another capacity, involving scientific work, at a salary of $15,000 a year, which he refused because he did not care to leave Canada. Dr. Macallum was not my appointment, nor was his appointment ever pressed upon me by anyone selfishly interested. He was chosen on the recommendation of the twelve eminent men from our universities and in our public life who were appointed upon the Advisory Council. My hon. friend asks for results. The results brought about by scientific research are slow in their processes, often disappointing in their leads, but where they do work out well they are of inestimable value to the productive interests of the country. One result which has been brought about is this: within a month or two, perhaps less, there will be in operation in the Northwest a process for the carbonization of low lignites, making them capable of withstanding the rough handling of transportation as anthracite does, and therefore opening the way to a countless advantage for the people in that vast country as affecting fuel and motive power and, indeed, their general sustenance. When that is in operation successfully, as it will be, it will give the lead to an operation which will make the Northwest absolutely independent of the rest of the world, and when the Northwest gets its millions and millions of people, there are still untold milions of tons of lignite which may be put through those processes and which, therefore, may be made available as anthracite is now made available. In Great Britain itself a research council, upon which our research council is absolutely modelled, has been in operation for the last five years, and the British Government has appropriated more than £5,000,000 in order that they may carry out their researches, because when the war came on, Great Britain woke up and found that she was so far behind in this matter of industrial and scientific research that she was at the mercy of her enemies. She determined not to be at the mercy of her enemies any longer; she put her money into this work; she called her scientific men together, and they are working on exactly the same plan as our council is. Go to the United States and see what is being done there, go to our own manufacturers. I have before me to-day a pressing demand from one of the most extensive and practical producing industries in this country which is longing for this research and is willing to put its money into it and to have tried out its own difficulties in process working just as soon as the laboratory, which has been contemplated and of which my hon. friend has spoken, is established here, if it is established in Ottawa. There is this call for it, from all parts of the country, and depend upon it we make no mistake; I am quite of opinion that we must be careful and wise in our selections and the like of that; but I have seen the workings and the spirit of that advisory council for two and one-half years, and I am bound to stand for the work they are doing and the fidelity with which they have attached themselves to that work.

Mr. MURPHY: With the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) and with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I am in hearty accord as to the desirability of applying science to Canadian industry as rapidly and generally as possible; but neither of these gentlemen told the committee, because neither of them could do so, that any practical result or benefit to Canadian industry has resulted from the work of this Advisory Council of Industrial and Scientific Research.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I just mentioned one.

Mr. MURPHY: My right hon. friend is one of the cheeriest optimists in Canada, and that excellent quality develops and increases as time goes by, and I commend him heartily for it. He mentioned that in a couple of months he expected that so-and-so would likely happen in connection with production of some of the lignite in the West. With him I hope that will be the case. My criticism is not based on any objection to the application of science and industry; quite the reverse; my objection is that real scientists with a practical knowledge of industrial chemistry have not been engaged, and I will give my right hon. friend my authority for saying so. I think the minister, my hon. friend from Algoma and other gentlemen in the House, will not be disposed to question my authority. Having the general knowledge that a person goes through college and university has about scientific subjects, without having devoted himself to the pursuit of the study of anyone of them in particular, I was anxious to find out from gentlemen competent to speak, what was the practical value to Canadian industry of the work of this Advisory Council. In looking about for the quarter to which I might address my inquiry, it occurred to me that I could not address it to any better informed quarter than to the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. I, therefore, made inquiry there, and I was told by one of the most competent officials of that association—and I need not mention either to the minister or to the hon. member for East Algoma that the Canadian Manufacturers' Association makes a specialty of employing competent officials—that while Dr. Macallum might be very eminent as a bio-chemist in a university, he was absolutely useless as an industrial chemist in connection with the industries of this country; that he had absolutely no knowledge on that subject, and the council of which he was a member produced no practical results. The opinion of this official of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association was that no practical results would follow from the work of this Advisory Council of Industrial and Scientific Research until chemists with a knowledge of industrial chemistry were employed in connection with it. That is my reason for the statement that I have made; that is the information I got, and that is the quarter from which I received it. My right hon. friend has described the results that flow from the application of science to industry. My right hon. friend used the phase that it was slow in its processes. In that respect this council measures up to the definition. We in Canada—and in this regard I want to point out that I am in perfect accord with the hon. member for East Algoma—need the application of chemistry and science to Canadian industry; but I desire to see whatever money may be voted for that purpose applied in the proper way, the way to produce results applied, for instance, in connection with those who may be engaged to conduct those scientific inquiries, in securing the services of men who not only have scientific knowledge but are able to apply that knowledge practically. The fact that, according to my informant of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, not one single practical result has so far flowed to Canadian industry from the work of this council, is the strongest possible criticism that may be offered with regard to expenditures of moneys that have in the past been voted for this purpose. An I said in my opening remarks, I do not offer these observations by way of criticism of the Government, still less of the minister in charge of the Estimates; I am offering them to the committee as a reason why either this vote should be discontinued or a very different method pursued in future in the expenditure of the money.

Mr. MANION: As one of those who some twenty years ago was a student of Dr. Macallum in Toronto University, I have listened on different occasions in this House to criticisms of that gentleman, and while I should not like to pass upon his ability as a bio-chemist, or on his ability in the position which he occupied on this Research Council, I should like to say this in justice to him, and I think it is only fair that someone should say it. Twenty years ago Dr. Macallum was one of the few men Canada had ever produced who had an international reputation in science. Dr. Macallum's name was known in every civilized country in the world in which the scientific branch which he taught at Toronto University was studied. I mention that in passing because I think it is only just that should be said about him. It is an absolute fact that cannot be denied by anybody who knows the subject which he taught to the students in Toronto University. I should like also to say that there have been various investigating committees in England looking into the industrial life of that country and wondering why it was not going ahead as it should have done, particularly since the war, and I have seen reports which stated that one of the main reasons why the industrial life of England was not going ahead was because Germany, for example, went into industrial research work on a much greater scale than England. It was also pointed out that all these industrial research committees in Germany were working for the advancement of that country, and that many large industries there had these research committees working for them. They would often find that a man or a body would be engaged on investigations for a number of years before accomplishing any result which would be of use to the industry, but then after many years work results would be attained which would be very beneficial to the industry and fully justify the length of time that had been taken up by the investigation. The Industrial Research Council of Canada has been in existence for only a short time, and I think we should wait with patience for a while at least to give them an opportunity to bring forth results which I believe will be of great benefit to the Dominion of Canada. I believe personally that a research council of some kind should be maintained to a reasonable extent, I think it is one of the most needed requirements of this country at the present time.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not wish to detain the committee at any lenght, but I desire to say just a few words in reply to the observations made by the hon. member for East Algoma. I would hardly agree with him in his statement that the university is not the proper place for research.

Mr. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): That was not my statement, but the statement of the presidents of the universities and the professors in the universities, made to a committee of this House.

Mr. McMASTER: I was just going to take that up. I could hardly imagine that the Principal of McGill University made any such statement. My recollection is that this committee sat within a year. Prior to that the Principal of McGill had been laid aside by a paralytic stroke, and his successor was only appointed within the last few months. At any rate, if the president did make such a statement I cannot agree with him. I think the whole history of research is contrary to that statement. If we take McGill University for instance, we find among the scientific discoverers who have shone in Canada in recent years, such men as Professor Rutherford, who was a professor at McGill, Professor Nicholson, also of McGill, Sir William Dawson, a principal of McGill, and one of the greatest discoverers in geology that we ever had, and Professor Barnes who was one of the great discoverers of the action of freezing water and eminent in scientific research along that line. Then if we go to the Old Land we remember that the great surgical discoverer, Lord Lister, was a professor at Glasgow if I mistake not, that the discoverer of chloroform, Sir James Simpson, was a professor at Edinburgh, and that Lord Kelvin was a professor at Glasgow. If we look at the history of scientific research in Great Britain and Canada we shall find that a large proportion of the most eminent men were college professors. My hon. friend from East Algoma made the statement that a man could not be an investigator on research work and be a professor at the same time. I hardly think that is correct. But I would have him and the House remember that a university has advanced students, such as the students of the graduate school of Johns Hopkins University, probably the greatest school for research in the whole of North America. I am, however, opposed to the idea of incurring expense for laboratories, which would be expensive to maintain, here in Ottawa. These laboratories should be at the universities, where the best work, in my humble opinion, can be done. I would not like the hon. member for East Algoma or any other hon. member of the House to think for a moment that I am opposed to the application of science to industry. We are all in favour of it. It is simply a question of what is the best way to arrive at the desired end.

Mr. VIEN: I should like to inquire what formalities have to be complied with in order to obtain the services of the Research Council.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If my hon. friend wants information with reference to any particular scientific research problem, just make application to the Chairman of the Council. If in the operation of an industry he comes up against a difficulty which puzzles him, an exact statement of his problem should be sent tc the Research Council. It would then be taken into consideration, and if they thought it was of sufficient importance to work out, they would hand it over to some person who was au fait in that particular line of research, and through a bursary or fellowship he could be given the means to defray his expenses while he was at work on that problem. That, however, cannot be thoroughly and efficiently done without a central laboratory, and we shall have a discussion on that in the future.

Mr. VIEN: Is it the intention of the Government to take advantage of the Advisory Research Council for furthering investigation into the electrical treatment of titaniferous iron ores? The Government some years ago spent quite a large sum of money studying the treatment in electrical furnaces of these titaniferous ores, and if I remember rightly, they sent Dr. Stansfield of McGill University to Sweden and Norway and other countries to investigate the processes in vogue there. I understood from the report of Dr. Stansfield that titaniferous iron ores could be successfully treated in Canada provided we could get electrical power cheap enough, but that the development of the electric furnace had to be carried still further before any economic advantage could be taken of our deposits. Has the minister any information as to the activities of the board in that respect? If not, is it the intention of the Government to investigate this matter further with a view to utilizing our deposits?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If I mistake not, the laboratory which is carried on by the Mines Department has had that subject before it and has conducted research with reference to it. Does my hon. friend remember to whom Dr. Stansfield made his report?

Mr. VIEN: To the Mines Department.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Well, I am quite certain that the Advisory Council has not undertaken any ambitious work in that respect. It is a pretty costly undertaking, and I suppose they have not felt themselves in a position to do anything in that direction.

Mr. VIEN: I do not think the experiment would be extremely costly in view of the developments which have been made in the electrical furnace. There is only the question of the magnetic selection of ores after they have been crushed, so that the iron ore might be obtained and the titaniferous portion be so reduced as to be economically treated afterwards in the electrical furnace. I think this would be of great interest to the province whence I come, because we have there in large quantities deposits of titaniferous ores, and also of oriferous and iron ores. In the county of Charlevoix there are deposits which were exploited about forty or fifty years ago, but operations had to be discontinued owing to the economic difficulties that had to be contended with. They could not compete with iron ores free from titaniferous alloy. I think the Advisory Council would find that it is not so expensive to complete the investigations already carried on under the direction of the Mines Department by Dr. Stansfield. I do not think very much study of the subject is necessary.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will bring the matter to the attention of the council.

Item agreed to.

Inspection and Sale Act, administration of, $2,500.

Mr. CAHILL: What is it that is inspected?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Hides, leather, etc.; the payment is chiefly by fees.

Mr. VIEN: Are there any grants in this?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This is all for the principal inspector.

Mr. McCOIG: Are any of the officials in connection with this matter paid any fees?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This is the salary of Elzéar Côté, who is the inspector of hides for Quebec. It also includes expenses in connection with the inspection of hides and the supervising of binder twine, $250, stationery and printing, $130. The salary of Cote is $1,620.

Item agreed to.

International Customs Tariffs' Bureau, $1,400.

Mr. CAHILL: What is this?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This is larger than the vote of last year because during the war, for two years, no appropriation was made. The work went on, not as efficiently as before, but still it was continued. This is an added appropriation to cover expenses. We pay a certain proportion, about $600 a year, as our share.

Mr. PEDLOW: On page 105 of the Estimates, I find an item for a similar proposition. I would call the attention of the minister to item No. 12, which is similar to this item. Will be explain the reason for these items appearing under two different heads in the Estimates? The item on page 105 is:

Chief, Foreign Tariff's Division.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is an entirely different thing. This is a fee that we pay to the International Customs arrangement which gathers together the tariffs of all the different countries and keeps track of their changes, distributing the information to the associate nations. We are one of the associate countries and we pay this $600 a year as our contribution towards the maintenance of this arrangement.

Mr. PEDLOW: The information given me the other night in regard to the other item is practically the same as the statement now made by the minister.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It was an explanation along similar lines. We have to keep a staff here for the collation of that information and its distribution to our own people.

Mr. PARENT: Who determines Canada's contribution?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: A certain sum is necessary for carrying on this work, and it is divided as fairly as possible among the associate nations. The amount is only small.

Mr. PARENT: According to the Auditor General's report, Canada has not paid anything for six years. At page Z-30 I find the following item:

International Customs Tariffs Bureau—Canada's share of cost for six years to March 31, 1920, $3,972.

Apparently the department has to wait quite a long while to ascertain what its share is to the general fund.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The information I have here is just as I have given it. However, I will look into what my hon. friend has said:

Item agreed to.

West India Cable, $38,933.33.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This is the customary vote under the contract. The contract is one entered into between the British Government, ourselves, and the West Indian colonies. Its purpose was to extend cable connection between the various West India Islands and to provide for a reduction in the tolls charged for the service. The British Government pays the same amount as we do. The contract has two years yet to run. The different West Indian governments pay proportionally. The service was considered necessary, and as we were interested in it we contribute towards the subsidy.

Mr. FIELDING: Is it paid to the Cable Company?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. VIEN: When was the service established?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: About six or seven years ago.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the real purpose of the service? Is it for commercial purposes only or for news and general purposes?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is for commercial purposes and for the sending of any messages that anyone wants to send; it is not a newspaper service. It represents about four thousand miles which is served by the companies which are subsidized.

Mr. VIEN: Is this regarded as a subsidy to the cable companies?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Printing of Parliamentary and Departmental publications, including cost of translation, $125,000.

[Sir George Foster.]

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This is a new vote as it appears here and is following out the resolution of Parliament which, instead of paying for the printing done by departments, now asks that the departments pay for their own printing, Parliament paying what is necessary for its own purposes. All the departments come under the resolution referred to, which I consider a very salutary one. The departments formerly acted under the belief that Parliament would pay the whole of their printing bills, and were probably less careful in the matter of printing. The new policy throws the cost of printing upon the department which is responsible for it.

Mr. FIELDING: Each department will have its own printing done?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. CAHILL: Is the cost of the new distribution service that the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Rowell) used to conduct from here included in this vote?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The news service for the hon. member for Durham?

Mr. CAHILL: The news service formerly conducted by the ex-President of the Privy Council?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is no news service by the hon. member for Durham.

Mr. CAHILL: I am glad to know the minister acknowledges that it did exist.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not know what my hon. friend is referring to.

Mr. VIEN: I would like to know of the cost of the Canadian Record, which used to be published under the ex-President of the Privy Council, is included in this item?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No, nothing of the kind. This covers departmental printing done by the Trade and Commerce Department entirely, and that department undertakes no news service such as was carried on formerly by the Publicity Department conducted under the President of the Privy Council.

Mr. VIEN: Is there any news service carried on at present?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I cannot speak as to what is being carried on under the President of the Privy Council, but I am of the opinion that the news service such as we formerly had is now a thing of the past.

Mr. PARENT: I believe last year all the Government printing was done through a certain department which controlled the distribution of the material that every department had to print. May I ask the minister if this change means that the minister himself will have charge of the distribution of the material for printing?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is no change made at all in the distribution itself. This simply applies to the bill for the printing.

Mr. FIELDING: At the Printing Bureau?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

On the motion of the Right Hon. Sir George Foster the House adjourned at twelve o'clock midnight.

Friday, April 1, 1921

The House met at Three o'clock.

FUEL SUPPLY PROBLEM

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): I beg to move—subject, I think it must be, to unanimous consent:

That a special committee consisting of Messrs: Steele, Blair, Cowan, Keefer, Hocken, Douglas (Cape Breton South and Richmond), Ross, McKenzie, Lemieux and Maharg, be appointed to inquire into all matters pertaining to the future fuel supply of Canada, with power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath and to report from time to time.

This is in pursuance of a resolution of the House debated a few days ago.

Mr. SPEAKER: In the absence of notice, this motion, I believe, does require the unanimous consent of the House.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Montmorency): In the absence of the member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Lafortune) I beg to move for leave to introduce Bill No. 52. to amend the Criminal Code.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Explain.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The folowing section is inserted immediately after Section 229 of the Criminal Code, Chapter 146 of the Revised Statutes of Canada:

229a. Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years imprisonment or a penalty not exceeding one hundred dollars, or both, who

(a) In any premises under his control, to which the public have access, engages in or permits other persons to engage in the game known as "Three Card Monte" or similar game played with other instruments than cards,

(b) Engages in the game of Three Card Monte, or similar game played with other instruments than cards, in any public place, or any place to which the public have access.

The member for Jacques Cartier himself could explain the Bill more fully than I can. It has for its object, however, the preventing of the extortion of money from people in the city of Montreal through the carrying on of a crooked confidence game which has been flourishing there for some time. The law does not seem to be very clear on this subject; the courts have had difficulty in finding any authority upon which to base the conviction of culprits who have been found guilty of engaging in this practice.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 45 for the relief of William Henry Coulson.—Mr. Hocken.

Bill No. 46 for the relief of Elizabeth Alexander.—Mr. Douglas (Strathcona).

Bill No. 47 for the relief of William Gleaves Doyle.—Mr. Best.

Bill No. 49 for the relief of Dorothy Mearuel Score.—Mr. Fripp.

Bill No. 50 for the relief of Henry William Maynard.—Mr. Middlebro.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—SECTION MEN

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. A. GAUVREAU (Temiscouata): I would like to put a question to the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Reid): On my way to Rivière du Loup during the recess I heard that one man working on a section of the railway had been dismissed. This is a matter of public importance, having regard to the safety of the road.

Mr. SPEAKER: I hope the hon. gentleman does not, on the Orders of the Day, purpose putting a question in respect to the dismissal of one man on the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I think it is in the public interest that we should know.

Mr. SPEAKER: Everything which takes place in the House of Commons should be in the public interest. There is, however, an opportunity to put a question of this kind on tne Order Paper in the ordinary way.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I would not take that trouble, Mr. Speaker, because it would take too long, and I want an answer at once. I would like to know if an order has been issued to dispense with the services of one man on every section of the road.

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways and Canals): The hon. gentleman knows that the management of the Canadian National Railways is not under the Department of Railways and Canals, but under the Board of Management; therefore no orders have been given by the Minister of Railways.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask what department the Board of Management is under?

Hon. Mr. REID: There is a Board of Management appointed for the operation of the Canadian National Railways—appointed by statute, not by the Minister of Railways. In reply to the hon. member, I stated that no orders, therefore, had been issued by the Minister of Railways or by the Department of Railways.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Are we to understand that the Board of Management is not responsible to any department of the Government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman knows that the statute speaks for itself in that regard.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must submit in any event that this subject cannot be tried on the Orders of the Day.

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT MERCHANT MARINE—INFORMATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): When the Minister of Marine (Mr. Ballantyne) made his statement on Tuesday with regard to the Government ships, he stated that he was willing to give the fullest information to members of the House. He used very broad language:

> That every contract made, every voucher paid, every letter and telegram exchanged between the Department and contractors is open for the fullest inspection of any member of the House who desires any further information.

[Mr. Gauvreau.]

Taking advantage of that pledge or promise I put a question with regard to the steamship Recruit and I got my answer yesterday that the Department did not know anything about it; that the matter was in the hands of some corporation in Toronto. I want to ask the Minister of Marine how he failed to implement the pledge that he gave to the members of this House on Tuesday with regard to this matter.

Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): The words that my hon. friend has referred to as having been used by me when presenting my statement to this House on Tuesday last pertain only, as he can easily tell by reading them over, to the letting of contracts for steel ships entered into between the Marine Department and the shipbuilder. It does not go any further.

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly-Verchères): From the statement made by the Minister of Marine that this question will be considered by a special committee of Parliament, are we to understand that the Government has decided to adopt the fatherless child of the hon. member for Halifax?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Explain.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) has on the Order Paper a resolution calling for the appointment of a committee. Does the Minister of Marine and Fisheries refer to that committee when, in his answer, he says that all these questions will be considered by a special committee of Parliament?

Mr. MEIGHEN: As I made the statement with regard to a special committee in a previous debate in this House, I may say that it is the intention to move that a special committee be appointed to consider just such subjects as were referred to by me in my speech and as were referred to by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in answer to these questions.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): Are we to understand that the committee is to decide what questions are confidential and what are not?

Mr. MEIGHEN: A committee does not decide, it reports. The special committee will report on such subjects as are referred to it. The subjects referred to it will be such as were indicated by myself in that speech.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Are we to understand that all the details of operation of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine and the Canadian National railways will be considered by that special committee?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not said so.

Mr. SPEAKER: There can be no cross-examination of the Government upon the Orders of the Day.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Surely I am entitled to an answer.

Mr. SPEAKER: Not upon the Orders of the Day. The hon. gentleman will have ample opportunity on several occasions during the sittings of the House; but I must point out, as I have on previous occasions, that there is no right, inherent or otherwise, on the part of hon. members on the Orders of the Day to submit questions except with regard to returns and matters pertaining to the business of the House. There has, however, been on the part of the Chair always a desire to permit questions of public and of such urgent character that it would be undesirable if they were left on the Order Paper for several days before being answered. But there can be no cross-examination of the Government as to policy or otherwise. Furthermore, in no case could there be submitted a question which tended to reflect upon or call in question the policy of the Government. That rule has always been rigorously adhered to in all instances.

Mr. THOMAS VIEN (Lotbinière): Will a statement be made public as to the administration of the Canadian Mercantile fleet, or will the only information be that which was put on Hansard the other day?

Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): The only statement which the Government will make is the one that I presented to the House on Tuesday last; but the operating company will also embody the report of their directors—and, I should imagine, rather fully—in their annual report when it is issued.

Mr. VIEN: Will the report of the managing company be distributed amongst the members?

Mr. LEMIEUX: And when?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I cannot inform the hon. gentleman definitely now. I will find out and let him know at the next session of the House.

CANADIAN LOAN TO ROUMANIA

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (George Etienne Cartier): A newspaper despatch announced last night that the Canadian mission in London had arranged to accept Roumanian Government bonds bearing interest at 7 per cent, to cover indebtedness due by the Roumanian Government for credits which were granted a few sessions ago, and it is further stated that the interest on the loan will be paid to-day. I should like to ask the Government whether, seeing that the banks are now closed for the day, the money is to the credit of the Canadian Government, or whether this is merely a cruel hoax on the part of the Roumanian Government, as this is "All Fools'" day.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): I do not receive hourly or momentary reports from the banks as to what money is paid in, and I have not knowledge of the subject to enable me to answer the question. I will bring the matter to the attention of the Minister of Finance.

QUEBEC CITADEL

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): I should like, with your permission, Sir, and for the purpose of asking a question, to read certain extracts from the Quebec Telegraph of March 30, with reference to the rocks from the Citadel threatening the inhabitants of a certain portion of the city of Quebec.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have no desire to object to the hon. gentleman submitting his question because it may be of an urgent character, although perhaps local in its nature. If the lives of people are endangered through lack of attention on the part of the Government, it may be proper to put the question; but the hon. member is not called upon to read a newspaper article in order to put his question. He might summarize it.

Mr. POWER: The newspaper report sums up the situation probably better than I could do so. As regards urgency, these rocks are falling at almost the identical place where a great landslide occurred some years ago, causing a number of people to loss their lives, so that the question is really one of some urgency and of more than local importance.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. gentleman has submitted his case sufficiently to put the question to the Government and get the answer he desires.

Mr. POWER: There is just one more thing I wish to say, namely, that the city disclaims all responsibility, and it was to that portion of the article that I wished to call the attention of the Minister of Militia.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Militia and Defence): I will see that the matter is communicated to the officers of the department and that they be instructed to take any precautions we should take in the matter. I do not know who is liable in such a case.

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Trade and Commerce—Canada Grain Act, administration of, $1,175,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the minister explain the increase of $175,000?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This appropriation covers the operations under the supervision of the Board of Grain Commissioners in carrying out the operations authorized under the Canada Grain Act. The increase of $175,000 over last year is almost, if not entirely, due to reclassification and the raising of salaries consequent thereupon. This appropriation covers all expenditures for salaries of officials, permanent and temporary, and contingencies of the various officers under the eastern and western grain inspection division; it includes salaries and contingencies of the Board of Grain Commissioners, the working expenses of all Government elevators, internal and at port terminals, and salaries and expenses of the grain research laboratory, with the exception of the chief chemist, who is on the Civil Service list and whose salary has already been passed. I may say generally with reference to this service that it is self-sustaining, and a little more than that, varying from year to year according to the crop. For the year 1920-1921 up to January 31, the fees collected amounted to $1,118,813, which is a little larger than the revenue for the whole year 1919-1920, so that we may expect to find, when the accounts are closed to the 31st of March, that the total receipts for the year have been considerably above those of the previous year; and if we have as good a crop next season the revenues on the same basis will meet the expenditure and probably leave something to the good. The aim is, as far as possible, to make the service pay its way. During the several years that the Grain Act has been in operation there have been years when there was a deficit, but since 1911 I have tried so to arrange it that whilst the charges shall not be so high as to bring in a great surplus, they shall be sufficient to meet the expenditure for the year, and leave a little surplus to go upon in case the returns for the following year are not so large.

Mr. BELAND: How many grain elevators has the Government?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Government has a terminal elevator at Port Arthur, terminal elevators at Saskatoon, Moosejaw and Calgary, and a transfer elevator in Vancouver. There is also a bit of the foundation of an elevator in futuro at Hudson Bay, but that is not in operation at present so far as elevating grain is concerned.

Mr. BELAND: Are there any in the East?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Government has elevators in the East at Port Colborne, operated by the railway department in connection with the railways, as well as elevators under the Harbour Commissioners in Montreal and Quebec. Then there is a small elevator in Halifax, which is in fact a transfer elevator.

Mr. BELAND: The Quebec elevator is not very busy, is it?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It has done some work, and I hope it will be busier in the future.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Would the minister explain the increase of $175,000 in this item?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend's question shows he was too busy conversing with his mate, because I have answered exactly the same question by the leader of the Opposition. I am not averse, however, to answering it again. The increase of $175,000 is due to the increases in salaries under re-classification. Altogether, under this vote some 429 employees are paid, so the increases spread over that number amount to a pretty tidy sum.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I understand the country derives some revenue from this item. Where can we find a statement of that?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I can give my hon. friend the figures.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Are they not published?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I already gave them when my hon. friend was conversing.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: What is the amount to be expended on the Quebec elevator out of this item?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Nothing has been expended on the Quebec elevator by us. It was built by the Harbour Commissioners of Quebec, out of loans advanced by the Dominion Government. The elevator is managed by the commission.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: Has the Government nothing to do with its management?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No.

Mr. MICHAUD: The minister has given the elevators in the West and in the province of Quebec. How many are there in the Maritime Provinces?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I gave that information, but I will give it again. There is a small elevator at Halifax, used chiefly for transfer purposes. That is the only one the Government owns in the Maritime Provinces. The Government had an elevator, as my hon. friend will recollect, in St. John, but it was destroyed by fire. The Canadian Pacific have elevators on the west side, which do the grain transfer of the harbour.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Are the revenues pertaining to this item published in the Trade and Commerce report?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, I will give them to my hon. friend. The revenue for 1920-1921 up to January 31, was $1,118,813.

Mr. VIEN: How does that compare with the expenditure?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The expenditure that is asked to be voted for the coming year is $1,175,000. The expenditure up to January 31, 1921, was $982,431, but of course the accounts are not all in for the year ending to-day, nor even for the period up to January 31. The expenditure so far as the accounts have come in, is quite a bit less than the revenue up to January 31. There is no doubt that the revenue for the year ending to-day will be over and above the expenditure.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does the minister follow the financial year or the calendar year in adjusting these accounts?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The financial year.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): I should like some information from the minister in connection with an answer which was given yesterday by the Minister of Finance to a question I asked. My question was, what were the approved securities forming part of the basis on which a large number of Dominion notes were issued. Dominion notes are authorized up to a certain number of millions of dollars, according to the gold kept in the vault. A change has been made in the statute by which not only gold but securities forming part of the basis on issue of Dominion notes. The question was, what are the particular securities on which this $127,000,000 of Dominion notes are issued? The Minister of Finance tells us that, among other things, Dominion of Canada bonds were one of the securities, others being bonds of the Canadian National Railways and assignments of grain and produce. How can grain and produce be used as a basis of currency in Canada?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: What is the last phrase my hon. friend is reading?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): A number of securities are specified, among others, assignments of grain and produce and demand notes of commercial houses endorsed by banks to the order of the Minister of Finance. Now, it was a new idea to me that grain and produce could be used as a basis of issue of notes for circulation in Canada. We were accustomed to the idea that Dominion notes must be based on gold, and I confess it was a rather startling idea to me that bonds of the Canadian Government,—a debt owed by the Government itself—could be used as a basis for the issue of further notes. That, however, is not the question I am asking now. The question is: By what means are grain and produce used as a basis for issuing Dominion notes?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am not entirely conversant with the matter. The Minister of Finance will give more precise information to my hon. friend. But I suppose that these are bankers' securities that they hold. It does not mean that grain in its passage through Canada can be, or is, in any way used as a basis for the issue of Dominion notes. It must mean that notes are issued on the strength of securities which the bankers have. However, I would prefer my hon. friend to take the matter up with the Minister of Finance.

Mr. VIEN: Will the minister please explain these items contained on page Z 12 of the Auditor General's report?

* Advances to George Searls, chief inspector, Winnipeg, $115,711. Advances to George Searls, chief inspector, Winnipeg, $129,445.57.

It seems that the Auditor General's report does not afford much information with regard to the expenditure of this money.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend will quite understand the purpose of these advances. Mr. Searls is chief inspector of the whole of the grain business and has a large staff at Winnipeg working under him. All the samplers, graders, inspectors and clerks who have to carry on this manifold work must be paid, and an advance is put into the bank to the credit of Mr. Searls. When these salary cheques become due he checks out against that advance.

Mr. BELAND: His own personal cheques?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No, the cheques are all official. It may be that his is the last signature, but the cheques are thoroughly conserved as to security.

Mr. VIEN: Are all these employees under Civil Service Commission appointment?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: They are all under Civil Service Commission appointment except those that are not.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That statement sounds superfluous, no doubt, but I will explain the situation to my hon. friend. Those that are not under the Civil Service Commission are nevertheless under a certain regulation; according to the income of the grain at different seasons, or at different periods within active seasons, it is necessary to put on a certain number of temporary employees. Similarly, if a man goes out through sickness or any other cause someone must be put in his place. Now, it is obviously impossible to carry on these operations uninterruptedly if a written request for employees to fill these temporary positions must be sent to the Civil Service Commission. If such written applications were sent to the commission, the positions would have to be advertised, and that, of course, would consume so much time that in the interval the service would be disorganized. Under an arrangement with the Civil Service Commission, the staff officer out there, Mr. Searls, can put on these temporary employees as the necessity for them arises. They cannot be termed permanent because, after a little time, the rush is over and their services are immediately dispensed with. Trouble having become imminent in regard to temporary positions, I requested the Civil Service Commission to send one of their number to Winnipeg. He went into the whole matter with the authorities there, and this arrangement was agreed upon between them and is being carried out under the supervision of the Commission.

Mr. VIEN: What is the system that prevails in the appointment of these temporary employees?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I cannot give complete information regarding the whole modus operandi.

Mr. BELAND: Is it similar to the system in connection with the census?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No.

Mr. VIEN: What is the difference?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I know nothing about the matter so far as the temporary employees are concerned, neither do any of my officers. If Mr. Searls wants a man for any of the reasons I have given, he employs a proper individual who, in his judgment, is fitted for the work. These appointments are absolutely without the least shadow of patronage so far as my department or anybody else is concerned. They are within the entire control of the supervising officer himself.

Mr. VIEN: Who is one of the officers under my right hon. friend?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes; if he were not he would not be there.

Mr. VIEN: Then I am sure this gentleman will take into his serious consideration the advices he receives from my right hon. friend's supporter, the member for the particular locality, when he makes such appointments.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am quite sure, because I have absolute knowledge, that he acts on no recommendations, he takes recommendations from no person whatever. Any one may submit a name to him, but he acts entirely on his own responsibility. I hope my hon. friend will be serious about this matter.

Mr. VIEN: I am.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Two hundred and fifty thousand cars pass through that centre. They have their periods of congestions as also of diminished numbers, and Mr. Searls is absolutely responsible for getting these cars graded and checked through with the very minimum of delay. He is responsible for the grades, because they furnish the basis upon which commercial transactions go on. Being responsible, therefore, he is the only man to decide who these temporary employees shall be.

Mr. BELAND: Does he also settle the question of salaries or remuneration?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The question of remuneration is settled, under those circumstances, on the basis of the current wage for that kind of employment in the locality. That is the wage he pays. But he must have the men, he must carry on the work; and if he cannot get a man that suits him at that wage, he is at liberty to give him what is necessary. And this has the approval of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MAHARG: What opportunity has he for making a comparison with the wage that is paid elsewhere for similar work?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Mr. Searls is in the very centre of the grain business. He has been there, as my hon. friend knows, for a long period of years. He knows what an expert grader gets, and what the current wage is, and I do not know of any person in Winnipeg who would have a deeper or more comprehensive knowledge than he would in regard to the services for which he requires men.

Mr. MAHARG: I quite agree with what my right hon. friend has said because I know Mr. Searls intimately. But my point has reference to the minister's statement that Mr. Searls paid the current wage. Now there is no other similar work being carried on in the city of Winnipeg that I know of—there is only the one inspection bureau.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend must surely be a little bit mistaken in that statement as regards men who are competent to grade grain. The work done in the other elevators, and by the other companies, gives Mr. Searls a line upon which he can base his determination. But outside of that, he knows the man he wants and he gets him by giving him what he considers necessary to obtain his services and to keep them. He also knows thoroughly well the wages that are current in other cities, outside of Canada itself, where graders are used. I do not know any one who would know the facts in that regard better than he.

Mr. MAHARG: I quite admit that Mr. Searls is quite qualified to estimate the ability of the man he is employing, but he has no other similar institution, such as there is elsewhere, which will enable him to make a comparison as to the wages that are paid—there is only the one inspection bureau in Winnipeg. It is different in other places. For example they have an independent inspection bureau on the other side of the line. That is something that we have for a long time been trying to get this Government to establish, but so far without success. I believe there should be a check maintained in that respect. That is why I raise the point.

While we are on the matter of inspection I would like to draw attention to another point. When the salaries in connection with the Grain Act, were under consideration a short time ago the stipend of the individual in charge of the laboratory in Winnipeg was under review. The hour was rather late and I did not press the point at that time, but I now wish to have a little further elucidation. The point arose in connection with the amount of moisture that was allowed in the grain to permit it to enter certain grades. If I remember correctly the minister said that that factor did not enter into the matter of grading to any extent—that the grading was done by the feel, the touch, and the appearance and colour of the grain. In reality the operation of grading goes much further. I believe there is a fixed standard and that 12.8 of moisture is permitted in the grain. Now we in the West have never been able, as yet, to find out just who has been responsible for the fixing of that amount of moisture which is permitted in the grain, other than the chief inspector. No doubt that official takes advice from other individuals. And that is where our quarrel arose. I remember that at a sitting of the Grain Commission held in Winnipeg a few years ago this point came up. We always believed, and experience has proved, that the amount of moisture allowed in grain to enable it to enter storage in certain grades is much below the amount of moisture that grain will carry and keep. That has been proved before; but at the sitting in question representatives of the two largest milling concerns in Canada were present and they were much opposed to the amount of moisture being increased —that is the amount of moisture allowed in the different standards of grain. They claimed that they were continuously having trouble in disposing of their flour to the European buyers on account of the excess of moisture that was in the flour. We, as producers, were absolutely helpless in the face of that argument advanced by two responsible men. However, I took opportunity on the very first occasion that offered to make a little inquiry into the matter. I happened to be in the office of another of the largest milling concerns in Canada, who also have interests in the United States. I asked the manager of this firm if they were exporting large quantities of flour to the Old Country, and he replied in the affirmative. I then asked him if they had any difficulty or any complaint as to the amount of moisture that was contained in their flour, and he replied that they had absolutely never heard of a single complaint from any person. Now that mill was running day and night, including Sundays, on war orders, continuously during the war; and yet those people had received absolutely no complaint at all as to any excess of moisture in their flour milled from practically the same wheat as the other mills were milling from—the different concerns' elevators being scattered over the entire country. Now that is our complaint. There is a difference of anywhere from six to eight and ten cents a bushel in the price paid for grain, as between the straight grade and what is known as "tough." The mills are usually quite anxious to get the grain that is graded tough, as I think the reports of the chemist in Winnipeg if they are examined will show that that grade makes just as good wheat for milling purposes and can be used to as good advantage as even the straight grade. The only difference is the actual weight of the excess of moisture—one-half, one-quarter, or one per cent—which it may contain.

[Mr. Maharg.]

Mr. CURRIE: Has not the wheat got to be passed through a drier, which is an advantage?

Mr. MAHARG: No it does not have to be passed through a drier; it is simply run in with the other grain and there is no drying process—in fact moisture is added to it. Those who understand the milling business know that moisture has to be added to wheat in order to fit it for a proper working. Under the circumstances we would like to have this matter investigated a little further. We do not think that the man who is in charge of the inspection should say just what amount of moisture wheat should contain before it is permitted to enter certain grades. We are especially fortified in that opinion by reason of the evidence given at the sitting to which I alluded, where it was clearly shown that the inspector based his conclusions on the statement of the millers alluded to—statements which were absolutely contradicted by another firm who have practically as large milling interests, and as large an European market, as are possessed by those who appeared before the commission. I would like the minister to take this matter into consideration, as it means a very heavy loss to the farmers of western Canada for no reason whatever.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. MAHARG: Before the vote carries —I notice an item of $350,000 of revenue from the surplus fund of the Board of Grain Supervisors of Canada. I would like to know just how that money has been apportioned? Has it been allotted to assist in meeting the expense of the administration of the Canada Grain Act, or has it gone into the general revenue?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend refers to the surplus that was left over after the Board of Grain Supervisors had finished their work?

Mr. MAHARG: Yes.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That went into the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

Mr. MAHARG: I would like to know if that is the only surplus that has gone into that fund from the handling of grain under the control of the Government at different times.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes. The surplus which remained, after all the accounts have been adjusted and the expenses provided for, went into the Consolidated Revenue Fund. The wheat board has been in charge during the succeeding season, and there will be a certain surplus over and above the expenses after the distribution of the $2.63 a bushel which has already gone into the farmers' hands. That surplus, however, is so small that it is absolutely impracticable to make a division of it amongst the holders of certificates—the expense of making the distribution would be almost as great as the amount to be distributed. But any small surplus will go into Consolidated Revenue Fund. As to whether there are any other surpluses, there were no other methods that I know of by which any could accrue to the Government on the handling of grain. My hon. friend may have sometning in mind, and if he mentions it I will be able to tell him clearly.

Mr. MAHARG: Was there any surplus from the first commandeering of certain quantities of wheat at the head of the lakes?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My impression is there was none. I will make inquiries and let my hon. friend know.

Mr. MAHARG: Am I right in understanding that this large increase of $175,000 in this vote is to provide for salaries under the reclassification?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, that increase arises from reclassification.

Mr. MAHARG: What percentage of the total cost of administration is attributable to salaries?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I can give my hon. friend 1919-1920, which is a full year.

Mr. MAHARG: That is satisfacory.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The statement of expenditure for that year is as follows: Board of Grain Commissioners, salaries $21,200, wages, commissions and contingencies $9,522, making a total for the Board of Grain Commissioners and their staff of $30,722. In the western inspection division the salaries amounted to $219,300; wages and contingencies, $340,389, making a total of $559,691. In the eastern inspection division the total is $13,411. And in the Grain Research Laboratory the total is $9,244. Therefore the total for permanent salaries is $256,052, and for wages and contingencies $357,018, or together $613,070, the total expense of the Act being $925,597.

Mr. MAHARG: One hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars seems a very large increase on a little over six hundred thousand dollars. It would appear as though the Civil Service Commision was a rather expensive institution if its reclassification has resulted in similar increase all the way through.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend will recollect that there are about 400 employees altogether, including temporary and permanent.

Mr. MAHARG: That does not affect the percentage. That percentage is tremendously high. It would be interesting to have comparative results in the case of a similar number of employees in any other department. We have heard both in the House and in the press a good deal about the appointment of a commission of inquiry into the grain trade. Will the expense of that inquiry be taken care of by these figures?

Sir GEORGES FOSTER: That would not come under these figures at all.

Mr. MAHARG: Of course, the appointment of that commission comes, indirectly at least, from the Department of Trade and Commerce?

4 p.m.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I presume so.

Mr. MAHARG: The personnel of that commission is of great interest to us in the West; in fact, the whole inquiry depends on the personnel. I do not know whether we are to pay attention to current rumours or not, but if some of the men whose names are mentioned are to be on that commission, the expenditure entailed will be absolutely thrown away. Among the names mentioned are those of two gentlemen, one a direct member and the other was secretary for years. The most important feature that needs investigation, it seems to me, is the working of that Grain Commission. Certain transactions we would like to have an opportunity of probing, for instance, the famous Curry case—11,000 bushels of wheat went out of one government elevator without anybody knowing anything about it. Now, the Grain Commission is absolutely responsible there, and in the investigation or suit entered to determine the ownership of this quantity of wheat in so far as I can find, not a single individual who had to do with the moving of that wheat from the elevator was called on the carpet. There are other things we would like to inquire into as well.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend will have a full opportunity of criticising the commission when it is appointed, and maybe it would be just as well to wait until that time, as then we will be certain we are criticising the proper parties.

Mr. MAHARG: I am not criticising the proposed commission, I am criticising the grain commission that has been in existence for years. To my mind there is absolutely no use in appointing a commission to inquire into the irregularities that have been mentioned across the floor of the House if the personnel of that commission is to include gentlemen who were or are connected with the Grain Commission which is responsible for some of those irregularities. If there is anything in the rumours I have referred to, the commission certainly will not appeal to the grain trade and the wheat producers in Western Canada.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We will see when the report comes out.

Mr. McKENZIE: Although we are not a grain producing country in Cape Breton we are very much interested in grain and its products, and I would like some further information on the grain question. The minister has been congratulated that notwithstanding the many changes which have taken place in the ministry which he adorns, his own department has been managed so satisfactorily by him that he has continued to remain at its head. For that reason we appeal to him with all the greater confidence for reliable information. I must congratulate the minister upon being able to give information which, whether or not it is always well founded, is pretty well rounded off and stands the test for the time being. Many years ago I suggested that the minister's department should be able to follow the grain through its various stages from the time it left the field until it got into the hands of the consumer and to be able at all times to tell the people whether or not they were getting a square deal. The price of flour at present is abnormal. For many years we got the very best flour available for $5 a barrel, sometimes for $4.50, but now we are paying as high as $16 a barrel, although the income of many men who have to buy that flour is pretty much at a standstill. The people who pay that big price expect their representatives in Parliament to ascertain some of the facts in connection with this very important staple article. I heard the minister say yesterday that the price of wheat had gone down very materially. Is that reduction in the price of wheat to be followed by a reduction in the price of flour? A western man who is very much interested in this business told me the other day that figuring a fair price for flour and counting four and one-half bushels of wheat to a barrel, flour should sell at $8 or $8.50 a barrel. Now, there is an enormous profit somewhere when a barrel which, it is stated, should sell at $8.50 or thereabouts actually sells at $16. The ordinary person has no power to inquire into these things. During the war the people were told that they could complain to their town council or municipal council of any exhorbitant charges made for the necessities of life, with a view to having the matter taken before a magistrate's court. That procedure was not of much avail; it was not productive of any serious results. These things must be dealt with by the machinery of government, and if it is a fact that the price of wheat has gone down and that wages are to some extent going down, the Department of Trade and Commerce should at least make it known authoritatively that there is no justification for these exorbitant and as it would appear to me extortionate, prices of flour. I am well informed that we have no honest competition in any trade in this country; that everything is divided off and that a combine of more or less potentiality exists with respect to all these things. The Government has cut off the head of the Board of Commerce; therefore they have taken the responsibility upon themselves. I bring these matters in all seriousness to the minister's attention in the hope that there shall be no combines, either in connection with grain or the activities of the millers or the wholesaling and retailing of flour, which will make possible the charging of extortionate prices. No one finds fault with the carrying on of business in a proper way and with a view to making legitimate profits, but the people do object to any combine which has the effect of restricting production and keeping up prices. I am sure that the minister has such a knowledge of his department as will enable him to take this matter in hand. It is not one which concerns me personally, because the quantity of flour I buy is very small.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The hon. gentleman eats oats mostly.

Mr. McKENZIE: Yes, I am largely an oats eater. I commend it to my right hon. friend or to anyone else, because it produces the proper kind of pugnacious material. As I say, I bring these matters to the attention of the minister in all seriousness on behalf of thousands of people who buy flour and have families to feed.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Following up the remarks of the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg) may I ask the minister if it is the intention of the Government to appoint a commission to inquire into the grain trade of this country?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There have been rumours that such is in the air, but I think all I can say to my hon. friend is that if a commission is to be appointed, announcement will be made to the House in due course. I cannot give him any other information.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Judging from the minister's answer a commission may or may not be appointed. I think there is no need for such a commission, because the present grain board have every power to investigate all matters pertaining to the grain trade. Why another commission should be appointed at great cost to the country is more than I can understand. Rumour also has it that in connection with the personnel of this commission the name of a member of the present board is mentioned. If anything of that kind is done it would only tend to create dissatisfaction and no good results would be obtained. The appointment of a new commission to deal with matters pertaining to the grain trade, would not, I am sure, meet with the approval of the producers of Western Canada. Unless it is an absolutely independent commission.

Mr. CURRIE: I quite agree that an independent commission should be appointed to investigate the whole matter. For instance, it would be very interesting for the farmers of Western Canada to know why, when the British Government was buying wheat in June last, they could not buy any in Canada, but they bought a whole year's supply in the United States at $3 a bushel, and then when there was no one buying wheat for Great Britain, how it was that wheat was sold short in Chicago and who benefited by that selling short. Those are matters involving $100,000,000. It is of far more importance to the western farmer to have those facts brought out than to have the duty on a binder reduced by fifty cents. Those are matters that should be investigated because, through some person's action, the markets of the world have virtually been closed to Canada, and a great deal of loss has resulted to the farming community, not only in the West, but in Ontario, and we ought to know those facts. I quite agree that no one connected with the ring in the West should be put on any of those commissions. Ontario farmers would like to know why they have to pay a toll on their grain to carry wheat for gentlemen in the West. The Ontario farmer has been taxed so much a bushel for all his grain—I do not know whether he is now—to carry wheat in western elevators. Those are matters affecting farmers in the eastern part of the country; an independent commission would go quite a long distance in straightening out these facts, and the Grain Growers' Company of the West should be the first to welcome an investigation, because there have been some ugly rumours in the East with regard to the conduct of their business.

Mr. MAHARG: How are the Canadian farmers taxed?

Mr. CURRIE: That is what I should like to know. The Ontario farmer was charged two cents a bushel all during the war. He does not carry his grain in an elevator, but there was an elevator charge on all the wheat he sold.

Mr. MAHARG: I think the hon. member will find that that was in the case of grain sold to the mills. There was some dissatisfaction at the start in connection with that, but I think that matter was gradually straightened out. In reply to the first part of the hon. member's remarks, I think I can tell him why the market was closed to Canada. Immediately on the announcement that the Canada Wheat Board would not be continued for another year, the Americans sold their entire surplus of wheat to Great Britain. That was something they would not have dared to do had the wheat board been continued, as they would have known they would have the wheat board to buy from and not a hundred thousand farmers scattered throughout the country. That is the secret of the whole thing, and the hon. member's estimate of $100,000,000 is quite conservative. In my speech in the debate on the Address I stated that we had lost a hundred million dollars and that our adverse balance of trade between Canada and the United States would have been rectified to that extent, had we had the price we would have had if the wheat board had been continued. That is the answer to the whole thing. Immediately the announcement was made that the wheat board would be discontinued, the Americans sold their surplus wheat, knowing they could well replace it, and the Chicago market tells the tale. It was pounded down immediately after that; our markets had to follow, and the result was the Americans got at least $100,000,000 of our good money that we should have got from them for our wheat through the one action of the wheat board being discontinued.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman knows more about this question than I do. I am speaking from information. My knowledge of the facts is simply this, that the hon. gentleman and his followers in the grain exchange in the West have been fighting for open markets and free trade for years. They fought the Government last year, and then the action of the Government in regard to the wheat question turned out to be all right. Last year I challenged the hon. member, as a matter of protection, to fix a price for the farmers, and he refused to do so. This year they fought for an open market and they got it. What happened? Great Britain came into the market last June to buy her wheat, but there was no person in Canada to sell our wheat to her. If we had had a grain board, it could have sold the whole Canadian crop for $3 a bushel, but there was no one functioning for Canada. Then the British buyers went to the United States, and they could get people in that country who sold them 180,000,000 bushels in June last. That shut out the Canadian farmer from foreign markets except in the United States. Then these gentlemen, knowing that the needs of the market had been fulfilled as regards the United States' and Canada's crop, and knowing that the British would not be buyers for six months, pounded the market; the grain gamblers in Winnipeg sold fall wheat in Chicago at from $2.80 to $3 a bushel, and then they turned round and hammered the western farmer and covered their trades at around $1.50 a bushel, pocketing the difference. An investigation of the whole matter would enlighten the country a great deal as to the way in which those agricultural philanthropists do business with their friends.

Mr. MAHARG: My hon. friend (Mr. Currie) is right in part when he states that the grain exchange was asking for an open market, but he is entirely wrong when he says that the farmers were asking for an open market a year ago.

Mr. CURRIE: I did not say that the farmers were, but hon. gentlemen opposite, who represent the Agrarian group and the Grain Growers, were yelling for an open market all the time.

Mr. MAHARG: The hon. member is absolutely wrong. Hansard will prove, without any words of mine what attitude I took. I do not need to say a word; the hon. member can look at Hansard. Within three months after the board was first appointed, its continuance was asked for unanimously, without a complaint, at a shareholders' annual meeting of the largest elevator company in Western Canada, and that action was followed up right along to the day that the wheat board was discontinued. Every western organization, not only the associations, but the commercial companies as well, asked for the continuance of the wheat board. So that the the hon gentleman's statement that the farmers or those representing them wanted an open market, is absolutely wide of the mark, as everything published goes to prove that they were unanimously in favour of its continuance. Immediately they saw the personnel of the commission they said: That is the board we want; we want it continued just as long at least as there is controlled buying in the Old Country.

Mr. MORPHY: What does the hon. member mean by "open trading"?

Mr. MAHARG: Trading on the exchange.

Mr. MORPHY: What did the sellers on the grain exchange want?

Mr. MAHARG: They did not want a closed market at all; they wanted the gambling that has been going on. If my hon. friend has followed the workings of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange—

Mr. MORPHY: I do not follow gambling practices.

Mr. MAHARG: I did not say "if the hon. member followed the practices;" I said "if he followed the workings of the market." I do not think, for a moment, the hon. gentleman would indulge in practices such as that; but as a citizen of Canada and a consumer of flour, he should take an interest in knowing why the dealers charged practically as much for their flour when the mills bought their wheat at $1.50 or even as low as $1.25 a bushel as when they paid $4 a bushel for it. The difficulty in this country is that the consumers are not taking the interest they should take in the matter. A very pertinent question for the consumer to ask is why they were charged the same price for flour when the wheat that it takes to make a barrel of flour was bought for $6 to $7, as they were charged when it cost possibly $20 for the same quantity of wheat. The hon. member should be interested in the matter as he is a consumer of flour, or he would not have the healthy appearance he has to-day.

Mr. CURRIE: The whole trouble with this open market is simply this. The man who headed the commission, Dr. Magill, came down here and preached and talked four-dollar wheat.

Mr. HENDERS: Five-dollar wheat.

Mr. CURRIE: Yes, four and five and six-dollar wheat. He quit this Government and was going to take charge of the grain exchange business in Winnipeg. Things were very rosy then. But six months before, the boys in the West had been using their grain certificates to light their pipes at poker games. A man would light a ten-dollar certificate at the candle thinking it was of no use whatever, and as a matter of fact they turned out to be worth real money, something like 63 cents, if I mistake not.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The difference between 15 cents and 63 cents.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): They were very useful anyhow. I kept mine.

Mr. CURRIE: Somebody has made a tremendous loss. The Agrarian party have been pusyfooting this way and that. You never can tell where they stand on any question, and I think it is well to have an investigation to find out what was at the bottom of all this. When Dr. Magill was preaching five-dollar wheat, did any of the Agrarian party say, No, the whole world is buying—as nations, there is no individual buying? It was the nations that were buying the grain, just as they are to-day. Great Britain bought grain as a nation, so did France and all the other countries, so the only rational way was to trade in grain as a nation. No objection was raised to the open market. I did not see them parading any brass bands around or sending in any petitions against open marketing. Through the lack of common sense of the Agrarian group the farmers of this country lost $100,000,000, and we ought to have an investigation to find out what is at the bottom of it.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Steele): I would draw the attention of the committee to the fact that the item under consideration is the administration of the Canada Grain Act. I think the discussion that has taken place is not relevant to the item and I would ask hon. members to confine their remarks more closely to the item before us.

Mr. MAHARG: I would be quite prepared to do so, but the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) has made an accusation against the Agrarian group to which, in all fairness, I think I should be allowed to reply.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Steele): We had better adhere to the item under consideration at the present time. There will be other opportunities to reply.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Surely all this is connected with the grain business. I think we should be allowed a little latitude in the matter. We have not been very troublesome in this corner.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Steele): I thought I had already allowed very considerable latitude, but perhaps the committee will not object to the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg) being allowed a reply; then we will return to the item under consideration.

Mr. MAHARG: I thank you, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member for North Simcoe stated that when Dr. Magill, the secretary of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange, and other officers were here telling the people they would get $5 for their wheat, no one in the Agrarian group protested. Now at that very time they were sitting in the galleries here when I protested just as strongly as I could against the market being opened. I wish the hon. member would keep closer tab on what is being done, but perhaps he may be excused, for even his leader made the statement that the continuance of the wheat board had never been asked for—either on the floor of the House or outside. I did not want to let my hon. friend's statement go unchallenged, for we did protest, and Hansard will show just what I said in respect to the gentleman who was sitting in the gallery and had been there month after month.

Mr. MORPHY: The hon. member for Maple Creek has disclosed the fact that he desired a closed market in wheat for the purpose of increasing the price.

Mr. MAHARG: I must absolutely object to that statement. The hon. member is simply putting words into my mouth that I did not use.

Mr. MORPHY: I take it that that is the only logical deduction from the cry he made, because the market was not kept closed. He says the effect of opening it was to lower the price of wheat. At the same time he complains very much because the poor consumer has to pay so much for his flour. His argument is that the high price of wheat should be kept up for the Agrarians, so that the poor consumer can get flour at a lower cost. Such a proposition is absolutely ridiculous. It just shows the insincerity of the hon. gentleman, who is always clamouring in this House for free trade in implements and everything else, but who, when it comes to a question of his own bread basket, through wheat, says: Don't open the market; close it tight, so that we can make all the money we can, and by increasing the price of our wheat we will give the poor consumer cheaper bread. Did any one ever hear anything more ridiculous?

Mr. MAHARG: Facts cannot be disputed. My hon. friend will find that he has been paying for his flour lately just about what he paid when wheat was nearly three times the price it was at one time this grain season. My hon. friend from North Perth says that we asked for the open market in wheat. We never asked for any such thing. What we were talking of was trade on the exchanges in Canada.

Mr. CURRIE: Yes, but the hon. gentleman—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Steele): I must again ask hon. members to make their remarks relevant to the item under consideration.

Mr. CURRIE: I was going to speak to the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Steele): Order. The rule reads:

> Speeches in Committee of the Whole must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

I think the committee quite realize that the discussion recently has not been strictly relevant to the item under consideration, and it is only for the purpose of expediting the business of the House that I now ask hon. members to confine their remarks to the item before us, which is the administration of the Grain Act.

Mr. CURRIE: We were discussing nothing but the operation of that Act. If we are to be limited to a discussion of what may happen in connection with this item in the coming year, the ruling of the Chair is all right, but I have never yet seen a Chairman in this House who was bold enough to close a discussion on what happened in connection with the item under consideration the previous year. It is the past year's operations we are discussing now, not what is going to be done in connection with this item this year. We are not projecting ourselves into the future, but endeavouring to discuss what happened in the past, which is of very great importance to this country.

Just one word in reply to the hon. member for Maple Creek. It is quite safe to say that if anybody hunts through Hansard he will find him on both sides of every question that ever comes up affecting the Agrarian party. You will find his leader on the one side, and perhaps my hon. friend on the other, just to ease up matters, so that if anything goes wrong, one of them will be able to say: We did not take that position. I challenge my hon. friend to show that his party or his leader took a decided stand against the open market. The reason they did not was that they were interested personally in having an open market. I say that a commission should be appointed to investigate and find the nigger in the woodpile.

Mr. MAHARG: I must take direct issue with the statement of my hon. friend that I have been on both sides of every question. I defy him to show by Hansard where at any time I have taken both sides of any one question. That I took one side while my leader took the other is not the question. The statement I originally rose to object to was that the Agrarian party had taken no action either in this House or outside when there was this talk of five-dollar wheat.

Mr. COWAN: I do not agree with the hon. member for Maple Creek, and I do not believe that any one has ever said that that statement was not made on the other side. I think you could get quite a few in the Agrarian party throughout the west to agree with the member for Maple Creek, but my position is that that hon. gentleman does not speak for the Agrarian party. They have a chosen leader, and when the Prime Minister challenged him he did not say he was in favour of the wheat board. He said most unequivocally that he was strongly opposed to its continuance. Then what happened? That same hon. gentleman who has been chosen as leader in this House of the Agrarian party went to Manitoba and Saskatchewan, in both of which places he was acclaimed the leader of the party. Within the last few months, since he made that statement in the House, he went to Saskatchewan and was chosen as their leader, and then he went to Alberta where he was also welcomed by that party and where his policy was endorsed. He is the leader of the party and speaks for it, and in that capacity he declared he was strongly opposed to the continuance of the wheat board. The hon. member cannot deny it, and I refuse him the right to speak for the party until he is chosen by them to express their views.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): To be fair, the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Cowan), should quote what my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) said.

Mr. COWAN: I will get Hansard in a moment.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): Keep quiet; you have not the floor all the time.

Mr. CURRIE: It is up to hon. gentlemen to prove the position they take.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): The hon. member for Marquette said that he did not want the wheat board continued as a permanent thing.

Mr. MAHARG: That is the point.

Mr. THOMSON: He never said that he was opposed to the continuance of it at that particular time; he was opposed to it as a permanent policy. Now, let the hon. member for Regina be fair or pretty nearly fair; at least, let him be as fair as he can.

Mr. CURRIE: When an hon. member rises in his place and challenges a statement it is up to him to produce Hansard.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): Nothing of the kind.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I want to help the minister with his Estimates, but I think they are being obstructed badly at present by his own followers, who are straying quite a distance in the debate on this point. With regard to the attempt to expose the woebegone condition of opinion in the small Progressive group, I think my hon. friends are raising a tremendous tempest in a very little teapot. Why, Sir, it is one of the glories of this group that there is some independence of thought in it. In the last divisions in this House we have been the only group to show that it has capacity to divide on great issues of public importance. We never see that quality on the part of my hon. friend from Regina, nor is it often displayed by the member for Simcoe (Mr. Currie). However, let that go by the board. With regard to the position of the wheat board, I take it that we can all get our thoughts into a very narrow and satisfactory compass. I venture to think that there is not a single gentleman in this House who believes that the wheat board was to be a permanent institution in this country. I venture to assert that, and I do not observe anyone rise to say he considered that it should be permanent. It was an immediately post-war arrangement. There were differences of opinion amongst all thoughtful men as to the exact time at which the wheat board's operations should be suspended. There were differences of opinion in this group. My own view about the wheat board is that it is impossible to prove exactly that it was ever of any use to the western farmers. That is my own individual view. During the war anyone could sell at a high price wheat or anything else which the Allies wanted. I make that statement in support of my previous assertion. The same possibility of a difference of opinion arises in regard to the effect of the suspension of the board. Everyone knows that agricultural prices were bound to descend within a reasonable time after the close of the war. During the war, on my own farm in the West, we never took less than 50 cents a dozen for eggs; within the last few months—greatly to the benefit of consumers in this country, I hope,—eggs have gone down to 20 cents a dozen, that is all we are getting now. I suppose the operations of the wheat board have nothing to do with eggs at twenty cents.

Mr. SMITH: Thirty cents.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): My hon. friend is probably informed in regard to Ontario. His information on agricultural matters is no doubt wide, but he cannot correct me in any statement as to what the people in my part of the country are getting for eggs. I congratulate him that he is getting ten cents more. Now, as to my hon. friend's (Mr. Crerar's) position with regard to the wheat board, I am not at all sure that he ever made a definite statement. As I say, there were great differences of opinion as to whether or not it should be continued for another year. The Government was in great difficulties. I for one never attempted to increase those difficulties because I sympathized with them, as I did in all reasonable cases where those difficulties arose from the prosecution of the war. Why is my hon. friend from North Simcoe trying to mix up the question of free trade and free exchanges with the wheat board and differences of opinion on that subject? Where does he want to get to? What is he proving? I submit that all he is doing is retarding the Estimates of the minister, and I do think we had better help my right hon. friend along.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The member for Regina (Mr. Crerar) made a definite statement that the leader of this group had opposed the reappointment of the Canada Wheat Board. Now, in my speech on the address, I quoted from the speech of the leader of this party the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), in regard to this enabling legislation as introduced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, when this subject was before the House last session, and I shall read that extract. The original statement of the hon. member for Marquette may be found at page 4119, volume 5 of Hansard of last session:

> Everyone who knows anything of the European situation must realize that conditions there are very unstable, and in those circumstances I think, perhaps, there is justification for the Government assuming the power which they are asking for under this legislation.

That is a direct contradiction to the charge made by the member for Regina. Regarding the stand taken on this matter by the hon. member for Marquette, hon. T. A. Crerar.

Mr. CURRIE: What I said was that the hon. member was on both sides of the question. His whole speech was for open markets, but he concluded by saying at the end that on the whole the board might be continued for a time.

Mr. VIEN: This discussion has demonstrated the difficulties that arise from the application of a vicious principle. To my mind the motive that prompted the institution of the wheat board was both vicious in principle and unjust in application. As the hon. member for Red Deer has said, I doubt very much whether it was of any use to the farmers. But we must admit that it was established at the instance of at least some sections of the agrarian community.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. VIEN: It was surely not the eastern provinces that insisted on the institution of the wheat board. Why is it vicious? It is vicious because by it the state instead of private enterprise undertook the marketing of wheat crops.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Does my hon. friend not recognize that in war the state must be the chief actor in a great many fields of activity, a role which it would not play in time of peace.

Mr. VIEN: No. Not as generally as the hon. gentleman has just said, and not in this particular instance because my hon. friend has just shown that there was such a demand for wheat that time that there was no difficulty in marketing the western crop.

Mr. HENDERS: How then do you explain this fact: On the average we in Canada sold our wheat at a lower price than the Americans sold theirs. But during the operation of the wheat board the Americans operated on the open market and we under the wheat board, and got more money for our wheat than our neighbours across the line got for theirs.

Mr. VIEN: It does not matter at all; it has no relation whatever to the principle I am now discussing.

Mr. HENDERS: It has, absolutely.

Mr. VIEN: The fact that it had or had not that effect has nothing to do with the principle which underlies this question. All sections of the farming interest in Canada might have asked the Government for some assistance—the farmers of the province of Quebec, or the farmers of the province of Ontario, who grow potatoes, or hay, or any other kind of farm produce, could have come to the Government and said "organize a hay board, organize a potato board, so that when the crop is collected we may go to some government warehouse, or elevator, get a certificate and ask the government to finance our whole crop." Such a system is unjust, it is vicious, and it placed on the whole community a risk which the community should never have accepted. The wheat board fixed a minimum price of $2.15 for the wheat crop of the western fields. It is true that at that time $2.15 was quite a safe margin. But we were not under normal conditions, and it was possible for the wisest man to make an error in judging what would be the market price for wheat four or five months afterwards. Then having fixed $2.15 as a minimum price to be paid the grain growers for their wheat the whole community would have had to stand a loss if the market price had fallen to $1.75, or some other lower figure. I say, this is a vicious principle; and the whole difficulty into which the Government was plunged in judging whether the wheat board should be continued or discontinued, arose from the application of that principle. It shows that a vicious principle should never be introduced into legislation to help in the solving of an immediate difficulty, because it always creates a greater difficulty and it at least creates a wrong precedent. Neither in the case in question nor in any other case should vicious principles be adopted in our legislation.

Mr. COWAN: I was challenged by hon. gentlemen opposite to quote from Hansard anything which would show that the leader of the Agrarian party was opposed to the establishment or the continuance of the wheat board last year, and to its continuation as a permanent policy. This subject was under discussion for a considerable period last session. The present Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) who was then leading the Government, correctly appreciated the situation. He saw that the Agrarian party were not taking a very definite stand on this matter and he challenged them to do so in these words:

I did not say I was closing the debate. I earnestly hope I have prodded these hon. gentlemen opposite—

That is the Agrarian party, sitting opposite—

—tc speak their minds. I was very much afraid that the debate was going to close without a word from them.

Following that the member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) took the floor, and during his speech he used the words which the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston) has quoted to-day. But I wish to draw attention to the very unfair method followed by that hon. gentleman. The hon. member gave a quotation from his leader's speech, but he neglected to cite the qualifying language he employed and which I now propose to read. The hon. member for Marquette, the leader of the Agrarian party said:

I think the Minister of the Interior furnished the only argument that constitutes a real reason why the board should be continued for another year, and that is the possibility of unified buying again in Europe.

These are the qualifying words which my hon. friend from Last Mountain did not read:

At the present time that is not the case.

Now the hon. gentleman (Mr. Crerar) meant that if there was unified buying in Europe he would continue the board for this year. At present there is not unified buying and therefore what is the only conclusion you can draw from the hon. gentleman's statement? It is that he was opposed to the continuance of the wheat board for last year. Having taken that attitude very definitely with respect to one year what does the leader of the Agrarian party say with respect to the Board's continuance as a permanent policy:

Personally I am opposed entirely to any permanent policy that meants the control of the marketing of grain in this country.

Could you have anything more definite than that? "There is no unified buying in Europe for this year consequently we do not need the wheat board and as a permanent policy I am opposed to it." There is no equivocation about that, it is straight opposition from beginning to end, and the hon. member was quite unfair in refraining from reading the expressions of opinion on the part of the hon. member for Marquette which I have just quoted.

Mr. GOULD: This question has again come to the front owing to members on the Government side endeavouring to fasten the responsibility, upon the Agrarian group in connection with this matter. Despite all their efforts I do not think they have succeeded in converting the majority of members of this House to their belief; neither have they persuaded the people throughout the country that they are right, and after all they are the persons that are most interested. When this question was last under consideration a certain hon. member refused to answer a question that I put to him and the incident thereupon closed. However the subject has once more come to the surface, and perhaps it is well now to thoroughly ventilate the matter. But why, may I ask, do hon. gentlemen opposite endeavour to place the responsibility upon the Agrarian group, because we are not the dominating party in this House?

Mr. VIEN: At whose request was the wheat board instituted?

Mr. GOULD: I believe that the Government and their supporters were responsible.

Mr. VIEN: But at whose request did they act?

Mr. GOULD: Not at mine, for I was not in the House. However the point is, hon. gentlemen opposite were so wise they persuaded the Government that this was good legislation. They were able to forecast events so accurately they knew it was going to be a success. Being convinced of the likelihood of its successful operation they urged the Government to continue the operation of the board. At that time public opinion in the country was favourable to the continuation of the wheat board. Yet hon. members opposite are endeavouring to saddle members of the small Agrarian group with the responsibility of their action. Their conduct demonstrates that at one time they were shivering with indecision and they were not then so sure of their ground as they now appear to be, and they are indulging in all sorts of insinuations with respect to us which will not do us the least bit of harm. We try to reflect public opinion. I have done so since I became a member of this House. Speaking directly at the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders) who made the assertion that wheat in the United States sold for a less price than our wheat sold for under the wheat board, you might, Sir, remember this fact, that in United States by far the greater proportion of the total crop is soft wheat and should not equal our hard wheat in price. Therefore it is not fair to draw a comparison in that way. I can tell the hon. gentleman from personal knowledge that the hard wheats of North Dakota and Minnesota sold for a higher price than our wheat realized under the wheat board, and I have figures to substantiate my statement. Further than that, the assertion that was made—

Mr. HENDERS: I beg to state—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. GOULD: I am just answering the assertion made that I was diametrically opposed to the wheat board. I want to say that if I lived close to the international boundary, and an open market obtained under the same conditions as prevailed in the fall of 1919, and if I had an opportunity to take my wheat across the international boundary, I would still take my chance of selling my wheat as an individual; but in the interests of wheat growers in the large areas far removed from the international boundary I would support the continuance of the wheat board. But I do know, as I said in my speech on the Address, in the first speech I made in this House, that the individual who went across the line and accepted the Americans' money got thirty cents, seventy cents and as high as a dollar more than was received by the farmer who lived north of the imaginary line along the forty-ninth parallel of latitude. From this would be deducted the value of the participation certificate—48 cents a bushel.

The fact that the wheat board was not reconstituted last year, with the resultant loss of $100,000,000 to western farmers, which I think is very close to the mark, is the very reason why manufacturing establishments in Eastern Canada are closed to-day. The people who require the implements manufactured in those establishments have not got the money they expected to have from their crops, and consequently they are not purchasing. Conditions were upset by the action of the Government in allowing the wheat board to pass out of existence. Why are factories in Eastern Canada full of implements and obliged to shut down? It is because the people have not got the money with which to buy those implements, which were manufactured in anticipation that the purchasing public would require them.

I would like to ask the minister a question about the personnel of the proposed commission of inquiry into the grain business. Assuming such a commission is to be appointed, will the names be submitted to the House before the commissioners are actually appointed?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Steele): Order. I must call attention again to the fact that the matter under discussion is not the appointment of a commission to investigate the grain business, but an item regarding the administration of the Canada Grain Act. It is quite out of order on this item to discuss the appointment of any proposed commission of inquiry.

Mr. GOULD: Mr. Chairman, with all deference I would say that this commission would have to enquire whether the Canada Grain Act had been wrongly administered. I therefore wish to ask, in case such a commission of inquiry be appointed would the names of the proposed commissioners be given to the members of the House before they are actually appointed, so that we may have an opportunity to discuss the merits or demerits of the proposed appointees?

5 p.m.

Mr. CURRIE: Now, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. GOULD: May I have an answer from the minister?

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. minister cannot answer that question because the matter involved is not before the committee. This is not our fight, it was started by the hon. member from Maple Creek, and we do not want to retire from the field without having the subject very thoroughly threshed out.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Finish the fight.

Mr. CURRIE: The most pithy saying in the debate last year on this question was the statement of the leader of the Grain Growers' party, which has been quoted already, and I will quote it again. He said:

> I think the Minister of the Interior furnished the only argument that constitutes a real reason why the Board should be continued for another year, and that is, the possibility of unified buying again in Europe.

Then he deliberately misleads the House in order to make his point—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. CURRIE: He said—

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I submit that my hon. friend is out of order in charging any hon. member with deliberately misleading the House.

Mr. CURRIE: I said that he was misleading the country.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I say further, Sir, that my hon. friend is the only gentleman who would prefer such a charge, even if it were in order, against the hon. member for Marquette in his absence.

Mr. CURRIE: Yes, I am very sorry the hon. member for Marquette is not here to take his gruel. But I did not say he deliberately misled the House—

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Chairman, I must ask for your ruling on the point of order. My hon. friend charged the hon. member for Marquette with deliberately misleading the House.

Mr. CURRIE: I said he deliberately misled the country, not the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, you said the House.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Steele): If the hon. member did not charge the hon. member for Marquette with misleading the House, he is in order; otherwise he is not.

Mr. CURRIE: Then I will withdraw the remark and say that he deliberately misled the country, because he made a statement that there was no unified buying in Europe. As a matter of fact, unified buying in Europe continues to-day. Greece within the last week has bought four million or five million bushels of wheat in the United States. Great Britain has purchased all her wheat as a nation since the war and is doing so to-day. Lord Lee bought 180,000,000 bushels of wheat in the States last June. Why did he not buy here? Because we had no grain board to arrange credits with him for the purchase of such a large amount of grain. I say that by taking the deliberate action which they did the Agrarian group enabled the western grain speculators to sell wheat short in Chicago at from $2.80 to $3.00 a bushel, and then to kick the props from under the markets in the West and fill their orders with Canadian grain at $1.50. That touched the pockets of the farmers in the West, not the pockets of the grain operators or speculators there. Knowing as they did that the requirements of the British market were filled, and there would be no buying for six months or a year, they were the only people in the market and they put the wheat price down to the point I have stated, and their action cost the country about one hundred million dollars —perhaps I should not say it cost this country quite that amount, because I think some of these gentlemen got away with a lot of that money. I think we should have a commission to investigate who was at the bottom of selling out the western farmer and the eastern farmer. It has caused a lot of trouble to our agriculturists, and the gentlemen opposite very well know that they are being held responsible for the low prices by the farmers in the West.

Mr. McMASTER: "Angularly opposite."

Mr. CURRIE: Yes. The hon. member for Brome, of course, did not put himself on record on this question. But the leader of the Agrarian group, I say, misled the country in that statement—whether he misled this House or not—when he said that there was no unified buying in Europe. There was unified buying in Europe. He said he was in favour of a wheat board if there was unified buying in Europe, and then he said there was not unified buying, therefore the inference is that he wanted an open market. There was unified buying in Europe at that time, and there is to-day. Somebody has been misled and we must place the onus where it belongs. Hon. gentlemen "angularly opposite" expressed great perturbation at the suggestion that this commission of investigation should be appointed. I hope that the Government will have the courage to appoint it and find out who has been digging into the markets out there, who has been selling short, who has been getting the difference betweeen the $3 and the $1.50 which the Western farmer got. I do not hesitate to say that if the wheat board had been in existence last June the whole Canadian crop could have been sold by the board at $3 a bushel. The attitude taken by the representatives, so-called, of the Western Agrarians, has cost the farmers of the West $100,000,000, and that will require a lot of explanation on the part of my hon. friends when they go to their constituencies in the West.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I do not want to prolong this discussion; certainly I do not want to take up the extremely rash and unfounded statement of my hon. friend.

Mr. CURRIE: Now, I want a ruling, Mr. Chairman, because I have read the facts from Hansard, and I think I understand the English language as well as my hon. friend.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): My hon. friend cannot prove, nobody else can prove, that $100,000,000 has been lost to the farmers of the West. It passes human proof; it is purely a matter of opinion on the part of my hon. friend.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. member to your right (Mr. Maharg) said so to-day.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): My hon. friend must open his ears, and to do that he needs sometimes to close his month. It is not usual in this House for two gentleman to talk at the same time. I want to point out to him that I listened with the utmost patience to what he said. I say now that neither he nor any person else can prove that the farmers lost $100,000,000 or any money at all by the dropping of the wheat board. I have given reasons for having believed that the prices of all agricultural products would drop within two years after the conclusion of the war. I, myself knew they would, because I have informed myself reasonably about the history of other wars and what happened when they were over. If I may be so personal, I may tell my hon. friend that in my little business on a farm in the West, which consists largely in the handling of cattle, I handled my cattle accordingly and sold them down very largely, knowing that the high prices of the war would not continue. I have previously given my hon. friend the instance of the drop in eggs; I could do it in regard to butter. It happens in regard to every kind of agricultural produce and in my opinion it was sure to happen in regard to wheat whether you had the wheat board or not. That is my opinion; my hon. friend holds a different view. I can tell him why agricultural produce falls, if he would like to know, and why it falls faster than manufactured goods do. Agricultural products cannot fall back upon the artificial aid of a tariff. That is why the farmers are the first hit. Yet I had to give $10 this morning for a pair of boots of a kind which I could have bought for $6 even after the war started. And so all along the line. I repeat that my hon. friend cannot prove—it is a matter of opinion—that the farmers of the West have lost $100,000,000. If they have, I want to say that there was nothing in the very careful and statesmanlike utterances of the hon. member from Marquette, which my hon. friend has read, to indicate that his attitude contributed in any degree to that loss. The Minister of Trade and Commerce will agree with me that the last and final responsibility for dropping the board for one year or carrying it on for another year rested with the Government of the day. The board was not suspended while Parliament was sitting; if my recollection is right, it was suspended after Parliament had prorogued. It was done by the Act of the Government. Now, it is not I, it is one of the followers of the Government, who says that the suspension of the board has cost the farmers of the West $100,000,000. If that be so, let him settle his charge with the minister whose Estimates are under discussion, who represents the Government for the moment; because he ought to realize by this time that his charge is directed, and directed solely, against the Government of the day. But if I could have proof of what my hon. friend believes so easily without proof, I certainly think he would have added an important reason for looking carefully into the votes that may arise during this session as to the advisability of keeping this Government in power a moment longer. Every question that comes up for a vote would be influenced mightily by a consideration such as my hon. friend has raised. I did not raise it; my hon. friend raised it. But I do want to clear my hon. leader's reputation, if it needed it. His statements were of the most careful kind. And I want to tell my hon. friend something more: the wheat board has no existence in the political platform of the Dominion Council of Agriculture, the tariff platform which is the platform of this party. My hon. friend expresses great anxiety about how my hon. leader will clear himself with the farmers of the West when an election comes on. Well now, I really think there are parts of this House where there is more anxiety about what is going to happen when an election takes place than there is in the bosom of my leader. But in case my hon. friend is really and sincerely exercised about the chances of my hon. friend from Marquette in an election, let me assure him that he will be able to take care of himself among the farmers of the West, so far as I know anything about it.

Mr. CURRIE: Now, Mr. Chairman, we have heard the ipse dixit of the hon. gentleman; we all have to take our little licking from him. But he must have been asleep during the early part of this discussion, otherwise he would have heard the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg), sitting on his right, make the statement that the loss was $100,000,000. I am only repeating hearsay; I do not know for a fact whether it was $100,000,000 or not. I do say, though, that this House, and I among the members of this House, have looked largely to the hon. member for Marquette for light and leading on this grain question. It is a national question, and a very serious one. When he made the statement in this House last year that he believed in a board, in national selling, as it were, when there was unified or national buying, and that there was no national buying, the inference was that it was his opinion that the board should be dissolved. At the very time he made that statement he must have known that the facts were entirely different. You cannot play fast and loose with the people all the time. But my hon. friend's information was wrong; his lack of knowledge in respect to the very question upon which he should have been informed has led this country to a loss of fully $100,000,000, as has been expressed by one of his own followers. For that reason, and as there is some difference of opinion as to the way in which the grain board, with which he is connected, functions, and as there are questions that need to be asked of the grain board, I say again that the Government would be well justified in appointing a commission to go into this whole question and to fix the responsibility for the great loss which the country has sustained. We want to know the facts. The farmers to-day are not getting a better deal than they were getting before. The facts of the matter are simply these. There is just a small group selling fish, and they are calling everybody else's fish no good. They are dealing only in a particular brand of politics, and in view of the disastrous agrarian policies of Townley in North Dakota, which are of a similar character, this should lead this country seriously to investigate matters and ascertain whether the policies of the group represented by hon. gentlemen opposite are the best policies for the country, or whether they are only preaching socialism in a mild form. I have quoted the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), and his statement cannot be denied; I took it from Hansard; I took his word for it, and I think the Government took his word for it, because we knew if anybody should be interested in the farmers' affairs, he should. When we took his advice, we found that he was misinformed or he misled somebody deliberately, and the results have been disastrous to the farmers, so that if anybody is to blame for those results, he and his followers must be blamed.

Mr. DAVIS: May I refer for a moment to an expression used by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie), that is, as to unified buying? Last year I supported the Government in its policy as to the grain board. I thought it was wise that the Government should have the power to go on or to quit as, in its judgment and upon its responsibility, it decided. I think that probably was the position of the hon. member for Marquette. Unified buying at that time by Europe meant this, that all the buying was done by England and that the proceeds were distributed amongst the various countries in the order of their requirements. But that had ceased at the time we were discussing this, and instead there was buying by each country separately. One of the problems before the Government was this, that it must decide whether that buying by separate countries was going to offer a field or area of competition as would still give us prices that would justify us in opening the market. Apparently it did not entirely do that. I am, however, inclined to deal charitably with the Government with regard to its decision on that matter; but nevertheless the form of the term as used by the hon. member for Simcoe North entirely misplaces the judgment used by the hon. member for Marquette with regard to the system of buying, and I think the latter's opinion was clearly understood at the time, although it may since have been forgotten by the House and, of course, by the country.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): A quotation has been given from Hansard of a speech delivered by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar). I see the quotation stops at a very convenient place to suit the purposes of the hon. gentleman who made it. Had he gone further, it would have knocked the foundation from his argument. I follow directly after what has been read:

> While during the years of the war the Royal Commission on wheat supplies in London had the practical control of the buying of wheat, and other cereals for that matter, since the Armistice has been signed the various countries in Europe have each organized its own government buying agency. At least, this is very largely the case; some of the neutral countries are getting back to old conditions of trade. Every one who knows anything of the European situation must realize that conditions there are very unstable, and in these circumstances I think, perhaps, there is justification for the Government assuming the power which they are asking for under this legislation.

If you take that altogether, the action of the Government had not the opposition at least of the hon. member for Marquette; it had his support. More than that, I think I am right in saying that, when the matter came before the House, there was not a single vote in opposition to it, certainly not by the hon. member for Marquette. If he had been opposed to it, he would have so voted, because we know the hon. member for Marquette is not in the least afraid to say what he thinks—if all the rest of the House were just as ready to give expression to their opinions as he has been, whether that helps or hurts him, the House would be conducted in a different way from what it is. Let me repeat what was said by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark). At the time this House prorogued the power for which the Government had asked was in their hands; they had enabling legislation to do what was required. They decided themselves, with that enabling legislation before them. Almost as soon as they got rid of Parliament, they decided that they would not have anything to do with the wheat board, and on them the responsibility rests.

Mr. MAHARG: The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Vien) stated that the organization of a board of control of any kind, or words to that effect, was a vicious principle.

Mr. VIEN: May I take the liberty of correcting my hon. friend? I did not say the organization of a board of any kind; I said the organization of a wheat board under the provisions of the statute enacted for that purpose, as the statute reads.

Mr. MAHARG: I am quite prepared to accept the statement, but that does not affect the point that I wish to raise. The hon. member wished to know at whose instigation this was brought about, or words to that effect. The impression that his remarks would leave on the House is that the farmers themselves asked for control in the matter of the marketing of wheat. I believe that is a fair inference to draw from his remarks.

Mr. VIEN: Yes.

Mr. MAHARG: The original control in the fixing of price for the marketing of Canada's wheat during the war was never asked for by the farmers at all.

Mr. VIEN: Could the hon. member inform me who instigated the organization of the wheat board?

Mr. MAHARG: It is not the question of the wheat board I am touching now; it is the original action of the Government in taking control of the marketing of wheat, —the wheat board is an after-consideration. The original control that was taken was not asked for by the farmers at all at any time; in fact, the opposite was the case. The minister himself will remember very well that when the original action was taken he asked that representatives of the western farmers should meet him in conference in this city, and we did so. And he will also remember that I opposed this action very strenuously unless he was prepared to take similar action in regard to the necessities that enter into the production of the grain, that is, to take control of the price the farmer should pay for his implements of production, his labour and so on. If they were going to control the price he was to receive, it was only fair that they should, in a measure, control the price it would cost him to produce.

The minister will remember that was my attitude. The point is, the Government having taken control, having stepped in, having broken down the organization, credits and such like, and having established that control, we believed in all fairness, some method of control should be continued. We did not ask the Government to appoint the wheat board. Committees from this House waited on the Minister of Finance from time to time, and they did not state any definite opinion whatever, but they asked him to institute some measure of control over wheat. This was absolutely refused. The question of the wheat board, however, is an after-consideration and only arose out of conditions that had been created by the Government stepping in and taking control in the first place. Just where the instigation came from I am not prepared to say, and I am not objecting to it at all, but I believe it came from the allied countries in order that they might get control of the distribution of wheat. In fact, the chairman of the wheat executive in London told me there were only two reasons for it, one being to get control of the wheat and the other to keep the price down.

Mr. VIEN: What was the nature of Government control before the institution of the wheat board?

Mr. MAHARG: Government control previous to the institution of the wheat board was under the Board of Grain Supervisors. I have already referred to their turning in $350,000 to the Government as a surplus from their operations. That board was discontinued.

Mr. VIEN: How did it exercise control?

Mr. MAHARG: They fixed the price—the price of $2.20 per bushel for the wheat produced by the farmers all over this country.

Mr. VIEN: Was it illegal to ask any higher amount?

Mr. MAHARG: Yes. They had absolute control over everything in regard to the fixing of prices and the disposition and direction of the grain. They had practically the same control as the wheat board.

Mr. VIEN: That was vicious too.

Mr. MAHARG: I am not going to say whether it was vicious or not, but I might say that we did not ask for it. It is a matter of opinion whether it was vicious or not, but we are not considering that question at the present time.

Mr. VIEN: I am glad to hear that the hon. gentleman was opposed to the wheat board.

Mr. MAHARG: No, the hon. gentleman cannot put those words into my mouth at all. I was opposed to original control of the wheat in any manner, shape or form. We did not ask for it in any shape whatever, but when the Government stepped in and took control, we believed that in all fairness they should continue when they had broken down the organization that had formerly been used, more particularly when control buying continues in the Old Country. I was pleased to hear the hon. member for North Simcoe state that there was still controlled buying in the Old Country, for his leader (Mr. Meighen) when he was speaking in Saskatoon, gave as a reason for discontinuing the wheat board, the absence of controlled buying in Great Britain. What the leader of the Agrarian party said was absolutely right. There was no unified buying; that requires two parties, and there were no two parties buying jointly. But there was controlled buying in Great Britain and the allied countries, and there is to-day, although there was no unified buying at the time our leader made that statement, nor is there to-day. It is controlled buying that is in existence to-day by the governments of the different countries. It is the hon. member for North Simcoe's leader who will have the explaining to do and not the leader of our group.

Mr. COWAN: Do I understand the hon. member for Maple Creek to mean that it was his desire that the Government should have continued to advance credits to foreign countries to buy our wheat last year and this?

Mr. MAHARG: If any such inference could be drawn from my remarks, that was not what I intended. That thought never entered my mind.

Mr. McKENZIE: The point that I intended to make has been brought out so well by the hon. member for Red Deer that I shall merely call the attention of the minister to it again. I refer to the loss by this country last year of $100,000,000 of money. That amounts to $12.50 per head of our population. That much was lost at one fell swoop by some one's blundering. The establishment of the wheat board and wheat control was a matter of policy on the part of the Government. First the Government got control buying through an agency which the hon. member for Maple Creek mentioned, then they established the wheat board. Both institutions were created as a matter of policy on the part of the Government. Then, later on, as a matter of policy the Government discontinued the wheat board. They said: We have come to the stage where the wheat board should be abolished. That again is a matter of policy for which the Government is entirely responsible. I was surprised to see the disloyalty, if I may use the word, of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) this afternoon. He always votes for this Government, always stands by them when it is to his political advantage to do so, but to-day he tells the Government: You lost the country $100,000,000 of cold cash last year.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman is putting words into my mouth I did not use, and is drawing inferences from what I said which are not justified. I did not make any such statement, or even imply it. What I said was that we took our light and leading from the Grain Growers group and that we were misled; that was all.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is a most humiliating confession to make, that this Government, with twenty ministers, and agents and sources of information all over the country, did not themselves know what was the proper thing to do, but took a sort of sidelight, a remark that was not very definite that was delivered by some private member of the House, because that is all the hon. member for Marquette was. My hon. friend from Simcoe says that he swallowed that advice hook, line, and sinker, as the saying is, and passed it on to the Government, and that childish simple-minded aggregation thereupon inaugurated a policy that lost this country $100,000,000. And the extraordinary thing is that the hon. member for North Simcoe now says in all solemnity that a commission must be appointed by this Government to investigate why the Government themselves blundered and bungled the affairs of this country to the extent of $100,000,000. He does not realize the full force and effect of what he says. If he is right and the Government has bungled to the extent of this immense amount of money, the Government must take the responsibility, and the appeal must be to Caesar, and not to any commission.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Mr. CURRIE: I again protest against the hon. member putting words into my mouth or drawing inferences that are not justified. I said it was time that we had a commission to investigate the Grain Growers Grain Company and similar groups that were very much interested in seeing that wheat fell from $3 to $1.50 per bushel. They are the people who should be investigated.

Mr. GOULD: There is no such company to my knowledge as the Grain Growers' Grain Company.

Mr. CURRIE: I may have made a single mistake.

Mr. GOULD: Lots of them.

Mr. CURRIE: They have changed their name so often. It is now the North West Trading Company? They have had about sixteen different names.

Mr. FIELDING: Almost as bad as the Conservative party.

Mr. MAHARG: The question of the name does not matter at the moment. My hon. friend from North Simcoe, in the course of his remarks said that we were very much concerned over the possible appointment of this commission. Now I made my position clear on that a few days ago when this matter came up in the House. I said that we would welcome an investigation, and that so far as our company was concerned we would render the commission every possible assistance. Our objection is to the possible personnel of the commission. If a commission is going to be appointed, we want one that can do something, and that will take a little more action than the present commission has done which has every authority to do what this proposed commission will likely be called upon to do, if appointed. We want a commission that will be entirely independent of any other commission now in existence; and, I repeat so far as we are concerned we will give them every possible assistance, and it may be considerable too, when the opportunity is afforded to disclose some of the things that have been going on.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It rather strikes me after careful observation that we have pretty well exhausted this line of argument, and I am going to suggest to the committee that we now turn our attention to the work that is before us and show our good intention, in the first place, by passing this item.

Mr. VIEN: I should first like to inquire from what quarter came the request for the establishment of wheat control and the fixing of a maximum price for wheat?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is a very important question and as my memory is not in the very best order at the present moment, perhaps my hon. friend will allow me to take it into consideration and to give him an answer some of these days.

Mr. VIEN: That is very vague. I am afraid that if we let the item pass, I shall not get the answer until the Greek calends. The minister has on many occasions given evidence of a very retentive memory, and if he would jog his mind a bit I think he could easily recollect how it happened that the Canadian Government stepped into the wheat marketing business and undertook the establishment of wheat control and a maximum price. He may desire to rush the voting of this item, but I think he might make an effort to recall this thing.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We are not rushing much, are we?

Mr. VIEN: How is the increase of $175,000 in salaries, due to the reclassification, going to affect the bonus paid these employees?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not quite understand my hon. friend.

Mr. VIEN: I will try to make it clear even if it takes a minute or two. Last year and the year before we voted a bonus to civil servants to meet the high cost of living. It was then understood that when the reclassification came into effect this bonus would in all probability be discontinued. I see now that the reclassification calls for an extra expenditure of $175,000 in salaries in this branch of the administration. What will be the policy of the department regarding the bonus in view of this increase?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The reclassification, as my hon. friend knows, affected all departments, and the bonus likewise applies throughout the Civil Service. The statement has already been made that the Government purposes this year to reduce the bonus by 25 per cent, and that, of course, will apply to this as to other departments.

Item agreed to.

Maintenance of Terminal Elevators and necessary equipment, $10,000.

Mr. MAHARG: How is this money to be applied? Is it for the upkeep of elevators, for improvements in plant, and so forth?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This is a very small vote which we have taken from year to year to be applied to capital account, if, for instance, new machinery is to be added, such as drying or cleaning plant.

Mr. MAHARG: I want to ask another question regarding the previous item. I was about to ask it when the chairman declared the item carried. We made provision during the last session for a certain amount of surpluses at terminal elevators being taken. Has any action been taken by the Government in that respect and have any returns come in from those surpluses over and above the actual grain which the elevators were supposed to have taken in?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: You refer to overages?

Mr. MAHARG: Yes.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The hon. member will recollect that Parliament passed, either last year or the year before, an amendment by which the elevators are allowed a certain percentage, the rest of it coming into the consolidated revenue fund. That has been carried out.

Mr. MAHARG: Why should these surpluses go into the consolidated revenue? This money, as well as some $350,000 of a surplus in connection with the operations of the Board of Grain Supervisors, has gone into the consolidated revenue. Why should it not be applied to the administration of the Act? This is what we had in mind when we requested that the overages over a certain amount be taken. While I am speaking about overages, it might be interesting to the House to know that when we took the overages away from the houses, the Board of Grain Commissioners immediately turned round and gave them an additional increase in elevating charges, which practically recouped them for everything they had lost in the way of overages. Now, that is a very significant fact. That increase was opposed by farmers' companies, but in the face of that opposition, the grain commission granted a rise of one half cent a bushel, which, on the whole handling of grain, amounts to approximately the total amount of money the different elevator companies received from their overages in previous years.

Mr. FIELDING: Is my right hon. friend correct when he describes this as a vote on capital account? It is not capital account in the ordinary sense in which we use the word in the Estimates.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No. In the first place, the elevators were built by a vote of Parliament. A vote was made for construction of elevators; and, so far as new construction is concerned, the capital account has been brought almost to a close. But we have had a small vote each year to provide for additional machinery. After that, the operating expenses come out of revenue. The expenditure has been very small. In 1919-1920, it was only $895; in 1920-21, to January 31, it was about $6,000, owing to addition of new machinery.

Mr. FIELDING: The words "capital account" do not, in the Estimates, mean quite the same thing as they do in the sense in which the minister uses them. This is capital account as respects that particular transaction, but it is not chargeable to capital in the sense in which we use the word in the Estimates.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is for the maintenance of necessary equipment.

Mr. MAHARG: The minister did not answer my direct question in regard to surplus overages. Has any money been collected from that source?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That question has reference to the vote we have just passed. I will look up the information and get it for my hon. friend before we are through with the Estimates.

Item agreed to.

Trade Commissioners and Commercial Agents, including salaries, travelling expenses, contingencies and other expenditure in connection therewith, $230,000.

Mr. POWER: May I ask what new Trade Commissioners have been appointed since last year and where they are located?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: During the current year G. E. Short was appointed to Rotterdam, Holland, and Mr. E. L. McCall to Rio Janeiro, Brazil. The latter is a new appointment. I think we have not heretofore had a Trade Commissioner in Brazil. These are the only new appointments that have been made during the current year.

Mr. FIELDING: Was there no trade agent at Rotterdam before?

[Mr. Maharg.]

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We had one at Rotterdam many years ago and afterwards at Antwerp. During the war there was no agent at either place, but the office was kept open with a clerk there in charge in order to answer enquiries and preserve continuity as it were. This is a new appointment to Holland, and Rotterdam is the headquarters of the trade commissioners.

Mr. JACOBS: Have these officials passed an examination by the Civil Service Commission?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes; the appointments are under the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. JACOBS: And do these men possess the necessary linguistic qualifications?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, so far as we could get them. That is a necessary thing. We make it a point as far as we possibly can that appointees to certain countries while passing through their period of probation here shall acquire the language of the country to which they go. In this case Mr. Short does not possess a knowledge of the Dutch language, but has a fair knowledge of French. You cannot in all cases get that linguistic requirement, but in most cases we make it an absolute necessity. For instance our commissioner to Brazil is familiar with the Spanish language and is fairly conversant with Portuguese, in which languages he will make himself more proficient. Our trade commissioner in Japan is a master of the Japanese language. I should not, perhaps, say a master of it, but he was born in Japan, as it happens, and during his school days, and ever since, has studied the language and has a good colloquial grasp of it.

Mr. JACOBS: Is he a British citizen?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. POWER: Who is the commissioner to the Fiji Islands?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We have not appointed anybody there.

Mr. POWER: Yes, we have a commissioner of some kind in the Fiji Islands?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No, not a Canadian Trade Commissioner.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Is there not a gentleman there by the name of Catellier?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: As trade commissioner?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Yes. In the Fiji Islands.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No.

Mr. POWER: This gentleman was certainly appointed to the Fiji Islands in some commercial capacity. I would like to know if he speaks the language used there, whatever it may be?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The hon. member will have to accept my statement that we have not appointed a trade commissioner.

Mr. JACOBS: He may have been eaten by the natives.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend could go there with perfect safety; they stopped the practice of cannibalism some time ago.

Mr. CURRIE: This should not be a matter of jest at all, because Canada does a lot of business with the Fiji Islands. Orders from there are now coming in fast, and there is quite a large trade growing up.

Mr. JACOBS: What do we supply to the Fiji Islands?

Mr. CURRIE: General merchandise.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We get a considerable amount of sugar from the Fiji Islands.

Mr. JACOBS: I suppose we supply the natives with clothing?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, they require some.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): How many trade agents are there altogether?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: At the present time there are twenty-four trade commissioners.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): How many are there in the United States?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Not one.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): How does the hon. gentleman explain that state of affairs? When practically half of our trade is with the United States why have we not some one looking after our trade there?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I made rather an extended explanation about this matter the other day, and I can refer my hon. friend to the statements appearing in Hansard. I may say, however, that the main reason is this: We have never adopted the policy of placing our trade commissioners in the United States, the two countries lying so close to each other, and the knowledge by one or the other of markets or marketing conditions being so easy to obtain, and being so generally well distributed. Access to either country is possible in a few hours, and there is a vast amount of intercommunication between the two countries. Neither this Government, nor any of the Governments which preceded it, has ever thought that it was necessary to extend through the United States our trade commissionership propaganda, but we have placed trade commissioners in more distant fields, where in the course of time, we knew our foreign commerce would extend with the idea of affording information and providing facilities for such expansion. The trade commissionership policy of the country has been a progressive one. It commenced really from nothing, or, more properly speaking, began with very few commissioners and involved but very little expense. It takes money to carry on this work on an extensive scale. Development has been carried on progressively as it was thought the necessity arose, and as we could provide reasonable means for carrying out the work. There are people who take the other view, that it would be well for us to place trade commissioners in the United States. If we commenced that policy it would require a large number of commissioners to cover the whole territory, and then the matter of expense comes in. The first question is as to whether it is necessary, and then there is the question of cost. I may say that the subject is engaging the attention of myself and my department, and probably before the session is over I will have an opportunity of speaking further with reference to it.

Mr. JACOBS: Before the war they had a system in Germany and Austria under which men well-known in commercial life were appointed to act as a sort of advisory board to the ministry. Has the Minister of Trade and Commerce ever considered the question of similar action along those lines?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, I myself have considered the matter as to whether it would be possible to have an honorary board of advisors from different parts of the country. There is something to be said for it, and there is something also to be said, probably, on the other side. In a way we are getting advise though we have no formal board. Our department is in communication with all the Boards of Trade, and with all the important centres of industrial trade acitivity. We are getting constant advice, and we are trying to give information on the basis of that advice. If my hon. friend were to see the correspondence which passes in the course of a month in the department I think he would be surprised at its diversity and volume. We are in touch with every quarter of the Dominion through its prominent business men and business and industrial organizations. Outside of that we have an excellent publication, the Bulletin, which we send to no one who does not apply for it and feels that it is necessary and useful to him. Our circulation in that way has gradually grown until now we have a live bona fide circulation of between eight thousand and nine thousand. We get commendation from our business communities as to its usefulness. In many ways it is utilized in a manner that we had not thought of. For instance, many school teachers use the Bulletin for lessons in geography and commerce and make those lessons of live interest to their pupils. Generally the policy which has been adopted is that our trade commissioners must pass from one to two and a half years in the work of the department before they are sent out into the field, and that work familiarizes them with the kind of information which they should gather. After their training in the departmental office we have those student trade commissioners travel through the country to examine the various industries and report to us thereon, and so make themselves fully acquainted with what is being produced, the way in which it is produced and the cost of its production. In these ways we seek to give them a training to equip them for their work, and with a knowledge of the language of the country to which they are assigned, which is the case in most of our appointments, these trade commissioners are able to do very efficient work. In short, I think we have a really good class of men who are rendering valuable services to our manufacturing industries.

SUPPLY

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at six o'clock we were considering the Estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce. We had reached and debated item number 358, concerning trade commissioners. Shall this item now carry?

Item agreed to.

Development and extension of Canadian trade, including exhibits and publicity, negotiations of treaties, miscellaneous advertising and printting, or other expenditure in connection therewith, $100,000.

Mr. CAHILL: Does this item cover foreign exhibitions?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No. Exhibitions are really under the Department of the Interior. In this are involved certain small exhibits in connection with our trade commissioners' offices as illustrating the products of Canada.

Mr. FIELDING: What are the principal items of the expenditure?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The principal items of expenditure are in connection with the Exhibits and Publicity Branch, the work of which I explained the other night. In the Exhibits Branch we have articles from different countries which are tabulated and priced for the information of any manufacturers in Canada who may feel that we could supply any of those particular articles. The work is in its initial stage, and we shall see in the course of a little while what good really comes from it. Some good results, however, have already been obtained, and we feel that it will be of benefit to the manufacturing industries in connection with the supplying to other countries of articles similar to those exhibited. The Publicity Branch handles the film operations, which are very interesting and are a very valuable development in connection with publicity. At the Bureau of Exhibits on Wellington and Bank streets we have an equipment for the taking of pictures, the development of the films and their distribution. The work done there cannot be excelled, I think, by any of the establishments engaged in that kind of manufacture. Our purpose is to give to the outside world a picture of our productive capacity, our natural resources, and so on; and we make the film story interesting by weaving in bits of scenery expressive of our natural scenic resources. These films are being distributed through a large number of the countries with which we are dealing now and with which we hope to deal. One of our pictures, for instance, that which depicts the water powers of Canada, is a very valuable one and has been exhibited in Great Britain and in the United States with profit in the actual realization of a great deal of business. Our agricultural film depicts the work of the settler, his coming into the Northwest, building his shack, beginning his operations, tilling his field and reaping his harvest. Then the movement of the grain is shown from the field to the elevator, thence to the cars and to the point of shipment to foreign countries. This very interesting film is a type of the many that we produce. Films illustrating manufacturing processes and activities are shown, in connection with fishing, logging, the manufacture of pulp from pulpwood, forestry work, and so on, and the legends include statistics with respect to the particular resources dealt with. For instance, if it is water-powers, the available water-power is stated, the horse-power already developed, the capabilities of further development, and so on. These films are being so distributed that the distribution really costs nothing, and in fact, has now begun to bring us in a revenue. When I was in Great Britain two years ago I arranged a contract with one of the most prominent film exhibitors there, Sir William F. Jury, and he was so well pleased with the original films that he is taking a new film from us almost every month He puts them through his regular circuit and a certain percentage of the proceeds comes to Canada. We have been doing work in the film line for other departments. We have done some work for the Canadian National Railways which they would otherwise have had done elsewhere; so in that way we try to keep our staff employed and to make as large as possible the income which is set against everhead expenses. During the latter half of the last year we did work for the departments to the amount of $8,559. We have now a large list of these motion pictures which have been taken and distributed. The total of the revenue up to January 31, 1921, is $11,875.

Mr. FIELDING: For the current year.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No, from the time they began distributing these pictures, probably about fourteen or fifteen months in all. In the United States these are distributed and are shown to probably two or three million people weekly, who see them through the pictures of current events. They also have been distributed in like manner in New Zealand, Australia and South Africa, and we are having the legends printed now in other languages so that they may be distributed in other countries as well. They were exhibited in France during the time of the Lyons Fair and at Paris when we had our exhibition there. This serves a double purpose. It stimulates trade; it excites curiosity as to our natural resources; but it also does a good deal of the best of work for our Immigration Department. It was a personal experience that I had at Paris and at the Lyons Fair. The city of Lyons set apart one of their large halls for the exhibition of our films, and we exhibited them there in the afternoons and in the evenings. The hall was crowded all the time, and it was very gratifying to see the interest that the people took in the pictures and to hear the remarks which they made in reference to them. The same thing occurred at Paris where we exhibited these pictures for about three months, where schools and colleges made expeditions at certain hours to see them, where the general public also came in, and where I had an opportunity of having them viewed by all the staffs and members of the countries represented at the Peace Conference, to whom I sent personal letters inviting them to come at certain times, so that we got a very wide publicity in that respect in reference to our resources and other features of interest.

Mr. DENIS: What amount was expended last year on these pictures out of the appropriation of $130,000?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Up to January 31, about $86,000. We have reduced the appropriation $30,000 this year.

Mr. CAHILL: What amount was expended on account of negotiations of treaties, and was any amount expended in connection with the proposed treaty with the West Indies?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Out of this appropriation we paid the expenses which were incurred by the meeting here. We provided the hall without expense; we met in the museum, and we took care of the delegates while they were here. With the co-operation of the Board of Trade and the citizens of Ottawa, we gave them as good a social time as we could. We also paid the small printing expenses.

Mr. CAHILL: What was the amount of the item?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have not seen the bills that are in. A very small amount comparatively.

Mr. ROSS: I notice from the right hon. gentleman's report that a preferential tariff has been extended by Australia to the United Kingdom and there is some little temporary agreement between Australia and South Africa giving South Africa a tariff preference also. The right hon. gentleman's report says that "the Canadian Government is now considering an exchange of views with the Australian authorities in the hope that the trade relations between the two countries may be improved." This report is dated 1st June, 1920. What has occurred in connection with these negotiations, and what success or failure have they had?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: South Africa received a small preference in the Australian market on a very limited number of goods, and I think South Africa gave three or five per cent preference on a certain limited number of Australian goods. That is the only preference that Australia has given other than to the United Kingdom. In Australia they undertook, about two years ago now, a revision of the tariff. I am not going back beyond that because I suppose my hon. friend knows what took place before that. There have been negotiations for the extension of preference between the two countries, but they have never resulted in an actual preference being given in either case, there being several reasons for this. The Government which at present exists in Australia, when it came into power, undertook a revision of the tariff. In March, 1920, it brought down a resolution which was the basis upon which was to be founded a Bill and an Act, but the Bill itself has not yet been framed and passed by the legislature; only the resolution holds, and the Government is acting under the resolution. By that resolution Australia gave a preference to British goods, but gave no preference to any other outside dominion or dependency of Great Britain, but in the resolution she contemplated, after the legislation was completed, opening negotiations with Canada and New Zealand for preference between herself and those countries. As I have said, the Bill is still being discussed, and the latest advices that I have is that probably it will be autumn of this year before it is finally passed. Whilst I have been keeping in close touch, personally and otherwise, the answer has been invariably this: "When that Bill becomes law, we shall have our legislation, and we shall be very glad to take the matter up with you and see if we can arrange for a preference between these countries." In the meantime the present condition is that Australia made material additions to her tariff along protective lines, gave to Great Britain a fairly good preference on her products as Australia imported them, but has no other preferential arrangements either made or under negotiation. That is the situation as it is to-day, so that our manufactures going into Australia, if they are of a quality or kind like those that come from Great Britain, go in under the general tariff while the British goods go in on a basis of preference.

Mr. FIELDING: We do not give Australia a preference?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No, we have never been successful in getting an arrangement.

Mr. ROSS: Suppose this Bill is passed by Australia, what do they propose doing as far as the Dominions are concerned? What reciprocal arrangements are suggested?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There are none suggested by the Australian Government. There is simply in the resolution I have spoken of power to enter into negotiations for a preference, but there is no proposition, and there are no negotiations. The answer I invariably get is that as soon as this Bill becomes law they will take the matter up with us.

Mr. ROSS: The Bill will empower them to make any arrangements they please?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. FIELDING: We had a partial arrangement with Australia at one time. At the beginning of the preferential arrangement my recollection is that we extended the preference to New South Wales, which was at that time a low tariff colony, but we did not extend it to Victoria, which was not a low tariff colony. When the colonies were united in the Commonwealth of Australia, the tariff generally got a lift up, and from that time forward we did not give a preference to any part of Australia. That is the present condition, I assume.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We are not giving a preference to any of the states in Australia.

Mr. FIELDING: I quite understand that, because when the colonies united and had a common tariff, that tariff being not as advantageous to Canada as the tariff of New South Wales had been, we ceased to give a preference to any of them.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Does my hon. friend refer to the first legislation of 1897?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That was the legislation, if I remember rightly, under which Canada gave a preference to any country whose tariff came within a certain limit. That might have applied to New South Wales, but when the main preference came in, none was given to Australia.

