactured goods.

Mr. McMASTER: That is general.

Mr. CURRIE: No, it is not general in Australia, but I say that we have displaced Germany and England in the Australian market for most lines of manufactured goods. The depression, as the hon. gentleman has said, is general so far as those two Dominions are concerned, but that condition of affairs does not extend to China, India and Japan; their credit is ample here, and they can pay for anything they buy from us. Unfortunately, however, Australia and New Zealand have not the funds now to pay for goods that they would very much like to purchase from us. They would buy millions of dollars worth of manufactured goods from us in the next five or six months if some form of credit was arranged whereby they could pay for those purchases.

Mr. VIEN: In what particular lines?

Mr. CURRIE: Every line of manufactured goods—for instance, textiles and hardware. We have sold millions of dollars worth of hardware in Australia and New Zealand. They require all kinds of goods such as we use in the ordinary carrying on of business here, and which we manufacture. There is a good market for those goods in Australia and New Zealand, but we cannot fill that market at the present time.

I might say also in the same connection that the Government must seriously take into consideration the question of export freight rates. If we are going to do business in those countries we must have lower freight charges. There is no use for our trade commissioners to go to those countries and get thousands of dollars' worth of business while our freight rates compare so unfavourably with the freight rates, for instance, from Philadelphia and from Pittsburg. The rate from Pittsburg to Hong Kong is now about $27, and the Canadian rate will run to $37. You cannot do business under those conditions. The last hoist given to Canadian freight rates has cut away all our foreign trade; the decline in Canada's foreign trade during the last three months is entirely due to that fact. It was freight rates that gave Germany the benefit of the markets of the world. A manufacturer in Munich would get a through freight rate to Smyrna just as a manufacturer in Hamburg could, and that rate was at least two-thirds less than from Liverpool or from London. If we are to maintain our foreign trade we must nurse it along. But I must bear testimony to the young men who have been employed by this department as trade agents. From all quarters of the globe—Argentine, Brazil, South Africa—they send communications stating that so-and-so wants to sell certain lines of goods; that Canadian goods are known in that district and that an interchange of business is desired. Reverting to the United States, the question has been discussed of establishing Canadian chambers of commerce. It would be of vast benefit to this country if Canadian chambers of commerce could be established in all the large centres of the world. The offices set up in this connection would be a centre for all the Canadians carrying on business in a particular locality, a place in which our agents might have a desk when they went there, and where they could consult with the trade commissioner. I am satisfied that the foreign trade of Canada would be enormously increased if such chambers of commerce were established. As to the necessity for our having trade commissioners in the United States, I may point out that the Canadian manufacturers are wide awake to everything that is going on there, and, as the member for Red Deer would say, it would be sending coals to Newcastle to assume that we could carry on a greater trade than we are now carrying on with the United States in manufactured goods. Practically every line of business in Canada, with the exception of pulpwood and grain, is largely carried on in the United States and for that business there is a large foreign market as well as a large home market. If you go into their home market with your carloads of goods, reports will very quickly be sent to Washington of what you have been doing, and obstacles will be thrown in the way of your export trade.

Mr. CANNON: Would the hon. member recommend that we renew our trade with Russia and send our trade commissioners to that country?

M. CURRIE: I was not discussing Russia for the moment. I was emphasizing the point that the establishment of chambers of commerce in such large centres as New York, Boston, Chicago, San Francisco and other places of that kind would result in our buyers going to these points and also in an increase of our sales. Now, with reference to an extension of our trade with Russia—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: May I prevail upon my hon. friends on both sides to leave these big questions until we come to the big votes and to get through some of these smaller things first?

Mr. CURRIE: I agree with the minister, but as these matters are sometimes brought up without some of us being able to discuss them, I am endeavouring to entertain my hon. friends opposite with a few remarks on the subject so that when the matter comes up again they will have a greater knowledge of it and will be able to discuss it intelligently.

Mr. ROBB: We have done a reasonable day's work and perhaps at this late hour we might make some progress and adjourn. I am sure that the minister would prefer being comfortably at home to sitting here discussing these items.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am ready to sacrifice myself on the altar of my country for a few hours.

Mr. ROBB: So far as the member for Lotbinière (Mr. Vien) advances the idea that we should have trade agents in overseas countries, I am with him. I think that trade agents in overseas countries and a much better display than we have now of Canadian products in the cities of the British Isles might be of great advantage to Canada. But so far as establishing a number of paid agents in the United States is concerned, it seems to me that having regard to the present financial position of our country there is much to be done before we undertake a work of such questionable value. Now, I am satisfied that the shoe manufacturers of the city of Quebec have their travellers on the road out as far as British Columbia, a point much more distant than the larger markets of the United States. If they are able to send travellers out to British Columbia to look for business I am sure that these manufacturers or any other manufacturers in Canada would rather trust to their own trained help than to a government agent of doubtful business capacity. The business men of this country are just as able to go out and look for business in the United States as they are to go out and look for it in British Columbia and the western provinces, and I am satisfied that they can do it with greater advantage to themselves and to Canada than a government official can. For these reasons I am not prepared to follow the member for Lotbinière in his argument in favour of trade agents in the United States. I do think, however, that any money spent in the display of Canadian goods in overseas countries will produce profitable returns and I shall be willing to support the minister in any appropriation that he may require for that purpose.

Mr. PARENT: The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Currie) has stated that Canada has an export trade in shoes. Would he state what particular brand of shoes are being exported to the United States, what their trade-mark is, and where they are manufactured?

Mr. CURRIE: I have no idea what their trade-mark is. All I know is that the United States trade returns two or three years ago showed quite an import trade in shoes from Canada.

Mr. PARENT: The Slater shoe was exported for a while, that is all.

Mr. CANNON: I see in the details concerning this appropriation certain items with respect to motion pictures and officials connected with that branch of the department. The right hon. gentleman went to Paris last year and I think he was there the year before as well. During his stay in the capital city of France, he probably acquired very artistic tastes. I notice, for instance, that amongst the officials of the department is an artist who is receiving a rather good salary. Who is this artist, how are his or her services hired, and what are exactly his or her duties in the department.

Mr. PARENT: Would the minister, at the same time, kindly give an explanation regarding the Director of Commercial Exhibits?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It will be quite within the knowledge of members of Parliament that for the last three or four years, the Department of Trade and Commerce has been availing itself of films as a means of educating and informing the people of other countries of the resources of Canada, what we produce, the processes of production, and certain scenic qualities of the country as well, all going to make up a propaganda of film production and exhibition. This has enlarged from year to year, and it has proved one of the most profitable investments that we have made; as being one of the most appealing methods of distributing information amongst large bodies of people. In that work, we have developed a staff which is of excellent ability and which turns out work which, I think, is not surpassed by any company or aggregation that works along those lines. You must have, in the taking of those negatives, an artist who is able to pose the situation, so to speak, so as to get your results, if it is a scenic effect, from the best possible angles, so as to produce the most catching and attractive form of what you are producing. That explains what the artist is for. He is not a painter of pictures, nor anything of that kind. How we obtain him is through the Civil Service Commission by advertising the nature of the work and then selecting from those who apply the one who appears to be best fitted for that work. We had, as our chief director, Mr. Norrish, for two or three years. We lost him about a year ago, or a little less, because he was taken from us by the Canadian Pacific for exactly the same kind of work, but at a much larger salary than we were able to give him. There is, therefore, a staff which is employed in taking those negatives, in developing them afterwards and in distributing them. As to the distribution, I am sorry I have to take this on an item of an officer rather than when we come to the main vote for this work. Perhaps the information which I have given now will do for this particular thing, because when we come to that item, I should like to deal with it a little more at length, so that the House may know what we are doing along that line.

Mr. VIEN: We were told by the Chairman that the details of the appropriation which is now before the committee are given at page 105 of the Estimates, and this is taken from page 105.

Mr. CANNON: If I understand the matter aright, the minister is willing to give all the details in connection with officials whose names appear on page 105, but there is another item as regards distribution, and the right hon. gentleman would rather give the explanation when that item comes up.

Mr. VIEN: What is that item?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The large item from which we pay the expenditures for this work.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): I would suggest to the minister that when he comes to deal with the question of films and the distribution of them, if it were possible for him to give us a moving picture of the 24,000 census enumerators, that would make a very interesting show for the House and the country.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It would cost a very large sum of money to do that, and I doubt if the object gained would be worth the expense in trying to satisfy my hon. friend's curiosity.

Mr. VIEN: It would be a fine collection of Tories, and maybe the last one.

[Sir George Foster.]

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It would I hope be a collection of very intelligent men and women.

Mr. PEDLOW: It would be an excellent exhibition of the "No patronage system" as carried on by the Government. I would like to have some information regarding the item: "Chief, foreign tariffs division, $2,610."

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: One part of the work of that branch—and that comes again later, although this is the salary for the chief officer—is to keep track of all the tariffs of all countries in the world. We must know in the department at Ottawa, in order to answer questions which are constantly put to us, the tariffs which rule in all the countries in the world with which we do business, and that is practically with all countries of the world. A tariff is passed at a certain time; but according to the different countries, you have modifications of that tariff by regulation, and you have to keep track of all of those. You have frequent legislative changes in the tariff, and you have to keep track of all of those. If my hon. friend wants to know the tariff upon any article in any of the principal countries in the world—and I think I may say in any of them—that information is at his disposal in the department; we are constantly being asked for that information, and we are constantly distributing it. It would be a sorry department if we did not have that part of it up to date.

Mr. PEDLOW: That is a very important work to perform, but is all that work performed for the sum of $2,610?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is the salary of the chief, and you will find some others of the staff along through the list. One man does not quite do all the work. It is a piece of work that one man could not perform by himself.

Mr. PARENT: I notice that on page 105 there is the position of Director of Commercial Exhibits. This would lead one to believe that we have commercial exhibits, and a director of that service. What are the duties of this officer?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: He is in charge of two different things. We have an exhibit of commercial articles gathered from a great many countries in the world with which we do business. Our trade commissioners in these different countries get samples of the goods which are largely in vogue in those countries. These are brought to the attention of our commercial men in Canada. A selection is made by our trade commissioners; they do not send us samples of everything that is used in these different countries, but discriminate and try to send samples of goods Canadian manufacturers might very well supply. We have an exhibit of these things in our Commercial Museum on Bank street. That is one part of the Director's duties. Then our trade commissioners have partial exhibits that they use in their offices. The Director of Exhibits has all this under his charge, their collection, their distribution, and all the information with reference to that.

Mr. PARENT: Does that include Canadian manufactured products?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No, articles manufactured in other countries, but which our Canadian manufacturers might very well be able to supply. If they visit this place on Bank street they will see exactly the types and forms of these articles in common use in these different countries, which it would be worth while for them to undertake to supply. If my hon. friend has been a reader of the Bulletin he will see that our trade commissioners when sending in their reports, if the article itself cannot be sent, send a diagram of the article. That appears in the Bulletin, and manufacturers can see exactly what is wanted and tell whether it is worth while for them to try and supply that particular article. That has proved very useful indeed, and much of the increase in our foreign trade has been due to that kind of representation, and the representation of the article itself.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): Do the manufacturers themselves take an interest in these exhibits and co-operate with the department in making them a success I notice by the British newspapers, for instances, that the manufacturers have no less than four large exhibitions running in Great Britain at the present time for the purpose of showing the British people that British manufacturers can beat any others in the world, and that is therefore no use for the people to buy their goods outside. The British manufacturers are willing to compare their goods with those of any other manfacturers in the world. I should like to know the attitude of the Canadian manufacturer in this matter. Does he assist in making these exhibits a success? Does he co-operate at his own expense to some extent?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Canadian manufacturer is doing exactly what the British manufacturer is doing. He is trying by exhibit of his goods, sometimes by car exhibit, sometimes by local exhibitions, and in every other way possible to show to the people of Canada that he can manufacture the goods they need just as good as anybody outside. We do not help him in that; he does the whole of it at his own expense. If my hon. friend has ever had the good fortune to go to the Canadian National Exhibition, as it is called, in the city of Toronto, which is held in the last week of August and the first week of September, he will have seen there a most wonderful exhibit of the products of our manufacturers, to speak of only them for the time being. They have the latest and most up-to-date equipment there, and their own representatives on the spot, able to give out information, distribute literature and so forth. Although that is the largest exhibition, there are others in a smaller way throughout all of Canada. That is the business of the manufacturers; we do not help them in that. What we help them in is in getting them samples of goods that are largely used in other countries, and which we think the Canadian manufacturer might very well make. When they see these samples they can make up their minds whether they will fill the bill in those countries in respect to that particular form of manufacture. To that work we bend our energies, and ask the Canadian manufacturers to take advantage of the exhibits we make for that purpose.

Mr. PEDLOW: It might be interesting for the committee to know that on Thursday last a gentleman by the name of Mr. Halladay, a brother of the hon. member for Bow River, addressed a small gathering in the Railway Committee room. This gentleman had travelled around the world representing a Canadian company, the Canada Cycle and Motor company, and his address was, I think, one of the most interesting and illuminating I have ever listened to. During the course of the year he had travelled over 41,000 miles. He had started out from his headquarters in Canada, crossed the Pacific to Japan, travelled extensively through Japan and China, gone down to the islands of the Pacific, Sumatra and Java, then to Australia and New Zealand, India, South Africa, and back home again. One interesting fact he brought out was that during the war Japan had built up an enormous foreign credit balance. The result of that was that the merchants of Japan were buying largely outside of their own country. That had an adverse effect on the manufacturers of Japan, so the government of that country stopped foreign credits in an endeavour to compel the citizens of Japan to purchase from their own manufacturers. Their attitude in that respect was very much like the attitude of those in this country who try to prevent the Canadian people from buying merchandise outside their own country, even though they can buy to better advantage. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) spoke of some obstacles in the way of Canadian manufacturers obtaining trade outside of this country. In my judgment, you cannot hope to make a success of foreign business in this or any other country unless you buy from the country where you sell. You cannot expect to sell to any great extent unless you buy from that place. That means, in my judgment, that the tariff in this country which prevents importations will also limit exportations to foreign countries. I am sorry there was not a larger number of members present to listen to the very excellent and instructive address of Mr. Halladay. His remarks were certainly interesting and illuminating. A point he made clear was that all the goods sold by his concern outside of this country were sold at a profit. It is held that goods sold by Canadian manufacturers outside Canada are sold at cost of production or at a loss sometimes to keep factories going. His claim was that the goods sold by his concern in foreign markets were sold at a profit and that their goods were sold to the consumers in Canada at higher prices than abroad.

Mr. MAHARG: I want some information on item 4, at page 105, regarding the expert in grain chemistry. Who is this expert at the present time?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This has reference to the grain laboratory in Winnipeg. Dr. Birchard is director. My hon. friend knows that we have been carrying on through that laboratory certain experiments, for instance, in regard to the conditions of wheat, as respects moisture, and how they affect the keeping of wheat in transport and storage. A very important part of the work of that branch has been the experiments in connection with milling and baking, which have been carried on now for two or three years. And we are publishing each month bulletins which give the results of the milling and baking tests. Experiments are made in regard to different kinds of wheat and how they pan out in these processes. Dr. Birchard is director, and has a staff of three who, with him, carry on that laboratory.

Mr. McMASTER: Monsieur le President—

Mr. MAHARG: Does this official report directly to the department or to the Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: He works in connection with the Board of Grain Commissioners and also report to the department. He is estimated for in the civil government, and is, as my hon. friend will see, an officer in the department, being under its instructions. But there must be in all these matters of experiments, etc., strict collaboration between himself, the Board of Grain Commissioners and the inspector in Winnipeg.

Mr. McMASTER: Monsieur le President—

Mr. MAHARG: Does he submit his reports to the Board of Grain Commissioners first, and after they are dealt with by the Board, are those reports passed on to the department?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My impression is that he reports to the department direct, and sends a copy of the same report to the Board of Grain Commissioners. I know we keep records here.

Mr. McMASTER: Monsieur le President—

Mr. MAHARG: There is a considerable doubt in the minds of some people as to how that works. We are looking for good things from that laboratory in Winnipeg, but so far as we are concerned, there seems to be little information available, and what there is to be obtained is difficult to get at. Some people are under the impression that he reports to the Board of Grain Commissioners, who censor those reports and then pass them to the department. That is the point upon which we desire to be clear.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is not so; we do not get censored reports, but the original documents. I would call the attention of my hon. friend to this fact, which he will realize the moment I mention it. With regard to tests of grain as to moisture conditions and their influence on either transport or storage, and so far as the quality of grain is concerned for milling or testing purposes, it is impossible to set a laboratory to work and expect results within the first year or two. The best results cannot be obtained for several years, because of the differing conditions from year to year. You must get a series of experiments over a wide area and extending over a reasonable period in order to strike the average result. During the first years of experimentation there was very little distribution of information. Now that period has passed and the director has got upon more solid ground. There is a wider basis for deductions and recommendations, and these brochures or bulletins are being now issued regularly with an authority which they could not have in the more experimental stage. If my hon. friend has not experienced any good results from the work that has been carried on, I can assure him that we have numerous and very strong commendations of what has been done.

Mr. McMASTER: Monsieur le Président—

Mr. MAHARG: I do not want to be understood as saying that we have received no benefit from this work, for such is not the case. We are, however, of the opinion that we are not receiving the benefits which we should expect. One of the principal things which we anticipated would be the determination of a reasonable spread between different grades of grain, but we have not seen any action in that direction so far. The spread between different grades is as wide this year as ever, if not wider.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend will admit that there is a wide difference between the application of what may be considered as knowledge, absolute or concrete, of the qualities of different grades of grain, and the devising of means by which that knowledge will be put into practice in the actual process of buying, because the process of buying depends upon so many other considerations than the quality of wheat, that the spread is sometimes very large, often much larger than it ought to be. It is very difficult to find out how to apply scientific knowledge to buying in the market towns.

Mr. McMASTER: Monsieur le Président—

Mr. MAHARG: I should like the minister—

Mr. McMASTER: Are you through?

Mr. MAHARG: I desire to finish the point I am discussing.

Mr. McMASTER: Monsieur le Président—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Mon honorable ami (M. Maharg) a la parole.

Mr. McMASTER: Mais qu'il achève.

Mr. MAHARG: If I understood the minister correctly, he said that this chemist determined the amount of moisture that grain should carry in storage, or words to that effect. Has the present chemist anything to do with determining the amount of moisture that grain should contain in order to enter a certain grade, say, No. 1 Northern grain? Does he determine the amount of moisture it should carry?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not think that element is considered in the grading of grain. Whether it is possible to do so or not I do not know, but practically it has never been done up to the present time. It may be that in time we may add to the tests for the grading of grain, which are now largely mechanical, some scientific principles, which have been ascertained by results in the manner suggested; but up to the present time the mechanical methods, of touch and sight have been those used for determining the different grades.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. MAHARG: I quite appreciate the anxiety of hon. gentlemen to get away at this hour of the night, but this is one of the matters that we in the West are largely interested in.

Mr. CANNON: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member for Maple Creek voted earlier in the evening against the Government giving information, and therefore I cannot see why he should insist upon obtaining information now.

Mr. MAHARG: If I desired to enter into any discussion of the point that my hon. friend has raised I could give him a very apposite reply. The point that we would like to be clear on is—who does determine the amount of moisture that grain shall carry to permit of it entering into the different grades?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am not an expert in the business, but in so far as I have seen it carried one, the grading is done by the inspectors or the graders after having taken a sample from the car. The grain is placed on the table of the examiners and they grade it according to its plumpness, or otherwise, and its color. That is done either by the eye or by touch.

As to making a moisture test of each grade I judge that is not done. However, I am not an authority on the subject and I would have to ask my officers for information in respect to it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We are within a few minutes of midnight. Does not my right hon. friend think we have been discussing these matters long enough?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is true that we have been discussing them at some length but we have not made any progress. I cannot conceive of such an intelligent body of men as I see before me spending all this time upon an item and leaving without adopting it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If we pass this item will it satisfy my right hon. friend?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am entirely in the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite. Of course the progress of the business depends very largely upon them and if they do not want to hurry matters I am in their hands.

Mr. VIEN: In the closing days of last session the right hon. gentleman himself, in almost the last words uttered by him at that time, criticized us because we passed a lot of his Estimates without studying them sufficiently. He made reference particularly to the Estimates of the Department of Justice saying: "You discussed a few legal questions, but when you came to the Estimates themselves you rushed them through, and you did not even discuss a few which to my mind were objectionable or at least questionable." Well, Sir, to-night we have studied to the best of our ability the Estimates which have been submitted to us. The details of the item which is now under consideration cover more than a page, and I think it is only reasonable that we should now adjourn so that we can give to the item the attention which it demands. My hon. friend from Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg) is seeking a lot of information from the minister and I shall do my best to assist him in getting it. I support very heartily the suggestion that we adjourn.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The hon. gentleman has supported the item for the last hour and a half, and I am sure we will never have any lack of questions so long as he is in the same state of mind that he is to-night.

Mr. VIEN: I have a lot of questions to put when the minister's estimates are again taken up.

[Sir George Foster.]

Mr. McMASTER: (Translation.) It seems to me that if I appeal to the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the language in which he is now a master, he will accept my suggestion. It seems to me that we have done a good day's work. The minister himself, during half an hour, endeavoured to arrive at a definition of what is and what is not confidential. He has wasted half an hour of the hon. member's time on this subject. The Deputy-Speaker has settled most difficult questions of order in a very satisfactory way for himself and perhaps for the House. I do not think it necessary that I insist on the matter. We were interested witnesses of the minister's acrobatic feats, and pyrotechnical dialectics, and I think we may request this from him because he is a wise man, a man of experience, a man who attends to the country's business; he must be in favour of the eight-hour day; if he is not, he deserves that all good labourers in this country vote against him at the next elections, and there will be enough electors voting against him in the next election contest to oblige him to give the labourers some encouragement. I am not here to make a speech; it is midnight, time for us to disappear, let us finish.

The Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER: (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I have listened with close attention to my hon. friend's suggestion. He has discussed—yes, he has discussed, and discussed, yet, I do not think he has shown any good reason for an adjournment. There is no necessity, because it is twelve o'clock, that the committee adjourn without having passed a single item. After such a varied and eloquent debate, we should pass a few items and then we could enjoy a good sleep on a peaceful conscience.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. DUFF: Before the item carries I would like the Minister of Trade and Commerce to repeat in English his French speech of a few minutes ago. I did not understand one word he said, and I think it is his duty in regard to these items to give the information which he imparted in French to us all.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is not necessary that every member on that side of the House should understand French.

Mr. DUFF: The Estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce are perhaps one of the most important set of Estimates that this House has to consider, and it seems to me that at this early hour of the morning—it is one minute past twelve—the minister should not ask us to pass an item of over $390,000 for salaries, especially in view of the fact that so very few Government members are present. It is quite evident that those gentlemen are carrying out the wish they expressed to-night when they voted for no information. There is a great deal of information which we would like to have, and although I might, of course, move that the Chairman do now leave the Chair, which motion would carry because we have more members present on this side than are now in their seats on the Government benches, I do not wish to take that course, and I respectfully ask the minister to report progress.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have no desire to press these Estimates unduly, but I think we should pass this item. If any information is required I shall be very glad to give it.

Mr. FOURNIER: As my right hon. friend has proved his love for the French language, I would ask him to publish his weekly bulletin in French. That is a most desirable and necessary improvement.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will take it into the most sympathetic consideration.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. CANNON: Before the item carries or the committee adjourns, I would like to tell the minister that the Canada Year Book published by his department is most incomplete in regard to the educational institutions in the province of Quebec. Some of our most important colleges are not even mentioned as educational institutions, although many of them have been active for over a century.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am very glad my hon. friend has called attention to those omissions, and when we come to the item provided for the Canada Year Book I shall have the information for him. These educational statistics have only been attempted within the last two or three years, and if any lack of information is noticed it is certainly a kindly act on the part of any member to call attention to it.

Mr. CAHILL: There is an item here for the Dominion Statistician. I asked the right hon. minister yesterday for information about the census enumerators in the county of Pontiac, because previously I had written to the Chief Commissioner and he told me that the appointments had not been made. I understand that the Government endeavoured to make appointments, but as some Ontario men were appointed I have no doubt the ministers representing the province of Quebec objected. The minister told me that the appointments had been made, but I have not been able to ascertain the names of the commissioners. Would the minister be good enough to give me those names now?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have not the names at hand now. When I answered my hon. friend yesterday I told him that the appointments had been made; that is correct.

Mr. CAHILL: That is, permanent appointments?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes. The chief trouble was in reference to the geographical situation in the county of Pontiac. In the end we divided it into three parts of one division. Temiskaming is the most populous part and as it would be necessary for one of the proposed appointees to travel two or three hundred miles to take up the work there, I have made arrangements whereby a resident of Temiskaming shall act for that part of Pontiac.

Mr. POWER: Would the item under consideration include the Dominion Bureau of Statistics?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That would include the Civil Government employees, but not the work of the statistical department; that is a separate vote.

Mr. CANNON: Does that include the salaries of the remaining employees of the Board of Commerce?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No.

Mr. CANNON: Is there a special item for those salaries?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. CAHILL: No. Mr. Chairman. There are several items here that we would like to have some information on. What is "Chief Transportation Division?"

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Statistical Department has a very wide field of work, and amongst other things it has to prepare statistics of the different transportation systems, which was formerly looked after by the department of Railways and Canals. The Statistical Branch of that department has now been merged with the General Statistical Department, and this is the officer who attends to that branch of work.

Mr. PARENT: (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, at page 105 of the Estimates there is an item as to a "lecturer," which can be translated by the word "conférencier." Could the hon. minister say whether or not that lecturer gives lectures in both languages and whether or not he is qualified to give them in French and in English?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In the first year and part of the second year during which we were commencing and perfecting the preparation of films we put on a series of exhibits of these films and visited about sixteen or eighteen of the principal cities of the Dominion, commencing at Halifax and passing through Westmount. The pictures were explained by a lecturer and they formed, I am sure, a valuable contribution to the information of the people generally as to what we are doing in the department. They were received with apparent satisfaction, the tributes offered in that connection being very numerous.

Mr. PEDLOW: I find on page 105 the following item: "1 chief, division of demography, $3,960." What class of work is demography?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is really the taking of the census. The word comes from the Greek "demos," the people, and "graphn, " a writing.

Mr. POWER: Is the Dominion Statistician, who is at the same time Census Commissioner, also chief of the division of demography?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No. The chief of the division of demography works under Mr. Coats.

Mr. POWER: What is his name?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: E. S. Macphail. He is one of our older civil servants in that department, and a most efficient man.

Mr. POWER: As I understand it, the Dominion Statistician collects facts with reference to men and women and things, whereas the chief of the division of demography would collect only facts with reference to human beings. Am I right in that?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not quite see the distinction between men and women and human beings.

[Sir George Foster.]

Mr. POWER: The minister misunderstood me. I said men and women and things—inanimate things.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Oh, I think the Dominion Statistician does more than that. He is director of all the varied activities of the Statistical Department, which are not confined to simply counting men and women and inanimate things and tabulating them. He has under him a very large staff.

Mr. POWER: Mr. Macphail is actually in charge of the taking of the census?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. POWER: Then where does Mr. Coats fit in?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Just as the director of a large business establishment fits in over numerous branches and divisions of the business controlled by him.

Mr. PEDLOW: In the Auditor General's Report Mr. Coats' salary is given as $4,000, while on page 105 of the Estimates it is given as $4,800 for 1920-21, and $5,100 for 1921-22. Will the minister explain the difference?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Probably it is due to reclassification.

Mr. POWER: The same thing applies to the demographist.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: And the same reason would apply.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE BILL

SECOND READING

Bill No. 38, to incorporate La Compagnie de Téléphone Québec Union Electrique (The Quebec Union Electric Telephone Company).—Mr. Power.

On motion of Right Hon Mr. Meighen the House adjourned at 12.20 a.m. Wednesday.

Wednesday, March 23, 1921

The House met at Two o'clock.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. H. H. STEVENS (Centre Vancouver) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 41, to amend the Railway Act.

He said: Very briefly, the object of this Bill is to amend certain sections of the Railway Act in which reference is made to the matter of discrimination in rates. In the Act as it now stands the word

"discrimination" is invariably preceded by words such as "unreasonable", "undue", "unfair", and such like. This Bill proposes to remove these words, thus making the question of discrimination an absolute one, rather than one that is subject to these modifications.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

LAKE OF THE WOODS' CONTROL

On the Order "Questions" being called:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this being Private Members' day, it seems improbable that the Orders of the Day will be reached, and consequently I shall not be able to take the usual opportunity of fulfilling two or three promises I made to the House yesterday. I would, therefore, crave the privilege of making a statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House that the right hon. gentleman should have unanimous consent to make his statement?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I undertook to reply to-day to a question of the hon. member for Three Rivers and St. Maurice (Mr. Bureau) as to whether communications had come from the International Joint Commission with reference to control of the waters of the Lake of the Woods, either since or prior to November last, or from any Branch, American or Canadian. The answer is, No. The last communication was some time in March 1916. I know that that is outside the period that the hon. member had in mind.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—AMQUI STATION

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): The hon. member for Matane (Mr. Pelletier) asked as to communications which I should have received, but which he complained were unanswered. The first one referred to, dated March 10, was received and acknowledged. The second one, dated March 15, was also received and acknowledged. I will hand the answer to the hon. member. CIVIL SERVICE BONUS

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): I also promised to make a statement to-day with regard to the bonus granted to the Civil Service. The House, of course, knows that this bonus has been given to meet the abnormal increase in living costs. This addition to civil service salaries amounted, for the fiscal year just closing, to some $12,500,000, running the total appropriation for remuneration of the Civil Service for the year to something over $66,000,000. The Government has decided, in view of the increases following re-classification, and of the diminishing cost of living, and having regard also to the imperative necessity of retrenchment wherever possible, to reduce this bonus, commencing with the ensuing year, by 25 per cent.

In answer to the question whether it will be distributed, I may say that it is not the intention to do so as the report is too voluminous to print.

CAPTAIN HENRY C. ADAMS

Mr. CURRIE:

1. Has the attention of the Government been drawn to the following press despatch published in the Ottawa Citizen of the 16th instant,

Capt. Adams Did Not Rebuke Canadians.
Report of His Speech at Vancouver Wrong

Vancouver, March 15—In a despatch sent out last night, Captain Henry C. Adams, of the Canadian naval squadron, was incorrectly reported to have said in a speech at the Canadian Club luncheon that England was paying $17 a head for maintenance of the navy, an-that it was time that Canada stepped into the breach and assumed her fair share of the burden. This remark was made by Gordon C. Jackson, secretary of the Dominion Navy League.

2. In view of the aspersion cast upon Captain Adams by an honourable member of this House, based upon the erroneous information referred to in the foregoing despatch, as reported in Hansard of the 15th instant, will the Government take measures to ensure that Captain Adams is publicly exonerated from the reflections thus made upon his discretion as a Naval Officer?

Right Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: The remarks which the question intimates constituted an aspersion consisted in a question to the Government as to whether its attention had been drawn to certain remarks attributed to Captain Adams in a newspaper, and whether, if such remarks had been made, any disciplinary action was contemplated by the Government. As appears from the question which the hon. member has done us the service to put on the Order Paper, the remarks were not made. There does not appear to be any aspersion, at all events any which the Government has power to remove.

GRANTS TO AGRICULTURAL SHOWS

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Verchères) moved:

Whereas, the regulations of the Department of Agriculture provide, in connection with autumn shows of domestic animals and poultry, that agricultural societies which have spent a minimum amount of $3,600 of their own money in their preceding show for the granting of prizes to the above classes of exhibits, will be entitled to a minimum grant of $2,500 from the Department of Agriculture.

Whereas, in fixing a sum of $3,600 as a minimum of expenses for the obtention of a grant the department does not encourage in any way the small local fairs held in counties which as an average distribute about $500 in prizes for aforesaid classes of exhibits.

In the opinion of this House it is expedient to amend the present regulations by reducing the minimum to $500, and by entitling the said fairs to the two-thirds of the amount expended in the previous year, this fraction being given as a grant providing that the amount expended was at least $500.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the object of this resolution is apparent as the motion speaks for itself, and it is my intention to be very brief in the remarks which I purpose to make in support of it. In passing, I may remark that this is another non-partisan resolution. Its purpose is to encourage local and county exhibitions of domestic animals and poultry. As the regulations of the department now stand, it is provided that, in connection with the autumn shows of domestic animals and poultry, agricultural societies which have spent a minimum of $3,600 of their own money in their preceding show in the granting of prizes to the above classes of exhibits shall be entitled to a minimum grant of $2,500 from the Department of Agriculture. Now, there are no local or county shows of domestic animals and poultry which have ever spent as large an amount of $3,600 as a minimum for prizes, and I understand that this year the minimum has been raised by the minister to $4,000. I have a list here of the counties surrounding my district, with the respective sums distributed last year in prizes. In the county of La Prairie the amount was $600.05; in the county of St. John, $441.25; in the county of Napierville, $414.50; in the county of Rouville, $597.20; in the county of Chambly, $741.45; and in the county of Verchères, $801.

These regulations may be all right for provincial and regional exhibitions, but the fixing of a minimum of $3,600 or $4,000 altogether precludes the local or county exhibitions from any share of the grants made by the Federal Government to agricultural societies. To prove my contention, I may say that I am informed by the department that last year in Canada there were only twenty or twenty-one exhibitions or shows of the kind which got the Federal grant. In my province there were only five. These were the exhibitions at St. Scholastique, Sherbrooke, Three Rivers, Ormstown, and Quebec. The exhibition at St. Scholastique is a regional exhibition in which practically four, five, or six counties participate. At Sherbrooke it is an industrial exhibition, that place being a city. At Three Rivers it is the same. At Ormstown the show is a regional exhibition and at Quebec it is a provincial exhibition. I surmise that in the other provinces the same thing occurs—that no local or county exhibition of that kind ever gives prizes to an amount as high as the minimum fixed by the department.

Mr. EDWARDS: Does the provincial government of Quebec give grants to these smaller fairs on the basis of the prize money paid out?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: The provincial government gives prizes but not on the basis of the prize money paid out. I believe the grants are given on the basis of the number of members belonging to each agricultural society in the proportion of two dollars for one. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the Federal Government should also encourage these local and county exhibitions; I submit that they are much more deserving of support than are the regional or provincial exhibitions. My reason for making that statement is that: in the local and county shows a keen rivalry prevails between the exhibitors or farmers of the district or riding. They can go to these shows, compete against each other and have a chance to win prizes. At the regional or provincial exhibitions the awards are nearly always carried off some wealthy corporation or breeder possessing the means to purchase prize cattle and so secure the prizes. This is one of the reasons why the local shows should be encouraged. Furthermore, the farmer of ordinary means will not exhibit at the regional or provincial shows because it means too much expense to him. These shows generally last five or six days, and the farmer, if he wishes to exhibit at them, has in the first place to lose that period of time. Then he has to make provision for travelling expenses to the place of exhibition, which is generally situated at a distance from his farm. He has also to incur the expense involved during the five or six days that he is attending the exhibition. On the other hand the county fair, or the local show, is generally held at a place which is in the centre of the county and very close to the farmer's home, and it lasts but one day. The farmer gets up very early in the morning, goes to the local show, spends the whole day there and returns to his home the same night. I see my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) laughing, but that is what happens in my county.

Mr. EDWARDS: The farmer always gets up early.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: That is true, but on the morning of the local exhibition he gets up even much earlier. As I said before, the local exhibitions should be encouraged to a greater extent than the regional or provincial shows because they result in much benefit to the farmer of ordinary means. Another reason for their encouragement is this: The regional or provincial shows require extensive buildings for exhibition purposes, while the county or local shows practically do not require buildings of any very great value. A still further reason for the encouragement of the county shows is because they are entirely agricultural in their character. You do not find at the local shows—at least it is the case in the province of Quebec and I presume the same conditions prevail in the other provinces—"midway" attractions and shows which if not of an immoral character are certainly vulgar, to say nothing of the crowd of fakirs, such as are witnessed at the provincial or regional exhibitions. Attractions of this kind very often deprive the farmers of their money, and they allure young people who would otherwise be examining the respective exhibits of the exhibition proper and deriving an educational advantage therefrom. The object of my resolution is not to do away with the grants to regional or provincial exhibitions, but simply to give more encouragement to the local and county shows. The only objection which might be urged to its adoption, is that it would involve some additional expenditure. Well, out of the 235 counties or ridings in Canada there are about 54 urban constituencies, leaving 181 rural ridings. If I take $600 as the average amount of the prizes given in each county for these local shows, which would entitle the counties to get two-thirds, or $400, it would only involve an expenditure of $72,400. Even if I increased that average and placed it at $900, which is a pretty high figure for prizes for these shows, the two-thirds would amount to $600, and 181 counties at $600 would only represent a total of $108,600. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Agriculture who is a practical man and has devoted himself with great earnestness towards promoting the welfare and development of agriculture, should agree to my resolution, for it would be a great boom for the agriculturists of this country and be decidedly to the advantage of the farming community.

Mr. THOMAS VIEN (Lotbinière): I beg to support the motion of my hon. friend from Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault). The other day, when discussing the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, I pointed out to the minister at the head of that department the importance of stimulating the development of agriculture through the medium of these country fairs. In the county of Lotbinière we have the good fortune of having one of the finest country fairs in our section of the province. We have a permanent building in which are exhibited every year the products of the farmers of the county, and it is encouraging to see the zeal which the farmers display and the keenness with which they compete for the prizes which are offered. But it is not possible to offer to these farmers in the one county the sum of $4,000 which is the minimum fixed by the Department of Agriculture entitling an exhibition to a grant. If this minimum were lowered to $500, as suggested by the resolution of my hon. friend from Chambly and Verchères, these farmers could obtain from the department a grant which would materially assist them, and would be of greater benefit to the development of agriculture than are those regional exhibitions which, as my hon. friend has just said, are more of the character of a circus than of an agricultural fair. For this reason, Sir, I think that if the hon. minister can see his way clear to get the necessary money to encourage these country fairs, he will advance the interests of agriculture in a most practical way.

I do not wish to repeat what I said to the Minister of Agriculture the other day when discussing his Estimates, but I can assure him that I give my heartiest support to the resolution. And I cordially invite him to attend the agricultural exhibition at Lotbinière next September, when he will see the progressive character of the farming population in that district, and will be convinced, I think, that the grants will be convinced, I think, that his grants have been taken full advantage of.

Mr. EMMANUEL D'ANJOU (Rimouski): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word in support of the motion introduced by the hon. member for Chambly-Verchères (Mr. Archambault). It is certainly one of the most interesting resolutions which have been submitted to the House during the present session.

I would not like to hurt the feelings of my hon. friend the member for Lotbinière (Mr. Vien), but I believe that we have country fairs in Rimouski which are as fine as any in his country. Two years ago, in the county of Rimouski, county fairs were started, and all who have taken part in these agree in saying that most certainly there are none better. They are not a meeting place for amusement, a circus, they are only an exhibition of all the agricultural products which the farmers of the county may bring. If the motion introduced by the hon. member for Chambly-Verchères were passed it would assuredly be an encouragement to our farmers who have such great sacrifices to make; such as loss of time and loss of money, in order to enter into competition in these fairs.

The district of Rimouski is certainly one of the important agricultural districts of the country, one of the most progressive. Our farmers are model farmers; they are attached to the earth and do their best in every circumstance to prove that they are experts in agriculture.

I do not wish to insist further, but I think that all the hon. members, and especially those who represent agricultural counties, should strongly support the resolution moved by the hon. member for Chambly-Verchères and urge the Government to accept it. This would enhance the interest attaching to our country fairs, and besides, would encourage our agriculturists to increase production, which we so urgently need at the present time.

[Mr. Archambault.]

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I think the general principle of this resolution, the principle of encouraging the production of better live stock, should be supported. But the function of this Parliament is not provincial, and it seems to me that some duty falls upon the provincial authorities to encourage these smaller fairs. In the province of Ontario such fairs are encouraged by grants from the provincial government, based upon the amount of money paid out in prizes by the several fairs. It seems to me that the sponsor of this resolution should not expect the Federal Government to go any further than the provincial governments are prepared to go in assisting these smaller fairs. For my part, I would be prepared to support a motion to the effect that the Government contribute an amount equal to the amount given by the several provincial governments in the way of grants to these fairs.

A good deal can be said in favour of the hon. gentleman's statement that the larger fairs are patronized by the wealthy stock breeders who make a business of exhibiting prize animals. I have had some little experience in connection with the smaller fairs, having been the secretary and manager of one for a number of years, and I may say that some fairs are open to this criticism, that very often, because they are only one-day fairs, somebody will drive in every animal he has on his farm, whether he ought to be ashamed to exhibit them or not, for the sake of getting some kind of prize. Therefore, in connection with making grants to these fairs I think it should be stipulated that expert judges be engaged, especially as our agricultural colleges are providing us with first-class men who are available for these duties. If we are to pay out federal money to encourage the production of first-class stock, we should have judges who are capable of passing an expert opinion upon that stock, and not merely some local man who will award a prize to any grade of animal, no matter whether it is worthy of a prize or not. If animals are not up to a certain standard no prizes should be given. A conscientious judge drawn from the locality in which the fair is held will often exact that high standard, but I must say, speaking from my own experience, a local judge is more apt to be influenced by his friends in the neighbourhood and to say, "Well, this animal is not quite up to the standard, but we will give it a prize anyway." I do not believe that the indiscriminate awarding of prizes encourages the production of good stock. I am in favour of some help being given by the Dominion Government to encourage the breeding of good stock, but such help should be supplemented dollar for dollar by the provincial authorities.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I share the opinion of other hon. members that our country fairs should be encouraged in every reasonable way. But I am afraid I cannot go so far as even the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) in saying that the Dominion should give grants to these smaller fairs, even as supplementary to the grants given by the provinces, These smaller fairs are purely provincial or local, and this House has about enough on its hands just now without branching out into anything of this kind. I cannot agree with the hon. gentleman who introduced the resolution that so small an amount as he suggests would be required. I think I could point to as many fairs in our province as he suggests altogether; many agricultural societies there would pay out from $500 to $1,000 in prizes if they could get two-thirds of it from the Dominion. In my constituency alone there are twelve or fourteen agricultural societies. Putting it at ten and multiplying that by say two hundred constituencies in Canada, you have two thousand fairs.

Mr. VIEN: Does my hon. friend understand that we speak of one fair per riding and not of agricultural societies, of which we have a number in each riding?

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): I am dealing with the resolution as I find it. You may call them "fairs" or "autumn shows," whichever you like—"a rose by any other name would smell as sweet." I do not think the name has anything to do with it. We call them all "agricultural societies" in our country; and we do all that sort of work through these societies. I do not think the resolution is confined to one exhibition or show for each riding; I think it would be absurd to suggest that any one agricultural riding can support only one fair of that kind. I have a good deal more faith in the progressiveness of the farmers of Canada than to believe anything of that kind.

Now, we have our agricultural fairs in Saskatchewan, and to these the province gives some assistance, as do municipalities in many cases. We have no counties in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, so my hon. friend's remark would not apply. We have rural municipalities, and they are disposed to treat fairly the smaller exhibitions. But even at that we find it very difficult to keep these exhibitions going, and I am very sorry that is the case, because I believe that the small agricultural exhibition properly handled is very beneficial to the country. But I do not think that this House or this Government should undertake, as finances are at the present time, to give assistance in cases of that kind. To do so would take not the small sum mentioned by my hon. friend, but in the neighbourhood of a million dollars, if the thing is to be done properly. I do not think that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) has a million dollars at his disposal for any purpose of that kind. I do not want to discourage my hon. friend in his desire to secure the expenditure of money for the benefit of the farmers or in support of agricultural exhibitions or shows—he may call them what he likes. It is desirable that these smaller shows should be encouraged. However, I cannot join in the request that such an expenditure be made by the Dominion because, as I have said, I do not think we should spend money in that way, at the present time, at least.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a great deal of pleasure in supporting the principle of this resolution, and one of the reasons why I do so has just been mentioned by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Thomson). That hon. gentleman says that the attendance at smaller fairs is falling away. This we all know to be the case. These small exhibition organizations have great difficulty in keeping up their prizes; and that is particularly true of all the small fairs, I think, in the province of Ontario. Many things contribute to this condition. The principal reason, I think, is found in the more general use of the automobile. Most farmers get into their cars and drive to the fair to see what their neighbours are exhibiting, while their neighbours, like themselves, have brought nothing, because it does not pay them to do so.

We know, too, that along with the progress of fairs has gone the development of stock. That is quite easily proved, especially in the new parts of the country where the small fall fairs are carried on. The improvement in the class of stock thus brought about is the result, largely, of competition; nothing will induce improvement in the class of stock like keen competition among neighbours in small municipalities. This does not apply to the same extent in the case of larger fairs, but if you want to improve the condition of the stock in the rural and backward parts of a province I do not know of any one thing more conducive to that end than to bring about an improvement of the calibre and the class of the fall fairs—an improvement which in itself hinges largely upon the extent of the prize list. In nearly all cases the prize list is too small to recompense a man for the trouble incidental to the exhibiting of his stock at a fair. I think, therefore, that if Parliament could see its way clear to grant —I would not say a few hundred thousand dollars; I would not restrict it to a million, because I think it would be an investment that would be productive of splendid returns to the people of this country—if, I say, we could spend a million or a million and a half along these lines, the results during the next five or ten years would be of an extremely beneficial character. I agree with the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) that anything of this kind must be worked out on a sound basis. His suggestion that the assistance to be given by the Dominion be based on the provincial grants, which, in turn, in the case of Ontario at least, are based on the amount contributed by the municipality, is a fair one. You there have some finality of responsibility; you there have a just basis upon which to build up your prize list. I do think that if this country is going to make progress and if it is to pay off its national debt, nothing will hold out such a favourable prospect in that direction as the development of our stock raising industry, and that, in turn, must be based upon the building up of higher grades of the different breeds of stock. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I have very much pleasure in supporting at least the principle of this resolution, and I hope that the minister may be able to carry into effect the substance of the suggestions incorporated in it.

Mr. GEORGE PARENT (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, a short time ago, when the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) had his Estimates before the House, at a late hour in the night we on this side, feeling that the minister had been kind enough to answer a good many questions, felt that we would like to give him a chance to pass a few items. Just about that time, Sir, he made the affirmation that in British Columbia a certain kind of hens had been laying three hundred eggs per year. I take it that on a resolution of this kind, involving the discussion of exhibitions and fairs in connection with which poultry would be exhibited, we may fairly ask the minister to state to the House what kind of hens he was speaking about. I think everybody would be glad to know something more about hens that would lay three hundred eggs per year.

Mr. A. M. DECHENE (Montmagny): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to add a few words to this discussion, now drawing to its termination, regarding the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault). The object of our rural agricultural exhibitions seems to be somewhat ignored or to have gone out of sight. In our departments of agriculture, there seems to be a particular tendency to encourage poultry and cattle breeding, without taking into account the fact that agricultural exhibitions in rural districts include every one of the farm products. For instance, there is held in the district of Montmagny one of the largest country fairs in this Dominion, an exhibition that at times will last as long as three days.

The capital required for the buildings necessary for this exhibition is considerable. It is difficult to determine exactly what is the sum spent to encourage poultry and cattle breeding, and to separate it from the sum given in general as prizes for all agricultural products. The farmers who represent the mass of Canadian farmers, go in for general farming and do not specialize in any one branch. He really represents the national agricultural asset, and I believe, as was said just now by one of the hon. members on the right, that he deserves more attention than any other class of agriculturists. The one who goes in for stock-raising exclusively is usually a rich man who does not require the stimulus of these exhibitions to lead him to improve his products in quality and quantity. The large exhibitions which are now encouraged by the Department of Agriculture really serve almost any end, but that intended. The large breeders who show their animals at these exhibitions do so not so much to win prizes as to let other breeders, and farmers in general, know the quality of their products and in so doing create a market for them. This does not encourage them to breed a better quality of animals, since they take part in these public shows simply to sell and advertise their stock. When you go to the rural fair, the district exhibition, you meet there the general farmer with all kinds of produce, who in a real spirit of rivalry tries to show that he can do better than his neighbour. His interest is not strictly commercial, nor his aim money-making. It is rather a matter of pride. He wants to show that he can do better than his neighbours, and to earn the reputation of being a model farmer in his district. I believe that this is the spirit which should be encouraged in the farmers; we should urge them to attempt to surpass each other. We would thus attain the aim of these exhibitions, which is to better the breed of our herds and poultry generally. With the present system, it is only the largest regional exhibitions which are subsidized and the people who win the prizes are not those needing encouragement. This is why the motion of the hon. member from Verchères is doubly praiseworthy, since it tends to encourage those who really need encouragement and in bettering the agricultural output, would thus add to the asset of our country.

We have in our rural districts several kinds of agricultural exhibitions. These exhibitions count usually upon the generosity of members of Parliament, municipal councillors, priests, and they are practically dependent upon charity for the recognition of the work exhibited. To mention but a few, besides the big country fair, we have that of the farmers' gardens, in which the competitors are often young boys or children who work a small plot of land, or who raise a few chickens or animals, hoping to win prizes furnished by generous doners in the parish. These youths, rather than farmers on a large scale, deserve to be encouraged. From their earliest years they work on the farm and try to improve their parents' stock, thus learning how to carry on this industry when they will be working for themselves. These youths will to-morrow be the men at the head of the agricultural industry, and nothing is being done to encourage them except through the friendly interest of those about them. There are exhibitions of this kind in all the parishes of our counties. We have exhibitions of domestic produce which depend also upon the goodwill of the people of the locality. Under these circumstances, I am tempted to go further than the hon. member from Verchères, and to ask the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) not to limit his patronage to the large breeders of poultry and cattle, but to bring its benefits within range of all the agricultural exhibitions, in giving them, for instance, a percentage of the sum which their management offer as prizes, the amount could be fixed at 25, 30 or even 50 per cent. This would not cost the country much, would help to maintain these exhibition concerns, and would have the double advantage of giving more prizes to the exhibitors and of fostering the increased agricultural production, so necessary for the payment of our indebtedness, thus contributing to the general welfare of the country.

I understand that our friends from the West, who have immense herds and numerous horses for breeding purposes on a large scale, are not very enthusiastic over the motion of the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères, for this motion might result in decreasing, to the benefit of the great mass of farmers, the subsidies from the hon. Minister of Agriculture and in diverting perhaps a large part of what they now obtain. I noticed, the other day, when the Estimates of Agriculture were under discussion, that nearly one half of these Estimates went to the encouragement of breeding and the care of our herds. There was a special item of one million dollars for breeding; there was an item of nearly one million dollars towards maintaining the health of the herds; all this, Mr. Speaker, in the interest of the large breeders; but the poor farmer, who has but twenty-five or thirty head of cattle, who has but eight or ten horses, who has but a more or less modest poultry-yard, derives but little benefit from these large subsidies. I believe that if the motion of the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères were adopted the mass of farmers would be largely benefited thereby and I therefore am very happy to support it.

Mr. JOHN BEST (Dufferin): Mr. Speaker, if this resolution passes, every fall fair and many school fairs in Ontario will also get this grant. The resolution states that if any fair contributes $500 toward prizes, the Government shall make a grant of two-thirds. In this way it would pay the management of every fair to add a couple of hundred dollars or whatever was necessary to reach the minimum amount of $500 and if they received a grant of two-thirds of that amount, that would mean that they would get $333 or in other words, that they would have to pay really only about $167. Therefore, it would be good financing for the management of every fair to do this in order to get the two-thirds grant.

While I believe that every encouragement should be given to these autumn fairs and to the production and improvement of stock of every kind, when municipal councils and provincial governments are making grants, there is too much of a duplication. During the past two years the present Government has been duplicating too much of the work of provincial governments, and I cannot see the benefit of that. Why should we take money, which the people in each and every province have to pay into the Dominion treasury, and hand it over to the different provinces and municipalities? Such action is all right when the work is on a broad scale such as that of our experimental farms; but if we are going to contribute to local fairs, we might as well begin to contribute to township fairs and to do township work, and if we did that I believe we would be making a mistake. No man in this House is more anxious than I am to promote agriculture in every way, but I do not think this is a wise step to take towards that end. If I interpret the resolution aright, there is no doubt that every fair in Ontario will benefit, but I understand that is not the intention of the mover of the resolution.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? What I mean by my resolution is that there should be only one grant for each riding.

Mr. BEST: That would create rivalry and do harm in a constituency where there were two or three fairs. Why should the people of the Dominion of Canada be asked to contribute to one fair which is picked out and not to another? In my constituency I do not know which of the three fairs is the best; some years, one is better than the others. I think it would be unfair to ask the people belonging to one fair to subscribe towards a grant for another fair in the same constituency. I agree with the hon. member that it probably would be better if there was only one fair in each constituency; in many cases there are probably too many, but at the present time in many constituencies there are two or three fairs, and it would be very unfair to say that one fair in a particular constituency will get the grant and the other two or three will not get it.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: There is one agricultural society—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member's last question turned out to be an assertion of his own. I point out that when he closes the debate, he will have ample opportunity to reply.

Mr. BEST: The resolution says "fall fairs." They are all fairs in Ontario, and, therefore, I cannot see how the grant could be honestly given to one and not to another.

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (Oxford North): Mr. Speaker, in what has been said by all the members of the House, there is a great deal with which I am in accord. If the Government could afford the money, the grant might benefit certain people who show cattle, pigs and chickens at country fairs, and it might, as the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) said, encourage competition, although that has not been my experience to a great extent. I might suggest that a way in which the Government could easily encourage agriculture in this country more than by making grants to country fairs, would be by reducing the cost of transportation. For fear that the minister might think that everybody in this House was, at the present time at least, in favour of granting moneys to country fairs, I just take the opportunity to say that I think the country will worry along this year and perhaps next year without any additional grant to country fairs put into his Estimates, and I hope that he will not attempt to add that expense to his Estimates.

Mr. J. F. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): Mr. Speaker, while I agree that everything possible should be done to assist in the development of agriculture and also in the improvement of our flocks and herds in this country, I cannot see any virtue in this resolution along that line. As pointed out by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Thomson), in Saskatchewan, country fairs or agricultural shows receive assistance from our provincial Department of Agriculture. That department is presided over by a practical farmer who, I am sure, will see to it that everything of a provincial nature is done for the advancement of agriculture in that province. The hon. gentleman who moved this resolution has said that he wants it to apply just to one fair in each constituency. In the constituency of Last Mountain there are twelve of these small fairs, and I would not like to be the one to select the particular fair which was to receive this grant. For that reason, and for the one big reason that I think this Parliament and Government should practise the strictest economy in all lines of expenditure, I am opposed to the resolution.

Hon. S. F. TOLMIE (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to what hon. gentlemen have had to say with regard to the granting of money by the Federal Government to small exhibitions. In the Department of Agriculture, we have adopted a policy of making grants to interprovincial and national shows rather than to the smaller shows. We have always felt that the small show comes within the purview of provincial Governments which are well able to take care of such shows. We feel that the provincial Governments should do their share, and that the work of handling the small shows belongs more to a Provincial Government than to a Federal Government. I do not want for a moment to speak in any slighting way of the work that these small shows are doing. They are rendering a very valuable service to agriculture and act as feeders to the bigger shows. We are giving aid to agriculture and particularly to the livestock industry in many ways. Amongst such policies might be mentioned:

Federal aid to horse breeding	$125,000
Distribution of pure bred sires	155,000
Record of performance for dairy cattle	25,000
District field work re cattle	45,000
District field work re sheep	35,000
District field work re poultry	60,000
District field work re hogs	20,000
Total	$465,000

This does not by any means exhaust the list of our activities in connection with the livestock industry. Our other work includes the co-operative marketing of livestock, wool and eggs, the replacement of scrub sires, the organization of committees to promote better business methods in production and marketing, assistance to boys' and girls' clubs in connection with the production and marketing of hogs, the supervision and operation of stock yards and stock yard exchanges, the issue of daily, weekly and yearly livestock market reports, the inspection and grading of wool and eggs, financial aid in connection with the registration of livestock, and the presentation of educational livestock exhibits at our different exhibitions.

Comparing the small fair with the big fair, one of the previous speakers said that the big fair did not fill a valuable niche in the progress of our livestock industry, or something to that effect. Now a breeder of pure-bred cattle in a back country district may successfully exhibit his stock at a local fair and win year after year, until finally he begins to think that he has quite a good line of cattle or some other line of livestock, but when he goes to the big fair that is assisted by the Federal Government, and where big enough prizes are offered to enable the poor man to take his stock, he meets with real competition and soon finds out that to win there he must have very much better cattle than he possesses. He is able to see a very large display of livestock there, and purchase such animals as he might think necessary to improve his herds. It is not always the big man that wins at the big show, as has been stated. In fact, these shows have been the means of bringing out young breeders who are anxious to produce cattle of good quality, but who did not know how good their cattle were until they took them to the big shows and competed with the big breeders. There are many cases where the success of these men with their cattle at these exhibitions has been the foundation of very much greater successes in subsequent years.

I notice also that some of the bigger shows were criticised for having attractions at the show. To operate a show successfully you must have the attendance through the gate, or some other source of revenue. An exhibition that is run for a week or ten days must have a varying programme to attract all kinds of people. A great many people who go to shows are not very much interested in some of the agricultural lines, but a show in Toronto or some other big city draws people by attractions of different kinds, and the managers must take advantage of the general population that patronize these shows by having such attractions as will bring them through the gates. Once having received that money through the gates, they are able to distribute it among the stock breeders and other lines of exhibitors, to the advantage of agriculture in the long run. I have pointed out the policy of the Government in this connection. We feel we have drawn the line at a safe figure. It is our intention to assist the inter-provincial and national shows, leaving the smaller shows to be taken care of by thep rovinces, which I think, are well able to undertake that responsibility. On these grounds, I must oppose the resolution.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Of course, it is not my intention to press this resolution to a vote, though I felt when I brought it in, that it would be of such help to the farmers that the minister would probably accept it, and I still hope that after he has had time to investigate the matter properly, if I come back next year with the same resolution, he will agree to it.

I will now try and answer some of the objections that have been made by some hon. members. My hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), who I was very glad to see supported the resolution, raised only one objection. He stated, and the Minister of Agriculture raised the same objection, that the provincial governments should do their share in supporting the local exhibitions. That is true, and if it is the same in other provinces as in the province of Quebec, they do support these local exhibitions. My hon. friend from Frontenac stated that he would support my resolution if it was couched in such a way as to provide that the Federal Government would contribute the same amount that the Provincial Government did. I would agree to that, because I believe it would mean the counties would get a larger grant than they would under my resolution. I believe, and I think I can prove, that the Provincial Government grants more to the county and local shows than they would get under this resolution, which provides for only two-thirds of the amount spent in the preceding year. I do not know how it is in Ontario, but in Quebec the Government grants $2 for each member of the agricultural society. In answer to my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Thomson), I may say that there is only one agricultural society in each county in the province of Quebec. We have an agricultural society in the county of Chambly, for instance, and another in the county of Vercheres. There is only one in each county, to which practically all the progressive farmers belong, and as the Provincial Government grants $2 for each member of the society, I think if the suggestion of my hon. friend from Frontenac were followed, these shows would receive more than they would under the resolution now before the House.

I was greatly surprised to hear the speech of my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle.

It has been said very often that the Agrarian party was in favour of class legislation. Well, I think we had proof of that assertion this afternoon. My hon. friend is not in favour of grants to poultry and animal exhibitions, because in the West the farmers grow only grain and care only for that, practically speaking. If my resolution asked for a grant for grain exhibitions, I am sure my hon. friend would support it. He also stated it was an absurdity to think there was only one small exhibition in each rural riding. He probably did not understand that the shows mentioned in my resolution are shows only for domestic animals and poultry. Of course, we have other agricultural fairs in the province of Quebec at which grain and all kinds of cereals, and industrial products, are exhibited, but we have only one fall fair for domestic animals and poultry.

My resolution would not call for such a very large expenditure, Mr. Speaker. According to my calculations it would not amount to more than $108,600, supposing the average expenditure on the previous show to be $900. We are spending this year $19,000,000 for Militia and Defence, Naval Service and Mounted Police; then we have an item of $16,000,000 for miscellaneous. These expenditures, I think, might very well be curtailed in order to encourage the farmers in the development of agriculture.

I do not need to explain to my hon. friend from Dufferin (Mr. Best), that in the province of Quebec—I do not know whether it is the same in Ontario, but judging from the hon. gentleman's remarks, I do not suppose it is—there is only one agricultural society for each riding; so that it would not be hard for me to decide which society in my riding should get the grant. My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Tolmie) has given us a statement which, in my opinion, reinforces my resolution. He has said that the attractions which we see at large fairs are necessary in order to bring money to those centres. That is true, and it is exactly why I desire the Minister of Agriculture to grant some money to the purely agricultural shows, which are deficient in the kind of attractions one sees in provincial or regional exhibitions. As I said before Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to press this resolution to a vote, but I trust that the Minister will take into consideration either my suggestion or that of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) regarding these shows, because I am convinced that what is proposed is in the interests of the formers of the country. For the moment I desire to withdraw my motion.

Motion withdrawn.

FUEL SUPPLY PROBLEM

Mr. MICHAEL STEELE (South Perth) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the future fuel supply of Canada should be considered by Parliament, and that a Special Committee of the House of Commons should be forthwith appointed to inquire into all matters pertaining thereto, with power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath and to report from time to time.

He said: When people begin discussing fall fairs it is a sure indication of the approach of cold weather, so that I take it that this a very opportune time indeed to introduce the resolution which I have placed in the Order Paper relating to the future fuel supply of Canada. Canada's climate requires the consumption of fuel for seven months of the year. Nearly every pleasure and comfort of life which we have in this country is entirely dependent upon fuel. Fuel is one of the three essentials of life, of which the other two are food and clothing. It is not only essential to the comfort and the very existence of our people in their homes, but it is absolutely indispensible to industry. Our country cannot prosper without power. The wheels of industry stand motionless and production ceases if power is not available. Power for our industries generally cannot be obtained without fuel, and Canada cannot have sufficient fuel for her needs without coal. After the interesting and enlightening discussion which took place in this House last week in regard to the natural resources of our country, it is hardly necessary for me to make much reference to the coal supplies of Canada, but I may be permitted briefly to recall to the House a few facts relating thereto. In Canada we have coal in the east and in the west, but none in the central portion of the country, so that the provinces of Ontario and Quebec have to seek elsewhere for their supplies of fuel.

Mr. LEMIEUX: We have "white coal" in Quebec and Ontario.

Mr. STEELE: Yes. In Nova Scotia and New Brunswick we have large areas of bituminous coal of good quality, while in Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia, there are immense deposits of lignite and bituminous coal and semi-anthracite. I should like to place on Hansard a statement if our coal reserves, actual and probable, in the various provinces of the Dominion. In Nova Scotia the reserves amount to 10,691,000,000 tons of bituminous coal; in New Brunswick, 166,000,000 tons of bituminous coal; in Ontario, although I said we have no coal, we have, at the south of James Bay, a deposit which is estimated to contain 27,500,000 tons of lignite; in Manitoba there are 176,000,000 tons of lignite; in Saskatchewan, 65,793,000,000 tons of lignite; in Alberta, 1,180,000,000,000 all told, of which 845,900,000 tons is semi-anthracite, 217,918,000,000 tons, bituminous coal, and 932,053,000,000 tons of sub-bituminous, with 29,095,000,000 tons of lignite. In British Columbia there are 77,923,000,000 tons of bituminous, and 5,715,500,000 tons of lignite. In the Yukon there are 275,000,000 tons of bituminous, and 5,159,000,000 tons of lignite, while in the Northwest territories there are 5,280,000,000. And even in the Arctice islands we have immense deposits aggregating 6,600,000,000 tons of bituminous coal.

With such immense quantites of coal in this country, aggregating 71 per cent of all the coal in the British Empire, people who have not much knowledge of the subject may well inquire how any portion of Canada can possibly suffer from a scarcity of coal. Coal is used in this country chiefly for the purposes of domestic heating and power, but it is of no use in these immense deposits unless it can be removed and transported from the mine to the range or furnace in the home, and to the boiler of the factory. From these immense coal deposits, it may be interesting to inquire for a moment, how much is being produced. In 1920, the bituminous coal produced in Canada amounted to 16,623,598 tons. Of this 2,558,174 tons were exported, leaving in this country, of Canadian production, 14,065,784 tons. Perhaps it would be interesting to give the production by provinces. In Nova Scotia, we produced in 1920, 6,395,545 tons, at an average cost of $4.44 per ton; in New Brunswick, 161,164 tons at an average cost of $5.81 per ton; in Saskatchewan, 349,860 tons at an average cost of $2.38 per ton; in Alberta, 6,859,346 tons at an average cost of $4.40 per ton; in British Columbia 2,856,920 tons at an average cost of $5.61; or a total of 16,623,598 tons costing on an average $4.65 per ton.

Knowing the production, it may be interesting for us now to learn what is the annual consumption of coal in Canada. In 1920 we consumed 14,065,424 tons of Canadian coal, and 18,742,542 tons of imported coal, or a total of 32,807,966 tons, costing at the mines $157,345,552. This shows an increased cost over 1919 of $54,000,000, and an increased consumption as compared with 1910 of about fifty per cent. We may ask where does the balance of our coal come from? We consume only 43 per cent of Canadian coal; where does the other 57 per cent come from? It comes entirely from the United States. In 1920 the imports were, as already given, 18,742,542 tons costing $98,033,598 or an average of $5.32 per ton. We find that our imports are very rapidly increasing. In 1910, as I have already stated, we imported only 10,597,000 tons, of which 3,266,235 tons were anthracite and the balance of 7,331,747 tons bituminous. Last year our imports had increased to 18,742,542 tons. Imports of anthracite in the intervening years had increased to 4,881,313 tons, or almost fifty per cent, while the import of bituminous coal had increased 13,861,229 tons, or eighty-nine per cent over the imports of 1910.

These being the sources of our coal supply, let us look for a moment at the cost of coal to the Canadian people, and after all that is the question that is largely affecting our people to-day. The production of coal at the Canadian mines for 1920 was valued at $76,326,853, of which coal to the value of $18,014,899 was exported coal leaving for home consumption coal to the value of $58,311,954. Of the imported coal, anthracite had a value of $36,773,351, and bituminous a value of $61,260,247 or a total import value of $98,033,598.

Mr. BELAND: Was that for the year 1920?

Mr. STEELE: Yes.

Mr. BELAND: Did we not import more coal from the United States last year than we produced in Canada all told, that is bituminous and anthracite?

Mr. STEELE: Yes, we imported last year fifty-seven per cent of our coal and produced only forty-three per cent.

Mr. BELAND: I understood the hon. gentleman to say we produced 57 per cent.

Mr. STEELE: No we produced 43 per cent. The coal which Canada consumed in 1920 cost at the mines $156,345,552. Let us see how this cost compares with that of previous years. In 1910 the average cost of imported anthracite coal per ton was $4,51. In 1920 the average cost per ton was $7.53. In 1920 the initial cost of the coal consumed in Canada—that is the cost at the mines—was $116,000,671, more than it was in 1910. But the greater part of that increase, or at least a very large part of it, was due to the great rise in the price of coal between 1919 and 1920. The increased cost in 1920 over 1919 was $59,786,303. If we calculate the increased cost last year on the retail price paid for it, we will find that the Canadian consumers paid in 1920 approximately $140,000,000 more for coal than it cost them in the preceding year, and about $240,000,000 more than it cost them in 1910. This, as I am sure the House will appreciate, is an enormous additional burden laid on the Canadian people for their supply of fuel, a larger burden than is imposed probably for all taxes levied by the federal Parliament.

Let us see how this affects the people? It not only entails a very large direct burden, which amounts to from $50 to $125 per family more than the previous year, upon the people for coal for domestic purposes to enable them to live in comfort, but it adds enormously to the cost of industrial production. Every article produced in Canada last year cost the consumer more owing to the higher price of coal. Many factories in Canada paid out in 1920 from twenty to fifty thousand dollars more for coal than they did the previous year, and many of the larger factories paid out from fifty to two hundred thousand dollars more for coal last year than they did the previous year. So that while our manufacturers and business men may complain of the Business Profits Tax and of the Income Tax, probably the heaviest burden they are bearing to-day—if we may call it a tax—is due to the increased cost of their fuel.

Mr. PARENT: May I ask the hon. gentleman if that position still exists to-day?

Mr. STEELE: The condition is not quite so extreme as it was a few months ago, the price of coal having been considerably reduced in the last few months. Let me give the House an illustration of how the high price of coal affects our industrial concerns. From the annual report of the Canada Cement company, I take this reference to the coal supply:

> For several months the company was unable to secure an adequate supply of coal to keep it running to the required capacity and earnings suffered severely. The president in his address said that the inability to obtain coal was greatly responsible for the smaller business. There was an increase of 540 per cent in coal cost over the year 1914.

That is a reliable ilustration of the increased expense which our industrial plants are subject to on account of the enhanced cost of coal. The higher freight rates and the exchange also add enormously to that cost. In the portion of western Ontario which I represent, three years ago the freight rate on a ton of coal was $2.90; to-day it is $5.29, plus exchange of $1.60, or practically $4 more than three years ago. This means for a town of 4,000 people an additional outlay of from $15,000 to $20,000 per year, most of which goes into the pockets of the United States coal operators and railways. But this is not the only difficulty which our people are experiencing at the present time; there is the additional difficulty in getting their coal at any cost. That there was a real scarcity there is no doubt, but this was partly owing to decreased production and increased demand, not at all to the diminution of our resources. It has been said that for every ten per cent increase in pay granted to the United States coal miners there was a lessening of production to the extent of ten per cent.

We in Ontario—and I am speaking now especially of Ontario—are entirely dependent upon the United States for our fuel, both for our domestic and our industrial needs. The scarcity affects the very foundation of our industrial life, and it seems to me essential that Canada should at once adopt a policy which will make us independent of any foreign country for our fuel supply and encourage the development of our own coal resources. The scarcity of coal of recent years has been attributed to various causes, principally to labour unrest at the mines, with the tendency among the miners to reduce their output as their wages increased. The lack of cars and motive power on the railways is also a contributing cause. This scarcity of coal will undoubtedly continue for another year at least and will recur at intervals in the future. Let me read an extract from a recent number of the Coal Age, which is generally regarded as a reliable authority on the coal situation in the United States. It says:

> The coal companies are figuratively sitting tight and tightening their belts. The spot market is quotable more because of the prices offered by shippers than by business closed. There seems to be a very general feeling—possibly founded on hope—that the buyer is going to stay out of the market until the last minute, and then when he does start to buy the rush will produce another sharp upswing in prices, and that next fall will witness another repetition of serious car shortage.

I believe that that opinion is shared very largely by the coal dealers of this country, based possibly on their experiences of last year, and possibly on their fears regarding next year's supply. What did we find last year? In July coal was being offered retail in western Ontario around $15, and $15.50 a ton; three or four months later it was selling at $22 a ton and almost impossible to be obtained at that price. We all know there was no legitimate reason whatsoever for that substantial increase. But what is supposed to have been the real cause of that sharp advance? It was the scarcity of coal in Canada, especially in Ontario, due to the causes which I have already given. Our people had to have coal, and our dealers felt that they had to pay whatever prices would secure them the coal. While the straight line coal companies were unable to supply our dealers, the independent coal companies, who control a very large percentage of the output in Pennsylvania and the other coal fields of the United States, took advantage of the demands from Ontario and possibly from other parts of Canada also, and would sell coal only when they secured the maximum price offered by any dealer who was urgently in need of coal.

Now, as I have said, that scarcity will return, with all the distressing incidents which we experienced in 1917 and 1918. We all remember those heatless days which were necessarily imposed upon us, when we had to submit to restrictions on the amount of fuel in certain industries, when we were permitted to have only a certain minimum of coal in our cellars, when we were obliged to use bituminous coal instead of anthracite, when we were forced to use wood whenever obtainable, and when even we had to practise the strictest economy in the consumption of gasolene. Those distressing days are sure to return, perhaps not next year or even the following year, but the conditions surrounding our fuel supply are certain to result sooner or later in a recurrence of the 1917 and 1918 inconveniences.

With such abundant resources, and with such urgent need, we should prepare to meet the issue unflinchingly and effectively. And now is the time to do it, not when we are looking for a supply of coal for our furnaces as the cold weather comes on. Now is the time to prepare, not for next winter merely, but for five years from now, when conditions will be more acute, and for ten years from now, when they will be still more acute than they are today. In time of peace prepare for war. In time of plenty prepare for scarcity.

Let me make some further references to the situation in Ontario. One of the substitutes for coal is electric power, and to-day Ontario is using about 1,000,000 horse power of electric energy. It is estimated that each horse power takes the place of about ten tons of coal. Therefore if Ontario were not using that 1,000,000 horse power she would require an additional 10,000,000 tons of coal for her industries. Let us suppose that that was the situation. With the knowledge which we have to-day of transportation conditions on our railways and on the American railways, how could those railways possibly handle that additional 10,000,000 tons? It would be an absolute impossibility. But some people may say, "Oh, well, we have 1,000,000 horse power of electric energy and we do not need to worry about that." No, we do not need to worry about that. But let us look ahead for another ten years when Canada will require at least 50,000,000 tons of coal instead of 33,000,000 tons as at present; how are we going to provide for that additional 16,000,000 tons? To-day it requires about 1,000 locomotives and 23,000 freight cars to handle our coal supply, which is one-fifth of all the freight transported by our railways. To handle another 16,000,000 tons would necessitate an increased equipment of about fifty per cent. Are our railways prepared to do that within ten years? Is the Government prepared to increase on our national railways the equipment for coal hauling purposes to the extent of fifty per cent within the next ten years? That is the problem which we have before us if we are going to supply the people of Canada with their necessities in the fuel line ten years from now. Again I say it is time that the Canadian people and this Parliament representing the Canadian people should give serious thought to the problem of our fuel supply in the future.

I have shown that there is an abundance of coal in Canada. Now I come to speak particularly of the needs of Ontario and Quebec, within whose boundaries no coal exists that can be used for commercial purposes. These two provinces, however, are the largest consumers of coal, and sometimes we are almost forced to the belief that in this matter nature seems to have made a mistake. British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have no difficulty in obtaining their supply. Manitoba has had some difficulty; she has suffered in the past, but with Alberta coal being shipped there in increasing quantities, it would seem that that province has solved its fuel problem. I would point out that in 1920 Manitoba took 516,198 tons of Alberta bituminous coal, 200,000 tons more than in the previous year. As only 98,629 tons of Alberta coal were consumed in Manitoba in 1916, it is evident that the people of that province are giving the preference to Alberta coal. This is as it should be. The freight rate to Winnipeg on Alberta coal is $5 a ton, and no exchange, a much lower cost than that incurred by the Ontario people when they import American coal. As the Alberta mines have a capacity to produce 12,000,000 tons yearly and as they now produce only about 6,000,000 tons, there is no reason why Saskatchewan and Manitoba need worry about their fuel supply in the near future. The briquetting of Saskatchewan lignites offers another relief, and it may be that these briquettes will in time be commercially available as far east as the upper lakes of Ontario.

As I have said, Ontario and Quebec are the two provinces which are faced by a real fuel problem. Ontario is the one province of the Dominion entirely dependent on the United States supply. Quebec, by water transportation, was prior to the war able to secure Nova Scotia coal as far west as Montreal. While this traffic was arrested during the war, there are indications that it will be resumed and in this way even Quebec may be able to supply herself with Canadian coal. Ontario alone seems at present completely isolated in respect of her fuel supply —the largest consumer and the most completely cut off from the coal-producing provinces. We consume in Ontario about forty per cent of all the coal used in Canada. The reasons for this are our large population, the gradual exhaustion of our wood supply, and the extensive and numerous industrial plants in the province. I would like at this stage to read some extracts from a letter which I received from a very prominent retail coal merchant in western Ontario, a director of the Retail Coal Association, in which he outlines the difficulties more clearly than I can. I will read part of his letter. Speaking for the retail coal dealers, he says:

> We have learned to our cost that we are entirely at the mercy of the United States wholesaler, both as to the quantity of coal which we can secure, and also as to the quality and price of the product shipped during times of great scarcity. This has been the universal experience of all the coal merchants throughout the country.
>
> The price on Pennsylvania anthracite ranged all the way from $8 to $17 per ton at the mines according as the necessities of the coal merchants might compel him to pay, and if a merchant made a trip to the mines, he found others there ahead of him and the coal was in fact auctioned to the highest bidder.
> Moreover, the middlemen were not the only offenders. These prices were actual mine prices from independent mine owners. Ordinary mine run bituminous coal also varied in price during the past season from $3.50 per ton to $12.75 (in extreme cases) per ton at the mines. It was an absolute holdup by the United States operators and the prices demanded from Canadian importers largely fixed the price for the United States citizens themselves, and as a result, a very serious effort was made to have shipments to Canada cut off altogether. You can readily see how absolutely helpless our people would be in such an emergency. This condition, it may be urged, is largely a case of manipulation on the part of the United States operators, but whether this is so or not, the results are exactly the same. Had this winter been a severe one, untold suffering would have undoubtedly followed, as shipments have not been nearly so heavy as in other years. During last fall and summer, when the situation continued so threatening, we endeavoured to get a price on Canadian coal from Alberta, but the best all-rail rate of freight which we could get was $20.50 per ton which, of course, precluded any private individual or company from taking any chances in connection with the undertaking.

Mr. MORPHY: Can the hon. member give the price of coal, mine run, in Alberta at that time?

Mr. STEELE: Four dollars and forty cents at the mine. So that a real problem exists in Ontario. Now, the question comes to us, how can this problem be met? I admit at once that there is difficulty in finding any satisfactory solution. We must have coal. How are we to get it when we need it, and how can we reduce the quantity consumed, are the two questions which I think we must consider.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Or the question of a substitute.

Mr. STEELE: The question of reducing the quantity consumed would include that of employing substitutes. Undoubtedly, the most promising source of our supply apart from the United States is Nova Scotia, but at present our railways cannot transport coal from that province as cheaply as the railways can carry coal from Pennsylvania, a much shorter distance. What are the possible remedies, then? First, to conserve coal. This is a remedy for many evils, a remedy which the people are slow to take advantage of. But I may be permitted here to suggest some reasons why coal should be conserved, thus limiting as much as possible the amount required.

It is generally assumed that there is enormous waste in the consumption of coal, both for domestic and for industrial purposes. The United States Bureau of Mines say that thirty-five per cent of the coal is wasted up the chimney in the average boiler plant, in some cases much more than that. Even in our homes there is vast waste through the people not having an intelligent understanding of how to fire their furnaces and ranges. A great saving can be effected by a campaign of education among our people along these lines. Another thing which I think might be done to conserve our coal and to reduce the quantity required is to have coal sold by test. Almost everything that we buy or sell nowadays is sold subject to test or according to certain standards; why we should pay the mine owners of Pennsylvania for ash and slate, pay transportation, say, to Ontario, carry that ash and slate into our cellars and from there into our furnaces and then carry it out to the ash heap, is a matter which I cannot understand. I believe the day has come, owing to the scarcity of coal and the efforts of coal miners to sell the whole output without grading it at all, when our Government should protect our people, if possible, by having the coal which is imported in Canada and that which is produced in Canada sold according to test.

Another way and one of the most important ways in which we can reduce the quantity of coal required is by waterpower development. Ontario uses about 1,000,000 horsepower of electrical energy annually, and this is a substitute for about 10,000,000 tons of coal. Therefore, the more electrical energy that we utilize, the less coal we shall need. With the completion of the Chippawa-Queenston power canal, in Ontario we shall have enough power from hydro-electric sources, it is estimated, to supply practically every plant west of the Trent valley system. The quantity of power required in eastern Ontario and not yet provided for is perhaps comparatively small when compared with that in western Ontario; but possible power development along the St. Lawrence is quite sufficient to meet all needs. While all the power that can be developed there may not be required—

Mr. PARENT: When the hon. member mentions "all needs", does he mean for industrial purposes or for heating purposes?

[Mr. Steele.]

Mr. STEELE: Only for industrial purposes. I think it is recognized that for heating our homes, electrical energy is not at all suited. It is estimated that about five horse-power would be required for each individual, and that would make electrical energy for heating very expensive. The surplus electrical energy, which could be developed along the St. Lawrence and which would not be needed for industrial plants, could very well be used in the electrification of our railways. Our railways are using about 25 per cent of the coal which is consumed in this country. Every horsepower of electrical energy which can be used on our railways dispenses with the transportation of about ten tons of coal, and that is a very considerable item in our transportation problem. If we can electrify our railways, we reduce the quantity of coal which will be required and also the quantity of transportation service which we are demanding of our railway system. Another consideration which we must not lose sight of is that, as the days go by and as a greater development takes place, electrical energy will undoubtedly be lowered in price, while the price of coal will, undoubtedly, increase. Therefore, it seems time that we should be giving attention to the substitution of electrical power for coal wherever that is found to be practical or possible. As regards the supply of anthracite in the United States, let me point out that Ontario and Quebec have no other source of anthracite available than the United States. It is estimated by the Geological Survey of that country that their anthracite resources will be exhausted in fifty years, and long before that time we can well understand the people of the United States will insist on their anthracite coal being reserved for their own purposes, and probably export will be prohibited. Another possible means of reducing the quantity of coal required is by adopting central heating plants. While I am not prepared to say very much about that at the present time, on enquiry I find that engineers estimate that, by the adoption of central heating plants in the centres of population, the cost of heating our homes and business blocks can be reduced by 50 per cent, so that this is a matter that is well worthy of consideration by our larger municipalities. Another remedy, and one which the Government can, perhaps, do much to apply, is the supplying of sufficient cars to ensure that the people of Canada will have their coal transported from the mines to their homes. It is generally acknowledged that much of the scarcity of recent years has been due to car shortage. I am not familiar enough with all the details of that to be able to explain why there should be a shortage; but undoubtedly there has been a shortage, and if it were possible for the Government and our railways to see that there are always sufficient cars at the mines to get the supply of coal which is demanded for our needs, shipped from the mines, very much would be done to relieve the shortage of next winter, and the time to take that action is in the next three or four months, not next fall. As I have said, 33,000,000 tons of coal were consumed in Canada last year, and that was practically all handled by our railways for a greater or less mileage. When I point out that the total number of tons of freight handled by the Canadian National railways last year was only 27,504,000, that gives an illustration of what a tremendous problem it is for our railways to handle our coal supplies. If the Canadian National railways had done nothing more last year than handle the coal of Canada, they would have handled over 5,000,000 tons of freight more than they handled of all freight on their whole system. The railways consumed 7,400,000 tons of coal in 1919, or 38 per cent of the total; our factories consumed 8,000,000 tons in that year.