Mr. McDERMAND: Will any part of this vote or any other item in the Estimates be used to promote trade within our own Dominion?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No, this vote is for the encouragement of foreign trade, but we cannot, I suppose, very well promote trade with outside countries without it having a reflex action on ours. This vote is not for any such purpose as my hon. friend has in mind. The different provinces interchange their goods, producers trade with consumers, and we do not by this vote, or any other vote in the way of subsidy or monetary encouragement, strive to aid that process of merchandising.

Mr. McDERMAND: I understand that Mr. Hoover, who was Food Controller in the United States, is very anxious to develop trade within the borders of that country, and I was in hopes that our Department of Trade and Commerce might be able to do something along that line, especially with respect to fruit. I had in mind aid to our growers in finding a market for their fruit. There is a great demand for fruit, but thousands of barrels of apples and smaller fruits go to waste every year owing to the scarcity of labour and of containers. We are not able to get this fruit on the market in bulk form, and I had hoped that the department might aid in finding a ready market for these perishable fruits. I think it would be a great benefit to the consumers in all the large centres. The high-priced containers certainly mean a higher price for the fruit to the consumer, but if the department could co-operate so that this fruit could be shipped in bulk or in sacks it would reach the consumer at a much lower price. Owing to the scarcity of labour in the rural districts and especially in the fruit growing districts, aid of this sort would be of great benefit to the consumer.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The different industries, the fruit industry, for example, are helped by the work of this department. The fruit industry is helped by the work of the department in gaining an entrance for it and in developing its distribution in foreign countries. It would be a wonderfully complex piece of business if we undertook here, in this Dominion, to aid the producers in any one section of the province to get their articles into another section or from one province into another province. That opens up a vista of a very great deal of complexity and expense. I think for a considerable time, maybe always, our internal trade will have to look after itself in so far as the transportation and representation of its products is concerned in other parts of the Dominion. The Statistical Branch of my department is doing a great deal of valuable work towards making the people of this Dominion acquainted with what is produced in different sections, its quality, quantity, price, and the like of that. Those parts of the country which do not produce a particular kind of article get that information, and that in itself is quite a large measure of aid and stimulus towards internal marketing. There is nothing in this item for the purpose my hon. friend speaks of, nor do I think anything will be voted along that line.

Mr. McDERMAND: I was lead to bring this matter up by a speech I read of the Minister of Finance delivered to the Retail Merchants' Association, from which I will quote only a short extract:

> Canada's chief claim to prosperity is as an agricultural country. There is no doubt of that. Does it look well for an agricultural country to be buying its agricultural products from abroad? Are we city people fair to our farmer cousins? Are we trying to see the home market retained for our own farmers as we should? Does it not seem strange that in a country like this, with such a climate, that for the nine months ending December 21 last we imported $27,000,000 worth of fruits, fresh and canned, from the United States? What is the matter with the Canadian apple? Obviously something must be wrong somewhere. During the nine month period referred to we imported 198,000 barrels, three boxes to the barrel, with our own apples rotting by the thousand on the ground. Whatever it is which is wrong must be mended.

Having read that, and having had some experience in this matter, I felt that there was a great and needless waste of fruit in Ontario when there should be a ready market in our large centres and in the West; for we all know the food value of the apple. Now, we made an attempt last fall to ship apples through to Winnipeg in bulk and not in any container, and we discovered that this could be quite successfully done, although I think there is room for great improvement. We understand that in the Niagara district a large corporation has been formed and the Ontario Government has guaranteed the salary of an officer for the coming year to supervise the work that is to be carried on. If we could secure real co-operation on the part of the Department of Trade and Commerce in the way of advertising and so on, not only the producers generally, but the consumers in the large centres, would be greatly benefited. The consumers are very desirous of getting this fruit as cheaply as possible, and we are equally anxious to dispose of it at reasonable prices. So that the co-operation of the department along this line would, no doubt, meet with the approval of both consumers and producers.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think my hon. friend has about struck the point in the last sentence or two. If there is one section of the community that has a large product which it wants to get rid of, and there is another community somewhere at a distance that has both the capacity and the desire for this product, then there is room and there is need for co-operative effort. Some organization is obviously required to bring supply and demand together. But my hon. friend must remember that some of the departments are doing a good deal in this direction. For instance, take the Department of Agriculture, among the different branches of which is the fruit department. If my hon. friend will study its reports, or listen to its minister, he will find out that the department is doing a great deal to promote the consumption of fruit and other products. And the Marine Department has also done something to encourage the consumption of fish by establishing a fish day. After they have succeeded in firmly establishing the habit of observing one fish day, I suppose a second such day will follow. By this means, the consumption of fish ought to be greatly increased. Some years ago I put on a campaign to aid the fruit industry, advising everyone to eat an apple every morning. A very successful advertising scheme was carried out and a great many apples were eaten that would otherwise have been wasted. That, however, was not a settled policy. After all, the industry itself must look out for its own avenues for customers and transport, and under this vote my department does not in any way contribute to that business.

Mr. McDERMAND: I may give the minister a concrete example of the cost to the consumer and it will show that something is needed. Perhaps I am appealing to the wrong department, but if the Department of Agriculture is properly charged with the responsibility for a matter of this kind, I trust it will give it some attention. We loaded cars on the Canadian Pacific railway last fall with bulk apples, hand picked, at $1.30 per hundred. The freight on these apples into Winnipeg amounted to $1 per hundred, which meant a cost of $2.30 per hundred landed there. These same apples were then retailed at $1.85 per fourty-pound sack, and the people came and bought them, at the car, paying something like $4.62½ per hundred. Someone was thus making a profit of about $2.30, which seems to me to be too much of a spread if business is to be successfully carried on. Now, we feel that if we could be put into closer touch with the consumer, it would benefit us both. I am sorry if I am appealing to the wrong department; but, I repeat, I hope something will be done, either through an advertising campaign or by some other effective means, to secure closer co-operation and communication between consumer and producer.

Mr. DECHENE: We export large quantities of butter and cheese every year to the United States and Great Britain. What is the department doing to extend this trade?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend sets me a pretty large task if I am to tell him all that the department has done in the interest of trade. I do not think he quite means that I should give a lecture that would occupy the time which it would take for me to recount the operations of the department. As regards butter and cheese, neither of these is a product which has come to light within the last few days, or even within the last few years. The cheese industry of Canada established its reputation in Great Britain decades ago, and it does not require anything in particular more than to keep up the standard. If possible, we should strive to improve the quality of our butter and cheese, and everything advisable in this respect is being done by the Department of Agriculture which looks after our butter and cheese and the dairying business to ensure that quality is maintained. If that is done, the market having been once opened, the demand created, the taste for these articles cultivated, and their reputation thoroughly established, trade must do the rest. My hon. friend, of course, does not think that we can go further than that. We cannot transport these products or open warehouses for their sale; that does not come within the scope of the department's activities. But we have, by the collection and distribution of information, done all we can to further the industry. The same applies to other articles.

Mr. A. M. DECHENE (Montmagny): (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, in taking my seat this evening, I promised the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce that I would furnish my humble contribution to the evening's debate by making a few remarks in French.

We know and it gives us much pleasure to acknowledge it, that he is about the only scholar within the Cabinet and that he alone together with one of his colleagues, the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), may pay themselves the compliment of knowing and speaking French. We congratulate him. I wish to prove to him this evening that we appreciate his work, by taking up an industry that interests the whole country. Every year we export about $50,000,000 worth of butter, cheese, condensed milk and cream. In reading over the official statements which are placed at our disposal, the right hon. Minister will no doubt recall to his memory that we export to England at the very most between $10,000,000 and $12,000,000 annually of butter and cheese. According to the reports of the Department of Agriculture, we are one of the smallest exporters of butter and cheese to England. As a matter of fact, only France and Belgium, I believe, export less butter and cheese to England than we do. I can easily anticipate the right hon. Minister's answer that it is up to the Department of Agriculture to look after that end; but on the other hand, what benefit do we derive from the Ministry of Trade and Commerce, if all the other departments not only take care of the production but also attend to the foreign marketing of their respective products. Such being the case, there would be no need for a Deparment of Trade and Commerce. This is perhaps a truth known to everybody, yet no one dares utter it in public.

I am perfectly of the opinion of the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, when he tells us that the Department of Agriculture sees to the production of butter and cheese. I know that the hon. Minister of Agriculture personally gives to it much of his valuable time and energy. In order to ascertain the quality of his products each year in either one or another of the provinces of this country, he organizes fairs at which all the provinces are invited to exhibit their choicest products. Last year, or rather a little more than a year ago, one of those large exhibitions was held in Winnipeg, and Quebec carried off a fifth prize. During the last session I had the honour to promise my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) that the next exhibition would show whether we had improved, and I think my memory serves me well when I state that this year, the large Dairy School of St. Hyacinthe took a first prize. We, then, have first-class products, but we cannot ask the Department of Agriculture who is looking after production and tries to keep up quality, to find new markets for the surplus of those products. In fact, if we look up the Estimates of the Department of Agriculture, we find that there is nothing to warrant an expenditure by that Department towards finding an outlet abroad for our surplus of products, whether in the United States, France or Great Britain.

But, is it not rather strange, and I think the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce should be the first to acknowledge it, that countries situated at the Antipodes got ahead of us on the English market, that the products of Argentina, New Zealand and Australia arrive there in larger quantities and that a better price obtains for them than for our Canadian products. I think it is within the purview of the right hon. minister to ascertain why countries so unfavourably situated should have this advantage, while our country, so near to England, and with such an extensive merchant marine, should have such small shipments to Great Britain. He should find out why we are unable to find in England a market for those commodities which are there in great demand and of which we have a considerable surplus. This is even more striking when considered in the light of the situation of the dairy industry in Ireland. We are aware that since unrest has broken out in this most unhappy part of the empire more than thirty large dairies, creameries and cheese factories have been destroyed by fire. Moreover, the Department of Agriculture does not allow the exportation of butter and cheese from Ireland except at fixed prices. Again we know that the butter which was smuggled from Ireland into England sold at five or six pence above the price fixed on the English market.

Taking all these facts into consideration, I am of the opinion that our Department of Agriculture should take more interest in the exportation of our dairy products. Our dairy, creamery and cheese factory products do occupy a special position in the country.

The hon. member (Mr. McDermand), who a moment ago showed his interest in the production and sale of fruit in this country, was told by the hon. minister that the department did not supervise internal trade. In my opinion, the department should at least show some interest in our foreign trade in a commodity which is not the produce of a province exclusively, but of all the provinces. Every province in the Dominion is interested in seeing to it that its butter, cheese, cream and condensed milk command better prices and sell in larger quantities. The result of such an undertaking is obvious. The owners of those small factories transact their business directly with a large number of farmers and, in helping those small manufacturers—I think they may be called manufacturers just as well as those who have steel, iron, etc., as their raw material—I am sure the department would be carrying on some useful work. The butter or cheese manufacturer gets his raw material from the farmer and pays him in proportion to the returns from the sales. If we create a larger market for our butter and cheese, the effect will be felt at once by the farmer and the country at large. It is not only a section of the country but the whole Dominion that would benefit by it. What is the use of voting for the Department of Agriculture amounts aggregating about a million dollars, and even more, to promote the better breeding and better care of our herds of cattle, if after all this the Department of Trade and Commerce does not exert itself in order to find a market for our products. From the special statement made to-night by the hon. minister, one would think that the Department of Trade and Commerce is nothing but a film machine, a photographic screen. If the Government of this country is going to do business with moving pictures as a specialty, there is but one thing to do: turn this House into a public hall and give us moving pictures concerning the intentions of the Government. We would have them before our eyes and the Government would not be committed in any way, as they would not have to say either yes or no. Moving pictures might help in making Canada better known to foreign countries; by their means, immigrants might be attracted here; but I do not believe that they would prove satisfactory to foreign dealers and induce them to purchase our products, though they might bring these dealers to invest money in our country, and perhaps come to see which industries could be developed here; yet, I fail to see how our trade could gain any advantage in this. All the reports of the weekly bulletin which is distributed to us—reports which unfortunately are published in one language only—prove that it is important that the Canadian dealer make some arrangement with the English dealer in regard to his sales, delivery and manner of payment, and also the packing of Canadian products. What do we find in pursuance of the advice given in this Bulletin which is published under the direction of my right hon. friend? We find moving pictures. They may be very nice and most enjoyable to look at but they are of no help, or very little, to trade. The right hon. minister and his colleagues who accompanied him to the conference of the League of Nations, may have found the sight of our movies most enjoyable but, after all, these gentlemen ought to realize that there is something better than movies to be offered to foreign countries. Is the Government of Canada a moving picture firm? I think this is of a nature to have us turned into ridicule, and if all may spend a pleasant afternoon or evening at a movie show, there is not much advantage there for our dealers.

We have companies and co-operative organizations in the province of Quebec. We have the large co-operative society of cheese-factories of Quebec which comprise 8,000 members, and which carries on a trade of several million dollars in foreign countries; this is indeed the only large trade organization which is seeking a foreign market for our farm products, and particularly for butter and cheese manufactured in our province. I cannot say what is being done in other provinces, but I know that there are large warehouses in these provinces, that there are dealers who are busy marketing a few million pounds of Canadian butter in Great Britain. I think that the Argentine Republic shipped to England, last year, over 300,000 cwt. of butter, whilst Canada only shipped 32,000 cwt. at the most. Why this discrepancy? I cannot say, and would be glad if the hon. minister himself could suggest an explanation, though I doubt very much he will do so. Neither could it be explained by the movies. It would be most important, especially under present circumstances, that the minister should have under his orders, smart, active, pushing young men who understand business, and who could represent us and make our products known in England and the United States.

Nearly every day, on the floor of this House, we hear hon. members saing: "You must, we must do our best to trade with our Mother Country, with Great Britain." We would be delighted to sell our products to Great Britain. Only, we realize that our Department of Commerce is not adequately represented in England, that it is not represented in such a way as to help us. I believe that, under these conditions, a fifty million dollar trade should prove of greater attraction to the minister and induce him to take all necessary means so that this product—a product which is greatly needed by the British people, especially cheese which is as bread and wine to the British labourer, cheese which is his principal food —be delivered to him in as large quantities as possible by our country and not by the Argentine Republic or New Zealand or Australia.

I wish to tell the hon. minister that I believe that he, himself, together with the other members of the Government should see to the exportation of products which are manufactured by the farmer or by those who receive the raw product from the farmer. It is very well to attend to large industries; these are generally controlled by large business concerns, men of wealth, who can very well look after their own connections and interests on the European markets.

Until late years, we have had a representative in Europe soliciting orders from the allied countries for our different manufactured articles. This gentleman, though paid by the Dominion, has never very much exerted himself toward establishing commercial relations which might have helped in developing the tradè both in the raw material and the manufactured article supplied by the Canadian farmers.

Why this discrimination, which is constantly recurring? Why trouble about the large manufacturers and never about the agricultural class?

The fiscal year of 1919-20 shows us that about fifty per cent of the total exports of this country consists of products foreign to our large industries. For fifty per cent consisted of farm products, either in their raw state, or as manufactured goods; this being the case, why does not the Department of Trade and Commerce think it proper and expedient to bring on closer commercial relations with England which is our best market? Why do they not see that we export even more to the United States, which seems to be, at the present hour, the largest market in the world.

I hope that the hon. minister himself will deem it expedient to explain some of these flaws which exist in his department, and why he has erred, and if having erred, he wishes to find grace by creating at an early date, for the Canadian farmer, the manufacturer of butter, cheese, condensed milk or cream, a market worthy of our country. What benefit is derived, by the Minister of Agriculture, from stimulating agriculture and asking the farmers of this country to produce more and of a higher standard, if having done so and more than the population of this country can consume, his colleagues, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, cannot find the necessary outlet for the sale of the surplus of these products.

I think the right hon. Minister of Commerce should stir up his head officers if necessary, and put them to work, so that we, the small as well as the large producers, may profit from the work of his department.

Mr. MOWAT: I would like to intervene at this stage in order to call attention to a subject which was discussed very briefly this afternoon and which discussion seemed to end in rather an indeterminate manner—that is the importance of considering how much we can do for Canadian trade by establishing commercial agents in the United States. As it is now, those in the adjoining Republic who want to buy Canadian goods have no way of determining the extent of a particular trade or the rates in vogue, and we are accordingly at the greatest disadvantage in that respect as compared with the United States. The latter country has seventy or eighty commercial agents in Canada, most of whom are consuls, and these officers are furnished with admirable trade statistics of the manufactures of their country, and are able at any time to supply those who are in want of goods from the United States with details in regard to railway rates and other data. We have no service of the kind in the United States, and the consequence is that Canadian manufacturers and producers are at a very great disadvantage in obtaining or filling orders from there. We now know that we are buying from the United States double the amount we export to that country, and this handicap could be largely overcome—so I am told by those who know, and it seems to me quite obvious—by having a better system of advertising our goods in the United States and indicating where reliable information could be obtained as to Canadian industries or products. The expense of such a proceeding would not be great for this reason: I am told, upon reliable authority, that the commercial agents of the United States in Canada—who, as I said before, are consuls and have consular offices in all our large centres—are paid fees by Canadians on the commercial paper involved in sending goods to the United States, and that these fees in the aggregate are sufficient to pay the entire salary or remuneration enjoyed by these commercial agents. We have therefore the extraordinary state of affairs that Canadians are paying the salaries or remuneration received by American officials, but Canada is getting no advantage from the value of the goods exported. I was told of a case by a gentleman in New York who received an enquiry from a manufacturer in New Orleans desirous of obtaining maple sugar and syrup from Canada. Unfortunately he did not know where to go. There was no Canadian agent to whom he could apply, and New Orleans is hundreds of miles away from this country. In some way or other he finally got information, through some agent in Montreal, as to where he could obtain these commodities and the result was that an order came from New Orleans for maple sugar and syrup to the extent of two carloads valued at several thousand dollars. If such a profitable transaction resulted in this one case, how many more instances are there where Canada loses orders for trade simply because of the fact that the people living over there, at such a distance from this country, have no information as to where to place their orders. If it is a fact that the salaries or remuneration which the American trade agents, or consuls, in this country receive, come from fees paid by Canadians, it seems to me that the same result would follow if Canadian trade agents were established in the United States. It would appear that if we could collect fees for Canadian trade agents appointed in the large American centres those fees would equal, and perhaps exceed, the remuneration that should be granted these officers, so there would be no extra expense to our country in putting such a system into effect. At present the work over there, as regards Canada, is done by the British consuls established in the large cities. While no fault can be found with the attention they give to Canadian affairs, they are not particularly anxious to see that Canadian orders are placed. They are British consuls, they are looking after the trade of Great Britain and Ireland, and while they are willing to do what is requisite there is no special effort made by them to help in the placing of Canadian orders. But if we had our own agents over there, and if a certain amount were placed at their disposal for the purpose of advertising in the papers where they were to be found, and what information they could give, I venture to say that a very large amount of the present disparity in the trade between the two countries would soon disappear, and we would find our Canadian business men deriving very great benefit by the appointment of these trade agents.

Mr. CAHILL: I would like to ask the minister, in connection with the item to cover the expense of negotiating treaties, whether the Government has in mind, or has attempted to negotiate, a treaty with England permitting live Canadian cattle to be imported into that country. We give a preference to British goods entering Canada, and I should think that if this Government displayed sufficient activity it could, in exchange for that preference, get permission to have our live cattle landed in Britain. The cattle industry of Canada is going to be very badly crippled if our livestock is excluded from the American market by a high tariff, and shut out entirely from the British market. I would not suggest that the minister should retaliate by increasing the duty on British goods, but I would recommend to him that if Britain is not agreeable to admitting our live cattle, we should reduce the customs duties on goods coming from other countries and make them equal to those prevailing on goods coming from Britain. Has the Government contemplated any such plan as the one I have suggested?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No, we have not thought of anything along that line, in order to achieve the object referred to, but my hon. friend knows very well the position which has been assumed by the Dominion for a great many years past with reference to this question. I think probably the matter will be in a better position by the Government continuing along the lines which have been followed in the past, and which are still being followed, rather than to interject into the issue a tariff question by way of reprisal. I do not think that would be the best way to reach a satisfactory conclusion.

With regard to the point raised by my hon. friend from Parkdale I may say, as I have already stated to-day, that my department is giving very special attention to the subject, and I repeat what I said this afternoon that probably before the end of the session I may have something further to say in a more definite way. The arguments which the hon. member has placed before the committee are believed in by a great many people; but there are others who think that trade between ourselves and the United States might very well be left to take care of itself for the reasons which I have already given. The two countries are in close proximity to one another; they have an intimate knowledge of each others resources, and in a variety of ways they are largely informed as to the extent of the business which each country may do with the other. Then the cost must be taken into account. For us to adopt the consular system which the United States employs and apply it to the United States would necessitate a rather heavy expenditure. The United States' consuls in this country number not more than thirty, and they are supplemented by a certain number of agents. It is true that for every package which is invoiced a fee of $2.50 is charged, and those fees in the gross more than cover the salaries and emoluments of these consular officers and their agents. If we adopt that system we must be prepared, as I said, to apply it to all foreign trade; otherwise it would be considered discriminatory against the United States. Of course, it would not be necessary to apply the system to Empire trade. As I said before, the matter is being considered.

Mr. MORPHY: I would like the privilege of going back, as did the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) to the item preceding, which varies very much from the present item. I am inclined to say a few words in advocacy of the same principle suggested by him. From what the minister said the other night, apparently he is thoroughly satisfied with his trade commissioners whom he has at work in various foreign countries, but I do not think he has yet given to the House the names and locations of those gentlemen. I should like to see this information put on record as a matter of publicity so that we may know who those gentlemen are and in what countries they are operating. After all, the best customer we have for our products is the United States, but, roughly speaking, they sell us two dollars' worth of goods for every dollar's worth that we sell them. Now, we enjoy our great volume of trade there without much solicitation on our part, and it seems strange to me that we do not adopt an aggressive trade policy in that great market right at our door instead of sending trade commissioners to remote foreign countries. The appointment of trade agents in unstinted numbers to make a drive for business in the United States would be most opportune at this particular time, for it is acknowledged by all economists that the only way to put ourselves as nearly as possible on a par of exchange with that great country is by increasing the volume of our exports there. The history of the United States after the Civil War shows most conclusively that they tackled their biggest problems in the building of canals and railroads on top of the greatest debt that the country had ever shouldered. Their slogan was: Full steam ahead! It seems to me that that would be a splendid motto for us to adopt now in developing our present trade channels and opening up new ones. I cannot conceive why in the trade bulletin which goes to all members all sorts of statistics are to be found about the opportunities for trade in Asia, Europe and Africa, illustrated with beautiful pictures of temples situated on the banks of the sacred rivers of the East, and of gondolas on the Venetian canals, while the possibilities of trade with over one hundred millions of people right at our door are apparently ignored. My hon. friend says that the United States has eighty-four consular agents and subsidiary officers here—although I think he would be nearer the mark if he stated the number at fifty-two—all active, energetic men pushing the sale of United States goods in Canada, while we are left to the tender mercies of the British consular agents in the United States. What do the latter care for the trade of Canada? They are in the United States for the purpose of increasing the trade of England, Ireland and Scotland. Undoubtedly the English people are the greatest traders in the world. They are alive to the necessity of keeping their mercantile marine busy, and they do it through the medium of foreign trade. Here we are, close to that vast market with only an imaginary boundary line between us, and it is scarcely credible that the Administration will send its trade agents to foreign climes, thousands of miles away, and neglect the American market right at our door. The minister says that his trade agents abroad are very satisfactory, but I have a recollection of being in the office of one of those gentlemen —I will give his name to the minister privately, as it is something I do not like to speak of publicly. This was some years ago before the present minister was in charge of the Department of Trade and Commerce. I saw the sign, and I went in and interviewed the commissioner, purely out of my desire as a Canadian to know what was going on in relation to Canadian trade. He was a kindly gentleman and a pleasant conversationalist, but before leaving he asked me if I could get for him at Ottawa a map of Canada to put upon his office wall. I said, "Surely you have a map?" He replied, "No, and I need one very much." He also wished me to send him a little atlas which the Canadian Government published and which would be more convenient to him than a map when giving information to callers about Canada and her resources. On my return home I sent him the map and atlas. I am sure that had that been brought to the attention of the right hon. minister who is now head of the department it in itself would have caused a shaking up of the dry bones of the trade commissioners who represent Canada, and would have led to the fitting out of their offices in such a manner as would enable them to talk intelligently about the country they represent and to give to prospective traders all the information likely to promote Canadian trade.

not only information about goods but where the people are and who can supply them—how far it is from Montreal, how far from Toronto and so on. The minister may suggest that surely the trade agent knew that. Well, he had not a map by which to explain it to anybody, and he needed it. It does seem to me that the department should take for its motto: "Full steam ahead." These trade commissioners should be properly equipped and informed as to what is necessary in the best interests of our country. Moreover, there should be established at points such as those referred to by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) independent Canadian trade agents for the express purpose of working in Canada's interests. I have heard no objections to the adoption of that course. The remarks of the hon. member for Parkdale with regard to the expense are much to the point. The fees received by the United States consular agents are, I gather from his remarks, sufficient to pay all the expenses of the American offices here. Surely it would be advisable to try it out, establishing only a few offices at first at the most advantageous points on the other side. The fact that we are doing $500,000,000 worth of trade or thereabouts each year with the United States is in itself an assurance that the cost of establishing and maintaining the offices would be made up by fees, as is the case with the United States offices in Canada. In other words, the offices of these Canadian trade agents would be practically self-sustaining. I leave that suggestion with the minister—full steam ahead on the specific line of the development of Canadian trade, making the Canadian seller of goods, the Canadian wholesaler, the Canadian manufacturer, feel that he has the loyal and active co-operation and assistance of the Government. Even if he is slow himself, he would give the Government credit for having pointed the way to the development and expansion of trade. Moreover, the adoption of this course and the resulting increase of trade would soon have the effect of adjusting the balance of trade as between Canada and the United States.

Mr. FIELDING: Mr. Chairman, "full steam ahead" is an excellent motto if you accompany it with another: "Be sure you are right, then go ahead." I need hardly say I sympathize most heartily with every effort to improve our trade relations with the United States; therefore the object that the member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) has in view is one with which I am in accord. But I am inclined to think that the argument in favour of trade agents in the United States is not as strong as some people think it is. There is very much force in the view advanced by the minister that one of the reasons why we do not need trade agents in the United States is because we are so near to that country. My hon. friend from Perth (Mr. Morphy) thinks that the fact that we are so near to them is a reason why we should have trade agents there. But you need trade agents in distant ports because distant ports have no convenient means of communicating with us.

Mr. MORPHY: Not only does the United States have consular agents in Canada, but our country is overrun with their commercial travellers.

Mr. FIELDING: Is there any reason why we should not have commercial travellers in the United States? Do our merchants and manufacturers need Government assistance in the matter of sending their travellers to the United States? I do think, however, that the argument in favour of the maintaining of trade agents in distant countries which are not conveniently in communication with Canada is a strong one.

Mr. MORPHY: The reason why the commercial travellers come here from the United States is because the trade agents of the United States tell them what they can sell here—encourage them and bring them here.

Mr. FIELDING: Oh no, it is because they learn from the morning newspaper all about Canada. Of course, in exceptional cases trade agents might advantageously be maintained in certain parts of the United States. The member for Parkdale suggested New Orleans, which is rather distant from Canada. There might be exceptional circumstances under which our having a trade agent at a particular point would be useful, and so far from discouraging it I would cordially support the minister in adopting any suggestion of that kind. But the idea that we should have these trade agents all over the United States is open to the gravest objection. A man who wants to do business between New York and Montreal does not need any trade agents; he can get nearly all the information he wants for a postage stamp, or he can leave by the evening train and arrive in Montreal on the morning of the next day, and vice versa. I am persuaded that the business relations between Canada and the United States will be almost as good without trade agents as with them, unless under such exceptional conditions as I have mentioned. It is my recollection that years ago we had a trade agent in Chicago. We found that he was not needed; that he was not accomplishing anything of a practical nature, and I believe that he was sent to some other part of the country. If you appoint seventy or eighty agents of Canada in the United States and they collect fees on American goods coming in, as is suggested, that will be an additional tax upon the Canadian people who bring the goods in. Whether we want them to bring those goods in is another question. It is their liberty to do so; the tariff permits it. But if you have a large army of Canadian agents in the United States and bring about the imposition of that additional tax, it may suit some interests in the country but it will not suit the consumer. It may be said that the object of maintaining these trade agents is to check the exports and adjust the balance of trade. Well, I do not think that is the best way to do it. We do not want to impose unnecessary taxation upon any part of our people. I repeat that in special cases, such as at New Orleans or other distant ports—even, perhaps, at New York or Boston—we might well have trade agents, but the idea of having a large army of them in the United States ought not to be too readily accepted. I am rather in sympathy with the view expressed by the minister that our proximity to the United States is one of the reasons why we do not need an army of agents in that country.

Mr. MORPHY: The hon. gentleman is most delightful in exaggerating to suit his own purpose. I have not yet heard any one speak about a "large army" of trade agents. I purposely suggested the advisability of starting with a few agents with a view to determining the advantages of the plan. I admit that the hon. gentleman has had vast experience and it is with diffidence that I dispute his suggestion in regard to this matter. But I have come across Americans who do not know this country as we know the United States—people who believe that this is a country of ice and snow, a country of Indians and bears. I am not sure that it would not be a good thing for Canada to send a moving picture show to the United States with a view to depicting the activities in our large cities, the beauty and extent of our lakes and rivers, the value of our steamship services, and so on—in short, to educate those people down there who are apparently backward so far as a knowledge of Canada is concerned.

Mr. CURRIE: Our railways.

Mr. MORPHY: Our railways would also be an object lesson. Why, some people who plan to visit Canada in the summer think that they are coming to the frigid zone and that they should bring their winter clothes; the fact is that they do not know us. These trade agents would make them know us, would make them know our trade capacity, would do a great many things. The hon. gentleman speaks about a large army; I want to remind him that this is not war time. That is not language that is justifiable in answer to what I have stated as a matter of principle. Nobody is talking about a "large army," an expression that was repeated three or four times by the hon. gentleman. My idea is to attempt to establish the principle of expansion of trade in that way. I asked the minister definitely and specifically if he did not wish to take a number of men and put them in that position to try to work out that scheme. The United States to-day is filled with the brightest brains of Canada in the services of banking, railways and other activities. Is it to be said that Canada cannot send men to expand our trade, when the United States is draining our country of some of the best brains we have for some of its greatest activities? I am surprised that the hon. gentleman has so little faith in the ability of our young men. I can safely point to the cities of Halifax, Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver, and I can pick out fifty men as bright as any commercial agent that ever lived, who could go out and do equally good work for Canada as these United States agents are doing here. It is not right to belittle the idea that we have potentialities in our manufactures in Canada.

Mr. CURRIE: Would it not be better for us to establish trade commissioners at home to take that billion dollars worth of trade the Americans get here at the expense of our manufacturers? That would be starting the business at home.

Mr. MORPHY: That is a general principle with which I think both sides of the House would agree, but they may fail to agree upon the proper method of carrying it out. They have failed to come together on a straight national policy. I am prone to think, and I want to say right now, that one of the weaknesses in our Canadian national life is the fact that while in this chamber there are men, who believe in a certain policy for the welfare, expansion, growth and swelling of the activities of Canada, for those things that will go to bring us above the debt that burdens us, the one thing in the way is partisanship on the part of men who will surrender their conviction for the sake of the fetish of a party name. Men on the other side, ardent protectionists, willing to build up the country in that way, will vote for a reduction in the tariff in order to get into office.

Mr. FIELDING: The zeal of my hon. friend (Mr. Morphy) in favour of better relations with the United States is exceedingly interesting. I will not say it is amusing, because that would not be courteous to my hon. friend. I will not say it is surprising, although I might say that in view of certain events which occurred not very long ago. My hon. friend had something to say about men belittling the young men of the country. I do not know who did so, I certainly have not said anything of the sort. If there are these hundreds and thousands of able young men throughout the country, by all means let them go to the United States as commercial travellers or anything else, if they are wanted. I believe they can go without any Government assistance. The only portion of my hon. friend's remarks with which I can agree is that of advertising Canada by films and so forth. He must have been asleep or absent this afternoon and evening; otherwise he would have known that my right hon. friend (Sir George Foster) explained at great length this afternoon that the Government are doing that now. It is a good service, I commend my right hon. friend for doing it. I am willing to accept the assurance of the minister that he is doing it now. My hon. friend seems to assume that the minister is not doing it and that some movement of that kind is necessary.

Mr. MORPHY: I was absent this afternoon when that information was given to the committee. I was not aware of it.

Mr. FIELDING: I thought not.

Mr. MORPHY: I do not know that there was any crime in my not being in the House at the moment. As to the gratuitous suggestion of my being asleep in the House, that is a pleasure which, since I have been a member of the House of Commons, I have never once enjoyed.

Mr. BUTTS: You do not know what you have missed.

Mr. MORPHY: I hope hon. gentlemen opposite have as clean a sheet upon that subject as I. The point that I make is merely fringed by what the hon. gentleman said a little time ago about commercial travellers. I would organize them or have the State take it upon itself to organize them as commercial agents and send them out. That is the difference between the hon. gentleman and myself. He is willing to admit the value of the trade and ardently desires the trade. I ardently desire to get it. The only difference is that he does not agree with the principle of the Government assisting to develop Canadian trade. What is the Department of Trade and Commerce for, unless it is for that very thing, —the development of the trade of Canada for the benefit of the people of Canada? If that be so, we have at our doors a market of 100,000,000 people who are crowding upon us and selling and dumping their goods upon us, through the activities of their trade agents and consular officers, but we are pusillanimous enough to say: "We will not do the same thing; we will go to them."

Mr. FIELDING: I am sorry to dissent from my hon. friend. He intimates that I am complaining of the Government. He is complaining of the Government; I am commending the Minister of Trade and Commerce for what he is doing. The hon. gentleman is doing his best to make it appear that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is neglecting his work. I am standing by the Government in this matter; my hon. friend is attacking them.

Mr. MORPHY: I am attacking the Government in this way: I believe it is the duty of every member of this House who has opinions, to express them freely.

Mr. CAHILL: Except when there is a vote on.

Mr. MORPHY: I do not know that that is an exception that it is not wise to follow when you have on one side of the House—

Mr. LEMIEUX: The patriots.

Mr. MORPHY: The hon. gentleman may have a right to talk about patriotism. He himself has it, but it is coming pretty close to some hon. members opposite who dare not say very much about it.

Mr. CAHILL: As much as the other side.

Mr. MORPHY: As to the vote, I have shown independence in this House in voting occasionally against the Government. I would like to know if the hon. gentleman ever did so in his life. Nobody ever heard of his doing so. He has been a party slave.

Mr. CAHILL: I have always voted against the Government.

Mr. MORPHY: That is pretty cheap and very well put in. I meant against the hon. gentleman's leader and party and policy. He knew very well what I meant. People who live in glass houses should not throw stones. I am not attacking the Government because the Government has not inaugurated this policy. There is no attack about the matter; I want them to carry out this policy; that is all.

Mr. NESBITT: There has been more or less discussion about charges made by consular agents of the United States. What are their charges for? When I have gone to export goods to the United States, I have never heard of being charged by them.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Before I answer that question, I want to address a word to my hon. friend (Mr. Morphy), who has spoken so eloquently to-night. I am afraid he has been asleep a bit. I am inclined to agree with my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Fielding) that he does occasionally take a nap.

Mr. MORPHY: No.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If not in the House, certainly somewhere else.

Mr. MORPHY: Not while the House is in session.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend charged me and the Government because we were so dilatory that we did not give the names of our trade commissioners, and he thought I might at least get up and read them. Then, afterwards, he showed an intimate acquaintance with the bulletins. He had looked at the Ganges as it was portrayed in the bulletin, had seen a sacred temple here and Bangkok there, but he never knew, and does not know now, who our trade commissioners are, though every edition of the bulletin has the names of every one of our trade commissioners, and where they are stationed. If my hon. friend would just read that page of the bulletin he would have that information.

Mr. MORPHY: I have seen the names, but I want them put on record so that the country will know them.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The country sees them as well as my hon. friend. They are everywhere throughout the country.

Mr. MORPHY: Oh, no, they are not.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is not a business house in this country that has not the bulletin on its table, and that does not know where every one of our trade agents is stationed.

Mr. NESBITT: That is right.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is not a trade commissioner in the service now who does not visit Canada once in every two years and make a tour of the whole Dominion from one end to the other; he talks with the merchants and manufacturers, interchanges information, gets the information that he needs, and goes back again to his field with the best possible equipment that can be given to him. My hon. friend was unfair to the service in resuscitating ancient history to the extent of giving a description of a trade commissioner of this Government who had not a map of Canada in his office and had to ask my hon. friend for a copy. That must have been in the dim and dusty ages of long ago. I do not think my hon. friend could find such a trade commissioner now. It rather grates on the commissioners, who are putting their best efforts into their work of securing trade for Canada along the most instructed and best possible lines, to be held up in the House of Commons as of the same type as that antediluvian of whom my hon. friend spoke, and who had to ask him for a map and a book that he wanted. All our agents are thoroughly furnished, all who are in the field now are intelligent men, and I believe that the exceptions are very few where these men are not absolutely devoted to their work and doing it with a spirit and elan which is entirely satisfactory. I have more to do with them than has my hon. friend, and when he gets a little leisure and goes out into foreign countries, I want him to go into the offices of our trade commissioners and talk with the men who are performing this service, and I know when he comes back he will have a higher opinion of them.

Now, let us come back for a moment to the stationing of the men in the United States. We have to do it on a wholesale plan if it is to be made self-supporting. You cannot place an agent in New York, or New Orleans, pay him by charges which he is authorized to make upon invoice of goods shipped from his locality, and not treat other parts of the United States where we trade in the very same way. It would not be fair to our own merchants; it would not be fair in any sense. We would in that case have to foot the whole expense, and not charge it upon the United States. I do not think there is any getting away from that, and that is one thing I want hon. members to think over as one of the difficulties in the way. It must be a wholesale business or none. We have to put at least one or two hundred men in the United States to cover the vast area where our people do business. The business is so widely distributed that you cannot mark off a little zone in one part of the United States, say to every man who trade from Canada in that zone that he must pay $2.50 on every invoice, or three per cent on the value of the goods, or whatever it is, and not subject his competitor who buys from other parts of the United States to the very same charge, because it is said in the United States, and it will be said with us, that it is really the purchaser in the United States who has to pay this invoice charge. But the matter does not go only that far. We must also take foreign countries into account. Some foreign countries do the same as the United States. They charge upon the invoice, either a percentage of its value, or a certificate of charge. A number of countries do that. These are some of the things we have to take into account.

In reply to the question of my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), the United States consuls certificate the invoice and charge $2.50, whether the invoice is for $200 or $20,000. Other countries, the South American States particularly, follow a different plan. There are two or three of them that make a flat charge, but the others make a percentage charge of from 1 to 3 per cent upon the value of the goods. France has a flat charge, I think, and some other countries a percentage charge. It is a large subject, and I have mentioned a few of the things that we must consider before we jump into it. That is what I and the Government are trying to do before making up our minds as to the policy to be adopted. I am quite in accord with my hon. friend as to the necessity of being alive and active.

My hon. friend also alluded to publicity by means of films, evidently without the knowledge that we had been engaged in that work for a couple of years, and were pushing it. As I said this afternoon, there are probably three or four millions of people who in the United States see these films depicting our sources, our productive processes, the beauties of our scenery, and everything in connection therewith. They are learning of Canada through the eye, and what is learnt in this way impresses itself on the mind. Every picture has a title which fixes on the mind one important fact with reference to what is being shown. It is a fine way of cultivating the interest and of expanding the knowledge of people.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I was very much interested in the remarks made by my hon. friend from North Perth (Mr. Morphy). As I listened, approving to a certain extent the remarks which he delivered this evening, I thought of ten years ago and asked myself, how it is that the hon. gentleman has reversed so completely his policy? I suppose, Mr. Chairman, that if in the year 1911 you and I, belonging to the same party and to the same league, had been suddenly transported to the beautiful county of Perth we would probably have heard very different sentiments from those the hon. gentleman has expressed here to-night. My hon. friend is most anxious now to develop trade with the United States. We should have, he says, young Canadian emissaries in every centre of American activity from east to west and north to south, and our motto should be the old Yankee motto after the Civil War, "Full steam ahead." We should attract American capital to Canada, and boost Canada in the U. S. What a change of heart, Mr. Chairman! Why, I am sure that the hon. members opposite in 1911, with the right hon. gentleman leading the chorus—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not sing.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Probably not the swan song; but the right hon. minister had a ebautiful clarion voice in 1911, and he sang the well known refrain: "No truck nor trade with the Yankees" and "Under which flag?" Canada first, Canada last, and Canada for ever!" By the way, I would suggest to my hon. friend from Perth that the real motto of our trade agents in the U.S. should be, not "full speed ahead,'" but the old Macdonald motto, the old Blake motto: "Canada first." That would be my motto in the United States of America. Mr. Chairman, trade will find its level just as water will, and it is not through a high tariff wall that you will attract trade to your country. There was, in 1911, a splendid and unique opportunity for Canada to develop a sound, healthy and prosperous trade with the United States. We had sought for that opportunity since the abrogation of the first reciprocity treaty in 1866. Sir John A. Macdonald in 1872, Mr. George Brown in 1874, Sir John Macdonald again in 1879, Sir Charles Tupper, and my right hon. friend, in 1891, indeed, all the leaders of public opinion on both sides of politics, for practically half a century, clamoured and clamoured in vain for the return of the golden era between 1854 and 1866. And in 1898, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the last of our great statesmen who have disappeared from public life, after vain efforts to renew that reciprocity treaty, said at last: We shall make no more pilgrimages to Washington.

In the year 1910 the hon. gentleman sitting beside me (Mr. Fielding), who presided over the Treasury Department, having made a great name for himself as Minister of Finance, was invited for the first time in the history of our relations with the United States, to go, not to Washington, but to meet half way, at Albany, I believe, the representatives of the American Government with a view to securing to the United States the benefit of a reciprocity pact with Canada. He came back with the very same offer—there were perhaps a few items, more or less, changed, but it was practically the same—which had been on our statute book since 1879, because the National Policy, of which the right hon. gentleman is so proud, was based on a permanent standing offer of reciprocity in natural products with the United States. If my hon. friend will refer to the statute of 1879, he will see, in black and white, that the National Policy was launched with a view to obtaining a reciprocity pact with the United States. In that statute there is a permanent standing offer of reciprocity with them in natural products. My hon. friend, I say, went to the United States, where he met the chief of the executive and succeeded in obtaining from their Government a pact which no one can deny was the best commercial agreement ever reached by us with the United States. When it was presented to Parliament it was received with applause on both sides of the House. It made for better relations with the Republic to the south of us, not only in trade matters, but socially as well. We cannot forget that they are our neighbours and it is well for us to have cordial relations with them.

But the right hon. gentleman and my hon. friend from Perth (Mr. Morphy) were among the chief offenders in 1911. From one end of the country to the other they abused the United States and the American people, and, not satisfied with that, they accused the great statesman who had negotiated the agreement, as well as his fellow-workers in the Canadian Government of being traitors. We know what the result was, because you and I, Mr. Chairman, were of the minority elected on that policy in 1911. Now, I repeat, if you wish to develop trade with the United States, the larger part of that business being agricultural,—because Canada is a great farming country—what is most essential is a market for our farm products. The manufacturers can take care of themselves. We have a great many manufacturing establishments in the province of Ontario and in Quebec, and I know that to a certain extent, from statistics available, they can compete in many lines even with the Americans. The trade which we must promote the most is that of our agricultural products with the United States. I am afraid that it must be said of my right hon. friend, as it was said of the statesmen of Europe in the last century who were responsible for the criminal partition of Poland, that since 1911 he has been in a state of mortal sin, because he helped by word of mouth, aye by incendiary speeches, to defeat the reciprocity pact that would have provided so much business for Canada.

If that agreement were in effect to-day, we should not have the adverse balance of trade which has been deplored in a way that ill became a Canadian minister who spoke in New York the other day. By the way, I do not think it is the proper way of improving our relations with the Americans, either commercially, politically, or socially, for any of our ministers to bewail at meetings there the fact that we are buying too much from the United States. I did not like the attitude of the right hon. gentleman at that New York banquet a few weeks ago; he is usually better inspired. Nor do I like the speeches of his colleague, the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), who keeps on repeating to our good people not to buy from the Americans. That is not a position of which a Canadian minister can be proud. No: The blunder was made in 1911, when a campaign of prejudice was preached in the back concessions to defeat the commercial agreement between Canada and our great neighbour to the south. A flag-flapping campaign was organized and vigorously executed to defeat that arrangement. I can remember that some farmers from the province of Ontario, when they heard that a reciprocity pact had been negotiated, sent telegram after telegram of congratulations to my hon. friend, some of them affirming that the value of their farms would be doubled and trebled by the effect of that agreement. Sir, do you not see to-day that the wave of discontent and unrest which exists in the great farming communities of Canada, in Ontario and in the West, is due largely to the treacherous policy in 1911, of the party that faces me to-night? Why did you prevent the Canadian farmer from selling his products? The pact did not affect the manufacturers. You have created grievances which to-day have come back with a vengeance. This is plain talk, but the right hon. gentleman knows that I am speaking the unvarnished truth.

Now, as to the campaign against the United States. If you wish to promote trade with the United States, if you are so anxious to get an export market for Canadian products in that country, why do not hon. gentlemen opposite stop the campaign of vilification against the Americans—carried on here in the city of Ottawa, there in the city of Toronto? I have here a review which is published under the auspices of the Government party called The Onlooker. What do I read in that review? My hon. friend from Perth wishes to send Canadian trade agents into the United States. I wonder if the following from The Onlooker of March, 1921, is conducive to better trade relations with the Americans:

> At the back of the brain of the average American there lies the conviction that sooner or later but one flag will fly over the whole surface of the North American continent from the North Pole to the Isthmus of Panama. He calls it, and has called it for years, "Inevitable Destiny". We do not blame him. The genuine native-born American has many lovable qualities. . . . The danger may not be immediate, but in dim outline it already looms vast on the national horizon and fills some of us with apprehension.

Reference is made to the designs, "the sinister designs" of the average American against Canada. Further on the article says:

> It is not the cultivated American, half of whose heart, and almost the whole of whose culture, is in Britain, we dread. It is not spiritual and intellectual America we fear. It is commercial America we doubt. For commerce is impersonal, without sentiment, and takes no cognizance of those higher things that illuminate and enrich the national life. So far, indeed, as the soul is concerned, gold is the deadliest of narcotics.
> The true danger lies in scarcely recognized impersonal tendencies with which kindly expressions of goodwill have little or nothing to do.

My hon. friend can see to what danger he is exposing himself and his good people when he wants to get American gold. It is the "deadliest of narcotics" says this Tory publication. Mr. Chairman, let us be frank about this matter. The Americans, when the test came were at one with the British Empire, were at one with the Allies in upholding the cause of civilization and liberty. They have with us practically a common history, common laws, a common language and common ideals. I am speaking of the majority in both countries. What is the object of that pinpricking policy which is aided and subsidized by the funds of a certain party? Do you think you will promote Canadian trade with the Americans by publishing such vicious appeals as these? As to the merits of trade representation in the United States I am inclined to believe that it would not be a bad thing if there were some trade agents in the principal centres of the United States. I do not say that we should have trade agents in every city or town; but there are large centres like Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis, New Orleans, New York and Boston where there should be Canadian trade agents. We were told by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) not long ago, that Canada was a nation, and that so soon as it pleased this country she might appoint consular agents, and even an ambassador at Washington. Why do we not appoint consular agents if we have that potential power? If there is a country in the world where we are interested in having consular agents it is the United States of America. I do not know how it is with my friends of English parentage, but I know as regards those of my nationality, there are in the United States not as many French Canadians as there are in the province of Quebec, but there are certainly over a million and a half of them in that country. The largest French centres, outside of Montreal and Quebec, are in the New England cities—cities like Lowell, Manchester, Boston, Bay City and others. All these cities are large French Canadian centres. There is a coming and going of French Canadians all the time between these cities and our province, and it is strange to think that the invoices and the passports necessitated by that ebb and flow of people have to go before the British consul when we could have a consular agent of our own to look after these matters. As a matter of fact I know, because I have often accepted invitations from Canadian clubs in the United States, that Philadelphia, for instance, is simply an outpost for Toronto, Hamilton and London, as Boston is an outpost for Halifax and St. John. In New York, in Boston, there are at least twenty-five to thirty thousand Canadians. So we are closely connected with the Republic, and it is not by such writings as the one I have just read to the committee that we will improve our relations, commercial and otherwise, with the Americans. Remember, Mr. Chairman, that the first trade treaty of 1854 with the United States was negotiated at a time when it meant the salvation of Canada from a national point of view. Remember that the first reciprocity treaty was negotiated with the United States when there was in this country a strongly expressed sentiment in favour of annexation on account of the removal of the British preference following on the establishment of free trade in England. The annexation manifesto was not signed by rebels like myself or like my friends from Gloucester, Vaudreuil and Joliette, it was signed by Sir John Abbott. Sir John Rose, Sir A. T. Galt, Judge Johnson of Montreal—indeed by the best English stock in Canada, by our great merchants and captains of industry. That manifesto was remarkably well drafted. It was transmitted by Lord Elgin to the British authorities, and he warned them that if immediate action was not taken there was a grave danger that Canada would pass under the political domination of the United States. He was at once authorized by the British Government to himself go to Washington and negotiate a treaty. He succeeded in his mission, and that treaty lasted until 1866. We know why it was abrogated: In those days—as to-day unfortunately—there was a class of Canadians always ready to belittle the Americans and to speak of them in uncomplimentary terms. Some of the confederate victories were applauded even in the Canadian Parliament. As a result, when, after the civil war, the time came to renew the treaty the Americans refused. Since 1866 men in both our great parties, men occupying the position of my right hon. friend (Sir George Foster) and the position of my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) have tried in vain to secure the renewal of that treaty. Our statesmen went periodically to Washington with that end in view—Sir John A. MacDonald at the time of the Fisheries Treaty, the Hon. George Brown, Sir Charles Tupper, my right hon. friend, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Sir Richard Cartwright —because by them all, it was considered that the renewal of that trade agreement would be in the best interests of Canada. Ultimately my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's succeeded—but not at his asking. He was solicited by the Americans themselves, by Mr. Taft and Mr. Knox, to enter into a trade compact in natural products. But, unfortunately for Canada, there was a party in this House and in the country which was more anxious to defeat the Liberal government than to give the farmers the great market which Canda had been seeking for upwards of fifty years. Now my right hon. friend is anxious to secure business from the United States. Let him make a confession, and let him have contrition for the mortal sin he committed in 1911. Then we will give him another lease of office, if need be, in order that he may redeem his soul by improving the trade relations between Canada and the great republic to the south of us. I agree that it is not natural that Canada should have this enormous balance of trade against her; the Americans should buy much more than they do from their best customer. The best means towards attaining this worthy object, is to get the American market for our farmers and I know of no better man than the right hon. gentleman to do the trick, if he will undertake it.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, we listened this afternoon to attempts to blacken the record of the little angularly opposite group here in connection with the items that came before this committee. We took part in that discussion, and I do not think it is necessary to follow up any further this political cross-firing. The subject with which we are now dealing is worthy of the most careful consideration. I quite agree with my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) that the best way to accomplish what we require here, if I interpret his view correctly, is by some reciprocal arrangement with the United States. I am satisfied that we will never secure proper trade relations except in that way. However, we have to take conditions as we find them, and we must recognize that while the present Government retain power it is hopeless to expect any move in that direction. As we are not in a position to set to work in the best way, we must adopt the second best, and I am still of the opinion that lies in endeavouring to secure a reception for exports to the United States through trade commissioners. The right hon. gentleman has held up the horrible picture of the necessity of one or two or possibly three hundred trade commissioners to carry out this plan, while the hon. member for Maisonneuve seems to think we might start with a small number. I would be sorry to advance my opinion against gentlemen of such great experience, but as they hold entirely different views I may venture to express the opinion that there is no reason why we cannot start work with a small number of trade commissioners. The hon. member for Maisonneuve has spoken of the necessity of cultivating a market in the United States for our farm products, and I agree with him that that is the only kind of trade which will help us to get rid of the present adverse balance of trade. It is natural that we should supply farm products to our neighbours to the south, and perhaps it is quite as natural that they should supply us with some other things which they can manufacture more cheaply. To my mind any effort to develop along unnatural lines is not likely to succeed. The best and only way of developing trade is along natural lines, that is, to purchase those things which can be more cheaply manufactured in other countries, and to export to those countries things which we can produce more cheaply. We have shown our ability to produce farm products as well as any country in the world, and better than our neighbours to the south. Our manufacturers tell us that it is utterly impossible for them to manufacture as cheaply as their competitors in the United States. I do not agree with that. Anyway, it is quite plain that in cultivating profitable trade with our American neighbours we must endeavour to sell to them as much as possible of our farm produce. I daresay that the efforts of our trade commissioners have largely been directed towards the procuring of markets for our manufactured articles, and that is because of the mad notion we have that that is the only way in which the country can be developed. I say it is a mad notion, and the sooner we get rid of it the better. The sooner we come to understand that we should export the things which we can most profitably produce, the better for us and for the world at large.

It is quite plain that we can improve our trade relations with certain countries by means of trade agents, because we are employing them now in different parts of the world. The Americans, who are a shrewd commercial people, believe that they can improve their trade relations in contiguous countries by the appointment of trade agents. They are not spending this money for the pure love of spending it; they believe that they will get some benefit from the expenditure. Possibly one of the reasons for our adverse balance of trade with the United States is found in the fact that the United States is appointing trade agents to look after its export trade to Canada while Canada is making no effort to increase her exports to the United States. I understood the minister to say before six o'clock that the Government were considering this matter. If so, this is the proper time for us to air our views. I am sure that the right hon. gentleman will not be averse to receiving suggestions even from back benchers in this unfortunate group which has been so much abused this afternoon.

Item agreed to.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Before we proceed to another item I want to refer to item 361, which I understand was passed at a late hour last night. I suppose under that item would be included the printing of blue books. In one very useful book issued by the Finance Department, the Public Accounts, there had been published from Confederation up to last year tables of expenditure from the Consolidated Revenue Fund in the various departments, and by one glance at these pages the growth of our expenditure in all the various departments could be readily ascertained. In the issue of the book for 1920 these tables were eliminated, on the ground, as is stated in the first part of the report, of economy. I understand that my right hon. friend is a member of the committee that controls the printing of blue books, and that is the reason why I mention the matter now. I would like him to consider the restoration of these tables. They have been very useful to me and I know that they have been regarded as valuable by many members of the House as well as by men who are not in the House. Year after year I have been asked to send this book to people who value the information that had been given in these tables. Only a few leaves have been cut out by eliminating them, and I certainly think it is false economy. I trust that the minister will take the trouble to look into it, and if he agrees with me, to see that when the book comes out next year these tables are restored.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I certainly will look into it.

Weights and Measures, salaries of inspectors, and staff, $192,460; rent, fuel, travelling expenses, postage, stationery, etc., $125,000; International Bureau of Weights and Measures, $400.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is the reason for the increase?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is due mainly to the reclassification. There is an increase also in contingent expenses for travelling, owing to the fact that we now carry out the inspection of weights and measures throughout the country every year, whereas we formerly did it once in two years. Last year or the year before we increased the fees. When this branch came over to my department I found a surplus of officials, and as some of the older officers are retired they are not being replaced. As a result of these considerations the Weights and Measures Branch for part of the year just passed has for the first time shown a surplus over expenditure. We think, therefore, that we are on the way to making this branch pay for itself.

Item agreed to.

Mail subsidies and steamship subventions—Atlantic Ocean—Canada and Newfoundland, steam service or services between, $35,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: Has the Government commission in charge of the Newfoundland railways, which are really a part of this service, brought about any betterment of the road or any general improvement of the system?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am afraid I cannot say that matters with reference to the railway are being improved. My hon. friend, perhaps, knows something of the situation as regards that road. Newfoundland has had the hardest winter it has had for many years. The road has been practically out of commission for weeks at a time. The company have not entered into any contract yet for steamship service, although they are performing a service between Port aux Basques and North Sydney. They have been pressing us for a larger subsidy. The service is going on, and some of our own vessels have, I think, been put on for part of the time, but the condition of the railroad makes the service very unsatisfactory. I understand, by report, that a commission has been appointed to take into consideration the rearrangement or betterment of the road, but the situation is not very satisfactory at the present time.

Mr. ROSS: I notice, in his annual report, in connection with the Canadian Merchant Marine, the minister states:

Since the commencement of the overseas Government service up to the 31st March, last, 71 voyages have been performed.

And in that number I notice that seven voyages have been performed between Canada and Newfoundland. How are these subsidies entered into? Are they entered into for a term of years? It seems rather inconsistent for us to be building merchant ships and sending them to Newfoundland and also subsidizing vessels of other lines which are apparently competitors. As the Canadian Merchant Marine increases and grows strong, will these subsidies cease and will we do our own work between Canada and Newfoundland?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have not the management of the Canadian Merchant Marine, and none of my appropriations go to the merchant marine, as my hon. friend knows. That is carrying on its services, and it has put on certain services between Halifax and St. John's, Newfoundland. It is putting on some services between Quebec and Newfoundland during the summer season, but neither of those touches this route, which is the link between the end of our Canadian National railways and the terminus of the Newfoundland railway at Port aux Basques.

Mr. ROSS: Why could we not use our own boats to make this connecting link?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We have not used them.

Mr. ROSS: Why should we not?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not know that they would be exactly fitted for that service. Anyway we have reduced the vote by $30,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What became of the old Bruce?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: She came to grief some way or another, I do not know where.

Mr. ROSS: Are these contracts for subsidies made for a term of years or just for one year?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This one is made from year to year.

Mr. ROSS: Would it not be a good thing for the minister to look into the question whether it would not be wise to cut off this subsidy and use our own boats? They would not be all too busy.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have looked into that, and in some cases we have taken off the subsidy where our boats are doing the work to-day. You cannot make all these substitutions at once. I am not sure whether our own boats can be used on this route at all. That, however, is a matter to be considered.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am afraid that the cutting down of this subsidy has rather paralyzed this service. For quite a number of years, as the minister knows, the Reid Newfoundland company was getting a subsidy of $70,000, and with that subsidy, the water end of the service was carried on very satisfactorily; they carried many passengers and large quantities of freight between the terminus of the National railways at North Sydney and Newfoundland. But ever since this cut was made, things have been paralyzed. There are no proper boats where there used to be a daily service and two boats on continuously. I think my right hon. friend will find that there is only one boat now, the Kyle, that can really be called a boat that is fitted for the service. The Reid Newfoundland company contend that they cannot enter into a contract to carry the mails, but the mails between Canada and Newfoundland are very large. As far as I know, they go from North Sydney to Port aux Basques, or when they cannot go to Port aux Basques, they go to St. John's. It is rather a serious thing so to cut this subsidy as to strike a blow at an old service like this. This route was established some twenty-five years ago when the first Bruce was built. The first Bruce was lost, and the second Bruce, which was an equally good boat, was commandeered by the British Government and sent to Russia as an icebreaker during the war. She has never come back, and I suppose she became a Russian boat long ago. The company would like to get a satisfactory condition again as they had before the war to carry on the service, and I am afraid that this cutting the subsidy by one-half is not going to enable us to have that service. My home town is the terminus of the road and the starting point for trade with Newfoundland. When I talk about that service, people might think I am talking about my home town, but the service is of very little advantage to us. The boat comes and goes; travellers land at North Sydney and take passage to all parts of the world; large quantities of freight come and are switched down to the wharf and the stuff goes on to the boat and off to Newfoundland. The service means very little to us, but nevertheless it is a magnificent source of trade. Our Canadian trade with Newfoundland is very large, and unless we have proper means of handling it, we cannot hope to keep it going. If a man in Newfoundland buys a few cars of flour and they stand for six weeks on the wharf at North Sydney and are not taken across to meet the necessities of his trade, he is not very likely to repeat his order in that way. We have keen competition from Americans who have water advantages that we have not. When I bring this matter to the attention of the minister and of the Government, it is not a local matter at all; it is the broad question of Canadian trade with a British country such as Newfoundland is, a country that is willing to trade with us. It came out the other day that we were competing with ourselves. We are competing with ourselves in this trade by putting on boats at Halifax and carrying stuff from that port to Newfoundland instead of letting it all go by the one route. I can readily understand that the Government boats are not fit for the trade between Port aux Basques and North Sydney, so far as passengers are concerned, but they can certainly carry freight. I have been in conversation with the minister several times about the betterment of the terminus at Norh Sydney. This is not a local matter at all. It is a matter of just as much concern to the man who ships a carload of flour from Manitoba to Newfoundland as it is to the people of North Sydney, that there should be proper facilities at the terminus of the road for handling the business that goes there. For the last three years, at all events, we have been promised from day to day that the wharves would be extended and that better facilities would be provided at that point. So far I have not heard this year whether that is to be done or not, and I am simply doing my duty in bringing this matter to the notice of the Department of Trade and Commerce, which seems to be particularly the one that functions along this line. If the people of Canada find that their trade with Newfoundland is falling off, they will know that the cause to some extent is that we are not in a proper position to handle expeditiously the traffic that now exists, and that has been growing very satisfactorily during the last 25 years. While the trade was very small at the beginning, it is very substantial now, and I hope that the minister, so far as he can do so, will see that everything is done to hold the trade we now have, and develop it as much as possible.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Repairs and improvements are now being made on our end of the road, but the trouble is at the Port aux Basques end. The trouble is with the railway accommodation in Newfoundland itself. It has happened again and again that vessels loaded at the Sydney side have gone over to the other side and have had to bring back part of their cargo, in whole or in part, because it could not be accommodated there. The service which was meant to be a daily service when we paid the heavy subsidy is now at best a tri-weekly service. With poor equipment, a bad road, no accommodation at Port aux Basques, and only a tri-weekly service, the trade is going in some respects through other channels. Our own vessels of the merchant marine are going from Halifax to St. John's, Newfoundland, which is the objective of most of the traffic. They are also putting on a service which will serve Prince Edward Island and go from there direct to St. John's, Newfoundland. Everything that can possibly be done to keep the connection on this route, I think, we have a right to do, and I am disposed to do it.

Mr. McKENZIE: Perhaps on this item I might ask a question of the minister in reference to the new route that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries hinted the other day would be established between Montreal and Newfoundland, via Charlottetown. I take it that the intention is to go to St. John's, Newfoundland. I understand that the Board of Trade of North Sydney has been in communication with the Department of Trade and Commerce or the Department of Marine and Fisheries with a view to getting the boats to call at North Sydney or Sydney. The right hon. gentleman knows that in going from Charlottetown to St. John's, Newfoundland, the Isle of Cape Breton is pretty much in the track of the boat. The boats will require bunkering, of course, and instead of bunkering at Montreal or St. John's, where the price of coal is very heavy, I would submit that as a matter of business the boats should bunker at North Sydney, where they can get coal at the pit's mouth, as the saying is. As my good friend from South Cape Breton, who is now sitting beside the minister, knows, that is the spot for the boat to bunker. While there she could also take on passengers and freight for Newfoundland, and on the return voyage carry coal back from North Sydney to Montreal or Quebec. If this service is established, I think it would be a great mistake to give the go-by to a place like North Sydney or Sydney, where a trade could be developed, and where the boats could get the coal they need very much cheaper than at Montreal or St. John's. The coal they would get at Montreal would have come from North Sydney in the first place, and would have added to it the expense of hauling. So, as a pure matter of business, I would impress upon the minister the advisability of adopting the suggestion I have made.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That matter has already been represented and is being considered by the Mercantile Marine company, which is anxious to get all possible traffic which will pay, and to bunker at the cheapest places.

Item agreed to.

Canada and the West Indies or South America, or both, steam service or services between, $340,666.66.

Mr. FIELDING: Would the minister explain the present condition of tnat contract, who are the contractors, and what are the ports of call?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The same contractors.

Mr. FIELDING: The Royal Mail Steam Packet company?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, their contract was first for five years. Then the war intervened and we have been keeping it on from year to year. At the present time, as a part of the arrangement we are making with the West India Islands for a larger preference, there is a proposition for an improved service, and if possible, a weekly service. Of course my hon. friend knows that up to the present time everything has been at peak prices. We are simply continuing this for another year in order to give us an opportunity of getting an improved service, a weekly service if possible should the trade warrant it.

Mr. FIELDING: Most of our Government ships, I am aware, are only freight vessels, but I understand that in the case of at least one, if not two, of these vessels going to the West Indies passenger accommodation has been provided. Are these boats now running to the same ports as come under this item or different ports.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is a service which runs from Halifax and St. John, Halifax mainly, to Jamaica. It touches at the Bahamas, Bermuda and British Honduras, and returns by the same route. We have had no subsidized service on that route, but as a result of the conference we had with the West Indian delegates two vessels of the mercantile marine were fitted up with certain passenger accommodation, enough for about thirty passengers, and have been put upon that route. They will be regularly kept on that route. Jamaica and Honduras pay a certain amount. If the agreement is carried through, they bind themselves to pay a certain portion of any deficit that may occur as their contribution towards maintaining the service. Two trips have already been made, I think, and both, so far as I have learned, have been successful.

Mr. FIELDING: They are not in any sense competing with this line?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No; they have a different route entirely.

Mr. FIELDING: Do they not call at Bermuda?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If this line calls at Bermuda there might be some competition; just with reference to that point, and just now when it is brought to my attention, I am not sure that these steamers do call there.

Mr. FIELDING: They formerly did.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, this line does, but the other line I have spoken of does not.

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend himself said that they went to Bermuda. I have no knowledge of the matter but I took it from what he said that the Government steamers are calling there.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am not so certain about that, but I know that Jamaica is the chief port, and from there they go to British Honduras.

Mr. FIELDING: Do they go to Nassau too?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: They touch at the Bahamas.

Mr. CAHILL: What practical advantage is there to Canada from the expenditure of this money?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This is the only regular service we have between Canada and the whole ring of West India islands and Demerara, the whole comprising the Windward and Leeward islands. It is absolutely essential to have this service if we are to promote trade between ourselves and those colonies. Whilst we have so far been carrying on this service entirely at our own expense, the West India islands touched by that route will, under the new agreement, pay a certain proportion of the subsidy which is necessary to maintain the service.

Mr. CAHILL: What practical results accrue to Canada from this service? Do we get any business that we should not otherwise get? Do we sell goods there which, without the service, we could not sell?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If the hon. member will take the trouble to look over the trade returns he will find that there has been a very large increase in the total trade, both imports and exports, between ourselves and these islands.

Mr. CAHILL: Carried by these boats?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, this is the only regular line that visits them, and it is the best service that we have ever had. The returns show the benefit of it.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I see that Demerara is one of the ports which it is intended to serve this year.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, two of the Mercantile Marine boats have been going there.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Are they under the control of the company that has the contract?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No, they are run by the Mercantile Marine.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Then the Mercantile Marine is competing with the company?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: That does not seem to be business.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is business in one way, although in another way it introduces a complication, and it is one of the problems with which we are dealing.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It ought to be dealt with in a sound and sensible commercial way. The same thing happened, I understand, in the service between Halifax and Newfoundland, and created considerable confusion and friction. Four companies were competing for the business between St. John's and Halifax, and the business was so small that it afforded no profit to any of the ships running on the route, but they did their best to keep the boats going. In the face of this, the Government suddenly entered the arena, and broke up the little trade there was, making it unprofitable for all concerned. There was not enough traffic to make it worth while for four companies to operate but they endeavoured to keep up the service and divided the work. The Government boats came in but did not reduce the freight by one cent. I am told they adopted the same schedule of freight paid to the commercial boats and simply made the business unprofitable for everyone; no one got any good out of it. Now, if that policy is to be pursued in the West Indies as well as in Newfoundland I think it is time the minister or someone in the Government took this matter into consideration. It seems to me to be very unbusinesslike to subsidize a line serving a place like Demerara and then to step in and make that line unprofitable for those who are struggling to keep it up. Nobody engaged in private business would think of doing such a thing. I hope my hon. friend will give this matter some attention and either keep the Minister of Marine away from these places or else discontinue the subsidy.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is a portion of the year in which it is very convenient to have extra vessels on the route. This is during the sugar season, when the amount of sugar to be moved is greater than the regular service can handle. There is the difficulty which my hon. friend speaks of, but the Mercantile Marine is bound to keep its vessels afloat and, so long as they operate, freights must be got wherever possible. So that there is in this line a competition for a certain part of the year, but these vessels prove a valuable addition during the sugar season because then there is more freight than could otherwise be moved.

Mr. SINCLAIR: This competition will make it unprofitable for the private company and next year the minister will find them asking for an increased subsidy. That is what I wish to avoid. There should be no competition of this kind. The Government have full control of the routes. My right hon. friend fixes the rates obtaining on the subsidized routes; they are submitted to him and he approves of them. So that it is not a question of rates, and if the Government step in with their boats and operate over the same lines as these subsidized vessels, the business will be unprofitable to the latter, and inevitably they will come back for increased subsidy. I do not know whether the minister sees my point.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I see the point.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Then I hope it will be given some consideration.

Mr. McKENZIE: The point made by my hon. friend (Mr. Sinclair), is perfectly clear. We have an item of $340,366.60 for a line to the West Indies and South America. Now, we are told that we have our own boats serving a part of that route, so that we are in competition with the vessels running there. Yet the Government is so exceedingly generous that it gives to a company with whom it is competing for trade the sum of $340,000 odd. They give them that magnificent handicap and then boldly and proudly step up and say: We will get plenty of profit notwithstanding this handicap we are giving them. Does it strike my hon. friend as good business that we should be spending $75,000,000 of the people's money in the building of boats and in looking for trade and then when we find an old service established on this route which we intend to work, instead of trying to displace those competitors, give them a subsidy? The Canadian people will not look favourably on that kind of business. We should do one thing or the other; either take these boats away and put them somewhere else and let the other people go on as they did before, or, if we find that there is enough business to warrant competition, discontinue the subsidy. It is an old theory that the moment a water route becomes so profitable that it can stand competition, the subsidy must go. I thought that principle was always recognized by the Government, and if the minister finds that there is enough business for our boats as well as those of this company, let him drop the subsidy.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We cannot drop the subsidy because this is a passenger service.

Mr. CAHILL: The minister should let the item stand until we can have the benefit of the advise of the Minister of Marine, who is in charge of shipping affairs as subordinate to the Minister of Railways, who is in turn under the Board of Management. We should wait until we can get some information to see if this line of ships is really competing with us, and if the subsidy is any longer necessary. This item amounts to about $1,000 per day, which is a good deal of money in these times for the Canadian people to pay, especially when they are paying something like $200,000 a day of a loss on the Canadian National railways. I think the minister should let the item stand until we can see whether there is not some way by which we can save this $1,000 a day.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not think there is any reason for allowing the item to stand. This is a vote which we must have; we must keep that service up; otherwise the whole business would fall to pieces. The boats on this route carried pretty nearly $10,000,000 worth of export freight.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the necessity of maintaining this service when vessels of the Canadian Merchant Marine are available?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The vessels of the Canadian Merchant Marine could not carry on the service at all; they are entirely freight vessels. This is a freight and passenger line, and we must preserve it if we are going to maintain communication between Canada and these islands.

Mr. ROSS: Why not utilize the Canadian Merchant Marine when two of its vessels are also being fitted up for this line?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Not this line.

Mr. ROSS: Then what line is it?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is another line running from Canada to the Bahamas, Jamaica and British Honduras, an altogether different line.

Mr. ROSS: I am very much inclined to agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Cahill) with regard to this particular item. It seems to me that when we are spending $340,000 a year subsidizing boats for a service to the West Indies, and when vessels of the Canadian Merchant Marine make thirty-two trips, apparently, to the same ports that these vessels serve, we might very well effect some economy here.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Not to the same ports; they are thousands of miles apart.

Mr. ROSS: That may be true, but you have now about thirty-nine vessels in the Canadian Merchant Marine and you are about to increase that number to sixty. It seems to me to be inconsistent, and very bad business, to be building vessels for the Canadian Merchant Marine which will have all they can do to operate at a profit if they go on this service, and at the same time subsidizing other lines that will compete with us. It would appear that there is not proper co-ordination between the department of my right hon. friend, and the Department of Marine and Naval Affairs. Under the circumstances, and until we get some explanation from the Minister of Marine that will clear up the uncertainty about this matter, I think the item ought to stand.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): At what ports in South America do the vessels on this service touch?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: These vessels do not run to South American ports.

Mr. FIELDING: Yes, they go to Demerara.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, they do touch at Demarara.

Mr. FIELDING: That is a South American port.

Mr. CAHILL: The minister stated that a trade of $10,000,000 had been developed. Now, I understand this is a passenger line. How many passengers are represented in that $10,000,000? I do not see the necessity for subsidizing passenger service when it is freight we are looking for, and when we have our own freight ships tied up owing to lack of cargoes. The explanation given by the minister is not very illuminating—it does not explain anything. I regret that the member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) is not in his seat. I am sure that if he were here to-night he would express very strong opposition to this policy of granting subsidies for this purpose. I think, therefore, the minister should let this item stand and give my hon. friend from Red Deer an opportunity of condemning the Government for its extravagance.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The $10,000,000 was the value of the export freight carried. In addition there were a number of passengers amounting to something over three thousand.

Mr. CAHILL: And we pay about $100 apiece for carrying these passengers.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We are carrying freight as well as passengers.

Mr. CAHILL: But our own ships are tied up in port waiting for freight to carry. Apparently our own ships are capable of carrying this freight, so we do not need to subsidize this passenger service. What benefit is it to us? Would it not be better for us to do away with this subsidy and let our own vessels attend to whatever freight business there is?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: You might do away with the subsidy but you would also do away with our West Indian trade in so far as the agreement between ourselves and the West Indies is concerned. If my hon. friend were to look into the matter he would not entertain the idea that you could do away with this passenger and freight service. Unfortunately, our own vessels do not carry passengers. If our own vessels had the necessary passenger accommodation there would be no question about employing them, but they do not and there is the difficulty.

Item agreed to.

Canada and South Africa, steamship service between, $146,000.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is the usual vote.

Mr. CAHILL: I would like to have some information about this item. To say "This is the usual vote" is a very poor explanation for these huge expenditures. Are we getting any value for the money? Is it any benefit to the country? Are we getting fifty cents on the dollar, or ten cents on the dollar, or any value at all for our money? We are voting these large amounts from year to year and the minister says in regard to each of them, "It is the usual vote." To say that it is "the usual vote" might perhaps have been satisfactory when we had lots of money, but it is not satisfactory now when we have unusual taxation. The people of this country are sufficiently burdened without our passing large expenditures on any such ground.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If the vote was there before, it is pretty good proof that it was supposed by Parliament to be necessary, and the necessity does not seem to have diminished. Last year about $10,000,000 worth of exports was carried from our country by that route to South Africa. It is the only subsidized service we have between the two countries. During the last ten years our trade with South Africa has greatly improved. Our merchants are largely availing themselves of this service; in fact it is the only traffic line that they can avail themselves of to get to the South African market. The service might be dropped, but our whole trade with South Africa might then be diverted to some other country.

Mr. CAHILL: What is our principal trade with South Africa?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have told my hon. friend that the vessels on this service carried exports to the value of $10,585,000.

Mr. CAHILL: I suppose the products are principally manufactured products that we are now paying the equivalent of a bonus to have manufactured?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes. It is quite necessary that everything they manufacture should be sold. It is part of our trade.

Mr. CAHILL: It is not necessary that the people of Canada should be taxed to find an outlet for the goods of the manufacturer; that is the business.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. CAHILL: We tried that with Roumania. We not only furnished the goods but we paid for them and sent them over there to give the manufacturers something to do. We are taking entirely too much interest in Mr. Manufacturer. He is perfectly capable of taking care of himself, much more so than the farmer or the labouring man who has to pay these subsidies to support the manufacturer. The manufacturer is getting it at both ends; he insists on protection to rob the people here, and not satisfied with that he must rob them again by way of subsidies.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: "Rob" is a good strong word.

Mr. CAHILL: I know of no stronger word. If I did I would use it. There is not any more positive robbery in the world than the robbery of the Canadian people by the Canadian manufacturers with the aid of the Government. I think it is about time we took notice of these things. The Government should say to the manufacturers, "Here, these people will some day revolt against this kind of thing."

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We take notice of these things every year when we discuss these Estimates and pass them.

Mr. CAHILL: We have loaned our gold to every country in the world that cared to borrow it until now we have nothing to base our currency on but cabbages and carrots. But we are not satisfied to buy the manufacturer's goods and sell them to people who will never pay their obligations, we must also provide means for transporting his goods. Do you not think it is time for the people to have a "look-in" instead of continuing to rob them from day to day? My right hon. friend argues that the point of view of the Government is always right. My experience since I have been in the House is that more often their viewpoint is wrong, and they have had to admit that themselves sometimes. We should stop squandering money to ship the manufacturer's goods for him when he is not in a position to pay himself. Let him look after his own business for awhile.

[Mr. Cahill.]

Mr. MAHARG: Does our disadvantage lie in our geographical position or in the incapacity of our manufacturers, or is this subsidy for the purpose of inducing ships to come here and give the manufacturers a cheaper rate? It did not look so serious until the minister said that if we did not vote this subsidy we would lose trade. There must be something wrong somewhere if the holding of this trade is contingent upon the subsidizing of boats to carry our manufactured goods to market.

Mr. ROSS: Does the Government intend putting any of our Mercantile Marine boats on the South African route?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not know. The Government may put on some boats to West Africa. This is to South Africa.

Mr. ROSS: I think we should have information.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The export trade in 1912 amounted to $4,000,000 in round figures, last year to $10,585,000. Our trade has been growing with Africa.

Mr. ROSS: I am not disputing that. I see in 1914 the trade was $3,000,000 and in 1920 it was over $8,000,000. But we should know what is contemplated.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We are putting on our own boats where we can do so. For instance, last year we had a subsidy to a steamship line to Australia amounting to about the same as this. Our own boats have been put on that route and we have withdrawn the subsidy. In so far as our own boats can be substituted to do the work it is our policy to use them.

Mr. ROSS: My right hon. friend is today asking for a subsidy to Australia in the next item $130,000.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is on the Pacific side.

Item agreed to.

Pacific Ocean. Canada and Australia or New Zealand, or both, on the Pacific Ocean, steam service between, $130,509.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): This item appears to be subject to the same criticism I made in regard to the sailings to the West Indies and South America. There are three proposals here now to establish monthly sailings between Canada and Australia.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The first refers to the service that I spoke of a moment ago from the Atlantic seaports to Australia and New Zealand. That has been taken off.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): We are going to establish a service from the Atlantic side by our Government Merchant Marine, and yet subsidize similar services by this vote?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No, not similar services. The service which was carried on for a number of years from the Atlantic ports to Australia and New Zealand was a freight service. For that has been substituted our own vessels, so that subsidy has been withdrawn. On the Pacific side the subsidy I am asking for is contributed by ourselves and New Zealand to a passenger and freight service regularly from Vancouver and Victoria, touching at Fiji and New Zealand and going on to Australia. It is a first-class service. The year before last we gave a subsidy of $180,000, and I have reduced it to $130,000. I should be very sorry to see the subsidy taken away, because I think the service would be withdrawn.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is this one of the C. P. R. boats?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No, the Union Steamship line.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): If the minister would tell us between what ports this service, and the monthly sailings provided by the Department of Marine are to be given, I think we could understand the item.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This line of vessels starts at Vancouver and touches at Victoria.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I am referring to the one on this side.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am referring to the one on the other side.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I have no trouble with the one on the other side. My hon. friend tells me it is the Atlantic service he is going to subsidize.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend and my other hon. friend thought it was the Pacific side. They are confusing that service with the service on the Atlantic side. We had subsidized for several years a service between the Atlantic ports of Canada and ports in Australia and New Zealand. That subsidy has been dropped, because the Mercantile Marine has put its own vessels on it.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): The mercantile marine propose to put two lines of vessels on the Pacific—monthly sailings direct from Vancouver to Australia and monthly sailings direct from Vancouver to New Zealand. Will that be a similar service to that which my hon. friend now proposes to subsidize?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not know the ports at which that service really touches, but if its objective is Australia it will probably touch at Sydney, as is the case with the service proposed to be subsidized. I do not know whether the ports of call are the same in the case of the New Zealand services.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): This is subject to the same criticism as was made in the other case. My right hon. friend is paying his competitor $130,000 to take business away from himself. He should delay the passage of this item until he can consult with the Minister of Marine and ascertain whether or not this subsidy can be dispensed with, as was done in the case of the Atlantic service.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The vessels operated by the Canadian Mercantile Marine on the Pacific are exclusively freight vessels. If we are to have a first-class service between Canada and Australia and New Zealand we must have vessels equipped to carry passengers as well as freight.

Mr. ROSS: Do the vessels of the mercantile marine on the Atlantic carry passengers?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Some of them are equipped to carry passengers. I know that one left Halifax a few days ago with passengers.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Not on that route. The two vessels which have been fitted up for passenger service go to Jamaica, Nassau and British Honduras.

Mr. McKENZIE: There should have been a thorough agreement between the Minister of Marine and the Minister of Trade and Commerce as to the new routes which were to be established. Will the minister say that he was consulted about the various new services which are to be operated by the government-owned boats?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I assure my hon. friend that I am not running the mercantile marine.

Mr. McKENZIE: Then what has been said by the member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) is quite right, that there should be a clear understanding between the Minister of Marine and the Minister of Trade and Commerce on these subjects.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend must remember that the classes of vessels in these respective services are different. One is freight solely; the other must be first class passenger and freight.

Mr. McKENZIE: These services are all for the one people and I do not think it is proper that two departments should act independently when the business is practically the same. Our purpose is to carry trade from Canada to the outside world and vice versa, and if that is to be done by government-owned boats we should not subsidize companies to do the same work. There should be no unnecessary expenditure of the people's money.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It would be very much easier if the classes of vessels were the same.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): How many boats does the subsidized company propose to operate in this service?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: They make a voyage every four weeks, the ports of call being Vancouver, Victoria, Honolulu, Fiji Islands, Auckland, and a port in Australia.

Mr. ROSS: How many passengers do they carry?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In 1919 they carried 9,521. The value of export freight carried was $5,305,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: This line has been subsidized for quite a number of years, I believe, and so fas as the minister has told us there is no complaint of congestion of freight or inability on the part of the service to carry what was offered. If we are getting the necessary service as the result of this subsidy, why put our own boats on the same service when we could use them elsewhere with advantage? We need boats on the St. Lawrence to carry coal to points where it is much needed. Here is a service which is strictly for our own people, and for which a crying need is felt. I see nothing in the proposals of the Minister of Marine which would indicate that any provision is being made for a service of that kind. He does seem to be very solicitous, however, about Australia, New Zealand, and other countries. If the minister can disperse with those far-away voyages and put those vessels on serviceable routes in the very heart of our own country, that is what our people will approve more than speculating where or not they shall get any trade on the Pacific in New Zealand, Australia or any of those far-away ports. The principle seems to be that these boats must be put out of sight somewhere or the people will find fault.

I wish to bring to the notice of the minister something I discovered within the last two days that I did not know before. I find that Norwegian boats which used to carry coal from Nova Scotia to Montreal and St. Lawrence ports are almost prohibited from entering into the trade at all by an Order in Council that was passed in 1902, and although the situation was relieved by an Order in Council which permitted those boats to run, I understand that the last Order in Council permitting them was passed in 1915; and it expired in 1916, so that to-day a Norwegian boat cannot carry on coastal trade in Canada, and it will be very difficult for our coal dealers to get ships to carry their coal.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Those ships cannot do coastal trade in Canada?

Mr. McKENZIE: They cannot carry a pound of freight from one Canadian port to another Canadian port. When we are carrying coal from North Sydney to Montreal, that is, of course, from one Canadian port to another. They cannot handle that trade. Therefore, it is highly important that our boats should do the business—I am not suggesting that they do it for nothing—as cheaply as possible and put us on an independent footing, so that our companies can make contracts with Quebec, Montreal and other places, knowing that they will always have the steamers to carry the coal. The minister is, perhaps, not aware that this is the situation to-day. I have made inquiries of the Marine and Customs Departments within the last two days, and I was positively informed to-night, that no Norwegian boat, nor any other foreign boat, can carry freight between any one port and another in Canada.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Unless they reciprocate with our vessels. I suppose that is the principle.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is the situation now. We have nothing to send to Norway, and there is nothing to do after we get there, so that reciprocity would be of no good to us. I am very glad, for one thing, that we have those ships, and I am sure the minister will keep in mind, in co-operation with the other department, that that is the best service in which they can be used.

Mr. BUTTS: My hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) has spoken a number of times about those ships and about the St. Lawrence coal trade. He referred to the matter several days ago in the House. I think I am not going too far when I tell my hon. friend that I have it on very credible authority that those ships that he speaks of as being tied up in different ports, are now under repairs and being refitted for the coal trade of the coming summer, and that they are now under contract and will likely be in the coal trade carrying coal from Sydney Harbour to Montreal and the different St. Lawrence ports.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That answers the question of my hon. friend.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am glad that the hon. member has come to the assistance of the minister. My right hon. friend did not know what was going on in his department. Now we have it on the highest possible authority that certain repairs are going on and possibly some contracts will be entered into.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend ought to be satisfied.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Another feature of this matter that I do not think the minister has looked into is the enormous expense he will incur in running this service to New Zealand and Australia by these large Governement boats if there is no trade for them. If it is true that the service that we now have is able to carry the goods that are passing between Vancouver and Australia and New Zealand, why are we proposing now to put on five 8,000-ton boats to compete with the service that we are now subsidizing? This is what the Minister of Marine and Fisheries says:

> Vancouver-Australia and New Zealand service. Established February 23, 1920: Monthly sailings: Allotted five 8,100-ton steamers: These steamers call, East and West bound, at Wellington, Auckland, Sydney and Melbourne.

The expenditure of running these five large steamers between Vancouver and Australia will be enormous. They have to plough their way through the Pacific ocean burning coal that will cost some six dollars a ton. You cannot expect them to run for a day with less than fifty tons of coal, so that that amounts to $300. Therefore, the five boats will take at least $1,500 worth of coal per day to keep them running on the Pacific ocean, and the coal is only a small item compared with wages and other expenses to keep these steamers in commission. This looks to me like an insane proposal unless the minister can show an enormous increase in trade between Vancouver and those ports in Australia and New Zealand. The Marine Department are proposing to put those five large government owned boats on that service, the Minister of Trade and Commerce is proposing to subsidize the old service that carried the trade before, and we have no information at all to show us that there is any need of putting those new boats on. The minister ought to take my advice and stop asking for the passing of this item until he consults the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in order to find out just where he stands in regard to this matter.

Mr. ROSS: In answer to a question I asked, the minister stated that some 9,000 passengers were carried from Vancouver to Australia. Did he mean that the subsidized boats had carried 9,000 passengers?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. ROSS: Did he also mean that the $5,000,000 worth of goods shipped from Canada to Australia was carried by those boats?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. ROSS: What is the tonnage of those boats?

Mr. PECK: Some of the boats that run to Australia are first class ships of ten, twelve and fifteen thousand tons. Our ships are not in the same class.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The tonnage of the Makura is gross, 8,200 and the Niagara, 13,444.

Mr. ROSS: Our ships are 8,100 tons.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Mail subsidies and steamship subventions—local services—Mulgrave and Canso, steam service—between, $13,500.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Has this contract been renewed for the coming year?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think it has. It will be anyway.

Item agreed to.

Pictou, Montague, Murray Harbour, and Georgetown, steam service between, $6,000.

Mr. McISAAC: Has this service been renewed?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am not sure, but it is about the time for signing the contract.

Item agreed to.

Supervision of subsidized steamship services, expenses in connection with, $4,000.

Mr. FIELDING: Before we dispose of this last item I would like to remind my right hon. friend that last session I called his attention to what I supposed was an accident in the omission of a small subsidy of $1,000, I think the amount was for the steam service between the town of Lockport and Froude's Point. It is a service between the Canadian National railways and the town of Lockport. My right hon. friend said that he had dropped it out as he understood it was merely a ferry of three-quarters of a mile, speaking from memory. I pointed out that that was quite a mistake. By road it is four or five miles, and by water four miles. It is really an important service. It is not a question of subsidizing any company, for the service is maintained by the town of Lockport, and if there is any deficiency the town has to make it up by taxing the people. I think it is as legitimate a claim as many of these here of the same class. I am quite sure that my right hon. friend was mistaken on the ground on which he left this item out, and I draw his attention to the matter now in the hope that when the Supplementary Estimates are being prepared he will be able to make provision for it. It is not a question of subsidizing any private capitalist or anything of that sort. It is a service run by the town of Lockport, and is of vital importance to them and also to the Canadian National railways. Lockport is one of the largest towns on the south coast, and is a very important fishing community. It is already doing a large fishing business, and would do a much greater business if it had better transportation facilities. My right hon. friend cannot introduce an item now, but I trust he will make a note of it and make provision for this service in the Supplementary Estimates.

[Sir George Foster.]

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will certainly look into it.

Item agreed to.

Civil Government—Patent & Copyright—Salaries, $161,292.50; contingencies, $35,000.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Is this increase of almost $29,000 justifiable?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The increase is due largely to the reclassification. Then there are some additional appointments which are necessary in order to clear up the arrears of work which have accumulated during the latter years of the war. Extra examiners have to be appointed for the largely increased number of applications for patents. While the war was on, there were not so many applications, but now the applications are in arrears and piling up, and when people pay for patents they want them got out. I have very carefully gone over this vote, and I can assure my hon. friend there are no unnecessary additions to the staff.

Mr. FIELDING: Are we doing something this session with regard to copyright? Is ther a Bill under consideration?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is a Bill under way.

Item agreed to.

On the motion of Sir George Foster the House adjourned at 11.55 p.m.

Monday, April 4, 1921.

The House met at Three o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Annual Report of the Veterinary Director General for the years ended March 31, 1919, and March 31, 1920.—Hon. Mr. Tolmie.

Fourth Volume of the Auditor General's Report.—Right Hon. Mr. Meighen.

Copy of Order in Council respecting the appointment of a manager for the Parliamentary restaurant.—Mr. Speaker.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 53, to incorporate the Fort Smith Railway Company.—Mr. Douglas (Strathcona).

Bill No. 51 (from the Senate), for the relief of George Elmor Glossop.—Mr. Copp.

SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 45 (from the Senate), for the relief of William Henry Coulson.—Mr. Hocken.

Bill No. 46 (from the Senate), for the relief of Elizabeth Alexander.—Mr. Douglas (Strathcona).

Bill No. 47 (from the Senate), for the relief of William Gleaves Doyle.—Mr. Best.

Bill No. 49 (from the Senate), for the relief of Dorothy Mearuel Score.—Mr. Fripp.

Bill No. 50 (from the Senate), for the relief of Henry William Maynard.—Mr. Hocken.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

PROPOSAL TO PLACE INLAND MERCHANT SHIPPING UNDER RAILWAY COMMISSION

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 54, to amend the Railway Act, 1919. He said: This Bill is similar to the one that I introduced last year.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: It is coming to a time when this Bill is looked upon possibly as a hardy annual, but I hope it is coming to a time when members on both sides of this House will appreciate to the full the importance of the measure and will vote to place it on the statute book. The purport of the Bill is to bring boats on our inland waters under the control of the Railway Commission. I have eliminated an important clause in the former Bill dealing with the question of controlling boats on our coasts. This Bill confines the control entirely to boats on our inland waters, and there is in the Bill a clause defining the limits contained in our statutes regarding inland waters. I do not need to tell members of the House that I hope the Bill will receive their approval, and that it will be placed on the statute books during the present session.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FERTILIZER ACT, 1909, AMENDMENT

Mr. THOMAS W. CALDWELL (Victoria and Carleton) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 55, to amend the Fertilizer Act, 1909. He said: It is not proposed by this Bill to make any drastic changes in the Fertilizer Act. This Bill is simply to provide for the better marking of commercial fertilizer which is offered for sale, so that the farmer may know exactly what he is purchasing. It is proposed that the manufacturer of fertilizers shall specify the material from which his different chemicals are derived, also the available phosphoric acid in the contents of his fertilizer. I believe a majority of the fertilizer manufacturers of Canada would be in favour of this amendment, from the very fact that a few unscrupulous manufacturers of fertilizer are putting into their compounds ingredients which are not plant food, such as ground leather, and mustard seeds, which have a large content of ammonia.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT—DEPORTATION

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 56, to amend the Immigration Act (deportation of undesirable persons). He said: The object of this Bill is to repeal certain provisions of the Act passed by this Parliament during the session of 1919. The most important provision of which repeal is asked is that part of the Act which gives authority to deport, without the form of a trial, persons who are under the law Canadian citizens. This Bill is similar to a Bill which was introduced last year by the Government in the Senate and which was rejected there in committee. At that time I asked the Prime Minister whether the Government would introduce the Bill in this House, and I was told that the Bill, having failed in the Senate, could not be brought into this House in the same session. This session I have waited until to-day expecting that the Government would introduce the Bill again, and I may add that I would be glad to give way, if they will accept the Bill as their own and proceed with it as a Government measure.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

GRAND TRUNK ARBITRATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): In view of the published announcement that the Grand Trunk railway arbitration proceedings will not be completed on the 9th of the present month, is it the intention of the Government to have the time for completing the award extended?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): The Government has not decided the question as to the extension of the award. Correspondence is now passing on the subject.

BUILDING TRADES' CONFERENCE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): Is it the intention of the Government to defray the expenses of the delegates who will attend the Building Trades' Conference, which has been called, I understand, by the Government, to be held in Ottawa sometime within the next month?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): I have no information on the subject, but I will obtain it and let the hon. member know to-morrow.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY—ALLEGED REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Montmorency): I beg to draw the attention of the House to an article which appeared in the Ottawa Evening Citizen of April 1, in which it is stated, "Railway situation was considered at ministerial caucus." In the course of the article it is stated that extensive assistance, the amount being upwards of eighty million dollars, was asked for on behalf of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. Has assistance of that extent been given?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): No assistance except what is in the Estimates.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Beauce): I read in the Montreal Gazette of this morning a report of a very able speech delivered by the Prime Minister in Montreal last Saturday. With your permission, Sir, I would like to read the concluding remark and to put a question in connection with it.

The right hon. gentleman is reported to have said:

> The Government had taken over the railways not because it wished to do so, but having been forced to undertake the task would give the system a fair trial at least, and if it could not make it a success, someone else might.

The question I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman is whether this foreshadows impending action of the Government in handing over the National railways to private ownership, as the system has evidently not been a success.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): The answer to the question is: No.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY—ALLEGED DEFAULT OF INTEREST

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Railways to a despatch from Montreal to the Citizen of this morning stating that the Grand Trunk Railway has defaulted in payment of interest on bonds, and that, according to the language of the telegram, the financial condition of that company appears to be in the air. Is this condition of things true, and if so, what effect will it have upon the negotiations now going on between the Government and the railway company, or will it have any effect at all?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): The Government has no information that default has taken place. There are some bonds, interest on which, I believe, is due to-day. In respect of them, and in respect of other subjects related thereto, correspondence has been and is passing, and is not yet completed. When it is completed, full details will be given to Parliament.

CASE OF SMALLPOX ON THE "SCANDINAVIAN"

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. O. R. GOULD (Assiniboia): I have received information from a passenger who was on board the steamer Scandinavian, which recently docked at the port of St. John, that a case of smallpox was found on board. The complainant states to me that all the passengers were cabin passengers, all eating at the same table, and so forth, and that 104 of them were segregated on Patridge island while the rest of the passengers were allowed to go to their destination. My informant does not protest against the segregation, but he wishes to know why, and from whom, the orders came that allowed some of the passengers to go forward to their destination while the others were detained.

Hon. J. A. CALDER (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): This is the first intimation that I have had that a case of smallpox has broken out on one of the boats. I am not familiar with the circumstances, but I shall immediately make inquiries, and will give a further reply to my hon. friend to-morrow.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. T. LEGER (Kent, N.B.): On the 14th of March an order of the House was passed for:

A copy of all correspondence, telegrams, and other documents, relative to the resignation of Mr. John Sheridan, Indian Superintendent for the North Shore district, in the Province of New Brunswick, in 1920. Also copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents relative to his re-appointment to the said position.

I should like to know when I may expect the papers.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): I will look into the matter, and it will be spoken to to-morrow.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CIVIL SERVICE—RELIGIOUS HOLIDAYS

*Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

1. Is it true that contrary to the formal promise of Sir Robert Borden in Parliament, at the last session, the civil servants of the Government have been forced to work on Catholic religious holidays, notably on the following: All Saints' Day, Immaculate Conception, Epiphany?
2. If so, for what reason has the Government acted thus?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN: In answer to questions 1 and 2, the assurance given by Sir Robert Borden in this matter is to be found on pages 4259 to 4262 inclusive, of Hansard 1920, Volume V. A perusal of the entire discussion on these pages and especially the perusal of the requests made of the then Prime Minister as regards observance of the Epiphany, Ascension Day, All Saints' Day, and the feast of the Immaculate Conception, would lead to the view that the assurance given following the requests so made was to the effect that pursuant to custom and convention Catholic civil servants in Ottawa should be at liberty to observe these days by attending church or other religious observances according to the laws of their church without any deduction of pay if the observance should take any of the time which they ought to give to the public service. Accordingly, instructions were issued by the ministers of each department that such Catholic civil servants should have full liberty as above set out on such days. A reading, however, of the last reference of Sir Robert Borden to the subject on page 4262 would indicate a possible interpretation that not only should the above privileges be granted but that the entire days should be observed as holidays in the civil service in Ottawa. In view of the fact that the assurance given may have been so understood and accepted, instructions are being issued that, while the law in this regard stands as it does, it be so carried out.

Mr. SEGUIN:

Is it the intention of the Government, in future, to exempt Catholic employees from work on religious holidays, specially All Saints' Day, Immaculate Conception and Epiphany?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN: This question is answered by the answer given to question No. 1 on to-day's Order Paper.

PAYMENTS TO JUSTICES RIDDELL AND LATCHFORD

Mr. CLARK (Bruce):

1. Has the attention of the Government been called to the evidence given by Mr. R. T. Harding before a committee of the Ontario Legislature that he has personally paid out of public funds the sum of $2,000 each to Justices Riddell and Latchford, acting as commissioners in a public inquiry in which the said Mr. Harding appeared as prosecuting counsel?

2. Is the acceptance by these two judges of this or any payment for acting as commisioners in contravention of Section 12 of the Judges Act as amended in 1920?

3. If so, what action, if any, does the Government intend to take in the matter?

Right Hon. Mr. DOHERTY:

1. No.

2. Section 12 reads as follows:

(1) No judge shall receive any remuneration in addition to his judicial salary for acting as administrator or deputy of the Governor General, or for any duty or service, whether judicial or executive, which he may hereafter be required to perform for or on behalf of the Government of Canada or the Government of any province thereof. Provided that this section shall not affect the right of any judge under the provisions of any statute, Dominion or provincial, now in force.

(2) Every judge who may be nominated for the purpose by the Governor in Council or the Lieutenant Governor in Council shall execute without additional renumeration any commission or inquiry for which he may be appointed as commissioner under any authority in that behalf exercisable by the Governor in Council or the Lieutenant Governor in Council, including the discharge of the duty of arbitrator in any case in which he may be named to act by the competent authority. Provided, however, that any such judge while acting as commissioner or arbitrator at the nomination of the Governor in Council shall be entitled to his moving or transportation expenses and living allowance at the rate and upon the conditions provided by section eighteen of this Act, and such judge when employed under the authority of the Lieutenant Governor in Council may be paid by the Lieutenant Governor in Council his moving or transportation expenses and a living allowance not exceeding the amount he would be entitled to under the said section eighteen.

The question is a mixed one of fact and law. The Government is not in possession of the facts, and it is not the practice to answer, nor can the Government take upon itself the function of answering, questions of law.

3. Answered by 1 and 2.

TOBACCO GROWING

Mr. GERVAIS:

1. Have the reports respecting tobacco growing been published in detail in the monthly Bulletin, January 1921, for the province of Ontario and not for the province of Quebec?

2. If so, why the discrimination?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER:

1. The area and yield of tobacco in 1920 in the province of Ontario are given in the Monthly Bulletin of Agricultural Statistics for January, 1921, by countries and townships, for each variety of tobacco. For the province of Quebec the area and yield is given for the province as a whole and are not distinguished according to varieties.

2. The estimates for the province of Ontario are as furnished to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics by the Tobacco Division of the Central Experimental Farm. For the province of Quebec the area and yield are as estimated jointly by the Dominion Bureau and Quebec Bureau of Statistics and details by countries and municipalities are not available. The Census of 1921 will collect statistics in greater detail.

Mr. THOMAS CANTLEY

Mr. DUFF:

1. Is Mr. Thomas Cantley, of New Glasgow, Nova Scotia, a director of the Canadian National Railways?
2. Has a private car been placed at the disposal of the said above mentioned director, since his appointment?
3. If so, what is the name or number of said car?
4. Is said car supplied with a chef, porter and all necessary supplies?
5. What has been the cost of said car to the country since being placed at the disposal of the said Mr. Thomas Cantley?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. Yes.
2. No. On two occasions, for special reasons, Mr. Cantley had use of car of Superintendent at New Glasgow for two trips between New Glasgow and Halifax, and return.
3. Answered by No. 2.
4. Answered by No. 2.
5. Answered by No. 2.

ST. JOHN AND QUEBEC RAILWAY

Mr. MICHAUD:

What were the gross earnings of the St. John and Quebec Railway during the last fiscal year?

Hon. Mr. REID (Grenville): $218,127.54.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—WORK AT CHARNY AND ST. FOY

Mr. PARENT:

1. Is there a station called Charny on the Intercolonial Railway?
2. If so, are any buildings being constructed there?
3. What kind of material is being used for the said buildings?
4. Where was the material obtained?
5. Has the engine house at St. Foy, opposite the Quebec bridge, been demolished in whole or in part?
6. If so, what has become of the brick taken from the said engine house?
7. Under whose instructions was said engine house demolished?
8. Who gave instructions concerning the disposal of the said brick?
9. Is there any similarity between the brick used in the building at Charny and the brick removed from the engine house at St. Foy?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. Yes.
2. No.
3. See answer to No. 2.
4. See answer to No. 2.
5. Yes; in part.
6. Used in enlarging engine house at Chaudière, near Charny.
7. Authorized as a result of decision of management to concentrate all terminal operations of the Intercolonial, Transcontinental and Grand Trunk Railways at one point, viz., Chaudière.
8. See answer to No. 7.
9. The bricks taken from Bridge engine house were used in enlarging Chaudière engine house, and second-hand bricks were also brought from other points for the same purpose.

APPLE EXPORTS TO GREAT BRITAIN

Mr. McCOIG:

1. How many barrels and boxes of apples were exported from Canada to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland from August 1, 1920, to and including February 28, 1921?
2. What was the total value of such exports?
3. What quantity and value of such exports was of Ontario product?

Hon. Mr. WIGMORE:

1. and 2.

	Barrels.	Value.
August	4	$ 36
September	51,558	301,549
October	169,853	1,085,725
November	231,885	1,449,269

February	123,222	737,281
Total	1,124,508	$ 6,963,882

3. Customs export entries do not indicate in what part of Canada exported apples originate.

MONTREAL-QUEBEC PILOTS SUPERANNUATION

Mr. CANNON:

1. What is the amount of superannuation paid to former pilots from Montreal-Quebec Division, or to widows and dependents of same?
2. What is the number of those pensioners?
3. What are their names and respective ages?

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE:

1. Pensions to Montreal-Quebec retired pilots and widows of retired pilots are paid out of the Montreal Decayed Pilots' Pension Fund, and is administered for the Montreal pilots by the Department of Finance.

Retired pilots receive $350 per annum since 1920.

Widows of retired pilots receive $175 per annum since 1920.

Dependents—nothing.

2. 17 retired pilots,
17 widows of retired pilots,
Total 34.

3. No record of ages. Names follow:

1. Widow, Alexis Gauthier,
2. Widow, Octave J. Hamelin,
3. Widow, Jean Nault,
4. Widow, Elzéar Bellisle,
5. Widow, Nestor Arcand,
6. Widow, C. Lyderic Bouille,
7. Widow, G. Joseph Dussault,

31. Decayed Pilot, Louis Z. Bouille,

INQUIRY RE QUESTIONS

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): With your permission, Mr. Speaker, and the permission of the House, I would direct the attention of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid), to the fact that when a question appears on the Order Paper the department concerned usually begins to prepare the answer immediately. Question No. 13 has now been on the Order Paper for about three weeks, and so far it has not been answered.

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways): I made enquiries to-day before coming to the House in order to ascertain the cause of the delay. I am informed by the officials of the department that this particular question requires some little time. They are preparing the answer and will have it ready in the course of a day or two.

Mr. MURPHY: To-morrow?

Mr. REID: I cannot say.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS CORRESPONDENCE

Mr. GEORGES PARENT (Quebec West), moved:

For a copy of all letters, reports exchanged between engineers and officers of the Canadian National railways concerning the demolition of the round house at St. Foy, opposite the Quebec bridge, the removal from that place of a mechanical staff to a place called Charny on the other side of the St. Lawrence river; the proposed demolition of the station on the main line of the Transcontinental Railway at Quebec bridge.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): This motion should await the report of a committee which I hope shortly to be able to move the House to appoint. It is a motion for the production of papers that would be in the possession of the management alone.

Mr. PARENT: This motion has been standing for about three or four weeks now, and I thought that the Government, by this time, would have had ample opportunity to obtain the information sought.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not a question of getting the information; it is a question that affects the whole general principle, as has been debated in the House frequently. If the hon. member will wait, the question can be handled precisely in the same way as all others relating to the same subject.

Mr. PARENT: Thanks very much.

Motion stands.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PRODUCTION OF PAPERS

Mr. SUTHERLAND:

For a copy of all reports, orders, telegrams, certificates of valuation, or any other correspondence relating to or connected with the slaughter of 245 hogs the property of one George B. Alderson, by officers of the Department of Agriculture on or about the 20th day of April, 1920, and for which compensation has been refused by he minister.

Mr. STEVENS:

For a return showing (a) the number of ex-civil servants now drawing superannuation from the Government and who had contributed for thirty-five years to the superannuation fund, and (b) the amount still remaining in this fund and (c) the amount withdrawn in the years 1918, 1919 and 1920.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR:

For a copy of all correspondence between the Government and the Board of Trade and City Council and Harbour Commission of Quebec, since the session of 1917, with regard to the diversion of the Northwestern grain trade to New York, the alleged non-fulfilment by the Government of its undertakings with regard to the terminals of the Transcontinental Railway at Quebec, and of the Memorials addressed to the Prime Minister on these subjects.

SCRUTINY OF ESTIMATES—SPECIAL COMMITTEE PROPOSED

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve and Gaspe) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, in order to co-ordinate and expedite the business of Parliament in a more intelligent and practical way, the estimates of the various departments should, before being laid on the table, be scrutinized by a special committee of the House, where officers would be summoned to appear with plans and reports bearing on each appropriation.

Right Hon ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): This motion relates particularly to the Finance Department, and as this is one day when the minister is necessarily away, may I request my hon. friend to let the motion stand?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Certainly.

Motion stands.

QUEBEC RIOTS OF 1918

Mr. GEORGE PARENT (Quebec West) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, an indemnity should be paid the innocent victims who during the so-called Quebec riots of 1918 have either been killed or wounded by the soldiers of His Majesty.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege last year to place before the House certain facts which, to my mind, should have justified the Government in paying some indemnity to those innocent victims who, during the so-called Quebec riots of 1918, were either wounded or killed by His Majesty's soldiers. At that time we had from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), certain declarations that led us to believe that the Government would institute an inquiry and give these people an opportunity to state fully and fairly their claims in this matter. Unfortunately, notwithstanding these declarations, no action has been taken, and I am compelled, under the circumstances, to put the matter once more before the House in a different form, and to ask hon. members to concur in the opinion that an indemnity should be paid to these people on whose behalf I now speak. My motion of last year was one for the production of papers. I moved:

For a copy of all reports, letters, petitions or documents referring to claims for damages on behalf of innocent victims who, during the so-called Quebec riots of 1918, have either been killed or wounded by the soldiers of His Majesty?

This motion was accepted by the Government, and on April 29 the Secretary of State produced the following document:

Sessional Paper No. 140: Thursday, April 29, 1920. Return to an Order of the House of Commons, dated April 14, 1920.

Canada, Department of the Secretary of State.

Answer: No information.

I was very much surprised at this answer because, to my personal knowledge, letters had been exchanged between certain persons and the Government, between certain persons and the Prime Minister of the day (Sir Robert Borden), and between certain persons and the Minister of Militia. On the strength of this information I communicated again with the parties interested and I received copies of letters which they wrote at the time to the Government. I know of one man particularly, G. Alfred Mercier, who wrote to the Minister of Militia, and the Prime Minister of the time a good many letters, and answers were received from both hon. gentlemen. I mention this fact, in passing, to show that there was no reason why the Secretary of State of that time should state that there was no information on the subject, when as a matter of fact, a number of letters had been exchanged and certain claims made. The only inference, so far as I can see, is that the matter was considered trivial by the Government of that time. To my mind the matter is not one that should have been treated lightly. A number of persons were killed, persons who were innocent victims, and it is not a case for refusing to entertain the claims that are being advanced. The people of that part of Quebec city suffered a grievous wrong. The wound then inflicted is still unclosed and it will so remain until the Government adopts measures of a remedial character and treats fairly those persons who have suffered so grievously.

I do not intend to repeat at any length the remarks which I made last year on this subject; but in order that the House may have a better grasp of the facts it is necessary that I should refer to some of the more important cases to which, at that time, I called the attention of the Government. I do not intend to condemn the Government for sending troops to Quebec on the occasion in question. A year ago I said, and I now repeat the statement, that the Government were influenced in acting as they did by special circumstances; they were badly advised by the reports of the men who represented the Canadian press at the time of the occurrence and who gave to this small trouble such exaggeration and such publicity that the Government were deceived with respect to it. I have already characterized the occurrence as "a small trouble." In that statement I am supported by the views expressed by the Quebec Chronicle, a paper which supported the Government throughout that period. The editorial in the Chronicle was written the day following the events referred to, and from it I quote the following sentences:

> Assuredly it would be foolish and unfair to allege that the natives of St. Roch's as a whole were guilty of acts of anarchy and we specifically state not only that what has taken place has been "the work of an excited populace," but also that only a relatively small minority of irresponsible youths "were involved".

Influenced by the publicity given to this small trouble troops were sent down to Quebec, and, prejudiced as the troops undoubtedly were, it is a wonder that other unfortunate acts did not occur in addition to those which actually happened. Still the actual events were sufficiently serious and greatly to be deplored. First I would draw attention to the case of Lecours. But first let me state that I will not take the responsibility of affirming that what these men say is correct; I will say, however, that I have no reason to believe they are stating anything contrary to the facts. I took the trouble of writing to each of the sufferers to ask him to put in writing what he had to say. I will first read the letter addressed to me by Lecours, which is dated at Buffalo, N.Y., March 22, 1920:

> Mr. GEORGE PARENT, K.C., M.P.,
> 70 St. Paul Street,
> Quebec.
> Dear Sir,—On the first of April, 1918, I was the proprietor of a store situated on the Iron Stairs, Crown street, in which I sold cigars, candies, cigarettes, etc. About 10.30 p.m., on the 1st of April I thought in view of the fact that the soldiers were guarding Crown street and the Steps, that it would be well to close my store earlier than usual. I had just put up my blinds and locked my door when a party of twenty-five or thirty soldiers suddenly burst the door and entered. Several of them struck me with their rifle butts on the head and elsewhere and threatened me with death. They took away the money which was in the drawer as well as several boxes of cigars and cigarettes and broke my window panes. I have already sent in my account to the Militia Department which refuses to pay on the grounds that the city is responsible.
> Yours very sincerely,
> A. J. LECOURS,
> 38 Cottage street,
> Buffalo, N.Y.

This letter speaks for itself. I shall dispense with comments except to draw attention to the writer's statement that he has "sent in his account to the Militia Department." If this be true, how could the Secretary of State declare on April 29, 1920, that he had no information concerning the claims referred to in the statement presented by me last year? Are we to presume that both gentlemen are right in their respective contentions?

The next case is the one of Joseph Blouin, and it well deserves attention. Here is what Blouin says in a letter addressed to me:

> In answer to your letter requesting details of the wounds which I received during the time of the Quebec riots, and asking me whether I was one of the rioters, I may state that I was not. I was travelling on St. Valier street when I was attacked. I was going home at half past five in the afternoon on Sunday the 31st of March, the day before the riots. I was bayoneted four times. These bayonets penetrated the abdomen and moreover I was struck by the butt end of a riffe on the head to such an extent that my health has diminished fifty per cent and according to my physicians I will be obliged to undergo an operation every two years for the rest of my life. I have given full information to Doctors George Racine and Simard, of the Hotel Dieu, and if I should happen to forget anything, these people will give you the details.

One would hardly believe this statement to be true, yet it professes to state the facts. If it does—and I have no reason to doubt its veracity—I claim that the Government should see to it that this man receives compensation.

I could bring many other cases to the attention of the House such, for instance, as that of J. Alfred Mercier, who has written more than one letter to the Prime Minister and to the Minister of Militia, although the then Secretary of State could obtain "no information" concerning his case. There is also the case of Edouard Tremblay, one of the saddest of all and to which I specially draw the attention of the Minister of Justice. I would say more about this young man's case were it not for the fact that my hon. friend from Charlevoix (Mr. Casgrain) will no doubt put up a strong plea in his behalf. I pass over the case of Demeule, Bergeron and Bussieres—killed at the age of twenty.

Here we have the remarkable fact that four civilians were killed and not a single fatality happened among the forces of His Majesty. This fact would naturally lead any one to pause and reflect. There is a principle of common law laid down in the Criminal Code which declares that, if necessary, force must be met by force. It is to be found at section 53 of the Criminal Code, Cap. 146. It reads as follows:

Everyone unlawfully assaulted, not having provoked such assault, is justified in repelling force by force, if the force he uses is not meant to cause death or grievous bodily harm, and is no more than is necessary for the purpose of self-defence.

2. Every one so assaulted is justified, though he causes death or grievous bodily harm, if he causes it under reasonable apprehension of death or grievous bodily harm from the violence with which the assault was originally made or with which the assailant pursues his purpose, and if he believes, on reasonable grounds, that he cannot otherwise preserve himself from death or grievous bodily harm.

The cases I have put before the House are the cases of men who being practically alone were shot at by a few soldiers and killed or wounded when there was no reason whatever to think that they had had anything to do with the riots. To prove this I must refer again to the unfortunate case of Avila Blouin. I shall read a letter from him which he is willing to back up at any time that an investigation takes place, if the Government decide to grant one:

Mr. GEO. PARENT, M.P.,
Quebec.

Rue Chevrière,
Parish of the Sacred Heart,
Quebec, P.Q.

SIR,—I wish to interest you in my case, which I am sure deserves special attention. I was unfortunate enough to be wounded on April 1, during the Quebec riots. I was hit in the right leg, and after two operations, I am obliged to walk with crutches since the leg has been amputated two inches below the knee. I declare upon my honour that the following is the true story of the events which occurred on the above-mentioned date.

On the night of April 1, after having worked all evening at my garage at the corner of Desglacis and D'Aguillon streets; this spot is quite remote from the scene of the riots.

I started for home about 11.40 p.m. On arriving at the Boulevard Langlier I was ordered by two sentries to keep straight on. I had gone but a few steps when I heard a whistle, and I threw up my hands, thinking this to be the most prudent thing to do, since I understood no English. I retraced my steps, in order to make myself understood by the sentries who had just let me pass. Whilst I was in the act of turning I was fired upon and hit in the left leg. The leg was badly injured, and the soldiers wishing to prevent me from getting up, I presume, tied me to a post, in order to bandage my wound. I am under the impression that they were not quite sane, because, instead of relieving my pain, they hit me on the head and in the face. Soon afterwards they carried me into a private house, and the military doctor gave orders for the ambulance to carry me to the Military Hospital. They amputated my leg without asking my consent or that of my parents, in spite of the fact that I had given them the telephone number of my home. I underwent treatment at the hospital for five months.

My leg was amputated twice, and I consider myself disabled to the extent of fifty per cent. It is now impossible for me to run a garage, and I have lost all hopes of the future. My incapacity I ascribe to the fact that the operation in question was so badly performed that specialists have advised me that I will find considerable difficulty in wearing an artificial limb.

I wish to call your attention to the fact that it would appear from the coroner's' inquest that the officer commanding gave orders not to shoot after eleven o'clock. I was fired upon a few minutes before midnight. I was alone, and if they had any reason to suspect me they might have taken me prisoner, and there was no necessity for shooting.

Yours very sincerely,

AVILA BLOUIN.

I have seen this unfortunate man a few times, and I must repeat, Sir, what I said last year, that his case is deserving of consideration. His daily appearance in the public streets, popular as he was and still is, bearing the evidence of the treatment he received, is no doubt a sore which cannot be cured in a day, but which will be very much alleviated if the Government comes to his rescue in the form of adequate compensation.

I will not specify any further cases. The right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) was good enough last year to say a few words concerning this matter, and from the tenor of his speech I was inclined to believe that he would find some means of indemnifying these persons. I shall quote his words because I want to have them on record. Here is what he said last year:

With regard to that proposition I can at the present moment only say—and I fancy that the strongest supporter of the motion would expect no more of me under present circumstances—that I shall certainly be glad to give consideration to it, and to approach it with a desire simply to look into the justification or lack of justification that may be found for it. Of course, even if one accepted the general proposition as being sound—that general proposition being, as I understand it, that if you assume, on the one hand that that action of the Government was not subject to criticism but was a necessary action in the general interest, and on the other hand, that the particular persons injured were perfectly innocent persons, and that under those circumstances it would be proper to assimilate the injury done to those persons to the damage suffered by individuals whose properties are taken in the general interest, and that therefore proper compensation for those injuries would be justified as being an indemnification to a party suffering by some perfectly proper action necessarily taken in the public interest—I did not, of course, come here expecting to be asked to pass a final opinion upon a question of that kind, and I can say nothing more except that I shall be glad to give consideration, and to ask my colleagues to give consideration, to the proposition that has been put forward. and to weigh carefully what has in support of that proposition been so moderately and at the same time so clearly put forward. The papers will be brought down.

I have no objection whatever to the conditions imposed by the right hon. gentleman to justify his intervention. I have not thrown any blame upon the Government, except in so far as its mind and its executive powers were permitted to be influenced by wrong advice.

A good deal of harm has been done, innocent victims have been killed and others wounded as I have stated. To point out the animus that existed at the time among the soldiers, I could have mentioned, for instance, the way Father Evain, a priest, was handled by certain soldiers at the very moment he was administering the last rites of the church to wounded civilians. I did not do so because I did not wish to appeal to racial or religious prejudices. I could have related how I myself, just as I was walking home from church on Saturday evening, was told by an officer to follow three different directions at the same time. I could have said that the first shot fired was the act of a soldier. I could have said all this and a little more, but I do not think the purposes I have in view would be better served if I were to give more details.

One word more, Mr. Speaker, and I shall have concluded my remarks. Last year when a subject similar to the present one was discussed, the right hon. Minister of Justice expressed the view that the demands for redress appeared to come at a very late hour. The reasons for that apparent delay are obvious. When minds were inflamed, when prejudices were running high, it was not the time to present such claims as these. It was considered more advisable to wait until time had shown and proved the injustice committed. To-day Quebec is known, as it should always have been known, as a law-abiding province whose people are lovers of British institutions. Now that the province of Quebec seems to be better understood by the whole Dominion, and when she is declared to be the fairest and one of the soundest of our provinces and our compatriots are regarded as good loyal citizens —as they always have been—it is time to come back and again to claim reparation for the injustice done to them, and I believe that that injustice can only be righted by the Government of Canada as a whole.

[Mr. Parent.]

We have tried to discover who is responsible for the shooting and killing. Some lawyers advised that the city of Quebec might be responsible, and the city was sued for damages, but the court declared that the city was not liable. Other lawyers have advised that the Government of Canada is responsible. In my humble opinion it is a case for the Dominion to deal with. I think every citizen of this country should contribute towards indemnifying the innocent victims who under those sad circumstances suffered so severely.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I second the resolution moved by my hon. friend from Quebec West (Mr. Parent), and I shall add very few words to what he has said. As to the circumstances which led up to the troubles to which he has referred and the events which occured in connection with those troubles, I do not think it is necessary to say anything. No good purpose can be served by doing so; the issue is one of the past. However, as a result of these troubles innocent victims have suffered, and my hon. friend is right in claiming that these victims are entitled to compensation. The city of Quebec cannot be held responsible in any way, because they had no latitude in the matter; the military authorities had taken from them the duty of maintaining peace and order; therefore they were no longer responsible. This is the view which has been taken by the law courts, and undoubtedly it is the correct view. Men who had nothing to do either directly or indirectly with those troubles, men who were returning from their work and had to pass through certain streets of the city, were either killed or wounded, though they were connected in no way with the occurrences of that time and were not responsible in any way for them. I submit that under the circumstances the Government and the military authorities are responsible for the damage that was caused. Human life is more important than real estate or property of any kind. When in time of war a piece of property has to be taken for military purposes, compensation is always paid to the owners. I think I may fairly say that even if the military authorities were properly carrying out their functions when these lives were taken, the Government is responsible to those who suffer—even if the military authorities were right; even if what they did served the purposes of the war. I do not think any fair-minded gentleman in this House can deny that those who suffered under such circumstances have a right to compensation. The Government ought to investigate thoroughly every case, and in all cases where lives were taken or persons wounded, when the persons in question were not responsible in any way for the troubles and had proper occasion for being where they were at the time they suffered injury, the Government owes it to the dependants of these persons, as a matter of honour, to pay to them a fair and just compensation. For these reasons I second with pleasure the motion of my hon. friend.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Montmorency and Charlevoix): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, allow me to say a few words on the subject of this most important resolution which is to-day before the House and was already last year submitted to its consideration. I do not desire to prolong this debate and I do not wish to repeat the arguments so ably presented last year and this year by the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Parent) and by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe). Let me just call your attention to one of the cases mentioned by my hon. friend from Quebec West, the case of Edouard Tremblay, a young man who was to finish his technical school course in June, 1918. As I said, Mr. Tremblay would have completed his course at the technical school in June, 1918. He was a son of Mrs. Mailloux, a widow, of Murray Bay, in the county of Charlevoix. At the time of the so-called Quebec riots he was spending his holidays with his family. On April 1 he returned to Quebec and, on the very same day he was shot near Bagot street. He reached Quebec by the Quebec-Saguenay railway at four o'clock in the evening, after supper, he went for a walk with one of his cousins, and it was whilst taking this walk near Bagot street, that he was shot through the leg and elbow and died shortly after. The inquest showed positively that neither of the wounds could have caused death; according to Dr. Marois' own words, at the coroner's inquest: "The wounds were not sufficient to cause death." In fact, if in this circumstance, there had been available an ambulance, or some one to give first aid, his case would not have proved so serious; this boy would still be living, and helping his mother to earn a living, as it is done in the province of Quebec, and in the county which I have the honour to represent in this House. He was shot about ten o'clock, and it was not until one o'clock in the morning that he was attended to by Dr. Marois himself. Unfortunately, he was already in a very weak condition, and it was too late. He died the next morning, at eight o'clock, without having recovered consciousness.

Mr. Speaker, I am well acquainted with young Tremblay's family; his uncle, Mr. Arthur Blackburn, is a well-known citizen of Murray Bay, and I have every reason to believe that this young man, who was quietly on his way to see some of his relatives, had in no way whatever transgressed the law or endeavoured to participate in the riots in question. Besides, at the coroner's inquest, where all the facts were proven, no evidence of this kind was given.

I believe that this case, as well as the others which have been submitted to the House by the hon. member for Quebec West, prove clearly that on this occasion there were innocent victims who were either wounded or killed, or who sustained losses. We have but to look back to our history to find that there have been other such disturbances. In 1837, for instance, after many appeals and great difficulties of all kinds, the government had to acknowledge the claims put forward by the respresentatives of the people, and if I remember well, an Act was passed by Parliament by which a compassionate allowance was granted to all those who had sustained losses during the rebellion of 1837. What is happening in the different countries of the world? Take those countries, for instance, which are not as civilized as our beautiful Dominion of Canada, countries where disturbances and riots recur from year to year; such, for example, is the case in Mexico. A press despatch from that country, which I read in an English paper, the other day, says that General Obregon, who has just assumed the direction of public affairs, is endeavouring to re-establish order and peace, and one of his first measures will have for its object to compensate the rebels who have suffered from any loss whatever, those who have been wounded or whose relatives have been killed. Surely, Mr. Speaker, if a country like Mexico takes into consideration the fact that there may have been losses of life or of money, and if such a country is ready to compensate even those who have caused the rebellion and have taken part in it, there is all the more reason, in a case where quiet and peaceful citizens like the victims of the Quebec riots—case which has been submitted to Parliament by the hon. members for Quebec West and Quebec East—as well as in the case which I have just mentioned myself. I think that the Government should accede to the request of the hon. member for Quebec West and adopt this resolution. This would only be a fair measure, a measure of equity, and at the present moment, it would be a good policy on the part of the Government. I therefore appeal to all members of the Government, and to those who support them, to vote in favour of this resolution.

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to be able to congratulate the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Parent), upon the persistence with which he has brought forward this question during the course of this Parliament. It was my pleasure last year to follow the hon. gentleman when he explained in such a clear manner the claim of the wounded and of the dependents of the killed in the famous Quebec riots. Having listened, last year, after his clear exposition, to the answer given to him by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), I came to the conclusion that the Government, immediately after the session came to an end, would investigate the whole matter. I find, however, this session that nothing whatever has been done. The question, apparently, has been treated in a light manner; it seems to me, at all events, that the subject has been discarded, as it were, by the Minister of Justice as being of insufficient importance to engage the close attention of the Government. These riots are more or less a family affair, I mean a Canadian affair; they are one of the regrettable legacies of the war. The war, indeed, in Europe, has amassed any amount of miseries, and it would be expected that that should be the case, because the continent of Europe was the actual theatre of the operations of the war. The miseries that have been accumulated in Europe, it will take, probably, centuries to repair. The Treaty of Peace has endeavoured to repair the damages and losses suffered during the war as between the allied nations and the enemy countries; but as my right hon. friend is well aware, the Treaty of Peace has not, in any instance, attempted to repair any damage or inconvenience that might have been caused by one country to its own résortissants, as my right hon. friend would say. It remains the duty of the government concerned in each country to see that, if any damages or losses have been suffered by some of their Nationals, they should take the proper step to right the wrongs that have been caused.

It is not my intention to rehearse the different cases which have been cited by the hon. member for Quebec West, but I think the House will be unanimous in coming to the conclusion that the relation of facts as presented by that hon. member is impressive; in a word, the situation is like this: You are a peaceable citizen; you are going from the place of your occupation to the place of your residence or domicile; on your way home, you meet an attack on the part of His Majesty's soldiers, although you are in no degree guilty of any offence; as a result of this attack, which may not have been absolutely voluntary on the part of the soldiers, but which may have been a result of their orders, you suffer a disability, or you incur death. This, in short, is what happened. If it is not so, let the Government find out. Can the statements made by the hon. member for Quebec West be sustained by evidence? This is the whole question. If those statements can be sustained, who amongst the hon. members who sit in this House would deny the right of those who suffered to be indemnified in some degree? This argument appears absolutely clear to me. This is not a provincial question; I am not drawn into this debate by the fact that the riots have taken place in the city of Quebec, with which I am, perhaps, better acquainted than any other city in Canada. That the same things occurred in the sad situation that developed some two years ago in the city of Winnipeg, had any of the Winnipeg citizens suffered injury or death from the action of the soldiers of His Majesty in their efforts to re-establish order, my position and my contention would be absolutely the same. This is not a question of provincialism, nor of race, nor of politics; those conditions must be put absolutely out of the mind of every hon. member. The principle appears to me to be right, that, if the soldiers of His Majesty have committed a wrong, the Government, the Parliament, the country as a whole, must right the wrong.

There is more than the question of principle involved. What about the question of national interest? Is it not of paramount importance in Canada that the most modest citizen be firmly convinced that, if he or she, suffers an injury from the constituted authorities, reparation will be made? It is, I think, of much concern to us also that this sentiment should prevail in Canada amongst all citizens, regardless of their situation. I will not press the point any further; but I would urge the right hon. gentleman who presides over the Department of Justice to institute an investigation into this case in order to find out whether the statements of the hon. member for Quebec West are well founded, and if they are well founded, the question is then one of honour, one of equity, and more than that, one of national interest, as I tried to demonstrate a minute ago. I shall say no more on this subject except to congratulate again my hon. friend from Quebec West (Mr. Parent), and to commend to the House his persistence and tenacity of purpose in bringing this case before Parliament. In doing so, he is serving not only his electors, but Canada as a whole.

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): I am sorry that I was not present at the opening of this debate and so missed hearing my hon. friend from Quebec West (Mr. Parent). I was otherwise engaged in attempting to convince the Government that in order to avoid further claims for compensation something should be done to prevent the rocks from falling on the inhabitants of another portion of our city. However, I listened with considerable attention to the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) and to the other members who have taken part in this debate, and I heartily concur in what they have said.

Without entering into a discussion of the causes, either proximate or otherwise, of the famous Quebec riots, I think we all agree after hearing the evidence so ably presented by the hon. member for Quebec West that there were undoubtedly a large number of innocent victims of these riots. So far as a case of which I have personal knowledge is concerned, a gentlman who lives in my constituency was, at the time he was wounded, walking along the street at some distance from the scene of any riot or trouble. He was a member of a family which had given several sons to the war, one of whom had been killed at the front, so his sympathies, if any, would most assuredly not have been with people of a riotous or rebellious disposition.

We have, on the other hand, this point of view to take into consideration. Hon. gentlemen will remember that at the time of the riots the whole country was very much stirred up. We had flaming head lines in the newspapers from coast to coast, which seemed to indicate that in the city of Quebec an actual state of warfare existed. Naurally, the soldiers sent from outside points—and a large number of them came from other provinces—were somewhat influenced by these inflammatory reports. I am in a position to state that a large number of these soldiers were raw rcruits, that some of them had never had Ross rifles in their hands before the evening on which they arrived at Quebec. Some of them even—and I can give authority for this statement—had received Ross rifles and had been issued with ball ammunition for the first time in their lives only ten minutes before they marched to Jacques Cartier Square in the city of Quebec. A large number of them, in shooting, I have no doubt, acted contrary to the orders which they had received. Taking these things into consideration, the state of mind in which these raw recruits must have found themselves, the reports which they must have heard, their obvious inexperience in the handling of dangerous weapons and placed in such a situation as they were, I think, without in any way imputing any blame to the soldiers themselves, that some blame must attach to those that sent them there. If, as will no doubt be urged by hon. gentlemen opposite, there were no other troops available, that does not in any way help the case of those who are of the opinion that no compensation should be paid. We have here, at any rate, on the facts of the case, shown that there was some negligence on the part of some one in authority, that certain well behaved citizens were injured, and some unfortunately killed. We have it that all precautions in the way of sending experienced men were not taken, and we have the inflamed state of public opinion at that time. So it seems to me that a case for compensation for the victims has been made by the hon. member for Quebec West, and I think the Minister of Justice would only be doing simple justice to the victims and their families if he would give this matter more serious consideration than he has hitherto given to it. He would at the same time, as my hon. friend from Beauce (Mr. Béland) has said, be confirming in the minds of the citizens of Canada that opinion which they have always had, and which they should have, that for any damage to which they have been subjected on the part of any one in authority they should be fully and amply compensated.

Mr. HORATIO C. HOCKEN (West Toronto): My hon. friends opposite have spread a good deal of salve over this incident in respect of which they are asking compensation for men who were injured. What they are asking is practically a pension for rioters, for men who were on the streets, in the midst of a riot, after they had been warned by General Lessard that they should not be there. Nobody can claim, by any stretch of the imagination, that men injured under such circumstances have any legal right to compensation. If I understand the arguments put forth, one of the men lost half his earning power, and therefore his demand will be for a fifty per-cent pension. This man, who was injured in a riot at home when this country was being urged to raise a sufficient number of men to support our troops at the front, was with his friends rioting on the streets of a Canadian city. My hon. friend from Beauce (Mr. Béland) says that this is a family question, a Canadian question. No, Sir, it is a French Canadian question, for in no other part of this country was there anything of the kind. There was unanimity everywhere else in support of our men at the front. The men who refused to be warned and went out and joined in a riot of this kind at the most critical time in the history of our country and empire have no right to come to this Parliament and ask for an indemnity for wounds or any thing else that they suffered. They went there deliberately; with their eyes open, they engaged in an unlawful assembly and if they have suffered any loss it should be made up to them, if by anybody, by either the province of Quebec or the city of Quebec. The people of the other provinces of Canada, who contributed so enormously in men and in money, and made such tremendous sacrifices to save this country from the Hun, should not be called upon to contribute in the slightest degree to indemnify men who played the part of rebels at that critical period in our history. There is no moral right, there is no legal right. I cannot imagine how any man can bring a question of this kind before Parliament. It is probable that it will be brought up in the House year in and year out until we have a Government supine enough to heed the plea; but I cannot conceive of a Parliament composed of men such as are here to-day passing this motion. To my mind it would be a disgrace if this motion were carried. It would arouse among the Great War Veterans throughout the country, as well as among people who have suffered so seriously through the war, a sense of resentment that would be expressed in no uncertain manner against any Government or any party that would be gulity of an act so entirely without justification.

Mr. BELAND: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. HOCKEN: Yes, sir.

Mr. BELAND: Did you say that the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Parent), was asking the Government for compensation for rioters?

Mr. HOCKEN: I say that.

Mr. BELAND: Well, I deny that entirely.

Some hon. MEMBERS: You are wrong.

Mr. HOCKEN: I say that these men had been warned, just as though the mayor of the city had read the Riot Act. They were warned by proclamation to keep off the streets. They refused to obey the proclamation, they went into the crowd, and if they suffered under those circumstances it was entirely their own fault.

Mr. BELAND: Do you still claim that they were rioters?

Mr. HOCKEN: I claim that they were among the rioters.

Mr. BELAND: Oh, "among".

Mr. HOCKEN: They had no right to be among the rioters, because they were warned by public proclamation not to go out.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): It was not my intention to intervene in this debate, nor do I purpose taking up more than a minute or two. I merely wish to draw attention to the free and easy way in which the hon. gentleman who has just concluded (Mr. Hocken), ignores the crux of the matter brought before the House. In characteristic Toronto fashion he misrepresented the statements made by my hon. friend from Quebec West regarding the merits of this case. My hon. friend from Quebec West read a number of statements from the survivors in whose behalf compensation was claimed. As I recall the cases that were cited, they were either those of men peaceably engaged in their places of business, or going peaceably through the streets on their way home after business. One man in particular—I think, the man whose case was first mentioned by the hon.

member for Quebec West,—told about his premises having been entered by men wearing the uniform of soldiers, and of the attacks made upon him in his store. Yet, in the face of the evidence submitted through my hon. friend in connection with that case, the hon. gentleman from Toronto (Mr. Hocken), bulks all these people together and refers to them as rioters who were on the streets when they had no business to be there. How does he make a man a rioter who is attacked in his place of business? But that is the characteristic Toronto style of dealing with facts.

Mr. BELAND: Hear, hear, but they are not all like that; I know.

Mr. MURPHY: Then he went on to allege that these people went out in the streets and joined in a riot. Now, listening attentively to the evidence submitted by my hon. friend from Quebec West, I did not hear the name of one man mentioned who had joined in a riot. Each of the men injured was wounded while engaged in some peaceful occupation, or while proceeding quietly along the street. My hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), mentioned a matter which I do not recall having heard in any of the preceding discussions of this unfortunate incident. He mentioned that the military authorities had superseded the civil authorities on the occasion in question and had taken the administration of law and order into their own hands. If that be the case, then I submit that that fact alone would afford my right hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), and the Government of which he is a member, a ground for action, if nothing else did. In any event, in view of the interpretation sought to be placed upon the incident by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken),—an interpretation which, during this week or the following week, will be blazoned forth in large print on the front page of the newspaper with which the hon. gentleman is inseparably associated—I submit that it is a duty which the Government owes it to the people to perform,—I say this with all due respect, and without any desire to dictate to my right hon. friend at all—to see that the evidence bearing on this incident shall be fully elicited in some formal way. When that has been done, I am sure Parliament and the country will be satisfied with whatever action may follow afterwards.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): If ever there was a question before Parliament which should be approached calmly and dispassionately, and without any party feeling, it is a question of this character. We as British subjects pride ourselves on the fact that every man who casts his lot and his allegiance under the British flag shall always have a square deal, a fair show, and an impartial trial, if there is anything to be tried. I think, therefore, that this high court of Parliament would make a mistake if it approached any case before the full facts were available in a proper and conclusive form, so far as they can be made conclusive in a matter of this kind. The facts set forth by the hon. member for Quebec West impressed me very much, and I was shocked to find that such a thing as described, could take place in this Canada of ours. We all have a high sense of the liberties of the subject, and we should be able with good reason to declare that every man, woman and child can at all times, at any hour in the day or in the night, move about in any part of this country, and particularly on the streets of a city of the size of Quebec, without the slightest fear of molestation in any way. That is a fact which we are apt to take for granted. Now, if it is true that in the city of Quebec some time during the war assaults were made on peaceful citizens, that men's shops were broken into, business interfered with, goods practically stolen, and those in charge of business places assaulted, then that is a matter for investigation; and if, as a result of inquiry, it were found that these things did actually take place, there are only two courses of action: Somebody should pay those who lost their goods, and the criminal responsible should be brought to justice and treated in accordance with the nature of the crime of which he might be found guilty. The fact that a man is wearing a uniform, and is permitted to carry a gun, does not relieve him of criminality in this country if he does anything wrong which he is not ordered to do. As I understand the law, the military power of this country can only be called to the aid of the civil authorities in a certain way, and when conditions are such that the civil authorities are no longer able to mantain order. If conditions of that kind arise in Canada proper orders are given, and the Minister of Militia orders out a certain number of troops to the aid of the civil authorities. If that happened in this instance then, as I understand it, that military force was subject to the orders, discipline and direction of the civil authority in the city of Quebec, and that authority is responsible for anything that may have ensued from the issuance of those orders. But if a body of men, sent into the city of Quebec by the Dominion, had broken away from authority, I would be disposed to think that the Government and Parliament, as the central authority to which those men are subject, would be liable, I would say in a general way, for anything done by those men contrary to law. The matter is one that should be fully inquired into and the facts properly placed before Parliament. I would regret indeed if any province or an individual from one province or another, should, for one moment, try to stir up trouble over this matter. The facts should be investigated by some properly constituted court whose findings, when presented to Parliament, would not be questioned. I would submit to the Government that if any inquiry is to be made it should be conducted by parties regarded as highly competent, and absolutely removed from any partisan or other influence that would cause them to make any report but such as would be in absolute conformity with the facts. That having been done, I trust this Parliament would rise to the occasion and treat the case on its merits. The impression should never be allowed to go forth, whatever the reason might be which created the situation, that our citizens might be assaulted with impunity, and some of them killed, without the proper authorities taking cognizance of the matter and doing something to compensate the sufferers for the depredations that were committed. Such, I am sure, will not be permitted here. No person, I am certain, will ever be allowed to say, with any degree of truth, that he was not treated fairly and in an absolutely just manner by the authorities of this country.

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): It is a matter of some regret to me that the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Béland), followed in like manner by the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Parent), should have assumed that this matter was treated lightly by the Minister of Justice, and that it had not received the attention, and had not been looked into. I only have to say in that regard that both gentlemen are entirely mistaken.

Mr. BELAND: We are glad to hear it.

Mr. DOHERTY: After the discussion of last year when I intimated that I would look into the matter, I received some three claims. These did not include a claim for the breaking into of anybody's shop, nor if my memory serves me, a claim on behalf of a man named Mercier, who was mentioned. In regard to those cases I understand there was an inquiry made by the Militia Department, at least I am so informed. Touching the three cases that came before me I was at pains, so far as my time and capacity enabled me to do so, to look into the law on the question, and I also had the law officers of the department do the same, and I reached the conclusion—the conclusion is one, I am satisfied, that hon. gentlemen opposite who are lawyers, if they also will look into the matter, will inevitably come to—that there can be no question of legal responsibility in the matter. We may as well lay that feature aside at once, and put it out of the question. I venture to say it is perfectly clear. Where the military authority intervenes, the soldier, because he is a soldier has not any more right than any person else to use unnecessary force for the maintenance of peace. If he does more, and it is a wrongful act, he has his responsibility for it; but there is, as a matter of law, I do not hesitate to say, no legal responsibility upon the Crown. I said last year I was impressed with the argument made by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), and which I think was supported by other hon. gentlemen, in which it was sought to establish an analogy between the case of the expropriation, for public purposes, of a man's property, where the principle is recognized that it implies an obligation of compensation, and the case where—without imputing blame to anybody—a man's life is taken by an operation necessary for the public good. I must confess that I have not been able to find anything to support that proposition; so I think we have to approach this question—I at all events am forced to do so—accepting of the position that I am not face to face with a legal claim, with a claim susceptible of being legally established or maintained by a court. Hon. gentlemen are exceedingly sympathetic with the persons whom they represent as affected, and who they represent to be absolutely innocent people. Of course, I do not suppose it would be suggested that if that assumption were not sound there could be any question of discussing from any point of view a claim advanced by people who themselves were guilty of taking part in the riots that required to be suppressed or of unduly exposing themselves with knowledge; but the case, I take it, is put forward upon the assumption that the people concerned were absolutely innocent victims. Even assuming that to be so, we are not face to face with a claim enforceable in law, at all events I can find anything nothing to justify that view.

As I have said, hon. gentlemen opposite are exceedingly sympathetic with the sufferings of these people and, if the facts are as they have been representing them to be, I can quite understand the existence of that sympathy. But my hon. friends are in position to indulge their sympathy to the full; I am not. Whatever might be my sympathy—and assuming perfect innocence on his part surely I would sympathize with a person, who, without fault of any kind, unfortunately lost his life, or was subjected to grievous injury; under the circumstances I think I would sympathize as fully as hon. gentlemen do—I have a duty to perform—and my function is to advise as to the legal responsibilities of this Government. Now I did, as I have said, go into this matter and I had my law officers go into it, and I have before me their report which confirms the only conclusion I was able to arrive at myself. So, clearly, I at all events have to take that position, and I do it with a very considerable degree of confidence that I am not mistaken.

We are not face to face with a question of legal responsibility. Then the question arises, how far are we to go? I have to remember when I am listening to this very impressive appeal to sympathy from hon. gentlemen, that it is not an appeal to me for payment of my own money; it is an appeal for payment of the money of this country. Now, am I or are hon. gentlemen themselves entitled to ask, because of their sympathy with people who have no legal claim against the Government, that the moneys of this country should be paid to those people in compensation of injuries sustained? It is not the only case where in law and in justice damage may be suffered and nobody be responsible for it; hon gentlemen, I suppose, are all perfectly familiar with what is often described in very barbarous Latin as damnum absque injuria. So far as this Government is concerned while these people may have suffered damage, and may be quite innocent sufferers, there is no wrongdoing established on the part of the Government, and that is absolutely essential as a basis of legal responsibility.

Mr. BELAND: That is the doctrine that the Crown can do wrong.

Mr. DOHERTY: The Crown has no responsibility for the wrong-doing of its individual employees. If you acknowledged any other principle there would be practically no limit to the possible liability of the Crown. Assuming it could be established that the soldiers were in some respects at fault, those particular soldiers, of course, have their responsibility. If the officer commanding unlawfully ordered certain things to be done, he has his responsibility. But you cannot pass that off onto the Crown. There are cases, of course, where a Government, acknowledging no responsibility, does feel justified in granting what are called compassionate allowances. But let me point out in that connection that the city of Quebec is not the only city where difficulties arose which gave rise to complaints by reason of the action of soldiers. We had such claims emanating from people in the city of Calgary amounting to very considerable sums.

Mr. BELAND: Was that during the war?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. BELAND: My hon. friend from Toronto does not appear to know about that.

Mr. HOCKEN: They were not rebelling against the authority of the Crown.

Mr. DOHERTY: Those complaints referred to soldiers breaking into some man's shop. I do not know that there had been any previous rioting on the part of the citizens concerned. We had to take the same position in regard to all these claims, that they were all governed by the same general principle. Perhaps it is not necessary for an hon. member to say it, but of course a question of this kind cannot be made a question as between provinces or races or classes; there has to be one law and one rule for everybody.

Now, under that law, unfortunately there are cases of suffering and damage in different parts of the country. In regard to all such cases I and the officers of the department who are advising this Government as to its liability have to advise in accordance with the law as we find it, and I think it will be readily understood how dangerous it would be for us to undertake to view cases from the compassionate standpoint. It is not the function of a lawyer at all events to be compassionate—indeed, some wicked people say that in order to be a good lawyer one should have a bad heart and a good stomach. I do not know whether I meet those two requirements or not and whether the badness of my heart is as great as it ought to be to make me a good lawyer, but it is undoubtedly true that, acting as the adviser of this Government, it is not possible for me to allow any sympathetic feeling to influence my advice. As I said when this matter was brought up last year, I was very much struck by the suggestion of the possible analogy between the case of the expropriation of a man's property and the case where a Government doing something for the public good does incidentally, through its employees or officers, deprive some one of his life—an analogy which would justify from the legal standpoint the granting of compensation. The best examination that I have been able to make has led me to the conclusion that that analogy cannot be sustained.

Eliminating absolutely the question of legal responsibility, and treating the appeal as based upon considerations of commiseration, I have to remember that all my colleagues have not had the advantage of hearing that appeal, and while I cannot, in view of what I have said, do otherwise than oppose this particular motion, I shall be glad to bring to their attention what has been said this afternoon.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, I have followed this debate with some interest. If from the purely legal point of view there is not in the judgment of my right hon. friend a case for compensation of the victims of the Quebec riots, I believe that when we consider what is called in law the res gestae, there is good ground for at least a compassionate allowance to those victims. I have not the cases at hand, but I believe if my right hon. friend will delve into the precedents of the Department of Justice under the Union of the two Canadas he will find that at the time of the Gavazzi riots in Montreal, compensation was given by the Government to the victims of the military on that occasion. If my memory serves me well, my right hon. friend will also take up Justin McCarthy's "History of Our Own Times" and peruse the chapter dealing with the Gordon riots in England, there he will find that the Home Government compensated some of the victims.

Let us take a case which is probably more familiar to my right hon. friend, a case in which the Crown came to the rescue of men who had no legal claim for compensation. I refer to the case of the squatters at Fox Bay, on Anticosti Island. These squatters had been on that island, and that particular part of the island, for many years, but finally the owner of the island demanded that they be deported; that the squatters leave the particular place where they had located. There was not one tittle of evidence that the squatters were entitled to any compensation. Yet the Dominion Government—and I believe the law officers of the Crown advised accordingly—decided that the squaters should be compensated in some way. As a matter of fact, the squatters did leave the island of Anticosti and were given by the Department of the Interior letters patent in respect of lands in the West in order to compensate them for the semblance of title which they imagined they had by virtue of their having for many years lived at Fox Bay on the Island of Anticosti. My right hon. friend was impressed last year by the appeal which was made by my hon. friend from Quebec, on the ground that there was some similarity between the cases brought forward by my hon. friend and cases of expropriation. I believe that the case of the squatters of Fox Bay should have some influence on the final decision arrived at by the Government in this matter. It was not a question of law; it was a question of equity, of fair play—of British fair play, I might say to my hon. friend from Toronto West (Mr. Hocken). It was a question of compassionate allowance. I find that on several occasions this Parliament has ignored the strict letter of the law and voted sums of money on the ground that there was occasion for granting compassionate allowance. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to come back to the particular events which took place in 1917, and in reverting to that phase of the discussion I wish to be as moderate as I can. It is not necessary to rekindle old fires; I believe we are all anxious to have peace not only in this wide world, but more so in our own country, Canada. My right hon. friend will remember that the cause of this whole trouble was the announcement suddenly made that we were to have compulsory military service. Are you going to blame very seriously the young men of this country because they at first resented the application of that law? Of course, every man must obey the law of the land. But, Mr. Speaker, it is the privilege of the young men of my race to be very logical. My right hon. friend will admit that the French mind is generally logical. The young men had been told—indeed, a solemn pledge had been taken before Parliament and before the country—that there would be no compulsory service in Canada; that enlistments would be under the voluntary system. But suddenly this was changed. We live in a free country, Mr. Speaker. We rejoice in the fact that we have free political institutions, and naturally it was the privilege of the yeomanry to criticize and to protest. The young men of Quebec criticized and protested, and they were not alone in doing so; other men in other parts of the country criticized and protested. And if finally that feature of the political situation in 1917 was accepted in other parts of Canada, you well know, Mr Speaker, and every conscientious member of this House well knows, that it was because the promise was made to these young men of Ontario and the West that they would not be conscripted; that the law would apply only to the young men of the province of Quebec. Sir, it is too soon yet to begin writing the history of the war, but when that history comes to be written, I make bold to say that the historian will give justice to whom justice is due. I was telling my right hon. friend a moment ago that one must remember the peculiar circumstances of the application of the Military Service Act; one must take into consideration what the criminalists call res gestae. Let us remember the inflammatory speeches delivered throughout the whole country, the incendiary writings published broadcast, the appeals made on all sides, for and against. Let us bear in mind—and this has been admitted since—that the people of the old city of Quebec are a law-abiding and liberty-loving people. All of a sudden, on the very day when the churches of that city were packed full of pious people, the Ontario soldiers appeared and began tramping in the streets. Remember that it was on Holy Friday in the city of Quebec, a God-fearing city, if there is one on this continent, that regiments sent from Ontario started marching. Poor soldiers! They were doing their duty as they knew it; they were obeying the orders as they were given to them. Who will ever believe that the soldiers, who came from Ontario to restore order on Holy Friday in the city of Quebec, did believe in their heart and soul that there was any order to be restored in that city on that particular day? But, elsewhere, there were men anxious, indeed, to send soldiers into Quebec during that period of inflammatory speeches throughout Canada, in order to serve the political ends, we know. The situation in Quebec, I say to my right hon. friend, on the morning of Holy Friday in 1918, is on a par with the situation prepared, abetted, concocted by other agitators, at the time of the raid on the Guelph Novitiate. We all know for what purpose that raid was organized, and all liberty-loving Canadians were humiliated by what happened on that occasion.

My right hon. friend says that no compensation can be given under such circumstances. It has been stated that law-abiding citizens, who were not rioters, lost their lives, that others lost property. I have in mind a case which came up before the criminal courts of Montreal, where young men were brought under the criminal law before their peers because they had threatened to destroy by dynamite the residence of Lord Atholstan at Cartierville, near Montreal. The Department of Justice must have been represented when that trial took place. At all events, my right hon. friend will remember that it was established before Mr. Justice Pelletier, and the twelve jurors, that the chief, the star witness of the Crown was a man by the name of Desjardins and that that man had received money from the Department of Justice. It was also proven that Desjardins received $25 and acted as "agent provocateur."

Mr. CASGRAIN: He was bonded by them and defended by their attorney.

Mr. DOHERTY: The man was employed. That he was employed as an "agent provocateur," is another statement, and that certainly is not true.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I will ask my right hon. friend—I am sure he is speaking in good faith—to read over the evidence in that case. He will find that Mr. Justice Pelletier, one of his former colleagues, who presided over the assizes, was so dumbfounded that he at once adjourned the court. Read his address to the jury. Later on, this man Desjardins was arrested, and he was bonded by the Crown. Later on again he was found guilty of highway robbery, or I do not know what other crime, in the district of Hull.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Defended again by the Government.

Mr. LEMIEUX: He was defended by one of the Crown's attorneys, I am informed.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It is true.

Mr. LEMIEUX: He was sentenced to jail or penitentiary, and he is now out under ticket-of-leave. Is that a fact or not a fact? If it be true that jailbirds of that ilk were employed and paid by the Department of Justice as "agents provocateurs" for political reasons of the lowest and meanest order, is there not ground at least for the innocent victims of the Quebec riots to claim a compassionate allowance from the Government? "Oh," the hon. member for Toronto West says, "the whole country would revolt against such an idea." I do not expect that this year or next year or the year after, the victims of the Quebec riots will be indemnified. It takes some time, even in British countries, for justice to be achieved; in some countries there is no hope for justice, but under the British flag, as I read history, justice is sure to triumph. Some day, Sir, when there is a better feeling between the various races and provinces in Canada, the victims of those riots and their families will be indemnified.

Canada has passed through other crucial tests in the past. Our forefathers passed through the rebellion in Upper Canada, in Lower Canada. The forebears of the hon. member for Toronto West were not slow in exacting from the Crown, after 1837 and 1838, an indemnity for the Loyalists, and the indemnity was granted by a majority in Parliament. Years went on, and went on, and finally a patriot from Upper Canada, by the name of Robert Baldwin, took office. He allied himself with Louis Hippolyte Lafontaine. They brought peace, harmony, order, into the country, and in 1849, under the Baldwin-Lafontaine government, the families of the rebels and some of the rebels themselves were indemnified for losses incurred during the rebellion. There were some protests at the time. The Hockens of the day set fire to the Parliament Buildings in Montreal.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I think the hon. member must realize that his remark is hardly Parliamentary.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Let us say, the Orange Sentinels of the day set fire to the parliament buildings in Montreal. They even treated with very scant respect the person of the Governor General of the day, Lord Elgin. I have myself seen in England, in the family of Lord Elgin, a big stone which was found in the carriage of His Excellency after he left the Parliament buildings in Montreal. It was exhibited somewhere in London—a souvenir of the loyal Sentinels of 1849. Some day too there will be a bill of indemnity to cover the damages inflicted on innocent victims of the Quebec riots, and people will then realize that the so-called riots were caused first by agents provocateurs in the pay of political agitators and secondly by the swaggering and bullying attempts of some very superior people to dominate a minority; The young men were only exercising a right by protesting against a law which they had been promised by the Prime Minister would never be enacted by this Parliament, Sir, we owe it to our dead in Flander's fields to put an end to all these causes of friction. They did not fight, they did not die, to let people like my hon. friend from West Toronto fill the air with their song of hate in Canada. They fought and they died so that their fellow-countrymen, of both races, might hereafter replace the song of hate by a song of love.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that my right hon. friend the Minister of Justice, when he has time, and is far from the sinister influence now around him, will again scrutinize closely the cases which have been so ably brought before the House by my hon. friend from Quebec West, and I have no hesitation in saying that I believe his better judgment will be in favour of a compassionate allowance for these unhappy victims of the so-called Quebec riots.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): I did not intend to say anything on this question, but it appears to me there is one phase of it which my right hon. friend the Minister of Justice has not yet considered. The claim was made, I understand, against the city of Quebec that the city was responsible for the disorders at that time, that the city was responsible for the protection of the property and lives of the citizens. The claim was disallowed in the courts, I am told, because the civic authorities of Quebec were not in charge of keeping order at that time. That function was transferred from the city of Quebec to the military authorities. The Government at Ottawa took the very unusual step of passing an Order in Council for that purpose, notwithstanding the fact that the civil authorities had not asked for any assistance from the military authorities. I have here the Order in Council. It is somewhat lengthy, and I do not intend to do anything more than read a paragraph or two to illustrate the point I am trying to make. The Order in Council is dated April 4, 1918, and reads in parts as follows:

Whereas on the 28th day of March last the opposition of a large number of the population of the city of Quebec to the enforcement of the Military Service Act, 1917, and the regulations thereunder, broke out in open violence and serious riots ensued on that day and on subsequent days in which the rioters destroyed the office of the deputy registrar appointed for the District of Quebec under the said Act, and moreover caused great damage to other property, and threatened further damage, and it became necessary for the restoration of order, the protection of property and the preservation of the King's peace that these riots should be suppressed by military authority;

And whereas at common law it is the duty of a military officer with the troops under his command to interefere—when such interference is necessary, to put down riot, insurrection or civil disturbance;

And whereas it is provided by the Militia Act that the active militia of Canada may be called out on active service in aid of the civil power upon requisition of the civil authorities, and the King's regulations and Orders for the Militia contain certain directions for regulating the exercise of command and disposition of the troops upon such occasions;

And whereas notwithstanding that it was necessary as aforesaid for the preservation of the peace and to repress rioting that resort should be had to military force the civil authorities of Quebec made no requisition for the calling out of the Militia and the Officer Commanding therefore, acting manifestly in the general interest and for the protection of the public, and by direction of the Minister of Militia and Defence assumed the responsibility to command and direct the operation of the troops for the protection of life and property and the restoration of the peace—in the city of Quebec. Now it appears that the military authorities intervened and took the city under their own protection, turning aside the civil authorities from looking after the property and lives of the citizens and the maintenance of peace and order. Consequently it follows that the military authorities should feel themselves responsible for what took place. If they had kept their hands off altogether and thrown the burden on the civic authorities, it would be another matter, but their interference at that stage and their taking upon themselves the duty of maintaining order in the city, puts the case in a different light. How did they perform that duty? The very men who were entrusted with the preservation of order in the city were the ones who committed the offences. As my hon. friend from West Quebec told us this afternoon, a shop was looted by soldiers wearing the uniform of His Majesty the King, and directed by officers of the Militia Department—the very men who were entrusted with the protection of the lives and property of the citizens of Quebec. Surely the responsibility is upon the Government, and not upon the city of Quebec, to compensate the people for the injuries that were done by these soldiers who did not perform their duty at that time. That was the decision of the courts, I understand, and I think the decision was right under the circumstances.

My right hon. friend the Minister of Justice says there is no legal claim. This is not put forward, I understand, as a strictly legal claim. It is a moral claim, and the practice in this Parliament, this High Court of Justice, has often been to entertain moral claims as well as legal claims. The claim of the city of Halifax was the moral claim. They had no legal claim upon us to furnish millions of money to compensate the victims of the disaster in the city of Halifax in December 1917, but the Government recognized that the disaster arose out of the war and that innocent victims in the city of Halifax had suffered great damage, and the Government stepped in and voted a large sum of money to compensate them.

I wish to draw that fact to the attention of my right hon. friend, not because the case is exactly the same, but because it disposes of the point made by him that he can deal only with cases of legal liability. We are not pressing for his attention in this case on any ground of legal liability. The question is as to whether it is just and right on the part of the Government to refuse to entertain these claims, seeing that they were responsible at the time for order in the city of Quebec and that the damage was done by soldiers in their service. This must not be forgotten. The men that did the damage were our soldiers, wearing our uniform, and directed by our officers. A case cited by my hon. friend from Quebec West seems to me to be a very serious one of hardship. The man in question was walking past the sentry. He did not understand English, although, when ordered to stop, he evidently realized the nature of the command and held up his hands. What more could he do? Nevertheless, a rifle was discharged and he was wounded, losing one of his limbs. Surely there is no excuse for that, if the facts be true. Whether they are strictly true or not is something that this House is not in a position to decide; it is a matter for my right hon. friend to find out. I understood from the minister's speech that he had made some investigation, but he did not tell us the results. He did not say whether these men injured in Quebec were in any way guilty of participation in the riots that took place in that city. That is a vital question. If they were not in any way connected with the riots, then I submit that they have a moral claim for compensation. Of course, if they were associated with rioters and were making a disturbance, resisting the law, they would have no claim for compensation. But that appears to me to be the crux of the claim, and my right hon. friend did not tell the House whether he had discovered that they were guilty of any misconduct or not. I trust that this question will be considered on its merits, and considered with a view to doing justice to the victims of the riot. The cases put before us by the hon. member for Quebec West were clearly stated. We must put aside any question of legal liability, and I do not think that my hon. friend intends that the subject should be considered by the House as involving any legal claim. It is simply a matter in which justice ought to be done; as I have said, it is a moral claim. I hope that no discrimination will be made because of the fact that this trouble occurred in the city of Quebec. The case should be dealt with as though the incident had taken place in Toronto or in any other city in the Dominion.

Motion negatived on division.

THE CASE OF SERGEANT-MAJOR N. BRUNELLE

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve and Gaspé) moved:

For a copy of all papers and correspondence concerning the application to the Board of Pension Commissioners of Mrs. Brunelle, widowed mother of the late Sergeant Major N. Brunelle, No. 62068, for a pension.

He said: I shall be very brief in presenting the case of the widow Brunelle. She is the mother of Sergeant-Major N. Brunelle, who enlisted in the 22nd Battalion, on December 4, 1914, and was discharged on May 21, 1919, being medically unfit owing to chronic bronchitis. He was examined at the North Bay district office of the Pension Commissioners and was awarded a pension of 25 per cent. I may say, en passant, that this young man, who enlisted at the beginning of the war and served until 1919, was awarded a decoration on the battlefield. He was 26 years of age at his death. After his return to Canada, he died on July 3, 1919, at Swastika, in northern Ontario, by accidental drowning.

Mr. BELAND: How long was that after he had been discharged from the army?

Mr. LEMIEUX: He was discharged on May 21, 1919, when he was given a pension of 25 per cent.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. BELAND: Disability?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes, and he was drowned on July 3, 1919. It will be seen that he did not long enjoy the pension granted him. When he was found after the accident a coroner living at a great distance from Swastika was summoned and held an inquest which, I may say, was all on hearsay evidence, for no one could say how the accident had occurred, except that it was during a very hot spell of weather when this young man and some companions took a bath in the river. In some way Brunelle got beyond his depth and was drowned. His mother is a widow. She is in poor in health; in fact she is absolutely helpless, being obliged to go from house to house, looking for work. She has two young daughters to take care of, and within the past few weeks, one of them, unfortunately, was nearly killed by a street car in Ottawa. So that this woman is altogether helpless. I appeared on her behalf before the Pension Commissioners and stated that in view of this man's disability and the fact that he had been incapacitated on the battlefield, the presumption was that he came to his death because he was not strong enough to cope with a situation in which a man in ordinary health would have been safe. He was sub-normal. I was referred, of course, to subsection 1 of section 11 of the Act which reads as follows:

The Commission shall award pensions to, or in respect of members of the Forces who have suffered disability in accordance with the rates set out in Schedule "A" of this Act, and, in respect of the members of the Forces who have died in accordance with the rates set out in Schedule "B" of this Act, when the disability or death in respect of which the application for pension is made, is attributable to military service.

My contention is that this death, caused by an accident, is above all chiefly attributable to the military service of the unfortunate Brunelle. He came back from the battlefield with twenty-five per cent less of his fighting power, and therefore I contend that his mother should receive the pension with which, if he had been alive, he would have helped her. It is a very sad case, and I hope the Government will instruct the Committee on Pensions to report in favour of so amending the Act as to enable a case of this nature to be dealt with by the Pension Commissioners. I wish to inform the House that the coroner's inquest has revealed nothing which should prevent the mother of this young Brunelle from receiving a pension. His death resulted from an accident in the river, and the presumption in law is, that if he had been in the physical condition in which he was before he became incapacitated on the battlefield he would certainly have been able to escape that fatal accident.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The minister under whom the Pension Commissioners act, in liason with the Government, is not at present in his place. The case as stated by my hon. friend is largely one that appeals to the sympathy, but he has also stated that the Pension Commissioners do not find that it comes within the law and they, of course, have to strictly administer the regulations according to the law. The pensions that have been arranged, even with their conditions and limitations are, I think, on a very generous scale—

Mr. LEMIEUX: No doubt about it.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: —but there will always be cases, even outside of that generous provision, which seem to involve very great hardship and appeal to the sympathy of individuals who become acquainted with them. It is, I suppose, absolutely impossible to frame a law which will cover all cases. I do not understand that my hon. friend finds any fault with the Board of Pension Commissioners, who have acted according to their rendering of the law and the regulations made thereunder. My hon. friend, however, as I understand, asks that they may be instructed to apply for amendments to the law, which would cover a case like this. I am not quite sure that that would be a wise procedure; but it might be possible that cases of this kind should be taken into account by the committee of the House which at present is sitting. I do not understand that my hon friend has presented this case to that Committee, but it would seem to me to be a fair method of procedure to bring it to the attention of the chairman. However, my hon. friend has placed his case on Hansard and I will call the attention of the proper minister to it.

Hon. H. S. BELAND: I may add just a word to what the minister has said. I am only sorry that the hon. member for London (Mr. Cronyn), who is the chairman of the Pensions Committee, is not at present in the House, because, he perhaps, more ably than myself, could have explained the better course for my hon. friend to have followed. The case that the hon. friend has cited is a pathetic one, and there are a number of others that are similar. The Board of Pension Commissioners are confronted with almost innumerable cases of that kind; but that Board is a tribunal unlike any other in Canada—there is no appeal from it, it is a sovereign Board. It is only fair to add that the Pension Commissioners, so far as I have been able to judge, always give the benefit of the doubt in exercising their discretion, and it is, I think, a fair Board. It is customary, however, in cases such as my hon. friend has outlined, to refer them to the Pensions Committee. That committee have appointed a sub-committee—called the "special cases sub-committee"—which deals with all these peculiar and pathetic cases which may be brought before them. I need not mention the names of the hon. members who compose this sub-committee—they are eminently qualified for the position—and I understand that the Board of Pension Commissioners in a case like this would abide by the recommendation of the sub-committee supported by the committee as a whole. I would therefore advise my hon. friend to report the case to the committee, and it will be dealt with in due course.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I certainly will accept the advice given by my right hon. friend the acting leader of the House, and my hon. friend from Beauce (Mr. Béland). I think indeed, that as the special committee are sitting during the session they would have no objection to hearing whatever complaints are made by the families of the soldiers. In the present instance, I wish to emphasize, that I do not find fault with the commission; far from it; they have treated me with the utmost courtesy and have taken a good deal of their time in going over the whole record. I spent a morning with them, and they were absolutely fair in their dealings with me. But, as the right hon. gentleman (Sir George Foster) has stated, here is a case which just touches the edge of the law and yet cannot come within the law, because the law itself is not elactic enough to cover it. However, every one will admit the hardship. Here is a man who was disabled, receiving a pension of twenty-five per cent; he is drowned in the river; there is no coroner's inquest to speak of except to view the body and say that it was found in the water. Is there not a legal presumption, Mr. Speaker, that this man was drowned because he was not able to look after himself as presumably he would have done had he been fully normal? He received his pension in the month of May, the drowning accident took place in the month of July. He was the only support of his widowed mother. Now she is penniless and left with two young girls, one of whom is crippled as a result of an accident on the street railway in Ottawa. And yet the Pension Commissioners tell me that the law cannot provide for such a case. I accept the advice of my hon. friend from Beauce—I will appear before the committee with widow Brunelle.

Motion agreed to.

COMPLAINT OF DR. BURNHAM AGAINST SIBERIAN GOVERNMENT

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Canadian Government and the Serbian Government concerning the expulsion of Dr. Burnham and his Hospital Mission from Montenegro.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in the old parliamentary struggles between the King and the Commons the Speaker could not leave the Chair before the grievances of the people were ventilated. I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that you would not, as was the case with the Speaker in ancient times, often acting as the agent of the King, force the House of Commons to vote supply before the grievances of a fellow Canadian were redressed.

I wish, this evening, Mr. Speaker, to present the case of a fellow Canadian. I do not know him personally, but I do know that he is a brother of a gentleman who for years was a member of the House; I refer to Mr. Burnham, former representative for the county of Peterborough. It is as a fellow-Canadian that I present Dr. Burnham's grievance to my right hon. friend the leader of the House of Commons and to the country.

First of all, who is Dr. Burnham? I am informed that he is a graduate of Manitoba University; that he was for years a distinguished medical practitioner in the city of Winnipeg; that he was a brilliant surgeon, and that he has published books bearing upon the line of work which he has pursued, books which are well known in the scientific world. When in 1914 the Great War was declared Dr. Burnham happened to be on the ocean on a trip round the world. True to his traditions and to his love of the Mother Land, Dr. Burnham immediately decided that he should serve in the ranks. Accordingly, he interrupted his trip and boarded a ship at San Francisco—I believe it was the Ortiga. I may mention in passing, that after proceeding some distance the Ortiga was chased for several days by the famous German raider Emden. However, he landed in Europe, offered his services to the Allies, and being a surgeon and most anxious to give his services, as did our gallant friend from Beauce (Mr. Béland) in Belgium, in hospital work, he was assigned to a hospital in Montenegro at a place called Plevna. Not long afterwards, as war was raging most intensely in that district, he was with thousands of others driven from Montenegro in the great Serbian retreat, where thousands were lost and he himself nearly perished. He managed, however, to escape and subsequently served continuously during a year on the Western front. Then he was sent to Salonika and there put in charge of a relief hospital, in which post he remained until 1919, giving most excellent service. In that year, being somewhat exhausted and his health failing, he returned to Canada on leave of absence, and proceeded to his home in Winnipeg. I may say that for his gallant service on the batlefield and in the hospitals and relief missions he received several decorations. Having returned to Winnipeg, where he had a host of friends, he started to organize a Canadian war hospital. He had seen with his own eyes the desperate situation to which the Serbians, the Montenegrins and the Albanians had been reduced and he knew by experience what efficient service could be rendered if a Canadian war hospital could be organized. His efforts met with a great measure of success. Not only did the citizens of Winnipeg subscribe large sums of money to the object, but municipalities in Manitoba and in other western provinces contributed generously. In 1919 he again left for Serbia and Montenegro, and made his headquarters at a place called Dulcigno. He was in charge of relief work there for several months until his activities were interrupted by the Serbian authorities.

I do not intend to read all the letters written by Dr. Burnham or the controversial letters exchanged between the Serbian consul and Dr. Burnham's friends. I will simply recite the grounds of complaint which have been urged by Dr. Burnham himself, and the House will judge whether under such circumstances the Government is not justified in taking action in order that the grievances of Dr. Burnham may be redressed. In a letter dated December 13, 1920, Dr. Burnham states as follows his grounds of complaint against the Serbian administration:

As officer-in-command of the White Cross Mission—

It is a Canadian organization.

—I have to complain of the Serbian administration as follows:

(1) That the Mission was under constant police surveillance.

That is Serbian police surveillance.

(2) That without known reason, two nurses were ordered to appear before the authorities at Antivari. Bearing in mind the painful experience elsewhere described the order was ignored.

(3) That the Serbian authorities sent and order coupled with a police threat, to open the White Cross magazine for examination.

(4) That in my absence, members of the staff were ordered before the Serbian authorities and terrorized.

(5) That they seized material shipped into the country for the relief of the inhabitants, that the cases were opened and when released did not contain the quantities cited in the invoices.

I may say that this material had been shipped largely from Canada, consisting of contributions from Canadians.

(6) That they seized the boat whereby material was conveyed from steamer to port, and that although the boat had been leased from the owner, the White Cross never afterwards had the use of it.

(7) That I was ordered before the Serbian Government at Antivari who made threats against the Mission and stated that it was no longer safe to remain in Montenegro.

(8) That shortly after the Serbian Governor came to Dulcigno and again summoned me. In the interview which followed Lekitch repeated former threats and concluded by ordering the Mission out of the country. On being requested to put the order in writing he refused.

(9) That on August 17, while waiting for the departure of the steamer at Antivari I was arrested by order of the Serbian Governor in the presence of one hunderd people on the quay, and

(10) That I was sent under guard of a soldier with rifle and bayonet to the Hotel Marina where I was detained four hours.

(11) That in consequence of the foregoing I was compelled to return on foot to Dulcigno where I arrived after midnight in an exhausted condition, having walked fifty-two miles during the day with the thermometer standing at 85 f. at midnight.

(12) That on the departure of the White Cross Mission for Albania, the Serbian authorities refused to allow the transfer of the stores and material belonging to the Mission.

He states in the same letter:

I have compiled accurate case reports of people in the number of 2,152 who availed themselves of the medical services alone. No further evidence is necessary to show that no reliance whatsoever can be placed in the statements emanating from the Serbian Government respecting affairs in Montenegro.

The letter is signed:

F. W. E. Burnham.

Sir, I am not concerned with political agitation which may exist in Serbia and Montenegro; I am not concerned at all with the quarrels which are too evident between the two above-named countries; but one must not forget that the Dominion of Canada was an ally of both Montenegro and Serbia from the beginning until the end of the war. There is, it seems to me —and it is a fact indeed—in the comity of nations, even as between enemies on the battlefield, a protection for Red Cross and such like. A fortiori is there a protection as between allies fighting and dying for the same cause? We have been told repeatedly, during this session and, indeed, during the last few years, that Canada is a nation. Not later than two or three weeks ago, when the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) was defining what the new Act meant in speaking of a Canadian national, we were told that Canada was a nation; that before long, as soon as it pleased Canada, she might have consular representation, even an ambassador in the neighbouring republic. I should like to test this evening the statement made by one prominent member of the Government and know from the leader of the House (Mr. Meighen) if Canada is really a nation. There is one statement which certainly cannot be discounted—Canada is a member of the League of Nations and, therefore, Canada, whether a nation or not, but a member of the League of Nations, is certainly concerned with her nationals, not only at home, but especially abroad. Even if Canada were not a full-fledged nation, shall I be told that this Dominion, the premier Dominion of the British Empire, my native land, will stand for the humiliations, outrages and indignities inflicted on Canadian nurses and a Canadian surgeon doing work to serve a humanitarian cause, and that under the flag of one of her Allies?

I have to take exception to the statements which have been made by the Serbian consul against Dr. Burnham. He has written to several newspapers denying the statements made by Dr. Burnham, and even accusing him of political intrigue in the performance of his duties in Montenegro.

Mr. Speaker, I resent the insults of a foreigner, even though he be a consul, against a fellow-Canadian of the standing of Dr. Burnham, who, to serve the cause of humanity, to relieve the sick, the poor, and the oppressed in those distant lands, left everything behind him and consecrated his life and his talents to that purpose. I say that the least the Government should do is to ask the Serbian authorities to recall their consul who has libelled in the press the good name and the good faith of Dr. Burnham.

Another point I wish to emphasize is that until an investigation has taken place, and until the statements of Dr. Burnham which I have just quoted have been proven false, and, if sustained, until an apology and reparations have been made, the Government of this country, through the League of Nations, should prevent any Red Cross funds coming from Canada or the British Empire from being apportioned in favour of Serbia. To give you, Mr. Speaker, an idea of the spirit which animated Dr. Burnham let me read the last sentence of one of his letters:

> Thus we close the first chapter of the activities of the Canadian White Cross in the Balkans. We look back without regrets. To retrace our steps would be to do exactly the same. We throw in our lot with the poor, the sick and the oppressed. It was for them that this fund was organized. We resolutely set our face against injustice in every form. To have chosen differently would have been easier, but would not have been the policy of the White Cross or in harmony with the spirit of the people of Canada.

You have in that sentence the ring of honesty, and I ask that the Government investigate the complaints which I have just recited—that Canadian nurses were terrorized, that the materials sent from Canada were seized, that the surgeon and his staff were prevented from continuing their work amongst the poor and the sick, and that finally they were all ejected from the country. I say it is the duty of the Canadian Government to investigate this case and to see that justice is done.

I do not wish to be more historical than necessary, but let me recall to my right hon. friend the leader of the House a case which in many respects, is parallel to the one I have just mentioned. I refer to the Don Pacifico case when Lord Palmerston, then Minister of Foreign Affairs, despatched the British fleet to the Piræus in order that the Greek government might compensate Don Pacifico for the losses sustained. It was stated at the time that Don Pacifico had very poor antecedents, that he was British, but of foreign origin, and that he had fyled a very extravagant claim arising out of the riots which had taken place in Athens, the capital of Greece. Here is the answer of Lord Palmerston:

> The rights of a man depend on the merits of the particular case; and it is an abuse of argument to say that you are not to give redress to a man because in some former transactions he may have done something which is questionable. Punish him, if you will—punish him if he is guilty, but don't pursue him as a pariah through life. . . . "Oh, but," it is said "what an ungenerous proceeding to employ so large a force against so small a power!" Does the smallness of a country justify the magnitude of its evil acts? Is it to be held that if your subjects suffer violence, outrage, and plunder—

That is the case in the present instance.

> —in a country which is small and weak, you are to tell them, when they apply for compensation, that the country is so weak and small, that we cannot ask it for compensation? Their answer would be that the weakness and smallness of the country makes it the more easy to obtain redress.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me repeat the question I put a moment ago: Is Canada a nation? I say that if she is not a fully-fledged nation, she has at least acquired certain titles of nobility during the last great war. She is the premier Dominion of the British Empire, and if we cannot as a Dominion within the four corners of the British North America Act assert our rights and protect our nationals abroad, we still have the old British flag, which protects every British subject wherever he is to be found in the four quarters of the globe. I should like to quote what Lord Palmerston said in the case of Don Pacifico in perhaps the most eloquent speech of his life. In his famous peroration he says:

> I therefore fearlessly challenge the verdict which this House, as representing a political, a commercial, a constitutional country, is to give on the question before it; whether the principles on which the foreign policy of this country has been conducted, and the sense of duty which has led us to think ourselves bound to afford protection to our fellow subjects abroad, are proper and fitting guides for those who are charged with the government of England, and whether, as the Roman in the days of old held himself free from indignity when he could say Civis Romanus sum, so also a British subject, in whatever land he be, shall feel confident that the watchful eye and the strong arm of England shall protect him against injustice and wrong.

I repeat, Sir, that if the Canadian Government feel that they have not the power to redress the legitimate grievances of Dr. Burnham and the noble nurses who were subjected to such humiliation and indignities at the hands of Serbian officials, they should draw the attention of the Foreign Office in London to the matter, and, through that channel, obtain justice for these British subjects. It was my privilege some years ago to be in the city of Rome. It was in the year 1909, and on that occasion I witnessed some very grave riots that took place in the Eternal City. These incidents occurred after the execution in Spain of a Spaniard named Ferrer, and the anarchists of Europe being of the opinion that this act was unwarranted and that the governments of the Continent should rise up in arms against the government of Spain. In many of the cities on the Continent, in Paris and in Rome, the Spanish Embassy had to be guarded not only by the police, but also by the military authorities. In Rome, the anarchists for a few days seemed to hold sway; there were general strikes, and riot after riot raged in that great city. I happened one day to visit the Superior of the Canadian College in Rome on a well known thoroughfare, the street of the Four Fountains. That college is under the jurisdiction of the Sulpician Fathers, who, as the House knows, are amongst the oldest French religious orders, together with the Jesuits and the Recollets, to have done missionary and educational work in this country. That institution in which our young men pursued their theological studies is under the direction of the Sulpician Fathers. In that year the Superior was a distinguished Canadian from St. Hyacinthe. The Canadian College is not far from the Spanish Embassy, and was consequently very much exposed to the anarchists and rioters who were passing back and forth in the vicinity. I asked the Superior whether he was not a little too exposed and did not fear for the young priests and students who were under his charge. He pointed to the British flag and replied: "With that flag flying I fear nothing." Sir, it seems to me that under the protection of the British flag, as was so eloquently said by Lord Palmerston, Dr. Burnham, whom I do not know, and who has no other claim upon me than the fact that he is a fellow Canadian, should receive justice. His staff of devoted nurses who were subjected to persecution at the hands of the Serbian Government should also be accorded, through the instrumentality of this Government, the protection which is the right of every British subject.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): The motion of the hon. member as it appears on the Order Paper calls merely for the production of certain documents, being correspondence exchanged between the Canadian Government and the Serbian Government concerning the expulsion of Dr. Burnham and his hospital mission from Montenegro. Of course, to the production of the correspondence no objection can be made. But the hon. member in his address has assumed that the treatment of Dr. Burnham by the authorities in Montenegro, or in greater Serbia, has been such as to cast upon the Canadian Government the obligation of calling for atonement or redress, either through the Foreign Office or on our own initiative, from the offending government. I did not put myself in a position to argue, in view of the way the resolution reads, whether the presumption upon which the hon. member has based most of his address is correct or not.

Speaking from recollection, without having recently brought my mind to the facts, I am aware that some correspondence has taken place, and I believe that the Foreign Office has been consulted with regard to Dr. Burnham's complaint concerning his treatment in Montenegro. If I recollect rightly, Dr. Burnham came back to Canada, having already conducted some work in Montenegro in the earlier years of the war. I thought his return was earlier than the hon. gentleman mentioned; I was under the impression it was about 1917. So far as the Government was concerned, its only connection with him was to assist him in securing reduced passage back to carry on again the work in which he was interested there. Montenegro, it seems, is to be, subject to certain delimitations, a part of Greater Serbia. Within the confines of Montenegro a party has arisen whose purpose is to resist its incorporation in Greater Serbia, and who carry on there a political agitation, if indeed they do not go farther, in order to make effective that resistance. Dr. Burnham's troubles are claimed to have arisen from the fact that he espoused the cause of the minority in Montenegro and became involved in political agitation there. Whether that is true or not, I should not like finally to say; but, at all events, troubles have arisen in connection with him and correspondence has taken place. If that correspondence, when brought down, discloses that there has been any failure or default on the part of the Government in looking into the merits of the complaint made, or in seeking redress if the merits of the complaint are established, then, of course, it will be time enough for the House to take action.

I was intensely interested in the address of the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), and, what is more, I was exceedingly pleased, not only with its substance but with the enthusiasm with which the doctrines propounded by the hon. gentleman were set forth. The hon. member asked me, as head of the Government, to say whether or not this country is a nation, and, if it is, whether or not it purposes to assert the attributes and rights of a nation in respect of the claims of one of its citizens wronged in far away Montenegro. Well, I have no hesitation or doubt at all in answering the question. Canada unquestionably is a nation, and something more than a nation. It enjoys a status and rights in the world beyond those which other nations of its strength and age enjoy. Canada is as well, a member of the great British Commonwealth of Nations, and as such is in the position to assert such authority as its own strength, and moral status entitle it to assert; but, also, the authority of the Motherland and of that entire League of Nations known as the British Empire, if their concurrence in our position is obtained.

It was, however, interesting indeed to hear this position taken up and espoused by the hon. member for Maisonneuve, a member of the Liberal party in Canada; and particularly interesting was it to hear him refer to that famous debate in the British Parliament on the Don Pacifico claims, to hear him quote from the speech of Lord Palmerston, and point to the doctrine which that speech contained as the proper motto for Canada to adopt in her march among the nations of the world. I remember reading that speech. It has been referred to time and again, not only in this country but in general literature, as expressive of the extremely Imperialistic attitude of the British Tory, as jingoism of the highest type. And I recall at the moment the reply of Mr. Gladstone, delivered early in the morning after Lord Palmerston had spoken, in which the old statesman described the speech to which he had listened; in which he described the spirit that it embodied; in which he said that this high and mighty Imperialistic attitude which Lord Palmerston had assumed, was typical of the old Roman statemanship, and was expressed in those lines of the poet:

> Oh Rome 'twas thine alas with awful sway
> To rule mankind and make the world obey,
> Disposing peace and war thine own majestic way.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Whatever may have been the rights of Don Pacifico, it was claimed to be doubtful at the time whether they were great enough, or fundamentally strong enough, to warrant the intervention of the British Fleet. But if the example of the British Government in the Don Pacifico case is to be followed by Canada, it undoubtedly can only be followed if this country maintains not only the name but the attributes of a nation—unless, in a word, we maintain that strength behind the word of Canada which will enable us to speak with substantial authority. I commend the address of the hon. member for Maisonneuve, I commend the doctrine that he has espoused tonight, I commend the spirit with respect to the mission of this country which evidently animates him, to all hon. gentlemen around and behind him, and especially to his leader who, only a few months ago, moved in this House that we should strip ourselves of naval and military strength and leave ourselves powerless. The mere word of any country does not go very far without any strength behind it.

Now the hon. gentleman—on the assumption again that a wrong has been done a Canadian citizen, a wrong that the courts and civil authorities of the State that is supposed to have done it have refused to redress—asks us to invoke not only the power of the Foreign Office, not only any authority that Canada may exert of herself, but, as well, to invoke the influence of the League of Nations, and if need be to see to it that any moneys that might come to Serbia from the reparation that Germany is required to make are withheld from Serbia pending atonement for the wrongs done by her to Dr. Burnham.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I had reference to the Red Cross funds, not to reparation funds.

Right Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought the hon. gentleman spoke of "reparation funds," anyway he suggested that moneys be withheld from Serbia. I am not apprehensive that it will be necessary to go to that length. In fact I have not yet been convinced—I have not the papers before me because I did not know that the hon. member intended to do more than move his resolution—that wrong has been done. I do not think, at least, that there is information now in the Department of External Affairs to warrant the Government in assuming that there is cause for specific intervention. If the papers disclose that there has been cause, and that intervention has not taken place, then, of course, the time will come for Parliament to speak its mind. I am not convinced that the papers will disclose such cause, nor am I sure that the papers will not disclose quite the opposite. However if it be found that there is something in the complaint that Dr. Burnham has made, and which the hon. member to-night has pressed on the floor of Parliament, then it may be altogether proper that we should invoke the assistance of the Foreign Office and it should be possible to secure such redress as will be appropriate to the wrong done. I do not think the matter will need to go to the length indicated in my hon. friend's address. Let me repeat that the subject has not been neglected; I know that communications have passed; I know that some information has been obtained; and I think it will be found that there has been nothing in the way of neglect on the part of the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): Before this debate closes I would like to add a word in support of the statement of my hon. friend from Maisonneuve. The facts in connection with this case were, I think, first brought to the attention of the Canadian public by Mr. Arthur G. Penny, the Editor of the Quebec Chronicle. I may say for the information of the House, Mr. Speaker, that the Chronicle is not a newspaper which could by any manner of means, be accused of having tendencies other than those of the most orthodox Conservative kind. For a considerable period the Quebec Chronicle carried on an agitation, if I might so term it, on behalf of Dr. Burnham, and on reading its article we come to the conclusion that in so far as we are able to obtain confirmation of the facts placed before us, Dr. Burnham a Canadian citizen, a colonel in the Canadian or the Imperial army, and a brother of an ex-member of this House, whilst carrying on a work of mercy in a foreign country was subjected to certain outrages and indignities. It would appear from his statements—and they have not as yet been contradicted, though more than six months have elapsed since they were first made to the Canadian people—that our fellow countrymen and women were terrorized by some petty Balkan bureaucrat, that goods and money sent by Canadian citizens to help the starving, the oppressed and the miserable in Europe were taken and used for other purposes, and that finally one of our own ex-soldiers, a man who bears a high reputation in Canada was forcibly ejected from Serbia. His mission was backed by the funds of individual citizens of Western Canada, by municipalities throughout the Dominion and even by provincial governments, and moreover Dr. Burnham went overseas, if not with the authorization of the Dominion Government, at least, as admitted by the Prime Minister, with its knowledge and consent. The only answer we get when the matter is brought on the floor of the House is that some time, sooner or later, we may obtain redress.

Perhaps I am one of those who have placed too literal an interpretation on the language used in this House and outside by hon. gentlemen who have represented us both at the Imperial conferences and at the meetings of the League of Nations when they said that we were a nation, for when they said that I thought they meant we had the attributes of a nation and that our citizens were not to be insulted with impunity by any petty sovereign or bureaucrat. I understood, as my right hon. friend the Prime Minister said, that we were more than a nation—though I am not quite prepared to be so enthusiastic as he about the reason why we are more than a nation. He stated we were so because we belonged to the Great Britannic commonwealth, and being backed as we were by this grat commonwealth we would not have the slightest difficulty in having our rights and privileges respected by other nations. The history of our boundary relations with the United States has not given me any great confidence in the value which my right hon. friend places in this alliance. However, taking his word for it that we have increased the value of our nationhood by such an alliance, and by recent events in Europe and elsewhere, I cannot understand how it comes about that we must wait for months and months until some petty clerk in the British foreign office decides that probably one Canadian might have been insulted by a ruler of one of the Balkan States. It seems to me that it is the duty of the Canadian Government and the Canadian people to protect our citizens wherever they may be.

Although I do not join in the enthusiasm of my right hon. friend from Maisonneuve and Gaspé with regard to the words used by Lord Palmerston in the Don Pacifico debate, and although I do not agree that we should go about the world with a chip on our shoulder blustering about our rights and our powers and shouting Civis Britannicus sum, I do believe that if we are to place any value on our citizenship we should have the means of being able to protect our nationals. I do not think anyone in this House would ask the Government to declare war on Serbia, for there are other measures which can be taken, financial and economic, and strong diplomatic pressure could be brought to bear. Then, as my hon. friend from Gaspé said, there is the League of Nations. That League, I understood was formed for the protection of the small as well as the great nations. How well these small nations have been protected would be a question perhaps for further discussion. For instance, how well the doctrine of self determination has been upheld in the case of this same little country of Montenegro would be a question which the League of Nations might very well ponder.

However, this is the point which I think should be taken up by this House. If a British subject is proud of being able to say he is a British subject in whatever part of the world he may be, and if being a British subject implies protection in every way, so should the title of being a Canadian national. I would not say, like my hon. friend from Gaspé, Civis Britannicus sum; I would say Civis Canadensis sum. Our men have made Canada so well known in the world that she is no longer a stranger. And I would ask that the Government make such representations as would lead the world to understand that our nationals cannot be insulted and outraged with impunity, however far they may be from their native land.

Mr. C. W. PECK (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the motion of the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux). The hon. and gallant gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Power) I think rather assumed to send our fleet into the Adriatic. I listened to the speech of the hon. member for Maisonneuve with great interest, and he certainly spoke temperately and with dignity. I think we should first do what he asks for, that is, investigate the charges. He did not state that the charges were true, he simply asked the Government to take measures to investigate them. In that he is entirely right. All I can say is, if those charges are true, it is a case of base ingratitude on the part of Serbia, because this young nation plunged into the war with the greatest courage and chivalry to uphold, among other things, the rights of small nations, and particularly the rights of Serbia, who was the first nation to get us embroiled in the war.

[Mr. Power.]

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, although I am not a swashbuckling imperialist and though I do not go round, as the hon. and gallant gentleman said, with a chip on my shoulder, I think we may rely upon the right hon. gentleman who is the head of the Government in this country, if he discovers that injustice has been done to a Canadian citizen, to be the first to uphold the cause of the nation with that dignity and firmness which are characteristic of him. It is a very good occasion upon which to let the whole world know that the rights of Canadian citizens must be respected everywhere. The Government should take every step necessary to the fullest investigation of this matter and adopt such measures as the facts seem to warrant.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, as the seconder of the motion I feel that I should like to say a word or two on the subject. I am not quite satisfied with the enthusiasm, if it could be called enthusiasm at all, with which the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) dealt with this motion. We should all be of one mind in regard to the matter brought to our attention by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux). We have to accept the word of a British subject until conclusive evidence to the contrary is presented to the House or to some tribunal inquiring into the matter. A British subject has made certain statements; they are presented to the House by the hon. member for Maisonneuve, and I for one accept for the time being those statements as being correct. If they are correct, they certainly require a most thorough investigation and it is for the Canadian people, both on their own behalf and as part of the great British Empire, to give Montenegro or any other country strictly to understand that Canadian subjects are not to be treated unfairly with impunity.

Now, the answer that we received from the Prime Minister to this motion is a fling at the Liberal party, an attempt to belittle the Liberal party and to tell us some things that we ought to know if we have such big notions concerning ourselves as British subjects or as Canadians or as members of this Parliament. I did not think, Sir, that there was any possible way by which the right hon. gentleman could get around to that attitude in connection with this motion. As the hon. member for Skagway has said—

An hon. MEMBER: Skeena.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Peck) will pardon me for not remembering for the moment the name of the constituency which he graces and honours, as he does the whole of Canada. I thought that the case was presented with fullness, with dignity, in a manner quite free from the slightest degree of political bias. But my right hon. friend says it would be well for the hon. member who proposes the motion to look around him and see what sympathy he is getting from his own side of the House; that it would be well for him to inquire into the history of the Liberal party and see what they have done to make Canada a nation or to maintain her in that position. Well, I would ask the right hon. gentleman where the party to which he belongs stood in 1882 when we were called upon as an integral part of the Empire to send troops to the Soudan, where they were much needed. What was the answer of Sir John A. Macdonald? "Not a dollar, not a ship, not a man; let England fight her own battles; we have nothing to do with them." That was the answer of Sir John A. Macdonald, and not a man was sent; a few Canadian voyageurs went on their own responsibility. That was the attitude of the Conservative party in 1882 when it was at the zenith of its glory and headed by the biggest statesman it ever had.

What was the attitude of the Liberal party when the South African war broke out? That was the second opportunity which this country had to show what it wanted to do as a part of the British Empire. I need not recite to you, Sir, the attitude that was taken by that great statesman, the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who was at the head of the Liberal Government at that time. Instead of saying to the British Empire: "Not a man, not a dollar! Sir Wilfrid Laurier said: "The last man, the last dollar; everything that we can do to support the Empire in this crisis." That was the first great step taken by Canada along the lines that we are now discussing, the first great event in connection with which Canada was brought prominently in contact with the affairs of the world. And is my right hon. friend to tell us that we should look around; that we should examine our history and see what our antecedents have been as citizens of Canada and as subjects of the British Empire? Speaking for myself, I take no slurs from the right hon. gentleman as to my relationship with the British Empire or the British flag. I am just as strong in that regard as he is, and that is true of everybody connected with my family during the last two or three hundred years. I therefore do not take kindly to anything coming even from the Prime Minister which tends to reflect in the slightest degree upon the attitude of the Liberal party in this respect.

About the time when I came to this Parliament, in 1904, a case occurred which was somewhat analagous to this. A small sailing schooner, having on board some natives of Nova Scotia, had been improperly seized at a port of Uruguay; the vessel was confiscated, and the men lost their furs and their money. The first word that I said publicly in this House was to ask Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his government to look after the interests of those men away down in Uruguay with their schooner and their furs confiscated. What happened? The government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier appointed a commissioner, conferred proper powers upon him, and sent him to Uruguay. A full investigation was made, and he returned and reported conditions to the then government. The Republic of Uruguay was obliged, through the British consul there, to make compensation for the schooner and the furs which they had confiscated. There was a case in which we did something along those lines. There was no hesitation about the matter; there was no speech-making on the part of the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier; his government immediately went to work and redressed the grievances of those men.

All that we are asking for in this case is that proper steps should be taken; that we should not be governed by the correspondence that has reached us from Serbia. That correspondence is tainted and coloured to suit the views of the people of that country. I would not be satisfied with this correspondence. I presume they have a consul in Great Britain, and Great Britain has consuls in that country. If this matter cannot be handled through Canadian avenues, the British consul in that country should be called upon to inquire into the matter and report, and in that way we can get at the facts without the high colouring that may be given to them through this correspondence. The Prime Minister should make a more pronounced deliverance on that point, and not say that he is simply going to wait; that he will give another reading to this correspondence, and that if he is convinced by the correspondence that has been received from the defendant in this case, he may do something to redress the grievances of Dr. Burnham. I am not quite satisfied with that. I think a little stronger statement should be given, so that Canadians, wherever they may be, may realize to the full that they have behind them at home a people, a Parliament and a Government always keenly on the lookout to see that they are properly safeguarded and protected in both their persons and their property.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Before the hon. gentleman speaks, it is my duty to inform the House that he is about to exercise his right to close the debate. Therefore, any other hon. gentleman desirous of speaking to the motion, should do so now.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I wish to thank hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House who have supported the principle involved in this motion, and I hope that means will be taken to hold an investigation to find out whether or not the grievances of Dr. Burnham and his nurses are really deserving of our attention, as I have no doubt they are.

Before taking my seat, I wish to tell the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) that he is quite in error if he believes that I am animated by any jingo spirit in proclaiming "Civis Britannicus sum." If my hon. friend will read my remarks in Hansard to-morrow, he will see that I have said that, if Canada is really a nation, she can, through her own channels, obtain redress in the present instance, but if there is no possibility, as we have no foreign office or foreign minister ourselves, of Canada obtaining justice for one of her nationals, John Bull is always at the old stand and, as for one hundred and fifty years we have lived under the British flag, we may still invoke the protection of that flag so that one of our fellow-Canadians may be protected against any humiliation, indignity or outrage abroad. That is what I said. It is true that we have in Canada the Department of External Affairs, of which I believe the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) is the minister, ex-officio. If my right hon. friend will take this matter in hand, will investigate it and see that justice is done, as I have no doubt he will if he has that authority, I shall be the first one to proclaim that Canada is really a nation, or at least on the way to become a nation. But, meanwhile, if it is impossible, through that channel, through that machinery, to obtain justice for one of our nationals, I look to the British Foreign Office to redress the grievance of one of our citizens. By doing this I am not parading in the highways and byways with a chip on my shoulder; I am simply talking common sense and speaking the language of a good Canadian.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve) moved:

For a copy of the special report made by Dr. Burnham on the treatment by the Serbian Government of the Canadian Hospital Mission in Montenegro.

He said: What I have just said on the former motion, applies to the present one, and I wish the two to be linked together.

Motion agreed to.

MURRAY BAY—TADOUSSAC PROPOSED STEAMSHIP SERVICE

On the motion of Mr. Casgrain:

That, in the opinion of this House, an up-to-date steamship service should be established between Murray bay situated in Charlevoix County and Tadoussac in Saguenay County.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I am ready to proceed with this motion; but the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) asked me to continue it until next Monday because he was unable to attend to-night. I would, therefore, ask that it stand.

Motion stands.

PROPORTIONAL REPRESENTATION

Mr. J. A. SEXSMITH (East Peterborough) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, in order to give each voter an equal share in the representation, some system of proportional representation should be adopted, and that a special committee of this House should be forthwith appointed, charged with an enquiry into the different systems of proportional representation, with a view to recommend one of these for adoption.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in presenting this resolution to the House, I do so with considerable timidity, because I realize there are, perhaps, members as well as many other people who look upon proportional representation as something new or somewhat of a fad. I would say to any one who may hold those ideas that it is not new and that to-day every country in the world, that has responsible government and an electoral system such as we have in Canada, is seriously discussing proportional representation. I sincerely hope that something may be done in order that we may secure in Canada a better electoral system than we have at present. I trust this subject, that has to do with the national interest and that is something of much greater importance than the success of any party, may be freely and fully discussed from an unbiased and non-partisan standpoint.

The chief evil of our present system is that large and important sections of opinion are left unrepresented, and the end of all political reform should be to secure to these important sections their due and fair share of representation in this House. In speaking of the single member mode of representation, I do not think I can do better than quote from one of the most outstanding statesmen in Great Britain to-day, the Right Hon. Arthur James Balfour. Speaking before the Scottish Conservative Club, in Scotland, he said:

> Everybody who has watched the actual course of a contested election in a constituency where parties were evenly balanced knows perfectly well the monstrous power which is given to a very small minority to exact a pledge from the candidate, not that he should support this or that great policy, but that he should help their small and particular interest.
> I know of nothing which is more corrupting both to the electors or to the elected than that process, and, although I have fully seen the difficulties which attach to what is commonly known as minority representation, it surely is an extraordinary criticism upon our existing system that, while a small handful of interested people, can turn an election one way or the other on their own personal issue, huge minorities like the minority of the Unionists in Scotland are utterly and grossly unrepresented. We give every privilege to the little knot of people in the individual constituencies: we ignore the great mass who under our existing system find no representation at all comparable either to their numerical strength or their public spirit or to any other quality which makes them useful, able and independent citizens.

Those are very strong words from one who I am sure every hon. member of this House will regard as a great authority. I look upon his words as a very strong condemnation of our present single member electoral system.

Looking over our election returns in this country, I find that we have large majorities grossly unrepresented in this country. I should like, if time permitted, to go over all the provinces of Canada and give to the House the results of elections during the last decade or two under our present system. In the province of Quebec, for instance, in the general election of 1900, fifty-seven Liberals and eight Conservatives were elected. The fifty-seven Liberals secured 133,566 votes, and the eight conservatives 103,253. The average number of votes required to elect one Conservative was 12,907, while the average number of votes to elect one Liberal was 2,344. Thus one Liberal vote had the value of six Conservative votes. Under proportional representation thirty-seven Liberals would have been elected instead of fifty-seven and twenty-eight Conservatives instead of eight.

Take the election of 1904 in the same great province. Then fifty-four Liberals were elected, and eleven Conservatives. The fifty-four Liberals secured 144,992 votes, and the eleven Conservatives 111,550. The average number of votes required to elect one Liberal was 2,636, and the average number of votes required to elect one Conservative was 10,141. A Liberal vote had the value of four Conservative votes. Under proportional representation thirty-nine Liberals would have been elected instead of fifty-four and twenty-six Conservatives instead of eleven.

In that same election of 1904 we find that in the province of Nova Scotia 56,526 Liberal votes were cast and eighteen Liberal members elected, and that 46,131 Conservative votes were cast, but not one member was elected. In the same year practically the same condition obtained in the province of British Columbia.

In 1908 in the province of Quebec we find the results were very similar. The Liberals secured 162,176 votes and elected 54 members, while the Conservatives secured 115,579 votes and elected 11 members. The average number of votes required to elect one Liberal was 3,003, and the average number of votes required to elect one Conservative was 10,144. One Liberal vote had the value of 3 Conservative votes. Under proportional representation 38 Liberals would have been elected instead of 54 and 27 Conservatives instead of 11.

These examples should be enough to convince any man in this House that any electoral system that allows such a condition to prevail where it is impossible to elect a Parliament that will properly reflect the opinion of all the people, which is one of the main principles of responsible Government, cannot possibly make for the welfare of our country, and I believe it is the duty of this Parliament, which is about to make a new redistribution of seats, to see that such a condition should no longer prevail. Should we fail to improve it, in my opinion, this Parliament will have failed to do its duty towards the people.

If we look over conditions in other countries we find them very similar where the same electoral system prevails, and in passing I may say that every country in the world that has responsible government has practically the same electoral system of single member constituencies. We find in Great Britain in the general election of 1874, and these are the reasons, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Balfour and many other British statesman are looking very seriously at the present system, which is absolutely unfair, the Conservatives had a majority of 50 in Parliament although the Liberal vote polled was 1,400,000, against a total Conservative vote of 1,200,000. In other words, although the Liberals in that election polled 200,000 more votes than the Conservatives, the Conservatives having a majority of 50 in the House, the Parliament of that great country was elected and served on a minority vote.

Again, in the British election of 1906, the ministerialist group had 56 per cent of the votes polled and elected 72 per cent of the members, while the Conservatives had 44 per cent of the votes polled and elected 28 per cent of the members. The unprecedented ministerial majority of 256 should have been the safe majority of 68.

I have selected only a few outstanding cases but I could give many further examples if time permitted. In the United States in the Oregon election in 1896, the Republicans, with 55 per cent of the votes, elected 83 members to the Legislature, while the Democrats, with 34 per cent of the votes, elected 7. It required 4,499 votes to elect one Democrat, and 619 votes to elect one Republican. The Socialists and Prohibitionists, with 11 per cent of the vote, were unrepresented. I have been unable to secure the returns for some of the other provinces of Canada, but I am told on pretty good authority that the present Government in British Columbia secured only 37 per cent of the vote polled.

We have an example in Toronto to-day of a Government carrying on with a very small minority vote. Now, in regard to the by-elections in East Elgin and West Peterborough, I have not a word to say about the men that represent these ridings. They are no doubt good representatives, but they failed to secure a majority of the total votes polled. Is it fair, or proper, or democratic that we should suffer to exist an electoral system that allows such a condition of things? The principles of democratic government, by the people and for the people, are well established in the minds of citizens, but in my opinion they have failed to work out in practice. For example, in the election of 1904, when the great question of building the Grand Trunk Pacific and the National Transcontinental railway was the main subject before the people of this country, what was the situation? That was the question on which the election was decided, and I think it is fair to assume that all those who voted Conservative at that time were opposed to that railway proposition. In the province of Quebec, under our electoral system, 54 supporters of the proposition were elected and only 11 opponents, whereas, under proportional representation, the respective figures would have been 39 supporters and 26 opponents. In other words, had the election of 1904 been conducted under the proportional system, Quebec would have elected 26 opponents to the proposition instead of 11, and 39 supporters instead of 54, or a difference of 15 supporters fewer and fifteen opponents more. In the good province of Nova Scotia, 46,000 electors did not secure one representative; they did not secure a voice in the House at all, although they had within 10,000 of half the vote. The Liberals elected 18 supporters and the Conservatives, who were at that time opposing the measure, failed to secure one representative. I am convinced that had the election been run under the proportional system, and had the people's minds been properly reflected in the House, that ill-advised and ill-considered railway proposition would never have been put through and Canada could have gone along and developed on safer and saner lines.

Now, the spirit of democracy requires that an equal share of representation shall be given each separate elector, and not that the direction of government shall be entrusted exclusively to one class or party. The first duty of a democracy should be to respect the rights of its citizens. Ever since the earliest days of responsible government, and you may go back centuries in the history of the great British nation, when the first representative government was formed, and follow it down to the present day, there has been a steady development until we have our present great system of government. But in the earlier times only a very small coterie of people had the franchise, and from those days until now the masses have been clamouring for the extension of the franchise. Why did they want the franchise? It was because, in all those years, there was a feeling that the people did not rule, and they believed that if they had the vote they would have sufficient power to control government, and would really have democracy. The franchise has been extended until, at present, almost every adult in the great British Empire has the vote. Yet, notwithstanding this universal application of the principle, the people have been unable to control government sufficiently to see that the different elements of the nation have a fair and equal share in the councils of the country and, may I say particularly, in its inner councils.

A short time ago a thoughtful editorial appeared in the Ottawa Journal. It pointed out that from 1896 to the present day not one farmer from the great province of Ontario had ever been taken into the Cabinet; not one had ever been taken into the inner councils of the nation. I ask, in all fairness and sincerity: Is there a man in this House who could say that in that great and important class in the province of Ontario one man could not have been found with sufficient ability to warrant his inclusion in the Cabinet? I say that there is not an honourable gentleman who would dare stand up on the floor of Parliament and so aver. Yet fifty per cent, we may say, of the people of the province of Ontario, so far as the inner councils of the nation have been concerned, have been disfranchised. Wonder has been expressed at the farmers organizing and going into politics. Well, Spencer says that self-preservation is the first law of nature, and I look to my right to-night and see there the nucleus of a farmers' party. I have heard that party variously called the Agrarian party and the Farmers' party, and there is not a man in this House who has more respect for the farmers or the agrarians, by whichever name you choose to call them, than I have. There is no man in this House who has fought the battles of the farmers longer and more strenuously than I have done, or who is more desirous to see them get their right and fair share in this country. But I must say that if the Farmers' party of to-day aims at becoming the sole governors of the country, then I cannot endorse any such ideal. If, in the past, the people from the urban centres have been governing, that is no reason or excuse for the farmers now to say that because they have perhaps a majority of votes, they will retaliate and elect a government to run the country, and that the people of the cities and towns will have to submit. No. This is a great country, stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific, with millions of farmers, and room for millions more, and millions of citizens in the great and glorious cities of Canada, of which we are all proud, and room for more; and if the Agrarian party desire to serve the best interests of the country, then, instead of seeking to become the governors of the country, they should be willing to join hands with others in the direction of affairs.

If I had my way, I would dispense with all parties, and that is not a conclusion which I have reached only to-day; it is probably some ten years since I saw the advisability of it. I would elect a Parliament of sensible Canadian citizens to come here and deal with the questions of the country on their merits, and not from any party standpoint or party bias; and for the farmers to come as a separate class and say: "We are going to make an effort, if possible, to seize the reins of power, and to govern the country," is an attitude which I cannot support. When a man elects to become the representative of one class he then, to my mind, ceases to be a representative and becomes a delegate. Professor John R. Commons, professor of political economy in the University of Wisconsin, has said "That one man of wealth has the influence of a thousand farmers, storekeepers and labourers." Well, with my experience I would be inclined to think that in some instances you might multiply his estimate a thousand fold.

We are living in a democratic age, an age, I trust, of advancement, but a time of unrest—even dangerous unrest—a time when people are dissatisfied with the old order of things. So many strange evils have sprung into life that one is bewildered. On the one hand we find unusual concentration of wealth in the control of a few; on the other, a growing restlessness and frantic attempts at organization on the part of the wage-earning class. I believe the Government should have an important place in solving these contradictions, and I believe that the remedy lies in the adoption of a proportional representation system in elections.

Let me quote what Lord Robert Cecil, an eminent man in public life in Great Britain, says. At a luncheon held in the House of Commons, London, England, on November 3, 1920, Lord Robert Cecil, speaking on proportional representation, uttered the following words:

I am satisfieid, that propirtional representation has never been more important that it is at the present moment. We are faced all over the world by an attack on what may be called the world order,—a general challenge and dispute on the presupposition of which the whole of our civilization and society is based. It is a time when democracy as a system of government and as a system of social organization is going to be tested to its uttermost, and the machinery which expresses democracy will be overhauled by no friendly critics, to see whether it really does justify the claim it makes. In this country, we have for many years, been aware of a growing criticism of representative institutions as they actually exist. We know that some of our most cherished institutions no longer keep the position in the public reputation that they did half a century ago, and the additional danger exists now, that not only are there those who criticise our institutions, but there are those who desire definitely to set up a different form and method of governing the country which many of us, at any rate, think would lead us straight to anarchy.

It is a time when it boheves all of us who believe in democracy and in stability to look carefully at the foundations on which our institutions are based and to do our utmost to see that they really are based on the only foundation on which democratic institutions can be based, namely, a true accord with the expressed and determined will of the people. It is for that reason that, to my mind, proportional representation has an added importance at the present time.

At the same meeting Colonel L. S. Amery, Under Secretary of the Colonies said:

We are only beginning to realize—the general public I mean—that methods of election influence the whole character and structure of the political life. We have plenty of object lessons before us, both in the present and in the past. I was reading the other day the life of my first political chief, Lord Courtney, and I was impressed with the far-seeing grasp he showed, forty years ago, of the inevitable results of applying the old political system of election to the Irish problem—and he endorsed his belief by sacrificing his political position.

I believe that half, if not the whole of the appalling problem with which we are faced to-day is a by-product of an unfortunate system of elections which created artificial divisions and exaggerated them, when the important thing was for the men of moderate views to get together and find a real solution. If we had had proportional representation, forty years ago, a solution might have been found of the Irish problem then on the lines of moderate men of all shades of opinion, drawing together on common ground.

It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to discuss the different systems of proportional representation. That will be the work of the committee, if appointed. However, I may say I agree with Colonel L. S. Amery when he expresses the belief that, had proportional representation been adopted forty years ago in the British Isles, a solution might have been found of the Irish problem. Our present system does not encourage unity of the Canadian people, which is so necessary for the well-being and general advancement of our country. It rather encourages the opposite. At election time we find Quebec talking about Orange Toronto, and Toronto talking about French Quebec, which, I think, does not make for unity. Does any man tell me that that mode of conducting elections is to the advantage of this country? Personally I cannot see it. In place of drawing our people closer together we, at election time, indulge in picayune methods in a constituency where a man can use "the glad hand" and resort to all the evils that may be attached to a corrupt election to try to secure his return. In a word the idea seems to be "Anything to get votes." We have to acknowledge these things because we all realize that they take place. Instead of talking in Montreal about Orange Toronto, and talking in Orange Toronto about French Quebec, we should, as some one has well said:

Be noble, and the nobleness
That lies in other men—sleeping but not dead—
Shall rise in majesty, to meet thine own.

There are many countries in Europe that have adopted proportional representation, and some countries in the British Empire where the system is in vogue. I do not deem it necessary to outline the conditions which exist in those countries, and the success which has followed the adoption of that system, but I want to refer to a few cases in our own country where proportional representation has been tried. The system was tried in the city of Winnipeg a short time ago, during the Provincial election, and I now wish to quote the opinion of the Hon. Thomas H. Johnson, Attorney General of Manitoba, as to how it worked out.

Mr. Johnson wrote:

I feel I can truthfully say that I have not now, and never have had, a single regret for the efforts made by me, personally, in connection with the introduction of this reform in our election laws. The proportional representation system gives a more truly representative legislature than the system of single member constituencies. Everything claimed for it in the literature which we used, and with which we are familiar, was clearly accomplished. The electors of Winnipeg had no more difficulty than usual, and the counting, nothwithstanding the great number of candidates, forty-one in all), came off without a hitch of any kind.

I now wish to quote the opinion of another gentleman Mr. W. J. Tupper, K. C., a Conservative member of the Manitoba Legislature, who wrote:

In my opinion the test that proportional representation underwent in this city during the late provincial election, was successful. As I understand the system, it is intended to give representation to all parties in proportion to their numerical strength. The result of the late election showed that the minority parties in the city of Winnipeg received representation in accordance with their voting strength. It however, did not favour independent candidates, as you will have observed.

I may say that the success of the system seems to me to depend upon the effciency of those in control of the counting. We were fortunate in this province to have exceptionally able men in charge and the result is, no doubt, in a great measure due to them.

The mayor of Winnipeg, Mr. C. F. Gray, wrote:

I might say that I followed the application of this new system of election with keen interest and the results have satisfied me that it is the best means of ascertaining the wishes of all sections of the electorate. I look forward to its successful application in the forthcoming municipal election in the city of Winnipeg.

The Manitoba Free Press, in its issue of July 7, 1920, commented editorially on the election, as follows:

Winnipeg, it may be ventured, has put proportional representation upon a Canadian political map. The test the new system has successfully passed through in the recent Manitoba election is the last thing needed to demonstrate the practicability and merits of proportional representation. Its extension to the rural constituencies in Manitoba is assured, and its ultimate adoption of all elections—civic, provincial, and federal—may now be looked on as inevitable. In Winnipeg the test was classic, and proportional representation won with flying colors.

I have some other comments here which perhaps are worth puting on Hansard:

Some of the advantages of the new system are very apparent. In the first place, proportional representation eliminated the excitement and bitterness from the election campaign; the knowledge that each party could only get its fair proportion, and no more, of the available seats made the old-time stategy and electioneering useless—

That is worth considering, Mr, Speaker, if nothing more.

—it also saves thousands of dollars which would have been spent in pushing individual candidates, and it enabled the electors to approach the ballots with a calmness of mind which gave them an opportunity to cast their votes with the greatest possible understanding and intelligence. The trifling number of spoiled ballots is an eloquent testimonial to the fact that the electors were cool and clear-headed when they went to the polls.

The leading fact, however, is that the result of the ballot has worked out with mathematical exactitude to the desired end; the elected candidates represent in accurate proportion the voting strength of the parties in the city; no votes were lost, and the voter who saw that his first choice had been defeated, knew that his vote was not extinguished, but passed on to his alternate preference, and that in the final results he had secured his correct proportion of representation.

I know there are those who think that proportional representation favours little cliques and independent candidates, but the results so far have proved the direct opposite.

Now, Mr. Speaker, after giving this question considerable thought I feel that something should be done to secure for this great country a better election system.

10 p.m.

Last year we spent weeks of valuable time trying to pass an election Act. Yes, we spent weeks trying to build barbed wire entanglements, if I may so express myself, around the polling booth so that the individual elector might be allowed to cast his vote without danger of its being switched or stolen. We acknowledge the principle of one man one vote, or one elector one vote, but we allow in our system of distribution the direct opposite. What would be thought of a government or of an individual member of this House that would introduce a bill giving the electors in one district six votes and those in the adjoining district one vote? What chance would a bill of that description have of adoption by this House? But that is exactly what has happened in some of our electoral districts, in every election for the last twenty years. In one district one Conservative vote might be worth five or siv Liberal votes; in another district that I have referred to in the province of Quebec, at one election, one Liberal vote was worth six Conservative votes; and in the province of Nova Scotia 46,000 Conservative votes out of a total of 103,000—I am speaking in round numbers—did not secure one representative in this chamber, while 56,000 Liberal votes elected eighteen representatives. While the Government of that day might have been elected by a small majority, still I look upon that as very significant because that is the year, 1904, when the great railway question which we are encumbered with to-day was before the country. There is not an hon. gentleman within sound of my voice who would hesitate for a minute in condemning any attempt that might be made to grant to our citizens in one district one vote and to those in another district five or six votes, but that has been the result of our elections during the past year.

Say not it matters not to me
My brother's weal is his behoof,
For in this wondrous human web
If your life's warp, his life is woof.
Woven together are the threads
And you and he are in one loom
For good or ill, for sad or glad,
Your lives must share one common doom.
Then let the daily shuttle glide
Wound full of threads of kindly care
That life's great lengthening web may be
Not only strongly wrought but fair.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, the resolution before us, is to my mind, well timed. The public is seriously considering this question and is intensely interested in it. It has received much study and is receiving more study. Such experience as we already have had in Canada with this system has been very satisfactory. I think the time for the introduction of the resolution is also well chosen because of what some people call the present political unrest, but which I prefer to call a political awakening.

People are doing their own thinking now as they have never done before in the world's history. There are extremists among labourers and among advanced thinkers, but we have always had extremists among thinking men and women. We must decide how we shall treat our extremists. In olden days they had a way of their own—those in authority adopted the plan of putting extremists to death as the handiest and most expeditious plan available; later on the plan of imprisonment was substituted; and in still later years Englishmen adopted the plan of allowing the extremist to shout himself hoarse in Hyde Park. The world mildly applauded the heroic action of the Englishman, but hesitated about following his example. The world moves and the extremist is no longer satisfied with being allowed to air his view in the public parks. He wishes to be given the opportunity of expressing his views in the legislative halls of his country, and the idea is gradually gaining ground that where the extremist has any considerable backing he should have that opportunity, and that the only safe course is to give it to him.

The best citizens are always drawn towards the under dog, and their sympathy always goes out to those who appear to be oppressed. They want to see every one have a chance, and the old plan of suppressing the extremist is no longer workable. The main result of suppressing the extremist was to get a new and bigger crop of his kind. We may kill or imprison the idealist, but we cannot kill or imprison the ideal. There is a law above the law of man and wiser than the law of man, which prevents that.