I was going to say a few words as to the substitution of oil for coal, but, perhaps, we are not ready in this country at the present time to think of that. It is a substitute for coal as fuel, but the oil scarcity on this continent is even more acute than the scarcity of coal. It is estimated that within five years from now the United States will be purchasing 500,000,000 barrels annually from the British Empire. They are to-day importing about 100,000,000 barrels over and above their own production. Their consumption is increasing at the rate of 100,000,000 barrels a year, so that we can see what a tremendous scarcity there is likely to be on this continent.

None of the remedies, however, which I have suggested, meet the urgency of the immediate future. What is concerning the Ontario people at this moment is their supply of coal for next winter. We need 16,000,000 tons of coal within the next twelve months. How are we going to get it at a price that will not be too oppressive? Are we to be forced to contribute another $100,000,000 to American interests, while our mines are idle and our railways incurring a deficit of $70,000,000 a year from lack of traffic; or are we going to take such steps as can be taken to ensure that our people will get the 16,000,000 tons of coal, and at a price which will be as reasonable as it is possible to obtain the coal at? To my mind, we, as a Parliament, should make every possible effort to see that our people are not overcharged for their fuel supplies, even by American producers, and if it is necessary that the coal should be transported from Nova Scotia to Ontario at the cost of transportation I think our Government railways at least should be utilized for that purpose. If that be impossible, if there is no remedy available, the only thing that remains is that the Ontario people will have to be burdened with this enormous cost of our fuel supply for a few years to come, and the burden will gradually become more oppressive. I would just like to raise my voice at this moment in this House in requesting that this question be given the very best and closest consideration. No problem has ever arisen for which a solution has not been found, and if we cannot find a solution for this one, let it not be said that a solution was not found because we did not make an effort to find it.

I have included in this resolution a request that a special committee of this House be appointed to take this matter into consideration. I think that is a wise request. Let us look into the matter; that is what Parliament is for; let us see what information we can get, so that we may be in a position to advise Parliament as to what steps are possible. Then we may expect that these steps, if such are found, will be taken.

Mr. D. L. REDMAN (East Calgary): Mr. Speaker, I wish to second the resolution which has just been brought in by my hon. friend from South Perth (Mr. Steele), but before speaking in support of it I feel that not only myself but the House generally should congratulate the hon. member for having brought up this important subject and especially congratulate him for the very great care which he has taken in looking into the subject, and in amassing and putting before the House in such excellent order for the use of hon. members all the information which he has given.

I need say nothing, after the speech of the hon. member, as to the general importance to Canada of this question. I presume that practically the question is this: How far, and to what extent, can we make the supplies of coal which lie more or less at the two extremes of Canada come towards each other with a view to meeting, as far as possible, the requirements of Central Canada? Whatever the interest of the province of Alberta may be in the general question, I think it would be quite true to say that its interest will be greater in regard to the question of how much coal it can sell to the rest of Canada.

I need not say anything to this House, because the information is already in its possession as to the almost unlimited quantities of coal which we have in that province, nor as to the quality, because we have there all qualities of coal. It is entirely a question, therefore, of the area within which that coal can economically be marketed. In the last few years the market for Alberta coal has been extended through Saskatchewan and Manitoba. We have not yet completely captured the Manitoba market, and many improvements must be made by us in our methods of production, and some improvements in transportation facilities, before that market is entirely ours; but we have proven that our coal can economically compete with Pennsylvania coal in the province of Manitoba, and I think that when we get proper production methods and proper transportation arrangements it will be proven that our coal can more than compete in Manitoba with the Pennslyvania product.

Then we come to the wider question, a question on which I am not going to have the temerity to-day to make any prohesies or to give any promises, and that is whether or not Alberta coal can come further east than Manitoba. We might, however, consider for a moment the factors which would influence such a result. In the first place, the question of the cost of production might well be looked into. It is a significant fact that while most of the fundamental products, grain, for instance, have been reduced in price during the last year, the price for coal has not only stayed up but has even increased. The Dominion Government has assumed and exercised a certain amount of supervision and control over the labour question in the Alberta mines, and that question is an important factor in the cost of production. In fact, the cost of production of Alberta coal, has almost doubled in the last few years. It is now given at something over $4. The coal itself, as far as the leases are concerned, has practically no value unless it can be sold, so the cost of production is simply the labour and the equipment which brings it forth. A committee of this House could well consider this question, as the Dominion Government has already assumed some control in regard to the question of the cost of labour that is involved in the production of our coal.

But the more important matter, in fact the real question in considering the market which our coal could reach, is the question of transportation. Here again, we find that transportation rates have not gone down this last year, and again we are met by the question of labour. Now whatever may be the relation of market transportation costs generally, I would like to say this: A proposal has been made from Alberta in the last two years that during the summer months, when the freight cars in Alberta and Western Canada are not being used in transporting the grain crop, and when there is not any congestion, when there is, in fact, not sufficient traffic to keep our railroads busy, these cars could be economically used in bringing our coal eastward at a considerably reduced rate as compared with the rate which prevails throughout the rest of the year. I think it has been proven that that can be economically done. It would cheapen the cost of production in that it would give labour all the year around to the miners; it would avoid congestion in the winter time, when the transportation of all products is more difficult, and when the grain is coming eastward. If some such arrangement as this were made, I think it would enable us perhaps to widen our market, and in any event deliver our coal more cheaply throughout the province of Manitoba.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Does my hon. friend mean to say that freight cars used for the transportation of grain can be used economically for the transportation of coal?

Mr. REDMAN: Oh yes, we do that out there. In fact, in Western Canada we use box cars more than any other kind for shipping coal. I have only to add that I think a parliamentary committee would be an excellent organization to consider such a subject as this. I can think of no argument why committees of this House should not consider more subjects than they do. I think myself, and I think other hon. members agree, that our time is often much better spent in getting together in a committee and going to the root of some question, than in making or listening to general remarks in this House on many subjects.

So that, having regard to the importance of the subject, not only to-day but in view of future needs, I would seriously urge that the resolution brought forward to-day by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Steele), be very favourably considered by the Government.

Mr. D. C. ROSS (West Middlesex): I desire to say just a few words on this urgent and important subject. The whole question has been so well discussed by the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele) that there is little left to be said except perhaps from the Ontario viewpoint. The facts are plain, I think, to every hon. member who comes from that province. The question of fuel supply has become one of the most important and one of the gravest of all the problems that confront our people to-day. The situation is this. The wood supply in Ontario, particularly in the older sections of the province, has almost entirely disappeared. Electrical energy has not been developed to such an extent that it may take the place of wood, and as a consequence we are more dependent every day upon the supply of coal we get, not only for our industries, but for our homes as well. The difficulty of obtaining a supply of coal for these purposes is not only increasing, but increasing rapidly. To a large extent, it is true that our industries are in greater need of a steady supply of coal than are private citizens, but, on the other hand, there is an increasing demand for coal for domestic purposes for the reason I have already mentioned, namely, the depletion of our wood supply. Coal is being used to-day not only in our urban centres, but by the farmers as well. The farmers throughout the western part of Ontario are using coal to a large extent, and therefore a proper supply has become essential for three purposes: first, for use in the homes; secondly, for the purposes of industry; and thirdly, for lighting a great many cities and towns throughout the country. We are in an unfortunate position as a province in not having within our borders any natural resources such as are found in the East and in the West. That is our difficulty.

This is not the first time that this matter has been brought up in this House. Last session, the hon. member for Maisoneuve (Mr. Lemieux) brought it up some time in the month of June, and in reply to him at that time the Prime Minister of the day (Sir Robert Borden) remarked that the question was a most important one which we must look pretty squarely in the face. He declared that the then Government or future governments would have to look this matter squarely in the face. I do not know what the right hon. gentleman meant by that statement, but I do feel that the present Government and past governments as well have dallied with this question too long, and the situation has become too urgent and acute for us to leave it in its present state. I think, therefore, that the motion of the hon. member for Perth is most opportune. I am not going to go into details in regard to statistics on the subject. The mover of the resolution has already done that, but the fact remains that we import half as much coal as we produce, and as the late Prime Minister said, the questions seems to be to a large extent one of transportation. Not only from the standpoint of Ontario but from the point of view of the nation as a whole, I would urge the necessity of something being done at the present time in this matter. It is all very well to say that the question of transportation is so large —and undoubtedly it is—that we are having great trouble in connection therewith at the present time. But as a Parliament trying to serve the needs of the Canadian people, it is incumbent upon us to meet the difficulties that face us, no matter how formidable they may be. It is the duty of this Government, and if the Government fails to shoulder its responsibility in the matter, then it is the duty of Parliament, to find a remedy for this urgent problem.

What is our position? I contend that as a nation—for we claim we are a nation—we are most unfortunately dependent upon others for those things which we should provide for ourselves. We have 71 per cent of the available coal supply in the British Empire, and we have 11 or 12 per cent of the coal production of the world, and yet, in these two great industrial provinces, we are absolutely dependent on our neighbours to the south. The people of Ontario, therefore, and particularly the poorer classes, look not only with misgiving but with positive dread upon the advent of fall and winter. Eight or nine years ago they could buy coal for their homes at a price ranging from $6.00 to $6.50 per ton, but during the last winter we have been paying in Ontario, in the county of Middlesex anyway, as high as $23 and $24 for a ton of anthracite for heating purposes, and as high as $16 per ton for soft coal. Now, this state of affairs should not be permitted to continue if we want to have a contented and prosperous people in Canada.

If we want peace and happiness, it is desirable that we reduce the cost of living, and this particular problem touches every home in the province of Ontario. But the difficulty lies not only in the question of price, although that is of exceeding importance. When the ordinary labour man has to pay $23 for a ton of coal to warm his little home and give comfort to his family, it is quite a slice out of his wages of, say, $15 or $25 a week, and one or two tons will not heat the ordinary home. As I say, however, the question is not only one of price; there is the prospect of our being absolutely debarred from getting coal at all. Any little difficulty occurring between us and our neighbours to the south would place us in a very hazardous situation. Should their supplies become depleted, as has been pointed out, or should a strike occur across the border, the result might be that these two great provinces would find themselves absolutely without coal for heating or industrial purposes. That is a most undesirable situation, yet it was the situation in which we found ourselves in 1919. I find in the report of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), for the year 1920 a statement in regard to the fuel supply of Canada in that year. That statement says:

> Almost immediately after a strike occurred in the bituminous coal fields of the United States. To meet this situation, the export of coal from Canada was prohibited except under license. The Fuel Controller, Mr. C. A. Magrath, did not have an organization to handle the situation, so the Canadian Trade Commission undertook the work, at the request of the Government, under the direction of Mr. Magrath.
> It was necessary to immediately ascertain what stocks of coal were in the country, the quantity available on wheels on Canadian railroads, and the minimum requirements of central Canada for the remaining months of the coal year.
>
> After investigation of Canada's needs, Mr. Magrath proceeded to Washington and succeeded in inducing the United States authorities to allow Canada a supply of one hundred and twenty-five cars per day, provided that the coal was distributed in accordance with priority ratings, established by the United States Fuel Administration.
> The arrangements made were quite satisfactory, although Canada never received the 125 cars per day, as promised: such industries, public utilities and institutions as were short of coal receiving sufficient supplies to keep them operating and heated. Fortunately the strike was settled about the middle of December and anxieties in regard to the coal supply for Canada were greatly relieved.

I think that the very reading of this extract from the report of the right hon. gentleman is a sufficient argument to justify the motion made by the hon. member for Perth. These things occurred in 1919; they may occur again this year, and the probability is that we should be absolutely without coal for either our industries or our homes. If such were the case, we should have to go hat in hand to the people of the United States and ask them, in their kindness of heart,—and I admit that they are large hearted—to give the Canadian people a sufficient supply of coal to keep them from freezing during the winter months and to ensure that the wheels of our industries would not be stopped.

These are the facts as I see them, and I do not wish to labour the point. Prices are every year going higher. This is a national question. It is not a question as to whether this government can supply the people of Canada with coal at a profit. Coal is an absolute necessity for the people of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. They must have coal, and the Government must get it for them even if the getting of it by the Federal authority involves some expenditure. We do not usually, as a Government, undertake enterprises in oreder to make money out of them. We do not operate our educational systems in order to make money; we do not supply seed grain to the farmers of the West on a money making basis; we do not make grants to agricultural fairs in order to make money for the people of Canada, or rather to put money directly into the treasury; we are operating a system of publicly owned railways and we are certainly not making money out of those. If the public needs of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec—our two most important and most prosperous provinces from an industrial point of view—require that the Government should do something of a concrete nature, the Government should take the matter in hand in some practical way. An adequate supply of coal is an absolute necessity for the preservation and efficient conduct of our industries, and the maintenance of domestic and social life in the province of Ontario—almost to as great an extent indeed as the British navy is necessary to the existence of the British nation. And yet when this vital matter is brought up somebody wants to know whether it is not going to cost money. In my opinion the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele) has presented facts which are absolutely beyond question; and even if it does involve an expenditure of public money some method should be provided whereby coal can be brought from our eastern and western mines to supply the needs of the Canadian people. What does the present situation mean in other ways? We are now paying out some ninety or one hundred million dollars to the Americans for coal. We talk about the adverse balance of trade, and the adverse exchange rate. Well, the Minister of Finance declares that we will be able to meet the indebtedness involved by our present national debt if we will only adopt throughout the country the slogan "Buy in Canada." Very good, here is an opportunity to carry out this slogan. Let us buy Canadian coal for our necessities and avoid the sending out of ninety or one hundred millions of dollars to the American people. Let us spend that money in the purchase of Canadian coal and thus help our own miners and labourers. I am not trying to advance any definite method of settling this problem because I do not know enough about the details of the situation. What I do contend is that we have to make a start somewhere, and I think the suggestion advanced by the hon. member (Mr. Steele) is a good one. Let a special committee be appointed to deal with this matter; let scientific men be brought before that committee and examined—technical men from the Department of Mines, miners, coal operators, railroad men;—and let us in consultation with them endeavour to reach some solution of this troublesome problem. I have very great pleasure in supporting the motion.

Mr. FRANCIS HENRY KEEFER (Port Arthur and Kenora): I want to join in the compliments which have been extended to the hon. member for South Perth for the labour he has expended in getting the data which he presented to-day and the very able manner in which he supported the motion. I do so with great sincerity knowing what work is involved in the preparation of such data. I think that the request made for a committee is one that should be supported by every member. I would like to join in the statement of the member for Calgary (Mr. Redman) that there is not enough use at present made of hon. members in connection with committee work. Very important subjects come before us that might very well be handled in committee by members of this House. We have seen the benefit of that in connection with the Soldiers' Pension Committee. The members of the House include men who are very able in their different professions or business callings; and, in my judgment, questions such as these could be better handled by these men getting together and considering them in committee, because of the time they could then devote to the work, than they could be handled by the Government, who from pressure of public affairs have not the time. After giving careful consideration to the subjects brought before them they could make their recommendations to the Government which could act upon them or not as it saw fit; but surely beyond all question some valuable opinions and suggestions might be obtained by adopting such a procedure. I sincerely hope the hon. member will be successful in obtaining a committee to consider the subject dealt with in his resolution.

The hon. member mentioned several possible solutions of the coal problem. To my mind there is only one solution of that problem for Ontario and Quebec and that is to burn Nova Scotia coal. There is no use in talking about bringing western coal to Ontario and Quebec—the source is too far away; the mines are situated eight hundred miles from Winnipeg and from that city it is four hundred miles to the head of the lakes, involving a journey of twelve hundred miles by rail to the lakeside ports. Before the war the freight rate on coal at cost was half a cent per ton per mile. That figure would easily be doubled now, so that the carriage of western coal for a distance of twelve hundred miles to Lake Superior would involve a charge of $12 per ton to start with. With such a handicap as that the carriage of western coal to the East is out of the question. But if we take Nova Scotia coal the situation is entirely different. From the mines of Nova Scotia to tide-water there is practically no rail haul, or a very trifling one. From a conversation I had with the member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. MacKenzie) I ascertained that a few years ago the Nova Scotia coal mines were only producing a small quantity—a little over half a million tons; but last year they mined ten times that former output. It is a strange fact that these mines should be shut down to-day. Why is that? One cannot understand it. Are there no orders, or is there some profiteering going on? What is the reason for the cessation of operations? Let us get at the facts. We know that there is a demand for this coal, and we know the demand is not decreasing in Canada; we know that there is plenty of coal in Nova Scotia; let us ascertain why it is not available.

Take, for example, the city of Ottawa. The freight on bituminous coal amounts to $4.85 from the mines.

Mr. FIELDING: What mines?

Mr. KEEFER: From the mines in Pennsylvania. The nearest mines you can get soft coal from are located from one hundred to one hundred and fifty miles from Buffalo. In some cases, however, the coal comes from as far south as Maryland. After the coal has been brought to the St. Lawrence river it comes in over the Grand Trunk or the Canadian Pacific to Ottawa. By the time it reaches this city the rate amounts to $4.63. On top of that you have to pay the exchange on that American freight, and on the American price of the coal, and there is also a duty of fifty-three cents. So there you have five to six dollars which in part could be saved by using Nova Scotia coal. Now, we had Nova Scotia coal coming up to Montreal for ninety cents a ton and less before the war. While that great struggle was on the boats were all commandeered and the business temporarily dislocated. Prior to the war Nova Scotia coal was much in demand in Boston; I am told that city gets a large proportion of its coal from the Nova Scotia mines. Why cannot that coal come into our lake ports, why cannot it pass Montreal? The freight rate by water is very different from what it is by rail, let me give you an illustration. For years we have been taking coal from the lake Erie ports, carrying it to the head of the lakes for use by the Canadian Pacific or the Canadian Northern railway, at as low a rate as twenty-fice cents a ton, a distance of nine hundred miles. This low rate is feasible because of the return cargoes of wheat—thirty or forty cents was the normal rate on coal, but during the war it rose as high as a dollar. Now, however, freight rates are coming down. If you go up to the lakeside towns you will see immense stock piles of coal annually made by the three railways.

Mr. EULER: Will the hon. gentleman permit me a question? Can he say what proportion of the coal consumed in Montreal comes from the Maritime Provinces? Does it amount to any large per centage?

Mr. KEEFER: I have not the figures for Quebec, but so far as our water-borne coal in Ontario is concerned, I can give you some information.

Mr. EULER: That would be water-borne also, would it not?

Mr. KEEFER: It would be for Montreal. The water-borne coal brought to Ontario amounts to 4,614,000 tons bituminous—

Mr. EULER: Coming from where?

Mr. KEEFER: I take it that that would practically all come from United States ports. Of that about 1,000,000 tons goes up to the head of the lakes, for the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian Northern railways. Then, 425,000 tons of anthracite is taken to the head of the lakes. The hon. member for South Perth has already given the total amount of coal coming in by rail and water; I need not repeat them. But the point I want to make is this: You can bring that coal from Nova Scotia up to Montreal for from fifty to ninety cents a ton. You can take coal from the Erie ports to the head of the lakes for forty cents a ton. Now, you have four or five dollars to play on. How is it that we cannot get that Nova Scotia coal anywhere in Ontario for at least a maximum freight of somewhere about a couple of dollars? One of the difficulties, of course, to-day is that these coal boats have to break bulk. That coal has to be elevated at Montreal and then reloaded in the smaller ships. I think that nearly every member of this House knows my views on this question of transportation. The solution is to allow those coal boats to come up through the St. Lawrence route as deepened and enlarged. When they can sail up to any port on lake Ontario and deliver their coal and thus be not far from any towns in the interior of Ontario, then you will get cheaper coal; but I doubt if you will get it until then.

When we have as a competitor a freight rate by rail for 150 miles that costs us practically three or four dollars a ton as well as the duty, there must be a solution of the problem of bringing this Nova Scotia coal to Ontario points, but it cannot, as suggested, be by rail. The distance is too great and you cannot get away from the per ton cost per mile on a railway.

This country has yet to awaken to what it is losing every year by not improving its water-borne transportation through the St. Lawrence. Our people do not yet realize what this means. The best minds in the United States have realized it, and they have made the statement—which I am perfectly certain is true—that it would pay these two countries to build that canal and scrap it every year, throw away the capital cost because that is what we are expending as wasted for lack of that water-borne traffic in relation to various commodities. Of course, we are only touching coal to-day.

Now, we should quickly prepare to get some coal in. Our Canadian mercantile marine ships are built as bulk carriers, and some of them adapted to the size of the St. Lawrence canals, and to-day they may be looking for cargoes. It would be well to have this question considered in that way. There are other existing types of boats that could carry coal up through those existing canals to the Great Lakes. When you once are able to send coal right through you would have return cargoes of grain and other products of the West, and a low freight established. Few of us have any conception of the number of ships that are occupied all the year round bringing coal up to the head of the lakes from lake Erie ports even under present conditions.

Mr. STEELE: Might I ask my hon. friend a question? What cargo of coal can be carried through the present St. Lawrence locks?

Mr. KEEFER: Their present limit is 14 feet 6 inches draft. The Welland canal is being built to a draft of 25 feet, with 30 feet on the sills.

Mr. STEELE: What would be the cargo capacity of those ships?

Mr. KEEFER: With the locks eight hundred feet long a coal cargo boat of about 9,000 tons could be taken through. The present length of boat that is much used on the upper lakes is 500 feet with a draft of 21 to 22 feet.

Mr. STEELE: I was interested in the boats that could go through the present St. Lawrence locks.

Mr. KEEFER: There is no reason why coal should not even at present be brought up through the St. Lawrence locks, but as a lesser cargo would have to be carried at almost the same overhead cost the freight per ton will be greater. But even in that manner coal should be brought up at half the cost we are paying for the railway haulage from Pennsylvania. The canal boat that comes through the St. Lawrence is about 300 feet long. I do not know what she will carry in coal, but you can get the relation in grain. Her grain capacity is about 100,000 bushels. On the other hand, these big 500-foot lake boats will carry from 400,000 to 500,000 bushels of grain or about 8,000 tons of coal. Therefore the smaller boats ought to carry from 1,500 to 2,000 tons of coal, if I am right in my figures.

Mr. HOCKEN: Would it not be possible for each of these boats to tow two or three barges?

Mr. KEEFER: There is no reason in the world why the same scheme cannot be adopted as used to prevail in the old Welland canal, when we used to see barges towing two or three schooners behind them. But we are asleep on this question. We are being robbed every day, and it is time the people were awakened, and the only way you can really awaken them is through this House. One of the quickest ways is by means of a committee, just as we had a committee on the question of prices, and so give the matter publicity. There may be some system at work between the coal operators and dealers or others that has held up the price of coal. Why is it to-day that the Sydney mines are shut down for lack of business? And yet the data produced by the hon. member for South Perth show us that we should be very busy now providing for our fuel supply. I am therefore glad to urge that this matter receive the very careful consideration of the Government and that a committee be appointed to work upon it.

The electrification of the railways need not be taken up just now, but when it is a fact, as we have been told in this House, that out of every dollar of expenditure in operation of our railways twenty cents goes for fuel, and we have any quantity of white coal right alongside these railways running to waste, there is something wrong. We have three railroads practically alongside the St. Lawrence which could be supplied with white coal from that source, and have that quantity of coal that is now regularly and daily going up in smoke, saved for Canadian consumers elsewhere. That in itself would be a saving. That is a question which this committee could thresh out, and I would like to urge that such a committee be appointed immediately.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join other hon. members in paying my tribute of gratitude to the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele) for the great care and extensive research which he must have bestowed upon the very valuable information which he has so clearly placed before the House on this very important subject. Such information is educative at all times, particularly in connection with so important a subject, and we should thank the hon. member for the service he has rendered the country generally and the House of Commons in particular.

Now, it has been abundantly shown that fuel is one of the prime necessities of our country, and I suppose it may be classed in the same category as food and clothing. When we talk of ourselves as a nation, as an independent entity among the nations of the world, it is desirable that we should be able to live largely within ourselves. I do not mean by that, Sir, that we should not have the fullest possible intercourse with the outside world, but I do mean that we should develop the essentials of life and the essentials of nationhood within our own borders. The people of the British Empire generally know that the basic industries of England and Scotland are coal and steel. These industries have been developed to the fullest possible extent, and the benefits and advantages common to such development have followed. A careful examination of the system of trade in Great Britain will show that Englishmen and Scotchmen are not fond of exporting raw material; they prefer to export the article in a fully manufactured state, and in that way the most is made of every product of the country, in all its stages of production and manufacture. We have coal in abundance in Canada; we have other products such as lumber, iron and steel, and it is of the highest importance that we should follow the example of our brethren in the old land and manufacture and use these products to the best advantage of the Canadian people.

I have spoken about national assets; and this phase of the question has been referred to by the mover of the motion. As a matter of safety first, if you like to put it on that ground, it is important that Canadians should be able to live by what they do in Canada for themselves. Accordingly, it is important that every Canadian citizen should be able to get fuel within Canada and of Canadian production as far as possible. An extraordinary condition exists to-day. The people of Ontario, particularly the western portion of the province, are in dread of cold weather, in dread of winter, because they have not the necessary supply of fuel—and the same condition exists in parts of Quebec. We have in Nova Scotia, as I read in the press and as I am told privately, ten thousand artisans out of employment, walking the streets, and alongside of those men are twenty-five or thirty coal mines capable of producing splendid fuel. It seems extraordinary that there should be such a demand for this article, such an abundance of it lying at hand, such a number of men out of employment who would be only too happy to work, and that nothing is done in order to have this coal taken out of the ground, at the same time giving these men employment and satisfying the demands of the people of western Ontario and other parts of the country for the necessary amount of fuel. The only thing necessary, it seems to me, is to find a practicable scheme under which this could be done. The hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Keefer) pointed out a moment ago that it is not a very difficult thing to get coal to Quebec and Montreal, though it may be difficult to store it and ultimately ship it further west by rail. That would mean, of course, a second handling of the coal, but it seems to me that coal shipped from the Maritime Provinces could be taken to Quebec and Montreal, whence it might be transported over the Government railway, a road designed for the purpose of carrying heavy trains at a small freight rate. If this were done, some if not all the demand of western Ontario for fuel would be met, to say nothing of enabling us to depend largely upon ourselves instead of upon a foreign country for our coal supply.

Now, there is the business end of the matter to be considered. One of the problems of the West is the matter of enabling their grain to find its way to the markets of the world. First, it must get to the Atlantic. During nine months of the year, I think, navigation on the St. Lawrence is open. It is quite feasible that coal should be brought from Nova Scotia to Quebec or Montreal by vessels which could take on wheat for eastern ports as a return cargo. In this way a substantial reduction of the rate even that prevailed before the war in respect to the shipment of coal might be effected. I think, therefore, that if we as a people could go about this matter in earnest, we might be surprised by the beneficial results obtained.

Human nature, as a rule, is somewhat disposed to shrink from new duties and new undertakings; we are inclined to go along in the same old direction and let the other man do the new thing. But it seems to me that this is an opportunity for the Government, if we can induce them to do anything at all, to make a start along this line and put something on the right side of the ledger, even if it is a death bed repentance. I would be glad to see them show that they have some sense of national responsibility and move forward in the direction of opening up these channels which are so essential to the proper development and unity of this country. It is a matter of great satisfaction that in Nova Scotia we have practically unlimited supplies of coal. Many years ago, we thought that we had discovered all the coal that was to be discovered; we have a history of coal fields in Nova Scotia, written many years ago by an English gentleman by the name of Brown. Brown's history is still an authority on the question of the mineral wealth, and particularly the coal wealth of Nova Scotia, and if you were to talk about finding coal outside of the sources mentioned in Mr. Brown's record and history, men would shake their heads and say: "There is no use talking; Mr. Brown knew what he did and what he wrote, and you will not find coal except the seams of coal which Mr. Brown discovered." It is, however, a happy development to find that within the last three months there have been struck, within the territory of the Dominion Coal Company, two magnificent coal seams which Mr. Brown knew nothing about. Therefore, coal is being discovered from day to day, and there seems to be no limit at all to the enormous quantities of coal of very excellent quality which we have in Nova Scotia, that is to say, within the Dominion of Canada. When we are talking about national questions, we name provinces simply as a means of designating where the national fortune is; and it is only proper for me, as a Nova Scotian and as an old coal miner, because I worked in the coal mines of Nova Scotia, and I know what it is to mine coal, to cut it and to bring it to the surface, to speak of the coal wealth of Nova Scotia. It does me good, therefore, to talk of this subject if it is to be of any benefit to my brethren of the coal craft in my native province. I hope the day is not far distant when our men will have plenty to do in mining coal, and when a constant, continuous market will be found for it within our own bounds aud outside of the bounds of Canada, so far as that may be necessary. Last year, we produced only 6,500,000 tons of coal in Nova Scotia, and that was done entirely by single-shifting, that is, by men working only one shift a day. There is no trouble in the world, when pressure is on, to double the shift, and with the openings that we now have in the coal seams, there would be no trouble in converting a production of 6,500,000 tons into twelve or fourteen million tons, if the necessary pressure were put on the production, and if the owners of the coal knew where it was to be sold. In that way, the cost of production would be very materially reduced. Any business man knows that overhead expenses in connection with 6,000,000 tons of coal are pretty much the same as overhead expenses in connection with double that quantity. As the market becomes certain and the quantity to be produced is sure and fixed, so from day to day would the expense of production be lessened and the price of coal accordingly cheapened.

I have much pleasure in again thanking the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele) for the service which he has rendered to his country in bringing this matter so forcibly before the House. I trust those of us who will have some responsibility in carrying forward the idea which he proposes, wil not avoid or try to swerve from the duty and responsibility which we have in connection with this matter, and the Government of the day, which is responsible for the general policy of the country so far as government is concerned, should do what lies in its power in order to further the project outlined by my hon. friend.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (West Toronto): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) says that it is a characteristic of humanity to shrink from things that are difficult. We all know that. I have found, in legislative bodies, rather a larger number of men who shrink from taking up difficult questions. There is a disposition to go along in the ordinary groove; but when one is urged to get out of a groove and undertake something that has not been done before, there is great difficulty in getting a sufficient number to carry that out. I have discovered that in places other than the House of Commons.

Mr. JACOBS: What places?

Mr. HOCKEN: In the city council of Montreal, for example. For that reason, I have great admiration for a man like the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele), who brings before this House something that is rather difficult of solution. The very difficulties make it worth while, and the obstacles in the way are, as the late

Sir James Whitney used to say, "for us to overcome." We all know there are obstacles in the way of providing an ample coal supply for the whole Dominion of Canada; but it is our duty, as men elected to look after the welfare of the people of this country, to find a solution for those difficulties and a means of providing those things that are necessary for a comfortable existence upon the part of our people.

The subject has been covered so fully by the mover and the succeeding speakers that I cannot do very much more than repeat what has been said. But when Canada has, within its borders, more than enough coal to meet all the needs of her people, and then we import $98,000,000 worth from the United States, there is something wrong with our business capacity. Although this coal is at the extremes of the country, the general advantage to Canada of having our people supplied with coal from our own mines is so great that one would think steps would have been taken long ago, at least to ascertain whether a solution of this question is possible. If we can succeed in keeping in this country $98,000,000 that we now send annually to the United States, we shall be contributing to that extent to the prosperity of the people of Canada, and to my mind, that is a very important consideration. A committee, such as is suggested by the hon. member for South Perth, seems to be the only means of solving this problem in an intelligent manner. That committee would have the power to make all investigations and examinations necessary to reach a decision; all the force of Parliament would be behind its findings, and if it is possible for any body in this country to secure the necessary information, it ought to be possible for such a committee as that which is proposed. Therefore, I think the hon. member for Perth South is proceeding along exactly the right lines.

The hon. member for Port Arthur and Kenora (Mr. Keefer) drew attention to the possibilities of providing, at least Ontario and Quebec, with coal from Nova Scotia. I remember the time when, as he said, you would see on the lakes a large steam barge towing two or three barges after it, really making the cargo which that steamer was drawing three or four times as great as if it went alone. I am at a loss to understand why that system could not be repeated in bringing coal from Nova Scotia to Ontario ports. If that should be done, I am quite satisfied that practically all the grain grown in Ontario that goes out for export could be taken out in the same way. That would reduce the cost both of carrying the grain for the farmer to the markets of the world and of bringing coal to the people of Ontario. That is a system of navigation that prevailed until they got the big whalebacks and those boats of 9,000 and 10,000 tons. Even with the canals we have at the present time on the St. Lawrence river, that plan should give very excellent results.

As to the coal of the West, I think that at least all the western country should be served by Alberta coal. If that were done it would enable many coal mines in Alberta to continue operations throughout the year, instead of shutting down, as they do now, for a considerable period. It would reduce the overhead expenses and mean cheaper coal to all the people of the prairies. I am not proposing any method to stop the importation of coal to the head of the lakes. That might not be a good thing for the railways, but certainly it should be possible, by specially constructed locomotives and cars if necessary, to supply as far east as Winnipeg at least, with Alberta coal. That is done to a considerable degree at the present time, but I think the distribution throughout the western provinces should be more complete.

I noticed by a document which came to my desk to-day, showing the mineral production of Canada, that the amount of peat produced in this country last year was 3,000 tons, at a valuation of $15,000. It seems to me the development of the peat beds of this province might be carried on more effectually and efficiently than has been the case so far. With coal at $6, or $7, or $8 a ton, perhaps it would be impossible for peat to compete, but with coal at $15 a ton peat at $5 a ton ought to be an efficient form of fuel for a considerable distance from the neighbourhood where it is obtained. In central and eastern Ontario there are large beds of peat, and I think a very large number of the cities and towns, and a considerable portion of our population, might be served with that fuel, which, while not equal to anthracite coal can be obtained at a lower price and be put on the market in competition with anthracite.

My hon. friend from West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) has said something with which I entirely agree—that it is going to be a question whether we can get fuel at any price. That has been pretty nearly the case in this country for the past few years, and that situation will be intensified. I therefore think that all the fuel resources that the country possesses should be examined, to see whether it is not possible for Canada to supply its own fuel both for industrial and domestic purposes, and certainly the question of peat should be considered.

As to the conservation of coal, which to my mind is a very important phase of this question, my hon. friend from South Perth (Mr. Steele) has referred to the possibility of erecting central heating plants. I have thought for a number of years that that is something that ought to be done, and any pressure that the Government could put upon municipalities in order to have that done should be exerted. In my own city at one time a company was formed to do heating from a central plant. Their proposition was to heat all the houses in one or two or three blocks from one plant. To my mind, that it a very fine idea. They could use butiminous coal for such a purpose: that is always cheaper than anthracite coal, and only about half the quantity would be required. All the ash and dirt connected with heating would be eliminated by such a scheme. Unfortunately, the members of the city council regarded that as a very valuable franchise, and they refused to permit the company to go on with the work. The municipality itself refused to do it as a publicly-owned enterprise, and they refused to let the company do it that was willing to invest its own money. To my mind, that is one of the solutions of our fuel problem. In cities like Toronto, Montreal, Quebec, Hamilton and London that plan would mean a saving of millions of dollars and not only that, but the heating of houses and large buildings under very much better conditions than obtain where individual furnaces are used. I do not know what any committee could do to persuade municipalities to go into that, but perhaps the publicity that would be given to the plan from the work of such a committee as is proposed would have an informative influence upon the members of the various municipal councils, and bring about that method of heating.

I want to say just a word or two in support of what my hon. friend from Port Arthur (Mr. Keefer) has said about the development of electrical power on the St. Lawrence river. There is a tremendously valuable power there awaiting development. It is a work that I think the Governments of the United States and Canada might undertake with great advantage in the interest of transportation and the saving of fuel, especially in this country, but also in the United States. If we had had to supply all the manufacturers of Ontario with coal to produce their power during the war, it would not have been possible for us to have secured anything like the results we got from the factories operating during that period. Let us get another million horse power from the St. Lawrence, and if there is a demand for it for industry, let it go there; if there is not a demand for it for industry, let us run the Grand Trunk railway from Toronto to Montreal with the power so developed. While the initial cost might be very great, the ultimate cost spread over a period of 30 or 40 years would certainly mean a great saving as compared with fuel, because with fuel it is not only its first cost that has to be taken into account, but the transporting of it from point to point, which forms a very large item in the expenses of a railway.

I want to congratulate my hon. friend from South Perth upon bringing this matter up. I hope the Government will see its way to granting him a committee, and I hope that that committee will stay at work session after session until it finds a solution for this very serious domestic and industrial problem with which our country is confronted.

Mr. WILLIAM D. EULER (North Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I think it is most appropriate that the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele), coming as he does from the province of Ontario, should have introduced this resolution. I may say at the outset that I am heartily in favour of it, because as is generally known, we in the province of Ontario and perhaps, in a lesser degree, the people of the province of Quebec, are very seriously handicapped by reason of the fact that we have no deposits of coal in these two provinces. Yet, Sir, I have been somewhat surprised that the discussion has related practically to only one item of fuel, and that is coal, except that my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Hocken) discussed briefly the development of peat beds in the province of Ontario. I read an article a few days ago in one of the Toronto journals, which I am sorry I did not keep, because it was written in a very convincing manner. It was to the effect that we shall have in Canada, and in Ontario particularly, other sources of fuel which will be available long before the supply of coal is exhausted. The writer referred to fuel oils which could be developed in this country, not merely from oil wells, but from the oil sands so plentiful in the West. He referred also—and this is perhaps the visionary part of it—to the undoubted possibility of manufacturing fuels by synthetic processes. That may look rather far-fetched to hon. members, and, as I say, it may appear to be somewhat visionary, but I believe there is a good deal to be said for the suggestion. Twenty-five or thirty years ago, if any man had said that the greater part of western Ontario would be supplied with power and light by current generated at Niagara Falls, he would have been considered a dreamer. Yet to-day that dream is true. That, however, is merely by the way.

I desire to refer briefly to one or two statements made by speakers who preceded me, and to make one point in particular, if I can. Most of the members have referred to the fact that the question of a fuel supply for Ontario particularly has to do with transportation. It is admitted, I think, that the western provinces and the extreme eastern provinces, are well supplied with fuel, and there is no serious difficulty so far as they are concerned. It is also admitted that they have enough fuel to supply Ontario and Quebec provided it can be distributed to those provinces at reasonable prices. The matter of transportation is undoubtedly one of the primary difficulties we have to contend with, but it is not the only difficulty in the supplying of fuel from the eastern and western provinces to central Canada. In the United States, from which we in Ontario get all the fuel that we use, both soft and hard coal, the people have at times been in just as serious difficulty as the people of Ontario, and have paid almost as high prices for their coal. They have found it sometimes almost impossible to obtain coal, just as we have found in the western part of Ontario. What is the reason? They have sufficient fuel in the mines of Pennsylvania, and yet the people of certain portions of the United States have suffered almost as severely as we in Ontario who have no coal at all. I remember reading, about a year ago or perhaps a little longer, that the United States Government itself had to pay $22 per ton for soft coal at the seaboard, delivered to United States war vessels, although it was clearly proven that that coal did not cost the producer more than perhaps $10 or $12 per ton, at the point of delivery. Yet the United States Government, for the maintenance of its warships, was obliged to pay a profit of some $10 or $12 a ton to the producers of the coal. That is the situation I wanted to point out. Private interests have a monopoly of this national necessity and use their power to extract unfair profits.

Even if we can provide for transportation from the Maritime Provinces, and can get coal from that part of the country into Ontario, I think it would be absolutely necessary for the Government of Canada to ensure that the coal deposits themselves should come under Government control. Otherwise, we should have a situation similar to that in the United States. I am free to admit that the United States people may possibly, at all times, be able to obtain coal, while on the other hand, we may at some time not be able to get any from that country, because, while they have treated us generously in the past, nevertheless, self-preservation is the first law of nature, and conditions may easily arise under which the United States might find it necessary to cut off the supply from Ontario. Practically the only reason why I rose was to make this statement, that coincident with the settlement of the problem of transportation must be the settlement of the control of our coal fields, whether in Eastern or in Western Canada. And while it may be a radical thing to say in this House, yet I for one believe that in regard to any of the great natural resources and public utilities of Canada, including such matters as transportation, where the people are dependent for their comfort and prosperity upon them, the Government has a real duty to discharge in seeing to it that these things remain under the control, if not the ownership and operation, of the people themselves.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): I shall not take more than a few minutes. I agree with the previous speaker (Mr. Euler), that these public utilities ought to be controlled by the state. Who own the coal-beds in the United States? The railways themselves, which are private corporations. We are getting railroads in this country which will be a national asset, and we must take hold of our fuel problem. If the people of the United States are paying such enormous prices to-day for coal, it is because the railway monopolies made a monopoly of the coal mines; and, as the previous speaker stated, we must avoid that. One thing I want to point out is the fact that transportation must be a matter of the electrification of our railways, and we can start with the development of the St. Lawrence powers. We can obtain power enough there, and also in Ontario, to carry cars up to the head of the lakes, and the coal supplies of the Maritime Provinces can be used to electrify the railways there by burning the coal at the pit mouth. They are coming to that in England, where they see great improvements in that direction. It is also possible, by the use of our river-powers, to get almost sufficient power to drive all the railways from one coast to the other. We should have more cars for transportation of coal. I think it is a good policy in connection with this question of coal to ascertain at the same time how much power we can get by the use of the water-power in our rivers, and also by the generation of power at the pit mouth in the mines. In that way we could get enough power to carry coal across the continent, and so avoid burning up 70 per cent of the coal we bring into the country in driving engines on the railways. The problem is a very wide one. It goes into the question of the use of electricity developed both from coal at the pit mouth and from power generated by the rivers, and it involves also the necessity of developing the greatest possible amount of power we can. Supposing we are dependent on the United States for anthracite coal, and particularly for coal for Ontario and Quebec, if we developed the electrical power which has already been referred to in this House, and obtained the highest possible amount of it, should the Americans be wanting power, we could trade our power for their coal, and in that way the balance of the account might be in our favour. So that all these questions must be taken up in connection with the fuel problem—the question of power, the question of transportation and the utilization of our surplus water-power—if we have a surplus of power, sending some of it to the Americans in return for a friendly supply of coal from them, thus relieving us from the necessity of having to beg it from them. So I commend to the consideration of the Government the proposal before the House. I hope the Government will appoint a committee of the character that has been suggested, that a full study of the whole question will be made, and that one result will be to ensure to the people of this country a plentiful supply of coal. Speaking of coal, I hope that the news coming from the Mackenzie Basin in the Northwest is correct. I trust a great supply of petroleum will be found there, and that it will help in the solution of the fuel problem of Canada.

Mr. H. B. MORPHY (North Perth): The afternoon is passing, and it is incumbent upon me to say a word or two in support of the motion of the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele), a close colleague of mine territorially. I consider that his motion deals with a situation of great urgency. I have listened to the many speeches, all of the same tenor, which have been made in support of the motion, and the discussion has been very illuminating. The main value of to-day's discussion to the House, and I believe also to the Government and the country, is the publicity which will be given to the subject matter of the resolution. It is unquestioned that in the departments of government are vast stores of knowledge concerning the natural resources of Canada, but unless there is a discussion of this kind these sources of knowledge lie dormant there and are given no publicity. For that reason I think my hon. friend from South Perth deserves the thanks of the House for bringing this question forward in the way he has. The appointment of a committee is asked for, and it does seem to me that the Government should, upon this subject at least—notwithstanding the criticisms heard now and then that there are too many committees—hearken to the views of hon. gentlemen and, in view of the importance of the subject, grant the committee that is asked. It does not seem to me that there has been anything introduced in the House for a long time that goes as closely to the public needs as the subject dealt with in this resolution. I do not wish to reiterate the arguments showing the deplorable condition to which either Quebec or Ontario may fall as the result of arbitrary action on the part of those across the line who have the control of the fuel supply. It is time, however, that some executive action of a concrete nature should be taken by the Government along the lines of the resolution, and that a special committee of the House should be given the chance not only to try and solve this problem by recommendations, but also to let their work operate as an advertisement to the capital of the world, showing the immense possibilities, as to profit and public benefit, of the utilization of that capital in the development of this industry.

There is no question to my mind but that the Government should consider what its attitude should be in so far as the nationalization of the coal interests of the country are concerned. That matter was the subject of comment in the House on a prior occasion and I believe it is one as to which perhaps the Government has an idea other than nationalization. But I take pleasure in agreeing with what the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) has just stated—that this matter is of such grave moment, being a necessity of the greatest public concern, that I do not think members would be going very far out of their way in asking the Government to seriously consider the question of the nationalization of the coal interests of the country. I know that it looks like a great undertaking to attempt; but nevertheless I think that in ten or twenty years from now, it may be said here that the Government was very supine when it did not devote its best energies to the consideration of the question of the nationalization of the coal industry. The more the fuel supply of the public is kept out of the hands of private enterprise, the freer the Government will be to take measures which will prove of real value to the public at large. Apart from that, the work of the committee might reasonably influence private capital to enter the coal fields of the West and produce. The more coal there is produced, and over produced, the cheaper that fuel will be to the people; and it seems to me that if there was no other reason than that, the committee should be permitted to enter upon a study of this problem. As the hon. member (Mr. Steele) said a short time ago, we may be up against worse conditions next winter than we have experienced during the past three or four years. I do not know what the conditions were in Quebec, but I think the hon. member faithfully portrayed the difficulties, the expenses—yes, the extravagant expenses—and the deep privations to which the people of Ontario have been put during the last few years in connection with this indispensable necessity of life. For that reason the Department of Railways should take into consideration the suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. Steele) that there should be Canadian cars stationed at the American mines to take coal and land it in Canada. There is no question to my mind but that the Government might reasonably take action along that line, and I commend the hon. gentleman for bringing the suggestion to their attention.

[Mr. Morphy.]

I would go even further than that if the conditions in future are to be as bad as they have been in the past. This country has given bonuses for the production of steel, it has given subsidies towards the construction of shipping—many bonuses have been given to aid enterprises which are not as nearly of as great concern as the fuel supply of the people. It might be all right, therefore, to suggest to the Government that they make a survey of the whole field of Western Canada, which is a veritable coal mine, and it might be worth while suggesting that this committee be asked to consider whether the bonus principle should not apply to the production of coal. I do not for a moment see why the question of a bonus for the production, or the over production, of coal should not be considered. I say "over-production" because you cannot produce too much of that necessity of life to satisfy the wants of the people and help to cheapen the price. I leave the matter there, in the hope that the Government will regard this motion not as an academic proposition but as a real problem which confronts this country and awaits solution. I hope the Government will consent to the appointment of a committee and let them get to work, thereby giving publicity to the extent and character of our natural resources. I trust further that our efforts in connection with this matter will lead to the development, either by private effort or by the Government itself, of our coal supply which is, if anything, as great a necessity as our supply of food.

Mr. W. D. COWAN (Regina): Mr. Speaker, the motion of the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele) is very opportune, I think, particularly so in view of the action taken only last week by the Legislature of Alberta. That province, as has been said to-day, is vitally interested in the development of her coal mines, she having such enormous deposits of coal. During the past two or three years she has been devoting her energies very largely to developing those mines, the result being that she has largely captured the Manitoba market which was formerly supplied from the American coal fields. The Hon. Mr. Cote, provincial secretary, speaking only last week in the Alberta Legislature said:

> We have increased our total output to 7,000,000 tons, and we have largely captured the Manitoba market, but we cannot hold that market without a struggle, and I am informed that arrangements have been made by American interests for a strong attack in order that they may regain the ground they lost last year.

He added:

It is not the intention of my department to submit quietly.

I am very glad to note that the Alberta Government is not going to submit quietly, because I have always felt that once Canadians have demonstrated that they can supply the market of Manitoba, they should be encouraged in every shape and form to continue that work in order that we may lessen the importation of foreign goods, and thereby balance the difference in trade which is so much against us at the present time.

Hon. Mr. Cote also stated:

I am firmly convinced that we have hit upon the right plan to develop Alberta's coal industry and, incidentally, all of the other industries of this province that are allied with the coal industry.

That to me is a very important statement, because if there is anything I want to see in Western Canada it is a greater development of our industrial life. As soon as we have that development the agitation which has continued so long, and which has so often threatened to separate Eastern and Western Canada, will very largely cease. Therefore, it is up to us to do what we can to assist Alberta in her work.

Why is it, I said that it is particularly opportune that we should at this time appoint such a committee? Speaking on the same occasion the provincial secretary said:

The coal industry of Alberta is capable of great development, and during the coming year it is the intention to have the staff of the Industrial Research Commission, for which $38,000 was voted, devote its entire energies to studying the coal problem of the province in every feature from mining to marketing.

What more opportune time for this Government to do something to co-operate to see if we can solve what is probably the biggest problem we have in Canada to-day? Co-operation between this Government and the various provincial governments has been carried on to a rather large extent in the last two or three years with very great success, and I see no reason why we should not continue along those lines.

As an illustration of the result of that co-operation, let me draw your attention Sir, to what this Parliament did on the initiative, if I remember correctly, of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). Some two or three years ago we voted $200,000 for the establishment of a briquetting plant in southern Saskatchewan. It was agreed that we should co-operate with the provincial governments interested, and the Saskatchewan and Manitoba governments voted $100,000 each, which I think they have since increased, and the total amount now expended is about $600,000. The question was: Can we solve the coal problem of southern Saskatchewan and of Manitoba from the lignite coal of that area? What has the result been? I am going to read—and I make no apologies for doing so—an item which appeared in the Regina Leader only a few days ago, in which it is stated:

The first briquettes produced by the Government briquetting plant at Taylorton, to be tried out in this city, were to be seen burning yesterday in the grate in the Premier's office at the Parliament Bulidings. They were part of a sackful from the first output of the plant sent to Premier Martin last week.

The briquettes are about two inches square and shaped like a piece of children's machine-cut candy. They are very heavy and burn evenly, giving off a powerful heat. The residue is a fine brown ash.

Those who viewed the fire in the Premier's grate estimated that the heat-producing qualities of the briquettes were considerably greater than those of ordinary soft coal burned on the prairies.

The plant expects to place these briquettes on the market this summer.

To me that is exceedingly important. There are two features to be noted. First, is it possible to take this coal and briquette it scientifically and successfully? It is demonstrated that it can be done. Then the next consideration is—will it be a commercial success? I am fully satisfied that within the next month or two that will be fully demonstrated. The fact that by the initiative of this Government and of this Parliament the task of solving this problem in southern Saskatchewan was undertaken, and it is now an assured success. If we can solve one problem in that way why shold not we undertake the bigger problem for the whole Dominion? This particular news item in the Regina Leader would lead the public to believe that the Provincial Government was solely entitled to credit for this particular work, but I am satisfied that that was not the desire of the Premier of Saskatchewan. He has already enough to his credit and does not need to steal credit from anybody else. I wish to express as strongly as I can my appreciation of the course taken by this Government in starting that work and carrying it to such a successful conclusion.

There is no reason why we should not supply the whole Dominion from our own coal deposits. The hon. member for Port Arthur and Kenora (Mr. Keefer) to-day said that it was quite impossible for us to bring coal from Alberta down to the province of Ontario. "Why," he says, "you have 1,200 miles of a freight haul." For the first time since I have been in this House I have to disagree with my hon. friend—and I think ninety-nine times of a hundred he is right. But what have we been doing? In the city of Regina a great many of us have for years been burning coal brought from Pennsylvania. That means a railway haul of three to five miles to the lake port, then the water haul to the head of the lakes, and again another thousand mile railway haul to Regina. That is, the Americans can sell their coal to us, notwithstanding a rail haul of over 1,200 miles. When it comes down to our doing the same in regard to Ontario it is suggested that we are quite incapable of handling such a proposition. To me a Canadian is just as good as any other man. We can do just as well as anybody else, and I am satisfied that if we attack the problem in a true Canadian spirit we can solve it.

Coal from Alberta does carry an enormous freight rate shipped eastward so also does Nova Scotia coal shipped westward. But let me point out that the more freight traffic you have undoubtedly the lower the cost of carrying that freight will be. Carrying only a limited quantity of coal over our lines as we are doing to-day, naturally the cost is very high indeed, and the very fact that we are carrying such a limited quantity is responsible for our enormous railway deficits. In the United States wherever they have coal-carrying lines those are found to be the most profitable. In fact, it is always profitable to carry coal. We are not doing it. Consequently we are not getting that freight, we are not getting the return that we should get on the freight, and we have operating deficits.

It seems to me that the only thing to do is to make up our minds that we are going to increase the amount of coal traffic on our railways, as a result of the decreased cost of operation due to the greatly increased volume of traffic, the Railway Commission, it seems to me, would be justified in ordering a reduction of the freight rate. Therefore it seems to me that the only thing for us to do is to make up our minds that we are going to tackle this problem seriously, and where we find the other governments, whether of Alberta or of Nova Scotia, ready to co-operate, we should show our willingness to co-operate with them. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to support as strongly as I can the wish of the member for South Perth.

[Mr. Cowan.]

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I exceedingly regret that I have not been able to hear much of this debate and to get the advantage of the discussion. The subject is one, of course, with which I came closely in contact during the three and one-half years that I was in charge of the Department of the Interior.

The motion of the hon. member (Mr. Steele) calls for the appointment of a committee in the hope that such a committee can contribute something supplementary to the efforts that have been made during the past number of years to bring about conditions under which a larger share of fuel consumed in Canada shall be of Canadian production. The fuel problem of Canada is one of our greatest problems. The very outstanding fact that of the money paid for goods imported into Canada, $80,000,000 is paid for coal alone, and that this coal comes entirely from the United States—a nation which, above all others, enjoys so tremendous a balance of trade as against us—that outstanding fact discloses the question as perhaps one of the most perplexing with which we have to deal.

Western Canada is replete with fuel potentialities, particularly with coal. Alberta has the largest deposits of coal, of course, on this continent—that is to say, of coal of all qualities. Canada itself, though it labours under the disability I have described, is second among the coal-containing countries of the civilized world. Western Canada, then, has its own fuel. The Maritime Provinces also are underlain with fuel. The central provinces, so far as has yet been discovered, are without great coal resources. The fortunate thing is that where coal is wanting, water-power abounds; in those portions of the Dominion where we lack the asset of the fuel resource in the form of wood or coal, we have it in the form of water-power. But the application of water-power for fuel purposes is a matter of slow development and cannot extend to such a length as will render it in any degree a solution of the fuel problem in the central provinces, for the reason that with the advancement of time and the development of industry the power that may be gathered from the fall of water will be more and more consumed in industries and manufactures. Now, though the output of Alberta is today the largest of any of the provinces, and though that output has increased very appreciably, particularly in recent years, we do not yet supply Western Canada with fuel, and we cannot hope for some time, I fear, to carry the —fuel of the West, that is, of Alberta, further—at least to any extent worth bothering about—than the head of the lakes. It is a matter solely of the cost of freight; it is a matter of the relation of the cost of the imported coal to the cost of carrying the freight in Canada. We do to-day bring the coal of the East into the province of Quebec—it is even coming into Ontario—and the effort is to bring the Nova Scotia coal as far as possible westward, to occupy as large an area of the Quebec field particularly as can be occupied by that production. That as well is a question of freight, a question of the relation of the cost of carriage of the coal to the cost of the imported competing article. That is the whole problem. You cannot carry coal for nothing. You may make the rate nothing, if you will, but that does not mean you carry it for nothing; it means only that you carry it at the cost of the country, and if you carry it at the cost of the carriage of the commodities of course it comes out of the people. There is a certain inherent cost in the carriage of coal and no amount of bookkeeping is going to reduce it. Consequently the extent to which that relationship is a factor in the area that can be covered by the Canadian production of coal is not alterable by very much that this Parliament can do. We have endeavoured in recent years—and I think there has been very considerable application of the resources of government to the problem; more than is generally understood—to make the production of the lignite of Saskatchewan such that it could withstand exposure to the air and thus be made available for other portions of the West in particular. In that respect we have had a very considerable degree of success. I am glad to note the reference made by the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Cowan) to the success that has been achieved there. My information is—and it is very recent indeed from the Lignite Commission—that they are now at the stage where they feel that the element of chance is pretty nearly negligible and that they can be said to have succeeded in actually commercializing the briquetting of coal. They have succeeded in obtaining, and are satisfied with the results obtained from it, the best binder that can be got. They believe it is the right one, and the only element of chance, if there be any, is in determining whether or not the use of this binder and the methods of its use require such capital and such labour that the cost is really going to be low enough to warrant—to compel, indeed —the distribution of briquettes at least as far as the head of the lakes and generally over the eastern prairie provinces. I do not think they entertain very much doubt, if any at all, that that is going to be the case. They feel that they have made a success of the enterprise that has been entrusted to them, and I think their view in that regard has plenty of material to back it up; I do not think they are wrong.

In Eastern Canada, in Ontario here, the effort has been directed in two ways, one toward the making available of our peat resources, and the other to show that we have coal at least in the farther northern portion of the province. As regards the problem of peat, there, too, considerable success has been attained. A machine has been developed which produces on a large scale, and which they are ready to turn over to a company,—if indeed, they have not already done so—with a view to the production of peat on a purely commercial basis apart from government assistance. It was a matter merely of the development of machinery that could be put down at a cost, and do the work at a cost, that would enable the peat production to compete. That, I think, they have succeeded in doing. When I last inquired, they were working at another machine or a smaller size which they thought might be used successfully and would aid in the production of this article.

The information I have obtained lately is to the effect that in northern Ontario in the rivers leading to Hudson bay, and in one in particular, there are indications that coal exists in such quantities and of such quality that it is likely it will be of use, in the not distant future, for consumption in this p rovince. I cannot give the House very much information, not because there is anything to conceal, but because I have not as yet learned just what is the result of their investigations. I remember well, only a few months ago, arranging for a special investigation of that question, and from a memorandum which I received just the other day and which I cannot put my hands on at the moment, I gathered the impression that those who started on the investigation had rather more success than they expected. So much for that.

As regards what a committee might do, and as regards the wisdom of this House accepting the resolution of the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele), there is this to be said. A committee could gather together in convenient form the information that now may be found in more or less scattered and inconvenient form. It could be of use in bringing to the attention, particularly of members of the committee and through them of the House, the real factors of the problem and especially of impressing how earnest and, I think, how systematic have been the efforts to solve that problem. If it succeeds in doing that the committee will be well worth while. The scientific board which has been at work for some two or three years has directed its efforts to this question. The committee will be able to gather much information from that board, and the policy which was foreshadowed in the speech from the Throne, and which it is intended to initiate this session will, I hope, enable that board more effectually to do its work and exert its energies in this as well as in other directions.

The hon. member for South Perth has undoubtedly contributed, not only to the interest of the afternoon, but to the usefulness of the day in launching this discussion, and I see no reason why the request he makes in his resolution should not be granted. Indeed, I see considerable reason why it should. I would like a committee of this House to give the assistance to the discussion of this subject in Parliament that they could give by a close and concentrated study of this question, and if they so give their time and energy to it, they will be able to assist very much in the discussions in this House, and the solution of the problem will be advanced. I think that is all that the resolution calls for, and that is the attitude that I have towards it. I understand other hon. members desire to speak and, consequently, it will not be possible to close the debate at this time.

Mr. J. C. DOUGLAS (Cape Breton South and Richmond) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. FIELDING: Before the House adjourns, I should like, if I am permitted, to put a question or offer a suggestion to the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) touching the Budget. I do not wish to press him unduly, because I know the embarrassments and difficulties of that; but there are some matters bearing more or less upon something approaching the Budget, which some of us may desire to discuss, and if the Budget were to be delayed, we might find it necessary to deal with them separately. I would not ask my hon. friend for an answer now, but my suggestion is this: that if, when the House meets again after the Easter recess, he is able to give an approximate idea of when the Budget will come down, that will be helpful to the general business of the House. What business will be taken up on Tuesday?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Government will proceed with Estimates. The Department of Labour and the Department of the Interior are prepared to go on. Should we get further than Estimates, I would intimate the likelihood of proceeding with the oleomargarine resolution and with the Lake of the Woods Control Bill.

At Six o'clock the House adjourned pursuant to rule.

Tuesday, March 29, 1921

The House met at Three o'clock.

FRENCH TREATY

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I beg to lay on the Table a copy of the Trade Agreement between France and Canada,—the original, which is in French, as well as the translation in English.

Mr. FIELDING: Is the document printed?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No; it is typewritten.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May we expect to receive printed copies?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Printed copies will be available in due course. I have just received this from the Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce.

PORT OF QUEBEC

ALLEGED UNFAVOURABLE TREATMENT BY CANADIAN GOVERNMENT MERCHANT MARINE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): Before the Orders of the Day are called, may I ask the Minister of Marine (Mr. Ballantyne), whether he has received any complaints from the merchants of Quebec, or any person else on their behalf, with regard to discriminatory action against the port of Quebec by the Canadian Government Merchant Marine? If so, does he intend to take these complaints into consideration?

Mr. SPEAKER: It strikes me that this question is not of such a character as warrants its being put upon the Orders of the Day. It should be placed on the Order Paper in the usual manner. While it is undoubtedly important, it is very local in its nature and does not affect the country at large.

Mr. POWER: I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it may be a question of public policy. It may be a question as to whether or not the Canadian Government Merchant Marine is fulfilling the duties for which it was created.

Mr. SPEAKER: It may involve a question of policy, but the subject is not of sufficient urgency to be brought up on the Orders of the Day; notice should be given and the question asked in the ordinary way.

Mr. POWER: With all due deference to the Chair, I submit that the matter is of considerable urgency. Navigation is about to open, and it is of great importance to the merchants and others in the seaports of Canada to ascertain how they stand in this matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the minister desires to answer the question now, I will offer no opposition.

Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE (Minister of Marine): So far as my knowledge goes, I may inform the hon. member that no communications of any kind have reached the Department of Marine charging any discrimination, on the part of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, against the port in question. However, I will look into the matter, and if it transpires that any correspondence has reached the department, I shall be glad to inform the hon. gentleman accordingly.

TRADE WITH WEST INDIES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. A. ROBB (Chateauguay-Huntingdon): Recently in the Canadian press there has been an announcement that Bermuda has rejected the trade arrangement between Canada and the West Indies, and it has been intimated that this action might affect the agreement with the other Islands. Has the Prime Minister any statement to make regarding the matter?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): I cannot speak with finality, but from a conversation I had with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, (Sir George Foster), I believe Bermuda has rejected the arrangement so far as it concerns herself. That, however, does not affect the validity of the agreement as respects the other Islands. The attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce has been drawn to the matter, and he will speak upon it tomorrow.

THE INCOME TAX

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve-Gaspé): As notices are being sent out, or are about to be sent out, under the Income Tax Act, and as people are rather afraid that mistakes may be made in the computation of the tax, by which they may be liable to severe penalties, it has been suggested to me by several parties interested that the payment of the tax be made as heretofore,—that is, a statement should be made by the person liable and the amount of tax should be fixed by the Commissioner of Taxation. Many people are somewhat uneasy under this new regulation, and I should like the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance to consider the matter seriously before applying the penalty clauses.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): The Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) is, unfortunately absent, being engaged this afternoon addressing an audience in the city. However, I feel safe in intimating—though nothing in the nature of a definite announcement can be made until his return—that the regulations have been under reconsideration, and I believe that the Minister of Finance has a method which he thinks of proposing that will not be open to objections of the nature suggested by the hon. member. I will call his attention to the matter.

Mr. BELAND: Last year an extension was granted until the last day of April for the handing in of the report. Is it the intention of the Government similarly to extend the time this year?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I cannot give an answer to the question, as I am not familiar with the subject. I am informed by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. McCurdy) however, that that is the law to-day.

SUPPLY—CANADIAN GOVERNMENT MERCHANT MARINE

GENERAL STATEMENT BY THE MINISTER

Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

He said: Before this motion carries, I desire to place before hon. members the particulars concerning the operations of the Canadian Government merchant ships during the fiscal year ended December 31, 1920. I thought it well to do so at this time in order that hon. members may be in possession of the facts. Hon. members will be in a better position, after a perusal of the Hansard report of my remarks, to ask whatever questions they may deem proper when the House is again in Committee of Supply. If it is agreeable to hon. members, I would suggest at the outset that they be good enough to allow me to finish without interruption whatever I have to say. When we are in Committee of Supply I will, to the very best of my ability, and with the greatest pleasure, give the fullest information to hon. members regarding the operations of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine.

Mr. Speaker, when, on April 4, 1918, I had the honour of announcing to Parliament the Government's shipbuilding programme, I gave the reasons which impelled us to enter upon such an undertaking. Although it may be a repetition of what I then said, I shall now briefly restate the reasons which caused the Government to create a Canadian Government merchant marine. During the spring of 1918 the war was at its most critical period, and losses in shipping tonnage throughout the world were very grave. Indeed, so serious was the situation at that particular time that it amounted to a race between the enemy submarines and the shipbuilding yards of the British Empire—in the one case to destroy allied tonnage as rapidly as possible, and in the other case to make good, as far as possible, that loss of tonnage. In the first place, therefore, this Government thought it wise to enter upon shipbuilding as a war measure. Before that decision was reached the British Government was utilizing our steel shipbuilding yards throughout the Dominion for the construction of steel ships for its own purposes, which ships were under British registry, the Canadian Government providing the necessary funds. However, as these vessels were being built for the Mother Land, and under British registry, the moment they were ready to be put into commission they would necessarily pass into the possession of the British Government to be utilized by it in the way it might deem best. The Dominion Government, therefore, came to the conclusion, and its decision received the unanimous approval of the House at that time, that it would be better for Canada in the national interests, seeing that she was financing the construction of these ships that were being built for the British Government, that we should build ships under Canadian registry and for the benefit of the Canadian people. Accordingly our first reason for entering upon the shipbuilding programme at that time was the imperative need of providing shipping to make up the immense losses that were occurring almost hourly during the most critical period of the war. The second reason for embarking upon this policy was that the Government owned a large system of railways amounting to about 18,000 miles, and which will be increased to something like 23,000 miles if the acquisition of the Grand Trunk goes into effect. Having this vast system of national railways, the Government deemed it necessary to complete the chain of transportation by providing ships to carry the cargoes that would be transported over this immense railway system to our seaports for exportation. The third, but by no means the least important, reason for the construction of these ships was to enable Canada to expand her export trade; and as I proceed with my remarks hon. members will see that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine has performed a very great national work in opening up new trade routes and in helping to develop and expand the export trade of the Dominion. At this stage permit me to say, Mr. Speaker, that no new contracts for ships have been let since the year 1919. I have noticed from time to time that the press of Canada, and occasionally some gentlemen engaged in banking—the presidents of our large financial institutions—have called upon the Government not to construct any more ships, expressing the opinion that the time had arrived when shipbuilding by the Government in this country ought to cease. I find no fault with these financial gentlemen except to say that when they made such appeals they seemingly were not aware that the Government had not placed any new contracts for the construction of ships since the year 1919, but was simply carrying to completion its original shipbuilding programme. Some of those who made this demand were of the opinion that when the armistice was signed the Canadian Government should not have given any more contracts for ships. Now, I explained to the House last year, and I repeat the statement, that the Government's reason for continuing the shipbuilding programme was the serious labour conditions that existed throughout Canada at the time of the signing of the armistice, and which conditions prevailed through the year 1919. Thousands of skilled and unskilled workmen were out of employment in the Dominion; and as, at that time, hundreds of thousands of our brave men were returning from the front, the Government felt that it was its plain duty, to carry on shipbuilding and to give employment not only to the men then needed in the industry, but to others who were likely to require work, and especially the returned soldiers—that from the point of view of making provision for unemployment it would be a wise policy for the Government to continue its shipbuilding programme. I hope the House will pardon me if, from this point, I adhere somewhat more closely to my notes in order to afford hon. gentlemen that detailed statistical information which is so imperatively necessary in connection with this important matter.

The year 1920, as was generally anticipated, proved unsatisfactory to shipping interests the world over, more especially from the point of view of net earnings. The loss of tonnage that had been sustained during the war was more than overtaken, with the result that there had been throughout the year a surplus of available tonnage. The world tonnage at the commencement of the war was about 49,000,000 tons. The available world tonnage at present is about 65,000,000 tons.

The costs of operation that had reached abnormally high proportions during the war and to which reference will be made later, continued throughout the year. That taken in conjunction with the substantial decline in freight rates from those of the previous year, added very materially to the difficulties with which shipowners had to cope. During the year there was a very severe decline in freight rates from United Kingdom ports over well defined routes, such as those to India and South America. While the decline in trans-Atlantic rates to United Kingdom ports was not so acute, it was nevertheless very substantial, and had a marked effect on the earnings of vessels. For instance there has been a decline of 65 per cent in the rate on flour; on grain 61 per cent; on deals 55 per cent; on cereals 48 per cent; and on apples 41 per cent. On cargoes from Canadian ports to South American ports decreases have averaged from 17 per cent to 50 per cent. On cargoes to India there has been a decline of 20 per cent in the comparatively short time since the route was established. From British Columbia ports to Australia there has been a steady decline averaging between 15 per cent and 35 per cent. On the one article of lumber the decline over the rate for 1919 was, during 1920, at least 25 per cent.

Over all the principal trade routes, both transatlantic and transpacific, there has been a corresponding decline in freight rates, and while shipping companies during that time had to contend with the highest operating costs ever known, they were also faced with the problem of smaller cargo offerings than had been the case for many years. As an indication of the enormous extent to which operating costs have increased in recent years, I would point out that the percentage of increases in the prices paid for the principal requirements as between the years 1914 and 1920 has been approximately as follows:

	Per cent
Coal	133
Provisions	100
Oils, etc	100
Paints	125
Rope	100
General deck and engine stores	100
Wages	300

So acute is the depression in shipping that for some considerable time there have been lying idle in different ports of the world a very large number of British ships, and at the present time there are lying idle 536 steel steamers of United States registry in addition to nearly 300 wooden vessels of the same registry. Under all these unusual conditions the Canadian Government Merchant Marine may well be considered to have had a very satisfactory year, the results of which I shall place in more detail before the House.

The next matter of interest I wish to bring before the House is the number of ships that the Government own. When I made my statement in connection with the shipbuilding programme to the House last session there were 24 vessels completed and in commission as follows:

7 ships of 8,300 tons each.
4 ships of 5,100 tons each.
4 ships of 4,500 tons each.
8 ships of 3,500 to 3,900 tons each.
1 ship of 2,800 tons.

The approximate tonnage of these vessels is 129,000 tons.

Since that time 23 additional vessels have been completed and put in commission as follows:

9 ships of 8,300 tons each.
4 ships of 5,100 tons each.
4 ships of 4,500 tons each.
4 ships of 3,500 to 3,900 tons each.
2 ships of 2,800 tons each.

These have an approximate deadweight tonnage of 131,000 tons.

There are therefore in commission at the present time 47 vessels of the following types:

[Mr. Ballantyne.]

16 ships of 8,300 tons each.
8 ships of 5,100 tons each.
8 ships of 4,500 tons each.
12 ships of 3,500 to 3,900 tons each.
3 ships of 2,800 tons each.

of an approximate deadweight tonnage of 259,783 tons.

There remain to be completed 16 ships of the following types, viz:

2 ships of 10,500 tons each.
9 ships of 8,300 tons each.
5 ships of 3,500 to 3,900 tons each.

These will have a deadweight tonnage approximating 114,470 tons.

The entire programme when completed will comprise 63 ships of the following types:

2 ships of 10,500 tons each.
25 ships of 8,300 tons each.
8 ships of 5,100 tons each.
8 ships of 4,500 tons each.
17 ships of 3,500 to 3,900 tons each.
3 ships of 2,800 tons each .

The approximate deadweight tonnage of all of those vessels when completed will be 374,254 tons.

Seven of these vessels are being equipped with oil fuel installation and thirteen of them will be provided with refrigeration spaces.

It will be recalled, Sir, that for the purpose of the shipbuilding programme the sum of $20,000,000 was voted for the present fiscal year. Of that amount there has been expended up to the present $14,684,513.99. It is estimated that before the end of the fiscal year a further amount of $650,000 will be expended, making a total expenditure for the year of $15,334,513.99. It therefore follows that, of the amount of $8,000,000 which will be required to complete the programme, $4,665,496.01 is a revote.

Now I come to the comparative cost of construction. The average cost of constructing all the vessels under the Government shipbuilding programme figures out at $191.95 per deadweight ton. The average cost of the vessels constructed by the United States Shipbuilding Board has been stated in a recent official communication to be about $215.00 per deadweight ton. So that on a much smaller programme our cost compares very favourably indeed with the cost of construction of similar steel vessels by our friends to the south, being nearly $24 per ton less than theirs.

With regard to the costs of operation, it will be found that a comparison of Canadian Government wage costs with like costs of operating similar ships by Great Britain, the United States, Japan, Norway and France, is as follows:

The monthly wage cost of a Canadian Government merchant marine ship of 8,100 tons deadweight which carries a crew of 41, including 2 boys, is $3,705. Published figures from an authentic source—(bulletin issued by Dow, Jones & Co., of New York) show the monthly wage cost of foreign ships of similar tonnage as being, for British ships $3,924; American, $5,315; Norwegian, $3,378; and Japanese, $2,869.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to give the House particulars of the number of officers and men employed on our Government ships at the end of the last calendar year. All told the number was 1,674, comprising:

Masters	48
Officers	138
Engineers	183
Ordinary seamen, firemen, stewards, etc.	1,305
Total	1,674
Total number Canadian by birth or adoption—
Masters	30
Officers	57
Engineers	129
Ordinary seamen, firemen, stewards, etc.	652
		868
Total number British—
Masters	18
Officers	81
Engineers	54
Ordinary seamen, firemen, stewards, etc.	653
		806
Total		1,674

I think it will interest the House also to be given some information in regard to the routes upon which these ships are plying. They are as follows:

Fortnightly sailings Canada to Liverpool.

Fortnightly sailings Canada to London.

Fortnightly sailings Canada to Barbados, Trinidad and Demerara.

Three-weekly sailings Canada to Glasgow.

Three-weekly sailings Canada to Nassau, Kingston and Belize.

Three-weekly sailings Canada to St. John's, Newfoundland, via Charlottetown, P.E.I.

Monthly sailings Canada to Cardiff and Swansea.

Monthly sailings Canada to Pernambuco, Santos, Rio de Janeiro, Montevideo, and Buenos Aires.

Monthly sailings Canada to Havana, Cuba.

Monthly sailings Canada to Liverpool, via Sydney, C.B.

Monthly sailings Canada to Mediterranean, Straits Settlements, Java and India.

Monthly sailings Canada to Australia and New Zealand.

Monthly sailings Vancouver to Straits Settlements, Java and India.

Monthly sailings Vancouver to Australia (direct).

Monthly sailings Vancouver to New Zealand (direct).

During the year 1920 new routes have been opened up and allocations of steamers made as follows:

(1) Montreal-Glasgow service. Established January 23, 1920: Sailings every three weeks: Allotted three 4,300-ton steamers.

(2) Vancouver-Australia and New Zealand service. Established February 23, 1920: Monthly sailings: Allotted five 8,100-ton steamers: These steamers call, East and West bound, at Wellington, Auckland, Sydney and Melbourne.

(3) Montreal-Cardiff and Swansea service. Esablished July 3, 1920: Monthly sailings: Allotted three 4,300-ton steamers.

(4) Montreal-India and the Orient service. Established September 11, 1920: Sailings every two months: Allotted two 8,100-ton steamers.

(5) Halifax and St. John-Nassau, Kingston and Belize service. Established December 8, 1920: Three-weekly sailings: Allotted two 5,100-ton steamers.

In accordance with the trade agreement concluded during the year with the British West Indies it was decided to equip two of the 5,100-ton vessels then under construction with passenger accommodation, in consequence of which a regular service every three weeks has been established between Canada and the Bahamas, Jamaica and British Honduras. The delegates at the very important conference held in this city in June of last year—I refer to the conference in Ottawa held with a view to negotiating a preferential trade agreement between Canada and the West Indies—particularly the delegates from the Bahamas, Jamaica and British Honduras, claimed that they were very short indeed of passenger services. I informed them, as your Minister of Marine, that the Government did not own or intend to build any passenger ships, but the delegates were very much interested in the matter and continued their pressure upon me and the other representatives of the Government, requesting us to equip, if possible, some of our freight ships with a limited passenger accommodation. I pointed out to them that I did not think it would pay to equip freight ships with a limited passenger accommodation and to operate them on such a long route as that of Halifax to the Bahamas, Jamaica and British Honduras and back over the same route in the winter, and from Montreal in the summer. The representatives from the West Indies then said that if it did not pay, the countries they represented would each contribute a certain amount. I am sorry I have not before me the amount that each of the Islands stipulated in the agreement that it would be willing to pay, but if my memory serves me correctly the amount in all would be about £13,000. We cannot tell at the present time whether or not this new route will pay, but judging from one or two voyages that the ships have made, it looks as if it might break even. I would not, however, be prepared to make that as a positive statement; we shall have to wait until the end of the fiscal year. While the accommodation provided is but for twenty-six cabin passengers on each vessel, it is of such an excellent character that it attracts a full passenger list for each sailing. Full cargoes also have been carried, and it is confidently expected that the regularity and character of the service generally will build up a profitable business in the interchange of the products of these British possessions and Canada. The first vessel on this route sailed from Halifax on January 25 last, with a full complement of passengers and a general cargo of flour, potatoes, oats, cement and general merchandise.

The House and the country generally, and the exporters of Canada in particular, will be interested to know what these ships are capable of doing in the way of expanding Canada's export trade. In this connection, Sir, I regret to have to express my dissappointment with the efforts so far made by the Canadian manufacturer and exporter. These ships have been equipped with one or two extra passenger cabins in order that Canadian business men might either go themselves to these British possessions and foreign countries, or send their commercial agents. While the showing of exports is not a bad one so far, I would like again to make an urgent appeal to the manufacturers and business men of Canada to reach out more aggressively for export trade. I said last year, and I say it again, that if Canada is to wipe out her immense war debt within a reasonable time, Canadians must not only look after the home trade but reach out aggressively for foreign markets. We have provided this magnificent fleet of freight ships and these new routes have been opened up. No, old-established steamship company would take the chance that the Government ships have taken in opening up one new route after another; these old companies would naturally hesitate and first try to ascertain whether or not it would be profitable to put ships on the various new routes to which I have referred. But these ships are Canadian ships, built in the national interest. The Government has never attempted, and, I hope never will attempt, to interfere in the management of these ships; all I have said to the management as the responsible minister was, that they should make all the money they could, at the same time keeping the national interest in mind and assisting the Canadian people in every possible way to export the products of fishery, forest, farm, mine, and factory. Canadians, therefore, have reason to be proud that they possess this immense fleet of new ships going to all corners of the world, and making a very creditable showing, to which I shall refer in a moment. But the great feature of a Canadian merchant marine is the fact that this country can say: We want this ship, or so many ships, run on whichever route we think there is a possibility of Canada obtaining trade and thus expanding her export business.

The principal exports of Canadian products by the vessels of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine have been:

From Atlantic ports to Malta, Barcelona, India, Ceylon and Java.

From Atlantic ports to Liverpool, London, Glasgow, Cardiff and Swansea.

From Atlantic ports to the British West Indies, Cuba and South America.

To Australia from Vancouver.

To Newfoundland from Montreal and Halifax.

The exports to Malta, Barcelona, India, Ceylon and Java consisted of iron and steel products, glass, furniture, agricultural implements, rubber goods, automobiles, grain, flour, etc.

To United Kingdom ports the exports have been grain, flour, cereals, canned goods, bacon, cheese, apples, pulp, paper, lumber, iron and steel, machinery, implements, etc.

To the British West Indies the products exported have been cement, flour, trunks, iron and steel products, paper, machinery, furniture, etc.

To South America the exports have been pulp and paper, malt, agricultural implements, dried fish, steel products, lumber, etc.

To Cuba exports have consisted mainly of pulp and paper, malt, flour, hay, lumber, fish, potatoes, whiskey, oats and cement.

To Australia there have been exported from British Columbia ports, lumber, paper, cement, fish, machinery, rubber goods, etc.

From Montreal and Halifax to Newfoundland, there have been exported flour, hay, oats, paper, cheese, cement, etc.

The importance of the merchant marine to Canadian trade cannot be too strongly emphasized. Canadian goods to the value of over $50,000,000 have been transported during the year in Canadian-built ships, each named vessel with its prefix "Canadian" being the best advertisement for Canada in the principal markets of the world.

I have now arrived at what, I presume, will be the most interesting part of my statement this afternoon, and that is: What results have been obtained from the operation of these ships during the past calendar year? I will, therefore, proceed at once to give this information to the House.

Mr. FIELDING: Is the statement for the calendar year or for the fiscal year?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: For the calendar year. This is the statement:

Operating Account for 1920

Cross Revenues closed voyages..		$10,027,442 77
Operating expenses..		8,733,917 22
Operating Profit Closed voyages.		$ 1,293,525 55

Depreciation. $667,665.46
Outstanding liabilities..	22,000.00

Net earnings closed voyages		598,460 09
Net earnings on voyages closed since January applicable to 1920..		183,000 00
Total net earnings.. ..		$781,460 09

I wish to point out that these net earnings are before providing for interest, and the above amount of net earnings, $781,460.09 is equal to 2.35 per cent interest on notes given to the Government for the full cost of the ships.

Mr. CAHILL: What does the Government pay for the money?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: As my hon. friend knows, the rate of interest varies, depending on the time at which loans are made. I might explain that when these Government ships are ready to be put into commission, they are turned over to the operating company and charged to that operating company at cost price, which I gave a few moments ago as $191.95 per ton dead weight. The operating company gives the Dominion Government its promissory notes for these ships.

The following is a statement of the assets and liabiliities:

As regards current assets, hon. members will, I am sure, note with pleasure the strong liquid position of the operating company. No bank loans are shown, and the operating company is in an easy position financially.

Mr. VIEN: Are the boats insured?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes. Insurance premiums alone for the past year amounted to over $1,000,000, and they are included in operating expenses. The ships are insured up to 80 per cent of their original cost.

Mr. VIEN: How is the depreciation calculated?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I have the information here; but it is somewhat technical, and if the hon. member will be good enough to ask me that question again when we get into committee on the Estimates, I shall be glad to give him the details.