With education even so general as it is in our land, the only safe way is to give every encouragement to those having advanced thoughts to give expression to their thoughts, whether they be right or wrong. Public parks served their day as places for that expression, but to my mind election days and legislative halls are the proper times and places for their expression in our day. In the public parks there is no satisfactory method of answering the soap-box orator, but in this House all new ideas can be met under the most complete rules and regulations and in such a way that those new ideas will be subject to the acid test. They will be set before the public with their strength and their weakness clearly exposed to the public gaze. Each argument will be publicly met by those well qualified to meet it. All new ideas will be exposed to cold-blooded public scrutiny, and I have sufficient faith in the public to believe that the general result will be that new ideas that are worth while will survive and in time will be put into effect, while those ideas not well founded will die. I doubt if there is any better place in Canada than this House in which to give effect to sound ideas and to kill unsound ideas. Carlyle, referring to the French Revolution, speaks of "truth clad in hell fire." It rests largely with this House to say how the new ideas of our day, be they true or false, shall come to us. It is largely ours to say whether they will come to us clothed in the garments of peace or dressed in the lurid garments described by Carlyle.

I do not think our extremists in any particular line are so numerous as some people suppose. They must be fairly numerous before they can get representation in this House even under the most democratic plan of proportional representation, but if extremists in any particular line are sufficiently numerous to obtain representation in the House under that plan, then I believe it is for the benefit of the country that they should come here and air their views in a place where those views can be properly met. Let me repeat that I believe if their views are well founded they will survive and eventually conquer, while if they are not well founded they will die.

This surely is as it should be. I believe we should arrange that in all our cities, at least in those which are entitled to more than one representative, the constituencies should be grouped together and each elector should only have one first vote, being entitled to give second and further choices, where necessary, to other candidates. This would enable any group of people to obtain representation, provided they are sufficiently strong to be entitled to representation. In time, as the plan is worked out, it may be well to provide for the grouping together of a considerable portion of thickly peopled rural sections under the same plan. Possibly at present it might be well to try it out in cities where it can best be worked out, and in rural communities where we have only one member for each constituency we should have provision for a second choice where there are more than two candidates.

The hon. gentleman who moved this resolution has suggested that a committee should be appointed to go into the matter. That is certainly the proper course. There is no need of going into the details here or of elaborating any argument as to how the plan should be worked out. I have no doubt that a committee would be prepared to consider all phases of the question, not only the matter of proportional representation in grouped constituencies, if you like to use the term, but also the matter of transferable votes in single constituencies.

The hon. gentleman has said something with regard to the experiment in Manitoba. I suppose the House generally is aware that in the last local election in Manitoba provision was made for the working out of proportional representation in the city of Winnipeg. The city was granted ten representatives and they were elected under proportional representation. In the country nothing of the kind was provided; no provision was made for transferable votes. Now, let us see how the different plans worked out. I refer again to the Free Press of July 5 last. The three groups which had any large representation in Winnipeg were Labour, Liberal and Conservative. Besides the candidates for these groups there were eleven Independent candidates, each representing, I suppose, some new idea of his own. The fear is sometimes expressed that some faddist or other might by means of this plan be elected to Parliament, but the Winnipeg experiment does not justify any idea of that kind. In Winnipeg, according to the Free Press figures, which, no doubt, are correct—they were published some days after the election—the votes cast as first choice were 42.5 per cent Labour, 30.4 per cent Liberal, 13.7 per cent Conservative, and 13.4 per cent Independent. You will notice that the Independents had nearly as many votes as the Conservatives, but it must be remembered that the Conservative group was one group where as among the Independents there were anywhere from six to eleven groups, so to speak; there were eleven candidates. As a result of the voting, four Labour candidates, four Liberals and two Conservatives were elected. It might be said that only one Conservative and one Independent should have been elected, and perhaps, another Labour candidate. But I have given a reason why the Independents were not elected—it is simple enough: because they were a lot of dissociated groups; none of them had sufficient backing among the people of Winnipeg to entitle them to represent the people of Winnipeg. The Conservatives had sufficient backing; they had that whole group of 13.7 per cent. Had anyone known the total number of Conservative, Liberal and Labour votes and endeavoured to give to each group the representation to which it was intitled, he could not have done it more fairly than was the case as the result of this election by proportional representation. It is true that there were less votes per member for Conservatives than in the case of any other group and considerably more votes per member for Labour than for any other. Had they elected, say, one more Labour candidate and one less Conservative, the inequality would have been very much greater. As it is at present, you have about one Labour representative for a little over ten per cent of the vote and one Conservative representative for a little less than seven per cent of the vote. Had you changed that, had there been one more Labour member and one less Conservative member, the disparity would be still greater. Labour would have one representative for a little over eight per cent, and the Conservatives would have one for thirteen and a half or nearly fourteen per cent. So you see a fairer result could not have been obtained amongst the parties.

We come to the other question of transferable votes in single constituencies, and there is little enlightenment to be thrown on that by the Manitoba situation. In Manitoba no provision was made in the provincial election for transferable votes in single constituencies. As is liable to be the case in Canada for some time at least, there were more than the two old groups; there were additional groups. I have from the Canadian Nation figures given of the results in some of those constituencies, which figures show that many of the elected representatives were minority candidates. It is not, however, fair to say of those men that they were not entitled to their seats, because they obtained the seats under the plan that was established, the only plan on which they could be candidates. No blame, therefore, attaches to them; the blame is on the system. In Brandon, the Labour candidate secured election by 2,007 votes, while 2,648 votes were cast against him for the two non-Labour candidates, so that he was a minority candidate. In the electoral division of Emerson 989 votes elected a Farmer representative, while 1,681 Liberal and Conservative votes were ineffective. In Manitou constituency 1,085 votes elected a Conservative candidate, while 1,927 votes for Liberal and Farmer candidates were wasted, or nearly double the number. In Rockwood the elected candidate obtained 978 votes, rendering ineffective the 977 votes, or one vote less, for another candidate, and 638 votes for a third candidate. That is, the elected candidate received only 978 votes, while 1,615 votes were cast against him. As I have said, there is no fault attaching to the candidates in that case; they obtained their election under the only system which was available.

We have at present in this House three members elected from constituencies in Ontario against whom the taunt is sometimes hurled that they are minority representatives. The fact that they are minority representatives is not any fault of theirs; it is the fault of the people generally and the fault of this House and of our plan of election. They offered themselves as candidates under the only system available, and they were duly elected under that system. It is very unfair to them that any one should be in a position to claim that they are minority representatives. If we wish to avoid the possibility or even probability of minority representatives in this House, we must adopt the principle of allowing the elector more than one choice, that is, where there is more than one candidate. It is quite plain that, for some time at least, we shall, in our politics, be divided into groups, and we should make our electoral machinery suit changed conditions. There is very little doubt that in the next election three-cornered and even four and five-cornered fights in single constituencies will take place, and it is our duty before the next election to provide legislation which will properly meet changed conditions and enable the electors to have complete say as to who shall represent them.

We hear the complaint made by leaders of the present Opposition that the opponents of the Government will be divided and will be fighting against one another in such a way as to weaken the effect of anything they decide to do. On the other hand we hear complaints from leaders and supporters on the Government side that there is danger of unfair understandings and arrangements amongst the leaders of the Opposition groups, and that this will militate against the Government. The way to overcome these dangers, if such exist, is to adopt the principle under discussion, where every elector can exercise his choice to the full limit.

Something has been said by the hon. member for East Peterborough (Mr. Sexsmith) with regard to the action of the farmers in forming an organization of their own. I do not think he was quite consistent with what he said before that; I think he rather contradicted himself. Let me, however, say this to my hon. friend, that I think he must admit that he has never seen in this group anything that would justify him in supposing that we want to make this group exclusive. The farmers generally do not want to form an exclusive political organization; they do not want to be exclusive; they do not want any class to rule. In fact, the main reason of their organization is their objection to class rule. We have had class rule in Canada since Confederation, and we want to do away with that. We have a platform on which we believe that members of every class can stand, that every honest man who wants fair play can stand. Therefore, we stick to that platform. Perhaps I am getting a little out of order; but if so I am only following my hon. friend who spoke before, who was also out of order. We ask for proportional representation amongst other things, so that my hon. friend is with us there.

Personally, I would like to see our law so framed that every opportunity will be given to the electors to decide who shall be their representatives. I realize that the leading issue in the next election campaign will be the issue between a customs tariff, probably somewhat resembling the tariff we have at present, on the one side, and a very low tariff on the other. I need not say where I stand on that question. Still, if the majority of the people of Canada desire to retain a protective tariff such as we have at present, or even a higher tariff, they have an absolute right to such a tariff, and notwithstanding my own preference, I wish them to have it. They have the right to rule, and they have the right to decide what should be done. I may believe their course a mistaken one, but I must grant them the right to make their own mistakes.

I trust this resolution will be adopted by an overwhelming majority of the members of the House, and that it will be followed by immediate and effectual legislation.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I did not arrive in the chamber in time to hear the opening sentences of the speech of the hon. member for East Peterborough (Mr. Sexsmith); but I think I was in time to hear the greater part of his speech, and I may frankly say that I was very much impressed with many of the arguments which he presented. I have had the privilege of sitting in this House with the hon. member for East Peterborough for a number of years. I know he never advocates anything unless he is absolutely sincere, and he is always very careful in his accumulation of facts and always logical in his presentation of them. I find myself, however, in this position in regard to the resolution before us. Very frankly I confess that I have not given this subject the careful study which has undoubtedly been given to it by the hon. member for East Peterborough and by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Thomson). I find myself then in a position of being ill-informed as to, perhaps, the benefits of this proposed system over our present system. It may be, as these hon. gentlemen urge, that the system of proportional representation, such as is proposed in this resolution, would be vastly superior to the system which has prevailed ever since Confederation, and I am conscious of many defects in that system. I am not sure at the present moment that the system suggested would be better than our present system, with all its difficulties, and that brings me to the objection which I find in the resolution as proposed. It reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, in order to give each voter an equal share in the representation, some system of proportional representation should be adopted—

Let me stop there. Now if I vote for this resolution, then perforce I am voting in favour of adopting some system of proportional representation, and speaking for myself alone, I have not sufficient information at the present time to convince me that such a system would be superior to our present system. It is true that the resolution goes on to suggest that a special committee be appointed to gather information in regard to proportional representation with a view to reporting to the House, but I would feel I was in a much better position to cast a vote in regard to proportional representation if I was provided with the information which this committee is supposed to gather than I am now, when the information has not been gathered and presented. If that part of the resolution were eliminated which asks me to vote in favour of a system of proportional representation, and the resolution merely asked me to support the appointment of a committee which was to gather information in regard to proportional representation, I would freely vote for it.

I shall not take up time discussing the subject further, for the reasons I have already given. I do not feel competent to discuss the subject on its merits. I have not given it careful study, and I think it is of sufficient importance to warrant hon. members of this House giving it careful consideration. I should like to hear the opinions of hon. gentlemen who have been longer in public life than I have. I should be very glad, indeed, to hear the well-considered opinion of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), for instance. He has been a long time in public life and no doubt has given the subject some consideration; whether or not he has gone deeply into the question it is for him to say. Frankly, Sir, I feel that I am not qualified to discuss this matter on its merits. I also feel that I have not sufficient knowledge of the system of proportional representation to enable me to vote for a resolution declaring in favour of it.

Mr. G. W. ANDREWS (Centre Winnipeg): The outstanding fact to my mind with regard to proportional representation is that it is here now. It is here in this House. It is in the Ontario Legislature, it is in the Manitoba Legislature, and in British Columbia. Proportional representation is in every place where they have held an election in recent years. The people of Canada are not satisfied with the old system, and they have split themselves into groups, not as the result of proportional representation, however; and if groups we must have, for Heaven's sake let us have intelligent groups. Perhaps the most useful contribution that I can make to the debate, coming from Manitoba, where the question is no longer an academic one, but where the system has actually been tried, will be to give a few facts with regard to the trial that was made of the system there during the last election. In the first place, it was tried in Winnipeg alone, and with this extraordinary result, that in Winnipeg we have a group of three parties only, Labour, Liberal and Conservative, whereas in the outlying parts of the province where the old system was in force, we have a group of five, Liberal, Farmer, Conservative, Labour and Independent. It will no doubt be interesting to the House to ascertain how this occurred. I have some figures here which I shall not read at length, but which with the permission of the House I shall place on Hansard, after quoting briefly from them. I have here the actual returns of every constituency in Manitoba, the number of votes polled, the number of candidates, and the results. In Brandon, for instance, where my old friend, General Kirkcaldy was running as a Conservative, he polled 1,245 votes. My old friend, Mr. Clements, a Liberal, polled 1,403 votes, and Albert E. Smith, the Labour man, polled 2,207 votes. This is a fair sample of a modern election where more than two candidates are running. It happens to-day, Mr. Speaker, quite often, I think, that we not only do not have majority representatives, but we have minority ones and this is a fair case in point. In Emerson constituency, the farmers elected a member with a vote of 989. The Government polled 756, and the Conservatives, 925. The man who was elected with 989 votes had against him 1,600 votes of people who did not believe in his policies. It has sometimes been said that if it had not been for proportional representation there would not have been so many groups in the Manitoba House. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall read a letter from the Executive Council in Winnipeg.

> I am in receipt o your letter of the 23rd ult., with respect to the recent Manitoba elections, and I am enclosing herewith the list of the candidates and the votes polled for each in each constituency in the Province of Manitoba.
> I cannot understand how the newspapers are possessed with the idea that proportional representation is responsible for the reduced majority of the Norris Government, as the vote in Winnipeg did not show this by any means. I have given as near as possible the party affiliations of each candidate, but until the House meets it is difficult to accurately state how some of these will line up.
> Had proportional representation been in force throughout the whole of the province there is no question in the world but that the Norris Government would have received a much larger representation.

One point I want hon. members to realize, is that we are not having groups because of proportional representation, but in spite of it. I think most of the ground has been covered in this debate. A point, however, that presents some difficulty is: What are you going to do in single-member constituencies? Most men feel that it is impossible to group the outside constituencies, and frankly I am of that opinion. Our areas are too far-flung to do it. As a result of the election in Manitoba there is a Bill before the Manitoba House at the present time, and it has passed its second reading, for the purpose of carrying out the idea of the single transferable vote in every constituency in Manitoba. This does not mean group constituencies, but if there are more than three candidates the elector will be given a first, second, and third preference. For instance, if there are three men, one a Conservative, one a Liberal, and one a Farmer, I, being a Liberal, would probably vote for the Liberal. Now, the majority is the majority of the votes cast at the election. Supposing 14,000 votes are cast; half of that would be 7,000, and one over that would be the quota required to elect a member. Now, I vote for the Liberal, and if he has sufficient votes in the first round to elect him, that settles it. If not, it is proposed to drop out the low man and transfer his votes, according to the preference of the votes. Probably, in the next case, I would transfer my vote to the Farmer if my first choice was not elected. These votes are transferred in accordance with the expressed desire of the voter; so that, as a matter of fact, no vote is lost, and it is impossible to have a minority candidate returned. The man who does come back must have at least a majority of one.

I was very much interested the other day, when the debate on patronage was before the House, to hear the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Edwards), suggest that the patronage should be given to the sitting member. I wonder what he would do in a case like Emerson, where the sitting member represented 900, although approximately 1,680 people had voted against him. It is entirely possible under our present system that we may have a House, after the next election, unless there is a change, representing about one-third of the people of Canada. That is quite possible. To-day, this proposal is right in line with practical politics. It is no longer a matter of academic debate, and I do sincerely trust that the Government will appoint this committee. I agree with the hon. member who has just resumed his seat that if the mover of the resolution could recommend the appointment of a committee without committing us to some definite form of proportional representation, it would be very much better. I will vote for it in any case, because it is a right thing; but if this suggestion were adopted I think it would be in the better interests of all concerned. With regard to the figures which I have, with the permission of the House, Mr. Speaker, I would place them on Hansard. The statement gives the names, the number of votes and the number of candidates in every constituency. In some constituencies there were as many as five candidates running. I think that this table would be of general interest to members of the House, and it would be well to have it on Hansard.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member would be better advised to read the list: It is only in rare and exceptional cases that documents are permitted to be embodied in Hansard without having been read, and I have never known instances in which this was done in a debate on private member's day. While I regret that this is so, nevertheless it is the fact, and I think it would be well, in the interests of proper procedure, for the hon. member to conform to the rule and read the list.

Mr. McMASTER: May I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker? If this is a very long statement the reading of it may take up considerable time. This is an extremely important debate, and while the statement may not strike hon. members on its reading, yet in printed form the facts would catch the eye, and I have no doubt that they would be of interest. I suggest, Sir, that it would be helpful to a proper consideration of the subject if the document were allowed to be placed on Hansard.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is only a question of principle. It is the duty of the Chair to direct the attention of the House to the rule, which is very clear and well defined. However, under the circumstances, I have no objection to submitting the question to the House. Is it the pleasure of the House that the tabulated statement submitted by the hon. member (Mr. Andrews), be inserted in Hansard without being read?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. ANDREWS: I have just one more word to add. I would quote the following from the letter I received from Mr. Tupper:

> I might say that the success of the system seems to me to depend upon the efficiency of those in control of the counting. We were fortunate in this province to have exceptionally able men in charge, and the result is no doubt in a great measure due to them.

I want to point out that this success in Winnipeg was not a mere accident. It was due almost entirely to the efforts of Mr. Ronald Hooper, who is employed in the Labour Department in Ottawa. While many of us have been playing at golf and having a good time for years, this young man has been devoting his energy and his time to the study of the question or representation in Parliament, and I have no hesitation in saying to-day that he knows more about this subject than any man in Canada. or perhaps in the world. If the committee is appointed, I do hope that he will be asked to attend, because his views will be of great value.

Following is the list submitted by the hon. member for Winnipeg Centre:

NOTE.—G—Liberal. L—Labor. I—Independent. F—Farmer. C—Conservative.

Hon. J. A. CALDER (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): Mr. Speaker, in view of the discussion which we have had, it seems to me that probably the debate might be shortened if I intimated to the House briefly the decision which the Government has reached with regard to this important question. As every member is aware, there has been for some years past very considerable discussion throughout the country with reference to our present method of securing representation in the House of Commons and to our various legislative bodies. Whether we may agree with it or not, there is undoubtedly a large mass of public opinion to the effect that our present method of selecting representatives to our legislative bodies is not all that it should be. I do not propose at this stage to enter upon a detailed discussion of the merits or demerits of the present system. I am rather inclined to the view that the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), fairly well represents the views of the House; that is, that most of us have not given as close and exhaustive study to the question as we should.

I doubt very much whether the House at this time should be called upon to express an opinion upon the broad principle as to whether or not we ought to adopt some method of proportional representation. I think we shall be in a better position to give a verdict on that question a little later in the session, if the course suggested is adopted, namely, that the whole problem should be referred to a special committee of the House, and that every means be taken to get the fullest light possible upon the subject. That is what I would desire myself. While I have followed the discussions that have taken place throughout the country, and particularly in the press, during the course of the last few years, I must confess that I have not that full knowledge of the whole problem that would enable me to cast an intelligent vote. Let me give a simple illustration. I intended when the member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Thomson) was speaking, to ask whether or not, in the case of the city of Winnipeg, where proportional representation was adopted for the last election, every voter was required to vote for ten candidates. That I was not sure of; I do not know. I understand they had but one constituency for a population of about 225,000 people, that in that one constituency they elected ten members, and that during the course of the election they had something like over forty candidates running. In the case of Vancouver, I think they had something like fifty odd candidates running in that one constituency. One thing that bothers me—and I think it is very essential in providing for any such system—is that in the case of an election method of that kind an individual, in many cases apparently, must be voting for a principle rather than for a man. Because I can conceive that in an election such as they had in Winnipeg it would be almost physically impossible for candidates to become acquainted with thier constituents, or for constituents to get to know their candidates, by reason of the size of the constituency and the multiplicity of candidates, and particularly where an election is arranged in a comparatively short time as it was under the Manitoba law.

Another thing that troubles me—I am merely mentioning this at the present time—is that I see difficulties in adopting one principle of representation for urban communities, and another system for rural communities. Now there may be good reasons for that. However, I do not wish at the present time to enter upon a detailed discussion of the features of the system either pro or con, I simply throw out this suggestion: The whole subject is one worthy of the very fullest consideration of this House, and Parliament should take means whereby it may obtain the very best advice and the very best evidence it possibly can on the subject. In so far as the resolution itself is concerned I think the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) pointed out what may be called a defect, and that is that the House should not at this stage be called upon to vote upon the principle of the resolution. For that reason it has therefore been suggested that the motion should be amended, and I propose to move an amendment so as to bring about that result. Accordingly I beg to move:

That all the words after the word "House" in the second line thereof be struck out and the following be substituted therefor:

A Special Committee of this House should be appointed to consider the subject of proportional representation and the subject of the single transferable vote—

Which is a very different thing, as I understand it, from proportional representation; both subjects should be considered—

—and the desirability of the application of one or the other, or both, to elections to the House of Commons of Canada, and to report thereon to the House, and that such Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses under oath.

If that amendment is acceptable I think, before the House meets to-morrow, we will be able to arrange for a committee that will be satisfactory.

Mr. F. L. DAVIS (Neepawa): I do not intend spending any time upon a discussion of the question. I merely wish to refer to the use in the amendment of the term "the single transferable vote." This has generally referred to the Hare System of Representation, and I think perhaps the amendment would be clearer if it was phrased in this way "the single transferable or preferential vote" as doubtless that is what the Minister of Immigration has in mind.

Mr. CALDER: I have no objection to inserting the words "or preferential vote."

Mr. J. J. DENIS (Joliette): At this late hour of the night I shall not impose a long speech on the House. However, as I take a deep interest in this matter of proportional representation, or the method of transferable votes, or any other system which might have for its object the improvement of the existing system of election, I think it my duty to say a word or two upon the present resolution. At the outset I congratulate the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Calder) for introducing the amendment which he has brought in. I understood on the reading of the resolution as originally drafted that it was a committal on the merits of the issue. But now I gather that the only question that should be dealt with by the House at the present time is, whether or not this question is important enough to justify the House in appointing a committee to consider it. Therefore I think it was wise to omit that part of the resolution which was a committal on the merits of the issue, and simply leave before the House the question of whether or not a special committee should be appointed.

One might ask what is proportional representation? To the man who has not made some study of the question, proportional representation, might, perhaps, mean a revolution in the electoral franchise. I must say, Sir, that in my opinion proportional representation means nothing of the kind. Proportional representation, to my mind, is purely and simply a mile-stone on the road of political evolution and reform. The electoral franchise is rather a new invention in the lives of civilized nations. One has not to go very far back in history to find the origin of the electoral system. Civilized nations had existed for many centuries before the popular electoral franchise was given, or invented, if I might use that term. The development of a popular electoral franchise was gradually accomplished, first in Great Britain then in the United States, and finally in all the important countries of the world. Like every other improvement, or every other device, it has developed by degrees. The first systems were crude and very antiquated and also unjust to the people, but by degrees these systems have been improved, and to-day the system of proportional representation is nothing more or less than an improvement upon the present plan which has defects—a fact, no one can deny. If, for instance, one should only look back through history for the last five years one will readily find that the electoral system has been changed and modified in many countries of the world. Take our own country alone. Is it not true, Sir, that in the last five years more changes have been wrought in our electoral system and our electoral laws than there surely were in the fifty years that preceded this period? The object of proportional representation is to see to it that the wish of the elector be given effect to. It has been demonstrated by the mover of this resolution, and it is known to everybody in this House that the present system is defective in that it does not give effect to the wishes of the elector. Especially is this true when in a single constituency there are several candidates representing different groups. I will not go into details, but en passant I might point out the fact that at the next general election it is common knowledge that there will be in the field the candidates of four parties—the Unionist party, the Liberal party, the Agrarian party and the Labour party. Now, taking a single constituency in which four candidates are running, each representing one of those parties, is it not true that in many cases the successful candidate will not be the man who will represent the majority of the electors? The hon. member for Winnipeg who took his seat a few minutes ago pointed out the same circumstance in another form. I think it is sufficient to bring that defect before the House to convince every hon. member of the necessity of a change in our law. Needless is it for me to say that in each and every case the man elected should represent the majority of his electors, and if we come to the conclusion that a different result might follow under the existing law, I think it is the duty of Parliament to change that law in order to give effect to the will of the electorate. Proportional representation, Sir, although relatively new, is not an entirely new system. I find that proportional representation has been in effect in over ten countries, including Galicia, Denmark, Sweden, Belgium, the Netherlands, Switzerland, two or three of the Balkan States, and Brazil. Further, wherever the system has been given a fair trial it has never been discarded, which speaks strongly in favour of its merits. The hon. member who introduced this resolution quoted many instances in which flagrant injustice has been done to the electorate. I might perhaps add to the long list. Indeed, if one should go through the results of parliamentary elections in this and other countries the book which I am now holding in my hand would not be large enough to contain all the examples of the dire injustice to the electors on account of the present system not being as effective as it should be to give proper expression to the will of the electorate. While the hon. member was speaking there came to my mind two instances which are familiar to us and which occurred in the Federal elections of 1917. In those elections the country west of the Great Lakes elected only two Liberal members. Is it to be supposed, Sir, that under proportional representation more than two Liberal members would not have been elected there? The answer is obvious. Taking my own province, sixty-two Liberals were elected as against only three Unionists. Is it reasonable to suppose that the Union party could not have secured more than three seats if proportional representation had been in operation? I do not believe it, I am sure of the contrary. Therefore, we have on the one hand in the West the Liberals deprived of that representation which they should have had; and, on the other hand, in the province of Quebec we have the Unionists deprived of the representation which they should have had. And these are typical of other cases that could be cited.

Now, proportional representation to my mind is only an expression qualifying a proposed change in the present electoral system. The change might also come under the form of transferable votes for single constituencies, or under any other form. But at all events, as was clearly demonstrated by the hon. Minister of Immigration, it is certainly a reasonable and just reform, and the House owes it to itself and to the country that a special committee be appointed to consider this question very thoroughly and report thereon to the House, and then every member will be able to carefully study that report and be able to express an enlightened opinion on the subject.

I will not attempt to enumerate the many advantages which in my opinion would follow the adoption of proportional representation, but I might bring to the attention of the House one point which was raised some time ago by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) when speaking on the address. in substance he said that in the Old Country, England especially, when a man has become a national figure, whether it be in one party or another the people will support him at the polls and almost invariably that man will be returned to Parliament as often as he desires. We know that history supports that statement. In this country, where politics are not so well developed as they are in the older countries, and where perhaps the political sense is not as keen, we often see men of the highest integrity and unquestioned ability defeated at the polls. Well, whatever party such men belong to it is always a loss to the country when they fail to secure re-election. When men have made their mark in Parliament, men of the type we have in this House, I do not care to what party they belong, my opinion is that such men have become an asset to their country and should be encouraged to remain in public life. Under the present system we have seen time and again our best men defeated simply because the electors have not had the advantage of voting under a system of proportional representation.

Mr. McMASTER: They could be put in the Senate.

Mr. DENIS: The resolution as amended simply asks that a committee be appointed. Taking into consideration the fact that this question is a most important one and that members on both sides seem to be most anxious that it be debated at length, I think it is only proper and right that the resolution as amended should carry and that a special committee to investigate this matter should be appointed.

Mr. JOHN HAROLD (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendment proposed by the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Calder). I feel that the Government are to be commended for the stand they have taken with regard to the request that a committee be appointed to consider this important question. I am not an enthusiast, nor have I been entirely won over to proportional representation, but being a so-called minority representative, I have given the matter a good deal of consideration. One point to which I should like particularly to refer is the desirability of having the transferable vote in the single-member constituency. In our own constituency the representative in the provincial House is a minority representative; he did not secure fifty per cent of the vote in the riding. As I took part in a three-cornered contest, the same thing resulted, the vote being about 2,100 out of a total of 5,400. Now we have to face the situation which confronts us. We are going to have in many constituencies throughout the country representatives of three or four different groups of thought and we should consider in what way the laws should be changed so that the best representatives can be selected from those constituencies. From my experience I would say that the adoption of the transferable vote would lead to a much better condition in such constituencies from the standpoint of fairness and honesty in elections. Considerable influence would be brought to bear in such cases to have certain candidates withdrawn in order that a combination might be effected against some other candidate. On the other hand, we know from experience that influence would also be brought to bear with a view to bringing out certain candidates in order to split certain votes and to elect the one whose success was desired by those working for such an end. If every group is perfectly free, without the exercise of any influence, to put its representative in the field, a candidate's election being impossible if the sentiment of the majority of the people is not beind him, a much more desirable state of affairs in regard to elections in such cases is brought about.

I understand that the present Government in Ontario polled the smallest number of votes of the three parties that were running. They themselves recognize the weakness of their position and have quite consistently pressed that some change be made in order that a similar condition might not again prevail. We are experimenting with proportional representation in the provinces and the municipalities. It seems to me that this Parliament should proceed very cautiously in respect to any proposed changes; we had better profit by the experience of those who are already carrying on experiments. Furthermore, one trial is not going to tell the tale. Sometimes a new thing is taken up enthusiastically; many people are interested in making it a success, and it proves to be a temporary success. But we have to keep in mind the necessity of having a strong and stable government and at the same time of changing our electoral machinery from time to time so as to take care of any abuses that arise through the changes in the opinions of the people such as their desire to form themselves into different groups. The Government have, I think, correctly interpreted public opinion in this matter. I have every confidence that the committee which is to be appointed will come to a wise decision, one that would prove to be a benefit to the country at the next election.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to let this occasion pass without extending a word of commendation to the Government for granting the committee asked for in the resolution moved by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Sexsmith). Let me say at once that I am in entire accord with the principle of proportional representation, and that it has my hearty support. It is a principle that has long since passed the experimental stage. It is a significant fact that those European countries which have adopted it and applied it in their legislative system are to-day perhaps the most orderly countries in the world, and are among those subject to the least political disturbance. The system has prevailed in Belgium, Holland, Denmark and Sweden for many years and has operated very successfully. There is very good reason for that; for it is simply an extension of the principle of representative government.

In 1916 the British House of Commons, the mother of parliaments, arranged for a Speakers' conference to consider this among other matters of reform in their electoral system, and that Speakers' conference, composed of the most representative men in the British House of Commons, brought in a unanimous report in favour of the application of the principle of proportional representation in the conduct of elections in the United Kingdom. It is, therefore, not a question of experiment; it is a principle which has been tested and tried and the operation of which has been proved to be successful.

Reference has been made to-night to the experience of Winnipeg in the last provincial election. I have talked to many representative men in that city, and without exception, irrespective of political affiliations, they are strong in their commendation of the principle as it was actually worked out in the last provincial election in Manitoba. I am heartily in accord also with the application of the system of preferential voting in single-member constituencies. My hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Harold) has referred to the fact that we have quite a number of groups, shall I say, seeking representation in this House. In a constituency where three or four candidates are running it may very well happen—indeed it is almost certain to happen under our present method—that the successful candidate will represent the minority of the electors in the constituency. That, indeed, was the case in the election held in East Elgin last autumn and in the election later held in Peterborough. By the application of the principle of preferential voting in single-member constituencies that difficulty can be overcome and the representative finally selected will be the representative of a majority of the people in the constituency. I was much impressed indeed with the remarks of my hon. friend from Joliette (Mr. Denis) and I endorse the arguments he advanced in favour of this reform. I am glad the Government has granted this committee; I trust it will investigate the matter fully, and I would offer this suggestion to the committee, that has not yet been appointed, but will be, according to the statement made by the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder), that it might be a very appropriate and useful thing if all the members of this House would hear the principles underlying the system of proportional representation explained by some of the gentlemen whom, I am sure, the committee will call before it to give evidence. I wish, in closing, to express my strong support of the principle, and I trust the work of this committee will result in the system being adopted by this House.

Mr. W. F. COCKSHUTT (Brantford) Mr. Speaker, for fear it might be presumed that every member of the House is in favour of proportional representation, I think it is well that one should say a word or two against the proposition, and at the expense of being considered singular, I am going to risk the operation and say that, in my judgment, the recommendation that this House should endorse such a principle as proportional representation is, to say the least of it, folly. The hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Denis) has named ten countries, I think, in which he says proportional representation has been in operation for several years. With all due deference to the countries that he named, I do not think they can show anything to Canada or to the British Empire about government. I take the ground that proportional representation is entirely unsuitable to the British system of government, which is that the majority of the people should rule. I cannot see that proportional representation is going to bring that about by any manner of means. Proportional representation is a help to group and class systems, both of which are most undesirable to be introduced into this country. I say that with all deference to my hon. friends opposite who may not agree with me on that. I was informed, within the last few minutes, by a western man—and I think he was telling me the truth—that only recently the Farmers' party themselves in the West tried out this system in their own convention, and they were obliged to abandon it as being too cumbersome even in electing their representatives in their own meeting. Perhaps the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) can tell me whether or not that is true. I have every reason to believe it is.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): Will the hon. member kindly tell the House what province in the West that happened in?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I cannot tell my hon. friend the province, but I can get the information and let him have it in the morning. The gentleman who gave the information is within the confines of this building, and I suppose it is a matter of common knowledge that in one of the western provinces within the last few months the farmers tried out this system in their own convention and they were obliged to abandon it because they found it cumbersome and unworkable.

Mr. CRERAR: If I might be permitted to interrupt the hon. member for a moment, because I am quite sure he does not wish intentionally to get astray, his statement is altogether wrong. The system has been applied in those conventions; it has worked out successfully without any question of doubt whatever, and it has not been abandoned anywhere.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: If that be the truth —and I am bund to accept the statement of the hon. member for Marquette—I say: So much the worse then for the commonsense of the farmers' organizations. I thought they knew better than to try their own physic on their own bodies, but apparently they did not. Proportional representation is at present being considered in the Ontario House by a committee similar to the one proposed, and the riding from which I come is proposed to be one of the victims. That is one reason why I feel particularly strong upon this question. One of the selected constituencies upon which the physic is to be tried consits of the county of Brant, containing two members, the county of Oxford, containing two members, and the county of Waterloo, containing two members. Therefore, I examine the system in the light of what I know about elections and about those particular constituencies. In the first place it is desirable that a community should know the men for whom they are voting. Is that not desirable? It cannot be done in six Ridings. A candidate is hardly known in his own Riding until he has run in two or three elections. Perhaps it is well that he is not known too well. That may be; but whether it be the case or not, it is an axiom of British procedure at any rate that a candidate should be a local man; that his character and ability should be known; that he should have some stake in the community and that he should be a man in whom the people have confidence. In six Ridings that is not possible. Futher, supposing a vacancy occurs by death or because of malpractice in elections; what happens? The successor has to run in six Ridings to be elected. Supposing a man in one Riding was selected as a minister of the Crown; he would have to run, and be elected, not in his own Riding, but in six.

In other respects proportional representation is a most cumbersome and undesirable system; it will advance the class system and the group system. I understand that in Medicine Hat a paper has been established recently by the Non-Partisan League formerly of North Dakota, who have moved into Canada. They have bought up a paper there, if I am credibly informed, and they have proposed eight classes to run in the coming election. It is a great mistake for the people of Canada to break up into eight classes. I want to see a party run, that will run on a policy for the general advantage of Canada. That will be my policy; and I think I can show, in just a few words, that it will be possible for forty-five per cent of the vote in Canada to be given on a platform that was for the general advantage of Canada and that that party should not succeed, and that the seven other groups, by buying certain privileges from one another, can make a working arrangement by which seven different fads will be bought up and paid for at the expense of the people, and thus fifty-five per cent of the vote will be controlled, and forty-five per cent, which was a solid vote for the general advantage of Canada, will be side-tracked under proportional representation. That is quite possible; it is quite probable that it will be done. We know from time to time a group is ready to sell out if it can get its price, its price would be some fad that it has set its mind upon, and it is ready to sacrifice all other interests for the advantage of this one particular fad that is selected by it as being the most important thing at issue in the present crises. The British system has grown up under a thousand years of parliamentary reform. We have the British system in Canada; they have it very largely in the United States, and I say with all deference to the ten countries my hon. friend has mentioned, that they cannot show any one of those three countries, Great Britain, Canada and the United States, anything about up-to-date responsible government.

Mr. CRERAR: They are adopting it in Great Britain.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I do not think so, and I do not think the hon. gentleman will live to see the day that it will be adopted in this House, unless such a calamity should happen as that a certain group should get into power, and I do not think that will happen. If we are going to investigate all the fads that are proposed, we should at the same time send to this committee the recall, the referendum, the initiative and all those fads that have been copied from certain parts of the United States and brought into our western country. Let us make a clean breast of it and a clean sweep. I would be in favour of a representative committee properly appointed, investigating proportional representation, because I believe such a committee would kill it.

I say the House would in a way be stultifying itself if after this committee brought in its report the House turned it down, which possibly would be done, a consummation devoutly to be wished. In my judgment the proposition should not be entertained by whatever committee may be formed. I do not think our time should be spent in following up these various fads, and certainly they are abroad in the land at the present moment. This is a time when ordinary old-time common sense cannot get a place, but has to make way for every kind of fad proposal for hampering the people and bringing in laws for the sake of multiplying them, instead of for the advancement of the people. As I said in the House recently, I would far rather hand my name down to posterity as a man who had prevented noxious laws from getting on our statute books than I would be known for having introduced ten or twenty or fifty laws of very doubtful character, and whose utility would be disproved as soon as put in operation. There is too much of that kind of legislation altogether, and I for one think that this House should not lend itself to this proposal even to the extent of appointing a committee.

Though not many have so far spoken, and perhaps nobody else will speak in this House on this occasion against this proposition, I believe I am speaking the view of a very considerable number of members of this House when I say they have absolutely no use for proportional representation. In fact, a western man told me that there are 257 varieties of it, which is 200 more varieties than there are of Heinz pickles, so this is a pretty pickle—257 varieties of proportional representation! I understand that in Winnipeg it took over one week to find out who was elected under proportional representation. Is it desirable to keep the public in suspense that time, to keep the home fires burning and the brass bands and the processions waiting for a week before you find out who is elected? I understand that proportional representation has been abandoned in certain parts of British Columbia that had it in a municipal way. I understand that in Calgary, where it is in operation, the people—at any rate, those I have had an opportunity of speaking with—have absolutely no use for it. Others who have tried it are all nearly of the opinion that it should not be introduced into Canada to any great extent.

I want it distinctly understood, Mr. Speaker, that so far as I am concerned I do not oppose the committee, because I think they will do their duty, and if they do, they will kill this proposal and all the other fads connected with it. We will then get down to business and go ahead on the good old British system, which says that the people shall rule. What I want to see in this country is a proper redistribution of seats, so that one man will have one vote and one woman one vote, and so that one vote will have one value to elect. If that is done, a great deal of evil we are now labouring under will be removed. In some constituencies it takes 50,000 or 100,000 people to elect a representative, and in others only 13,000 people; I think everybody knows the constituency where the 13,000 people live. It is questions of that sort that we should be studying. I would vote to have a committee on a question of that kind at once, so that when a redistribution of seats is made it will be on the basis of population, on the principle that a certain number of votes has a certain value, whether those votes go to my hon. friends opposite or not. I do not want favours for any party. I say that the old British system that has been tried out and proved to be good for generations should not lightly be set aside because some new fad is being introduced into Canada from countries that cannot show us anything about liberty, good government, or stable organization. I understand that some of these governments change over night, that a certain group may be here to-day supporting the Government, and to-morrow jump to the other side because they have been bought up by some particular fancy, or some particular idea that may be entirely undesirable. The result is that they sell out, and the Government goes down over night. Many countries of Europe change their premiers and their cabinets almost every twelve months, and some much oftener. That is a most undesirable thing to encourage, and therefore I say that if this committee is going to kill this fad I will certainly vote for the committee. I do not believe any committee can investigate the question without killing it, and all the attendant fads that go with it. They are all in line, and are brought in largely by the same people. The referendum, the recall, the initiative, and all that sort of trash should be all buried together by this one committee, and if they will do that, I will certainly hold up both my hands for appointing it.

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome): I had not intended to intervene in this debate but the remarks made by the hon. member who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Cockshutt) with that intense, genial and enthusiastic Toryism which marks his every utterance, make me feel that I would like to say just a word or two. He reminds me of that Irishman who followed the advice: whenever you see a head, hit it. Whenever a new idea comes up my hon. friend takes a crack at it. "It's a new idea," he says, "away with it." The hon. member has referred to the old British system. I am always somewhat doubtful of the logic of a gentleman who leaves aside reasoning on the instant to appeal to patriotism, and here not only the logic of the hon. gentleman is wrong, but his history, because the old British system was two knights from a shire and two burgesses from every borough. They did not have a single-seated constituency, but a double-seated constituency, which gave in a somewhat meagre and attenuated form a degree of porportional representation.

My hon. friend also talks about the initiative, the referendum and the recall, as fads from the United States. My idea was that the initiative and the recall had their rise in Switzerland, not in the United States. Certainly the referendum had. He also says: I want to have our party get the votes to which it is entitled; I want every voter to have a vote of equal value; and he referred to the fact that some constituencies in this country are very much larger than others. I agree with my hon. friend; there are some a great deal larger than others, and that constitutes an unfairness for which, of course, members who represent the smaller constituencies are not responsible. They cannot get more votes than there are in the constituencies, but if they get three-fifths of the votes which were cast in the last election, as the member who now modestly addresses this House got, my hon. friend should be perfectly well satisfied.

Let me just say this: Our parliamentary institutions are on trial. I do not think even the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt), if he would sit down and carefully study matters, would say that our present single-seated constituencies give a just result. For instance, in the election of 1904, the Liberals in Nova Scotia cast about 56,000 votes, and the Conservatives, for the Conservate party was then called the Conservative party, without trimmings, got 46,000 votes.

Mr. COPP: It was well trimmed that time.

Mr. McMASTER: So well trimmed that the Liberals came back with the whole 18 seats. Although the Conservatives in Nova Scotia had polled within 10,000 of the votes polled by the Liberals, they had no representation in this Parliament at all. Now does my hon. friend think that was fair to the Conservatives of Nova Scotia? I do not think he does. Of course, my grief at the situation was not as great as his, but I say it was not a square deal to the Conservatives of Nova Scotia, and did not properly represent the voters of Nova Scotia, whether Conservatives or Liberals. Then, in the election of 1911, the same thing happened again, only here the boot was on the other foot. In the British Columbia elections the whole seven Conservative members were elected with about 25,000 votes while the Liberals, who had 16,000 votes, elected none at all. I do not think that is fair representation, and our present system does not give that equality of voting which we all desire. Is it reasonable or right that to-day in this House the province of Ontario should have only some eight Liberals? Is it fair that, in federal matters at any rate, for the last twenty of twenty-five years, the great city of Toronto has never had a Liberal representative? It is not fair; it is not right; and when there is such unfairness, it seems to me that we should cast aside our disinclination even to consider what is new and should say, after all:

> That men may rise on stepping-stones
> Of their dead selves to higher things.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Is the hon. member desirous that proportional representation should be introduced into Quebec and all other parts of Canada?

Mr. McMASTER: Oh, of course. I am a Liberal, and I want only fair play. In the last election, the public sentiment of Quebec was such that even under proportional representation I doubt whether there would have been any great difference in the number of men returned. But under ordinary circumstances, during the last few years, the single-seat system has tended to over-emphasize the Liberal representation of Quebec and similarly to over-emphasize the Conservative representation of Ontario. That has been the tendency of the single-seat system, and it is a bad thing. Anything that causes the Canadian people to divide on religious, or racial, or sectional lines is a great mistake. The only lines on which our people should divide are lines of political opinion. As Mr. Asquith said, in speaking of proportional representation, there should be no substantial strain of public opinion unrepresented in the House of Commons. It is true we may have to make some changes in our practices in Parliament; it is true we may have more groups than we have now, although I am not sure about that. But the fundamental principle is that people should have the right to rule through their elected representatives and a system of eleetion should be devised and put into practice which will bring into the House of Commons the strains of public opinion in the same proportion, or as nearly as possible in the same proportions as they exist in the country. It seems to me that no one, whether in favour of this system or not, could object to the proposal made by the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) that we should have a committee. I am sure this will appeal to the members of the House. There is Biblical authority against refusing to examine any proposition. If it be of good it will succeed, and if it be of evil, then in the long run it will fail. I heartily support the amendment, and I trust that all members of the House will unite in at least examining into the question.

Mr. MICHAEL STEELE (Perth S.): Like some of the previous speakers, I feel that I ought to apologize for taking up even a few minutes at this time of night; but, with the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) I should not like this opportunity to go by without saying a word as to what I think on this question. I am very much in agreement with the hon. member for Brantford on this subject. I believe that in the discussion to-night, and perhaps in the discussion generally on the question of proportional representation, the fact is lost sight of that we are endeavouring to substitute not only a different method of conducting elections, but also, unconsciously perhaps, to substitute a different method of government, for what has been the practice in the British Empire for many years. There is no system of election that is perfect. Proportional representation is not perfect, as is evident from the fact that there are, as some one has said, 257 varieties of it. My study has led me to believe that there are 300 varieties and none of them is entirely satisfactory. That also is evident from the fact that no two countries, at least so far as I know, have adopted the same system; each has a system varying from that of any other country. But I desire to get back, as the hon. member for Brantford did, to the good old British system. Ridicule it as we will, criticize it as we may, endeavour to substitute for it anything we choose, we cannot ignore the fact that the British system has built up the greatest Empire the world has ever seen, and that under that system the people of Great Britain have proven themselves the best governors that the world has produced. Not only has their own country been better governed than any other country, but their colonies and dependencies have enjoyed the same good government. The British have been more successful in colonizing the world and in governing their colonies than any other nation has been. That, to my mind, is pretty good evidence of the value of the system of government which they have been practising. But not only has this system proven its value in the British Empire, but the greatest Anglo-Saxon nation of the world, outside of our empire, the United States, practically uses the same system, with the exception that its executive is independent of Parliament, while in British countries the executive is really part of Parliament and subject thereto. Under the party system of Great Britain, it is essential that there shall be a strong executive. In Britain and in Canada the duties of the government are not only administrative, but legislative; the governments of these countries govern as well as administer. If the only function of government were to administer, then I would admit that proportional representation might very well be used. But where Parliament and the Government must govern, it seems to me that it is absolutely necessary that the Government shall have a good strong majority so that they may not be dependent on any clique, or group, or set of men for their support, relying only upon those who consistently support them in their general policy. We have heard a great deal to-night about the evils of the present system and members being elected by minorities. Under the proportional representation system every elected member is a minority member.

Mr. McMASTER: No.

Mr. STEELE: You cannot elect a member under the proportional representation system by a majority vote. The number of votes required to elect a member in each of the constituencies under proportional representation is found by dividing the total number of votes cast by a number one greater than the number of representatives required.

Mr. McMASTER: Plus one.

Mr. STEELE: Yes; one greater than that number; so that any member elected by that system must be a minority representative. Some criticism has also been made of the single member constituency. But one advantage of the single member constituency is that it provides one of the very things which advocates of proportional representation demand: it gives minority representation; if not representation to the minority in that constituency it gives representation to the minority in the country, and that is the minority that ought to be represented and is entitled to be represented. I believe that every man who is elected to the House of Commons of Canada is elected, first, as a supporter of the national policies which are best adapted to the needs of Canada. That is the first thing that he must support. The next thing that he must do is to represent the people of his constituency—not only those that voted for him but all the people of his constituency—and I say that in no country in the world, and never in the history of Canada, has there been such need as there is to-day for representative men with a national outlook who are prepared to stand by the policies which are developed and offered by this Dominion. In order to have that it is necessary for us to get away from parochial ideas, and petty policies, although they may please a section of one constituency—may please perhaps a section even of one province. We need to get down to greater things, the more important things, the things that, to my mind, are to-day essential for the welfare of Canada.

Let us elect men who will support the national policies of Canada. In order to bring that about it seems to me we must retain the system that we have at present. But we cannot retain it if we adopt proportional representation, and if the people of each constituency divide into two, or three, or four or five or six classes; one class perhaps, or even two classes, with their ideas on great national questions, and the balance divided up as to whether a man should be a farmer or something else, whether he should be a labouring man or something else—supporting one man because he advocates a certain view which is not before the electors of the country at all but is merely held by some of the electors in his constituency—enough, the candidate thinks, to elect him. Now we cannot build up a great nation in Canada by adopting that method of electing our representatives to Parliament.

In 1909 a Royal Commission was appointed by the British Parliament to look into this whole question—not only the question of proportional representation, but the many and varied methods, of electing their representatives. One portion of the report of that commission dealt with the present system of electing members in single member constituencies by the process of a relative majority, and the opinion expressed on that system was this:

> None has been devised more simple for the elector, more rapid in operation, more straightforward in result—advantages in an instrument for use by a large electorate of varying intelligence which it is difficult to over estimate.

Now, is there not a good deal of truth in that statement? Is it not a fact that what we want is not a system which will be mathematically correct—because after all the system of election by proportional representation is largely a mathematical system. What we want is a system which will appeal to the intelligence of our people, which the average person or,—in fact, every elector—can use with reasonable intelligence, a system by which the people can mark their ballots in such a way as will show what the individual elector, at least, believes is best for our country? Talk about the transferable vote and the alternative vote! I think there is a good deal to be said in favour of both, but the fact is that in Western Australia where they have I think, the transferable vote—they have one or the other—only sixty-five per cent of the voters made a second choice. And what, after all, is the value of the second choice? Is it not the electors first choice that is important? It will be the custom for every elector, I think, to give less consideration to his second choice than he gives to his first, even less consideration to his third than he gives to his second; and the result will be that men will be elected on second, third or fourth choice, the most ill considered choices which the elector makes.

Small majorities will cripple governments; and I know of nothing more unfortunate for Canada to-day than that this Parliament should, at the next election, or at any time within the near future, be so composed that no one party can carry on with a strong support and a strong majority. That would be the most unfortunate position this Parliament could get into. Why I would much prefer seeing my friend the leader of the Opposition in control of affairs in this country than that condition should exist. I would even go so far as to say that I would prefer even to see my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) in control of the affairs of this House rather than witness a condition where no party could control. What Canada needs to-day is a stable government, a strong government that can carry on, and if the policy which that government adopts is wrong, the people of the Dominion will attend to it and attend to it very promptly.

Something was said by the hon. member for Marquette about this system being in use in Belgium. I am sure the hon. gentleman does not intend to advocate that we in Canada should adopt a system that is in use in Belgium. The system in vogue there is the "list" system where a list for each party is made out and arranged, as I understand it, by—shall I say—the organizers of the party, arranged in a certain order, and each elector votes for a list. He ignores the personnel of the representatives entirely, and the policy they are working for—the elector merely votes for a list. Or would my hon. friend advocate the system of proportional representation in operation in France, which has produced for many years a general election in that country every few months or every year or so. That is what we would probably get in this country if proportional representation were adopted at the next election.

Mr. PROULX: Does the hon. gentleman say they have elections every year in France? My understanding is they only have elections there every five years.

Mr. STEELE: They have had a change of government there much more frequently than that in the last few years on account of the ministry being unable to secure the support of a majority in the House. It might be of interest to us to hear what some of the men who helped to build up the British Empire in the past have to say on this system of proportional representation. Disraeli discussed it in debate in 1870. That is a considerable time ago, but the British system then was much the same as it is to-day. This is the opinion which Disraeli gave on the system of proportional representation. He said that such schemes are:

> Refined and fantastic arrangements for the representation of the people

He also said:

> Proportional representation is a proposal opposed to sound principle, the effect of which would be to create a stagnant representation and bring about a feeble executive; an admirable scheme for bringing crochety men into the House; a scheme of coteries, not the politics of nations; which if attempted would end in chaos and confusion.

John Bright was opposed to the system and so were Gladstone and Harcourt. If the British Empire has produced any greater men than these, I am not familiar with their history.

[Mr. Steele.]

Now, there are practical objections to proportional representation which have not been mentioned, and one is the large constituency. I am free to admit that a system which might be very convenient for the people of Great Britain or in the other densely populated countries of Europe would be entirely unsuited to a sparsely settled country like Canada. It would be impossible even in the older portions of our country for any representative to become familiar with the views of the people in a constituency made up of four, or five or six of the present constituencies, and when we get into our newer sections, such as Northern Ontario, Northern Quebec or the Western Provinces, it would be entirely out of the question. Imagine a constituency as large as the half of Saskatchewan to be canvassed by the men seeking election. How much would the people know of their qualifications? It seems to me that the advocacy of this system for Canada to-day is far ahead of the times, and while I think it was very wise indeed for the Government to agree to the appointment of this committee to study the system of proportional representation, I am only sorry that they did not also instruct the committee to inquire into the present system of representation in view of the disparity in the size of our constituencies. To my mind that is one of the greatest electoral evils we have to-day. A man representing a constituency of 13,000, 15,000, 18,000 or 20,000 certainly is a minority representative compared with the man who is representing a constituency of 60,000 or 80,000 people.

That is all I have to say on the matter at the present time.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should not like this debate to conclude without giving expression to my own personal views on this important subject of proportional representation. From such study as I have been able to give it, I find myself in full sympathy with the principle. I wish also to support the amendment which has been proposed by the Government, and to congratulate my hon. friend the President of the Privy Council on having brought forward an amendment which at last gives this House the privilege of getting information on at least one important public question.

Part of my study of proportional representation was made as a member of a select committee of this House, and I have been rather interested in listening to the different speeches to find that no single member appears to have had any knowledge that such a committee had investigated this important subject. During 1909, 1910 and 1911 that select committee was 12 m. appointed, and my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) who has spoken so strongly this evening against any committee was one of those who at that time supported the motion in favour of a committee.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I was not a member of the House at that time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, yes.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Excuse me. I came in in 1904 and was out from 1908 until 1911, and therefore did not support the appointment of the committee at that or any other time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I accept the statement of my hon. friend. I was under the impression that he had been in the House continuously from the time that he was first returned. I owe him an apology if he was not in the House at that time. However, a committee did take this matter in hand and was unanimously supported by the House of Commons of that day. I am not sure that its report has been printed. My impression is that it has been, but I have been unable to secure a copy from the Library this evening. I mention the appointment of that committee as an evidence that the subject has already been under consideration by a committee of this House. What is needed for a correct understanding of proportional representation is the most careful study which it is possible for hon. members to give the subject. If any evidence were needed in support of the wisdom of having a committee appointed, it would be found in the speeches made by the hon. members for South Perth (Mr. Steele) and Brantford, (Mr. Cockshutt) and Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), all of whom were more or less inclined to view proportional representation as something not in accord with the principles of the British electoral system. What is that system other than an endeavour to give expression to the democratic principles of justice and freedom?

Proportional representation, so far as I can see, is a juster system than any we have at the present time, in that it gives the electors, whether of a minority or a majority, their fair share of representation in Parliament, where their views can be aired; and it seems to me that it also gives greater freedom in that it allows the greatest possible latitude to every citizen in expressing his choice of who shall represent him in Parliament. Because proportional representation is founded on the true democratic principles of justice and freedom, and as it gives better expression to those principles in our electoral machinery, I for one, strongly favour its adoption.

However, it is desirable that a resolution of this importance should, if possible, receive the unanimous support of the House. It is apparent from the debate that if hon. members were asked to vote on the resolution as moved by the hon. member for East Peterborough it would not receive unanimous consent. On the other hand, I am inclined to believe that the amendment proposed by the Government will, notwithstanding the one or two reactionary addresses which we have listened to this evening, receive the almost unanimous support of hon. members. This will mean that at least we will have a committee appointed to carefully study the merits of proportional representation and make a report to the House.

In conclusion, reverting again to what I said at the outset, it is a sign for which we on this side I am sure are all duly grateful, that the Government seems at last to be waking up to the wisdom of doing something which we have constantly urged this session. The last two amendments that we moved, one asking that every department of the Government should supply this House with information, and the other to the effect that it was desirable in the public interest that we should have as adequate representation as possible during the present session, were voted down by the supporters of the Government. Tonight fortunately my hon. friend brings in an amendment which recognizes the wisdom of giving the House information and of finding a way for more adequate representation. I congratulate him on this improvement. I hope the Government will follow the lead he has given, and I trust his supporters will lend a hand by giving his amendment their unanimous support.

Mr. A. THOMPSON (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I am glad this subject has been brought to the attention of the House, particularly for my own sake, because it is one I have found great difficulty in arriving at an opinion on. Maybe there are other members who are in the same position. We shall now have an opportunity of giving the subject careful study and of hearing the evidence which will be submitted to the proposed committee. So far as my observations have gone I am not quite sure whether I am in favour of proportional representation or not. However, I want to approach the question with an open mind, and I shall endeavour to do so. It must not be forgotten that the splendid system of government which our forefathers worked out and under which we are operating, was founded altogether upon the majority system, and that system is the basis upon which the representatives in the parliaments of the Empire are selected. It is a system which, I think, we should not hastily cast aside.

So much for proportional representation. There is, however, in the working out of this majority system of ours a development which occurs from time to time which has never seemed to me to be quite in keeping with the spirit of our representative institutions or with the genius of our people. I refer to the case of a single constituency in which one member is elected out of three or four candidates. We have instances of it in the House at the present time. The amendment proposed by the minister to-night will give us an opportunity of considering a remedy for that in the preferential or transferable vote, so that when more than two candidates run in the same constituency the candidate who is elected will represent a majority of the electors. That principle, indeed, has been adopted by us, in our political conventions, as well as by the United States in theirs. When a number of candidates are nominated and a ballot is taken it is quite frequently found that no single candidate has the majority. In that case the low man drops out and the votes given to him are transferred by his supporters to some other candidate, and so the process of elimination goes on until finally a candidate is elected who has the confidence of a majority of the delegates at the convention. That principle, therefore, is not new. It seems to me it is quite compatible with the transferable vote, which would result in the election of a candidate with a majority rather than of a plurality candidates. I have much pleasure therefore, in supporting the amendment, and I feel sure that I shall obtain much information from the discussion which will ensue before the committee, the meetings of which I shall have great pleasure in attending.

[Mr. Thompson.]

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. J. A. SEXSMITH (Peterborough East): Mr. Speaker, I shall detain the House only for a few moments. I wish to say first that I have been very much pleased with the reception accorded to this resolution. Had the motion been accepted unanimously by the House, including my two good friends so close by, the member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) and the member for Perth (Mr. Steele), I would have had serious doubt whether the proposal was a desirable reform or a movement forward. I myself am a Conservative; I like to cling to some of the old things—those that are good, but I like to discard those things which are ready to be discarded, and look onward to the future. We talk about this great Canada of ours and about British principles of freedom. Well, that is the reason why I introduced the resolution—because if under our old system, one man's vote is equal to the vote of six other men, I say that condition is not British. But that is exactly what has been taking place in almost every election since Confederation. We have in Ontario sometimes one Conservative vote worth four or five Liberal votes. We have in Quebec, as I said to-night, one Liberal vote worth six Conservative votes. We had the spectacle in Nova Scotia in 1904 of 46,000 Conservatives unable to get one representative while 56,000 Liberals got eighteen. Now, I ask my hon. friends from Brantford and from Perth, is that British fair play? Is that British justice? If it is, I do not understand British fair play or British justice.

I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that I gladly accept the amendment offered by the Minister of Immigration and desire to thank him for taking the matter into consideration. I hope and trust that a committee will be appointed and that it will go on in good British style and secure some better system than we have to-day, a system fairer and more British—and if it is more British it will be more just.

Motion (Mr. Sexsmith), as amended, agreed to.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if there is no objection I would move now, while we are on the subject, seconded by Mr. Calder:

That the special committee appointed this day to consider the subject of proportional representation and the subject of the single transferable or preferential vote and the desirability of the application of one or the other or both to elections to the House of Commons of Canada, consist of the following members: Messieurs Blair, Calder, Crowe, Currie, Davidson, Denis, Harold, Manion, McMaster, Molloy, Pardee, Sexsmith, Simpson, Sinclair (Antigonish and Guysborough), Thomson (Qu'Appelle), Whidden.

Motion agreed to.

PROPOSED SELECT STANDING COMMITTEE ON RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

On the proposed motion of Mr. Maclean (Halifax):

That Rule 10 of the House of Commons, relating to the appointment of the Select Standing Committees of the House, be amended by adding to the Select Standing Committees of the House a Select Standing Committee on "Railways and Shipping" owned, operated or controlled by the Government; and that the Special Committee appointed to prepare and report the list of members to constitute the Standing Committees for the present session, be instructed to prepare and report the list of members to compose the Select Standing Committee on "Railways and Shipping" owned, operated or controlled by the Government, for the present session.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I wish to move that this motion be discharged from the Order Paper.

Motion agreed to.

On the motion of Right Hon. Mr. Meighen the House adjourned at 12.17 a.m. Tuesday.

Tuesday, April 5, 1921.

The House met at Three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 48 (from the Senate), for the relief of William John Bell.—Mr. Tudhope.

Bill No. 58 (from the Senate), for the relief of Hazel Galbraith.—Mr. Douglas (Strathcona).

THE BUDGET

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask my hon. friend the Minister of Finance if he is yet in a position to give the House any information as to when he intends to present his Budget.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Minister of Finance): I am afraid that I cannot give my hon. friend any definite date. But progress is being made, and we are getting nearer to the Budget every day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Can my hon. friend give an approximate date—a week, two weeks, a month?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I should hesitate to give even an approximate date, for I should not like to disappoint the House.

GRIFFENHAGEN AND ASSOCIATES

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): May I inquire from the leader of the Government if any person in any way connected with Griffenhagen and Associates is still in the employ of the Government, and if so, what work such person or persons are doing, and under what authority?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): In answer to my hon. friend I would say that the contract, as per notice, has been cancelled, but the work of organization a part of which remains unfinished will still be carried on by the subcommittee of Council with the aid of certain persons employed from that company.

Mr. MURPHY: How many of them are still employed?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Not many. I could not tell my hon. friend the exact number at the moment, but I will find out and let him know, probably to-morrow.

ANSWER TO INQUIRY FOR RETURN

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): In answer to the hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. Leger) who inquired yesterday as to the progress of a return ordered by the House on March 14, I may say that the delay in bringing it down occurs by reason of the way the notice of motion for production of papers was framed, it being worded by the hon. member in the general form which, I venture to suggest is too often used, and which compels inquiry to be made of, and reply awaited from, every department of the Government. If hon. members would confine notices of motion to cover only the department they have in mind, they would get returns more rapidly. This particular return really covers the Department of Indian Affairs, but being general in its form inquiries had to be made of all departments. The answer from the Department of Indian Affairs went to the Secretary of State some time ago, and consequently it will only be a short time until the return is brought down.

BUILDING TRADES' CONFERENCE

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): In answer to the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy), who inquired yesterday whether the Government intended to defray the expenses of the delegates who will attend the Building Trades' Conference, I am informed by the hon. the Minister of Labour that it is the intention to make the same allowances as were made to the delegates to the Industrial Conference of 1919.

[Sir George Foster.]

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY—ALLEGED DEFAULT OF INTEREST

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): I desire to refer to an inquiry made yesterday by the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) with regard to the reported default of the Grand Trunk Railway on certain securities interest on which fell due April 1.

The House will no doubt remember that the Act embodying an agreement which passed this Parliament calling for an arbitration tribunal to determine the value, if any, of the three preference and common stocks of the Grand Trunk Railway provided that the arbitration tribunal should have nine months from the date of the appointment of the arbitrators within which to secure evidence and make their award, such nine months being capable of extension by approval of the Governor in Council. The provisions of the agreement also called for the Grand Trunk Directors remaining in possession pending the result of the arbitration and the making of the award, a committee of management being established in the meantime with certain limited powers. Owing to the heavy demands made upon the Government for financing the road while the Grand Trunk thus remained in possession, owing as well to what we believed to be dilatory methods of preparing for, if not conducting, the arbitration, the Government felt that there should not be further financing except what we might be under legal obligation to pay or a further extension of time, involving as it probably would, still further financing with the Grand Trunk in control, unless the time contemplated by the original agreement for the transfer of possession and control should be adhered to notwithstanding any extension.

An intimation of the Government's position was made to the Grand Trunk Railway a very considerable time ago. Up to the present, arrangements for that transfer have not been made. As a consequence there has not been further financing by the Government since the final intimation of our position was made. That may have something to do with the reported default on April 1. I have only to add that the Government has as yet no official intimation that the Grand Trunk did default, but inasmuch as a statement did come from the President that they would not be in a position to pay, it is not improbable that the report is correct.

[Mr. Meighen.]

CASE OF SMALLPOX ON THE SCANDINAVIAN

Hon. J. A. CALDER (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): A question was asked yesterday by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould), concerning a case of smallpox that had broken out on a steamship arriving at the port of St. John a short time ago. I have received a statement from the department in connection with that inquiry which is as follows—

> The original case developed the fourth day out from Antwerp, March 19th. The patient was at once isolated; so were two immediate contacts occupying the same room. Then everyone on the boat was vaccinated. No other case developed on the voyage.
> During the period of incubation there is no risk in the way of general transmission. In the present case the incubates would have developed only after landing.
> Only a few Anglo-Saxon passengers shipped at Antwerp. These had their cabins on the upper deck (B), with those who embarked at Southampton later. The Continental Antwerp passengers occupied (C) deck below. We know for a fact that the upper deck passengers used a different dining room, parlour and living room from the Continental. The only common place of meeting was the upper after deck from the promenade, which was very little used by passengers detained, thus reducing the possibilities of contamination to a minimum.
> The Health Department considers that no unjustified risk was taken in making the separation that was made.

Mr. OSMONDE GRATTAN ESMONDE

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (George Etienne Cartier): A Vancouver despatch this morning announces that Mr. Osmonde Grattan Esmonde has been arrested on orders from the mayor of Vancouver for alleged sedition. The despatch goes on to say that the case will probably be disposed of by the Immigration Board. Has the Minister of Immigration any information to offer the House regarding this matter?

Hon. J. A. CALDER (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): I have no information whatever; I was not aware of the fact that Mr. Esmonde had been in Vancouver.

Mr. JACOBS: Will the minister make inquiries?

Mr. CALDER: I will, yes.

THE CANADA WEST INDIES TRADE AGREEMENT, 1920

On motion of Right Hon. Sir George Foster, (Minister of Trade and Commerce) the House went into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

Resolved, (1) That it is expedient to approve the agreement dated the eighteenth day of June, 1920, between the Government of the Dominion of Canada and the Governments of certain of His Majesty's colonies in the West Indies, which agreement is termed "The Canada West Indies Trade Agreement, 1920";

(2) That the provisions in the said agreement relating to the customs duties upon goods, the produce or manufacture of any of the colonies, the government of which is a party to the said agreement, be sanctioned and declared to have the force of law in Canada;

(3) That the Governor in Council shall have power to prescribe, by proclamation published in the Canada Gazette, the day upon which the preferential treatment of the said goods provided for in the said agreement shall be brought into force under the terms of the agreement with respect to each of the said colonies, the extent of such preference within the limits prescribed by the said agreement where the exact amount thereof is not specified in the said agreement, and the day upon which the preferential treatment of the said goods of any of the said colonies is terminated under the said agreement;

(4) That the Customs Tariff, 1907, and the amendments thereto be amended in accordance with the provisions of the said agreement; and

(5) That the Act to be based upon these resolutions shall come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation of the Governor in Council published in the Canada Gazette.

Mr. FIELDING: Is this agreement to be found in the Votes and Proceedings?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It was laid on the Table some time ago. I will also have placed in the boxes of hon. members copies of the report of the proceedings of the conference, of which this agreement is the result. The resolution pretty well explains itself, and I would rather take the discussion of the subject on moving the second reading of the Bill. I should like to get the matter advanced to that stage, but if there are any questions which hon. members desire to ask, I shall be glad to answer them.

Mr. FIELDING: Does the right hon. gentleman propose to introduce the Bill immediately?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. FIELDING: And deal with the matter in Committee at a later stage?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. FIELDING: That is reasonable.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has my hon. friend received any petition from the tobacco growers in connection with this Treaty?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not remember having received any.

Resolution reported and concurred in. Sir George Foster thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 59 respecting the Canada West Indies Trade Agreement, 1920.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

FRENCH TREATY

On motion by Right Hon. Sir George Foster (Minister of Trade and Commerce), the House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

Resolved, (1) That it is expedient to approve the provisions of the Trade Agreement made between the Government of the French Republic and the Government of Canada, dated at Paris the twenty-ninth day of January, 1921.

(2) That the Governor in Council may make such orders and regulations as are deemed necessary to carry out the provisions of the said agreement, and such orders and regulations may be varied or revoked, and they shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament as soon as may be after they are made.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I would like to make the same remarks with reference to this resolution that I made with regard to the other: we will take the discussion of the matter on the second reading of the Bill. The agreement has been laid on the Table and has been printed—at least the order has been given for the printing—and if the resolution passes I will introduce the Bill founded upon it which also is printed.

Mr. LEMIEUX: May I ask my right hon. friend, who has returned but lately from France, if, during his interview with the French Government and especially with the Minister of Trade in France, mention was made of the exhibition train which will be sent throughout Canada, from ocean to ocean, this spring? My right hon. friend knows that the Chamber of Commerce in France have made certain arrangements with the railway companies in Canada, and the harbour authorities in Montreal especially, with a view to sending some of the French commercial exhibits throughout the Dominion, provided that Canada makes a similar exhibition in France at a later period. My right hon. friend will know what I am referrng to; I think he has had some conversation on this matter with Senator Beaubien. When I was reading about my right hon. friend's discussion with the French Government, my attention was called to some speeches delivered in Paris and some articles published in the press over there, to the effect that as a result of this treaty this arrangement would be put into effect and would be conducive to more extended trade relations between the two countries.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The proposition to which my hon. friend refers was one placed before the merchants of France and some officers of some of the departments of government there, long before the negotiation of this agreement and did not necessarily—and did not as a matter of fact—come up when we were talking with reference to this treaty. That was a matter along the line of commercial development which is not based upon the treaty, so to speak. But, so far as my knowledge goes now, the arrangements are pretty well completed for an exhibition train, furnished with samples of French merchandise, to make a tour of our country —going from city to city and stopping for a little time in each, the exhibits being upon cars of the train and remaining there, and advantage being taken at the same time for film representations, more or less extended, of not only the exhibits which are being shown but of French productions and French scenery. The films are said to be of a most excellent quality, and some samples that I have seen fully bear out that statement. In return for that we give certain facilities, in fact all the facilities that we possibly can. The railroads do the hauling and provide the cars and, practically, the Dominion of Canada, as a government, has no expense in the matter. The French Government and authorities, in their turn, undertake to facilitate a similar train being carried through France fitted out with exhibits from Canadian producers, industrial and otherwise, and to give to that train and those exhibitors the same facilities and courtesies that are extended to the French train in Canada.

Mr. FIELDING: I concur in the view expressed by my right hon. friend that the details of this matter may be better considered when we have the Bill before us in Committee of the Whole, and therefore I do not rise to offer any objection to that course. But I want to call my right hon. friend's attention to a somewhat queer "scrap of paper" which he has circulated, and which purports to be an agreement. The only information which we have at the present time on this subject is that "scrap of paper." It is headed "An Act respecting a certain Trade Agreement between His Majesty and the President of the French Republic." Yet it is not in the form of an Act, and there is nothing in it to show that it is intended to be an Act, but it goes on to state that it is a trade agreement between France and Canada. It not only does not seem to be in the form of a treaty but is entirely lacking in all the characteristics of one. I cannot imagine that this is a complete copy of the document. If this is the actual and complete agreement as it has been arranged between the Government of Canada and the Government of France its presentation in such a form is a very unusual proceeding. I only call my right hon. friend's attention to the fact now in order that before he brings in the Bill we shall be supplied with information in proper form, and shall have an exact copy of the treaty, or agreement, and not merely a "scrap of paper" which is evidently not complete.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The agreement itself has already been laid on the Table, as I informed the committee a moment ago, and is being, or has been printed; it is either now distributed, or will be immediately distributed, to hon. gentlemen. We are now dealing with the resolution and my hon. friend assents to its being passed. A Bill, founded on the resolution, will be introduced which, on being passed by the House, becomes the Act governing this matter.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Has the whispering now going on any reference to the trade question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend must have seen the agreement itself because it has been placed on the Table. I have not drafted the Bill which is to be founded upon this resolution; that duty has been performed by the officers of Parliament.

Mr. FIELDING: I have seen the only information on the subject, as far as I know, that my right hon. friend has caused to be laid on the Table. What I hold in my hand is apparently a copy of what was laid on the Table and that, I repeat, is headed "An Act respecting a certain Trade Agreement between His Majesty and the President of the French Republic." It is not in the form of an Act, there is no reference to His Majesty in it from beginning to end, and it is clearly lacking in all the characteristics of an agreement. In substance the information may be there, but in documents of this character we do not want merely the substance—we want complete copies, and no complete copy of this agreement I am satisfied has been laid on the Table.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is a great difference of opinion then between my hon. friend and myself because I certainly gave the agreement to the Prime Minister, and I think he laid on the Table the whole of the official documents.

Mr. FIELDING: Well, here is a document which was laid on the Table. If my hon. friend has any other I would be happy to see it; I do not know of any other. This appears to be an agreement, I suppose it is fair to say that in substance it is an agreement; but in documents of this character, which are necessarily of a formal nature, we should have a copy of the actual agreement itself.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I see the point raised by the hon. gentleman. It has not the form of an Act, and it would appear to me as if something had been omitted by the parliamentary counsel; nor when he purports to describe an agreement, does the opening recital look to me as if it was really the beginning of the agreement. I will have both matters looked into by the parliamentary counsel, but doubtless the substance of the agreement is there.

Resolutions reported.

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT

On motion of Right Hon. C. J. Doherty (Minister of Justice) the House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

That it is expedient to provide,—

1. That the provisions of section eleven of chapter fifty-six of the statutes of 1920, entitled An Act to amend the Judges Act, withdrawing the exemption of certain judges from the operation of certain taxes, shall not apply to the present Chief Justice of Canada.

2. That an additional judge of the Court of King's Bench for the province of Saskatchewan be appointed at an annual salary of nine thousand dollars.

3. That paragraph (b) of section eighteen of the Judges Act be repealed and in lieu thereof provisions be enacted as to when certain judges of the Supreme or Superior Courts of the province of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Manitoba, British Columbia, Prince Edward Island, Saskatchewan and Alberta are not to be paid travelling allowances for attending court or chambers.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Explain, please.

Mr. DOHERTY: Mr. Chairman, I will try to explain this resolution so far as it calls for explanation. The reason why it is essential that the Bill proposed to be introduced be preceded by a resolution is that it provides for the salary of an additional judge in the province of Saskatchewan. The legislature of that province has increased the number of its judges in the court of King's Bench by one. The purpose of one of the clauses of the Bill is to make provision for the salary of that additional judge. There are two other clauses. One of them is to correct an error. In the legislation for the increases made last year in the judges' salaries, provision was made that all judges whose salaries were increased by that measure should, both as to their salaries and as to any retiring allowances they might later be entitled to, become subject to the payment of income tax. The fact was overlooked that the salary of the chief justice of the Supreme Court, though in words it appeared perhaps to be increased, was not in reality increased. Prior to that legislation the salary of the chief justice of the Supreme Court was fixed at $10,000, and he was voted annually an allowance of $5,000 as remuneration for the performance of his duties as Deputy Governor General. By the legislation of last year the salary was made $15,000, but it was provided that it should cover not only the performance of his duties as chief justice but of his duties as Deputy Governor General. So as a matter of fact no increase whatever was made in the actual remuneration. It was therefore considered unfair, and I think I am safe in saying that it was not intended, that, receiving no increase, he should be made liable to the payment of income tax. It is proposed to rectify that error. The third clause has to do with the payment of travelling allowances to judges in the provinces mentioned. It is to correct an abuse that has grown up, resulting from the fact that in those provinces the place of residence of the judges are not fixed by provincial law, so that in the past they apparently have considered themselves—and I think they could not be criticised for that—entitled to reside wherever they chose. That, of course, does not concern this Government or this Parliament, save in so far as it affects the amount allowed for travelling allowances. The purpose of this clause is to provide that judges who under provincial legislation are free to fix their places of residence where they please, shall not be entitled to travelling allowances for attending court at the centres where the proper seat of their court is.

Mr. EDWARDS: If I understand the minister correctly, we are informed by him that the second part of the resolution is to provide that a judge who does not travel is not in future to receive anything for travelling expenses. That is a wonderful piece of legislation; it is really remarkable; if it means that in the past we have been paying judges certain amounts of money for travelling expenses when they did not travel, then it is certainly time the abuse was rectified. We had an oustanding case some time ago where a chief justice did pull down some $5,000 for travelling expenses when he did not travel. That amount of money we received back after considerable trouble and after considerable wriggling on the part of that particular chief justice. It was nevertheless a reflection upon the common sense of this House that the payment ever was permitted. I want to enter my protest, Mr. Chairman, as a member of this House against the first part of that clause exempting the chief justice of Canada, who is in receipt of a salary of $15,000 from payment of income tax.

An hon. MEMBER: He is too poor.

Mr. EDWARDS: I venture to say that if you will fly in the face of public opinion to the extent of increasing the sessional indemnity of hon. members to $15,000, we will all be willing to pay income tax on that amount. Why in the name of reason is the chief justice of Canada to be exempted from paying income tax on his salary of $15,000?

An hon. MEMBER: Shame.

Mr. EDWARDS: I am only a layman, but for the life of me I cannot see any rhyme or reason in any proposal of this kind. The minister says that really no increase was made to the salary, that the $5,000 was added to the $10,000 salary of the chief justice to cover his expenses for acting as Deputy Governor General of Canada. Was anything more ridiculous ever uttered on the floor of this Parliament? Let us have done with this subterfuge and camouflage. Every hon. gentleman knows that it does not cost the Chief Justice of Canada $5,000, or $500, to come to this Parliament now and then to act for the Governor General. It does not cost him $5,000, or $500, occasionally to write his name on a document as Acting Governor General. The thing is absolutely ridiculous. If you want the salary of the Chief Justice of Canada to be a certain sum, fix it at that sum and be done with it. The principle is unsound, Mr. Chairman; a man who receives a salary of $15,000 a year should not be exempt from income tax. I for one will vote against this motion.

Mr. DOHERTY: I very much regret that notwithstanding my effort to speak both loudly and clearly, I should have conveyed to the hon. member the impression that this resolution proposes to do something which it does not propose to do and something with which it has nothing to do. In certain provinces, owing to the fact that the law did not fix the places at which the judges should reside, the judges found themselves free to choose their own places of residence. Under the existing legislation, which had in view the provinces in which the places of residence were fixed by law, provision was made for travelling allowances when a judge attended court elsewhere than at his actual or legally fixed residence. Our attention was called to the fact that in certain of these provinces where there was not a legally fixed residence the judge selected his residence and charged travelling allowance when he travelled from that selected residence to the chief cities where the sittings of the court were held. We did not and we do not think it is right that there should be a travelling allowance under these circumstances. If a judge in the exercise of his own free will chooses to reside elsewhere than at the principal city where his work is, we think he should not have travelling allowances—and the purpose of this measure is to provide accordingly—except, of course, in cases where by law he is compelled to reside in some place other than the chief centre where the sittings of the court are regularly held.

Now, with regard to the Chief Justice, this is not a provision to introduce a system under which the salary of the Chief Justice shall be exempt from income tax. Wisely or unwisely, the legislators of the past provided that the salaries of the judges should be exempt from taxation. That was the law under which the present Chief Justice and all judges prior to the legislation of recent years were appointed; they were to have a certain salary and they were to be exempt from taxation. Now, it is one of the fundamental principles of the British constitution that the independence of the judges must be made as certain as possible, and it has been universally recognized that in order to accomplish that, their remuneration should not be subject to reduction at the pleasure of the Government or of Parliament. The salaries of all judges other than the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court were increased last year and it was considered right as a condition of that increase to remove the exemption and to subject their salaries to taxation. But the reason for removing the exemption did not exist in the case of the Chief Justice because his remuneration remained the same as before, only that previously it was divided into two sums, one of $10,000, his salary as Chief Justice, and one of $5,000, his salary or remuneration as Deputy Governor General. That $5,000 was not in the nature of an allowance to pay expenses.

Mr. EDWARDS: What if he goes overseas to attend the sittings of the Privy Council?

Mr. DOHERTY: The law at present makes a provision of $3,000 for any qualified judge who sits on the Privy Council. The present Chief Justice has never sat in the Privy Council.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Who does?

Mr. DOHERTY: Last year, and, I think, the previous year, Mr. Justice Duff did. But that has nothing to do with a question of allowance for expenses.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Who selects the judge who sits on the Privy Council?

Mr. DOHERTY: Well, it is subject to the approval of the Governor in Council.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has the Chief Justice anything to say in the matter?

Mr. DOHERTY: There is no law defining how it ought to be done, but as a matter of propriety certainly the Chief Justice should be consulted. So far as I am concerned in the matter I certainly would consult with him before coming to any conclusion.

Mr. CANNON: The person who sits on the Privy Council has to be a Privy Councillor as well as a judge, has he not?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes. Any member of the Imperial Privy Council who is or has been a judge of a High Court in any of the dominions is eligible to sit on the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Mr. LEMIEUX: When was Mr. Justice Duff made a Privy Councillor?

Mr. DOHERTY: I cannot recall the precise date, but I think it was two years ago. I would like to make this quite clear, if I may. This is not a question of allowance for expenses at all; the Chief Justice has had this salary or remuneration for acting as deputy Governor General for years back and the legislation of last year, therefore, left him absolutely where he was. If this legislation should not now be passed, you would have this anomalous situation, that the legislation of last year, intended to increase the judges' salaries operated to reduce the remuneration of the actual Chief Justice, and had no other effect as regards him.

Mr. McLEAN (Royal): I am sorry I cannot understand the perhaps very clear explanation made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty). Sometimes in the past it has been difficult for me to follow him on account of his speaking very low, and it is difficult for members to hear clearly what he states. What I understand the Minister of Justice to state is this. This measure is to remedy a hardship on the part of the learned Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada. What we members, who object to this resolution, object to, is the principle that is established that the Chief Justice shall not pay income tax. That is a bad principle to go out to the country. Under the law as it stands at present, every man in Canada is liable to pay income tax; that is the principle that stands and that should be enforced, and the Minister of Justice has no right to make an exception. If, as stated by my hon. friend (Mr. Edwards), you want to increase the salary of the Chief Justice, increase his salary. But is this not true? The salary of the Chief Justice is raised to $15,000; is he not now entitled to retire on $15,000?

Mr. DOHERTY: No, because in that same legislation it was provided, in the first place, that all judges appointed in the future should be liable to pay income tax; second, that with regard to all judges of the Higher Court appointed in future, the provisions enabling them to retire on full salary should be repealed, and that as regards all existing judges, in fixing the amount of their retiring allowance, where they were entitled to their full salary, the increase of last year should not be taken into account. So that the position of the actual Chief Justice of the Supreme Court is this: As long as he remains on the bench, he will receive absolutely the same remuneration that he received before the legislation of last year. If he comes to retire, having fulfilled the conditions which, under the past law, entitled a judge to retire with his full salary, he will retire with that full salary, not as it is created by the legislation of last year, but as it stood before that legislation, that is to say, with a retiring allowance of $10,000.

The hon. gentleman asked one other question. He asked—Was this laying down the principle that the Chief Justice of Canada should be exempt from taxation? It is not. The principle that has been laid down for the future is that the salaries of all judges appointed hereafter shall be liable to taxation. As regards existing judges, the salaries of all 4 p.m. judges whose salaries were increased by last year's legislation, shall be liable to income tax. But as regards those judges whose salaries were not increased, we were bound by the contract which was made with them when they were appointed and under which their remuneration was to be exempt from taxation. We took occasion of the increase made to make, as a condition of the increase in salary, the withdrawal of the exemption to which judges were otherwise entitled. In doing that, however, we withdrew from one man, who got no increase at all, the privilege to which he was entitled under his appointment, and we could not justify our action in that regard as being hte condition of an increase in remuneration.

Mr. McLEAN (Royal): I thank the learned Minister of Justice for his lengthy and perhaps not very clear explanation, because I am still in a little doubt in comprehending all he says. What I understand him to say is this. We are making this poor man suffer by increasing his salary by $5,000. That is unfortunate. Before that he received $5,000 for the onerous duty of acting as deputy Governor General. Very good. The learned Minister of Justice has not brought before our attention this matter: that all the other judges were allowed extra remuneration for extra work when they served on Royal commissions. They were often taken off the bench and appointed on Royal commissions and on other special work for which they received extra remuneration. It is now put into the Judges' Act that the increase of salaries shall cover all extra work that judges may perform; that they shall not receive one dollar more for extra work, which they may perform on Royal commissions or other work. Are they not then on the same ground or standing as the Chief Justice? They are prevented from earning this extra remuneration. The learned Chief Justice is prevented from earning this extra remuneration. But to come back again, this is the principle on which I want to stand. I have no objection to the salary of the learned Chief Justice being increased. The position should carry an ample salary to command the highest legal talent in this Dominion, and $15,000 is too small a salary for the Chief Justice of Canada. Why, you are paying to counsel, retainers of $20,000 and so many hundred dollars a day. If you go to Montreal at the present time, you cannot obtain a leading counsel under $10,000 or $12,000. So I say, I am not objecting to the salary being increased; I am objecting to this roundabout way of doing the thing. It is not the right way of carrying out the increase in the Chief Justice's salary. I think the salary of the Chief Justice of this Dominion should be $20,000.

Mr. EDWARDS: I may have misread into the resolution something that was not intended.

Mr. McMASTER: Louder.

Mr. EDWARDS: My hon. friend should consult a specialist down town with regard to his hearing. If I have misread or misinterpreted the resolution prepared by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), some members in the House will, I am sure, be good enough to excuse me to a certain extent. It is not always easy to arrive at a conclusion after a resolution has been prepared or a sentence uttered by the Minister of Justice. It is unquestionably my fault or my misfortune, that I have not had that legal training to enable me to follow, if I may speak without offence, the twists and turnings of a legal mind.

Mr. McMASTER: Order, order.

Mr. EDWARDS: I had no reference to the hon. member for Brome when I used that expression. Now, Mr. Chairman, even if I did come to the conclusion that some members of the bench were receiving travelling expenses when they did not travel, am I to be blamed for coming to that conclusion? I do not have to remind the Minister of Justice of the very outstanding instance in this country where a certain legal gentleman collected money for travelling expenses when he did not travel, and that there were certain gentlemen connected more or less closely with the law in this country who were prepared to excuse that action on the part of the Chief Justice of the Dominion of Canada. I am one who will not excuse him. The Lord defend me from the legal quibbles and technicalities that we have handed out to us here on the floor of this House.

The Minister of Justice says that when the salary was fixed at $15,000 there was no increase made in the salary of the Chief Justice. I say that in my estimation, and I believe this was also in the minds of other hon. members of this House, there was an increase made in his salary when it was fixed at $15,000. It was in my mind, and I believe in the minds of many hon. members, that he was not earning the $5,000 he got for coming down here once in a while and acting on behalf of the Governor General—that he was not earning $5,000, nor $4,000, nor $3,000, nor $2,000, in doing that;—and when it was agreed to fix the salary at $15,000, that was taken into account, and it was considered that we were giving him a definite, and a pretty substantial, increase in salary. That is the way I viewed it, at all events; I considered that it was an increase. Formerly, his salary was $10,000. The other was, of course, a little side line that gave him another $5,000, but we made the thing definite and fixed his salary at $15,000.

We hear a good deal about the independence of the judiciary, that it is necessary to fix their salaries at a certain figure in order that they may keep their honour above reproach, and all that sort of thing; we have heard that time and again. So, when the salary of the Chief Justice of Canada was $10,000, in order that he might not be subjected to any temptation to stray from the path of virtue, we gave him another $5,000 for trotting down here once in a while and signing his name when the Governor General was absent. Then in order to shield him still further from temptation and keep him in the path of rectitude, we gave him another $5,000 to trot over to England once in a while to attend the sittings of the Privy Council. But all that did not prevent a Chief Justice from collaring the money even though he did not go overseas. What was wrong? There was no income tax at that time to lead him away from the path of virtue. Were we remiss in not fixing his salary at $100,000 so that he would not feel like pocketing $5,000 that he did not earn? Something was wrong. He took money that he was not entitled to, that he had never earned. Even though he was the Chief Justice of this Dominion, I repeat, he took money that he never earned and was not entitled to. If we are to fix their salaries at the point where, like Caesar's wife, they will be above suspicion, we have never yet reached that point, apparently.

The principle of the thing is wrong in my estimation. We have our income tax. We have a man who is supposed to be something superior in intelligence dropped down from Heaven to this earth to make regulations in regard to the collection of income tax in this country. We have regulations now which make every man in this country who is liable to income tax, and even if he is not liable, his own assessor and his own collector, and he is liable to a fine, if he makes a mistake in assessing himself. That applies to people who are above the $2,000 mark, if married, and above $1,000, if single. But you must not touch the man drawing $15,000 because it was not in the Act that his salary was raised. Well, if that was not included in the Act, I submit that the proper procedure is to bring in a Bill to amend the Act and fix it up right instead of following this roundabout way. I object to any man in this country who is drawing a salary of $15,000 getting out of paying income tax; I do not care if he is the Chief Justice of Canada or who he is.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Mr. Chairman, I could perhaps put this matter before my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) from a layman's point of view. The position before the legislation of last session was this, as I understand it, and I am following in this regard the statement which has just been made by the Minister of Justice. Each of the puisne judges of the Supreme Court of Canada received a salary of $9,000. The Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada received a salary of $10,000. As Chief Justice he was called upon, under the constitution of this country, to perform certain other duties, to act as deputy of the Governor General, and to discharge the duties of the Governor General whenever he might be absent. I might point out to hon. members that the duties in that respect are somewhat more extensive than has been suggested by hon. members who have addressed this committee in opposition to the proposed legislation. Not only had he the duty of representing the Governor General from time to time, at the opening of parliament when a new parliament had been assembled, and during the sessions of parliament from time to time when legislation required the assent of the Crown, but he also had the duty, and discharged the duty from day to day, during the Governor General's absence, of examining all the Orders in Council and giving his approval to them. I know personally that the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada has spent a considerable amount of time each day during the absence of the Governor General in performing that duty.

To go back to the observation which I made a moment ago, each puisne judge of the Supreme Court received a salary of $9,000, and the Chief Justice received as such, a salary of $10,000 a year. In addition to that, in view of the obligation placed upon him under the constitution to discharge the duties to which I have alluded, he had the additional remuneration mentioned by the Minister of Justice, amounting altogether, I think, to $5,000 per annum. By the legislation of last session the salary of each puisne judge of the Supreme Court of Canada was raised to $12,000—I think I am correct in that —and the salary of the Chief Justice of Canada was fixed at $15,000 a year. It was provided that that sum should include everything which had previously by way of allowance been voted to him from year to year in remuneration for the duties which he discharged as deputy Governor General. So that after the legislation of last session had been passed the Chief Justice of Canada received in all precisely the same remuneration that he had been receiving before, and each of the Puisne Judges of the Supreme Court of Canada receives $3,000 in addition to the salary that had been provided for him up to that time. The Minister of Justice has spoken of the further provision of the Act of last session which declared that any judge receiving an addition to his salary under that legislation should be liable to income tax. In the terms of the statute, that was made applicable to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, although, as a matter of fact, he received no actual increase to the remuneration which had been provided for him before. I am perfectly confident, and I am sure every hon. member must be confident, that the gentleman who is filling the position of Chief Justice of Canada would desire no exceptional treatment. It is merely suggested that he should receive fair treatment and, inasmuch as the remuneration which he is receiving at present is the same in amout, although differing in the method of appropriation, as that which he had received before, he naturally would feel that he ought not to be treated as if he had received an actual increase of salary. If I understand the statement of the Minister of Justice, that is exactly the position which he is placing before the committee to-day, and under all circumstances it seems to me that hon. gentlemen, on reflection, ought to reach the conclusion that the proposal, upon its face, is not unreasonable and is no more than just.

Mr. EDWARDS: If this resolution carries, as I understand it the Chief Justice's salary will be exempt from income tax. Suppose, as suggested by my hon. friend from Royal (Mr. McLean) this House saw fit to increase the Chief Justice's salary to $20,000, would he then come under the Income Tax Act?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I really do not desire to enter into a discussion of hypothetical questions, but in the case which my hon. friend has cited, there would be a distinct increase in remuneration, and there a liability to income taxation. The point I have endeavoured to make, if I have succeeded in putting it clearly before hon. gentlemen, is that the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada is receiving, in respect of the duties which he performs as Chief Justice and as Deputy Governor General, exactly the same amount as that which he received before the legislation of last session was passed.

Mr. EDWARDS: But if his salary were increased to $20,000 he would be liable to income tax, because there would be in that case an actual increase in his salary. How is it that he is liable to income tax now, in view of the fact that there has been no actual increase in his salary?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is clear, I think. The form of remuneration has changed, without the necessary qualification of the statute which should have been thought of last year, and which the Minister of Justice is now bringing to the attention of the House.

Mr. EDWARDS: That is to say, his salary does come under the income tax law. Why?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Owing to an oversight in the legislation of last year which is now being remedied.

Mr. EDWARDS: If the Act is wrong, then make it right.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is what the Minister of Justice is doing.

Mr. HOCKEN: It is interesting to observe that if the salary of the Chief Justice had not been increased, but $5,000 had been appropriated as formerly, he would be liable for taxation on that $5,000. Was there any contract exempting him from payment of taxes on that $5,000 as well as on the $10,000? I do not think the question of the independence of judges comes into the matter at all; you might as well talk of the independence of members of Parliament. We had to pay income tax before our indemnities were increased, and every business man must pay his taxes, no matter what he makes. The situation is a rather strange one in view of the fact that this gentleman would be liable to pay taxes on $5,000 if he had been left in the position he was in before the Act of last session was passed.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The legislation proposed by the Minister of Justice has no effect whatever except in respect of the present incumbent of the office of Chief Justice. The purpose of it is to place him in the same position as he would have been in, if the legislation of last year had not passed.

Mr. BEST: Would it not apply to his successor?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No; it has no application to any future incumbent.

Mr. BEST: I believe that the Chief Justice and every judge should have a good salary. I am in favour of that, because they should be placed in an independent position. But we have a lot of trouble in Canada to-day, principally because, in my opinion at least, the people think that there are some who get too much and others who do not get enough. How can I go before my electors, who are honest people, some of them working hard the whole year round for $3,000 on which they have to support their wives and families, and justify a thing like this, when those people have to pay income tax on what little they make, while the Chief Justice goes scot free? I oppose that principle, for I do not believe that any man should be allowed to get off without paying the tax. If the salary is not enough, increase it, but let us have the same system applicable to all classes. I oppose the resolution on principle, and not because I think this gentleman is receiving too much. Probably he should get more. But the principle is wrong, and I cannot support it.

Mr. ROBB: The Minister of Justice, in introducing this resolution to-day, is creating embarrassments for his colleague the Minister of Finance, upon whose department devolves the duty of collecting the taxes to meet the extravagances of the Government. How can the Minister of Finance go out and demand taxes from people who are drawing $2,000 or $3,000 a year, when they know that his colleague the Minister of Justice has passed special legislation to exempt the Chief Justice of Canada, who has a salary of $15,000? The minister says it was owing to a mistake of last year; but that particular mistake and the resolution which the minister brings in to-day are creating new embarrassments for the Minister of Finance, who already has lots of trouble, and it seems to me that the minister would be well advised to accept the advice of his own supporters and withdraw the resolution.

Mr. DOHERTY: I should like to repeat one thing I said before, something which I do not appear to have succeeded in having penetrate into the minds of some of my hearers. I did point out that this legislation does not create exemption from taxation; that was created by legislation of the past which applied to the salary of the Chief Justice and, at that time, of all judges. The legislation of last year withdrew that exemption upon the ground that the conditions were being changed to the advantage of the judges concerned.

Mr. CANNON: Are the salaries of judges at present taxable not only as regards the increase but on the old salary?

Mr. DOHERTY: The taxation applies to the old salary.

Mr. CANNON: The old salary plus the increase?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. CANNON: Why not treat the Chief Justice of Canada the same way?

Mr. DOHERTY: The proposal is to treat the Chief Justice exactly in the same way as any judge whose salary was not increased—that is all that we are doing. Under the law that withdrew the exemption from every man whose salary was increased this one gentleman found himself liable although he got no actual increase. This legislation is not to create a new exemption, it is to correct the error that withdrew the exemption.

Mr. TWEEDIE: The hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Hocken) suggested a question which I think has not yet been answered. The Chief Justice of Canada acts in a dual capacity,Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, and Deputy Governor General of Canada. Under the old statute he receives a salary of $10,000 a year as Chief Justice and for acting as Deputy Governor he gets $5,000 a year. It is virtually a matter of contract between the Government and the Chief Justice that his salary of $10,000 shall not be liable to taxation, but would the exemption apply to the salary of $5,000 paid him as Deputy Governor General?

Mr. CURRIE: As a layman I have some reluctance to discuss legal matters. However, the House is at one on this question apparently, and that is that there is no desire on the part of anybody to penalize the Chief Justice; it is only a question as to the method by which we may overcome this difficulty. Evidently the law of last year created the difficulty, and I think the simplest and easiest way of overcoming it is to grant an increase in salary. We are confronted with the difficulty that we cannot make any increase in the Estimates submitted to us by the Government—in fact in view of some past rulings of the Chair I am doubtful whether we can even discuss an increase in the expenditures. If, however, it is desirable to make up the sum to the amount of taxation that the Chief Justice is subject to, why not add $2,000, or $3,000, or $4,000 to his salary and let it go at that, and not have the impression go abroad that we are letting somebody escape from having to pay taxes? It is the easiest way to overcome the difficulty, and to my mind would best meet the situation as far as members on this side are concerned.

Mr. DOHERTY: First with reference to the question of the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Tweedie). I have not the statutes before me, and I am not in a position to say positively whether the $5,000 paid to the Chief Justice as Deputy Governor was or was not liable to taxation. I recognize that the point ought to be looked into because it is not the desire to make his position better—the intention is to make it just what it was.

With regard to the other suggestion that we should meet this situation by an increase in salary rather than by the method proposed, I think it certainly is deserving of consideration. There is, however, this to bear in mind from the point of view of the charge on the country—that if you increase the salary it will apply to every future Chief Justice, whereas this provision would be of application only to the present incumbent of the office. If I might make a suggestion it is this: the necessity of passing a resolution before introducing this Bill is mainly, if not entirely, due to the clause which has not been questioned—that is the clause providing the additional salary for an additional judge in Saskatchewan. Now the suggestion I was going to make to the Committee is this: the passing of this resolution does not mean the enactment of the measure, it only makes it possible to introduce the Bill. The whole matter will have to come before the House when the Bill comes up for consideration, and my suggestion therefore would be that if the Committee pass the resolution we will consider between now and then the suggestion that has been made and be in a position later on to determine which is the more desirable course to take.

Mr. CURRIE: As long as we are not adopting the principle involved, and the Government is willing to consider the point raised, I do not see why we should not pass this resolution.

Mr. DOHERTY: The Committee will be at perfect liberty to deal with the matter at a later stage.

Mr. FIELDING: As stated by the Minister of Justice the case is this—that by an error in legislation last year we did penalize the Chief Justice and that was not the desire of Parliament. As stated by the right hon. gentleman this legislation, or something equivalent to it, is necessary to keep faith with the Chief Justice. Accepting it in that spirit I desire to support the resolution, because I do not imagine that you can accomplish the same purpose in any other way without as much, or more, money being involved. But the discussion will be useful I think in the consideration of certain general principles to which I would like to make brief reference.

In the first place, I entirely agree with all that has been said regarding the desirability of giving our judges good salaries. I have supported every proposition that ever came before this House to advance the salaries of the judges; and if in the judgment of the Department of Justice and the Government of the day it would appear necessary, at any time, because of high reasons of State, to advance these salaries —not all of them—to a fair degree, in all probability I would support the proposition; I would not object to any generous and liberal stipend that is given if it is given as a straight salary. Then there should be no exemption. In this period of unrest when people are so unreasonably pressed it is an ugly thing to find some poor struggling business man paying a tax on $2,000 and discovering that a man receiving $15,000 is exempt; it is a bad state of affairs and it should not happen. Let us give the judges—and for that matter all other officials—decent salaries, but let them stand before the law and the country as citizens and pay their income tax the same as anybody else.

The next point I wish to make is this: I do not want any judge to be getting any pay by way of "side shows." I do not think the Chief Justice of Canada should get one penny for any extra duty discharged by him outside of the office of Chief Justice. I do not think he should be paid for acting as Deputy Governor General; it is part of his duties as Chief Justice of Canada. Pay him a decent salary as Chief Justice, and then see that he performs all the duties of his office. I do not think he should get a separate allowance in any shape or form, neither do I think that judges should get allowances for serving on commissions. The essence of the whole thing lies in giving a judge a liberal or generous salary and seeing that he gets it straight and square; do not pay him extra for doing something else. I do not believe either in dual services or dual salaries. Whatever the Chief Justice of Canada receives he should receive by virtue of his position as Chief Justice. The salary he gets as Chief Justice should be sufficient, and he should not be paid any more for any other purpose whatever, from the treasury of Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think I can say I am in hearty agreement with the hon. member (Mr. Fielding). The reason he gives for the introduction of this legislation has been, in the few words which he employed, as well put as it could be. Rightly or wrongly Parliament has historically adopted this principle—that when a judge's salary is fixed that salary shall not be reduced, shall not be subject to the will of Parliament whether exerciseable by way of reduction of salary or by way of the imposition of a tax. It may be questioned whether Parliament was wise in going so far as that. I know that this Parliament merely followed the example of the British Parliament, and I think the legislatures of United States as well, in that regard. It was thought that the desirability of placing the judges in a position where they could in no way be influenced in their conduct by a desire to appease Parliament or Government or anybody else was worth paying this price for, and that there should be taken from Parliament even the right by practice, if not by statute, to reduce their salaries at any time in the future, whether by actual deduction or by tax. I know it can be argued with some force that in going to that extent we may have gone too far. It may be argued that judges would not be subject to influence in any degree by taking their chances with the rest of the country; if the necessity for taxation came, even though it should mean a reduction in their remuneration, they would take their chances in that regard. But, any way, this much must be admitted, that whether the argument against any deduction under any circumstances is strong enough or not, it could not be contended for one moment that you should apply one rule to one judge or class of judges, and another rule to another judge or class of judges. The Chief Justice of Canada is entitled to stand in just as good a position in that regard as any other judge in the country.

Now, as a matter of fact when the Chief Justice came to his position he was entitled at law to a remuneration of $15,000. Consequently if we are going to adhere to the principle at all, we must see that that is not deducted from in any way whatsoever. We failed in this a year ago because it was not observed that the form of the statute was such, that the remuneration which he had a right to expect when he took office was not secured to him. Having failed to do that then, whether the principle is right or wrong—and I think I speak the word of this House when I say that, though something can be said against it, on the whole the weight of argument is in favour of it—whether the principle is right or wrong, it must be adhered to in respect of the Chief Justice of Canada if we are to adhere to it at all. To adhere to it we must pass this legislation.

Only one possible argument that I can see should be taken into account in further consideration of this matter, and that is the argument advanced by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) and supported by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Tweedie), that possibly under the law and the practice as it stood when the Chief Justice took office he had no right to expect that there would be no deduction for income tax in respect of the $5,000. If so, then we would still adhere to every principle that we have ever adhered to, if we made an exception in respect of that $5,000. Consequently I think that is a matter for further inquiry, but, except as regards that, it does seem to me that there is no sound argument against passing the Bill, and if we fail to pass it we shall be failing in our obligation to the Chief Justice of Canada.

Mr. NESBITT: Is the Governor General's salary exempt from taxation?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is of course another question. My understanding is that it is.

Mr. NESBITT: If so, why should not the deputy's salary be exempt when he is acting in the Governor General's place?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is another matter altogether. But the hon. gentleman, I am afraid, has missed the argument as I have sought to present it,—this seems to be a subject that it is impossible to state clearly; I studied the method of presentation as carefully as I could, and I have done my best to make it plain to all. The point is this. We have adopted in this Parliament, as in the British Parliament, the practice of securing to our judges the whole amount they had a right to expect would be secured to them when they took office. We departed from that practice in the case of the Chief Justice, in that we did not observe that the form of the statute imposed an extra deduction upon him. Having departed from that practice, we seek now to make it right. We want to make it right, but we do not want to go one dollar further; and if we are going further in respect of the $5,000 the Act should be amended. That is the intention of the Government.

Mr. JACOBS: I would like to ascertain from the Minister of Justice why it is that when the salaries of all the other judges were increased no provision was made for increasing the salary of the Chief Justice of Canada?

Mr. DOHERTY: I hope that light may shine in the darkness and that this time the darkness may comprehend. What was done was this. The salary, designated as salary, of the Chief Justice of Canada was $10,000. The salary so designated was made $15,000. But the Chief Justice, in addition to the salary of $10,000 so provided in the Judges' Act was in receipt of $5,000 a year for duties performed as Deputy Governor General. The wording of the statute last year in terms increased his salary as Chief Justice from $10,000 to $15,000, but went on to provide that that $15,000 should cover all the services rendered by him as Deputy Governor. So that while the statute with one hand, addressing the gentleman as Chief Justice, handed him a five-thousand-dollar increase, with the other hand, addressing him as Deputy Governor, it took $5,000 away from him. And so as to the amount he received he was landed just where he was.

Mr. JACOBS: Why was that?

Mr. DOHERTY: It was thought wise to include the whole remuneration in one sum precisely for the reason stated by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding)—that it was considered undesirable that a chief justice or other judge should be receiving remuneration under other titles than the title of his judgeship. So uniting the two sums, as I said, in words we increased his salary, but, in fact, suppressing the remuneration of the Deputy Governor, we left the Chief Justice and Deputy Governor in receipt of $15,000.

Mr. JACOBS: That is to say, he is receiving now the same salary that he received before only in another form?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. JACOBS: Is it not a fact that the Chief Justice refused to accept an increase in salary because it would have affected his pension?

Mr. DOHERTY: He never refused to accept any increase.

Mr. JACOBS: Then why, when we increased the salaries of the superior court judges of the province of Quebec from $5,000 to $9,000, almost double—there are cases of that kind—and his puisne judges are receiving as I understand, $12,000 a year, is the salary of the Chief Justice of Canada left at only $10,000, plus $5,000, or altogether $15,000? The butcher and the baker do not ask whether he got this partly as deputy governor and partly as judge. He was getting $15,000 before, and he is getting $15,000 now. It is simply the difference between Tweedledum and Tweedledee. The fact remains that the Chief Justice of Canada to-day is not getting any larger salary than he did before, while all the puisne judges and the chief justices of the provinces have had their salaries advanced. That seems to me to be an anomaly.

Mr. DOHERTY: That may be the reason why, as has been suggested, we should increase his salary. But is that a reason why we should subject his unincreased salary to a deduction? This legislation is only for the purpose of correcting that.

Mr. JACOBS: I have no objection to the legislation.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am open to consider objections.

Mr. CANNON: Is it not the fact, Mr. Chairman, that the law last year providing that a judge could receive no other salary but his salary as judge made it impossible for the Chief Justice of Canada to receive a salary as deputy governor, so that in reality his salary was increased by $5,000? If his salary had not been fixed at $15,000, according to the law passed last year he could receive only $10,000, because if he had drawn any salary as deputy governor it would have been against that law.

Mr. DOHERTY: His being deprived of the right to receive any outside remuneration was the condition under which he was given an increase. Before the legislation of last year, there was nothing to prevent his receiving a salary as Deputy Governor.

Mr. CANNON: But there has been since.

Mr. DOHERTY: In the case supposed, if we had granted no increase there would have been no prohibition in respect of receiving outside remuneration.

Mr. CANNON: If then, a judge in the province of Quebec declined the increase, would he be permitted to receive outside remuneration?

Mr. DOHERTY: All these things were dealt with by specific provisions. The case of the Chief Justice was dealt with by a specific provision so far as the Deputy Governorship was concerned—that his salary increase as judge should cover that. Then, the general prohibition of the receiving of other sums was dealt with by a prohibiting provision. The question of exemptions from taxation was dealt with by permitting a judge to decline the increase, in which case he would not lose his exemption. The Chief Justice was deprived of any extra remuneration as Deputy Governor, but it was provided that the two salaries should be merged into one, whereupon he became subject to the general prohibition against receiving any other remuneration.

Mr. CANNON: Would the exemption apply also to the pension received by the Chief Justice?

Mr. DOHERTY: The exemption from taxation fell upon the pension as well as upon the salary of every judge who became liable to taxation. The Chief Justice, having received no actual increase in remuneration and being not liable to taxation before, remained not liable to taxation, and that exemption applied to his salary as well as to his retiring allowance.

Mr. CANNON: If this legislation is adopted, then, the Chief Justice of Canada will not have to pay any taxes on his pension.

Mr. DOHERTY: In the same way that every judge who declined to take the increase provided by the legislation of last year is entitled to his salary and to his retiring allowance exempt from taxation.

Mr. CANNON: I am not opposed to the resolution; I am simply looking for information. The minister says that judges who have had their salaries increased may not receive any outside remuneration; but is it not a fact that even since the enactment of last year the right hon. gentleman has permitted judges to deviate from that rule and to draw moneys that they should not have drawn?

Mr. DOHERTY: Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to give specific cases?

Mr. CANNON: I will give the minister the case of Judge Désy, of Three Rivers, who has drawn $6,500 from the city of Three Rivers as Royal Commissioner, an amount to which he is not entitled. The attention of the right hon. gentleman has been drawn to that case, but I do not think he has done anything. Does he intend to do anything?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am surprised that so distinguished a lawyer as my hon. friend should not be aware that the Minister of Justice exercises no authority over the judges. I do not sit here as the judge of the judges. If hon. gentlemen know that a judge has violated the law, the courts are open to them.

Mr. CANNON: Parliament, too.

Mr. JACOBS: And impeachment.

Mr. DOHERTY: If hon. gentlemen know that there is ground for impeachment, it is in their power to institute the necessary proceedings. If they think that the circumstances call for official action by the Government I would respectfully suggest that they bring the matter to the attention of the Government elsewhere than on the floor of Parliament. A specific rule of this House makes it not permissible to launch accusations against the judges on the floor of Parliament. There is only one method of disciplining a judge. If there be ground for impeachment in this instance, even if action ought to initiate with the Department of Justice—which I am not prepared to admit—I would suggest that the hon. gentleman give us the necessary information.

Mr. CANNON: The minister has the information.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have read a newspaper article which states that for holding a commission for a municipality this honourable judge received a remuneration. I myself do not undertake to be responsible for the statement of facts. But in the statute which sets forth the services in respect of which the judge is forbidden to receive extra remuneration there is reference to Government and provincial requirements; there is a saving of any right existing in favour of a judge under a Dominion or a provincial statute. Now, I have not studied the case, because I am not, as I have said, sitting here as master of the judges or as judge of the judges. But the question that arises is this: That was a municipal investigation, and if my memory serves me aright—I am speaking only from recollection—the laws of Quebec provide that, in certain instances, judges may be called upon under those statutes to hold certain investigations in municipal matters.

Mr. CANNON: But they get no money for doing so.

Mr. DOHERTY: My recollection is, and I know of numerous instances where municipalities have considered that it was proper to pay the judge, and where he has been paid. In the particular instance, I understand the municipal council passed a resolution and made the payment. There is in connection with the matter another fact of which I am not aware, but which is very material—Was the judge called upon to perform that duty before or after the passing of the statute?

Mr. CANNON: After.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have said all that I know about the matter; but what I want to point out, and where I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken, is, in the first place, when he puts this matter to me to know what I am going to do about it, and in the second place, when he suggests that we should try to decide that question before this House to-day. I really respectfully would call the attention of the Chairman to the fact that this is entirely out of order.

Mr. CANNON: Before the Chairman decides, it would be only fair to allow me to reply to the right hon. gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN: I would regret to be charged with unfairness, but as the point of order has been raised I must rule this debate to be out of order. I do so for two reasons: First, because it is an attack or reflection upon the conduct of a judge.

Mr. CANNON: It was not an attack, it was a reference.

The CHAIRMAN: All references to judges and courts of justice of the nature of attacks or censure have always been considered unparliamentary and the speakers of British and Canadian Houses have always treated them as breaches of order. That will be found in Bourinot at page 358. The second reason is the well known rule that discussion in committee must be strictly relevant to the item or resolution under consideration.

Mr. CANNON: In answer to what the Minister of Justice said a minute ago as to the enforcement of the law of our country concerning the administration of justice in general, I simply wish to say this: The right hon. gentleman was kind enough to refer to my legal standing. My legal standing does not compare in any way with the very eminent standing held by the right hon. gentleman in this country as a legal mind. Every man in this House will admit that the right hon. gentleman is one of the best lawyers; that he has been one of the best judges, and that he is now one of the best Ministers of Justice that we have ever had. Therefore, I was very much surprised when I heard him express the views which he expressed a minute or two ago, because I do not think those views are in accord with the real interpretation of the law as the law should read and be interpreted. The right hon. gentleman says: I am not the judge of judges, and if a member is not satisfied with anything that might happen in this province or any other province, let him apply to the courts of justice and have whatever abuses may have been committed, remedied or rectified. Discussing the matter on very general lines, and not, for instance referring, as the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) did, to a former Chief Justice of the Supreme Court as a thief, without being called to order, I will proceed and say that the Minister of Justice appoints judges throughout the land. The Attorney General of each province sees to the administration of the law within the province of which he is Attorney General. That is the general administration of the law. As regards the personal conduct, dignity and honour of each individual judge, it is the Minister of Justice who has to attend to that and not the Attorney General of a province. The right hon. gentleman, as he knows full well, is not only Minister of Justice, but Attorney General of Canada, and what for?

The CHAIRMAN: I would be glad to hear any remarks the hon. member may desire to make to show the relevancy of this discussion to the resolution now under consideration. Unless he succeeds in doing so, I shall be obliged to ask him to discontinue his remarks.

Mr. CANNON: I cannot argue the point of order; I understand it has been decided. I am only continuing the discussion along the lines which have been adopted by the right hon. gentleman himself. We have before the Chair a resolution to the effect that the salary of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada shall be exempted from taxation, and in that resolution there are other clauses providing for other matters in different parts of Canada. Under this resolution a very general discussion ensued, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen), the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), the hon. member for King's (Sir Robert Borden), the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), discussed the question whether it would be wise or unwise to exempt from taxation the salary of the Chief Justice, and they also discussed the application of the law in general as regards all judges throughout the country. Following that very general discussion which has been allowed by the Chair throughout the afternoon, I am now discussing with the Minister of Justice very generally the question whether, should a judge, no matter who he is or where he sits, not behave as he should, it is for my right hon. friend as Minister of Justice for Canada or for the Attorney General of the particular province concerned to interfere.

The CHAIRMAN: That particular question had not been discussed until it was introduced by the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon). That is the point raised by the Minister of Justice, and that is why the Chair has ruled this debate to be out of order.

Mr. CANNON: I shall not insist. The field of discussion has been very suddenly narrowed down by your ruling, Sir, much to my surprise. You were in the Chair, and there was no call to order when the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), for instance, went very far and attacked the former Chief Justice of Canada and present Lieutenant Governor of Quebec. Yet there was absolutely no remark and no call of order from the Chair. But I always respect the Chair; I always respect your ruling, and seeing that you have allowed the Minister of Justice to say all he wanted and you are calling me to order and preventing me from answering him, I will now resume my seat.

Mr. PROULX: I did not happen to be present when the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) gave the reasons for asking for exemption from income taxation of the salary of the Chief Justice.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Let the minister explain again.

Mr. PROULX: I cannot see any good reason for this. Is it because the salary of the Chief Justice was increased more than the salaries of the other judges? Is it because the higher the salary, the more the exemption should be? Last year we increased the salary of the Chief Justice from $10,000 to $15,000, or an increase of $5,000, and the salary of the other judges was increased from $9,000 to $12,000; there the increase was only $3,000. Yet there is no provision in this resolution to exempt the salaries of these other judges. I think the principle is wrong, and I believe that if you exempt the salary of the Chief Justice, who receives the highest salary of all the judges in the land, you will have very strong representations from all the other judges to have their salaries also exempt from taxation. I believe my right hon. friend is not well advised when he brings down this resolution asking for this exemption. I believe there should be no exemption from income taxation, and especially in the case of the judge who receives the highest salary of all the judges in the land.

Mr. DOHERTY: May I just say one word, because I do not want to be lacking in courtesy to the hon. gentleman. I forego with great regret the opportunity of addressing to him the explanation I have already addressed to the House, because I have implicit confidence that in addressing it to him I would be addressing it to an intelligence that would grasp it at once. I only want to ask him to be good enough to read in Hansard the answers I have endeavoured to give to the questions which he puts, and which were put, before he came into the House, by other hon. gentlemen.

Mr. ROCK LANCTOT (Laprairie and Napierville): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, as in the past I have always taken much interest in this question of the judges' salaries, and as I have always been the only one to discuss the subject, it is with much pleasure that I find myself to-day, one of a goodly company of members, not only of the Opposition, but also of the Government side, and I now hope for better success before long.

I am always surprised to hear the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) say, when discussing these questions of the judges' salaries, that the Government must keep its word even after a period of ten, fifteen or twenty years, and that no change can be effected. I find that since 1914, in this House and outside of it, much has been said, and yet owing to the war much has been changed. We had been promised that there would be no conscription, and yet we have had it. Granted these judges had been promised that they would not be taxed, nobody was taxed in those days, no wonder they could be promised that they would not be, because there was no question of an income tax at that time. But to-day that taxation exists, and I do not see why a judge who receives $15,000 a year should not pay an income tax as well as the poor farmer who earns $2,200 and pays on $200 an income tax of $8. This man who gets $15,000 should to my mind pay the tax like every one else, and set a good example. Nothing is worse than bad example coming from above. The example set by the right hon. Minister of Justice, I hold to be of the worst kind, for the hon. gentleman is paid as a minister and as a member of the House, and draws at the same time a pension from the State. Then why cast doubts on the honesty of purpose of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court? I would not suspect them.

Last year, the salary of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court was raised to $15,000 and since then, I believe, he has drawn that salary. I do not know how payments to judges are made; they must be paid monthly or quarterly; at all events, he has likely received a part of those $15,000 since the passing of the last Act, and his salary having been increased, he has no right to be the deputy of the Governor General of this country with a stipend of $5,000. If he has that right and wants to draw those $15,000 the Government should select another man who would not be such an expense to the country. For my part, I would not object to such a change, and were I living in Ottawa I could perform those duties for a dollar a day—because I am a thrifty man—and I would deem it a great honour.

Before concluding my remarks, I beg leave to move as an amendment that the first paragraph of the resolution be struck out, that is that part which reads thus:

1. That the provisions of section 11 of chapter fifty-six of the statutes of 1920, entitled An Act to amend the Judges Act, withdrawing the exemption of certain judges from the operation of certain taxes, shall not apply to the present Chief Justice of Canada.

Amendment (Mr. Lanctot) negatived; yeas 38, nays 59.

Mr. McKENZIE: What will be the effect of the change proposed in paragraph 3 so far as the judges in the province of Nova Scotia are concerned? The Minister mentioned that the judges had the right to settle their own location. So far as the judges in Nova Scotia are concerned, I think they all reside in Halifax, so I do not think that would affect them.

Mr. DOHERTY: There is no change so far as Nova Scotia is concerned. The reason it is mentioned is that we are repealing the whole section and re-enacting it in order to make the change in the other provinces.

Resolution reported.

Mr. DOHERTY: I desire to cover an omission. The other day, by oversight I forgot to state that the resolution in question had been submitted to the Governor General and had obtained his approval. I desire to make that statement now.

I move for leave to introduce Bill No. 60, to amend the Judges Act.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

THE FRENCH TREATY

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I move for leave to introduce Bill No. 61, founded on the resolution, which was passed to-day, respecting a certain trade arrangement between His Majesty and the President of the French Republic.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

SUPPLY — CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROPOSED REFERENCE TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE OF HOUSE

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister) moved that the House go again into Committee of Supply.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I wish to avail myself of this opportunity to move an amendment which is substantially the same as the notice of motion which stood in my name for several days and which had relation to the appointment of a committee to be known as the Railway and Shipping Committee. Last evening, the House will remember, I moved for the discharge of that motion from the Order Paper. I did so because I was likely to be absent from the House during the next few days, and also because, even were I sure of being here continuously, there was considerable doubt as to when I might have an opportunity of moving that motion. I was anxious to be able to present it to the House as early as possible, and after consultation with the Prime Minister last evening, I made the motion for the discharge of that motion from the Order Paper, which was unanimously carried by the House. Upon giving notice this afternoon to the Prime Minister of the text of this amendment, he pointed out to me that his position would be somewhat prejudiced by my moving it on a motion to go into Supply, and that possibly he might not have consented last evening to my motion being discharged from the Order Paper had he understood that this amendment would be moved to-day on the motion to go into Supply. I refer to this fact merely to say that I do not desire to prejudice the position of my right hon. friend or his supporters, particularly if any embarrassment to them were due to any act or word of my own. Therefore, upon the conclusion of the debate on this amendment, I shall ask the House for leave to withdraw it. It will be understood, of course, that when the right hon. the Prime Minister comes to move for the appointment of a committee, which, I understand, he has intimated he will do, there will then be an opportunity for me or any other hon. gentleman to move for additions to the powers of that committee, if in my judgment or theirs it is felt that those powers are too limited.

Mr. MURPHY: I dislike interrupting the hon. gentleman, but did he say that the amendment which he is about to move this afternoon is substantially the same as the motion he got leave to withdraw yesterday? If so, in what respect do they differ?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): The only respect in which they differ is that the period of continuance of the suggested committee is limited, in this amendment, to this session, and it was my intention to incorporate that amendment in the original motion had I moved it. Now, the purpose of the amendment is disclosed in the text itself; the reading of it will show the intended functions of the committee if this House decides to establish it. The name of the committee also suggests substantially the range of its jurisdiction. I think that such a committee should have the right and power to enquire into substantial matters of policy connected with the management and administration of the Government owned and controlled railway system of this country, and as well the shipping, which is known as the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. I should hope that the work of this committee, if it were appointed, would be of a substantial and informative character; if it were not, it would fail to fulfil the terms which I have in mind at the moment. It is not my intention that there should be conferred upon this committee supervisory or administrative powers over railway matters—and when I refer to railway matters, the House, I trust, will bear in mind that I have reference only to the system of railways known as the Canadian National Railways. I should hope that this committee would be the means of supplying a great deal of information to the public in connection with the government-owned system of roads; that it would be the instrument by which the management of this railway system could convey to the public, who are its owners, an account of their stewardship, and in this manner give a review of existing or contemplated policies of the Board. I should hope that this committee, if established, would establish between the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian public some such relationships as exist between an ordinary commercial enterprise and its shareholders. I should hope that there would be established, as between the management and Parliament, at least the relationship which ordinarily exists in commercial concerns between the management and the board of directors or the shareholders. Now, Mr. Speaker, I realize that asking for the creation of a committee with such wide powers is perhaps somewhat unusual in our parliamentary experience, and I therefore realize very clearly I trust that in order to induce Parliament to accept my proposal I must convince, or should endeavour to convince Parliament that a serious problem confronts us to-day. If I succeed in doing so I think it should follow that the proposal contained in the amendment should be granted, and that a committee, to whom should be granted unusual powers, should be set up to meet an unusual situation. In order to do this I must refer to certain matters relating to the Canadian National Railway system, and particularly to the economic condition of that system. I do so primarily for the purpose of impressing the House, if I can, with the gravity of the situation now confronting it.

A few days ago the Minister of Railways presented to the House what is known as the annual railway statement, which statement contained a great deal of valuable and important information regarding the Canadian National Railway system. I do not know that the statement which the minister gave could have been more complete without it becoming somewhat burdensome to himself and to the House. However, we learned from the minister that there are in Canada to-day 17,000 miles of railway controlled by the Government, and possibly this mileage shall later be increased by the acquisition of the Grand Trunk Railway. We learned that in 1919 there was a deficit of $48,000,000 on account of operating and fixed charges, that in 1920 there was an operating deficit of $37,000,000, and that in 1920 there was a deficit of $70,000,000 on account of operations and fixed charges. We further learned that 95 per cent of the gross revenue of the system was consumed by two items alone—wages and fuel. We also learned from the statement that it cost $1.24 and a fraction to earn a dollar during the past year. The minister on that occasion likewise gave to the House his statement of net earnings for the current year, the railway year being the calendar year. He estimates a deficit of $50,000,000 on account of operating and fixed charges, and including interest on advances to the Canadian Northern Railway he calculates that this deficit will be increased to $60,000,000. This is reached by taking into consideration a possible decrease in wages, in the cost of materials, and by effecting economies which I fancy he hopes to be able to successfully introduce. So you see that the deficit in 1919 was very substantial, it was very substantial in 1920, and I suggest there is little or no evidence that it will be any less in 1921 notwithstanding the minister's estimate—in fact everything known to us suggests a very much greater deficit than we had in 1920.

Now considering the commercial and trading conditions of the world, the conditions of the European exchanges, the decrease in the productive powers of Canada and all other countries, the fact that even in Canada during the past three or four months the producers of lumber, fish, coal, iron and steel have reduced production —I think it is probably a fair estimate to say that in the Prairie Provinces there will be a diminution in the production of wheat, largely owing to the fact that the cost of production is abnormally high, and the markets and prices are not very reassuring; —taking all these conditions into consideration I think it is fair to say that when the current railway year ends on December 31 this year we shall learn that a deficit considerably in excess of the deficit of 1920 confronts this country, and that I am sure will be regarded as a very serious situation. But the condition of a railway is not altogether revealed even by the operating results. It is true that the deficit of 1920 is, in itself, sufficiently staggering. It is also

I have no doubt, true and well known to hon. gentlemen that it is extremely desirable that a road should have more than a mere surplus of operating income; it is extremely desirable that it should build up a reserve. The Canadian National Railway system, in the face of the existing deficits, was unable to build up, or to add to, reserve. Further, the failure to have an operating income upon the credit side, the failure to be able to earn anything to add to a reserve, affects the credit of a railway company, and doubtless the borrowing capacity of the Canadian National Railway system has been disastrously affected by the result of the operations of last year. I think I am correct in saying that to-day the Canadian National Railway system would be unable to borrow any money in the markets of the world without the guarantee and backing of the Canadian Government. That being so, and I hardly think anybody can question my statement, I feel compelled to say, although very regretfully, that at the moment our National Railway system is practically bankrupt. In ordinary affairs an individual, or a commercial concern, is not considered bankrupt while they are able to pay and meet the demands of their creditors; but it is altogether different in connection with a railway system. As soon as a railway system reaches the condition that it is unable to borrow upon favourable terms it is bankrupt—because the operations of a railway never cease, it must be continually expanding. Further, we are all aware that during the past four or five years a great deal of money should have been spent upon maintenance, development and construction work, in connection with our railways. This has been deferred. I am not criticising anybody for so doing; I should say that that was good business policy. But nevertheless that fact must be taken into consideration in a review of railway conditions to-day. I make the statement, not authoritatively of course, but I think I am well within the mark, that no less a sum than $150,000,000 should this year be expended upon the Canadian National Railway system for maintenance, and improvements in order to prevent the impairment of our railway assets. That, Mr. Speaker, is a serious situation to contemplate, and I have not the slightest doubt that every hon. gentleman is impressed with its seriousness, particularly when coupled with the fact that we are facing for the current year such a large deficit.

Now, we can hardly hope to increase our railway revenues by a further increase in freight or passenger rates. It may be fairly stated, I think, that to-day our freight rates are at such a figure that they adversely affect the production of goods and our domestic and export trade. These high freight rates in turn contribute to the continued high price of commodities, thus lessening the ordinary exchange of goods and the total volume of the production of the country and their consumption, which in turn leads to unemployment. I have no doubt also that the fact that a great deal of maintenance work on our railways has been deferred also contributes to unemployment. And I think I may with greater confidence say that our passenger rates at least have reached that point when it would be inadvisable to further increase them. The statement of the Minister of Railways indicates a decline of 9.45 per cent in the number of passengers carried per mile in 1920 as compared with 1919. I think I am reflecting probably the judgment of the average member of this House when I say that our passenger rates might be reduced somewhat and thus stimulate the earning power of our railways. Therefore I say that we cannot well look to increasing railway revenues for the current calendar year by increasing freight or passenger rates; on the contrary not at all improbable that better financial results might be obtained by here and there a slight diminution in the rates.

Now, Sir, I do not refer to the financial condition of our railways with any degree of pleasure. It is not a condition that one would care to proclaim in Parliament in a malicious spirit or to injure his country; but facts must sometimes be faced boldly and courageously, and I think it is far better that Parliament and the country should realize the actual situation confronting us.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): And in other countries also.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Yes, I am going to refer to that. There is some comfort in the reflection that in other countries approximating conditions prevail. When one thinks of the great extent of this Dominion, of the sparseness of its population, of the lack of development of our natural resources, and of the physical condition of a great deal of the country through which our railway system operates, it is not surprising to find the present results. I am sure we all have hope for the future. This country has the capacity to expand com-mercially and otherwise, and it certainly shall, but of course in the immediate future our problem is a very serious one. I do not think that our position should be prejudiced by the fact that the other great railway system in this country presents a very much better showing for the past fiscalyear. I have never been able to appreciate why a statement of the financial condition of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company can be expected to contribute to the solution of our own railway problem. There are many obvious reasons why that system is in such a relatively flourishing condition to-day. The two systems are unlike and cannot be compared. To my mind it contributes very little to clearing the general situation to find so many flattering commendations made of the one road and so many unreasoned and unreasonable condemnations of the other.

Of course, a great deal of the present situation is due to the conditions ensuing from the war, and, as has been suggested by my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean, York) opposite, that fact has left similar results in many other countries. It would be very interesting just for the moment to look at the railway situation in the United States, where conditions are much the same as here, except that that country has a much greater population and is more fully developed. In 1920 it cost the American railways on an average $93.59 for every $100 earned; in 1919 the operating ratio was $85.25; in 1918, $81.54; in 1917, $66.46. The net operating income of the United States railways of the first class dropped from the high level of $934,000,000 in 1917 to $62,000,000 in 1920. In January, 1921, the operating deficit of 143 railways in the United States was $3,000,000, compared with a net operating income of $42,000,000 just a year before, in January, 1920. This, of course, indicates the existence of fundamental conditions prevailing in the United States as in this country which affect very greatly the railway situation. In March of last year the American railways passed from federal control back to their owners, the transfer being made under the provisions of the United States Transportation Act of 1920. The legislators of that country evidently felt that the future of their railway systems was not too fully assured, because in the Transportation Act they made provision for a stated income from earnings for these railways—a provision which had not previously existed. At present the United States railways are entitled to a minimum dividend of five per cent upon the value of the road and a minimum of, six per cent. If an amount in excess of the six per cent is earned, the difference is divided between the railways and the nation as a reserve fund. The reserve fund belonging to the carriers is to be used by them for almost any railway purpose, while the proportion of the excess going to the United States Government is to be used by way of loans or advances to their railway systems. Further, the United States Transportation Act of last year provided for the voting of a revolving fund of $300,000,000, to be used for the purpose of aiding roads seeking financial support or assistance. That amount, I fancy, will meet but a small proportion of the applications for loans which will be made by the American roads.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): May I ask the hon. member if he will be good enough to give an estimate of the amount that the roads of the United States will require to place them on a safe footing for the year?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Well, I have not in my reading observed any statement which would give me that information, but I fancy it would take considerably over one billion of dollars. I understand that the American railway carriers claim from the United States Government something over $900,000,000 to put their roads back where they were prior to their being under federal control, and it is asserted that that would not commence to meet their legal and valid demands. I refer to the railway conditions in the United States only for the purpose of indicating that there is a railway problem in that country just as there is in this, and by way also of opposing the possible idea that our condition is entirely due to circumstances for which this country alone is responsible.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what are the principal considerations which suggest the appointment of a committee, and how might such a committee function to the advantage of Parliament and of the country? The facts which I have just presented to the House in relation to the financial condition of our railways surely indicate the existence of a situation that must be considered, studied and dealt with by this Parliament and by the country. It involves the imposition of heavy taxation, and no intelligent and reflecting man will deny that the situation demands the gravest thought and study on the part of every Canadian who is interested in the present and future of his country. I suggest further that a large deliberative body or assembly such as this House of Commons is hardly suitable for the effective consideration of this problem. That is an assertion which cannot safely be contradicted; in fact, one might postulate that proposition. Our experience also shows that for the purpose of reaching constructive ideas and informing the members of the House and the people generally, as well as in reaching a definite public policy for the future, a small parliamentary committee affords the best means. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, on general principles a committee of Parliament should be appointed to consider the railway situation in itself as well as in its relation to all the other interests of the country.

I should like also to suggest for the consideration of the House that Parliament requires information upon this question. I am not reflecting upon the knowledge which any hon. gentleman has or upon his capacity to obtain it and to utilize it when he gets it. But I think I may safely say that members of this House and the people of the country generally, outside of those who are engaged in the railway business as a vocation, are sadly in need of information on this subject. It is only when we are armed with knowledge that we can embark upon any definite policy for the future or that we can safely legislate. I think that one might say, without reflecting on past Parliaments, that a great many of our railway difficulties to-day are due to the fact that Parliament itself was not informed. The governments of the day thought that they themselves were informed, and possibly they were; but if there had been on the part of Parliament that degree of accurate knowledge regarding the matter with which the government itself was dealing, the government policy might have indicated greater wisdom than it did.

Newspaper correspondents are beginning to say that our railway affairs had better be handed over to business men, and that members of Parliament and the Government would consent to this transfer of duties. I have all my life been looking for an accurate definition of this omnipotent so-called business man who is taken from his hiding place every time the nation is in great trouble. For my part, I do not admit the capacity of these business men to deal with the situation any better than anybody else, unless they are informed upon the subject—and I doubt very much that they are so informed at the present time. However, that is a point which I feel I need not elaborate; it is a self-evident proposition that before we take further steps in connection with the railway problem in this country, Parliament should be informed. I am not emphasizing the fact that the Government should be informed. That is their duty; we assume that they will take every possible step to inform themselves, but I go further and say that it is equally the duty of Parliament to be informed. I say with little trepidation that a parliamentary committee can do more to inform Parliament and the country upon this question than any other body which can be suggested. The presence of the management of the Canadian National Railway system before a committee of Parliament for a few days annually could not fail to inform Parliament and the country. There will be made public facts which cannot be made public to-day by reports through the Minister of Railways or the Government. Foolish and absurd statements are being made day after day, predicted upon assumptions which are not based upon facts. If there is anything dangerous to the country at the present time in relation to a great and important public service, it is having Parliament and the country debating the problem upon facts which have not been established. Expert opinion could be brought before that committee to advise members of the committee, in the hope that that advice, if worthy of credence and acceptance, could be extended through the committee to Parliament, and thus gradually get out into the country, so that sound and intelligent public opinion could be formed upon this issue. A committee before which the management might appear would also afford an opportunity to the management to give to the country their views of the situation, and generally speaking, a standing committee of this House is the best and, I am almost bold enough to say, the only method by which Parliament and the country can be educated as they should be upon this problem at the present time.

We must not forget that when a Government owns and operates a railway with a deficit of $50,000,000 in 1920 and a probable deficit of $100,000,000 in 1921, it is not likely to receive fair treatment from the people. The quality of the management will not be fairly judged by the country unless that management have an opportunity of putting before the people their side of the story of their management. Further, in years past in connection with the railway problem, when, perhaps, it was largely the function of railways to exploit the country, we passed laws to protect the public against the carriers. The situation is very much changed. The railway question will never again appear before the public in the exact form in which it did from ten years back to twenty-five or thirty years preceding that. The country to-day is the owner of a great system; the people are the shareholders; they must pay out of their pockets any operating deficits; they must provide capital for the continuance and operation of the road. While heretofore it was, perhaps, largely the work of Parliament and statutory bodies created by Parliament to protect the public against the carriers, it may be that now our true function will be to protect the carriers against the public. There is, at least, something in that statement.

SUPPLY — CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROPOSED REFERENCE TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE OF HOUSE

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Right Hon. Arthur Meighen (Prime Minister) for Committee of Supply.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax) (resuming): At six o'clock I was urging upon the House that in connection with the railway question it was desirable that Parliament and the country should be informed, and that by such means alone could we develop in this country a public opinion that would aid in the solution of the railway problem. I think it is a fact that there is to-day very little public opinion in this country upon the railway issue, largely because Parliament has failed in recent years to be informed itself, and through it the country. I was suggesting to the House that a committee to which would be granted very large and extensive powers, perhaps broader than those to which we have been accustomed in the past, would aid in the formation of constructive views in Canada, which would be found of some value in the early future. Now if we cannot get information and develop constructive ideas, and assist the public in developing sound constructive ideas upon the railway question, as things go on at present, how is this information to be obtained and disseminated throughout the country in order that the conditions I have suggested might be brought about? The Minister of Railways cannot inform Parliament upon this question, so big has it become. He would need to be a superman, if there is such a person, to do so. It would be an impossible task to impose upon any minister to keep Parliament and the country fully informed upon so vast and intricate a problem. The Government cannot do it. It is their declared policy deliberately to abstain from intervening in the administration of the railway, and, so far as I know, the Government are living up to that policy, and I trust they will continue to do so. One thing is certain, and that is that government ownership and government control could not last twenty-four hours in this country if there was direct interference in the administration of the railways by the Government or by members of Parliament. Therefore, the declaration of Government policy precludes Parliament or the country from being informed by the Government. That eliminates the two probable sources from which the necessary information could be obtained.

Possibly a good way of strengthening one's position in such a case as I am endeavouring to make out would be to give a few illustrations of what I think a committee of the nature I suggest might do. I may astound some hon. gentlemen in the House and possibly some members of the Government, when I state some of the problems which I think might very properly and very profitably be committed to the committee for inquiry and investigation. Take the Hudson Bay railway. I do not know if other hon. gentlemen have had the experience I have had in connection with this public undertaking, but I think in all my experience I have yet failed to meet a Canadian citizen who thought this project would be a success. Yet the two historic political parties of this country have, I think, approved the project. I am not saying it is inherently weak and destined to absolute failure, just because that has been my experience, but as far as I am concerned, I should hesitate to commit the country to the completion of that undertaking until I had further information about it. It has not yet been settled that the Hudson Bay route is a feasible or practicable shipping route. In fact, the Hudson Bay port selected, is not now deemed by the former friends of the project to have been properly selected. The very successful export of a cargo of wheat from Vancouver a few weeks ago has also given to the Hudson Bay undertaking an altogether different colouring. I quite agree that it is futile to deliberate upon past mistakes, but something might still be saved if it were the judgment of Parliament and the country that the project should not go to completion. How are we to be informed upon the subject? I know of no other way, or of no better way, at least, than by committing the consideration of that question to a Parliamentary committee. I do not believe there is any other method which would so promptly and effectually develop public opinion one way or the other upon that question. I think that is a matter which might very properly be committed to a Parliamentary committee, which I believe could do splendid work in considering it.

I will give another illustration in which the people of my province and of the Maritime Provinces generally are much interested. I refer to the operations of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. Parliament, of course, is cognizant of the fact that during the war the Canadian Government built a number of ships; it matters not what their number is, or their tonnage, or the motives which moved the Government to embark upon that policy. When the ships were constructed, it became necessary for the Government to adopt some method of operating them, and eventually they committed them to the Canadian National Railways for operation. That department did not seek the transfer of these ships; they were rather imposed upon them by the Government. I do not know that the Government is open to any criticism for so doing, but the Government have never formulated any definite and irrevocable policy as to the operation of these ships. Assigning them to the Canadian National Railways was only a temporary disposition of the matter. At the moment, I take it that the Government is free to vary their policy, established as I have indicated, and adopt a different policy, and if possible, a better policy. From maritime ports to-day, and also from American ports via our maritime ports, there are running four privately-owned steamship lines connecting with Newfoundland. These services have been built up in the course of years, after a great deal of trouble, risk, anxiety, and considerable investment of capital. All the requirements of the Maritime Provinces and of the rest of Canada and of the ports of New York, Boston, and St. John's, Newfoundland, were fairly well satisfied with the shipping facilities provided by these four privately-owned services to which I have referred. Recently the Canadian Government Merchant Marine have placed in that service three or four boats. Those boats are losing a great deal of money in that service. There has been a curtailment of traffic. The privately-owned lines are also losing money.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: May I ask my hon. friend how he knows that the Canadian Government ships are losing money on that route?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I know positively that nothing else is possible than the loss of money by the boats of the Canadian Merchant Marine that are now engaged in that Newfoundland service. I say to my hon. friend that nothing else would be possible, and I am so informed by men who know the shipping business just as well as those who are operating the Merchant Marine.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Or better.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I therefore accept it as a positive fact that my statement is correct and incontrovertible. But even if my hon. friend were right and I wrong, I submit it as a fair proposition that the Canadian Merchant Marine have no right to interfere with established companies who, in the course of years, have developed a service which is satisfactory to the people generally. It is unfair and unjust, and you cannot get the people of this country very long to support such a policy. These privately owned companies pay their taxes, and they are at the present time losing money. The Canadian Merchant Marine are losing money, and they ask the owners of these companies to help pay the deficit encountered in their operations. As a matter of sound policy, this is wrong, and it is not fair treatment to the people who are engaged in that service to-day. And I do not believe that the people of the country will take any different position from the one I have just stated in this connection.

However, it would be very difficult, I take it, for me to persuade hon. gentlemen on either side to abandon the present policy unless I were able to demonstrate conclusively the facts upon which I base my conclusions. I do not think that any member of Parliament has the right to occupy the time of his fellow members and ask them to reach a conclusion unless he knows his subject and is able to demonstrate the soundness of the conclusion which he hopes to impress upon them. I can quite understand, if I ventured upon such a course in this Parliament, I might be questioned as to my facts, and I am not sure that I could obtain them very easily without the information available through a committee. If a committee were appointed with jurisdiction over the matter of shipping, I should be entitled, I assume, to summon before that committee the managers of the company and the owners of privately-owned companies operating in the particular area to which I referred a moment ago, to have the opinion of everybody, and a general exchange of views; and in the end, that committee, if composed of capable men, would be able to reach a very safe and sane conclusion. If their finding were a sound one, I feel sure it would be accepted by Parliament and by the Government. But I want to say to the Minister of Marine (Mr. Ballantyne), that I am referring only to one particular service; I am not urging that the whole fleet of the Canadian Merchant Marine should be withdrawn from service. I am sure, however, that a great many of these steamships might profitably be sold, particularly the smaller ones operating from eastern ports. It is far better, if you wish to develop commerce and have a successful merchant marine in this country, to dispose of these ships at favourable prices and on satisfactory terms as to payment, to Canadians, if they will take the ships, because the history of the world is abundantly clear that all commerce is after all developed by the initiative of private individuals and not by governments or by ships.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): So are high rates for all kinds of transportation.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): There is no possibility of excessive freight charges to-day, with ten million tons of shipping more than before the war, two and a-half million tons of shipping being idle in the British ports to-day, and one thousand ships laid up in American ports. In these circumstances it is unlikely that the world will lack competition in the future. But, I repeat, the point I want to make is that it is extremely foolish and unprofitable for the Government to be operating boats at a loss on routes which are amply served by existing fleets owned by private individuals.

I do not propose detaining the House by citing matters which I think a committee might very well inquire into. If hon. gentlemen will permit me, I should like, in fancy, to see the heads of the railway management before this committee, if it is established. What is more natural than that the committee should have before them the general manager to go over the annual financial statement and thoroughly explain it, and to have matters which have not been submitted to Parliament placed before them? Would any public interest suffer, or would the railways be prejudiced by an exposure of all relevant and important facts? Would it not aid in the development of sound public opinion on such matters if this were done? There can be no difficulty in convincing one that great benefit would accrue from a discussion of such subjects as capital expenditure, the necessary money required to be voted by Parliament annually for operation, the question of the re-valuation of some of the roads, the elimination of particular services, and the closing down, temporarily, perhaps, of certain sections of railway.

I do not say that this committee should formulate and attempt to dictate policy to the Government, to Parliament, or to the country. All I urge is that it should be the instrument for disclosing full information that is much needed, all of which would go to inform Parliament, to educate the country, and thus gradually to evolve a sound public policy. The other day a motion was made by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), in which it was suggested that a complete disclosure of all information should be made to Parliament. As I said on that occasion, it may be that there was much to be said against that motion. It might well be a fair matter to commit to this committee the task of working out some other method of giving to Parliament all important or necessary information and thus perhaps avoiding a needless waste of time, at the same time giving to every one whatever was really necessary. The objection has been urged upon me privately that this matter should be referred to a special committee and not to a standing committee. I am not irrevocable in my judgment upon this. I am not particularly wedded to a standing committee in preference to a select committee, but I wish to point out that this will be a standing issue for some years. I think there will be much that a committee might do for more than one session, and more than the lifetime of this Parliament, and I believe, therefore, that it will be better that this vast subject, in so far as it is to be treated by parliamentary committees, be referred preferably to a standing committee rather than a select or special committee.

A reference of the issue to a special committee at the present moment would, I fear, develop contests and antagonisms, that would not promote really useful and informative inquiry into the railway question; the very suggestion of a special committee suggests a contest. It has also been suggested that the present railway committee would suffice for my purposes. In answer to that suggestion I say that committee is too large, and its history and traditions are against useful work, particularly of the nature that I have outlined as being proper work for this committee. It has been urged, I think by the leader of the Opposition, that this committee should only inquire into such matters as were referred to it by the Government. There may be something in that contention, but its accuracy could only be developed later. I should think that if this committee were appointed, there is very little that it might not inquire into. I would hope that it being a parliamentary committee, and not a government committee, the House from time to time would exercise the power vested in it and refer to that committee anything which it desired to refer. I wish again to impress upon the House the fact that I desire this committee to be a parliamentary committee, not necessarily a committee for Government purposes.

It has also been intimated to me that the management of the National Railway system would object to the constitution of this committee. I can hardly understand such opposition coming from the management. I can hardly understand the mentality of responsible men who, in view of the general situation, would take that position. I am not sure that that is their view. If it is I can only say that in my judgment they lack a clear apprehension of the great task that is ahead of them and now before then. Does the Government imagine for one single moment that it can get this country committed to the policy of government ownership and government control for twenty-four months, or for twelve months, unless there is some method of keeping the country informed from time to time upon the issue? In prosperous days, with a railway earning its operating expenses and building up reserves, the public probably would be quiescent in the matter, and it would take very little to satisfy them; but I want to tell my right hon. friend who leads the Government that his credulity is almost laughable if he thinks that the country will permit him to conduct the National Railway system under its present policy—and I am not at the moment criticizing it—with the vast amount of taxation that must be imposed upon the people, unless he creates some avenues by which the people can be informed, by which the management and the public can be kept in touch with each other, and by which Parliament may know, as much as anybody else, about this question. If the management of the railway think that they can perpetuate themselves there, and at the same time carry on their duties in the background, without any means of seeking public approval of their policies and administration from time to time, and keeping that public informed, then I say it is very evident indeed they do not understand the problem which confronts them and the seriousness of the railway situation. I venture the opinion, Mr. Speaker, that if the chief officers of the Canadian National railways were to appear before a parliamentary committee for about ten days during a session of Parliament they would do more to establish themselves with the public than they can do by any other means to which they may resort to inspire or to obtain public confidence. I do not mean, Mr. Speaker, that this committee should engage in an inquiry into, and a discussion upon, all the trivial details of railway operation. I can quite understand you could not get a capable and intelligent railway manager to head the management of any railway system, particularly of a large system like this, if he were to be the subject of daily discussion in Parliament and of attack, even before a parliamentary committee, upon small trifling matters; it is very desirable that we abstain from criticism of that nature. What I seek to do, is to afford the opportunity for the management meeting a committee of the Parliament of Canada who represent the people so that, sitting together, they might discuss all the important matters relating to the railway administration, and I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that only through a parliamentary committee can this be done.

I want to say further, Mr. Speaker, that I doubt very much if the opinion of the railway management is as has been represented. I know it is not the opinion of all the important officers of the management. I do know that it is not the judgment of all the nominated directors of the National system. I know that many of them feel that their position is absolutely untenable, and that the whole situation will break down unless some method is provided of bringing the management into contact with the public, unless some method be devised of putting the public into a sort of relationship with the management such as shareholders are in annually with the management of ordinary commercial concerns. I take very little stock, Mr. Speaker, in the suggestion that has been made to me several times that he management are against the proposal for a parliamentary committee. It is an untenable position to take, and I venture to prophesy that after the experience of one week before a parliamentary committee they would abandon that foolish position, if, at the present moment, they entertain it at all. But whether they do or not I say that if the management want to have the support of the public, and they do want the support of the public, some such proposal as this one of mine is necessary. There is no management alive to-day, no management procurable by the Government, which can manage a railway system unless it has the support, of a section at least, of public opinion, and it must also have the support of Parliament, or at least a very large section of it. Otherwise it would be absurd to occupy the time of hon. gentlemen in seeking to establish the possibility of its continuance.

I admit, Mr. Speaker, that my suggestion perhaps contemplates a commitment of powers to a parliamentary committee far greater than we have hitherto witnessed. I know that the British system of parliamentary government strongly maintains the principle that all power and responsibility rests with the government. That was strongly asserted several years ago, and text book writers have affirmed that principle throughout the years in any discussion upon the British system of parliamentary government. But it is true that in actual practice, even in Great Britain, very important matters are now being committed to parliamentary committees, and splendid work has been done by them. In the United States splendid work was done last year by the Senate committee, particularly in the preparation of what is now the United States Transportation Act of 1920—the Act which transferred the control of the railway systems from the Federal Control Act to the Act which I have just mentioned. As I say, splendid work was done there, and a perusal of the prolonged inquiry of the Senate committee would repay almost anybody, because the problems with respect to railways in the United States were very much the same as they are in this country. If there is any other possible way of bringing about a connection between an interested tax-paying and share-holding public, and it is better than this parliamentary committee and more likely to secure the results we seek, I should very gladly accept the suggestion.

Just one word in reference to the size of the committee which, I understand, the Prime Minister has intimated that he will appoint. It seems to me that that committee should not be a very large one; at the same time, I do not think it should be a very small one. It may be presumptuous on my part to make any suggestions in the matter at all, but inasmuch as I have perhaps made some astounding suggestions—at least, the Prime Minister may think I have—I might add just one more to the list without increasing the enormity of my offence. There is no doubt in my mind that if the operation of our railways is to continue under what is now virtually Government direction, with little prospect of any extensive construction during the next year or two, indeed, with a paring down of maintenance to the very limit, interprovincial jealousies will develop. Already instances have been observable in the press. I mean that when services are being curtailed, when sections of railway perhaps are to be abandoned temporarily or permanently, there is a natural tendency among persons living in the localities affected to believe that the railway management or possibly the Government are acting in a partial way. Therefore, if the Prime Minister will permit me, I would suggest that the committee should number about twenty-five or thirty-five members, and that in its constitution some respect should be paid to provincial representation.

I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that I have detained the House so long in presenting this matter, although I do not wish hon. members to think that I have exhausted the arguments that can be advanced in support of my motion. In fact, I doubt if I have given to the House the strongest reasons for the appointment of such a committee. However, I trust I have given such reasons as will induce the Government and the House to accept the suggestion which my motion contains. I move:

That all words after "That" be struck out and the folloing inserted in lieu thereof:

"Rule 10 of the House of Commons, relating to the appointment of the Select Standing Committees of the House, be amended for the present session by adding to the Select Standing Committees of the House for the present session a Select Standing Committee on Railways and Shipping owned, operated or controlled by the Government; and that the Special Committee appointed to prepare and report the list of members to constitute the Standing Committees for the present session, be instructed to prepare and report the list of members to compose the Select Standing Committee on 'Railways and Shipping owned, operated or controlled by the Government' for the present session."

Mr. L. J. GAUTHIER (St. Hyacinthe-Rouville): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Before the hon. member speaks, it is the duty of the Chair to warn hon. members that an amendment having been proposed to the motion to go into supply, the discussion should, of course, be relevant to the amendment until the latter is voted on.

Mr. GAUTHIER: Mr. Speaker, I have listened attentively to the address delivered by my hon. friend, the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) and I must at once state that I am opposed to his motion, for many reasons. Everybody admits that our railway situation is a very distressing one, but that does not justify the hon. member's proposal for the formation of a committee which, if I have understood rightly his explanation, would be vested with more power than the House which had originated it.

There is another reason why I cannot agree with my hon. friend. He states that the tendency of modern times is to give all rights and powers to governments. I do not agree with him. Rights and powers belong to Parliament, and they are not to be surrendered to the Government; and surely we are not going to give away those rights and powers to a committee which will hear evidence, send for papers, and manage the road, and will then give Parliament whatever information it may see fit. We will not be any better off. The hon. member for Halifax says that his proposed committee will be subject to criticism. In other words, it will be taking the place of the Government, because the Government is charged with responsibility for the distressing condition of our railways, and under my hon. friend's suggestion this responsibility would be shouldered by the committee. I do not think the motion should be entertained. Why? I believe, Sir, that we would do well on this very question to take a lesson from the labour movement. What is the reason of the struggle between capital and labour? Labour contends that in every industry there should be a closed shop so as to eliminate competition in regulating the hours of work, the schedule of wages and the kind of work to be done. Every employee is looking for the acceptance of the closed shop idea, but my hon. friend is evidently desirous that the Canadian National Railways should be operated on the open shop system. I believe that the Canadian National Railway system has troubles enough without our adding to them by furnishing to a committee of twenty-five or thirty-five men information that may subsequently be secured by its competitors. If that is done, successful competition with other railways will be made very difficult.

My hon. friend has stated that the conditions as regards railways are the same elsewhere, and he has referred to the American railways. When the United States Government decided to conscript their sons they decided also to conscript the railways of the land. They controlled them for two years; they increased the rates to the amount of $750,000,000 each year, and they had a yearly deficit of $850,000,000. In the month of September last the railways were returned to their private owners, but the United States Government gave to the owners $500,000,000 as a bonus, because of the fact that roadbeds had been deteriorated, rolling stock had not been replaced, and motive power was no longer efficient. The United States Government decided to appropriate $600,000,000 for the purpose of enabling the railways to reimburse themselves during a certain period for the loss they would have to incur in putting their roads on as sound and efficient a basis as that on which they had been operated before. But my hon. friend was badly advised in connection with the Transportation Act passed by the United States Senate. It is what is known in railway parlance as the Esch-Cummins law. When the roads were given back to their private owners those in the United States who still believed in public ownership were responsible for the enactment of this law, providing that the bulk of railway securities should not return to the owners more than six per cent on the investment. That is why the railways on the other side of the line are in such distress. They cannot issue bonds for absorption by the public; when they did appeal to the public to absorb their securities they had to pay as high as seven, seven and one-half and eight per cent by way of interest. When they make further issues of bonds they have to take into consideration the fact that the bulk of their securities must not carry more than six per cent. But notwithstanding this distressing condition there are six railways in the United States which are operating on a perfectly sound basis. For instance, when the Wabash system, which traverses part of Ontario, was given back to its owners in September, everybody versed in railway matters thought that it would have to go into the hands of a receiver. But there was appointed to the management of that road a man who knew how to direct its operations properly, and to-day the Wabash system is one of the six systems in the United States which is paying its way and which is putting aside every month an amount for equipment and maintainence which is necessary to the success of the railroad.

My hon. friend has stated that there is a difference between the Canadian Pacific railway and the Canadian Northern. I admit that there is a vast difference, but there has been a vast difference, too, in the management. In the course of my remarks I am going to give the reasons for that difference. Both these railways were put on the market by promoters. The promoters of the Canadian Pacific, however, after their preliminary work had been completed, put the road in the hands of expert managers, and the result was success. But in the case of the Canadian Northern, the promoters, having secured the construction of the railway, promoted the sale to the Government, and some believe they are now promoting the re-purchase of the system by them. If you will allow me, Sir, to give you the comment of the man on the street and to put it as I have heard it, it is this: the group of promoters of the Canadian Northern bled the country to build up their railways; they bled the country to sell their railway to the Government; they are bleeding the country through its operation, and they will again bleed the country when they re-purchase the road. Public opinion will not stand for that, as I shall prove before I am through with my remarks. The Government were compelled to take over 17,500 miles af railway, and they are waiting for the conclusion of the arbitration proceedings to take over the Grand Trunk. When they are attacked with regard to their policy of public ownership they turn on the Opposition and say: You are responsible; you built the National Transcontinental; you subsidized the Grand Trunk; you subsidized the Canadian Northern; it is your fault. But the Liberal Opposition reply: You were wrong in taking over these railways; you should have let them go into the hands of a receiver. But to my mind, Mr. Speaker, public men have no desire to lose their prestige, their reputation, their good name. They do not wish to propound policies which will result in the destruction of the parties which they lead; they are actuated by a desire to do what is right, and to do it at the proper time. Take, for instance, the Liberal party. In 1904 there had been two or three adjustments of Federal subsidies to the provinces and the older provinces were still endeavouring to secure better terms. The authorities in Ottawa thought that the demands were reasonable but that if they were met, the Federal Government would be exposed to a series of raids on the public treasury. About the same time the new management of the Grand Trunk, under the guidance of the late Mr. Hays, decided to ask for subsidies in order that they might tap the prairie provinces and secure an outlet to the Pacific ocean. The Government of the day decided that they would link together the appeal of the older provinces to secure better terms and the appeal of the Grand Trunk to get subsidies. Was that a wrong policy? Was the Government of the day composed of wilful wrong-doers? Not at all. This was at a time when two new provinces had been opened up on the prairies; it was at a time when an abundance of wealth was coming to this country, when an immense prosperity was flooding the country, and the men at the helm of the ship of state then decided that, at the same time as they were according better terms to the older provinces and as they were giving a favourable answer to the Grand Trunk, they would also answer the calls of the western population of Canada. What was the claim of the western population of Canada at that time? They said that the Canadian Pacific railway with its rolling stock was unable to take care of the needs of the western country; that the western country could not get service at proper rates. They were asking better service, competing lines, and the Government of the day decided to grant to the Grand Trunk subsidies to build the Grand Trunk Pacific, but on the understanding that the Grand Trunk would at the same time operate the National Transcontinental which was to be built with the money of the people of this country. If you want to judge the action of the Liberal Government of 1904, you must go back to 1904. You cannot judge the decision and the action of that Government by the motives that you can impute to them in 1921. To do so would be unfair; it would be an injustice and you would be resorting to a policy of recriminations which would create a sentiment and feeling of unrest in the country. We are not here to say: "You are another." "I told you so." "Why did you not listen to me?" We are here to face problems as they come before us, without recrimination. If we want public men to be respected in the land, our first duty is to respect one another.

What was the argument of the Government in respect of their policy of public ownership? On account of the war, the railways were unable to meet their obligations, and the Government decided it was better to take over the railways and not to allow the companies to go into the hands of the receivers, because, otherwise, the credit of Canada would be hurt for all time to come in the money markets of the world. This is a sound reason; this is a reasonable argument; but there is more than that. The majority of the chamber were in favour of public ownership; they wanted to have this experiment, and 9 p.m. majorities rule in this House. I have stated before, and I have no hesitation in stating again to-night, that I am opposed to public ownership, because I believe it kills individual incentive to better one's condition. As soon as you have public ownership, you are falling into routine, and you can have no proper management unless you are lucky enough to find somebody who will be sufficiently strong to do his duty to the utmost, and such conditions are very hard to find these days.

Anyway the situation as I see it is this. The railways were built by parliaments of former days; they were taken hold of by the late government. Now we are face to face with this situation. Are we going to say: "Well, we will try to becloud the issue?" You cannot becloud the issue. Last year the railways had a deficit of $48,000,000; this year they have a deficit of $70,000,000, and next year the deficit will run up to $100,000,000. You cannot becloud the issue; you must face it like business men and try to secure the real remedy for the evil. What else could you do? You cannot sell those railways. Nobody will buy them. You cannot give them away for nothing. Nobody will take them. You cannot even give them away by paying somebody to take them. Everybody will be afraid of the expenditure. Are you going to sacrifice the money of the country? Are you going to let the railway deteriorate? Are you going to allow the rolling-stock to become obsolete as our locomotives are becoming obsolete? Are you going to let the motive-power, the rolling-stock, the road-bed, go to pieces? If that be the case, the deficits will be higher every year and you will never be able to dispose of the railways. You have the railways; manage them properly; keep them in the best of condition. If you are able to make a success of the business, all right; but if you can only make both ends meet, keep your railways in a state of efficiency, and when times are better, you will be able to dispose of them, regulating those railways by the Railway Commission, so that the people of this country will not have to pay rates which are prohibitive as the rates which we are paying now are. That is, to my mind, the only solution. We have, I admit, to face a tremendous problem; but are we going to say, after having gone on record for public ownership, that public ownership in the railway question is a hopeless task for Canada? You cannot do this unless you have given a fair trial to the experiment of public ownership of railways.

Who is responsible for the actual deficit because after all, if we had a surplus, I suppose the opponents of public ownership would not say much; I suppose we would not be looking for remedies if we had a surplus. We have a deficit. Who is responsible for that deficit? In railway management you have to take into consideration three factors—the management, the employees, and, in public ownership you have also to take into consideration the public. Of course, a privately-owned railway must also take the public into consideration, but under private ownership the public pays the rates and absorbs the securities issued by the railways. Under public ownership, the public pays the rates, and in our case, settles the deficits. Those are always the three factors, and they act accordingly.

Under public ownership you must have a management who can appeal to the employees. You must have a management that is founded on democracy; you must have a management that is not autocratic. Railway management under public ownership must win the confidence of the employees. You cannot drive the employees by fear. The management must be respected by the employees, and when the public sees that the management is doing its best, that nothing is concealed, and that the operation of the road is successful, in its turn it also will have confidence in the management and in the employees. How can we expect the employees to have confidence in the present management of the road? They have been fighting each other since the beginning of public ownership. Actually, Sir, the Government through its management is paying every year an immense amount of money for freight which has been delivered to the Canadian National Railway system but which was never delivered again to the party to whom it was shipped. Things have gone so far, Sir, that the "Canadian Railroader," the official organ of the brotherhoods, is appealing to the employees to stop this pilfering of the freight trains. Can you blame the employees? They are doing what they see the management doing. If the management, after having had last year a deficit of $48,000,000, can come to this Parliament again this year with a deficit of $70,000,000, and still retain the confidence of the Government, what confidence do you think the employees can have in the management? More than that, if the management is permitted to manage the railway system in such a way as to compel the country to shoulder such huge expenditures and such excessive deficits, why should not the employees serve themselves while they have the opportunity? They do exactly as the ones above are doing, no more and no less. Do you believe, Mr. Speaker, that with a management of that kind we can make a success of public ownership? Mind you, I have gone on record, and I am not going to repeat myself. If I was only looking for political profit I would not say a word, but under democratic government, I believe in the majority ruling. The majority have asked for public ownership in railways. Give them public ownership, but do not kill public ownership, and do not kill the hopes of the men who believe in public ownership. I say it is the duty of the Government to change that. If the employees have no confidence in the management, how can the people have confidence in their public-owned railway? It is a failure. From one end of the country to the other newspapers are telling their readers that it is impossible to make a success of railway management under public ownership in this country, until now the people have lost confidence in public ownership. I believe that for the sake of the country—I have no right to ask the Government to do it for their own sake—the Government should change these conditions, and they cannot change them too soon, for not only is the Government going to suffer in the general dislocation, but the country is going to be ruined, and the country will not stand for that.

The management, I charge, is actually responsible for the situation of our railways. The road is managed by a gentleman who all his life has been affiliated with the group of promoters who promoted the Canadian Northern Railway, with its 65 subsidiary companies. Ordinarily, under railway management there is a main line, with feeders. The feeders help to swell the revenues of the main line. With the Canadian Northern, the feeders were only feeding the promoters; they never fed the main line. Conditions are the same to-day; even if they are not, people believe they are, and that is just as bad as if they were. When people look at the deficits on our national roads they will continue to believe that the feeders do not feed the main line; at any rate, they do not feed the coffers of the system.

Promoters cannot be railway managers. Promotion is an art, and railway management is a science. The promoter is looking for a quick turnover. He appeals to the schemers, the plungers, and the get-rich-quick people. But railway management is a science, and the scientific manager looks ahead for the application of principles which have been taught by experience. There is no comparison at all between the two. Promoters cannot manage. They can continue to promote, and they are actually promoting yearly deficits. But enough of that.

With the permission of the House I will speak in a single sentence my own mind on this question. Once a promoter, always a promoter. I say if the Government keep on with the present management of the Canadian National Railway system their responsibility will be very great. They are shattering the hopes of all those who believe that with competition in this country we can have better service with adequate rates. That will be impossible if the management remains in the hands of those who are actually managing our railway system. According to Mr. A. B. Johnston, the President of the Railway Association in the United States, "Transportation is a business; it is the business of business men to put the transportation business on a business basis." I shall do my best to discuss the situation as one who would like to be a business man, who has studied this question with all his modest ability, and who is willing, whether his ideas prevail or not, to give them to the House with the satisfaction of having done his duty.

The management of every railway ought to replace without delay the obsolete locomotives that lie around every railway system on this continent. According to the figures which I have, there are on this continent more than 20,000 obsolete locomotives which cannot be consigned to the scrap-heap for the reason that at present they cannot be replaced. To build a modern locomotive to-day requires from $50,000 to $55,000; that is, if the figures I have been able to procure are correct. The technical experts on the railways in the United States, finding that they were unable to secure, by the issuing of bonds, the necessary funds to replace their present motive power, have devised means by which an obsolete locomotive, which to-day can draw only one-fourth of a regular haul, will, when remodelled, do the work of an engine that has cost $50,000 to $55,000. Now, this is no experiment; it has been accomplished in one of the eastern railways in the United States. The remodelling costs something like $22,000, and it converts an out-of-date locomotive into one of the most powerful engines on the road. The railways should have in their yards and in their shops proper scientific tools and equipment. I admit that the war is responsible for the fact that the railway shops are not equipped to do this kind of work; but if the railway companies would let contracts to the companies that remodel obsolete engines, I have no doubt that these concerns would be glad to do the work at practically half what it is costing the railways to carry on with their present rolling stock. If contracts were let for remodelling the locomotives that are in use now, within a few years the Canadian railways would have highly efficient motive power. But motive power is not the only question to be considered; I think that a scientific management should also see to the reduction of grades and curves.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the question of competition is a very interesting one. Railway experts assert that the troubles in connection with the present railway situation on this continent are due chiefly to duplication of tracks; but it seems to me that our Canadian railway concerns, in face of the unwisdom and the loss resulting from such duplication, are fostering this disease. It is a useless expenditure to have trains running practically alongside of one another, consuming fuel and paying wages to double crews. Under a scientific and proper management, many trains would be eliminated, and, with proper motive power, freight trains could be hauled with more tonnage and fewer employees. But, Sir, when the railway management have to face employees as well as Parliament, they are afraid to act, and while they are in a state of indecision, deficits are piling up every year. An important question, Mr. Speaker, is that of terminals. For the railway management as well as for the travelling public, I suggest that the same terminals should be used as far as possible by different lines, taking care, of course, not to prejudice the traffic of the owners of any terminal.

The question of letting contracts for rolling stock is to my mind one of the most important and most serious. Whenever the Canadian National Railways want rolling stock or motive power, they virtually advertise in advance through the appropriations voted in Parliament. Those who supply raw material, as well as the labourers, know that the management will be in the market; and the Canadian Pacific Railway, the only competitor our national railways have, are thereby given an advantage which they would not have in the case of a private competitor. If the Canadian Pacific Railway wanted to secure an appropriation for any purpose, they would get it at a meeting of the shareholders. But when a vote is made in Parliament for the Canadian National Railways for the purpose of securing motive power or rolling stock, their competitor—and I know this of my personal knowledge—immediately enters the market. What is their object in doing that? They are in the market to boost prices and not with any intention of letting contracts; and the prices of raw material having been boosted up, the Canadian National Railways pay more for their rolling stock than they should if they were properly managed. I was reading in one of the papers of Montreal yesterday that the Canada Car Company have no orders from the Government, although they know that the Government will soon be in the market to purchase rolling stock. Look at the National Steel Car Company. They have contracts for just three or four months in the year, and the labour men, knowing that they will have only three or four months' work, necessarily increase their demands. The owners of dwellings also, knowing that their houses will be occupied only for three or four months, raise their rents; and the tradesmen in the vicinity, apt to be left with an immense stock on their shelves, naturally charge higher prices. So that the labour men have nothing to do but demand higher wages, because they have to pay higher rent and greater prices for the goods they buy. But there is something worse: the labouring man, working only three or four months in the year, loses a part of his efficiency and the Canadian National Railway system pays higher for its rolling stock.

May I be permitted, Sir, to place on Hansard the official figures of the rolling stock and motive power which were contracted for by the American and Canadian railways in 1920: locomotives 1,770, the cost amounting to $106,000,000. Passenger cars 997, at a cost of $23,000,000. Freight cars 73,593, the cost amounting to $221,000,000 making a grand total of $350,000,000. The Canadian National Railway system is paying for a share of this rolling stock and motive power, and I believe that it is time to have a system, a scientific system, which will do away with lots of the waste from which the national railways annually suffer; the management, to my mind, should try to secure the greatest efficiency combined with the strictest economy.

May I be permitted, Sir, to call the attention of the House to an experiment entered into by the large railway known as the Pennsylvania Railway system? When that railway was given back to its private owners there had been such a large expenditure, and such an immense amount of patronage, under public ownership, that in the first month after the resumption of private ownership the management of the road released from employment 15,000 men. There was trouble all over the line, but the management of the Pennsylvania appealed to the men. They told the men that they were looked upon as partners. The men were given committees of their own with equal representation with the management; and every month, all over the line, sub-committees are having their regular sittings. Every discussion is open, every question is settled; and when this joint committee has, by a vote of two-thirds, reached a conclusion, the matter is settled once for all over the entire Pennsylvania system. Sir, every newspaper in the United States has acclaimed this experiment, saying that owing to this plan there will be no more strikes on the Pennsylvania system. I wish hon. members to keep this experiment of the Pennsylvania railroad in mind because I want to use it as an illustration in connection with the proposal which I would have submitted to the House had I not decided to speak on the motion of my hon. friend the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean). But being unable to present this resolution as I had contemplated, and calling for a vote on it, I will embody in my remarks all that the resolution contains, and this will be my contribution towards the endeavour to settle the vexing problem of our railways in Canada. I believe, Sir, that with proper handling the employees of the Canadian National Railway system might be taught that the McAdoo schedule and the Chicago agreement are unable to solve the problem as far as they are concerned. The McAdoo schedule of rates was launched on the eve of a presidential campaign in the United States. It was designed for a political purpose, but, Sir, it has created a situation which, in wages alone, has increased the pay-roll of the railways of America from $1,500,000,000 to $3,600,000,000 inside of four years. The employees using the McAdoo schedule went into convention and they adopted what is called the Chicago agreement. I shall give to the House a few instances of the effect of this agreement, and then hon. members will understand, I am sure, why the railway situation in the United States, as well as in Canada, is in a very distressing state. With the closed shop and the Chicago agreement, which are two different things, the labour element have adopted a policy which can thus be summed up: the least work done by each man means more work which will have to be done by others. Now let us see what has been the result of the Chicago agreement as recorded in the proceedings of the recent United States Railway Board which met in Chicago:

> The Pere Marquette Railway was compelled to pay $9,364 in back pay to four pump employees because their titles under these agreements were changed by a decision of the Director General.
> A car repairer on the Virginian Railway was paid $1,000 for work he never did. He was laid off with other employees because there was no work for him to do. When he became entitled under his "seniority rights" to be re-employed, he received back pay and overtime.

There are instances, Sir, where men, without working but because they were protected by the closed shop system and because they were influenced by the Chicago agreement, have made raids on the treasuries of American railways. When these railways were operated by the government the patronage curse helped the employees along; but now that the railways in the United States have been handed back to their private owners the latter cannot stand for such doings; and surely, Sir, when private owners are unable to subscribe to the demands of the employees because they are excessive, the men, if they were properly talked to, ought to understand what is best in their own interests—surely they would obey and would follow the course which reason dictates? But actually, Sir, you cannot have that—it is impossible. The management is spending money and the employees want to spend just as much as the management is spending.

Sir, if I were permitted to occupy a few more minutes of the time of the House I would say that the remedy of our railway situation is this: you must take into consideration that in running railways there is the mechanical operation, and there is the technical operation. The mechanical operation in my opinion should be attended to by the employees, and they should be given proper representation on the commission. I cannot admit, Sir, that the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government can hope to make a success of our railways when those who are supposed to have the general management have not been to Toronto for twelve, fifteen or eighteen months or even two years. They cannot be held responsible, for they have never been trained for that work. They have not got even a smattering of the science of railroading. The sole management of the road is in the hands of one man, and in this man the country has no confidence whatever. If I may give good advice to the Prime Minister, I would say to him: Do away immediately with the present commission and substitute for it a commission of mechanical and technical experts. Have three men to look after the mechanical operation of the road; secure the services of three technical experts in equipment, maintenance and operation; have two purchasing experts, and appoint as chairman an expert railway manager vested with the fullest authority. Above all, Sir, to give confidence to the public have the books of this Canadian National Railway system audited by the Auditor General of Canada. He is not an employee of the Government; he is an employee of Parliament, and he has the confidence of the country. It may be objected that he will have to increase his staff. Well, let him increase it. Surely the auditors who are at present auditing the books must have increased their staff to look after this work, and it is just as well that it should be done under the guidance of the Auditor General. Then, Sir, in order that the idea of public ownership which was responsible for taking over this system may be maintained, the books after being audited by the Auditor General should on request of the members of this House, with the consent of the manager of the system and with the acquiescence of the Government, be brought before Parliament so that the country may see there is nothing to conceal. In that way you will restore public confidence.

Some hon. members are trying to make political capital out of this railway situation. I say it is too big and too distressing a problem to be so treated. Let us face it as business men. Let us appeal to the scientific railroad men who on the other side of the line have been able since last September to restore six of those roads from the verge of bankruptcy to a sound paying basis. "Oh," some hon. gentlemen will say, "Do not let us go outside of Canada for help." Sir, let me cite the example of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk, who were pretty nearly all Britishers living in Great Britain. They were tired of seeing the continued deficits of the Grand Trunk, and they went to Mr. Hays in southern California and hired him for five years, at an immense salary for that time, to rehabilitate the system. He came to Montreal with a full staff of technical experts and was given complete control of the road. What was the result? For the first time in the history of the Grand Trunk a dividend was paid on all its stock. It was worth while for the shareholders to engage Mr. Hays. And I say it is worth while for this country, if we are to make a success of public ownership, to take similar action, and if after doing so we are unable to make a success of it, then those who come after us will say that when Parliament decided to take over our railways it did not know its business and was unable to tackle a job which in the sequel was a hopeless task from the outset.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my appreciation of the considerate and impartial manner in which the mover of the amendment (Mr. Maclean, Halifax) presented his case, and as well of the incisive, forceful and well informed style of the hon. member who succeeded him on the floor (Mr. Gauthier). The amendment before the House by way of amendment calls merely for the appointment of a standing committee, and it is the amendment, of course, which is before us for consideration. It is before us for consideration in the same way and with as great thoroughness as if the judgment of Parliament were to be obtained upon it, notwithstanding the fact that the hon. member who moved the motion was fair enough to see and to state that, inasmuch as the general attitude of the Government towards it had been made known, while it appeared on the Order Paper as an ordinary motion he did not feel that it should be pressed to a conclusion by way of amendment to Supply.

Coming then before the House as a motion for a standing committee for this session, it is, I think, my duty to state with more definiteness and completeness than was necessary on a previous occasion what the position of the Government is with regard to the suggestion it contains. I agree wholly with the hon. member from St. Hyacinthe that the hopes entertained by the hon. member for Halifax as to what can be achieved by the mere launching of a committee of this House are rather chimerical and extravagant. Nevertheless, it occurred to me on my first study of the motion when it appeared on the Order Paper that it would be worth while to extend to a committee of Parliament the duty of studying some of the concrete phases of this railway question. Indeed, it must have occurred to many hon. members that some method should be found for spreading a little wider the heavy burden that more and more devolves upon us as the Parliament of Canada and for endeavouring to secure from hon. members what they are capable of doing through the instrumentality of committees. I am quite aware that in doing so care must be taken that no attempt is made on the one hand to delegate to a committee what it is the duty of Parliament as a whole to itself consider and decide upon, nor on the other hand to detract from the essential responsibility of the Government for the initiation of policy. Perhaps I may first refer to the general railway situation which naturally in this debate is before us to some extent. I am free to say that the results of operation, in so far as they are reflected in the financial returns, are not altogether what we would like to see. The deficit this year is very substantial; the deficit last year was substantial. There are special reasons why that deficit exists—reasons so powerful that I do not think any hon. member who studied the subject thoroughly could have reasonably expected that no deficit would appear. At the same time I do not think the whole outlook is anything like so appalling or so discouraging as seems to be indicated by both hon. members who have just spoken and by some in the House and out of it who have already given expression to their views.

It must be recalled, first of all,—and this among other facts was brought to the attention of the House in the statement of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid)—that there was considerable arrearage to make up in the way of additions to the scale of pay extending over a period of time that was not covered by the increase in rates which was intended by the Railway Commission to apply thereto. A very considerable share of the deficit, at least of the increase in the deficit, is attributable to that cause. Other causes might be looked to, but a more appropriate time will come when the details of the figures may be inquired into by this House. But looking by and large at the whole problem, it is by no means surprising that we in Canada should find ourselves at this time with railway difficulties of considerable magnitude to overcome. Now, why is that the case?

It is the case fundamentally and in the most important degree for this reason: as the result of conditions that are universal, every country in civilization to-day has railway difficulties of great magnitude to surmount. The mover of the resolution referred to the United States and also to England, and the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe brought forward most significant facts in respect to railway conditions in the United States to apprise the House of how tremendous is the problem that that republic confronts. Correspondingly great is the difficulty in which England finds herself in this regard. The reasons are not far to seek. During the progress of the war there was in both countries a mobilization of the railways under state control. The state undertook for the first time the handling of the traffic of the country. They were making an experiment, and naturally in the first years of the trial there would not be expected the same success that experience would bring about. May I remark in passing that I do not think there is a railway expert in any of the other countries engaged in the war who would not readily concede that in this country the problem of handling the traffic was more thoroughly solved than it was in the United States, in England—indeed, in any nation of considerable importance. We had during the war most excellent traffic conditions in Canada; we had none of the most serious congestions which both in England and in the United States, more particularly in the United States, were encountered. In addition to the fact that there is a burden to be carried by reason of the struggle through the first years of Government operation on the part of these countries, railway wages and costs of material have advanced in these years at an unprecedented pace. The long series of McAdoo awards in the United States and of corresponding awards in England and in Canada has added tremendously to the burden of the railways and the cost of materials has also added to it, though not to the same extent. But both have put upon railway operation burdens that could not in the nature of things be compensated for by the increase in rates. You may increase rates to a certain degree and, as you go up, increase the returns of the road, but there is a point beyond which you cannot go; there is an elevation beyond which you cannot go and get any corresponding returns. There was, in a word, nothing to compensate in toto, or nearly so, in the way of increase in return due to elevation of rates, for the tremendous advance in labour and material costs. That was a universal condition.

Now, it would not be strange if in Canada we had something of an exceptional burden, a burden additional to that shared in common by other countries enjoying transportation conditions similar to ours. I do not know, though, that our burden is so very much greater proportionately. I do not know that the problem in the United States, proportionate to their population and their strength, is not to-day just as vast as ours. Surely the figures given by the member for Halifax and the member for St. Hyacinthe indicate that the financial burden they must surmount in that country this year and next year is fairly comparable in proportion to population with that which we must overtake. But I say that it would not be strange if we had something exceptional in this country. And why? In the first place, we have a country of tremendous extent. We have a large area, and the larger the area of a country proportionate to its population, the greater must be its railway burden and the more it must cost to transport the goods of that country. Consequently, it is only reasonable to suppose that until our population bears a higher proportion to our area we are probably going to have a bigger railway problem in this country than other countries have. It is only fair to bear that fact in mind in reflecting on the strength of the next point that I hope to make.

As I set about to state the next reason why we might expect to have an exceptional railway problem in Canada, I hope I shall be able to do so without seeking to make party capital out of it in any way. It does not matter to whom it is attributable. I have my own opinion as to whom it is attributable; others may have theirs. But that is not the point for the moment. The fact is that in this country we did anticipate unreasonably the railway needs of Canada and we did build prematurely so far as transcontinental lines go. By how many years, no man can estimate; by ten years, by twenty, possibly by thirty. But the fewer we can make it, the better. It should be the effort of every good Canadian and every public man who understands his duty to help make that period of years just as short as possible. I for one am by no means discouraged. I am more hopeful to-day than I have been for a long time that there will be no need of railway deficits in the course of some years; that we shall overtake the time when the mileage now constructed in this country may be used to advantage and when these great railway enterprises entered into in great degree for the purpose of opening up the country and for political purposes—honourable and high political purposes, too, some of them—when these railway enterprises will reach the stage when they are business enterprises as well. We are in the process of arriving at that point and all the efforts of this Parliament will be needed to hasten it. But struggle as we may we shall not reach that end for some time; we cannot in the nature of things reach for a few years at least the time when the railways now gathered into the Government system, built as they were for other than business purposes—that is to say, as investments that would be expected to bear a dividend within a reasonable time—will become business enterprises as well as political ventures.

It surely must be concluded that the present railway situation need cause no surprise, nor need it necessarily be attributable to faults of management. There may be faults, but that is not the issue in this debate. Further, it need not be attributable to the fault of the system. The management doubtless has faults. Every management has faults. The system doubtless has faults. Every system has faults. But I do not know of any other system that could have been adopted in the railway impasse which existed in Canada than a Government-operated system. If anyone can point the way or can stand back two or three or four years behind the present time and from there point the way of any other system that could have been followed, I should like to hear it. I do not think there was any system open to adoption at that time, or that there is now, other than the system we adopted. It may be that the construction of the method of management might be improved. I am not prepared to discuss that point now; but, at all events, it does not necessarily follow that, because there are large deficits in operation, larger than those of last year, and the deficits of last year larger than those of the year before, the principle of management is wrong; nor does it follow from that alone that the method of construction of the corporation and the devolution of responsibility in the corporation is wrong. Much less does it follow that Government-operation in itself is unsound. So much by way of general comment on the railway situation.

I come now to a more specific discussion of the resolution and of what, in my judgment, might be expected of and delegated to a special committee of this House. The hon. member who moved the motion, the senior hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean), emphasized the necessity for greater information, both on the part of members of Parliament and the country, as to fundamental railway facts of Canada. I would be only too glad if some practicable step could be taken by this House to spread wider the truth as regards our railways; in a word, better to inform the Canadian public. That would be a high and honourable object to seek. The hon. member thinks also that the committee could be instrumental in forming a liaison, a connection of some kind, between the railways and the public. I do not know that I have made any particular study of the functions of special or standing committees in relation to parliament; but if my experience is worth anything, it would lead to this conclusion, that you can scarcely make too concrete and definite the duties delegated to a special committee. The hon. member who moved the motion has been in this House for many years; he has sat on many committees, and I did not hear him make any favourable comment on the competency or value of any special committee. Indeed, he took care to say that the Railway Committee of Parliament, which, perhaps, is the most important committee that we have, is historically unfitted for such a task as he has in mind for this special committee. I do not know of any special reason why this should be so; but why is it that we delegate specifically duties to other committees, but that we should give this special committee almost unlimited powers and expect it in some roving commission style to do the impossible? The hon. member seems to have in mind that if we can just appoint a special committee of Parliament and throw the doors wide open on all sides and the windows open above and around, that committee is going to settle all troubles under the sun. It will settle the question, say, of what branch lines shall be built; it will settle the question of railway rates. He discussed that at some length, although that question is committed to the charge of a body of experts known as the Railway Commission. It will settle the question whether the Hudson Bay railway shall be completed. It will settle the question whether a set of steamers running in our Mercantile Marine between Halifax and Newfoundland shall be continued on that route, and if they shall not be continued, what we had better do with the steamers. After it has done that, it will become a sort of educational institution to inform the whole Canadian public about our railways, a sort of college, university, and correspondence school combined. Really, I do not see how a committee of Parliament could ever perform functions so extensive. Nor do I think that, sitting here as members of this House, debating a resolution, we are very likely to be able to determine in the best and most careful way just what it would be wise for a Standing Committee of Parliament on National Railways and Shipping to undertake. It is of the utmost importance that if a standing committee is to be created—and it seems to me well to create it for specific purposes that I will come to in a moment—and if it is to be continued as a standing committee, its powers, duties and responsibilities should be carefully and thoroughly thought out and committed to that committee in such form that it will know exactly what it is expected to do, what service it is expected to render to the House and, therefore, it will address itself to its task with the intention of really getting it done well. Consequently, I intend to set out what I think Parliament might well charge such a committee with, and included in that will be the task of studying and determining for recommendation to Parliament whether the committee could, for useful purposes, be continued, and if so, what those purposes should be.

In discussing a subject akin to this about a week ago in this House, I said that Parliament might well consider whether or not the committee should be charged with the duty of studying out the much discussed problem how on the one hand Parliament can be kept informed of all facts connected with the railways and their operation, the shipping and its operation, all facts that Parliament should be kept apprised of in order that Parliament may, with all the light that can be shed upon the subject, determine questions of policy as to both railways and shipping, and how, on the other hand, that can be done without exposing the management to such conditions of operation as make efficiency impossible. That is a real problem. It is something of which, if a committee can work out and frame and recommend to Parliament a solution, that committee will be discharging a real duty to this Parliament and rendering a real service to the country. I believe it can be done; I believe it must be done; and I think it will be done. We must find a method by which necessary facts, that Parliament must have brought out as to operation and everything else connected with the railways and shipping, may be made known to Parliament, and at the same time that this may be done without so shackling and restraining the operations of the road as to make business operation by a board of directors an impossibility. Unless there are restrictions—at least as to operations under way or very recent—unless conditions are imposed, unless something is done that will not expose the management from day to day to such disclosure in this House of its every act for the benefit of the individual here or the individual there or its competitor all over the country, or for the benefit of some political party, or of a political candidate here or a political candidate there—unless something is done so that the facts can be made known without those results, we may just as well give up for all time the possibility of a business management of the national railways of Canada.

I would like to ask, is there a director of that road who would suggest that such day to day disclosures can be contemplated? I know the management would never suggest it, and I believe, and firmly believe, that no man and no set of men capable of consideration for the management of a tremendous enterprise and responsibility of that kind could be secured to undertake the task if there was no restraint in that regard. Therefore, if that is committed to the committee, and the committee is empowered to secure every fact necessary for its determination on that policy, it is a task such a committee may well engage upon, and it would be an honour to any committee to be able to come to Parliament with a practical solution of the problem.

Furthermore, and this also has been referred to by previous speakers, there may be some question—I do not know whether there should be or not—as to whether the system of auditing that is now followed in respect of the operation of the national railways and shipping can be improved, whether it would be possible to have it done under the Auditor General, subject to his responsibility. I am not going to say whether a change would be better or whether it would not. I know there are very, very strong opinions that it would be impracticable to have it so done. But I think the committee might very well inquire—and the Auditor General could be a witness and anybody else that the committee wanted to give evidence on that point could be a witness—whether the system of auditing could be improved upon, and included in that is the question whether the auditing should be under the responsibility of the Auditor General or not, or perhaps jointly, or perhaps on the responsibility of a firm designated for the purpose subject to the ultimate responsibility of the Auditor General. That question might well be looked into.

Then I have heard it suggested that there might well be more detailed information as to the operation of the road appearing in the annual report than it is customary for ordinary railway corporations to embody in the annual report to their shareholders. So far the management of the road include in their annual report only what ordinarily is given by a corporation to its shareholders; such as the Canadian Pacific Railway, for example, gives to its shareholders. It has been suggested that under the speciai conditions appertaining to Government operation, it should be possible and would be desirable that more detailed informatio be given in the annual report of the Canadian National Railways. That question might also be considered by the committee.

Then there would be the further subject for deliberation as to whether it would be well to establish this committee as a permanent standing committee, such as the Railway Committee, the Public Accounts Committee, the Banking and Commerce Committee, and if so, for what purposes it should be continued, that is, what should be its duties as a permanent committee. That subject also might well come under review. review.

I have merely outlined in brief what have occurred to me as proper subjects for the deliberation of the committee. I am not going to say that nothing else could be submitted to them. It might be conceivable that the general question of the devolution of responsibility within the managing body might also come up for consideration there. I have no comment to offer upon that suggestion. It can be reviewed when the motion that I shall give notice of to-night comes up for discussion. At present I am convinced that the four topics that I have hastily referred to might well be committed for consideration and report, and I am most thoroughly persuaded that if the committee addresses itself for the rest of this session to the review of those four concrete, distinct, and most vitally important questions, it will perform a service so great that it will not likely be hunting for other worlds to conquer.

There is one thing perhaps I should say, and it was suggested by a remark, I think, of the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier). It must never be thought that we should give to a committee powers or duties exceeding those we ourselves are ready to exercise. For example, if it is not in the interests of the country that we so hamper the management of the road as to render efficiency impossible by doing in this House what this House decided some few days ago it would not do, namely, bring out merely upon question or motion all information, no matter what it is; if that is not going to be done by Parliament, then Parliament is certainly not going to commit to a committee the power to do what in the public interest it is not right for Parliament to do itself. That could not be considered at all.

It was suggested in the debate, and I must say the suggestion was surrounded with uncertainty to me—I could not tell just what was intended by it—that if the word "Confidential" were used in respect to papers and documents that should not be produced, that would solve the whole problem, but the explanation of the word "Confidential" given by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) was such that if it meant what he said, then the whole idea meant nothing at all. It would simply mean that there should be brought down in this House such documents as the Government thought it was in the interests of the country to bring down. With the idea so vague as that, I think it would be well to commit to the committee this question, and not leave it to the deliberation and decision of the Government in each individual case. That is impossible. Let us commit to the committee the decision as to what line of information, perhaps complete, if at the proper time, should be brought down, and the conditions under which it should come down, in order that Parliament may be put in possession of verything that Parliament should have to determine policy in relation to the railways and in relation to shipping. In the word "policy" I include finance.

I think it is wise just to repeat in one sentence my suggestion: That to a committee there be given the duty of inquiring into and reporting to this House on the four subjects I have outlined, and that one of these four subjects should be the working out with care and thoroughness what the powers and duties of that committee should be should its existence as a permanent standing committee be recommended to this House.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask my right hon. friend one or two questions before commenting on what he has said. Would he regard it as appropriate that there should be referred to the committee to which he has made reference the report of the Board of Directors—that the committee might consider any matter that is dealt with in that report?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would consider it right that the report of the Board of Directors should be referred to the committee. The committee, of course, would consider it for the purpose of giving a decision on the subjects referred to it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What I am anxious to know is whether my right hon. friend thinks it would be proper for the committee to ask for information with respect to any matters that were suggested by that report?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly, with a view to determining its decision on the duties committed to it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not concerned about the committee's powers to determine what its duties will be. The point I am after is the power of the committee to secure information, facts, and answers to questions. Now, the report of the Board of Directors would deal with a number of matters pertaining to railway management, control, and operation, and it would naturally suggest a number of questions. What I should like to know is this: Would that committee have the power to get from the management answers to any questions which its members might wish to put with respect to any of these matters?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. gentleman is not concerned with the duties of the committee, I am afraid there is not very much purpose in his question. The committee would necessarily direct all its efforts to the performance of its duties, and if it considered that any facts as to management were essential to enable it to determine these questions, it would have it within its powers to demand those facts.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am afraid that the replies of my right hon. friend are somewhat vague and evasive.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will not say I think he purposely wishes them to be so, but if I understand the tenour of his remarks, they mean that this is a committee essentially for the study of what powers a body of the kind should have. I desire to know whether or not I am right in viewing the remarks of my right hon. friend in that way.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not a committee for the study of what powers it should have. That is only one question. I very clearly outlined four. The committee would be entitled to any information which it thought was necessary in order to enable it to come to a decision. I cannot answer more clearly than that, and, as we are not in committee, I think we should proceed with the debate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am prepared to proceed with the debate. Permit me, Mr. Speaker, to remind the House that the circumstance which occasioned this particular debate was a motion which was introduced a few days ago on going into Supply, in which we on this side of the House asked the Government to supply Parliament with information with respect to matters pertaining to the operation, management, and control of the Canadian National Railways; averring in this connection that the Government should be responsible to Parliament in the giving of information and accounting for public expenditures, so far as the Canadian National Railways and the Railway Department are concerned, in the same way as in respect to any department of government. We were told at the time that it was impossible for the Government to give us information in answer to questions asked in Parliament, and further, that it was impossible for the Government to give information by way of orders for the production of papers and documents asked for. Speaking broadly, there are only three possible avenues whereby Parliament can be informed with regard to the administration of public matters: one, answers to questions asked of the ministry; another, the production of papers; and the third, through some committee of Parliament which has power to obtain information and report upon the same to Parliament.

Having been denied the first two sources of information, we naturally expected, when my hon. friend, the member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean), had upon the Order Paper a resolution to the effect that Rule 10 of the House should be amended so as to establish a Select Standing Committee on Railways and Shipping, and when it was intimated by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen), that in all probability the Government would accept something at least equivalent to what the hon. member had proposed, that we were to have at least one avenue whereby it would be possible for the people's representatives in Parliament to receive information in regard to matters appertaining to the control, operation and management of the Canadian National Railways. Instead of that, after listening to my right hon. friend this evening, we are now led to believe that all that the Government proposes is to appoint a committee for the purpose of studying and determining, for recommendation to Parliament, certain questions. That is an entirely different proposal from the one in which we are interested. What this Parliament wishes to obtain is information that will enable the public to understand, among other things, how it is that a deficit occurred the year before last of $48,000,000 on these railways under Government management; how it is that that deficit was $70,000,000 for the past year; and how it is that in all probability it will be $100,000,000 for the present year. These are vast sums of public money which the people of the country have to provide by way of taxation, and the people will demand that the Government, in one form or another, shall be responsible for the accounting of every cent so spent, no matter whether it is paid out under some Board of Directors which the Government themselves may constitute, or paid out by a Government department direct.

Allow me Mr. Speaker, to draw the attention of the House to an important fact: Last year, when my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, made his statement to Parliament and announced, with surprise at that time, the enormous deficit of $48,000,000, we on this side naturally immediately asked for information that would help to explain that deficit. My hon. friend was quick in assuring us that as soon as the report of the Board of Directors of the National Railways was laid on the Table of Parliament we should be given ample powers of investigation in order to obtain all the information that was wanted. The hon. gentleman who sits beside him, the then Minister of Immigration and Colonization, the present President of the Privy Council (Mr. Calder), was also promptly on his feet to explain that the Government were anxious to get the Estimates through and that if we would only wait in our requests for information until the report of the Board of Directors were tabled, we could have all the committees we liked and the fullest investigation into the affairs of the railways. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister himself gave the House a definite assurance, in positive terms, that we could have all the information we desired in regard to matters appertaining to the report of the Board of Directors or to any other question concerning the operation, management or control of the national railways. Now, this year, when we have a deficit of $70,000,000, the Government changes its policy entirely, turns in a directly opposite direction, and informs us that we shall have no information whatever. They say: "We will give no information to the public by means of answers to question, or through the production of papers. We will not allow a special committee of Parliament to get that information; all we will do is to concede a committee of Parliament for the purpose of studying certain academic questions"—questions which my right hon. friend has elaborated at great length—" but we will not give the committee power to get facts with respect to the cost of materials, with respect to contracts, with respect to methods of management; in other words, we will give no information that will help to explain this enormous deficit." Now, that is a position which, in the sight of the people of this country, is absolutely indefensible.

Let me make clear the distinction between the Government's present attitude and their professed attitude of last year. I do not say that it was their true attitude, because, as circumstances proved, once the Government got under way with the Estimates, they quickly forgot their promises that Parliament would be amply supplied with whatever information was required. In Hansard, on April 26, 1920, as reported at page 1671, will be found the following questions I addressed to my right hon. friend.

> Mr. Mackenzie King: .....The Minister of the Interior said—and his remark was very significant—that while the Government would bring down a report somewhat in the nature of the report made by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, Parliament or any committee of Parliament would have a right to investigate everything disclosed by that report. I think I have reported my hon. friend correctly in that regard.
> Mr. Meighen: That is right.
> Mr. Mackenzie King: But what about the things that are not disclosed in that report? That is just exactly what we want to get at through the questions we are asking.
> Mr. Meighen: If they have to do with the company, the hon. gentleman will have a right to information as to those also.

There is a statement which my right hon. friend made last year to this parliament. In regard to anything that had to do with the company, we on this side of the House, or members of Parliament generally, were to have right to the fullest possible information; but the doctrine laid down by my right hon. friend this year is that touching anything that appertains to the company we shall get no information. Only on such matters as relate to the department, and the relations between the department and contractors, for example, is this House to receive any information. Now, Mr. Speaker, we cannot bear too clearly in mind this complete change of front on the part of the Administration. This year they have brought forward a distinction, between the company's responsibility in managing the railways and the Government's responsibility. They say that so far as the Government is concerned they have no responsibility other than as regards matters of a purely departmental concern; that anything pertaining to the management of the road through the company is something that concerns the company, and that Parliament is not to be informed upon it.

But the Prime Minister was not the only member of the Government who gave the assurance that if we passed the Estimates we would be supplied with any information as to the affairs of the company. His colleagues, in the House, as I have already mentioned, were all of one mind on that point. On April 26, 1920, the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Calder) as reported on page 1671 of Hansard, said:

> Every opportunity and every facility should be provided to this House to examine into every transaction. Everything that the management do may be brought under review.

Now we are told that nothing the management does is to be brought under review —the direct opposite. Again on page 1672 of Hansard my hon. friend is reported as follows:

> This House will have the fullest opportunity to inquire into every dollar's worth of expenditure that has been made by the National railways during the past year.

Let me read the statement again, Mr. Speaker, and contrast it with the position which hon. gentlemen opposite are taking this year. Mark this: the statement was made at a time when the deficit was forty millions. We have now a deficit of seventy millions, and it is threatening to become a deficit of one hundred millions for next year. When the deficit was forty millions my hon. friend said:

> This House will have the fullest opportunity to inquire into every dollar's worth of expenditure that has been made by the National railways during the past year.

More than that, the Minister of Immigration and Colonization went on to say:

> It simply means that there will be a time when the fullest opportunity will be presented to Parliament to inquire into every detail of the work of the Canadian National Railway system.

There we have three distinct statements and pledges: first, that everything relating to the management shall be disclosed; second, that every dollar's worth of expenditure shall be accounted for; third, that every detail of the work may be inquired into. And now we are told by hon. gentlemen opposite that neither as respects the management nor the expenditure nor details of the work are the members of this Parliament to have any information whatever.

But the hon. ministers I have just quoted were not the only members of the Government who spoke in this way. I see opposite me the hon the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) and he, I think, will recall that he made a statement to the House at that time, as Minister of Finance, with respect to the attitude of the Government in giving information. That statement was made on April 26, 1920, and will be found at page 1680 of Hansard. It is as follows:

> The House will be given the fullest opportunity to examine the report when it is brought down. Select committees or any thing else you like. These committees will be a great deal more than the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific will get, but make thorough inquiry then if you will, so long as the detailed business from day to day is not of necessity more or less interrupted.

In other words, what the Minister of Finance assured us was that so long as we did not question the ministry from day to day with respect to matters which might affect the business management of the system, that if we would be content to wait until the report was brought down, we could ask for committees and those committees would get all the information that they might want on any question that they liked to ask. Now we are told that we cannot have a committee except for the purpose of an academic inquiry.

But, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Railways also gave a pledge on behalf of the Government.

Mr. PARENT: You can rely on that one.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Here is the pledge given by the Minister of Railways on June 25, 1920. It is to be found on page 4194 of Hansard and is as follows:

> I would think that in the future there would be no reason why a special committee of the House should not be appointed in connection with railways and let some of the officials come and explain the operations and give any information the committee may want.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what are we to conclude concerning the attitude of the Government at the present time when we have had the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Railways and other of their colleagues assuring Parliament before the Estimates are passed, that committees will be granted, that the fullest information will be conceded, that the House will get all the information it wants, and, then after the Government have succeeded in getting their Estimates through, they come back to Parliament the next year and tell us that we will get information in regard to any of these matters one way or the other?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that the people of Canada have a right to an accounting for every single dollar of public money that is being spent on the national system of railways, and no fiction, no subterfuge, on the part of my right hon. friend or his Government will serve as an excuse for that fundamental principle of responsible government not being adhered to if it is at all possible. What does my right hon. friend, or the Minister of Railways, say when we now ask them for information in regard to these roads? They say the Government has no responsibility; that responsibility belongs to the management. When we ask of the management they say "We have no responsibility, we are under the Board of Directors." At other times my hon. friends opposite also say to us "The Board of Directors are responsible." I think my right hon. friend said the other day that in this respect the Act would speak for itself. He disclaimed that any department of the Government was responsible and insinuated, though he did not say it, that by this Act, Parliament had made the Board of Directors responsible. Well, Mr. Speaker, let me read what the Act says in regard to the responsibility of the Board of Directors. It will be found in section 6 of the Statute 9-10 Geo. V., Chapter 13:

> 6. No Director of the Company shall be under any personal responsibility to any shareholder, director, officer or employee of the Company, nor to any other person, nor, except with the approval of the Governor in Council, shall be subject to any pecuniary penalty under the provisions of any statute, in respect of his office, or any act done or omitted to be done by him in the execution thereof.

In other words the Government virtually say "We will accept no responsibility," the Board of Management have no responsibility and the directors according to the Statute have no responsibility: in this way there are hundreds of millions of dollars of public money being spent without any responsibility one way or the other. My right hon. friend asks me: what is the explanation of the condition into which these roads have got; what is the explanation of this large deficit? It does not require any genius to make an answer or to give the explanation. Tell any man with hundreds and thousands of dollars to spend that he has no responsibility, that there is no responsibility in any direction, and you will very soon find money being squandered in all sorts of foolish directions —there is the explanation. We have departed from the fundamental principle of responsible government in the matter of holding the executive responsible for all expenditures of public moneys, and the minute you depart from that fundamental principle of government you bring the whole edifice to the ground. So, Mr. Speaker, the position we on this side take is that nothing will be satisfactory to the people of Canada except a return to the recognition of the obligation of the Government to account to the public for every cent of public expenditure. We will hold the Government responsible for the expenditure on these railways, and we will expect the ministry to find some way of giving Parliament the information which it has a right to have. Now I shall wait until we see what are "the concrete terms" —to use the words of my right hon. friend —in complete form which he suggests as to the means he proposes to give Parliament for securing information before stating what further action we will take. But I would tell my right hon. friend now that if he brings in a motion at all in accord with the statement which he made this evening, if he brings along the suggestion of a committee with only the right to study and report, it will not be acceptable to the people of this country and will be strongly opposed by those of us on this side of the House. We will not oppose it for the sake of offering any opposition to a committee. What we will demand is a committee with powers sufficiently wide to get information which the people have a right to be supplied with in view of the very serious condition that this problem has brought the country face to face with at the present time.

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we certainly have just had the advantage of witnessing an exhibition of wrathful indignation. The hon. gentleman is so fond of these exhibitions that he apparently will not understand the simple statement put before him tending to show the serious intention of this Government to take the necessary methods of seeing that this House does get the requisite information to enable it to act intelligently in the discharge of its responsibility for the voting and expenditure of public money. He conjures up an imaginary situation in which he says this House has been absolutely refused any mehod of getting that information, and then he waxes wrathful and threatens us with what he will not accept and what the people of this country, whom he assumes to be behind him, will not accept. Now, if he had only been able to sit with sufficient calmness to follow and intelligently to apprehend what the right hon. the Prime Minister placed before this House he would have found that what is being proposed and offered is a method of conciliating what I think, we are all agreed should be conciliated, namely, the right on the one hand of this House to get information with regard to the operations both of the railway system and of the shipping company necessary to its intelligently discharging its duty of determining to what extent the moneys of this country should be voted to enable the carrying on of these operations. The problem is to conciliate the obtaining of that information with on the other hand the preserving of such secrecy with regard to the details of the operations of these companies as may be essential to protect those companies, and, protecting them, to protect the public interest. That is the problem which is before us for solution. And what is it that the right hon. Prime Minister has indicated as being his intention? It is to provide a method whereby this House may be assisted and enabled to solve that problem. And how is the announcement met? With this outburst of wrathful indignation, loud sounding words and excited gesticulations, but not one word bearing upon the suggestion of the right hon. Prime Minister. All this outburst is about an imaginary refusal—an imaginary announcement that this House is never to have any information, in face of its having just been told that a committee will be constituted to devise the best methods of getting that information in such a manner as to conciliate those two public interests—in the first place, the public interest that this House should be able to intelligently supervise and control the expenditure of public money; and, in the second place, the public interest that the operations of the public's railways and the public's vessels should not be so carried on as to be under the eyes of all interested in competing with them and with absolute knowledge of every detail of their respective businesses.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have said that that is what has been offered by the Prime Minister to this House. It would be more correct to say that this House has been asked to join in producing the means of solving that problem. Yet the hon. gentleman sees an utter inadequacy in the powers to be given this committee, and is indignant because the suggestion is not simply directly to name a committee to go out and ask and get an answer to every question that it may desire to put with regard to the smallest detail of the operations of these two companies.

Mr. CAHILL: What about the large details?

Mr. DOHERTY: With regard to the large details, the committee that it is proposed to create is asked to report to us as to what the information is that this House can be given, and, consequently, should be given consistently with the two public interests that I have pointed out, to report to us what is the best method of obtaining that information and of giving it to the House in view of the purpose of conciliating these two public interests; then to report to us upon the system of auditing that should be adopted and the extent of detail that should be given in the annual report, this for the purpose of enabling the House to decide what information should be obtained in the public interest and what is the best method of obtaining it; and, finally, whether and for what purposes the committee should be continued. Now, it is not proposed that this committee shall be the method of obtaining information for the general purposes of this House. If it were so, how illogical it would be on the part of this House—and that is what I understand the leader of the Opposition suggests ought to be done—having first decided that there should be some discrimination with regard to the information which the House should ask for and obtain, to proceed to appoint a committee that would exercise no discrimination whatever, but ask for anything and everything that any member of that committee might want. The hon. gentleman entirely misapprehends the proposal that has been put forward here. What the House is asked to do is to ascertain what is the best instrument whereby the information that we ought to get can be obtained, and, through its committee, to state, having regard to the consideraions I have mentioned, what information ought to be made public. Then, there is the question of the best method of obtaining that information, and, finally, the best method of auditing the accounts of these different companies, so that the reports of the auditors may be accepted as statements of the proper condition of the companies in which we are interested. Last of all, there is the question of the permanency of the committee.

Now, save when he thinks it is necessary for oratorical purposes to work himself up into apparently uncontrollable indignation, the leader of the Opposition, I believe, earnestly desires to find a method by which he may consistently with the public interest get that information for which he so hungers and thirsts. All that this House is asked to do is to provide a committee to report to this House as to what is the best method of attaining that desirable end. Is that not a reasonable proposal? Surely the debate of the other day made it quite clear that two conflicting principles required to be conciliated if the public interest was to be served. And what is the present proposal? That we sit down and study with the aid of a committee what is the best way to conciliate those two principles so as effectively to serve the public interest. I am sure that any one who reflects for a moment will see how entirely uncalled for was the wrathful indignation of the hon. leader of the Opposition and will recognize in this suggestion a sincere desire to arrive at a practical method of finding a solution of the difficulties that present themselves and of achieving the necessary result of providing the House with the information to which it is entitled and of so providing it as not to bring about any deteriment to the public interest.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, unless we are entirely mistaken in the purposes of Parliament and in the constitutional rights of the people of this country, the representatives of the people have some purpose in coming here. Otherwise we on this side, acting under some illusion and under "indignation" as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) says, completely misapprehend the purpose of our coming here. Are we not to know anything at all? Are we not to ask any questions for conscience' sake? Are we to submit tamely to everything that the Minister of Justice passes out to us? I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that that is the purpose of the people of this country in sending us here, notwithstanding the lessons and reprimands which come to us from the Department of Justice. We on this side, while never over-satisfied with the analytical disquisitions of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) always manage to understand pretty well what he means. He told us very clearly to-night what was intended by this commiteee. But the Minister of Justice was not satisfied with the English language as presented by the Prime Minister. He thought it was a jumble of words without meaning; that indignation was possibly provoked by their presentation, and, as a Daniel come to judgment, the Minister of Justice, in his lucid, clear-cut, well-determined sentences, told us exactly what the Prime Minister meant. The hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) took high ground when he said that there really was nothing to the purpose in the speech of the right hon. Prime Minister. If there was any doubt as to the soundness of the position taken by the leader of the Opposition we have the most conclusive proof of its correctness in the commentary of the Minister of Justice.

Let me remind the Minister of Justice of what he said a very few seconds after he got through with his speech. He said: "The leader of the Opposition works himself into a fury of indignation, of wrath, over imaginary difficulties." That is his language. As a humble representative of the people of this country, I ask the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice if a deficit of $49,000,000 last year in the operation of a public utility with which the people have to do, where the people have to furnish the money to pay every cent of that expenditure, where the freight rates of the country were raised 40 per cent over and above what they used to be, where enormous amounts of money have been dragged and extorted out of the pockets of the people of Canada for keeping this incubus going—I ask them if that was an imaginary thing. Yet, after this was all done and additional millions of dollars were filched out of the pockets of the people, the Government come back and tell us: "Last year we had a simple deficit of $49,000,000 which, in the estimation of so worthy a gentleman as the right hon. Minister of Justice, is a mere illusionary matter that no person should be concerned about; it is imaginary and not worth asking any questions about at all." I see a number of able business men sitting around and behind the Government. I should like to ask them if, when they go back to their constituencies in all parts of the country, they are asked: "What is the condition of the railways; I am told that last year you had a deficit of $49,000,000; that this year you have a deficit of $70,000,000, and that next year you will have a deficit of $100,000,000"—if they will undertake to wave their constituents aside and say: "Oh, gentlemen, do not be illusionized by these things; they are merely imaginary. All you have to do is to imagine that there is no such a thing as a Government railway at all. All you have to do is to imagine that the Government railways made $65,000,000 of profit last year, and you have the money in your pocket." So the Minister of Justice says. I told the right hon. gentleman once before that we in the province from which I come are in the habit of having the greatest respect for the office and the person of the Minister of Justice, and I would feel myself rather confused if a man stood up and produced this Hansard at a public meeting, say in the town of Sydney Mines and said: "Why, you are talking about deficits; the right hon. Minister of Justice said last year that that was merely imaginary; that there was no such a thing at all." Will the right hon. gentleman say that that is really the fact?

I submit this to the usually fair mind of the Minister of Justice. It has been proven to the hilt that last year, before the Estimates were through, before we gave the money to Parliament and to the Government to spend, we were promised by one minister after another, by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) by the then Minister of the Interior, by the then Prime Minister himself and, I am sure, by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne), who is usually prolific in promises and very barren in performances, that every dollar that was expended of the money of the public would be accounted for. I am sure the Minister of Marine and Fisheries told us that every dollar of the public money spent in his department would be accounted for twice over. Those were the promises. Did hon. gentlemen expect members of the House and, in particular, members of the Opposition to believe them? I am sure they will not dare to say in this House: "We made those statements, but we did not expect you to believe them. We were not sincere." I am sure they will not dare to take that attitude. We believed them; we voted the money, and here we are this year with all this money expended and $70,000,000 more expended that we did not vote at all. The Government come back to us now in face of those promises, and the Minister of Justice, leading the van, says: "You will not get one word, not one iota, not one figure; you can just go and do your best about the matter; we will sit tight here, and you will not know one thing that is going on behind our closed doors; we are in the dark lantern brigade which you said we were in, and we will not flinch one inch from the position we take." Does the right hon. gentleman not think that is a subject for indignation, if there was indignation? Does he not think that is a reason why the people of this country should rise in their might and say: "What is the good of Parliamentary representation? What is the good of having the name of responsible government if these facts are not given to the people."

I can only repeat what the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition says, and I think it is plain and simple. We still adhere to the doctrine of responsible Government, to the position that the minister of every department of Government must come down to this House and explain its expenditure. I do not think, when the business of this country is carried on under twenty departmental heads, we can say that they are overburdened and overloaded with work when we ask them to be able to come down to this Parliament and explain in reasonable detail what has become of the money of the country. If the Department of Railways has become top-heavy, if it is too big, if it cannot be handled by one man, why not divide the work up so that departments which have not so much to do will have some part of that work and give us details which are necessary in order to satisfy the people of Canada that their moneys are properly expended? I remember when we sat behind the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier as Premier of this country and hon. gentlemen who are to-day on your right, Sir, were on this side of the House, we had to account for every dollar, and if a few thousand dollars were expended by way of ever-expenditure or anything of that kind, the greatest possible storm was raised until every dollar was accounted for. That was the proper thing. When a change of Government took place, when those hon. gentlemen went to your right, and when they have the purse-strings and the expenditure of the money of this country, is there any doctrine that can be thought of for one moment but that for every farthing of the money which they expend, they shall account to the honest people of this country who are furnishing the cash and who have, for the time being, given the Government their confidence in the expenditure of that money? There is only one doctrine, one position, one stand that any sane community or representative can take in this House or in the country.

As regards the idea of appointing this committee, have we not enough committees already? I have not said anything so far about this committee; I do not care very much whether it is appointed or not. We have already a string of standing committees, and why should this public business not be sent to one of them? Every dollar that we are going to have inquired into before this committee is money belonging to public account, is it not? We have a Public Accounts Committee. If there is anything to be inquired into by way of the public accounts of this country, why does it not go to the Public Accounts Committee? Is that not what a Public Accounts Committee is for? Is there any money expended in connection with the ships, the railways, the Post Office, Public Works or any other department that is handled by the Government that is not public money? Therefore, if the Government desires a full inquiry into this question, should it not be sent to the Public Accounts Committee? It is not the function of any committee to do the business of the Government. If there is any inquiry which members of Parliament may require; if they are dissatisfied with any account that the Government has brought down, they may ask for a committee. But in the first instance it is the duty of the Government to be prepared to give every information that may be required, and if details are asked for by people who may be dissatisfied, then the question may go to a committee for a further investigation. But the floor of Parliament, and not a committee, is the place for hon. members to find out the facts. The idea of saying that there are no politics in the management of the road; that it is entirely free from politics, and then after all is said and done and you come to an inquiry and an investigation, the matter is to be sent to a partisan, political committee, because in this House you cannot get a committee other than a partison committee that will act in a partisan manner. I have been on quite a number of committees, and when a matter came to the test, I never saw anything but a clear-cut division on the partisan bias of each member of the committee, and that is what would happen in this case.

I submit therefore that instead the right hon. Minister of Justice should have devoted himself to answering the charges that were made by the leader of the Opposition, that promises were made last year to give this information, and that the information is not only not forthcoming now, but has been absolutely denied. The Minister of Justice tells us that the business of this committee is to perform the impossible. He tells us that its business is to provide intelligence for the Department of Railways, intelligence and wisdom for the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and efficiency for the management of our railways. If he can find a committee under God's blue canopy that will give intelligence to the Department of Railways, wisdom to the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and efficiency and executive ability to the railway management, I should certainly like to see the personnel of that committee.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the fact that apparently I am particularly to blame in connection with the promise said to have been made last year—and I have no doubt it was made—impels me to throw myself very unexpectedly into this debate. But once in it, I think that we should all try to understand at the earliest possible moment that we are debating a very serious situation, a very serious question of policy and of principle.

It is easy to say "losses"; it is easy to say that public ownership is wrong; it is easy to throw the cheap gibe and the cheaper sneer. We are told that last year we only asked for so many millions, and that under public ownership this

11 p.m. year we are asking an enormously increased vote. I would like to point out one thing to hon. gentlemen, for we might just as well get down to the basis, and see whether their basis is right; they may be right by accident. I would point out that the tremendously increased vote this year is not the result of public ownership; it is not the result of anything that has been done by the committee now managing the national railways. The tremendous vote this year is the result very largely of private operation, private ownership and private management of the Grand Trunk Railway. We are asking a vote this year of $87,000,000 for the Grand Trunk itself, run and operated as a private company. Now, there is a great deal of room for debate as to whether or not the people as a people can properly run, own and operate a railway, but there is no room for debate on one phase of that question, for it has been settled by every country that has tried it, and that is you cannot run a difficult, complex business organization such as a railway, covering an enormous mileage and touching the home life of the people in every city and town the whole country over, by direct parliamentary control. I do not think there is any room for debate on that question, and if there be no room for debate on that question, it seems to me we are perhaps not arguing the real point at issue, that point being whether or not public utilities can be operated through commission form or by trustees for the public in the interests of the public. That is really what we are arguing to-day. We are not arguing anything else. I put it to any hon. gentleman who has studied public ownership of public utilities by direct parliamentary control; has he ever found it result in anything except absolute failure?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Has any hon. member ever suggested direct parliamentary control?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I cannot very well distinguish between degrees of parliamentary control. I cannot very well distinguish between a system that would allow the Order Paper to be cluttered up every day with questions as to why a stationmaster was removed from some small station down there, or why a switch was not put in here or there—I cannot very well get away from that system without at the same time getting away from parliamentary control.