Mr. VIEN: When we come to that in the Estimates, will the minister be prepared to tell us the current value of the same type of ships in the markets of the world?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am quite sure that the figures I am giving to hon. members are absolutely correct. Not only have they been certified to by the company's auditor, but I asked a well-known firm of chartered accountants outside altogether of the operating company to give me the usual statement that appears when an annual balance sheet is issued. The certificate of these auditors, who are the well known firm of Marwick, Mitchell & Company, chartered accountants, reads as follows:

We have audited the accounts of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited and its subsidiary companies for the year ended 31st December 1920, and have obtained all the information and explanation which we have required.

We certify that the above consolidated balance sheet and relative operating and surplus accounts are in our opinion properly drawn up so as to exhibit a true and correct view of the state of the Company's affairs as at 31st December 1920, and of its operations for the year ended at that date, according to the best of our information and the explanations given to us, and as shown by the books of the Company subject to the explanation that no provision has been made in respect of accrued interest on notes payable due to the Dominion Government for the year 1920, as the amount of same may be subject to adjustment.

Now I just want to say a word or two in regard to the present outlook. While there is a business reaction throughout the world, I am under the impression that this is only of a transitory character, and that we can look for a considerable improvement in trade in the very near future. While freight rates may be expected to still further decline, this will be offset by much lower operating costs, and with the acquisition of the Grand Trunk Railway system, this additional mileage added to the lines which the Government now own and operate, will make in all 23,000 miles, and will act, I hope, as a constant feeder to the Government ships.

Now, just a word or two in regard to shipbuilding conditions. Conditions throughout the world are quite similar, owing to the lack of demand for tonnage. Canadian shipbuilders, therefore, are experiencing the same depreciation that is being experienced in other countries. Canadians have demonstrated that they can build ships equally as good and, during the past few years, at as low a cost as the old and experienced yards in the United Kingdom. Freight ships to-day of 8,400 tons deadweight corresponding to the Government's type would cost in the United Kingdom about £29.10 per ton, equal to $130 at the present rate of exchange. I have had no need to ask Canadian shipbuilders recently for a price to construct steel ships, but I have every reason to believe that the Canadian price would not be any more than $10 or $15 per ton higher than the United Kingdom price which I have just quoted.

Regarding the question of a subsidy as an aid to stimulate steel shipbuilding in Canada, the Government has this matter still under consideration, and it may be that an announcement in that connection will be made by the hon. the Minister of Finance when he brings down his budget.

As I have already stated, by July next all the Government ships will have been completed and placed in commission, and Canada will have reason to be proud of her merchant marine modern freight ships.

I first had the privilege of announcing the Government's shipbuilding programme in the House of Commons on April 4, 1918. The Government's shipbuilding policy at that time received the unanimous approval of Parliament, and I was particularly pleased on that occasion to receive such warm words of commendation from that distinguished statesman whose word carries such great weight in this House and throughout the country, the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). My thanks are also due for the words of commendation uttered on that occasion by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) and the late member for Prince County, P.E.I., Captain Read.

The creation of a Canadian Government merchant marine has been warmly endorsed by people from one end of the country to the other, and even if these ships in the future are not able to continue to make the good showing that they have done so far, I am satisfied that I am expressing the majority opinion, not only of this House, but of the whole country, when I say that the policy of Canada owning and operating her own merchant marine is fully justified.

I have endeavoured to place before the House as briefly and concisely as possible the main features of the Government's programme, both from the construction and operating point of view. Before the end of the present calendar year all construction will be completed, after which the connection of the Marine Department with the programme will cease. The House will not need to be reminded that the programme of ship construction was much more extensive than anything hitherto undertaken by Canada. It was not to be expected that the work could be carried to completion without experiencing some difficulties and disappointments. I am able to report, however, that no serious difficulty was experienced. The aim of the Government throughout was to develop shipbuilding as a self-contained industry. It has been successful to the extent that the boilers, engines, pumps, winches and all the other accessories are nearly all of Canadian manufacture. The House will, I am sure, be glad to know that all these accessories manufactured in Canada, by Canadian workmen, have measured up to the highest standards of excellence and are giving results equally as satisfactory as could be obtained from similar accessories manufactured elsewhere by long-established concerns. It is no less satisfactory to know that while the price paid for the construction of ships may be regarded, in the light of present day conditions, as high, they have been substantially lower than those paid for similar work in the United States, where conditions more nearly resemble those in Canada.

There is a further consideration from which as the minister primarily responsible for the programme I derive some comfort, and that is that every contract made, every voucher paid, every letter and telegram exchanged between the Department and contractors is open for the fullest inspection of any member of the House who desires any further information.

It would be difficult, indeed, it would be impossible, to measure in any adequate way the national importance of Canada's Merchant Marine. I am firmly convinced that what these vessels have already accomplished in the way of marketing Canadian products in remote parts of the world is but an indication of greater successes along these lines in the years immediately ahead of us. Canada is no longer a stranger in foreign ports. The Maple Leaf struck on the House flag and on the funnels of vessels is becoming a familiar sight in the principal world ports.

In the design and construction of the vessels, British types have been adopted. Those in commission have splendidly met every requirement and have been commended by men competent to form opinions. The quality of the vessels themselves, as well as, in a general way, the types of men serving as officers and crews, are helping in a very special manner to establish for Canada and for Canadian business a favourable position abroad.

It would not be proper for me to conclude this statement to-day without expressing my deep appreciation of the technical officers of the Marine Department who shared with me the great responsibility of constructing this seventy-five-million-dollar merchant marine fleet for Canada. As I stated a moment ago, we had many difficulties to contend with. The war was at its height, material was high, and unskilled as well as skilled labour was hard to obtain. But we managed to build these ships in Canada, and the achievement is a great tribute to the Canadian workman and the Canadian shipbuilder; it is creditable to them that these ships have been constructed so well. The design, of course, was British; but, as I have mentioned, all accessories were made in Canada by Canadian manufacturers, and no serious complaints have reached the Marine Department either in regard to design, construction, or equipment of these vessels, down to the minutest detail. In the circumstances, this House and the country generally may feel confident that, given equal opportunities, we can build ships in competition with the world and build them as well. I desire particularly to tender my thanks to the naval architect, Mr. Duguid, to my very able deputy, Mr. Alex. Johnston, and to all those who assisted me during these years in carrying to a successful conclusion, if I may be permitted to say so, the creation of Canada's large and splendid mercantile fleet.

Mr. ROBB: Before the minister leaves his statement, and in order to complete it, perhaps he might take the House into his confidence and say whether the rates are fixed on a joint tariff basis, or are competitive with other steamship lines operating on similar routes. That is one question which I should like the minister to keep in mind. I desire also to know whether any preference is given, in the export of Canadian goods, as between the manufactured product and raw material. I think the minister will understand in a general way what I mean. Further, is any preference given Canadian goods over goods of neighbouring countries in the matter of export, and are the rates on imports on the same basis as the export rates?

Mr. SPEAKER: I have no desire to interpose any objection to the question if the minister desires to reply. But privileges accorded one hon. member should be accorded all, and in that case I am afraid we should have a very irregular proceeding and one in contravention of the rules. It seems to me, therefore, that it would be much more fitting and desirable if questions on points of detail were withheld until the House is in Committee of Supply.

Mr. ROBB: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but I thought that possibly the minister might think it advisable to complete his statement in the direction I have suggested.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: As I have already stated, government ships being vested solely in the operating company, I have no detailed knowledge as to the computation of freight rates. I am glad that the hon. member has asked the question, and when we are in Committee of Supply I shall be prepared to give with pleasure the information he seeks. As regards the preference given Canadian products, I do not think that question has arisen or is likely to arise, because our ships have never been in such a position that they could not take all the cargo that was available at any port and load it for the port of destination.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I am sure we have listened with a great deal of interest to the exhaustive statement of the Minister of Marine. It is difficult for the ordinary man not fully trained in business, to grasp the details so as to be able to say whether or not we are in a solvent condition in connection with the business of shipping. One thing that strikes a person at once is the fact that we have built ships, according to the statement of the minister, costing something like $191 per deadweight ton. These ships are not to-day worth half the money paid for them, but in making out his statement the hon. gentleman puts upon his balance sheet the value of the ships as if it were really what the ships cost in the first instance. They are probably worth less than half of what they cost, and the minister will find that possibly he could not sell any one of his ships to-day at one-third of the price he paid for its construction. Indeed, it is doubtful whether he could sell them at all; it is exceedingly doubtful whether he could give them away. It is therefore a grave question for the Canadian people whether or not the expenditure of seventy-five million dollars in ships, which certainly will not pay for their operation, and which we could not get off of our hands if we wanted to sell them, is a wise venture. That, of course, will be brought out more fully when we are studying the details of the minister's estimates, when we shall have an opportunity of going carefully into these matters. Perhaps it is interesting to know that it is just twelve years ago to-day when the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) moved his famous resolution involving the building of ships in this country. That resolution was moved on the 29th March, 1909, and the final action of the House, so far as the resolution itself was concerned, took place on the following day, the 30th March, 1909. The policy that was agreed to by both sides of the House at that time involved the building of a Canadian navy, and, incidentally, the building of merchant marine ships as they might be required for the general purposes of the country. It is unnecessary to say to-day that, if that policy had been adopted, when the war broke out we should have had warships at normal prices, costing about a fourth of what we are paying for ordinary tramp ships today; and the prices of other ships would have been proportionate. But a change of government took place; new men came to the helm, and new policies followed, a policy of delay, a policy of do nothing, a policy in regard to shipbuilding which stood in abeyance for some years, from 1909 until the 4th day of April, 1918, as the minister has just announced. I would say to my hon. friend at once that when he came to parliament on the date referred to with a shipbuilding policy for the construction of tramp ships, of freight ships, that if it had not been for the war he could not have had a "look in" for this policy at all. But we were then suffering under the stress of war, and anything that would have a tendency to relieve the existing situation was likely to receive and did receive the support of both sides of the House. But I say to the minister, and I address my remarks also to the Government, that when that distressing situation ceased, when the armistice was signed—which I believe was on the 11th of November, 1918, a few months after the Government's policy was inaugurated—when the necessity for building ships for war purposes had disappeared, and he should have halted, he should have finished the construction of the ships then in hand and not have ventured any further into the business of shipbuilding. I am sure that if I had been in the House at that time, and I suppose I was, I would have given my assistance—at all events by a vote if that were necessary—to the establishment of the policy of building ships for purposes rendered necessary by the war; but I am not so clear that it was necessary, even according to the statement of the hon. gentleman, to step in and build these ships. He says that all the Canadian shipyards at that time were fully engaged in the building of ships for the Home Government for the purposes of the war; that we were supplying the money and the ships were being built as rapidly as they could be built. If that was the case I do not at all see the necessity why we stepped in. If there was a possibility of adding to the quantity of tonnage that was imperatively required, owing to war reasons, I would put up both hands for making a start; but when the armistice was signed there was no further necessity for the building of ships by this Government—not a vessel was then being torpedoed and we had plenty of shipping in this country for all practical purposes. Such being the case, I do say that from that moment forward the Minister of Marine and the Government have been following a policy which is absolutely wrong and absurd, as far as business principles are concerned, and have followed a policy that will be as bad for Canada as it has been in the case of the national ownership of railways. When we come to put a proper value on these ships, when another year comes and we get an honest statement from the Department of Marine, we will find that in proportion to the amount of money invested we are just as badly off as we are in connection with the government-owned railways. Therefore it is only a further evidence that governments should, as far as possible, keep their hands off private enterprises and allow private individuals, who are trained in these enterprises, to look after them—the Government should confine itself to looking after the administration of the affairs of the country generally. That is the position which I have always taken in connection with the railroads. Of course if, during the war, it was necessary for railroads to be built by the nation for war purposes I would have voted for such a policy and said that was the proper thing to do; but when the war ended I would certainly be opposed to any further building of railways for war purposes. In the same way I am opposed to the building of ships on any such ground.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if these ships are for the development of Canadian trade we should undertake that development where it is most necessary, and where it will be of direct advantage to the people of Canada. What is the matter, if the ships of the Canadian Merchant Marine are lying idle, with using these ships to develop the coal trade of this country? Last week the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele) moved a resolution for an investigation into the coal situation, and in speaking in its support he declared that conditions in Ontario, particularly in the western part, were such that the inhabitants dreaded the approach of winter because they had no supplies of coal available. Well, there is an abundance of coal in the province of Nova Scotia and in the Maritime Provinces generally. Evidently, according to the minister, we have lots of shipping. In that case, seeing that navigation in open up to a point beyond Montreal, what is the matter with using the ships of the Canadian Merchant Marine for the transportation of coal from the Maritime Provinces and having it stored at places inland where it would be available for our own people—in other words having Canadian coal carried by our own ships and by our own railways, if that is necessary, for the safety, protection and well being of our own people? Is it not much better to have our ships engaged in that way than for them to be swinging idly at anchor in the different harbours along our coasts, while in the meantime the overhead expense goes on just the same, the officers, the sailors, the engineers, and the firemen being paid just the same although they are doing nothing? Would it not be better if we had a statement from the minister that such a service as I have indicated was about to be put into operation? Would it not be better that, possessing shipping and facilities for transportation, we should get the benefit of them in our own country? But what, sir, are the facts? The minister made the remarkable statement that the Government is competing with itself in the matter of the carriage of freight. We have two ports on our Atlantic coast from which we send goods to Newfoundland. The terminus of the Intercolonial Railway, and of the National Railway system, is at North Sydney. From that port large quantities of goods—and we would like the amount to be very much larger—are sent to Newfoundland. Halifax is the only other Atlantic port from which we export goods from Canada to Newfoundland, so far as I know. Well, the minister has told us that he is competing at Halifax with the Government railway at North Sydney. That railway, to make money, must carry goods from North Sydney whence they go to Newfoundland. If these goods are taken off at Halifax and the Canadian Government steamships are employed in their carriage, thus operating in competition with the government railway system, we have the most aubsurd spectacle of a government competing against itself in the carriage of freight and cutting down its own profits. That is the situation as it is to-day.

I repeat, the minister should have called a halt when we reached the stage that there was no further necessity for building ships on account of war conditions. But he made the mistake of continuing in his policy, and now he finds that he has a white elephant on his hands in the shape of these ships. He cannot sell them to advantage and cannot operate them at a profit under present conditions. Of course the same cry will be raised by his department that was raised by the Department of Railways in regard to the railway situation: This is not of our choosing, these vessels are on our hands, what are we to do with them? That was the cry with the Department of Railways uttered with respect to the railways—these railways have been put on our hands, what will we do with them?—we will have to do something with them. And so it goes on and the people pay the piper every time. In conclusion, I wish to point out that if we are going to have these ships they should be used to the advantage of our own people and in improving trade conditions in Canada. The hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Keefer) pointed out, and he was backed up by hon. gentlemen opposite, that the only way to fully develop trade from the east to the west in this country, is by the opening up of the St. Lawrence route—at least it is one of the routes available and the most feasible one. Let me say to the minister that if he is going to have these ships on his hands he should make every possible effort to open up a proper channel, as far inland as possible in Canada, so that he will find a use for at least a few of these vessels. At present he has too many, far too many. Any person who has any sense of proportion, or any business capacity will invest his money in a trade in proportion to its development. The minister has gone far too fast in the building of ships in Canada and he will find that there is no work for these ships to do, that he has to compete with the world in the carriage of freight. He will not be in a position to get any business that will amount to a paying proposition. I hope that when we come down to details in regard to this matter the minister will be able to present us with fuller and better information.

I congratulate the minister upon his apparent willingness to throw the full flood of daylight upon the operations of his department. I am pleased to know that he is not following the Nicodemus-like practice of the Department of Railways and Canals; he is not moving in the night. He proposes by his open way of doing business to dispense with the secret manœuvres of the "dark-lantern brigade" operating our railways and which has to report to us a deficit of something like $70,000,000 or $100,000,000. So not only in business but in all other matters, we, on this side of the House at all events, will commend and encourage the most open methods, and we trust that before we are through with the minister's Estimates and our discussion of his general policy he will find that we are quite capable of appreciating the situation. And he had better come here equipped with the fullest information that he can give the House in regard to this enterprise.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I should wish as far as possible to accede to any request so courteously made as the request of the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Ballantyne) that discussion upon the statement which he has presented to the House this afternoon should be postponed until we have had time to read it and are seized of the details of the very large question involved. But in that connection it occurs to me that the Government have not been well advised in bringing this matter before the House this afternoon. We had better look at this thing squarely without any camouflage,—to use the word which is so common on our lips and in our newspapers to-day. There is a great deal of talk about this shipping scheme in the press, there is a great deal of talk about it in the business circles of Montreal and other shipping points of the country, and there is a great deal of talk about it amongst serious citizens who are to any extent apprized of the grave financial position of this country. And while, I repeat, I should have desired to wait for details, I think the postponement might very well have been on the part of the ministry until we had a full House to discuss a question which is bulking so large in the public thought and is of such vital importance to this country. Not having any knowledge that this statement would be submitted this afternoon, and not having had time to peruse the speech of my hon. friend, I am a little at a loss to go into this whole question, but I should not have been doing justice to my own conscience as a citizen of Canada and as a member of this House, and I should not have been doing justice to a great public question, if I allowed it to pass without at least a word or two of comment.

My hon. friend from Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) does not seem quite content to have any part or lot in this shipping business at the present moment. Well, he betrays considerable agility in that respect in being able to turn a pretty sharp corner, Mr. Speaker, unless my memory fails me. I am not fortified with any more than my recollection of Hansard, but if my recollection is correct, my hon. friend the Minister of Marine might very well have thanked the hon. member for North Cape Breton and Victoria, as well as the hon. members for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) and Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) for the initial support, at any rate, which was rendered to his scheme. As for me, Sir, my garments are clean. Any member of this House can read the debates in regard to the shipping programme that have taken place from the first day that my hon. friend brought his scheme before Parliament and he will find me on record as having warned the minister that he was embarking upon a scheme which was going to lead to financial disaster for the country —and I do not mind telling him very frankly that there are a good many of his own friends who know that that financial disaster, if not actually here, is very close at hand. My recollection about my hon. friend from North Cape Breton and Victoria is that this shipping business bulked very largely in his political career. I am not at all sure that it was not in a debate on shipping that he made his famous avowal of being a protectionist. If I am wrong he will correct me. I am nearly sure that it was in that debate. He was leader of the Opposition at the time, and naturally on a question of this size and importance being introduced he, as leader of the Opposition, had to stand up and tell the people what he thought, and he did not hesitate much about it. He said: I am a protectionist. I am all for selling steel plates as long as they are made in Nova Scotia; I am for building ships, if it furnishes a market for steel plates in Nova Scotia. I hope I am not misrepresenting my hon. friend. I am nearly sure that that is the substance which a reasonably good memory furnishes me with of what he said on that occasion.

Mr. McKENZIE: This is a case, Mr. Speaker, in which silence does not give consent.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I did not catch what my hon. friend said. It was addressed in so low a tone and so exclusively to the Speaker that it could not possibly reach me at this end of the chamber.

Mr. McKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, I said that this is a case in which silence does not give consent.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Well, Mr. Speaker, there are times when it is necessary to keep silence even from good words. But I do not know that my hon. friend has any very good defence to make in any very good words, for I know his pugnacity is so great that that defence would be forthcoming at the point of the usual dagger which he carries so handy. I think that his silence certainly does give consent, and that he practically agrees that I am not misrepresenting what his attitude was on that occasion.

Now, we are not in any doubt about what the attitude of other hon. members was, because the minister, who doubtless has refreshed his memory for the occasion, has offered his thanks to the hon. members for Shelburne and Queen's and for Maisonneuve for their kind support to his scheme at the time, I think he said, of its initiation. Well, I have not misunderstood that point. That may account in some measure for what, I repeat, is a somewhat extraordinary line of procedure. I do not know why a statement of this importance should have been brought on the first day after the holidays when notoriously it is the general expectation that we have a small House, unless it was thought that it could be crowded through and no discussion take place upon it. I seriously hope there was no understanding of that kind in the House. I should be very sorry for parliamentary traditions and parliamentary practice if we had got to that point. But, I repeat, I should not have done my duty to myself and to the country if I had not stated where I stand in the matter and repeated the warnings that I have given before. I do not know how far my hon. friend the minister intends to go with this scheme. He now has not the leader of the Opposition to deal with apparently, but the ex-leader of the Opposition, in a very much chastened frame of mind compared with that in which he spoke about shipping in the early stages of this scheme.

Now, I just want to say this about this shipping measure as far as we have it before us this afternoon. I did not hear the minister's whole statement, so I do not know what he intends to do further in the matter. But I want to endorse what my hon. friend the member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) pointed out—that this is a scheme which in its magnitude is now almost as serious as the railroad problem which is exercising the mind of every thoughtful Canadian. I say that without fear of successful contradiction. The minister went into it with his eyes open, with warnings in front of him. He has gone into it by stages from year to year. At the time of the armistice—I rely upon public prints for my information, but if I am correctly informed, at that time an expenditure of only sixteen and one-half millions of money had been embarked upon in the carrying out of this scheme. Now, that was a considerable sum of money, but as my hon. friend from North Cape Breton says, these contracts were given in war time, for a specific purpose, when the whole country was behind any step that was necessary for the winning of the war. Our losses could have been cut to a very small proportion indeed if we had stopped this business at the time of the armistice—even if my hon. friend had stopped at the time I warned him he should stop; at the time I warned him that he was backing a "wrong 'un" for the people of this country.

Now, what is the condition of affairs? The same public prints tell me that including the contracts that were entered into with the Imperial Munitions Board, this country has embarked upon an expenditure up to date of no less a sum than $140,000,000 in connection with this shipbuilding scheme. These are very serious statements; they are statements which require an alert Opposition. One hundred and forty millions embarked upon; these statements are made in public. And what is the condition of the property? I have a recollection of recent statements, made, I think, last year; I have a recollection of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine saying that he could sell these ships for more than they had cost to build. Would he repeat that statement to-day? If he did he would correct the best business columns of the best newspapers in this country, because we are told what is in accordance with the shipping knowledge of everybody who has studied shipping at all, that the value of the ships has been cut in half. I question whether for any ship he has built the minister could get half of what it cost him to build it. That is a very serious matter, Mr. Speaker, for the people of this country. It is a very serious position for any minister of the Crown to be in in regard to a scheme with which he persevered in spite of warnings that he was going in the wrong direction.

What about freights to-day? Why, before coming east I read a statement issuing from the port of St. John from the man who is responsible for getting cargoes for the government ships, that cargoes were not to be had. I warned my hon. friend that it would be so. I told him from my own personal experience what shipping in Britain had paid during the Boer war and what it was paying within a year and a half afterwards; percentages of twenty had shrunk to one and one and one-half, and the people holding the shares were glad to get it. He had these warnings before him. Despite his attempt to make a rosy story this afternoon, that is the position the Government of Canada is in with regard to these ships: The value of the ships is cut through the middle; freights cannot be had. Why, only the other day I read in the columns of the Montreal Star—a publication coming from a very good town, one which has a reputation for political leanings that would lead one to think it would be favourable, if it could be, to the Government in power and to the Minister of Marine—that some of the merchant ships of Canada were coasting along the shores of Scandinavia seeking cargoes, and that some of them have even been looking furtively to Germany for cargoes, until Canadian exports revive; a very interesting statement to me, and it ought to be a very interesting statement to my hon. friend the Prime Minister, because it contains the admission that Canadian exports at the present moment are in need of being revived. Last summer the right hon. gentleman was rather jaunty about the condition of Canadian exports, but now it seems that Canadian ships have to coast along the shores of Scandinavia seeking cargoes, "until Canadian exports revive." Yet one of the objects of the building of these ships, according to my hon. friend's statement this afternoon, was to promote the export trade of Canada.

Now, that is the position of my hon. friend's enterprise up to date, according to statements that are printed in almost every newspaper in the country. For some of this information I depend on what my memory recalls to me of what appeared not later than Saturday in the parliamentary correspondence of the government organ, the press supporting the Government in this city.

We had this scheme entered lightly upon —and I dwell upon this for a moment without wishing to extend my remarks— we had this scheme entered upon according to old, bad political conditions in this country. Such schemes are as common under a protective tariff as withered leaves in autumn. My hon. friend to whom I have referred took occasion to avow himself a protectionist, thereby, with very great courage, probably losing the leadership of his party. The scheme is very simple; it was very simple at the time; it was simple to carry it on. We traded upon the patriotism of the people—the Government did, anyhow. It looked so fine. "We have to help out the winning of the war"—we all agreed about that end of it. "It will be a splendid thing to build ships in Montreal and in Three Rivers"—I do not see my hon. friend from Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) here, but Three Rivers, I think, was included. Then, of course, there was Vancouver, and where else were they built? I do not remember all the places, but the minister is an adept at that sort of thing, and he got fine support for his scheme from both sides of the House. He introduced it, the steel plates were sold, and the orders were issued. Why shouldn't they be? We were getting subscriptions to Victory bonds at the time by the hundred million. I have, in private and in public, expressed the opinion that the last victory bond issue in this country, subscribed to the tune of seven hundred millions, was a positive curse both to the Government and to the country. It indicated vast patriotism on the part of our people, but it put money by the hundred million into the hands of a government that did not know how to handle it. So you had your ship schemes and your housing schemes—thank God, in regard to that the provinces have used only half the money that was voted—and a hundred other channels were opened for the frittering away of the wealth of the people, until the finances of this country are in the condition they are in to-day and that every man from one end of the country to another who follows public affairs knows they are in. That, shortly, is the history of what happened after the war was over in regard to this shipping business.

Now, as I said in beginning, Mr. Speaker, I merely wanted to put myself upon record for, I think, the fourth time—at any rate, I have gone on record whenever my hon. friend has had the question before the House in one sense—that this was a financial escapade that was going to end in disaster for the country. On each occasion I warner my hon. friend that that was so, and while it is never any great line of conduct to say "I told you so," I would still confine myself to a warning and I would say to the hon. minister, for goodness sake, stop this thing now. You have had your eyes opened to the real nature of it; let us have the thing cease now; let us cut our loss as the stockbrokers advise us to do.

The project was carried out, I am sorry to say, with large support from the other side of the House—support derived from the old, bad system of looking at the needs of the constituency rather than the needs of the country. If ever there was a scheme which should have been supported as a great national scheme, it was this, if there was anything in it at all; but, as I have said in this House again and again, it was looked at, as politics teaches us always to look at these measures, for its local value at certain points. So that the plates were sold at one place and something else was sold somewhere else; the ships were placed in various localities whether they were represented by Tories or by Liberals, and the result is that to-day, to the tune, according to some newspapers, of $140,000,000, we have "a painted ship upon a painted ocean." That is the scheme of my hon. friend up to date and I hope we have heard the last of any extension of it. The further one goes with it, the worse off this country will be. How we shall get out of our difficulties, the Lord only knows. We will get good help towards getting out of them when we get, to handle the finances of this country, people who have more sense of financial responsibility than, I am sorry to say, has been displayed in this shipping scheme that is—I endorse what the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) says—a white elephant only second to that of our railways themselves.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: (Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, as we have not before us the figures which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) gave to the House this afternoon, I will defer to a later date, when he brings down his Estimates, the general discussion and the specific discussion of some features of this venture. But in order that the House may understand at once my position in the matter, I wish to state that it is quite true that in 1918, during the war, before the armistice, I supported the shipbuilding programme of my hon. friend. Is that a crime, or is that an indication, as is suggested by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), of a dark association between both sides of this House in favour of some big interests? During the war, and because of the war, the Liberal party in the House of Commons stood for any sane and big national measure. From my seat in this House, I supported this shipping programme because we were officially informed that it was absolutely urgent that Canada should build ships in order to relieve the shipping situation of the Allies. I am not sorry in a way that the experiment should have been made. We were told not so very long ago that it was absolutely impossible to build ships in Canada; that we could hardly find riveters; that we could not manufacture plates; that we could not have men to man our navy. I, as a Canadian, had enough pride that, even although told by Mr. Winston Churchill, that we were not able to build ships, we were, indeed, able to do it.

If I was in favour of the shipping programme of the Government during the war, before the armistice, one must not infer from that that I stand in favour of this huge expenditure now that the war is over. I can only re-echo what all business men in the country have been stating during the last two years, namely, that a halt should be called to that carnival of expenditure. It is a well known fact that, since the armistice, and especially during the last fifteen or sixteen months, ships have been like a drug on the market in Great Britain, the United States and France. I have seen the figures; I have read the articles, and I have never understood why the Canadian Government and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) should have gone with such pig-headedness into this wild expenditure when they were warned from all sides, from all sources, that they were riding to a certain fall—because, from what I have learned this afternoon from the very attitude of the hon. gentleman, it is pretty certain that he is very gloomy as to the future of the Canadian Mercantile Marine Company.

I am glad, however, that he was able to state that Parliament could have access to all books, documents, even telegrams, which passed between the contractors and his department. His announcement is a justification of the attitude taken the other day by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and this side of the House, when we pleaded in vain with the Government for access, not to confidential documents which might injure the Canadian National Railway system, but to documents to which Parliament is naturally entitled. I suppose my hon. friend has been warned by responsible people, by friends of the Government, that the attitude of the leader of the Government (Mr. Meighen) and of his party, as well as the attitude of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) the other day, was not in conformity with British traditions and institutions. Why should we have freer access to documents concerning the building and managing of a Government-owned navy than to documents referring to the building and managing of a Government-owned railway system? the two cases are parallel. But the other day the Government thought, perhaps, that the motion made by the leader of the Opposition was inopportune and that they should, therefore, vote against it. They have found out since however, from their own friends. I have in mind two articles published by a leading paper in this country, the Montreal Gazette, strongly condemning the Government and their friends for the vote they gave in the House the other day on the question of the production of documents. Is it not, Mr. Speaker, one of the elementary rights of hon. members of this House, elected by the people, that they are entitled to have access to the books and documents concerning the administration of the affairs of the country? Our railway system, our merchant marine, are both parts of the administration, perhaps in an indirect way, if you please, of the affairs of the country, and why should we have been refused by the Government the right to have access to these documents and books? I am glad my hon. friend has learned better and has taken heed of the advice from his friends in Montreal who complained bitterly of the refusal given by the Government.

As to the Canadian Merchant Marine, the Government will learn on that question also they have lost the support of their best friends. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries said this afternoon that the bankers were not well informed when they dared criticise the administration of that branch of his department. Mr. Speaker, there are no two men in this country better informed than the President of the Bank of Montreal and the President of the Royal Bank, and they both condemn the Canadian Government Merchant Marine as an unwise enterprise which in the long run would bring disaster to the country and to the Government. I have not here the words of the President of the Bank of Montreal or those of the President of the Royal Bank, but I have read them. These gentlemen were only too well informed.

I speak to-day with some sense of pride, because I remember that just a year before the election, during a discussion on some of the branch lines of the Canadian Northern system, when I ventured to express the opinion that government ownership of railways would bring disaster to this country, what a howl of protest there was from the ranks opposite, and I remember well the lecture given me by the then Minister of Finance. Well, Mr. Speaker, who was right, and who was wrong? Government ownership not only as regards the railways but as regards the merchant marine is simply a mistake, if not a crime, and Canada to-day is facing the issue squarely. The country realize that for a passing whim the Government has sacrificed its best interests. I am not afraid, Mr. Speaker, to take the same stand to-day that I took two years ago, and especially after the admissions made this afternoon and the disappointment expressed by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. If he could give us his honest opinion, if he could tell us his own intimate sentiments on the Government railway policy, I am sure he would be at one with me and would condemn the Government and his colleagues for the crime they have committed against Canada.

The time will come when we shall discuss in detail the pragramme of the Government with respect to the merchant marine. This afternoon I just wish to state that if in 1918 I supported the programme of my hon. friend, it was because Canada was then at war, and because the Mother Country, on account of the destruction of so much tonnage in the North Sea and elsewhere by enemy submarine raids was most insistent on receiving aid from Canada. I did not commit myself to any policy of a Government-owned Merchant Marine. On the contrary, I say that my hon. friend should have halted his programme immediately after the armistice, because, being a business man, he should have known that from that moment ships would be available at half price in the United States, in France, and even in the Mother Country.

My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries says that the merchant marine has not been appreciated as it should have been by the business community, by the manufacturers of Canada. Sir, the merchant marine was not built simply for the manufacturers. It was built for the whole Canadian people—for the farmer, the miner, the fisherman, just as much as for the manufacturer. My hon. friend has said that he thought to expand the export business of Canada by means of the merchant marine. He will certainly have to revise his views on the tariff if he thinks that by raising it "as high as Haman's gallows" he can develop any export business. My hon. friend may be able to develop an export business with the merchant marine if he invites the world at large to trade with Canada, but if when inviting the world, he at the same time raises a barrier to prevent any trading with this country, I am afraid his hopes are doomed to disappointment.

Mr. Speaker, once more I say I am glad that the ships were built in Canada, although as I said a moment ago, my hon. friend should have stopped building immediately after the armistice. We have taught John Bull that Jack Canuck is able to take care of himself. Some years ago, as my hon. friend will remember, in 1913, we were solemnly told by the right hon. gentleman who was then Prime Minister, that he had received a communication from the Right Hon. Winston Churchill that Canada, forsooth, could not build ships, and that we should be satisfied to rely on the Mother Country in that regard. Well, though it has cost several million dollars, Mr. Speaker, we have at least this satisfaction that we were able to demonstrate to the Right Hon. Winston Churchill that Canada can build ships.

Mr. EDMUND BRISTOL (Centre Toronto): The subject under discussion is one to which I have given some attention. I have listened with a great deal of care to the observations of hon. members and the criticisms which have been levelled at the policy of the Minister of Marine (Mr. Ballantyne). The objections seem to be two-fold: first, that the merchant marine should never have been built—which, I understand, is really the view of my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark)—and second, the view of my distinguished friends of the official Opposition, that all shipbuilding should suddenly have been stopped when the armistice was declared. Now, it is only reasonable to view the situation in the light of the conditions that existed when the shipbuilding policy was adopted. What was the world-wide situation then? What was the world-wide cry? It was that every country associated with the Allies should build ships. Not only was that cry insistent, but the condition in the Mother Country showed the imperative necessity for ships. She was not only building all the ships which her own shipyards could contain, but she was straining every nerve on the continent of Europe, and was spending millions of dollars in this country building ships for which, as I understand, the people of Canada were lending her money, since they were anxious to have the shipbuilding programme carried on in view of the submarine menace. The minister, backed up by practically all the people of this country, except my hon. friend from Red Deer, thought that it was only fair, instead of allowing Great Britain to borrow money from Canada and build ships in this country, that Canada should assume that burden and put her own money into ships. What was the position in the United States? They took possession of every private shipyard. They took over, I suppose, at least a dozen large shipyards, and they have invested billions of dollars in ships which were constructed at the same time Canada was making her small effort in this direction. The fact of the matter is that there was not a country in the world that did not believe that shipping was going to be the best property any one could build, and they were all tumbling over one another to build ships. The belief of the people in every country at that time was that the building of ships was not only a good policy from the point of view of the war, but that it would prove good business. There was not a nation that was not anxious to build ships, and certainly no nation was more anxious than the United States. The American Government took over the orders of the Cunard and White Star lines in American shipyards because they said that the United States needed ships. Why, the paltry effort of Canada alongside of what the United States has done is a mere bagatelle; and, as I have observed, the position taken by every civilized people in the world at that time, was that it was the best thing to build ships. This was the conviction of everybody except my hon. friend from Red Deer, who, because of his belief that shipbuilding could be carried on in Canada only under a protective policy, is opposed to the building of ships in Canada.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): My hon. friend will allow me to say that I never said a word in public or private that could be construed as being in favour of a protective policy.

Mr. BRISTOL: My hon. friend misunderstands me. I suggested that his opposition to the construction of ships in Canada was because the work could be done only by virtue of a protective tariff, and his position was that it could not be done so cheaply here as in the Old Country. We are all aware of that fact, and that was one of the reasons why last year the Government passed a shipbuilding Act to lend money for the building of ships in this country. But the point is that the world was shipbuilding crazy, and we had only the small end of the craze in Canada.

Mr. LAPOINTE: "Craze" is the word.

Mr. BRISTOL: There was no one who did not believe that it was a good policy and one that was ncessary in the exigencies of the time.

Now, to come to the armistice. What was the position then? The Government of this country had shipyards working overtime constructing ships. There were yards that came into existence that would never have been established but for our national shipbuilding policy that had been instituted during the war. There was some $250,000,000 invested in this industry in Canada, and practically 250,000 men, directly or indirectly dependent on it, besides some 50,000 who directly derived their subsistence from the building of ships. What was the Government to do? Were they suddenly to cancel contracts and turn every one of these men loose, with the resultant unemployment throughout the country? Such an action, in my humble judgment, would have been suicidal; it would have been adverse to the best interests of the country. It is strange that only to-day, for the first time, we hear this wonderful criticism of the whole subject, and suggestions as to what should have been done at that time. I fancy it is a case of foresight and hindsight; it is wonderful how wise one can be after the event.

My hon. friends say that these ships are worth only half of what they cost. Well, I venture to say that if our ships are worth only half of what they originally cost, the ships in the United States are probably worth two-thirds less than what it cost to construct them. Our ships were constructed very much cheaper than the ships in the United States, where the average price was something like $300 against our price of $185 per ton dead weight. Not only did we construct better ships than those built in the United States, but ours were vastly cheaper. Our neighbours to the south were building ships under conditions similar to ours, but conditions in Canada were worse because we had to import plates from the United States for a long time, until the Government adopted a policy of establishing a plate mill in this country, which made it possible for Canada to build every part of a ship and not be dependent on the United States. Before that policy had been adopted, we had to wait until the United States were good and ready to give us plates.

My hon. friends' complaint is that some of the ships are not earning money to-day; they say that the ships are tied up. Well, there are other ships than Canadian that are tied up; the ships of England and every other country are largely in this condition. To hear hon. gentlemen talking about ships being tied up in Canada, one would imagine that there was not such a thing as a worldwide cessation of trade since last November; one would think that conditions in France and Germany were perfectly settled, and that peace reigned throughout Russia. To hear the criticisms that are levelled at the minister on the ground of Canadian ships being tied up, one would suppose that conditions were normal in every country except Canada. That suggestion is ridiculous, because every one knows that there has been practically a worldwide cessation of trade, and the ships of England, good as they are—although they are no better than the boats built here—are equally as idle as Canadian vessels. Until our railways and the railways of the United States are on a stable basis; until there has been a worldwide readjustment of the rates of exchange; until trade is again normal; and until the situation in Germany and Russia, and elsewhere, is settled, no man can reasonably expect the business of shipping to resume its pre-war status. And my hon. friends would be helping the country much more if, instead of the destructive criticism which they level at the Government for a state of things, which is only similar to that existing in other countries, they would offer some patriotic suggestion of a constructive character in regard to the railway and shipping situation in Canada at the present time. The construction of ships is one thing, and their management in the future is another; and that is a fair field for discussion. But to go back and discuss now the question as to the date at which the Government's shipbuilding policy should have ceased to operate, and to criticize the Government because some of their ships are idle, when there is a similar situation throughout the world, is futile and is a waste of time.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): The intention of the Government in having this statement placed on Hansard to-day was to enable hon. members to acquaint themselves with the details of the operation of the vessels, in order that they might approach the discussion of the general policy later on, or of the Estimates having to do with that policy, intelligently in the light of the figures there presented. The occasion of going into Committee of Supply was taken in order that, if it was desired, there should be comment on the part of hon. members, particularly by the leader of the Opposition, as is sometimes the case when such statements as these are presented. I do not think the presence or the absence of a portion of the House to-day has any real bearing on the question. The intention was to give hon. members an opportunity to read the statement in print, because only by doing so could acquaintance with the actual situation be at all thorough or detailed. Consequently the day chosen was most appropriate for that purpose. I am sorry that, as things have turned out, hon. members opposite were found prepared for a very dismal presentation, whereas, as a matter of fact, the statement made by the Minister of Marine reflects anything but a disastrous situation—possibly it is not as rosy as many of us expected when the programme was launched, certainly not as rosy as there were just reasons for expecting at that time, but on the whole fair and satisfactory; and particularly so when compared with the experience of any other country not excepting Great Britain herself. In fact there is no country that to-day can show as creditable a record in the matter of shipbuilding, and in the results of shipbuilding and operation in the period of time which we have been in them as can this Dominion of Canada. It is important, and I think it is due to the House, that an opportunity should be given for the study of the details of operation by a perusal of the printed statement in Hansard; otherwise errors are very easily fallen into, errors such as we have had many examples of this afternoon. It is a good thing to study Hansard. It is a practice that I would commend to hon. gentlemen opposite, and, if I might specialize this afternoon, I would commend that practice to the hon. member for Maisonneuve. I believe if he will spend a night or two reading some of the good portions of Hansard—his own speeches above all, delivered on occasions when the Estimates for shipbuilding were under weigh—he would come to this House better prepared for the discussion of these matters, and would never fall into the mistake of making a speech such as he did this afternoon. I have some recollection of the eloquence with which my hon. friend applauded, not only the launching of the shipbuilding programme but every step taken in that programme from the date of its launching, and—so far as I am aware, and I venture to say with great positiveness—up to a year ago. Now the fact is that not one single ship has been laid down—that is to say not one contract has been entered into, no commitment has been made in regard to shipbuilding construction—for just the time he says we should have known it would be better not to build any more ships, just sixteen months. Would the hon. member say that as the armistice was signed on November 11, we should have thrown a ship into the ocean upside down that was perhaps two-thirds constructed at that time, or one-third constructed, or even twenty per cent constructed? Did the hon. member support this programme in the first place, or did any hon. member opposite support it, merely as a war programme? If that is the case my recollection is not very accurate. We supported this programme because we needed ships for the purposes of Canadian commerce. It is true that we needed ships to carry Canadian commerce during the war; but the vessels that carried Canadian commerce, and world commerce, were destroyed by the submarine and we needed them not only during the war but after the war period. It was known that when the war was over there would be a very serious shortage of ships, and each country vied with the other in an endeavour to catch up with that shortage and to give its own people the benefit of the industry that would be entailed in the process of catching up. In that effort Canada bore a creditable part—not a part as great relatively as the efforts of larger nations but a creditable part. The vessels constructed were creditable to this country, and the contracts for that construction reflected honour, not dishonour, upon the Department of Marine. We have the ships to-day and there has been nothing in the way of substantial complaint with respect to their construction; and in that particular regard, above all others, our experience compares most favourably with that of other nations.

The hon. member made, or at all events set out to make, a point on the reference by the Minister of Marine to the availability to Parliament of all documents, letters, correspondence and papers relating to the construction of these vessels—

Mr. LEMIEUX: And telegrams also.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly, telegrams form part of correspondence. The hon. member affected to see in that a recantation of the position the Government took the other day in relation to documents and papers respectng the operation of the Canadian National Railways, as well as the operation of the national shipping. The hon. member affected to see in it an inconsistency with the position the Government took at that time. His imagination led him on until he leaped to the conclusion that that inconsistency was due to the dictation of the Montreal Gazette and the financiers of Montreal, who had told the Government that it was all wrong on this question of correspondence on the subject of operation, and that it should right about face at once. I want to compliment my hon. friend on his imagination, but I cannot compliment him on his hearing. Actually what the Minister of Marine said what this—it happens to have been committed to writing and the minister read it directly from notes:

> There is the further consideration from which, as the minister primarily responsible for the programme I derive some comfort, and that is that every contract made, every voucher paid, every letter and telegram exchanged between the department and contractors, is open for the fullest inspection of any member of the House who desires any further information.

Every word of this is in line with what I uttered myself in stating the position of the Government in relation to the national railways—every single word. All correspondence with any department of the Government in relation to any subject at all is available to this House. That has always been the case, it is the case to-day. Were we, under a department of government, to construct railway cars, were we to make rails, were we to build anything at all, everything relating to the activities of that department and passing between that department and the contractor, or passing between the department and anybody else, necessarily is available and must be produced on an order of this House. That is true in regard to the construction of ships. But what has that to do with the operation of the vessels or of railways under a corporation?—That is a different thing altogether.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Are not the Canadian people the shareholders in the enterprise?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We know all that, but the difference is the same difference which I pointed out the other day, and I know I have convinced the hon. member that the position taken by the Minister of Marine is the position which I take myself. My hon. friend contends that there is no difference when the ships or railways are operated under a corporation. Well, the judgment of this House is that there is a great deal of difference. The judgment of the House, and it was pronounced very emphatically, is that we had to go very carefully in determining what in the nature of correspondence and details of operation should be producible in Parliament from day to day if we were going to make a business success either of the operation of our shipping or of our railways.

If we are going to get any man who is big enough and able enough to take in hand the tremendous responsibility of operating them, Parliament must proceed very carefully in deciding what part of his operations is to be exposed to his competitor and to the public from day to day. That is the principle I sought to enunciate then; by that principle I stand to-day; and from that principle the statement of the Minister of Marine makes no deviation whatever. The hon. member says it is too bad. It is too bad, because the whole basis of half his speech falls down.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve made some other statement to which I was anxious to reply. Before I do so, let me refer to the rather doleful lamentation of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark). I readily accord to the hon. member full credit for consistency as regards the whole shipbuilding programme of this Dominion. On that score there is no fault to be found with him. But when he says that this Dominion is to-day in a state of appalling financial calamity, and that second only to our railway trouble is the great difficulty we are in with respect to our mercantile marine, I am afraid he rather exaggerates a dread that he has been harbouring for some years. Our ships, he says, are worth very little. Well, they are at least earning a good sum over operating expenses,—and you cannot make any trains do that over the Transcontinental railway, nor over the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. Those ships are at least earning some million odd dollars over operating expenses, and after allowance for depreciation and every other just allowance that need be made they are still able to pay a small percentage upon their actual cost, although they were built at a time—and it was essential to build them then—when that cost was necessarily abnormal. Surely that is not a position wholly disastrous. If they were able to pay a larger percentage of interest it would be better, but having in mind the fact that their construction was essential, and that it was commenced at a time when the cost was necessarily high—keeping in mind those two factors, which are the very bases of the whole case upon which we are now proceeding,—surely the result shown by the statement of the Minister of Marine is not a cause for tearful lamentations. We can face the situation as to our mercantile marine; we can face the situation, too, precipitated by premature and expensive railway building, not at a time when it was needed, but at a time when it was not needed at all—we can face both those situations because we are a strong and virile country. But in facing them do not treat them as comparable. We can look upon one with nothing except pleasure at having undertaken a great enterprise, and at least with satisfaction that it has gone through without any great cause for discontent; but the other is something which we cannot contemplate without a very wholesome and unalloyed regret.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I shall not attempt to follow my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) in his remarks concerning the Canadian Mercantile Marine, because I agree with him when he says that for an intelligent discussion of the statement which has been presented to the House this afternoon by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) it is obviously desirable that we should have before us for careful examination the various facts and figures contained in that statement. The whole subject is too large to be dealt with off hand; it is second only to that of the railway problem which we had brought before us the other day, and it is absolutely essential that we be fully seized of all the details before the public can be properly acquainted with their significance, I might say with their direful significance.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is one remark of my right hon. friend's which I would not like to pass unnoticed, and that is the reference to the statement made by the Minister of Marine as to the information which he was prepared to give to Parliament on matters pertaining to the Canadian Mercantile Marine. I do not think that my right hon. friend has strengthened either his own position or the position of the Government in what he has just told us as to the real significance of the utterance of the Minister of Marine. If I understand him aright, the right hon. gentleman makes a distinction between giving to this Parliament information concerning the administration of a great public enterprise where it is in the nature of correspondence with the department, and giving information where the administration is carried on by a corporation, so-called, although created for the purpose by the Government itself. For example, so far as our railways are concerned, the Government has formed, for the purpose of control and operation, what I might call a phantom corporation. When it suits the purpose of the Government to withhold information from the public, we are told that that information is part of the information of which this phantom corporation alone has knowledge and control. The only information that Parliament is to be acquainted with is the routine correspondence exchanged with the deputy head or possibly with the minister of the department himself.

Now we are told that the Government proposes to adopt exactly the same course in regard to the Canadian Merchant Marine. This is another colossal enterprise involving an expenditure of millions of dollars of the people's money, and yet, when it comes to accounting to the public for this expenditure, the public is to be told that they are to get no information whatever as the enterprise is being carried on by a corporation and this notwithstanding that the corporation is the creation of the Government itself. Let me say to my right hon. friend and to his Government that the people of Canada will hold him and his Government accountable for every cent of public money, whether it is expended directly by the minister in charge of a department, or by any corporation or other creature which the ministry itself may create for the purpose of carrying on its business. The public have to meet the bills in the shape of the heavy taxation which is being imposed upon them, taxation as regards the railways alone amounting to $169,000,000, according to the Estimates brought down for the present year, and taxation amounting to many millions of dollars for this merchant marine, according to the statement which the minister has just given to the House. It is impossible to imagine that the people of Canada will consent to pay the enormous sums which they are being called upon to provide by way of taxation for the conducting of these enterprises and will sit silent under the Government's refusal to give them any information as to how their money has been spent.

REPRESENTATION IN PARLIAMENT

FILLING OF VACANCIES—AMENDMENT TO SUPPLY

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the Opposition): That point, Mr. Speaker, is the only one to which I wish to refer for the moment with respect to the merchant marine, because I desire to pass on to another subject, which is of even greater significance, relating as it does to all matters that are likely to come up for discussion in this Parliament—the all-important question of the right of the people to representation in the Parliament of Canada. We have had this afternoon a denial of the right of the people's representatives in this House to information with respect to matters of public concern which are involving them in huge expenditures of public money. I wish to point out that the Government by its action is denying the people another of their fundamental rights, I should say the first of the political rights of the people under British parliamentary government, namely, the right to be represented in Parliament by members of their own choice. This right of representation involves the right of the people to participate in the making of their own laws, and in the control of taxation. These two rights might be expressed, as they are so frequently in the form of political maxims, that Government is carried on only by the consent of the governed, and that there should be no taxation without representation. May I say to my right hon. friend that the attitude which he and his Government have taken as respects the several vacancies which at present exist in this House is an open defiance of these two political maxims and of the fundamental rights of the people of this country. There are at the present time no less than six vacancies in this House of Commons. Let me read to the House a statement of the constituencies that are not represented at the present time and the dates at which the vacancies occurred in each case:

1. Yamaska, Qué., December 25, 1920.
2. York-Spunbury, N.B., January 7, 1921.
3. Medicine Hat, Alta., January 21, 1921.
4. St. Antoine, Montreal, Qué., February 14, 1921.
5. West York, Ont., February 20, 1921.
6. Leeds, Ont., July 9, 1920.

I think I am right in assuming that the vacancy in the constituency of Leeds, in respect of which no definite date has been given to the public, would be as of July 9, 1920, the date of the Order in Council under which the sitting member for that constituency assumed an office of emolument under the Crown. That means, Mr. Speaker, that no less than six constituencies are at present denied representation in this Parliament. From the nature of the replies which have been given by the ministry when questioned as to these vacancies, one is right in assuming that the Government evidently intends to adopt in respect to them the course which it adopted in respect to vacancies in the last session of Parliament. That course was, in cases where it was, primarily, a matter of consideration of the rights of the people, to ignore altogether the rights of the people, but in cases where the political, partisan ends of the Government might be served, to taks as quick action as the Government could find it possible to take. May I direct the attention of the House to the circumstance that in the last session of Parliament the constituency of East Elgin was entirely without representation, notwithstanding that a period of something like nine months elapsed between the day on which the vacancy occurred and the day on which it was filled? Let me contrast with that the case of two other vacancies which were created by the Government itself for its own purposes, and the length of time which elapsed between the creating of those vacancies and the day on which they were filled. The vacancy in East Elgin occurred on February 17, 1920; it was not filled until November 22, 1920. In the interval a session of Parliament was held. That is the point I would like hon. members to note particularly; that the vacancy occurred before Parliament met and was not filled until after the session was over, so that during the whole of that session the electors of East Elgin were without representation in this House. But take the other vacancies which occurred. In the city of St. John and Counties of St. John and Albert, and in Colchester, Nova Scotia, the Government itself created two vacancies on July 16, 1920, by the appointment of two ministers who had, of course, to resign their seats in the House. Now, these vacancies occurred on the 16th of July; they were filled on the 20th of September, within two months, although Parliament was not in session at the time. In other words, where it suited the political and partisan ends of the Government, they were alert and ready to see that the representation was quickly made complete so far as this House of Commons was concerned; but where it was not their own political ends which were concerned, but rather the rights of the people to representation in this House, they were ready to ignore completely the fundamental right of the electors to representation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it would seem that the Government purposes, in the case of the six constituencies I have just mentioned, to adopt a course very similar to that which they adopted in the case of the constituency of East Elgin; in other words, unless this House of Commons is prepared to express its opinion in no uncertain terms that every constituency in Canada should be represented in this Parliament just as quickly as possible, the Government in all probability will act in such a manner as to deprive the electors of these six constituencies of any representation during the present session of Parliament.

My right hon. friend may say that according to a statute which was passed by this Parliament on the 10th of November, 1919, the Government has a period of six months after a vacancy occurs within which to issue a writ for the filling of any vacancy. I would direct the attention of my right hon. friend to the wording of that statute. He will see that it was not drafted with a view primarily of affording the Government the latitude of running six months; it was framed rather with a view of putting a time limit on the period within which it would be possible for the Government to deny to the electors any representation. The Act will be found in the statutes of 1919, second session, being chapter 18, 10 George V, section 1, 11A. I quote:

> In the event of a vacancy occurring a writ shall be issued within six months after the receipt by the clerk of the Crown in Chancery of the warrant for the issue of a new writ for the election of a member of the House of Commons.

Note these words, Mr. Speaker: shall be issued "within" six months. That is the time limit imposed on the Government, but, as has been made apparent in so many debates in this House, the really important consideration in matters of public policy is not the letter of the law but the spirit of it, and the spirit of this enactment is that there shall be some restraint upon the Government with a view to preventing it from denying to constituencies the right of representation to which they are justly entitled. I contend, Sir, that the Government's attitude towards vacancies should be one of endeavouring to see that so far as can conveniently be arranged every constituency in Canada shall have its due representation in Parliament.

Let me say just a further word, Mr. Speaker, in regard to the attitude assumed by the Prime Minister in this matter. Hon. members of this House as well as the public have a right to expect from any hon. gentleman holding the high and dignified position of Prime Minister of this country something more than ordinary courtesy and consideration when matters of great public concern are brought to his attention. I think it would be impossible for anyone to read the replies which have been made by my right hon. friend to questions put to him in this House concerning its representation without feeling that he has been, to say the least, very cavalier in the nature of his replies. Let me quote, for example, the reply of my right hon. friend to a question which was put to him on March 3. I addressed the right hon. gentleman in what I thought was a courteous and proper way when I asked if in the opinion of the Government the hon. member for Leeds had not forfeited his right to a seat in this House by virtue of having accepted a position as one of the arbitrators on the board which is to value the stock of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. When I asked that question I was not asking it in order to obtain personal information. I was asking it as a representative of the people, to obtain from the Government a statement which the people might have as the expression of the Government's view on that all-important matter. I think that my right hon. friend, as Prime Minister, should have given to that question an answer befitting its importance and significance. What was the reply made by my right hon. friend? It is to be found in Hansard of March 3, page 505, and is as follows:

> Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): I do not know that the Government gives legal opinions, especially on the floor of Parliament. If the hon. gentleman will submit his question in the usual way on the Order Paper, he will receive an answer.

I might say to my right hon. friend that I did move in this House for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General:

> For a copy of the Order in Council of July 9, 1920, appointing the Honourable Sir Thomas

White as an arbitrator to value the stock of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, any subsequent Orders in Council having reference to this matter, and for all correspondence between the Government and the Honourable Sir Thomas White respecting such appointment.

On March 10 of this year the House voted that address; but up to the present time—and to-day is the 29th of the month—it has been impossible for any one on this side of the House to secure the papers on this particular subject. That is not treating Parliament with the courtesy which hon. members have a right to expect from the Government on matters of this kind. I regret to say this, but I feel called upon to do so.

Not only has my right hon. friend been very cavalier in the nature of the replies he has made, but he has lacked candour in some of the replies which he has given. If there is one thing above another which the people of the country have a right to expect from its first citizen, I think it is the utmost frankness and candour on any question of great public concern. Let me, in this connection, read to the House the replies of my right hon. friend in regard to the resignation of the hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames). On March 3, I addressed the following questions to the Prime Minister:

Is the Prime Minister aware of the hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) having made any public declaration to the effect that he had tendered his resignation as a member of this Parliament? Has the Prime Minister or any other member of the Government received an intimation from that hon. gentleman of his desire or intention to tender his resignation?

Rt. Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN: I have seen no public declaration made by or on behalf of the hon. member for St. Antoine, nor have I received any communication that I can give to the House.

One may take that language and, by looking with a microscope at the wording, perhaps could say, as my right hon. friend, no doubt will, that literally he was stating the truth when he said that he had not seen a public declaration, nor received any communication which he could give to the House. But at the time that statement was made, the impression which it conveyed to the House and to the people of this country was that my right hon. friend was in ignorance of any resignation having been made by the hon. member for St. Antoine. If my right hon. friend was not in ignorance of that fact, he was in duty bound, as Prime Minister of this country, to have made a candid, frank and open statement to the House, to the effect that the resignation of the hon. member had been made.

But let me direct the attention of my right hon. friend and of the House to what actually were the facts. The reply which I have just read by my right hon. friend was made on March 3, 1921. On March 17, you, Mr. Speaker, presented to this House the declaration of the hon. member for St. Antoine respecting his resignation. What was the surprise of the House when it was discovered that the date of that resignation was the 14th February, 1921. These are the words of the declaration:

To the Honourable Speaker of the House of Commons:

I, Herbert B. Ames, member for the House of Commons of Canada, for the Electoral District of St. Antoine, Montreal, do hereby resign my seat in the said House of Commons, for the constituency aforesaid.

Given under my hand and seal at Ottawa this Fourteenth day of February, A.D. 1921.

HERBERT B. AMES. [L.S]

Witness, W. S. Middlebro.

Witness, Howard P. Whidden.

As the House well knows, the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Middlebro) is chief whip of the Conservative party. It is inconceivable that the chief whip of that party had this information in his possession and gave no intimation of it one way or another to the Prime Minister; and if the right hon. gentleman had any intimation that there was any such resignation in the hands of the chief whip, he owed it to this Parliament, when he was questioned as to the resignation of the hon. member for St. Antoine, to reply to that question with the utmost candour. But let me direct the House to a further statement in regard to this question. On March 4, the following question was put by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain), and it will be found on page 608 of Hansard:

Mr. Casgrain:

1. Is it true that the member for Saint Antoine, Montreal, has sent in his resignation as a member of the House of Commons?

2. If so, when was it received by the Speaker of the House?

This was replied to as follows by the Speaker:

Mr. Speaker: The answer to the first question is, No. The second question is answered by the reply to No. 1.

It will be noticed that it was on March 4 that that question was answered by you, Sir, in this House. My right hon. friend must, however, take the responsibility for permitting the Speaker to answer that question. The question was adressed to the ministry; the Speaker made the reply, possibly in the ordinary way, but this is the circumstance to which I wish to draw the attention of my right hon. friend. He was sitting in his seat, the chief whip, the hon. member for Grey North, and the other witness to this document, the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Whidden), were both in their seats when the Speaker of this House made that statement respecting the resignation of the hon. member for St. Antoine. On March 4, you, Mr. Speaker, were permitted, in the presence of those gentlemen, to say that the hon. member for St. Antoine had not resigned his seat, and all the time there was in the possession of the chief whip the declaration of that hon. gentleman to which the chief whip had himself been a witness on February 14.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: My hon. friend has made a misstatement. That resignation which was handed to the Speaker, I suppose, later on, was not in my hands more than two minutes. The hon. member for St. Antoine one day came to my seat in this House and presented me with that resignation, saying: "I am going overseas; I want to have my resignation witnessed; I am going to send it in later on." I know nothing more about it than it was sent later on. It was signed in blank; the date was blank, and he was to use it as he saw fit.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What was the date when the resignation was handed to my hon. friend?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I do not know the date. He just came to me when I was in my seat in the House during last session. He came over to me and the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Whidden) with it all drawn out; the date was left in blank; it was witnessed in blank, and he took it away.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That only makes the case worse than ever. The statement we now have is that during last session of Parliament the chief whip received from the hon. member for St. Antoine his resignation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Nonsense.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: It was not left with me. He simply came to me and said: "I am going to resign."—he did not say when—"Will you and Dr. Whidden kindly sign this?" We sat down in a seat here and we signed it. It was in blank. I gave it back to him. It was the property of the hon. member to do what he pleased with it.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps the hon. member will now explain to the House how the document came to be dated February 14—witnessed February 14 of the present year.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I suppose the hon. member for St. Antoine has a perfect right to date that document whenever he pleases.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And you to assert yourself as witnessing his signature on February 14.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: My hon. friend knows better than that. He knows the date was blank.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But it is stated in the document.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I would remind hon. members that the leader of the Opposition has the floor.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me direct the attention of the House to what is stated in the declaration of the hon. member for St. Antoine:

> Given under my hand and seal at Ottawa, this fourteenth day of February, A.D. 1921.
> Witness, W. S. Middlebro.
> Witness, Howard P. Whidden.

Now there is something false in that statement according to what my hon. friend has just told us. Either he did not witness that document on February 14, or he did. He tells us now that he did not witness it on February 14, but that he witnessed it last session. Now the question I wish to ask my right hon. friend the Prime Minister is this: Where was that document from that time until the day on which this Parliament opened? I say that my right hon. friend owes it to this House, when he gets up to speak in reply to what I am now saying, to clear away this mystery completely. He owes it to his own reputation, and to the honour of members of this House, and the honour of the hon. member for St. Antoine. This document is dated February 14. Now that date is significant. That is the day on which this Parliament opened, and when Parliament opened on February 14, how does it come that this document signed that day never reached the Speaker's hands until March 17? Will my right hon. friend tell the House in frankness and candour, when he rises to speak, where that document was in the meantime? Some one must know. The chief whip waives responsibility in the matter, but the Prime Minister cannot waive it. He owes it to his position to tell the House where that document was in the meantime.

May I add this further. I am informed, and I believe credibly, that on the night of the division on the Address my hon. friend the chief whip on the Government side sought to have the member for St. Antoine paired with an hon. member on this side of the House, notwithstanding that he knew that that resignation was already signed by Sir Herbert Ames. I asked my right hon. friend the Prime Minister when I brought this matter up in the House, who was responsible for having withheld this important document from you, Mr. Speaker, for over a month, from February 14 until March 17?

The Prime Minister made no reply to that question whatever. He evaded it altogether, and confined his remarks to generalities respecting what in his view might have happened to the resignation in the meantime.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at Eight o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING (resuming): Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock we had been discussing the several vacancies existing in this chamber, and the lack of popular representation ensuing as a consequence. We were referring more particularly to the vacancy in the electoral district of St. Antoine, in the City of Montreal. I think I express the feeling of the House when I say that we had had the somewhat painful disclosure that on March 3, the Prime Minister had conveyed to this House the impression that the member for St. Antoine had not tendered his resignation as a member of the Canadian Parliament and further permitted that impression to be confirmed by you, Mr. Speaker, on March 4, by allowing you to state from the Chair as a positive fact, that the resignation of Sir Herbert Ames as the member for St. Antoine had not been tendered. There was the further circumstance that all of the time there was in existence, and in the possession of someone, a signed declaration by the hon. member, dated at Ottawa on February 14, in which the hon. member formally tendered his resignation as a member of this House. More remarkable still, Mr. Speaker, was the disclosure made, in the course of discussion, by the chief whip of the Government party to the effect that he, himself, together with one of his colleagues, witnessed the resignation of the member for St. Antoine as long ago as the last session of Parliament. That would bring the resignation, as made out by Sir Herbert Ames, to a date prior to July 1, 1920, when Parliament prorogued. Now what the Government whip has stated in that connection is borne out by the statement of Sir Herbert Ames himself which was read in this House during an earlier debate. Speaking in London, England, on July 21, 1920, before the Empire Parliamentary Association during an address on "The Dominion and the League of Nations," Sir Herbert Ames made this statement:

> Now, I have just returned from a hurried visit to Canada. Mr. Balfour has alluded to the double capacity which I occupied at that time, and for the moment still occupy. For sixteen years I have been the representative of Western Montreal in the Canadian House of Commons. My resignation is in the hands of the Speaker because I have found that my new work is quite enough to occupy all the time and attention that I am capable of giving to it.

In other words, Sir Herbert Ames made the statement, in London, on July 21, 1920, that his resignation was in your hands, Mr. Speaker. My hon. friend, (Mr. Middlebro) tells us that when Sir Herbert Ames visited this House during a preceding session—that is prior to July 1, of last year—he made out his resignation and it was witnessed by two hon. members of this House. Under these circumstances, we have a right to assert, notwithstanding any language that may be used by hon. gentlemen opposite in the way of evasion or trying to circumvent the real issue, that a vacancy has existed in the electoral district of St. Antoine ever since July of last year. Sir, the important point is not whether hon. gentlemen opposite did this or did that with a particular resignation which was placed in their hands, not whether the Government for its own reasons inserted a date which served its particular purpose—but the real question at issue in this matter is, the right of the people of the electoral district of St. Antoine to be represented in Parliament. They have been defrauded of that right by virtue of the action of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman say that resignation was placed in the hands of any member of the Government?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I must leave it to my right hon. friend to explain the circumstances.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. gentleman does not say that, why does he assert that the electors were defrauded of representation by the action of any member of the Government?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My reason is that the hon. member who had been representing that riding made the public statement in London that he had tendered his resignation. Sir Herbert Ames himself was the one person who knew what his motives were and what he intended to do; and if Sir Herbert Ames—a man of the highest honour and integrity, I believe—said on July 21st, 1920, that he had tendered his resignation to the Speaker I, for one, believe that he intended his resignation to be in effect at that time or he would never have uttered the statement. I must leave it to my right hon. friend to extricate himself and his colleagues from the somewhat embarrassing, if not painful, position in which they have placed themselves.

Now what, among other results, is the effect, Mr. Speaker, of the action of the Government in this matter? The law, which I quoted a few moments ago, requires that elections must be held within six months after the resignation of a member is in the hands of the Speaker and His Honour has issued his warrant for the issue of a new writ of election. Had the resignation been tendered, as Sir Herbert Ames said he believed it had been tendered in July, 1920, an election would have had to be held in the St. Antoine division of Montreal before the end of 1920, and we would have had in Parliament, at the beginning of this session and at the present time, some one representing that constituency instead of the electors of the riding being unrepresented as they now are.

But there is another consequence, Mr. Speaker, which I think, in some ways, is even more serious and unfortunate than the one I have just mentioned. In view of the attitude which the Government has taken and of the evasions of my right hon. friend, what are we to believe in regard to any other vacancies that may be existing at the present time? There is now, we believe, a vacancy in Leeds. We have every reason to believe that the right hon. member for Leeds (Sir Thomas White), having accepted an office of emolument under the Crown and being an honourable man, has, in his own estimation, no longer the right to a seat in this House. Indeed, we know that ever since Parliament assembled the right hon. gentleman who formerly represented Leeds has not taken his seat here. I am right, I think, when I say that the former member for Leeds has been in Ottawa repeatedly during the time that Parliament has been in session—may I say that I believe he was in Ottawa to-day—but he has not entered this House or taken his seat here.

Under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, we have a right to believe there exists in the mind of that hon. gentleman, just as there did in the mind of Sir Herbert Ames, the belief that his resignation should be given to this House, and that the electors of the constituency of Leeds as a consequence are entitled to other representation in Parliament. There may be in the pocket of some hon. gentleman opposite, handed to him by some other hon. gentleman to suit the partisan ends of the Government, the resignation of the hon. member for Leeds. We have a right to ask my right hon. friend when he speaks in reply to-night to state unequivocally whether in his opinion, as one holding the highest position of trust in the gift of this country, the constituency of Leeds is not entitled to have a representative in this Parliament at this particular session. In order that there may be no possible further evasion of the exact situation, let me quote the law on this subject. Section 15 of chapter 10 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, provides in part as follows:

> If any member of the House of Commons accepts any office or commission. . . . . or performs any service for the Government of Canada or for any of the officers of the Government of Canada, for which any public money of Canada is paid or to be paid,. . . the seat of such member shall thereby be vacated, and his election shall thenceforth be null and void.

The preamble of the Act for the acquisition of the Grand Trunk railway, chapter 13 of the Statutes of 1920 provides that one of the parties to the agreement is called the Government; and clause 6 of this schedule, which forms part of the Act, provides:

> That the value of the stock of the Grand Trunk Railway company shall be determined by a board of three arbitrators, one to be appointed by the Government.

And the first sentence of clause 21 of the schedule reads as follows:

> Each of the parties to this agreement shall pay its own costs of and in connection with the arbitration subsequent to the date of this agreement, including the remuneration of the arbitrator appointed by it.

I am informed that on July 9, 1920, the hon. member for Leeds, the right hon. Sir Thomas White, was by order in council appointed the Government arbitrator, to be remunerated by the Government for his services in that connection. As I mentioned to the House this afternoon, it has been impossible to secure from the Government any of the papers relating to this particular appointment, so that we on this side of the House are unable to tell the electors of Leeds whether they are legally represented in this Parliament or not. Under the circumstances, I say to my right hon. friend that he owes it to the electors of Leeds, he owes it to hon. members of this House, and he owes it to the people of this country to state unequivocally to-night whether the electors of Leeds are or are not at the present time unrepresented, and whether it is his intention, as the leader of the Government, to see that a by-election is brought on in that constituency as soon as possible, in order that their representation may be made good at the earliest possible moment.

That I may conclude with the several phases of this matter at this moment, let me say to my right hon. friend that we will not only expect him to make a statement in regard to the situation in the St. Antoine division in Montreal, and in regard to Leeds, which will be unequivocal in its terms, but that we will expect him also to state to this House whether or not he intends to allow the electors in the other constituencies where vacancies exist the right to have representation before the present session of Parliament is at an end. When, on March 3 of this year, I asked my right hon. friend about the vacancies in the several constituencies, I said:

> May I ask my right hon. friend if he can inform Parliament when the writs will be issued for by-elections to fill the vacancies that exist in the constituencies of Yamaska, Quebec; York-Sunbury, New Brunswick; Medicine Hat, Alberta; and West York, Ontario?
> Right Hon. Arthur Meighen: I am able fully to conform to precedent in that regard, and to tell my hon. friend that the writs will be issued in due course.
>
> Mr. Mackenzie King: May I ask my right hon. friend if the writs will be issued simultaneously, or at different times?
> Mr. Meighen: That will appear when the writs are issued.

As Prime Minister of this country my right hon. friend has a great responsibility and a solemn trust imposed upon him, and as part of that responsibility and of that trust it is his duty to take this House and the people of Canada into his confidence in very considerable measure, on matters of great public concern, and in this connection to state at the present time in a frank, open and straightforward manner what he intends to do in order to give these constituencies their rights to representation. I need not draw the attention of the House to the circumstance that virtually every answer that my right hon. friend has made this session in regard to this matter has been in the nature of an evasion. We expect from now on that he will take a little more care as to the manner in which he makes his replies to hon. members on this side of the House and that he will give the country through Parliament the information to which it is justly entitled.

I presume that when my right hon. friend does reply he will take refuge as regards the answers which he has made in a retort to the effect that having looked up previous records he finds that other administrations were not over hasty in filling vacancies from time to time. Any comparison made with the conduct of previous administrations has not a true parallel in the present instance. So far as I am aware there never has been a condition quite the same as that which now exists in this Parliament. I do not recall any government that has ever held on to office so tenaciously in violation of the pledges by which it had obtained power. Moreover, I think my right hon. friend will find on looking up the records, at least during the period of the Liberal administration, that there never was a time when the fate of the administration hung on the thread of the possible outcome of a series of by-elections, as I think is the case with his administration to-day. Nor, indeed, has there ever been a time in the history of the country when the problems demanding solution at the hands of Parliament were as vast as the problems which confront us at the present time. We have a series of problems arising out of the war as a result of which colossal sums of money are being asked for by the Government in appropriations amounting to almost $600,000,000. No previous administration, I think, prior to the time that hon. gentlemen opposite took office ever asked much beyond, if indeed, it came to a total of, $100,000,000 by way of annual appropriations. With these serious matters confronting Parliament it is of the utmost importance that every constituency should be represented in this House and that the best intelligence possible should be brought to bear on their solution.

In conclusion, let me say, Mr. Speaker, that the one fact above every other which is causing concern to the people of this country is how they are going to meet the vast expenditures which hon. gentlemen opposite are subjecting the country to. It is true that the Government has given us very little in the way of a legislative programme for the present session. Indeed, that programme is as sparse as it can possibly be, save in one particular, and there it is prolific enough. The particular to which I refer is the colossal amount of money which the Government expects this House to vote, and which the people will be obliged to bear in taxation during next year. When the Government is asking appropriations of $576,000,000, which will probably run into $600,000,000 or $700,000,000 before this session is over, if the Government bring down Supplementary Estimates such as they did last session—and that vast sum does not include a single cent set aside for paying off the war debt, amounting to a couple of billion dollars—when there is an appropriation for our railroads alone amounting to $167,000,000; when the Government proposes, as we are led to understand, further indirect taxation through the revisions that they are about to make in the tariff—there are, I think, Mr. Speaker, the strongest reasons why the electors in every riding should have the right to have their voice heard in this Parliament at this particular session, and for that reason I beg to move, seconded by my hon. friend for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding):

That as respects the motion before the House all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor: "The House is of the opinion that representation in Parliament being a fundamental right of the people, writs should be issued at once to fill the existing vacancies in the House of Commons, and that polls should be held at the earliest possible time so as to ensure representation of all constituencies during the present session of Parliament."

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure if any improvement of character or conduct on my part could be looked for as a result of the scolding from the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), I rise very much chastened and purified by it. I recognize the privilege of being given lessons in candour and honesty and frankness at the hands of my hon. friend.

I would indeed profoundly regret if any default on my part were responsible for the rather unseemly bickering to which the House has been treated this afternoon.

I have read again the various reference to which my hon. friend has alluded. I have read the questions asked me, and the replies, and I say first of all that I am conscious of no error whatever, however slight, however negligible, as affecting the accuracy of a single reply, nor am I conscious of having withheld from him or from Parliament anything that it was my obligation, or even my right, to give as a member of the Government and of this House. The hon. member has chosen this occasion—it is very rarely if ever that the House is moved into Committee of Supply without some attempt being made to delay almost indefinitely the deliberations of Parliament in Supply—he has chosen this occasion, to move a resolution demanding that all vacancies be immediately filled by by-elections, but he has used it mainly to revamp some difficulties he finds in connection with the resignation of a private member of this House and to try to give rise throughout the country to the idea that the Government of Canada is responsible for the time or the method in which a private member of this House chooses to put in his resignation. The Government of Canada is responsible for the advice it gives the Crown in relation to public affairs; the time and the method of a resignation is the responsibility of the member concerned. Sir Herbert Ames was quite capable of discharging that responsibility, and he discharged it. He was capable of getting advice from any source he chose, and those giving it are responsible to him for that advice.

Now, the hon. gentleman complains that information misleading Parliament has been given. I have often been sorry that my hon. friend seemed utterly incapable of reasoning carefully on any set of facts. I do not presume he intends to throw out intimations to the House and to the country that are inconsistent with the facts. If he would reason carefully on the facts we would not come to these rather disagreeable incidents in this House,—there is no necessity for it. Much less would we ever reach the time when the accusation of falsehood would be lightly thrown across the floor of Parliament. I do not know whether it was his intention to create the impression that something I had given this House was false, but in the plainest language and apparently without even a moment of reflection he hurls at my hon. friend from North Grey an accusation of falsehood. I do not think that any hon.

member of this House on either side would even in his heart conceive the hon. member for North Grey capable of misleading Parliament or of uttering a falsehood to this House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I made no reference of any kind reflecting upon the hon. member for North Grey—none whatever.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, the facts are these: the hon. member quoted from the resignation and quoted from what he said was the assertion of the hon. member for North Grey as a witness to that resignation; he then referred to his statement in Parliament and said that one or the other was false. I do not know whether he conceives that that reflects on the member for North Grey. If he does not, it is only another illustration of what I referred to a moment ago,—my hon. friend's utter incapacity for reasoning on any set of facts.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is bothering hon. gentlemen opposite? On what ground did the leader of the Opposition hurl that accusation across the floor of this House? He quoted from a resignation signed by Sir Herbert Ames dated February 14 of this year, a resignation witnessed by the hon. member for North Grey and the hon. member for Brandon, and, reading the attestation clause—"Given under my hand and seal at Ottawa this Fourteenth day of February, A.D. 1921," signed as witnesses to the signature of Sir Herbert Ames by Mr. Middlebro and Mr. Whidden—he asserted that it was false to affirm that that was signed on February 14. Now, the hon. leader of the Opposition has, whenever it has suited him, when he thought it would pander to the prejudices of an audience, been in the habit of complaining about too many lawyers elected to this House.

An hon. MEMBER: That is right.

An hon. MEMBER: Shame.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: One cannot help noting that surrounded as the hon. gentleman is in Parliament he very carefully refrains from making that complaint in this House. I have often regretted that the hon. member had not at least some little acquaintance with law; it would save him a lot of trouble. It would not require more than two days of the five years of the study of law required in most provinces for the hon. gentleman to acquaint himself with the fact that the signature of witnesses is a signature attesting the authenticity of the signature to the document. The witnesses by signing say that that is an authentic signature; they saw him sign. They do not attest the fact that it was signed on the day on which the instrument is dated.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hon. members say "oh, oh"; and I heard a lawyer like the member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), when the leader of the Opposition was on his feet, applaud him with a huzzah the utterance of that sentiment.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, and I am sorry the Prime Minister of Canada is of another opinion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Take, by way of illustration, the case of a legal document signed by two, three, or four parties, some of them living in different cities. Is there not one date to the document? Yet is it not essential that one sign on one day and another on another? Do the witnesses assert when they sign as of a certain date that the document was signed by all on the same day? Why, the merest tyro knows that is not the case.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McMASTER: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the hon. member talking about? Does the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) wish to dispute that? Does he mean to assert that a witness affirms, when there is a date to a document, that it was signed on the date of the document?

Mr. McMASTER: Suppose a man signed as witness to a will dated as of a certain day. Does my right hon. friend mean to say that it is not important to have the date on it? It is a sort of dying request.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This will illustrate what the hon. gentleman's ingenuity amounts to. He knows that a will has a special attestation clause in which it is specifically asserted that the witnesses saw the person sign on the date of the will. Indeed, the law in our province calls for that, and I am pretty sure the law of Ontario does. But for hon. members to state in this House that a witness to a document is a witness to anything more than the authenticity of the signature is to talk nonsense. Does the hon member say that it was the duty of the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Middlebro), or the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Whidden), to see that the date was filled in at the time they signed the document? The law does not call for any date at all.

Mr. McMASTER: They had a right to do so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the business of Sir Herbert Ames. It is the business of Sir Herbert Ames to decide when his resignation shall come to Mr. Speaker, and the time he chooses and the method he chooses for doing so are matters within his own concern. It is for him to choose them, and in the choosing of them the Government of this country has no responsibility whatever. Sir Herbert Ames did not leave his resignation with any member of this Government. I told the House that he left it with a friend of his, and he did; but the resignation becomes a resignation when it reaches you, Mr. Speaker, as every hon. member knows. The hon. member for Prince, P.E.I. (Mr. Mackenzie King) would seem to think that Sir Herbert Ames was bound, the moment he wrote out his resignation, to tender it at once to you, Sir. He can choose the time he tenders it; he did choose the time; he chose the method; and whether or not the person to whom he confided it carried out his instructions is a matter between that person and Sir Herbert Ames. The hon. member asks me, as leader of the Government, to tell him what method Sir Herbert Ames adopted, to tell him what the custodian of Sir Herbert Ames' resignation did. That is a matter concerning Sir Herbert Ames, and I will so continue to tell my hon. friend as long as he asks the question. I am responsible for what I do as leader of the Government. The Government is responsible for the advice it gives to the Crown and for the conduct of public affairs. Sir Herbert Ames is responsible for the time he resigns and the method he takes for resigning, and if anybody, no matter who he is, were he a member of the Government or anybody else, advises him in that regard, for that advice no one is responsible and no one is answerable to the leader of the Opposition or to this House; the man is answerable to the person to whom he gives the advice. Sir Herbert Ames chose the channel by which his resignation should reach the Speaker, and he had a right to do so. My hon. friend reads a report—I do not know what it is from; I presume it is a newspaper report of a speech made by Sir Herbert Ames, supposed to have been made in London on July 21, 1920, in which he asserted that his resignation was in the Speaker's hands. I never saw the report; I do no know whether he made the speech or not.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hon. members may think it clever to laugh. I do not know what is laughable about the matter. If the hon. member (Mr. Lapointe) has anything clever to say to this House, he will have an opportunity of standing on his feet and doing so when I am through. I know, if Sir Herbert Ames made that statement—I can scarcely think he made it, because I know he was aware of the fact—he made it before the date on which he handed his resignation to the custodian. I venture to give that information to the House. It was after that date that his resignation was handed to the custodian and limitations placed upon the time at which it would be handed to Mr. Speaker. I do not know what mystery there is about this matter. Has Sir Herbert Ames not the rights of an ordinary member? Can he not choose his agent, his time, his method? That right he had; that right he exercised, and for the exercise of it he is responsible.

Now let me come to the subject matter of this resolution. The hon. member says that six seats, are vacant, and he demands that before we go into Supply, the Government be instructed that all those writs must be issued, and right away, because very great harm is going to be done to the constituencies and to the country if those writs are not issued immediately.

Mr. EDWARDS: May I ask whether in the six seats he includes one of the two held by the hon. member for Gaspé and Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux)?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman is very silent on that. I may refer to that subject later. No, he referred to the seat held by the hon. member for Leeds. Although he reviled lawyers, he was not at all the first to stand in the House and argue, as a matter of law, that that seat was vacant. I do not know how far his legal opinion will be accepted by hon. members; but at all events, he gave it for what it is worth. Not only that, but he abuses me because I refuse to give my legal opinion. The hon. member has moved in this House for the papers relating to Sir Thomas White's appointment as arbitrator in the Grand Trunk arbitration. That motion passed this House; those papers the hon. member has a right to; those papers he shall have. Necessarily, in the preparation of that file—because this is only one of a great number of resolutions that pass Parliament—some time must be taken. Only a little over two weeks have passed since the resolution was passed by this House; it will not be very long until the papers are brought down; and I may tell the hon. member now that, when that correspondence is brought down, it will contain the opinion of the Department of Justice as to the tenure of the seat by Sir Thomas White. It is the opinion of the Department of Justice by which this Government is governed, and that will be known to Parliament in the usual way by bringing down the papers. That will be of more value to the House than any opinion of any individual member, however eminent in law he may be.