Mr. CAHILL: Will my hon. friend tell me whether under our system he could have any control if he had not parliamentary control. He either must have parliamentary control or no control at all. The people are responsible. My hon. friend cannot get away from that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is a perfectly proper question, and I shall be very pleased to deal with it. As I was saying the issue here is really whether or not public ownership as we understand it, public operation as we hope to get it, is to be given a fair trial. I want to touch just for a moment on the point raised by my hon. friend from Pontiac (Mr. Cahill). I think there is a great deal of difference between bringing up all the little details of management, the small questions which inevitably always are, and always must be, questions for immediate and prompt decision by the management, and the larger and more important questions which arise out of the results of the management's operation and out of their annual report. Now last year—I am going to try and be consistent, and I think I am—

Mr. McKENZIE: You will find it very hard.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not as yet. I would find it very hard to reach the heights of fancy and joke that my hon. friend can, but so far I have not found it very hard to be consistent. Last year I said that I saw no reason why the report of the directors should not be dealt with by a committee. I conceive that to be a very different thing from worrying the management day in and day out for information as to the petty details of management. I am quite sure hon. gentlemen know very well how railways are run, and that I shall only be drawing to their attention something they know all about when I say that the function of a railway president is really the function of giving prompt and just business decisions. He is a referee of tremendous responsibility. He must dispose of an infinitude of questions in a very short time if he is to deal effectively with them, and for the life of him he could not tell you, a month after a decision was given, why he had done this or that in connection with some small matter of detail. The leader of the Opposition stated that there was no responsibility on the part of the directors. Well, I am sure my hon. friend wants to be fair, and he will find that the provision that is there made in the statute is one which is incorporated in many and many an Act for a public purpose, where duties are cast upon individuals who do not directly share in the profits of an enterprise. All that is stated there is that the directors shall not be personally responsible in damages for acts done in their capacity as directors, and you have that provision also in connection with the managers of many companies. It does not mean that they are not responsible for their management; they are responsible therefor just as much as any hon. gentleman is responsible to his constituents for what he does in Parliament. Now, if there be any better way, we ought to try to find it; and, after all, that is what we are trying to do.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): To whom are these directors responsible?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: They are directly responsible for the discharge of a high public trust.

Mr. FIELDING: Responsible to whom?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: To the people of the country.

Mr. FIELDING: Through what channel?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Through this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And they have made their reports accordingly.

Mr. PARENT: There are no details.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. member will find that there are complete details of everything that really goes to solve the question as to whether or not these men are efficient, and whether they are running this public enterprise properly. The yardsticks are all given. As a matter of statutory duty, these reports are filed every year. The full particulars of the different activities are all given,—passenger activities, freight, mails, express, and miscellaneous operations, together with operating expenses. They are all given, and if there be anything more that should be done, I would have thought that it would be done just as I suggested last year.

Mr. McKENZIE: To whom is their report addressed?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The report goes to the Minister of Railways and is by him tabled annually.

Mr. McKENZIE: Then he is responsible?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He simply tables the report.

Mr. JACOBS: Can these directors be brought before the Public Accounts Committee for examination?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know that there is any reason why they should not be. Of course, I know many reasons why in some respects this is not desirable.

An hon. MEMBER: What are they?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If many small matters of detail are to be inquired into; if they are to be asked to give up the full information regarding their traffic arrangements, for example; if they are to be asked to disclose full information as to—

Mr. CAHILL: As to deficits.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I did not catch that.

Mr. CAHILL: I said, information as to deficits.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh, we will come to that later on. I was saying, if they are to be asked to disclose full information as to their business relations as directors in connection with their different industrial sidings; in other words, if they are to be asked to give up all that business information which every man in business for himself regards as his private property, and if they are to turn all this over to the advantage of a competitor, then there are many reasons why they should not appear before the committee for this purpose. On the other hand, if they are brought before a committee such as we now suggest, or any other committee, for the purpose of enquiring into their operations with a view to ascertaining whether economies could not be effected, and moneys saved in various ways, no reason in the world could be advanced against this. As to the deficit, that is certainly a matter that should be looked into. It is certainly a large operating result; it is certainly a matter about which very few persons can find anything for laughter; at least I cannot; it is certainly something which ought to be reduced, if possible.

Mr. JACOBS: Would not that be accomplished by going into the small details? Little drops of water make the mighty ocean.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If the hon. member started counting the drops of water in the ocean, he would not be engaged very much longer in the process than he would be in trying to find out exactly what was wrong with the railways by going into little bits of detail here and little bits there. By the time he got them all collected he would have such a mass of material that it would be absolutely impossible for him or any one else to digest it. That is undoubtedly something which any railway president, or any other man who understood the operations of railways, would regard as ridiculous. Do you think that a railway president looks after matters of detail? Do you think that any man charged with large affairs, carrying on an enormous business running into millions, bothers about details himself? He has many persons under him to look after these matters.

Mr. PARENT: Suppose the appointment of an agent at some station might mean a clear profit of $15,000 a year to the railways, does not the minister think that an agent should be placed there?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think that any one who was entrusted with the large responsibility of running the country's railways would be in a far better position to judge as to whether or not an agent should be put on at any particular station. That is something that is left in the hands of the management.

Mr. PARENT: I was suggesting a case where a clear profit of $15,000 would accrue.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If there is any case such as is suggested by the member, it is not necessary to make trouble either in the House or with the management. All he has to do is to go before the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. PARENT: It is not under their control.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: They are bound to appoint an agent where there are earnings of $15,000, not net but gross. The hon. gentleman is wrong; the lines are under the board. The board fix their rates, and while the statute does not give them, as a board, the right to interfere in detail matters of operation, through letters of the ministers of railways the board have exercised that jurisdiction. Certainly the railway management will not refuse to appoint an agent where such an appointment is necessary.

Mr. PARENT: If the hon. gentleman will allow me I can tell him that the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners says the contrary?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, I can only speak from recollection which is quite recent, as to the very general practice. I exercised the right and I exercised it at the request of the Government. But after all the Act is there and it will not be very long, I hope, before the anomaly is removed if the matter be in the position to which the hon. gentleman refers.

Mr. ROBB: Would the minister consider the purchase of supplies and equipment a fair subject for inquiry by the committee?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You would have that in the report and everything that is in the report, I think, is a perfectly fair matter for inquiry.

Mr. FIELDING: Would we be free to ask for copies of tenders?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think that is something that ought to be done. Let me tell the hon. gentleman something that we know about. Let me tell him that after would-be contractors, who were trying to get a specific price for commodities, had failed to secure a contract—that contract having been let to a lower tenderer—questions were asked in the House as to the details of those tenders. It is a dangerous thing to try and run a competitive business in such a way, where the men you want to do business with know exactly what they have got to bid and how near they come to the prices offered by their competitors. It is certainly not the way that any railway company in the world that has ever made a success of its business has been operated. After all, what are we trying to do? What we are trying to do is to see if we cannot better the present condition, see if we cannot compose the differences that exist. I think those differences are largely differences which can be easily composed, because I am quite confident that so soon as we realize what the effect on the country as a whole would be if there is indiscriminate searching from time to time and day to day into the business of this large concern, we are all going to be together. We are trying to see what is the best thing to be done. When I said last year—and there again the difference can be so easily illustrated—that there was no objection at all to the fullest reference of the report, or anything else that was asked, to a committee, is there not the greatest difference in the world between that and the asking of questions—for example, such a question as was put the other day in the House as to why an agent was not at work for a given number of hours in a particular city?

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend has spoken of "the Board of Directors" of the Canadian National Railway. Has any board of directors been appointed under the law which was passed a few years ago? Has that corporation been organized to any extent at all, or are the railways managed, as they were then, under the Government by commissioners appointed by it?

An hon. MEMBER: By order in council.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. gentleman is quite correct to a certain extent; but I am afraid that in the main he is quite wrong. It is quite true to say that the general Act has not yet been put into effect, but it is also entirely untrue to say that the railway system is governed by a commission. The Board of Directors are elected just in exactly the same way as the board of directors of any company would be elected.

Mr. McMASTER: Except there is only one shareholder.

Mr. PARENT: Not by the shareholders.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps hon. gentlemen will allow me for one moment; I am now speaking in answer to a question. They are elected in exactly the same way as the directors of any other company; there is one difference and only one. That one difference is that instead of a certain portion of the public being interested in the election of the directors, the whole of the public are interested in it, and that instead of the shareholders—through their proxies as is usually done—electing the directors, the whole of the people elect the directors through the Government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): The Minister of Finance asked a question a few moments ago, a very proper question, "What are we trying to do?" I will not undertake to describe what I think my hon. friends opposite are trying to do; I did that the other day and they thought I was not as courteous as I ought to be. But I will undertake to tell my hon. friends, and the Government, what we on this side are trying to do. We are simply trying to assert and to maintain the right of the people of Canada to receive an accounting—in gross or in detail as they please—through their representatives of every dollar of the public money that is spent. That is what we are trying to do—only that and nothing more. But that is something which is so plain and so simple that I am satisfied the people of Canada will readily understand it. But hon. gentlemen opposite are trying to make excuses for not doing that, and they are raising men of straw in order that they may knock them down. They are raising ghosts as to all the difficulties in the way. "Why," says the Minister of Finance, "if all these little details were brought down here what a trouble it would be." Well, I will not repeat the argument I used the other day. Our contention is that this matter should be dealt with precisely in the same way as it would be in the case of one of our own departments; there is no reason why the same principle should not apply. If the Prime Minister is going to move for a committee, and the proceeding will give to the House all the rights and privileges which it has as respects every other department of Government, that will be all right; but if he is going to say "We will give the House information regarding the Department of Public Works, but we will refuse it as regards the Canadian National Railways," I say that is wrong. We are going to stand on that and make that the issue in this House and if necessary before the country. The hon. gentleman, I say, raises a ghost for the purpose of trying to show that there are difficulties in the way. He says, "What good are these details anyway?" But take the position of the Department of Public Works or the Department of Railways, any or all of the departments of Government, and the way we act with respect to them. We have the right to demand the details as to every dollar of expenditure of the Public Works Department, but we do not do it. Why should we not have the same privilege as regards the national system of railways? We would have the right under our contention to deal with all these matters of detail, but we would not do it. Why? Because they are not necessary. To-day a question is asked regarding the Department of Public Works; in the matter of a contract for example, suppose a question is asked now about the price that is paid for coal? Well, the Minister of Public Works may reply, "I may say to the hon. gentleman that that matter is still under consideration. We have received tenders but we have not awarded contracts and we are not able to give the information"—a perfectly proper answer and the House would accept it. But if the same question is raised regarding the Canadian National Railways we are told, "That is a violation of all business rules," and we are not to know the price that the Government railway management paid for coal although we would be told what the Public Works Department paid for such a commodity. There is no earthly difference between the two. I suppose the Department of Public Works every year pays—I do not know the exact number but at a rough guess I would say ten thousand accounts. How many of them do we bring before Parliament? We do not bring them before Parliament once in a blue moon, unless something arises which calls for an investigation. We have the right to investigate every item, and we should have the right, but we do not exercise it. Why should we not have the same right in the case of the Government railways?

It is one thing to have the right to go into all these details, and in giving that right without any restriction or limitation you are carrying out the proper principles of parliamentary government; but when you deny and restrict that right; then you are departing from all the soundest principles of parliamentary government. I utterly fail to see any reason why we cannot apply to the railways of Canada the same principle that we apply to the public works or the marine and fisheries. I have not found any indication yet of any kind of information the bringing down of which could do harm to our railways. Not one of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken has given us an illustration of something we might ask for, but which the railway company might properly refuse to give. In a motion that we laid on the Table the other day we recognized the fact that at all times there are certain matters in connection with government which in the wisdom of the Government they may see fit to withhold. We recognized that fully, and we recognize it as fully in the matter of our railways as in the matter of the Marine and Fisheries or the Public Works departments. The Government have to be the judges of that, and the House will always recognize reasonable grounds refusing information of that character. What we on this side contend for is that the principle which applies to every other department of government should apply to the Canadian National railways. Not a shadow of ground has yet been shown to indicate that any harm would be done by bringing down any item of the information we have asked for. I take the illustration in regard to coal. I can understand that if we asked for information about tenders for coal the Minister of Railways would say: "This matter is under consideration, it is not settled, and the information cannot be brought down." But after the contract has been awarded, what earthly interest can suffer by the answering of a question as to what companies we got the coal from and what prices we paid for it? It is all nonsense to say that you are going to give information to your competitor, the Canadian Pacific railway. Your competitor certainly knows all there is to know in connection with railway matters. Do not be alarmed about the Canadian Pacific railway. The are pretty shrewd, wise fellows, and they know all that is of any value to know.

But the simple question I am answering is the question of the Minister of Finance. What we are trying to do, and what we are going to do with all our energy, whether we succeed or not, is to stand for the rights of the people of Canada to have either in gross or in detail whatever information may seem to be reasonably necessary in the judgment of any member of this House as respects the expenditure of every dollar of public money that the people of Canada are obliged to pay.

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (North Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the discussion has arisen through the resolution of my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean) which asks that a special committee be apointed to inquire into the operation of the national railways; in other words, to dig into the operation of those railways with a view to recommending any improvement that they can suggest with reference to that operation. As to the whole of the details being given to the House, I was one of those that sat at that time on the opposite side of the Government when the Canadian Northern railway was taken over, and I absolutely insisted that the railways should be put under the management of an independent commission in so far as it was possible to put them under such a commission, I believe that that has been done. I believe that the present Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) has carried out that policy to the fullest extent and that he has interfered as little as possible with the management.

Answering my right hon. friend who has just sat down, the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), for whom I have the greatest respect, I remember last year when the discussion took place over the Minister of Railway's statement that the minister did not hesitate to give to the House any information in his power. I remember distinctly with reference to the question of coal that he gave the purchase price in the various sections of the country through which the railway operated. Nor do I think has this Government refused any reasonable request on the part of any member of the Opposition or on the part of any other hon. member with reference to the operation of our national railways. But you must bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that we insisted that those railways should be operated as far as possible by an independent commission. That is being done. You cannot bring those men on to the floor of the House to illustrate every little detail with reference to the operation of the system, and it is not customary for any corporation to give such details to its shareholders. I have had a good deal of experience on boards of directors, and I have never yet known the shareholders to ask for absolute details of operation.

Mr. PARENT: Why not?

Mr. NESBITT: Why not? Those details are open to them if they want to go and examine the books.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: That is what we want to know.

Mr. NESBITT: I have no doubt that details of the management of the national railways are open to any member of the House.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. NESBITT: Have you tried and have you been refused?

An hon. MEMBER: Yes.

Mr. CAHILL: The minister refuses everything.

Mr. NESBITT: I do not believe anybody has been refused. Let me repeat, I do not know any corporation that tells its shareholders the details of its operations.

Mr. PARENT: We know.

Mr. NESBITT: I doubt if you do.

Mr. PARENT: I do.

Mr. NESBITT: As to this proposed committee of the House consisting of members on both sides as I understand it, the hon. member from North Cape Breton and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) tonight said that on special committees partisan discussion was just as likely to arise as on the floor of the House. I have sat on special committees appointed to discuss all kinds of questions since I have been in this House, and I will say for the Opposition, no matter which side of the House I sat on, that I never saw a question debated by any of those special committees from a party standpoint. Take the question of soldiers' re-establishment, the committee on which sat for two months. I have only this to say for the hon. members who sat with me on that committee, members of the present Opposition, that never by any chance was there a word or action that would suggest that we were discussing the question from a party standpoint. And the report was not brought in from a party standpoint. Any spectator who attended the meetings of that committee would not have known which party the members belonged to as far as the discussion was concerned. Therefore I believe that great benefit would be derived by the appointment of a special committee to thoroughly investigate the question of the operation of these national railroads and to report back to the House.

Let me repeat, that I know of no instance where the Minister of Railways in discussing the annual statement of the national railways last year refused to give any information in his power, and I doubt if he will now. I think you are raising a mountain out of a molehill in discussing this question, because I believe that, after all, we all view the matter from the same standpoint, and I am as certain as I am that I am standing here that there will be no difficulty on the part of the Prime Minister in selecting from this side of the House, and on the part of the leader of the Opposition in selecting from that side of the House, men who will forget whether they are Liberals or National Liberal Conservatives, and who as soon as they are appointed on that committee will forget their party prejudices and do the best they can to work out a solution of this very serious question confronting the country at the present time. I hope that that will be the view of the men who are appointed on that committee, and I am quite sure from my past experience that it will be their view, and I hope the Prime Minister will carry out his intention of appointing such a committee.

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) asked a question the reply to which is really an answer to the whole discussion. He said, as I understood him, we could not have public ownership cocurrently with parliamentary control; I think that is a fair repetition of what he said. Now, if that is the case, it will be impossible for us to have public ownership, because we will not give up parliamentary control. I am not an enemy of public ownership; ever since I came to this House, and before, I have been attracted to public ownership. I have been seeking further light on the question and honestly and anxiously inquiring how the matter worked out in practice. I must frankly admit that until now nearly all the evidence that has been brought before me has been against public control and public operation of railways. But let me say this: we have to have control of railways, and that control has either to be responsible or irresponsible. I do not think that any member of this House will say for a moment that that control should be irresponsible. Then it must be responsible, and to whom? In the ultimate analysis, to the members of this House. And if you cannot have public ownership which involves ultimate responsibility to this House, then public ownership will have to be given up. After all, public ownership is merely a matter of expediency. It may be wise or it may be unwise; it may be advantageous or it may be disadvantageous, but the control of the expenditure of public money by this House is a matter of principle, the very basis of our parliamentary institutions and of our British constitutional practice.

The gentlemen who have spoken on the other side have been at great pains to point out the possible dangers of parliamentary control. They have set up the imaginary bogey that if this House inquires concerning different details of management the Canadian Pacific Railway company will catch on. I think I can say with a fair degree of assurance that nothing of substantial importance happens concerning any railroad in Canada or in the northern part of the United States of which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are ignorant. It is part of their business to know; I believe they know their business and are well advised as to what goes on with their competitors. After all, the operation of railways is not carried on in the dark, and it must be known what railways pay for their supplies just as the schedules are known upon which the trains are run. So far as rates are concerned they are fixed by a public board, and there is no possibility of one competitor hiding from another the details in that connection. But the point I wish to impress upon the House to-night is that the system of irresponsible control is one which may breed most unwholesome conditions in this country. I accuse no one of wrong-doing in the remarks which I propose to make to-night. But I say that the Government has placed the railways of this country in the hands of a small committee who are called directors but who are the creatures and nominees of the Government, and that a large number of these men are directors in companies which, if not selling to the railways, have in hand the goods to sell to the railways. I also wish to make this point, Mr. Speaker: these men are directors not only in the Canadian National Railways but also in such a number of other companies as to preclude their giving to the railways of the country that care and attention which the railway situation demands. Now, the other day the member for Essex (Mr. Kennedy) asked the following questions in the House.

1. What are the names of the gentlemen who compose the Board of Management of the Canadian National Railways?
2. What is the salary of each and what amount did each receive as expenses during the past year?
3. Are any of these gentlemen also directors of joint stock companies doing business in Canada?
4. If so, of what company or companies are they respectively directors?

To which the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) made the following replies:

1. D. B. Hanna, A. J. Mitchell, R. T. Riley, R. Hobson, Major G. A. Bell, Sir Hormisdas Laporte, Col. Thomas Cantley, A. P. Barnhill, E. R. Wood.
2. Director's fees, $2,000 each, and travelling expenses to and from their homes.
3. The Government has no information.
4. Answered by No. 3.

I would direct attention to the fact that the answer to number 2 was only a partial answer; the question, "what amount did each receive as expenses during the past year" was not answered, it being merely stated that they receive travelling expenses to and from their homes. Now, as a matter of elementary propriety and justice, the Canadian people, who are paying to Mr. Hanna $25,000 a year and to the other directors, who are not expected to give all their time to the consideration of railway matters, $2,000 a year and their travelling expenses, are entitled to know what other companies these directors are interested in, if for no other purpose than to know how far their attention is distracted from the railway problem which is in their special charge. As that information was withheld from the members of this House I examined the Financial Guide of 1920 and I discovered these facts, which I think, should be of interest to the House and perhaps of interest to the country. I find that Mr. D. B. Hanna, who, as I have said, receives $25,000 a year, if I mistake not, as manager of our Canadian National Railways, is also a director in the following companies: Canada Steamship Lines, Limited; Electrical Development Company of Canada, Limited; Canada Mortgage Investment Company; British-American Assurance Company; Western Assurance Company; Canadian North Prairie Lands Company; Brazilian Traction, Light and Power Company, Limited; Rio de Janeiro Light and Power Company; Sao Paulo Light and Power Company. He is also president of the Canada Flour Mills. Mr. A. J. Mitchell is a director in only one company, the Western Canada Flour Mills. Mr. R. T. Riley is interested as a director in but two companies. He is vice-president of the Union Bank of Canada and vice-president of the Great West Life Assurance Company. Mr. Robert Hobson is a director in the Bank of Hamilton; he is a director in the Canada Locomotive Company, Limited; he is president of the Steel Company of Canada, Limited; he is a director in the Tuckett Tobacco Company, Limited, in the North Star Oil and Refining Company, in the Chartered Trusts and Executor Company, in the British Empire Trust Company, in the Dominion Power and Transmission Company and in the Toronto General Trusts Corporation. Major G. A. Bell is, I understand, a civil servant, and so far as I can learn, he is a director in no company whatsoever. Sir Hormisdas Laporte is a director in the Credit Foncier Franco-Canadien, in the Société d'Administration Générale, in the Frontenac Breweries Limited and in La Sauvegarde Life Assurance Company.

Mr. CASGRAIN: He is president of Laporte-Martin, Limited.

Mr. POWER: What do they do?

Mr. McMASTER: They sell wholesale groceries in Montreal.

Mr. PARENT: They do not sell liquor, do they?

Mr. McMASTER: I do not know. They probably will not after the first of May. Col. Thomas Cantley is a director in the Eastern Car Company Limited, in Brandram-Henderson Paints and Varnishes and in the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company, Limited. Mr. A. P. Barnhill is a director in the Eastern Trusts Company, in James Pender and Company, Limited, in the St. John Iron Works, Limited, and in the Telegraph Publishing Company. He is president of the New Brunswick Electrical Company. He is president of the Acamac Land Company, Limited. He is a director in the Fenton Land and Building Company, in the Westfield Land Company, in the Times Publishing Company, and in the New Brunswick Realty Company. Last, but not least, in the number of directorships he holds is Mr. E. R. Wood, who is a director in the British American Assurance Company, a vice-president of the Canada Life Assurance Company, a director in the Western Assurance Company, a director in the Canadian Bank of Commerce. One would have thought that the connection between that bank and the late lamented Canadian Northern railway would have been sufficient to have made the Government believe it was inadvisable to have a director of that bank connected with the railway lines of this country. He is a director in the Barcelona Traction, Light and Power Company, Limited; he is vice-president of the Brazilian Traction, Light and Power Company, Limited; he is a director in the Rio de Janeiro Light and Power Company, in the Sao Paulo Tramway Light and Power Company, in the Mexico Tramways Company, in the Toronto Railway Company, in the Toronto Power Company, Limited, in the Toronto Electric Light Company, Limited, and in the Electrical Development Company of Canada, Limited. He is a vice-president of the National Trust Company and a director in the Dominion Securities Corporation, Limited.

The first point I want to make is that what we need in this country associated with our railways, if we are going to have this system of nominating a commission and calling them directors, is to see that those men are well paid and that they concentrate their minds upon railway problems. To have these men with all their diverse interests entrusted with this task is a very unwise thing for the country from that point of view. But there is another and, to my mind, a more serious aspect of the situation. As I have read the names of the different companies with which these different gentlemen are associated, I think hon. members will have noticed that there is hardly a requirement of any prime necessity needed by the railways which, if the management wishes, they cannot get from some company in which one of the directors is also a director. I do not know whether this has been done or not; I make no charges against any man without proof of wrong-doing under my hand; but I denounce in unmeasured terms the system such as exists here, because it is quite possible—I accuse no one because I have not the proof—that this forms a little family compact in which the interests of the railway are, perhaps,—I do not know—being sacrificed to the interests of these different companies. It may be perfectly true that Mr. Hanna, when he comes to consider and to advise the company as to the extension of a line in the Northwest, may remain absolutely uninfluenced by the fact that he is president of the Canadian North Prairie Lands Company. I do not know where those lands are situated; but if we found that a line of the Canadian National railways was being pushed towards those lands, would it not be reasonable for one to be a little suspicious that, in pushing the railway in that way, Mr. Hanna may have, perhaps, unconsciously been affected by the fact that in doing so he would help the Canada North Prairie Lands Company, in which he is a director? As regards locomotives, supposing the National Railways desire locomotives; it may be, for all I know to the contrary, possible that when the Canadian Locomotive company tenders to the National railways for the supply of locomotives, Mr. Hobson knows nothing about the matter at all; that he declines to be present at the meeting of the board where the tenders are opened, and that he does not convey to the Canada Locomotive company any information that he may have as to the price that the Canadian National Railways are willing to pay for the locomotives in question. He himself may be absolutely beyond reproach in this connection; but it is a mistake for the Government of Canada to have, as one of the directors of the Canadian National railways, a gentleman who is also a director of the Canadian Locomotive Company, Limited.

The same principle is in issue when we find that Mr. Robert Hobson is president of the Steel Company of Canada, Limited. If the National Railways should consider it advisable on part of their line to adopt oil-burning locomotives, Mr. Hobson is also a director of the North Star Oil and Refining Company.

Sir Hormisdas Laporte, if the railway supplies its own dining cars, in those parts of the country which are not bone-dry, with light beer to drink, may supply beer of the Frontenac Breweries, Limited, for all I know. I do not know whether he does or not.

Mr. POWER: He does.

Mr. McMASTER: My hon. friend says that he does. I am quite innocent of the information myself. As regards a request for cars, if the railway management want cars, they can, without going outside of the circle of directors, obtain cars from the Eastern Car Company, Limited, of which their director, Col. Thomas Cantley, is also a director. If they need paint to paint the cars, Brandram-Hennderson, Limited, will no doubt be willing to supply them. If they need coal the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company, of which Colonel Thomas Cantley is also a director, will no doubt be prepared to sell to them. As far as Mr. Barnhill's connection with the railway is concerned, I do not know that any companies with which he is connected would be in a position to sell to the Canadian National Railways, because they seem to be mostly publishing companies and land companies. As far as Mr. Wood is concerned, he is a director in such a number of companies that it would appear to be impossible for him to give any real care and attention to the work of the Canadian National Railway system. Now under these conditions is it fair that we should have any limited right of investigation? If Mr. Hobson, Colonel Cantley, and the other gentlemen whose names I have mentioned are high-minded gentlemen, and I have no reason to believe them otherwise, will they not gladly embrace the opportunity to come before this committee and to show that in their administration of the Canadian National Railways they have always considered, first, the interests of the railway, and secondly, the interests of the companies of which they are directors. But I say that a far better system would be the system which I have urged, without success, I am sorry to say, in this House before, to keep out not only from the Government these interlocking directorates, as I unsuccessfully attempted to do, but also from a department of Government such as this Canadian National Railways' directorate is. I fully appreciated, I trust, as a law student when I sat at the feet of the Minister of Justice, that old French law phrase "Donner et retiner ne vaut," which I might express in homely English as "To give and to withhold at the same time is not worth a continental."

We have had promises of large rights of investigation, but these have been whittled down and whittled down and shaved down by the Prime Minister until, as stated by him, and as commented upon by the Minister of Justice, we find that the committee which the Government are now willing to give is a committee to look into the question of what information should be given by the railways to such a committee, secondly, can such information be given, thirdly, what is the best method of giving this information, what is the best method of auditing, and for the investigation of what matters should the committee be appointed?

If a committee is to be appointed, and I frankly admit that there are certain advantages in the appointment of a committee, for a committee with the right to call witnesses and for papers could bring before it Mr. Hanna, Mr. E. R. Wood, and Colonel Cantley, in a way in which this House sitting in Committee of the Whole could not do, I say that nothing short of the fullest investigation will satisfy the members of this House who sit to your left, Mr. Speaker, and what is of a great deal more importance, will not satisfy the Canadian people whose money is being spent, and who are being heavily taxed. It must be a somewhat galling reflection to men in this country who are paying their income tax to remember that practically the whole, if not the whole, of what we raised for the year 1920 by the income tax will be absorbed by the deficit on the National Railways. We have adopted the system of public ownership, and we must give it a fair chance. Whether we wished to adopt it or not, the system has been adopted, and you cannot give public ownership in this country a fair chance unless the representatives of the people have access to full and complete information about all the operations under public ownership. You cannot give it a fair chance by leaving the control of your railway in the hands of men who have private interests which are not identical with the interests of the railway they are supposed to control and operate, and what we have to do in this House, and what the Liberal party will have to do in this country, is to create a public opnion which will say: We will get the best men that we can for this purpose, and we will see to it that they have no other interests to concern them except the public interest in regard to the railways of this country.

Mr. W. F. COCKSHUTT (Brantford): At this late hour I shall not detain the House more than five or ten minutes, I hope. The question that we are debating is perhaps the most serious one that this House will have to deal with during the present session. The country will be looking for the results of this discussion tomorrow, and I hope they will not be disappointed with the evidence that has been produced on the floor of the House as to the railway situation, and how it is to be amended. I for one have been considerably disappointed in the fact that very little light has been thrown on the situation by hon. gentlemen opposite who have criticized very severely the situation that exists at the present time.

I regret that the mover of the resolution (Mr. Maclean) is not in the House at the present time because I want to take exception to one or two things that he said. In the first place, he said that business men were no better than anybody else for a job like this, if as good. I do not know what his opinions of business men may be, nor where he got his information, but I venture to say that if the railway situation in this country can be improved, it will be improved by business men rather than by legal men, of which profession I understand my hon. friend is a member. The railway situation, above all, requires business management. I may say that I was pained to hear the report of the Minister of Railways some two weeks ago. I was bitterly disappointed at the result of the year's operations. I was one of the few in the House last session who asked for an increase of rates as a solution of the difficulty that then confronted us of a loss of $48,000,000 on the year's operations of the road. I thought at that time that an increase of rates, both passenger and freight, was due, and I urged on the minister on three different occasions, I think, that instead of throwing the matter open to the House as he did, he should make up his mind at once that an increase in rates was necessary in order to bring expenditure and income into line with one another. But that was not done until the autumn, when a very severe advance, something like 40 per cent, was made in the rates. I regret extremely that even after that increase of 40 per cent in rates, the difficulty was not by any means met. Instead of the railways showing an improvement as a result of that increase, a further deficit in operating expenses has taken place. I think that is extremely to be regretted. I am glad to see that the mover of the resolution has returned to the House.

As to the appointment of this committee, my hon. friend laid down several propositions with regard to what this committee should do, and what it should be. He said it should not be a large committee; I think he mentioned 25, if I remember rightly, but perhaps it was some other member. At all events, he said it must not be very large. He also said that boundaries should have something to do with the appointment. In other words, in selecting the members for that committee regard must be had to provinces. I want to tell the hon. gentleman that if he thinks he is going to run a national railway on provincial lines of that kind he is very much mistaken.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I did not say that at all.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: That is the way I got your words.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Nor did I say the committee was going to run the railways.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: You did not say it was going to run the railways, but you did say that in the selection of the committee, if I remember rightly, and I do not want to misinterpret you,—in any event, Hansard will show exactly what was said —provincial lines should be watched. In other words, I understood the hon. gentleman to say: "Don't pick out men in this House who, you may think, can investigate the railways satisfactorily, but see that every province in the Dominion of Canada gets some representation on that committee whether they are fitted for the job or not." That, at any rate, is the interpretation I place on the hon. gentleman's remarks, and it is far from my wish to misrepresent him. The hon. gentleman wants a lot of information brought out. Well, so far as I see, there is no objection to information being given. The Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), has told us that he stands up for the handing out of a large amount of information. But if my memory serves me rightly, in the old days, when my hon. friend sat on the other side of the House, as he is doing now, all matters of this kind were sent to the Public Accounts Committee; but when they got to that committee something happened. There was there what was known as the "blocking brigade"; some three or four self-constituted blockers saw to it that the information sought at that time by our side, who were in opposition, was not forthcoming. I think my hon. friend will recognize the term I have just used, and perhaps he knows some of the men who constituted that committee.

Mr. COPP: Give their names to the House.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: That is not necessary.

Mr. COPP: You had better give the names.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I do not think the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) wants them.

Mr. COPP: Well, then you might give them to me.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I was addressing my remarks more particularly to the hon. member for Halifax who says that he wants all kinds of information.

Mr. COPP: I think it would be well for you to give the names.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: It is not necessary; the men are well recognized, and they were well known to every one in the House at the time.

Mr. COPP: I was not here then and I should be glad to hear the names.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: You did not get into the House in time, but you had a man representing you here that could speak longer and with more volubility on branch lines than the hon. gentleman himself. I have known him to speak for five hours on the question of branch lines, so what would you do if he attempted to deal with main lines?

Mr. COPP: Did he not deal with main lines successfully?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: No, he did not deal with main lines, but branch lines. That gentleman, Mr. Emmerson, used to have a field day every year on branch lines, and certainly he branched out in great shape. Now, my hon. friend from Halifax, who is undertaking to solve this question, apparently thinks that it is possible for this House to constitute a committee that could receive information that could not well be handed to the House. If the committee is not able to do that, I cannot see what particular function it will have. It is perhaps well, as the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), has said that every dollar of expenditure should be investigated. I am not sure that that is not a sound business principle, and if it were possible it might be done even with regard to railways. But if that information is to be sought in order to feather arrows to be shot at political archery competitions, I do not think it would be wise. If that information is to be got in order to help us out of a difficult problem and make non-paying railways a paying enterprise, then by all means it should be granted. But I was considerably nettled to-night to hear the leader of the Opposition calling in such indignant tones for information, information, information!

Let me recall to my hon. friend's mind for a moment what occurred when these troubles were initiated. By whom were they started? Why are we in this country staggering like weary Titans under this burden? It is because my hon. friend and the hon. gentleman who led him at that time were in a government that launched railway schemes upon the country fifty years in advance of their time. They were told that hundreds of times in the House; they were told that information had not been obtained to warrant this country in building a transcontinental road. What was the reply of the hon. gentleman's leader at that time? "We have mountains of information." Well, what did those mountains of information lead to? They led to the building of what has proved to be the greatest white elephant in the way of railways ever seen in this world. It was known that it would be so, because this railway was projected for purely political purposes, and was never intended as a business proposition, from the time of its inception. It was launched as a political railway for the expenditure of vast sums of money in this country, money which, I say, was wrongfully diverted from the coffers of the country; and if there is any gentleman who should be gentle, and willing to show a little charity and a little confidence in those who are trying to undo this tangle, it is the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition and who, with his leader in the government of that time, shouldered on to the country vast expenditures not only on the Transcontinental, but on the Canadian Northern. When they put on that $35,000,000 of guarantee on the line traversing the north shore of lake Superior, they placed a heavy burden on the Dominion. And when they undertook to build the Grand Trunk Pacific, it was understood in the first place that it would cost $13,000,000, or at the utmost $60,000,000, and it actually cost $180,000,000. That was the second clamp they put upon the country. Now my hon. friend wants information. Well, I hope he is going to make better use of it than he and his friends did in the years 1903 and 1904, when they got mountains of information and built a railway of 1,800 miles in the wilderness that cannot be made to pay in our time by any board of directors, whether politically appointed or composed of the best business men you can get in this country.

I say we have 1,800 miles of railroad that cannot be made to pay, and it can easily be proved that no body of directors could make that piece of road pay. My hon. friend who leads the Agrarian party (Mr. Crerar) it is true, has a receipt all his own for making the national railways pay. I am sorry he is not here to-night to state it, but I have seen it several times in print, and it is worth while recalling to the House just what the hon. gentleman's proposition is. His proposition for making these roads pay is to recapitalize them. They have cost about one thousand million dollars up to date, but they are losing $70,000,000 on operation. Can any man in the Agrarian party or in any other party in this House, say how these railways are to be made to meet operating expenses by reduction in the capitalization? It cannot be done; and it is childish to suggest it. Whether you capitalize them at one thousand millions, or at one dollar, if they are running at a loss on operating expenses, recapitalization will do absolutely no good, and no one can seriously suggest such a thing. Now, what the country wants to know is what we as thinking men, are going to do to solve a very difficult and dangerous financial problem, and that is what I want to lend my attention to for a moment. In this respect I am somewhat inclined to agree for once with my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster). The hon. gentleman is not often right, and possibly he may be wrong now; but I really feel tempted to agree with him in this respect.

An hon. MEMBER: Do not do it.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: He says that the director of a big enterprise controlling some thousand million dollars of the people's money should be prepared to spend all his time, if necessary, in the public interest, in directing the expenditure of that money; and that is but reasonable. The board might be reduced to one-half, and should be comprised of the very best men that could be obtained. I would say that from the general manager down the best men possible should be secured. The general manager should have around him the most efficient staff that money could secure, and they should devote themselves soul and body to the problem of bringing this country out of the darknes and distress in which it is in connection with its railways. To that end, I believe that the policy which my hon. friend has stated with regard to the directorate might very well receive the consideration of the Minister of Railways. I do not want to criticise anything that has been done. It is easy to criticise when a difficult mess of this kind takes place, but I fear myself that the best results have not been obtained from the operation of these roads. If I were assured of the absolute necessity for it, I would willingly vote another $70,000,000 or more. The Government know the inward operations far better than I do, who sit on the outside and am acquainted with very little that is going on within, but they should consider very carefully indeed whether the Department of Railways and the management of the great railways now known as the Canadian National Railway system, are bringing the best results to the people of Canada which we can reasonably expect. If they are I say support them loyally, endorse heartily everything they do with a view to getting us out of the difficulties we are in. But Mr. Speaker, in order to make these railways pay we have, in my opinion, to have a different spirit not only in this House but amongst the people of the country as well—that is a spirit of loyalty to our own property. By constantly knocking our own property we are not going to build it up. We ought rather to try and boost it, and make helpful suggestions all along the line; we ought to encourage it in the way of traffic, in the way of passengers, and in every possible way that we can. Let us be loyal to our own property and see to it that the best results are obtained from this railway system.

If the committee be appointed, I hope, in order that it may serve a useful purpose, the Prime Minister will make it as wide in its scope as it is possible for it to be, and I believe he will. Because I think it is reasonable—at least as long as deficits occur—to think that the House will want to know what particular expenditures have gone to make up those deficits. I do think that is a proposition that ought to be carefully considered. If the Government were bringing down a seventy million surplus to us each year we might not ask them quite where they got it all; but if they come down with a seventy million odd deficit and ask us to vote the money then I do think that we, as custodians of the public funds should know whether that money is being wisely expended. And if this committee is appointed I think it will act reasonably; it will not unduly harass any department by asking for unnecessary returns, and it will not expect to get information that is going to result in any damage to these roads and that should not be given out. Every one that is a member of a private company knows that there is a very small amount of the expenditure laid before the annual meeting. Even as regards expenditure in lump sums, the company do not tell where they bought the supplies, or how much they paid for them. That is not the rule. That is the experience in the case of private companies and I am a member of quite a lot of them. I do not know any company which gives that information; and in the case of this great system we ought not to ask for unreasonable information. I do not believe that members if they want to do what is right and want to assist the country out of the deep difficulty in which it is at present, will harass in any way the administration of this great national enterprise. I hope it will be successful, because I think the success of Canada is largely bound up in it. There is nothing at the present time that gives this country more concern than its railway problem and its shipping problem. We are glad to know that our mercantile marine is paying its way and has a surplus even if it is only a small one and we hope the Government railways will soon be in the same position. So far as I am concerned I heartily desire to co-operate in every possible way in making our great national highway the success it ought to be.

Mr. FRANK S. CAHILL (Pontiac): I wish to say a few words on this all important subject of the Canadian National railways. I was much interested in the remarks which fell from the Minister of Finance when he was discussing the question of parliamentary control. It seems to me that until we solve the problem of getting the members of Parliament and the people of the country educated up to what parliamentary control and public management mean, we are going to be in difficulties as regards our railway problem. There are a great many members of the House who are keenly interested in public ownership and are strongly in favour of it, but apparently have given no thought whatever to the question of public management. I remember very well that in 1918 when this subject was under discussion in the House the Government were quoting whole pages from a certain railway report, of which the Minister of Finance was partly the author to suit their own purpose, and leaving other pages, that did not suit their designs, untouched. In the case of the minister particularly interested in the subject, I was convinced that he had not quite arrived at a sound conclusion as to what might or might not be government control, even after the amount of attention he had given to it. Now, to any man who has given any thought to the subject it goes without saying that it is impossible to get away from parliamentary control. By the very nature of our governmental institutions it is impossible to ignore parliamentary control unless you wish to hand the entire supervision of this enterprise over to irresponsible people—that is irresponsible as far as Parliament is concerned—and have no control whatever. You must have one thing or the other; you must have parliamentary control or no control. It is this choice that is confusing the people today. Which are we going to have? Are we to have no control or parliamentary control? Any company of gentlemen who are handling $300,000,000 of the peoples' money should be subject to some control—there should be some control over gentlemen who are handling that much public money. The Estimates provide for $165,000,000, and the railway system earns $125,000,000, making roughly an expenditure of $290,000,000 without allowing for any Supplementary Estimates. The gentlemen who have the control of our railways are, according to the Government, spending this money without restriction to the extent of $300,000,000. The people have come to realize that they have to deal with a serious problem; they have come to realize that first of all the Government and Parliament must take notice of this expenditure. They want to know what is the cause of the deficits. They want to know how these deficits can be eliminated, and the Government raiway system made to earn interest on the investment if possible. The Minister of Finance said this evening that you could not have members of Parliament asking about a station agent some place; but he will not say to me now that it is not legitimate for me to ask the Government why Parliament, through the irresponsible agency referred to, should expend millions of dollars on terminals at Halifax when these expenditures have never been approved by Parliament. The Government came down here and asked for a lump sum to take care of deficits. During the year they were engaged in spending $125,000,000 in any way they pleased, and I am of opinion they are spending a good part of it under the direction of the Minister of Railways. I do not believe that the Board of Management went to Halifax and entered upon an expenditure of several millions of dollars on that undertaking without first consulting the Minister of Railways. I believe that he was advised by the Minister of Railways and Canals.

Hon. Mr. REID: Might I ask the hon. gentleman what expenditures re refers to?

Mr. CAHILL: The expenditure referred to in the report of the Department of Railways and Canals.

Hon. Mr. REID: I might answer the hon. member in regard to that. Any expenditure on capital account I gave details of when the Estimates were going through, as to how and where it was to be expended. In so far as operating expenses are concerned, of course, they do not come before us.

Mr. CAHILL: I am not at all convinced that the minister would mind if I were to refuse to ask any more questions when his Estimates are before the committee, but if he will point out any place in his Estimates in previous years where he mentioned an investment on the Halifax terminals, I believe I would be almost willing to agree not to ask him any more questions on the subject of railways. I would do him that favour. That is one question, the question of contractors who are double-tracking and doing other work in connection with the railways, that comes under capital expenditure; there is no provision made for that in the Estimates except in lump sums such as the minister passed last year at half past two in the morning after delivering a number of speeches all day without giving any information whatever.

Now, the Government may say that it is up to the Opposition to ask for and get information. I think they are justified in saying that, for in my opinion it is the business of the Opposition to get information. But the Government have taken a great proportion of the expenditure of this country entirely out of parliamentary control. The Government come down here with a lump sum for deficits, and they give as little information as possible, and the money voted is spent in any way that the management may see fit, always bearing in mind that it has to co-operate with the Minister of Railways and Canals and his colleagues.

The minister came down and asked the members of this House for suggestions. We are willing to offer suggestions, we are willing to help solve the problem if that is possible; but before attempting to do that the minister will agree with me that the Government must lay their cards on the table, they must be fair to the people and not attempt to do what the Prime Minister has attempted to do to-day. The Prime Minister agreed as a final result of all this discussion, after promising for several days what he was going to do, to appoint a committee. The function of that committee would be to recommend to itself what it should recommend to Parliament, and what Parliament should in turn recommend back to the committee. That in plain language is what the minister said, that this committee would have absolutely no function at all. But if I am not mistaken the Minister of Marine and Fisheries intends to come down to-night to ask the committee to pass Estimates for a department so closely related to the Department of Railways and Canals that it is not going to give us any information. His department, too, is excluded from furnishing any information pertaining to its expenditure. My hon. friend has been taught some bad lessons by the Minister of Railways and Canals.

The Government should make up their minds as to what they are going to do about this question. It is all very well to ask the Opposition for constructive criticism, but, as I pointed out to the minister last year, we would be very foolish to offer suggestions to a Government that would bungle them. The Prime Minister laughs, but he knows that there never was a Government of this country better able to bungle things. He will not disagree with that surely. This Government has lost more money on railways in the last five years, including this year's deficit, than the total expenditure by all the governments of Canada since Confederation, including the cost of the Intercolonial, the Transcontinental and the Hudson Bay railways. The loss to-day amounts to about $200,000 per day, and my hon. friend's remedy is to appoint a committee to investigate and see what they can do. That is not a solution for the country. The Government must first make up their minds what they are going to do as to furnishing information, about how much they propose to give and how they propose to give it. It is useless to say, "We are going to shift this responsibility on to a committee,"—a committee that will have no responsibility to any person and will merely report. The Government must take responsibility, and if they refuse to give information here, that is for them to answer before the country. But to say that they can appoint a committee to manage our railways, and then to refuse to give the report of that committee to Parliament, is too absurd for the people of Canada to accept. My hon. friend tried to make out that they are afraid of political control. I will give them a way that will relieve them of a great deal of political control. Bring the whole proposition before the people's representatives, they who vote the money for the enterprise, give it the widest publicity possible, and then you will have no political patronage. If every person is acquainted with what is going on you will have nothing to conceal. Apparently the Government now feel they have something which they must keep back, and the people feel the same way. The Government have given them the lead and the people believe the Government—in this case; in most cases they do not.

The only plan to get away from political patronage is to give the widest possible publicity. Give the Opposition the facts and the information, and you are always protected. If you give the public full information the public may then be able to assist you to obtain better results. If the Government continue muddling along as the Minister of Railways does, the railway deficits in future will be very much greater than they have been. It is too serious a problem for the Government to treat so lightly by appointing a committee that they say will do something. It is for the Government to give information, and the time and place to give it is here and now.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member should have leave to withdraw his amendment?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker, have I a right to reply on the main motion?

Mr. SPEAKER: I think not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then I will ask leave of the House later.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the motion?

Mr. SPEAKER: That I do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Supply.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Civil Government—Marine and Fisheries—salaries, $360,810; contingencies, $68,870.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my right hon. friend if it is his wish to sit all night?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, not by any means. I do not wish to complain of the amount of time taken up in the discussion of railway matters, but I take this occasion to seek to impress on the committee the fact that this is the fifth day of April; that Supply has been called every day for several weeks, and that virtually no real business has been done. But on account of the railway question being up to-day, I do not think that I should ask the committee to sit longer to-night.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: In view of the lateness of the hour, then, I beg to move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES FOR 1921-22

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting Supplementary Estimates for the year ending March 31, 1922, was presented by Sir Henry Drayton (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the House, and referred to the Committee of Supply.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REFERENCE TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN: During the course of the discussion with regard to the Canadian National Railways, I promised that I would give notice to-night of a motion for the appointment of a committee. I am prepared to hand the motion in, in the regular way, but as in that case hon. members would have no chance to peruse it, I think it would be fairer, that I should read it to-night. In that connection I wish to say that the subjects here outlined are not given finally and conclusively as the subject to be under the review of the committee. In the course of my remarks, indeed, I said that such was not the case; necessarily the committee, in examining anything, will examine it with a view to determining its duties as committed to it. As regards the report that was referred to, it was on the table for many months and could have been referred to the appropriate committee at any time had anyone so asked. There is no objection to its being referred to this committee for all the purposes for which the committee is appointed. I say this merely by way of explanation of the motion of which I am giving notice. I give notice that I will move—the motion will appear in the Votes and Proceedings to-morrow:

That a Select Standing Committee on National Railways and Shipping be appointed for the present Session, and be instructed to inquire into the following questions:—

(1) What information as to operation of Canadian National Railways and Shipping as conducted by the Board of Directors and Management should, in the public interest, be brought down in Parliament on Question, Motion for production of papers, or otherwise,

(2) When, by what method, and under what conditions, if any, should such information be given, regard being had for the necessity of securing to Parliament and the Public all facts requisite for the determination of policy (including finance), and to the Board of Directors the best possible conditions and efficiency of management,

(3) What system of auditing should be adopted, and what extent of detail should be given in the Annual Report,

(4) Whether and for what purposes the said Committee should be continued, and that for the above purposes and for such other purposes as the Committee deem in the public interest there be referred to said Committee the Annual Report of the Board of Directors and that the said Committee have power to examine witnesses under oath to send for papers, persons, and records, and to report from time to time.

I am sorry to destroy the hopes of hon. gentlemen opposite.

An hon. MEMBER: What hopes?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hopes that they built all their speeches on to-night, namely, that they would be denied the examination of the report.

On the motion of Right Hon. Mr. Meighen for the adjournment of the House:

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What business will be taken up to-morrow?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The House will be moved into Committee of Supply on Labour and Railway Estimates; those are what we will take up first. There may be two or three Government orders that would be gone on with first, but not such as would likely be contentious. Notice was given to-day of a motion for interim supply, which, if the notice is sufficient will be gone on with.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When was that notice given?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This afternoon, I think.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not aware of it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would simply be handed in, I suppose.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend speaks of going on with the Estimates of the Railway Department to-morrow. Possibly the motion of which he has just given notice had better be disposed of before we go on with the Railway Estimates. We would like to know before we discuss those Estimates what information we are likely to get from this committee when it functions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not see the connection at the moment. However, I promised the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) that he would have an opportunity to-morrow to make some remarks—I do not know whether or not he has an amendment—in relation to labour matters; so I have on that account mentioned labour, and doubtless he will take advantage of the opportunity.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.50 a.m. Wednesday.

Wednesday, April 6, 1921.

The House met at Three o'clock.

SOLDIERS' RE-ESTABLISHMENT AND PENSIONS

Mr. HUME CRONYN (London) presented the second report of the Special Committee on pensions, insurance, and re-establishment of returned soldiers.

Mr. CRONYN: Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by Mr. MacNutt, that the second report of the Special Committee appointed to consider questions relating to pensions, insurance, and re-establishment of returned soldiers, which was presented this day, be concurred in.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must point out to the House that, in the absence of notice, this motion requires unanimous consent. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT TABLED

Report of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for the year ended September 30, 1920.—Hon. J. A. Calder.

GRAND TRUNK ARBITRATION—CORRESPONDENCE

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): I desire to lay on the Table a copy of correspondence between the Government and the Grand Trunk Railway Company relative to the question of the extension of the time for arbitration. I thought that even though the correspondence was not complete, it had arrived at a stage when it was proper that the House should know where the parties stood. I may add that just a few moments before three o'clock there came to me a further letter in the nature of legal argument, but I received it too late to include it in what I now submit. When it is possible to put further correspondence on the Table that letter will appear.

RESIGNATION OF SIR THOMAS WHITE

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received the resignation of the Right Honourable Sir Thomas White, K.C.M.G., as Member for the Electoral District of Leeds.

I accordingly issued my Warrant to the Chief Electoral Officer to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 57 (from the Senate), to amend the Post Office Act.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Explain.

Mr. DOHERTY: The Bill has already been passed by the Senate, and it is not customary to explain such Bills on their first reading in this House. Unfortunately, I have not a copy of it under my hand, but there are three clauses, the principal one of which provides for a system of insurance in connection with registered parcels. The other two provisions, I am satisfied, are of minor importance.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Have they anything to do with the payment of ferry men?

Mr. DOHERTY: I cannot remember. I understood the Bill was here, and it should be here, having been sent from the Senate.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I know it is not customary to delay the first reading of Senate Bills, but, Mr. Speaker, if my motion of the other day had been adopted, we should have the Postmaster General here to explain the nature of his Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is unusual for Senate Bills to be explained on their first reading in this House. They receive a first reading as a matter of courtesy and as a matter of course.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT BONDS

Hon. Mr. FIELDING:

1. What amount of Canadian bonds was purchased by the committee of bankers acting for the Government in each of the fiscal years 1919, 1920 and to the present time in 1921?
2. What amount, apart from interest, was paid in each year for bonds so purchased?
3. What amount of such bonds was disposed of in each year by the committee?
4. What amount, apart from interest, was received by the committee in each year as the proceeds of such sales?
5. What amount of such bonds remained in the hands of the committee when the committee's operations ceased?
6. What disposal was made of the bonds so remaining in the committee's hands?

Hon. Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1. The question asks for data covering "each fiscal year." Figures are not readily available in this form, but the following, summarizing the results of the two distinct periods of the committee's operations, substantially supplies the information desired:—

A. As to operations of committee from January 22, 1918, to January 20, 1919, when it was disbanded.

1. $70,329,050 (par value)
3. 64,549,400 (par value)
5. 5,779,650 (par value)

6. Taken over by Minister of Finance for sinking fund purposes at 99½ for 1922's and 99¾ for 1927's—ruling market prices.

2 and 4. After returning unsold bonds to the Department of Finance on the above-mentioned basis and crediting its accounts with interest earned by bonds on hand from time to time, the committee, whose accounts were audited and certified by chartered accountants, was able to show a surplus on operations of $124,088.64, after paying all expenses. No interest was charged in the committee's books on cash advances made by the Finance Department from time to time from surplus loan funds to enable it to carry on its operations and which amounted in the aggregate to $10,950,000.

B. As to operations of committee from August 26, 1919, when it was revived, to November 30, 1920, when it was again discontinued.

1. $299,206,650 (par value)

[Mr. Lemieux.]

2. $293,529,680.56.
3. $190,259,100 (par value)
4. $184,319,978.96.
5. $108,947,550 (par value)

6. Bonds of the par value of $19,719,250 being total accumulations of bonds of the taxable 1919 issue, have been placed in investors' hands since the committee wound up, leaving $89,228,300 held by Finance Department, all of which bonds are exempt from taxation and became available for sinking fund purposes.

The accounts of the committee covering this period of its operations were rendered in similar form to that of the first period, regularly audited and certified by chartered accountants. These accounts showed a surplus from operations of $714,253.88, after meeting all expenses. This result was arrived at after taking into consideration interest earned on bonds held, from November 24, 1919, to December 1, 1920, but disregarding any interest accruing after December 1, 1920, as well as interest amounting to $2,140,864.15 accruing on bonds to the par value of $34,972,750, which were purchased between August 26, 1919, and December 15, 1919, and especially segregated from the latter date, and after providing the sum of $1,160,308.94 to reduce book values of current account bonds to closing bid prices of the Toronto Stock Exchange on January 22, 1921. No interest was charged in the committee's books on cash advances made by the Finance Department from time to time to enable it to carry on its operations, and which amounted in the aggregate to $107,000,000. These advances were made from Victory Loan balances on hand.

VICTORY BONDS—EXPENSES

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough):

How much money was spent or liability incurred by the Government during the calendar year 1920 in stabilizing the Victory Bond Market.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

This question is fully covered by the answer just now submitted to the question asked by the honourable member for Queens and Shelburne; and I assume that, on that understanding, the honourable member (Mr. Sinclair) will permit his question to be dropped.

PRINTING BUREAU

ALLEGED DESTRUCTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS

*Mr. BROUILLARD:

1. Has Judge Snider made any report in connection with the inquiry into the destruction of Government property at the Printing Bureau?
2. If so, what is the date of the said report, what action has been taken thereon, and when will the report be laid on the table of the House?
3. When will Judge Snider finish his inquiry?

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: Stand.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Mr. Speaker, I notice that question No. 15 has been on the Order Paper for several weeks.

Mr. SPEAKER: If any hon. member desires to direct attention to unanswered questions he should do so on the Orders of the Day. It is irregular to call attention to unanswered questions while questions are being answered.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—CONDUCTORS AND BRAKEMEN DISCHARGED

Mr. DELISLE:

1. How many conductors and brakemen, employed on the Government Railway, from Quebec to O'Brien, have been discharged during 1920?

2. What are the names of said employees?

3. What was the reason for their dismissal? Were they granted a legal and impartial enquiry, as required by section 36 of rules entitled Rate of Pay and Rules, under the signature of F. P. Brady in behalf of the C.N.R.; M. G. Wilson in behalf of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, and M. Kelleher in behalf of the Order of Railroad Conductors?

4. What are the names of the spotters who made the case?

5. What was their occupation before they took up that work for the Government?

6. Were affidavits taken? If so, before whom were said affidavits sworn to?

7. Is it the intention of the Government to reinstate such employees?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. 7 conductors, 6 brakemen and 1 baggageman.

2. Names of conductors: Jos. Elias Albert, J. Esdras Benoit, J. Elz. Cleophas Cote, Ls. Phillippee Cloutier, L. Azavedo Dupont, Levi Jos. Jess, F. R. Plouffe.

Names of brakemen: Jos. Albert, Jos. Brochu, Romeo Fournier, Romeo Gagnon, Vic. R. Mulligan, Frs. Ls. St. Pierre.

Name of baggageman: Romeo Picher.

3. Conductors J. E. Benoit, J. E. Cleophas Cote, L. P. Cloutier, L. J. Jess were dismissed on account of irregularities in handling of cash fares. Conductor J. E. Albert was dismissed on account of conviction for theft of railway property. Conductor L. A. Dupont was dismissed on account of insubordination. Conductor F. R. Plouffe was dismissed for violation of Special Rule "E" of Timetable No. 2, resulting in rear end collision. Brakeman Jos. Albert was dismissed on account of conviction for theft of goods in possession of the Railway. Brakeman Jos. Brochu was dismissed on account of unsatisfactory services established by demerit marks. Brakeman R. Gagnon, Frs. Ls. St. Pierre and baggageman R. Picher were dismissed for violation of Rule "G" (intoxicating). All of these employees were granted full and proper investigation as required by rules of schedules with Brotherhoods covering such cases.

Brakeman R. Fournier was dropped from pay-roll on account of not having returned for duty within a year's time as required by Railway regulations. Brakeman Vic. R. Mulligan was dropped from pay-roll on account of leaving service and taking up employment elsewhere.

[Mr. Lemieux.]

4, 5 and 6. The management take the ground that it is not in the public interest to give names or occupations of persons who gave first information as to irregularities in handling cash fares.

One case is still under consideration but the management state they have no intention of changing the discipline administered in connection with the balance.

JUDGE WILSON

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Was Judge Wilson of the York and Sunbury County Court in the Province of New Brunswick superannuated by an Order in Council? If so, when?

2. Has any one been appointed to fill the vacancy? If so, when, If not, why not?

3. When was Judge Wilson notified of his superannuation, and by whom?

4. Who was recommended to fill the vacancy and by whom?

Hon. Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1. Yes, by Order in Council dated March 8, 1921.

2. No.

3. Letters Patent granting annuity to Judge Wilson transmitted to him by the Department of the Secretary of State on April 1, 1921.

4. The vacancy has not yet been filled.

BONUS TO LIGHTHOUSE KEEPERS

Mr. FAFARD:

Is it the intention of the Government to grant a bonus to lighthouse-keepers for the year 1920?

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE: The matter is under consideration.

CUSTOMS REVENUE BY PROVINCES

Mr. BUCHANAN:

1. What was the total amount of customs revenue collected in the province of Alberta, each year, during the past five years?

2. What is the present estimated population of Alberta?

3. What was the total amount of customs revenue during the same period, in the other provinces of the Dominion respectively?

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. GRIESBACH:

1. Has the Young Men's Christian Association associated with the Canadian Expeditionary Force in the great war submitted to the Government a statement of accounts showing all moneys received and expended by that body both by way of contribution from people in Canada and arising out of sales to Canadian troops?

2. If so, will he Government lay same upon the Table of the House?

3. If not, is it the intention of the Government to procure and distribute such a statement?

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PRODUCTION OF PAPERS

Mr. A. L. DESAULNIERS:

For a copy of all reports, petitions, letters, and other documents in conection with the removal of the postmaster at Pont St-Maurice, Champlain county.

DESTRUCTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS

JUDGE SNIDERS REPORT

On the Orders of the Day.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve and Gaspé): I wish to draw attention to the fact that question, No. 15, which has been on the Order Paper for three or four weeks, dealing with Judge Snider's report still remains unanswered although it deals with the matter of public importance. I understand that Judge Snider's report is in the hands of the Government.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): I do not wish to be considered discourteous by intervening at this juncture but we are unable at this end of the Chamber to hear anything of the doubtless very interesting proceedings which are at present going on. I would therefore urge my hon. friends sitting immediately to your right and left, Mr. Speaker, when they are discussing matters across the floor of the House to speak in a tone of voice which will be audible to us at this end of the Chamber so that we can glean some idea of what is being said.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): I am quite prepared to yield to my hon. friend's request, and I will do so on behalf of others as well as myself. As to the representation made by the hon. member for Maisonneuve I will make enquiries into the matter and let the hon. member know later.

PRIVATE BILLS

EXTENSION OF TIME

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (George Etienne Cartier): Inasmuch as the time for filing petitions for private Bills expired during the Easter recess I should like to know from the Chairman of the Standing Orders Committee if it is intended to recommend a further delay in order that those who proposed filing petitions for Bills immediately after Easter shall have an opportunity of doing so?

Mr. H. M. MOWAT (Parkdale): I understand the practice to be, when petitions for private Bills are not presented within six weeks from the opening of Parliament, that when the petition is presented Mr. Speaker calls attention to the fact that it is too late, and then any honourable member interested may move that the petition be referred to the Standing Committee on Standing Orders for consideration and report.

SUPPLY—MINISTER OF LABOUR AND THE NATIONAL CATHOLIC LABOUR UNIONS

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go again into Committee of Supply.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I desire to make some remarks concerning a matter which I deem to be of great importance. I had intended to discuss this matter when the Estimates of the Labour Department were considered in committee, but as I do not know when those Estimates will come before us, and as there is a campaign, being carried on in the press in the meantime, I think it my duty to present the facts with respect to this question now, and offer such comments as I consider necessary. I will first state the facts of the case as I know them to be, and then repeat the version of them as given in the press.

On March 23, a delegation of the Executive Officers of the National Labour

Union waited upon the Minister of Labour in order to present to him the resolutions which had been adopted at the annual convention of the union held last summer in the town of Chicoutimi. I was asked by the President of the National Union, to accompany the delegates and introduce them to the Minister of Labour and I did so gladly. At the time I did not know what was the tenor of the resolutions which were to be submitted to the head of the Department of Labour. Indeed a representative of the Canadian Associated Press asked me in the morning, a few hours before the interview took place, what was to be the programme and what the resolutions were and I told him that I did not know. The delegates duly waited on the minister who was accompanied by his deputy. Resolutions on the various subjects which had been dealt with at their convention were sumitted and, for the information of hon. members I will read the press reports showing what those subjects were. My part in the proceedings so far was rather to translate to the minister the remarks of those of the delegates who could not speak English, and to the delegates, the remarks of the minister, who could not speak French. One of the demands made was that in the representation on all the boards, commissions, or committees concerning labour upon which labour representatives are called to sit, the members of this Union—which has a membership of forty thousand working men —should be given a share according to their number as compared with the number of the workers who belong to other unions. I thought myself that this was a fair demand, but I was not there to advocate anything. The Minister of Labour stated that this demand could not be granted, and, for what purpose I do not know, started a violent onslaught on the union, the officers of which were present. The minister denounced the union telling its officers that their work was nefarious and very dangerous and that the other working men belonging to the International Unions would refuse to sit at a conference if the members of the National Unions were invited to it. The Minister of Labour asked me my opinion. Perhaps I would not have said anything if he had not invited me to state my view. I then said that I could not agree with him, or the argument he was employing—that those arguments could be brought forward to persuade or induce a working man to join the union of which the minister is a member, or to which he is favourable, rather than another union; but the moment there are two sections of organized labour, the moment two unions exist, neither the Minister of Labour, the Department of Labour, nor the Government of Canada, has any right to set one against the other; both must be dealt with fairly and impartially. I went so far as to tell the Minister of Labour then and there that I did not think he was fairly representing the members of the international unions when he stated that they would refuse to sit at a conference with the members of the national union. I know too well the fairness of the working men of Canada as a rule to believe that the members of any international unions would be so intolerant, and I stated that if there was intolerance somewhere surely it was not on the part of those who wanted to co-operate with their brothers of the international unions, but on the part of those who refused that co-operation.

As I desire to be absolutely fair and to simply state the facts, I will read what appeared in the press afterwards. The following morning the Canadian Associated Press, which was represented at the delegation, sent to all the newspapers the following despatch, which I take from the Ottawa Citizen of March 24:

> That racial and religious strife are the possible outcome of the growth of the Quebec Catholic labour movement was the warning conveyed by Hon. G. D. Robertson, Minister of Labour, to a deputation representing these organizations which met him yesterday.
> The deputation came to submit its programme of legislation which it drafted at a convention held by the Catholic unions at Chicoutimi, Quebec, and the item which provoked the minister's warning was a request that the Catholic unions be given representation in the building trades conference to be held in Ottawa on May 3 next.
> "Last year I pleaded with your organization," declared the minister to Abbé Fortin, who headed the labour men, "to proceed very carefully along the lines you have been following, for if it once gets in the mind of the people that in your province for a man to get along in his work he must accept a certain religious guidance, it will not be conducive to the improvement of relations between your province and other parts of the Dominion.
> Must be of Certain Faith
> "You have charged discrimination by the department against your union, yet you make it necessary for a member of your organization to be of a certain faith. What would be the result if the Methodists, say in Ontario, should band together and ask the employers to employ only Methodists? I am sure that not only would the Catholics, but the Protestants as well, would rise against such a movement."
> Abbé Fortin charged the department with recognizing only the international trade unions, despite the fact that Catholic Federated unions in Quebec numbered between 40,000 and 50,000 members. He urged that an equal consideration be given his organization, declaring that such is being done in practically every European country where Catholic, Socialistic and Protestant unions exist. He further contended that the labour section of the Peace Treaty made such provision.

Cannot Grant Request

Senator Robertson pointed out to the deputation that the Building Trades conference referred to had not been organized by the Government, but by members of the international unions and of the builders, consequently the minister could not dictate to either party that a third party should be admitted.

Furthermore, he explained, that the agreement of all nations subscribing to the Peace Treaty was that each country should recognize associations of employers and associations of labour which would give each class the greatest representation. In Canada, these organizations were respectively, the Canadian Manufacturers and the Dominion Trades and Labour Congress.

Ernest Lapointe, member for Quebec East, who introduced the deputation, protested against the decision of the minister in recognizing only the international unions.

Delegation's Requests

The requests of the deputation, in brief, were:

Federal aid to the shipbuilding industry.

Representation on all industrial commissions of inquiry.

That all official documents used in Quebec be printed in both languages.

Proportional representation in all elections, and that a commission be appointed to study this question and submit a report to the Government for its action.

Seizure of all undue war profits by the Governments.

Amendments to the Housing Act whereby money would be loaned at three per cent to individuals instead of the present rate of five per cent, and

The appointment of a public prosecutor to enforce the observance of all laws.

Reviews Requests

The minister briefly reviewed the requests stating that while he could not speak for the Government, he would give his personal views on some of the issues.

He did not see any likelihood of further subsidies to the shipbuilding industry. In this regard he declared that some 24 per cent of Britain's mercantile marine was now idle.

He then promised to submit the request for amendments to the Housing Act, although he observed that the money loaned at five per cent was borrowed by the Government at five and one-half per cent.

The deputation, which was introduced by Mr. Lapointe and Dr. Fontaine, M.P., Hull, consisted of Abbé Fortin, G. Hebert, president of the federation, A. Shields, A. Morin, Father Bonhomme and A. Myre.

The following day the press of Canada published an interview with Mr. Tom Moore, the president of the Trades and Labour Congress, endorsing the attitude of the Minister of Labour and asking that the National Labour Union should not be recognized by the Government. On the same day the Montreal Gazette published an editorial, to which the Minister of Labour later replied, and I intend to read his letter. This is the editorial:

SHOWING HIS HAND

The Minister of Labour, on Wednesday, received a deputation representing the National Catholic Labour movement in this province, whose members asked, among other things, that the organization be represented at the forthcoming conference of building trades representatives, to be held in Ottawa. The Catholic Federated Unions in Quebec, according to Abbé Fortin, a member of the deputation, has a membership of from forty to fifty thousand, and is therefore an important factor in the industrial life of this province. The Minister of Labour, the Hon. Gideon Robertson, appears to have adopted a very extraordinary attitude in dealing with this deputation. He seized the occasion to lecture the Union in regard to its religious complexion, saying that an impression that success in labour in Quebec was conditional upon holding a certain religious belief would not be conducive to improved relations between Quebec and other provinces. Then he proceeded to say that the coming conference was organized by the international unions and the builders, and that he could not dictate to either party for the purpose of admitting a third.

The Minister of Labour has, on a number of occasions, acted as if he were the Minister of Organized Labour; he now comes forward as the Minister of Organized Labour Internationally Affiliated. When provision was first made for the establishment of a Department of Labour in connection with the administration at Ottawa, such a situation as this was never contemplated; the idea and purpose was to create a department which would keep in touch with all classes of labour and would deal equally with all. Certainly it was never supposed that a Minister of Labour, in dealing with a labour body, would concern himself with the religious convictions of its members. The Catholic National Union in this province is none the less a labour organization because its membership is Catholic, nor is it the business of the Minister of Labour to dwell upon, or even consider, the religious belief of this labour body or of any other, Catholic or Protestant. The impression created, however, is that the minister's real objection to the Quebec unions is that they are national. Mr. Ernest Lapointe, who introduced the deputation, and Abbé Fortin, who headed it, seem to have been under no illusion in this respect. It was not the first time that these national unions had asked in vain for representation. The reasons for refusal vary, but the refusals do not. Moreover, the minister indicates clearly enough what is in his mind, and what his purpose is, when he emphasizes the fact that the building conference has been organized by builders and members of international unions. Is he not really concerned for the supremacy of the international organization? He says that all nations subscribing to the peace treaty have agreed to recognize associations giving each class (employers and labour) the greatest representation, and the labour organization in Canada, which conforms to this standard, is the Trades and Labour Congress. Here is internationalism again. There is nothing in the labour provisions of the peace treaty which authorizes more favourable treatment to one class of labour than to another; the whole spirit of the treaty is to the contrary, and if Canada, as a subscriber, has agreed to deal only with the Trades and Labour Congress, it is the first intimation that we have had of it. The people of Canada have never sanctioned any such injustice and will not do so. As to the building trade conference, it is being held under government auspices, if it is not actually government financed, and if the Minister of Labour desired to secure representation for the Catholic unions, nobody will believe that his efforts would be unsuccessful.

In the Montreal Gazette of Thursday, March 31, appears a letter signed by G. D. Robertson, Minister of Labour. This letter is very long, but I think in all fairness I should read it in its entirety. I am sure that the House will bear with me while I do so. It is as follows:

National Catholic Unions

To the Editor of The Gazette:

Sir,—In your issue of March 24, 1921, and editorial appeared entitled "Showing His Hand" which charges the Minister of Labour with being the "Minister of Organized Labour Internationally Affiliated," which charge you base upon his statement to the National Catholic Union that he could not undertake to force the Federal Builders' Association and the Federal Building Trades Council who are holding a conference in Ottawa on May 3rd next, to recognize National Catholic Union delegates.

Your implied support to the impossible position taken by Mr. E. Lapointe (Quebec East) indicates utter ignorance of the facts, or else an endorsation of the National Catholic Union principles and policies. It is, therefore, proposed to relate some facts concerning International Trade Unions; the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, and what it represents; the National Catholic Unions, and the policy and attitude of the Department of Labour toward each.

For forty years past craft organizations of workmen, with members in both the United States and Canada, have existed. They are known as International Trade Unions. Every person engaged in a particular trade or craft is eligible for membership, subject to certain requirements as to moral character, sobriety, etc. Catholic and Protestant alike enjoy equal rights and privileges. The constitutions provide that neither religious nor political affiliations shall affect in any way a workman's eligibility to membership. Many of the constitutions specifically forbid the discussion of religious or political questions within the union. Briefly stated, every workman has and should have equal rights and voice in the industrial field. Neither religious nor political affiliations should be a recommendation or a bar to obtaining employment.

To these principles the Minister of Labour heartily subscribes. Mr. Lapointe does not; does the Montreal Gazette?

The Trades and Labour Congress of Canada is and has for years, both by past and present Governements, been the recognized legislative mouthpiece of labour in Canada. It does not—as your paper has frequently asserted—represent Trades Unions only; neither does it speak for all the International Unions, a number of whom maintain their own legislative representatives. There are over 70,000 railway employees in Canada members of International Trade Unions who are not represented through the congress, including the organization of which the undersigned has for twenty-five years been a member. Therefore your oft-repeated inference, i.e., that the Minister of Labour was guided by the wishes of the Trade Congress, is obviously not a fact nor a near approach thereto.

The Trades Congress does, however, speak for many labour bodies that are not International in character, but purely local and purely Canadian, as the following facts will verify. At the Hamilton convention of the Congress, held in September, 1920, the 929 delegates present represented about 280,000 workers—232 came from the province of Quebec—five of these delegates represented five International Unions—nine represented four trade councils—218 represented 101 local unions in that province. These delegates represented 88,949 organized workers in that province, a large portion of which are Roman Catholics. The senior vice-president of the Congress is a Roman Catholic, resident in Montreal. Like the International Unions the Congress stands for equality among all workers, so far as their rights and privileges within their respective organizations are concerned, and also in their opportunities for employment regardless of religious or political affiliation of the individual. Both the International Unions and the Trades Congress are in accord with the principles laid down in the pastoral letter circulated in September, 1918 by the archbishops and bishops of the United States, signed by the late respected and lamented Cardinal Gibbons of Baltimore, Md. Except in Quebec, throughout all North America, Catholics and Protestants alike, other citizens as well as workmen, endorse the principles giving equal right to all, and everywhere—except in Quebec—millions of workmen, representing every shade of religious opinion, are able to work together in harmony.

To the universal application of these principles the present Minister of Labor subscribes. Mr. Lapointe does not—does the Montreal Gazette?

The National Catholic Union movement began at the city of Three Rivers in 1911, extending to Chicoutimi in 1912 and 1913. The published report on the subject, dated 1913, reads in part as follows:

"The object of the organization is the protection and development of the religious, social and economic interests of its members. The association is essentially Catholic and professes its belief in and entire submission to the instruction and direction of that Church. The qualifications for membership require a candidate to observe the Catholic faith, to be of not less than 16 years of age, and not connected with an International Union. There are both active and honorary members. The affairs are administered by an executive committee chosen by the council of direction. There is to be a general chaplain named by the Ordinary of the diocese. Each local branch also has a chaplain named by the Ordinary of the district. The constitution provides for small death and permanent incapacity benefits provided the member's marriage was legally contracted under the rites of the Catholic Church."

There were at that time nine branches, with a membership of 1,567. At that date there were in the province of Quebec 37,928 organized workmen adhering to the principle of absolute equality referred to in a preceding paragraph.

By 1919 troubles had occurred in certain localities, because of discrimination against Protestants and Catholic workmen members of other trade unions. An attempt was made to minimize this difficulty by passing the following resolution, at at Three Rivers convention of September, 1919:

"(Resolution 19) Whereas certain rumors have circulated that the National Catholic Unions do not protect Protestant workmen in labor matters, this convention allows the adoption of a resolution protesting against such a statement and energetically states that it has protected and is still protecting Protestant workmen in all labor matters by issuing to them an adjunct membership card which guarantees to them all the protection they need."

Investigation shows that this adjunct membership card permitted the holder to pay dues but debarred him from any voting power in the Union.

Perusal of the constitutions reveals some interesting facts. That of the Catholic Union of the Quebec Printing and Book Binding Workers may be of interest to the Montreal Gazette. It reads in part as follows:—

"Chapter 1, Article 1:—

"There is founded in the city of Quebec between the Catholic workers following the printing and book binding trades, an organization which shall be designated as follows: The Catholic Union of the Quebec Printing and Book Binding Workers.

"Art. 2. The Union has for its immediate object the study, protection and development of the professional interests of its members; but it subordinates this proximate object to the exigencies of the superior interests of souls, society and religion.

"Art. 3. Because it is a Catholic labour organization, the Catholic Union of the Quebec Printing and Book Binding Workers;

"(a) Shall affiliate with the Action Sociale Catholique;

"It shall secure from it, after filling the usual conditions and upon presentation of its statutes and by-laws, a special diploma which shall be the warranty of the Catholicism of the Union;

"Said diploma may be cancelled or revoked in case the Union should cease to fulfil the conditions required for its affiliation;

"(b) It shall admit among its members Catholic workers only;

"(c) It shall have a Chaplain;

"(d) It shall remember,

"1.—That all human acts, those of groups as well as those of individuals, are subjected to the tribunal of conscience;

"2.—That justice and Christian charity are the two supreme mannitory rules or relations between employers and workmen;

(e). Recognizing that the Church alone has the right and is qualified to say where, in the so-called labour questions, is the true and the false, the just and the unjust, the good and the bad, what is permissible and what is not, the C.U. of P. and B.W. will comply entirely and conscientiously, in the pursuit of its object, with the teaching and instructions of the religious authority.

"(f). In order to still shows its character as a Catholic Union the C.U. of P. and B.W.

"(a) Puts itself under the protection of St. Joseph.

"(b) It shall cause to be celebrated every year, on the Feast Day of its Holy Patron Saint, a solemn mass with a sermon, all members endeavouring to attend and receive Holy Communion.

"(c) When a member dies the Union shall cause to be celebrated in the Church where the funeral takes place a high mass for the repose of the Brother's soul and shall be represented at said mass by at least two of its members.

"Chapter II.—Membership, admission and exclusion.

"Art. 4. The Catholic Union of Printing and Book Binding Workers of Quebec is composed of an unlimited number of members;

"Art. 5. To become a member of the C.U. of P. and B.W. one must:

"1.—Be an active Catholic.

"2.—Be at least 18 years old; follow (as linotype machine operator, case worker, pressman, feeder, binder, finisher and ruler) the printing or book binding trade since at least five years, or that of stereotyper since at least three years and hold a certificate of competency (as journeyman) delivered by the Union itself.

"All those who, being 16 years old have followed the printing or book binding trade for at least two years, may also be members of the Union, but as apprentices and without having any right to vote at meetings, if they otherwise fulfil the other conditions of admission.

"3.—Belong to no secret society or any organization the principles, tendencies and spirit of which do not agree with those of the union.

"Chapter III.—Executive Committee, Council, General Assembly.

"Art. 8. The Union is directed and administered by an Executive Committee, a Council, and a General Assembly of members.

"Art. 9. The executive committee is composed of the President, Vice-President—or in his absence the Assistant Secretary and the Treasurer of the Union, elected in February of each year and re-eligible at the expiration of their term of office, by the General Assembly of members of the Union, and the Chaplain of the Union, appointed by His Grace the Archbishop of Quebec.

"11. The Executive Committee is directed to administer the property of the Union, to dispatch daily and routine business, and to carry out the decision of the General Assembly, to the direction of which it remains subject and to which it gives an account of its operations and conduct. It is its duty to call regular meetings, or, if need be, special meetings of the Council and General Assembly and to settle itself all matters relating to such calls.

"III.—The Executive Committee meets once a week at the place, date and hour fixed by itself. As to special meetings of the General Assembly the President of the Union shall call them if four members of the Union request him in writing to do so.

"Art. 10. The Council is composed of the members of the Executive Committee and three Councillors elected in February of each year, and re-eligible at the expiration of their term of office by the General Assembly of members.

"The Council has all the powers necessary for the direction of the management of the affairs of the Union in particular:

"It admits, refuses, or excludes members, after consulting the General Assembly.

"It settles all matters in connection with the enforcement of the by-laws of the Union and the putting into practice of the principles which the Union recognizes as governing its action.

"Art 12. The Chaplain is appointed by His Grace the Archbishop of Quebec. He is a member of the Executive Committee, Council, and General Assembly. He takes part in all debates but does not vote. He may, however, require that any resolution be submitted to the Archbishop of Quebec and approved by him before taking effect, and any resolution adopted during his absence must be communicated to him before being carried out."

The apprenticeship by-laws provide that:

"1. The selection of apprentices belongs to the employer, and no one shall be allowed, without his consent, to work in printing and book binding shops;

"2. All apprentices shall be at least 14 years of age and must have shown a sufficient knowledge of the French language to the satisfaction of both the employer and the union."

The foregoing clearly shows that the purpose is Church control of an organization of industrial workers. Note that no resolution can pass or be adopted without the chaplain's consent, who will in turn—if he is in doubt—submit same to the bishop, whose decision is final, regardless of the wishes of the membership. Note too that apprenticeship is required, and that the applicant must have the endorsation of the union as to his ability to speak French. No Protestant, and no Catholic connected with any other organization of workmen is eligible for membership. Why? Obviously because they cannot be satisfactorily controlled by the Church authorities.

May I relate just two instances of how the application of the National Catholic Union principles work out. During 1919 the Department of Labour received a complaint that it was difficult, if not impossible, for any but National Catholic Union members to get employment in the Davies shipyards at Lauzon. It was also observed that the dry dock operated by that company was built with public money and protested vigorously against Protestant or Catholics, not members of the National Catholic Union, being debarred from employment. On February 23rd, 1920, a French-Canadian Catholic filed complaint that two painters, members of the International Painters' Union, working on the Drill Hall at Quebec City, were dismissed by the contractors because they would not join the National Catholic Union. The complaint stated this was the second instance of discrimination against them. Briefly stated, the conflict arises because of the determination of Church authorities to autocratically control industry and industrial workers, discriminating against those who do not bow to their dictation.

To such a policy the present Minister of Labour will never subscribe; Mr. Lapointe does; does The Montreal Gazette?

Finally, your paper supports Mr. Lapointe in his endorsation of the National Catholic Union request for representation at the conference of the National Industrial Council of building employers and workmen. I wonder why?

The Dominion Association of Building Contractors and the trade unions representing the building trades in Canada, did, in 1919, lay the foundation for active co-operation between employer and employee in that important industry. They have established local industrial councils in several large cities with a central or appeal court to which local disputes unadjusted may be referred. On the Central Council each interest has equal representation, but no chairman. Both interests asked the Department of Labour for its co-operation in providing an official of the department to act as convenor of and preside at the central council meetings, but without any voting power, his advice on questions under consideration being solicited by both. The development of the Co-operative Industrial Council idea is growing and the object of the conference on May 3rd is to encourage it among those who have found it possible to work together in harmony. The delegates are being invited upon the nomination of the employers' and workmen's respective organizations. The National Catholic Union delegates would be gladly invited if the consent of the parties participating were obtained, but instead of approaching them the National Catholic Union make a demand on the Labour Department to force representation for them, which request was declined. Why did the National Catholic Union make this request instead of seeking to co-operate with the two parties interested? One reason is because in January 1919, it issued a statement from Quebec, which reads in part as follows:

"The National Central Trades Council of the District of Quebec assumes it its duty, under the present circumstances, to make the following statements:

"1. This Council represents in Quebec the national and Catholic labour movement. It voluntarily assumes responsibility for its own decisions and measures, but it has nothing to do with other labour groups whose principles, claims and programmes are not entirely its own.

"The National Central Trades Council of the District of Quebec is, moreover, absolutely a stranger to all the doings of the 'Labour party' of the Province of Quebec, and has no relation whatever with either the 'Trades and Labour Congress of Canada' or the Trades and Labour Council of Montreal.

"The National Central Trades Council of the District of Quebec is autonomous, of a national spirit, distinctly Catholic."

Having voluntarily cut themselves off from intercourse with all other labour bodies, knowing the impossibility of securing any recognition or co-operation from them, the National Catholic Union now demands that the Department of Labour force their unwelcome presence upon this conference, the only possible effect of which would be to destroy its usefulness. They knew the department could not lend itself to such a proposal, therefore a good opportunity presented itself for Mr. Lapointe to endorse a project calculated to provoke discord and, at the same time, blame the Government for it, and you lent the support of your paper to the trick.

I hope you will give this letter the same publicity as your editorial received.

G. D. ROBERTSON,
Minister of Labour.

Ottawa, March 27, 1921.

Mr. EDWARDS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am glad to see that the Minister of Labour has at least the support of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards).

Mr. EDWARDS: He has.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The Montreal Gazette of the same day published the following editorial:

There appears elsewhere in this issue a letter from the Minister of Labour. On March 24th, The Gazette criticised the action of the minister in dealing with the request of the National Catholic Union for representation at the approaching conference which is to be held at Ottawa between employers and employees in the building trades, and the letter purports to be an answer to that criticism. The minister asks that full publicity be given to it and, without pretending to understand his desire in that respect, we are acceding to his request. We are even prepared to go farther and would direct the attention of our readers to the letter, to its substance, its spirit, and its purpose; and we ask them to take seriously into their consideration the immeasurably harmful effects which must inevitably follow if the Minister of Labour is permitted by his colleagues to persist in the course which he has adopted. The point of our criticism was, and is this, that the National Catholic Unions represent an important industrial element in this province, that they went to Ottawa, as a labour organization seeking admission to a labour conference, that the Minister of Labour declined to interest himself in their request, and that, in refusing, he attacked the National Catholic Union on the ground of its religious complexion. If any ground for such criticism were lacking, the letter now published supplies it. We have now, over the signature of the Minister of Labour, "the policy and attitude of the Department of Labour" toward the National Catholic Unions of this province. The "policy and attitude of the Department of Labour" are the policy and attitude of the Prime Minister and the Government, unless and until repudiated by the Government.

Senator Robertson states that the Trades and Labour Congress has for years been the "recognized legislative mouthpiece of labour in Canada." by which, presumably, he means of organized labour, the class alone to which his attention appears to be given. That this Congress does not represent international unions only, is not in dispute and, with all respect to the minister, has not been disputed. Neither is it of any importance to know that some non-affiliated unions send delegates to the Congress. The tail does not wag the dog, and certainly so small a tail as that to which the minister alludes, could not be expected to resist the international leanings of the Trades Congress. Neither is it of any consequence, though the minister appears to think otherwise, that some international organizations, such as that of which he has been for twenty-five years a member, are not represented through the Congress, and the most painstaking examination of this fact fails to clarify the argument of the minister that "therefore" he is not guided by the Trades and Labour Congress, previously identified by him as "the recognized legislative mouthpiece of labour in Canada."

"Briefly stated," says the Minister of Labour, "every workman has and should have equal rights and voice in the industrial field." That has been our contention. "Neither religious nor political affiliations should be a recommendation or a bar to obtaining employment." That, again, is a sound principle; but why does not the Minister of Labour act upon it? He claims it to be the rule of international organizations and of the Trades Congress of Canada, but as to the latter, there is the explanatory addition "so far as their rights and privileges within their respective organizations are concerned, and also in their opportunities for employment, regardless of religious or political affiliation of the individual." If organized labour, as understood and represented by the Minister of Labour, accepts the principle of equal rights, as he says it does, irrespective of religious differences, why the exclusion of the National Catholic Unions from the Builders' Conference and why the attack upon these unions because of their Catholicism? Perhaps the answer to that question will appear.

The minister in his letter, is at pains to prove what does not require proof, namely, that the National Catholic Unions are Catholic. Have they not the right to be, and is the Dominion Government, through the Minister of Labour, to say that they have no such right? Are their members any the less industrious and efficient workmen, and is not industry and efficiency in labour the title to those equal rights of which the minister speaks? The minister charges these unions with having, in certain instances, discriminated against non-Catholic workmen, and in this he takes issue with the statements of the unions concerned. Discrimination upon grounds other than those of industry and efficiency is bad; but the evidence which the minister cites against the National Catholic Unions, in that respect, consists more of complaints than of conclusions and is not satisfying. On the other hand, the industrial record of Quebec where these unions are strongest, has been the envy and admiration of other parts of Canada where the actions and objects of organized labour enjoy the approval of the Minister of Labour.

All this, however, tells but a part of the story. The minister goes very far upon his dangerous road, and complains that the Catholic Unions are under clerical control. He offers a set of union rules as showing "that the purpose is church control of an organization of industrial workers" and he proceeds: "Briefly stated, the conflict arises because of the determination of Church authorities to autocratically control industry and industrial workers, discriminating against those who do not bow to their dictation. To such a policy the Minister of Labour will never subscribe." Here the Minister of Labour gets out into the open. He is opposed to the National Catholic Unions because, being Catholic, they acknowledge clerical authority in union matters because, as he says, they have cut themselves off from other organizations, because, as they say, they are "autonomous, of a national spirit, distinctly Catholic."

The desirability of clerical control in labour matters may, as a principle, be debatable; but, as between clerical control in Quebec, and the control of foreign office-holders or of their Canadian representatives, the choice is not difficult to make. The proof of the pudding is in the eating and the industrial record of Quebec, despite this "autocratic control of industry" by the church, or because of it, compares very favorably with that of other provinces. So good a judge of conditions as Sir Frederick Williams-Taylor, no later than Tuesday, described Quebec as the "home of the most peaceful, contented and productive population in the Dominion."

The minister will not pretend that it was not in his power to have granted the request of the National Catholic Unions regarding representation at the Builders' Conference. He taiks loosely of a "demand" that the department "force their unwelcome presence upon this conference" and, finally, goes the length of suggesting that the whole thing was a political plant by opponents of the Government. This fantastic proposition calls for no comment. If it were put forward seriously, why was not the "trick" treated as such at the time, and what was the occasion for the attack upon the catholicity of the National Catholic Unions? That attack was made and has been repeated by the Minister of Labour as minister, and the Government should either repudiate it or take the responsibility for it.

When this letter and that article appeared in the Gazette, I referred to the matter in the House, and as I wish to quote exactly the facts of the matter, I quote here what I then said:

Mr. LAPOINTE: Before you proceed with this item, Sir, the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) said last night that he intended to proceed with the Estimates of the Labour Department to-day. The Estimates of that department have not been taken up previously, and I will object to their being proceeded with to-day. Before we proceed with the Estimates of the Labour Department, I have a few remarks to make about the hon. gentleman who presides over that department and about certain matters concerning it.

Then there was a meeting of the trades council in Ottawa, at which Mr. Moore, the president of the Trades and Labour Congress, and Mr. P. M. Draper, of that association, delivered speeches. The report of this meeting appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of April 2, 1921. I shall quote only a few words of what Mr. Moore said:

Attempted Supercession

"As long as the leaders of that movement confined their operations to their own province, we were not interested," said Tom Moore, "but we find that the National Catholic Union seeks to supersede the International Trades Union at the Dominion Industrial Conference. It attempted to do this a year ago, and is again renewing the attempt. To the everlasting credit of the Hon. Senator Gideon Robertson, Minister of Labour, he has held that religion shall not be mixed up with the labour movement. Because of this Mr. Lapointe, the member for Kamouraska, has announced his intention of taking the Minister of Labour to task on the floor of Parliament, and has said that he will challenge the Estimates of the Labour Department, in order to hold up the appropriation for the industrial conference, and force the Government to recede from the stand it has taken on this question."

Mr. P. M. Draper spoke as follows:

"Politicians have been guilty in the past of dividing our people on religious grounds in order to attain the seats of the mighty, but we don't want any of this kind of thing in our movement. We must send good men speaking both languages through Quebec to show them the issue underlying this dangerous movement, and I think when they understand they will tell their clergy, "You had better confine your attentions to our spiritual affairs, and leave us to look after our own business.' "

At that meeting a resolution was passed, a copy of which was sent to the members of the districts surrounding the city of Ottawa. I shall read one of its clauses:

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Whereas this Trades Council, appreciating the danger to the International Trade Union movement and the organized workers of this country, should the Minister of Labour be overruled in his correct attitude to the non-recognition of any factional or religious movement in coming Building Trades Conference or any other Government committee or commission—

Therefore this Council declares its full commendation of the position taken by the Minister of Labour, etc.

In justice to the National Labour Unions, I desire to read a very short interview given by one of its officers, which appeared in all the Canadian newspapers yesterday. It was dispatched by the Canadian Associated Press and reads in part:

Quebec, April 3.—The National Catholic Unions have known for a long time the sentiments of the Minister of Labour towards them, but they wished to ascertain the reasons for his attitude, said Abbe M. Fortin, general almoner of the unions, in an interview to-day. "The minister made known the reasons for his attitude at the interview we recently had with him in Ottawa and in his letter published in the press," added the abbe.

"The Minister of Labour continues to mix into matters that do not concern him," he continued. "Instead of giving a serious answer to the demands made by us at Ottawa he persists in entering into a discussion of a question, which as minister of the crown he should leave alone.

"We did not go to Ottawa to ask the minister's approbation for our unions and we do not see the necessity of knowing whether or not the principles of the National Catholic Unions please him or not. As Minister of Labour he has only to enquire whether or not our unions menace the public interest. He has, however, carefully avoided putting such a question as, during the past five years, the National Catholic Unions have been the ones which have contributed most to the maintenance of public order."

Refering to Senator Robertson's contention in his letter to the press that the church through the priests attached to the unions controlled the deliberations and policies of the unions Abbe Fortin said that the function of the almoners was to prevent the workers in the course of their deliberations, from breaking the doctrines of the church. "The Catholic workers like the others," he added, "deliberate freely and make whatever decisions seem good to them. The function of the almoners is that of councillors and not controllers."

My comments, Mr. Speaker, shall be few. I am not a member either of the National or of the International Labour Union. I am a friend of labour, especially of organized labour, and have endeavoured in my public career to acquaint myself with the various labour problems and the claims of labour, and the remarks I intend to make shall be imbued with a spirit of goodwill for the cause and the interests of labour. The argument I desire to offer I shall try to base entirely upon principles of justice and fairness, upon principles which must appeal to all men irrespective of their creeds, their opinions, and their personal differences, and even to those belonging to either of the two labour bodies which are the cause of the present difficulty. We have in Canada a Department of Labour that was created by legislation of this Parliament about fifteen years ago. (My hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) informs me that it is twenty years ago.) The duties and the work of the Department of Labour are prescribed by various statutes of this country. The department must work in such a manner as will ensure peace in the field of industrial activity. In various statutes relating to the department is a reference to unions and trade unions, and I may refer especially to the Industrial Disputes Act, which provides that when either the employer or a labour or trades union appeals to the minister regarding labour difficulties, a board of arbitration shall be appointed to settle the question at issue. The Minister of Labour is entrusted with the high and important duty of assisting in the maintenance of industrial peace in this country, and he must see that there is harmony as between employers and employees as well as among employees themselves. The very nature of his functions obliges him to be fair and impartial in his dealings with all sections of labour. If,—owing to lack of vision, narrowness of mind, bias, or otherwise,—he cannot be fair and impartial, his usefulness is gone and he is only a cause of trouble and discontent. When reference is made, in the statutes that I have just quoted, to "Labour Union" it is never said that it must be an International Union. It is not specified what sort of a union it has to be in order to get recognition from the Government or the Department of Labour. In none of these statutes can you see any proviso that such union has to be affiliated with the Trades and Labour Congress, or whether it has to recognize the jurisdiction of the American Federation of Labour. I do not wish to express any preference as regards the International Union to which the Minister of Labour belongs, or the National Unions which he has fulminated against. Both organizations have a valuable and most important work to perform, both have a large field of activity, both have the right to existence and recognition; and I shall not fall into the mistake which has been committed by the Minister of Labour of assailing or abusing either of these two labour bodies. I shall willingly go as far as to admit that personally the Minister of Labour is quite entitled to prefer the International Union to the other; but I say that in his public capacity, acting as the head of the Department of Labour, he has no right to discriminate against either union and to refuse to give it, in all his dealings with labour, proper and effective recognition, proportionate to its membership. Freedom of association is not a privilege which any Minister of Labour can destroy. Trade unionism is a natural and normal development in the field of industry. The working man when left alone, struggling single handed and individually, was in a painful state of inferiority in dealings with the industrial owner. He was frequently forced, on account of his weakness, to accept unfair conditions and unjust terms. Trades unionism has raised the standard of labour. Its aims are to realize for the working man a higher scale. It attempts to improve not only the material but also the moral, social and spiritual conditions of the members who compose it. It works not merely for the sake of mere life, it exists for the sake of good life. It is, indeed, a sort of mutual insurance body working for the betterment of the social and moral as well as the material conditions of the working man.

Now, Sir, in the realization of that ideal there are people who believe that religion has an important part to play. Others think that religion should be wholly ignored by, and excluded from, all that concerns labour associations. Some people believe that religion is a force in determining sociological work; that it is religious spirit which, more than anything else, teaches a man that his service must not only be for himself but for humanity—that he must view problems and difficulties in more than material aspects. They believe that religion and sociology are co-forces working in harmony both determining the destiny of man, and surely it is not a crime to believe in such association. Others believe that all labour unions should be absolutely neutral and purely business associations, and that they will achieve their end more successfully by remaining so; and they have the right to believe so, their opinion is entitled to respect. But, Sir, neither the advocates of the first nor those of the second system have the right to force their view upon the others, nor to impose their preference upon those who honestly differ from them in this most important problem. Even the Department of Labour, under its present head, has preached a doctrine different from that expounded now by the minister.

I hold in my hand a pamphlet issued by the Department of Labour entitled "Information Respecting the Russian Soviet System and its Propaganda in North America" in which it is said, on page 18:

> The National Catholic Unions are located in the Province of Quebec and are very anti-socialist.

It is not that phrase I want to refer to, but another one on the same page which reads as follows:

> Trade Unions which retain within their ranks men who use their membership to "bore from within," and destroy instead of support, are assuming a serious responsibility and risk. There is unquestionably need of an opportunity for work by the Christian Churches of every denomination.

So the Minister of Labour himself was inviting the co-operation of the Church. I do not desire to say a word as to the merits or demrits of the existing unions. I merely claim that so long as they exist side by side, so long as they are lawful organizations working for industrial peace in the land, they are both entitled to recognition from the Government, and the Minister of Labour has no right to side officially with one against the other, and to attack and grossly misrepresent either, as he has done in the case which I am now discussing. Our constitution guarantees equally to each citizen the protection of the law. Sir, the trade unions have had to fight for a great many years, and in some instances are still fighting, for existence and recognition. Why should the old ones try to kill the new ones? They are both tending towards the same goal, but believe in different agencies and methods of action.

The Canadian doctrine is, equality of rights under the law. When a man appeals for his rights he appeals to the principle of right, and what he appeals to for himself he must recognize as equally good in regard to others. Hence he is under a moral obligation to recognize the rights of others. The man who asks for "my" rights does not ask for them because they are his rights exclusively. When a man asks for his rights and gets them, and then because he is stronger than another man refuses to him the rights which he has claimed for himself, it is not right but might that is triumphant.

On February 21 and 22, 1921, a conference of employers and employees was held in Ottawa, and a report of that conference has been published by the Department of Labour under the title: Report of the Conference on Industrial Relations. In that report I find this passage in a speech delivered by the Minister of Labour, which I would commend to him if he were a member of this House. It will be found on page 58 of that report:

> I do not think any employer in this country questions a man's right to be a member of any fraternal soceity or church, and I think there are very few who even ask an employee whether he is a member of a trades union or not; but I think there is a tendency on the part of some employers to refrain from dealing with their workmen through their unions.

And he pleads with the employer for the recognition of those unions. How can the Minister of Labour reconcile that appeal with his own attitude with regard to the National Labour Union? I believe in self-determination in labour organization as in any other fields of activity. Workingmen have a right to honestly differ as to the character, the programme, and the activities of the associations which they desire to form or join.

I have referred to the religious element of the question, but there are other points of difference. I have here the platform of the Trades and Labour Congress as published in the Ninth Annual Report of the labour organizations for the calendar year 1919. In that platform there are many planks which, of course, every one is entitled to support. I wish to refer especially to a few of them. The first is free compulsory education; the second is the legal working days of six hours, and six days to a week; the third is government inspection of all industries; and so on. The eighth is abolition of the Dominion Senate. Well, it is a piece of humour that the Minister of Labour should be a member of the Senate when one of the planks of the Trades and Labour Congress is the abolition of the Senate. Article 15 of the platform calls for direct legislation through the initiative and referendum. And so on. But there is more than that. I see in the same report of the Department of Labour that prior to 1902 there were national unions in the province of Quebec which were affiliated with the Trades and Labour Congress, but they were expelled from the congress. Here is what the report says on page 42:

> As has been reported in previous departmental annual reviews of labour organizations in Canada, the majority of the independent labour units in the Dominion were to be found in the province of Quebec, and principally in the city of the same name. Some of the older national unions of Quebec were at one time affiliated with the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, but by an amendment to the constitution in 1902, the congress denied recognition to national unions where international organizations of the same craft existed. This decision also deprived the national unions from representation on trades councils chartered by the congress.

I see on page 131 that this article still exists in the constitution of the congress. Part of section 2 reads as follows:

Further, no national union or local unions comprising said national unions shall be entitled to membership in this congress when there is in existence an international union of their craft, nor shall any local union attached to a national body separated from their international organization, or any organization which has been expelled or rejected by the American Federation of Labour, be entitled to delegates in any central body chartered by this congress.

So, Mr. Speaker, apart altogether from the religious point of view, and purely from the national standpoint, all working men who do not believe in some of the planks of the Trades and Labour Congress, or indeed a subordination of their unions to the American Federation of Labour—and surely they are entitled to their opinion in that respect—have no alternative but to join an independent union, and the Minister of Labour and the Government have no right to interfere with the exercise of their discretion in the matter. On the other hand, those workingmen who believe that the larger organization is safer and more powerful for the protection of their rights and interests are entitled to their opinion also, and no Government or department of labour should interfere with them.

Now, Sir, the Minister of Labour has set forth the argument that he was governed by a clause of the labour agreement and the Peace Treaty concerning the International Labour Conference, to which each party to the League of Nations would send four representatives, and that two of those representatives would be appointed by each government, the two other representatives being appointed one to represent labour and the other to represent employers. He states there is a disposition that provides that the choice of the representatives of labour and of employers will be made by the organizations, when such exist in the country, which are most representative of the workingmen or of the employers. Well, that is no argument at all. At the International Labour Conference the representation of labour and of the employers was limited to one delegate each. I agree that it was the fairest method of choosing delegates at that conference to let the most powerful labour organization, or the one whose members were more numerous, choose the delegate for Labour, and to let the most representative of employers' organizations choose the representative of the employers. But is that a reason to deny recognition to the other labour unions at conferences where labour is represented by ten, twenty, or fifty delegates? Is that a reason to give to one labour union full control of the representation of labour at all conferences? I have here the Labour Gazette of November, 1920, a publication issued by the Labour Department, in which there is an article with regard to the Industrial Council in Belgium, exactly the same kind of body as that which is going to sit in Ottawa in the month of May next. On page 1508 of this issue of the Labour Gazette, I find the following with reference to the Council of Mines, a most important industrial council of Belgium:

The workers' representatives are appointed by the two industrial unions in proportion to their membership, the socialist union having eight and the Christian Roman Catholic union having two.

It is not only in Belgium that such unions are recognized. They are recognized in Ireland; they are recognized in Italy. No department of labour in any other country thinks of interfering with or denying existence or recognition to a particular branch of trade unionism. What is the purpose of a joint industrial council? I have here another report of the Department of Labour on the Industrial Councils, on page 31 of which I find what I consider to be the best definition of the duties of a joint industrial council. It is as follows:

First, to secure the largest possible measure of joint action between employers and work people for the development of the industry as a part of national life and for the improvement of the conditions of all engaged in that industry.

To make a joint industrial council successful it must represent as far as possible all the parties interested in that particular trade; there must be a fair representation of all the interests concerned if their decrees are to command willing and general assent. Each section has its own interests, slightly or greatly diverging from the interests of the other section. If consultation, joint conferences—indeed, self-government in industry—are to grow, it will be necessary that all separate interests have their fair share of representation, and it should be the business of Parliament to see that they get it.

Now, I think every member of the House will agree that any man of impartial mind presiding over the Department of Labour, any man qualified to fill that important office, instead of trying to crush and abuse any of the labour bodies of Canada, should try to use some tact and diplomacy with the view of getting them together to cause them to co-operate with each other instead of being divided against each other. And when, Mr. Speaker, the officers of one of the unions which are excluded from government conferences or commissions go to the Minister of Labour and say: We are ready to co-operate with you and with the other labour bodies in Canada; we want to attend the conference; if our numbers entitle us to only one or two or three delegates, give us one or two or three that is all, we want to work with our brethern in the other labour associations—when they say that, the Minister of Labour should not tell them: The others refuse to go with you; the others will refuse to sit with you at any conference. But the minister did say that, and he approved of that attitude. I repeat that it should be the duty of the Minister of Labour to get these unions together, not to divide them, because it is only through co-operation at these conferences that all may get together and work for industrial peace and harmony in this country.

With regard to the statement of Mr. Moore that I said in the House that I wanted to prevent the adoption of the Estimates, of the Department of Labour, the Estimates to cover the expenses of the coming conference, in saying that, he deceived his hearers at that time, as the House well knows. I never said anything of the kind. It is not my purpose to try to prevent the holding of that conference. I believe in joint industrial councils in Canada, and I want this conference to proceed. I shall vote gladly for the appropriation of the amounts necessary to the holding of that conference. All I ask is that it be more representative. I admit that it is late to change what has been done, but I wish to lay down a principle to this House: what I ask is representation of all labour, especially of all organized labour, all labour belonging to any union, at all labour conferences held in this country.

I have endeavoured, Sir, to put the situation clearly before the House. Is there anything in it which justifies the strong words employed by the Minister of Labour and the denunciation which he made, speaking for the Government? for he took the trouble to say that he was speaking for the Government. Was there any political trick on my part on agreeing to introduce to the minister the officers of the National Union, not even knowing what resolutions they were going to submit to him? Did the Government support the Minister of Labour in this attitude? They are, of course, responsible for his words and actions. Moreover, the Minister of Labour stands high in the councils of the Government. I have in my hand the Labour Gazette of October 20, in which is reported a speech delivered by the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) before the Trades and Labour Congress at Windsor. The Prime Minister is reported at page 1333, to have said speaking of the Government:

> It has taken from the ranks of organized labour a vice-president of one of its largest organizations and has given him Cabinet rank. Never has a Labour Minister in Canada been accorded a more generous confidence from his colleagues and a freer hand in the administration of labour problems than has Senator Gideon Robertson. There is no department that requires ability of a higher type. A practical labour man, for the first time in our history, has been in charge, and after two years' trial I believe the almost universal feeling of Canada is that he has discharged his task with admirable fairness and with extraordinary capacity. He has done honour to the ranks from which he came and has compelled the confidence of men and women of every class.
> Senator Robertson's policy has been to work in co-operation with responsible labour organizations and with organizations of employers as well.

Surely my right hon. friend did not know at that time the attitude of the Minister of Labour with regard to the National Labour Union which I should consider, and I think he should consider, to be a responsible labour organization.

The two other members of the triumvirate, Robertson, Moore and Draper, in making the statements they made, utterly misrepresented the facts. When Mr. Moore stated, in the speech which I have mentioned, that the National Union came to Ottawa and asked that it supersede the International Union at the conference and before the Government, he stated what was absolutely untrue. When the National Union asked for one member or two members at that conference out of a membership of thirty, was that a demand for superseding the International Union? Let me tell Mr. Moore that it is only a question of justice that I am defending now, and when National Unions want to supersede International Union, as he says, I shall be behind Mr. Moore, or perhaps a little ahead of him, to defend the rights of the International Union. It is no wonder, when such statements and speeches are made, that resolutions may be passed at those meetings; but those who voted for those resolutions are not acquainted with the facts; they are being deceived, as the hearers of Mr. Moore were deceived when they passed that resolution.

The attitude of Mr. Moore and Mr. Draper may be quite comprehensible. They are not few in Canada, especially in the ranks of labour, of international labour at that, who believe that Messrs. Robertson, Moore and Draper are ruling labour in an autocratic manner and desire to perpetuate by all means their domination and arbitrary methods. Either one or the other is a member of some commission or committee or board, and they do not relish the idea that some one else from some other organization should be recognized and should have a share of influence. This condition is not to the personal disadvantage of these gentlemen. They are travelling extensively at the expense of the country. Volume 2 of the Auditor General's Report shows that Mr. Moore, during the last fiscal year, has been a recipient of public money on a large scale. At page M-15 of that report, I see with regard to the Industrial Relations Commission, the following item:

> Tom Moore, Ottawa, commissioner; services, 69 days at $20; travelling expenses, $700, total, $2,080.

At page M-17, I see the following item:

> International Labour Conference, Paris and Washington, Tom Moore, president, Trades and Labour Congress of Canada: subsistence allowance, 84 days at $20; travelling expenses and disbursements, $594.20; less allowance from International Labour Office for attendance at London meeting, $818.35; total, $1,455.85.

A little later on I see, with regard to the Washington conference, apart from a substantial amount received by my friend Mr. Draper:

> Tom Moore, $614.43.

Thus members of the House will see that Mr. Moore, apart from his salary as president of the Trades and Labour Congress, is receiving a fine share of the public money of this country, and it is not surprising that he wants to keep as much as possible for himself the hen that lays the golden eggs.

As regards Mr. Draper, everybody knows that, besides being an employee of this Government with a good salary—and I am told that he got a promotion after the Windsor meeting of the Trades and Labour Congress of last fall—Mr. Draper travels extensively throughout the world as representative of labour appointed by the department, and he has been receiving a fair share of public money. In that connection, I am not sure whether it is quite proper that an employee of the Government should act in that dual capacity. I am not alone in suggesting that. I read in a very important British Review, the New Statesmen of February 5, 1921, at page 526:

> At one time it looked as if the Labour party might play a notable part in the evolution now in process, but it is rent by internal quarrels and its leadership is miserably ineffective. Mr. Tom Moore, the president of the Trades and Labour Congress, has many good qualities, but lacks vigorous initiative and belief in the efficacy of political action. However, the prime source of weakness of the Labour movement lies in the fact that his second-in-command, the secretary of the congress, holds a fat civil service position in Ottawa.

I know that there are many in the Labour movement who do not like this condition of things. In the Toronto Globe of September 15, 1920, I find a report on the deliberations of the Trades and Labour Congress from which I take the following excerpt:

> President Tom Moore refused to accept a resolution from delegates of the Toronto Labour Council to-day, when the convention opened, which called for the appointment of a special committe to investigate the disposition of $50,000 which Allan Barker, former president of the International Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees, is said to have sent Mr. Draper to use to fight radical propaganda in Canada. The few radicals who are in the convention had hoped to make capital out of the charge.
> "I shall have to rule this out of order," said President Moore. "First, because it carries with it a veiled insinuation. If this were sent broadcast over the country it would give the impression that a charge was pending against Mr. Draper. Then, we have been advised by the maintenance of way employees that their internal affairs should not be discussed by the Congress. It says that there can be no charge against Mr. Draper and that it is satisfied with his conduct."
> Mr. Barker is charged with the misappropriation of funds of the brotherhood and his case will be heard shortly in Detroit.

It was said in the evidence at the trial that $50,000 of the funds of that association had been sent to Mr. P. M. Draper to fight radical propaganda. There are many in the Labour movement who believe that Mr. Draper and his friends thought that the best way to fight radical propaganda was to use those funds to insure their re-election as president and secretary of the Trades and Labour Congress.

As to the Minister of Labour, I shall have very little to say. I shall not even attempt to correct his misrepresentations with regard to myself. I can claim that I am fully as good a friend of Labour as he is. We both have had our hour of trial. When Senator Robertson was in Winnipeg at the time of the great strike, siding openly with the employers, and taking the humiliating step of sending a frantic appeal to Samuel Gompers, the 5 p.m. head of the American Federation of Labour, to come and settle the difficulty out there, I was here on the floor of the House defending the rights of Labour to collective bargaining. When the Canadian National Railway Company was organized I took the responsibility of presenting the claims of Labour to representation on the Board of Directors, and the Government opposed my request with the implicit support and on the responsibility of the Minister of Labour. I desire to say as firmly as I can that by the attitude which the Minister of Labour has taken in the question I have been discussing, he has demonstrated that he is utterly unfit and entirely disqualified to occupy the high position of Minister of Labour in Canada. A Minister of Labour must be practicable in his plans, logical in his arguments, and absolutely fair and consistent in his undertakings. Above all, he must be impartial in his dealings with all sections of labour, organized and unorganized; all workmen must be equal before his department. The present Minister of Labour has proven that he lacks these elementary qualifications. He has shown himself devoid of the gift of tact, devoid of that broadmindedness and diplomacy which are necessary to achieve success in his department. Indeed, he has exhibited a deplorable lack of common sense. I have been told by people who are friendly to him that he did not realize the full extent of the responsibility he had as Minister of Labour, and I am fair enough to believe that that is true. But, Sir, that is no reason for keeping him there; it is no reason for the Government taking responsibility for his actions. I am sure that his actions in that respect are caused less by ill-will than—Mr. Speaker, I should like to use a polite substitute for the word ignorance.

That is all I have to say to-day. In closing my remarks I repeat what I have already said, that I base my arguments only and solely on the principle of justice, believing in the righteousness of the cause which I have defended, and believing that that is all-sufficient in the eyes of a population who love justice.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the subject on which the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) has treated the House to quite a lengthy speech is one that most of us, in some of its features, would like to have introduced in Parliament as seldom as possible. It has not always proved practicable that it be wholly excluded from discussion in this chamber, and all that one can ask when such discussions must come, is that they be conducted with temper and moderation, and with scrupulous regard for the feelings of one's opponents.

The hon. member for Quebec East has sought to impugn, though his conclusions did not take the form of any resolution or amendment, the general administration for the Minister of Labour, and the basis of his charge is the conduct of that minister in relation to a certain application made by officers of a Catholic union in Canada for representation at a conference to be held in Ottawa next month. With a skill which undoubtedly the hon. member has developed to quite a height, he has succeeded most triumphantly in confusing the issue by a long statement of utterly impregnable principles, all the while assuming that one or other of these principles had been flagrantly violated by the minister. A more exact, careful and complete recital of the real circumstances in order to lay before Parliament just what the minister did, under what circumstances he acted and why he gave the decision that he did, would, I think, have been more appropriate than many of the lengthy extracts which the hon. member read.

Possibly a brief review of the Labour situation in Canada may be necessary to a full understanding of this matter. I do not pretend that I can speak with the amplitude of detail, or perhaps with the firmness of confidence in my facts that others could, but if I am wrong, I ask to be corrected on the spot.

Labour organizations in Canada have existed almost since the Confederation of Canada. We have here members of international unions in very large numbers, and we have numbers of unions that are wholly Canadian. These, for the most part, are represented in what is known as the Trades and Labour Congress, which is a congress of Canadian representatives of these unions created for the purpose of watching and, to the best of their capacity, influencing legislation along lines they believe to be in their interests. There has grown up also since 1911 what are known as National Catholic Unions, confined, so far as I know, to the province of Quebec, unions composed wholly of catholics and adopting constitutions differing, in this respect, entirely from those adopted by other unions. These have reached considerable numbers in that province. The constitution adopted by one of these unions is quoted in the letter of the Minister of Labour, read by the hon. member when he presented his case.

Now, those unions which are represented in the Trades and Labour Congress are constituted on what is known as the craft basis; that is to say, all the members of a craft join together for union purposes, for the sake of advancing their interests, and for wide co-operative objects. There is within these unions no distinction of race, religion, or anything else; the only basis of union is occupation in a craft. All are treated alike and have the same rights. The National Catholic Unions in the province of Quebec have been organized along different lines. I do not say that it was not their right so to do; I have not the least doubt that it was quite legal. At all events, they have organized along different lines and are in no way associated with the unions that form part of the Trades and Labour Congress. They have indeed taken the position, as set out in the letter quoted by the hon. member, that they have no relation to, and nothing to do with, the unions that are reflected and represented in the Trades and Labour Congress, nor with the Trades and Labour Congress itself. That position also is within their right, and there is no need to take exception to it, for it has nothing to do with the arguments and the facts before the House to-day. I stated that the National Catholic Unions sprang up in 1911. They have grown in numbers until in 1920 their strength, I believe, is claimed to be 39,712. They embrace many persons who could not be properly described as workmen. Many of these unions are really not, in the strict sense, labour unions, although a great many others are. Some of them consist of what are known as research clubs; I have the names of one or two, such as "The Pius X Research Club, of Lévis," and "The Leo XIII Research Club, of Quebec"; and others. Of that 39,712, I understand only about 700 are actually engaged in the building trades.

The Trades and Labour Congress, of course, represents some hundreds of thousands. If my recollection of the memorandum presented me is correct, the members of the unions in the Trades and Labour Congress from the the province of Quebec total 89,000 or 90,000. While I do not think it matters as to the religious denominations of these 90,000 men in the Province of Quebec who are in unions represented in the Trades and Labour Congress, it must be manifest to all who know anything of that Province that by that by far a larger number of catholics will be in those unions than could be in the catholic unions, whose total membership is only 39,000. Consequently, it will be difficult to argue that, while an attitude might be unfair to one or other, a preference for either on the part of the present Minister of Labour must necessarily arise from any narrow or anti-catholic impulse. No one who knows that minister would for a moment suppose that he is capable of being animated by any such feeling. The one motive that actuates him most is a real sympathy for Labour, particularly for Canadian labour and union labour. That is what is deepest in his heart,—a desire to advance the interests of all labour in this country, and his sympathies are strongly with the workers of our country, tempered, of course, by a spirit of fairness and a loftiness of view that well comport with his position and that have been, in the years he has occupied his present office,—yes, and for years before,—of inestimable service to this country.

That being the general labour position, how does it come about that the present difficulty arises? I have set out that the Catholic unions exist; I have set out that the other unions also exist; and I have shown the distinction that obtains between the two. Now, I would never for a moment argue from that state of facts that there could be taken up on the part of the Government of this country, or of the Labour Department, a position which denied recognition to the one or the other. That is obviously an impossible position for the Government or the Labour Department to take. Nor has that department been guilty of refusing recognition to either. I purpose reciting the facts to show the truth of what I assert; many of the facts and some of the correspondence which he overloked might well have been submitted by the hon. member; but they would never at all have agreed with the conclusion at which he arrived, that there was failure on the part of the minister of any general recognition, or indeed of any specific recognition, that could, on logical grounds have been requested. What was the recognition asked for? It was in this respect, I think, that the hon. gentleman erred most. I think he led the House to believe that the officers of the Federation of National Catholic Unions came to Ottawa, accompanied by himself, to make a general request for recognition, as he put it, on all commissions and, I think he said, on conferences appointed by the Government. If they came for purposes that were reasonable they would not have been denied. If they came for recognition in respect of anything they could fairly claim to be represented in they would not have been denied. What they specifically came for was this: A conference had been called on the part of two parties to an agreement. Now who were those parties? There has grown up in Canada, on the one hand, an organization known as the Federal Association of Building Trades, composed of various unions in different parts of Canada, who have got together, for purposes that I shall set out. On the other hand there has grown up an organization known as the Federal Association of Builders and Contractors—that is to say an association of the employers who employ the men—aggregated together in the other associations. An agreement was made some time ago between these two parties and out of that agreement real results have come. These results have been chiefly along the line of the establishment of Industrial Councils, at specific points through the country, between the employees in the building trades on the one hand—members of the General Association—and the employers members of the Employers' Association, on the other. There has evolved as well what you might call a Central Industrial Council—I think they call it an Industrial Conference—composed of five who are named by the various employees organizations, parties to the agreement on the one hand, and of five more named by the employers' organization, parties to the agreement on the other hand. Now it was desired by the two parties to that agreement that a conference should be held, in the belief that difficulties that might loom up in the future, and that they saw on the horizon, might be solved and smoothed away, and in the belief, I understand, that it would promote the further establishment and further usefulness of these Industrial Councils. That was the conference that was asked by these men—organized on the one hand, by the employees; organized by the employers on the other. Does any hon. gentleman know why that conference should not have been held? Does any hon. member know why these parties to a distinct individual agreement should be denied the right of having representatives come together for the purpose of exchanging their views? Does any hon. member know why the Minister of Labour should not have acquiesced in the demand for the assistance of his department when the parties came together for the purpose of calling that conference? If no one knows of any such reasons then there can be no criticism of the Minister of Labour.

What was the assistance asked of the Department of Labour? Was it that the minister should name the parties of either side to come to the conference? No, it was merely this—that in the case of this conference of the two parties to the agreement in question he should send the invitations to their nominees, and that he himself, or some officer of his department, should preside at the conference when held—the conference called for the 3rd of May. When matters were in that position a delegation came from the Federation of National Catholic Unions—those 39,000 people odd, of whom only 700 odd were in the building trades and none of whom were in the organizations represented by the employers who were a party to the agreement, and certainly none of whom were members of the employers' organization which constituted the second party to the agreement. They came down, and they came down accompanied by the hon. member for Quebec East. It was not the first time the members of this organization had come, but whenever they came they were welcome. I will read in a little while something that took place at a previous meeting between the representatives of the National Catholic Unions and the Minister of Labour. I will quote the verbatim report of what took place; and I say now that it will show to the hon. member for Quebec East and to every member of this House that the stand which the hon. member advocated looking to the smooth working together and co-operation of the Trades and Labour Congress on the one hand and of the Federation of Catholic Unions on the other—the stand which he says it is the great business of the Minister of Labour to take—is precisely the stand that the Minister of Labour did assume.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not this year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The question is not up this year; that is not what they came down for. They came down accompanied by the member for Quebec East although they had with them before—I do not know just how to refer to the gentleman but I want to do so in a correct way—

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Chaplain.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes the Chaplain, Abbé Fortin. He was down in 1920 at the head of the delegation, but this time they required the member for Quebec East to introduce them. So the hon. member came with them to the Minister of Labour.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I suppose my right hon. friend will take my word when I say I was invited to go there without at all knowing what the resolutions were going to be.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not doubt that at all. What I said was the delegation brought the hon. member with them and he introduced them although they were accompanied by the gentleman who led them in 1920. That is the fact. I do not say the hon. member knew the purport of the resolutions; I accept his word instantly when he says he did not. Anyway he came with them, and I believe another member of this House came with them as well.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Was there any wrong in that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I do not say there was anything wrong. I would be the last to argue that it was wrong on the part of an hon. member to take advantage of every such occasion in his public life. Every hon. member wants to get behind him all the strength he can; I simply call attention to the grounds upon which he came. Now that is of interest when I go on a little further. I have stated the specific object for which they came. Did hon. members of this House get that to be the specific object from the speech of the hon. member? I do not think they did. The request of the delegation was denied by the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Labour took this ground: How can I say to these people who have the right to make their own nominations, "You must see to it that somebody else comes to this conference between these two said parties to the said agreement; I won't allow you to have that conference unless you do"? Had he the right to take that ground? I think my hon. friend knows he had not, and must have known it, especially in view of the fact that of the delegation which he introduced, representing 39,000 odd people, only 700 odd were in the building trades, whereas the parties to the conference were wholly of the building trade. Yet in spite of that the delegation asked the Minister of Labour to take the situation strongly in hand and say to these two parties to the agreement "You cannot get together unless the other parties come in as well." Was that a fair request to make? And after the Minister of Labour had stated his views, I am informed, and I am informed by the Minister of Labour himself, that the labour representatives present—those of the delegation who were themselves labouring people—did not take any exception to those views and that the opposition was first taken by the hon. member for Quebec East himself.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Who says that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Minister of Labour.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The Minister of Labour is stating an untruth when he says that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I had better repeat it so that it will be understood. My information from the minister is that the labour delegates there, those who were labouring people, did not take exception to his statement of the position when he refused to himself compel representation at the conference, but that the first to take exception was the hon. member for Quebec East.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Speaker, I insist upon my right to have my word accepted by the right hon. gentleman. The Minister of Labour could not understand the men who were there, and I had to translate to him what they were saying.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The Prime Minister has not refused to accept the statement of the hon. member. It is perfectly proper for the Prime Minister to state what the Minister of Labour said to him in respect to a certain occasion. What the hon. member has said in this House must be accepted. That is the rule of the House. His word is on record and will stand.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Now we have reached that point of the argument. The Minister of Labour did not take the stand he did in relation to refusing the request on the ground that this was a Catholic union, or that he had any fault to find with it. He took his stand on the ground that I have stated—a ground that I humbly submit, is utterly unassailable. I cannot for the life of me see how he could possibly have taken any other stand. I say he did not take that stand on the ground that he had to treat differently the workingmen engaged in the building trade who happened to be members of a union who were parties to the conference and members engaged in the same trade who happened to be members of the Catholic union; not at all. On the contrary he stated: This is a conference between these two parties to an agreement which they have a right to hold, and they have a right to determine the way in which they will hold that conference. They have determined how they will hold it, and I have no right to interfere, especially as the unions you represent are not building trades unions particularly but only to the extent of two per cent of your members. What followed from that? Instead of trying to discriminate in favour of one as against the other, he followed that statement with a letter, which the hon. member did not read. I have the letter before me and will read it now.

Mr. J. E. A. Pin,
270 rue de la Reine,
Quebec, Que.

I presume he is the secretary of the union or of the delegation.

Ottawa, Ont., March 29, 1921.

Dear Sir,— The proposals contained in the printed memorial and submitted by your delegation last week have been translated and are receiving consideration. One of the requests made referred to a conference to be held in Ottawa on May 3 next, and to be participated in by employers and representatives of labour parties to the National Builders Industrial Council agreement.

Parties to the agreement.

You will recall it was explained to your delegation that the delegates to this conference were not being selected or appointed by the Department of Labour, but at the request of the employers' and workmen's organizations, parties to the Industrial Council agreement, the department had agreed to invite the delegates whom the respective parties might nominate.

Upon the occasion of the visit of your delagation it was made clear to them that the department could not assume to force upon the employers' and employees organizations, parties to the Industrial Council agreement, the presence of outside organizations of either employers or workmen, but that if your organization would communicate directly with the parties who were participating in the conference and obtain their consent to your being represented, it would be the pleasure of the department to extend invitations to any members of your organization who might be nominated.

That is what he stated to the delegation. I do not think the hon. member quoted that.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He never said that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He did not state that?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No; and it is not in the letter he wrote to the Montreal Gazette.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think it is in that letter. If so, I do not know where the hon. member will be then. But the Minister of Labour did not stop there. In his letter to this gentleman, who I think must be the secretary of the delegation, he also said:

Since then it has occurred to me that your people have perhaps overlooked the fact that the employers in the building industry who engage only National Catholic Union workers will not be present at the conference referred to. If in the opinion of your organization, and of the employers with whom your organization deals, it would be advisable to have a conference together, similar to the one to be held between employers and employees, members of the national building industrial council, it will be the pleasure of the Department of Labour to extend invitations, upon receipt of nominations, in exactly the same manner as is being done in the other case.

If a conference between the building contractors, who employ members of your organization only, and yourselves, is deemed desirable the department will be glad to co-operate with you in exactly the same manner as we are attempting to do with the other organizations of builders and workmen.

Now, I do not say that the hon. member ever had seen this letter before he spoke—

Mr. MURPHY: Is the right hon. gentleman reading the whole letter or just extracts?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I have read the whole letter. The latter part of the letter in which it is suggested that possibly the workmen in Mr. Pin's organization would like a similar conference with their employers, the minister does not claim to have stated to the delegates. He did tell them what is expressed in the first part, that if Mr. Pin's organization would obtain the consent of the parties interested to his organization being represented, he—(the minister)—would be glad to extend invitations,—in a word, if justice was being done by the parties to the conference, they who were not parties would be treated precisely the same even in relation to that conference. What more the Minister of Labour could do I am at a loss to understand.

Now the hon. member complains that the Minister of Labour has not taken the line of seeking to avoid friction between the Catholic unions and the unions incorporated in the Trades and Labour Congress. I say, on the contrary, that the minister has taken precisely that line, and has always taken it. He has felt that friction was bound to arise when organization took place along those lines. He has felt that it is better for labour to be all together, to present its case as one, not as two. He has always tried to get them together but his efforts have not received much response, and I know he feels discouraged by the attitude of those whose cause the hon. member has espoused this afternoon.

Now let me read what took place a year ago at this meeting between the representatives of the Federation of National Catholic unions and the Minister of Labour. This is a verbatim report of what he said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would the Prime Minister allow me to correct one impression before he proceeds? He has made reference to a letter which my hon. friend (Mr. Lapointe) is not supposed to have seen. As my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) has realized, the speech of the member for Quebec East had reference to a letter from the Minister of Labour which appeared in the Montreal Gazette on March 31. It was dated at Ottawa on March 27. The letter which my right hon. friend has just read, and which he says the member for Quebec East possibly had not seen, is dated March 29, two days after the letter was sent to the Montreal Gazette which details the whole ground of the controversy.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister wrote the letter on the 27th to the Montreal Gazette, and he wrote the letter to Mr. Pin on the 29th. The letter of the 27th could not embody the letter of the 29th.

A moment ago I was challenged by the hon. member when I quoted from the minister's letter of the 29th to Mr. Pin to the effect that he, the minister, had told the delegates that if they would obtain the consent of the parties to the conference he would be glad to extend to them invitations to this conference. The hon. member interrupted me to say that the minister had not said that at the delegation, and that what he had said at the delegation was in the Montreal Gazette. Very well. I read from the Montreal Gazette letter:

The delegates are being invited upon the nomination of the employers' and workmen's respective organizations. The National Catholic Union delegates would be gladly invited if the consent of the parties participating were obtained, but instead of approaching them the National Catholic Union make a demand on the Labour Department to force representation for them, which request was declined. Why did the National Catholic Union make this request instead of seeking to co-operate with the two parties interested?

Then he gives the reason why in his opinion they did not.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What about the other parts of the letter? That is not the only reason he gives.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know that, but the hon. member said he did not give this reason in the letter. The hon. member's interruption reminds me of the man charged with a crime who, faced with the testimony of witnesses who said they saw the offence committed, contended that he could produce many hundreds who would swear that they did not see him commit the crime. I was about to read from the words of the minister at the conference in 1920. I do not really know what the name of the conference was ; I assume it was just a delegation similar to this one. It was held on January 20, 1920. I observe that Rev. Father Fortin was present, because I see one or two remarks put in by him. These are the words of the minister:

If I may be permitted—and I hope you will not regard it as presumption on my part to call one or two things to your attention—

We will see how this displays a "narrow", "partisan" and "anti-Catholic" mind. It is the language of the Minister of Labour.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Where is that report?

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is a verbatim report, taken in shorthand. Does the hon. member dispute it?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Where?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Here, where the conference took place.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does my hon. friend refer to the conference of this year?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, 1920. The minister said:

If I may be permitted—and I hope you will not regard it as presumption on my part—to call one or two things to your attention, for the consideration of your federation, and it is for the purpose of promoting harmonious relations in the labour world and in the industrial world generally that I presume to advance these thoughts for your consideration.

There have been established in the province of Quebec during the last few years what you have been pleased to term your National Catholic Unions. I had the pleasure and honour of being received by Bishop Gauthier and several other gentlemen, including Father Fortin, in Montreal some weeks ago to discuss some of the things that I am going to mention now. Throughout all of the rest of Canada, and indeed all Northern America, the wage earners, the workingmen, are organized into what they term their craft unions. That is, the carpenters have their organization; the machinists have theirs; the boilermakers have theirs; the street railway men have theirs; each class of men in railroad service have their particular organization; and the bricklayers, the stonemasons, the garment-workers, etc. Those organizations are all, or nearly all, international in character. That may or may not be a good thing, but what I want to point out in the first place is that there is no distinction as to any race, nationality or creed in that whole labour movement numbering several millions of people. The movement that has started in your province, setting up what is termed the National Catholic Unions, is having a very disturbing effect in the minds of labour men generally—those who are affiliated with these other unions that have been in existence for years—particularly in your province; and unfortunately it is true that the feeling is not all of a friendly sort. I think that it is unfortunate that there should be any friction between men whose interests are identical. But if you continue to increase your membership in the province of Quebec among your own people, and the friction continues to grow by reason of certain provisions in your constitution, which may be misunderstood, misquoted, and misinterpreted in other parts of the Dominion, I honestly greatly fear that serious results will ultimately come out of what has been started, and I would like to make this suggestion to you gentlemen here. You have placed a number of important matters before Mr. Blondin and myself on behalf of the Government, for consideration by the Government, and I am therefore going to venture to ask you to give consideration to the proposal that I desire to make to you. It is that you should honestly and earnestly endeavour to find some method whereby your organization can work in more complete harmony with the other organizations representing labour in this country, and at least stop the growing friction that exists. Father Fortin was present when we had the conversation in Montreal, and we need not discuss the matter at the length we did there, because he is familiar with it; but I do respectfully submit, gentlemen, that there ought to be no religious distinction in the labour movement. In every trades union that exists in North America, Catholic and Protestant are alike welcome, and have equal rights, and the question of religion is never raised. The secretary of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada is a most devout Roman Catholic; several of the executive of that congress are also of that religious faith, and they have the confidence and the admiration and the respect of their fellow workmen of all religious beliefs throughout the whole country, for they are elected by them.

Rev Father FORTIN: Well, Mr. Minister—

The MINISTER OF LABOUR: And what I wanted to say was that I do hope that as you proceed along your line of development you will earnestly endeavour to promote more harmonious relations between other organizations and your own, both your local unions and your federation, and if possible adopt the same principle that we are suggesting should be adopted between employer and employee, namely, by getting together with the executive officials of the other unions and endeavouring by conference to find some common ground on which you can work together in harmony,

That is exactly the policy which the hon. member says the Minister of Labour should promote.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Do not have them coming to me or to the Government—no matter who may happen to be Minister—and saying, "We won't participate in the Labour Conference if another organization is present." It is undesirable to have one organization representing labour coming to the Government and saying, "We want the eight hour day," and another organization coming and saying, "We do not." Unless there is harmony and unity of action, the Government is placed in a most embarrassing position in dealing with the presentations that are made. The Government has even been endeavoring, and with some success, to get labour and capital to sit down, talk together, and bring in joint recommendations. That is very desirable and has been useful where it has been done. Everything possible should be done to bring about a spirit of co-operation among all the organizations that are trying to improve the condition of the workingman in any part of this country. I think it is desirable that they should be pulling together instead of having any differences, and coming at different times and making opposite representations to the Government in some cases. I do not mean the remarks that I have made to be taken as in any way offensive, as I am sure you gentlemen will appreciate. I lived in the province of Quebec for some six years, and knew a great many of the people there and have great admiration for the French people. It is unfortunately true that in the distant parts of Canada our French-Canadian people are not properly understood, and in many cases not properly appreciated. Their ideas and aims are somewhat different from those of other people in other parts of the Dominion. At the same time I believe that it is absolutely true, on the other hand, that the majority of our people in the province of Quebec, do not fully understand the people in the other provinces of Canada. It is only by the meeting of representatives of all parts of the country, whether of labour or capital, that we become properly possessed of the right ideas, the ideas that should prevail for the benefit of the country as a whole. So I leave that thought with you for your consideration.

This is what I want to emphasize particularly.

If at any time it seems to your Federation desirable that a conference should be held between officers of your organization and officers of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, with a view of trying to arrive at some common ground on which you can work together in harmony, or at least so work that friction would be avoided, and if this Department can be of any service in bringing about such a conference, we would be delighted to co-operate with you in that way.

Even the words of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lapointe) himself could not more clearly or more forcefully express the devotion that a minister ought to show to the cause of co-operation amongst labour, to the cause of the abolition of that friction amongst labour classes, and especially of the abolition of friction that involves from religious division.

The hon. member must realize that, in so far as any administrative decision went, the decision of the Minister of Labour as regards this question of being represented at this special council was specifically, the only administrative decision that he made. But when the hon. member (Mr. Lapointe) got up to charge him with discrimination, he gave, as he expressed it to me, "without cost," his opinion. The Minister of Labour has opinions as to the wisdom of organizing workers along the special line, the religious line, such as at the basis of this Catholic Union. It is not that the Minister of Labour is anti-Catholic. His opinion would be just the same as regards the organization for labour purposes adherents of any other religious body in Canada, It would be just the same as regards a clerical party in this House of any religious denomination whatever. Such is the opinion; it is not an administrative act at all. The Minister of Labour, so far as administrative direction goes, takes the ground that in his eye all must be treated alike; there must be no refusal to recognize anyone. But he believes that the best line of labour organization is not the line that marks the confines of a religious sect. That is his opinion; surely to that opinion he has a right, and the opinion applies to such an organization, no matter by what special religious boundary it may be confined. I will give you his reasons. He states that in his experience as a labour man, as Minister of Labour, the inevitable result of workers organizing on religious lines is to give ground for complaints of discrimination and unfairness on the part of employees, Catholic or Protestant, who cannot or do not belong to this Catholic Union so organized or to this special organization of labour within lines of particular faith. In his judgment there inevitably arise claims of injustice to those men who do not, who cannot, belong because they are in other unions or because they are not Catholics. Furthermore he holds this opinion on the far broader ground, namely that the projection of lines of division amongst our people on religious grounds into the labour field—and I think he would say into other fields—is not for the ultimate good of Canada. That is his opinion. But because he believes that it would be better to organize along other lines that is no reason why he should not recognize organizations if they choose to take form, so long as such organizations are within, and entitled to the protection of, the laws of this country and so long as the purpose of the organization is in no way destructive. That being his position, what fault can be found?

There is, however, an organization of another character that arose in the West, and in the judgment of the minister it had much to do with the Winnipeg strike. I am rather sorry to see the hon. member trying to lead the House to believe to-day that in the great conflict that arose in winnipeg, his sympathies were wholly with those who precipitated that struggle there, some of whom were found guilty of grave crimes by unanimous verdicts of juries. I did not know that the hon. member would stand in this House and say that he was pleading their cause here when the Minister of Labour was in the West trying to restore order in one of the most trying and difficult situations that ever arose in Canada. I did not believe that he would stand in Parliament and try to prove his claim to sympathy with labour on any reasoning like that. I do not think that these grounds he will get very much sympathy from leading members of his party, whose views on that occasion were expressed quite freely, honestly, honourably and truly, quite on the other side.

I have described the position that the minister took; the position that he outlines in his letter to the Montreal Gazette. That position is wholly compatible with his lifelong effort to bring about the best possible relations between labour units as they appear in the Trades and Labour Congress and labour units as they appear in the Catholic union, and quite consistent with that policy, from which he has never departed, of recognizing the one in the same way as he would recognize the other and in giving no preference to either. That is the position he has assumed all along. In that position, is he wrong? In that position, I venture to say he is supported by the majority, even of the religious faith of those who belong to the Catholic unions, and by the majority of labour men. I know it is his firm opinion that the majority do support him in that position, and I think he is a competent judge as to what side the majority are on. In that position I have not the least doubt that he is supported by the great body of fair, impartial, unbiased public opinion in this country; and in pursuing that course I think he is serving the ends of labour, the ends of the Dominion, and deporting himself with dignity and usefulness in the high office which he holds.

At Six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess

Mr. J. E. FONTAINE (Hull): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief in my remarks, for on no account would I spoil the good impression made upon this House by the eloquent speech of the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe). I had the honour to accompany the delegates of the National Labour Union when they called upon the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Robertson); I heard all the proposals which were submitted to him; I heard their request which was to be presented at the industrial conference of employers and workmen, in Ottawa, on May 3rd next; a conference called by the hon. minister himself, and having for its object the bringing together of employers and employees with a view to securing a better understanding between them. They solicited the favour to send three of the thirty-seven delegates who will make up the conference, that is to say a quota proportionate to the 50,000 workmen they represented. Much to my surprise, Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of Labour, forgetting that he is the Minister of Labour for the whole country, whatever be the union to which they belong, refused their request, for the reason that these men are members of a Catholic National union. And here I mean to state, that the minister does not tell the truth when he says that the only protest against his refusal was that from the member for Quebec East. As a matter of fact the hon. member for Quebec East only served as an interpreter for the benefit of the Minister of Labour who does not understand French, and the delegates warmly protested, but in vain, as the minister's refusal was final.

When one looks over the political history of this country one encounters many politicians and other groups mixed up in intrigues having for their object to discredit all that is Catholic. I still remember the wars waged against Sir Wilfrid Laurier by certain fanatics; I have many times heard them say that they wanted no Prime Minister who received his directions from Rome and the pope, or other similar nonsense, but never before have I seen a minister of the Crown, supposed to represent all races and creeds of the country, forget himself to the extent of sinking to the level of the fanatical politicians I have just referred to. And this happens, Mr. Speaker, at the very moment when the Government try to have ministers elected in the province of Quebec, and tell us through their newspapers that they want friendly understanding and union to prevail in the country, and that they even regret not to see our province better represented in the Cabinet. I remember the account given of a grand banquet offered to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) in Montreal, where he declared that he had never uttered a word or sentence that could offend the province of Quebec. Well, Mr. Speaker, here is a fact which speaks louder than mere words, and if the Prime Minister be sincere, if he wants us to believe in his courting, let him repudiate the conduct of his colleague, the Minister of Labour, and demand his resignation.

After all, why this objection to the Catholic labour unions? Is it not admitted by everybody that it was the province of Quebec that saved the situation, that put an end to the friction which after the war existed in this country between capital and labour? Indeed, when strikes were taking place in all the provinces of the Dominion —I still have in mind the famous strike in Winnipeg—the province of Quebec was calm and peaceful and was the bulwark of order and harmony. Mr. Speaker, the reason is that the people, especially the working classes, are permeated with deep religious sentiments and follow the wise and patriotic advice of their clergy. Although the honourable Minister of Labour is adverse to the presence of a chaplain among trades unions, I wish to state on the floor of this House that as long as they follow the advice of the clergy our workingmen will not go astray and Quebec will be admired by the people of this country.

Mr. GEORGE PARENT (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, just a few days ago—last Sunday it was—I had the good fortune to be present at a gathering called under the auspices of the National Catholic Unions of Labour in the city of Quebec. At this meeting held in the Market hall there were about three thousand people present, and many more were unable to get in. This large number of people had gathered to hear a very prominent member of the clergy, Abbé Deponcheville. He addressed this gathering of Catholic Labour Unions and I must say that I was very much impressed with his speech, as I believe everybody present was on that occasion. Did he say anything against other labour unions? No. Did he say anything particularly in favour of Catholic unions? Possibly so.

When I left that room I asked myself, how are we going to face the situation which now confronts us in view of what we had been told a few days previously by the Minister of Labour, the Hon. Gideon Robertson? Coming to Ottawa the next day, much to my surprise I received from people belonging to other labour unions a resolution which I wish to place in part before the House, the tenor of which was exactly to the contrary of what I had heard at the meeting I had attended the day previous. It is a resolution of the Quebec Typographical Union, No. 302, and says in part:

That whereas this Union has taken cognizance of the stand taken by the Hon. Gideon Robertson, Minister of Labour, in connection with the National Catholic Unions of this province in their efforts to divide bona fide labour organizations by means of religious and racial prejudice—

If it were true, Mr. Speaker, that the Catholic Unions want to divide bona fide labour organizations by means of religious and racial prejudice, I for one would by no means support any organization that would have any such tendency. I do not think the Catholic unions have any purpose of that sort in mind. The Abbé Fortin, who also spoke on this occasion, said that if Catholic unions wished to be advised by priests, it was their own business. He said further: We went to Ottawa for this very purpose of telling the Minister of Labour that whenever a labour congress took place, or a conference on labour matters was held, we wanted the Catholic unions of labour, representing over forty thousand people in this Dominion, to be heard. That was all. That was mentioned at that meeting by Abbé Fortin. He repeated there what he said in Ottawa that that was all the Catholic unions were trying to get from this Government.

The Minister of Labour has written a letter to the press, published in the Montreal Gazette, in which he tries to becloud the issue, saying that if the labour unions could not be heard at the coming congress it was because they were Catholic.

A day or so later another letter was published by the same gentleman, but he did not go quite so far as he did before. Now, it is our hope that whatever may be the nature of these organizations in the province of Quebec, whether they be advised by legal counsellors or by priests, they shall be given the same right to be heard by the Department of Labour as is enjoyed by any other union in Canada. There are some forty thousand labour men in these Catholic unions, and they should have an opportunity of stating their views before any conference under the direction of the Minister of Labour. I will not go further on this subject because the whole field has been well covered by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), and everything that he has said concerning the whole matter I am pleased to endorse. I trust that the Government, taking his views into earnest consideration, and heeding the opinions expressed by some of us, will take such steps as will ensure to these Catholic unions the right of being heard by the Department of Labour.

Mr. EDMOND PROULX (Prescott): It seems to me that the Labour Department is exercising a discrimination against the National Catholic Unions. There was a labour conference in September, 1919, at which those unions desired to be represented, but they were refused the right. Now, they serve a certain purpose in this country, and the Department of Labour should have no policy which would operate against the interests of any union of labour, whether its members belong to one denomination or another. Those Catholic unions want to be represented now at another labour conference, and they are denied the right by the Minister of Labour. Why is that? Are they not citizens of this country? They number about 40,000, and there is no reason why they should not be heard in any conference under the auspices of the Department of Labour. I wish to put on Hansard the views of a prominent labour man, who has had a large experience in the employment of labour in this country for the last thirty years. This man is not a Catholic; he is a Protestant named A. A. Wright, and writing from 9 Victoria Square, Montreal, under date of April 1; with reference to the National Catholic unions, he says:

To the Editor of The Gazette:

Sir,—I read with a great deal of interest yesterday your very able criticism of the position taken by the Minister of Labour, as shown by his letter in the same issue. It may be of interest to you to know that prior to March, 1917, I had had over thirty years' experience in Ontario with unorganized labour in the lumber and shipping industries. During that period, the relations between the employing firm and their employees were of the most friendly character, and nothing but harmony prevailed, mainly from the absence of paid agitators. From March, 1917, to date, I have been closely connected with firms from Port Arthur to Halifax, the first two years of that period being connected with the construction of patrol vessels in the shipyards from Port Arthur to Quebec for the British Admiralty, under the Department of the Naval Service of Canada. This was my first experience with labor organizers or leaders of the Metal Trades Federation affiliated with the International Unions, whose activities are responsible for all the unrest in labor circles. It was my first connection also with the Catholic workers organization in the Province of Quebec.

I have no brief for the clergy of the Roman Catholic Church nor for the labor organization among members of that church, but I am compelled to state that from personal experience that if compelled to take my choice between dealing with the Catholic Workmen's Union or with the leaders of the International Unions, I would unquestionably prefer dealing with the Catholic Workers Union and their leaders for the following reasons:

The leaders and advisers of the Catholic Workmen's Union teach the workers to live up to the teachings of the Christian religion, and to give an honest day's work for a fair day's pay. They impress on the workers that the only source of employment is from the men who are able to use the savings of the people intelligently in producing commodities required by mankind, and that they can only pay the men the highest wages possible to them after paying for raw material, overhead expenses and a reasonable profit, and the difference between that, and the value of the commodities produced, is all that can possibly be available for wages.

On the other hand, the International Unions teach their members that the capitalist is the enemy of the workingman, who has been exploiting his services for the accumulation of wealth and not giving the worker a fair share of what he produces.

The International Unions, through some of their leaders, do admit that men should give an honest return for the wages they are paid, and when advocating the eight hour day guaranteed that if employers would grant the eight hour day, they would get greater production than they had been getting in the ten hour day. From observation in the industries with which I have been connected, instead of doing this the men have been giving, up to a few months ago, less than half of the production in eight hours which they had formely been giving in ten, because the workmen were privately, and in some cases openly taught, that the less work a man does the more men will get employment and the more prosperous workers will be. Further, I have been told by first class Union workmen, when asked why they belonged to a Union, since they were men of such a type that employers will bid against one another for their services, that they are virtually compelled to belong to the Union because there is an aggressive minority which, throught secret dealings with foremen and other means would drive them out of the shops if they incurred the enmity of the Unions and refused to join, because it is absolutely essential to the existence of the Unions that they have enrolled among their members a large number of skilled men, as without them the Union could not exist and these men are used to enable the indifferent and undesirable workmen to get and hold jobs.

I think it is safe to state that fully 80 per cent of the members of the labor unions are honest, conscientious, law-abiding citizens who take little or no interest in agitation, and that of the 20 per cent, of aggressive members, possibly not over 5 per cent, are of the class which might be considered really undesirable citizens. When this is considered, coupled with the fact that organized labor affiliated with these International Unions does not embrace at the outside probably over 20 per cent, of all the workers in Canada and the United States, it should be evident that too much attention is being paid to those so-called labor leaders (who arrogate to themselves the right to dictate through the press and public platforms to our Government as to what Labour demands), by the Government, press and public. They should be absolutely ignored, as if this country, or any other country, is to prosper, the Government elected by the people should only pass and administer laws for the benefit of all its citizens, instead of catering to a noisy minority by passing and enforcing laws for the benefit of a small minority of citizens at the expense of the majority.

I think a comparison of the ethics taught by the Catholic Workers Union leaders, and those of the International Unions, will justify the decision of many employers who after careful consideration now refuse to sign any contract with leaders of the International Unions, but will confine themselves to making agreements with men who are working for them who are willing to live up to their contracts, and give honest service in return for the highest wages which the firm can afford to pay.

A. A. Wright,

9 Victoria Cquare,
Montreal, April 1, 1921.

Well, Mr. Speaker, it has always been my opinion since the International Union entered upon an aggressive campaign against the National Catholic Union that the former wanted to kill the movement undertaken by the latter. They saw that in the province of Quebec the National Catholic Union was living up to the principles of the Christian religion in making agreements with their employers and adhering to those agreements. You have not seen in the province of Quebec within the last few years any strikes worth speaking of, and even when strikes did occur they were very quickly settled. There has not been seen in the province of Quebec any such strike as the big one which occurred in the West. The members of the National Catholic Union are not members of the One Big Union. Nevertheless the Department of Labour has exercised discrimination in this matter, and I think the head of that department in so doing is acting at the dictation of the officers of the Trades and Labour Congress. I do not believe that the Minister of Labour wrote the letter which has been quoted here, I do not think he had the time to do so. I believe that letter was written by Mr. Tom Moore and Mr. P. M. Draper, the President and secretary respectively of the Trades and Labour Congress. The minister is taking up the cudgels for these gentiemen and, I submit, acting unfairly towards the National Catholic Union. The members of that union number over 40,000. They are peaceful citizens who want to avoid strikes and to co-operate with their employers. We have heard much within the last few years about the necessity of having co-operation between employers and employees, and we cannot have industrial peace in this country without such co-operation. Well, the main principle of the National Catholic Union is that we should have co-operation along this line and they are carrying that principle into effect. If any employers who have made agreements with the members of the National Catholic Union were summoned and questioned before a committee of this House it would be found that all those employers are perfectly satisfied.

The Montreal Gazette is a very important newspaper, perhaps one of the most influential in the country, and in its utterances on this matter it knows whereof it speaks. That newspaper declares that the National Catholic Union should not be discriminated against and that it should be represented at any Labour Conference held in Canada, especially when the expenses of such a conference are met out of the public treasury. Has the International Union, I ask, any more right to come to this Parliament and ask that public money be devoted to meeting the expenses of a labour conference than the National Catholic Union? If the expenses of such a conference are met out of the public treasury, why should not the National Catholic Union be represented at it? My hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) was perfectly justified in accompanying the delegation that waited upon the Minister of Labour to ask that the minister recognize the National Catholic Union. I hope the Prime Minister will reconsider the decision arrived at in this matter; and I appeal to the Minister of Justice, who represents the province of Quebec in this House and who knows the membership and the principles of the National Catholic Union, to see that justice is done to them, and that they should be given representation at the forthcoming labour conference to be held in this city. I make this appeal hoping that the Minister of Justice will use his influence towards remedying the injustice which has been inflicted upon that organization.

Mr. HENRI E. LAVIGUEUR (Quebec County): If I may be permitted I would like to say a few words on this subject. I have no intention of discussing the question at any length because my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) has very ably placed all the facts before the House, supplemented by the hon. memhber for Quebec West (Mr. Parent). I wish to say, however, that I endorse absolutely every word which has been uttered by both these hon. gentlemen. The treatment which has been meted out to over 40,000 of the most peaceful and honourable working men of the province of Quebec constitutes a great insult to our race—it is not only an insult to the labour classes of that province but it is also an insult to our race and our religion. During the course of a great number of years I have had the advantage of observing the work of the National Catholic Union in the city of Quebec. I have had the honour and the pleasure of knowing the most of their officers, and on many occasions it has been my good fortune to meet with them touching labour matters in the city of Quebec not only during the war but subsequent to it. The members of the National Catholic Union of Quebec comprise some of the most honourable and worthy people we have. In the city of Quebec during and subsequent to the war there were never any labour troubles owing to the praiseworthy action of the National Catholic Union, to say nothing of the international union whose members also do good work in the interest of the trade and industry of the country. Under the circumstances I could not let the opportunity pass without saying that I endorse every word that has been uttered by hon. gentlemen on this side, and I would have been greatly pleased and happy had I been called upon to vote for a resolution asking the Minister of Labour to tender his resignation in the Cabinet. The Minister of Labour has no mandate from the people, he is simply responsible to the Government, and, I repeat, by his action in this matter he has insulted our people.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): I do not wish to participate in the debate, I merely want to ask a question. For that reason I am sorry the Prime Minister is not in his place. When he was speaking this afternoon I had in my mind to refer to it but did not wish to interrupt him. In putting the question now I am merely asking for information. I understood the Prime Minister to say that the proposed conference will not be a general labour conference, but a conference of two groups—one representing the workmen and the other the employers in the building trades. I think that is correct. The Prime Minister further said that the Minister of Labour was not in a position to admit any other parties to the conference. I think that is correct also. Then the question arises: If two bodies of men desire to have a conference why do they bring the Minister of Labour into the matter at all, why do they come to him for his opinion? There are conferences all over Canada every week between employers and working men, but why is the Minister of Labour drawn into this disagreeable matter? Perhaps the Minister of Justice can answer the question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Before the Minister of Justice answers the question I would remind the hon. member that he has exhausted his right to speak, and that if he wishes to ask any further questions he had better do so now.

Hon. Mr. FIELDING: I only desire to ask one or two questions. I have stated the first one: Why has the Government been drawn into this matter, why could these parties not have their conference without bringing the Minister of Labour into the controversy? They did not need his permission. This conference, it appears to me, does not stand on any different basis from any other conference on the labour question in any part of Canada, and I cannot understand why the Minister of Labour and the Government are drawn into this very disagreeable matter.

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, if I understand the position correctly, and I think I do, it is this. A body representative of a large number of working men in the building trade and another body representative of employers likewise in the building trade came to an agreement that with a view to adjusting difficulties, actual or anticipated, that might arise in connection with their relations it would be desirable to have a conference. They asked, as I understand it, that the Minister of Labour should furnish an officer of his department to act as chairman of that conference and, in a sense, to help bring the parties together.

Mr. FIELDING: Could they not come together?

Mr. DOHERTY: They certainly could if they had thought proper to do so. But, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Quebec East this afternoon,—and I think he read from the statutes—the function for which the Department of Labour exists is to do everything in its power to facilitate and further the getting together of employers and employees, and thereby to ensure the maintenance of peace and concord in our industrial operations. Whether these gentlemen who desire to have the conference were right or wrong in the view that it would promote concord between them, they did request what they thought would be helpful, and the Minister of Labour desiring to meet any expressed wish for such co-operation, agreed that an officer of his department should preside over this conference and should issue the invitations. I am not prepraed to say that it was absolutely necessary, but it does seem to me that it was quite within the line of the duties of the Minister of Labour to meet such a request if it was at all possible to do so. I think that is the entire explanation of how the Department of Labour came to be connected with the matter.

Mr. FIELDING: And, incidentally, the Government pay the bill.

Mr. DOHERTY: Incidentally the Government, I understand, do pay the expenses connected with this conference. But I leave it to this House whether, if conferences of this kind conduce to bringing about and maintaining a good understanding between employers and employees, it is not the proper function of the Ministry of Labour to encourage them and to co-operate with labour.

Mr. LAPOINTE: To co-operate with all labour.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes. But when particular bodies representative of large numbers of men occupying towards each other the position of employers and employees represent to the department that a conference between them would be conducive to the results I have mentioned, even if they do not embrace the entire body of employers and employees throughout the country, is it not worth while to co-operate with those who seek to confer together and help them to that end?

Now, that is the whole explanation of the mystery, if there be a mystery connected with the matter. That being so, so long as the department offers and is ready to extend the same co-operation to any other body of employees and employers, it seems to me fairly clear that there can be no question of discrimination. But the difficulty seems to have resulted entirely from a misapprehension on the part of the applicants of the nature of the conference in question. It has been said that I know something about the people that compose these Catholic unions. I do, and I believe that they are reasonable people, people that are not seeking to make trouble, and I cannot but believe that if they had fully understood that they were asking for representation, not at a general labour conference but at a conference between two particular bodies of men of which they did not form part, they would have realized that there was no intention to discriminate against them, and that they were not the victims of the injustice which the hon. member for Quebec East and possibly they themselves seemed to believe that they have been subjected to. I am confident that when the members of these unions come to understand the misapprehension under which they labour they will realize that there was no refusal of recognition and no injustice done to them. I think that was made abundantly clear by the offer to them of the same good services of the department if they thought there was any conference which they could have with their employers that would tend to produce the same results of good will and harmony.

I do not think there is any substantial difference of opinion about the principles that ought to govern this matter. The right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) was quite in a postion to agree to the principles laid down by the hon. member for Quebec East. The difficulty seems to be that there was a misapprehension as to there having been a violation of those principles or a desire to ignore the particular request in question that led to the one administrative action which took place. Surely, as the hon. member for Quebec East himself pointed out, the questions that may arise out of the correspondence he read are, after all, abstract questions upon which people may honestly differ in opinion, and, as he pointed out, each one is entitled to entertain his own opinions and to act upon them so long as he is within the law. The Minister of Labour, like everybody else, formed his opinions upon those abstract questions which, after all, do not arise here for us to discuss or determine.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will my right hon. friend allow me a question?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will he take responsibility for what is stated in the letter written by the Minister of Labour to the Montreal Gazette?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am just pointing out that for the opinions of the Minister of Labour upon those abstract questions I have no responsibility. I have a responsibility for the administrative actions of this Government, and in view of the explanation of the Prime Minister, what was done in this particular instance, nobody, I think, can question. There are doubtless many abstract questions upon which action is not called for on the part of this Government in connection with which I might not be in agreement with my friend the Minister of Labour, or, possibly, with some of my other colleagues. But there is no necessity that we should be in agreement. In a country of this kind there are many questions upon which the patriotic duty is to agree or disagree, to respect each one's liberty, to entertain the opinions he entertains, and, so long as he is within the law, and to act upon those opinions. As I have pointed out, no substantial difference of opinion is involved here. But it is not conducive to any good purpose to endeavour to bring about an agreement concerning certain matters when we all know that we shall not succeed in the effort. Let us learn, after all, to respect our respective opinions, to respect the liberties of each man to form his own opinions upon such questions as are involved here, to respect the right of each man to act conscientiously upon his own opinion within the law, and we shall get along a great deal better. I trust that the hon. member for Quebec East may have performed this valuable service: that he has caused it to be made perfectly clear that in the action that was taken there was no refusal to recognize the status of any organization because of the religious belief of its members. That is a good thing to have made clear. As regards the particular action that took place, and as regards the particular conference, I think it is equally clear that there is no room for criticism. And for the rest, may we not hope that after this debate we shall realize perhaps more fully than we did before the wisdom of recognizing the liberty of opinion to which I have referred and the liberty of action within the law upon the conscientious opinions which each one may hold.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I hope the Minister of Labour will accept that doctrine.

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, with all due deference and respect to the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), I must say that notwithstanding his explanation, I am no clearer upon this subject than I was at six o'clock. Having listened intently to the able speech of the member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) I had come to the conclusion that a labour congress or conference was to be held in Canada under the auspices of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Robertson) in the month of May next, and that it was to be a general and universal labour congress or conference. If that is the case, the point made by the member for Quebec East is unassailable—that is, that all labour unions in Canada should have been invited to participate in that conference. Now comes the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government with the statement that the labour conference is going to be held as between employers and employees in one particular trade, the building trade. If that is true, I do not see the necessity of inviting the unions referred to this afternoon, though, as has been admitted by the Prime Minister himself, a large number of persons engaged in the building trades are members of the national so-called Catholic unions. Even if only one thousand out of the thirty-nine thousand members of the National Labour Union were connected with the building trades, they should be represented at that conference.

Mr. DOHERTY: If the hon. member will allow me, I think he has not fully grasped the statement of the Prime Minister. It was that this was to be a conference between a certain association of employers in the building trades and certain associations of workmen in the building trades, certain distinct bodies, not a general conference even of the entire building trades of the Dominion.

Mr. BELAND: Well, my understanding of the Prime Minister's statement is not quite the same as that of the Minister of Justice. If I followed the Prime Minister closely—and I think I did—the conference is to be between one particular association of employers and one particular association of employees in the same trade, with a view to establishing all over Canada industrial councils not only in the building trades, but in all the trades. If that is not the case, why should the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada be getting so busy over it? The inference is that this conference is to be a Canadian national labour conference, the object, plainly stated, being to establish in connection with all trades in Canada such industrial councils as have been already established as between employers and employees in the building trades. If that is so, what is the ground for refusing admission to that conference of certain labour unions which may not be international in their character? What can be the solid ground upon which to base a refusal to admit to the conference any labour union which has been organized and is operating in accordance with the laws of the country? I do not see any. I repeat that if the Prime Minister comes forward and says that at the request of one particular association of employers and an association of employees in the same line of trade he is asked to call a conference in Ottawa to discuss matters pertaining only to the two bodies concerned, that is a different matter. But I do not so understand it. I think the conference will be national in its character and universal in its object—the establishment of industrial councils in all the trades in Canada. If that be so, the minister and the Government are wrong in refusing admission to the unions that have asked to be allowed to participate in that conference.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

Railways and Canals,—salaries, contingencies, $230,025.

Mr. FIELDING: May I suggest to the minister that, in view of the notice given by the Prime Minister as to an inquiry into railway matters in another form, it would be wise for my hon. friend to defer for a day or two these Estimates? I do not want to press the matter unduly; but in view of the general discussion likely to be raised on that motion, we may be duplicating our work by going into railway matters to-night. I quite realize, of course, that it was mentioned yesterday evening that Railway Estimates would be taken up to-day.

Hon. Mr. REID: The Prime Minister intended going on with Labour Estimates this evening, but unfortunately it is impossible for him to be present. I could take up Civil Government and a few other items to which there could not be much objection. Some members want to get information in connection with the Railway Estimates.

Mr. FIELDING: With the promise of an early adjournment, the minister might, perhaps, make some progress.

Mr. PARENT: What salaries are generally paid to agents at various stations on the line?

The CHAIRMAN: Before this question is answered and before any other questions of a like nature are asked, I think it only fair, in order that nobody may be called to order, to point out that when we reach the item providing the large amount for the administration of the Canadian National Railways, these questions and all other questions concerning the administration of the Canadian National Railways will be perfectly in order and may be asked, and there will be no desire whatever on the part of the Chair to restrict any such questions. As regards the outside service or the administration of the lines by a commission, the Chair must now rule that questions concerning these are not in order upon an item providing for Civil Government, which is merely the payment of employees in the department at Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. REID: With reference to civil government, during the last fiscal year we had 104 employees and the salaries paid totalled $208,204.91. During the coming fiscal year our staff will be reduced to 95, and the total amount that we ask for is $201,425.

Mr. CANNON: What offices have been abolished?

Hon. Mr. REID: On page 96 of the Estimates the details in regard to every officer in the department are shown. The hon. member will see, by the details, the offices that have been abolished, because they are not included in the 1921-22 list.

Mr. CANNON: Who decided to abolish all these offices?

Hon. Mr. REID: There are some positions that we have abolished on the recommendation of the deputy minister, which recommendation is approved by the Civil Service Commission. We had a staff under Mr. Monsarrat that were not further required when the Quebec bridge was completed, and we took them over and used them in connection with the railways. We have abolished four or five positions there. On page 96 the hon. member will see the title "Head statistical clerk." Some employees in the Statistical branch were taken over by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. CANNON: If Mr. Monsarrat was on the Quebec bridge, would he not belong to the Outside Service?

Hon. Mr. REID: Yes. We brought him here, and he was here in the department after the Quebec bridge was completed.

Mr. CANNON: I understand that these changes in the staff were decided upon the recommendation of the deputy minister as approved by the Civil Service Commission?

Hon. Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. CANNON: That is, the Civil Service Commission is the body which decides whether the staff shall be increased or decreased, and not the minister or the deputy minister?

Hon. Mr. REID: The deputy recommends the decrease of the staff or the abolition of an office, and the Civil Service Commission must approve.

Mr. CANNON: That is as regards the Inside Service. The Outside Service is also under the control of the Civil Service Commission?

Hon. Mr. REID: In exactly the same way.

Mr. CANNON: And it is the duty of the management of the railways to look after the employees on the railways?

Hon. Mr. REID: When the Civil Service Act was passed by Parliament, railways were excepted in so far as the Civil Service Commission was concerned.

Mr. CANNON: If the minister has no control over the Inside Service of his department, no control over the Outside Service and no control over the employees of the different railways, why have we a minister at all?

Mr. LAPOINTE: What are the duties of the minister?

Mr. FIELDING: In view of the very large portion of the hon. gentleman's department which has been transferred to the Board of Directors at Toronto, there must be much less work to be 9 p.m. done in his department than formerly. This year and last year the reduction in the staff has not been very great, but there may have been in previous years a reduction to correspond with the decrease in the work. Has there been any decrease in the staff at Ottawa, having in view the large part of the business now transferred to Toronto?

Hon. Mr. REID: I cannot say that there has been much reduction. Prior to the Government railways passing to the management of the Canadian National Railway system, the details of the work in connection with the Government railways were largely done at Moncton, so that the work was merely transferred from Moncton to the Canadian National railway management, and the work has not decreased as regards the Railway Department. On account of the system being enlarged by the taking over of the Canadian Northern, there is more correspondence and more work.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I see that last year there were four senior clerk-stenographers, and that this year there are ten. On the other hand, there were fourteen clerk-stenographers last year, as compared with eight this year. By what process have so many clerk-stenographers become senior clerk-stenographers with an increase in salary?

Hon. Mr. REID: The increase is due to the reclassification by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I thuoght the reclassification was to reduce the salaries.

Hon. Mr. REID: It increased the salaries.

Mr. PARENT: What are the duties of the hydraulic engineer?

Hon. Mr. REID: He has to do all the engineering work in connection with the canals, the Welland and St. Lawrance canals, for instance.

Mr. PARENT: He has to do with water-powers?

Hon. Mr. REID: Yes, and work generally in connection with the canals.

Mr. PARENT: Has he anything to do with providing water for the locomotives and things of that sort?

Hon. Mr. REID: No.

Mr. DUFF: Would the minister explain why the chief engineer's salary has been raised from $6,000 to $8,000?

Hon. Mr. REID: That is a typographical error, and I intend to move to reduce that by $2,000.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I notice that there are three secretaries to executives. What are the functions of these gentlemen, and who are the executives in the Railway Department?

[Mr. Fielding.]

Hon. Mr. REID: The deputy minister has a secretary, and so has the chief engineer, and the comptroller. These positions were classified by the Civil Service Commission in that way.

Mr. CANNON: I see we are asked to vote the salary of a solicitor and counsel, and further down in the list I see "assistant solicitor." I am very much surprised that the department should have these officials, because I understood we had taken over the legal staff of no less than three railroads. I understand these staffs are still at work and, extraordinary to relate, some of them are fighting the Government, but nevertheless we are supposed to pay the cost. If we have all these legal gentlemen why should we retain a counsel in the department, or if the departmental counsel is a competent man, as I trust he is, why not dismiss the others? The time has come for strict economy. In former years my hon. friend the minister would come to Parliament, and, with his very pleasant ways, get his Estimates through without much difficulty, but this year I think even his genial smile will not allow him to get his Estimates through so easily in view of the serious railway situation confronting this country.

Furthermore, I do not think it is reasonable for the minister to try and screen himself behind the Civil Service Commission. Whenever any information is asked as to the salaries of any of these officials, the minister says: That was done by the Civil Service Commission. Now the minister is either responsible or irresponsible. If he is responsible, he is the man who should give us the information. If he is not responsible, he should not be there at all. I should like him to give us a full explanation concerning the legal staff of his department.

Hon. Mr. REID: We have in the department a solicitor and an assistant solicitor. Their time is occupied very largely in drawing up leases and contracts, and doing other work of that kind. There is a large amount of that work to be done in the department. Very important cases that have to go to court are referred to the Justice Department, after a brief has been prepared in our department. These important cases that go to court are not in charge of our own counsel. We have always had a solicitor in the department for the departmental work, and I can assure my hon. friend that there is sufficient to keep him busy all the time.

Mr. CANNON: These men in the department are drawing up leases?

Hon. Mr. REID: And agreements and contracts.

Mr. CANNON: I do not think the minister can seriously contend that a man with the title of head counsel for the department, and the assistant counsel, are occupied simply in drawing up leases. I know something about legal work and about leases. We do not need a head counsel to draw up leases because it is simply routine work. The minister mentioned a moment ago that most of the legal work of his department was referred to the Justice Department, and was done, apparently, by the officials of that department.

Mr. REID: Oh, no. I say that some cases are referred to the Department of Justice, which is the legal department for all the other departments of the Government.

Mr. CANNON: Then why refer these cases to the Department of Justice if they are handled by the Department of Railways and Canals?

Hon. Mr. REID: The brief is prepared by the solictor for our department, who understands the matter, but if it is a very important case it may be referred to the Justice Department, who will pass on it finally. If you have a legal gentleman doing that work, he is entitled to the title of solicitor.

Mr. CANNON: This gentleman does not do any work in court?

Hon. Mr. REID: He is there to assist the counsel that acts for the Government. He would prepare the brief.

Mr. CANNON: Where cases go before the court, the Justice Department selects the counsel?

Hon. Mr. REID: But our department counsel prepare the whole case, as well as assist the outside counsel in court. A number of cases arise from time to time that must go before the court.

Mr. CANNON: Then if the department solicitor does all that preparatory work, why does he not go to court and save the expense of engaging another man?

Hon. Mr. REID: The hon. gentleman knows that the counsel employed in cases that go before the Exchequer Court or the Supreme Court is usually a gentleman who has had experience in these courts. Generally these men command a large fee. The salary paid to our solicitor is $5,000. You would not expect a man drawing that salary to have the same experience as a counsel handling very important cases involving a large amount of money.

Mr. CANNON: If, according to the statement of the minister, the departmental counsel is not competent to appear in court—

Hon. Mr. REID: He does appear in court.

Mr. CANNON: But the minister said a moment ago that we had to retain outside counsel because his own counsel had not enough experience and was not competent to appear in court.

Hon. Mr. REID: What I said was that he appears as solicitor assisting the senior counsel in court.

Mr. McMASTER: I quite realize that no large business enterprise can be properly carried on without the assistance of lawyers. That is a self-evident proposition. But what I want to be clear upon is this: Does the Railway Board now operate the Intercolonial?

Hon. Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. McMASTER: That being so, why should we have counsel engaged in railway matters in Ottawa and also a large staff of counsel in Toronto?

Mr. LAPOINTE: And in Montreal.

An hon. MEMBER: And in Quebec.

An hon. MEMBER: And in Moncton.

Mr. McMASTER: Yes, in Montreal, Quebec, and Moncton.

Mr. PARENT: And Toronto.

Mr. McMASTER: I said Toronto.

An hon. MEMBER: And Brome.

Mr. McMASTER: No, not in Brome. The people in Brome are so honest and fair and sensible that we do not have lawsuits with the railways. I want to know why it is that we should have a large staff in Toronto when there are counsel in Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. REID: There are many cases in connection with the Intercolonial that are yet to come before the courts; and it is only a short time ago since the Canadian Northern was taken over. Probably in the near future however, we shall be able to reduce the staff. There are a number of cases in connection with the Intercolonial on which the solicitor is busy all the time getting ready his briefs. Those cases are about to go to the Exchequer Court.

Mr. FOURNIER: The minister says that lawyers are preparing leases. Are not the right of way agent and the assistant right of way agent competent to do this work?

Hon. Mr. REID: They are not solicitors. We have a right of way lease agent who is employed to value properties, but he has nothing to do with drawing leases.

Mr. CANNON: I understood the minister to say that the principal work of the departmental counsel is the drawing up of such agreements.

Hon. Mr. REID: That is one of his duties.

Mr. CANNON: The minister said it was his main work. My own experience as a lawyer in my constituency and around Quebec is different. Whenever the Transcontinental railway expropriates land in the county of Dorchester, or in neighbouring constituencies through which it passes; the agreements and leases are not drawn up by departmental counsel, but by friends of the Government. I want to call the attention of the minister to the fact that some of the gentlemen who do this work are most dilatory. I do not know whether they get paid on the basis of the time they take to do the work of the department, but I know that, in certain cases of expropriation in my constituency, farmers who entered into agreements had to wait for months before they could get their money from the department. I do not think the minister can fairly make the statement that leases and agreements are drawn up by this gentleman to whom we pay $5,000 when I know, as a matter of fact, that in the city of Quebec friends of the Government are engaged to do the work. I am not blaming the Government for throwing work in the way of their friends; but whenever I have advised any of my people in Dorchester, or any people in Quebec, to enter into agreements, I have observed that the department has never made the mistake of sending them to a Liberal notary. They always happen to strike a good Tory. Now, why should we go to the expense of getting outside help when we pay this gentleman for drawing up leases? Are the leases drawn up in Ottawa, and sent to these Tory notaries in Quebec—and I suppose it is the same all over the province—

An hon. MEMBER: All over.

Mr. CANNON: —are they drawn up in Ottawa and sent to these men merely for the sake of giving them a little money? The hon. minister cannot afford to bestow these gifts on his friends. His department ought to be run strictly on economical principles, and if we are paying $5,000 to someone to draw leases he ought to do the work. The Government, I submit, should change the present system and save money; but if they do happen to take outside legal help, as they have done of late, the minister ought to see to it that whoever does the work does it expeditiously and with satisfaction to those concerned. At present there is no satisfaction. For example, there was an expropriation in my constituency at St. Malachie, where a sand pit was taken over by the Transcontinental. Representatives of the Government went there and made a certain agreement, and a notary from the neighbouring parish who belongs to my hon. friend's constituency of Bellechasse (Mr. Fournier), a Mr. McKenzie, was engaged. This man has kept the parties waiting months and months.

Mr. PARENT: Is he a census commissioner?

Mr. CANNON: Evidently the Government was so well satisfied with his work in this connection that they have appointed him census enumerator in the same constituency. He is one of the strongest Tories, and while I do not blame the Government for giving their friends some work, I think they should have the courage to get up in the House and admit it. This gentleman received the documents for examination and study and although they were in his hands for months he kept the farmers waiting for quite a while. Now, such a condition of things should be remedied, and if Tory notaries do not give satisfaction, then the minister should try others, even though they may be Liberals, provided that they do the work.

Mr. McMASTER: As they will.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And as Liberals always do.

Mr. MICHAUD: When the Government railways were directly under the control of the minister, although we had difficulty in getting cases against the railways settled, yet there was more satisfaction to be obtained than is possible now since the railways have been placed under the direction of a corporation. Before the railways were transferred from the direct control of the minister to this body, I must admit we had some satisfaction, such as it was; but now there is no hope whatever for any man of small means to get a case settled against the railways. We have had considerable trouble along the Transcontinental railway for about a year now. It takes about three or four months to get any reply, and then a claim agent goes over the ground to ascertain whether the railway caused any damage or not, and finally the claimants are told: "No damage was done, and you may go ahead and sue if you want to." A great many people living along the railway line have not the means to sue the Government railways to recover their claims, and I promised some of my clients to bring the matter up before the minister, seeing that we have no other means of reaching the Railway Board than through the hon. gentleman himself.

Hon. Mr. REID: Mr. Alward was the solicitor in charge of that work on the Intercolonial and Trancontinental and he is in that position still.

Mr. CANNON: Well he ought to lose it.

Hon. Mr. REID: As far as my information goes he is a good man. If I remember rightly he is a good Liberal too, at least he came from New Brunswick—

Mr. DUFF: Possibly a Unionist.

Hon. Mr. REID: No, I think he was appointed by the late Mr. Emmerson and he is a good man. I understand he is still in the same position and doing good work. He has, I think, been moved to Montreal. He was brought into the department by the late Mr. Emmerson and was promoted to Moncton by the late Mr. Cochrane. I understand he has now been promoted from Moncton to Montreal.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I understand my hon. friend to say that this gentleman is a law officer of the department and that he has been transferred from Moncton to Montreal?

Hon. Mr. REID: Yes. I repeat, that as far as I know, Mr. Alward is a good man. I cannot understand why there should be so much delay when this work is all under the same officer.

Mr. MICHAUD: Is he living in Montreal?

Hon. Mr. REID: Yes he has been moved from Moncton.

Mr. MICHAUD: He is living rather far away from his field of operations.

Mr. CANNON: I endorse absolutely everything that has been said by my hon. friend from Madawaska (Mr. Michaud). In my own constituency merchants have merchandise sent to them over the Transcontinental railway. The Government for reasons not apparent to me have adopted a rather extraordinary way of running their railway through my county. They have stations, but in most cases no station agents, so that the freight is very often lost and consequently merchants are obliged to make claims to the railway. These claims have to be sent down to Moncton, at least that used to be the practice and from there they would be sent somewhere else. Very often we did not know where the claim was sent, but the Moncton people would say "We have received your claim and have sent it to the proper authorities to attend to." Weeks and months would elapse, very often over a year would intervene, and we would have no other news about the claim. That was the condition which existed up to very recently. I know, for I sent a claim to Moncton on behalf of one of my electors in Dorchester. That procedure is absolutely unbearable. If the minister were to say "Well, our staff is not sufficient, that is why we cannot give as good a service as we would like" the committee would, in a manner, understand; but all over the country—in every small centre as well as in every large centre—the Government employs a number of lawyers. Some lawyers are supposed to look after the Intercolonial railway, others are supposed to look after the Transcontinental railway, and still others are supposed to look after the Canadian Northern; the Government has so many lawyers that we really do not know to whom to apply. As an hon. member near me remarks, nearly every Conservative lawyer that we know of has something to do with the government railways in one form or another. I want to draw the minister's attention to another fact which has relation to this special item. A very great hardship for people—not only in my own district but, I think, all over the province—is that the special Order in Council which was to be passed to give legal existence to the famous corporation constituted to look after the whole system of Canadian railways has not yet been passed, if I am well informed. So that every railway which has been taken over by the Government has retained its separate and distinct entity—each is a separate and distinct organization. That is another conditions of things that ought to be changed. If I have a claim against the old

Quebec and Lake St. John railway, why should I have to see the officers of that company when the railway was taken over by the Government several years ago. And the Quebec and Lake St. John railway has a special lawyer in my city—I know him—and has other lawyers in the region through which the line passes. The same condition exists in connection with the Quebec and Saguenay railway, and with respect to every railway taken over by the Government. Why does not the Government resolve once for all, to run the national system on business lines? Why not group all these railways together and have one corporation? The minister has very often said in the House, "I cannot give information that is asked for because that information should be given by the corporation." But that corporation does not exist; it has no legal existence. For instance, what authority has Mr. Hanna to run the Canadian Northern railway? He has no authority from Parliament, and if Parliament did not give him authority, where could he get his authority from? There is no corporation created by law to enable Mr. Hanna and his associates to run the Canadian National railways. Every railway which has been taken over by the Government is still a separate organization. I do not think that is a business way of running things. It is no wonder we have deficits. In the matter of the legal department does the minister for one moment contend that it is a proper policy for the Government to retain all these lawyers acting for the different railways? In my own city, if we have a claim against the Intercolonial we have to go to one gentleman. If we have a claim against the Canadian Northern we have to go to another; and if we have a claim against the Transcontinental we have to go to a third. Is there any sense in that? Why not group all these railways together and have one or two lawyers in each large centre attending to railway matters, and not employ six or seven as is done now? There is absolutely no reason to have lawyers attached to the Department of Railways because the work is done by railway solicitors and not by these gentlemen. The minister mentioned Mr. Alward. I have not the pleasure of knowing that gentleman personally. I do not know whether he is responsible for the system existing at Moncton. If he is as efficient and competent as the minister has said he surely is not responsible, because from the way things were run at Moncton we could not get any satisfaction no matter how hard we tried; we would have to wait months for the settlement of claims for such small amounts as $15, $25 or $30. Sometimes over a year and a-half would elapse before repayment was made. I think the minister should give consideration to that special branch of his department because it needs plenty of reform.

Mr. ROBB: The hon. member has spoken of the loss of freight. I have had some experience with lost freight and overcharges in the case of different railways and I have never had to employ a lawyer to settle the claim. The railway companies generally have their claims agents and if the claim is good it is attended to. I think the minister might now make a statement as to whether there are claims on the national system of railways, and whether these claims agents are doing their duty. If every claims agent is doing his duty there should be no necessity for employing lawyers in such cases.

Hon. Mr. REID: The railways, of course, have their claims agents who go round settling these claims. There may be occasions when they might have to go to the courts, but as a rule these cases are all settled by freight claims agents. The hon. member was talking about some land expropriations and also—

Mr. CANNON: And even about freight claims of very small amounts.

Hon. Mr. REID: Those claims go to the agent appointed especially to settle them. The hon. member asked why we did not consolidate all these subsidiary railways. That is impossible. The Canadian Pacific railway keeps alive all its subsidiary companies and operates them separately, as it were; for instance, the Quebec Central and the Kingston and Pembroke. It is the same with the Canadian National system. The railway the hon. gentleman mentions is part of the Canadian Northern system, although it is called the Quebec and Lake St. John. If judgments were obtained against that subsidiary line the Canadian Northern would of course be responsible.

Mr. BELAND: Are there three boards of management, one for the Canadian Northern, one for the Intercolonial and one for the Transcontinental? I understand very well what the minister has stated regarding the Quebec Central railway, which is leased to the Canadian Pacific and is still administered by its own board. Are we to understand that for each of these Government railways there is a separate board?

Hon. Mr. REID: No. What I wished to convey was this. The Canadian Northern railway for instance has a board of directors, and for any subsidiary companies that form part of the Canadian Northern system the same board of directors is appointed. For the Intercolonial, the Transcontinental and the Hudson Bay railways of course there is no separate board of directors because they have always been owned by the Government. The hon. member will recollect that when the Bill was passed for the consolidating of the Canadian National system we excepted those three railways so that any bonds could be issued against them, The board of directors of the Canadian National system were appointed managers of those Government railways, and in that way they are treated as one system.

Mr. PARENT: Now that we have had the legal aspect of the situation, probably we can get some information about the engineers. Quite a number of them are mentioned on page 96. Among all those engineers I am wondering whether I could find some one responsible for what has happened in the yards of the Transcontinental railway near St. Foy facing the Quebec bridge. A couple of years ago an artesian well was sunk there at considerable expense. A year or so afterwards some one dropped a big piece of steel into that well, with the result that its usefulness has been destroyed and the money expended is a total loss. I wonder if any one of these engineers could remove that piece of steel.

Hon. Mr. REID: The engineers mentioned on page 96 are not connected with railway work at all. Those now in the Railways and Canals Department are employed on engineering work in connection with navigation and highways. The engineer who dealt with this well at Chaudiere, as the hon. member stated would be connected with the Intercolonial railway. The engineers referred to in the Estimates are in the Inside Service.

Mr. PARENT: Undoubtedly somebody must be responsible for the acts of other engineers even if they work in the Outside Service. If the mistake was made by some of the men working under these engineers, they should report to the department, and the minister ought to know what is happening.

Hon. Mr. REID: If the hon. member will give me some information I will make inquifies about the matter. I have not heard of it before.

Mr. PARENT: I did not think the minister understood my question. I did not talk about Chaudiere at all, which is on the Intercolonial railway. I was speaking of St. Foy right opposite Quebec bridge on the main line of the Transcontinental. This artesian well was built to give the people on that side of the river a water supply. It was destroyed because it was part of the Transcontinental line, and the engineer even went so far as to sink a piece of steel in the well. Surely some one is responsible for this destruction.

Hon. Mr. REID: I will make inquiries and get the information for my hon. friend.

Mr. PEDLOW: I find thre is included in this list an assistant purchasing agent, a junior purchasing agent and senior supplies clerk. It certainly would indicate to my mind that there is a senior purchasing agent in charge of this branch of the service. Is there such an officer?

Hon. Mr. REID: We had a purchasing agent for the whole system, a Mr. Lavoie. When the Government took over the railway systems Mr. Lavoie was transferred to Toronto, and this is really the junior clerk. The Civil Service Commission gave him that title. Our purchases are now being made through a purchasing commission, but the services of a clerk are necessary in the preparation of the requisitions, and so on.

Mr. PEDLOW: I find that there are two purchasing agents in the list, one at a salary of $2,520 and a junior purchasing agent at a salary of $1,925. Does it require two men to make out the requisitions for this department?

Hon. Mr. REID: It requires one man and another to assist him.

Mr. PEDLOW: Then the name "purchasing agent" as given by the firm who classified the Civil Service would seem to be a misnomer. These officials are simply clerks.

Hon. Mr. REID: They have to understand purchasing, the nature of goods, and so on, in order to be able to prepare the requisitions and do the necessary work connected with the obtaining of supplies.

Mr. PEDLOW: Then they are merely requisition clerks, not purchasing agents. They fill out the requisitions for the requirements of one particular part of the service and pass them on to a purchasing commission in Toronto. If they are really purchasing agents, a salary of $2,520 would be altogether too small. I find that a file clerk in this department receives a salary of $2,400. The work of a file clerk is of a routine character, and does not require very much brain power, ability or experience, but a capable purchasing agent can scarcely be obtained for the amount named in this item, $2,520. That is why I direct attention to the matter.

Hon. Mr. REID: I agree with the hon. member that you could not get an expert purchasing agent for $2,520. But the duties of these officials are more of a clerical nature, although, as I say, they must understand the nature of the goods, the making of the requisitions, and so on.

Mr. FIELDING: Are the requisitions for the Canadian National Railways made out in the office at Ottawa?

Hon. Mr. REID: No, just for the canals now.

Mr. FIELDING: Then these two clerks do not requisition for the Canadian National railways?

Hon. Mr. REID: No, for the canals only.

Mr. PEDLOW: There is another item here with regard to which I would like some information. The Griffenhagen firm or whoever made the reclassification have apparently not been consistent in assigning salaries to employees doing to same work in different departments. In the Interior Department, for instance, junior file clerks receive $615, $630, $660, whereas in the Department of Railways employees doing the same work are paid $1,300. File clerks in the Interior Department receive $1,005, $1,080 and $1,170, whereas in the Railway Department they receive $1,300. In the Interior Department senior file clerks receive $2,240 and $2,160 whereas the head file clerk in the Railway Department receives $2,400. Has the Minister any explanation to offer of the difference which exists in these cases?

Hon. Mr. REID: It was the Civil Service Commission and the officials of the department who took this matter up and arranged the salaries of these employees, I had nothing to do with it. For each of these positions, however, there is a minimum and a maximum salary, and some officials may have been longer in the service than others, which would result in a difference in the salaries paid. It is the first time it has been brought to my attention that the head file clerk in the Railway Department receives a higher salary than an official doing the same work in the Department of the Interior. If the hon. member would like to get an explanation of the matter, it can be obtained from the Civil Service Commission, and I will make a note of it and, if he so desires, give him the information the next time the Railway Estimates come up.

Mr. PEDLOW: I appreciate the position that the minister finds himself in with regard to the question I asked and the impossibility of his giving a satisfactory answer to it. But does it not strike the minister that there is something wrong in the work done by the Civil Service Commission? That is to say, a file clerk in each department does similar work; there is not much difference in the quality of the work or the requirements for doing it. A file clerk merely files documents, and the same talent, the same ability, would be required to perform the same work in each department, so that the salary for that class of work should be the same throughout the departments. No doubt one of the reasons why there is so much unrest and dissatisfaction amongst the civil service at present is because employees in one department find employees who are doing the same work in another department getting double the salary. I call the attention of the minister to this point, and I think it would be worth while inquiring into it for the general good of the Civil Service at Ottawa.

I understand the Railway Department is not going ahead with much new construction work during the coming year owing to the financial condition of the country. Why, then, does the minister require the services of these solicitors, a right-of-way agent and an assistant right-of-way agent? The services of these men might be dispensed with temporarily, if the department is not proceeding with the construction of new roads.

Hon. Mr. REID: We have a great deal of work going on all the time in connection with the St. Lawrence canal, the Welland canal, and river work. There is plenty of work to keep these men going. When we were looking after the Intercolonial, we had a solicitor and his staff at Moncton doing work, but this work is entirely different from the work in connection with the canals.

Mr. ROBB: I want to draw to the attention of the minister a matter which will come up later under another item, but inasmuch as the minister has referred to the fact that these engineers are mostly associated with the canals, I want to draw his attention to a matter of urgent importance. It is the case of the road around Hungry bay in the county of Beauharnois. The minister will remember an arrangement made between the Government and the county to maintain that road as a dyke, and the road was well maintained and kept in excellent shape until the outbreak of the war when we economised wherever we could. It appears that we have been economising to the extreme, because the reports that are coming to me now are that the road is breaking away into the muck and there is danger of the water washing through. Therefore, it is of urgent importance that the minister instruct his engineers to attend to this matter without delay.

Hon. Mr. REID: I will take the matter up with the engineers to-morrow morning and see whether we have not provided something for repairs, and when my Estimates are taken up again, I shall be able to let the hon. member know just what the condition is.

Mr. DUFF: I see the minister has four travelling auditors, two at $2,640 and two at $2,520 a year. As most of the work in connection with this department has been taken over by the Canadian National Railway Board at Toronto, there surely cannot be sufficient work to keep four travelling auditors busy in this department. The minister might explain why it is necessary to have these four gentlemen, and if his explanation is satisfactory, I will accept it.

Hon. Mr. REID: These auditors are employed largely now in connection with highway work. The provinces receive grants from the $20,000,000 that was voted for highways, and we do not pay any accounts until our auditors have gone over them very carefully and certified that the expenditures are correct. They are really kept busy all the time even with that work. The Railway Department has also to audit the sums of money passing through the department between the Finance Department and the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk, as well as other expenditures in connection with the Railway Department. These men are, therefore, kept very busy.

Mr. DUFF: Do I understand the minister to say that accounts in connection with the Railway Department are first audited by auditors of the Railway Department and then sent to the Auditor General's Department where they are again audited? As regards the amounts advanced to the provinces for highways, I understand that the department send these auditors to the provinces to do the work. If the Dominion makes a grant of money to the different provinces, the least the provinces might do would be to send the accounts to Ottawa for audit, instead of the Federal department having to send auditors to the different provinces to audit these accounts.

10 p.m.

Hon. Mr. REID: I hardly think that would be possible. The hon. member will see that the provincial officers would have to bring to Ottawa all their books, vouchers and everything else connected with the transaction, so that it would be much cheaper and much more satisfactory for our auditors to go, say to Toronto or Quebec, and examine the books. In fact, the provinces probably would not let these documents out of their hands; and when our auditors go to the provinces, they are able to get the explanations from the provincial officials who understand the accounts. I think that is really the only way in which the work could be done. As regards the other question, every account that passes through the Railway Department is audited by our officials before it goes to the Auditor General. Our auditors check up and audit all these accounts, and it saves a great deal of trouble to every one to have these men do the work.

Mr. DUFF: I understand there are two sets of auditors, those in the Department of Railways, and then the regular staff in the Auditor General's Department. I am satisfied with the explanation given by the minister. The minister, however, said that a good deal of the work of these auditors is in connection with grants by the Dominion Government for highways. These grants only commenced a few years ago. Are these four auditors new appointees, or have they been in the department for years, previously doing work in connection with the railways when the Government had full control of the Government railways?

Hon. Mr. REID: These men have been in the department for some years. When the Intercolonial was taken over by the management of the Canadian National Railway system, there was less work passing through the department, but the highway work came on at the same time and these men fell into that work.

Mr. CANNON: Under the new condition of things created since the taking over of all these railways and the establishment of the Canadian National Board at Toronto, what is the quantity and character of the work actually done by the department as regards railways?

Hon. Mr. REID: We have a good deal of work to do. There is a great deal of correspondence in the department in connection with the railways and, of course, we have control of all the canal work as heretofore.. Then there is work in connection with the accounts passing through the Finance Department and the Railways Department. These matters must all be looked into, and there is considerable correspondence in connection with them.

Mr. CANNON: If I understand the Minister rightly, the work is mostly clerical.

Hon. Mr. REID: It is more than that.

Mr. CANNON: Am I to understand from the minister that all the accounts coming from the different railways are sent to his department, and afterwards forwarded by his department to the Finance Department?

Hon. Mr. REID: No, we send our men out to audit the accounts.

Mr. CANNON: Suppose the Canadian National Railways have spent $15,000,000 during a certain period. Has the Department of Railways, or have any of these officials whose salaries we are now voting, anything to do with that expenditure? Are returns made to the department? Do the department's auditors audit these accounts of the different railways?

Hon. Mr. REID: Parliament votes a certain sum of money, and the items for which the money is voted are given in the Estimates. The Department of Railways follows these items and sees that the money is expended as Parliament provided. That is the duty of our auditors.

Mr. CANNON: The railways, according to the system which has been established, run for twelve months. Now, either they have a surplus or a deficit, as has been the case ever since the railways were taken over by the Government, at the end of that time. The amount to cover that deficit is supplied by a vote of Parliament. Is the Department of Railways kept informed every week or every month of the amount that is expended in excess of the amount provided by Parliament? For instance, did the minister know three or four months after the opening of the year that the deficit on the railways was a certain amount, or was he kept in absolute ignorance until the end of the year?

Hon. Mr. REID: We know how the accounts stand from month to month. They are audited every month. The Finance Department will not pay out anything until they have received the certificate from the Department of Railways and Canals that the money has been expended by the railways in accordance with the vote. Our officers go to the head office, or wherever it is necessary for them to go to make the audit, and on their report the Finance Minister issues the cheque.

Mr. CANNON: Do I understand the minister to mean that the board in Toronto cannot expend any money without the minister authorizing that expenditure?

Hon. Mr. REID: They can expend all the earnings without any certificate from the Railway Department, but they cannot get any money from the Finance Department until they get a certificate from the Railway Department that the work is necessary. Then the money is provided as the work proceeds.

Mr. CANNON: If I understand the minister rightly, there is this distinction to be drawn. The board in Toronto has the right to expend all the receipts of the railways, but they cannot expend any money in excess of those receipts until the expenditure has been authorized by the Government.

Hon. Mr. REID: They have to get a certificate from the Railway Department.

Mr. CANNON: Then this year, with a deficit of $70,000,000, the minister authorized the expenditure of every cent of that $70,000,000?

Hon. Mr. REID: Of course, we must authorize it. If the receipts are not sufficient, our auditor must go out and audit the amount over and above the earnings before the board can get any money from the Finance Department.

Mr. CANNON: That is the money is expended and the accounts are audited afterwards? Am I to understand that there is no official in the Department of Railways, not even the minister himself, with any authority to control the expenditure, and that the only thing the Railway Department does is to send out its auditor and then the Government pays to the railways whatever amount the auditor finds has been expended in excess of the receipts?

Hon. Mr. REID: That is right. None of the officials or the minister has anything to do with the expenditure. That is left entirely to the management.

Mr. CANNON: Suppose there was gross mismanagement. In the face of evidence of such mismanagement has the minister no authority, or has no official in his department authority, to stop that mismanagement? Can the board continue to squander the money without the minister being able to interfere?

Hon. Mr. REID: The hon. member must understand that if any case of mismanagement or wrong-doing is brought to the attention of the Government, we could put an end to the management at any time, but we have had nothing of that kind brought to our attention.

Mr. CANNON: Does the minister maintain that even though the returns this year show such an enormous deficit, and even though the accounts are audited by his officials every week or every month, whichever it is, there is nothing wrong with the management, and that he has never interfered with the Board? Am I to understand that he has never interfered on any occasion at all?

Hon. Mr. REID: I have not yet had brought to my attention any case of wrong-doing so far as the railways are concerned; neither have I had any case of mismanagement brought to my attention. The fact that there is a deficit of $70,000,000 does not mean that there has been any wrong-doing. If it did, then every manager of a railway in the United States should be dismissed, because their railways show deficits. A deficit does not imply wrong-doing or even mismanagement.

Mr. CANNON: I am not talking about wrong-doing; I simply used the word mismanagement. Does the minister say that though he observed this deficit piling up every month he never interfered? Did he think everything was all right all through the year?

Hon. Mr. REID: We have a board of management operating the Canadian National railways. They were placed in charge, and have been operating the railway. I have not in any way interfered with them. I feel that if the operation of the Canadian National railways is to be made a success, as I hope it will, there must be no interference by the Minister of Railways or any other member of the Government. That is the position I take.

Mr. CANNON: I do not say that I disagree with the minister, although I think his experience might be very useful even to the board. Perhaps the minister is really too modest when he says he should not interfere. Sometimes interference might be effective. If the management of the Canadian National railways is exclusively under the board, why have a minister of railways at all? Let the hon. gentleman be minister of canals, or of any other department, because it would be a pity for him to leave the Cabinet; but why have a minister of railways when he has absolutely nothing to do with our railways? And there is a personal consideration in the matter. I do not see why the hon. gentleman should shoulder the responsibility for our railway situation and be held accountable throughout Canada for present conditions if, in fact, he has nothing to do with them. Why should he persist in keeping this portfolio when he has no authority whatever? I think he should change the name of his department, and restrict his activities to the canals of the country; the blame for the railway situation should certainly not rest on his shoulders if he asures us that he has nothing to do with the railways. In any event, what has he to do? I think that is a fair question, and it calls for a fair answer. This is an important matter, and I will repeat the question: Why have we a minister of railways? The minister does not answer, but I should like him to justify his retention of the title "Minister of Railways." When am I to receive an answer to this question?

Mr. McCURDY: Next sitting of the House.

Mr. POWER: What are the duties of the Minister of Railways?

Hon. Mr. REID: I have explained that.

Mr. CANNON: The minister explained it by saying that most of the work done by his department consisted in correspondence. Well, I am sure that the hon. gentleman does not do the correspondence himself, and I think that the committee ought to be told exactly what the powers and duties of the Minister of Railways are. The hon. gentleman said plainly a moment ago that he had nothing to do with the railways, and has never interfered with their administration.

Then, if the Minister of Railways has nothing to do with railways, what on earth is he doing?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not wish to interrupt the minister if he is about to reply to the hon. member. If not, I want to ask another question. Returning to the matter of highways, the minister says he has a numerous list of engineers and others employed, because of service in connection with the highways. I take it for granted that it is understood the arrangements between the Dominion Government and the provinces are to continue for the present year?

Hon. Mr. REID: Yes. The hon. member will recall that the Act provided a period of five years; the arrangement is being carried on this year.

Mr. FIELDING: So far as the Dominion Government is concerned, it is intended to continue the same system?

Hon. Mr. REID: Yes; the agreements were and are being made. We must pay our forty per cent so long as the Provincial Governments continue the work.

Mr. CANNON: Will the minister answer my question?

Hon. Mr. REID: I do not wish to be discourteous, but I cannot give any other answer than I have already given.

Mr. CAHILL: No occupation.

Mr. POWER: Is the minister content to remain in well paid inactivity, as Mr. Winston Churchill says?

Mr. CAHILL: I want some light in regard to the directors. Do I understand that these men are directors of the Canadian Northern railway only?

Hon. Mr. REID: And of the subsidiary companies also.

Mr. CAHILL: But not of the Intercolonial, the Transcontinental, or the National railways?

Hon. Mr. REID: No, because they are not a corporate company. They are owned entirely by the Government. The direction of these roads is under the management of the Canadian National railways.

Mr. FIELDING: They are directors of the Canadian National Railways Company?

Hon. Mr. REID: No, of the Canadian Northern.

[Mr. Cannon.]

Mr. FIELDING: Are there no directors for the Canadian National Railway Company?

Hon. Mr. REID: That Bill has not yet been brought into effect.

Mr. FIELDING: There is no such company as the Canadian National Railway Company?

Hon. Mr. REID: That is only a descriptive title. We passed an Order in Council providing that the title "Canadian National Railways" should be used until we brought into force the Act passed two years ago.

Mr. FIELDING: I understand that the term "Canadian National Railways" is descriptive of—

Mr. McGIBBON (Argenteuil): Mr. Chairman, I have been attempting to speak pretty often and so far I have not succeeded in getting the floor. Now I am going to stand up until I get what information I want. I think it is about time that the Minister of Railways and Canals had a few minutes' rest.

Hon Mr. REID: Hear, hear.

Mr. McGIBBON: Now, I have not very many complaints to make; I made them before the Government bought these railways. I had the courage to get up and warn them what was coming. I told them it was going to be a knock-out blow to the country, but they did not believe me. I told them that it would involve a debt not only on the present generation, but on unborn generations, and my words are now proving pretty nearly true. Not only have we not got the debt approximately discharged, but generations to come will be shouldered with a great burden. We have two lines of the Canadian Northern running through my country, as well as a canal, and I think there are sufficient employees on those two railways and the canal to win the next general election for the Union Government.

Mr. DUFF: That is encouraging.

Mr. McGIBBON: They have been making improvements from time to time, and whenever any work is needed to be done a good old Tory gets the job. Two bridges were built in that constituency about ten years ago, and the engineers at that time said they were going to build structures that would be strong enough to stand for all time. Now what do we find? Last year these splendid bridges were pulled down and clumsy, cumbersome things put in their place,—bridges that have no strength whatever. What farmer, if he had a waggon that was not strong enough for his purposes, would, instead of fixing the wheels and axles, make an enormous body that would carry millions of tons?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McGIBBON: Well, the comparison is not so far fetched after all, in view of the nature of these bridges. I say, what farmer would neglect the wheels and axles and build a disproportionate body for his waggon? That is just the case in connection with these bridges. They are tremendous structures capable of bearing a heavier weight than a passing train, but they are placed on weak abutments. I am not an engineer, but I have common sense, and, in my opinion at least, these bridges are not as strong as they were before. It provides work, and the people are employed from one end of the country to the other—they all get jobs. However, I do not know where the money is coming from. I think it would be well for the Minister of Railways with such a big expenditure going on in the county which I represent to take a run down there and size things up for himself. I would be satisfied with his judgment if he would say that this bridge was good for a number of years yet until we get out of debt. Leave it alone for the present; it will carry us all right. But we never find the minister going down there and looking into these things, he leaves matters to the managing committee that is putting the country to such expense from day to day until such a situation is reached that the chances are ten to one if we will ever get out of it.

Mr. CAHILL: I wish to ask the minister a question in connection with these directors. I understand that these gentlemen are directors of the Canadian Northern and its subsidiary companies—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Steele): There was a ruling given by the Chair earlier in the evening that a discussion of such matters is at present quite out of order.

Mr. CAHILL: Matters of what kind?

The CHAIRMAN: Any discussion relating to the item under consideration will of course be quite in order. The item relates to detail of civil government.

Mr. CAHILL: I understand that the Deputy Minister of Railways is a director of the Management Board—is that your understanding, Mr. Chairman?

Hon. Mr. REID: I might say that—

Mr. CAHILL: I was asking the Chairman for his ruling.

The CHAIRMAN: The ruling of the Chair was that discussion of any matters connected with the Outside Service of the railway was quite out of order. Only discussion upon matters pertaining to the vote we are now considering is relevant.

Mr. CAHILL: Am I to understand that discussion pertaining to outside matters is relevant?

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. gentleman did not grasp what I said I will repeat it. I say that discussion of matters pertaining to the Outside Service is not in order.

Mr. CAHILL: Will the Chairman tell me whether the deputy minister would be regarded as belonging to the Outside or the Inside Service? I see that he is a member of the Board of Directors of the Canadian National Railways, and I would therefore like to know if he is to be regarded in the Outside or the Inside Service?

Hon. Mr. REID: I would have to explain that. The deputy minister's salary as such is included in the item under civil government. His position as a director comes under another item, but of course I am willing to give the hon. member any reasonable information he wants. I have no objection to enlarging the field and discussing this or any other item, but the Chairman has ruled that the discussion must be limited to the item we are now considering. If we pass this vote the next item will enable hon. members to talk upon the activities of any branch of the railway system.

Mr. CAHILL: What does the minister mean by the next item?

Hon. Mr. REID: I mean that upon the next item we will take up you could discuss any question in connection with the railways system. I am not raising any objection to the present discussion, except that I think perhaps it would be well to adhere to the ruling that has been given.

Mr. CAHILL: I am quite satisfied, Mr. Chairman, to abide by your ruling but I want you to carve the deputy minister and tell me just what portion of him belongs to the Outside Service and what portion to the Inside Service? Then I can follow your ruling and not render myself liable to be called to order. I have no desire whatever to dispute your ruling; in fact, I wish to follow it. I now wish to know whether the deputy minister, and the other directors of the Canadian National system appoint the management for the Government railways, or whether they are appointed by the Minister of Railways?

Hon. Mr. REID: That is a question I will have to answer myself, and the Chairman can then give such ruling as the case seems to call for. The question has been asked whether the deputy minister comes under this item. He is paid a salary as deputy minister in the Inside Service and that is included in this item. Then as a director he gets a certain amount but that appears in another item altogether.

Mr. CANNON: He gets a certain amount beside his salary?

Hon. Mr. REID: Yes, besides his salary. In the item we are now considering, the amount the deputy minister receives as a director is not included. When we come to the next item hon. members may ask any question they please about the deputy minister or any other of the other directors.

Mr. CAHILL: With your permission, Mr. Chairman, I wish to know what the minister means by "another item." I did not have any idea that we were to go on with any of the Estimates of the Department of Railways to-night. In view of the explanation given by the Prime Minister that a committee was to be appointed to deal with the railways I understood the Miniser of Railways would take up only the items relating to Civil Government. I now ask if it is the intention of the minister to go on with any other item.

Hon. Mr. REID: What I meant was, that if we passed the item relating to Civil Government and proposed to take up another item I would not see any harm in doing so. Then hon. gentlemen could discuss any matters in connection with the operation of our railways. If we remain in committee on the items of Civil Government then the ruling of the Chair must be borne in mind. I am not urging that the next item should be passed if we do go on, but I would then be in a position to give the committee information that was asked for with respect to any item that might happen to be discussed.

Mr. CALDWELL: What is covered by the item "Sundries, $10,000?"

Hon. Mr. REID: My deputy tells me that aplies to incidental expenses in connection with the department. He is now getting the details and they will be available in a moment.

Mr. CANNON: While waiting for those details I would like to again refer to the matter of the salary of the deputy minister. The minister has informed us that the deputy minister is also a director of the Canadian National Railways. I do not think that this is good policy or that it is a all in consonance with the principles of good organization. We are asked to vote this gentleman a salary as deputy minister, and the same official will go to Toronto and sit on the Board of directors and be independent of his own boss. How can we reconcile the two positions? I do not wish to attack the deputy minister, I am sure that he is a good official, but I say that he cannot satisfactorily hold the two positions at the one time. Let him be Deputy Minister of Railways and draw his salary as such, or if he prefers to be a director of the Canadian National Railways let him be that; but he cannot be both. Earlier in the evening the minister explained that all moneys expended by the Canadian National Railways are checked up by the department. Naturally one of those who sees to the very close checking up of those accounts would be the deputy minister, and if on the one hand he is paid to protect his department, on the other hand he is paid also to go to Toronto to spend the department's money. I do not think this anomaly ought to continue any longer. I do not see the reason why Mr. Bell, after being appointed a director, remains deputy minister. I would like the minister to give the committee an explanation on this point and say whether the arrangement works out well. I do not see how it possibly can. How can the deputy minister, after attending to his departmental duties, go to Toronto and act as a director absolutely independent of his minister?

Hon. Mr. REID: The deputy minister gets the usual director's fees. The other directors receive $2,000 each, and there is no reason why he should not receive that amount as well. As I stated a few minutes ago, a large amount of money that is voted by this House on account of the National Railways must be certified to by the board of directors. I think it is a good idea to have an official of the department at the directors' meetings to see that the moneys are properly expended and give any explanations that are necessary.

Mr. CANNON: The moment the deputy head of the minister's department sits on the Board of Directors, and a decision is taken by that board in which the deputy minister concurs, the department is bound. If that decision is not in the best interests of the country how could the department move to have it changed if the deputy minister as director has concurred in it and has shared in the expenditure? The hon. minister had not considered that apparently when answering me a minute ago. To sum up my objection,—the deputy minister represents the department at the board; therefore the department is a party to all decisions taken; and if bad decisions are taken and money is expended which should not be expended, the department is bound by those decisions and cannot exercise a proper checking up of the expenditure.

Hon. Mr. REID: Of course, the hon. member knows that a decision of the board would be final any way, but the deputy minister being on the board would not agree unless they were carrying out exactly what was intended by Parliament. If by any chance that board should do something other than what Parliament had authorized, of course, the deputy minister would inform the minister of the Government on his return, and the mistake could be corrected. I think it is a great advantage to have him on the board.

Mr. CANNON: Has the deputy minister ever disagreed with the decisions of the board?

Hon. Mr. REID: If he disagreed the board would do what was right, because they would not want him to report and recommend the Government to take action. The board might innocently take some action not in accordance with what should be done, and having the deputy minister present he would be able to give them information and advice and see that what Parliament authorized was properly carried out. If he made a report that the board had passed some resolution not in accordance with what Parliament had authorized, I think that some action would be at once taken by the Government.

Mr. CANNON: I do not understand the minister very clearly. At first he told us that decisions taken by the board were final. If such is the case, how could the deputy minister have them changed?

Hon. Mr. REID: The hon. member knows that the actions of the Board of Directors are supposed to be final, and are final unless they are not in accordance with what Parliament has authorized. Now, I say that if the deputy minister reported next day that such irregular action had been taken, the Government would have power to remove the directors. I am satisfied that the presence of the deputy minister to give advice and point out the intention of Parliament is of great assistance to the directors, and I have no doubt they would follow his advice.

Mr. McMASTER: How often does the Board of Directors meet?

Hon. Mr. REID: The Board of Directors have a regular meeting once a month. Of course, they may have special meetings now and again.

Mr. McMASTER: During 1920 how many special meetings were held besides the regular meetings?

Hon. Mr. REID: I have not that information now, but I will get it.

Mr. McMASTER: Are regular minutes of the Board of Directors kept?

Hon. Mr. REID: Yes, by the Board of Directors in Toronto.

Mr. McMASTER: Will those minutes show the attendance of the directors at the meetings?

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) perhaps was not in the House when this item was first reached, and the ruling was given that anything relating to the Board of Directors of the Canadian National Railways could be properly asked only on the item providing the expenditure incurred by that board, which, I hope, will be reached during the evening. The discussion which was brought up by the hon. member for Dorchester was of course more relevant because it related to the position of the deputy minister upon that board, and for that reason was allowed.

Mr. McMASTER: I think it would be proper to ask the minister to ask the deputy minister how often the board met.

The CHAIRMAN: That question was allowed.

Hon. Mr. REID: I said to the hon. member that I did not have that information, but that I would have it at the next sitting.

Mr. CALDWELL: I asked the minister a question a while ago with regard to the item of sundries. We cannot hear very well at this end of the chamber, and I did not catch his reply.

Hon. Mr. REID: The amount is for temporary assistants and various small items, typewriters and things of that kind—small supplies.

Mr. CALDWELL: There is another item here for $13,000 covering printing and stationery. It seems to me that $10,000 is a pretty large item for sundries. If a man included in his statement of election expenses an amount of $10,000 for sundries, his statement would be questioned. The item appears to me to be too large to be allowed to pass without our having some information as to what it is intended for.

Mr. CAHILL: Is there a gentleman named Hayter in the Department of Railways and Canals?

Hon. Mr. REID: He is in the Auditor General's Department. I think he is the official who has charge of the railway accounting in that department. He has never been paid as an official of the Railway Department.

Mr. CAHILL: Who is Mr. Cope? Is he in the Railway Department?

Hon. Mr. REID: When Mr. Bell was promoted to the position of deputy minister, Mr. Cope took his place as financial comptroller of the department.

Mr. CAHILL: At page W-234 of the Auditor General's report, volume 3, 1920, I find some correspondence on the subject of the audit. I find that Mr. Hayter asks for permission to audit the Canadian National accounts, and the correspondence apparently concludes with a letter from G. A. Bell to the effect that all the cheques, vouchers and other documents relative to expenditure made by the Government railway under vote number 96 will be supplied to any person having authority to call for them. I would like to know what "Government railway" means in that connection.

Hon. Mr. REID: The Intercolonial and the Transcontinental.

Mr. CAHILL: The letter refers first to the Canadian National railways and afterwards to the Government railways. It would seem to be misleading in that respect.

Hon. Mr. REID: It says:

> I have been advised by the treasurer of Canadian National Railways that all the cheques, vouchers and other documents relative to expenditure made by the Government railway—

And so on. The Intercolonial and the Transcontinental have been known as the Government railways.

Mr. CAHILL: Under what item do we find the appropriation for the salaries of the managers of the Canadian National Railways?

Hon. Mr. REID: Mr. Hanna and his staff are paid out of the total earnings of the whole system—that is, the several railways that go to make up the Canadian National Railway system. There is apportioned to each part of the system its share of these salaries.

Mr. CAHILL: That cannot be, because there is a separate company there, the Canadian Northern. They employ certain gentlemen and the minister, in turn, employs certain gentlemen for the purposes of management; in this case they happen to be the same persons. Where is the vote for the payment of these men? The expenditure must be submitted to the Auditor General, unless you are cutting corners.

Hon. Mr. REID: The salaries of Mr. Hanna and his officials do not appear in the Auditor General's report. The report laid on the table of the House gives the total revenue and the total expenditure of all these railways, but the details are not at hand just at the moment. However, I will give the information to the House when we come to the particular item concerned, and as it is asked for.

Mr. CAHILL: Well, it is being asked for now.

Hon. Mr. REID: It does not come under this item.

Mr. CAHILL: That may be so, but we are voting the salaries of Civil Government employees in connection with the management of the Government Railways. As I understand it, the Government railways stand in the same position as the Canadian National; they did not change their status in any particular. That is, they bear the same relation to the Government and the people of Canada as they did before, except that the minister employs the same management as he has for the Canadian Northern system.

Hon. Mr. REID: Mr. Hayes was the manager of the Intercolonial before the Canadian Northern was taken over, and the Transcontinental was under Mr.

Brady. Both these managers reported direct to the Government. They resigned these positions when the other railways were taken over and assumed other duties in connection with the Canadian National Railway system. Then we appointed the board of Directors of the Canadian Northern,—what we now call the Canadian National,—as managers also of the Intercolonial and the Transcontinental, and the management was therefore taken over entirely by these gentlemen. Of course, the salaries and expenses in connection with the Canadian Northern system,—what we call the Canadian National system,—are all paid at Toronto and the details kept there. Any information the hon. gentleman wants, I can give to the committee in connection with any of these expenditures. If the hon. gentleman lets me know a little time ahead what information he wants, I can have it ready for him when I am on my Estimates again; or when I am on my Estimates, if he lets me know the information he wants, I can get it for him.

Mr. CAHILL: The other night the minister seemed to be under a sort of eclipse and no information was available. I am delighted to hear him say to-night that he is going to give any information that may be required. He told us this evening that the Canadian National Railway Company, the Bill for which was forced through this House, was never brought into operation. Therefore, there is no such thing as the Canadian National Railway Company; it is not a company; it has no standing, and it is not in a position to hire people and pay them, because it has no funds. Therefore, the employees, the civil servants in connection with the Canadian Government Railways, must be paid by some person. If that does not appear in this item, I should like to know where it appears.

The CHAIRMAN: It appears in item 126, for a loan not exceeding $50,000,000, which may be used "to meet expenditures made or indebtedness incurred at any time by or on behalf of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, the Canadian National Railway Company, or any company comprised in the Canadian Northern Railway system." If the hon. member will also look at item 341, he will find an appropriation there of $7,000,000 towards any deficiency in receipts and revenues necessary to meet working expenditures on the Canadian Government railways. He will see that there are two separate items, and his question would, of course, be in order when those items come up.

Mr. CAHILL: The minister stated that there was no such thing as the Canadian National. The Canadian Northern is a different proposition. We have a Canadian Government railway.

The CHAIRMAN: I cannot answer for the minister; I can speak only for the Chair. The ruling of the Chair is that the question and the discussion in answer to the question put by the hon. member are out of order at this stage.

Mr. POWER: Some time ago, in answer to the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon), the minister made it quite clear that it was no part of his functions to interfere in the management of the Government roads. He also wished the hon. member for Dorchester to state whether he referred to cases of dishonesty or fraud. Would the minister interfere if he had brought to his attention a case of fraud or malpractice on the part of an employee on the Canadian National railways in the discharge of his duty?

Hon. Mr. REID: Matters of that kind have been brought to my attention, and I have immediately brought them to the attention of the Board of Management and they have always taken action. I would be very much surprised if, when a case of that kind was brought to their attention, they should not take action.

Mr. POWER: I asked that because complaints have been made to me with reference to one such case in which the directors would not take action.

The CHAIRMAN: I certainly cannot allow the hon. member to go into that case on this item.

Mr. POWER: I am not going into it.

The CHAIRMAN: It will have to come up under item 126 or item 341.

Mr. POWER: I do not wish to offend the Chairman in any way, but I would ask him to call me out of order when I am out of order. I was not going into this matter; I was asking the minister if I could bring such cases to his attention.

The CHAIRMAN: I will say that the hon. gentleman is out of order in asking the question.