Mr. JACOBS: Will it be more valuable than the opinion of the Minister of Justice himself, who is a member of this House?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Minister of Justice is head of the Justice Department; but the law officers under the Minister of Justice are the officers that are followed in public business, and it is their opinion, not necessarily that of the Minister of Justice, to which the House in answer to that motion is entitled.

The resolution states that a writ must be issued immediately for each of the vacancies that now exist, applicable only to the five that undoubtedly do exist, the constituencies of Yamaska, Quebec; York-Sunbury, N.B.; Medicine Hat, Alberta; West York, Ontario, and St. Antoine, Montreal. The first observation I wish to make is this: Two sessions ago this Parliament altered the law with regard to the issue of writs for by-elections. Prior to that time, under the law of the land, it had been left entirely to the Government of the day to determine when it was in the public interest that by-elections should be brought on and writs issued, and no limitation at all was placed upon the discretion of the Government in that regard. In the session of 1919, Parliament altered that by special statute, by which Parliament declared that writs should be issued within six months after the receipt by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery of a warrant for the issue of a new writ for the election of a member of the House of Commons. That is to say, the discretion that Parliament had theretofore granted the Government, an unlimited discretion, was specifically limited to six months after the receipt by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery of the notification of a vacancy. Why Parliament so acted, the debate at the time pretty clearly shows. It appears that the subject matter of the Bill had been referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The committee reported the Bill in this form: it limited the discretion of the Government to six months in the case of all vacancies occurring otherwise than by resignation, but they took the view that it would not be well to limit the discretion of the Government at all in relation to vacancies arising out of resignation, because to do so would put it in the power of an individual member by the exercise of a mere idiosyncrasy or whim, to declare a seat vacant and bring on a by-election at any time he chose. Whether that recommendation of the committee was valid or not may be doubted, but at all events Parliament in considering it afterwards, came to the conclusion that there should be no exceptions, and enacted that the time within which the writ should be issued should be six months from the receipt by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery of the warrant to issue a writ for the vacancy. That is the discretion now given to this Government and to all governments in this country. Does anybody know why the exercise of that discretion should be specially limited as regards this Government?

Has anybody heard any reason why, after Parliament had so decided, this same Parliament should alter an Act, which has passed all its stages, upon the mere resolution of the leader of the Opposition? That is the orbit of discretion given the Government of the country. By what process of reasoning is this Government to be denied the exercise of that discretion while other governments are to be accorded it? Oh, the hon. member says, there are special circumstances; you are hanging on, he says, by a thread. He has been imagining that thread for quite a long while now; he has been giving interviews about it, making statements about it, making speeches in this House about it, but the "thread" still hangs, and it seems a pretty substantial thread; there are at least 25 strands strongly holding it together. How does that affect the case anyway? Even were it so, how is that relevant to the argument? Did Parliament make an exception and say that discretion should only be exercised when the Government had a large slavish and reliable majority? If that had been the intention of Parliament, they would have said so. But Parliament placed no restriction; Parliament intended no restriction. Now, the hon. gentleman is fearfully outraged about the poor electors of St. Antoine, and of Yamaska and of York-Sunbury being denied representation in the House this session, and he is seconded in this by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). He too is becoming very impatient, and is very anxious indeed that this process of non-representation, which in the longest case has continued for only three months, and in the shortest case for about three weeks be immediately stopped, or the fundamental rights of the electors are being ignored. Well, if the electors have fundamental rights to-day in this regard, they have had the same fundamental rights for fifty years or more in this country. They had the same fundamental rights when the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's was a member of the Government, and when the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) was its enthusiastic supporter. The fundamental rights of the electors have not changed between then and now. Let me ask the hon. member: how is it that he is scandalized to think that three months should have elapsed in the longest case that now constitutes a vacancy in this House, when he was quite content to support a Government that allowed a whole year and nearly two years to elapse?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will my right hon. friend wait a few moments for an answer, or does he want it now?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I await it now—I took up his challenge, but he does not answer. Let me give the hon. member just a few cases. Starting back in 1897, shortly after hon. gentlemen opposite came into power, I find in the contituency of Champlain, Quebec—he will know about that—

Mr. BUREAU: The Government ought to know too.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly they know about it. In that case three months elapsed. Next, three months elapsed in Colchester, Nova Scotia; four and a half months in the case of Témiscouata, at the time the present hon. member for that constituency was elected.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It was worth waiting for.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In that case the constituency waited from June 25, 1897, when the former member died, until the 6th day of November, 1897. Such was the outrage perpetrated on the people of Témiscouata, an outrage which hon. gentlemen opposite quite cheerfully assert was abundantly vindicated by the election of the present hon. member himself. I agree that my hon. friend is a creditable representative in this Parliament, and I know he will agree with me that the outburst of cheers of hon. gentlemen opposite at the assertion that it was all right to wait until he was elected is only another of a thousand proofs of the assertion that all their interest in this matter is politics, and party politics. It is not the electors of these constituencies they are concerned about at all: all they are concerned about is to gain some party advantage if they can, and it will only be a moment till I show you how they hope to gain it, if they are able to bring the House to their point of view at this time.

We go on to the case of Bagot, Quebec. Mr. Dupont died on March 12, 1898. There was no election in that county at all until December 14, 1898, or nine months and two days afterwards. What an outrage was perpetrated on the people of Bagot, an outrage to which the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's the seconder to this resolution, was a party: Next is the case of North Simcoe, where the late D'Alton McCarthy died on May 11, 1898, and where the election was deferred until December 14, 1898, or for seven months and three days. We pass unto Montmagny, Quebec. There the election was deferred for five months and seven days. We pass from that to West Huron, Ontario, where Mr. M. C. Cameron was appointed Lt. Governor of the North West Territories on May 30, 1898. The election in that case was deferred until February 21, 1899, nine months and twenty-five days after the vacancy occurred.

The next case is Chambly and Verchères —and this outrage was not at all redeemed by the election of the present hon. member. There the Hon. C. A. Geoffrion died on July 18, 1899. The election did not take place until January 18, 1900; six months elapsed in that case. That is only half as long as one I read a moment ago, but twice as long as the worst case which now outrages hon. gentlemen opposite at the present time.

Then I refer to the city of Winnipeg, which at that time was possibly the largest single member constituency in this Dominion, had the largest number of electors, and perhaps the greatest individual and property interests. There Mr. Jamieson died on February 31, 1899, but the election did not take place until January 25, 1900, or practically one year after the death of the hon. member for Winnipeg. The next case is Lotbinière, Quebec, Where five months elapsed. Then there is the case of Sherbrooke, Quebec, where six and one-third months elapsed. Passing on to subsequent years, there is the case of Antigonish, Nova Scotia, when four months elapsed. There is the case of West Lambton, Ontario, in the same year, when five months elapsed; the case of Wentworth, Ontario, in the same year, when nine months elapsed; the case of the resignation of Mr. Walter Scott in 1906 for the constituency of West Assiniboia, when five months and six days elapsed; the case of Saskatchewan, North West Territory, in 1906, when five months elapsed; and later on, the case of East Elgin in 1906, when ten months elapsed, the resignation of Mr. Ingram taking place on December 8, 1905, the election being held on October 4, 1906. Then there is the case of the Hon. Peter White, who died on May 3, 1906, having represented the constituency of North Renfrew, and for whom no successor was elected until October 9, of the same year. There is the case of Quebec county, Quebec, when there was a lapse of four and a half months. In the case of St. Mary, Montreal, in 1906, four months elapsed; in the case of Victoria in New Brunswick, when the Hon. John Costigan was summoned to the Senate, four months elapsed. In the case of St. John city and county, in 1907, six months and three days elapsed; in the case of London, Ontario, in 1907, six and a half months elapsed; in the case of East Northumberland in the same year, seven and two-thirds months elapsed; in the case of North Wellington, Ontario, in the same year, seven and a half months elapsed. And so on, down the list. I doubt whether there is one single year in the whole time that hon. gentlemen opposite were in power when there were not cases —or, numbers of cases—in which twice the time, or almost twice the time, elapsed that has elapsed in the most extreme case of which those gentlemen complain to-day.

The hon. member says: But this is a very important session; we must have a lot of money this session. Well, it is an important session. But it was not wrong at all in those days to deprive constituencies of representatives for a whole year; and I have a case here where they were deprived for a far longer time; indeed, where no election was held at all until the general elections came on. That was all right then, but for this Parliament it is a heinous political offence that any election should be deferred. But for this difference the hon. member gives the reason that this is an important session. Why, it is only a few weeks since the hon. gentleman was out on the stump, indeed since he spoke in this House, and said that we had no right to legislate at this session at all because this Parliament was defunct—

An hon. MEMBER: So it is.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —and that it should not exist; so the reasoning of the hon. gentleman is that it is entirely right and proper to deny constituencies their representation in a good Parliament for a year or two, but that it is wholly wrong to deny them representation in a defunct Parliament for three months. Mr. Speaker, the fact is that this Parliament, except in the imagination of the leader of the Opposition, and perhaps in that of some other hon. gentlemen opposite, is in precisely the same position as all other parliaments. In this Parliament, precisely as in all other parliaments, constituencies have a right to be represented; the same right, no greater and no less. In this Parliament, the Government has the same discretion as to the issuance of writs as has always existed, save as restrained by legislation passed two years ago; and in this, as in every previous Parliament, the Government intends to exercise the discretion reposed in it by Parliament, subject only to the restraint Parliament has imposed, and not to the whim of any hon. gentleman, whether he be the leader of the Opposition or not. Now, there is another consideration that does especially weigh at this time. Parliament now in session has possibly two months more in which to sit, possibly longer. I believe it is the anticipation of hon. members on both sides that we may be able to get through towards the end of May, or early in June. Nothing will be done by the Government to hurry matters through, or in any way to constrain Parliament in the consideration of public questions. Nothing of that nature will be done at all. But it is the common anticipation that Parliament will get through in the time I have suggested. An election called now could not be held until about the middle of May, under the law passed by this Parliament; and there would be but a very short time in which any candidate who might be returned could sit in this Parliament this session. But more than that, when by-elections are on it is the duty of hon. members on both sides to see that the case from their point of view is presented as fully as possible to the electors concerned Under present conditions what do we find? We find that hon. gentlemen opposite, within their legal right, have adopted the policy of refusing pairs. The courtesy of pairs is a tradition with Parliament, but it has been refused by hon. gentlemen directly opposite, not, I am glad to say, by hon. gentlemen of the Agrarian party. That is the course which hon. gentlemen opposite have pursued within the exercise of their right. Under the rules of this House hon. gentlemen may bring on a debate at any time on any subject of their choosing. They may precipitate a motion to adjourn; they may challenge the Government on motions that are not debatable, and which consequently may be brought on at any moment, in respect of which a decision cannot at all be delayed. Consequently they have the privilege of having their members present, by concert and agreement among themselves, choosing the time to suit their own convenience. Perhaps hon. gentlemen on this side might be away, necessarily engaged in the presentation of issues before the electors where a by-election was being held. But the courtesy of pairs has been refused, and while they refuse it hon. gentlemen opposite say to us: Go to the country with your by-elections; let your members go out there; and when they are away we will not give pairs, but we shall have our members away or here just as we want them. We shall choose the time for a vote, and by that means shall get a snap verdict and thereby obtain some glory throughout the country. That, I think, is what is in the back of the head of the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Bring on your by-elections and we will give pairs.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Now, these resolutions come on with a minimum of notice. Of this one I received notice forty minutes before the meeting of the House this afternoon; and another I received this afternoon I got half an hour's notice of. It is the privilege of hon. gentlemen opposite to take that course; but it is also the privilege of the Government to take a similar course. I have never pursued that course. Every evening before adjournment we have given the House a statement of what the Government intends shall be taken up the next day. We are not strictly bound to do that, we do it as a matter of courtesy, as advancing the interests of Parliament. I think hon. gentlemen opposite owe us the same courtesy, of giving us notice when these things are about to come on; and I do think that they should not pursue a course that is calculated to enable them to take the Government at a disadvantage when hon. members on this side might be away from the House. I do not think they should urge, under the rules of the House, the adoption of a resolution which is designed for the purpose I have stated.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will permit me, I might say that it was not until one o'clock to-day that a few of us who happen to be sitting side by side decided that this amendment would be moved this afternoon. As soon as that decision was reached, I wrote a letter with my own hand to my right hon. friend and sent it over by special messenger to his office. As a matter of fact, he was informed long before hon. members on this side of the House knew anything about the matter. Besides, this is the only day this week we have of presenting these matters.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all. What my hon. friend says I do not dispute. He may have written me as soon as he knew of the decision to bring this matter up; but that does not help me in any way. Notice did not reach me until twenty minutes after two o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was sent to my right hon friend's office.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very well; but it is when the notice reaches me, just as it is when a resignation reaches the Speaker, that counts. It would not be a very good answer for the Government to say when the House was adjourning at night: "We have not decided what to take up to-morrow. We will likely decide that to-morrow at 2 o'clock, and then we will send a notification to the leader of the Opposition as to what it is." My hon. friend would not regard that as a very good answer on my part.

There was nothing to hinder this resolution from being taken up any day after my hon. friend had placed it on the Order Paper.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend will permit me to say that when we adjourned for Easter—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman has no right to the floor. He has already spoken, and I stretched the rule in his favour a moment ago.

Mr. MEIGHEN: All I am seeking to impress upon the hon. member is that these amenities work both ways, and that when we on this side observe them—and we try to do so to the best of our ability—we expect the same consideration from hon. gentlemen opposite. If this amendment were to pass—and I have not the slightest apprehension that it will because it is not at all fair—it is not based on fairness, or the idea of fairness—it would not only deny to the Government the discretion that Parliament gave it by statute, but the discretion that this Parliament intends that other governments shall exercise in the future. It would not only do that but it would compel a course which, in the conduct of the business of the House and under its rules as they stand to-day, would put the Government at a disadvantage which it does not deserve. Therefore it seems to me that the amendment should not pass. Why should such a motion be moved as an amendment to the resolution to go into Committee of Supply? Why cannot the amendment be placed on the Order Paper as a resolution the same as any other motion? This is a matter of general public concern. This is a matter that seeks to get the opinion of Parliament on a subject which Parliament has already dealt with through the regular process of a statute. Surely that is something that should be brought to the attention of Parliament in the regular course, and not by way of an amendment to the motion to go into Committee of Supply.

An hon. MEMBER: What is his reason for moving it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, that is for the hon. gentleman himself, or some one on his side, to state. I can only leave hon. gentlemen to divine the reason as best they can. We all know what amendments to the motion to go into Committee of Supply are; and I have heard it stated by the leader of the Government before 1911, that though an opposition might move the Ten Commandments in amendment to the motion to go into Committee of Supply they could not expect that those Ten Commandments would be affirmed by the Government when they were proposed in such a manner. It seems to me that my hon. friend has chosen this method in order to get the advantage that would result from an amendment to the motion to go into Committee of Supply, because no amendment can be made to it—it must be taken as it is or not at all. I therefore appeal to hon. members to vote down this amendment in fairness to themselves, in fairness to the Government of the day, in fairness to the Government in future years, and in fairness to Parliament for all time.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Montreal East): The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) said in his opening remarks that after the castigation administered by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) he was chastened and improved. I am afraid that his good resolutions were of short duration, and that he has quickly succumbed to his usual bad habits. Taking his last observation first, he complains that the notice of the intention of the leader of the Opposition to move his motion was only sent him at one o'clock this afternoon, or rather at two twenty o'clock. It is not the fault of the leader of the Opposition that the notice was not received by my right hon. friend until that hour, because the notice was sent at one o'clock. Although the right hon. gentleman complains about that proceeding, he himself at twelve o'clock sent to the leader of the Opposition a letter which reads as follows:

Ottawa, March 29, 1921.

Dear Mr. King,—Mr. Ballantyne proposes to make to-day his statement regarding the operations of the Canadian Mercantile Marine. He will make it on the motion to go into supply.

Yours faithfully,
ARTHUR MEIGHEN.

Now what is sauce for the goose should be sauce for the gander. Is it any worse for the leader of the Opposition to notify the Prime Minister that he intends to mave an amendment on the motion to go into Committee of Supply this afternoon, than it is for the Prime Minister to notify the leader of the Opposition that the statement as to operations of the Canadian Mercantile Marine will be proceeded with the same afternoon?

Right Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman permit me a question? Does he not see the difference—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The Prime Minister is distinctly in order in submitting his question, and if hon. gentlemen would permit the Chair to exercise its jurisdiction in maintaining order the results would be much more satisfactory.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am quite willing to permit the right hon. gentleman to ask any question, but I am told he has just refused the leader of the Opposition the privilege of doing so.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is quite in error. The leader of the Opposition rose for the third time to make a statement which he had no right to do; he did not offer to ask a question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was going to ask my hon. friend if he does not see the distinction between a statement as to the Canadian Mercantile Marine shipbuilding, a statement placed on Hansard so that hon. members may study it—just as in the case of the statement regarding the operations of the national railways—and a challenge to the Government by way of an amendment to go into Committee of Supply. To the first no study is needed on the part of hon. members.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The difference I see is that in the one case we are dealing with the Canadian Mercantile Marine involving the expenditure of many hundreds of millions of dollars, and in the other case with the holding of by-elections in this country. Now, I desire to read the amendment which has been offered by the leader of the Opposition. I wish to draw the attention of all hon. members to its language and to ask them if they can vote against the principle enunciated in it:

> The House is of the opinion that representation in parliament being a fundamental right of the people, writs should be issued at once to fill existing vacancies in the House of Commons, and that polls should be held at the earliest possible time so as to ensure the representation of all constituencies during the present session of Parliament.

I believe that this resolution should be accepted and I cannot see that any government, nor any parliament, can successfully challenge the principle which it enunciates —that it is the undoubted right of the Canadian people to be represented here during the present session of Parliament, as well as during other sessions. I think the constitutional doctrine in that respect cannot be successfully challenged. Parliament must reflect the sense of the whole country. Every citizen of Canada has the right to his share in the making of legislation—in the selection of his representative in Parliament and in the formulation of the laws of this country. This principle cannot be successfully challenged for it is the essence of responsible government. and when there are here and there throughout the country constituencies that are not represented in the House, the whole country is interested in having those vacancies filled, because otherwise Parliament is like a leaning tower—lacking foundation at important points. This, I repeat, is the constitutional doctrine. It is the doctrine of freedom, it is the doctrine of liberty, and for such a doctrine people have fought and shed their blood in days gone by.

This doctrine is recognized in all other countries. What is the law in Great Britain with regard to the holding of by-elections? There the Government has no say in the matter. When a vacancy is created a motion is made in the House of Commons by the chief whip of the party to which the late member belonged for the issuing of the writ. The writ is issued forthwith and sent to the returning officer, who fixes the date of the nomination and of the polling. In 1920 an amendment was enacted to the Representation of the People Act, chapter 35, of 10-11 George V, in which it is provided:

> The day fixed for nomination in boroughs shall not be later than the seventh day after the returning officer receives the writ. . . . The poll shall take place on such day as the returning officer may appoint, not being less than six or more than eight clear days after the date fixed for nomination.

The Government there has no choice in the matter. Further, it is enacted that any person who causes delay in the holding of a by-election is guilty of a misdemeanour. I wonder what my right hon. friend would do if he were guiding the destinies of Great Britain to-day?

And that doctrine has always been recognized in this country, of course. My right hon. friend resorted to the tu quoque argument. I was not surprised, for it is a pet argument with him. With all deference, let me tell him that the tu quoque argument at its very best is a despicable argument. It lacks in logic, it lacks in conviction, it lacks in good faith, it lacks in force. In a word, it is a worn out argument.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I tell my right hon. friend that I am not using any tu quoque argument, nor do I intend to. I do not think that my hon. friend erred when he sent his notice this morning, no more than I think my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition made a mistake when he sent his notice to the right hon. leader of the Government. So I am not using any tu quoque argument. But let me tell my right hon. friend that the men and women of this country to-day are not disposed to make permanent a wrong simply because it has been in existence. The majority of our people are not disposed to believe that a wrong becomes a right when it is done many times by succeeding governments or succeeding bodies. I wonder how progress could be achieved or reform accomplished in this or any other country if this doctrine, so dear to the heart of the right hon. Prime Minister, was the final doctrine accepted by our people. I will tell my right hon. friend that he is wrong when he uses the tu quoque argument. In the cases reported I think I am right in making the statement that the vacancies were filled in every instance before the opening of the succeeding session of Parliament. My right hon. friend shakes his head.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no doubt about it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There are no doubts about it in my mind; I am sure of my assertion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are cases of vacancies not being filled for over a year.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have taken down the cases quoted by my right hon. friend, and in every instance the vacancies were filled prior to the succeeding session.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You did not take them all down.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My right hon. friend may discard that with a wave of the hand as he discarded the Ames matter the other day. He may shake his head in contradiction of what I say, but he cannot prevent the facts remaining facts. In the session of 1908—and this will serve to show that the doctrine I have just alluded to is the recognized doctrine in this country—the former Prime Minister of Canada, who was then leader of the Opposition, the present member for King's, N.S., introduced a bill to amend the House of Commons Act. I refer my right hon. friend to page 5226 of Hansard of the session 1907-1908.

Mr. R. L. Borden (Carleton, Ont.) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 66) to amend the House of Commons Act. He said: Mr. Speaker, the object of this Bill is to provide that writs to fill vacancies in the House of Commons shall be issued within a certain period, and in that way to avoid the prolonged disfranchisement of constituencies which has sometimes occurred. The Bill is framed on practically the same line as that which has been in force in Ontario since the year 1904.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) if he thinks, in view of the invariable practice that has been followed in this House since confederation, there is any necessity for such a Bill as this. If any vacancies have taken place during the recess these vacancies have always been filled before the ensuing session, and so far as I can remember no constituency has been left unrepresented, certainly not within the last ten or twelve years.

The member for King's, N.S., the then leader of the Opposition, did not deny that statement. He said:

If Parliament were to expire in a month or a few weeks, the House could be given power to direct that the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery should not in a particular instance carry this provision into effect. My recollection as to what has taken place is a little different from that of the right hon. gentleman, because I think the constituency of St. James, Montreal, was unrepresented for a whole session.

That was one instance.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier: Do you say St. James?

Mr. R. L. Borden: I am speaking from recollection, but I remember there was at least one constituency in which the writs should have been issued much earlier than they were.

So the leader of the Opposition of that day, without being sure about it, said that he could recollect only one instance in which the writs had not been issued before the ensuing session.

Now, as to the necessity of holding by-elections and having the vacant constituencies represented during all the sessions of Parliament, I shall quote from the remarks of the same gentleman, the then leader of the Opposition, at the same session of Parliament, 1908, as reported on page 7,862 of Hansard. The then government had introduced a Bill to amend the Elections Act and on the second reading of the Bill the hon. member for King's complained as follows:

There is no provision in this Bill for the holding of by-elections within a reasonable time, nor is it provided—

I desire to direct my right hon. friend's attention to these words of his former leader:

—nor is it provided that, where several by-elections are pending, they shall all be held upon the same day.

The member for King's was and is of an opinion quite different from that entertained by the present leader of the Government in that respect. Last year the House emphasized the necessity of having all constituencies represented in Parliament by enacting a measure compelling the Government to hold by-elections within six months of the opening of the seat. Public opinion forced that law upon Parliament. I remember that when the Bill was moved for second reading one of the hon. gentlemen on the other side, a whip—the member for Annapolis (Mr. Davidson) if I am not mistaken—moved the adjournment of the debate, which in the ordinary course would have had the effect of killing the Bill. But public opinion compelled the Government to afford another opportunity for the discussion of the Bill in the House. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) shakes his head, as if he had been the father of the Bill. He took great care last year to say on two or three different occasions that he was not responsible for the Bill; that the member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) was responsible for it and that he, the minister, was simply giving an opportunity to the House.

Mr. DOHERTY: I gave to the hon member for George Etienne Cartier full credit for the Bill, but the hon. member for Quebec East will not deny that had it not been for the co-operation I gave, even when the member for George Etienne Cartier was not in the House, to the extent of taking the Bill up and putting it through, the Bill could not have been got through. The hon. member for Quebec East is too fair, if he knows these facts, to follow upon the lines he has just started to take: I appeal to the member for George Etienne Cartier if what I am saying is not the simple fact.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am quite ready to admit that the Bill could not have been adopted without the co-operation of my right hon. friend, and without his willingness to let the Bill proceed as he did.

Mr. DOHERTY: And in the absence of the sponsor of the Bill I took it up and put it through.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, but what I want to state is that my right hon. friend at the same time took the trouble to say that he was not responsible for the Bill; that his part in putting the Bill though was simply to let the House have the opportunity of dealing with it.

Mr. DOHERTY: Will the hon. gentleman read what I said? I did not repudiate responsibility. As I say, I was giving due credit for the Bill to the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier; I did not want to steal his thunder.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Very well. Then my hon. friend will say with me that it was the intention of the House that the by-elections should be held within a reasonable time after the vacancy occurred, and that the intent of the law was not as stated to-night by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, who asserted that the provision in the Act for a delay of six months entitled the Government to delay the full extent of that period and to ignore the rights of a constituency to representation in Parliament, even though the by-election could have been held much sooner.

When that Bill was discussed in committee it was argued that the provision for a delay of sixty days which had been inserted originally in the Bill by the member for George Etienne Cartier was too short; that it had better be changed to six months in order that there might be sufficient time for the preparation of the lists. So the intention of Parliament was that the elections should be held immediately, or as soon as they could possibly be held, and the provision for a delay of not more than six months was inserted in order to obviate any possible objection in connection with the preparation of the lists.

There is another matter to which I wish to refer very briefly, the question of the resignation of the former member for St. Antoine. The Prime Minister said he was not aware that the member for St. Antoine had made a public statement in London in the month of July last to the effect that he had tendered his resignation. The right hon. gentleman said that this was probably a newspaper report, and expressed the belief that such words were not uttered by the former member for St. Antoine. Well, that "newspaper report" is the printed report of his speech; I hold it in my hand, and it is at the disposal of the right hon. Prime Minister. It is published by the Empire Parliamentary Association; surely the Prime Minister of Canada knows what the Empire Parliamentary Association is. The first stage of that pamphlet reads as follows:

Confidential. The Dominions and the League of Nations. An address by Sir Herbert Ames, M.P., (Canada), Financial Director in the Secretariat of the League of Nations, delivered at a Private meeting of Members of the Empire Parliamentary Association in the Home and Dominion Parliaments, in the Rooms of the Empire Parliamentary Association, Westminster Hall, on July 21, 1920. The Right Hon. Arthur J. Balfour, O.M., F.R.S., M.P., Lord President of the Council and Chairman of Executive Committee of the Empire Parliamentary Association (United Kingdom Branch), in the Chair. Issued under the Authority of the Empire Parliamentary Association (United Kingdom Branch), Westminster Hall, Houses of Parliament, London, S.W.I.

I suppose it is not necessary for me to read the names of the officers of the Empire Parliamentary Association as given in this pamphlet. Then, the reading matter preceding the report of the address is as follows:

A private meeting of the Empire Parliamentary Association was held in the rooms of the Association, Westminster Hall, on July 21, 1920, when Sir Herbert Ames, M.P. (Canada), Financial Director in the Secretariat of the League of Nations, delivered an address upon "The Dominion and the League of Nations." The Right Hon. Arthur J. Balfour, O.M., F.R.S., M.P., (Lord President of the Council and Chairman of Executive Committee of the Empire Parliamentary Association) occupied the chair, and there was a considerable attendance of members of the Association in the Lords and Commons and of visiting members of the Association from Dominion Parliaments.

The chairman, Mr. Balfour, introduced the speaker. I suppose it is not necessary for me to read his remarks; but I wish to read again this part of the speech of the former member for St. Antoine, and I shall now ask my right hon. friend whether he believes those words were uttered by Sir Herbert Ames or not.

My resignation is in the hands of the Speaker because I have found that my new work is quite enough to occupy all the time and attention that I am capable of giving to it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: What is the date?

Mr. LAPOINTE: July 21, 1920. I shall be pleased to hand the book to my right hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have never seen it. I have no doubt my hon. friend is reading it aright. All I have to say is that if Sir Herbert Ames said that, he was manifestly mistaken.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My right hon. friend is modifying his position.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My right hon. friend said a few minutes ago that he did not believe the hon. member for St. Antoine had made the statement. I took his words down at the time. Now he says that he has no doubt that those words were pronounced, but that Sir Herbert Ames was mistaken.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I intend to state a point of order, notwithstanding the noise. I state that the hon. member has no right to misquote what I said, especially a moment after I said it. I said that I did not know whether he made the statement or not; I could scarcely believe that he did. I know the authority is very good. I said that I did not doubt the hon. gentleman was reading correctly; but there is on record the Speaker's word, which I do not think hon. gentlemen intend to challenge, to the effect that if the statement was made, it was a manifest error. I do not know what hon. members are trying to make out. If they believe that there was any breach of honour on the part of any member of the Government in this respect, let an hon. member, on his responsibility as a member of this House, make that statement.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Everything I state in this House is on my responsibility, and my right hon. friend may be sure that I continue to have that responsibility for everything I shall say to-night. Can the right hon. gentleman say that a gentleman of the standing of Sir Herbert Ames, who has represented St. Antoine, Montreal, in this House for so many years, who has been appointed by this Government as a chief officer in the League of Nations, could have made such a statement without the statement being true? That gentleman stated that his resignaion was in the hands of the Speaker. I have no doubt that it was not in the hands of the Speaker; but there was certainly an error, or a mistake, or call it what you like, somewhere, and that is what we would like to find out—

Mr. MEIGHEN: You had better ask Sir Herbert Ames.

Mr. LAPOINTE:—especially under the circumstances which have surrounded the whole procedure. I do not want to dwell long on this question, although it is very interesting. I quite understand the right hon. gentleman cannot speak again, but I should like to ask the hon. gentleman who is going to follow me: who is the party who kept that resignation against the will of the hon. member for St. Antoine, because he expressed his formal will in that statement that his resignation should be in the hands of the Speaker. He said that it was in the hands of the Speaker. Who is the party who kept that resignation against the will of the hon. member for St. Antoine, while that hon. member was under the impression that his resignation was in your hands, Sir? I will ask and call the attention of the House to this second point: how is it that the resignation should have been signed before the chief whip of the Government party and announced a few days later in the city of London by the hon. member who had written the resignation? In all this, of course, I am quite willing to accept, and I do accept, the statement of the Prime Minister; but it seems a queer organization in the great Conservative party, that the chief whip should have witnessed the resignation of an important member; that this member should have announced his resignation publicly in the city of London, and that the leaders of the party should know nothing about it. I will ask further: How is it that the gentlemen who signed that resignation as witnesses have certified that such resignation as witnesses have certified that such resignation was written on February 14? The Prime Minister, in his very clever game of splitting hairs said that those gentlemen witnessed only the signature and nothing else, and everything was right. He does not see anything irregular in the matter. I will call the attention of the House to the language of the Statute. Section 5 of Chapter 11 of the Revised Statutes of Canada reads:

> Any member of the House of Commons may resign his seat,—
> (b) By addressing and causing to be delivered to the Speaker a declaration of his intention to resign his seat, made in writing under his hand and seal before two witnesses.

And so on. Not only must the signature be affixed before the witnesses, but the resignation must be made in writing before the witnesses. Does my right hon. friend say that the date is not an important part of that writing?

Mr. BRISTOL: Will my hon. friend say, as a lawyer, that that section of the Act requires the date to be in the document at the time it was signed?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I certainly say that as a lawyer.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. BRISTOL: I do not think so.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am quite willing to discuss this with my hon. friend, even before the courts of Toronto. It is so clear that it does not require discussion. I am surprised that the Prime Minister of Canada should say, on his responsibility as a public man, that there is nothing irregular in that proceeding. I am surprised that he should allow that statement to go broadcast in this country of ours. He may say that he is not responsible for the irregularity; he may say that he did not know anything that occured concerning that resignation; but I am at a loss to understand how the leader of the Government and the chief citizen of this country can say that everything is regular with regard to that.

There is another point which I desire to bring to the attention of the House. My right hon. friend was quite indignant at the language of the leader of the Opposition with regard to the answers of my right hon. friend to questions put in this House by hon. members on this side. What my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition said was that there was a lack of candour. On March 2, I read in this House, in the presence of my right hon. friend, the words of the former member for St. Antoine as I have read them tonight. I stated then—I had the pamphlet in my hand, and it was at the disposal of my right hon. friend—that this statement had been made by Sir Herbert Ames before the Empire Parliamentary Association in the month of July last. On March 3, in reply to a question put to my right hon. friend as to whether he was aware of any public declaration having been made by the hon. member for St. Antoine, he said as reported at page 506 of the unrevised Hansard:

> I have seen no public declaration made by or on behalf of the hon. member for St. Antoine, nor have I received any communication that I can give to the House.

Surely my right hon. friend knew on March 3, that there had been a public declaration made by the hon. member for St. Antoine. I had read it on the preceding day, and my right hon. friend was here when I read the very words that I have read again to-day. Surely my right hon. friend will not deny that he was here facing me all the time when I spoke on the Address. Does he deny that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, the hon. member may have read it, and I may have been pretty busy. I did not hear him read it. If he thinks that is a matter of very great consequence, I think he is magnifying a trifle. If he read it, all right; but I did not hear about it until the leader of the Opposition spoke. But what in the world is the difference?

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I refresh my right hon. friend's memory? Does he remember that at the conclusion of my speech —the right hon. gentleman was then in his seat—Mr. Speaker rose and stated that in view of the statement I had read he felt it necessary to say that he had not received the resignation?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I remember that.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Now, Mr. Speaker could not possibly have said that if I had not repeated the statement of the hon. member for St. Antoine. Another queer circumstance in this matter is this: How is it that February 4 should be recognized as the binding date on that document? How is it that this document having been in the hands of somebody on the other side of the House was kept for three or four weeks after the alleged signature on February 14, and especially until after the division on the Address in this House?

Mr. FIELDING: It was St. Valentine's Day.

Mr. LAPOINTE: These are all circumstances which have not yet been explained. Even the reasoning of my right hon. friend the leader of the Government has not cleared away any of what he himself has called the mystery. Now, Sir, by-elections, apart from giving representation to the people of this country, as is their constitutional right, have this other advantage, that they demonstrate whether the Government of the day still possess the confidence of the people of the country. They are very important in that respect, and as I showed the other day, governments in other countries have resigned because of the trend of public opinion against them as demonstrated in by-elections. Perhaps I should not use that argument here, because it is the very reason why my hon. friends opposite do not want to hold any by-elections. At the present time there are vacancies in various parts of Canada. There is a vacancy in the West of Medicine Hat, there is one in York, Ontario, there are two in the province of Quebec, and there is one in the Maritime Provinces, not to speak of the vacancy in Leeds. In most of these constituencies, the Government, and even the Conservative party, have always won by big majorities; they are considered safe Tory constituencies. Why should the Government be afraid to take the plunge and give the electors of these ridings the chance to be represented in this Parliament? They have the right to be represented here. In the Speech from the Throne itself we are told that matters of supreme importance to the people of this country will be brought down to the House this session. It is announced that there will be a revision of the tariff. We are confronted with a railway situation which is most serious. Surely the people of Canada have the right to be heard in the solution of these problems. Take the case of the St. Antoine division in Montreal. Nobody will say that it is a Liberal constituency. I do not think it ever was represented by a Liberal member in this House. Now the electors of St. Antoine have strong views on certain questions which are now before the country. You may read letters in the Montreal Gazette every day discussing the railway situation in Canada at the present time, written by supporters of this Governemnt, electors of St. Antoine. When this matter is discussed in the House these electors of St. Antoine have the right to have their views expressed on the floor of this House. They have the right to demand that they should be represented when those questions are discussed. They have the right to demand representation when the tariff policy of this country is settled by this Parliament. The electors of these five or six constituencies that are not represented here to-day have the right to be heard on the Imperial problems which are going to be discussed at the Conference to which my right hon. friend desires to proceed in the month of June. All these questions will be discussed during the present session, and the electors of St. Antoine, West York, York-Sunbury, Yamaska and Medicine Hat have the right to have their representative in this House to speak for them when these matters come up.

There is the subject that was introduced this afternoon when the Minister of Marine (Mr. Ballantyne), made his statement to the House. That is another big question. It is a most important question, and the electors of St. Antoine have pronounced views on the policy of the Government in regard thereto. They have the right to have those views expressed on the floor of the House, and what reason in the world can there be to prevent the Government from holding the by-elections in these various ridings? Why can they not trust the people? An evasion of that responsibility implies that the Government do not trust the people of this country, and do not trust themselves. They are afraid that they have not the confidence of the people and consequently do not want an expression of this distrust at the polls. Let me say in conclusion that the more delay there is in this matter the worse will be the fate of the men who are responsible for that delay. The day will come when the people shall have the right and the opportunity to express their views and give their vote, and when that day comes we shall hear a different story from that told to-night.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): I wish in a very few words to tell the House how I am going to vote, and why, on this question. My first reason for voting as I shall vote is in a measure explained when I express the hope that whenever it is desired to impugn the policy of the Government, or to carry a vote of censure upon them, we shall not have too large a rehash of the very prolific amount of campaign oratory which we had last fall. There is one thing which I think my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), has by this time got thoroughly into the minds of the people of this country, and that is that he wants to have an election. There cannot be any doubt about that if one is to do what I do most fully and freely, that is, to give the utmost credit to him for sincerity in the various speeches which he has made upon that question. We had a resolution which was a vote of confidence or no confidence, and which I think the country looked for in connection with the speech from the Throne. It was proper that at the beginning of the session there should be a show-down in the circumstances which the country found itself in. In that resolution, to all intents and purposes, my hon. friend demanded an election. Well, the sense of Parliament was against his views at that time; and now he in effect says that if we cannot have a big election we will have several small ones. He is in favour of elections.

May I say to my hon. friend, in all sincerity, that an election is not a policy. It has no bearing one way or the other upon what my hon. friend and his supporters would do in regard to any one of the great problems before Canada if he came into power. It is the means of putting a policy into operation, if indeed a policy be the possession of those who might be put into power. Something has been said about evasion and I think my hon. friend himself used the word in another connection. But this reiterated demand for an election, to my mind, almost amounts to an evasion on his part of his undoubted duty to tell the country what he is going to do if he becomes Prime Minister. In the debate on the Address my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Hon. Mr. Meighen), and his Government put the policy of protection right in the centre of the stage. He did that following a pointed question which he had put to my hon. friend all over the country: What is the position of the leader of the Opposition on the principle of protection? Did my hon. friend answer that question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: He has never answered it, and I want to express the opinion—I do so in all humility, but it is my opinion, and so long as I am here I have the right to express my views—that at this moment from east to west the people of Canada are far more concerned to know what is the hon. gentleman's exact position in regard to that principle of protection than they are concerned about any resolution such as he has brought before the House. That is my honest opinion, and I should like him to see if there be anything in it, and clear it up, because otherwise he will inevitably come under the suspicion of a desire to get a blank cheque from the electorate without having avowed any policy upon this matter of protection. What the country would like is not an election cry raised again and again, but a policy that is to be carried out after an election. There is a long session in front of us, and I trust my hon. friend will lay to heart what I am saying in perfect good faith and friendliness.

That brings me to the second reason why I shall vote against the resolution of my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition. This very day an excellent opportunity was offered my hon. friend and his supporters to bring in a resolution which would have been a vote of censure, and could not have been mistaken for anything else, upon a question on which the whole debate rests. What happened in the House this afternoon? Two of the leading supporters of my hon. friend, in effect, charged that the very Estimates that are before the House, of the Minister of Marine, had been inflated to the tune of millions upon millions of dollars of the people's money since the armistice, in a way which was contrary to the public good, contrary to public policy, contrary to the best interests of the country. Now, I want to ask the members of this House and the people of this country; could there have been a straighter chance of taking a vote of the House upon a great principle of policy? My hon. friend talks of great problems. Is not that a problem? On the showing of my hon. friends from Maissoneuve (Mr. Lemieux) and Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie), is not that a problem of enormous size, bigger than the question of six vacant seats? But again, I say that my hon. friend runs away from that problem and brings in a resolution which, after all, has no earthly connection in logic with the Estimates of the Marine Department, and certainly has no earthly connection with the waste of millions of the people's money upon the building of ships which are worse than useless, according to the showing of the hon. gentleman's own friends.

I quoted a figure myself this afternoon. I am not going into the details of the shipping question as I should be out of order if I did. I merely quote the figure again to illustrate my point. I said it was freely stated in the newspapers of this country that up to the time of the armistice only sixteen and a half millions of dollars had been spent by the Government on a merchant marine. The figure now reaches to pretty nearly seventy millions. That is to say, according to the showing of my hon. friend's followers, fifty millions have gone wrong since the time that this policy should have been given up. Then why have we not a resolution of confidence or no confidence in the government on the very question which logically is before the House—that is the estimates of the Minister of Marine? These are two of the reasons why I shall vote against the amendement of my hon. friend. The third reason is this, that what my hon. friend has submitted, is in the first place, a proposal to reverse what has been the procedure of the Parliament of Canada from Confedration to this moment. What has been that procedure? The procedure has been that the laws of Canada, made in the wisdom of our forefathers, have left the discretion as to the calling of an election in the hands of the government of the day. That is the principle and there is no getting away from it, that has been the principle of the procedure of the government of Canada until the Act of a couple of years ago. The proposal of my hon. friend is that we reverse that procedure which, I repeat, has substantially existed from Confederation to the present moment.

But what is the second element in the proposal? The second element in the proposal is that it asks us to reverse the law of the land by a resolution in Parliament on this particular question. My hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) has said very truly that they have a definite law in Britain on this question of by-elections, and he has told the House what that law is. The law has entirely removed the discretion from the government of the day in Britain and put it in the hands of the Speaker. Every by-election there takes place automatically within a certain time, but we do not have an hon. gentleman—whether he be leader of the Opposition or whatever position he occupies in the British House—rising in his place, after an hour or an hour and a half's notice to other members of the House, and proposing that the law of Britain shall be overridden, the law which settles the method of calling by-elections. Well, I respectfully submit to my hon. friend from Quebec East and to my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, that we have a law here and that as law-abiding subjects of the British Empire we are as much concerned in obedience to the law in Canada—whatever that law may be—as they are in Britain to the law over there; and my hon. friend's argument from the case of Britain, so far from helping him, is absolutely opposed to his point of view. Their law is different from ours— made by their Parliament, as our law was made by our Parliament. They carry out their by-elections according to law. To be logical, —and not only to be logical but to be constitutional, and to show the proper regard which Parliament always should show for the laws of the land—we surely ought to live according to this law. And when was it carried? The law under which by-elections of the Canadian Parliament are now carried out was adopted two sessions ago by this very Parliament, constituted of the very personnel that constitutes it now, and it was adopted on the initiative of an hon. gentleman who sits behind, and is a supporter of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. EDWARDS: And carried unanimously.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Yes, carried unanimously; both sides agreed to it. But the strong point is that it was carried on the initiative of an hon. member for one of the divisions of Montreal who, I think, has earned the gratitude of the whole country by trying, at any rate, to limit the time during which the discretion of a government shall be allowed to operate in this particular direction. Now, Mr. Speaker, constituted as I am—with the desire to be logical, and with the desire to obey the dictates of the constitution and the law of the land—for the life of me I cannot understand how hon. gentlemen get over the argument that I have just presented to them. If the law is wrong—and that would be a frightful admission for my hon. friend from Montreal because he applied his acute legal brain to the drawing of it—if he says that he made a mistake in drawing that Act and the whole Parliament of Canada made a mistake in passing it—what is our logical duty? What is the logical duty of any Parliament to-day with a bad law? It is not to bring in a resolution to override that law; it is to alter it. That is the manifest duty of the citizens and legislators of Canada. It is true if the law happens to be a tariff one it is bad; it is true that it is our duty to express our opinions upon tariff laws and every other law here; but for the purposes of an Act like this surely our manifest duty, if the law is wrong, is to alter it. For my part I will simply close by saying that I cannot conceive of any greater indignity being placed on this Parliament—and I use the words with deliberation and forethought—I cannot conceive of any greater indignity being placed on this Parliament than to ask it—by means of a resolution dictated largely, I fear, by sheer party expediency—to override by its own act a solemn law which it placed on the statute book only two years ago.

Mr. JOHN WESLEY EDWARDS (Frontenac): I would like to make one or two observations in regard to this matter, and I do not think it will be necessary in noting the salient points to occupy as much time as did the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) in his ponderous effort of a short time ago. The hon. member waxed very indignant over the fact that there were certain constituencies in Canada which are not at present represented in this House. He declared, as every person will admit, that it is the right of every constituency in Canada to be represented in Parliament; and he went on to talk about the people who had fought and the blood that had been shed, to gain the people the great boon of being represented in Parliament. The hon. gentleman, however, conveniently passed over a situation which exists in regard to a certain constituency in Canada which it seems to me should have occurred to him, to say nothing of his associates. I agree with the hon. gentleman that it is the right of every Canadian constituency to be represented in this Parliament, but let me ask this question: what about the two constituencies represented at the present time by the hon. member who sits immediately to the right of the official leader of the Opposition? Why is it that that hon. gentleman has not resigned one of those seats and given its constituents an opportunity to elect a representative to this House? The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) complains that certain constituencies have been deprived of representation for a period of two or three months, but it does not seem to affect him in the slightest degree that one at least of the two constituencies I have referred to has been deprived of direct representation for a period of four years. Why does not the leader of the Opposition prevail upon the hon. gentleman who sits to his right to vacate one of those seats and give opportunity for an election either in the constituency of Gaspé or in the constituency of Maisonneuve? I think the reason was suggested by the hon. member for Red Deer. The hon. leader of the official Opposition has taken part in certain by-elections, it is true, and he has figured in one part of the country in one way and in another part of the country in another way. I believe if the truth were known and we got at his real reasons for not bringing on an election in either of those constituencies it would be that he is afraid to test the opinion of the electorate there.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, Oh.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Let us have a good laugh.

Mr. EDWARDS: It is the privilege of hon. gentlemen opposite, Mr. Speaker, and especially of my hon. friend from Chambly and Verchères, to laugh. He is so beautiful at all times that he cannot add to his beauty even when he cracks his face in a laugh. But when the hon. leader of the Opposition taunts the Government with being afraid to bring on elections in certain constituencies, it is obvious that if he has a right to draw that conclusion, I certainly have a corresponding right to draw my conclusion as to why de does not prevail upon the hon. gentleman who sits to his right to vacate one of his two seats and test the opinion of its constituents. I have stated my opinion that he is afraid to test the feeling in one of those constituencies which is largely interested in manufacturing; and in the other, which, I believe, is largely rural, he is also afraid to test its opinion, just as he has shown himself afraid to test the opinion of his followers in this House by a straight tariff resolution, as evidenced by his naked amendment on the Address.

But, Mr. Speaker, let us consider for a moment as to why it would be unreasonable to expect any person in this chamber, excepting the hon. leader of the official Opposition himself, to vote for the resolution which he has moved. I think I am right in saying that he was not a member of the House in the session of 1919 when the Bill was passed fixing the time when elections must be held at six months. If he was not then present, we cannot hold him responsible for that piece of legislation. But the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's was a member at that time, and in seconding this resolution he is casting a reflection upon the wisdom of the vote which he gave when that Act was passed. Is it reasonable to ask me or any other member to vote for a resolution worded as this resolution is when two sessions ago a law was unanimously enacted placing the discretionary power in the hands of the Government at six months in regard to the holding of by-elections. If that law is wrong, and six months is too long a time to allow, the law should be amended; but so long as that statute remains in force, then the discretion of the Government is within that six months, just as its discretion was unlimited before that legislation was passed.

I contend that no hon. member who voted for that law two sessions ago can logically or reasonably vote for the amendment which has been moved by the hon. the leader of the Opposition this afternoon.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, this resolution states that the House is of opinion that representation in Parliament being a fundamental right of the people, writs should be issued, and so on. There can be no doubt whatever that that fundamental right should be given to the people as far as it is reasonably possible, and if we are to look upon this resolution as merely a pious declaration of opinion, there can be no question of what we ought to do in regard to the first part of it. But the question may arise as to what we should do in view of the fact that we believe that all persons should be represented in this House, and that some are not so represented. As has been pointed out by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), we passed a law a short time ago providing for cases of this kind, and I think it was well that we did so. There may be some ground of complaint as to that legislation, and if it were proposed to amend it by limiting still further the power of the Government in regard to the time within which to hold by-elections, I think it would be disposed, as I feel at present, to support a motion of that kind. That, however, is not what we are asked to do here. As has been stated by the last two speakers, we are asked practically to ignore that law, and to act now in a way different from what we decided should be done when we passed that legislation. I do not think that is the proper way to go about it. In doing the right thing we should do it in the right way.

Something has been said about the resignation of a former member of this House, Sir Herbert Ames, and although I was not present during all the discussion, it seems to me, in the absence of some better explanations that I have heard, that there is an element of suspicion about that matter, and it should be cleared up.

Our law provides that a writ must be issued for a by-election within six months of the issuing of your warrant, Mr. Speaker. But so far as I can read the Election Act, there is no time fixed within which the polling must take place, and it seems to me that perhaps the law is rather weak in that particular. I think we depended on the government of the day to deal fairly in that respect. Whether this Government have dealt fairly or not in regard to it, I have been advised, whether rightly or wrongly, that the writ was issued for the East Elgin election some three months before the election was held. If the Government hold off by-elections through the power which they have of fixing the date on which the polling is to take place, then we might as well not have any date fixed for by-elections at all. I think we should deal with this weakness in our present legislation in the way I have suggested, that is, by amending that legislation rather than by bringing in resolutions to overcome the defect. From the reports I have received in regard to the East Elgin by-election, there appears to be an element of suspicion surrounding it, and I think we ought to have some explanation. But the mere fact that there is some suspicion in connection with certain things the Government has done does not in my opinion, justify our passing a resolution by which, in effect, we are asked to ignore the law of the land and to condemn the Government for not doing things which the law of the land does not require them to do. For that reason I shall feel myself justified in voting against this resolution. Not only do I feel justified, but I feel it my duty to do so and I have made these remarks in order to explain my position.

I am fully in accord with the sentiment expressed in the beginning of the resolution, that every part of the country should be represented in this House, and if the law is such now that the Government can prevent any part of the country having proper representation we should amend the law accordingly. But I do not see how we would gain very much even if the resolution were accepted by the Government and they took the necessary steps to at once issue writs for elections to fill the existing vacancies, for I hope this session will not last so many months that we shall be kept here long enough for the successful candidates of those by-elections to take their seats. At any rate I do not think any good purpose is served by introducing new members during the last few days of the session when we are rushing business through and trying to get home.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): Mr Speaker, the question has been so fully discussed that I can hardly hope to add anything material at this late stage; yet there are two or three thoughts to which I should like to be permitted briefly to call attention.

In the discussion that occurred a few days ago I ventured, presuming, perhaps upon my long experience in this House, to say to my right hon. friend the leader of the Government (Mr. Meighen), that I thought he would have been wise if instead of cracking the party whip and treating the amendment then offered as a non-confidence motion he had accepted it, because it simply asserted one of the vital principles of parliamentary government. From what has occurred since, from the discussion in the press and from reports that have reached me as to the views of hon. gentlemen in this House, privately expressed in general conversation, I am going to hazard the opinion that my right hon. friend rather regrets to-day that he did not adopt that view. I may be mistaken, but he probably thinks it would have been wiser had he accepted the motion. Well, at the risk of repeating myself I am going to express regret again that my right hon. friend does not see the wisdom of accepting the motion that is now before the House, because it is simply the assertion of one of the very first principles of our parliamentary government. When my right hon. friend says that this amendment also must be treated as a non-confidence motion, I again protest that he is not representing the matter fairly. I am speaking from memory, but I am quite sure I am safe in saying that there are precedents and good precedents under all governments in Canada for the acceptance by the Government of an amendment to supply when it contains within itself nothing obnoxious when it asserts something that is admittedly sound and right, which ought not to be voted down simply because it is an amendment to supply. I have not looked at authorities, but my recollection will, I think, justify my saying that. If it should turn out upon later inquiry that I am mistaken, I shall be the first to make correction, but I am pretty certain that I am right. It is not a conclusive argument, therefore, to say that this motion must be voted down because it is an amendment to suply; if it asserts something which is true and right and reasonable, then the House should accept it. I am afraid my right hon. friend is putting a strain upon the loyalty of his friends when he asks them to vote down propositions so simple, so vital to the administration of public affairs in accordance with the institutions of British parliamentary government.

Now, a word or two with regard to the question of notice. I would like to remind the House that under the rules of comparatively recent years, under a rule which, if it be not offensive, I might call a parliamentary strangulation, and for which my right hon. friend the Prime Minister is probably more responsible than anybody else, under the restrictions that are now placed upon discussion in this House, this is the only day in this week when we can challenge the action of the Government by a motion of this kind. There are three days for Government business this week, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday. On Thursday and Friday the Speaker leaves the Chair without any disucssion and we would have no opportunity on those days to submit such a motion. Therefore, unless we brought forward our motion this day, Tuesday, we could not bring it forward for another week, and that, I think, is sufficient reason. But let me say to my right hon. friend that beyond that there is a reason. We have been having a few holidays; members are scattered throughout the different provinces; many of them have not yet returned. If we were to avail ourselves of this opportunity of bringing the motion before the House, then we had to have a hurried consultation this day after some of the members had returned. In these circumstances—circumstances from which my right hon. friend cannot entirely absolve himself, because he had a large part in making the rules—we were precluded from dealing with the matter unless we brought it forward as we did to-day on the motion to go into supply. My right hon. friend will see, therefore, that we were justified in proceeding as we did. I know that the intention of the leader of the Opposition was to give my right hon. friend all the notice that was possible. I quite agree that it is desirable that in these matters reasonable notice should be given. I would like to feel that he has all reasonable opportunity of meeting anything that we bring forward.

The right hon. gentleman had much to say about the practice of old times. If my hon. friend made a study of Hansard for the purpose of these references I am sure he must have found quite a number of occasions upon which he and his friends took a view very different from that which they take to-day. I have no doubt he will find on examining the old records that on many an occasion he and the former leader of the Government, the member for King's, N.S. (Sir Robert Borden) and others when they were in opposition were very vehement in demanding that there should be no delay in the issuance of the writs. However, I do not attach much importance to that. If the cases stated by my right hon. friend were as strong as he presents them—and I assume for the moment that he has presented them truthfully—if there was such delay in the holding of the by-elections as he describes, then I say I do not care under what government it was done, it was wrong and it is time we corrected it. But suppose I admit for the sake of argument that the hon. gentleman's contention is correct. Suppose he makes a point against my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition; suppose he makes a point against me as a member of the ministry of former years, what answer is that to the people of Canada? Is it any answer to them to say that I did wrong many years ago, if wrong it was? Surely two wrongs, as the old adage goes, do not make a right, and instead of going back to what hon. gentlemen claim to be the errors of former days it would be far better for them to stand behind their own record of these days and demand that these faults, if they were faults, should no longer continue. What answer is it to the elector down in St. Antoine to be told: Oh well, we had this up in the House some years ago; Mr. King and Mr. Fielding discussed it on that occasion, and their attitude then was inconsistent with the attitude they take now. But, says the elector in St. Antoine, what have I do with the leader of the Opposition and the member for Shelburne and Queen's? I have my rights as an elector of Canada; I have a right to be represented. What answer is it to the electors of Yamaska? What answer to the electors of York-Sunbury? What answer to the electors in any part of Canada? When these electors say: I have the right to be represented in Parliament, the right hon. gentleman replies: Some years ago Mr. Fielding and Mr. King had different views, and we are going to stand on that. It is a poor argument; the world is moving to-day.

> New occasions teach new duties,
> Time makes ancient good uncouth;
> He must upward still and onward
> Who would keep abreast with truth.

Instead of relying on the practice of the olden days, how much better it would be to move forward with the times and stand for the right of the people to be represented in Parliament. That is the rule that my right hon. friend should follow; that is the procedure he should adopt, rather than talk of what we did many years ago. It is a fact that hundreds and thousands of the young men of this country who are prepared, whenever they have an opportunity, to vote, had no opportunity of so voting when these things occurred. I am not indifferent to the records of the past; we may learn much from them; but the world is moving, and if the principles set forth in this amendment are sound and reasonable, we should be prepared to accept them. They are sound and reasonable. What reasons can be given for not accepting them? None has been given to-day.

Yes, my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) said: We have the six months' rule. The nature of that rule has not been fairly stated; it has been quoted here in a manner which would imply that the intention was that an election need not be held for six months. It is preposterous to say that that was the intention of the Act. It was not the intention of the Act. When you give the Government power to issue a writ within six months, it is absurd to say that they are entitled to take the full benefit of that law, because that would shut out a number of constituencies from representation for a whole session of Parliament. Put aside the question A, B and C; put aside the question of consistency or inconsistency; put it as a simple question of representation. What right have the people of Shelburne and Queen's to representation and the people of St. Antoine to be denied representation? What right have any of the members of this House to represent their constituencies here and at the same time to tell the people of Yamaska and York-Sunbury that they have not a right to be represented? The point is that we ought to be ready to give these people early and prompt elections. I cannot see that my hon. friends opposite have given us a single argument other than the old story of what we did many years ago. I have not investigated that, but I have no doubt that in many of those cases, perhaps in all of them, good reasons could be shown. I am, however, going to assume, for the sake of argument, that we were wrong, and I say, unhesitatingly, that if the cases were as described by my right hon. friend, if we deprived any constituency of an election for years—I do not know who did so—that was wrong, and instead of defending the wrong, it is high time we came to a better understanding in regard to the situation. That is the whole question.

No reason in law or argument can be advanced against the motion of my hon. friend, and it ought not to be treated as a vote of want of confidence. Hon. members of this House who read that motion calmly, when they leave this House to-night and go home and have their constituents read it, will see that no good reasons have been given why the motion should not prevail. It is in the interest of prompt elections; it is in the interest of every section which has the right of parliamentary representation. There is no reason for this hocus-pocus on the part of the Government. Why should there be this monkey business over the resignation of the hon. member for St. Antoine? Why should the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro), for whom I have the highest esteem, be led astray by this hocus-pocus business and get into trouble by being induced to sign documents which, on their face, as an hon. gentleman said, are somewhat suspicious? As regards my much respected friend, the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Whidden), I have more than a kindly interest in his welfare; he is a son of an old political opponent, but an old friend, with whom I crossed swords many a time years ago in the legislature of Nova Scotia. I am sorry to find that estimable gentleman has been dragged into this miserable business by which suspicion, which the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Thomson) has spoken about, surrounds that resignation. All that shows the simple reason for accepting the motion of my hon. friend. Why not give the people of these respective constituencies an opportunity to have an election?

I forgot one reason my right hon. friend advanced. He said: "If you did have these by-elections, what would happen? We would have to go off to the constituencies and defend our cause; those gentlemen would not go, they would not grant pairs, and therefore, we would be at a disadvantage." My right hon. friend has paid us the compliment that if there were by-elections, he and his friends would have to go and fight them, while we could stay at home and win.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think it is quite as bad as that. I did not say that at all. I did not say that hon. gentlemen opposite would not go; much less did I suggest that they could win, because they have won scarcely anything that I remember. I said that they could go; but that as the rules put it in their power to challenge the Government by a motion that was not debatable, they could bring on a motion at a time that suited them, but we could not do the same thing. I pointed out their advantage under the rules.

Mr. FIELDING: The right hon gentleman's comment was in regard to pairs. He said that we would not grant pairs.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly.

Mr. FIELDING: If we did not pair, we would be in Parliament.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. FIELDING: Therefore, my right hon. friend clearly implied that if there were by-elections, he and his friends would be obliged to go away and fight them; that we would not do so. We would have an advantage. I am going to make a suggestion to my right hon. friend, if that was a material point in his argument, and it was about as strong as any argument he used. If he is afraid of that, let him bring on the by-elections, and we will give him all the pairs he wants. I think the facts and the principles involved are so plain to every thinking man that I am amazed that any extensive argument should be deemed necessary. The whole question is this: Have the people of every part of Canada a right to be represented in Parliament? If they have, why not give it to them? No shadow of reason has been advanced why the constituencies of St. Antoine and Yamaska should not be given the privilege of representation at the earliest possible moment.

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure whether there is adequate reason for me to intervene in this debate; but we have sat so long listening to arguments in support of a motion for which there was manifestly no adequate reason, that I am overcome by the evil example and led to add reasons where reasons are not required. We have been accustomed in this House to the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) making "much ado about nothing;" we have not as yet become accustomed to that line of action on the part of the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), nor, may I add, on the part of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding); but this evening they seem to have been overcome with the conviction that their leader had not had his usual success in making "much ado about nothing," or at all events, that he had not made as "much ado about nothing" as this particular "nothing" in their eyes required, and, therefore, they felt obliged to come to the rescue. The hon. gentleman who spoke last, (Mr. Fielding), to take him first in order, felt impelled to support this motion by representing it to be absolutely the most harmless thing in the world. Why, it did not mean anything at all; it was just the affirmation of a principle which nobody doubted and nobody disputed, and why on earth should we not affirm it? Why should it be suggested that this motion was a motion of want of confidence? The hon. gentleman's proposition amounts to this, that every time the Government comes to this House asking for Supply, this House may properly be stopped in order that we may affirm, for instance, that the sun stands in the firmament, and we must not go into Supply; we must strike out all the words after "that," and substitute the indisputable declaration that the sun is in the firmament, and then hon. gentlemen will rise in indignation and will say: Why do you call this a vote of want of confidence? Why do you ask this House to refuse to affirm what is self-evident to all the world, namely, that the sun is in the firmament? Oh, ye unreasonable men!

Does the hon. gentleman ignore the fact that there are two portions to the motion? Before you come to affirm these perfectly innocent, harmless propositions, you ask this House to say to the Government's motion to go into Supply: No, you won't get your Supply. Why? Because it is essential that we should affirm so and so. Can there be any suggestion of utility in a performance of that kind if it is not implied that the conduct of the Government is in some way violating this principle which the House is called upon to affirm? And yet hon. gentlemen are amazed because we treat this as a want of confidence motion. I have no doubt of the sincerity of the last gentleman who spoke (Mr. Fielding), but I am puzzled to see how, in view of his sincerity, he conciliates his affirmation, on the one hand, that this motion is no motion of want of confidence, with the declaration in his next breath that if they had not made this motion to-day they would have had no opportunity this week to affirm this principle. Why, Mr. Speaker, if they wanted merely to affirm a principle, the Order Paper is open to them as it is to every hon. member of this House. They might have put this resolution on the Order Paper for to-morrow or the next day, and might have debated it to their hearts' content, but that would not have served their purpose; that would not have served the purpose of the people who are amazed that we think this is a motion of want of confidence. Why would it not have served their purpose? Because it would not have carried with it the censure that the refusal of this House on the Government's motion to go into Supply implies and carries with it, and because it would not have had in it the sting that if it were carried tonight they would point out tomorrow to be in it—the sting of the imputation that this Government has not lived up, in the letter and in the spirit, to what is the real principle with regard to representation in this House. So much for the pretension of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's that we are not face to face with a vote of want of confidence. So much for the pretension that all that is wanted is a declaration of this abstract principle of the right of everybody to representation. Now let us see the other nothings about which we have had so much ado to-day.

Mr. BUREAU: You are getting quite Shakespearian.

Mr. DOHERTY: A little Shakespeare might not do hon. gentleman on the other side any harm at all.

Mr. BUREAU: A little Molière and Corneille would do a lot of good to the Government side.

Mr. DOHERTY: It might, and therefore we have recourse to them. I steer clear of the Scriptures, however, since my experience the other day. I would not for all the world resurrect once more the two scriptural familiars of my hon. friend from Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie),—his friends Pontius Pilate and Judas Iscariot. My hon. friend from Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) will have to pardon me if I should bring back to his memory by the allusion I have made to the title of a play, the memory of Shakespeare, which I hope he keeps alive in his heart, and by whose teaching I hope he will endeavour to profit.

To pass to some of the other nothings with regard to which we have had much ado, in the first place we have had a fierce denunciation of the tu quoque argument, and hon. gentlemen have seemed to take it that because the right hon. leader of this House ventured to refer to some past actions of their own he had no argument to make except that "we are bad, and you are worse." Now there is a purpose for which it is sometimes salutary to look back into the history of the past, even though it may not afford an argument to justify or condemn the particular action of to-day. If it were not for my dread of getting on scriptural ground and my respect for the preserves of the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria, I might remind hon. gentlemen opposite that it is written in a certain book that it is well for those who live in glass houses not to cast stones.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is not in the Bible.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman says it is not in the Bible. We will not insist on its particular biblical situation, although I think I could satisfy my hon. friend on that point. However that may be, perhaps it does not do hon. gentlemen any harm, when they wax warm in the heat of their indignation, to recall to them that perhaps a little of their heat is due to the fact that people living in glass houses are apt to find themselves in hothouses, and are therefore apt to get a little overheated about the shortcomings of other people; and perhaps a little dose of past history may do no harm in the way of calming them, even if their glass construction should escape destruction.

Of course, we all admit that two wrongs do not make a right. Of course they do not, but where is the wrong that has yet been established? Where is the wrong of to-day? Why, in most of these cases, it is a matter of a few weeks. Hon. gentlemen may say what they like but, as one of them did say, the legislation of 1919 fixed a reasonable delay. Parliament sat here and considered what was a reasonable delay, and Parliament fixed that reasonable delay at six months. Now I do not suggest that that means the Government must not hold an election until the end of six months; but it is the solemn judgment of Parliament that within a period of six months it is proper that the Government of the day should exercise its discretion as to when an election ought to be held. And what are we here asked to vote?—to pass an order by this House to issue the writ in all these cases tomorrow. Well, now, Mr. Speaker, the representation of the people of the country in this House is important, and the choice of their representative is important, and because those two things are important, it is important that elections should be conducted in such a manner as to give every opportunity to the electorate to exercise calmly their judgment and pronounce, after fair discussion and calm consideration, upon the issues that are submitted to them.

That takes time, and it depends largely upon local conditions as to whether one particular moment or another is the time when you may get the proper judgment of the rural people. Take this very proposal that is urged upon us to-night. If we issued these writs to-morrow we should be holding elections in certain rural constituencies—in Medicine Hat and Yamaska—in view of the delays that must necessarily intervene, just at the time when these rural populations will be actually taking up the important work of their seeding and when they will be very loath and averse to being called away from it to engage in the determination of important political questions that are to be dealt with and to follow up that by an election. I just point that out to show the wisdom of Parliament when it confided to the government of the country a reasonable period of time within which to select the proper moment when the people will have the best opportunity of providing themselves with the representation to which they are entitled. If the importance of that is realized, I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the common sense of the House, that a month more or less in the time that elapses, within the six months to which we are limited, is a matter of very little consequence indeed, and I am quite justified in describing all this fuss as "much ado about nothing."

As to the motives imputed to the Government in this connection, it is hardly necessary, I think, that I should point out that this is the first government in the Dominion of Canada that has submitted itself to a Parliamentary rule restricting the time to which it might suspend elections; and to impute gratuitously to a government whose action made that rule possible, any desire to abuse the discretion, so limited at its own instance, in order to defeat the rights of the electors, is a proposition which, I must say, with all respect to the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution, and the hon. gentleman who seconded it, they will, on reflection, realize was more than ungenerous—was absolutely unfair.

Now, I do not want to take up time with the smallest of the nothings about which there has been so much ado. But there is the matter of the resignation of my very good friend Sir Herbert Ames. I am sure Sir Herbert will be cut to the quick when he reads the report of the address of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), and finds that he has been charged with being a party to a hocus-pocus in regard to his resignation.

Mr. FIELDING: Oh, no; I did not make any charge against him.

Mr. DOHERTY: Oh! Then the hon. gentleman made no charge against the only person in the world who had control of that resignation! Who was it that approached the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middleboro), and the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Whidden), and asked them to sign this document? Sir Herbert Ames, the gentleman who, my hon. friend would not for one moment suggest, would have anything to do with hocus-pocus. But what was the hocus-pocus that took place? It was the witnessing of the signature of Sir Herbert Ames, at the instance of Sir Herbert himself, by the hon. member for North Grey and the hon. member for Brandon; and my hon. friend almost weeps over the unfortunate condition in which those two gentlemen find themselves in having been mixed up in this disgraceful proceeding. But Sir Herbert Ames, at whose instance they signed the document as witnesses, stands immaculate, unconnected with the hocus-pocus. For him the hon. gentleman has no word of condemnation; and in that let me say that I join most heartily with him; I have no word of condemnation for Sir Herbert. But I cannot follow the hon. member in his commiseration, if not condemnation, of the two other gentlemen who did what Sir Herbert asked them to do. I cannot agree with my hon. friend in his views in regard to this awful offence, and the falsehood imputed to those who signed the document as witnesses because the date was not on it; nor can I admire the learning and the legal lore to which we have been treated this evening upon this question of the necessity of witnesses certifying to the dates of documents. Hon. genltemen are positive about it. Why, it is so clear to them that there are not in the English language words lucid enough to do justice to its clarity. For common mortals who read the statute, however, I submit that what they find there is that there must be but the signing and sealing before a witness. There is not a word in the statute to require the date in the document, and hon. gentlemen read into a prescription that does not require such a provision at all, a witnessing to the date of a document. I will not undertake to speak for other provinces, but some of the lawyers who spoke are distinguished members of the legal profession in my own province, and I think that they would be satisfied with the sufficiency of a witness to a signature who does not witness to the date at all, if they turned up the civil code of the province of Quebec, wherein they would find, in regard to probably the most solemn document to which only two witnesses are required—that is, one of the forms of will in that province derived from the laws of England—that it is in so many words declared to be sufficient that the individual should exhibit his signature,—not write it in anyone's presence but exhibit a signature written previously, possibly on some date the witnesses knew nothing of—and then they sign to attest the signature. What is important about this document is the signature of Sir Herbert

Ames, and that is what the witnesses attested.

Now, we have all this talk and this reading of the speech in the Empire Parliamentary Association's Report, in which it is stated that Sir Herbert said that his resignation was in the hands of the Speaker; and hon. gentlemen are exercised as to whether people do or do not believe that statement, while all the time they run away from the perfectly manifest fact that, unless the veracity of the speaker be put in question, the very most that can be said is that Sir Herbert made a mistake in speaking. Now, I do not know in whose hands he left the resignation. I do not know what reason he had at that time for being under the impression that it had already reached the hands of the Speaker. I do not know whether he did or did not change his mind, or whether he had been under the impression that he had taken steps to send it to the Speaker or not. I simply do not know anything of this; I have no explanation to offer, and I have no responsibility so far as all this is concerned; nor has the Government any responsibility or obligation, or explanation, for it. Sir Herbert is an honourable gentleman; hon. members profess their confidence in him. He has the key to all this, and if they are curious about the relations between Sir Herbert and his trusted friends, I can only suggest that they apply to him, in whose honour I have the same confidence as they have, and I have no doubt they will get ample satisfaction for their curiosity. But, after all, what is it but empty curiosity? If they will read their statute they will find that a resignation is an effective document only from the moment it reaches the Speaker's hands. Just as a promissory note, so long as the maker keeps it in his own hands or in the hands of his own agent, binds him to nobody and to nothing, so that resignation has no binding legal effect until it has passed into the hands of the Speaker. And if whoever was the custodian of it, had chosen to tear the document to pieces before it reached there, he would have been responsible to Sir Herbert Ames and to Sir Herbert Ames alone. Until that document reached the Speaker, Sir Herbert Ames was as fully a member of this House as any of us who sit here to-night.

I am not going, except for the purpose of correcting one or two statements, to refer to the past. I deem it to be only proper, however, that the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) should be corrected in his statement that never up to the time referred to had there been a period when the session went by without a constituency being represented in Parliament. Let me just mention one case that my eye falls on, and it is a startling one—the case of West Durham where, in the general elections of 1900, by reason of some irregularity, no return was made of the election that took place in that year, and no by-election to fill the vacancy occurred until January 15, 1902—that is to say from November, 1900, till January, 1902—and most assuredly it will not be suggested that there was not a session during that period.

Mr. BUREAU: Was there a proceeding before the courts in reference to that election in the meanwhile?

Mr. DOHERTY: There had been no election; the returning officer did not return any candidate as elected. There was nothing before the courts because no return had been made.

Mr. BUREAU: Then there was no proceeding of any kind before the courts?

Mr. DOHERTY: I cannot see on what such a proceeding could have been based.

Mr. FIELDING: What was the evidence of a vacancy?

Mr. DOHERTY: The best evidence of a vacancy was that in the general election a writ was issued for an election in West Durham as well as everywhere else, but the return day went by and no return came.

Mr. FIELDING: That might not be technical evidence of a vacancy; there might be reasons for that.

Mr. DOHERTY: There was no evidence of any body being the member. The vacancy occurred when a general election was called, and the vacancy continued to exist until somebody was returned to represent that constituency. Ordinarily somebody does get returned for a constituency and the vacancy in that riding results from his disappearance. Here the vacancy was not the result of the non-appearance of anybody; the vacancy had existed since the House had been dissolved and continued to exist. There is also the case to which my hon. friend from Frontenac referred. We have had, sitting in this House ever since the general elections of 1917, an hon. gentleman who occupies two seats and thereby excludes one of these ridings from representation.

Mr. FIELDING: They both have representatives; they both have the man of their choice.

Mr. DOHERTY: I would say that one has a representative or else neither has. My hon. friend from Maisonneuve and likewise from Gaspe—the gentleman who comes from opposite directions at the same time—is a man of fairly goodly proportions, but I fancy that if you divided him between the two counties neither of them would have a complete member.

Mr. JACOBS: He would be dismembered.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, as the hon. gentleman suggests, in the operation the member becomes dismembered, and the constituency is deprived of a member.

Mr. JACOBS: Is the right hon. gentleman aware that one of these seats has been contested and that it is impossible for the hon. member in question to resign while the case is before the courts?

Mr. DOHERTY: I have heard it so stated. I am not of an overwhelmingly suspicious turn of mind, but when I am told that an hon. member has been for a period of four years the object of a fierce onslaught on the part of a determined opponent insisting on driving him from his seat and leaving him with a broken heart because that inconsiderate action deprives him of resigning one seat or the other, may I confess that notwithstanding the high respect I entertain for my hon. friend the dual member for Gaspé and Maisonneuve I cannot keep out of my mind a certain suspicion—I wonder what the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) thinks about it—a certain suspicion that if the contestation was not more likely to keep the hon. gentleman in two seats than to drive him from one, it might probably disappear. While we are on the question may I say that the thought has very frequently occurred to me—how did that contestation come about? There was a great reproach made to the legislation with respect to elections which preceded the last general election, the reproach being that as the law operates the thirty or forty days within which it was essential to file a petition in contestation of an election, actually expired before we got the return. Consequently it was said—and apparently was recognized in every constituency in Canada except the one of the two in which the petition now referred to was filed—that there was no opportunity to file a petition.

Mr. POWER: May I suggest to the right hon. gentleman that if there is any abuse in the administration of justice in the province of Quebec, or elsewhere, it is the duty of the Minister of Justice to see that it is corrected.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have not suggested that there is any abuse.

Mr. POWER: Or suspicion of any?

Mr. DOHERTY: May I gently intimate to the hon. member for Quebec South that if the Minister of Justice should take upon himself to attempt to direct or control the administration of justice in the province of Quebec he would be very promptly and very politely asked by the Attorney General of that province to mind his own business. The hon. gentleman shares a misapprehension that is very common in this country, a misapprehension that the Minister of Justice has some control or direction of the administration of justice, a matter which our constitution confides, and confides exclusively, to the provinces. That being the case, I can only recommend the hon. gentleman to carry his suggestion to his very good friend the Attorney General for the province of Quebec, who, no doubt, will give it every attention.

Mr. POWER: And then have it referred back to the Minister of Justice in order that he should amend the law about which he complains.

Mr. DOHERTY: But you have not complained about the law. I am sorry the hon. member for Maisonneuve and for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) is not here this evening. I would suggest to him in the most friendly way that it would be wise on his part to let the world know who the petitioner is in that contestation, and in what court that petition is lodged, so that it may be open to inspection by the general public, who may be less confiding than I am, to satisfy themselves of its actual existence.

Mr. JACOBS: Why not appoint a royal commission?

Mr. DOHERTY: Hon. gentlemen who are so resourceful might perhaps themselves find out for the benefit of the general public. However, it cannot leave one unmoved to observe the absolutely unperturbed condition of the hon. leader of the Opposition and the hon. gentleman who seconds this motion in face of the deprivation of the people of one or other of those constituencies of Gaspé and Maisonneuve of representation in this House; and the contrast is somewhat remarkable.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with apologies for having myself contributed anything to this "much ado about nothing," I think I may safely resume my seat, feeling that I have no anxiety that I have not said all that could be usefully said, my only regret being that I should have wasted so much time over matter calling after all for so very little serious consideration.

Mr. F. F. PARDEE (West Lambton): Mr. Speaker, the closing sentences of the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) were, it seems to me, hardly consistent. He apologised to the House for taking up so much time on a matter that he thinks of so little importance; but if he thinks it of so little importance why did he waste the time of the House? It did appear to me in listening to his opening and closing remarks that the government benches having debated this matter in solemn form during the afternoon and the first part of the evening, apparently decided to put up a joker at the end in the hope of overwhelming the resolution with ridicule. That would appear to be the only conclusion to be drawn from the speech delivered by the Minister of Justice.

But, taking up the last part of his address first, he referred to the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) and made some jocular remarks to the effect that if the hon. gentleman could be divided into two he might represent both Gaspé and Maisonneuve. Let me say to the minister in all seriousness that the fact remains that my hon. friend was elected by both of those constituencies. He stood for the verdict of the people, and that verdict said that he was their choice to represent them in this House. Now let the Government go and do the same thing in these constituencies which have been without representation for many months. That is what we are complaining about, and it is what the Government shrink from doing. The Minister of Justice says, to quote his own words, "It appears to me there is very much ado about nothing. Why should this House stop and debate the question, if it so seems fit to hon. members of the Opposition, whether or not the sun stands in the firmament? "Now, Sir, as to there being much ado about nothing, let me bring this phase of the matter to the attention of the House. Does the Prime Minister or does the Minister of Justice think that to complain, as we do, of the disenfranchisement of 200,000 people for several months is much ado about nothing? If there is one thing we ought to have in Canada it is responsibility of government, and responsibility of government rests with the people. If the government of the day has decided that the people shall not be trusted—and apparently they have so decided—well and good, let the Government say so. But why does a minister holding one of the most important positions in the Government stand up and say to the House and the country that this motion is only being brought forward at the whim of the leader of the Opposition? Let me say to him and to the other members of the Government and their supporters that if they will only put their ear to the ground for a few moments they will find that this motion is not brought forward to satisfy the whim of the leader of the Opposition, but rather to satisfy the whim of the people of this Dominion.

The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) said this afternoon, if I understood him aright, that the question of the right of the hon. member for Leeds to hold a seat in this House he would have to refer to the Department of Justice. Has anybody the temerity, Mr. Speaker, to stand up in this House and say that when a man is being paid a fee of $100,000, as has been reported, for conducting the Government's case in an arbitration as appears to be the case from the Act passed for that purpose, and which was cited by the hon. leader of the Opposition this afternoon, that he is not within the pay of the Government and does not infringe the provisions of the Independence of Parliament Act? Do you need any opinion of the Minister of Justice, Sir, on that point? You need the opinion of no one. The right hon. Prime Minister knows, every member on the Government side knows, and the people of this country know, that Sir Thomas White, the hon. member for Leeds to-day, has no more right to sit in this House than the man in the street.

How many people have been disfranchised for months? In the constituency of Leeds there are 36,753; in Medicine Hat, 24,481; in Yamaska, 20,387; in York, Sunbury, 30,780—and in passing let me ask this question: Do I understand that your warrant, Sir, has been issued in the case of York-Sunbury? If it has it is a most significant circumstance, and it has, I believe, been issued for one reason only, while writs for elections in the other constituencies that were vacant long before York-Sunbury have not yet been issued. The only reason is that York-Sunbury, the Government believe, is the one constituency in which they have the slightest hope of carrying a by-election. The constituency of West York has an electorate of 33,306; St. Antoine 34,794; making a total of 187,501, or in round numbers 200,000 people that to-day are disfranchised by the action of this Government.

When, Sir, the Act was passed that by-elections should be brought on within six months of the vacancies occurring, did any one who discussed or voted for that measure believe for one moment that the whole period of six months was to run? No, the intention was that just as soon as possible writs were to be issued. That was the spirit of the law, and it is in that spirit that I ask the Government to live up to to-day.

This, Sir, is not an ordinary session, this is not an ordinary Parliament. It is, perhaps, one of the most extraordinary Parliaments that ever sat in this Dominion. This feature has been brought up before during this session, and I do not propose to rehash it now, but I have said before, and I repeat it now, that irrespective of all precedent or anything else, there was a distinct promise that at the conclusion of the war this Government would appeal to the country. But, Sir, leaving all that aside, what do we find? We find after reading the statement of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) that we have the most appalling railway deficit in the history of our country—a defiicit of ten dollars for each man, woman and child in Canada. We have before us that most contentious question of the expenditure of millions upon the mercantile marine, a statement in connection with which was made to-day by the Minister of Marine (Mr. Ballantyne). In view of these facts, and of the fact that all constituencies are not represented, can it be said either in this House or out of it that this Parliament has the right to go on with a willy-nilly policy? I say that the only fair thing to do is to let every constituency be represented before these important questions are taken into consideration with a view to making radical changes. Every constituency has the right to be represented, and I ask the Government to see that that right is acceded to.

There is one question I would like to ask of my friends in the far end of the chamber. especially the member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark). I ask it in no spirit of controversy, but the matter is of some interest. The question came up in the House the other day of practically an investigation of the railway systems of Canada. In other words, it was simply this: that the people of Canada, the shareholders in the publicly-owned railroads, should have the right to know whence their money was coming and whither it was going; the right to know how that money was spent and where the vouchers were; the right to speak absolutely as shareholders of a company. The people who are being taxed for these roads have been denied the right to know whence these moneys came and whither they went. When this question is discussed the hon. member for Red Deer and a number of the other members of his party absolutely vote against any such investigation. Why I know not, but I should like to know. I am asking these hon. gentlemen—for whom the old parties were hardly good enough—I am asking them in all seriousness—why they take that attitude. The hon. member for Red Deer says that the by-elections should not be brought on except at the will of the Government. In other words he says: We do not want investigation; we do not want representation. It is a nice point; I ask the question out of curiosity. There are many farmers in my constituency and I want to tell them; they are looking for enlightenmen. When the hon. member for Red Deer stands up and in that vehement manner which is characteristic of him, says in trumpet-like tones to the farmers all over this broad Dominion, says to the members of this House, says, indeed, to every man, woman and child in Canada: We want neither representation nor investigation—I ask the hon. member for Red Deer where he and his party get off?

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, may I as a matter of order tell my hon. friend that I get off by saying that I did not say what he says I said?

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (George Etienne Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I have been waiting all evening to hear some explanation from the two witnesses to this famous document. As the House is about to have the question put, and nothing has been heard from these two witnesses I merely rise to express my surprise that these gentlemen, whose names have been bandied about so freely both inside the House and out of it during the last two or three weeks, have not considered it necessary to offer to the House and to the country some explanation as to what became of this document between July 21 and March 18. Sir Herbert Ames on July 21 stated that his resignation was in the Speaker's hands. Some time during this month you, Mr. Speaker, formally stated to the House that the document was not in your hands and that you had not received it, and following that statement the famous resignation was forthwith placed in your hands. Now, where was it during that time? The Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen), who is supposed to know something about the doings of his party, said that he knew nothing whatever concerning it. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) knew nothing about it. No one knew anything about the document. May I suggest that it was perhaps in the dead letter office? It would have been wise if the Postmaster General had been a member of this House in order that he might have said something about that part of his department which is dead.

Another suggestion, Mr. Speaker, I might offer is that when Sir Herbert Ames said his resignation was in the Speaker's hands, possibly he meant that, as he was the speaker, the resignation was in his own hands at the time. The whole matter is enveloped in so much mystery that the chief whip on the Government side, the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) and the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Whidden) might give us some explanation as to when that document came into their hands and why it was not received by you, Mr. Speaker, until a few days ago. There must have been some reason for it. Were they acting on the instructions of Sir Herbert Ames? They certainly were not acting on the instructions of the right hon. Prime Minister. They were not acting on the instructions of the Minister of Justice, because we have the statements of these two gentlemen that they knew nothing whatever about the document. Were the two gentlemen who witnessed it acting on their own initiative? If so, we would like to know why. Was it in the interests of the country that they were so acting? Was it in the interests of Sir Herbert Ames, or was it in the interests of the Tory party? The country should know something about this. The whole transaction has all the characteristics of a slight-of-hand trick. Sir Herbert Ames states that he placed the document in your hands, Mr. Speaker, but you do not receive it; then six or seven months afterwards it is found in the hands of the chief whip of the party.

A word or two has been said to-night with regard to the Bill which I had the honour of introducing into the House a couple of sessions ago and which declared that elections should be held within six months from the vacating of the seat. The Prime Minister seems to think that that law gave the Government discretion; he says: "It is for us to say when we shall have these by-elections; it is for the Government to exercise its discretion." Well, I thought at the time I introduced the Bill that it was for the benefit of the people, not to suit the discretion of the Government, but I must have made a mistake. I was a new member at the time and naturally was deceived by the arts and wiles of the Government. They ought not to have taken advantage of a poor member in that way.

When this measure was originally drafted it provided that the by-election should be held sixty days after the seat was declared vacant. The Bill was sent to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, of which that astute gentleman the Minister of Militia (Mr. Guthrie) was chairman. Hon. gentlemen on the other side, with tears in their eyes, represented to those who were supporting the Bill, that it would be manifestly unfair to force the holding of a by-election within sixty days. I remember that the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Keefer), whom I see before me, made use of that argument. He said: "Take my own district, which runs from somewhere around Lake Superior to Hudson Bay and is as extensive as a large part of Europe; it would be impossible to canvass the electors of that district; it would be almost impossible within sixty days to enable the people to hear the dulcet tones of my voice." The hon. member pointed out that a period of six months was a reasonable time in which everyone could hear him expound his views to the people. He said that it would take at least six months to prepare lists in that wild and unorganized district, the district which sends him to this House. We were soft-hearted people and we fell. We agreed with the hon. member and we thought that after all, half a loaf was better than no bread, and we accepted the six months. It never was contemplated at the time that this period of six months was to be given in order that, as the Prime Minister said, the Government in that time could exercise its discretion as to when an election should be brought on. If that is the view which he takes, he certainly has distorted what we considered should be the law and were willing to agree to, when the matter came before the House after the committee had reported.

I heartily concur in the views expressed by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) as to the necessity for bringing on these elections now. It may not suit the convenience of the Government to have these elections brought on; but, as has been said by every hon. member on this side who has spoken in this debate, it is in the interest of the country that the people of these disfranchised constituencies should have a right to have their views expressed on the floor of the House on the highly important matters which are to be brought before us within a very short time. Only a few evenings ago we heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) declare, in the most solemn way, that, with regard to the railway situation, we are facing one of the most important crises in the history of the country since Confederation. Surely, every element of this population, of this community, has a right to be represented in this House when those important matters are to be discussed. I consider that the Government are making a serious tactical blunder when they refuse to allow this resolution to go through. The temper of the people is such that they cannot stand, as the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) said, very much further hocus-pocus business in this House. Their temper is such that they want to have matters fully discussed; they want to know the financial condition of the country, and every constituency be represented in this House at this crucial moment. I for one am very glad to cast my vote in favour of the amendment which has been moved to-night by the leader of the Opposition.

The House divided on the amendment of Mr. Mackenzie King which was negatived on the following division:

Main motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Civil Government—Interior—Salaries, including F. Clapp, Acting Secretary to Minister, at $2,400, $1,353,922.50; contingencies, $115,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would ask my right hon. friend if he does not think it is a little early in the morning to begin taking up Estimates.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know how the business of the House is to be done if we are always to have an amendment to the motion for Supply, and then land up too late at night to do any work. It is pretty late to be commencing Estimates, but it is important that the Estimates be considered, and we are getting on very, very slowly. Although the Government has brought the Estimates on every day for quite a length of time now, we have scarcely anything through.

Mr. CAHILL: May I ask who is the Minister of the Interior at the present time?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. gentleman does not know, it is the Hon. Sir James Lougheed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like again to speak to the Prime Minister. I think it is perfectly proper that matters of general and great public interest should be discussed. We need not necessarily end this session at a particular date as my right hon. friend has intimated this evening and if there is public business to be carried on we are prepared to stay here in Ottawa for a considerable period of time until it is done satisfactorily, but we do not wish to discuss the business of this country after midnight. We propose to do it at a time when we can give to it all the attention that it demands.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Some of us are quite a long way from home and want something to do. I have wandered about Ottawa for five days now with little to do. I am an older man than the leader of the Opposition, but I am quite prepared to go on with the business of the House now. I have been in this House when we carried on business continuously day and night. I helped to do it, with the co-operation of my hon. friends. I am sure my hon. friends are not so old that they cannot stay and work for a little while yet.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not want to stay here all night, and I do not propose to stay here all night. If the hon. member for Red Deer does not go home that is his misfortune, not my fault. Apparently he has had a better rest than those who went home. Some go for pleasure and others go for work. I have not the advantage of being a gentleman farmer, and when I go home I have to do something. Let us begin by getting a little information. I notice an increase in this item of $42,250. How is that accounted for?

Mr. TOLMIE: That is accounted for entirely by statutory increases.

Mr. BUREAU: I find by the details on page 81 that we are providing salaries for assistant deputy, publicity assistant, and custodian of survey equipment. I do not know that there is anything in the statutes providing for increases for these men. Then there is a senior statistical clerk; statistical clerk, forestry; statistical clerk, natural resources and intelligence. I thought all this work of collecting statistics was transferred to the Department of Trade and Commerce to co-ordinate the work and save money to the country. I should like some explanation.

Mr. TOLMIE: These men are engaged in the compilation of statistics with regard to our natural resources, and they come under the Interior Department.

Mr. BUREAU: The $42,250 is made up of increases to those men for the coming year?

Mr. TOLMIE: Yes, the statutory increases for all these positions.

Mr. BUREAU: They are entitled to these increases by statute?

Mr. TOLMIE: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: Does that include the bonus?

Mr. TOLMIE: No.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): The item calls for salaries for four editors. What do these four editors edit?

Mr. TOLMIE: These editors are connected with the various branches of the department, such as the Astronomical Branch. They edit the publications that are issued by the various branches of the Department of the Interior.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): What publications does the department issue?

Mr. TOLMIE: It issues monthly bulletins regarding astronomical questions and other matters that are dealt with.

Mr. PARENT: Where are they printed?

Mr. TOLMIE: At the Bureau.

Mr. CAHILL: Is it the intention of the Government again to amalgamate the Department of the Interior and the Department of Immigration and Colonization? It seems that at the time the departments were separated it was a more matter of convenience for the Government to make an appointment, and I should like to know whether it is the intention to amalgamate them again?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The amalgamation has not been considered by the Government. The importance of the Immigration Department is such that it takes considerable time itself. I would not say that amalgamation may not be possible later on, but it must be remembered that the Mines Department has also been placed under the Minister of the Interior.

Mr. FOURNIER: Is there any talk about amalgamating the Department of the Interior and the Customs Department?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh no; there is no talk of that. I think the hon. gentleman means the Inland Revenue Department and the Customs. They are being amalgamated.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I am not entirely satisfied with the explanation in regard to the editors. My hon. friend told me that these four editors of monthly bulletins were being paid over $9,000 in salaries. Now, in the town in which I live I know an old gentleman of over 70 who issues a paper twice a week all alone. He does the whole work and his paper is a bigger thing than these monthly bulletins. I hope the minister does not mean to say that these gentlemen are working a whole month on these little bulletins.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps I may be excused if I say something on this subject, because I have some familiarity with it. The hon. member must not labour under the impression that these are new appointments. These editors have been in the service for many years, I think prior to 1911. The Astronomical Branch, which has charge of the observatories in Ottawa and Victoria, would not be performing its functions as such at all if it did not issue publications recording its achievements and observations, and these publications must necessarily be edited by a man who knows the work of the observatories. I am sure that Dr. Klotz could give the hon. member a more detailed explanation than I can. His staff has been so very much reduced that if the hon. gentleman met him he would listen to a wail of complaints at the parsimony of the Government in not granting more money for his observatories. I do not think there has been any increase; in fact, there has been a reduction. It is, of course, essential to have someone to edit the publication of this branch, and the same is true in regard to the natural resources branch. Its business is to compile into systematic and readable form information as to the natural resources of this country, and well has it performed its task. The head of the branch is Mr. Lynch, one of the ablest of public servants, appointed long before the Government of Sir Wilfrid went out of office; and without an editor that branch could not do its work. The same can be said of the Geodetic Survey. That is one great survey that is being conducted in the Dominion, and in relation to it all other surveys take their place. It is the primary one, to which other surveys are related and to which they are more or less subsidiary. Necessarily, its work takes the form of publications which must also be edited, and these editors are retained for this purpose.

Mr. POWER: I notice on page 82 a junior law clerk at $1,680, and a senior law clerk-stenographer at $1,500. Now, I have always been aware that I belong to a very poorly paid profession, but I did not think that a kind and benevolent Government such as this could imagine that after having gone through three or four years of study in a law school, any one who qualified for the position of law clerk in the employ of the Government would be worth only something like $100 more than an ordinary stenographer. I do not desire to ask the Government to spend more money; they have spent enough, the Lord only knows; but I think it is most unfair to the members of the profession to which I belong, to give them what I might call starvation wages.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: What is the name of the junior clerk?

Mr. POWER: Am I to receive an explanation from the minister as to how it is that a barrister receives only $100 or so more than a stenographer? I presume this is a barrister, and it does not seem reasonable.

Mr. TOLMIE: These are both stenographers who are familiar with law terms, and this classification is made by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. POWER. I see that there are really three law clerks, two at $2,040 and one at $1,800. Will the minister explain what their duties and qualifications are, who are the present incumbents, when they were appointed, and from what universities they graduated? I forgot to add that there was a departmental solicitor, and I should like to know something about his qualifications too.

Mr. PARENT: Is he still alive?

Mr. TOLMIE: The duty of these men is to draw up grazing and mining conveyances and leases in connection with the Department of the Interior, and to do the usual law work appertaining thereto.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. POWER: What are their names?

Mr. TOLMIE: One of them is Mr. W. McQuarrie; I am sorry I cannot give the other names.

Mr. PROULX: I know one of these law clerks, who happened to be one of my classmates at the law school. He has been a lawyer for a number of years and is receiving only $2,040, while I see on page 8 a young lady clerk is receiving $2,400 a year.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: She has other duties to perform.

Mr. PROULX: Was her salary fixed by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: What is her name?

Mr. PROULX: S. Clapp.

Mr. TOLMIE: This young lady has been designated as "Assistant Private Secretary." She had five years experience in Toronto law offices before coming to Ottawa, on February 9, 1917, as secretary to Mr. S. A. Armstrong, formerly assistant Provincial Secretary, Ontario, then Director of the Military Hospitals' Commission, and afterwards Deputy Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. Miss Clapp was employed in this capacity until Mr. Armstrong left the department in July, 1918, when she was transferred to the minister's office as assistant private secretary. She was thus employed until October, 1920, when upon Sir James Lougheed being appointed Minister of the Interior, she was transterred to the Interior Department. Sir James Lougheed is now minister in charge of the following: Department of the Interior, Department of Indian Affairs, Department of Mines, Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, Board of Pension Commissioners, Soldiers' Settlement Board and is Government leader in the Senate. The ministers' secretarial work in connection with the foregoing is carried on by two private secretaries and Miss Clapp as assistant private secretary. Miss Clapp's salary as indicated in the Estimates will not carry with it the usual secretarial allowance of $600 or any other allowances. Miss Clapp's transfer does not make any increase in the secretarial staff of the office of the Minister of Interior.

Mr. BUREAU: Dispense.

Mr. PROULX: One of these clerks, who has had eighteen years' experience, is only getting $2,040 while acording to the statement of the minister this young lady, with five years' experience only, is in receipt of $2,400. I do not think that the discrimination is at all fair.

Mr. TOLMIE: This young lady is assistant private secretary.

Mr. PROULX: How many secretaries are there to the Minister of Interior?

Mr. TOLMIE: Two private secretaries and one assistant private secretary. But he administers, as I have already pointed out, the Department of the Interior, the Department of Indian Affairs, the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, the Board of Pension Commissioners, the Soldiers' Settlement Board, and is leader in the Senate.

Mr. CANNON: A short time ago the minister mentioned that a bulletin was published by the Department of the Interior, which bulletin, if I am not mistaken relates to astronomy. I would like to know from the minister if it is the custom of the department to print that bulletin in both languages? If my information is correct it is not published in French, although the subjects treated of in the bulletin are most interesting and should be published in French and distributed throughout our provinces, a proceeding which would be productive of good results. In making this request I am not asking favour, but simply asserting a right. The publications by the Department of the Interior are official documents issued under the authority of the Federal Government. Now, as is well known, English and French are official languages and therefore if the Department of the Interior, or any other department, wishes to publish bulletins, or monthly statements of any kind, these publications should be issued in both languages. There is this further reason for pursuing such a course: There are already translators in the department and it would be very easy for the minister to see that in future all publications by the department are printed in both languages. Then the population of my own province, as well as the population of the English provinces, would be able to take advantage of these publications. I think it will be sufficient to draw the attention of the minister to the matter to cause him to see that the present condition of things is immediately remedied.

Mr. TOLMIE: Some of the publications issued by the department are now published in French, but I will be very glad to bring what my hon. friend has said to the attention of the Minister of the Interior.

Mr. McCOIG: There seems to be some discrimination shown in the matter of increases. Some officials are drawing salaries of $4,000, others $3,000, and others again $2,500, or $2,000. These seem to be the officials who are getting increases whereas the poor fellow who is only paid $1,000 does not appear to be receiving any consideration. It appears to me that the men in humble positions—who have families to raise and clothe and educate just as the higher salaried men have—are entitled to some attention. If increases in stipend are being given, surely those men who receive only $1,000 a year are as much entitled to an increase as are the higher officials who are paid three or four thousand dollars a year?

Mr. TOLMIE: The remuneration is not now arranged by the department but by the Civil Service Commission who fix these increases from time to time.

Mr. BUREAU: There is a very strange item at page 32 of the Estimates where I notice that salaries are being voted for two senior messengers and also for eight messenger clerks. What work is performed by the clerks of these messengers may I ask?

Mr. TOLMIE: There are two senior messengers, one in the Natural Resources Branch, and the other in the deputy's office. "Messenger clerks" is the new designation given by the Civil Service Commission to ordinary messengers.

Mr. BUREAU: I think that designation ought to disappear from the Estimates. It may be all right to have senior messengers but why do you want to have messenger clerks for them? With all due respect to the Civil Service Commission they do not, so far, seem to know very much about the duties entrusted to them.

Mr. TOLMIE: These men have to perform the duties of an ordinary messenger, but occasionally they are employed in doing some little office work that does not strictly belong to their duties.

Mr. BUREAU: In that case call them messengers, why term them "messenger clerks"? I move that the word "clerk" be stricken out of the designation.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. PEDLOW: I notice there is still another grade of messengers and that is "confidential messengers". I would like to know what duties these confidential messengers perform, and why they are so designated?

Mr. TOLMIE: The confidential messenger carries cash from one department to another and handles cheques. He has a good deal of responsibility as compared with the ordinary messenger.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: The other day when we were considering the Estimates of the Minister of Justice he gave an entirely different definition of a confidential messenger.

Mr. CANNON: But there is no money handled in his department.

Mr. TOLMIE: I have explained the duties of these men in the Department of the Interior. I do not know anything about how they do their work in the Department of Justice.

Mr. CANNON: It appears that salaries are voted for officials who look after the Government lands. I suppose these must be the lands held by the Federal Government in the western provinces. Is it the intention of the Government to come to any decision as to those western lands? I saw in the papers a few months ago that a conference of Western premiers had been held in Ottawa, and I would like to hear from the minister if the matters then discussed have been considered by the Cabinet and any conclusion reached in regard to the natural resources which have been claimed by the western provinces since their creation by the Laurier government fifteen years ago.

Mr. TOLMIE: This has been a live question in the West for many years, and the various provinces have made efforts to secure these Dominion lands. A meeting was held here within the last twelve or eighteen months and the matter was discussed, but up to the present time the Government has reached no definite conclusion in regard to the matter.

Mr. PARDEE: On page 81 I notice 3 Chief Map Draftsmen, 12 Principal Map Draftsmen, 30 Senior Map Draftsmen, 26 Map Draftsmen, 1 Junior Map Draftsman, 2 Principal Draftsmen, 4 Senior Draftsmen, 6 Draftsmen—86 in all. What are these Chief, Principal and Senior Map Draftsmen?

Mr. TOLMIE: These are all classifications made by the Civil Service Commission and cover the making of maps for the Lands Department, the Natural Resources Department, the Mines Department, the Observatories, and the Water Powers branch. The definition of Chief Map Draftsman is: supervising the preparation of sectional, topographical, geological, geographical, and other maps, corresponding with surveyors and others in connection with map preparation. The definition of Principal Draftsman: is supervising the compilation and plotting of survey maps and plans from notes, and assisting in the examination and checking of plans submitted by various district engineers and contractors.

Mr. McMASTER: Although there is a very considerable increase in these Estimates, the minister in charge of the department has made no suggestion whatever as to the possibility of cutting down expenses. I think the minister who is now endeavouring to pass these Estimates must realize the position in which the country finds itself. It is very hard in a committee such as this to make adequate criticisms of various items; we can only do our best from the information which the mere Estimate places before us. But in view of the present financial situation and of the fact that immigration is proceeding at a very slow rate, surely there should be an opportunity of cutting down expenses in this department. It is quite impossible for any private member to say just what officer should be let out, or just what expense could be curtailed; but we have got to cut our coat according to our cloth, and the only way to reduce the expense of government is by cutting down a little here and a little there. I do not suggest for a moment, Mr. Chairman, that salaries should be cut down, but I want to see better service given. It seems to me that in many offices a smaller personnel could do the work as efficiently, and perhaps more efficiently, than those who are presently engaged there. And that is what we would like to have from the minister,—some plan for cutting down expenses. Of course, it is not quite fair to ask this minister to talk about a department with which, after all, his connection is merely to get the Estimates through this House. His ability and courtesy always impress us, but look at the striking difference between to-night, when he seeks information from the deputy on every point and has to keep us waiting in answering questions, and the facility with which he answered questions when he was passing his own Estimates. At that time it was a pleasure to ask him questions, for the information, accurate and interesting, simply flowed from him. Now, why have we not a right to have the Minister of the Interior, of this great spending department, in this House to answer for his own Estimates? Could anything be more striking as to the fitness of the stand taken the other day by the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) and other members on this side that these great spending departments should have their ministers sitting in this chamber? That is something which I wish to strongly impress upon the Government. We realize that the minister in his courteous and able manner is doing the best he can with these Estimates, but how can he do justice to the situation when he has to have recourse to his deputy and practically read all the information he gives us. And I believe in an eight-hour day. I do not think you will advance the business of the country by insisting on proceeding in the small hours of the morning. However, if it is thought wise to go on, of course we will endeavour to do our duty in this connection. But let me make this suggestion. I have in my hand a pamphlet dealing with adjustment of geodetic triangulation in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, publication No. 2. I presume this pamphlet has been distributed to every member of the House; at any rate, I made no special application for it yet I find it in my box. Now, I defy the minister, who belongs to a learned profession, to make head or tail out of this geodetic triangulation. It is all higher mathematics. The member for North Cape Breton asks me to explain some of the diagrams. I can no more do that than I can talk Gaelic; it is beyond me. My learned and hon. friend from Dorchester suggests that this pamphlet is published with the intention of bringing the two provinces together along geometrical lines. But the point I want to make in all seriousness is that although these pamphlets may be of interest to highly trained technical men, such as surveyors and engineers, to send them broadcast throughout even the House of Commons is a pure waste of public money. These are suggestions which I throw out for the time being, and if the minister who is in charge of the department can help us by suggesting how public money can be saved in the conduct of it, we will all gratefully listen to him.

Mr. TOLMIE: The pamphlet which the hon. gentleman has just referred to is for the use of surveyors and other professional men. These pamphlets are distributed in the various provinces and exchanged with other countries for similar publications. With regard to running this department in an economical way, I may say, the minister is at present engaged in a general reorganization with a view to effecting a substantial saving. There are no increases other than the statutory increases. He is retiring a number of employees who are getting up in years and he is combining a number of branches with a view to making a saving. I shall be glad to bring to his attention when he returns the fact that this matter was mentioned by the hon. member for Brome.

Mr. CANNON: Can the minister make such a reorganization of his personnel without the consent of the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. TOLMIE: By the combination of branches, I think he can move a considerable distance in that direction.

Mr. CANNON: But how far?

Mr. TOLMIE: Sufficiently to obtain very much better results through the combination of staffs in different branches.

Mr. CANNON: I would direct the attention of the committee to a most extraordinary condition of things. When hon. members ask for information in connection with railways they are told that the information cannot be furnished because the railways are managed by a body independent of the Government. If we turn to the Mercantile Marine we are told that it also is run by a separate corporation and that details and information will be supplied by that corporation and not by the Government. Then, when we put questions in connection with civil employees in other departments we are told that the Civil Service Commission, another body independent of the Government, is responsible, not the Government itself. This is a very serious condition and every hon. member should try to bring about a change. If we are to have responsible government in Canada, members are not to be referred to outside bodies when they ask for information; if so we might just as well abolish the House of Commons. Under our constitution the House of Commons is supposed to have the power of the purse, but I doubt very much whether we have that power. Hundreds of millions are spent every year on our railways and

hon. members cannot obtain any information in connection with them; the managing body can spend what it likes and the House of Commons has to pay. The same is true of the Mercantile Marine. Now, when we come to the civil service, if there is any body of persons who should be responsible to the representatives of the people it is certainly the civil employees. Even when the Minister of Agriculture was explaining his Estimates he stated on a number of occasions in answer to inquiries from this side: I cannot give the information; that matter is settled by the Civil Service Commission. I say that if this system continues, both the power of the purse and responsible government will disappear. The minister ought to be master of his department; if he is not, who is? If the ministers who compose the Cabinet are not masters of their various departments, it is about time we should know who runs this country.

Mr. BUREAU: The Civil Service Commission.

Mr. CANNON: Apparently the Civil Service Commission runs it so far as the Civil Service employees are concerned. The Toronto financiers run it so far as the railways are concerned, and as to who runs the boats we shall know that when the marine Estimates come before the House. The condition which prevails in Ottawa is unbearable, and unless there is protest from both sides of the House—because every member is interested—unless there is a strong and earnest movement to bring about the re-establishment of constitutional institutions in Canada as they existed before the war, we shall wake up and find that we have in this country not responsible government, but autocratic government. It is to be regretted that the head of this department we are now considering, in connection with which such a large amount of public money is spent, is not in the House to furnish the necessary explanations. He is replaced, it is true, by a very sympathetic minister; in fact I think the Minister of Agriculture was chosen purposely because his colleagues know how sympathetic he is to this side. We have confidence in the Minister of Africulture so far as his own department is concerned; we know that every cent we have voted for his department will be well spent. But the moneys which we give to-night, if we give any, will be spent, not by my hon. friend, but by another minister whom we do not know even by sight, for he sits in the Senate. My hon. friend is not in a position to give to the committee the information which it desires. The member for Brome asked whether it is possible to reduce the expenses of the department. That is a fair question, but the minister cannot answer it because he has not the information. Indeed, he could not do it even if he were the head of the department, because judging from the answer which he has just given he would have to apply to the Civil Service Commission before he could reduce the personnel of the staff.

The minister, in answer to a question which I put in connection with the Dominion lands in the West, told me that the matter was under advisement. That was a very diplomatic answer, but without discussing this question on its merits I would point out that the financial situation in Canada is very bad. Every hon. gentleman realizes the necessity for a reduction in expenditure with a view to the stabilizing of our financial condition and status. Why should not the Government cease giving vast sums of money to the different provinces for roads, technical schools, housing schemes, and other different things? Those grants are given, not because the older provinces need them. The older provinces are in a better financial condition than the federal government is. The credit of the province of Quebec is by far higher than that of the Dominion of Canada. Quebec does not need any of these federal credits; we do not want them; let the Government keep the little money they have. Some hon. gentlemen opposite might say: "If the eastern provinces do not need that money, maybe the western provinces need it." Instead of taking money that we do not possess in the Federal treasury and giving it to the western provinces, why not stop those grants and give to the western provinces their natural resources? They would then have large revenues that would meet their expenditures, and Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta could carry on the government of these provinces without calling on the Federal Government for assistance. This is a very important question. I see some of my western friends in their seats, and we should, to-night, endeavour to secure from the Government a more definite answer on this all-important question of Dominion lands in the western provinces. These remarks are addressed to the minister in entirely good faith. I know he is not in a position to speak with full authority as regards the Department of the Interior; but next to him I see the Minister of Justice

1 a.m.

(Mr. Doherty), and I am quite sure that nothing of any great importance would be decided without that right hon. gentleman being consulted, so that if the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) cannot furnish the information, I am quite sure the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister will do so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know that the subject of natural resources is connected with the Civil Government Estimates, but I shall be glad to make a short answer to the hon. gentleman. The question of natural resources has occupied the attention of government and of political parties for some time. I have no doubt the hon. member will recall a somewhat celebrated, but, I think, very often lamented convention that was held in the city of Ottawa in August, 1919, at which convention, amongst other resolutions—almost innumerable others—a resolution was passed referring to this very question. That resolution called for the transfer to the western provinces of their natural resources on terms that would be fair to the other provinces of Confederation. With the principle of that resolution, coupled with the condition—I have no fault to find. I might remark though, in passing, that the natural resources were reserved from the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, initially by hon. gentlemen opposite, and the complications that are now involved in any question of the retransfer all arise from the fact that those resources were initially withheld.

Mr. McKENZIE: Were they not withheld from Manitoba in the same way?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They were withheld from Manitoba, I forget the year, but shortly after Confederation.

Mr. McKENZIE: But on the same principle when the province was created.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The same principle, I know.

Mr. CANNON: What about the extension of Manitoba?

Mr. MEIGHEN: When the natural resources were withheld from Manitoba and Manitoba requested to be put in the same position as Alberta and Saskatchewan, the same had to apply to the extension of Manitoba; there was nothing else to do. That is what Manitoba asked for; that is what Manitoba received.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): The reservation was made first for Manitoba, and my right hon. friend says that we are responsible for Saskatchewan and Alberta. Who was responsible for Manitoba?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The government of the day that made the reservation.

Mr. CAHILL: Who were they?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not sure. My statement anyway is correct that hon. gentlemen are responsible in respect of Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Mr. McKENZIE: Following your precedent.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): It is the same old tu quoque argument.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman himself was jumping at it a moment ago; he should not despise it now. I am not making anything in the way of a tu quoque argument; I am simply stating the facts and the difficulties in the way of this question. They arise from the fact that the resources were reserved; that they did not pass to the provinces. Whatever the reasons were that moved governments of the day to reserve those resources, the fact is that they were reserved, and that public policy since then has adjusted itself to that situation, public policy in respect of not only subsidies but every policy that appertains to western Canada and, much more, appertains to eastern Canada. Scarcely a step has been taken in regard to administration and the laying out of lines of policy as to the west, that has not been dictated in part by the fact that those resources were reserved. For example, as regards railway policies, under the responsibility of the Federal Government lines of railway were projected, were entered into that probably would not have been entred into, but the fact that the resources were reserved. In respect of water-power, in respect of irrigation, obligations were undertaken that undoubtedly would not have been undertaken but for the fact that such resources were reserved. I could go from one thing to another; all these things have been incurred, and the proportion of outlay of the federal Government that is attributable to the fact that the resources were reserved is something that it is virtually impossible to ascertain. It is just like attempting, after a long series of years, to go back and under a process that is long and involved. An accounting will not do it; indeed, it is impossible to get at anything that can be said to be an exact return of justice to those provinces and, at the same time, fair to the others. At every point of the process some difficulty arises that virtually involve the whole question and makes us determine what would have been done if such and such had not been the case, something that no one can, with any certainty, determined at all. Consequently, when a Government, however anxious it may be to solve this problem, to return the resources to the western provinces, sets about to get a solution based upon any principle at all, it is met with difficulties that are almost insurmountable when you take into account the fact that the other provinces must consider the solution fair. Hon. gentlemen opposite have acceded to the principle that a solution cannot be found which does not take into account the fairness that applies to the other provinces that have been parties to the subsidies the West has obtained arising from that reservation. We have attempted time after time to get a solution; we have not succeeded. We are still engaged in the effort, and we are sincerely anxious to obtain a solution. If hon. gentlemen were in power, I think they would be anxious to obtain a solution, but they would meet precisely the same difficulties which we have encountered. I do not think, however, we would find the hon. member for Antigonish and Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) ready to accede to anything that western Canada would agree to. None of the western provinces has as yet agreed to accept any deduction from its subsidies, got in lieu of lands if the resources are transferred. They take the ground that the resources should be transferred and the subsidies retained, because they maintain that already sufficient resources have been alienated, as they express it, to make up for the subsidies. That is the position of the matter.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I happened to be a member of the House at the time the western provinces were organized, and I recollect distinctly the discussions that took place on that occasion. The decision that was arrived at was this, that it would not be wise at that stage of the progress of the Dominion to hand over to the western provinces the lands, because the immigration policy was in the hands of the Dominion Government and it was thought that the two should go together, so that when the Dominion Immigration Department found a good settler in Europe and brought him to Canada they should be able to place him on the land without any interference by the local legislatures of these new provinces. The Parliament of that day arrived at a solution by contributing a larger sum of money to the western provinces. That was regarded as fair by the representatives of the western provinces at that time, so the matter was settled in that way, and that large subsidy has been paid to the western provinces ever since that date. If they claim their lands now, it will be necessary, of course, for them to account for the money that has been paid to them during all these years since the western provinces were organized. That is only fair to the other provinces. I have no desire to inflict any injury on the western provinces; my only desire is to arrive at a fair solution. I should like to know whether my right hon. friend agrees with the decision that was arrived at by the premiers of all the provinces when this matter was dealt with, to the effect that the rights of the other provinces had to be recognized, and that the eastern provinces, as well as the western, have certain rights in this matter. Does my right hon. friend agree with the decision that was arrived at by the premiers of the various provinces? The position that has been taken by my right hon. friend and by some other gentlemen from the West for some years past, as I understand it, has been that the natural resources of the western provinces should be handed over to them now, the western provinces retaining the large subsidies that were given to them in lieu of their resources. Is that his position at the present time?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know to what agreement between the premiers my hon. friend refers. I would be very much surprised if he can find what was agreed on by the premiers of the provinces of Canada.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): My right hon. friend quoted it a moment ago. He said that it was to be done with regard to the rights of the other provinces.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will refer to that in a moment. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the premiers of the different provinces had come to some agreement in respect to this matter. If they have, I would be delighted to be informed of what it was. I do not think they ever agreed on anything, and I may possibly be permitted to express despair that they ever will. The hon. member says that if the western provinces get their resources, they must account for the moneys they have received ever since these subsidies were granted in lieu of resources. I understand him to mean that they should pay that money back. I want to tell him right now there is not one Government of the three Prairie Provinces that would consider that for one moment. They have never agreed as yet, even to a deduction in any degree whatsoever from the subsidies payable in future in lieu of lands. I communicated with the premiers of all the provinces by letter, prior to our last conference, and told them that if any substantial progress was to be made they should let us know what they were ready to do. Were they ready to accept a deduction in subsidy in lieu of lands, or were they ready to wipe it out? I got no affirmative answer. They take this ground now. They say: You were trustees for us for these lands. Now we ask you to account for everything you have got, and not only everything you have got, but for everything you should have got; if you had a piece of land homesteaded, for instance, instead of selling it, you should pay us the amount you could have sold it for. You account to us as trustees, and we will account to you for the subsidies received. I pointed out that at every stage of the accounting the whole question would come into view at once as to what appropriations of this Parliament were made because the lands were reserved to us, and what were not. I do not think the wit of man could ever tell that. In respect to immigration, for instance, could it be told? Are you going to ascribe all the expenditure this Government has been put to for immigration in all these years to the fact that these lands were reserved, and reserved for immigration purposes? I do not think you should. It is true some of it was, but can any human being tell how much was? I do not think so. Nor could any human being tell what money was spent by this Government in respect of railways, in respect of water-powers, in respect of irrigation, in respect of many of these subjects arising from that fact. It could not be done by any process of accounting. You might make some rough attempt at a conclusion, but that is all it would be. I have urged upon the premiers of the different provinces that they should be ready to say just what they would be ready to do in respect to a deduction of the subsidy. If they are not prepared to accept any deduction at all, let them say so, and then we will say whether we consider it fair or not; but they have made no statement in that regard. That is the position at the present time.

Mr. GOULD: I should like to say a word or two on the question of natural resources, since it has come up. I recollect quite distinctly in the year 1905, members of the then Federal Government coming into our province to endeavour to persuade the electors that the subsidies to be granted to the provinces in lieu of our natural resources was the best thing that could happen to the provinces. Now, I am not yet prepared to admit that the electorate of the Province of Saskatchewan really believed the statements that were made to them at that time, although perhaps the vote in the elections might show that they did. I myself took the view at that time, as I do to-day, that the natural resources of the province of Saskatchewan rightly belonged to the province. While under that influence we accepted the subsidy, the question has always been a very live one in the West and we have made repeated requests to different Governments and Oppositions that our natural resources be given back to us. I was one of a committee of three that waited upon the leader of the Opposition in the year 1911 in the city of Weyburn, and when we made the request that the natural resources should be handed over to the province we received the very positive statement that immediately upon the accession to office of the Conservative party of that time our natural resources would be handed to us. We accepted that statement in good faith, but as soon as the party got into power other considerations entered in, and obstacles were raised. Up to the present time I do not know that there has been as much earnestness shown by the Federal Government as has been shown by the provincial governments in an effort to get what we claim is simple justice.

I do not wish at this time to discuss the natural resources, as the subject is somewhat foreign to the question before us, but I think a resolution on the subject should be brought into the House later on. Representatives of our group will have something to say on that question.

I wish to endorse what has been said by the hon. member for Dorchester as to the minister who is in charge of these Estimates not being in a position to make the positive statements that I believe the House should have. It is deplorable, from my point of view at least, that we should ask for information and be unable to receive a positive declaration from the minister giving us the precise facts asked for. When his own Estimates were before the House he could give us positive and reassuring statements, but to-night, in answer to questions by hon. gentlemen, all he can say is "I think this" and "I think that," which I submit must be absolutely unsatisfactory to all hon. members who listen to the minister. I am sure that the minister himself must feel that in those circumstances he is handicapped in his efforts to give to the House such information as it has a right to expect. I do not know what to suggest in order to improve things, but I do think that almost any condition would be as good as the present. A large amount of money is being expended in this department, and I am sure the tax payers will demand some positive answers to the questions that are asked by hon. members. The older members of the House can perhaps suggest ways and means whereby we may be able to obtain the information we require. Personally, I think that it is certainly due to hon. members that definite answers should be made in reply to such queries as they put to the Government, and I do seriously submit that the present state of affairs is not satisfactory.

Mr. BUREAU: This is a large item and, as has been said, the Government has chosen for the purpose of putting it through an hon. gentleman who enjoys the greatest degree of sympathy on our side. Now, we are willing to show our sympathy by meeting him half way, and if it is agreed that we shall adjourn after the passage of this item, we will let it pass.

Mr. POWER: No.

Mr. BUREAU: We can let this item pass if the Government agrees to adjourn.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should really like to have another department, that of Labour, entered upon, but I am prepared to accept the terms of the hon. member. We should surely get some more business done another night, however, and I sincerely trust that if another amendment comes on we shall be able to confine the debate thereon within reasonable limits.

Mr. CAHILL: I desire some information regarding the regulations appertaining to oil leases, which, I understand, are under the department. As these items are going through we find, from time to time, that it is impossible to go back in order to obtain information on subjects that have already been disposed of. The leader of the Government sometimes evinces a denseness in comprehending some remarks of hon. members on this side, and it is possible that when we come to some other item that may be in this department, we will find it convenient to press the Chairman to restrict the members on this side to the subject immediately under consideration. Now, there has been a great change in the regulations concerning oil leases in western Canada. The minister in charge of these Estimates may not be as familiar with the regulations as is the Prime Minister, who was previously in charge of this department. Will the right hon. gentleman inform me what led to the conclusion that the leases should not be allowed in future, as in the past, for prospectors to locate on Dominion lands with a view to prospecting for oil in Northern Alberta, or British Columbia, or elsewhere? I do not know whether there is any other item in these Estimates that might afford an opportunity for putting this question, and I am anxious to have this information, because the matter is of considerable importance to the people of western Canada at the present time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no doubt as to the importance of the subject. The hon. member could undoubtedly bring up the discussion in several ways. He could introduce it under the item for Dominion Lands and Parks. That would be the proper item under which to discuss it, but of course it could not be taken up to-night; or he could have brought it up on a motion made some little time ago by the member for East Edmonton (Mr. Mackie), which was debated at some length; or on two or three other motions which are still on the Order Paper, if they are not disposed of, by the same hon. member. In the debate on the motion of the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Griesbach), I went into the subject in some detail. I have no doubt the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) was not here—

Mr. CAHILL: Yes, I was, but no specific answer was given.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh my, yes; I gave a rather complete answer as to why the leases were changed.

An hon. MEMBER: What was it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am afraid I cannot give as complete a statement to-night as I gave on that occasion. At that time I had a memorandum on the subject. However,

I can give a little information regarding the matter. In the first place, I do not think there has been any material change in respect to the provinces my hon. friend refers to, that is, in respect to Dominion lands in Alberta, the Peace River belt, and the railway belt—the only parts we control —and Saskatchewan and Manitoba. From the best of my recollection, the only changes there, are in regard to the imposition of royalty, which it was thought was justified in the public interest, in order that the people as a whole might get some share of these resources, which are the property of the people of Canada. But there was a pretty substantial change in regard to the North West Territories lands, for the reason that it was felt that after the Fort Norman discovery, that field could be legitimately regarded, not as one for prospectors only, but as a proven field, where the existence of oil in quantity had been established, and consequently it was considered that the regulations should be altered so as to give that protection to the public interest that was justified, after the time of experiment had passed and the time of actually proven field had come. That is the reason for the change. It was felt that as oil in quantity had actually been discovered, it was not unjust that we should change the regulations so as to bring a larger share of the ultimate result to the treasury. Consequently, it was provided that only one section in four should be finally taken by the locator, the other three reverting to the Crown, and also that the royalties therein provided for, should be reserved to the Crown. Now, I have given the hon. gentleman the reasons. The matter is under consideration to-day. You may go so far in restrictions as to discourage exploitation, and it is under consideration whether or not some fair priority right to the other three sections, 640 acres, might not in fairness be reserved to the man whose courage and venture are responsible for the location of the first section. That is under consideration; I cannot intimate whether it shall be done or not. Now, I have stated concisely the reason why the change was made in these regulations; it was because of a change in circumstances. The field passes from one fit only for a prospector in the hope that oil might be found, to a field where oil has been found, or what is known as a proven field.

Mr. CAHILL: Have the regulations, since the passing of that Order in Council, been strictly lived up to, or have any filings been allowed since then?

Mr. MEIGHEN: So far as I know, they have been strictly lived up to. The Order as first passed had, I think, a certain retroactive effect which was afterwards removed. I am not sure that I can give the exact date or the circumstances. There were certain applications for leases which would have to be denied under the regulations as first passed, and on representations made by very many it was felt that that was unjust, and the retroactive effect was removed. Every regulation has been lived up to, so far as I am aware, and I would be very much surprised if the Minister of the Interior did not insist that they be lived up to.

Mr. CAHILL: I understood the Prime Minister to say that a man was now permitted to take in one whole section, whereas previously he could take in a tract not exceeding in all nineteen hundred and forty acres.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Nineteen hundred and twenty acres.

Mr. CAHILL: Was that the regulation and is it still in force?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I cannot say just how he was allowed to take it. Previously he was allowed to have 1920 acres, but now he can only have 640 under the regulations as they stand in the Territories. I explained in detail the other day how the area might be taken out. I think I can recall the explanation and it is this: He can take out as much as four sections, or 2,560 acres, in four rectangular blocks. That is, he can file upon four restangular blocks aggregating not more than 2,560 acres, but within a certain period after he has had time to determine what he wants, if he has paid rent on the whole thing for one year, he then must select a square block containing not more than 640 acres, and in respect of that alone he gets a lease, that is all he is entitled to. At present it is under consideration whether he should not have the same right to the remaining three-quarters, in priority to others who may come after him and share the advantage of the risk that he ran.

Mr. CAHILL: Could the Prime Minister tell us what extent of land was leased on the retroactive policy as enunciated by him? He says that there were some people who had made claims to leases, and that they were allowed a retroactive right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I could not give the number of applications or the extent of lands to which they referred. I did hear the figures but could not now recall them. I think there were quite a number.

Mr. CAHILL: Could the Prime Minister give the names of the people who made these applications?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think I could give the name of a single applicant.

Mr. CAHILL: Could the Prime Minister tell me whether a General Lindsay secured any lands under that arrangement?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I could not tell my hon. friend definitely, but I do not think so. The hon. gentleman's reference to General Lindsay must be in regard to another incident altogether.

Mr. CAHILL: That may or may not be the case.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If it is not then I do not know anything about it. I do not think General Lindsay had any oil lands at all. So far as I know he had none except to this extent: he had a lease, made while I was Minister of the Interior, in respect of a certain area of land upon which he had the right to perform certain experiments in order to discover whether or not oil could be commercially produced from th oil sands. That is what General Lindsay got. I remember revising that lease over and over again after it was submitted to me by the officers of the department, and it finally went through. Whether General Lindsay has made much progress or not in his experiments I do not know, but I sincerely hope he has. So far as I know, or have ever heard, General Lindsay took out no leases of oil lands beyond what this particular contract made with the department gave him a right to have.

Mr. CAHILL: When was that arrangement of which the Prime Minister speaks made with General Lindsay?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will have to speak from recollection purely. I think it was about the spring of last year. I left the department in July and the arrangement was made, I would think, within six months of the time I left and at least three months before.

Mr. POWER: On page 81 I notice that mention is made of a gentleman who holds a very lowly position, having regard to the salary paid him. He gets a salary of $1,000 and occupies the position of cabinet maker. I would have suggested to the Prime Minister that when he left the Department of the Interior he should have brought his cabinet maker with him, or rather have brought a cabinet reconstructor. Had he done that it would have saved him a great deal of the difficulty which, I understand, he has experienced since he became Prime Minister. Had he brought with him a gentleman learned in the art of cabinet making when he succeeded to the position of Prime Minister I have no doubt he would have succeeded better and would not have to encounter the serious difficulties which confront him at present. All that by way of coming to the question as to what the cabinet maker does in the department. What are the duties of this cabinet maker, and what has he got to do with Dominion lands?

Mr. TOLMIE: The cabinet maker in the Department of the Interior repairs furniture. He also makes boxes for shipping or moving specimens about from one place to another, and is a general handy man in any work around the department that requires the use of tools.

Mr. POWER: May I ask the Minister whether the department has at its disposal the miniature natural resources cabinets which formerly were distributed to schools of a certain grade—cabinets filled, I think with specimens of the different minerals of the country? If so, I would like to know if these cabinets can now be obtained from the department?

Mr. TOLMIE: There are none in the Department of the Interior, but they may still be issuing them in connection with the Mines Branch. I will get that information for my hon. friend when we take up the Estimates of that branch.

Mr. PARENT: I am sorry that at this late hour we are obliged to let the item pass without having full information in regard to a good many details. For instance, I notice that on page 80 of the Estimates reference is made to an International Boundary Commissioner and a Surveyor General. I would like to find out whether the duties of the two gentleman are identical or not? I would also like to ascertain whether the Surveyor General has drawn a line showing the boundary between Labrador and the Province of Quebec, and what lands are possessed by Newfoundland and the Province of Quebec, repesctively, in the Ungava district?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Surveyor General and the International Boundary Commissioner are by no means the same man. The Surveyor General is Doctor Deville and the Boundary Commissioner is Mr. J. J. McCarthy. That is the answer to the hon. gentleman's first question. In reply to his next question as to the work of the International Boundary Commission, I understand all that the commission has to do is simply complete the preparation of the reports. The work has been tapering off for some time and, I believe, is now complete. As to whether the Surveyor General has delimited the boundary between Newfoundland and Canada on the Labrador coast, I have no doubt that that boundary is laid out in the main and can be located all right as it is placed by Canada. It should be located by Canada and the province of Quebec. The location, I believe, is now under way, though it has never been actually brought to a head. I have always felt that the province of Quebec is chiefly concerned in this matter, and that when it is brought to a head the province of Quebec and the Dominion should be specially represented by counsel. I do not know just what is delaying the matter now, but I am quite certain that if at any time the province of Quebec wishes to go ahead their wishes will be very carefully, and probably sympathetically, considered.

Mr. PEDLOW: I find that out of 822 employees in this department there are 524 clerks and clerk stenographers. I see there are 339 clerks and 185 stenographers, or 524 out of a total of 822 employees in this department. What class of work are these clerks and stenographers doing, and are they fully employed all the time? If they are not fully employed, is it the intention to reduce the staff and cut down expenses?

Mr. TOLMIE: These clerks are all fully engaged in the various departments, such as the mines department, the lands department, the natural resources branch, the mines branch, the observatories and the waterways. It is the intention of the minister to reorganize the various branches and to economize. He is already combining certain branches to lessen the staff; and while the Civil Service Commission makes the appointments and fixes the salaries, he has the right to dismiss any of his staff for whom he has no work. With the exception of the statutory increases this year, there has been no increase in this department.

Mr. CANNON: I see there is a small vote for the Commissioner of Dominion Parks. If my memory serves me right the Prime Minister last year introduced legislation concerning our Dominion parks. Have any new parks been formed under this law; if so, where?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am informed that no new parks have been constituted. The Commissioner of Dominion Parks is Mr. Harkin, a very old public servant. I do not know that I have quite in mind the legislation the hon member refers to. Was it an Act providing for the creation of new parks?

Mr. CANNON: It was passed two years ago if I am not mistaken.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I remember something was done as to Point Pelee shortly afterwards. I have before me a list of all the parks: Rocky Mountains park, Yoho park, Glacier park, Revelstoke park, Kootenay park, Jasper park, Waterton lakes, St. Lawrence islands, Broder park—this park was created in 1919—Buffalo park, Elk island, Foremost Antelope reserve, Fort Howe, Fort Anne, Port Pelly park reserve, Point Pelee. Two of those parks have been created since the passing of the Act referred to by the hon. member.

Mr. PARENT: What are the duties of the superintendent of the Natural Resources Intelligence department?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That gentleman is Mr. Lynch, to whom I referred some time ago. The Natural Resources Intelligence department collects and distributes intelligence respecting the natural resources of Canada.

Mr. CAHILL: I noticed in the press a few days ago that two townships were to be taken out of the Riding Mountain park in the Dauphin district. My recollection is that that is a rolling country of a more or less sandy nature, and a few years ago it would not have been considered as at all fit for settlement. Are these lands of first class quality? What was the report of the surveyor general when he originally surveyed these lands?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman is quite right as to the Riding Mountain park being rolling country and generally light as to soil. The Government was urged, according to my recollection solely by returned men, to open certain parts of that park that were suitable for farming. The Parks branch usually resists anything being taken out of the parks, and the Forestry branch almost invariably resists. Consequently a survey was made by officers jointly, and as a result of that survey very small areas were authorized by Parliament to be taken out. I think that only part of what was authorized was taken out. The amount found fit for cultivation was relatively very small indeed.

Mr. CAHILL: The newspaper report mentioned two townships. I would think it would be impossible to get that area of good land in the Riding Mountain park. What was the area taken out, and was it taken in consecutive sections?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The exact area taken out can be obtained, and I will secure the information. I know, speaking from memory, there was nothing like two townships taken out, and I think the newspaper report must be in error in that regard. I think there were isolated pieces taken at three or four different points.

Mr. CAHILL: The newspaper report may have been in error.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It may have been right, but I do not think so.

Mr. CAHILL: I am quite willing to accept the Prime Minister's word as to that. I always accept his statements here when I have to. But I am not asking now for what may be nearly accurate, but for accurate information from the department, and I do not think the Prime Minister will attempt to argue that such a request is unfair. I presume that these sections or quarter sections of land were at least on the fringe of the reserve. I hope it has not been the custom of the department to go in and select portions of land in the interior of the reserve for settlers to take up. I do not think the minister could expect members of the Opposition to quietly sit down and allow the Government to dispose of all the parks without asking some questions, nor do I think that he should resent the asking of questions about any of our parks. Certainly the minister in charge of the Estimates should have information about this transaction. I think that he should be in a position to state what portions have been taken and under what conditions they have been taken—whether or not the land has been passed as good agricultural land. I can understand that there are Indian reserves and park reserves adjacent to settlement, in some cases close to railways, that a settler would take in preference to better land in a district further away from settlement or from railways, but whether it would be good business to allow such lands to be taken up simply because of their more desirable location is another question and a question for the Government to answer. If those lands are not first-class farm lands it is a question open to debate whether the Government should allow them to be settled on. The Minister of Agriculture had the experience in Kapuskasing in Northern Ontario of settling people on land where they could make no headway, and the Ontario Government has since taken them out of there. A similar condition might arise with respect to settlements on the western lands controlled by the Government. Unless the land will provide a living for the returned soldier, he should not be allowed to settle on it. I would like from the minister in charge of the Estimates a report of the surveyors—not only the recent report but the original report, because these lands were originally surveyed some forty years ago and in each case the Surveyor-General made an accurate report of the condition of the land. Is the minister prepared to take the responsibility of placing returned soldiers on this land whether they are experienced men or not?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Act stipulated the land that was authorized to be taken out. When the Act was passed full information was given to the House as to why it was passed and as to the reports upon which it was based. I do not know whether or not all that was authorized to be taken out was taken out or what the area was; no minister and no officer would carry that in his head. I have said to the hon. member that the exact area will be given to him while these Estimates are before the committee.

Mr. CAHILL: The Prime Minister seems to imply that every member on this side should know of all legislation and every Order in Council that is passed and of everything that takes place in this House. It has been the custom for the Government to state each evening what business will be taken up in the House the next day. At the last sitting the Prime Minister said that certain Estimates would be brought up, and members who were not interested in those two items—perhaps I should say "departments", because the right hon. gentleman called me to order the other day for using the word "item" instead of "department"—members of the Opposition who were not particularly interested in the departments which were to be taken up might not think it necessary to be in their places in the House. After giving us his assurance that two specific departments would be taken up, the Prime Minister came down to-day and moved to go into supply on an entirely different department. I thought I heard the Minister of Marine make a statement to the House to-day, and I thought I heard a letter read from the Prime Minister to the leader of the Opposition stating that the Minister of Marine wished to make a statement. During the discussion on that statement it was impossible for members of the Opposition to know whether it was the intention to go into the Marine Estimates or not; of course, if you went into the matter when the Estimates were up, the chairman would very properly tell you that you should not object to the principle of the Merchant Marine while any single item was being dealt with. If the Prime Minister will continue the practice which, I understand, has been in vogue for many years, of giving information in a straightforward way so that members of the Opposition shall have an intimation of what to expect on the following day, he will, perhaps, find not quite so much opposition to some of the things which he wishes to do. All hon. members on this side, I am sure, are quite anxious to oppose most of the measures of the Government because their measures as a rule are opposed to the principles of Liberalism. But there are some members on this side—I am not speaking for myself now—who have no desire to obstruct legislation or to obstruct Estimates, and if the minister in charge wishes to make such fine distinctions between words and terms and thinks that he is going to make any headway by criticising and lecturing members of the Opposition every time they ask for information, I think he will find that he is heading toward the bottom of the well, not toward the top.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I stated to the House in answer to the leader of the Opposition was that we would take up the departments of Labour and Interior, and that immediately on getting into supply we would take up the Department of the Interior. That constitutes an answer to the hon. member. He refers to some lecturing that has been done from this side; I do not know who did it. I plead not guilty on behalf of all concerned.

Mr. CAHILL: I accept the Prime Minister's explanation, of course. He stated that the Department of the Interior would be taken up, but what better intimation could we have of what department is to be taken up than in the fact that a certain minister makes the motion to go into Supply or speaks to the motion when it is made? It has been the custom, at least since I have been here, for the minister to make a general statement regarding his department on a motion to go into Supply. If the Minister of Marine wished to make that statement—

The CHAIRMAN: I regret that I must call the hon. member to order. His remarks are certainly not relevant to the item before the committee. We cannot, without having a point of order before the Chair, enter into a discussion of customs and procedure and continue that discussion during the entire evening.

Mr. PARENT: How long has the present minister been in charge of the department; since he has been in charge how many employees have been dismissed from the department, and what are the names of those who have dismissed?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister has been in charge since July 10, 1920. There have been two or three dismissals. Several have been retired under the statute passed by the House and given the gratuity or allowance provided by the statute. That has been done in the interest of economy. If the hon. member wishes to have the names, I will secure them and give them to him while the estimates of this department are under consideration.

Mr. PARENT: I would imagine that the official in front of the Prime Minister would be able to furnish the information now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He informs me that he has not the information here.

Mr. PARENT: What are the duties of the director of water-powers, and in what part or parts of Canada does he carry out those duties?

Mr. MEIGHEN: His name is Mr. J. B. Challies. He performs services in all parts of Canada, directly in the provinces where the resources are the property of the Dominion, through the Governments of the other provinces where the resources are not the the property of the Dominion. Arrangements have been made, I know, with New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Ontario, and, I am informed, with Quebec. The services of that branch, which is under the charge of Mr. Challies, are in that way for the purposes of getting information for the use of the water-powers of all the provinces. If the hon. member will consult the Government of his province, he will find they are highly appreciative of the assistance given by that branch.

Mr. PARENT: According to the statement of the Prime Minister, the director of waterpowers has something to do with the province of Quebec, and he led us to understand that the Dominion Government and the Provincial Government had come to some understanding as to the duties of that man in Quebec. The statement of the right hon. gentleman may be correct; I would like to take it as such; if it is, we are entitled to more details so as to find out what has taken place between the Federal Government and the Government of Quebec as regards the director of waterpowers.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am informed by the official who is in front of me that they have been doing work in Quebec, although I cannot recollect it myself. I recollect agreements with Ontario, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. I have letters from at least one or two of the members of those Governments appreciative of the work done. I do not know that any difficulty has arisen with respect to the Quebec Government. It may be that the information given to me is not correct. I have a recollection myself of negotiations with the Government of Quebec; but I will get the full details for the hon. gentleman, and when this matter comes up under the appropriation for Dominion lands and parks, which we are not taking up now, Mr. Challies will be present himself.

Mr. PARENT: It comes under the director of waterpowers.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is just the salary of the director, but all information as to what he does and his branch does in the various provinces properly comes under the appropriation for Dominion lands and parks. Mr. Challies will be available and the very fullest information can be given.

Mr. POWER: I should like to obtain a great deal of information with regard to the director of forestry and details of what has been done by this department for forestry. I should like, if, at some future time when these Estimates are before the House, I might be allowed to discuss the question of forestry, to call the Government's attention to the fact that in the eastern provinces a large number of big trees are being destroyed by bud-worms and other worms and to point out that it is the duty of the federal Government to help the provincial governments to overcome these pests. It is true the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) says that the provinces do not need the federal Government money; but in this respect at any rate, I contend that the forests of our country are of such paramount importance that the federal Government should assist in every possible way to look after their conservation and preservation. I should like also, at the time that these other Estimates are brought up, to go into the question with the minister of what body is taking the place of the Commission of Conservation with regard, for instance, to losses that might be occasioned in our forests by fire. All this, I am led to understand, subject, of course, to correction, could be gone into when other items under this department are before the House.

2 a.m.

I should like, on my own behalf, to make this statement to the Prime Minister, that I think really we should begin our sittings about eight o'clock every evening. I notice that, as time goes on, as the hour grows later, the Prime Minister becomes more sweet tempered. This evening, and particularly in the last two hours, he has given us a remarkable example of how courteous and well disposed he can be. I would hope that the Prime Minister would be always so well disposed to give us information. I am sure, if such were the case, we on this side of the House would be able to assist him, as we have assisted him to-night, in laying the details of the various departments before the House and the country. Really, in the future, if the Prime Minister would show the same disposition and magnanimity which he has shown to-night, we would have reciprocal arrangements of some kind whereby the business of the House would be greatly facilitated.

Mr. CAHILL: Will it be possible for the minister at some other date to take up the question of the policy of the Government with regard to homesteads? I mentioned this matter to the minister before and at that time he seemed to intimate that the Government might institute a different policy with regard to homesteads; that is, they might adopt a policy of restricting homesteading to what might be regarded as the railway area of the country and not allow settlers to take up homesteads in the more remote parts of Canada where they would have no chance of railway facilities and where, in a great many cases, they would be only taking hardships on themselves without being of any productive value to the country generally. Has any new policy been adopted by the Government, or has the Government considered the advisability of restricting homestead settlement to what might be regarded as the railway area of the country?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No new policy has been adopted, nor has a change been under the general consideration of the Government. The subject has been pretty fully discussed in the House on other occasions. There is a great deal to be said both ways; there is a great deal to be said in favour of doing away with homesteads altogether, but the Government has not come to that conclusion as yet. An opportunity for a discussion of the question, of course, will come on any of the remaining items, at least when those involving grants for Dominion lands are under review.

Item agreed to.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Report progress.

Mr. MEIGHEN: An hour has gone by since the suggestion was made by the hon. member for Three Rivers that if the item passed we would take up no other item and go into no other department. However, on this occasion I shall not press the point, but on another occasion when the hon. member for Three Rivers or any other member comes to an understanding I think it would be well that it be lived up to or that the Government feel themselves free to take such procedure as they may deem advisable.

Mr. MURPHY: I think we would make greater progress if the Committee rose now.

Progress reported.

On the motion of Right Hon. Mr. Meighen, the House adjourned at 2.12 a.m. Wednesday.

Wednesday, March 30, 1921.

The House met at Two o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

STORAGE OF FOODSTUFFS

*Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Is the Government aware that there has been considerable hoarding of foodstuffs in cold storage throughout the country?
2. If so, does the Government intend to take any special steps to bring down any legislation to prevent such conditions in the future?
3. If so, when?
4. If not, why?

Hon. Mr. TOLMIE:

1. The Internal Trade Division of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics publishes monthly the holdings of foodstuffs in cold storage throughout Canada. Late returns do not reveal anything that may be fairly interpreted as "hoarding". It is necessary, if the public is to be provided with many foods of seasonal production during the seasons of scarcity, that these foods should be carried somewhere and by someone from the season of flush production to the season of non-production. It is advisable that all perishable foods should be carried in cold storage and is absolutely necessary in the case of some, if they are to be preserved in the best condition and without waste.

2. The Government has already arranged for the publication of cold storage holdings of food products month by month. All the goods in cold storage are for sale at any time. If the returns indicate that there is a surplus over and above normal requirements the price is at once affected. There is no more effective regulator of prices. A large proportion of the foodstuffs held in cold storage is not owned by the owners of the warehouses but belongs to merchants, dealers, producers and consumers. In many warehouses none of the goods are owned by the proprietor of the warehouse.

3 and 4. Answered by 1 and 2.

CIVIL SERVICE LIST

Mr. PROULX:

1. Is it true that the Editorial Committee, appointed by the Government, on the alleged ground of economy have discontinued the printing of the Civil Service List?

4. Will the Government consider the reissue of the List?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1. No. The duty of preparing and publishing the Civil Service List was among the duties assigned to the Civil Service Commission by Section 36 of the Act of 1918, but was eliminated from the Amending Act of 1919, and the last edition was published in the fall of 1918 by the said Commission.

2. In the fall of 1918 the work of reorganization commenced, to be followed by a complete reclassification of the personnel of the service, and is now rapidly approaching completion. Obviously it was impossible during that period to publish any list of the employees of the service which would have been of any practical value or utility.

FRENCH TREATY

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Vercheres) moved:

For a copy of the new treaty of commerce between France and Canada.

Right Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: A copy of the treaty was placed on the Table yesterday, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

Hon. Mr. FIELDING: Has my right hon. friend taken steps to have the treaty printed?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am communicating with the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). I rather expected he would be here to-day to move for printed copies.

Mr. FIELDING: The Government does not need to move for printed copies. The treaty ought to be brought down in printed form.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understand a motion is necessary as to the number of copies to be printed.

Mr. FIELDING: Printed copies of many documents are brought down without motion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The treaty will be printed.

TORONTO CUSTOMS OFFICIALS

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT moved:

For a statement showing the names of the examining officials of the Customs Department, Toronto, and the respective salaries of each of said officials.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT—SUSPENSION OF IMMIGRATION

Mr. HERMAS DESLAURIERS (St. Mary's) moved:

Whereas the question of unemployment in our large cities has become a serious problem; whereas the Government is going to study this question; whereas in Europe this social problem is just as great a menace as here and such being the case Canada is exposed to the risk of receiving more or less undesirable immigrants; therefore be it resolved: That, in the opinion of this House, all immigration should be suspended until a normal condition of affairs is established.

(Translation.) First of all, Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the House that I am taking the full and sole responsibility of this motion and it is as such that I intend discussing it.

It is not my intention to argue as to whether Canada is now facing the problem of unemployment, because it is a fact recognized by all including the Government who shall have to appropriate shortly a certain amount of money to that end. What I propose to establish is why the working class, the people who are hungry, are asking that immediate steps shall be taken by the Government who are largely responsible for this serious question of unemployment.

In 1919, the former Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) went to Europe accompanied by Mr. Draper, secretary of the Trades and Labour Congress with the object—so they claimed at the time—of protecting the interests of Canadian labour. The Government press highly praised our representatives for having supported article 427, paragraph 4 of the Peace Treaty concerning the eight-hour day or the 48 hour week. Since then nothing has been done by the Government. The workers are still being kept for many hours in unsanitary factories at a time when unemployment has reached an acute stage. I repeat that the Government have done nothing while they should have compelled the manufacturers to employ a larger number of men to have the same amount of work done within shorter hours and at the same rate of pay, which would have reduced the number of unemployed and bettered the general condition of the workingmen.

In 1919, a Housing Bill was passed by this Government granting $25,000,000 for the construction of tenements, but they introduced such impossible and impracticable provisions that even their own friends were unable to avail themselves of that legislation.

At that time the object was to afford to the labourers an opportunity to build houses for themselves and to avoid unemployment. The whole question was well organized camouflage and nothing else.

On the 1st of June, 1920, in this House, I had the privilege of suggesting to the Government several means to avoid unemployment, but they were not considered. I spoke then as follows:

> The chief cause of suffering in our cities is imputable solely to the Department of Labour, which refuses to enact the legislation necessary to prevent the present-day disorders through fear of displeasing the high protectionists. I am speaking of enforced idleness.
> This unemployment is caused by irregular work, mainly due to lack of organization, to business depression or to seasonal fluctuations. If we had a competent Department of Labour these problems could easily be solved by following the example of other countries. Could we not set up a well organized central labour exchange in our principal cities and enact a law forbidding the employer from hiring workmen at the factory gate and obliging him to apply to the labour exchange? There the worker would have to give his name and his trade; each one by turn would be supplied with work and the salary paid would be that established by the labour unions. In this way we would get rid of the sight of hundreds and hundreds of workers anxiously waiting every morning at the factory gate for employment which never comes; these poor men waste weeks and even months in these vain attempts to find work, while their families are suffering the direst poverty.

An equitable distribution of Government contracts during periods of stagnation, would also help to overcome this problem of unemployment. Old people and children under eighteen years of age should have to work only during a limited number of hours. Every year the Budget should contain an appropriation for widows so as to oblige them to bring up their children properly and relieve them of the necessity of spending long hours in the workshop to earn a pitiful salary. In this way all labour would be absorbed and our economic distress forestalled.

Another method of overcoming this problem of unemployment would be insurance such as they have in several cities of Germany where it is coupled with medical attention in return for a reasonable contribution which the employer deducts from the worker's pay envelope. In several countries, especially in Belgium, Norway, Denmark and Holland, the Gand system is followed and seems to give satisfaction; under this system the public authorities on the recommendation of the Department of Labour, vote certain subsidies to the labour unions as a reward for services rendered the State; this ensures comfort for the workers and gives relief to the State by preventing just so much hardship.

Now, Mr. Speaker, none of these suggestions were taken into consideration. Why? Because the Government is not in sympathy with the labourer; they profess a systematic indifference for them. We were first apprised of it in the Speech from the Throne when the suggestion was made of pensions to old age and insurance against unemployment. This Government cannot deny that the present social turmoil comes from their war policy and they are altogether wrong when they shift their responsibilities on the municipalities or on the provinces. The labourer who sufferers today of privations knows what the policy of the Government means so far as labour is concerned; experience has taught him what a consideration by this House of the question of insurance against unemployment involves. He anticipates the appointment of a commisssion which will be, like all other empowered to hold meetings, congresses, where so-called labour leaders, intimates of the minister of Labour will be present, where resolutions learned by heart will be delivered and where, as usual, nothing will be done. Meanwhile, the people who have an immediate need of bread are entitled to claim that the conditions be not made more distheartening by dumping on our country a continuous flow of immigrants. They have a right to protest against the utterances of gentlemen like Lloyd George, Bonar Law and others who, on the floor of the British House of Commons say that, to solve their social problems, there is but one means and it is to send to the Dominions their undesirables.

Mr. Speaker, the labourers who are idle to-day felt very keenly the resolution adopted in March of last year at a banquet held in Montreal by the Manufacturers' Association to subscribe a million and more in order to maintain the present policy of the Government, namely, a policy of high protection in the interest of manufactures, which is the very cause of their sufferings, because since that time our workers were one after the other deprived of employment and they have the right to know when we shall see the end of this endless million and whether the Government will always be indifferent to their fate and will not change their so-called policy of moderate protection, which is but a policy of high protection, to another one which would promote a fair and just competition.

It is said by many that the unemployed are more numerous in our towns, but that, in order to solve that problem we have only to say to them: "If you have no work in the cities, there is a shortage of labour in the country, we have thousands of acres of arable land which is not under culture."

Allow me to say that this answer which is meant to solve the serious problem of unemployment, is merely a childish one. I do not hesitate to state in this House the the fact that there is a shortage of labour in the country, for it must be admitted, but this condition exists only during the crop season, that is, during two months or at the most four months, and during the other eight months of the year, the employer, in the country, may dismiss his hired man when he does not require his services any longer. It is quite exceptional to find a farmer who can afford to pay such fair wages as will allow a man to establish a home and provide food for it, during these two months of the year. Besides, if we should wish for proofs of this fact, we must not content ourselves with listening to street rumours, or the sayings of some person or other, but we must consult the official provincial reports. You have but to consult the provincial report for Montreal, and you wil find that the labour exchange has not been successful in placing in the country some of the unemployed, because the wages offered by the farmers were hardly sufficient for a man to obtain his living.

I say that these wages are not sufficient, during two or four months of the year. Wages that are hardly sufficient for one man would certainly not be enough for him to establish a home and provide for it. Besides, Mr. Speaker, these men who are unemployed to-day have no savings, and they have none for the very reasons which are given by the Labour Gazette, because, during the war, the high cost of living, which was due to the profiteers did not allow them to put anything aside. And this is proven by the fact that the Government has now to appropriate money out of the public funds to support these people who have been reduced to beggary. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it would be more practical to do away completely with the Public Works Department, in Ottawa, and all its subsidies which amount to over $1,500,00 and to utilize this in helping those who wish to return to the land.

Until now, particularly since the last two or three years, the Public Works Department has done nothing but a well organized camouflage, nothing else. These subsidies which are granted by a useless Department might easily be appropriated towards helping these people, who have no savings whatever and who wish to return to the land, by providing them with agricultural implements, horses and the necessary cattle for farm work, in a word with a sufficient grant to help them until they are able to harvest the fruits of their labour, instead of employing these subsidies in distributing the Labour Gazette which floods the country with useless statistics. Why prove to the people that the salaries are not in keeping with the high cost of living? Would it not be enough to unsettle the minds of the people? This Department, instead of helping the workingman interferes with them considerably. These people who, through force of circumstances, have been left without any economies, have to return to the city, when the crop season is over, and what awaits them there? They see shiploads of immigrants entering our ports, and these immigrants work themselves into our midst and take the place of heads of families at insufficient and sometimes ridiculous salaries, but to the entire satisfaction of the manufacturers. Such salaries would be sufficient for men without homes, who are packed in congested quarters and have no taxes whatever to pay, and often these men are most undesirable, nothing but adventurers or old offenders.

Allow me to read the following in support of my contention:

Recorder Geoffrion, a few days ago, sentenced to three months at hard labour, a man named Patrick Read, a South-African soldier, who had been a leader in a recent raid on the Child's restaurant by the so-called unemployed.

It has been discovered that Read is one of a number of immigrants that England sent us a couple of years ago. Upon his arrival in this country, Read decided to settle in the West, and first established himself in Winnipeg. But he was evidently not interested in agriculture. Neither was he very anxious to help in the work of reconstruction which Canada had to face after so many years of war.

Like so many other veterans who are a charge to England, Read thought that, as he had fought in the war, the country should now support him. And the mother country thought fit to get rid of him by sending him to the "colonies".

As soon as he arrived amongst the Western "colonials", Read visited the working classes, and he was one of the leaders when a general strike was attempted at Winnipeg.

Attracted, no doubt, by the announcement that those having no other calling now than being veterans of the Great War were playing an important part in the disorders instigated not by the unemployed, but on their behalf, Read came to Montreal and launched into the fray with the result which one knows.

Now is the time when those who govern us in Ottawa should remember that Canada is not a colony but a confederation enjoying home rule, and when the immigrants England send to our shores by ship-loads should be watched more closely. Downing Street has no right to send us Great Britain's undesirables.

If we do not want outsiders to come and sow trouble among our peaceful working classes, it is high time that the press of the country should remind the powers that be that there are people who, even if not plague-stricken, are no less a menace than the contagious or infectious diseases

Upon that score, I concur in the opinion uttered last year by Sir Andrew McPhail before the Canadian Club in Ottawa. This is what he said about those incoming undesirables:

Now I ask you to cast your minds back upon the public undertakings of this country for the last forty years, and you will observe that they were all intended for the benefit of the hypothetical immigrant. If a railway was built, it was intended to open up a country, to develop something, to carry immigrants; but the immigrants have not come. If they come, they come to the wrong place, to the cities.

It is quite true that we are scrutinizing the immigrant. It is also true that the immigrant is beginning to scrutinize us and to ask what we have to offer in opposition to other countries. For many years they have had this passion for what they called freedom. They came to this country expecting to achieve it. They are finding now, to their cost, that this country is perhaps not so free as they expected it would be. The shipload of undesirable immigrants which was sent back to Russia is a warning to the world that we do not propose that our civilization shall be overwhelmed as the civilization of Russia has been overwhelmed. We shall not, then, expect to attract people on that ground, because they have destroyed their governments in their own countries and they have there all the freedom they could possibly desire.

The workman, who nowadays undergoes hardships, knows by experience that the Government labour policy is a superficial one which consists in resorting to the camouflage year in and year out. The Government said many things as to that but they did nothing at all. They shielded the big interests, the moneyed men, the manufacturers, who are friendly to them. Mr. Speaker, I am amazed when I notice in the newspapers people who advise us to be patriots and who venture to state that Canada to-day is able to provide for herself, that she begets every thing she needs. That I think was the last opinion on that question uttered in Montreal by the hon minister of Finance. Now, let me say that to reprove is not all and that it is far better to practice what one preaches. It is useless to tell to the people: "You must buy all your goods in Canada if you want the war tax to be taken off." To give some value to such an advice one thing is necessary: that the producers set such a price on their goods as will encourage the consumer and keep him from going and buying out of the country.

Allow me to give a few instances in order to prove whether or not those preachers practice what they advocate.

L'Information of March 3, 1921, has this to say:

First instance:

The St. John "Globe" relates the following incident: "The owner of an hotel in this city wanted to buy an electrical machine for the washing of dishes. A Canadian firm was asking $190 for a machine of the required capacity. Proceeding with his investigations, the hotel-keeper was told that in the United States he could buy a similar machine for $100. Of course, the intending buyer came to the conclusion that the difference would be more than sufficient to pay the custom duties, the transportation charges and the exchange rates, and he brought in that machine from the U.S."

Second instance:

Following an exhibition of goods made in Canada, a manufacturer exclaimed before a group of newspaper men that after such an exhibition it would have been difficult not to buy only goods made in Canada. Among his hearers was a representative of the "Farmer's Sun" who pointed out to the manufacturer that he should himself have been the first to set the good example. The manufacturer having protested, some inquiries were made in order to know how far that newspaper man was right, and this is what that manufacturer was wearing: his hat, his shirt, his collar, his shoes had been made in the United States; his necktie, in Germany; his suit, in England; his gloves, in France; his socks and watch in Switzerland; even the trinkets he had in the pockets of his coat, such as pencils, penknives and so forth, had been imported, not to mention handkerchiefs and underwear which, without a single exception, all bore foreign trade marks.

Third instance:

A few years ago, let us say, at the beginning of the war, a great Canadian papermaker had sent out many thousand copies of a circular letter in order to remind his customers and the general public how important it was then more than ever to encourage the native industry and to use for all purposes only paper coming from Canadian establishments, from the fine writing paper, passing through wrapping paper, to the coarse coardboard used in the making of boxes. A reader wanted to make sure whether or not the manufacturer himself was setting the example.

He took the circular, and lifting it to the height of his eyes towards a window, he found that a commercial water-mark in the paper showed that the latter came from an American manufacturer; the envelope similarly tested also showed that it had been made on the other side of the line.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is a conclusion to be drawn from these quotations. It is that if we wish to do away with Canada's war debt we must do otherwise than is done by these famous preachers of patriotism. Why should not the Government show themselves as practical as they were until last fall, when they so delighted in issuing Orders in Council? What they did in the matter of sugar, they could do again with regard to other staples, and the public would certainly not complain. But they will not. And why? Because they are prevented by their friends. These men, accustomed in war time to reap scandalous profits under cover of patriotism, these patriots who came and declared in an industrial conference that they are not working for prayers and that they are drawing dividends of 175 and 200 per cent; who do not want to abate their greediness and do not want to sacrifice anything for the sake of others; these men long in their hearts to see workmen on their knees soliciting famine wages, and they wish above all to reach and destroy the most legitimate unions.

As the representative of an electoral college of 70,000 souls—which means that I do not represent timber limits and thousands of prairie acres, but individuals, in this House—I do not hesitate to declare that the people have come to this that they will not any longer allow themselves to be fooled by words; they can still be for some time kept in want, even obliged to become professional beggars. They can stand even more. At this moment, when these people have but the bare necessaries and are even reduced to mendicancy, every week in the hostelries of our large cities, great Balthasar banquets are organized where gorging is going on under their eyes, at the expense of the Liberal-National-Conservative party. The people look on, notice these; and some day they will enter these festive halls, and toil hardened hands shall write upon their walls the fateful words which you know well—Marie, Thecel, Phares—You have been weighed and found wanting. Then will be the hour of retribution, the hour of justice. No gold, nor silver will then have any effect on the soul, on the mind of these people; judgment shall be at hand and each shall be judged according to his works; the partisans of the Government may well clamour, as was done in 1896, that if the Liberal party should come back to power, it would spell disaster for Canada, ruin for the country; they may well exhaust their stock of mournful rhapsodies over smokeless chimneys, over silent looms, empty workshops, and so forth, these people, whose motto is "I remember," will remember Laurier and his policy; they will put their confidence in the personality of the leader of the Opposition, his colleague of yesterday and the standard-bearer of his policy. All those trickeries will come to naught, and once more, if Providence wills it, Canada shall see days of prosperity and happiness.

Mr. Speaker, we are told in the press, in pamphlets, we are told everywhere, that there is at present but one way of remedying the state of our finances, bringing in immigrants. I for one do not admit without discussion this proposition. There was a time, now gone by, when immigration was a boon to this country. Immigration is a question of business. Love of money, personal interest, hide under the cloak of love of man. I share the idea of Sir Andrew McPhail, that that time has gone by, and if we wish to preserve our institutions, it is time that we should put an end to the propaganda going on in the four corners of the world, emphasizing the liberty which we enjoy and which in reality is no greater than elsewhere. In the name of this liberty are drawn to our shores all immigrants without distinction. Any immigrant wishing to come to us should be made aware of what he must expect here. Beside the matter of mentality, the question of morality, there is one thing which must not be lost sight of. It is that every immigrant entering the country incurs obligations, is subject to taxation. I could on this subject bring forth the testimony of many eminent men whose authority would be recognized by this House, but I will confine myself to quoting a statistical statement of Sir Andrew McPhail. This is what he said in 1920 before the Canadian Club of Ottawa:

> And next in importance comes the question of the taxes and the obligations which the immigrant must assume; and for this purpose I have taken some pains to draw up a statement of the obligation in which a man immigrating to Ottawa would involve himself. I have drawn it up on the basis of a man, his wife and four children constituting the family. Coming from the Province of Quebec, I do not think that is an excessive estimate; I should say it was a minimum. I have assigned to this immigrant coming with his family to the City of Ottawa an earned salary of $5,000, which is not excessive; and not to trust to my loose memory, I should like to read to you precisely where such a man would stand.
> You invite to Canada immigrants of the best type—the type, for example, who could earn $5,000—the man with a wife and four children. Here is his budget in respect of capital obligations, of interest payable, and of taxes to meet expenditure. The per capita debt of Canada is $366; of Ontario it is $30; and of Ottawa it is $167; making a total of $563 per person. Multiplied by 6, that imposes upon your immigrant a capital obligation of $3,378. The annual interest payable on the Canadian debt is $18.25, on Ontario $1,65, on Ottawa, $9.20; making $29.10. His annual interest charge, then, is $1.74. Here is a recapitulation of the obligation which the immigrant who earns five thousand dollars a year is under. The Canada tax is $212.52, for interest and expenses; for Ontario, $45,90; the municipal expenses in Ottawa are $439.95; the Canadian income tax is $84; which gives a total of $782.37. If there is any person here present who draws so large a salary as $5,000, and has a family, this is his annual charge.

Mr. Speaker, according to me, those statistical data deserve consideration. In the past, we have witnessed the coming of different kinds of immigrants, but they often came to do some farming for a month and then to enter our cities. It might be said that on an average only five per cent of the incoming and prospective immigrants are desirable individuals because nowadays it must be reckoned that European nations are keeping their best citizens and sending us only those who do not answer their purpose. These are people who do not earn $5,000 a year; therefore, as they are earning less, the country is liable to have to provide for so many more individuals. Those statistical data are certainly quite valuable and worthy of our utmost consideration.

New we might let in undesirables. By noting what is going on in our courts, we might easily satisfy ourselves that what I am asserting is perfectly true. Taking into account the difference in the rates of exchange between Austria and Canada upon $35 or $40, for instance, one may get $2,000 worth in Austrian securities. These people are coming to this country and in the course of a single night they can reap what would be a small fortune in their own country, and even the expenses of their deportation are settled by Canada. It is most important that such a case should be seriously considered.

Although my resolution seems to bear the stamp of some radicalism, I shall admit that the Government should pay regard to an immigration actually and not in appearance only agricultural. I was reading lately the opinion upon immigration matters of a prominent citizen who manages in a splendid manner the affairs of the Canadian Pacific Railway; I mean Mr. Beatty. Who is Mr. Beatty? He is the president of a great corporation owning a vast railway system, a large fleet of ocean liners and who heads a company of shareholders earning enormous dividends. Therefore I shall grant that, as a business man, the more freight he will be able to get for his company, the larger will be its surplus. His advice is that of an interested person and we, the members of this Parliament, should lay it by and pay regard only to the general welfare of the country.

Now, before concluding my remarks, it is my desire to let the House know that I had no intention of offending any nationality, neither French, English, Austrian, Hebrew, nor others. I oppose with all my might that mode of reasoning according to which, when a cup is full to the brim, the way to prevent its overflowing is to pour more liquid into it; and I would willingly make a reservation in my resolution for those who would be acknowledged highly qualified for farming or industry, chiefly for farming. However, I do not accept the contention of the president of the Canadian Pacific Company, that we need mechanical experts, because we have all we want for the Angus or other shops; but we should let in the following:—foremen and captains of industry, which is quite another thing.

Mr. Speaker, I am confident of having entirely covered the ground of my resolution which states that the Government ought to put a stop to immigration from the standpoint of common sense and in the interest of public order. I am also confident of having shown clearly enough that the policy of the Government as to labour matters is a downright camouflage; that the Labour Department should vanish out of sight as a department, and if the Government were willing to be frank, if they earnestly wished for the progress of the country, the amounts granted to that department ought to be given to agriculture or industry, chiefly to agriculture, as loans or credits judiciously apportioned.

I think my hon. friend the member for Prescott (Mr. Proulx) for agreeing to second this motion which made such a stir among the public, in the press and elsewhere, to such an extent that I would find every day in my letter box, correspondence about immigration and letters advising me in covert terms to withdraw my motion. If I am in parliament to-day it is a matter of conscience and patriotism which lead me here and not a question of money; and this being so, I sincerely believe that it was my duty to submit this matter to the House in the clearest possible way and with all the vigour I am capable of, in the interests of my constituents.

Mr. EDMOND PROULX (Prescott): Mr. Speaker, I am in accord with most of what has been said by my hon. friend from St. Mary (Mr. Deslauriers), but I would like to make certain reservations. At the conclusion of his remarks my hon. friend said he would not object to the admission into this country of a certain class of immigrants, especially those who would engage in farm work or settle on the land. But the present regulations of the Immigration Department permit the immigration into the country of farm labourers and domestic servants. We are not overburdened with this class of immigrants and I do not think we need anticipate any trouble through letting them come in. I am in accord with my hon. friend, however, in his desire to restrict the admission of the artisan class. There is much unemployment at present in the different cities and urban centres of this country, and that unemployment will become more serious if the present immigration restrictions are relaxed. I do not think there is a small town in this country which has not been affected during the last few months by unemployment conditions. We read in the press that thousands of persons of the artisan class are waiting in the European ports for the opportunity to come to this country. Well, I do not see why we should make our regulations less restrictive than those which the United States has applied to immigration into that country. Recently the United States Government imposed very stringent restrictions. I applied not long ago for permission for one of my electors to go back to the United States; he had lived there some years ago and had married an American. He could not, however, gain admission to the United States, in view of the restrictions imposed. I advise the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Calder) to follow the example of the United States in this regard and to protect our own citizens. The best way to protect our workers or artisans is to keep for them the labour that is available in Canada. We should not encourage the immigration of French or Belgian or English people into this country at present; they are needed in their own countries to go on the land and to assist in reconstruction, especially in France and Belgium. We should render the people of those countries a very bad service if we carried on a propaganda to cause many of their number to leave and come here. Most of those who want to come into Canada are of the artisan class. I would strongly encourage the admission of those who want to go on the land, or work for the farmers or accept employment as domestic servants. The hon. member for St. Mary has said that the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway company strongly advocated a policy of immigration, saying that it would be the salvation of the country and of the railway companies if we could increase our immigration. I am sure that the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway company had in his mind immigration of the settler class. That is what opened the West some years ago and created prosperity there. But unfortunately we do not get the same class of immigrants now, especially from Europe, as we got some years ago. If we admit thousands of persons of the artisan class who will not go on the land but will stay in the cities and urban centres, we shall aggravate the unemployment situation to the detriment of our own people. There is one town in my county with a population of 5,500. The main industry there is a pulp mill. Well, that industry had to close down a few days ago, and may be closed for some months, affecting the employment of some seven or eight hundred people. You can see, Mr. Speaker, what the condition is if there are many other towns in this country in the same position. I was in Toronto last week, and I believe that the unemployment situation there is very serious. If we admit into Canada any more persons of the artisan class, it will become much worse. I hope, therefore, that the Minister of Immigration will not relax his restrictions, even if he is strongly urged to do it. I know there are some in this country—I do not know whether it is through generosity or tenderness of heart—who would like these restrictions relaxed so that a large number of artisans could gain admission into Canada. Well, we should protect our own people first; charity begins at home. Instead of being relaxed the restrictions should be made even more severe, at least for some time, until the unemployment situation becomes less acute. Having made these observations, I am pleased to second the motion of my hon. friend from St. Mary.

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (North Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I rise merely to ask the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder)—if he is going to speak with regard to the resolution—if it would not be possible to have these proposed immigrants checked at the places where they originate instead of having them deported if they are not found satisfactory on their arrival in Canada. It must be a great hardship to these poor people to travel all the way across the ocean and then be rejected when they land in this country.

I have nothing particular to say with reference to the class of immigrants being allowed in, because I think the minister is perfectly alive to the situation in this country. As is suggested by my hon. friend (Mr. Proulx) we do not want in the cities and towns more artisans. We want men on the farms. In Ontario, at the present time, it is just as difficult this year as it was last year to get men to work on the farm; wages demanded last year by men who would work on the farm were more than the farmer could afford to pay and at the same time make a profit out of his business, and if wages were high last year, now that the prices of nearly all farm products have very materially decreased, I am quite sure that this year wages will be still more than the farmer can afford to pay.

I am not going to speak for the western farmer, because he can speak for himself better than I can, but I understand that farmers in the West paid wages as high as $10 and $12 a day last year for threshing and other farming operations. If that be the case, that is very much more than we paid in Ontario, and it must be that much more difficult for western farmers to stand. There is plenty of room in this country for certain classes of European farmers, such as those who have been successful in the United States, and who, I believe, could be successful in this country. The type of immigrants that we do not want is the continual agitator who apparently was not satisfied with the country from which he came and who is less satisfied with the country to which he comes.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Are there any of those in Woodstock?

Mr. NESBITT: But very few. I am glad to state that in Woodstock we are a very peaceable community; there is no unemployment; everybody who wants to work has work to do, so that I am not speaking on account of any local troubles. I know that what I have already said is correct, namely, that we cannot get men on the farm this year at any lower wages than we did last year; in fact, we cannot get, in any measure, the help that is required on the farm. Many people think that anybody can work on a farm, but there never was a greater mistake. The man who is city-bred entirely takes a long time to be of any use on the farm. In my experience a man raised on a farm can learn very much more rapidly to make himself useful in an ordinary factory than the ordinary city-bred man can learn to make himself useful on a farm. The boys on the farm —that goes into the old question of why boys leave the farm and I do not think I will touch that; I left the farm myself, and I am very pleased to get back on it any hour of the day or any day of the week that I can do so—

Mr. McMASTER: Especially Sundays.

Mr. NESBITT: Especially Sundays.

Mr. JACOBS: Is there a church there?

Mr. NESBITT: We have enough people in the community to hold a small church meeting if that is necessary, but I am afraid I am not an adept at that.

I still think that, if it were possible, it would be better to stop these prospective immigrants at the port of embarkation than at the port of debarkation. I think also that there are numbers of European farmers who could well be brought out to this country and who would be useful on the land now. But it is not wise to encourage artisans to come to Canada because, at least at the present time, we have plenty of that class to fill up all the factories and manufacturing industries we have in this country, men who are thoroughly acquainted with the country and who know the kind of work that is to be done.

Another class that we could very readily absorb is what is called the domestic servant class. I think that is a wrong appellation; perhaps we should call them "maids of industry"—cooks are now called "dietitians," so that I think we could well call the others "maids of industry." We could absorb many of them if we could get the right class.

I do not think immigrants should be brought to this country and then dumped at the port of debarkation, such as Montreal, Quebec, Toronto or any other place. Somebody who is capable, who knows the country and its necessities, should be on hand to take charge of them there. If women were amongst the immigrants, a capable woman should be available who could look after these women on their arrival and not lose track of them until they were established in some way. I can imagine going to some foreign country about which I was totally uneducated and arriving there in the night—or in the morning, no matter when. With nobody to tell me what to do or where to go, I would be practically lost. I often feel very sorry for the bunches of immigrants you see around city stations who apparently are wandering around without any knowledge of what they are going to do or where they are going. I want to impress on the minister that these people should be taken care of from the time they land in Canada until they are properly established in whatever walk of life they want to get into. I hope the minister will take that into his serious consideration.

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Georges-Etienne Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw the attention of the House to the wording of this resolution introduced by the hon. member for St. Mary division of Montreal. The resolution reads:

> Whereas the question of unemployment in our large cities has become a serious problem; whereas the Government is going to study this question; whereas in Europe this social problem is just as great a menace as here and such being the case Canada is exposed to the risk of receiving more or less undesirable immigrants; therefore be it resolved: That, in the opinion of this House, all immigration should be suspended until a normal condition of affairs is established.

In other words, he says as soon as a normal condition of affairs is established here, then Canada can receive all the more or less undesirable immigrants who are prepared to come.

> Whereas in Europe this social problem is just as great a menace as here and such being the case Canada is exposed to the risk—

I am afraid my friend from St. Mary has not given this subject the attention it requires. I rather think he is looking at the question with spectacles which will not permit him to see further than the St. Mary division of Montreal. I feel that if he had had the experience which some of us have had in this matter of immigration, he would not have introduced this resolution. I am glad to think, however, that with the possible exception of himself and the hon. member from Prescott (Mr. Proulx), who supported the resolution, no one in the House is in favour of it. I may say that I myself have introduced a resolution directly negativing, if I may so call it, the resolution of my friend from St. Mary, but it appears that his resolution having come up before mine could be reached, I shall be debarred by the rules of the House from discussing my resolution this session. I had prepared myself with a certain amount of ammunition which I intended to direct to the seat of the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder), but, fortunately for the House and the minister, this ammunition is not in the House at the moment, and consequently the minister will have to possess himself in patience until the matter comes up again.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We are not in immediate danger.

Mr. JACOBS: There is no immediate danger. I entirely agree with what my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) said just a moment before he resumed his seat. I made a note of his remark, and it was this: "I know little or nothing about the subject."

Mr. NESBITT: I did not say that.

Mr. JACOBS: I have a note of it here; that is the way it reached me. I would go so far as to say that my friend from St. Mary is in exactly the same position as the hon. member for North Oxford.

The immigration question is a great national problem. It has been said only within the last few weeks that in the solution of our national problems immigration will play a most important part. We have it from the mouth of Mr. Beatty, the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, that if our national roads are ever to be a success it will only be brought about by fostering proper immigration to this country. That seems only reasonable. Here is a land without people. How are three transcontinental railways to pay if we have not the people along the line of these roads? The question seems to me not to require any discussion. We must have people if we are to make these roads pay. Yet we have gentlemen coming into this House and telling us that inasmuch as we have unemployment in one part of the country—because we have too many artisans in that part and too few in the other—therefore, we should suspend immigration, put a ban on it for a period of two years, and afterwards let down the bars and allow the tide of immigration to flow in its natural course. That, Sir, is impossible. If we discourage immigration by putting up the bars in that way, we are going to restrict it just when we need it. There may be a little unemployment in this country. I do not know what the figures of the Department of Labour show, but I fancy the condition is not serious. When I want some one to do work for me, I cannot find any one to do it.

Mr. CANNON: They know you.

Mr. JACOBS: I did not believe that I was so well known to all the unemployed in the Dominion of Canada. What I wish to point out is that, simply because of some temporary unemployment in certain particular lines, we ought not go so far as to put up the bars against all kinds of immigration. Ever since I have been a member of this House I have been in favour of the open door with regard to immigration—the open door with, of course, certain modifications. I would not permit a single person to come into this country if he were undesirable. But what is an undesirable citizen? A man is not an undesirable because he has no money in his pocket. If that were so, there would be a very large number of respectable people in the country who would be undesirable. Very often a man is desirable just because he has no money in his pocket, because that condition provokes ambition. Where a man comes to this country without any money, that ought to be no reason for debarring him. As a matter of fact, a very large percentage, I venture to say perhaps 90 to 95 per cent, of the people in this country who came here as immigrants came just because they were poverty-stricken—if they had been well-to-do in thier own country, they would not come to Canada. What would there be to induce a man to come here if he were well-off in his own country? They come here in order to bring up their families under the better conditions that we provide in this country; they come because similar conditions do not obtain in Europe. Yet when these people come we have all kinds of annoying restrictions placed in their way. We have certain Orders in Council which were put into effect last fall, just previous to the winter season setting in, which further restricted immigration to this country. Only last week these Orders in Council were continued for an indefinite period. I would point out to the House that these restrictions were imposed in the absence of my friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization. Now that he is back, when he finds out what has been done in his absence, he wil probably see to it that these restrictions are removed. It is curious that during the entire time he was here, not one step was taken to continue these restrictions, but when he was called away to the West the restrictions were imposed.

Mr. JACOBS: I do not think he did, because I happen to know the minister very well. I have had business with his department for a considerable time, and I can testify to the intimate knowledge which he has concerning the whole immigration problem. I have from time to time brought to his attention cases of great hardship in the matter of immigrants landing on our shores, and I must say that he has brought to the solution of the cases which I placed before him in regard to immigrants a great deal of sympathy and a very intimate knowledge of the whole immigration problem. I know that at heart the minister would really like to see these Orders in Council and all the other restrictive regulations reduced to the minimum.

My hon. friend from St. Mary cited with a great deal of satisfaction this afternoon the opinion of Sir Andrew McPhail. I would like to ascertain from my hon. friend whether he is in agreement with all the opinions of Sir Anderw McPhail upon other subjects as well as immigration. Some one has said that necessity makes strange bed-fellows. Still, I was surprised to see my friend from St. Mary in agreement with Sir Andrew McPhail even on the matter of immigration. I remember some speeches delivered by Sir Andrew during the war. Is my hon. friend from St. Mary prepared to accept the views of Sir Andrew McPhail regarding the war? And if Sir Andrew was wrong in his views of the war, does not my hon. friend think he may also be wrong in these immigration suggestions of his? I would rather have the view of a man like Mr. Beatty, who intimately knows the whole question, than that of Sir Andrew McPhail, who, although he may be a very estimable gentleman, is at best a mere doctrinaire in the matter of immigration and is in the same class as my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), and my hon. friend from St. Mary. My hon. friend from Prescott (Mr. Proulx) stated that the restrictions in the United States were very much more severe than those in Canada. Well, I do not think they are. I had occasion some time ago, when discussing the question of immigration, to remark that the United States makes a rule to-day and we follow it to-morrow; or, to put it differently, they take the snuff and we do the sneezing. That is the unfortunate part of the whole situation, Mr. Speaker. The United States and Canada cannot be compared in the matter of immigration. They have been taking millions of people into their country for a period of a hundred years, and in the report published only last week by the United States Department of Immigration it was stated that during the last century 33,000,000 people had entered the United States from Europe. To-day the descendants of those people constitute the United States. What are we doing? Absolutely nothing. While the Americans have over 110,000,000 people in their country, we, I venture to think, have no more than 8,000,000. So that we cannot possibly compare conditions in the two countries, and people make a mistake when they presume for a moment to do so. What kind of people come to this country?—people who want to improve their condition, and those who have not the means to set up in Europe on their own account. And there is another class of people who come to this continent, those who are obliged to leave their own countries in Europe by reason of religious and social persecution. Now, this country, it seems to me, should be the haven of rest for people of that kind, and we ought to have our doors wide open for all those who flee from persecution, social and otherwise, in European countries. During the war a great wave of sympathy went out from Canada and the United States to those people in Europe who were ground down under the heel of autocracy and other forms of persecution. At that time we were ready to say to them: "Come unto us all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and we will give you rest." But so soon as the war is over we close our doors against them and say: For our own protection, we will not permit you to enter. When speaking on the subject of immigration a year or two ago, I related a story which, I think, was apropos to the matter under discussion. It was a story told by a Salvation Army officer of a man whom he saw in London piloting poor cripples from one side of the street to the other, jumping from one little island, as he put it, to another. The Salvation Army officer was touched by what he supposed to be the charity of the man, and expressed his pleasure accordingly. The man replied: Why, it is not a matter of charity. You see, I have no shirt on and I carry these people from one side of the street to the other to warm my back. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what we want these people to do in this country. We want them to come here to warm our backs, metaphorically speaking; because, God knows, we need it badly. If we go on much longer with our merchant marine and our national railways in their present condition, we certainly shall need someone to warm our backs, because we shall not have a shirt to our name.

My hon. friend from St. Mary, you will no doubt judge, Mr. Speaker, cannot have a very heavy foreign population in his division. I think that is a reasonable conclusion from his remarks; and I suppose, per contra, I must have a very heavy foreign population in my own division. But I trust that I am able to look at this question with a larger vision. If I felt for a moment that the advocacy of admitting large numbers of proper immigrants into this country constituted a danger to the country, I care not how many foreign or other people I have in my division, I would not advocate it. But it is because I consider that it is entirely in the interests of the country that I am in favour of the widest possible immigration, consistent, of course, with proper safeguards respecting desirability, etc., from the health and other points of view. My hon. friend from St. Mary and also the hon. member for Prescott, were evidently not aware of the fact that we have at present on the statute book, and in Orders in Council and other regulations, just such restrictions as they are asking should now be imposed by this Government. For instance, we have a regulation to the effect that no person shall be permitted to come into this country unless he is travelling from the place of his birth on a through ticket to Canada. If he comes from some of the Balkan hills where it is impossible for him to purchase a through ticket from that place to Canada, and he purchases his ticket in Antwerp, or Havre, or Liverpool, he is turned away from our shores immediately on his arrival. Surely that is a pretty severe restriction. Well, that is one of the regulations which the Immigration Department has imposed. Where it is an absolute physical impossibility for a man to purchase a through ticket, no matter what his qualifications for citizenship may be, and no matter what sum of money he may have in his possession, he is unable to land here because he was unfortunately not in a position to see to it that the Canadian Pacific Railway, or the White Star line, or some other company, had ticket offices in the town of his birth. It will be for the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) when he replies to me, to say what it is that prompted the department to put into force a regulation of that kind. To my mind it is like the peace of God—it passeth all understanding. Then we have another regulation to the effect that no person may land in this country unless he has in his possession the sum of $250. If he has $249.99 he is looked upon as an undesirable citizen and is not permitted to land on our shores. No investigation is made as to whether he is likely to become a good citizen; nothing is done to find out whether he has relatives in this country who are able and willing to look after him; no investigation can be made by the officers at the port of entry, because the regulation states that he must have $250. If he has $250 he can land, and when that money is exhausted for living expenses—and it can last only a month or two at the most—then this man may become a public charge. But the Government feels that it has done its duty when it has seen that he has $250. Why, the man may have relatives in this country worth half a million dollars who are willing to give bonds that he will not become a public charge; but all the Government cares about is to see that he has this required sum of $250. They pay no attention to the circumstances of the man's relatives who may have come out to this country previously and done well here. Now, I say that these rules are silly, that they are foolish, and that it is not in keeping with the dignity of a country like Canada to enforce them. It is true that we have a rule which says that farmers and domestic servants can enter the country freely. But what is there to ensure that if a man enters Canada as a farmer he will go on the farm? I venture to say that fifty per cent of the people who were on farms twenty-five or thirty years ago are to-day residents of the large cities. I venture to say that the domestic servants who came here fifteen or twenty years ago are no longer domestic servants. What are we going to do about it? How can we guarantee that a person who was a farmer on the other side of the Atlantic ocean is going to remain a farmer when he comes to this country? How can we say that a person who was a domestic servant in some European country is going to be a domestic servant here? How can we say that a man who was an artisan in the Old Land is not going to become a farmer here? How can we make watertight compartments in this country and say to immigrants: "If you declare you are a farmer we will let you in to go on the farm, but if, on the other hand, you declare that you are an artisan, even though you are willing to go on the farm, we refuse to permit you to enter the country." I say again, Mr. Speaker, all these rules require to be revamped. We ought to appoint a commission to investigate the whole question of immigration into Canada.

Mr. McMASTER: Not a commission.

Mr. JACOBS: The reason I suggested a commission is because I know that such an idea will appeal to the Government. They may feel it is something that will cause the whole matter to be shelved and may thus readily grant it.

Mr. CASGRAIN: We do not want to shelve the question.

Mr. JACOBS: We will not shelve the question. I hope it will come to a vote this afternoon in order that we may take the opinion of the House as to whether the resolution of my hon. friend from St. Mary is in the interest of the country. What pleased me particularly was the assertion of my hon. friend from St. Mary that he was making this resolution entirely on his personal responsibility. Well, it is such an illiberal motion, it is a motion so contrary to all ideals of freedom, that I would rather have expected it to come from an hon. member opposite. I am somewhat surprised that my hon. friend, who calls himself a Liberal, who votes Liberal, and who, I trust, thinks as a Liberal, should introduce such an illiberal resolution as this.

What was it that made this country prosperous from 1896 to 1911? I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it was the immigration policy introduced by the Laurier government and carried out by it up to the very moment that it went out of power. I had occasion to say before in this House that Sir Clifford Sifton is largely responsible for the tide of immigration which came into this country after 1896. We may have different opinions and views respecting the character of Sir Clifford Sifton but I must say this—that at no time in the history of Canada, with the possible exception of the present Minister of Immigration and Colonization, did we have a man who viewed the question of immigration so clearly as did Sir Clifford Sifton; and we ought to consider ourselves under a heavy debt of gratitude to that man for having clearly seen what was to the interest of this country, and put into force an Act to forward our immigration policy which did so much to people the West and to bring prosperity to Canada. If we adopt such a resolution as this we are going to face a most serious crisis. I warn my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization that he ought to go slowly in the matter of restrictions on immigration. There are in Europe to-day thousands and tens of thousands, yes millions, of people who would become desirable immigrants in this country; but once you make them understand and believe that Canada is only for a certain class, that although this country is one which can accommodate one hundred and fifty millions, it is going to be made a stamping ground for seven or eight millions merely, then you turn the eyes and thoughts of those desirable immigrants elsewhere, and we lose them for all time. This resolution, although it has been introduced by my hon. friend from St. Mary, who knows practically nothing of the whole question, will have served a very good purpose by promoting the present debate, and more especially if it should elicit from the Minister of Immigration and Colonization some tangible, concrete views on this highly important question.

Mr. GEORGE BOYCE (Carleton): I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to the hon. member who has just taken his seat. I regret very much that that hon. gentleman is not a farmer, because, judging from the opinions he has expressed, he would make a good one. I have heard a good many speeches in this House but I must say I do not think I ever listened to one which contains more sound common sense than the speech which my right hon. friend delivered this afternoon. There is no doubt that immigration is one of the great questions to which we should give our most thoughtful consideration at the present time. In the great West there are boundless acres lying uncultivated for the want of men to till them. In New Ontario what do we see?—millions of acres, waiting for settlers to come and cultivate the land. The need is great for desirable immigrants to enter this vast country of ours and help to increase its production. For my part I do not see why we should place such a serious handicap as now exists on respectable persons who wish to enter this country and settle here. Why should an honest man who is willing to work, and who would probably make a better living than he did in his former home, be hindered from coming into this country? I think I am safe in saying that there are hundreds and thousands—I might almost say millions—of men in the Old Land who would be only too glad to be given the opportunity of coming to Canada in order to work here and earn an honest livelihood. I have had letters from two or three men now who are there and who would like to get back to Canada. They lived here before the war broke out, and then went across the ocean to do their part. After peace came they remained in the Old Land, but although they would like to return to Canada they have not the means to carry out their desire.

I am a farmer and speak with some little knowledge of agriculture and its needs. In the county which I represent I believe employment could be found for at least one thousand qualified men in the course of a few days. In the farming industry we have been labouring under all sorts of difficulties for years, trying to get along with only about one-quarter of the labour needed, and yet we know there are any number of men available for settlement in Canada if they can only be brought here. We often hear it said that in the cities there are great numbers of idle men. I have not the least doubt that such is the case. I have visited this city myself trying to get men to work in harvest time but without success, although there seemed to be any number of persons without any visible occupation. I know of one case where a man was asked to take a place on the farm and demanded $5 a day and his board. When this was promised him he said: "Will you take my two chums?" The farmer replied in the negative and the man then said: "Oh, well, I do not want to work on a farm." That is the type of man that is idle in our large cities. Such men as this do not want to work. I have been brought up in this country and have an intimate knowledge of the conditions here, and I say that no man who is willing to work need experience hard times—he can always get sufficient employment to keep him going and yield a little to spare. I trust that no serious monetary handicap against desirable immigration into Canada will be enforced.

How are we going to amount to anything if we stop immigration? We have heard several references to the United States. Would there be a population of 110,000,000 in the United States to-day if there had been any restriction on immigration there? Not a bit of it. If we put restrictions on immigration how long will it be before we have a population of even 50,000,000? We want men who are willing to work. It deos not make any difference whether they are farm hands or mechanics, if they are willing to work they will always find plenty to do. That is the type of men we want, and I hope we will do everything to encourage such men to help in the upbuilding of Canada, so that we may become one of the great nations of the earth and our land will be a blessing to millions who will make their homes here in years to come.

Mr. J. A. ROBB (Chateauguay-Huntingdon): Mr. Speaker, the pith of the resolution presented by my hon. friend from St. Mary (Mr. Deslauriers) is that Canada should suspend all immigration until normal conditions are established. In my judgment if this resolution was adopted, and the Government based their policy upon it, my hon. friend would be helping to delay the very conditions that he wishes to bring about, because the restriction of immigration would go far to retard the re-establishment of normal conditions in this country.

Our city friends have for some years been clamouring for a reduction in the cost of living and in rents, and they complain bitterly that foodstuffs and rentals have become dearer year by year. But what has contributed more to the advancement of rents in the cities, to the detriment of the workers, than the action of the workers themselves? They are not willing to work more than eight hours a day; but, after all, that would not be so bad if they were willing to give a good eight hours' work. However, the rule apparently is to do as little work as possible, and this in very large measure is responsible for the higher rents which they have to pay. While they are clamouring for a reduction in the cost of foodstuffs, apparently our city friends forget that their advocacy of shorter hours and increased pay has taken away from the farms the people who by their work on the land would have contributed to a fair reduction of the cost of living. And our city friends by their advocacy of higher pay and shorter hours for railway workers have still further helped to increase the cost of transportation of the products of the farms to the cities. As a result, to-day we have dissatisfaction both in the cities and in the country, because there is a shortage of labour in the latter and a surplus of it in the former, and the trouble is that many of the men who were attracted to the cities by higher pay and shorter hours are disinclined to work.

I have no quarrel with my city friends for wishing to bar immigration completely, but, representing an agricultural constituency, I do not wish to see this resolution passed without saying to the minister in charge (Mr. Calder) and the Government that in my judgment what Canada requires to-day more than anything else is more and better immigration. If workers in the cities are to have cheaper foodstuffs and lower rents, Canada must produce a surplus of exportable products to meet our national obligations, and the only way to stimulate production is to encourage men to come to this country who are willing to work. I am quite ready to admit that there are a sufficient number of artisans in this country if they were only willing to work. And I am not urging upon the Minister of Immigration to make it easier for foreign agitators to enter Canada. Indeed, I am satisfied that even old Mother England should keep her agitators at home. We do not want them here, but we do want men and women who are willing to work, and therefore I do not think we would be acting wisely in placing a money restriction on the right type of immigrants. Perhaps many of us in this House would not be here had there been a money restriction placed upon the earlier settlers, for many of our parents came here with very little money; all they had was their health and their willingness to work. They did work, and their industry helped to make this country what it is to-day—attractive to those from overseas who are seeking to enter our ports. Therefore I urge upon the minister the adoption of a policy that will bring to this country all immigrants who are willing to work.

From what I read in the press recently it occurs to me that some gentlemen who are very closely associated with the Government apparently have not much confidence in its immigration policy. I noticed that recently in the city of Winnipeg there was formed what is known as the Western Canada Colonization Society, and, strange to say, instead of placing at its head the Minister of Immigration, who is himself a western man and should know the needs of the West, they selected as president a gentleman from Hamilton, Mr. Robert Hobson, one of the directors of our national railway system. The reason for the formation of that society was stated to be that, in the opinion of its organizers, Canada must have increased immigration in order to secure greater production, and instead of urging upon the Government to extend its immigration policy I gather from the newspaper reports that these gentlemen say: We are going to take this work out of the hands of the immigration authorities and ourselves see that the work is done right. It is aparent that they are not satisfied with the methods of the Immigration Department. The managing director of the association is General McRae, who did such splendid work in the war, and it has been left to him to go out and stimulate immigration. It seems to me that when the minister replies he should tell us whether the newspaper reports are correct, and whether those gentlemen are to send their agents throughout the British Isles and other parts of Europe in search of suitable immigrants, instead of leaving the work in the hands of the Immigration Department.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to suport the resolution presented by my hon. friend for St. Mary and so well argued by him from his point of view. I say in all frankness to my hon. friend from St. Mary that if the city people wish to secure lower rentals and cheaper foodstuffs, the best thing he can do for Canada is to withdraw his resolution and allow the Government to proceed along sound, sane lines as was the case in the years from 1896 until 1911, when we were so prosperous, when we had immigration of anywhere from 200,000 to 350,000 each year. That is the policy we require for Canada—not the restriction or suspension of immigration.

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I think there is a good deal to be said in favour of the resolution, the effect of which is to recommend to the Government that all immigration shall be suspended until conditions again become normal. We all have to admit that conditions are not normal at present, and it seems to me that they are going to become worse before they get better. Factories and industries all over the country are closing down; we hear that every day, and a great many men are out of employment. I was in Hamilton during the Easter holidays and I heard there that a lot of the Hamilton factories were closing down and that a great many men would be out of employment. Included in the institutions which are closing down, I think, is the International Harvester Company, a big concern which employed 3,500 men. Now, we have bread lines in nearly all the cities. I know that in Vancouver a great many men are at present out of employment, men who want work but cannot get it. I do not agree with the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) that the unemployed of Canada are men who do not want to work; there are a great many men who cannot get work. That being the case, why should we bring into the country a lot of men to make conditions worse? Because that is what the result would be. The great argument seems to be that the farmers are unable to get help. Well, I think the time will come, and come very soon, when the unemployed in the cities may be very glad to go back on the farm, and when that time comes you will have lots of men, and good men, to work on the farms.

When I was coming up from Hamilton I met one of the men who had been thrown out of employment through the closing down of a factory in that city. I got into conversation with him. I do not know what his name is, but I ascertained that he was one of the Princess Pats, one of the men who came back with the remnant of that famous regiment not so very long ago and marched along the streets of Ottawa; one of the regiment of which we are all so proud. That man said he had been working in a factory where threshing machines were manufactured; that the concern had been getting no business for some time and had had to close down. I asked him what he was going to do. He said: I am going to a farm here where I have secured employment. I believe that will be the case with a great many men; when they cannot get any other work they will have to go on the farm. I believe conditions will right themselves and that we have in Canada sufficient men to look after all the work which is required to be done on the farms.

The matter of the need for domestic servants has been referred to during the course of the discussion. I believe it would be advisable to encourage the coming to this country of domestic servants, because there is a shortage of that class of labour in Canada. If a good, capable girl comes into the country, in a short time she gets married, and I believe we should encourage that kind of thing if they are the right kind of people.

It has been said also that the solution of our railroad problem, which is a most unfortunate one, of course, is to throw open the doors to immigration and let everybody in. That course has been urged by men like Mr. Beatty, of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and the hon. member from Marquette (Mr. Crerar). Well, that may later be the proper policy; when conditions right themselves it will, I suppose, be proper for the railroad companies to do as they did before and bring people to this country by the thousands and tens of thousands. But I do not believe that time has come; I do not believe that the bringing of immigrants into Canada by the wholesale will help out our railroad situation. Before you throw open the doors, I would say, get rid of the bread lines—which involves practically what the mover of the resolution (Mr. Deslauriers) suggests, namely, the return of conditions to normal. I am not a pessimist, by any means; I believe that we have a great country and that a great future lies before us. But we should be very careful not to make conditions worse during the next few years.

The United States is restricting immigration, and no doubt a large number of people who are refused entrance into that country will try to come into Canada. Something has been said about the policy of the late Liberal Administration, and Sir Clifford Sifton's name was mentioned, great credit being given to him for bringing so many people into the country. But I am afraid that under that policy a great many people of the wrong kind were brought in. I do not think that the country gained anything by the admission into Canada of people like the Doukhobors, for instance,—I mention simply that one class; there are others. These people do not do any good to the country, so far as I have been able to discover. They have their own settlements; they make money for themselves; they cultivate the land, it is true, but they remain more or less a foreign settlement in our midst. I do not think that is what we want; we do not want men who, when we get into any kind of trouble, will say that they are conscientious objectors and that they are not going to take any part in the defence of the country. We want people who will make good Canadians, who will perform the duties of Canadians, and who will help to make Canada the country which it ought to be.

I stated that there was a good deal to be said for this resolution, but I do not wish it to be inferred that I would support such a drastic proposition as this. I believe rather that the policy which the Government has adopted, of the very strictest kind of supervision of people who are trying to get into Canada, should be followed out. Such people should be examined in every possible way. I quite agree that it is not sufficient to qualify them that they should possess the sum of $250 or any definite amount of money; they should be the right kind of people, and the Government should examine them very strictly in order to find out whether that is the case or not. I would allow in, as the Government is doing, domestic servants and farm labourers. It is quite true that when you let in a farm labourer, you cannot be at all sure that that man is going to stay on the farm, but a certain number of them will do so. They have the farming instinct in them, and if they cannot get employment in other lines, they will go on the farm. I want to help the farmers; there are many farmers in my constituency, and there is a certain amount of room for men who will go on the land, particularly in the West. Let in domestic servants; let in farmers; but be very careful, though, about the class of people that you let in to be farmers. The mere fact that a man has been a farmer in some European country, to my mind, does not altogether qualify him as a proper citizen of Canada.

Some hon. members, in speaking of the need for farm help, have, perhaps, to a certain extent, exaggerated the situation. There are in this country people to work on the farms, provided that you can induce them to do so. If a man is out of work and will not go on a farm, there must be something wrong either with the man or with the treatment that he receives when he goes on the farm to work. Something can be done to improve conditions on farms so as to make them more attractive for men who might be expected to work on them. I am, unfortunately, not a farmer, and possibly I have not a great deal of information about the way in which farm labourers are treated; but it seems to me that they are more or less turned out in the backyard to live; that they are not given proper accommodation, and that they are not treated exactly as they should be in more respects than one. The time is coming when the farmer will have to get down to the eight-hour day, and while some hon. members may smile at that, things are changing; in other lines of industry, the eight-hour day has had to be adopted, and I do not see why farm labouring should not be considered in exactly the same way as labouring at any other kind of work.

This resolution should not pass, but the Government should carry on the policy, which the minister has stated as reported in the press, of the very strictest supervision of immigration for some time to come.

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS (Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, the question of immigration, to my mind, is one of the greatest questions confronting the people of Canada at the present time. At the outset let me say that I have not the slightest sympathy with the resolution propounded by the hon. member for St. Mary's division of Montreal (Mr. Deslauriers). Some facts with regard to the difficulties of admittance of settlers into this country under the present immigration regulations were set forth very clearly by the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) and I agree entirely with every statement he made in that regard. In the province from which I come we can accommodate millions of immigrants. The previous speaker (Mr. McQuarrie) stated that, under the regime of Sir Clifford Sifton there came into this country a certain kind of immigration which, in his judgment, was not in the best interest of Canada. He mentioned the class of Doukhobors. Personally, I have no knowledge of the Doukhobors; but I presume, in his classification of Doukhobors, he also included other residents of Austria and Russia who were of the same type, but who do not hold the same religious convictions which the Doukhobors hold.

In Alberta, we have a large number of foreign-speaking settlers who are now Canadian citizens, men who came from Austria, from Russia, and some from Germany. In spite of any criticism which may have been made as to the immigration policy which was put into effect in 1897 or thereabouts, I make the statement in this House that that immigration policy was the foundation of the success of this country, and that Alberta and the other western provinces have profited greatly by the settlement of those people on our fertile lands. The regulations in vogue to-day contain so many restrictive measures that a great injustice is being perpetrated on people, particularly from certain sections of Europe, coming into this country. Those people, in many instances, are relatives of people living in Western Canada at the present time, who are progressive, well-to-do people, and who are prepared to take the chances of seeing that those people do not become charges on the country. I have had, under my personal observation, many cases of former Austrian citizens, former Russian citizens, former Polish citizens, now living in this country, who are quite prepared to give a bond, if necessary, to the Government that their relatives will not be a charge on the public of this country if they are allowed admittance. But they cannot get in, and yet we see other types of people coming into Canada who are not in the same class whatever as settlers, who are not under any circumstances to be regarded as being of as great value to the country as some of those people whose entry into this country has been prohibited by regulation.

We have a tremendous transportation problem on our hands; we have tremendous resources undeveloped; we have a huge national debt, and if we are ever going to get out of the mire, we must have the people. In my judgment the $250 qualification does not represent the value of an immigrant in the slightest degree. If I might be personal, I might cite the case of my father who came to this country in 1853 with one sovereign in his pocket. and who had to make his way in a country where the advantages at that time were not nearly as great as they are to-day. His case is only one of thousands This country was built up by men of that kind. If we are going to restrict and hamper this class of people we are not going to have a country at all.

Hon. gentlemen have referred to what the United States is doing, but the United States cannot be compared with us at the present time. They have in the neighbourhood of 110,000,000 people, while we have only a paltry 8,000,000 or 9,000,000. We have as large an arable country as they have, yet we are putting up the bars against possible assets in the form of hard-working industrious people who will make this country a place that we shall all be proud to live in. I am entirely in favour of the bars being thrown down to a great extent; at all events, more than they are at the present time. Give us a policy that will bring the most progressive and strongest type of immigrants to this country, and I have no fear as to what the results will be in the future.

Mr. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James, Montreal): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, as this motion may go to a vote, I wish to address the House though very briefly, on the subject, if only to qualify my stand in reference to it.

I must first congratulate the member from St. Mary's (Mr. Deslauriers) for having brought about this debate and this independantly of what he had to say, and I should like also to congratulate him for having opened it in French, since this permits some of the members from the province of Québec to follow it in their own language. I hope that the minister in charge of the debate will not think it a lack of courtesy if I continue in the same language as that used by the member from St. Mary's, since the arguments on the debate have been offered in such profusion in English that he has certainly been able to form his opinion without having to hear in detail that which I wish to say. I will add though, that the Government is but imperfectly represented in this debate, since, while it is mainly a question of immigration that has been raised, it is at the same time one of labour. Once more we are shown the proof of the absurd position of the present Government which has in the Senate some of the ministers who are at the head of the most important departments, notably that department among all others which should be represented in the democratic House, the lower House, the House of those elected by the people, the department of labour. But I hope that upon this side of the House we have voices powerful enough to make themselves heard even in the richly decorated hall of the Upper House.

I agree with a good part of what has been said by my friend the member from St. Mary's who shares with me the distinction of representing one of the divisions of Canada's metropolis, and who is my neighbour on the left in the city of Montreal. I also agree with the part of what has been said by my neighbour on the right, the member from Georges-Etienne-Cartier (Mr. Jacobs), and it is an odd circumstance that though I am geographically situated between them, I should be called upon to take a stand which is not entirely that of either of them.

The member from St. Mary's maintains that the labour situation is such that all immigration should be suspended. The member from Georges Etienne-Cartier on his part answers, "It is true that the situation of labour is difficult enough, but nevertheless we should continue to open wide our doors." It appears to me, Mr. Speaker, that it should be possible to find in a treatise on architecture the contrivance of an aperture which be neither the dark closed grill of my hon. friend on my left, so to speak, nor the wide-open door of the member from Georges-Etienne-Cartier.

It is rather remarkable that the member from St. Mary's, while pretending to treat the immigration question as a whole, contents himself with presenting the arguments which have to do with the problem of unemployment from the labourer's point of view. It did not occur to him that one of the ways of solving the problem of unemployment in the towns is to increase the population in the country districts, for the larger the rural population, the greater is the need for articles manufactured in the towns. A community after all is like a person, it must be fed. But there are certain foods which suit this person and others which are distasteful to him, and if a diet of overfeeding (which I suspect my hon. friend from Georges-Etienne-Cartier of wishing to prescribe) would not agree just now with the Canadian people, I do not believe that we would be justified in exposing the community to starvation by cutting off the supply of food which it needs. For who can deny that up to a certain point we need immigration in Canada? The member from St. Mary's says that he does not wish an indiscriminate invitation to our shores extended to all would-be immigrants, but it seems to me that he falls into the opposite danger, which is to prevent all, without distinction, from coming in. If the motion is not at fault in its premises, if it be true, as he has so ably shown with the science and eloquence which gained for him the support of the most thickly populated county of the Dominion, I really believe that we have unemployment in our cities, and that this constitutes a grave problem. He adds that the Government purposes to study this question. This is also true, in the exact terms in which he puts it. The Government, alas, purposes all sorts of things and then does nothing further about them! It is true that a social upheaval exists in Europe, and that on this side we are exposed to having undesirable immigrants. All this, from my point of view, is quite true. But I am forced to disagree with my hon. friend from St. Mary's, when he asks that immigration be completely suspended, though that does not mean that I accept in their entirety the views of my hon. friend from George-Etienne-Cartier.

In fact, we know that in his conclusions the hon. member for St. Mary's has allowed it to be understood that he is willing to modify to a certain extent his conclusions; and he admitted that there might be immigrants who would become excellent citizens. It is therefore easy to see that we can come to an understanding. We must therefore content ourselves with asking the Government to exercise a reasonable control over the immigration that presents itself at our doors. This is what is done by our neighbours of the United States. I do not wish to prolong this discussion—I have here a very interesting compilation from The Literary Digest, on the subject of immigration to the United States, in which is explained, by extracts from different American papers, how they mean to proceed in that country. In the United States, though it is a very populous country, already having 110 million inhabitants, it is not the intention to stop immigration, because it is admitted that even in that thickly peopled country, certain elements from European or other sources may be needed. It is all the more so, Mr. Speaker, in Canada, where we are only 8 millions; where we have to face immense problems; where we have, for instance, the problem of State-owned railways—a problem which can only be solved as it seems by adding to the population of the country in years to come—where we have a heavy war-debt which will be reduced if our population increases. If this tax is so much per head to-day, it is evident that when the population is 16 millions it will be reduced by 50 per cent. Unless the Government persist in increasing the debt by their extravagance, but, notwithstanding the Government's great aversion to go before the people, we know very well that there cannot be a longer delay than fifteen or sixteen months. We must have a "back to the land" policy, and I believe that the member from St. Mary's will admit that in the increasing of the rural population lies a remedy—I do not say the only remedy, for no single remedy can solve a complex problem—for the evil of unemployment in the towns however would certainly disappear with reference to foreign immigration, I would like to add a word. I declare in all sincerity before this House, that there are different European elements the incorporating of which would be a distinct gain to us. I would like to mention some who have become Canadian citizens and are worthy of our attention, for instance, the Syrians. Those who are familiar with Montreal, particularly the east end, know that they are easily assimilated; that they readily learn not only French but English, that they are industrious, and become merchants, not labourers. We have in Montreal, on Notre Dame St. east, and in other parts of the town, not only in the constituency of St. James, but in other constituencies, a Syrian population carrying on business along sound and profitable lines and constituting an immigration eminently desirable. Nevertheless I know, from having talked with them, that most of these Syrians came into the country with less than $250 which the Government now exacts on arrival.

As the hon. member from Georges-Etienne-Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) strongly put it just now, it is not the rich, it is not those who are comfortably off at home, who emigrate; those who leave their own country are the ones who seek better conditions than are possible for them at home. I do not wish to discuss in all its details this particular restriction which the Government imposes upon immigration, but I would like to simply show in a general way, and to remain within the bounds of this afternoon's discussion, that this question is very complex, and that it is very difficult to settle it by arrangements of a special character. This is why, in the best of spirit, and because my hon. friend from St. Mary's (Mr. Deslauriers) is one of the best Liberals I know, that I would suggest that he further develop his view of which he gave us a glimpse in the last sentences of his speech. In these he admitted that if it were necessary to maintain a barrier against all immigrants who might be a cause of social disaggregation, or of overbidding on the labour market, a door must nevertheless be left open not necessarily wide open, but it must be left ajar for a certain class of immigrants whom we need in our rural distracts.

Personally, I wish to say that I would gladly vote for a resolution along these lines, but I would be very sorry indeed to vote against that of the hon. member for St. Mary's should it remain exactly in its present form.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (Oxford South): After listening attentively to the speeches delivered on this resolution, I cannot help expressing the regret I feel, that it is rather unfortunate that the vision of some of those who have addressed the House does not extend beyond the borders of their own constituencies. The resolution reads in part:

> Whereas the question of unemployment in our large cities has become a serious problem . . . . therefore be it resolved: That, in the opinion of this House, all immigration should be suspended until a normal condition of affairs is established.

The large cities, it seems, are the only points to be considered, and all the other sections of the community, and the interests of the people in general, are to be lost sight of. One almost imagines, from the remarks that have been made upon the resolution, that the people of Canada and the people of the world at large ought to be in a normal condition to-day. It would be strange indeed, after the world-wide convulsion that has taken place, if there were not an unsettled state of affairs in many parts of the world, and in many sections of our own community. The conditions that prevailed during the war were entirely different from what they are to-day, and were in no small measure responsible for those unsettled conditions which the mover of the resolution referred to as existing at present in the large industrial centres. We heard a great deal during the war about profiteers, and the charge of profiteering was frequently hurled at a certain class of people. I question, however, whether any section of the community are altogether free from this offence, and many of those people who to-day are out of employment in the large cities are in my opinion not free from this charge. It is true there has been a great influx of people from all parts of the country into the large industrial centres, where wages during the war were higher than they have ever been in the past. In the manufacturing of munitions and other necessary war material, our people have congregated in these centres and now, owing to the cessation of hostilities, are to-day without the employment which they had during the years of the war. I venture to say that there was never a time in the history of Canada when labour was so necessary as it is at the present time. It is the only thing upon which we can rely to pull us out of the difficult position in which we are placed. True, it may be impossible for some people to get employment in the trades and industries in which they had been previously engaged; but if they are out of employment to-day it is largely because they will not do the work which is to be done and which must be done before we shall be able to get back to a normal state. The mover of the resolution would bar all immigration into this country. Well, there is a certain class of immigrants whom I would not permit to come here at any time or under any conditions. But just now there is a certain class of people who are anxious to come to Canada, and I believe they ought to receive consideration at the hands of the Government. If you wait until you absorb all the elements that we find in the large cities to-day, then you will wait a long time; you will wait until those desirable settlers who are eager to come to Canada have gone to some other country. There are in Great Britain to-day immense numbers of men and women who are anxious to come to Canada and make this country their home. But some one says: If you bring these people here they must go on the land, and what assurance have you that they will remain there if you permit them to come in? A few hours ago, before the Pensions Committee of this House, we had certain witnesses, one of whom represented the tubercular patients at the hospital at Hamilton, where they had adopted an industrial scheme whereby they are building houses on the outskirts of the city for tubercular patients and establishing what is known as a "vetcraft industry." Men of means have interested themselves in their behalf as they are anxious that the Government should do something for them. The promotees have made careful observations as to what lines of business can be carried on under the auspices of this organization with a view to making them a success. A witness who appeared before the committee to-day, Mr. Speaker, a shrewd young man who has evidently made a study of the subject, referred to the various industries which could be carried on profitably and without subjecting tuberculous patients to undue strain. But he made some statement which was rather significant, he said that so far as agriculture was concerned they did not intend to do anything because it was absolutely unprofitable. I am afraid that a great many hon. gentlemen will not agree with me if I should concur in the view of that witness. Nevertheless it is very significant to-day to learn from a persual of the daily newspapers that many of the essential articles of food in Canada are being imported from Europe and South America and China where labour is cheap. These articles of food are coming into competition with Canadian products, and are taking the place of commodities that ought to be raised in this country. Why, Sir, look at our vast extent of territory which to-day is only occupied by some eight or nine millions of people. We have laid the foundations of great public works intended to aid in the settlement and development of the Dominion. We have built railways, we have dug canals, and we are building steamships to assist in carrying our produce to the various markets of the world. The foundations of a great system of transportation have been well and truly laid; and to-day we are anxiously waiting for people to come in and help develop this country, waiting for people to come here and fill the vacant places that need to be filled, and whose coming is justified by the immense area of this country, as yet so sparsely populated. The transportation system of Canada is in a very precarious condition to-day and I believe that it is more largely responsible for the existing unrest and the lack of employment than anything else. I believe that if we had lower railway rates in the Dominion you would not find the stagnation in business which you do find to-day. Who is responsible for the condition of our railways? It is not altogether due to the fact that we have built too far in advance of our needs, or rather that in many sections of the country there are railways paralleling each other, railways which should not have been built. Railway companies have been competing among themselves in order to obtain traffic, but they have not given that cheap service to the country which should have resulted from a competition in the real sense of the term. We find that during the war the railway unions of Canada, which were better organized perhaps than other unions, not only kept abreast of the high wages being paid to workers for turning out munitions and other necessities of war, but their remuneration was far in advance of that received in other branches of labour. The result is that it would appear as though the railway employees in Canada to-day considered that the railways were built for their convenience and benefit rather than for the convenience and benefit of the people as a whole.

As to the question of immigration we ought to be careful about the class of immigrants we permit to enter Canada. I have here a clipping which was published in a newspaper in 1913, just before the war broke out, and the article refers to information which had come from Berlin, that the Canadian Pacific Railway had succeeded in securing twenty thousand immigrants per month to come out to this country, and that these immigrants were mainly Austrians and people from southern Europe. There may have been some method in the policy of bringing immigrants to Canada which was pursued at that time; but in view of what has transpired during the past six or seven years we ought to be careful to see that the immigrants permitted to enter Canada are in sympathy with our laws and institutions. At the same time if we enforce a penalty, as it were, to the extent of $250 against the entrance of desirable immigrants we are going to handicap our people in a way that nothing else can do. As has been already pointed out by previous speakers, labour was never more difficult to secure in the rural districts. Never before was it so difficult to secure satisfactory farm labour as it is at this particular time. I think it was the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) who declared that the farmers do not treat their help properly and who proclaimed himself in favour of an eight-hour day, in order to overcome the difficult situation that confronts us. I say, and I have said it on previous occasions in this House, that what we need is labour and a class of labour that will not be too particular as to whether it works half an hour over the usual time or not. It is not an eight-hour day that is so necessary in many walks of life, but a desire to give value for the wages received. This is what is needed in order to establish confidence and put many of these industries on their feet again. My hon. friend says that the farmer should adopt the eight-hour day. Well we have to-day to consider the competition from Holland, Denmark, Argentine, and other countries whose products are now sold in Canada but of a quality that does not begin to compare with our own. Surely we are not going to permit such inferior importations to take the place of commodities which ought to be produced in our own country.

I had no intention of speaking on this resolution, I had not even read it before coming to the House this afternoon, but I do desire to put the Government on their guard against paying too much attention to the demands of some of the labour unions in Canada. These unions are asking not only that the hours of labour shall be cut down, but they are even fixing the amount of labour that a man will be permitted to do, with the result that if he exceeds the maximum he is fined by the union to which he belongs. It does not appear to be a question of giving value for what is received; it is an effort to curtail as much as possible what each individual man can do. How can a country expect to have prosperity under such conditions? If you follow such a policy out to its logical conclusion you must apply the same regulation to every other class in the community. The same standard must apply to all, which would mean that the Government would eventually have to take charge of the entire population and provide that they shall do just so much labour without competition, which all will admit, is an absolute impossibility. I do not believe it is advisable for a government to attempt to undertake anything that the people ought to do and are capable of doing for themselves. There are sufficient necessary duties devolving upon a government without its seeking new spheres of activity along that line. But I want to say again that the only hope for our country is to have competition whereby the best will come to the front, merit must be the test, because once you eliminate competition you are going to have stagnation. And that is the very thing sought to be accomplished by the so-called Independent Labour party of Canada. I realize that I may be saying something that will not be very popular in many parts of the country and it may be in certain sections of the constituency that I represent, but I have been accustomed to say exactly what I think on matters of public importance since I have been a member of this House, although, I recognize such frankness is not always popular in certain quarters. But I am so seized of the seriousness of the situation with which we are confronted to-day that I welcome this opportunity to put on record my views in regard to this question. You must remove the shackles that are to-day placed on trade, you must permit natural and normal development, and you must see that our transportation facilities are placed in such a position as will make them of the greatest possible use in the further development of the Dominion. Given these conditions, I am satisfied that the genius of our people will overcome the difficulties with which we are now surrounded.

Mr. J. W. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): Mr. Speaker, my only reason for taking part in this debate is that the question of immigration is so closely related with that of employment. I think it is rather strange that a debate of this kind should have arisen, even at this time, in a country such as Canada, and I am surprised that any one would advocate the barring out of suitable immigrants when our broad acres and our many natural resources are waiting the necessary labour to develop them.

We have heard a great deal this afternoon about unemployment, but it has not been suggested that there is much unemployment in our rural sections. It has, however, been stated that the unemployment situation is very general in all our urban centres and very serious. This condition, according to some people, is due to the refusal of labour to work reasonable hours for reasonable wages; certain others have been disposed to blame this condition on the employers; but in this particular I think the discussion has really overlooked the actual cause. I submit, Sir, that the present serious labour situation is a very sad commentary on the fiscal policy which Canada has so foolishly followed during the last fifty years. This policy was entered upon to a certain extent to afford employment to labour. We have heard a great deal of argument along this line in the last few years, and even in the present session, in the Address which we had from His Excellency it was mentioned that the present Administration was still pursuing the policy of protection in order to afford employment to our labouring men. After following that policy for fifty years, is it not strange that we have such a serious unemployment situation in our urban centres to-day? Surely the advocates of protection will not further argue that a continuance of that policy will afford permanent employment to the working men of this country. Protection has encouraged industry, but industry is dependent on so many conditions outside of itself that there are certain times when it flourishes very rapidly and demands a great deal of labour, while at other times it is beset by certain unfavourable conditions and it turns labour out. This is a great hardship on the labouring man, for he cannot easily change his employment. Therefore I would suggest that it is very unwise to continue a policy of trying to build up in this country large industrial centres which are so dependent on external conditions. I would suggest instead a policy of encouraging some of our basic industries, such as agriculture, which is not so dependent on outside conditions, and which will afford permanent employment for many more thousands of labourers than we have at the present day.

Much has been said about permitting farm labourers to come into this country, and excluding artisans. Well, the farm labourer who has come to us in the past has, after spending a few months on the farm, usually drifted into the urban centres to become an artisan. That has been the experience of the past and will likely be the experience of the future so long as we follow a policy which makes agricultural labour so unremunerative. I was struck by a remark made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sutherland) who immediately preceded me, that if you eliminate competition you produce stagnation. I would suggest to him that the fiscal policy of protection tends toward that very thing, towards restricting competition, and so inevitably producing stagnation.

I want to combat one or two statements made by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie). He intimated that the reason why agricultural labour was so scarce in this country was that hired men were not properly treated. I think he used the expression, that they were turned out into the back yard. I think the hon. gentleman admitted that he was not a farmer and was not familiar with farming conditions. This is quite evident or he would never have made such a statement.

Mr. SMITH: Is not that partly true?

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): The hired man has usually the same privileges, the same food and the same accommodation as the farmer and his family enjoy. The hon. member for New Westminster also stated that he advocated an eight-hour day for the farmer. Well, I am sure the majority of farmers would welcome an eight-hour day.

Mr. SMITH: Are you sure of that?

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): I am quite sure they would welcome an eight-hour day on the farm.

But I might advise the hon. gentleman that if such a thing came to pass our urban population would very soon be paying possibly a dollar a pound for their butter and for their beef and bacon, fifty or sixty cents a pound for their cheese, a couple of dollars a dozen for their eggs, and so on down the list. That would be the inevitable result from the establishment of an eight-hour day on the farm. I think it would be very unfortunate if this resolution were concurred in and suitable immigration to this country restricted at the present time.

Mr. W. K. BALDWIN (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, this, to me, is one of the most important resolutions which has been presented to the House this session. If we cast our eye over this broad Dominion, three or four thousand miles in its extent, and consider the proportion which our population bears to our railway mileage, to our vast agricultural possibilities, our great waterways, our splendid mineral and other resources, we must come to the conclusion that only by increasing our population through a wise immigration policy can these vast resources be developed and our country attain its fullest progress. We have an area comparable with that of the United States; see what they have done. It is only recently that they have had restrictive immigration laws of any kind. People come from the four corners of the earth to that great country, and, as some hon. members have said here to-day, whether these immigrants be Norwegians or Swedes or Germans or Danes, they have been the best possible immigration agents and they look after their people as they come in. So unless we wish to retard and hold back the progress of this great Dominion we must work along progressive lines. Look at our railway system, our great agricultural and mining possibilities and our water-powers which, if developed, would enable us to get most of our coal in our own country instead of from Pennsylvania and to keep our money at home. All these branches of development need help, need the assistance of labour. Let me say right here that the climatic conditions of this country are such as to discourage the coming here of those nomadic races who live by putting their hands into the other fellow's pocket. We do not want that class of people; we want a better class. We do not want loafers; we have enough of them already. I am interested in some large undertakings and have been for many years, and I can say that there never was a time when it was harder to get labour than it is to-day. We talk about farmers and the need for production. Well, the value of the products of the farm has declined to the extent of one-third, and if the farmer is to go ahead, if he is to extend his tillable land, he must be enabled to get labour and to get it at rates more consistent with the prevailing prices of farm products.

We know that labour creates all things, all that we eat and use and wear, and our population must increase if this country of ours is to go along as it should. It is appalling to see hon. members looking no further than their own constituencies, their own little neighbourhoods. The great province from which I come, with all its important industries and its agricultural possibilities, loses one-half the people born within its borders—people who are persuaded to go down to the New England States through the inducements of cheap land and high wages.

Mention has been made of the need for domestic servants. Well, many who come from the Old Land and who would otherwise act in the capacity of domestic servants are absorbed in the Civil Service of Canada. In my opinion we have in this country—and I care not who hears it—three civil servants where we should have one, and here is where a great deal of our domestic help is absorbed. Then there are the telephone concerns and other institutions which want to employ people during a few hours each day; it is ridiculous. I know captains of industry in this country who work fifteen hours a day—there are not many of them, because it does not take a great many captains of industry to make a country grow; but they are all handicapped by the lack of labour. Agriculture is especially handicapped, and will be until we can get labour more cheaply. We are handicapped in a sense, even by the three thousand miles of border line between this country and the rich and powerful United States, a line so easily crossed by our people who seek to take advantage of the inducements offered by that country. They are re-claiming their marsh lands, re-claiming their arid lands by irrigation, even re-claiming lands along the Atlantic coast which are lower than the sea level. They are doing all these things to develop that wonderful country, and they are offering strong inducements to Canadians to go down there. I submit that we should have a system under which any one can come to this country who is law-abiding and willing to work.

Mr. J. R. WILSON (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, the resolution before the House is a most important one and if concurred in might give rise to far-reaching and serious results. I believe, Sir, that there is inseparably bound up with this question of immigration the question whether this country is to progress or to stand still. Prior to the war, immigration was, so to speak, the life-blood of Canada, infusing new life and progress into our country. I agree that it may be well for us to restrict certain classes of immigration; certainly we do not need many more of certain classes of people. What we do require are persons who will settle on our rich agricultural lands, which are awaiting the touch of the hand of man to blossom forth and to produce all that is required for man's sustenance.

We have in the three prairie provinces about 1,100,000 people who are located on the land, holding in the neighbourhood of 26,000,000 acres. It is estimated that the arable land in those provinces consists of about 152,000,000 acres. If this land were settled even to the extent that the occupied parts of the provinces are now settled—which is sparsely—and brought under cultivation, there would be located on the land in these three prairie provinces about 8,000,000 people thus doubling our present population. It seems to me that the only solution of some of the problems which face us is a strong immigration policy to settle these vacant lands which are capable of valuable production.

It also seems to me that, in past years, in our policy of subsidizing railways, we were working at the wrong end. We were subsidizing and assisting railways to pay interest on bonds, which interest the railways were unable to meet owing to their having been built in advance of the settlement of the country. When the railways found that they were unable, through lack of traffic, to earn sufficient to pay their way, in years gone by they approached the Government, and the Government handed out assistance. At that time it was my opinion, if assistance that had been given in order railways had possibly been given in order to encourage agriculture and to induce men to go on the lands of the West, we, perhaps, would not have had the railways coming to the Government with their hands out for assistance to pay interest on bonds.

In this regard I should like to give an illustration of something that happened not so many years ago. In 1914—this is a matter of history—hon. members will remember that we had a very dry season in the West; that many farmers, through failure of crops, were faced with the problem of securing seed, and they had no money with which to secure it. The Government came to their assistance and furnished seed at an expense of about $10,000,000. What did that return in wealth to this country? At that time I was managing one of the Government elevators and I was in fairly close touch with this proposition, because there passed through my hands about a million and a half bushels of that seed I kept track of the districts into which the seed went. As things turned out, in 1915, we had, I will admit, an abnormally heavy crop; but the grain that was furnished by the Government, purchased at a cost of about $10,000,000, returned in wealth to the farmers of Canada, which after all means Canada as a whole, at a very conservative estimate, about $150,000,000. But the return did not stop there. If that grain was transported via our all-Canadian route from its point of origin to the Atlantic seaboard, it brought about $35,000,000 to the transportation companies. I give that as an illustration of my statement that I think we have been working at the wrong end with our railways in helping them to meet deficits. The only way in which we can solve the railway problem which is now confronting us is by increasing settlement on our western land, increasing production and thereby increasing traffic and revenue to our railways.

I think everyone admits that agriculture has been in the past, is at present, and will be, for some years to come, the basic industry of Canada. I was a little bit interested and amused to hear the hon. member for Glengarry and Stormont (Mr. Kennedy) blame the fiscal policy of this country for the unemployment which exists at the present time in our cities. This is a condition which prevails throughout the world, as can easily be found by correspondence with foreign countries or conversing with men who have travelled through them. There is not in the world to-day another country in which conditions, generally speaking, are as good as they are in Canada. Many problems confront us; but if we hold to a national spirit of self-reliance and have some confidence in our ability to meet and surmount those obstacles, we will meet and surmount them. I feel certain that this resolution will not be accepted, or taken very seriously, by members of the House, and it would be a calamity if it were.

The hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) referred to some impediments put in the way of immigrants coming into this country. I have had experience in dealing with some cases, and the regulations seem to me to be a little drastic, to work a hardship, and to be somewhat unfair. Prospective settlers who buy a ticket, possibly en route, who may be laid up for a month or two on account of illness and who then continue their journey, are debarred from entry into Canada owing to the journey not having been a continuous one. Some cases have occurred where part of the family is in Canada. This works a hardship, and it is something that should be taken note of.

As I said some few minutes ago, I did not intend to speak on this question, and I do not wish to take up any more of the time of the House, as time is passing and I know the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) wishes to have a little time in which to give us some information and probably an outline of what his policy in the future will be. In conclusion, I think this $250 qualification for the class of immigrants that we are in need of in this country, is putting a handicap on their coming in, and it should be seriously considered whether we should put any impediment in the way of the entry into Canada of the class which we are most in need of and most desirous of having. We all admit that the great need of this country is more people. People at the present time seem to be inclined to move, and while they have that inclination and we being in need of more people, now is the time for us to bestir ourselves and take advantage of the opportunity of securing as many as possible of the class of immigrants that we desire to have.

Mr. LUCIEN CANNON (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer just a few brief remarks on the resolution which is before us for debate. First of all, I am in accord with the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Wilson) when he says that the resolution probably goes too far. I would not favour barring altogether immigration into Canada, but I would favour a policy, on the part of the Government, under present conditions of restricting immigration to a certain extent. When one is considering this problem of immigration into Canada, the first consideration which comes to one's mind is: whence at the present time can immigrants come into Canada? Immigration certainly cannot come from Africa, for obvious reasons. Nor can it come from Asia. We have endeavoured in the past, and we are still endeavouring now, not only to restrict, but to bar altogether, immigration from Asiatic countries. Therefore, immigration can only come from the United States or from Europe. As regards American immigration, the more we have the better for Canada. As regards immigration from European sources, I think we should be very cautious and very careful; in fact, we cannot be too cautious or too careful. Immigrants cannot come into Canada from France, they cannot come from Belgium, they cannot come from any of the allied countries in any great numbers. We can only expect European immigration from the central Empires or from Russia. Now is that immigration desirable? Should we open wide our gates to Russian immigration, to German immigration, to Austrian immigration? That is a question of very great importance, and I am quite sure that before coming to any definite conclusion hon. members of this House will think the matter over very, very seriously.

Mr. JACOBS: May I point out that Austrian and German immigration is debarred completely from Canada?

Mr. CANNON: Notwithstanding the laws or regulations that might exist as regards Austrian or German immigration, these people manage in some way or other to evade the laws which exist in their own country.

Mr. JACOBS: The Canadian law prevents them from entering here.

Mr. CANNON: They evade the law in Germany and in Austria, and it is only when the Canadian laws are enforced that these immigrants are kept from coming into Canada in as great numbers as they desire to come.

Mr. JACOBS: They cannot, under the Canadian law, enter this country.

Mr. CANNON: They have such laws in both Germany and Austria, and I say that these people evade the laws of their own country and come here.

Mr. JACOBS: But they cannot land in Canada.

Mr. CANNON: That is exactly the question I am discussing. Should we allow them to land in as great numbers as they now do land in Canada? German immigrants who have come to Canada and have settled here have become very good citizens. The German immigrants who came to Ontario, for instance, many years ago have become very good citizens. We have a striking example of how good a Canadian citizen a man of German descent may be in the person of my hon. friend who represents the constituency of North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). Therefore, I do not say that an immigrant should be debarred from Canada just because he is an Austrian or a German or a Russian, but I say that the more care the Government takes to examine into each particular and special case, the better it will be for the welfare of our country.

I have heard it said this afternoon that it is in the interests of Canada that our population should be increased. Some hon. members have referred to the railway situation, saying that in order to meet the deficits we are facing at the present time we ought to have an increased population, which would mean an increased traffic. There is no doubt about that, but there is a higher consideration than the pecuniary one. There is the very much higher consideration of moulding a national spirit in Canada. Every immigrant who comes to Canada should be of such a type and character that the Government can hope that within a reasonable period, if not the immigrant himself, his next descendants will cease to be foreigners, and become good Canadian citizens. Have we succeeded so far in Canada in assimilating our immigration? I do not think we have. We still have in the western provinces, and even in the province of Ontario, settlements which we might call foreign. Our policy so far as that is concerned has not been as perfect as it might have been, especially when we compare the results obtained in the United States along this line. Immigration has flowed into the United States in very great numbers. Thousands and hundreds of thousands of immigrants have gone in there every year for the past century, and in most cases they have become good American citizens and are proud to declare to-day that they are American citizens. Let the Minister of Immigration and Colonisation see to it that whatever immigration we have into Canada is of such a kind that very soon the new settlers will become Canadian citizens, not Germans, or Austrians, or Russians, or foreigners of any kind, but real Canadian citizens, enjoying the privileges and the rights of Canadian citizens, and realizing to the full the liberty and freedom that is given them under our Canadian institutions.

If we have not obtained as good results as we might have done from our foreign immigration, I lay the blame at the door of the present Government to a very great extent, and I am sorry to say that one of those who is responsible to a very large extent for the framing and moulding of that policy is the Minister of Immigration himself. How can we expect the foreigners who come to Canada to become Canadian citizens and assimilate themselves to our customs and our ways and our institutions if me debar them, as they have been debarred by the present Government, from their rights and privileges of citizenship when election time comes. I do not wish to discuss the law which governed the last general election of 1917, but I wish to say to the Minister of Immigration, who knew fully the defects of that law and who is aware of its eveil consequences, that I hope so long as he remains in the Government he will see that justice is done to every element in Canada, and if justice is done to every element in Canada, no matter how it may be composed, very soon we shall be able to promote in this country a truly national spirit.

I said that I thought the resolution went too far, but that, on the other hand, I believed the Government was right in restricting to a very great extent immigration under present conditions. But the Government ought to do more. If we are to open up new territory, if we are to develop our industries, if we are to make a success of our railways, we must have population in Canada. Now population is to be obtained not only from outside countries. Why should not the Government of Canada adopt a policy of promoting increased population from our native sources? The citizens of the province of Quebec understand fully their duties towards the State and have very large families. We do not need immigration from outside sources to develop our province. The French Canadians see to that themselves; they encourage the raising of large families. Now, why should not the Government adopt this principle as part of their policy and encourage throughout the provinces of Canada the same condition of things as exists in Quebec? Let the people in the English provinces have families numbering fifteen, twenty, twenty-five and thirty children, and very soon the problem which confronts the Minister of Immigration will disappear. The hon. gentleman receives this suggestion with a smile, but let me tell him that I offer it in all seriousness, and am only endorsing sentiments uttered by a very eminent statesman of the United States a few years ago—I refer to Theodore Roosevelt—when he spoke on the dangers of race suicide. Let us see to it in Canada that our race does not extinguish itself through the want of children and families. Let every citizen not only perform his political duties towards the state, but let him thoroughly appreciate the full responsibilities of fatherhood, and we shall have a natural increase in population which will, to a great extent, solve the problem we are discussing this afternoon.

I have been much longer than I intended, but before concluding my remarks I wish to say to the Government that on this side of the House we will support any policy which will make for a proper, a sensible, and a wise development of this country of ours. The policy which was adopted by a former Minister of the Interior, the Hon. Mr. Sifton, who opened wide the doors of Canada to immigration, had very bad consequences. Now, if on the one hand we oppose that indiscriminate policy, we will, on the other hand, favour a reasonable immigration, restricted where necessary, and all the more so under present world conditions, which are of so troublous a character that it behooves us to follow the example of our neighbours to the South, to go very slowly and moderately, not looking to quantity, but having in view the quality of the new citizens to whom we may open the doors of Canada.

Mr. ANGUS McDONALD (Timiskaming): I did not intend to speak on this resolution, but it has provoked so much discussion that I think it is well for me, as the only real labour member in this House, to put myself on record on the subject. Let me say at once that I am not in favour of the resolution of my hon. friend from St. Mary (Mr. Deslauriers) as it stands. I would support a resolution of this nature to some extent if it contained what I might describe as a classification. I believe the statement has been attributed to the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) that the enormous debt with which the people of this country are saddled, and which future generations will have to discharge—a debt which, if we take history into account, it is not impossible we may have as a burden for centuries—will have to be paid from the top six inches of Canadian soil. I want to ask hon. members, both farmers and others, if they ever saw not only the first six inches, but the first six feet, or six hundred feet, of Canadian or any other soil produce anything without the application and energy and skill on the part of the people. This resolution has elicited certain opinions which I think the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) as well as the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Calder) might well take into consideration. I am in favour of immigration under certain conditions. We need more population on the land in order to distribute more widely the enormous debt which at present possibly less than ten millions of people are responsible for. I would support an immigration policy if it were directed differently from the way things have gone in the past. I think we should aim at securing good citizens, people who would apply themselves to the land in order to open up the vast millions of acres which we have waiting for settlers, instead of leaving the direction of immigration in the hands of transportation companies who stand to benefit lavishly thereby.

Some hon. members say that there are many idle men in Canada. We have in this country to-day the sorry spectacle of some 500,000 people, who are idle, and together with their dependents they number probably a million and a half, out of a population of perhaps ten millions. This is a sad spectacle indeed in this glorious land of ours which we profess to be so proud of. Are these people idle by choice? Some hon. members suggest that the labour men of this country are idle because they are lazy. Well, were the people lazy who were laid off in Hamilton in the last week, as my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie), said? Were they lazy when they were working right up to the time they were laid off? Not by any means; and the man who says that the entire labour force of this country is lazy, makes that statement for a purpose which has no bearing on this resolution. Now, it is the duty of the farmers to think over this matter seriously. There are 500,000 men or thereabouts idle in Canada, and we have bread lines in every centre of population in the country. Why, the condition of affairs is staggering, and the Domniion Government if my information is correct, is asked to contribute towards the sustenance of men in Toronto, Winnipeg, Vancouver and Montreal. I do not think, in view of these things, that it is fair for any farmer to rail at the condition of the working men, who are idle, not through any fault of their own, and who are only too anxious to get employment. They have been thrown out of work after the industrial concerns have reaped great profits from their energy.

I will not take up much more time of the House, but there is one hon. member to whom I should like to reply, and that is my good Scotch friend from South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland). That hon. member says that we want men who are willing to give an extra hour, if necessary. I give my hon. friend the right hand of fellowship so far as that is concerned, and I will go further than he did and say that I am one of those working men who like to see a man give an honest day for an honest dollar. But I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that we want to see the farmers apply this principle to themselves, and not stick at the last farthing. I have been on the farm; I was raised there to some extent, and I know something at least about agriculture. I am yet to find a farmer who will give you 2,240 pounds of hay for a ton anywhere, and I make that statement having farmed myself. Let me tell this House, Mr. Speaker, that the labouring men, like the rest of us, are human and are somewhat like politicians. No doubt they get into a rut in the centres of population because an inducement is there offered. In the cities, they can get work the year round if they want it, but this is not the case on the farm, not on the western farms at any rate. I worked there myself. I got work for three months in the year, and for the other nine months the attitude of the farmers was this: You can shift for yourself after you are through with us.

Something must be done for the working man; he cannot starve for nine months while he is waiting for the three months' work which the West offers. Of course he may be in the province of Ontario but is he likely to get work all the year round with a man who may be only farming one hundred acres. The average workman does not have employment the year round, and what are you going to do with him during the time he is idle? We want to see some policy of a reasonable character adopted; and it will be unfortunate if the labour situation to-day is not looked into to a little further extent than it is investigated by politicians. That brings me back to the point I left a little while ago, and that is that the workingman is just like the politician in this chamber—he gets into a rut and he hates to be taken away from it; he has to be driven out just as a great many politicians have been driven out of Ottawa. I think that if the pleas which the leader of the Opposition has been making here for the last four or five weeks had been successful, the labouring people of Canada would have demonstrated beyond the faintest suspicion of doubt that a great many members who are now sitting here would never return to Parliament again. I do not want to occupy any more time; I simply wish to place on record the statement that I consider some of the things that have been said here as a direct insult to the labouring class of this country. It is a wonder to me that men—who perhaps have sons earning their living under the very hard and very disagreeable conditions which the workingman experiences—could sit here and listen to aspersions such as were hurled at labour this afternoon by the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon (Mr. Robb).

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (West Toronto): I was very much pleased to hear the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) emphasize the necessity of developing a real Canadian spirit among the people of this country. I entirely agree with him that in the past we have admitted altogether too many persons to Canada to participate in the free land and the rest of the advantages that the Dominion offers, and who have shown very little desire to be assimilated. The result is that there are many sections of Canada where foreign ideals, the ideals of Central Europe, predominate among the majority of the people. They have been allowed to colonize in such a way that it is now a matter of extraordinary difficulty to effect in their case that assimilation so necessary to make them good Canadian citizens. Located in this and that corner of the prairie these people are removed from that particular environment which would assist materially in giving them Canadian ideals. Segregated and living in their own communities, they not only have no desire to assimilate with the Canadian population, but they resist every attempt that is made to influence them to do so. We find such a situation exists to a far too great extent in Western Canada and it is a most deplorable thing because, at some time or other, this Parliament must undertake a Canadianizing movement which will make of these men Canadian citizens, understanding British institutions and desirous of being governed by them.

We have a country here capable of maintaining, in as great comfort as any of us live to-day, a population of one hundred or perhaps one hundred and fifty millions. We have a better country than there is to the south of us, and we have a climate that is designed to produce the very best type of humanity. The conditions in Canada are altogether different from those in the neighbouring republic where, south of the Mason and Dixon line, there are probably from thirty to forty millions of people who really do not have to work, and who do not work in the sense that a man works north of the forty-ninth parallel. That is the greatest handicap under which our neighbours to the south live, and it constitutes for them a problem, due to the enervating character of the climate in that sub-tropical region, which to my mind is practically insoluble. Now we have a different country and a different climate; and after you cross the forty-ninth parallel, you have to work, or somebody has to work for you, or you will starve or freeze to death. So that I believe the climate of Canada is its greatest asset.

Our great western country is capable of producing enormously, and of sustaining life under the very best conditions, and it is a matter of very negative concern to every Canadian who wants to see this country properly developed that the West should be filled up with industrious men. I believe that if a man is half industrious and is placed in that country he will become wholly industrious—I think that the conditions under which he would have to live would make him so, because the climate is calculated to give him additional energy both mental and physical. I think the immigration policy of this country ought to be to encourage every man who understands British institutions to come to Canada, and especially those who are able and willing to go upon the land. We have in the province of Ontario fifty or sixty million acres of as good land as there is anywhere else in the Dominion, but that great district is almost untenanted. There is a field for immigration in that northern territory where men can go and settle on free land, or what is practically free land —costing, I think, only a dollar an acre— and, after a few years of steady and perhaps laborious effort, clear for himself and for his family a home that will sustain them as long as they live. It has never been the policy of the Dominion Government to attempt to settle the province of Ontario. I am not complaining about that particularly, but I think there are a large number of people in the Old Land who would find themselves much more comfortably placed in a wooded country like northern Ontario than they would on the western prairies. I also believe that there are a very large number of men in the Old Country, possessed of sufficient means, who should be properly encouraged and directed to come to Canada and buy farms,—but developed farms, improved land. I am sure they would find the opportunities here superior to those which present themselves at home. So, Sir, I take it that the policy of the Government in the matter of immigration should be to adhere to the law which excludes—I think for about ten years except under certain very narrow restrictions— immigrants from central Europe, and to undertake an intensive campaign in Great Britain and Ireland to bring men to this country who understand our institutions, and to increase the number of men in the Dominion who will aid in assimilating the foreign element. In that way they will do a great deal to assist us to Canadianize that foreign element, some of whose members after being here ten or fifteen years do not yet understand our institutions, and do not want to understand them.

I have a great deal of sympathy, too, with the hon. member for Temiskaming (Mr. McDonald). Like him I am a labouring man, and have been all my life. I do not think the hon. member has worked nearly as hard as I have, and I am sure he has not worked as long. Therefore I always have sympathy for the working man. But the working man can hardly expect to be employed in industries which are insolvent, nor can he expect the proprietor to run deeper into insolvency in order to give him employment. To my mind that is mainly the reason why there has been so much unemployment in this country during the last few months. We had in Toronto, for instance, a large industry, the Dominion Shipbuilding company. That company had some large contracts, taken at what they considered to be a good price, but it became insolvent, and the reason given for its insolvency was not merely high wages, but the impossibility of getting the men to do a fair day's work. I am not in the shipbuilding business, but that is the statement of the assignee of the company. I have it from other sources, sir, and quite reliable sources, that in some of the trades the men during the last year or two, particularly during the last year, refused to give their employers the efficiency of which they were capable. That has to be corrected, and I think the only way it can be corrected is by such a period of depression as we are going through at the present time. I know the great majority of working men are desirous of giving a fair day's work, and they do give a fair day's work, but during the last year a very large proportion made no pretensions of giving an adequate return for the wages they received. No employer will complain about wages if he gets the equivalent in work, and that is exactly where labour has fallen down. I could tell my hon. friend of instances in my own city where men have been doing twice the amount of outside work in the winter season that they did last summer. There is only one deduction to be drawn, and that is that they did not do a fair day's work in the summer season. That idea of rendering a minimum return was permeating all labour unions, not only to the lessening of production, but to the detriment of the men themselves, for they were losing their personal efficiency, they were becoming less competent, and they were suffering moral and spiritual deterioration. I hope that what we have gone through during the last few months has put an end to that mistaken idea. I have no desire to see reductions in wages and I have no fear that there will be if our working men will do their share and give a fair honest day's work to their employers.

Hon. J. A. CALDER (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): Mr. Speaker, this is a very important subject, I have followed closely the opinions expressed during the discussion this afternoon, and I had hoped to deal with many of the points which were raised. My suggestion would be, if the hon. member who has introduced the resolution agrees, that the resolution itself be dropped. We have had a long discussion and the field has been very well covered, and it is my purpose during the coming week, if it can possibly be arranged in connection with the Estimates for the department of Immigration to make a statement to the House that will not only cover the points raised this afternoon but will touch on the other phases as well. The discussion in that way will be thrown open again, and any hon. gentleman who desires to take part will have the fullest opportunity on that occasion. So, if it is agreeable to the hon. gentleman to withdraw his resolution, I can assure him there will be the fullest opportunity very shortly for discussion of the kind which I have mentioned.

[Mr. Hocken.]

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member for St. Mary have leave to withdraw his resolution?

Some hon. MEMBERS? Carried.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The resolution is withdrawn.

At six o'clock the House adjourned without question put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, March 31, 1921

The House met at Three o'clock.

REPORT PRESENTED

Second Report of the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines—Mr. Armstrong (Lambton).

FRENCH TREATY

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved:

That four hundred copies in English and two hundred in French of the trade agreement between France and Canada, laid on the Table of the House on the 29th instant, be printed forthwith, and that Rule 74 be suspended in relation thereto.

Mr. MURPHY: May I suggest to my right hon. friend that there is likely to be a greater demand for French copies of this treaty than for English copies?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not think so.

Mr. MURPHY: My right hon. friend should have at least the same number printed in French as in English.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not think there will be the same demand for the French copies. The demand for the English copies will come from traders and business houses.

Mr. MURPHY: French business houses will be interested to the same extent.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have no objection to making the number of French copies four hundred.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion now provides for four hundred copies in English and four hundred in French. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion as so amended?

Motion as amended agreed to.

The question as to the desirability in the public interest of securing such and like information and making same available on motion or on question in Parliament is to be considered by a special committee of Parliament.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—DIVISION AFTER A RECESS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): Mr. Speaker, With your permission I would like to ask the attention of the House for a moment to what might be called a question of privilege, I suppose, though it does not concern me any more than any other member of the House. It is to a telegram from Ottawa in the Montreal Gazette of Wednesday concerning the division of the previous evening. The correspondent writes:

It has been an unwritten rule of Parliament since confederation that there would be no vote on the day following a recess. This was an amenity of Parliament that has never been violated until to-day by the new Liberal leader.

I believe, Sir, I have to plead guilty to being now one of the oldest members of Parliament. I think there are only two, possibly three, who were here before me. With about twenty years of experience, I want to say that I have never heard of such a rule. I have consulted a number of the older members of the House, each one of whom tells me that he never heard of such a rule. It is quite evident, therefore, that the Gazette correspondent was misinformed and mislead.

GRAND TRUNK—PORTLAND TERMINUS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. PIUS MICHAUD (Restigouche): Is the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) aware of a dispatch published yesterday morning, coming from Portland, Maine, which reads as follows:

> The Grand Trunk Railway steamship terminus here will be enlarged and improved at a cost of approximately $500,000, officials of the railway said to-day. Construction will begin May 1. Plans have been approved for an immigration examination and detention building to provide accommodations for the handling of 1,000 passengers a day.

Is it true or not?

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways and Canals): I have seen the item. I wrote a note to Mr. Kelley and asked him what he had to say in that connection. He has replied as follows:

> There is no truth in the above item from Portland. Such work as is to be undertaken by the Grand Trunk at that point is merely in the nature of ordinary renewal of the wharves, piling, etc.

Mr. Kelley signs that note.

CIVIL SERVICE HOLIDAYS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT: (Chambly and Verchères): I would like to direct the attention of the Government to the fact that question No. 1, has been standing on the Order Paper since the opening of the session. It is as follows:

> 1. Is it true that contrary to the formal promise of Sir Robert Borden in Parliament, at the last session, the civil servants of the Government have been forced to work on Catholic religious holidays, notably on the following: All Saint's Day, Immaculate Conception, Epiphany?
>
> 2. If so, for what reason has the Government acted thus?

This is a very important question; at the same time, I do not see why the Government does not answer it.

[Mr. Fielding.]

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): The question will be answered very shortly. I started the process of reading many pages of Hansard with a view of getting the whole purport of the debate on the subject but I shall be able to give an answer the first of the week, I think.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEDNESDAY SITTINGS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): I would like to suggest to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister that he reconsider the decision already made with regard to the taking of Wednesday as a Government day. I quite realize his desire to advance Government business, but there is a large number of motions on the Order Paper, and if the opportunity is denied to members to bring them up in the ordinary way they will be driven to bring them up in some other less direct way. I really do not think that the taking of Wednesday at this stage will facilitate the business of the House. I will not ask my right hon. friend to answer now, but I suggest that he give the matter his thought.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): In relation to that question, while I should not give a final negative at the moment, I want to say this—and it is no more in relation to one side than to another, this first sentence at least: There is not a motion on the Order Paper that has not been called and passed by twice, if not three or four times, since the beginning of the session. I recall one day in particular when the whole forty-six resolutions by private members were called and not one hon. member was ready to go on. It is true that the resolutions are still there and that possibly other means will be resorted to to have them proceeded with. But the Government must have regard to the fact that I have stated, because if we keep extending the time there will never be any very great desire on the part of an hon. member to go on with his motion at a time when he really has an opportunity to do so.

Mr. FIELDING: I think my right hon. friend must be under a misapprehension when he says these motions have been called again and again. I have two motions on the Order Paper and to the best of my knowledge and belief they have never been called. I spent a whole day here waiting for one to be called, but it was not reached. If my right hon. friend will look into the matter more carefully he will see that some of these motions have never been called. I know that two of my motions have never been called, at least when I was present, and I am a pretty regular attendant at the sittings of the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would not be certain that what I have said applies to the last three or four motions, but it applied to forty-six on one day; I know that, because I noted it. The hon. member (Mr. Fielding) put his on more recently; though I was under the impression that his first motion had been called once.

Mr. FIELDING: They were not put on so very recently.

PROPOSED EMPIRE CABINET

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): For the purpose of addressing a question to my right hon. friend the leader of the Government I desire to call his attention to a report published in the London Times on the 17th inst. giving a summary of a debate in the New Zealand House of Representatives on the question of whether the Prime Minister of New Zealand should attend the approaching conference of overseas Prime Ministers in London. After mentioning the somewhat unimportant features of the debate, in which Mr. Massey participated, that gentleman is credited with saying:

> He believed there would soon be an Empire constitution and a recognized organization, which he thought should take the form of an Imperial Executive, with the British Prime Minister as President. This executive should consist of representatives of Great Britain, the Dominions, the Dependencies, and India, and it should be responsible to the British and Dominion Parliaments. It should meet at least biennally, and it should be responsible for foreign policy, treaties, and declarations of war and peace.

My question is, whether the right hon. the Prime Minister has any knowledge of the proposed creation of such an Empire Cabinet or Imperial Executive, and if so, whether he has any information to give the House on the subject.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): I have not seen the despatch. The conception embodied in the despatch may be in accordance with the mind and intention of the Prime Minister of New Zealand. I have not subscribed to it.

THE AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly-Verchères): Mr. Speaker, the committee on public accounts is a very important committee of this House but in order that it may proceed with its business it is necessary that the committee have before it the fourth volume of the Auditor General's report. On the twenty-second instant, when I asked for that volume, the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) answered me in this way: "I expect it will be tabled at the end of the month." This is the last day of the month and I wish to ask the minister when he expects that his expectation will be realized.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Minister of Finance): The hon. gentleman realizes that no one is more anxious than I am to get that report down, because I seem to get all the blame for something with which I have nothing to do. I have been following the matter up, however, and pressing the work on a gentleman over whom I have no control. But I am glad now to be able to tell the House that I think the very last bit of copy went down yesterday afternoon to the Printing Bureau. There are some five or six hundred folios, and by having the work proceeded with at night as well as by day I think we shall be able to have the fourth volume laid on the Table early in the week.

SUPPLY

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

Trade and Commerce—bounties on crude petroleum, administration of the Act, $3,000.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Before you proceed with this item, Sir, the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) said last night that he intended to proceed with the Estimates of the Labour Department to-day. The Estimates of that department have not been taken up previously, and I will object to their being proceeded with to-day. Before we proceed with the estimates of the Labour Department, I have a few remarks to make about the hon. gentleman who presides over that department and about certain matters concerning it.

Mr. DENIS: I have been using a copy of the Estimates printed in French. I have no copy of the Estimates in English, and I object to proceeding with the Estimates unless we have English copies.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Does the hon. member object to the committee proceeding with the Estimates because he has not a copy of them in hand? These Estimates were printed as usual and a copy was placed in the box of every member weeks ago. My hon. friend has allowed his copy to drop out of his pocket. He must not hold us all up because he has happened to lose his copy.

Mr. DENIS: I stated that I have only a French copy of the Estimates; I have not an English copy, and I do not think it is an answer to say that the Estimates have been distributed once. My objection can be withdrawn, but we will discuss these Estimates in French, and I want to know if the Government is willing to proceed on that understanding.

Mr. CANNON: In support of my hon. friend's contention, last week I applied for a copy of the Estimates in English, and I was told by the distribution office that they had none in hand. I hold here a copy of the Estimates in French. I have no objection whatsoever to holding a French copy; it suits me better to discuss the Estimates in French than it would to discuss them in English; but on the other hand, as my hon. friend (Mr. Denis) has said, as we have in our possession only copies of the Estimates in French, it would be only reasonable and natural that we should carry on the discussion in the language in which the Estimates are printed.

Mr. MARCIL: The minister speaks in French now. We can proceed.

Mr. CAHILL: What does the term "administration of the Act" mean in this case?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This appropriation has been passed every year for a long series of years. The object is to pay the salary and expenses of the officer or officers supervising the payment of the bounty upon crude petroleum oil. That bounty is granted, of course, by Act of Parliament; it has to be paid out under the regulations of the department, and the $3,000 is to pay for the supervisor and his aids, and for contingencies and travelling expenses. The work of the supervisor is to see that all claims that are made for payment of bounty are correct, to compare them and to issue his certificate as to their payment.

Mr. CAHILL: What amount of bounties has been paid? Or are any bounties being paid?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The bounties paid for the fiscal year 1918-19 on crude petroleum oil amounted to $162,187; for 1919-20, to $103,753; and for 1920-21 up to January 31, to $70,908.

Mr. CAHILL: What people were the bounties paid to?

[Sir George Foster.]

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: To the producers of the oil in two or three counties in Ontario where petroleum is produced; in New Brunswick where some oil is produced from the shales; and in Alberta where some oil coming under this Act is produced. The main part is paid to producers of oil in some two or three Ontario counties.

Mr. CANNON: (Translation.) Are those grants paid by the Government simply to individual owners of oil wells, or are they also paid to corporations and companies, say, for instance, the Imperial Oil and other trusts, which sell the oil at such a high price?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I must ask my hon. friend to speak a little louder and a little more distinctly, and especially to couch his question in particularly good French, so that it will commend itself to my ear.

Mr. CANNON: I am quite sure—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is better.

Mr. CANNON: I am quite sure my right hon. friend is too modest. He has taken part in several conferences overseas; he has represented Canada with much honour and dignity at the Peace Conference; he has also represented our country at Geneva; and last year at the opening of Parliament, much to the pleasure and appreciation of hon. members on this side of the House, acting as Prime Minister of our country he delivered a magnificent, able, and, as usual, very eloquent speech in the French language. I am quite sure my right hon. friend understands French just as well as I do, and I am inclined to think he speaks French even better than I can speak it myself. But for the convenience, not of my right hon. friend who is a very noted bi-linguist, but of other members who might not be so conversant with the French language, I will proceed in English. I do not do so, however, for the convenience of my right hon. friend because I am sure he could carry on the discussion in French. The question I put to the minister is this: Are those premiums paid by the Government simply to individual owners of petroleum wells, or are they also paid to corporations and companies, say, for instance, the Imperial Oil and those very large trust companies which sell the oil at such a high price that I do not see why we give them premiums at all?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The premiums are paid in all cases to the people who produce the oil.

Mr. CANNON: Are any premiums paid to corporations or companies?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think not.

Mr. CANNON: The right hon. gentleman says he thinks not. I would like to be sure on that point. As far as I am concerned, I do not think this House ought to pay a cent of bounty to any corporation like the Imperial Oil, and before we proceed any further with this item I would like the minister to make sure whether premiums are paid to this corporation. If they are being paid, I think he ought to see to it that they are not paid in future. This Government is not rich enough to give money to the Imperial Oil Company, the Standard Oil Company, or Rockefeller. We have heavy enough financial obligations to meet without throwing away our money to people who are richer than the Government itself.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If I might be allowed to interfere, at the expense of my hon. friend's well-turned and eloquent periods, I will give him the information absolutely that the bounties are paid only to those who produce the oil, so neither Rockefeller nor the Imperial Oil Company gets a squint at it.

Mr. McMASTER: It does not seem to me to be of essential difference whether this bounty is paid to a large company or to a small operator. I wish to state to the committee, and I think that what I say will have a responsive echo in the country, if not in the House, that for the Government to bonus an industry which is able to sell its products at the prices at which coal oil products are selling now is, in view of the present financial condition of the country, most unwise, to use the most modest term.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Can't you make it a little stronger?

Mr. McMASTER: I would say it was rank, raging lunacy, to speak plainly. In view of the respect which I have for the minister I couched my language in the most modest and gentle terms.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In the interests of my hon. friend himself will he allow me to intervene for a moment? I have noted the hard language which he has applied to this policy of bonusing. Does my hon. friend know that that policy was inaugurated in 1904, that it was re-inaugurated in 1907 and 1908, that it is there on the statute books by virtue of the concentrated wisdom of the Liberal Government to which my hon. friend paid allegiance, and which he considers to be one of the finest Governments that ever existed in Canada? It is ungrateful of my hon. friend after all the prominence that his party has given to it to stand up behind his aged and revered leader (Mr. Fielding) and tax him with introducing a policy of rank and unadulterated lunacy.

Mr. McMASTER: I have listened to the defence of this policy of bonusing by probably the ablest man on the opposite side of the House, and it has taken the form of chiding me because the Liberal party, when I was not in the House, did something which I trust I would have opposed then as I oppose it now.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: But you sacrificed at their altars then.

Mr. McMASTER: I have this to say. I have always been against bonusing, I have always been against protection; I think it is a mistake, and that it was a mistake when it was brought about by the party to which I gave my allegiance at that time, and to which I give my allegiance now. I would, however, make this observation, and I believe the minister will consider it reasonable, that when the public debt of Canada was between $250,000,000 and $300,000,000 there was more excuse—I do not say more reason—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In principle?

Mr. McMASTER: There was more excuse for the giving of bonuses then, than there is at a time when, as I am sure the minister will agree, the financial condition of this country is a very serious one indeed. I hope that the minister will see his way clear, even if it is necessary to bring down legislation for that purpose to stop bonusing this industry, which I do not believe requires bonusing. If it has been bonused since 1904, it is about time it stood on its own feet, about time that the cask of petroleum stood on its own bottom. I protest energetically against what I consider to be this waste of public funds. I protests against the giving of bonuses by a country in the financial condition in which we find ourselves to-day.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am only administering the Act.

Mr. GRIESBACH: I should like to ask the minister how he reconciles the policy of bunusing oil production with the policy of collecting royalties on oil production, as we have it in the West?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If my hon. friend or others are interested in looking at the history of this particular transaction, they will find, I think, that the bonus was given to the oil producers at the time when the duty was taken off crude potroleum entering this country from the United States and other contries. When petroleum was made free, on the theory that it would be of great general benefit, it was felt by those who were administering the affairs of the country at that time that the producers of oil should be compensated for this introduction of free petroleum. That was the theory on which the bounty was paid.

Mr. CANNON: I asked the minister whether large corporations like the Imperial Oil were getting any of these bounties, and he answered that he thought they were not. He was not very explicit in his answer. He did not say that no public moneys were being given to these very large corporations, these trusts which are crushing the people of Canada, and to which we should not give a cent.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think my hon. friend must be wrong with reference to my assertion. I think I told him that the bounties were given simply to the producers of oil, and not to companies who do not produce or raise the oil.

Mr. CANNON: But suppose the Imperial Oil Company is the producer of oil on certain lands. Would they get a bonus for producing oil? That is what I want to know.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Act, of course, provides how the money shall be paid. The provision, as I find it here—

Mr. CANNON: I understand the minister is about to tell the committee how the payments are made, but that is not the information I want; we can come to that later. I want to know whether the Imperial Oil Company, if it produces oil on lands in Canada, is entitled to this bounty. Should the Government pay premiums to the Imperial Oil Company?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will read the section of the Act to my hon. friend, who I believe is a lawyer:

> The said bounty to be paid to or divided among the producers of the petroleum, the owner or occupier of the soil through which it is mined or won, or such other person interested, or injuriously affected by the mining operations or works as the Governor in Council by regulation approves.

I think that explains it.

[Mr. Griesbach.]

Mr. CANNON: If I understand the minister rightly, that means that the Imperial Oil Company occupy, own, or lease land upon which oil is produced. Then they would receive a bounty from the Government?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Being a producer, they would, I suppose.

Mr. CANNON: The minister says they would. I want to know, has the Imperial Oil Company, as a fact, received a bounty?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Now my hon. friend asks a question as to a specific point. I have not the information, but my own impression is that tne vast majority of the bounty is paid to the small producers of oil throughout the different districts. I am not prepared to say that there is not a company producing oil in those districts and that no such company is getting the bounty upon what it produces.

Mr. CANNON: Now I desire to call the attention of the committee to this point: About ten days ago my hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) complained that we had not sufficient information to enable us to discuss the Estimates intelligently. The Prime Minister's attention was drawn to the fact that the fourth volume of the Auditor General's report had not been brought down yet, and that therefore the members on this side as well as hon. gentlemen opposite could not possibly consider the Estimates with that degree of care and scrutiny which is only proper. In reply to that representation, the right hon. gentleman who leads the House gave the formal and definite assurance that no items would be discussed unless information in connection therewith were first available to hon. members. If my right hon. friend refers to page 2 of the index of volume III of the Auditor General's report he will find therein stated that details in connection with crude petroleum are to be found under "Z-23." Now, "Z-23" is not in our hands; it is in the fourth volume. In view of the assurance given us by the Prime Minister I would ask my right hon. friend to postpone this item.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Item stands.

The CHAIRMAN: Sir George Foster moves that further consideration of item 346 be postponed.

Mr. POWER: Mr. Chairman, before we leave this item—

The CHAIRMAN: I am very sorry, but the motion to postpone consideration of an item is not debatable.

Item stands.

Bounty on Linen Yarn spun in Canada from Canadian Flax, including expenses of supervision, under Order in Council of September 3, 1918, $26,000.

Mr. MORPHY: I desire some information regarding this item, in view of the present condition of the flax market in Canada, and also in view of some letters I have received regarding the loss already sustained and the further loss which is anticipated by those who have produced flax, particularly in western Ontario. I am informed that the flax men throughout that part of the Dominion stand to be ruined one after another by the decline in the prevailing prices, which have fallen considerably since last year. I cannot give the prices in detail except as regards seed, which I understand was a year ago $6 a bushel and now has dropped $1.50. I have a communication from certain men who say that they stand to be ruined by the conditions under which they have to work. Now, I notice that the item this year is being reduced by the sum of $4,000. If the principle is a sound one of assisting, by way of bonus, the manufacture of linen, I think this is a most inopportune time in the history of the country to make any reduction in this grant. On the contrary, I think it ought to be increased. Is the minister or his department seized of the extreme distress in trade that now exists and is likely to be aggravated by the failure of the flax producers to dispose either of their fibre or of their seed? If the matter has been brought to the attention of the Government or of the minister, I should like to know what activities are in progress in the department to ameliorate the very serious conditions which have overtaken the flax interests, as a direct outcome, I fancy, of the war.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The department over which I preside has had numerous communications from flax growers, particlurly in the province of Ontario, regarding the difficulties under which they are labouring at the present time, difficulties which are summed up in the fact stated by my hon. friend, that the prices for either fibre or seed have very suddenly and largely dropped from those that prevailed a year or two ago. The hon. gentleman very properly said that he supposed this resulted from the general war conditions. It is a disability being suffered not only by flax producers but also, more or less, by the producers of very many of the staple articles of the country. For instance, I see that July wheat is selling on the Chicago market to-day at $1.25, which is a great come-down fro mthe price of $2.08 to $3.00 per bushel which prevailed on the market a year or so ago. The Department of Trade and Commerce cannot, of course, undertake to keep up prices nor to remunerate producers who have on hand stocks which they cannot get rid of at former prices and which consequently they must sell at a loss. But it is working in conjunction with these producers in an endeavour to find as profitable markets as possible in the different parts of the foreign field, and our trade commissioners are specially charged at the present time with this matter, being in possession of information which has been supplied me by the flax growers themselves. I do not know what will be the outcome. I am afraid there is not very much hope that these products, either fibre or seed, will regain anything like the values which they have had in the preceding three or four years. The special item under consideration is not intended as a relief to producers of flax. It is a child of the war, and the action which resulted in this bounty being granted for a period of three years was a direct outcome of the necessities of the war. At a certain time Canada found herself unable to get linen thread or yarn, either from the United States or from Great Britain, and this article was called for from all parts of the country for use by fishermen as well as for manufacturing purposes of various kinds. The War Commission, which was functioning at that time, took the matter up on the suggestion of Council, and in the end an Order in Council was passed by which it was proposed to give a bounty for the manufacture of linen thread and yarns of certain sizes, the bounty to be payable for three years after the Peace Treaty had been put into force, but not to be payable to the manufacturers of these yarns until the war had ended. The theory was that if manufacturers installed the equipment necessary for the production of these yarns, which had not before been made in Canada, the prices which could be charged for them, owing to the scarcity of the article, would be sufficient remuneration for the time that the war lasted, but—as this was an unusual and an emergent thing—when the war was over, and supplies were available in greater quantity, the prices would tend to recede. Then the bounty was to take effect, and be paid according to the scale agreed upon, for three years after the war had ended. Some manufacturers undertook to equip their factories; but only one has really provided the required equipment, the owner, I think, of a factory at Guelph. That factory is now not only making linen yarns out of the Canadian product, but is also turning out a superior quality of linen goods of the coarser and of the finer kinds as well. I have seen an exhibition of these goods—either in Ottawa or in some other city—and they certainly are of excellent make; the quality of the fibre and the finish of the product seems to be everything that can be asked. To the extent that they manufacture, they may avail themselves of the bounty as given on these yarns up to the maximum; but in no year may the bounty paid to all manufacturers of yarns exceed $25,000, nor is it in the three years to exceed the sum of $75,000. The vote asked for here is for the purpose of paying the bounty as agreed upon, and as I have explained to the committee. The sum is smaller than was estimated for previously, and even the amount of this estimate may be reduced somewhat—in fact I am going to ask that it be reduced—simply because it is impossible for the manufacturers to absorb that sum of money out of the current year for which this estimate is being voted, and there is not much use of carrying in the Estimates an amount beyond the sum which can be absorbed.

Mr. MORPHY: The explanation of the minister with regard to the reason of the decrease is quite satisfactory to me, but I would like some further information as to the activities of his trade commissioners. I would like to know who they are, where they are located, what they are doing, and how hard they are working to assist the men who did answer the call in this country for production for national purposes of material for the manufacture of linen, and whether or not these producers are being treated by the trade commissioners with that consideration to which they are entitled. I am told that in England the warehouses are bulging to the roofs with linen, that ther never was in England the scarcity that is alleged, but that they had there all the yarn they wanted; and yet the manufacturers and farmers of this country were pleaded with by this Government to "go to it," to do their best, and to produce, and produce, and produce. Now they find themselves up against the wall, and I want to know from the minister just how hard his trade commissioners are working. I want to know where they are working, and what they are doing to ameliorate this unfortunate condition into which the flax industry has been thrown, and I think probably unfairly thrown by—may I use a mild term?—English commercial greed. I may be misinformed—if I am I would like the minister to tell me—but I wish to know whether it is true that during the war, and at all times since, the English linen producer, and the United Kingdom producer generally, has had all the yarn he wanted and that he could have supplied some to Canada and relieved the situation here, had he been actuated by a little more consideration of the difficulties under which this country laboured as the outcome of the war.

4 p.m.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: As to whether the trade commissioners are acting fairly by this interest, as by other interests—

Mr. MORPHY: I did not say "acting fairly," my question was as to whether they are working actively.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: As to whether they are working actively in comparison with their efforts in other directions I think I can answer that by a very strong affirmative. They have received special instructions outside of those relating to their general duty, and I must say with regard to our present staff of trade commissioners that I think they are a set of men whose intelligence, honesty, and assiduity cannot be successfully criticized. They work not only because they are paid a salary, but because they are instructed in their work. They are enthusiastic in the performance of their duties, and the intimate relations the department holds with them, and the statements of the men who travel in those countries where they are and should come into contact with these commissioners, affords evidence to back up the assertion that I have made. I honestly believe that we have amongst our trade staff to-day, our commissioners abroad, a better set of men than we have ever had. I believe that we have a most satisfactory staff which will compare with the staff maintained by any other country.

Now as to what it is possible for them to do, that is a different matter. If prices have gone down, the shoulders of all the trade commissioners are not strong enough to boost those prices agaisnt world conditions. That is a situation that the trade itself comes up against and that the commissioners are powerless to overcome. All they can do is to seek out any possible avenues that are available for the exchange of these products in the countries in which they have their work set out, and that they are doing. But the countries are not very many that take these products. Great Britain itself has absorbed them in the past. The manufacturers there have paid highly for the flax seed, and the fibre as well, that they have got in Canada, and they prize these commodities just as highly as before. But they have stocks on hand more than sufficient for their own use, and they will not buy fresh stocks when they stand face to face with the market, in a measure, as our own producers of flax fibre stand. I am convinced that three or four years ago the conditions of the market were such that neither the United States nor Great Britain could, in justice to their own people, satisfy the requirements of our people. They did it to a certain extent, but gradually we came up against the impossibility of getting any supplies from either one country or the other. There is one thing that lights up the situation somewhat, and that is that this factory which is at present making fibres from these yarns has demonstrated that Canadian material and machinery, backed by Canadian enterprise and technical skill, can make the product from the root up in this country of such a quality as will bear comparison with the product turned out in Ireland, Belgium and other countries where this industry has been established for many generations.

Mr. MORPHY: I am very much pleased to hear that the minister has such a remarkably active and well equipped staff, and I am sorry indeed to find that he is forced to confess that his staff is absolutely helpless under the circumstances to afford any grain of comfort at all. But in his long narration concerning his excellent staff the minister has not told us of a single instance where any of his men have endeavoured to ameliorate the serious conditions under which our producers of flax are labouring. His men, I presume, are scattered all over the world. What I asked him was whether he has been getting reports from any of his staff containing suggestions that would assist our people here to dispose of the product of their factories that they cannot work up for the foreign market because the banks have refused them accommodation. The situation is more serious, I think, than the minister realizes. To use his own words, the manufacturers of this country undertook to establish equipment for the working up of these products, but only one manufacturer lived up to the undertaking. I would like to know the names of the manufacturers who failed to redeem their promise. Let us see who they are and why they failed.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend pushes me pretty tightly up against the wall. What answer would he make if he were in my place? I will put myself in his place and answer. He does not impugn the efficiency of our trade commissioners. If he did I would have to defend them, and I could do so with a perfectly honest heart. But what can men do under the circumstances? My trade commissioners cannot go down into Ontario and lift one ounce from the load these people have to bear. The only hope of relief is in extended markets. To secure extended markets you must go outside of Canada. That is what our trade commissioners are doing, but they are up against the conditions of the market in other countries just as our people are up against the conditions of the market here; and if the market is overstocked, and consequently prices are low, no trade commissioner can raise those prices or alter the general conditions. My hon. friend spoke about those manufacturers who gave a certain undertaking. Our action was in the nature of trying to get people to supply the need that existed at the time; and when the War Commission took the matter up they had communication with more than one manufacturer, but only one succeeded in establishing the proper equipment, and he is to-day manufacturing the goods. The others did not come under any bond and they could not be compelled to do anything. They would only get the subsidy when they produced the goods, and they would take upon themselves the responsibility of the equipment in view of the bounty which would be paid for the three years after the war while their equipment would be working. I do not think I can give my hon. friend any clearer answer than that.

Mr. CURRIE: In looking over the trade papers I notice that a short time ago there was a convention in Brussels or Antwerp of representatives of various countries with a view to fixing the prices of linen fibre and linen, the trade being in a bad way in all countries. Did we have a representative there?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not remember if we had one at that particular meeting, but I should not have much faith in the power of a convention to fix prices which would stand against world conditions as they are to-day.

Mr. CURRIE: It was a meeting of flax growers and flax manufacturers at which England, Ireland, Germany, France and Japan were represented, and they made an effort to fix a minimum price of, I think, seven cents. I do not know whether they were successful or not. But the condition is world-wide, it is not confined to Canada alone.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Certainly not.

Mr. BEST: I would not think of criticising the members of this commission, but I understand that the purpose of the commission is to give information to the general public. Now it may be working very hard, but if it had done its duty, it seems to me it should have got information two or three years ago as to what would be the actual conditions after the war, because, if this had been done, many of our farmers in Ontario would not be in their present unsatisfactory position. We were led to believe that there was a great shortage of flax and linen and that for some years to come the price would be on a paying basis. But after going into the business quite extensively our farmers find this year that all along there was plenty of yarn and linen piled up in the Old Country. Why did not the commission know those conditions and report them to our farmers? I noticed in one of the leading papers a few days ago that some one had stated that Ontario fibre was not as good as Belgian or Irish fibre. We have at Ottawa a flax expert who states that the best quality Ontario fibre is equal to any that is produced either in Belgium or Ireland. The other statement will certainly hurt the sale of our fibre. Why does not the commission criticise that adverse statement? Why does it not come out and tell the world that our fibre is as good as any fibre that can be produced, as we are led to believe it is? Japan and many other countries have warehouses right in Belfast, where, from the information I have received, they manufacture more linen than in any other part of the world, and people can go to those warehouses and select what they want. The buyers on the other side do not want to buy it in lots of a few pounds, and they will not come over here and buy it in Ontario because the manufacturers there buy different grades of fibre. We should have a warehouse there as other countries have to which our fibre could be shipped and where the purchaser could select what he wanted and pay for it. I think that this commission should surely be able to furnish some information to the growers of Ontario. Commissions of that kind should give full information about conditions in other countries. I feel quite satisfied that if the farmers in Ontario, and I think some in Quebec, had known one or two years ago what the conditions would be they would not be suffering the losses that they are likely to suffer this year.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: The farmers of Quebec did not go into any large cultivation of flax.

Mr. BEST: Some small quantities were produced there, I believe.

Mr. COWAN: May I ask the minister whether the manufacturers of these linen goods in Canada are giving to the trade commissioners that co-operation which is necessary if trade in the foreign fields is to be captured? I understand that the trade commissioners are a thoroughly capable body of men who are performing their work in an excellent manner. But it has been stated and we had a man speaking on this subject a short time ago in one of the rooms in this building—that the manufacturers of Canada have not any agents in the foreign field. I know of two men who have been all around the world, who visited every commercial field, but who met no salesmen anywhere representing Canadian firms. It seems to me that the Canadian manufacturers of linen are relying entirely upon the Government and upon the trade commisioners to advance their interests, and I do not think it is possible for the trade commissioners to do anything of that kind. The trade commissioner cannot have that intimate knowledge of every line of business which is necessary to the effecting of a sale. Salesmanship to-day involves an accurate knowledge of the article which it is intended to sell, and it is impossible for the human mind—in this case, for the trade commissioner—to grasp the salient features of every line of business, and thus be able to effect the largest possible number of sales. Has the minister any information which would show whether or not Canadian manufacturers are actively engaged in the promotion of Canadian business abroad? If they are not, it is time they awakened to the necessities of the situation.

Mr. McMASTER: Are we under any moral or legal obligations to pay this

$2,000 to the producers of flax yarn? Are we free to withhold the bounty?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The answer is a very plain one, and as a business man my hon. friend will understand it. The Government entered into a contract; that contract has three years to run and is limited as to the amount that can be paid under it. These men, with that signed contract, put their money into the equipment of the business. They put in a splendid equipment and are doing excellent work. The Government, therefore, is not in a position to say: Well, we have not as much money as we used to have; we do not want to pay you anything; we will slide out. As to the question put by the member for Regina (Mr. Cowan), there is a negative and a positive answer. Some manufacturers are wide awake and have their representatives wherever in foreign fields there is a fair chance of making a sale. The trade commissioners were never instituted, never paid, never instructed, to make any sale for any particular party or for any particular corporation. They are not sales agents; the sales agents are to be put in the field by the men who have the commodities to sell. There never can be a thoroughly good foreign trade for this country unless the manufacturers co-operate with the trade commissioners and follow up the information furnished by them. To make your sale of goods to a man you have to sit down before him, first, a thorough master of your business in all its details so that you can meet his every argument, and then if modifications are suggested you have to be able to tell him on the instant: I will take you on that; you have made me an offer; I will take it. Where would your trade commissioners be if they were placed in a position of that kind?

Now, with reference to the flax industry, there are men engaged in that business who are fully alive to the situation and have their representatives in the Old Country and perhaps in other places. We are in constant communication with them and through our trade commissioners in England we help them all we can. I do not think they have any fault to find with the extent of the co-operation offered by the Trade and Commerce Department.

Mr. McMASTER: I thank the minister for the explanation which he gave us as to its being impossible for the Canadian people to break this engagement entered into with the producers of flax yarn. But at the risk of being tiresome may I just observe how this affords a striking example of the unwisdom of endeavouring to bonus into precocious economic life one industry or another? When a Government by bonuses or protection undertakes to interfere with the law of supply and demand, in the long run they do more harm than good.

Mr. CURRIE: What harm has that factory done?

Mr. McMASTER: The member for Dufferin (Mr. Best) has just placed before us the fact that inducements were held out to the farmers of Canada to go largely into flax production. It was held out to them that there would be a market for flax through the manufacture of flax into yarn as a result of this bonus.

Mr. CURRIE: Oh no, the hon. gentleman is altogether wrong.

Mr. BEST: I had nothing to say about the manufacturers here. In fact, I believe that if we had three or four similar factories engaged in the manufacture of this commodity, there would be a sale for it. I was only criticising the work of the commissioners in not informing the farmers of the conditions on the other side.

Mr. McMASTER: My hon. friend may deduce from the facts different conclusions than those which I arrive at. But I think I am right in saying that he is my authority for the statement that the increase of flax production was substantial; that farmers in Ontario were led to believe that it was a wise thing to go in for the production of flax; that they devoted certain of their land to the production of flax rather than to the raising of other crops, and that today the market for flax is broken and they are suffering a loss. Now I think it is a fair argument that these farmers proceeded as they did because of the hope and the expectation that there would be a considerable market for their crop, and that hope and expectation was no doubt based, in part at least, upon the action of the Government in granting this bonus upon flax yarn. My right hon. friend (Sir George Foster) shakes his head. It seems to me that is a reasonable deduction to draw, and I think most members will draw that deduction. What has happened? The market for flax has slackened and there has been a loss. You will generally find that this is what happens when you bonus, when you stimulate artificially one industry rather than another, because you cannot control world supply and world demand, and market prices, in regard to the great staples of production, are created by world supply and world demand. Of course, we must not do what is ethically wrong, seeing that the manufacturers of yarn have altered their position by reason of this contract entered into by the Government. Yet, while perhaps in war conditions, it may not have been improper to give this stimulus, I have always the gravest doubt about the advisability of following such a course, either in war or in peace. I would make this observation, that we have here another example of the unwisdom of interfering with economic laws; that, as a rule, this interference does not help, but hinders and hurts the general interest. Let me give an example. Prior to 1846, protectionist sentiment in the Old Country, largely looked to agriculture; the Corn Laws formed the great keystone of the protectionist arch, and it was agreed that by maintaining what was practically prohibition of imports until the price rose very high on the introduction of foodstuffs into Great Britain, you maintained agriculture in a flourishing condition and that tended to keep people on the land and to maintain an agricultural position.

Mr. CURRIE: They are doing the same thing in England now.

Mr. McMASTER: And they will have the same disastrous results as they had before, I have no doubt. Let me make my point, my hon. friend will or will not agree with me as he sees fit. The point I want to make is that, during these years, while the agricultural interest in England was supposed to be helped by the introduction of heavy duties on foodstuffs coming into that country, the agricultural interest suffered very severely. Every few years, parliamentary investigations had to be held to examine into the cause of agricultural distress. And why? Because in lean years, when the harvest was small, the prohibition or the impediments to allowing food to flow into Great Britain were such that prices became very high and rents were fixed on a very high basis. Then when there was a bountiful harvest, prices tended to drop; but rents tended to remain where they were, so that the only people who benefited in any way by the system were the landlords, and even they did not really benefit, because the misery which was thus imposed on the bulk of the people reacted upon the landlords as well. The committee will pardon this digression, but I want to emphasize the point, and all my reading and experience go to confirm the notion which I have held for years, that it is a great mistake to interfere with economic laws, and that harm and not good is the inevitable consequence of the pursuance of that policy.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend has made his point, or he thinks he has. My contention is that his point was not well taken, and I do not want his argument to proceed from a false assumption. The argument of my hon. friend was: You set up a factory to manufacture yarn and textiles from flax fibre—by setting that up, and in setting that up, the idea you had in mind was to stimulate the production of flax in this country—that idea got abroad amongst the farmers; they produced flax and produced it and produced it on that assumption—and now your factory takes but a small proportion, and the flax producers find themselves with large surpluses which they cannot market. That argument does not apply in this case. The point had in view by the War Trade Board and the Government was not of giving this bonus to a factory to stimulate the production of flax in this country. To a certain extent, the factory would call for a certain proportion of flax that it required for its manufacture. The object in view was a war object and no other. What is wisdom at one time may, as my hon friend said, be unwisdom at another, so that we have to go back to the time which produced the action. What were the grounds upon which the action was taken? I think it well that the committee should know these grounds:

Whereas it appears that no linen thread or yarn has come forward from Great Britain since the first of January, 1918, for the manufacture of fishing nets, or shoe hemp for military and agricultural harness, or for the manufacture of aeroplane cloth,—

The demand for which was very insistent at that time.

—linen thread for military boots,—

And military boots had to be provided —machine thread for the manufacture of agricultural and military harness, or yarns and threads for civilian use in Canada.

That was the basis. It was the utter lack of those things necessary for those purposes that induced the War Trade Board, on the suggestion of the Government, to see whether or not they could bring about the manufacture of those things to apply to that necessity and that emergency. That was the purpose, and my hon. friend was quite wrong in placing it upon the broader ground that we went into this bonus for the purpose of stimulating the production of flax in this country. The production of flax in this country, not stimulated much by this, although that provided a certain limited market, was stimulated by the high price that prevailed for both the seed and the fibre, and the impression that those high prices or profitable prices would prevail for a long time and that, therefore, the farmer would have a remunerative result from his labour if he put his labour to the production of flax seed and fibre. My hon. friend (Mr. Best) finds fault with my poor trade commissioners because they were not prophets.

Mr. BEST: Not with them.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend is not a prophet; I am not a prophet, and to put a man back five or four years ago in the turmoil of world conditions and ask him to tell your farmer in Ontario just what conditions would be four or five years afterwards, is giving the man no show at all unless the Lord Almighty pointed out to him what he should say. Only inspiration could do that; no human knowledge could. Therefore, I think it is not right to ask from our trade commissioners what they cannot do. The Jap, my hon. friend said, went ahead and put up a great warehouse and stocked it with flax fibre and seed and went on the market to sell it. I am afraid my hon. friend has hold of a bit of a fairy tale in that regard. Anyway, if that were a fact, the Government could not follow that course; it could not take wheat or flax or any other product that is made and establish warehouses and put in stock, and then either wait until somebody came to buy or induce them to buy.

Mr. BEST: I refuse to be charged with opposing this grant to the flax industry of Canada.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I did not say that.

Mr. BEST: I was referring to the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster).

Mr. McMASTER: I hardly think my argument is open to that.

Mr. BEST: My complaint is that the bounty is not half a million or a million dollars. We send our fibre from here to the Old Country where it is manufactured, and then hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of the manufactured article is shipped back to Canada. Would it not pay the people of Canada better to give a bounty so as to have the manufacturing process done in this country? I was not criticising the item at all. What I was criticising was this. I believe this commission could have found out what quantity there was on hand each year. Perhaps I may be wrong in that, but I think it could have been done, and if that information had been given to the farmers there might not have been quite so much flax produced. I did not say that the Japanese had a great big warehouse in Belfast. I said they had a warehouse there, where every variety of their fibres and seed samples could be shown. A small room, with one man to look after it, would do. A buyer could look over the fibre and seed and decide how many bales of fibre or how many bushels of seed he would take. The cost would be very small. If the farmers of Ontario are going to produce fibre, I think the Government should certainly establish a small warehouse there. I hope no hon. member will think I am criticising this bonus. If this bonus had not been granted, we would not be in the position we are in to-day as regards the fibre industry.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I think we have wandered a little from the item before the committee, which is to provide $26,000 for a bounty on linen yarn spun in Canada from Canadian flax. Last year the item was $30,000. It is admitted that there are immense stocks of flax fibres in the hands of the growers in this country. As a rule I do not favour bounties, but if ever there was a time when we were justified in passing such an item without criticism, it is now. I do not favour reducing the item to $26,000. I could not help but feel that if we had someone in this country whose foresight was as good as the backsight exhibited by the hon. member for Brome, we would have a world-beater. I did not approve of the bounty when it was first introduced, because I believed that flax growing was an industry that was peculiarly adapted to a country where cheap labour was plentiful. If you study the history of flax growing and linen production all over the world, you will find that it is most successful where cheap labour prevails, such as in Russia, India, Belgium, and Ireland. These countries have excelled in the growing of flax and the manufacture of linen. During the war, however, there was such a tremendous demand for linen, and the price went up to such a figure, that many people went in for the growing of flax, for they knew that climatic conditions in this country were ideal for its production. Well, the price has fallen since. The deflation in the price of flax seed, linen and hemp is only what you find in the wool industry as well.

We had linen industries in this country before this item was placed in the Estimates. There was in the constituency that I represent a small factory engaged in the manufacture of linen. It is now a branch of the factory that is established at Guelph. They have been manufacturing linen very successfully, and their success is in no small measure due to the fact that this item was placed in the Estimates. Unquestionably there are immense quantities of flax in the hands of the growers for which they can find no sale to-day. I do not believe we are justified in encouraging its manufacture into linen in this country and therefore I am heartily in favour of this item in the Estimates. Instead of reducing it to $26,000, I think we would be quite justified in leaving it at $30,000.

Mr. COWAN: I want to disagree as strongly as I can with the attitude of my hon. friend from Brome in this matter. To my way of thinking, he is a most unprogressive gentleman. If his policy had been followed, Canada would never had got to where it is to-day. I think he would make a good old-time Conservative. This item in the Estimates has been a benefit to Canada, even if the flax market is broken to-day. We have proved that we can raise in Canada the very best kind of flax for fibre purposes, and that is worth a whole lot more than the amount it has cost us in the way of bonus. This industry is not for to-day only; we shall have a flax industry in Canada for all time to come, employing thousands of men, and bringing profit to the farmers who raise the fibre. I think this is the proper course to follow if we are going to develop this industry in Canada. We must start it by just such means as we are adopting here. I think we ought all to support the item, which will encourage the development of this industry.

Mr. CAHILL: The minister asked us to excuse him for this bad legislation on the ground that it was adopted in war time. I think the minister really should be excused because any ministry that thought winter time was the time to grow flax in this country must have been more or less confused. The Order in Council for the encouragement of the flax industry was passed in September. That fact alone, I think, shows that the minister must have been very much confused. Had he waited for a more reasonable time, he would have found that the war was over, and he would have avoided the criticism he has received this afternoon from his own supporters for his lack of knowledge of the conditions in the flax industry. An hon. member has asked whether it was not the whole Government that was responsible for this Order in Council. I suppose the whole Government would be responsible. Certainly Parliament was not responsible. Parliament was not consulted about the matter, and had nothing whatever to do with it. The Government acted on the principle of divine right, at the time they were doing things by Order in Council instead of submitting them to Parliament. They passed this Order in Council to grow flax in the winter time instead of waiting until the House was in session, which would have been time enough, if this legislation was really necessary. I say it was a bad move on the part of the Government, and the minister deserves the criticism he has received from his supporters this afternoon.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Flax grows better when it is sown on a snowbank.

Mr. CANNON: The particulars concerning this item are not to be found in volume 3 of the Auditor General's Report. I would be very grateful if the minister would indicate where they are to be found. I owe the committee an explanation with reference to the previous item. The minister and I, I am quite sure without any bad faith on the part of either of us, misled the committee when we agreed to let the first item stand. I stated that the particulars were not in volume 3, but in volume 4, and the right hon. gentleman was under the same impression. Now I wish to correct both my statement and his impression. The particulars are to be found in volume 3, and if the minister desires to return to the item I withdraw my objection. Will he tell me, if he can, where the details of this flax item are to be found in the Auditor General's Report?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If I am to answer my hon. friend exactly according to his question, the details of this item will not be found until it has been worked out on the basis of production and the accounts have been paid and audited. That will appear in the Auditor General's Report, probably of 1922.

Mr. VIEN: We mean last year's expenditure.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Last year's expenditure, if anything, was very slight, and I am not sure that there would be anything in the Auditor General's Report this year concerning it. In the report of next year, the audited accounts will be found. I am glad to go back to item 346, but I am sorry to have to say that my faith in my hon. friend's general veracity has received a severe shock. He told me, with such an honest look in his countenance, that the details were to be found only in "Z" that I took his word for it. After this I shall have to query when my hon. friend makes a positive statement.

Mr. McCOIG: Has the minister any encouragement to offer the flax growers of the country for the future? What my hon. friend from South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) stated a few moments ago is absolutely true. There are many flax growers throughout Ontario who were encouraged to take up this business by the facts placed before them by representatives or supporters of the Government. They went ahead and have produced a crop which they have yet. They have been at great expense, having paid out money which they could have spent to better advantage in some other direction; and now they have flax on hand which they are unable to dispose of. I do not say this in any unkind spirit or for the purpose of criticising the Government for having given encouragement to this or any other industry. I believe they are justified in taking such steps as they deem fit from time to time to encourage an industry which they hope will turn out profitable to the producers. But I would ask the minister if he has any advice as to the future to offer these men who have seriously gone into this industry, made large expenditures, purchased machinery, and put up buildings to take care of their crops. Would he advise them to continue or to withdraw from the industry, and take up some other line instead?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I certainly would not advise them one way or the other, and it would be a pretty bold man, I think, who would take the responsibility of giving advice to people as to how they should employ their enterprise and spend their money on production in the future. The best that could be said about it is that men must use their judgment in the light of their knowledge of the world and of business. You have to make your investment on the basis of your conviction as to what the future has in store, and a man would assume a great responsibility if he presumed to give advice to people to go on producing flax because year after next they would obtain splendid prices. It is not possible for one to make such a prediction, and if it were, it certainly would not be possible under conditions as they exist at present. If my hon. friend thinks for a moment he will realize the truth of this. Still, we cannot stagnate. If a government is to do anything to help conditions, it must proceed on general lines, advising that we produce all we can and raise all we can; but, after all, the producer himself must be his own judge as to whether or not he will follow such advice, even though it be given with the very best intention and on the strength of information available at the time. We all know that things change, and sometimes the change is so rapid that what appeared to be the height of wisdom at one time in the prosecution of an enterprise might be the height of unwisdom at another time, and a policy deemed advisable previously might later on turn out disastrously. I have no specific for that sort of thing, and if my hon. friend has any, I should like him to give me the formula.

Mr. EULER: How many factories have actually been established which are entitled to the bounty?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: One.

Mr. EULER: Are they entitled to the bounty whether they produce yarn or not?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The bounty is paid only on the production of yarn.

Mr. EULER: On what basis is it given?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is paid on the basis of so many cents per pound, based on the "lea"—their measurement—which signifies the degree of fineness or coarseness, as the case may be. The bounty is so many cents per pound of a certain fineness.

Mr. EULER: Would they receive any bounty merely as a remuneration for having put up a factory, or must they actually produce?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Nothing is paid except on what is produced.

Mr. VIEN: What part of the $30,000 was expended last year?

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): What is the name of the company the minister mentions?

Mr. VIEN: Just a moment.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The bounty was paid from April 1, 1920, to December 31, 1920, on 110,011¾ pounds of linen thread, the amount paid being $3,939.00.

Mr. EULER: What is the name of the company and where is it located?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The name of the company is Dominion Linens, Ltd., of Guelph.

Mr. CANNON: What is the reason for the decrease this year?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I explained that the bounty is paid on actual production. At present there is one factory producing, and it is without the bounds of possibility that that factory will produce enough during the current year to warrant the payment of $30,000, and it was therefore reduced to $26,000. I do not think it is very probable that they will absorb the whole of that sum, but if it is not earned, it wil not be paid.

Mr. PEDLOW: The member for South Oxford, in his reference to this item, in speaking of the conditions in regard to the production of flax and manufacture of linen yarns, stated that one of the reasons why Canada was not able to compete with other countries was the cheapness of labour abroad. I think that another reason is the difference in climatic conditions. Climatic conditions in the north of Ireland particularly, in Belgium, Holland and Russia, are much more favourable to the production of a finer fibre than can ever be produced in Canada under the climatic conditions that prevail here. The conditions here will prevent the Canadian producer from ever competing in the markets of the world for finer fibres. There is another reason which apparently has not been considered this afternoon in discussing this subject. That is the fact, that while in the Old Country they produce flax for the fibre only, in Canada I understand they try to produce flax at the same time for both fibre and seed. Now it is impossible to produce the finer grades of fibre and save the seed at the same time. If you produce the fibre to the stage where the seed ripens you have coarser fibre as a result, and consequently it will not be possible for the Canadian producer to compete in markets of the world in the producing of the finer grades of this commodity.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I have no desire to prolong the debate on this item, but in view of certain definite statements which have been made by the last speaker I feel it incumbent to at least say a few words.

Mr. PEDLOW: I have not completed my remarks. Does the hon. gentleman wish to ask a question?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): No. Let the hon. gentleman proceed with his speech.

Mr. PEDLOW: Not only is what I have said true with respect to the production of the fibre, but it is equally true when we consider the manufacture of the material. It is an undoubted fact—a fact questioned by no one who has any knowledge of the linen industry—that linens cannot be produced in Canada which are at all as fine as those produced in the north of Ireland. The reason for that also is the climatic conditions there. The humid atmosphere of the north of Ireland is extremely favourable to the manufacture of the linen material—it is favourable, in the first instance, to the production of the fibre, and it is equally favourable to the production of the finished article, the cloth produced from that fibre. Such being the case I do not think it is possible to produce in this country either the fibre or the finished article to successfully compete with the finer grades of linen manufactured in the Old Country. In making that statement I am speaking with authority, because I have not only had personal experience in handling the finished product, but I have also had experience in the whole process from start to finish—handling the seed; pulling, retting, and scutching the flax; spinning it into yarn, weaving it into cloth, finishing the woven product and placing it on the market. So that by reason of this experience I should know whereof I speak. I am aware that there are those who claim that what I state is not the case. Such people speak without knowledge for the production of an article as fine as that produced in the Old Land has been attempted under artificial conditions on this continent time and again, without any degree of success. That is to say the endeavour has been made to obtain artificial conditions in the factory where the material is spun into yarn and the yarn is woven into cloth, but even in that case the quality of the finished article did not compare with the finished article manufactured in the north of Ireland. I would like to give some consideration also to the point so properly referred to by the hon. member for Dufferin (Mr. Best). We have trade commissioners all over the world but what do they accomplish? The hon. member for Regina (Mr. Cowan) presided at a meeting of members of Parliament held in this building a few days ago when a certain gentleman delivered an address on trade questions. This gentleman stated that he had travelled entirely round the world, in the interest of the firm with which he was connected, in an endeavour to obtain information of value touching the manufacture and disposition of their product. He said that he had, during the past year, travelled a distance of over forty-one thousand miles; and I was astonished to hear him assert that in all his travels he had found only one really live Canadian trade comissioner who was of any assistance to him. I will not mention the locality where that trade commissioner is stationed, but the minister, if he wishes to investigate the matter, may secure information of value to him from hon. gentlemen on his own side of the House. Now, referring to the Auditor General's Report, pages Z—20, Z—21, Z—22, and Z—23, I find a list of 36 Canadian trade commissioners.

5 p.m.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If my hon. friend will allow me, does he not think it would be more appropriate to discuss the matter of trade commissioners on the item relating to them which comes up a little later?

Mr. PEDLOW: On general principles I have no doubt the minister's view is correct, but I merely wish to refer to the matter in passing in order to emphasize a point which was alluded to by the hon. member for Dufferin. Now you have trade commissioners at Yokohama, Havana, Barbadoes, Rio de Janeiro, Vladivostok, Shanghai, Cape Town, Buenos Aires, Rotterdam, and other places whose title terminates in the same manner as the last one I quoted.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is an awful mean way of swearing.

Mr. PEDLOW: Although there are trade commissioners at all these places there is not a single one in the city of Belfast. Now I ask the minister why it is that the Government, although it obtained last year $30,000 for the encouragement of the flax industry and is now asking for a sum of $26,000, has not any representative in the city of Belfast to look after the interests of the Canadians who have this yarn to sell?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In the first place the capacity of the Dominion is limited. There are a great many other cities in the world besides Belfast where we have no trade commissioner. As my hon. friend said we have about thirty commissioners, but even those are not sufficient to meet the needs; we have to send them where we think the best general advantages can be derived. At the present time I would imagine it to be a little bit dangerous to be in Belfast.

Mr. PEDLOW: I think a trade commissioner would be just as safe in the city of Belfast as he would be in the Bahamas, Shanghai, or Vladivostok.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: But you have to keep indoors there.

Mr. PEDLOW: It seems ridiculous for the Canadian Government to be endeavouring to promote the production of flax in Canada and to be granting bonuses for this purpose, that it has not followed the matter up by appointing a resident agent in the city of Belfast, the world centre of this particular branch of trade, to look after the interests of Canadian producers.

Mr. GLASS: I wish to say, in reference to the observations of the hon. member who has just spoken, that he takes upon himself a very serious responsibility in criticising the support that the Government is trying to give to the establishment in Canada of an industry that has such immense possibilities. I am sorry that world conditions so far have prevented manufacturers from Ireland, and I may say even manufacturers from Belgium, who are experts in the cultivation and manufacture of flax, establishing mills here and taking advantage of this bounty to encourage the spinning industry in Canada. It must be patent to any one that it is the height of folly for us to continue to be the hewers of wood and the drawers of water for the countries of Europe—for us to produce our raw material and send it over there to be manufactured and re-sold to us in the finished state.

There seems to be a desire not only in the House but in the press to discount the ability of Canadian growers to produce flax of high quality. A prominent Belgian who was in this country a short time ago, in the course of an interview given to a representative of the Montreal Star, stated that Canada grew as fine a quality of fibre flax as could be produced in the civilized world; but that Canadians so far had not been able to handle their flax as scientifically as growers in Belgium, Ireland and other countries. Why, Sir, the very object of establishing a department of fibre in connection with the Experimental Farm was not to show farmers how to grow flax—that is easy enough—but how to handle it after it is grown. You may produce a crop of flax the acre value of which might not represent twenty-five dollars after it is harvested, and yet that very same flax handled under expert direction and properly retted and scutched might represent a value of from $300 to $350 an acre. It is for that very purpose that we want expert direction through our Department of Agriculture. Then, having produced a quality of flax equal to the best that can be produced in Europe, the Department of Trade and Commerce, through this bounty, can encourage the spinning of the fibre into yarns. This means spinning it into threads from which the linen is woven. As a result of that encouragement a mill was established in Guelph by Dominion Spinners, Limited, the purpose of which was to use Canadian flax fibre for the making of yarns, and then in their adjoining mill to weave the yarns into linen. The quality of their goods is attested by the fact that the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian Pacific Railway, the King Edward Hotel and other leading institutions which demand a high quality of linen for their tables are buying their supplies from Dominion Spinners, Limited; in other words, they are buying linen which has been woven in a Canadian mill from yarn spun from Canadian-grown fibre. The Brooklyn Linen Mills of Belfast, Ireland, have already been looking into the possibilities of growing fibre in this country with a view to the establishment of linen mills here. I hold, Sir, in view of the fact that we have such a tremendous potential water power in this country, and that we can grow fibre here of such excellent quality, there is no earthly reason why with proper encouragement we should not have the flax spinning and weaving industries developed here to their highest possibilities. I submit that if several spinning mills were established here—as I hope they will be—the $25,000 or $26,000 appropriated for bounties on the production of these yarns would be too small, and it is my cherished hope that the industry may so develop and such a large amount of yarn will be spun as to require even a large appropriation for this bounty.

This afternoon, while this discussion was proceeding, I was engaged in my room dictating a long letter of protest to the Montreal Star in answer to an article which appeared there a week ago to-night. A Mr. Ireland, of Ireland Bros., large linen manufacturers of Belfast, allowed himself to be interviewed by an ignorant reporter of the Montreal Star—ignorant on this subject; I will qualify it to that extent; absolutely ignorant of the subject about which he was seeking information. Mr. Ireland, in expressing his optimism and hope for the future of the industry, made the statement, that with the present condition of the industry throughout the world there is a total visible supply of not one-third enough fibre to operate the mills in Ireland alone for a single year. Yet notwithstanding that condition, and the impossibility of the Baltic and other flax-growing districts getting back to normal conditions within a reasonable time, the price of this commodity has been depressed to a point where it is now below the cost of production in this country. That is a very unfortunate circumstance, but it is not one to discourage us, because production costs last year were abnormal by reason of the very high rate of wages. Mr. Ireland expressed the opinion that these conditions impelled the conclusion that in the very near future there must be a large increase in the consumption of fibre, and that as soon as the retailer commenced buying linens there would be a demand on the manufacturers for their goods, and having eased themselves of their stocks, a demand would spring up very quickly from the manufacturers for the limited supply of fibre that was now available. Therefore there is every possibility that our growers will come through with a very fair profit if they will have patience. But the point in this article that I object to, and the point which I drew to the attention of the chief of the fibre department of the Experimental Farm, is this. The interviewer asked Mr. Ireland what did people in Ireland and the rest of Europe think of Canadian flax. He said: Oh, Canadian flax does not meet with very much success. He could not say anything against its quality, for it was good, but the flax in this country was grown mostly for linseed. Now, that was an absurd statement for him to make. It is true that in the West flax is grown for linseed, but in Ontario and Quebec we grow flax for fibre exclusively, and we have developed a quality equal to the best fibre grown in any part of the world.

I urge, Sir, that it is the duty of the Government at this critical time not to get discouraged. Our growers are not discouraged. They will grow more flax next year, but not so much as in former years; they are going to feel their way. I have expressed the opinion in this House time and again that the duty of our growers is to develop quality rather than quantity, that a hundred acres of good flax from which good fibre can be produced is better than five hundred acres of mediocre flax, the fibre from which you cannot find a market for, against the competition of Russia, Japan and other flax-growing countries. I hope the Government will stand to its guns and will follow up its good work by establishing a demonstration plant in the district where fibre is mostly grown, and will by research work encourage the adoption of better methods and better mechanical appliances. There is no reason why we should not have by this means, a flax industry developed to the limits of its possibilities, and an industry which will add enormous potential wealth to this country.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I cannot allow the statement of the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Pedlow) to go unchallenged. In my constituency there are five flax mills which took care of a production area last year of over two thousand acres. Some of these mills have been in operation for fifty years or more and their business has been conducted in such a way that their fibre has been sent to Belfast and is considered of the very best quality in every particular. There is no question about the capability of the people of my county to raise the very best quality of flax fibre. I merely make that statement for the purpose of correcting the hon. member for South Renfrew.

Mr. PEDLOW: I am pleased indeed to hear the correction made by the member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong). I am pleased also to see the hon. member for East Middlesex (Mr. Glass) here. During the progress of the discussion I looked around for him, and as my hon. friend has made a specialty of this subject and has discussed it on numerous occasions on the floor of the House, to take the matter up without his being present seemed to me to be like trying to play Hamlet without the star performer, the Prince of Denmark. I was glad to hear from him the facts of the situation in regard to the production of fibre and to know that in Ontario at least they have not been trying to grow flax both for seed and for the production of fibre. That was attempted in the early stages of the production of flax, but without satisfactory results. I am sure that the information which has been given in regard to this matter by the member for East Middlesex will be of much interest to the general public.

Mr. GLASS: A certain amount of confusion constantly arises from the fact that we can grow flax for seed as well as flax for fibre. The characteristics and the methods of cultivation in the growing of flax for fibre and the growing of flax for seed are entirely different. In producing flax for seed in the West they sow one-half bushel to the acre and as a result they grow a short, stocky straw which throws out its branches and has many seed bolls on it. The statistics show that in good soil and under favourable conditions they have reaped a crop of as high as twenty-eight bushels to the acre. Their purpose is to grow seed; the fibre is of no consideration whatever; for generations back the straw has been burned as waste, there being no use for it. In Ontario, Quebec, British Columbia, and the provinces where we grow for fibre, the seed is of an entirely different character. It is seed which has been cultivated down through successive generations, having been grown originally in Riga, Russia, developed in Holland and then sent out here and grown as it is in Ireland—Dutch Child seed, we call it. This seed, instead of being sown one-half bushel to the acre, is sown a bushel and one-half to the acre, and the result is that instead of growing a short, stocky straw, they grow a long, lean straw running from thirty-six to forty-five inches high, the whole outer surface of which is covered with this fibre. The seed that is grown for oil contains twenty-five per cent more oil than the seed which is grown for fibre, therefore when you have to sell the fibre seed to the oil mill a deduction of value is made because oil cannot be produced from that seed in as great quantity as it can be produced from the regular oil seed. It is owing to the confusion with regard to our growing that flax in the West and growing this other type in other parts of the country that the countries of Europe are getting mixed up as to our capacity for the production of flax. It is necessary, therefore, by propaganda and advertising to keep before the public the fact that there are two distinct varieties, one having no connection with the other, one produced for one purpose and one for another. The statement that flax cannot be grown for fibre as well as for seed is also erroneous to some extent, because this is the only country under God's sun where we can do both. We pull the fibre flax up by the roots at a time when the seed in the boll has not been fully developed—is not ripe. But the seed is left in the straw and it goes on to maturity while the plants are in the stock, and there is no very great deterioration in its quality. The Government demands, of course, that all seeds exported to Europe for growing fibre must be certified as to quality, must show a purity of not more than one weed seed to the ounce avoirdupois, which means one weed seed in 3,390 seeds, and that they must germinate ninety per cent. My hon. friend will admit that if we grow from our fibre straw a seed that will germinate ninety per cent—and it does germinate, as has been shown by test, up to ninety-five and ninety-eight per cent—it can scarcely be said that we cannot grow fibre and, from the crop grown, obtain seed as well. We do obtain the seed, but it is not our purpose to sell it to the oil mills if we can find a market for the product in the form of fibre; because last year it had a value of $10 a bushel for fibre whereas its value for oil seed is not half that amount at the present time. There does not appear to be a market for the seed for fibre, because of the large surplus of Holland seed. The flax growers who grow for fibre have to sell their seed at twenty per cent under the price obtained for the oil seed of the West because their fibre seed does not produce the same amount of oil.

Mr. PEDLOW: The hon. member for East Middlesex (Mr. Glass) has just substantiated the point I made, to the effect that when you try to produce flax fibre and seed at the same time, the quality of the fibre is depreciated. You cannot produce the highest quality of flax fibre and produce a ripened seed at the same time. During the course of the discussion this afternoon the minister said that he did not desire to give advice to the farmers or to anyone else in a matter of this kind. But after the discussion which has taken place here to-day I think he should arrive at the conclusion that is is not advice the farmers want, but information as to the proper methods of handling this product. If the Department of Trade and Commerce will supply the correct information to the men who handle this product, those men will have received from the department all they should expect, and all, I am sure, that they desire.

Mr. McKENZIE: It has been stated during the discussion that this is an old industry, having been carried on in Canada for fifty or sixty years, and that we are producing here the very best quality of fibre in the world. That being the case, I do not understand why the minister has been giving a bounty for the encouragement of the industry. Bounties are usually given to encourage new industries, and before a bounty is granted the minister has to be satisfied that the industry in question is of a national character and that it has a future. What is the reason, then, for the granting of a bounty to this industry?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): The statement I made is with regard to the production of flax seed and flax fibre. I have in my riding no industry like this that would require a bounty. There is in Canada only one industry for the manufacture of fibre and that is located at Guelph.

Mr. McKENZIE: We have the raw material in abundance and of the very best quality, so that in the state to which we have developed it, we have for the last fifty or sixty years been capable of controlling the markets of the world. Why then, having such splendid material, should we not go on and develop and manufacture it further without any bounty at all? If we have to get a bounty for the manufacture of flax which is of the very excellent quality which the hon. member says it is, would not the same argument apply to every industry in the country? If a fisherman says that he is going to produce boneless codfish or that he is going to manufacture canned halibut or anything like that, where he takes a stage in advance in the production and output of fish, then he can come to the Government and say: "If you give me a bounty on every can or barrel of fish, I will produce a more advanced article." In that case, I think the department would say: "You have the article; you have your opportunities in the world, and you must hold your own or go under, just as the case may be, because we cannot follow a general policy of granting bounties to every industry in this country." I understood the minister to say that there was in Canada only one mill that was spinning this kind of yarn, and the bounty goes only to the spun material. Therefore, if all of this $26,000 is to go to one mill, I would like to have a little further explanation from the minister. Until I looked a little more closely to this item, I thought the bounty went to the farmer; that when he produced the flax in some stage or another, he was getting the bounty. The farmer, however, does not get the bounty at all. All this afternoon we were making a lot of noise about what the farmer was going to get, when the farmer was not entitled to anything, because this item says that the flax must be spun. If there is, as I understand the matter, only one factory in Canada in which this process is carried on, I do not quite like the idea that we are going to give this $26,000 to one concern. I should like a further explanation why we had so much talk about the farmer over-producing and this bounty being given to relieve the farmer when he does not get it at all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Ask the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster).

Mr. McKENZIE: I am discussing this question with the minister now, and I give it as my opinion and practice that I always stand by and get information from the department which is the responsible source. I would not even take chances on going to South Oxford, although, perhaps, it is the most prolific source of information known to the human race at present. If the farmer does not get this money, and if there is only one man who does the spinning, why should we give him, or let him earn, $26,000 out of the depleted treasury of this country? The minister told us a little while ago that the bounty on oil goes to the farmer who has a side-show of oil producing. If the farmer who produces flax must be encouraged, why does he not get the bounty, without waiting until somebody takes the flax and spins it and then the latter gets the bounty for doing so? The spinner does not take any chances at all; he need not buy from the farmer, and he will spin and manufacture only as he sees an opportunity of selling. I cannot quite understand why he is getting the bounty and nothing being given to the farmer, who may have a large stock of this material piled up. On the other hand, the moment the manufacturer sees an opportunity of selling some of this manufactured stuff, after he has spun the fibre, he gets a bounty. I do not see the consistency of that course.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think my hon. friend could not have been here when I explained why this bounty was granted in the first place. If he had, he would have known that it was a war measure and that it was not given specifically in order that more flax might be raised, but it was given specifically in order that linen thread, of which there was an absolute lack in this country, might be furnished to the fishermen and boatmen and harnessmakers and all those that required it as an absolute ingredient in their manufactures. My hon. friend might use the same argument with reference to an industry in which he is interested. Why was a bounty given on steel plates or iron? Why was the bonus not given to the men who dug the ore out of the mine? That is susceptible of an answer much the same as this. What the country and the department wanted at that time was not flax seed or fibre; it was what was never made in this country before, something of which there was an absolute lack and which was necessary for all those different purposes that I mentioned. We wanted to find a man who would spin the flax fibre and make it into thread, which would be used in those various works of necessity and out of which ultimately the textiles would be woven. My hon. friend proceeds on the wrong ground when he proceeds on the idea that this was a bounty to stimulate the production of flax seed or fibre. Indirectly, it had the effect of stimulating the production of flax. The bounty is open to any mill that will put in the machinery and manufacture the article. If my hon. friend or any friends of his would put in the amount of money necessary, erect the machinery and spin this flax from the fibre, they would have a share of this bounty; it would not be given to one. But this is the only mill which has equipped itself and is, consequently, the only spinner of flax thread in the Dominion.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister has drawn an analogy between the granting of a bounty to the spinner of flax fibre and the granting of a bounty to the producer of steel. When he talks about a bounty to the producer of steel and pig iron, we are dealing with a concrete case and we know exactly the circumstances. There was no distinction of ownership in that case; the same man who made the pig iron owned the raw material.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Not necessarily.

Mr. McKENZIE: There was only the one specific case in Canada, or two at the outside.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend is wrong. The bounty was given on pig iron with which was mixed a certain and quite a large proportion of foreign iron ore. It does not necessarily follow that the man who made the pig iron owned the iron mines.

Mr. McKENZIE: There was never anything else. There were only two companies in Canada that ever got much advantage —The Dominion Coal Company, and the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company, and they both owned their iron ore. The bounty was never given to anybody simply because he had ore and was not manufacturing it. I do not wish to detain the minister with his Estimates for one moment. I only wish to tell him that we are seem to be following a different practice than has been usual when considering Estimates. A minister used to get through his Estimates without very much trouble from his own side of the House, but it is different to-day, and I would suggest to the minister that he should caucus his Estimates so that when he brings them down here he will only have to battle with those who are not in his confidence. Practically the whole afternoon has been taken up with sniping from behind the minister. He has had very little trouble indeed from this side of the House.

Mr. FIELDING: Was this Order in Council passed under the War Measures' Act?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. ROBB: The minister has just admitted that the Order in Council was passed under the War Measures' Act. I gathered from a previous statement he made that we had made a contract for three years, and that we could not, if we were to keep our faith as a nation, rescind the contract until the end of that time. I am not sure that I am quoting him correctly. Well, in answer to a question from the hon. member from North Cape Breton and Victoria the minister has just made the statement that so far only one mill in Canada has availed itself of the advantages of this contract. I suppose the minister is providing in his Estimates this year for the subsidy which that mill will earn?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Or any other that may qualify for it.

Mr. ROBB: I notice that the item is for a subsidy to the manufacturers of flax, including expenses of supervision. I suppose $5,000 would cover the expenses of supervision fairly well. If that be true, the minister will be subsidizing this particular mill, providing he appropriates the $26,000, to the extent of seven per cent upon $300,000. That will equip a pretty good mill. The shareholders in this particular mill one therefore given a preferred dividend of 7 per cent upon $300.000; I do not think that is an unfair statement.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend's statement is not right in this respect. If this mill with its equipment can make a sufficient quantity of linen thread to make it necessary for us to pay out $20,000 as a bounty upon the number of pounds that it makes, it would get the $20,000, and my hon. friend would be right in his reasoning, but at its present rate of production it would not get that amount. If another mill equipped itself and produced thread it would also share proportionately in the bounty, which cannot exceed $25,000.

Mr. ROBB: I thought it was $26,000.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The contract is $25,000, and if ten mills were producing, and producing at an equal rate, each mill would get only one-tenth of $25,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The vote is for $26,000.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That includes the expenses of supervision.

Mr. ROBB: I allowed $5,000 for that, leaving a bonus of $21,000. The fact remains that the minister is providing for a preferred dividend of 7 per cent on an investment of over $300,000 for three years. Now, either the minister has in mind that this particular company will get the whole subsidy, or that some other company will avail itself of a part of it; otherwise, it would not be necessary to vote this full amount. I think it would be well for the minister to take the committee completely into his confidence in view of the opposition that has developed from his own supporters. The opposition to this item, I gather, is largely upon the ground that this particular mill subsidized by Canada, with its dividends guaranteed, is not taking care of the crops which the farmers of that district have been encouraged to grow in anticipation that they would be able to sell them to this mill. The mill will not take the flax, and consequently the farmers are the losers because they could have utilized the land for growing cereals or for dairying or some other purpose.

We have heard a good deal to-day about developing the flax industry in this country, but if my knowledge of the trade is at all correct, Russia grows two-thirds of the flax production of the world, and exports one-half of its product to Great Britain, Germany, France and Belgium. I am not sure that it is a wise policy to subsidize an industry that comes into competition with the cheap labour of Russia. We might invest our money in something that would be more suitable to this country, and that would give us a better return on the investment.

There is another feature. On the one hand, hon. gentlemen who represent constituencies where fibre is produced for this mill complain that it is not buying the fibre. I should like to know how this mill is dealing with the people of Canada in selling its manufactured product. Is their selling price up to the very limit they can obtain under the tariff laws of this country, or is there any advantage to the Canadian people in purchasing linen from this particular company?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend, I think, was scarcely fair in trying to make it appear that a very large amount of opposition had developed to this particular vote on this side of the House.

Mr. ROBB: That is how it looked to us over here.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: But the glasses probably were arranged so that it might look that way. Neither was my hon. friend quite fair, I think, in stating that all the incentives to the raising of flax in Ontario and other parts of the Dominion were centered entirely on the fact that here was one mill that was manufacturing a small proportion of linen thread. That was not what caused the development and expansion of the flax fibre and seed industry. As I stated before, and as my hon. friend will readily admit, it was the general conditions of supply and demand throughout the world which made the price for flax fibre and flax seed very high and remunerative, and it was that high price which stimulated the growth of flax fibre and seed. The market has suddenly receded, as it has in a thousand other instances, and consequently there are stocks on hand that cannot realize the old price. There may be stocks on hand which cannot realize a remunerative price. This is but a small item in the incentive towards increased development in the production of flax. My hon. friend wants to know how they are selling, and so on. Well, as I mentioned a while ago to the committee, only about 110,000 pounds has been manufactured up to the end of 1920, and that would go a very small way in the manufacture of textiles. I imagine they are selling at as good a price as they can obtain.

Mr. ROBB: Is the number of pounds mentioned by the minister the full capacity of the mill?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That was only what was spun by the mill in a limited time; it does not take in the whole year, neither was it the full acapacity. Your capacity increases according as you bring in your units. What the full capacity is I do not know.

Mr. GLASS: I hope the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) does not propound the doctrine that because Russia in the past has produced two-thirds of the total flax fibre production in the world, and, owing to cheap labour, was able to produce it at a low cost, therefore we must lie down or get out of the way and let that country continue this production. We produce a quality of fibre in this country that is superior to the great bulk of the fibre produced in Russia. Hon. gentlemen do not seem to understand the conditions that were responsible for this bounty. Primarily, I suppose, it was due to war conditions, because we had mills that could weave linen cloths for aeroplanes, but we could not get the yarns. We had raw fibre and were sending it across the seas to help the Mother Country, but we could not get a pound of yarn here, and the only mill we had was shut down because it could not obtain supplies of yarn to carry on manufacturing. Cotton looms were installed and, I believe, cotton was spun. Now, the production of fibre by the farmers and the small co-operative mills of this country had been possible only by exporting the material. During the war it was felt that if we could spin the fibre here and produce aeroplane cloths, we should be doing the Empire a great service. But, there was the fact that we were allowing our fibre to go out of this country to be spun into yarns in Ireland, Belgium, France, and elsewhere, where there are spinning mills. My hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), said he understood that we have been manufacturing these yarns in this country for a period of sixty years. He is entirely wrong in that impression. Except through the hand loom in the home of the habitant, we have never before spun yarns in this country. This bounty was given to encourage the establishment of an industry which would enable us to use our materials right through the various stages of production to the finished article, linen. No one would imagine that a mill would begin operations on the assurance of a bounty for one year. The mills asked for a bounty of $25,000. That was the maximum that could be given in one year, and it was to be given for three years. It was divided into three classes, a bounty of three cents, six cents, and nine cents per pound, according to the quality of the yarns spun. The three cents per pound bounty was given on all yarns between ten lea and twenty lea, which is the coarser quality. The yarns of a finer fibre, between twenty and forty lea, were granted six cents a pound, and all above forty lea were given nine cents. The object of the higher bounty was to encourage the spinning of a finer and better quality of yarns in this country. That, of course, is a matter of great importance to the grower as well as to the spinner, because if we are to spin yarns of sixty lea and upwards, it is necessary for the farmers to produce the higher quality of flax.

Mr. ROBB: Were these various qualities of yarn spun in the same mill?

Mr. GLASS: Yes. Now, the spinning of yarn of good quality is not a question that depends on any method of handling in the mill; it is a matter of having a quality of fibre that will produce fine yarn.

Mr. McKENZIE: Were these various very fine qualities required for war purposes?

Mr. GLASS: I am informed that yarn that would spin sixty lea was of ample fineness for the purposes of manufacturing aeroplane cloth, which was the matter of principal importance at that time. It has been stated by a prominent linen manufacturer that ninety per cent of the production of all linens in the world are manufactured from yarns that are spun under one hundred lea of fineness. We have already produced yarns in this country that have spun up to one hundred lea, which is an exceptionally fine quality. We need not worry ourselves if we are unable to produce a quality fine enough to compete with the finer yarns spun from Belgium flax retted in the Courtrai district. If we can produce a quality sufficiently high to be included in the ninety per cent of the total world production, we are producing an article which, I think, should command sufficient sympathy from this House to ensure its development. My hon. friend from Cape Breton said he thought we were helping the farmers. Well, so we are. If we can develop the spinning of a finer degree of yarn by developing our own spinning facilities, naturally it follows that the onus is on the grower to produce a finer fibre that will give us the better quality of yarn. An acre of flax will produce three hundred pounds of fibre, and that fibre may be worth anywhere from fifteen cents per pound to seventy-five cents per pound, according to quality. Whatever be the quality of the fibre, it has taken the same amount of labour and the same area of land. But it is a matter of great importance to the producer whether he gets fifteen cents a pound or seventy-five cents for the product. It is a total difference of $1,200 per ton in price, or as will be seen, $180 an acre. I think that we should urge our people to produce, not so much with a view to quantity as for the purpose of securing as good a quality as can possibly be had, because it is in the hope that we may produce an article of the highest quality that we shall ultimately displace Russian flax from the American, and even from the Irish, markets. Russia will not bother us in the production of flax for a few years to come, and unless she improves her methods she will not be a serious competitor in the higher grades. But if our ambition stops at the coarser grades, then Russia will be a serious competitor against us in the years ahead. In order to encourage this industry a bounty of $25,000 a year was granted by Order in Council as a maximum to be continued for a period of three years.

Now people might naturally say, in fact the statement was made at the time, "There may be half a dozen mills start up, and in that case we will not get this bounty on our production. We will only get the bounty in the ratio that our production bears to the entire production; and it may be that if five or six mills were producing enough to absorb $100,000 on the basis of the bounty given, that each mill would only get twenty-five per cent of that bounty to which it might be entitled if there was not competition." Nevertheless we hoped the assistance given would attract the Irish mills to this country, and that we would ultimately develop a large and extensive spinning industry in this country, because it follows as surely as that the night follows the day that to develop the spinning industry means the development of the growing industry, and that is where the advantage to the farmer comes in. I submit that in fairness to the manufacturer who started the mill in question, it is our duty to keep faith with him. I hope that if we keep faith with him we will find before the expiration of the term for which this bounty is granted, other large firms in Ireland desirous of establishing mills in this country.

Mr. VIEN: Would there be an ample market for the yarn spun in Canada?

Mr. GLASS: There is a market in the world for more than Canada could possibly produce if she had twenty mills. The spinning capacity of the world to-day is not sufficient to supply the world's needs for linen at the present time.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend said something about the mills wanting a guarantee of $25,000 before they would enter into this undertaking. Does he mean that they wanted such a guarantee from the Government of Canada, or from the city of Guelph?

Mr. GLASS: I do not think I made myself clear to my hon. friend; I certainly did not mean to create such an impression. What I said was that they were presuming at the time that half a dozen mills, maybe a dozen, might take advantage of the encouragement as proposed for the establishment of spinning mills in this country. Now the maximum amount of the bounty was $25,000. If twelve mills of equal capacity started operations and each mill earned according to the rate granted, a bounty of $25,000, it would instead of getting the full bounty, receive only a ratio as one of twelve.

Mr. VIEN: If my hon. friend is right in saying that there is an ample market at the present time for yarns spun in Canada, and that even if several other mills were established they could not produce all the yarns that the world's market could absorb, I fail to see the necessity of a subsidy to bonus such an industry. The idea of such a subsidy is to protect an industry during its earlier years against competition; but if my hon. friend's statement is correct, and I take it that he is an authority on the subject, I fail to see why this industry requires assistance. It should not need aid if there is an ample demand for its product in the markets of the world. I would like to have some explanation from my hon. friend as to his reasons for supporting the granting of a subsidy when, according to his own statement of a moment ago, no subsidy is necessary for the establishment of the industry.

Mr. GLASS: My hon. friend propounds a question in regard to a matter which seems to me very clear. The bonus would be applicable in this case just the same as it is in the case of the iron and steel industries, or any other industry which it is desired to encourage.

Mr. VIEN: My hon. friend will permit me to point out that the iron and steel industries in Canada had to fight their way, in the matter of marketing their products, in the face of very strong competition. The point as to which I would like my hon. friend to give some enlightenment is that in this case, according to his own statement, there is no competition—there is a demand for the entire production not only of the existing mills but of other mills that might be established. The hon. member also said that we need not fear competition from Russia, which used to produce most of the flax consumed, for years to come. The case of the steel bounties is not at all parallel to the present case: In the one there is competition, and in the other there is not at present, according to my hon. friend, a sufficient supply to meet the world's demand.

The CHAIRMAN: Is there any possibility, by sitting a few minutes longer, of putting this item through before the committee takes recess?

Mr. McKENZIE: I think there is every possibility of putting the item through if the Minister of Trade and Commerce would promise to control his followers.

Mr. VIEN: If my hon. friend will pardon me. I do not wish to unduly prolong the debate, but a point has arisen upon which I would like some enlightenment before I am ready to support this vote. The point is the one I have endeavoured to explain. We are asked to vote a subsidy for the encouragement of this industry and the hon. member (Mr. Glass) has just informed the committee that there was such a demand for yarn that even if several spinning mills were established it could not be supplied. If that is true, it seems to me no reason exists why we should assist this industry by voting it a subsidy. The reason for the granting of a subsidy is to protect an industry against competitors in the markets of the world. In the case of the present industry not only is there no competition but there is an insufficient supply of the material—that is accepting the statement of my hon. friend. Under the circumstances the matter will stand further investigation, and I therefore respectfully beg to differ from the hon. member for North Cape Breton and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) who said that the question could be disposed of in a very few minutes.

At Six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at Eight o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at six o'clock we were considering the Estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce. Item 346 had been allowed to stand. We had considered item 347, which has not yet been adopted. Shall the item carry?

Mr. VIEN: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose the question was on the advisability of continuing the bounty to the flax industry in view of the fact that there is not a sufficient supply of fibre to satisfy the excessive demand. Therefore I do not see why a subsidy is necessary to encourage the development of the industry. The principle underlying a subsidy is that of protection to the particular industry during its infant years so that it may survive undue competition of stronger rivals. I would be very much interested to hear the hon. member (Mr. Glass) who is known as an expert on this subject, give the committee his reasons for supporting the grant of such a subsidy.

Mr. GLASS: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman draws the deduction from my statement that because there is an unlimited demand for the visible supply of fibre there is no reason why encouragement should be given to the manufacture of the raw material in this country. In theory his deduction may seem to him to have some force. It was pointed out this afternoon that although this industry had been in existence in this country for a period of fifty or sixty years—and I may tell my hon. friend that he would not have gone astray if he had said that it had been in existence for a period of over two hundred and fifty years—yet we had not made that substantial progress in it that might reasonably have been expected. The total visible supply of flax fibre to-day is not sufficient to keep the British spinning mills alone employed for one year. But that visible supply will also be sought by the spinning mills in Belgium, Austria, France, Germany and other parts of the world. Therefore it is a fairly reasonable statement to make that the present supply is not at all sufficient to meet the demands of the world. Now, my hon. friend asks the question: If there is an unlimited demand for flax fibre, why is there any need of protection? I answer him by saying that there is a demand, but there is a suspension of that demand for the time being by reason of what is generally conceded to be a consumers' "strike." The impression prevailed that all commodities had reached such a high cost that there must inevitably come a reaction, and the consumers of linen came to the same conclusion and they quit buying. The result was that the wholesaler ceased buying his supplies from the mills, that reacted on the mills and they had to suspend operations, and at present they are operating on very short time and are loaded up with their manufactured product. If my hon. friend's question applies to the immediate present, I would say that the demand having been temporarily suspended, and the supply in the mills being ample under those circumstances, there is a supply for which there is no call at present.

Mr. VIEN: Since when?

Mr. GLASS: Practically since last September. It has been intermittently stagnant from that time on. The consumers' "strike" still continues and therefore the manufactured goods are not moving. But so soon as the usual channels of trade become active again the demands of consumers will react on the wholesalers, and they in turn will be eager to relieve the manufacturers of their present stocks.

Mr. VIEN: Although this temporary condition of slackness of demand has existed only since last September, I would point out to my hon. friend that the subsidy was introduced under the provisions of the War Measures' Act in 1919, if I remember rightly.

Mr. GLASS: The conditions arising out of the war only added force to the arguments in favour of a subsidy to encourage the development of the flax industry in this country.

Mr. VIEN: Was there not at that time such a tremendous demand that although all our mills worked day and night they could not satisfy the war-time requirements?

Mr. GLASS: No, my hon. friend is entirely wrong. There was not such a demand as the mills could not satisfy, but there was such a dearth of raw material that they could not produce the yarns with which to manufacture cloth.

Mr. VIEN: Did I not understand the hon. gentleman to say that there was such a demand for fibre in England that our Canadian weaving mills could not get their supply, and that the demand for their products was out of all proportion to their means of supplying it?

Mr. GLASS: I am sorry I cannot make myself clear to my hon. friend. I do say that there was a demand for the cloths, the resultant product of the weaving mills, which could not be supplied at that time because the available supply of flax fibre, which is the raw material of the spinning mills, could not be produced, and the only weaving mill in Canada at that time was the Dominion Linens, Limited, in Guelph, they having established a mill there at a cost of $750,000. They had previously been importing their yarns, the manufactured article from the fibre, and from those yarns weaving their cloths. Due to the war conditions then prevailing and the necessity for aeroplane cloths, Great Britain, Germany and all the belligerent countries forbade the exportation of the fibre and yarns and of any other flax products. What was the condition in Canada? We had a mill but that mill was stagnant because we could not manufacture our fibre into yarn to keep the spinning mills going.

Mr VIEN: Because you could not get the yarn from European mills?

Mr. GLASS: Precisely.

Mr. VIEN: Then there was such a demand for the yarns that the Canadian weaving mills could not get their supply to keep them going. Therefore my argument is that if there was such a demand for yarns, there is no need of protection to the spinning mills.

Mr. GLASS: My hon. friend draws a very unreasonable conclusion. Does he think for one minute that by reason of the demand for fishing nets, aeroplane cloths, harness threads, shoe threads and the other products of flax fibre it was reasonable under the pressure existing at that time to start their manufacture here, although the war might be over in six months or a year, when the large manufacturers in England, with their experience and their organization spread over centuries, with all the facilities and advantages which were at their command, might be in a position to crush any small mill which was started in Ontario? Surely it is unreasonable for my hon. friend to take that position.

Mr. VIEN: Not at all. I will ask for further information from my expert friend. Under normal conditions before the war, was there an excess of supply in yarns, or was there an excess in demand?

Mr. GLASS: Before the war there was an adequate supply of yarns and an adequate supply of fibre, eighty per cent of which was produced by Russia. When the war started the York Street Spinning Mills of Belfast saw the possibility of great diminution of the supply in Russia, so they sent an expert out to look over the field in Canada and see whether they could produce here the raw material for their linen mills. The man whom they sent out was a Mr. Lockhart, who is still chief of their organization. He came to the little village of Park Hill in the county of Middlesex and from that centre he established mill after mill in adjoining districts, and as a result of the success of their effort the acreage was increased year after year until it had run up to between three and four thousand acres. This Belfast mill had not known that they could use any flax fibre produced in Canada. Not a dollar's worth of flax fibre had ever been exported from Canada to European countries. Our sole market had been in the United States, in the thread mills of Massachusetts and New Jersey, and the result was that our growers were compelled to take the price fixed by the mills in Andover, Massachusetts and the other mills in New Jersey. They could scarcely get a price that would yield a profit sufficient to encourage any expansion of the industry. Now, Russia got out of the market completely and the demand continued to increase throughout all the years of the war, chiefly through the demand for aeroplane cloths. As a matter of fact, the manufacture of flax into linen for table-cloths and things of that kind was prohibited in Great Britain and Germany; the governments took control of the whole supply of linen and directed its manufacture to the production of aeroplane cloths. The hon. gentleman suggested this afternoon that Russia was able to grow eighty per cent, or four-fifths of the world's supply of fibre, and he asked what was the use of Canada producing fibre in the face of that fact. Well, would he suggest that because Russia, Argentina or other countries can produce wheat at a lower cost than we can, our farmers should discontinue the growing of wheat? I hope that this country will build up a great home market in which they can use all their wheat and all the fibre and linen that we produce. The point I want to make is that we have grown fibre in this country for two hundred and fifty years, but we are very little advanced in our methods of production—and so it is throughout the world—over the methods that were employed six thousand years ago. Canada has done something in the development of mechanical appliances for handling these crops, but in my opinion she has not measured up to her responsibility in the matter of research work with a view to improving the methods of retting this fibre. We have manufactured throughout all these years, but we have never been able to establish an industry here by which we could spin our yarns.

Mr. VIEN: Why?

Mr. GLASS: Because the production of fibre was small on account of the expensive methods of handling, on account of the cost of labour as against the low cost of labour in Russia.

Mr. VIEN: Could we not import the fibre as Ireland did?

Mr. GLASS: Yes, we could import the fibre, but we could not get labour with which to operate our spinning-mills at four times the price they pay in Ireland.

Mr. VIEN: I speak of the conditions prior to the war.

Mr. GLASS: I, too, am speaking of conditions prior to the war. We have open markets in the world for raw fibre just as Ireland has. But my hon. friend knows or should know that the conditions of labour prevailing in Ireland were such as to involve a standard of living that would not be desirable for the workingmen of this country, and I hope that the standard of living of the workingman in this country will never come down to the point which it reached in Ireland. Before the establishment of this spinning mill we did not know the quality of the fibre we had been able to grow. We accepted the price for our fibre fixed by the spinning mills in the United States. The lower grades of tow—the waste or by-product of the manufacture—were suitable for a good deal of the material which they manufactured, and not having any market for our fibre in our own country we exported our superior material at a price based on that of the cheaper tows which are produced to-day. When we established the spinning mill—

Mr. VIEN: When was that?

Mr. GLASS: A year ago. When we established the spinning mill we commenced to show by actual demonstration what we could do in this direction. Hon. gentlemen may theorize all they like about Canada not being able to grow flax, but when we delivered the goods, when we produced an article from our own raw material, we demonstrated that we could grow a fibre that would spin yarns up to sixty lea. There has been some difficulty in getting the machinery necessary to the development of the business up to the standard we aim at. This mill which has been in operation for a year has been able to get a certain amount of machinery with which to carry on the development of the coarser grades of fibre, but machinery for the spinning of the finer yarns is under order and when it is installed we shall be producing a quality of fibre away above that which we are producing now. If for no other purpose than to encourage the production of a higher and better quality of fibre I submit that the encouragement which has been given to the spinning industry has been fully justified. Hon. gentlemen have expressed the view that if the bounty re-acts beneficially upon the farmer, they are enabled to view it from a more favourable standpoint. That may be all right so far as it goes, but my argument is that the development of the spinning industry has shown the farmers and the growers what they did not know before: that they are able to produce a fibre that can compete with the best standards of fibre in Europe; that they do not have to take twelve and one-half cents a pound for it; that in the future, instead of receiving $250 a ton, they may reasonably expect a permanent market at a price of from $750 to $1,000 a ton.

Mr. VIEN: I do not think the hon. gentleman has answered my question at all. He has repeated the theories that we heard from him this afternoon and that we had heard with great interest at various times prior to that. The question I put to him is this: If there was a demand under normal conditions, setting aside abnormal conditions created by the war, and if the supply was sufficient for the demand for spun yarn, then there is no field for such an industry in Canada, and it would be better if we diverted our energies and capital to more profitable propositions. If, on the other hand, there is not a sufficient supply, then the demand is incentive enough to our manufacturers to start such an industry, and thereby the necessity for such a subsidy disappears. That is the point I tried to make clear to the committee this afternoon. I wanted to be enlightened but I am sorry that I have received very little enlightenment on the subject so far. There are only two alternatives—whether the demand exceeds the supply or the supply exceeds the demand. If the demand exceeds the supply, there is no necessity for a subsidy to protect such an industry. If the supply exceeds the demand, there is no field for such activity, and the Government would have been better advised to encourage industries with greater prospects of success.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: As my hon. friend (Mr. Vien) has, after this arduous series of debating conflicts with my hon. friend on this side, come to the conclusion that he has not received any enlightenment and does not see any prospects of receiving any, probably it would be better for us now to leave the general question with which this is incidentally connected and go back to the appropriation itself.

Mr. VIEN: Is the minister not of opinion that the principle at stake, underlying the appropriation, is of some importance?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If my hon. friend will allow me to present, for a moment or two out of his precious time, my point of view, I shall be very glad, and then he can go on again. This appropriation is for a special purpose. I explained it early in the afternoon. During war time and at a period when it was impossible to get any linen thread in this country from outside sources, and when there was a great demand for these linen yarns for war and for peace purposes here, under the War Measures Act the Government, on the recommendation of the War Commission, proposed, for the purpose of getting these yarns spun in Canada and getting a material which we could get in no other way, that we would give a bounty if anyone be found to put in the equipment necessary for spinning yarns, none of which equipment we had had in Canada before. We had not spun an ounce of linen yarn in Canada previously to that. As a result of inquiries and after a good deal of negotiation, we proposed a plan of giving for three years a subsidy, of the limited amount of $25,000 a year, not to exceed in the three years $75,000, and to give that on a poundage basis to men who would put in the equipment and spin the yarn, such subsidy not to be paid during the continuance of the war, but to commence after the determination of peace and to be continued for three years thereafter. The reason for that was that, during the war period, owing to the scarcity, the price would be sufficiently high to be an inducement to remunerate them somewhat at least for the extra equipment put in, but their hard time would come after peace had been declared and after prices had taken the fall which they inevitably would take. Under the War Measures Act the Government made a contract with those people. We have paid them upon the first year of their contract; we are to pay them on two years more of their contract, and I am simply asking for this appropriation to enable us to do what our part of the contract asks to be done in an obligation out of which no reasonable person would, I believe, think we ought to attempt to crawl for any reason whatever. We are not discussing any broad principle of subsidies to flax interests or to the making of yarn. This is a war child, born of war necessity, a contract entered into by the Government under the War Measures Act, and we ask the committee to give us this appropriation to carry out our part of the contract.

Mr. VIEN: Does the minister consider that this will be a permanent industry in Canada or that there is an opening for such an industry?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If we take the vote on the ground on which I have stated it, it would make no difference what I thought in that regard. This is a contract we propose to fulfil. We ask the committee to give us this appropriation in order to fulfil the contract. My hon. friend is a business man; he knows what contracts are, and I do not think in his heart he has any objection to the Government fulfilling a contract into which it has solemnly entered. All these extraneous things in the discussion are very important, but we are not discussing to-day a permanent policy of subsidizing either the spinning or the production.

Mr. VIEN: But there is this much to be said: The Government is now before the committee and subject to the judgment of the committee as to the wisdom of the policy adopted at that time and as to the wisdom of the conract entered into by the Government with that company. The minister has explained to the committee that this was a war measure adopted for war purposes. Other industries were started during the war for no less important objects. For instance, new industries had to be started for the manufacture of shells, cartridges and a number of other articles of great necessity during the war. The prices given for such articles were the incentive, and the Government never thought of resorting to a subsidy or bonus to those industries no matter what amount of machinery they had to purchase or what amount of experience they had to acquire. The Government simply placed contracts with those firms to deliver certain quantities of materials, and they never introduced the idea of protection by way of a bonus to these industries for war purposes. In the present instance the Government has adopted a different course. Owing to the necessity of getting the yarn, not only did the Government offer the inducement of the general conditions prevailing, but they went a step further and offered a subsidy amounting to $25,000 a year if a manufacturer could produce sufficient to earn this subsidy. This was a departure from the general policy which prevailed at that time. The minister, to explain his position, brushes aside the principle at stake and says: "Surely the committee will not refuse the Government the fulfilment of their contract. The Government have entered into a contract and this committee cannot put that contract aside." I am in favour of the flax industry in Canada and of developing the establishment of mills to spin yarns from fibre produced in Canada, but before we decide to protect such a new industry I put to myself and to my right hon. friend the question: Is there a field of operation before it which holds out prospects of success in the future? My right hon. friend evades that question. He brushes it aside altogether, and says it is not the question involved, that the only question involved is the fulfilment of a contract. In my humble opinion, the Government were wrong in making a contract with such a company, because the demand for this material at that time, as the minister himself has admitted, was just as great as for the material turned out by any other industry started during the war period. So I say from the point of view of the contract the Government was wrong in entering into it. Before we determine to protect a new industry by way of this subsidy to be paid during three consecutive years, I put to myself and to my right hon. friend the question: Is it an industry which has any chance of success in the future? I have failed to draw either from my right hon. friend or from the previous speaker any answer to that question, and to my mind that is the whole principle which underlies this vote; it is not the question of the contract, but the question whether we should protect such an industry. If there is a chance of this industry surviving we might consider this vote, but we have not been enlightened on that point so far.

Mr. ROBB: What amount was paid to this corporation last year? I notice the vote this year is $4,000 less than last year.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: $3,939.77.

Mr. VIEN: Is that for the calendar year? I understood the right hon. gentleman to say it was up to December 31.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, from the time production commenced.

Mr. VIEN: Were any further amounts paid after December 31, last.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No.

Mr. VIEN: So the figure given by my right hon. friend covers the fiscal year as well?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Accounts may have come in which have not yet been paid, but they will be accounts for work done during the remaining months of the fiscal year.

Mr. VIEN: Would my right hon. friend tell us why the Auditor General's report is absolutely silent as to the expenditure during last year? As it is an expenditure during the period covered by the Auditor General's report, it seems to me the matter should have been reported on by the Auditor General.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Auditor General's report that my hon. friend has before him deals with the fiscal year ending March 31st, 1920. This production was after the expiration of that fiscal year.

Mr. PEDLOW: I understood the minister to say that $3,939.77 was paid in bonus to this industry last year. How much was paid for supervision, or for nursing this war baby?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The large amount of $197.

Mr. PEDLOW: That was all that was paid out of the appropriation of last year?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Up to that time.

Item agreed to.

Bounties on Crude Petroleum, administration of the Act, $3,000.

The CHAIRMAN: This item has already been considered to a certain extent. The hon. member who objected to its passing this afternoon is now willing that it be re-considered.

Mr. CANNON: I find, at page Z-23, volume III, of the Auditor General's report, that the monies expended in the period covered by the report were paid, not to individual farmers, as was intimated by my right hon. friend this afternoon, but that all the monies have been paid to companies, some of which have received very large amounts. I would like the minister to tell exactly what these companies are, and where they are operating.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am afraid I cannot give my hon. friend the information with reference to all these companies or individuals who have been recipients of the bounty. The law states to whom the bounty shall be paid. Our supervisor makes certain that the oil which has been raised has been correctly represented, and thereafter the bounty is paid at the rate of one-and-a-half cents, I think it is, per gallon. As to the composition of these companies or the associations of the farmers amongst themselves I have no knowledge at all, and no information which I can give to my hon. friend.

Mr. CANNON: I think the minister might supply the committee with more information than apparently he is willing to give. This afternoon I raised the question whether this Government was paying this bounty to the large oil companies, such as the Imperial Oil Company, which is a subsidiary of the Standard Oil Company. I notice by the Auditor General's report that the moneys which have been paid by the Government have been paid to corporations, not to individuals. If the right hon. gentleman will look at the list on page Z-23, volume III, of the Auditor General's report he will see that these corporations are apparently important concerns. I am under the impression—I may be wrong—that they are subsidiary companies of the Imperial Oil Company. If they are, I think the principle is altogether wrong that this Government should give bounties or premiums to such corporations. Oil in this country is sold at very high prices, and I do not see why the Government should add to the already exorbitant profits made by these corporations by paying them bounties from the public treasury.

Mr. GRIESBACH: I am not so much interested—

Mr. CANNON: Perhaps the hon. member would permit the minister to answer my question first.

Mr. GRIESBACH: What I am about to say has to do with the point raised by the hon. member, and after I have finished the minister will be able to answer both questions at the same time. The point I want to raise is this: It would appear that under the law a bonus is paid for the production of oil. I do not know whether it is payable only to concerns operating in certain provinces, or whether it applies throughout Canada. But I do know that the Government proposes to exact a royality on oil produced, and I should like to know how it is that we grant a bonus on the production of oil and at the same time impose a royality on that oil. That is what I cannot understand.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think I explained this afternoon the origin of the bounty on oil. In 1904 the Government of that day removed the duty from crude oil imported into Canada. The production of oil in this country was at that time almost exclusively confined to some districts in the province of Ontario. Oil was produced in small quantities by a large number of people from individual wells, and some companies also produced on a small scale; and the bounty given at that time was a compensation to these people by reason of the introduction of free crude oil from the United States. That legislation was amended on two or three occasions so as to provide that the individual producers of oil, whether farmers or companies, should have the bounty paid directly to themselves. There are farmers who have oil and produce it simply in the line of their individual operations. They get their bounty on the amount they produce. There are associations of farmers in a small way that work a number of wells amongst themselves, and there are also companies, small and large. The subsidy is paid to producers, whoever they are, whether individual farmers, associations of farmers, or companies. As to the quality of the oil, I suppose it was fixed at a standard corresponding to that of the oil allowed in free of duty. The law provided a specific gravity test of .8235. Those hon. members who are familiar with this subject will understand this matter better than I do; I do not know much about it myself. This provision first appeared in the Act of 1908, and has been in it since. This specific gravity test, I have no doubt, was applied to ensure that the oil on which the bounty was paid should about equal in quality the oil obtained from the United States and the condition is therefore precedent to the payment of the bounty, that it must be oil of a specific gravity of .8235. No oil gets the bounty if it does not fulfil that test. Very little of the oil that is produced in the West conforms to that test, and therefore but a small portion of the bounty is paid on western production. Some is paid on oil raised in the vicinity of Edmonton. From the shales in the province of New Brunswick some oil is produced and that has to fulfil the test. The bounty is granted to all oils, wherever produced, that fulfil the requirements. The other question of my hon. friend, as to why oils on which a bounty is paid are made to contribute to the revenue, is explained in this way. Usually oil concerns that are started give promise of large results, and it is considered right that some royalty at least should be paid to the Government to pay for all the preliminary work which is necessary and for proper regulation and supervision.

Mr. McMASTER: May I suggest to the minister that the wells of knowledge do not flow far enough in this direction? We are not able to follow him; we cannot hear.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I thought they were filled to overflowing. However, I will turn round and face my hon. friends. Now, to reply to my hon. friend on the other side who is thirsting for information, I find that there are companies and individuals mentioned in the memorandum before me, and broadly speaking, I think there are more individuals or associations of individuals, than companies, to whom the payment is made. Various names of companies are given, and my hon. friend has a suspicion that possibly they are subsidiaries of the Imperial Oil Company. I do not know. No doubt they sell their oil after they get it. They would not raise it unless they had some prospects of disposing of it. The Imperial Oil Company may be the buyer of their oils; there may be affiliations between them—I do not know—but under the law I do not think I have any particular duty to enquire. It is the producer that receives the bounty under the law, and all that I have to do is to see that the party that produces the oil gets the bounty.

Mr. CANNON: The question I am putting to the minister is this: Does the Government consider it fair that public money should be given to companies such as these under the law as it exists to-day? The question is all the more timely because if these corporations are rich, and are simply representatives of the very large oil trust called the Imperial Oil Company, the financial condition of Canada is such that we certainly cannot be extravagant and over generous in our treatment of them. I do not believe that any of these companies need any bounties if they are affiliated with, or related to, the Imperial Oil Company. If the law forces the Government to give these grants, I think the sooner that law is changed the better it will be for the country. I wish to draw the minister's attention to another fact. Looking over the Estimates concerning his department I have not seen any item covering the amounts which are to be distributed as bounties during the coming year?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: These grants, as I have told my hon. friend, are the result of a law passed by the Dominion Parliament in 1904 and which has ever since been upon the statute book. By virtue of that statement preceding Governments have paid these bounties in exactly the same way as we are paying them now. If my hon. friend looks into the Estimates he will see that there are statutory payments made which appear in the Auditor General's Report. There are also payments made by virtue of votes passed by Parliament and debitable to the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

Mr. CANNON: I understand that, but it does not affect my argument. I contend that whether an amount is authorized by statute, or whether it is simply voted in the ordinary way by the House of Comcons, it should appear in the Estimates to be voted for the current year. Such is the case I contend, and to illustrate my contention I will mention the salaries which are voted every year for the judges, which salaries are fixed by statute. The amount for this purpose is what we may call a statutory amount, but nevertheless the Minister of Justice comes to the House every year, with the Estimates for his department and in those Estimates there appears a fixed amount from which will be taken the moneys to pay the salaries of the judges throughout the country. I contend that whether the money to be paid as a bonus to petroleum companies in Canada is a statutory payment or not it should appear in the Estimates. I would therefore like the minister to tell me where the money for this purpose does appear, so that we will know exactly what amount is to be expended in the coming year.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is impossible for my hon. friend to tell, or for any one to tell him, the exact amount that will be expended during the year. That amount will be based on the number of gallons of this specific kind of oil which is raised and approved for bounty. The production may be large or it may be small, it varies from year to year, and you could put no sum in the Estimates which would represent the exact amount which may be spent. The contention of my hon. friend that in certain cases statutory payments appear in the Estimates is perfectly clear. I am not so certain that an amount, following the general rule, might not be placed in the Estimates to cover this item, but it would have to be an indeterminate amount. There would have to be a sufficient amount voted to cover the possible expenditure while the real expenditure, 9 p.m. owing to reduced consumption, might be very much less. But, as a matter of fact, the basic principle of the law is adhered to. The law states what shall be paid per gallon in the form of bounty. The administration of the law carries out the direction of the statute, and cannot go beyond that. So that whether the amount is put as an indeterminate item in the Estimates, no more or no less can be expended than what the statute calls for.

Mr. CANNON: My point is that no minister of the Crown has a right to spend five cents of public money without having previously obtained from Parliament the consent of the representatives of the people to the expenditure of that money. If the minister will look through his Estimates, and I refer him particularly to page 24 where the Estimates of the Department of Agriculture are set out, he will see where statutory payments are mentioned. The rule in this matter is well known. Does my right hon. friend seriously contend, in view of his very long experience in Parliament, that he has the right as a minister of the Crown, or that his department has the right, to spend money during the coming year without the representatives of the people having previously voted that money? I do not think he will contend any such thing because it would be absolutely opposed to all rules of constitutional procedure. My right hon. friend is in exactly the same position as every one of his colleagues, and he cannot, after this session of Parliament is concluded, spend five cents, or a dollar, or ten dollars, without having previously obtained our consent as representatives of the people. The right hon. gentleman says "I cannot say to-night exactly how much money will be spent." Very true. But we do not ask the right hon. gentleman to state the exact amount which will be expended. We do want the right hon. gentleman to follow the rule of parliamentary procedure which requires that an amount for this purpose should be placed in the Estimates. That amount may not be all spent but it cannot be exceeded. The minister, through his officials and especially through this official whose salary we are now being asked to vote, should find out how much money he needs —he should fix the maximum which cannot be exceeded but which possibly will not be reached. This is the rule, and it must be followed by my right hon. friend as well as by every other member of the Government. If the right hon. gentleman refers to the Estimates, and the Supplementary Estimates, and the further Supplementary Estimates, of last year he will find nowhere an item covering moneys which have been paid for this purpose, even though the expenditure appears in the Auditor General's report. Under what authority did the minister spend that money? Under what authority did he spend money of which the Estimates of last year make absolutely no mention, and as to which they are just as blank as the Estimates of this year? How could he make such an expenditure without it having been voted by Parliament? I think, Mr. Chairman, that having regard to constitutional procedure the situation is very serious, and before we vote the salary of an official who is supposed to look after the administration of this law and distribute bounties to companies, we have a right to know how much money that official is going to distribute. Furthermore we have the right to find out by virtue of what authority the right hon. gentleman distributed money last year of which the Estimates contained no mention. I maintain that my contention is right, and that the Government has absolutely no power to spend any money unless that money has been regularly voted by Parliament.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend has worked himself up to a wonderful pitch as a constitutional authority, but he has ended with one sentence which is the only thing that I shall advert to. It was that no minister has a right to spend a single dollar which has not been voted by this chamber. Let there we no doubt in our understanding of my hon. friend's statement. Now I will ask my hon. friend how much this House voted to the Minister of Justice? Will he be good enough to turn to the Estimates and see? Will he then turn to the expenditure and tell me and this committee whether he still considers himself to be right in his dictum? Or will he impeach the Minister of Justice for spending some millions of dollars in his department over and above what has been voted by this chamber?

Mr. CANNON: Will the right hon. gentleman allow me—?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Will the hon. gentleman allow me for a moment longer?

Mr. CANNON: The right hon. gentleman is putting a question to me.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am, and I will give my hon. friend an opportunity to answer it afterwards, and I would like him to bestow a little thought on it before he makes his answer. I am giving him an opportunity to be correct. Will he look at page 8 of the Estimates, item 4, and find out how much was voted by this chamber to the Minister of Justice for salaries and contingencies? It amounted this year to $190,832.50 with contingencies $25,000. Does my hon. friend suppose that all the expenses of the administration of justice will be paid for out of those two amounts? But that is all that was voted. And in his search after knowledge will my hon. friend turn to page 12 of the Estimates? There he will find that besides the amounts voted by this chamber $1,345,300 will be spent on the administration of justice under authority of statute, and under that authority alone. The figures there given are simply details, and not one dollar of it has been voted by this chamber. So that my hon. friend is not quite right in the stand which he has taken.

[Mr. Cannon.]

Mr. CANNON: The right hon. gentleman was kind enough in his answer to adopt a tone which I am not going to copy, and he was also kind enough to ask me to bestow some thought before I replied to him. I always do think before I speak, and the answer to what the right hon. gentleman asks is very simple. I think that if he was a lawyer he would not have spoken in the way he has, because from a legal viewpoint his answer is no answer at all, and the question he put to me is no question at all. What I said is very simple, and I want the right hon. gentleman to understand and to bear in mind that when I am speaking I am thinking, and not to make the mistake of believing for one moment that I bestow no thought on what I am saying. We are asked to-day to vote the salary of an official of the Department of Trade and Commerce, which salary, if I mistake not, is fixed at three or four thousand dollars.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Two thousand dollars.

Mr. CANNON: This official has the duty of supervising the administration of a special law. This law sees to it that certain bounties are distributed to petroleum companies throughout Canada; and those bounties are distributed in accordance with that special law. My contention is very simple. I say that the amount which the Department of Trade and Commerce wishes to distribute for the coming year ought to appear in the Estimates in the same way as the salaries paid to our judges, so we may know exactly what moneys are being spent. The right hon. gentleman asks: Will I move for the impeachment of the Minister of Justice, because in the summary appearing in the index of the Estimates he has shown two amounts, one of $190,000 and another of $25,000 which do not cover the whole expenditure of his department? Certainly not; and the right hon. gentleman could not have been serious when he suggested such action. The amounts which are to be spent in accordance with the law and which are voted by Parliament can be expended by the department, but I say that those amounts have to appear in the Estimates so that every year the law as regards that expenditure will be again ratified by Parliament.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: How ratified?

Mr. CANNON: May I point out to my right hon. friend that there is a wide difference between a law passed by Parliament ten or fifteen years ago, providing for the expenditure of a certain amount of money, and the expenditure by the Government of those moneys every year. It is a well known rule, and a rule which exists in England as well as here, that Parliament does not vote money for more than twelve months. That has been well established in England, and is considered to be one of the greatest safeguards of English liberty and freedom. My right hon. friend is not going to deny that. Therefore, as public moneys are not to be voted by Parliament for more than twelve months, another rule has been established in England—a rule so well known that my right hon. friend with all his experience will not deny its force—that Parliament has to meet at least once every twelve months. What does that mean? It means that every year the Government, through their ministers, have to come before the representatives of the people to obtain new subsidies, and the subsidies which are then voted to them are annual subsidies. The principle is the same, no matter whether it is a case of voting salaries to judges, or bounties to petroleum companies as in this instance. My right hon. friend will not deny that. So, coming back to my first argument when the right hon. gentleman answered me, I say that he ought to put in the Estimates an approximate amount of what is to be spent, which we are entitled to know. Does the right hon. gentleman contend for one moment that this committee is giving him a blank cheque for any amount at all? We are just as much entitled to know what the Minister of Trade and Commerce intends to spend as we were to know what the Minister of Agriculture intended to spend in accordance with laws passed by Parliament. On page 4 of the Estimates, the summary, I find the following: "Trade and Commerce, authorized by statute"—nothing; not a cent. So I think I have answered the question of the right hon. gentleman. I wish to be very respectful to him on account of his age and experience, but I am quite sure that his answer will be as thoughtful as the one I have given him.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have stated my position, and my hon. friend in his reply has fled the coop.

Mr. JACOBS: What does that mean in English?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In English that means that he has carefully avoided reaffirming the assertion which he made twice—it is on Hansard and he cannot get rid of it—that no minister has the right to expend one dollar which has not been voted by this Parliament. Now, I am within the hearing of both sides; I am within the hearing of my hon. friend directly opposite, and he will not deny that.

Mr. FIELDING: It is quite correct.

Mr. CANNON: I maintain the position which I took.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not think my hon friend restated his position, and I do not think he can maintain it.

Mr. CANNON: Well, I tried to state it.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: All through the Estimates there are certain sums which are voted and certain sums which are authorized by statue. For instance, in the case of the Department of Justice the sum of $1,300,000 for judges' salaries, authorized by statute, is absolutely fixed.

Mr. CANNON: And has to be voted.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: And has not to be voted by this House. These sums that are authorized by statute are placed in the Estimates for information, but the House does not vote them. The total amount voted for agriculture this year was $4,502,-139, but agriculture will spend this year an additional $1,100,000 which is authorized by statute but not voted by the House. In the case of pensions, $620,910 will be expended by virtue of the statute but is not and will not be voted by the House. So all the way through the Estimates. I am not prepared to say that as a matter of information it might not be shown under this vote that there is authorized by statute the payment by the minister of one and one-half cents per gallon for all crude oil of a certain test which has been raised and certified to; it would be information, but you would not have to vote it. If my hon. friend's contention is that it would be useful to the House to have it appear in the Estimates that there was an expenditure authorized by statute, when I would concur with him, but I cannot agree that no single amount whether authorized by statute or not, can be expended by the mniister unless it has actually been voted by the House.

Mr. FIELDING: This being an oil item, I would like to be able to pour some oil on the troubled waters. There is something to be said on both sides of the question. When the member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) says that no minister has the right to spend one dollar of public money until it has been voted by the House he is absolutely right, and if my right hon. friend disputes that assertion he is absolutely wrong. But it does not follow that you have to vote it every year in the Estimates. The sums that are put in the Estimates as authorized by statute are there for information. The only point of difference between my right hon. friend and the member for Dorchester is whether it is necessary to vote these amounts every year, and on that point I am bound to say that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is correct; these sums are voted by statute and the statute is a standing authority to the ministers concerned for the expenditure of the money. Where the amount is fixed, as in the case of judges' salaries, you have no difficulty in stating it in the Estimates for the information of the House, but in this case I see the difficulty of putting in any particular amount. It is not intended by the law that there shall be a limit to the amount in this case, and as there is no fixed sum it would not be easy to state it in the Estimates each year as the member for Dorchester desires. However, the main point taken by the member for Dorchester is correct: that the minister has no authority to spend one dollar unless it has been first voted by the House. All these sums mentioned as authorized by statute have ben voted by the House; otherwise there would be no authority for spending them. But I agree with the minister that it is not necessary in all cases to set the amounts out in detail; in cases where there is not a fixed sum he might have difficulty, indeed, in doing so.

Mr. CAHILL: I submit there is no more difficulty in fixing the amount in this item than there was in fixing it in the next item of $26,000 for a bounty on linen yarn.

Mr. FIELDING: I believe that is not voted by statute. It is done by an Order in Council, and unless it is voted by this House from year to year, it cannot be paid at all.

Mr. CAHILL: I contend that this item should not be paid either.

Mr. FIELDING: That is another question.

Mr. CAHILL: The minister this afternoon said that the statute was passed by the Liberal administration. If it had any usefulness at the time, apparently its usefulness has passed, and surely the minister should not attempt to perpetuate any evil legislation on the part of the former Liberal administration as an excuse for further expenditure of this nature. If the expenditure is unnecessary—and I think it is; indeed I do not think the principle of bounties is good in any event—why not eliminate it? Is it not time that the Government should look around for ways and means of saving money instead of spending it in every possible way? To be consistent, the Government should either eliminate this bounty or throw the lands open for prospecting to all. The Government is adopting a principle of paying a bounty to one set of people and not giving other people an opportunity of prospecting. The person who has a little oil well is getting his bounty, but the Government does not allow others to go in and prospect. The fact that this appropriation has been passed from year to year, is not a sufficient excuse for its continuance. There must be some period at which this bounty will terminate, and I do not think it was the intention of the Government of that day to perpetuate it. If there is no advantage in continuing it this year, why not discontinue it? The Government never seem to find any way by which they can save money; with them, it is always a question of added expenditure. The only excuse they offer is: Well, this legislation was passed by a Liberal administration; therefore, it must be good. I am quite free to admit that about the only good things they have to offer are some of the things which they have taken from the Liberal administration, but I do not think this is one of them and it should be eliminated at once.

Mr. REDMAN: I cannot follow the argument of my hon. friend. As I understand the matter, this is a bonus which was given to oil producers in counties of southwestern Ontario where the production is so low as to make it almost impossible to proceed with that production unless some Government assistance is furnished. That was the situation at the time the Act was passed under the late Liberal administration, and it is much more the position today, because from that time the production of individual wells in those counties has gradually and continually decreased. What I rose to speak about is this. I wish to take the minister back to the statement he made a short time ago when he said that this bounty is limited to oil of a certain specific gravity. I think he threw out the suggestion—I do not think it was more than that—that this was done because this may have coincided with the specific gravity of oil which must necessarily be imported to meet our domestic needs in this country. I do not know whether or not that was the fact at that time. My view is that this has always been an incentive to the production, discovery and exploration of oil in this country. In Alberta, we have a grade of oil which is very different in specific gravity from oil obtained in Ontario, and to that Alberta oil this bounty is not applicable. In Ontario, the wells are sunk to a depth of only 400 to 1,000 feet at a very small cost, whereas in Alberta, wells are sunk to a depth of some three or four thousand feet, it costing $40,000 to $100,000 to put down one well. The quantities of oil which we have been obtaining southwest of Calgary are not great although the value of the oil is great, and the field may have potentialities. I wish to point out the unfairness of paying a bounty in Ontario where the cost of obtaining oil is so small, when a bounty is not paid to those who produce oil in Alberta where very great cost is incurred in putting down wells. I think this matter has already been presented to the minister in petitions, and he has probably looked carefully into the matter and will have an answer ready. The bounty should be continued until such time as we discover in Canada the sort of oil which will enable us to produce oil in competition with the outside world on an equal basis without the necessity of a bounty. Until that time a bounty should be paid by this Government, not only to assist those who are now producing, but to encourage others to explore and prospect for oil, the necessity for which in this country no one can dispute.

Mr. CANNON: I have listened with great interest to the remarks contributed to the committee by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), who has had a long experience in this House as Minister of Finance and as a member. His opinions have great weight and I am sure the Minister of Trade and Commerce will not dispute the opinion given by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's. But the two hon. gentlemen seem to agree on one point, and that point is that statutory expenditure has not to be voted by Parliament every year. I accept with great respect their opinion; but on the other hand I would submit that the wording of the Estimates and also the spirit of the law, as I understand it, although I may be wrong, do not seem to agree with that opinion. I would refer the minister to page 4 of the Estimates, on which there is a summary of the whole expenditure for the current year? What do we read? It is the "summary of the estimated expenditure of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1922, together with the sums granted for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1921"—that is granted not, for an indefinite period, but for a definite period—"and a statement showing the increase and decrease for each service." If we read the summary in one column, we see the ordinary Estimates and in the other column we see the Estimates authorised by Statute. The law was passed in Parliament in 1904, says my right hon. friend. This law, having been enacted by Parliament, and having been sanctioned by the Governor General, becomes the law of Canada. That sanction is an authority to the Government to put the law into force, and one of the provisions of the law is that moneys are to be expended. I say that as far as the money part of the law is concerned, it has to be placed before Parliament every year in just the same way as every statutory vote is placed in the Estimates for all the departments. Being placed before Parliament in that way, which is not as formal and direct a way as is followed in the case of the other Estimates, every year Parliament gives a new authority to the Government to expend the sum which is mentioned in the law, and my contention is that unless this is done the Government has not the authority to spend the money. I do not wish to detain the committee very much longer on this point, but I might recall to the right hon. gentleman that in the old days in England when Parliament met only at long intervals, perhaps once in 15 or 25 years at the convenience of the King, the King did not need Parliament because at the opening of each reign Parliament met and voted once for all what was called the civil list and that civil list covered the expenditure for the whole administration of the realm during the reign of that sovereign. That was changed at the Revolution, and after 1688 the law was laid down by the British Parliament that in future moneys would be voted for only 12 months, and would be voted only after an itemized and detailed account had been submitted to Parliament. Therefore I say that my contention is correct, and that my right hon. friend has no right, any more than has any other member of the Government, to spend a dollar of public money unless it has first been voted by Parliament. If my right hon. friend will refer to page 2 of the summary he will find that it does not contain one single cent of expenditure by his department authorized by statute. The position taken by the right hon. gentleman to-night might be improved if he would give more information to the committee; if he would tell us approximately what amount of money is to be expended this year in bounties to petroleum companies, and if he would do what all his other colleagues have done—place in the Estimates the moneys authorized by Parliament. I appreciate what my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's has pointed out, that it is very hard to fix a precise amount, but this law has been in force since 1904; the officials of the department know how it works, they are acquainted with all these companies and have a good idea as to the quantities of oil produced each year; so I think the official whose salary we are voting now should be in a position to give sufficient information to the minister to enable him to do with regard to his department what his colleagues all do with regard to theirs. I would ask another question of my right hon. friend. According to the law which was passed in 1904, is the amount to be expended by his department limited?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is one-and-a-half cents per gallon for every gallon of oil which comes up to the test.

Mr. CANNON: Suppose these new oil fields which have been discovered in the West produce immense quantities of oil. Does my right hon. friend contend that, without giving any figures to the committee, or any more information that than he has done, he has authorization by this Parliament to give out in bounties at the rate of one-and-a-half cents per gallon, millions and millions of dollars? Where would he stop? We do not know. According to his interpretion of the law there is no limit to the amount he can expend. If that is the case, next year when we come back, if we do come back, and ask the right hon. gentleman how much money was expended, and he answers that in consequence of the immense success of these new oil fields he has paid out in bounties ten to fifteen million dollars, we could not be able to reproach him in any way, unless we now insist upon his giving us more information and fixing a limit, so that we shall know where we are going. I think the right hon. gentleman will acknowledge that the position I am taking is very reasonable. We cannot give to his department a blank cheque any more than we can to any other department, and we have all the more reason for not doing so because he does not mention anywhere in his Estimates the amount which he is to expend, either as authorized by Parliament or otherwise. In the summary it is stated that the expenditure authorized by statute for the year 1921-22 amounts to $114,000,000, and then the total amount of the other Estimates is given, but in neither of these two columns does this particular expenditure appear. I do not think it is reasonable for the right hon. gentleman to insist on the committee giving him an absolutely blank cheque for this expenditure.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not know that there is much to be gained by prolonging the discussion between my hon. friend and myself. The position I take I am quite willing to let go before the House, and the House can judge of it. The ex-minister of Finance, and trusted leader of my hon. friend, has coincided absolutely with my view.

Mr. CANNON: And also with mine.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: May I ask my hon. friend if when he made the statement that the minister could not spend a single dollar except it was voted by this chamber, he included in that assertion the vote of money by statute, or was he referring only to the annual votes which we pass here?

Mr. CANNON: My statement was to the effect that all moneys to be expended by the Government must first be voted by Parliament.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend said that I could not spend anything during the next year except it had been voted by the House this year. There my hon. friend and myself differ entirely, and my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance agrees with me absolutely. No one in this House believes that any minister has the right to spend money unless it is either voted in the Estimates or provided by statute, but the statute may provide for expenditure for years and years and years, and we never revote in the House what Parliament has already voted through a law which it has passed.

My hon. friend says that if my officer were really any good he ought to give me such information as would enable me to put the precise sum in the Estimates. How can you do that? My hon. friend must realize that although you have the records to go by you can put in the Estimates only approximately what the cost will be. The production differs from year to year. Some years it is twice what it was the year before, and sometimes you will find a falling off of 50 per cent in production in the course of a year. So that it would be altogether misleading to attempt to put before the committee an exact estimate of what you would spend. You must put a sufficient amount to keep you out of all difficulties, even though it might not all be used. Every member has the Auditor General's report, which is a treasured document, and he knows exactly what is spent each year. That is, therefore, a guide. Now, with reference to the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Griesbach), I have had many communications from the West regarding oil fields producing oil that does not fulfil the test that is required before the bounty is payable. This is a vexed question, and in one way it seems to be unfair. But you have only to go back to the purpose for which this bounty was given, namely, to compensate for legislation that was passed some time ago, equalizing the quality of oil produced here with that imported from the United States, in order to get at the basis of the matter. The proposition is put up to me strongly: why not change the law so that it will cover our oil-producing regions in the West? Well, frankly, the question then would be as to where we should land if we made the subsidy applicable to all oil produced in Canada; and should the promises of large production in the West, which at present seem to be very great, be realized, it would involve a very heavy charge upon the revenues of the country. This specific gravity test has been on the statute books for quite a while, and I am not going to say that because it has been there it should remain there for ever. It is a matter for the House to take into consideration if it thinks that the time has come when that provision ought to be done away with; and there are different minds with reference to that. But until there is a change in the law, it is, of course, my duty to administer the Act as I find it. With reference to the millions upon millions which I might find myself under the necessity of spending, if something on a large scale took place in the North West—well, if we proceed on suppositions I fear we may get off the solid basis of argument. I do not look for any such expansion. Anyway, so far, the specific gravity test has been the differentiating factor in the granting of the bounty.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I want to say a word or two, not in connection with the discussion that has taken place, although I think the country and the House should be thankful to my hon. friend (Mr. Cannon) for having put his point so clearly, that is to say, that not a dollar should be spent without the authority of Parliament.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That has been long recognized.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes; but the sooner it is made clear in the Estimates as to what our statutory expenditures are, the sooner those expenditures are specifically stated, the better it will be.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That might be.

Mr. LEMIEUX: We are facing a very serious situation and the country is entitled to know what expenditures are to be made every year. The public will be more and more critical also in regard to the total amount of our expenditures. Although theoretically, on one branch of the argument, my right hon. friend is correct, yet the hon. member for Dorchester has rendered the country a service this evening in calling the attention of the committee to this very important question of putting before the country the real expenditures which are to be made and which are proper only as sanctioned by Parliament. The point I wish to make, however, is this: We are paying a bounty on the production of crude petroleum. I remember when this bounty was created by Parliament; as my right hon. friend stated a moment ago, it was in the year 1904. Now, I am not going to suggest the creating of other bounties, because I do not think that the country at the present time is in a mood to grant further subsidies. But in connection with oil, would it not be possible to encourage the exploitations of the large fields of shale oil in my right hon. friend's native province as well as in my own? There are immense fields of shale oil in the province of New Brunswick, in the county of Albert; and lately very large fields of shale oil have been discovered in the counties of Gaspé and Bonaventure. As I say, I am not asking for a bounty, nor would I dare propose the creation of one for the development of those fields. But when the new tariff is enacted, the Government should help the pioneers and the miners by decreasing or completely abolishing the duties on the machinery needed by the miners and operators for the development of those fields of shale oil. I believe I am speaking by the book when I say that my right hon. friend, who is familiar with this question, has reason to view this suggestion with sympathy, not only because it concerns his own province or the east of Canada, but because the whole subject is a highly important one. This country is in need of fuel oil, and the Government should help to develop these natural resources. Evidence was taken by a committee which sat a year or so ago in the Senate chambers, where experts were heard, and it was recognized and admitted that these fields of shale oil can be successfully developed if the Government will agree to admit the necessary machinery without exacting the duties that are at present levied. In all mining ventures, and especially in regard to oil, the crucial test, or, to use Wilsonian language, the acid test, is the period of development; and if the miner or the operator cannot secure at reasonable rates the machinery and the engineering required for that development, he is, of course, barred out, and under such circumstances these fields will remain unproductive. I call the attention of the right hon. gentleman to that fact. We—I should not say "we", because I am not the owner of any of these fields, but the Canadian people—would be pleased if the Government would give free machinery, and free mining implements, in order to promote the development and the operation of those natural resources.

Mr. BELAND: I want to ask the right hon. gentleman a simple question touching a matter as to which I would like to be enlightened. We read on page 4 of the Estimates that the grand total of the expenditure for the next year will be $582,000,000. Does that represent the whole of the expenditure for next year barring the Supplementary Estimates?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend's question has reference to the figures in the third column?

Mr. BELAND: Yes. The grand total of the summary is $582,000,000. If we have no Supplementary Estimates this session does this amount represent the whole of the money that will be paid out during the next fiscal year?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I would not undertake to say that it does. That third column is the total of the two sums in the two preceding columns, of what is to be voted and what is authorized by statute, but whether everything authorized by statute is included in that amount or not I do not know. If it is, then that would represent the total amount that could be paid out, exclusive of expenditures by Governor General's warrant for special emergencies and things of that nature.

Mr. BELAND: May I further ask whether the minister expects that during the next fiscal year his department will pay out about the same amount as that which appears in the Auditor General's Report for the last fiscal year in bounties on crude petroleum? The figure for the year ended March 31, 1920, was $103,000. Does the right hon. gentleman think that the amount to be paid out during the present fiscal year will exceed that sum or be about the same?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There again I cannot give a definite answer. In one year 350,000 gallons of oil are raised; in another year the quantity is 202,000 gallons. What is raised one year is no definite lead as to what may be raised the succeeding year. Last year a certain number of gallons were raised, and the bounty was paid on that quantity at the rate which is allowed. Next year there may be half that amount raised, or there may be fifty per cent more than that raised—it is impossible to say. That indefinite feature is there and you cannot get over it; you can make no definite statement with regard to it. From the year 1904 that item has never appeared, so far as I know, in the "Authorized by law column" of the Estimates. I suppose the reason it is not put in is that you would be rather misleading the House if you put in a certain amount not knowing whether the production of oil would rise or would fall, or would remain just about the same.

Mr. FIELDING: Where you are dealing with a contract for the construction of a work by the Government, or anything of that kind which is under government control, you can, through your officers, make a reasonable estimate of what you are going to do—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. FIELDING: —but when you are dealing with corporations over whom you have no control—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: And with Providence.

Mr. FIELDING:—you cannot make an estimate with any accuracy; you have to be dependent upon the work which it suits their convenience to do. Now, in fairness, while we are on this branch of the subject I must say that we have in times past spent vast sums under the authority of statutes which have not appeared in the Estimates. Let me take as an illustration the railway subsidies. Again and again we have voted railway subsidies and millions—many millions—of dollars have been expended under these Acts, but my recollection is that they never in any case appeared in the Estimates. Let me mention another case. Within my own experience we have spent millions in bounties on steel and iron, and I do not recall any case in which they were mentioned in the Estimates. Why? For the reason I have just given, that they were not Government works; they were operations carried on by corporations over whom the Government had no control; and so long as there was statutory authority to pay the money—at any rate, speaking within my own recollection—I do not think it was customary to mention these sums in the Estimates. I agree that it would be a convenience if you could have a general summing up of the whole thing, but in the case of the operations carried on by corporations that would have to be largely a matter of guess work.

Mr. BELAND: We may at all events draw the conclusion that the amounts specified in the main Estimates do not cover the whole expenditure for next year, and it is a disagreeable revelation that at least $100,000 can be added to the already very large sum required for the next fiscal year without the public knowing anything about it.

Mr. McMASTER: May I make a suggestion? I think most of the people who take an interest in these matters have been accustomed to feel, though quite wrongly, that the sum total found at the beginning of the Estimates was the amount which the country would have to provide for the fiscal year next ensuing. Now we learn that they are amounts authorized by statute which do not appear in the summary. The fact that some of these amounts do appear in the summary would lead the ordinary reader to suppose that all expenditures authorized by statute do find a place there. In order that the public, who, though they have not taken an interest in the past in our financial condition, are bound to do so in the future, may have a more correct idea of just what the commitments of the country are, I would make this suggestion, which I trust is a reasonable one—that there should appear at the end of the summary a statement of what was paid under the authority of statute which is not mentioned in the summary itself. I quite understand from the statements of the minister and the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) that it may be quite difficult to estimate the amounts that are to be paid under any special statute, by way of bounties, for instance; but we should be able to put in a supplementary statement at the end of the summary showing what has been paid under the authority of statutes for the preceding year.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: For the last year?

Mr. McMASTER: Yes, for the last year.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: You find that in the Auditor General's report.

Mr. McMASTER: No doubt all these things are available if one knows just where to look for them, either in the Auditor General's report or in the Public Accounts; but my suggestion is that when persons—members of this House and the outside public who are interested in these matters—come to examine the Estimates, they should have before them in convenient form exactly what is submitted to the House and voted, and what was paid under statute, although difficult of computation, for the past year.

Mr. EULER: The minister seems to take the position that the principle of bounties cannot fairly be discussed in connection with this item. In a sense he is perhaps correct, yet I would like to associate myself with the member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) in his opposition to the granting of bounties. I have not heard the minister give any reason whatever why these bounties should continue to be paid, except that they are paid under a statute enacted in 1904. With all respect to the right hon. gentleman, I do not think that is a sufficient reason for their continuance. This matter is directly in his department, and it seems to me that he should proceed on the principle that the monies to be paid out by way of bounties are for some definite purpose. If he believes the reasons which moved the previous government to give these bounties by way of encouraging oil production still hold good, he should be prepared to defend those reasons. I am entirely opposed to bounties and I think it is time to repeal the law under which they were granted. I question very much whether the bounty of a cent and a half a gallon encourages the production of oil; it merely adds that much more to the profits of those who do not require any assistance. Unless the minister is convinced that the granting of bounties does still give encouragement to oil production, I think he ought seriously to consider the introduction of legislation to repeal the Act under which these bounties were first granted.

Mr. BELAND: As the Supplementary Estimates are sometimes laid on the table of the House as late as the end of June, would it not be well to include in them the amount paid during the fiscal year ended the previous March, so that the country will know exactly the amount likely to be paid during the current year? I would ask the right hon. gentleman to bring this suggestion to the attention of his colleagues.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I am sure my right hon. friend (Sir George Foster) must be impressed with the strength of sentiment opposed to the principle of bounties. The words which have just gone from my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) are very impressive. I have no doubt myself that this item, small as it is, is a waste of public money. I settled that question for myself many years ago, and when I first came to this House I expressed myself more than once along those lines. I think my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) has pointed out to the minister a more excellent way of helping the exploration of the wealth beneath the surface of the earth—by making it easier to get the implements by which that wealth may be won. I have not had time to look into what the Argentine has done of recent years, but before the war she had no duty whatever on mining implements, and the Argentine resembles Canada in these respects, that it is thinly populated and is a new country. My right hon. friend balks at the idea of paying out this bounty on large amounts of oil; but he contends for this modest sum of $3,000. That attitude brings him to what is the fundamental and, in my opinion, the insurmountable objection to bounties. You can only pay a bounty to two kinds of business: either to a business which is a paying business, when obviously it does not need any assistance and it is a gross injustice to the taxpayers to assist it; or to a non-paying business, which is a foolish waste of public money. In the absence of bounties people would put their capital and their energies into a line of business which on the whole was likely to be remunerative; otherwise, they would withdraw from it. I hope my right hon. friend has been impressed, as I have been, with the strength of sentiment that has been expressed by my hon. friends from Dorchester, Pontiac, Maisonneuve and other hon. gentlemen. I want to add my modest word to theirs, and I hope if he does bring in the Estimates another year he will be so much impressed by the arguments advanced to-night that he will drop even this small sum. I want to reiterate in a sentence that, in my humble judgment, it is a waste of public money, and certainly no responsible citizen of Canada at the present time will argue for one moment that we have any money to waste.

Mr. CAHILL: My hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Redman) states that this bounty is necessary for wells that are not producing enough oil to make them pay for the labour expended on them, but he must know that such enterprises are better closed down at once. He might just as well argue that his friend who is sitting beside him, the member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion), would be justified in asking for a bounty on fish in portions of Lake Superior which have been fished out. I have no doubt that the right hon. gentleman would grant such a bounty, and I also have no doubt that lots of fishermen would be ready to take that bounty to catch fish.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): They would catch the bounty.

Mr. CAHILL: Yes, that is what most of them are looking for. The principle of bounties is wrong. When an enterprise will not pay for the labour, and we have too many remunerative occupations for our people to waste their time and money on those that are unprofitable. The minister has stated that if it was the wish of Parliament to abolish this bounty, it would be abolished. I am quite satisfied that if I moved to strike the item out the minister would call to his support all his followers, and the item would carry. Legislation is conducted by the Government, and the Government is sure of the votes of its supporters. While they may criticise, as they did this afternoon, when it comes to a vote they are sure to support the ministry. Therefore such a suggestion cannot come from this side with any hope of success; at least, the amendments we have made so far have been voted down. The time is coming, and coming soon, when that will not be the case. But in the meantime what can Parliament do about it? It is for the minister to take the responsibility for this expenditure, and before he asks for an unlimited amount, say $100,000 or $200,000, he should consider well the advisability of eliminating unnecessary expenditure. This is not a time for unnecessary expenditure.

Mr. CANNON: Before this item is passed I wish again to protest against the principle of giving bounties to companies and corporations that do not need them. I object also to our voting a salary to an official who will distribute an amount which is nowhere mentioned in the Estimates. In other words, we are giving a blank cheque to the Department of Trade and Commerce and my right hon. friend can spend any amount he wishes; there is nothing to restrict or to curb his extravagance if he is inclined to be extravagant. If my right hon. friend's contention is correct that if an expenditure is authorized by statute he does not have to come back to the House and have the amount voted but can spend what he likes each year, the Government might as well introduce a Bill conferring upon themselves the power to spend a lump sum of say $500,000,000. We would then have no budget; the usefulness of the House of Commons would disappear, and the Government would be able to run the country as they wish to run it.

Item agreed to.

Canada Year Book, $20,000.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the reason for the increase?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is due largely to the increase in the cost of paper.

Mr. CAHILL: How many of these books are distributed free, and what good purpose is served by spending $20,000 for the Year Book? Is it worth the money to the people, and if so, in what way?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That might be a debatable question; it would depend upon one's point of view. I, myself, have no doubt as to the utility of the book and the usefulness of the purpose which it serves. I know of no progressive country in the world which does not publish a year book of singular excellence. Our year book has been published for a number of years; its quality and efficacy, so to speak, have been increasing each year and I believe that Canada has to-day, with the possible exception of Australia, a year book as comprehensive, as well put up, and as consecutive in the information which it gives as that of any other country which publishes such a book. Last year we published an English edition of about 9,000 copies and a French edition of about 3,000 copies at a cost of $22,000. The work is now done in the Printing Bureau; formerly that was not the case. A certain number of copies are distributed to libraries, chambers of commerce, and permanent institutions of that kind, where they are available to those who seek information concerning Canada. Then, a price, which is just about the cost of publication, is charged for all copies distributed, other than the complimentary copies of which I have spoken. One feature which has been introduced in the book is, I think, valuable. Each year an exhaustive article is published dealing with one particular phase of Canada's development—whether concerning her history, her mineral wealth, or otherwise—so as to bring up to date all the information in compendious form with reference to that subject. Then in succeeding publications there is a reference column to articles which appeared in the preceding books, so that if one does not find in this year's book the information which he seeks he may refer to the previous volume dealing with the subject.

Mr. CAHILL: How many have been distributed each year?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I cannot tell my hon. friend the number, but I can get the information for him.

Mr. BELAND: The information in the book covers the calendar year?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. BELAND: I have noticed that the Canadian Almanac contains more recent information in some respects than that which appears in the Canada Year Book.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, that is bound to be the case. The Year Book is not so much a pocket volume containing strictly up-to-date information as a permanent record. It takes a good deal of time to prepare it and get it published.

Mr. CAHILL: Has the Year Book always been published under the name "Canada Year Book," or was there some other title?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think the earlier volumes had a different name, but it has had the name "Canada Year Book" for a number of years.

Mr. CAHILL: The Imperial Canadian Year Book is a different publication?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Culling timber, including an amount of $600 for superannuated cullers, $1,600.

Mr. McMASTER: Why have we to pay cullers? I did not know the Government was in the timber busines.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This comes in as the tail end of a long transaction, and this is the last time it will appear. It has been gradually diminished by appointments not being made, until I think we have now three officers left who are being paid small superannuations. Most of them, I regret to say, are over eighty years of age and will soon disappear. The active operations of this work will disappear after this year.

Item agreed to.

Grant to Canadian Engineering Standards Association for the promotion of uniformity of standards in metallic and other products, $10,000.

Mr. CAHILL: What does this appropriation accomplish?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This appropriation has appeared for the last two or three years, and when the committee understands what it is for, I am sure it will consider the apropriation a very useful one. It is granted to the Canadian Engineering Standards Association. The Canadian Engineers banded themselves together, and they are now at work particularly in forming standards of various kinds, so as to standardize productive operations. As members of the association they give their whole time to this work, and we give them a grant of $10,000 to enable them to carry on.

Mr. CAHILL: Are they meeting with any positive success?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes. They have divided themselves into a large number of committees, each committee taking up one special subject with the idea of introducing standardization in regard to that product, whatever it is. They get together and canvass the question, discuss the standards that they fix, come to an agreement and then bring all the pressure they can to bear upon the manufacturing companies to adopt those standards. They are meeting with great success in that respect. Anyone who will think for a moment will realize the great economic gain which would be had if, instead of a manufacturer devoting himself to five, six, seven, eight or ten different standards in the manufacture of an article of use, he could bring those down to the minimum number of usable standards and manufacture along that line.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Do they make reports to the Department?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, and we have on record the results of their work.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Are the reports available for the public?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We have them on record; we have not printed them. My hon. friend could get any in which he is interested.

Honorary Advisory Council of Industrial and Scientific Research,—salaries and expenses, including printing and stationery and the collection and distribution of information, and for studentships, scholarships, special problems and forestry studies, $120,000.

Mr. COWAN: In the speech from the Throne reference is made to a Bill dealing with scientific research. Will any expenditure entailed by that Bill be in addition to this amount, or does this include it?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This does not include it. What is contemplated in that allusion is something of a much more extended kind; it is really a national laboratory for standardization and research. On the other hand, this would have an intimate connection therewith, and when the other is established, this would work in with it to a very large extent. That correlation would have to be made after we knew the form of the new venture, so to speak.

Mr. CROWE: The latter part of the item refers to: "forestry studies." Is that work in a forestry products laboratory?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is an explanation, a little more extended, of what is meant by the research. Those are the lines along which they are carrying on research. They include not only the research and salaries and expenses, but a system of studentships, fellowships and bursaries which the advisory council supervise, and, after proper examination, award for special researches in different lines. They take up quite a large range at the present time. There are included in them some forestry problems, mining problems, productive problems in industry, and scientific problems to a certain extent where they are trying to solve difficulties which are met in processes of production and they carry on experiments to that end. the system of bursaries, fellowships and studentships has been found to work well in Great Gritain and other countries, and the same line is being followed out under this research board.

Mr. McMASTER: I would venture the assertion that the work conducted under this Advisory Council of Industrial and Scientific Research might far better be conducted under the universities of this country. For instance, we know that in the Faculty of Applied Science of McGill Universities we have had some of the leading scientists, I may say, of the whole world, some men who occupy chairs in that faculty are really men of world-wide reputation and have done a great deal of their most important work in connection with the university. What I am afraid of, in voting this $120,000, is that we are largely duplicating the work of the universities, and I think if we wish to promote scientific and industrial research, that work can much better be carried on in the great scientific schools attached to universities like McGill, Toronto Varsity and Queen's University at Kingston.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The University of Montreal.

Mr. McMASTER: The University of Monereal, Laval University and others. I would like to bring forward this objection which, I believe, is a serious one. Would the minister inform us how he expects with the appliances available at Ottawa to have the work done as well as it would be done with the magnificant equipment at McGill, for instance, and I speak of McGill not because I do not realize there are other universities splendidly equipped, but because I am familiar with the equipment of my Alma Mater.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am afraid my hon. friend has not read the yearly reports as diligently as he might have done if he had had more time. The universities are not ignored under this system. Their energies are co-ordinated by the members of the Research Council, many of whom are connected with the universities. These researches are not carried on by means of appliances here in Ottawa, but at the universities themselves by members of the universities, either professors or students who have gained their degrees or passed through most of their courses and have specialized in some one of the subjects. They are appointed under the bursary studentship and fellowship appropriations to carry on during the vacation months researches along a certain line. Here is a research, for instance, being carried on by Professor Porter of McGill University. A grant of $1,500 is proposed to be given him out of this vote in order to defray his expenses in carrying on an investigation with reference to oil flotation in the recovery of values, by the application of Canadian and other oils, taking into consideration minerals other than those of the Cobalt district. There is a line along which research has been extended. The professor has been at work on that and shows an aptitude for it. This grant is given to him under the supervision of the Research Council to enable him to defray his expenses in carrying on that investigation for another year. That is just an example of how the work is done. There is no laboratory here under the management of the Research Council where independent research is undertaken. I have a number of instances here of bursaries, studentships, fellowships, and grants for researches that are being carried on at McGill, Queen's, Toronto University, and other universities which have the appliances and the skilled workmanship necessary to enable them to undertake that work.

Mr. McMASTER: I would not like the minister to think I was opposed to research work. I am glad to know that it is being carried on in these places where it can best be carried on, but I would like to be convinced of the necessity for this council in regard to this work. Would the minister tell us roughly how much of this $120,000 is going to the actual work of research at the universities, and how much goes for the salaries of officers or officials connected with the council?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Research Council is composed of a number of gentlemen who are selected because of professional and scientific knowledge and skill, also of men who are versed in and familiar with the industries of the country. All of them give their services without any remuneration with the exception of the president, who is a constant or stationary officer and who had to give up his work in the university and become a sort of Director for the Research Council, supervising their work. All the others give their services free. We pay their expenses when they come to Ottawa for their meetings, which are every fortnight or three weeks as necessity dictates. Dr. Macallum, who was the Director, and received a salary of $10,000, has resigned and gone on a mission to Pekin after being appointed to a position in McGill University. His place has been taken by Dr. Ruttan, who is filling the position until we come to a conclusion in reference to the laboratory which has been spoken about and the rearrangements which are to be made. He fills that position gratuitously. I make that explanation to show that salaries are not a large part of the expenditure. The others receive their travelling expenses and their living allowances when they are attending the meetings. Last year, salaries and allowances and the staff which is necessary to carry on the work consumed $14,800, printing and stationery and travelling expenses of members took up a certain amount and the standard gauge laboratory equipment took up $9,000. I must make an explanation with reference to the standard gauge laboratory equipment. It had been purchased by the Imperial Munitions Board, and had been used by them to a certain extent. When the Imperial Munitions Board was demobilized this valuable machinery remained there. The value of it was somewhere in the neighbourhood of $30,000. They offered it to the Research Council for $9,000. It is worth fully the amount that I stated first. After consultation, the Research Council decided to buy it at $9,000. It could be sold at more than that price at any time, but if this new arrangement is made and comes into force it will be absolutely necessary to have that gauge. Forestry examinations took $8,000, assistant researches, seventeen in all, $24,467, fellowships $4,100, studentships $4,125, and bursaries $2,150.

Mr. BELAND: Are all these studentships carried in Canada?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: All in Canada.

Mr. BELAND: None in England?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No. Professor McLennan, who has charge of the physics laboratory in Toronto, has been conducting experiments there for us. During the war, he was taken over to England and employed by the British Government in research work, and his investigations proved very valuable indeed. While in England he was working for the British Government, not for us.

Mr. BELAND: How many of these students are there?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There were seventeen researches carried on last year in different lines, an example of one of which I put before the House. There are six students.

Mr. BELAND: Are they university graduates?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: They are university graduates or undergraduates who have made their mark and shown a distinct aptitude in and desire for a certain line of research, and they are selected by the Research Council after consultation with the presidents of the universities with a view to obtaining the best men. They are given fellowships which enable them to carry on research.

Mr. McMASTER: In glancing over the Auditor General's report, I would submit, for the consideration of the minister, that the overhead, if I may so term it, in connection with this enterprise, is very much higher than it should be. The administrative chairman is far from being a stationary officer, for I see he spent seventy-eight and three-quarters days at $10 per day travelling around, and his railways fares amounted to about $436. The expenses in connection with this undertaking amount to about $33,000 out of a total of some $94,000 for the work that is supposed to be done. I think the thing is top-heavy, and there are comparatively few students who are being helped. At any rate, the amount spent on helping students is very much less than the overhead. Let me draw the attention of the committee to this item:

> Dr. Andrew Hunter, Toronto: Grant to aid in research into the problems of the fox-breeding industry, honorarium $200, travelling expenses, $191.10, advance for expenses, $5,000.

I respectfully submit that if you are going to make experiments in fox breeding, an amount to some fox breeder down in Prince Edward Island would be a good deal wiser than grants to any gentlemen who lives in Toronto. I never knew that city to be famous for fox production.

Mr. PARENT: They have to be foxy.

Mr. McMASTER: It strikes me that we have paid out a good deal of public money in this direction, and far too much has gone in the way of expenses to those who were not doing the real work, but who were more or less supervising. The Minister of Immigration and Colonization has a very wise look on his face and perhaps he could give us some information in regard to the subject of fox breeding. I throw out this suggestion because there is a sapient expression on his face.

Mr. CALDER: I have no knowledge of the subject.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: First, with reference to over-head expenses. The one purpose of the Research Council was to interest scientific bodies and to line them up as far as possible in accordant action. In order to do that they must visit the different parts of the Dominion and consult with those men and form organizations. To have said to Dr. Macallum, "We will pay you $10,000 as director, and then make you stay in Ottawa so as to obviate travelling expenses", would not have been a proper manner in which to conduct the enterprise. Dr. Macallum did travel over every part of the Dominion. He called on scientific and university men, had conversations and conferences with them, and formed them into groups which affiliated themselves in work with the Advisory Council, under their direction. That was the first really excellent step that was taken. It had to be taken if you were going to collect information, focus scientific research work in Canada, and carry it on under proper supervision and in a regular manner. With reference to fox breeding, this is an industry that has had its ups and downs. On the whole it has shown possibilities of very large returns, not only from foxes, but from other wild animals that might be cultivated. The difficulties in fox culture arise, so far as I understand, chiefly in regard to habitat, feeding, and procreation of foxes. Foxes are, of course, a foxy lot, and many a breeder, after he has spent large sums of money, and has obtained a litter, suddenly finds, after leaving them in good condition one day, that the next day they have in some way or other disappeared. Very frequently they are destroyed by the mother herself. Now why is that? The mother fox destroys her young through fright. Some clumsy method in dealing with these animals may give rise to fright on the part of the mother and she probably thinks that the best way of standing between them and their enemies is by destroying them. An endeavour is made to provide proper food and, generally, such treatment as will make the habitat as natural as possible and on the whole make for natural conditions. This research work was carried on in the actual farming of foxes for a certain period. Strict scientific observation was made of them on which conclusions might be based as to the best methods of feeding,, breeding and looking after them. When that information is ascertained, and has behind it scientific authority, as well as experience, it will prove very valuable to the fox breeding industry as a whole.

Mr. McMASTER: What is Dr. Andrew Hunter, who is devoting his attention to fox breeding? Is he a veterinary doctor?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: So far as this research goes, I suppose you would call him a fox doctor.

Mr. McMASTER: Well, he is doctoring foxes and he gets an advance for expenses of $5,000.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is for carrying on experiments.

Mr. McMASTER: Where has he carried on these experiments?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In Prince Edward Island in the vicinity of Ottawa.

Mr. McMASTER: Well, I submit that it is not wise to appoint a man who is a veterinary doctor, or a homeopather, or a dentist, who lives in Toronto, to carry on investigations of this nature in Prince Edward Island. Why should a man in Toronto be engaged to carry on research work in Prince Edward Island at a total expenditure last year of over $5,000?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am not a fox doctor, nor am I an authority on the breeding of animals. My hon. friend, however, has a high opinion of McGill University, and I know he has an equally high opinion of Dr. Ruttan who was on the Advisory Council, which thought it necessary, after a thorough consideration of the matter, to devote a certain amount of money to this purpose. He was one of the Advisory Council who made that proposal. I cannot give my hon. friend the information which I know he could obtain from Dr. Ruttan, although I could get it for him and give him a memorandum on the subject. I know it would be both interesting and instructive as well as satisfactory to my hon. friend if he would meet Dr. Ruttan and talk the matter over with him.

Mr. McMASTER: There are many things which we should like to do in Canada if we had the money. I do submit, with all respect to the minister, that the country's finances are not such as to warrant the expenditure of this amount of money on investigating the psychology of mother foxes in order to provide some remedy against their unnatural and most unmotherly propensity for dining off their young. As a matter of fact, the member for Châteauguay and Huntingdon (Mr. Robb), who has experience in country life and is member for one of the finest agricultural counties in the Dominion, tells me that the female pig also very often does the same thing. To my mind, Mr. Chairman, we have to economize, and I think the Government is very severely to blame for spending so much money on this sort of scientific investigation.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is not only scientific, but it is practical. This industry is one which is largely carried on at the present time and is capable of almost indefinite expansion in our country. I will just read a little memorandum I have on the subject for the benefit of my hon. friend:

To the Associate Committee of the Research Council investigating the problems affecting the fox-breeding industry of the Dominion.

I may say that $5,500 was the grant.

This committee has been engaged for over a year in studying the causation of the low yield from this industry. In Prince Edward Island, the average number of fox pups to a litter ranges from three to five, but the number of pups reared to maturity averages only one to three per pair of foxes. The loss, therefore, is in the neighborhood of about sixty-five per cent of each litter, and apparently is largely due to wholly unsuitable diet which affects the mother vixen before the birth of the litter, and also the young pups. There is no knowledge for the fox breeders to go upon on this score, and the Fox-Breeders' Association appealed, over a year and a half ago, to have this investigation conducted under the auspices of the Research Council. This was agreed to by the latter, which planned an investigation which would extend over two years at least. The associate committee consists of five professors—

Now I will catch my hon. friend——of biochemistry and physiology two representatives of the Department of Agriculture, one of whom is Dr. Torrance, the Veterinary Director General of the Health of Animals Branch. The investigation is now being conducted under the auspices of the Associate Committee by an expert Canadian biochemist, who has, for the past fifteen years, been engaged in studying the nutrition of farm animals in the North Western States and Canada, and who has control of part of the Research Laboratory of the Health of Animals Branch at Hull, P.Q., where there are installed special pens for the foxes and special equipment in the laboratory for this purpose, at the expense of the Department of Agriculture.

The Fox Breeders' Association have donated six pair of foxes estimated at a value of $2,000, which are now under observation as to diet and the resulting state of nourishment. Already data have been obtained which seem to point the way to a standard diet for these animals which, if established, will lower the mortality amongst the young foxes and thus save, it is hoped, about a million dollars a year for Prince Edward Island alone.

The grant will enable the work to be continued until the end of 1921.

Mr. BELAND: Are the grants made by the minister or by the Council?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The grants are recommended by the Council and the minister agrees or disagrees, and with his approval they go into operation; but I may say that so far as I am concerned I have taken, in most instances, the considered recommendation of the Research Council. In some cases I have talked recommendations over with them and they have been withdrawn.

Mr. BELAND: I understand that all the members of the Council do not devote the whole of their time to this work?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No, they do not.

Mr. BELAND: But they convene in Ottawa?

Mr. BELAND: How often?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: As a rule the meetings are held about once a fortnight. The members of the council could not be expected to give their whole time to the work. They are men who have their allotted duties in the universities. They get no salary for this work, but they do give a large amount of time. They not only attend meetings here but they are more or less at work even when they are absent from Ottawa.

11 p.m.

Mr. MURPHY: The right hon. gentleman has just read an interesting document, the product of a number of eminent gentlemen, some of whom were biochemists. Now among those "bios" was there a practical fox-breeder—even one practical fox-breeder?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have read a statement giving the composition of the committee, and that statement also mentions the fact that the foxes were placed in these pens by those who own them in Prince Edward Island. The foxes are kept under the supervision, and subject to the constant observation, of these men who are carrying on the experiment and making the notes. That is the only way in which the investigation could be conducted. Even a practical fox-breeder might not be able to make scientific observation. I do not know how it is with foxes—but generally a successful breeder has the knack of it and has luck—gets along well.

Mr. MURPHY: The last observation of the right hon. gentleman is really the one that applies to this industry. The practical and successful breeder does not need the assistance of the "bios" who compose this committee. To quote the language my right hon. friend used in the House a few weeks ago, "honest injun now," does he not think the money is wasted?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not.

Mr. MURPHY: The right hon. gentleman says he does not?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not.

Mr. MURPHY: Then may I tell the right hon. gentleman that among the large population in this part of Canada he is an outstanding exception.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is not always a demerit.

Mr. MURPHY: It is very well known that this Council of Industrial and Scientific Research is just a method of providing—well, a sort of pleasant occupation for a number of gentlemen who form little coteries here and there, and to whom the irreverent refer as members of a mutual admiration society. Now just in this connection, a gentleman who is said to be a very eminent man, and whose standing in a university I will not attempt to question, was until lately the head of this Council of Scientific and Industrial Research—I refer to Dr. Macallum. Amongst those who have been born and have lived in Ottawa all their lives, and who are not very easily impressed by the great or the near-great, there was a very settled conviction that Dr. Macallum was not at all what he was represented to be in connection with this Council of Industrial and Scientific Research. Efforts were made in this House from time to time to find out what salary Dr. Macallum received in Toronto university before he was transferred to Ottawa but those efforts were unavailing.

Mr. McMASTER: Futile.

Mr. MURPHY: As my hon. friend from Brome classically says these efforts were futile. But a few short months ago I chanced to read an address by the present president of Toronto University in which he gave the secret away, and he mentioned that Dr. Macallum used to get $4,000 in that institution. He was brought down here and was provided with a position affording much more time for recreation than occupation, and was paid $10,000 a year. So far as I am aware, neither the House nor the country has ever been given a single proof of any practical work accomplished by Dr. Macallum or this Council of Scientific and Industrial Research. I am not charging the present Government, still less my right hon. friend, with having been the initiators of this method of public expenditure. In times past I recall that other gentlemen, supposed to be very eminent in the scientific world, were also engaged in alleged scientific occupations. To one gentleman we used to vote money annually—indeed, we may do so yet, for I have not scrutinized the Estimates with sufficient care to state definitely—for experiments in electric smelting. From time to time this gentleman interviewed himself and handed out information to the newspapers of wonderful accomplishments at the Soo in connection with electric smelting, but so far as a critical and cynical public ever knew the only thing he turned out were some paper weights. I remember I was favoured with one.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Have you got it yet?

Mr. MURPHY: I believe so. I hope to produce it here as Exhibit A to illustrate to the House and to the public what value we received for the expenditure of public money in this way. Now, Dr. Macallum has resigned and no successor has been appointed?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No permanent successor.

Mr. MURPHY: Is the $10,000 being paid to anybody else?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Not at the present time.

Mr. MURPHY: Is it to be paid to anybody in the future?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I cannot tell; that will depend on the reorganization.

Mr. MURPHY: In any event the work is going on without Dr. Macallum?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: I submit, Mr. Chairman, that that is the most eloquent commentary that need be made on the value of Dr. Macallum's services to the country in return for his $10,000 a year. I am not criticising my right hon. friend, in fact, I do not know if his department has had the supervision of this Council from its inception, but, to use his own phrase again: "honest injun, now," isn't it about time we stopped providing for these gentlemen? They are all quite respectable, but none, I submit, renders any service of practical value to this country for the money received. Just take the illustration given to the committee a few minutes ago by my right hon. friend of the expenditure of some $5,000 as a retainer and honorarium, with travelling expenses thrown in, for a gentleman in Toronto to instruct people down in Prince Edward Island in fox-breeding—people who have forgotten more than this gentleman will ever know about foxes. If my right hon. friend requires any information on fox-breeding, all he need do is move down a few seats to the hon. member from Prince Edward Island (Mr. McIsaac), who will no doubt enlighten him. The report the right hon. gentleman read contains no practical information regarding fox-breeding that was not known before, and much more accurately by the people who are engaged in the industry in Prince Edward Island. All Governments have been sinners in this respect, they have yielded to the importunities of pestering friends, and jobs of this kind have been created for people who have nothing else to do, or who in public competition with practical men could not earn enough for their keep, to use a common phrase. In view of the serious financial situation of the country, I submit to my right hon. friend that he could render no greater national service at the present time than to ask the committee to drop this item.

Mr. FIELDING: The suggestion of the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) seems to be that Dr. Macallum was furnished with a soft and easy job, to repeat an expression which is sometimes used in the Government service. Yet the strange fact is that Dr. Macallum seems to have voluntarily resigned that job and gone where his services are appreciated. That would suggest to me that Dr. Macallum is more entitled to commendation than criticism. Without going into details, and particularly without undertaking to sit in judgment on this foxy business, I wish to say that in regard to some general system for carrying on scientific research in Canada I am cordially with the Government, and I think it is desirable that it should be encouraged. Of course, it should be conducted in a practical way and should be devoted to the development of the natural resources of the country. We have suffered in the past because other countries have given more attention to scientific research than we have. It is a matter of notoriety that much of the success of Germany in industrial affairs was due to scientific research. I have not sufficient knowledge of these matters to go into details, but I do wish to go on record as heartily supporting every effort to employ scientific men to the end that they may devote their talents to the development of the natural resources of Canada. I do hope that if there are any defects in details the criticisms offered today will be taken into consideration, but on the main question of having some well defined system of scientific research I wish to give my cordial support to the action taken by the Government.

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): Statements have been made that the money voted for the purposes of scientific and industrial research has literally been thrown away. In my judgment, as one who has had something to do with practical affairs, instead of the vote being cut down it should be very materially increased if the country could possibly afford it. We are lagging behind industrially because we are away behind scientifically. The tremendous waste that is taking place every day could be avoided if we had the leadership of just such men as Dr. Macallum, to give our industrial leaders the scientific direction which they require. We could pay our national debt out of the waste that is involved in our industries every day. In northern Ontario during the whole period of the war we were importing iron ore from the United States and smelting it into shell when the ore itself only carried thirty per cent of iron. At the same time we were mining ore in northern Ontario, taking it out to the roasting beds, destroying vegetation, and roasting out of it twenty-three per cent sulphur, then at very great expense putting it through the smelter and securing only fifty to sixty per cent iron because we have not developed any scientific process to make it possible to separate the precious and coarse metals in the one operation. In those slag heaps there is enough iron to keep every rolling mill in Canada going if we had a process by which the iron could be saved. That is the kind of thing that is going on. My hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) thinks it is very strange that Dr. Macallum, who was head of the Research Council, should have resigned this fat job that he was holding down, I suppose my hon. friend would consider, as an ornament to society or as the head of a mutual admiration society. Well, why did he resign? Because his worth was recognized by a commercial organization which is willing to give him just double the salary that he was receiving as head of the Research Council.

Mr. MURPHY: Does the hon. gentleman state as a fact that Dr. Macallum is now receiving twice the salary he was receiving before?

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): I am credibly informed that Dr. Macallum has been engaged on a five year contract at $20,000 a year and expenses. I am confident, without having any more than a passing acquaintance with Dr. Macallum, that those who have employed him would not have done so were they not confident that he would earn his salary. But leaving Dr. Macallum out of the question altogether, if this country is going to advance as it should, we should increase this item rather than decrease it. We should strengthen the hands of the Research Council by giving them a laboratory here in Ottawa where this work can be carried on. I know scores of cases in which men who wanted to get a certain commodity or product analyzed in this country could not do so; they had to go to the United States or to some other country in order to get the information. The committee of the House which dealt with this matter heard the evidence of the heads of the universities, to whom the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) referred, and it was recommended by those gentlemen that a research institute be established and properly equipped with laboratories where research work could be carried on under the most favourable conditions. It will be seen by the evidence given by the heads of the universities before this committee that they do not agree with the view of the member for Brome that this research work should be done in the universities. They say that the business of the men in the universities is to teach what others search out for then and place in their hands, and that if you double up the work—well, the member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) shakes his head. But it was the view of all these gentlemen that the man engaged in the teaching profession in the university is not in a position properly to carry on research work. I do not wish to labour the question, but I repeat that instead of reducing this amount we should look forward to increasing it and to giving the Research Council all the necessary facilities for properly carrying out this very important work.

Mr. JACOBS: Are the professors to whom the right hon. gentleman referred in the document which he read—those engaged in the fox farming industry—veterinarians?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The associate committee which is carrying on the investigation consists of five professors of biochemistry and physiology and two representatives of the Department of Agriculture, one of whom is Dr. Torrance, Veterinary Director General, Health of Animals branch. I should just like to reply briefly to the statements made by my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Murphy). As an exhibition of good-natured banter and persiflage, of its kind, it was excellent; but the very same type of speech has been made on numerous occasions for many years past with reference to scientific men engaged in the work of research. This patient, tireless, exhaustive work does not show itself from day to day, but it frequently results in some discovery, either of synthesis or of analysis, some discovery of the relations of materials and their effects in combination, which puts into the world's productive industries millions upon millions of money and into the economic use of the country products which it otherwise would not have and at lower prices than would otherwise be the case. My hon. friend spoke about Dr. Macallum. I am loath to bring Dr. Macallum's name here; his affairs are his own affairs. But I can tell my hon friend that neither before he took this position nor since has Dr. Macallum been obliged to beg for offers of emolument or for the highest positions. He is at this moment loaned to the Rockefeller Institute, having been selected by them for special work in China during five, six or seven months. Before he was appointed head of the Research Council he received an offer of a position in