Mr. POWER: I am quite satisfied that the Chairman can call me out of order whenever he likes, and he knows that. But I am asking when I might bring this matter to the attention of the minister, and I do not see that there is any occasion for heat on the part of the Chairman of the committee. I understand, in answer to some question by the member for Dorchester, the minister stated that a reason for a decrease in this item was that Mr. Monsarrat had left the employ of the Government. Who has replaced Mr. Monsarrat.

Hon. Mr. REID: We have abolished that position.

Mr. POWER: Who controls the Quebec bridge?

Hon. Mr. REID: The Board of Directors of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. COPP: Has the minister a purchasing agent in the department at Ottawa?

Hon. Mr. REID: We have an agent here, but he does not make the purchases direct as was done heretofore. Mr. Lavoie used to make the purchases before the Intercolonial and the Transcontinental came under the Canadian National Railway system. Mr. Lavoie was removed to Toronto. We have at Ottawa one or two men who prepare requisitions and attend to arranging items, and then the Purchasing Commission makes the purchases.

Mr. COPP: I notice in this item there is so much for an assistant purchasing agent and so much for a junior purchasing agent, but nothing for a purchasing agent.

Hon. Mr. REID: I explained a little while ago that the Civil Service Commission gave those men those titles. They were employed here as assistants under Mr. Lavoie who had quite a little staff when he was in the department. We had to keep those officials in the department to carry out the work in connection with getting requisitions ready for the Purchasing Commission.

Mr. COPP: What work do the assistant purchasing agent and the junior purchasing agent do? Is it in connection with the Government at Ottawa or in connection with purchasing for Government railways generally?

Hon. Mr. REID: Only purchases in connection with the canals. They have nothing to do with the railways in any shape or form. The purchases for the Intercolonial, Transcontinental, Canadian Northern and all those systems is done through Mr. Lavoie, the purchasing agent at Toronto.

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. COPP: In purchasing for the canals, do the assistant and junior purchasing agents have full authority, or do they just report to the minister?

Hon. Mr. REID: They have no authority to purchase at all. The purchases are made now by the Purchasing Commission which purchases for the several departments of the Government.

Mr. COPP: Are they members of that commission?

Hon. Mr. REID: No.

Mr. COPP: What are they here for if they have nothing to do?

Hon. Mr. REID: They prepare specifications and requisitions. There is a good deal of work in connection with getting specifications and all that sort of thing ready before tenders are called.

Mr. COPP: I see an item in regard to four travelling auditors.

Hon. Mr. REID: I explained that a few minutes ago, but I do not object to giving the explanation again. These men have been in the department for some time. They have a great deal of work to do. They were there when we had the Intercolonial and Transcontinental, and since those roads have been handed over to the management, the highways work has been transferred to our department. All the expenditures in connection with that work made by the different provinces have to be checked up by our auditors. Then they have the canal work as well. We also have to send them to Toronto to audit the expenditures that have been voted by the House. So they are fully employed.

Mr. CAHILL: Since the department is no longer managing our railways, what is the object of retaining a right-of-way agent?

Hon. Mr. REID: He is busy all the time in connection with the canals. Then there is purchasing to be done in connection with other works. Leases, for instance, are being granted almost daily for properties along the canal. I may add that this man used to do work in connection with the Intercolonial. He is a splendid man, a first-class man, and for that reason we have loaned him to other departments, the Public Works Department, for instance.

Mr. CAHILL: I am not making any objections to the man at all. I do not know whether he is a first-class man or a third-class man, but I cannot understand why we should be passing this item for the Department of Railways and Canals when there is really no work pertaining to the railways for this man to do. If his work pertains solely to the canals, why not say so, and let us dispense with this discussion when the Railway Estimates are being considered. I understood that these Estimates pertained to both the railways and canals, but apparently all these officials whose salaries we are voting are doing canal work only, since the Government have washed their hands of the railways. Is the deputy minister considered as the deputy minister of Canals here or as the deputy minister of railways?

Hon. Mr. REID: He is Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals.

Mr. CAHILL: What are his functions as Deputy Minister of Railways?

Hon. Mr. REID: He has a lot to do in connection with the items we are passing. We are voting very large expenditures in connection with the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk, and the deputy minister is responsible for the work in connection with these items.

Mr. CAHILL: That would be in his capacity as director of the Canadian National Railways?

Hon. Mr. REID: No, as deputy minister.

Mr. CAHILL: Why do we need a comptroller and a secretary and the rest of these gentlemen, now the railways have been transferred to the company?

Hon. Mr. REID: The comptroller has charge of the expenditure. There is a comptroller in every large spending department.

Mr. CANNON: I see there are three "secretaries to executive". Who is the executive?

Hon. Mr. REID: There are three secretaries, one for the deputy minister, one for the chief engineer, and one for the comptroller.

Mr. CANNON: And the minister also has a secretary?

Hon. Mr. REID: Oh, yes. The Civil Service Commission has given this title to the secretaries of the three officials I have mentioned.

Mr. CANNON: It seems extraordinary that the comptroller, for instance, should be designated an executive. I understood the executive of a department to be exclusively the head of the department.

Mr. CAHILL: What are the duties of the bridge and structural engineer?

Hon. Mr. REID: That was Mr. Montsarrat. When the Quebec bridge was completed, it was decided to keep Mr. Montsarrat on for a year or two, in order to see that that work was all right. We kept him on, and two or three other gentlemen, and that was the title he had. He retired from the department on March 31.

Mr. CAHILL: Has he been transferred to the company?

Hon. Mr. REID: No, he has gone into private practice.

Mr. DUFF: We are asked to vote $202,000 for salaries, and $28,000 for contingencies, for the Department of Railways and Canals. The salaries are to be paid to ninety-five officials. It seems to me that as they cannot have the work to do that they had before the railways were transferred to the so-called company with headquarters in Toronto, there should be a reduction in the staff, unless the minister can show the committee that there is as much work to do in the department now as there was four or five years ago. The country certainly cannot understand why there should be as many officials in the department now as there were before the railways were transferred. I can understand that the minister is not in a position to give me the information to-night, but I should like him to tell the committee when his Estimates are up again, how many officials were employed in connection with this item under Civil Government in 1914-15, or, say, the year before the railways were transferred to the company.

Hon. Mr. REID: I shall be very glad to get that information. I may say to the hon. member that we made a reduction in the staff last year. I might also say that the highways work has been transferred to the department, which means the addition of a few more officials, at least.

Mr. CAHILL: I see that the head statistical clerk has been eliminated from this year's vote. Is there a statistical branch in the department now?

Hon. Mr. REID: Mr. Payne was head statistical clerk, but he has been retired from the Government service.

Mr. CAHILL: Is there no statistical branch in the department of railways now? Is there no statistical branch available to the Canadian people in any department at the present time?

Hon. Mr. REID: Oh, yes. About one or two years ago a Bill was passed transferring the statistical work of all departments to the Department of Trade and Commerce, and providing that a report should be laid on the Table every year showing the statistics for each department. The Board of Railway Commissioners also keeps statistics.

Mr. CANNON: I see that there is an official here called a records searcher. Am I to understand that the records are lost in the department and that he is supposed to search after them?

Hon. Mr. REID: We have one man, Mr. Ross, who has been in the department many years doing this work of turning up records as they are wanted. A great many applications are made by the public for documents, and this gentleman, who has been engaged in this work for a long time, hunts them up.

Mr. CANNON: Would it not be better to call this official "Keeper of Records"? Was the present title given by the commission?

Hon. Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. CANNON: I wish the minister would have more control over the commission.

Hon. Mr. REID: So do I; I should be glad to.

Mr. CANNON: Any man who looked at the list and saw that this gentleman was a record searcher would naturally be under the impression that records were lost for which he had to search. If he keeps records, let him be designated accordingly. I see that most of the titles ascribed by the Civil Service Commission are quite inappropriate. It would be better for the minister to have proper titles for his officials so that people might know exactly what they were doing.

Hon. Mr. REID: I agree with the hon. gentleman. I have not been entirely satisfied with some of the titles given by the Civil Service Commission, but they have power in the matter.

Mr. CAHILL: I should like some information in regard to Mr. H. Forman, who appears at page "234-W" of the Auditor General's Report.

[Mr J. D. Reid.]

Hon. Mr. REID: He is treasurer in Toronto. I will have information in regard to him when we come to the next item.

Mr. CALDWELL: The Minister of Railways has told us that he has no control over the Board of Directors. He has said on two or three different occasions that the deputy minister attends meetings of the Board of Directors, and may exercise certain control over their deliberations. Does the deputy act under the direction of the minister? If he does, we can establish the connection and show that the minister in an indirect way, through the deputy minister, has control over the Board of Directors.

Hon. Mr. REID: I must answer, "no."

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

On the motion of Right Hon. Mr. Doherty for the adjournment of the House:

Mr. FIELDING: What will be the business to-morrow?

Mr. DOHERTY: We expect to take up the Estimates of the Department of Marine and Naval Affairs, and of Railways, and the motion for the appointment of a committee in connection with railway operations.

Mr. FIELDING: That is a motion of which we require longer notice. I will not press my objection at the moment, but it really requires two days' notice.

Mr. DOHERTY: If it is not ripe for action, it will not be taken up.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 11.20 p.m.

Thursday, April 7, 1921

The House met at Three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEE

Mr. MICHAEL STEELE (South Perth) presented the report of the Select Standing Committee on Private Bills.

PAPERS TABLED

Return showing quotations of different classes of Grand Trunk Railway Company's stock in January 1918, etc.—Hon. Mr. Reid (Grenville).

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—EMPLOYEES' REMUNERATION

Mr. MURPHY:

1. What rates are paid now as compared with 1916 on Canadian National Railways, per month, per day, or per hour, for the following classes of employees:—Engineers, Firemen, Conductors, Trainmen, Shop Mechanics, Carmen, Agents and Operators, Freight Shed Men, Trackmen, Bridge and Building Men?

2. Have there been any particular changes since 1916 in working conditions, such as length of working day, overtime regulations, etc., which further increased compensation over changes in rates, if so, what are such changes for each of the classes named in question number one?

3. What would be the comparative monthly compensation as between now and 1916 paid each to engineers, firemen, conductors, and trainmen (allowing average overtime conditions), in the following classes of service:—Through passenger run, Local passenger run, Through freight service, Local freight service.

4. What are the monthly earnings as compared with 1916 for the following classes of employees working full regular working hours:—Shop Mechanics, Carmen, Agents and Operators, Freight Shed Men, Trackmen, Bridge and Building Men?

5. What would be the monthly earnings of the classes of employees named in question 4 if required to work the same regular working hours as existed in 1916 at present rates as compared with the rates paid in 1916?

6. Do any of the classes of employees named in the foregoing questions receive any compensation or privileges in addition to their rates of pay, such as commissions, free or reduced rental, living accommodation, fuel, light, transportation, etc? If so, in a general way what are such concessions and what are they valued at in individual cases?

Hon. Mr. REID (Grenville): The answer is a very lengthy one and would take about half an hour to read. The subject, however, is a very important one and if possible I would like the information to appear in Hansard.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Dispense with the reading of it.

[NOTE.—The answer to the foregoing question is given as an appendix to this days Debates.

TORONTO POST OFFICE—PROMOTIONS

Mr. HOCKEN:

1. How many promotions have been made in the Toronto Post Office since February 1, 1921?

2. Under what authority were the promotions made?

3. What are the names of the persons so promoted?

Hon. Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1. Two. There may be certain officers in the Toronto Post Office whose rating was improved under the reclassification but these cannot be regarded as promotions.

2. Under the authority of the Civil Service Commission.

3. Miss E. A. Robinson and H. Davis.

REV. N. TAPPERT

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

1. Did the Government of Canada, at any time during the past six years, pay compensation to the Rev. N. Tappert, an American citizen resident, some years ago, in the city of Kitchener, for injury suffered at the hands of a mob?

2. If so, what was the amount of said compensation?

3. If not, was any demand for compensation made, at what date and by whom?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1. No.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

S.S. CANADIAN BEAVER

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough):

1. Did the steamer Canadian Beaver sail from Halifax for Barbados on or about March 28, 1921?

2. Is this steamer equipped for passengers? If so, for how many?

3. How many passengers did this vessel carry on the said trip?

4. What is her deadweight tonnage and how many tons of freight did she carry from Halifax on said trip?

Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE:

1. The Customs reports indicate that the steamer Canadian Beaver cleared from Halifax for Barbados on or about March 26, 1921.

2. No.

3. The department has no information.

4. The deadweight tonnage of the vessel is 3,972½ tons. The department has no information as to the quantity of freight carried on the voyage referred to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—FOREMEN AND ENGINES

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. How many road foremen of engines are at present employed by the Canadian National Railways?

2. What are the wages paid to said employees?

3. What are the duties of said employees?

Hon. Mr. REID (Grenville):

1. Officers formerly known as Road Foremen of Engines are now called Assistant Master Mechanics. There are 32 now employed on Canadian National railways.

2. Various rates from $250 to $325 per month.

3. Assistant Master Mechanics deal with mechanical matters on Superintendents'

Divisions to which they are assigned, including supervision of enginemen and shop staffs.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. REID (Mackenzie):

1. What is the total number of persons in the employ of the Dominion Government, including both the inside and outside services, but not including the Canadian National Railways?
2. How many persons are in the employ of the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. WRIGHT:

1. How many employees has the Government in the British Isles?
2. What is the number of departments maintained?
3. How many employees has the Government in the United States?
4. What is the number of departments maintained?

PROPOSED GRAIN INQUIRY

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): Before the Orders of the Day are called I would like to ask a question of the Government with reference to a despatch from the special correspondent of the Montreal Gazette, appearing in that paper I believe on Monday last, to the effect that the Government has decided upon a grain inquiry, and that the two commissioners in the said inquiry would be Judge Hyndman, of Edmonton, and Mr. Staples, one of the present Board of Grain Commissioners. I would like to ask the Prime Minister if that statement is correct?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): The Government has not appointed any person on the grain inquiry, nor has there been any Order put through for an inquiry under the Act. Requests have been made to see if certain parties would accept; beyond that nothing has been done.

Mr. CRERAR: I would further ask if the Government has decided upon such inquiry, and if so when it will be undertaken?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Government's decisions in these matters are embodied in Orders in Council, as my hon. friend very well knows from his experience and from his undoubted intelligence, and when the Order is passed it will appear.

Mr. CRERAR: Not a very illuminating reply.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Do you expect anything else?

[Hon. Mr. Reid.]

SUPPLY—RESOLUTION FOR ONE-SIXTH OF AMOUNT REQUIRED FOR NEXT FISCAL YEAR

On motion of Sir Henry Drayton (Minister of Finance) the House went into Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON moved:

Resolved that a sum not exceeding $71,499,703.70, being one-sixth of the amount of each of the several items set forth in the main Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1922, and one-sixth of the amount of the item for a provisional bonus allowance for the Inside and Outside services of the Civil Service, set forth in the Supplementary Estimate for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1922, be granted to His Majesty for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1922.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: How much?

Mr. CHAIRMAN: It would perhaps be better for the Chairman to again repeat the motion. It is made by the hon. Minister of Finance for one-sixth of the entire Supply for the present year. Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the motion?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, I think very strong exception should be taken to acceding to the request of the Government. We on this side of the House have repeatedly pointed out that the only way in which the public can exercise its control over expenditures is to have ample opportunity of discussing the Estimates in detail before any part of them is voted. We wish to preserve the public in that right, particularly as the expenditures are mounting up as never before in the history of this country, the total Estimates for this year thus far presented being between $500,000,000 and $600,000,000. We have had very little opportunity of discussing these Estimates, many items of which are liable to be subjected to considerable criticism and, we hope, considerable reduction. Without giving the House full opportunity of considering all the Estimates, we contend that we should not be called upon to vote blindly one-sixth of the total amount as the Government is asking.

I would point out that at the conclusion of last session we drew the attention of the Government to the circumstance that in order to give Parliament the opportunity it should have to control public expenditures, it was desirable that Parliament should be called earlier in the new calender year, if not before the close of the year preceding, and we received assurances from members of the Government that such would be done. The fact that Parliament was not called until the middle of February is no fault of hon. members, it is entirely the fault of the ministry. Under these circumstances, Mr. Chairman, standing on the broad principle of the right of the people to a full knowledge of what is to be done with the money which they are obliged to pay in the form of taxation, we must take strong exception to granting the portion of the Supply asked for and so depriving the House of the opportunity of discussing the items in detail.

But in taking this stand we have no desire in any way to embarrass or penalize the Civil Service because of any neglect on the part of the Government, we will be perfectly willing to consider any arrangement with a view of providing what may be necessary in the way of salaries both for the Inside and Outside Services. As respects other expenditures, however, we contend that except as agreed upon, this Parliament should have the full right of examining in the closest detail every item of the Estimates before voting any portion of them.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Chairman, it is quite correct that the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) did draw the attention of the Government to the advisability of having the business brought down at an earlier date, and I think it has been. It is quite true that he also, during last session, took exception to the practice of voting interim Supply. His objections are objections which apply to a principle that has obtained for many years, and I am very much afraid that, apart altogether from what we might like to do, the exigencies of parliamentary government mean that this principle of interim Supply is something which we will have to continue. It is not a new principle that is being now attacked, nor is it a principle which is confined to Canada. It is something which has to be done in every country where parliamentary government is carried on and the public moneys are dependent upon the votes of deliberative associations or parliaments.

In view of the objection raised by my hon friend on the matter of principle, I have taken the trouble to look up one or two precedents to see just exactly what this principle is and what it is founded upon. I will read in the first instance from "Procedure in the British House of Commons," by Redlich, a leading authority. This is what he says:

There is no need here to add anything to what has already been said about the former (Supplementary Estimates), but it is necessary to study a little more closely the mode in which the House of Commons provides for current necessities before the final Estimates are adopted. The peculiarity consists in the fact that a grant on account, a temporary provision for national financial administration, has been converted into a necessary organic part of the year's finance. As the financial year closes on the 31st March, and Parliament does not receive the Estimates until about the beginning of the same month, it is absolutely impossible for the year's Supply to be granted before the year begins. Moreover, the traditional arrangement of parliamentary business makes the extension of the debate on Supply over the whole length of the session, or at all events over the greater part of it, an indispensable necessity of political tactics and parliamentary management. On the other hand, the Government must have money by the first of April, and can only get it from Parliament. The annual provision required is not made, as in most Continental countries, by giving temporary authority to levy taxes and incur expenses on the same footing as in the old year, nor is there a grant of an aliquot part of the estimated total as in the case of the twelfths of the French budget. The method adopted brings out clearly the financial supremacy of the House of Commons which grants votes on account, advances on the basis of the Estimates laid before the House.

At one time, Mr. Chairman, we had not as much difficulty in connection with interim Supply as we have had of recent years. When our fiscal year ended on June 30, as there was that much longer time greater progress could be made with the Estimates. But even under the old regime—and I have not thought it necessary to go back more than a certain number of years—when the fiscal year ended on June 30, I find that in the session of 1899 interim Supply was passed in connection with the following dates: Parliament opened on March 16, closed on August 11; main Estimates were tabled on April 24—over a month after Parliament opened—and the interim Supply was voted on July 5. Then again, in 1903, we had an interim vote of one-fifth and the dates were: Parliament opened on March 12, closed October 24; main Estimates tabled March 16, interim Supply voted on July 8. In the following year, 1904, there was an interim Supply Bill. Then the fiscal year is changed, and the change becomes effective in the year 1906-07. In 1907 the interim Supply Bill was for one-fifth. In 1908 there were two interim Supply Bills, the first for one-eighth and the second for one-eighth. In 1909 the interim Supply voted was one-fourth; in 1910, one-fourth. In 1911 there were two, the first—

Mr. CANNON: May I ask the minister where this resolution is to be found on the Order Paper?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is not on the Order Paper. The resolution is brought up in the ordinary way in committee, notice having been given the night before last.

Mr. CANNON: I understand that the minister is now introducing a resolution upon which a Bill is to be based.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is in Supply. It is a motion for interim Supply.

Mr. CANNON: It will be a Bill for interim Supply?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: A motion for interim Supply, on which, of course, a Bill will subsequently be founded, just as a bill is subsequently founded on the main motion for Supply.

Mr. CANNON: Then I rise to a point of order. If a bill for interim Supply is to be based on the resolution, I submit that the resolution should have been preceded by notice. There has been no notice of the resolution; it is not on the Order Paper, and I submit that any discussion of it at this stage is not in order.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Unless I am entirely wrong, the hon. member will find that notice of a motion of this kind has never been given. Notice is not given of motions made in Committee of Supply; they all come under the general motion with reference to Supply.

Mr. CANNON: There is a distinction to be made. To-day the Speaker left the Chair without motion and we automatically went into Supply; if we had taken up the Estimates of one special department the minister at the head of that department could have introduced a resolution and no notice would have been necessary. But this is altogether different. The minister in introducing a resolution now is laying the foundation for a money Bill, and such a resolution should be preceded by notice. We have had no notice and I submit that the procedure followed by the minister is altogether irregular and that the committee at this stage cannot consider the resolution. This is a resolution preceding an interim money Bill; it is not the ordinary going into Supply to consider the Estimates of one particular department.

The CHAIRMAN: Does any other hon. gentleman desire to speak to the point of order before a decision is given?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I should like to say, Mr. Chairman, that I have been unable to find any cases in which such notice has been given as the hon. gentleman suggests. The practice followed is the practice indicated by the law officers of the Crown as being the correct one.

The CHAIRMAN: The point of order, as I understand it, which has been raised by the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr Cannon) is that as the House to-day went automatically into Committee of Supply and we are not considering the Estimates of any particular department, this resolution should have been preceded by notice. There is nothing in the rules of the House, nothing in the procedure and in the precedents reported by different authors on the subject, which in any way indicates that a resolution for interim Supply—in other words, a vote on account—must be preceded by a notice of motion of any kind. The Estimates were submitted to Parliament with a message from the Governor General; they were referred to the Committee of Supply and the entire Estimates are before that committee to be dealt with as the committee may see fit. If the Committee of Supply desires to vote at one time ont-fifth or one-sixth of the total amount, the committee certainly has that right. Therefore, so far as the question of notice is concerned, no notice is required, and I would so rule. The hon. member for Dorchester did, however, draw attention to the fact that to-day the Speaker—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not hear the hon. member raise the other point to which you are now proceeding, Mr. Chairman, as to this being Thursday; I would like to have spoken to it. I feel that a reading of the rule would make it clear that it was not intended to apply to prevent a motion for interim Supply being made on Thursday.

Mr. FIELDING: Why?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will give the reason in a moment. If the Chair held that that was the rule, I do not know that the Government would be at any disadvantage, because if it is the meaning of the rule that we cannot take a general vote on a fraction of Supply on Thursday or Friday unless all departments have been in Supply previously, then necessarily if we were to move a motion for interim Supply on Tuesday, on Thursdays and Fridays, after that we could go on with anything. It would work both ways, and I think that was never intended.

Mr. FIELDING: I shall not deal now with the general question of notice; I shall, if I am permitted, deal with that a moment later. Under the rules—rules, by the way, for which I do not think we on this side are particularly responsible, but rules which in its judgment the House at the time of their adoption deemed wise—the House may go into Supply on Thursday and Friday without any delay, without any debate. But there is a condition attached—that you cannot take up in the Committee on those days the Estimates of any department which have not previously been under consideration. Now, there are a number of departments the Estimates of which have not yet been under consideration. I think I am correct in saying that, though I know the right hon. gentleman would endeavour to get around the rule by taking an odd item here and there and in that way bringing in all the departments. Now, if we could not under that rule take up a given item in any one of these departments whose Estimates have not previously been considered, I do not see how we can take them all in bulk. It seems to me that a motion of this kind can only be adopted by general consent or agreement.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I simply want to emphasize again the fact that if that view is held, it necessarily follows that on Thursday and Friday we can go into Supply on any department at all.

Mr. FIELDING: We will argue that when it occurs.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no question at all that that follows; that there is no escape from it. I do not think that would be fair to the House, though it certainly would be a great advantage to the Government.

The CHAIRMAN: As this further point has now been discussed by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) and by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), I must point out that Rule 17c states, in part:

> On Thursdays and Fridays. . . . Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair without putting any question, provided that, except by the consent of the House, the Estimates of each department shall be first taken up on a day other than Thurday or Friday.

There are in the Estimates which are now being considered in the interim Supply vote the Estimates of all departments, and the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's has pointed out that the Estimates of a number of those departments have not yet been considered. For that reason, they cannot be considered on a Thursday or a Friday without the unanimous consent of this committee and the Chair is obliged to so rule.

If the committee desires the Chairman to continue the ruling and decide the question of what may happen later—

Mr. FIELDING: I submit that the Chairman ought not to be asked to decide now what he will do next week. I do not desire to take technical grounds of objection. I would like to assist the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) if I could in this matter, because I know from experience the embarrassments suffered on occasions of this kind. The real difficulty is, of course, that the Government—and perhaps other governments have done likewise—have been slow in summoning Parliament. Parliament should be called early, and the idea of Parliament being summoned to meet early in February and expected to get a Supply Bill through before the end of March, is unreasonable. I have no doubt, however, my hon. friend can cite previous cases where Parliament has not been called early. We all want to see that members of the Civil Service at Ottawa—and I would not confine this to Ottawa; wherever there is a wage earner in the employ of the Government—should receive their salaries. Because they are not usually rich men. I think a reasonable view of the matter would be that the hon. gentleman should ask by common consent of the House—and I do not want to oppose him—for a vote on account, with the condition that it will be applied only to wages, salaries and things of that sort. Let me state my reasons for taking this ground. As an illustration, suppose there are large sums which have been appropriated for the railways, concerning which there is much contention, and let us suppose that we on this side have good grounds for opposing any one of those appropriations. We desire an opportunity to discuss them, to divide the House upon them—I am only supposing; —we may be wrong, but that is our right, and we ought not to have any interference with our right. Here we are, going to make a vote of those very appropriations to which, perhaps, we are opposed in toto. That is not reasonable, and I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that he might get over this difficulty by agreeing, either now or at a later stage, that the Supply for which he is asking now should be applied only to salaries, wages and purposes of that kind. That would be a fair proposal.

My hon. friend is sometimes sensitive—I will not say unduly sensitive—in the matter of notice. This is a matter of which we have had substantially no notice at all. Last night when we asked about the business of to-day, we had no intimation given to the House that this matter was to come up, although it appears that some mention was made of it on a previous occasion. It does not appear on the Order Paper, nor on the Votes and Proceedings. I do not take the technical objection that it is not on the Order Paper, but I do not know of a motion of this kind having ever been brought up before without a previous understanding with the leader of the Opposition. I do not say that that is necessary; but I speak from experience, and I am quite sure I am correct when I say that, in all my experience, no motion of this kind was ever before made without a previous understanding between the Minister of Finance and the leader of the Opposition. No mention of this matter was made last night when we asked about the business of the day, although we may be told that some mention was made of it the other day and we can find it if we look at Hansard. I do not, however, wish to take a technical objection; my desire is to assist the Minister of Finance, and my suggestion, which I make entirely for myself, is that we agree to give the Government this Supply with the distinct understanding that it shall apply only to salaries, wages and urgent matters of that kind.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have had a good deal of experience in matters of this kind, both in Opposition and while a member of the Government. It is perfectly obvious that you can get a vote on account only by consent, because on every item with respect to a vote on account, you could take up just as much time as you could in passing the entire Estimates. Therefore, it goes without saying that this must be by consent. The point to which the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding has called attention is one that has arisen in the past, and it has always been met by this understanding—in numerous cases in my experience, both while in Opposition and while a member of the Government—on the part of the Government of the day, that any vote on account of any particular item shall not in the least prejudice the right of the Opposition to attack that item and to move for its reduction or its total removal from the Estimates.

Mr. FIELDING: In the meantime, it might have been spent.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Only a very small fraction. At all events, whether the method to which I have alluded is right or wrong, it is one that has always been pursued in the past. It is quite correct, as the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's has said, that there is a conference in these matters between the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition, and I gathered that there had been a conference with regard to the matter in this particular instance.

Mr. FIELDING: I understand, not.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If that is not the case, my hon. friends have the matter before them now, and if they desire that there shall be a further delay until a further conference or a conference takes place, that course should be pursued in such an instance. I should like to say that I myself tried once, in Opposition, under what I thought were somewhat serious circumstances, the policy of refusing any vote on account, and before ten days were over, I got very tired of my position, because I heard, I think, from every province and from nearly every community in Canada on the subject. I should be very sorry to see the policy, which has been followed in the past, permitting a vote on account in the public interest and for the public service, to be abondoned in this Parliament for the first time.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is always a pleasure to listen to the right hon. gentleman, and I wish we would hear him speak more often. He has just reminded the House that he has done some little obstruction in the past. In one instance he succeeded, unfortunately, and as a result he is somewhat responsible for the state in which the country is to-day. I wish to tell my right hon. friend and the leader of the Government (Mr. Meighen that no one on this side, during the great crisis through which the country is passing, is desirous of obstructing the country's business; but the country has a right to expect that the affairs of this House shall be conducted in the old traditional way. What is the principal function of this House, if it is not the control of the expenditure of public moneys? It is the traditional function of Parliament to control the expenditure of public moneys. We are to-day passing through the most serious financial crisis through which this country has ever experienced, and we are asked to rush this interim Supply on account without any scrutiny. We have to face huge deficits, and the amounts asked in the Estimates are beyond the means of the Canadian people unless we resort to extreme taxation measures. Yet, the right hon. gentleman (Sir Robert Borden) comes with a smile and pleads and says: "I have tried obstruction on similar lines in the old days; I have not succeeded. People soon began clamouring for the money." My hon. friend will not hear to-day from the country what he says he heard ten of fifteen years ago about expenditure. Then the people were willing to spend money; they knew the country was rich, but this is not the mood of the Canadian people to-day. They want to see reduction in military expenditures, reduction on the merchant marine and on the naval programme; reduction in expenditure on the Mounted Police. I repeat again: I do not care to resort to obstruction. This is not a time to play politics.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If the Tories are willing to play politics, the Liberals and the Progressives are not. Further, I would like to make this statement: In view of the deficit of $70,000,000 which was proclaimed throughout the whole country the other day by the Minister of Railways and Canals, some one in this House should have the courage to demand that that deficit shall not be met by additional taxation, but by a reduction in the Estimates. In view of the financial situation in which the country finds itself to-day, that is the only way in which that deficit ought to be met. I, for one, am not afraid of what may be said in the back concessions about the expenditure of public moneys. I am listening to the voice of my conscience.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Who is the man that has not a conscience? Mr. Chairman, I will have the courage to back up my words, and I shall await the verdict of the House. If not I personally, some on in authority on this side of the House will propose a serious cut in the expenditure this year. I am ready to reduce the amount provided in the Estimates by at least $50,000,000. We are asked to vote one-sixth of the total Estimates and I understand from the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Meighen) that there will be no expenditure on items which might be considered contentious. I accept his word, as I would the word of the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), but I say that this is not the proper way to conduct the public business. Let us get back to normal. We have lost our bearings for the last six years. We have been rolling in millions since the war, and the right hon. the member for King's (Sir Robert Borden) is largely responsible for the reckless expenditure of public moneys during the war. It is well to-day that he should help by his advice and by his presence the unfortunate heir to the legacy which he has left to the country. I say, let us return to the normal, and I am here only repeating what several hon. members who are supporters of the Government and what the people at large are saying. It is time we should get back to a common-sense basis in this country. We have been spending too recklessly. Surely, it is time to stop. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who was elected chiefly because he was a business man, has practically lost all his reputation in that respect since he joined the Government. Once more, let us get back to normal. Let us live no longer in a fool's paradise. The trouble to-day, Mr. Chairman, is that we do not control the expenditure; we do not scrutinize in detail the items in the Estimates, but pass them holus-bolus. In a few days the Budget, I suppose, will be delivered, and after some weeks' discussion we shall have reached the dog-days and every member will be anxious to get home. Then the people of this country will be burdened once more with a bill of expenditure which can only be met by more taxation. Mr. Chairman, I protest against that mode of procedure. I say, let the Committee of Supply of this House of Commons get back to its traditional function of scrutinizing every item, and reducing the expenditure where that is necessary. Then hon. gentleman opposite may come and ask us to pass certain non-contentious votes, if they be such that the House of Commons will agree to them. But as a representative of the people, and as a taxpayer, I protest against the high-handed procedure which the present motion, if carried, will occasion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I must thank the right hon. member for King's, the ex-Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) for reminding the House and indeed the Prime Minister himself, that courtesy and conference should be a part of the proceedings of this House. Let me say in reference to what my right hon. friend has said that I have always understood that in matters of interim Supply there would be something in the nature of a conference between the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition before anything of the kind was sprung upon the House. In the present case, no conference of any kind has taken place between the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) and myself, or between the hon. the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) and myself. The motion this afternoon is the first intimation I have had of any intention on the part of the Government to bring up to-day an interim Supply vote.

In order that the House may fully appreciate the significance of the action of hon. gentlemen opposite in attempting to rush this matter through, may I direct the attention of hon. members to the fact that the amount we are asked to vote now, if one-sixth of the Supply as set out in the Estimates, is little less than $100,000,000. We came into this House without the slightest warning one way or the other that we should be asked to vote $100,000,000 and we are told by hon. gentlemen opposite that by virtue of the force of their majority they intend to rush that amount through this Parliament without affording any opportunity whatever for consideration of the expenditures involved thereby. If my right hon. friend is going to rely upon might as his means and method of carrying on the business of this Parliament he may do so, but I tell him that all such methods of might are Prussian methods. I propose that we on this side of the House shall take our stand in accord with British methods—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. gentlemen opposite do not seem to appreciate what is meant by the word British. I wish to tell them that wherever there has been a Parliament carried on in accordance with British traditions, it has stood for the rights of the people in protecting them against extravagant expenditure on the part of the Government. It has stood for the rights of the people's representatives in Parliament to control public expenditure and the public purse, and that right has always been exercised in Committee of Supply by allowing the freest latitude to hon. members to discuss every single item in the Estimates before the money with respect thereto is appropriated by Parliament. There are only two methods of conducting public business: one is the method of relying upon reason, upon discussion, upon conference; the other is the method of relying upon might, upon force. There is no other alternative. Hon. gentlemen opposite have not even attempted the first method. They have not even accorded us an opportunity of considering whether the particular vote they are asking Parliament to accede to to-day should or should not be granted, either in whole or in part. I say, Mr. Chairman we on this side of the House will not consent to vote any $100,000,000 by virtue of the force of the majority which the Government has behind them. We will expect at least something in the nature of a conference between the two sides, or there will be no acceptance of the proposal to vote any such amount.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would like to join with my hon. friend in what he says as to the exercise of courtesy in this chamber. I would like to see some at least of our important business discussed without perhaps quite as much heat, and perhaps a little more fairly. There is no doubt about one thing, and that is that we should give proper notice, but I had understood that the hon. gentleman had absolutely refused to have anything to do with interim Supply. I may be wrong, but unless my ears are very far from being perless my eyes are very far from being perfect, he solemnly declared in this House this very session that there would be no interim Supply. So under the circumstances I did not know of any other way of bringing up the matter than the one in which it has now been brought up. But I want to say this: if, notwithstanding my hon. friend's declaration of weeks ago, he is not to-day willing to discuss this question, I certainly do not want to take him by surprise, and I would be willing to have the matter stand. But before it does stand I think we ought to understand a little more clearly just where we are and what we are at.

In the first place, I wonder if we can get away from dealing in extravagant statements.

Mr. CANNON: I did not wish to interrupt the minister, and I am prepared to accord him every courtesy to which he is entitled. On the other hand, I desire to remind the committee that the chairman has ruled this discussion out of order.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The chairman did not exactly rule that the discussion was out of order. He ruled that the resolution could be considered only by unanimous consent. The [illegible] clearly given [illegible] hon. [illegible] proceed [illegible] sumed [illegible] mous co[illegible]

Mr. CA[illegible]

The CH[illegible] to any motic[illegible] sent, any hon. member has the right at any time, before the motion is carried, to object to the discussion. The hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) having objected, I must maintain his objection; but in all fairness to the hon. Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) I think that by unanimous consent he might be allowed to conclude his remarks and we could then proceed to some other item.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Before leaving the question of notice, the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen), calls my attention to the fact that on the night before last notice was given that we intended to bring up this question. That notice was given in this way:

> Mr. Mackenzie King: What business will be taken up to-morrow?
> Mr. Meighen: The House will be moved into Committee of Supply on Labour and Railway Estimates; those are what we will take up first. There may be two or three Government orders that would be gone on with first, but not such as would likely be contentious. Notice was given to-day of a motion for interim supply, which, if the notice is sufficient, will be gone on with.

I may say that instructions were given to the law officers to give notice, but they say that it is not necessary, and should not be given, and that is consonant with the ruling given to-day by the chairman.

> Mr. Mackenzie King: When was that notice given?
> Sir Henry Drayton: This afternoon, I think.
> Mr. Mackenzie King: I am not aware of it.
> Mr. Meighen: It would simply be handed in.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Go on; read the whole of it: "I suppose."

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: (Reading):

> Mr. Mackenzie King: "I suppose" my right hon. friend speaks of going on with the Estimates of the Railway Department to-morrow. Possibly the motion of which he has just given notice had better be disposed of before we go on with the Railway Estimates. We would like to know before we discuss those Estimates what information we are likely to get from this committee when it functions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is no statement there that this matter would be definitely taken up.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is an intimation there to the effect that a motion for interim supply would be proceeded with.

Mr. FIELDING: For the next day's business. The intimation we received last night was different.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perfectly true, but I do not know that that was evasive. The statement of the Prime Minister was plain—

Mr. LAPOINTE: As all the Prime Minister's statements are.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: —and I do not think that hon. gentlemen will receive the greatest degree of courtesy in this House if idle charges of evasion are to be hurled across the floor. The language I have quoted is plain and speaks for itself. Now, let us see if we can get down from extravagant figures and come to actual facts. Heaven knows the figures are large enough. But the resolution does not call for the one hundred million dollars which the hon. gentleman refers to, although it does call for a very large sum. It calls for an amount not exceeding $71,000,000 odd, being one-sixth of the total,—to be exact, $71,499,703.70.

4 p.m.

Now, the charge is made with some heat by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux), that we are not following British practice or tradition. Well, this is the only thing they do in the British Parliament every year. It is always done, and it is the only way they can get along. I do not ask my hon. friend to take my word for it; I read to him just a few moments ago the authority on the subject, showing just exactly what is done in the British House. But because we are following the example of the Mother of Parliaments, we are charged both by the hon. member and by the leader of the Opposition, with being un-British in our methods. The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), says that we should call Parliament sooner. Well, when he called Parliament sooner, he adopted exactly the same practice as is now being followed. He had charge of the country's finances in the year 1906-7. Parliament was called on November 22, 1906, and in that session there were two interim Supply Bills passed, although the House was called in November.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There was a surplus that year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know whether there was a surplus or not, but I am dealing with one particular complaint that is made, and I am pointing out that, although it is suggested that if Parliament were called in November there would be no necessity for these things, nevertheless hon. gentlemen opposite did call Parliament in November and in this particular year to which I have referred they passed not one but two votes in interim Supply. Again, in 1909-10, Parliament was called in November, and a quarter of the Estimates was passed in interim Supply; and in the next year, 1911, the first interim vote was one-sixth, and then there was a further vote of three-twelfths of the remainder. In fact, this became an absolutely settled practice, and I appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite whether I am not following fairly good precedent when I do what has been done by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's. I have the statements made during the debate in 1903, and although I do not propose to read them in extenso, the answers then given by the hon. gentleman himself completely meet the very objection that is made to-day as to salary. He pointed out, for example—well, perhaps I had better quote his exact words on that point:

> All the matters that can be discussed in connection with those votes will, of course, still remain before the House; and we will have to take these up item by item for the purpose of obtaining the remaining four-fifths of the Estimates. So that the course we now propose does not in any way restrict the fullest and freest discussion. It simply facilitates the granting of a partial supply, which will be very much needed before the end of the present month.

The point was raised as to items in connection with which there might be objection and trouble, and at that particular time the views were just exactly opposite to what they are to-day on the part of some hon. gentlemen. In that instance the right hon. the ex-Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) said:

> I would not care to be in this position that because we have voted this one-fifth, in order that some portion of it might be expended on public works, for example, any gentleman on this side of the House should be precluded from the right of moving to strike out the whole item.

As to this the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's says:

> Of course in any particular case after we have acted upon the Supply Bill to the extent of one-fifth, it would be too late to strike out the item in that case. But I hope no such case will arise. At all events, I quite agree with the hon. gentleman's wish to have full freedom of discussion and of action in the matter, and that he merely facilitates the passing of this resolution because it is necessary to make supply for the public service. I quite appreciate that and in that spirit only is the matter agreed to.

As I say, it came up every year and on two occasions I find the hon. gentleman referred to the whole thing as purely pro forma—it was a matter of so long standing, in fact, such regular standing. I am sure the hon. gentleman will appreciate the fact that there are other things which have to be paid for besides wages. Coal has to be paid for, supplies have to be paid for, and work that is going on has to go on. He refused before to take anything but his regular vote which would enable him to do these things; I am very much afraid that at the present time we will have to refuse to take anything except what will enable us to do business and continue to pay bills. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that this motion be postponed and taken up in committee again to-morrow.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Amen.

The CHAIRMAN: Sir Henry Drayton moves that further consideration of the resolution be postponed.

Mr. CANNON: How can a motion be postponed when it has been ruled out of order?

The CHAIRMAN: The debate on the motion is postponed. If it is the desire that the motion be withdrawn and presented again this procedure may be adopted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The motion may as well be withdrawn. The only thing I have in mind is this: While I do not question the correctness of the ruling by you, Mr. Chairman, having regard to its exact wording, I do say that very embarrassing situations in the future will arise therefrom. It is evidently something that was not taken care of in the framing of the rules, as is very frequently the case. It undoubtedly will mean, as you, Mr. Chairman, were about to intimate, that the consideration of a vote of even one-fourth of the total Estimates as interim Supply, will virtually wipe out the whole effect of the rule and we could then go into Supply on Thursday and Friday and consider the Estimates of any department without any previous notice. Because of that fact I warned hon. gentlemen of the risk they were taking in raising this question and having it ruled accordingly. I think hon. gentlemen will agree with me that it was never intended that the rule should have this effect; it was only intended to enable a vote against a department to be introduced at the opening of the Supply of that department. This could not be done on Thursday or Friday, because there is no motion to go into Supply except on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday. That is the reason why this ruling affects the whole situation. I do not ask for any decision now, I would like to give some thought to the subject, and I think that possibly we can come to an agreement, perhaps to reverse the ruling, or at least in some way to establish a precedent which will not have the effect and the consequences that the ruling is going to have. However we can consider the matter to-morrow.

Mr. FIELDING: I would point out to my hon. friend the fact that when there is a motion made for Supply there is not associated with it any rule in reference to any department, and the rule in that respect, may I say is defective.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know that, but the point was raised in the discussion, and the point was taken care of by this means when the closure rules were discussed. I know there is no special department mentioned. According to the practice any member of the Opposition is in a position to move an amendment against a department, or reflecting on it in an way at all.

Mr. CANNON: What is the decision?

The CHAIRMAN: The motion is withdrawn.

Department of Marine—Shipbuilding programme—amount required for the construction of vessels in accordance with Government programme, $8,330,000.

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE: Before the members of the committee enter upon the consideration of this item I may perhaps be allowed to say a word or two in reply to certain observations that were made by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) and the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) when I presented to the House a week ago last Tuesday, the annual statement as to the earnings of the Government merchant marine. I am sure the hon. member for Red Deer will find no fault with me if I correct a statement he made as to the amount of the contracts that had been let—as he put it, up to Armistice Day, November 11, 1918. If there is one hon. member in this House for whom I have the highest regard it is the hon. member for Red Deer. I admire his parliamentary style and his eloquence, and above all I admire his consistency. While the hon. member and myself do not agree on public questions, I want to pay him this tribute —that ever since I have been a member of Parliament he has been thoroughly consistent on all public questions that have come before us. The hon. member for Red Deer opposed the Government shipbuilding programme which I had the honour to submit on April 4, 1918. He said frankly and freely that he did not believe it was a wise expenditure, or that the policy contemplated was wise. In taking that stand the hon. member was consistent and I want to assure him that I appreciate his consistency. However, I want to correct the hon. gentleman in regard to a certain point. He said that the value of the contracts, as let on November 11, 1918, was $16,000,000, and in the hon. gentleman's opinion the Government should have called a halt at that time. I wish to inform the hon. member for Red Deer that the value of the contracts let on Armistice Day, November 11, 1918, was not $16,000,000, but $45,000,000. That is the only correction I desire to make in the hon. gentleman's statement.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Does my hon. friend recall the speech he made somewhere about December 5, of that year on the occasion of the launching of the first two ships?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Did he not mention in that speech the figure of $16,000,000?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The hon. member is quite right. The $16,000,000 represented the value of the contracts that had been actually signed by Order in Council at that date, but the Government had closed up $45,000,000, although formal Orders in Council had not been passed; therefore I can see quite plainly how the hon. member got the figure of $16,000,000 instead of $45,000,000.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): The minister refers to Orders in Council, but I would like to know if on November 11, 1918, contracts had not been let for $45,000,000.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Here are the actual figures: Value of contracts signed on or before November 11, 1918, $29,299,991.40; value of contracts approved by Order in Council on or before November 11, 1918, but not signed, $16,359,703. The commitments therefore on November 11, 1918 amounted to $45,659,694.40.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I turn from my hon. friend from Red Deer to my good friend who represents the constituencies of Maisonneuve and Gaspe (Mr. Lemieux). I will not reply to him with the same warmth which he displayed towards me, nor will I make the same unfair insinuations. The hon. member for Maisonneuve and Gaspe, after I had concluded making my statement the other day, with his usual eloquence and with a great deal of heat, informed this House that he was in favour of the Government shipbuilding programme for war purposes only, and that when Armistice day came the Government should have cancelled all the remaining contracts. Indeed, he could not understand how the Government went on spending so many more millions on shipbuilding. He paid the Minister of Marine another compliment on that occasion. He said he could only explain the continued expenditure by assuming that it was due to the pigheadedness of the Minister of Marine. While I admire the eloquence and the many abilities that my hon. friend is endowed with, I cannot pay him the tribute that I paid the hon. member for Red Deer a moment ago and say that he is always consistent on the various problems that from time to time come before this House. Apparently the memory of my hon. friend from Maisonneuve and Gaspe is not very good. A moment ago we heard him say how much he was impressed with the debt of this country, and that his ability and influence would be exercised in this House to have the Estimates reduced by $50,000,000. But in May, 1919, when the vote was before this committee for $30,000,000 to continue the Government shipbuilding programme, if the hon. member's view then was the same as it is now, this House would have expected him to take advantage of that most favourable opportunity to rise in his place and say: I am opposed to the Government shipbuilding policy; I favoured it, of course, while the war was on, but now I want the Government to call a halt to the wild extravagance of the Minister of Marine. Let me remind the hon. member for Maisonneuve and Gaspe that the armistice was signed on November 11, 1918, and I brought before the House an interim vote of $30,000,000 in May, 1919.

Mr. LEMIEUX: When was peace signed?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Does not my hon. friend know when peace was signed just as well as I do? If the hon. member for Maisonneuve and Gaspe meant what he said the other day on the floor of this House, that he was absolutely opposed to one cent of the public money being expended on shipbuilding after Armistice day, then his duty was plain in May, 1919, when the $30,000,000 vote was in committee—one would have expected him to oppose the vote. With the enormous debt at that time staring the House and the country in the face, that was a grand opportunity for the hon. member to have said: I want $30,000,000 of the public money saved.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us see what the hon. member said on that occasion: A few moments ago he stated that I had lost my business reputation in the commercial metropolis of Montreal. The mere say-so of my hon. friend is by no means conclusive. The business reputation that I have established in Montreal during a period of thirty-five years cannot be marred in the slightest degree by anything that my hon. friend may see fit to say in the heat of debate.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The president of the Bank of Montreal said it, though.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Did he? I will not read the eulogistic remarks concerning myself uttered by the hon. gentleman in May, 1919, because they would make me blush.

Mr. LALOR: Read them.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: No.

Mr. DUFF: Give them to me, I will read them.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: But here is what I want to put before the committee, the actual words of the hon. member for Maisonneuve and Gaspé as they appear on page 2312 of Hansard of May 8, 1919, long after Armistice Day,—a golden opportunity, I repeat for my hon. friend to have saved this country $30,000,000,—and no doubt the committee will be interested to know what he said on that occasion. Here are his words:

> I do not offer any criticism of the contract between the Naval Department and the Dominion Steel Company which was mentioned this afternoon. I have not seen that contract, and I have the word of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that it may be altered or even dropped. I do not purpose to let politics interfere with my views on the questions of trade and transportation, for I am a Canadian, first, last and always, and I sincerely approve of the policy of any Government which will promote our shipbuilding and improve our transportation facilities.

That was on May 8, 1919.

> I happen to reside in Montreal during several months of the year, where I represent one of the constituencies most interested in shipbuilding. The county of Maisonneuve has within its boundaries the establishment of Canadian Vickers Limited, and I think it is to the credit of the Laurier administration that we have that great shipbuilding plant. Canadian Vickers Limited employ thousands of men, and they have been able to build up an industry which some years ago was considered as only a dream and impossible of realization.

Then the hon. member goes on to talk about navy matters, I will pass over that part.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Perhaps you had better read it all.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Certainly, if the hon. gentleman wishes me to. I quote further:

I cannot forget that in 1912 when the question of a Canadian navy was being debated in this House doubts were expressed as regards the practicability of that policy. The Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) himself stated, in a now famous speech, that not in twenty-five, or even fifty years perhaps, could we expect to build a Canadian navy. And we had the candid advice of Mr. Churchill, who told us—with some ingenuousness I should say—that we could not find reveters in Canada, and there were so many swamps that we could hardly lay keels for the proposed Canadian navy. Sir, let us not refer to that debate, because really it is enough to make us lose confidence in some of the statesmen of the Mother Country. We have passed the period when the British Government could at their own sweet will thus impose their views on credulous colonials. We have had the satisfaction since that time of establishing shipyards on the Pacific and Atlantic coasts, on the river St. Lawrence, and on the Upper Lakes, and the British Commissioners who were appointed some years ago to study the trade conditions of the British Empire, reported that Canada was fully equipped for shipbuilding and had nothing to fear from competitors. I have under my hand the report of those commissioners, published in February, 1917, from which I read the following:

"Before leaving the subject of the overseas communications of Canada we may allude very briefly to the capacity which the Dominion has for shipbuilding. We visited yards for ship construction and ship repairing both on the Pacific coast and at Montreal and we were struck with the activity generally prevailing at all places. There is also considerable shipbuilding work on the Upper Lakes."

I do not know what the commissioners would say if they came back to Canada to-day. Had they come last year they would have seen how our shipyards kept the wheels of industry running at full speed during a very crucial period. But Canada must not be satisfied with her war industries only. During the war Canada established her ability to do things; she must go on now and adapt herself to peace conditions, profiting by the development which has taken place during the war.

I stand for a moderate and wise policy of shipbuilding for Canada—

Mr. LEMIEUX: Hear, hear.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The hon. member will not think I am unfair to him when I say I had always known, until recently, that he entertained the same views with regard to shipbuilding in Canada that I did. The hon. gentleman went on to say:

—and if the Acting Prime Minister, under section 2 of the Bill, intends to apply some of that money for the promotion of shipbuilding and the improvement and development of our Canadian transportation facilities, I shall vote for the amount which is being asked this evening.

Nothing, in my judgment, has proved more adequately the ability of the Canadian people to do things than the enormous development which has taken place in our shipyards during the last three or four years. It is urged that the Minister of Naval Affairs (Mr. Ballantyne) took away from the Imperial Munitions Board a business which that board was carrying on at our Canadian yards. It seems to me that the answer given by the hon. gentleman is a common-sense one. During the war Canada gave to the Mother Country the exclusive use of her shipyards, in which ships were built of British registry. Our ships were also commandeered. Of course, it was for the common cause. But the moment war ceased, the moment we come to peace activities, it is only common sense that Canada should take control of these shipyards—

That is, after the war.

—and build her own ships with her own men and her own money, with a view of improving her shipping and transportation facilities.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If my hon. friend will allow me, what does he find in that speech?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I find in that speech, in the plainest language, that the hon. member for Maisonneuve and Gaspé did not on May 8, 1919, by his voice or by his vote dissent from an appropriation for an additional $30,000,000 to continue the ship-building policy of the Government, though my hon. friend said a few days ago in this House that he favoured ship-building only during the war, and censured me as Minister of Marine, and the Government of Canada, for spending any money on the construction of ships after the Armistice day, November 11, 1918. If the hon. member entertained at that time the views which he apparently entertains now, his only course on that occasion was to make the speech that he made on the floor of this House a few days ago; to say: the war is over; my support of the Government's policy is withdrawn; I am opposed to the appropriation of this additional $30,000,000 for the continuance of the ship-building policy of the Government. I read in that speech not what the hon. member said the other day, but warm and full endorsation of the expenditure of $30,000,000 on ship-building. More than that, by his voice and vote on that occasion he supported to the full a continuance of the Government's ship-building policy. I am at a loss, therefore, as all other hon. members in this House must be, to understand the inconsistency of my hon. friend. I know that he has been a long time in public life. I am aware that he has spent his summers down on the beautiful shores of the river St. Lawrence at Murray Bay, and as he went out in canoes and boats a great deal he has a more thorough knowledge than I have of how to trim his sails according to the breeze. My hon. friend, therefore, trims his sails according to the breeze that is now blowing in this House and condemns the Minister of Marine and the Government for proceeding with their ship-building policy after November 11, 1918, although six months subsequent to that date he gave the Government his entire support for the expenditure of $30,000,000. He told us on that occasion—and I concurred in what he said in that regard—of the existence of a large shipyard in the constituency of Maisonneuve employing some 3,500 men.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In order that there may be no misunderstanding, I may say that I would repeat at this very hour the very words that the minister has just read

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Well, I leave it to the judgment of the House and of the people as to what meaning can be taken from the speech that my hon. friend delivered on May 8, 1919.

The senior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) speaking the other day with regard to the railways, expressed opposition to the running of Government ships between Halifax and Newfoundland and stated that the ships on that route were losing money. With that statement I disagreed and I asked him how he knew that to be the case, whereupon the hon. member said that the source of his information was, in his opinion, as reliable as the operating company. I took the trouble to have my secretary telephone to the manager of the Canadian Government merchant marine and ask him whether or not the Government ships on this route were making a profit, and the reply was that they were. Another reason why the management want those ships to run from Halifax to Newfoundland in winter time is to keep up the connection between the routes operated by the ships which run between Montreal, Charlottetown and Newfoundland during the season of open navigation on the St. Lawrence.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is all I wish to say at this stage. If there is any information that hon. members desire I shall be happy to give it to the best of my ability.

Mr. DUFF: Mr. Chairman, we have all listened with a great deal of attention to the second speech which the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Ballantyne) has felt it necessary to make with regard to the Canadian Government merchant marine. Evidently he was not satisfied with the statement which he made to the House when the House re-assembled on Tuesday last after the Easter recess. There has been a good deal of talk about extending to hon. members of this House certain courtesies in regard to public matters. Whilst I do not complain because we on this side were not notified on Tuesday last until practically within an hour of the meeting of the House, that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) was going to take up this important question, we on this side are more courteous than he is. Last evening, after the debate on the motion of the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) I had intended to go into the question of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, before the House went into Supply, but I found that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was absent, and consequently I deferred my remarks to a later date. I also, Sir, did not know to-day that this very important question was coming up. But I am glad to say that I think, in my feeble manner, I am able to deal with this question at the present time and show whether the minister's statements are correct or not. As regards the minister's statement of a few minutes ago, that the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), in his remarks this afternoon with regard to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine in any way reflected on the business ability of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, I have always found, in my short life, that "birds come home to roost," and it would be well, before the minister says anything about the business or political career of the hon. member for Maisonneuve, that he reflect carefully on what he might have said himself; and it would be better for the minister, instead of going in public places and making remarks about hon. members of this House, that he make those remarks on the floor of Parliament and in the presence of the said members, and say what he has to say like a man.

I noticed this afternoon, when the hon. member for Maisonneuve was speaking about the large amount of money which the Government had spent on this merchant marine and the reasons for economy, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries laughed very long and loudly. This may be a matter in which the minister may see something to smile at, and if the true story of this merchant marine were known, I think the minister could very well laugh; but the people of this country are not in that position; they recognize that the building and operating of this merchant marine are serious matters, and consequently, I can assure the minister that they are in no laughing mood.

The Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in his speech on Tuesday last, went into the history of the building of those Government ships, and in order to bolster up his case he had to call to his assistance some words which were said by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) and the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux). It is not my desire, nor my intention to take up the cudgels for those hon. gentlemen; they are ready and able to do so themselves. But at this time, it is a very poor defence for the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to use the words of the hon. member for Red Deer, or the hon. member for Maisonneuve, or any other hon. member, when the war was on or shortly after it was over and before peace was declared.

What is my understanding of the history of this merchant marine? I might say that when the minister asked this House in 1918 for a vote of $20,000,000, I voted for it, or I did not oppose it. I want to say, however, that I never favoured the building of a Government merchant marine. I am in favour of a merchant marine, a Canadian merchant marine; but I am not now, nor was I then in favour of this Government going into either the building or the operating of ships. If I understand the matter correctly, the first intimation the members of the House and the people throughout the country received with regard to the programme of the Government was sometime in the spring of 1918. At that time the minister, after no doubt awarding contracts by Order in Council, asked this House to pass a vote of $20,000,000. It seemed to me that before this policy was adopted by the Government, the very least they might have done before giving the contracts was to ask this House to support the policy. This money was voted, because the war was on at that time and because every man in this country, whether he was interested in or knew anything about the shipping business or otherwise, realized that, owing to the fact that the German submarine was operating, not only in the waters of the Atlantic, but in the North Sea, and destroying thousands and hundreds of thousands of tons of British shipping, it was necessary for the Canadian people to do something. Not only did the Government go on with this programme; but private capital all over the coastline of Canada, both on the Pacific and the Atlantic, decided to do everything in its power to build ships in order to help out the situation. In practically every town facing the Atlantic coast in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, shipyards sprang up almost over night, and private industry provided private capital and built shipyards and ships. In 1919, as the minister said, further money was asked for by the Government and voted by this House. At that time the Canadian people felt that this shipbuilding programme should stop, and had the minister consulted the business men, and the financial men of this country, he would not have gone on with his programme. The right and proper thing for the minister to do on that occasion, after war was over and peace was declared, was to go to the shipbuilders to whom he had given contracts and endeavour to settle with them, giving them damages, and to get them to complete their contracts and go on with the shipbuilding business with their private money, and make contracts in the open market. That is the businesslike way to deal with the matter, and that is what the minister and the Government should have done.

The minister, in his speech the other day, gave as one reason why he entered into this shipbuilding programme and kept it going was to give work to returned soldiers. That is not a very good excuse. It is quite true a few returned soldiers were employed in those yards; but anybody who knows anything about shipbuilding is well aware of the fact that skilled workers are required to build steel ships, and the ordinary man who went over to France and fought heroically for his country, knew nothing about building ships. Consequently, the arguments of the minister that the continuance of his programme was to give work to returned soldiers must fall to the ground.

If the minister or his department had been properly informed, they would have realized, in the year 1919, that it would take only a very short time for the world tonnage to be back to its normal level or beyond it. Every shipping man in this country, in Great Britain and every other country, knew, in 1919, that every shipyard in the world was busy replacing the tonnage that had been sunk during the war. Whilst in 1914 there were 45,000,000 tons of shipping throughout the world, to-day there are 65,000,000 tons. Therefore, the minister and his department were improperly informed, or they would have been aware of this fact, and, consequently, they would have trimmed their sails to suit the occasion.

The minister told us, either in 1919 or 1920, I forget which, when he was criticised for going on with this programme of building ships when there was no necessity, that he could sell them at a good profit. I am sure if we could get down to the inner consciousness of the minister he would certainly admit that he made a very grave mistake in not selling the Government ships in 1919 or 1920 if he could have sold them then at a profit or even at cost. That would have been the business-like thing to do, and I say that the minister was derelict in his duty in not disposing of these ships at that time, when he could have sold them at a profit or at cost. That is the course any good business man would have taken. The minister after the armistice should have endeavoured to get out of the contracts, and make the very best settlement he could of a bad bargain.

In order to prove my case, perhaps I may be allowed to show that another department of this Government did the very thing which I have just stated should have been done by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. If hon. gentlemen will turn to page 22 of the twenty-eight annual report of the Department of Trade and Commerce, they will find this:

> Negotiations were then entered into between this Department and the two furnaces, with the result that after many conferences and meetings, the Government offered and the contractors accepted the sum of $460,000 in the case of the Midland Iron & Steel Company and $200,000 in the case of the Parry Sound Iron Company for the cancellation of their production on July 31, 1919, agreeing however to take care of all loading and storage charges until August 31, 1920.

Now if the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the officials of his department thought that in view of world conditions in 1919, it was good business to cancel certain contracts they had made during the war for war purposes, I think the members of this House and the people of this country will agree with me that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries should have done the very same thing and cancelled the various contracts which he had made. Another reason which the minister gave in his speech was that it was necessary or good business to build these slow tramp steamers in order to get the products of our fields and mines and fisheries from Canadian shores to Great Britain and foreign countries. I do not think there is anything in that argument. Hon. members have no doubt received through the mails a copy of the statement of the Canadian Pacific Railway. If they will look at that statement, they will see the number of steamers employed by that company, and if they will look at the report of the Department of Trade and Commerce they will see what a small proportion of the goods routed over the Canadian Pacific either to Montreal, Halifax, or any other port in Canada, are carried by Canadian Pacific Railway steamers. If they look at the report of the Department of Trade and Commerce they will also see what a small quantity of freight is handled by these slow tramp steamers for which this country has had to pay such a high price.

We have also been told about what these Government ships have been doing for our export business; but what do we find? All the ships have been doing practically is interfering with other companies already in existence. We were told that these ships on the Pacific Coast were carrying lumber, which any old wind-jammer could have carried. That is the kind of business they are doing, and consequently the argument the minister puts forward that these ships were necessary to transport to their destination cargoes carried over the railroads is not a sound one, as every man who studies the subject will agree.

If hon. members will turn to page 5 of the report of the Department of Trade and Commerce for 1920, they will find that last year our exports amounted to $1,239,492,098, and we remember that the minister in his speech a few days ago told us in sonorous tones that the ships of the Government merchant marine carried last year $50,000,000 worth of these goods. I need not stress that point, but the figures show conclusively that the ships of the Merchant Marine are carrying only a small proportion of the trade of this country, and in doing so, I say they are interfering with other lines which could carry the goods far better than the slow tramp steamers which the Government has built.

The minister also told us, if I am not mistaken, that another reason why these ships were built was to expand our foreign trade. Now the ordinary person would think that it was wise for Canada to have ships to help expand her foreign trade, but are these Government ships expanding the foreign trade of this country? I say they are not. I say they have not expanded our foreign trade to the extent of $1,000,000 more than other lines were doing before these ships ever took the water. Let me tell the committee what these Government ships are doing. I doubt if the minister knows, but I am going to try and enlighten him, because I think somebody should put the matter up square to him. Here is an item I found in a good Tory paper, the Halifax Herald, and I would ask the minister to listen very attentively to this:

The steamer Canadian Pioneer—

I presume that is one of the Government's boats.

—left here (Halifax, N.S.) Saturday for Newport News, to take on bunker coal there, and then proceed to Gibraltar to load grain for Italian ports.

Did you ever hear anything like that before, Mr. Chairman? I will repeat the quotation, so that the House will be fully seized of the situation:

The steamer Canadian Pioneer left here (Halifax, N.S.) Saturday for Newport News, to take on bunker coal there, and then proceed to Gibralter to load grain for Italian ports.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Newport News? Where is that?

Mr. DUFF: In the United States where hon. gentlemen opposite did not desire any truck or trade. But they sent their steamers there, light from Halifax, when the coal mines of Nova Scotia were crying for orders, and although the bunker coal from North Sydney or Sydney Mines or any other part of Nova Scotia is just as good as any that Newport News can offer. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries is responsible for daring, I say, to send that steamer from Halifax, without bunker coal, to Newport News, without one dollar's worth of cargo in her hold, to bunker there.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I would like to inquire whether the hon. gentleman believes everything he reads even in a Tory paper.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is a bad one for the Tories.

Mr. DUFF: I would just as readily believe this statement in the Halifax Herald as some statements which have been made by certain persons in this country. Before I get through, I am going to prove that this statement is just as correct as certain statements made within the last fortnight. This item in the Halifax Herald goes on to state that after taking on bunker coal at Newport News this steamer is going to come back, in order to get to Gibraltar to load wheat for an Italian port, passing within fifty miles of Halifax or Louisburg. That is the kind of foreign trade the minister is developing. I can give a hundred other instances to show that these ships do not carry Canadian cargo, but go to all parts of the world developing trade for the benefit of foreign countries. The minister, last week apologetically endeavoured to show cause for the condition in which the Canadian Government Merchant Marine appears, and he told the House that the Government programme was over and that no more contracts would be let—in other words, the Canadian Government did not intend to build any more ships. The minister claims that the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) is inconsistent, but it seems to me that this charge can very properly be laid at his own door. Because if these ships, as he says, are developing foreign trade, why should we stop building them? If his argument is sound, that sixty-three ships built under contracts let have developed export trade to the advantage of this country, we should go on building, and instead of having sixty-three, we should have a thousand. But it is quite certain that the minister's contention is wrong and that these ships, far from developing Canadian trade, are going hither and thither developing trade for foreign countries.

I would refer for a few moments to some of the contracts entered into by the Government with certain shipyards in this country. My own idea is that there is an Ethiopian in the woodpile somewhere in connection with some of these contracts, and although I have not been able, so far, to locate him, I am on the look-out and some day I hope to land him. Now, although the war has been over two years; and notwithstanding the fact, in view of the general state of business to-day, that other people have been endeavouring to cancel contracts and stop building ships, the minister has virtually allowed the keel of a new ship to be laid in Halifax in the last few months. And thereby hangs a tale. The Halifax Shipyards Company I have not a word to say against. My whole complaint is against the Minister of Marine; I consider that the Halifax shipyards people are good business men, and they certainly put one over on the minister. What has the Government done within the last two years? A contract was entered into with the Halifax shipyards to build three ships, if I mistake not. Now, the Halifax shipyards was a new concern. In the latter part of 1917, or early in 1918, there was no such concern as the Halifax shipyards, and when they incorporated they did not buy out an old shipyard; they built an entirely new one. Practically before a blow was struck, the explosion occurred in Halifax, and you will remember what occurred then. Almost the entire city was wrecked, some 2,000 persons, in round numbers lost their lives, while about 20,000 suffered in one way and another as a result of the disaster. I will not discuss the subject now, but I may remark, in passing, that most of the business places in Halifax, and the buildings and wharves suffered. There was in Halifax what is known as the Graving Dock Company, owned principally by English capitalists but managed by a gentleman in that city. This dock

5 p.m. was built some twenty years ago and has given excellent satisfaction to the shipping not only of this country but of Great Britain and the United States. Practically all the year round vessels come to Halifax for repairs. During the explosion this dock was partly wrecked. After people had fairly well recovered from the shock, the manager of the dock suggested that the Government should take it over, and he offered it to them, if I am correctly informed, for $1,250,000. Negotiations were entered into, but the Government refused to pay this price. A few days afterwards, however, an Order in Council was passed confiscating the property for the sum of $1,100,000. The owners of the dock protested and took the matter to the Exchequer Court where it hung fire for something like two years. Now, the people of this country will agree that it might have been good business for the Government to take over this dock for their own purposes; and, at all events, had they done so probably little fault would have been found with them. But what happened? Almost immediately after they passed the Order in Council confiscating this dock, the personal property of the owners, they turned it over to the Halifax shipyards. I say that there is absolutely no excuse for that. It was not necessary for the business of the Halifax shipyards. Shipyards in other parts of the country built ships without owning any dry dock, but the thing was done for some reason; there are certain interests in this country who are pretty close to the Government and are also close to the men interested in the Halifax Shipyards.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: As the hon. gentleman seems to be shooting somewhat wide of the mark, let me tell him now that all dry docks in Canada come under the Public Works Department. The Hon. F. B. Carvell was Minister of Public Works at the time. He was the man who carried through all these negotiations, and neither myself nor any one else connected with the Marine Department had anything whatsoever to do with this matter.

Mr. DUFF: I am delighted indeed to hear the minister say that this is a matter with which the Public Works Department, and not his department, had to do. But I knew that; there was no necessity for the minister to make that statement. Now it is also true that the Hon. F. B. Carvell carried on "negotiations". I would not call it "negotiations" to seize a man by the throat and take his property. However, I do not know that I should hold Hon. Mr. Carvell any more guilty than I do the Minister of Marine. As I have already said, I only wish I could get ahold of the Ethiopian in the woodpile.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Why don't you get him?

Mr. DUFF: I am looking for him every day. I say there was some reason why the Minister of Marine sat round the Council Board when the Order in Council was passed expropriating the Halifax Dry Dock and handing it over to private interests, and it is of no avail for that hon. gentleman to come here and try and excuse himself and argue that the Public Works Department or Mr. Carvell is responsible. I say such a thing as that is not fair to the late Minister of Public Works; the Minister of Marine must take his own share of the responsibility.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Certainly.

Mr. DUFF: Why don't you do it then? To show you what feeling this expropriation and the subsequent proceedings created in the Old Country where the people lived who had their money invested in this dry dock at Halifax, I shall quote from a report of a meeting of the Halifax Graving Dock Company, Limited, held in London, and which is headed—

The Halifax Graving Dock Company, Limited

Dominion Government and the Company Expropriation of the Property

Criticism of Award

I need not read very much, I am only going to read one short sentence. It is from the annual report of the shareholders of that concern which was adopted unanimously. The sentence in question is:

It is not too much to say that such action constituted an abuse of the War Measures Act and is a piece of sharp practice on the part of the Dominion Government.

I fully agree with what the shareholders of the Halifax Graving Dock Company said at their meeting in London when they asserted that this proceeding was a piece of sharp practice. It certainly was sharp practice on the part of the former Prime Minister and his colleagues to take this graving dock from a private company and hand it over to another private company within a few days. If the Government had kept this dock themselves and used it for war purposes there would have been no criticism, or at any rate very little. I say the Government had no right to take this property from a private company and hand it over to the Halifax Ship Yards Limited.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried:

Mr. DUFF: I regret that hon. gentlemen opposite show they are not interested in this matter. I know by their actions that they do not care anything about the discussion of a serious question like this. If they are not interested I hope they will abstain from noisy interruptions or else leave the chamber. It is a foolish policy for hon. gentlemen opposite to cry "Carried" when another member is addressing the House on such a serious matter.

Now, Sir, before I leave the matter of the Halifax Dry Dock, and my criticisms do not seem to be accepted very gracefully by hon. gentlemen opposite, I wish to again refer to the same "Ethiopian." There has been created what is known as the British Empire Steel Corporation which is putting the value of the Halifax Dry Dock at $7,250,000 whereas they paid the poor English shareholders who formerly owned the property, only $1,500,000, including interest and all. That is the way these things are done and therefore I say there is some reason why some people closely connected with the Halifax Shipyards and the Government of this country—

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Don't throw veiled insinuations across the House. Be frank and fair, and if you think I have been connected with the Dominion Steel Company, or the Dry Dock, in any way, be good enough to say so and produce your evidence. Surely my hon. friend knows enough of etiquette, and understands the sentiment of the House sufficiently well, to refrain from continually casting veiled threats across the floor. I repeat, if the hon. member has any evidence that I have been, directly or indirectly, connected with the Dry Dock Company or with the British Empire Steel Corporation, or any other members of the Government either, let him say so.

Mr. DUFF: If the cap fits anybody they can wear it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: That is not the question.

Mr. DUFF: It is rather amusing to hear hon. gentlemen applauding. Let these hon. gentlemen go ahead and clap; it is all they can do. But it certainly is amusing to see the Minister of Marine getting up every second or third day in the House and complaining, when an hon. member says anything, that they are referring to him. He may, of course, think that he is the whole Government but we on this side do not. We know exactly what he thinks about himself and the great ego which he has developed during the last three years. Well, I can assure him that there are other people in this country and in this Government—bad as it is, and God knows it is bad enough—besides the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Consequently I cannot see why he should take the matter directly to himself when I make any reference to the Government. However, if he wants to do so it is not my fault.

The minister last week presented to Parliament what purported to be a statement showing the operating expenses of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine for the year 1920. Now, Sir, in order to give the House and the country the full details of the mismanagement of this business, and to show them exactly what has happened, it is necessary for me not only to discuss the minister's statement of last week but to draw attention to what the minister said last year when this matter was discussed in the House. He then told us that he was going to put on Hansard the proper statement of the operations of the Canadian Mercantile Marine for the year 1919. I regret to say that no such statement appears in Hansard. The statement in question, beyond a very few items, was such as no business house or no person with any knowledge of business would issue. Just before the session ended, however, and when it was so late that there was no chance to discuss the affairs of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, a little book which is called the "First Annual Report of the Government Merchant Marine Limited" came into my hands. Within the covers of that booklet are two statements and two statements only, and in order to give the full financial story of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine and its operations, it is necessary for me to put this statement on Hansard:

Canadian Government Merchant Marine Limited

I want first to call attention to the fact that in that balance sheet no item appears for interest paid to the Department of Finance on the cost of these ships. According to the total given by the minister, the cost of the vessels will figure at about $25,000,000, and the interest would be about $1,021,680. But in this balance sheet no such item appears as having been paid, although the minister distinctly told us in the statement which he presented to this House that he had paid to the Department of Finance, if my memory serves me right, a sum of $500,000 for interest on these vessels. If my figuring is correct, instead of $500,000, about $1,000,000 should have been paid. When the minister read certain figures last year to the House he told us, after I had asked him about depreciation—he would not tell me at the time, but he brought down the information in the evening—that he had put to rest for depreciation 5 per cent of the cost of the vessels which were then in operation. Of course, I accepted his statement that that had been done. It seems to me, with my limited experience of finance, that if any amount was put to rest for depreciation—$1,238,400—it would appear in the statement of assets and liabilities. Therefore I should like the minister some time within the very near future to tell me and this House and the country where that depreciation is to be found. That is one reason why we want the information in regard to the Government railways and ships. I want to see the bank book, I want to see where this depreciation is put to rest, and I want the officials who made up this statement to come before a committee of this House and show where they have placed $1,238,400 for depreciation. I say again that on the face of this statement no such amount has been set aside. Now, Sir, there is in this pamphlet an operating account which I desire to also place on Hansard for the purpose of reference not only by hon. members but by the people. This is the account:

Operating Account

For the Period from March 2, 1919, to December 31, 1919

Closed Voyages—
Revenue from vessels			$2,770,049 09
Other revenue—
Commission and Agency Fee on landing of ss. Juil		$ 869 66
Interest		8,715 23
			9,584 89
Total revenue			$2,779,633 98
Expenses—
Operation of vessels		$1,621,999 46
Operation of wharf		16,475 91

OPERATING ACCOUNT—Concluded

For the Period from March 2, 1919, to December 31, 1919—Concluded

General expenses—
Office salaries	$41,013 44
Printing and stationery	6,825 15
Advertising	2,740 10
Cables, telegrams and telephones	3,404 95
Miscellaneous	9,612 78
Loss on Exchange	794 81
		64,391 23
			$1,722,866 60
Operating Profit closed voyages			$1,056,767 38
Open voyages—
Balance open voyages accounts	$415,724 92
Complete statement of disbursements, and operating expenses on account of these voyages has not been received, but it is estimated the result will show a net profit of approximately			$ 350,000 00
Total profit for Period			$1,406,767 38

It will be seen that an amount, which is not stated, is deducted for disbursements and operating expenses on account of these voyages, and so on, and the balance is said to represent an estimated profit on the open voyages of $350,000, making a total profit for the period from March 2 to December 31, 1919 of $1,406,767.38.

This statement, which I assume has the approval of my genial friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, shows, although there is no provision made either for interest of $1,000,000 or for depreciation of $1,238,400, that there is a net profit of $1,406,767.38, including open voyages. Evidently, Sir, I am justified in using the larger figures, because these great experts who are managing these steamers should have known before figuring on a profit of $350,000 on open voyages that the profit was in sight and would stay in sight.

I would now like to refer for a moment to Hansard of 1920. The reason I refer to this more particularly is that the Minister of Marine a few moments ago in his heat accused the member for Maisonneuve of not being consistent, and of saying things that he should not have said. He is not the only man in this House who is inconsistent.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am not inconsistent.

Mr. DUFF: Of course you are not. I am saying what the Minister of Marine said you are.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I know that.

Mr. DUFF: Where the assets appear on the balance sheet we find, as I read a few minutes ago, cash in banks and on hand, $432,476.39, and Dominion of Canada Victory Loan 1919, $500,000—counted, I presume, as cash, but not the actual value as stated here. I asked the minister for the amount of profit set aside to rest account for depreciation. This is his answer at page 623 of the Hansard of 1920:

Mr. BALLANTYNE:

I am sorry I cannot give that information at the moment.

That was in regard to rest and depreciation.

I have given the gross earnings and the net earnings, and explained how these sums were arrived at, but just how much has been set aside to rest account I cannot say.

I know that up to to-day the organization has in the bank, in the shape of cash and Victory bonds, the large amount of one and one-half millions, but just what portion of that has been set aside or depreciation I cannot at present state.

Now, Sir, in the statement put on Hansard by the minister he said that he had on hand in banks on account of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine $1,500,000 in cash and Victory bonds, whereas the statement from which I have been reading and which was issued under the signature of D. B. Hanna gives only the sum of $432,000 cash and $500,000 Victory bonds —a slight difference of $600,000. The minister should be the last person to talk of other hon. members being inconsistent.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the hon. member give the date of Hansard from which he quoted?

Mr. DUFF: I gave it once, but if the hon. gentleman will listen I will give it again: page 623, March 23, 1920.

Mr. STEVENS: I thank the hon. member for his courtesy.

Mr. DUFF: I am very glad to have the thanks of the hon. gentleman; I appreciate them very sincerely. Now, in 1920 the minister, when he was giving to the House a statement of the results of the operation of these steamers and when he gave a certain portion of the two statements I have read, at the conclusion of his remarks prophesied that there would be a greater profit for 1920, and I would like hon. members to bear that in mind as I proceed with my remarks. But I am going to prove that the minister was a false prophet; he was one of the prophets spoken of in Jeremiah who cried "Peace, peace, when there was no peace", for he was crying "Profits, profits", last week when there were no profits. Although the minister shows a profit in his statement, I am going to prove that he did not give the House a correct statement of the affairs of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, and that there was no profit.

In the statement made by the minister on March 29, 1921, which appears at page 1334 of unrevised Hansard, I find the following:

Operating Account for 1920

Gross Revenues closed voyages..		$10,027,442 77
Operating expenses..		8,733,917 22
Operating Profit Closed voyages.		$ 1,293,525 55
Deduct—
Depreciation. $667,665.46
Outstandin liabilities..	22,000.00
Incorporation expenses..	5,400.00
		$695,065 46
Net earnings closed voyages		598,460 09
Net earnings on voyages closed since January applicable to 1920..		183,000 00
Total net earnings.. ..		$781,460 09

If hon. gentlemen will figure it up they will find that the minister allows only 1.56 per cent for depreciation. In the ordinary course of events, as every shipping man in this country knows, 5 per cent is a sufficiently small amount to allow for ordinary depreciation—not the difference between the cost of the ship and what a similar ship might be purchased for, but what is known as ordinary running depreciation or wear and tear. But instead of 5 per cent the minister allows only 1.56 per cent for depreciation.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Two per cent.

Mr. DUFF: In a moment I will give the minister the figures.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Perhaps I can save the hon. gentleman that trouble. He is no doubt basing his calculations on the capital cost of the ships as shown in that statement, whereas the depreciation is figured only according to the time that the ships came into commission.

Mr. DUFF: That is fair; I accept that. We will take the minister's word that it is 2 per cent. Now, Sir, in the same statement there appears an item: "Outstanding liabilities, $22,000". I admit that it is impossible for the minister to know the full details of this organization, but I do offer this criticism: although the outstanding liabilities of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine are given in this statement as $22,000, in the city of Halifax on December 31, 1919, his company owed about $100,000.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I do not like interrupting my hon. friend so frequently—

Mr. DUFF: Go ahead; we want to get all the information we can.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I want the hon. gentleman to finish his speech. But I would like to direct his attention to the fact that the accounts as I presented them a few days ago were audited not only by the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, but also by the well known firm of auditors, Marwick, Mitchell & Company; so I rather think they should be regarded as authentic.

Mr. DUFF: I noticed that. I did not know about the Canadian Government Merchant Marine audit, but I noticed a certificate by this firm of Marwick, Mitchell & Company. The minister prides himself on being a business man; I do not. But the minister must agree that it was impossible for Marwick, Mitchell & Company or anybody else to know what the liabilities of the ships were on December 31, 1919. All the auditors do is audit the books and papers which are laid before them on information which they can get in the office of the company in the city of Toronto or in the minister's office down here. It is impossible for Marwick, Mitchell & Company to know that the outstanding accounts of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine in the city of Halifax amount to $100,000. Why, there are outstanding accounts in practically every port at which these ships call. Everybody knows that; the captains of other ships come home from foreign ports and say that the bills of the merchant marine are not being paid. It is impossible, therefore, for the accountants or auditors to tell whether the outstanding liabilities are $22,000 or $22,000,000. I say, then, that the amount given under the head of outstanding liabilities is too small and that if it was put at its proper figure, the amount of profit given by the minister as being made by his ships in 1920 would be considerably reduced.

I have shown that according to the statements of the minister, of the officials of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine and of this well known auditing firm of Marwick, Mitchell & Company, the Government ships were supposed to make certain profits within two years. The minister expects the statement of Marwick, Mitchell & Company, of course, to be correct.

Now, coming back to the minister's statements, I find the following:

Operating Accounts for 1919 and 1920

Cr.

By profit to Dec. 31, 1919 (closed voyages)		$1,056,767 38
By profit to Dec. 31, 1919 (open voyages)		350,000 00
		1,406,767 38
By profit from Jan. 1, 1920, to Dec. 30, 1920 (closed voyages)	$598,460 09
By profit on open voyages to date	183,000 00	781,460 09
		$2,188,227 47

I would like the hon. gentleman to bear that in mind, that if we read from his two statements, in the two years he shows on paper a profit of $2,188,227.47. Of course, I might say that that is not a profit at all, and everyone knows that no such profit exists. It will be interesting for hon. members to know what become of this $2,000,000. Before I go on to the minister's statement which is found on page 1334 of unrevised Hansard, March 29, 1921, and which is known as the consolidated balance sheet, I want to give to the House a statement which I mave made out of the actual condition and position of the operating account for the two years:

Operating account, 1920,
Credit: By profit on closed voyages, $598,460.09.

I give only the net profits because I realise, and the officials of the department must realise, that the amount which they put down on paper of $183,000 for net earnings after January for voyages which are not closed, is purely imaginary. There are upon the ocean to-day scarcely any ships making a profit, and the minister's ships certainly cannot make profits with empty holds and running from one port to another without cargoes. Therefore, I am taking the net nearnings on the 1920 operating account of $598,460.09. The debits are as follows:

To interest on cost of ships in commission—$2,724,474.00.

Which is a charge against the operating revenue of the ships for 1920.

To interest on advances for uncompleted ships	$421,699.10
To business profits tax, 1919,	742,650.00
To income war tax, 1920	62,580.00
Total	$3,951,403.10

Leaving a loss on operating account for 1920 of $3,352,943.01. This is the actual state of affairs. Instead of there being, as the minister says, a credit balance of $2,188,227.47, there is a debit balance of loss in operation for the one year alone of $3,352,943.01. I would like to explain the figures I have given in the debits. As regards the interest of $2,724,474, on cost of ships in commission, I have figured the interest at 5½ per cent, on information which the minister gave to the House a week ago last Tuesday. If my memory is correct, the ships cost an average of $192 per ton, and the tonnage of ships in commission is 259,783 tons. I have figured this amount at 5½ per cent, which shows that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine owes the Finance Department in 1920 for interest on cost of ships, $2,274,474. It is also a well known fact that the Finance Department, through the Marine Department, have advanced to shipbuilders throughout this county on account of ships, that are not yet completed but which are in course of construction, certain sums of money known as progress payments. I have figured in this connection that, if we allow only six months' interest, there is due to the Finance Department $421,699.10 on uncompleted ships. That is an amount of over $3,000,000 which these ships owe in interest. I have charged a business profits tax for 1919 of $742,650, and my reason for charging this amount is twofold. One reason is that the business done by these ships is the same as business done by a private corporation. Instead of this business being done, if done at all, by the officials of the Department of Marine, for some reason or another the Government saw fit to put the business into the hands of a private corporation, with the result that, as a private corporation, they have to pay to the Government a business profits tax of $742,650. Of course, they are not going to pay it because they do not have to, and it would not matter very much if they had to pay it, because they would be only taking the money out of one pocket and putting it into the other. But it is quite proper for me, in making up this operating account, to charge them with a business profits tax which a private company would have to pay. I got this amount from a very reliable source, and I think it is correct. I also figured income war tax for 1920 for the same reason. Therefore, instead of there being a credit balance on the two years' operations of $2,188,227.47, as the minister says, there is a direct loss to the country on operating expenses for one year of $3,352,943.01. Nobody can contradict these statements and I am sorry I have to give these statements to the House; but my figures are practically correct, and this is the showing the Canadian Government Marine made in the two years of its operation. Never before in the history of any shipping concern was there such an opportunity of making money. In the first year that these ships were launched, private ship owners, after allowing for depreciation, interest, taxes and every other expense necessary, and after paying their shareholders 7 per cent or 10 per cent, made millions and millions of dollars. Yet the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, with a great deal of gusto, tells this House that he has made a paltry $1,056,000, which shows only on paper and which was never made by the corporation. The shipping business went wrong or bad only in September, 1920. What were the minister's ships doing from January 1, 1920, to August 31, 1920? Practically every ship was engaged in profitable work up to August 31, 1920, and it was only during the last four months of the year that the Government ships should have made a loss. I say that the Government ships were badly managed and the Government have no right to carry on the work of endeavouring to operate ships built in Halifax and Vancouver, registered in Montreal and managed in Toronto. A beautiful combination surely!

I want to go a little further to show the credence that can be put in the statements of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. An ordinary business man, or I would think a man who boasts about his business, before presenting a statement to his shareholders, or to his directors, or to the country, would have gone over these statements and seen that they were correct, before placing himself in the position in which he is placed to-day before the people of this country.

But, Sir, he also presented a second statement to the country, which I should like to place on Hansard. On page 1334 of Hansard of March 29, 1921, appears the statement of the Assets, as follows:

Canadian Government Merchant Marine Limited and Subsidiary Companies

Consolidated Balance Sheet as at December 31, 1920

Assets

Fixed Assets—
Vessels at cost	$50,005,892.71
Less depreciation reserve	815,841.32	$49,190,150 39
Plant and equipment at cost	$ 27,243.25
Office furniture at cost	29,128.66
	$ 56,371.91
Less depreciation reserve	2,818.60	53,553 31
Total		$49,243,604 70
Current Assets—
Cash in banks and on hand	$ 426,816.02
Accounts receivable	1,750,161.36
Advances to captains, crews and agents	54,605.09
Adjusted losses due by underwriters	67,860.82
Insurance claims, estimated amount recoverable	686,805.51
Interest receivable accrued	4,583.33
Inventories of stores and supplies	44,821.84
Dominion of Canada Victory loan, 1934	500,000.00	$ 3,535,653 97

Now with reference to this delightful statement of Marwick, Mitchell and Company, if hon. members will turn to the same Hansard from which I have just quoted they will find that the total assets have not been added up. Instead of showing the total assets as $52,779,258.67, as any proper statement should show, they say that the fixed assets are $49,243,604.70, and the current assets $3,535,653.97, which gives a total of $52,779,258.67.

Then under the heading of Liabilities we have this:

Liabilities

Capital Stock—
Authorized 10,000 shares of $100 each $1,000,000, issued 4,709 shares of $100 each	$ 470,900 00
Votes payable—
Due Dominion Government secured by mortgages on vessels	49,535,892 71
Current Liabilities—
Accounts payable	1.712,803 03

Open Voyages—
Balances of uncompleted voyages	963,820 65
Surplus—
Contingent liabilities (none ascertained)	1,004,233 01
	$53,687,649 40

Owing to an error in the printing, I presume, the amount $1,004,233.01 appears opposite "Contingent liabilities (not ascertained)" instead of opposite "surplus." According to the minister's statement the surplus should be $1,004,233.01. On operating expenses the minister showed a profit of $2,188,227.47, whereas according to his own statement which I have just read, there is a profit of only $1,004,233.01 on the two years' operations. The minister certainly brings very peculiar statements to the House and I would recommend that instead of getting up in heat and objecting to statements made by the hon. member for Maisonneuve or any other hon. member he would be more careful himself. I have compiled a statement from the minister's figures which I have just read, and I will place it on Hansard in a moment. I have just shown that the minister according to his own figures shows a profit of $1,004,-233.01. Now, I am going to show that according to his own figures there is no such thing as a profit of $1,000,000. Now that is a pretty broad statement to make. If the minister will add up the liabilities—leaving out the surplus—shown on page 1334 of Hansard, and subtract the total from the assets, he will find that according to his own figures, the figures of Marwick, Mitchell and Company, or of Mr. Hanna, or of his own officials, who should have gone over this statement to see that it was correct, instead of a profit of $1,004,233.01, he has only a surplus of $95,842.28. Now what do his officials mean, what does Mr. Hanna mean, what do Messrs. Marwick, Mitchell and Company mean, who pretend to have some reputation in this country as auditors and accountants, by showing a surplus of $1,004,233.01 when there is no such thing? Here is the statement I wish to put on Hansard, compiled from the minister's own figures, and it shows that the surplus for the years 1919 and 1920 is only $95,842.28 instead of $1,004,233.01:

Canadian Government Merchant Marine Limited and Subsidiary Companies

Surplus—
Contingent liabilities (none ascertained)	95,842 28
	$52,779,258 67

The surplus for the years 1919 and 1920 therefore according to the statement of the Government is $95,842.28 and not $1,004,233.01.

I would point out in passing that the figure $49,190,150.39, under Fixed Assets, as it appears in Hansard is evidently intended for $49,190,051.39, as the total shows, and I have therefore made this correction in the statement above.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am sorry that there is an error in the statement as it appears in the unrevised Hansard. The figures in Hansard are not the figures I handed to the reporter here. Hansard has left out under Current Assets, on page 1334, deferred charges, insurance unexpired, $908,390.73. The total assets should be $53,687,649.40.

Mr. DUFF: That total includes the $908,390.73 for unexpired insurance?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes. While I am on my feet I also wish to correct another error in Hansard. Under the heading of "Liabilities" the item of $1,004,233.01 should have appeared directly opposite the word "Surplus," instead of opposite the words "Contingent Liabilities (none ascertained)."

Mr. DUFF: I understand that. While I am willing to accept the minister's correction, I am anxious to learn that the ships are losing as little money as possible, and the country should have had this correction immediately. But it only shows again that someone in the minister's department is not doing his duty, and when Hansard came out the next day somebody should have gone over the figures and called them to the minister's attention.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: They did.

Mr. DUFF: Why did you not correct them?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I did, right away.

Mr. DUFF: When did you correct them?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: My secretary drew my attention to them immediately and a letter was sent to Hansard calling attention to these errors and asking Hansard to be good enough to correct them.

Mr. DUFF: The minister should have called the attention of the House, and not of Hansard, to the fact, because we do not receive revised Hansard until the next fall. The minister should certainly want to get a proper statement before the country, and I say that someone has been derelict in his duty in failing to have these figures corrected in the House the next day. As the minister now comes in and shows that there should be added to the assets an item of $908,000 for deferred insurance, I must accept his statement as it appears on page 1334 showing a surplus of $1,004,433.01. But I intend in a few moments to dissect both assets and liabilities, and I will show to the House that the minister, instead of having, on his own figures, a profit on operating account of over $2,000,000, from the two years' business, can only show on paper a profit of $1,000,000, and this, as a matter of fact, is really not a profit.

At Six o'clock the Committee took recess.

After Recess

The Committee resumed at Eight o'clock.

Mr. McMASTER: Before the hon. member (Mr. Duff) who has the floor resumes his speech I wish to put a question to him. In his remarks this afternoon he told us that the graving dock at Halifax was expropriated by the Government for the sum of about $1,500,000 including interest. He then told us that the dock was turned over to the Halifax Shipyards, Limited, and that they turned it over to the British Empire Steel Corporation for $7,000,000. I do not recollect his having told us at what price the Government—after having expropriated the dock from the British company for $1,500,000—turned it over to the Halifax Shipyards Limited.

Mr. DUFF: I am sorry I omitted to state that because it is a very important feature. The expropriation of this property has had very serious consequences, not only to the shareholders of the Halifax Graving Dock Company but to the people of the Maritime Provinces who have been using this dock. I may say that the Government, after taking the property from the Halifax Graving Dock Company by force, which they did during the war, made an agreement with the Halifax Shipyards Limited to deliver this dock to them at a rental of $62,500 for the first year, with the understanding that sometime during the year the Halifax Shipyards Limited would pay to the Government $1,250,000 for the whole property. Now since my hon. friend has asked me the question, I wish further to state that up to within a few weeks ago the Government had not collected from the Halifax Shipyards Limited that $1,250,000 although they last year paid to the Halifax Graving Dock Company the amount that was awarded the latter by judgment of the Exchequer Court. Consequently, that is another reason why the members of this House and the people of Canada should condemn the Government—for not having collected this money from the Halifax Shipyards Limited after the first year had expired.

Hon. Mr. REID: If the money has not been paid, then I take it for granted the title of the Halifax Dry Dock is still vested in the Crown, and therefore the Government has not only the security of the dry dock as it was when expropriated, but all the buildings and construction that are on the property.

Mr. DUFF: There were no buildings or construction on it. As I remarked this afternoon it is a separate and distinct property from that of the Halifax Shipyards Limited. There was no good reason why the Government, of which the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) was a member at the time, should, at the instance and on the advice of somebody in their ranks, have decided to take the Halifax Graving Dock Company by the throat, a company composed of English investors of capital in Canada who came here twenty years ago and, in an endeavour to build up industries in the Dominion, invested their money in the Halifax Graving Dock. I say that at the instance of somebody in the Government the Minister of Railways and his colleagues deliberately passed an Order in Council expropriating the property of this private corporation known as the Halifax Graving Dock Company.

Hon. Mr. REID: I suppose the hon. gentleman is aware that Mr. Brookfield gave a written signed option on this property at $1,250,000 and that afterwards he asked more. The claim went to the Exchequer Court and the court placed its valuation on the property.

Mr. DUFF: I am delighted to see the Minister of Railways in his place to-night. I remember that last year when we were discussing matters in connection with the Canadian Government Merchant Marine the Minister of Railways was sent for and he favoured the House with information that he had at that time in his department regarding the merchant marine. I am delighted to have him back here again to-night, but let me tell him he was not present this afternoon unfortunately when I explained the whole situation. I know exactly what occurred. The minister is quite correct when he says that Mr. Brookfield, the Managing Director of the Halifax Graving Dock Company offered the property to the Government for $1,250,000. But does the minister know that this offer was made by Mr. Brookfield within a fortnight after the great explosion which took place in Halifax, when two thousand inhabitants of the city were killed and twenty thousand wounded and injured? The population of Halifax at that time were in an awful state of mind, in fact the Minister of Marine, a short time afterwards when he came back from a visit to that city, said "they were in hysterics." That is the expression which he employed; he said they were quite hysterical. Is it any wonder they were hysterical when a great part of the city of Halifax had been practically destroyed? It was then that Mr. Brookfield went to Mr. Carvell, or some other member of the Government, and offered this property for $1,250,000. But Mr. Carvell, on behalf of the Government, did not accept the offer of Mr. Brookfield. Then the Halifax Graving Dock Company started repairing the property and getting it in shape to do the work for which it was intended. The strange part of the situation is that afterwards the Halifax Shipyards Limited was formed—that company having established itself within one hundred yards distance of the Halifax Graving Dock. They purchased a piece of property and thereon built a shipyard. Before that time the shipyard was not in existence. Then it was that the minister—due to some influence which I have not yet discovered although I am endeavouring to find out the reason—acted as he did. I do not blame the minister because evidently he did not know what was happening. Seemingly he cast his vote for the passing of that Order in Council in good faith. Nevertheless I cannot relieve him from his share of the responsibility for the deliberate expropriation of the property of private individuals and the turning of it over to the Halifax Shipyards Limited. I do not, as I say, blame the minister, but I say some influence was at work which resulted in the property of the Halifax Graving Dock Company being expropriated by the Government for $1,100,000—not $1,250,000 but $1,100,000. Mr. Brookfiefild and his associates would not accept the offer and they entered an appeal in the Exchequer Court and the matter dragged on for two years. In the meantime some influence was brought to bear on the Government which resulted in the handing over of this valuable dry dock in the city of Halifax to the Halifax Shipyards Limited at a rental of $62,500 for the first year and the understanding that the total purchase price of $1,250,000 was to be paid within a year. The money has never been paid, and the people should know that the Halifax Shipyards Limited, through the operations of the dry dock, have made a profit of some $300,000 since they took the dock over.

Mr. JACOBS: Have you a list of the directors?

Mr. DUFF: The directors are all English; it was an English concern financed with English capital. As I said this afternoon, it is certainly poor advertising for Canada for the Government to deliberately take the property of British shareholders and turn it over to a local private concern. I want to say further with regard to the Halifax shipyard, that this property was expropriated by the Government without any just cause or reason, and notwithstanding that Mr. Brookfield, the manager of the company, endeavoured before the award was made to have an investigation into the whole affair, for some reason or other the Minister of Railways and his colleagues would not grant any inquiry.

Hon. Mr. REID: I never heard of the matter.

Mr. DUFF: I know. I am appealing to him because I think he is a fair man. I want to say to him that there is something wrong with this transaction. I do not know who is to blame, but if the minister will follow the trail—I am on the trail myself, but I have not reached very far yet, I am sorry to say—and will connect the Halifax Dry Dock Company with the Halifax Shipyard Limited and the British Empire Steel Company, he may find that the latter company or the Halifax Shipyards were asking $7,250,000 for this dry dock property for which they paid $1,250,000; and this House, the country and I will be grateful to him if he will straighten out this tangle. I would like him to go to the Prime Minister's office and to the office of the Minister of Marine and look over the correspondence which has passed between the directors of the Halifax Dry Dock Company and the Government, for although legally the Halifax Dry Dock Company can go no further, since the award of the Exchequer Court is final, I say that in all fairness and common decency an investigation should be held and Mr. Brookfield and the Halifax Dry Dock Company should be allowed to present their case to the Government which innocently passed this Order in Council for expropriation.

Before the House rose at six o'clock I was placing on Hansard a number of statements in connection with the operations of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. I had read from Hansard a statement, placed there by the Minister of Marine on March 29, and the minister called to my attention the fact that somebody had made a mistake in the figures which were then given. Of course, Mr. Chairman, I was very glad to have the correction. He showed that owing to the omission from that statement of an item of $908,000 for the deferred insurance the figures which he gave on that occasion showing $1,004,000 profit were correct instead of my calculation from that statement as it appeared showing a paper profit of $95,000. Of course, it was not my fault that the mistake was made. I do not think the minister should be held responsible, but I do think that somebody in his department should have looked over that statement the day after it appeared on Hansard and made the necessary correction.

Now, in order to go further into this matter and to show, as I tried to show before six o'clock, that instead of having any surplus the minister has a deficit, I shall have to bring some more figures to the attention of the committee. Before doing so I would like to call attention to the fact that in the operating account for 1920, at page 1334, the minister allows for depreciation $667,665.46. But if hon. members will look a little further down, on the consolidated balance sheet statement they will see that there the minister allowed $815,841.42 for depreciation. The difference between those two amounts is $158,175.96. Where is that $158,000? It does not appear in the 1919 statement of the minister, and how can he bring forward in his consolidated balance sheet for 1920, $815,000 for depreciation when in his operating statement he has only $667,000, whereas the difference should appear in the 1919 statement? That shows, as I said before recess, that neither the book-keeping of the minister's officials nor of Mr. Hanna's officials, nor the auditing of Marwick Mitchell & Company's staff is to be depended upon.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): The hon. member for Lunenburg is right.

Mr. DUFF: I am glad to have the commendation of the hon. member for Muskoka. If my figures are correct—and they are correct—this difference should have been charged off in 1919 and should be shown in the statement for that year.

In order to place the matter properly before the House and to show fair-minded members both on this and on the other side—because this is not a political question; it is something in which we are all concerned—and reasonable men like the hon. member for Muskoka the way in which this business is being conducted, I want to give to the committee an actual statement of the assets and liabilities of this company as they stand at the present time. I have gone over the accounts very carefully, Mr. Chairman, and I have made up a statement, and if the Minister of Marine and hon. members will follow me they will find that I have taken the figures in the consolidated balance sheet on page 1334 in some cases in order to make up this statement. I should like to place it on Hansard:

There is the actual standing of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine on December 31, 1920—no profit on current account; no profit on operating account; no profit on any other account, but an absolutely loss to this country in depreciation of the value of ships and in the operation of those ships, of $58,669,906.22.

Now, before I leave that statement, as I have placed in it some items which do not appear in the statement given by the minister, I wish to make a brief reference to them. I have added to the statement made by the minister, interest, in the liability column, amounting to $2,724,474. This is the interest on the investment of 1920, which the Canadian Government Merchant Marine owe to the Finance Department. They also owe to the Finance Department six months' interest on $15,334,513, amounting to $421,699.10. I have also placed in the liability column loss in value of uncompleted ships, 114,470 tons at $150. If hon. gentlemen will turn to the minister's statement of March 29, 1921, as found in Hansard of that date, page 1331, they will see that the minister stated that there were uncompleted at that time two ships of 10,500 tons each, nine ships of 8,300 tons each, and five ships of 3,500 to 3,900 tons each, making a total deadweight capacity of 114,470 tons. Hon. gentlemen may well ask me why in the liability column I placed an amount of $17,170,500 as the loss in value of these uncompleted ships. Well, Sir, with your permission I would like to prove my statement. These ships were contracted for by the Minister of Marine without calling for tenders, without asking the public to make an offer for the building of them at a certain price, with the result that instead of costing the market price, the ships cost anywhere from $215, if my memory serves me correctly, to $167.50 per deadweight ton. But in his own statement as found on Hansard the minister says that these ships cost, on an average, $192 per ton. The House will notice that I have deducted for depreciation in value, $150 per ton, leaving the small sum of $42 per ton as the value of these ships.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I do not know whether or not my hon. friend has taken off enough.

Mr. DUFF: I thank the minister very much for that suggestion; perhaps I have not, but I am willing to leave the public to judge between the minister's statement of March 29 and mine. It would be more dignified on his part if the minister, instead of throwing slurs across this floor, would allow me to finish my statement.

I said, Sir, that some hon. members might wonder why I deducted $150 per ton from the prices which the minister says is the average cost of these ships. It is a large amount, but I think I can prove conclusively to the committee that any hon.

gentleman can at the present time go into the open market and buy new ships—not tramp steamers such as the minister has on his hands, most of which can make only eight or ten knots an hour, but steamers which can make from twelve to fifteen knots an hour, at anywhere from £9 per ton, which, in the exchange market to-day, would be about $37 to $38, to $60 or $75 a ton, according to the manner in which the ships are fitted up.

Hon. Mr. REID: May I ask the hon. gentleman whether he refers to second-hand ships or to the making of a contract for the construction of new ships of the type that he mentions?

Mr. DUFF: That is a fair question. I mean that the Minister of Railways can go into the open market and purchase ships which were launched within the last six months and which have not been sold, in the English market or in the Scotch shipyards, at £9 per ton deadweight. Now, Sir, let me prove my point. This is from the American Shipping Register:

If the United States Shipping Board were to fix a price for the sale of the steel tonnage with regard for the world market figures ruling to-day it would be forced to offer the cargo carriers with $35 a deadweight ton as the top price. One of the most recent sales in the United Kingdom on a new 6,750 deadweight ton freighter, completed in 1920, was recorded at £60,000. This was at approximately £9 a deadweight ton. The depreciation in the value of tonnage is indicated by the comparison with £14 a deadweight ton at the end of the past year. Before the British are able to dispose of the ex-German tonnage it would seem that the Inchcape syndicate will be almost giving away the more antiquated and seaworn cargo carriers.

That is for December 31, 1920.

It seems doubtful if any considerable number of these ships could be sold to-day to American companies even if they were offered at nominal figures.

This is an extract from the Shipbuilding and Shipping Record of January, 1921.

Ship Sale Market

Few years have closed with the ship sale market in a more depressed condition than that of the year just past. Striking illustrations of this deplorable slump were evidenced at a ships' auction at the Merchants' Hall, Baltic Exchange, London, on December 15, when C. W. Kellock and Company offered for sale two very attractive vessels, one of which was practically a new ship. This vessel, the War Fig, a cargo steamer of about 4,050 tons d.w., fitted with geared turbines, and ready for immediate service, was put into the bidding at £10,000, and despite much eloquence on the part of the auctioneer, the bidding failed to reach the reserve price, and was eventually withdrawn at £34,000.

[Mr. Duff.]

This would be a rate of $35 per ton.

The second vessel, the ex-enemy steamer Chemnitz, with accommodation for about 49 first-class and 16 second-class passengers, of a deadweight capacity of about 8,300 tons, twin-screw triple-expansion engines, and built in Germany in 1901, was submitted at £10,000; but it was soon evident that there was little desire to purchase, and bidding ceased at £17,000, at which figure she also was withdrawn.

This would be a rate of $9 per ton.

Consideration should be given to these facts; here, in the instance of the War Fig, we have a vessel equal to a new ship and ready to load a cargo as soon as she is fixed, passed over so lightly that the highest figure bid was but little more than £8 per ton d.w., a strange commentary on prices ruling a year ago.

This is another letter from a ship-broker in the town of North Sydney, a gentleman who, in his business, like any other shipping man, is offered ships from day to day. He says:

I note that according to the minister's statement these vessels cost $190 per deadweight ton. To-day I have a letter from London offering a 2,000-ton steamer built in 1920 for which an offer of £14 per ton would be accepted.

A price of £14 per ton, as the Minister of Railways knows, was equal to about $56 in 1920. I would like the House also to remember that this offer of $56 per ton, was for a 2,000-ton steamer, and the Minister of Railways must know that the smaller the deadweight capacity or the smaller the steamer, the higher the price or cost of building per deadweight ton. Consequently, if a steamer of 2,000 deadweight tons would be offered for $56 per ton, it follows that a steamer of 5,000 or 8,000 deadweight tons, of which we have some in the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, could be purchased at a much less figure. This is another letter from a prominent shipping man:

I notice that a new steamer has recently been purchased in the United Kingdom at £9 a deadweight ton. This would be practically $40, whereas the Canadian Government Merchant Marine cost, I understand, from $180 to $200 a deadweight ton. I understand that they have either built or contracted for 63 steamers, and the average deadweight I suppose would be about 4,500 tons, or a total of 292,500 tons. Take the average cost, say at $190. This shows a difference over the English price to-day of $150 a ton, or a depreciation in value already, which the Government will have to write off if they are to operate these steamers in competition with the cheaper British steamers, of $43,875,000.

The minister will have noticed that all I wrote off was $38,000,000; yet my friend, who is a man who knows something about shipping, who every day receives quotations from the United States and England, says that the Government has made a loss, by depreciation in value of these sixty-three steamers, of $43,875,000. I think the House will agree with me that this is a serious state of affairs. What do the people in this country think of this matter? It might be well, perhaps, although it will take a little of the time of the House, for me to go into this matter.

Before I do so, however, I might, if the committee will allow me, go back for a moment to the statement which the minister made with regard to the other figures contained in my statement. Accounts receivable, as given by the minister, amounted to $1,750,161.36. In the statement which I have made up, I have deducted from that 10 per cent or $175,000, for the reason that if the Government agents have allowed, on freights, $1,750,000 to be outstanding, I cannot understand how they are going to collect that amount without a loss of 10 per cent, which I have allowed for loss in collecting. These freights should have been collected long ago, and it is too much to place in the assets of the company, $1,750,000 for accounts receivable. I doubt very much if that is not purely an estimate and not an actual statement of the fact. A little further down in the minister's statement he shows insurance claims, estimated amount recoverable, $686,805.51. The only conclusion to which I can come is that the insurance claims are for either actual or partial losses on some of these boats. I presume one boat or, perhaps, more than one got into difficulties somewhere, and after the officials of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine received from their agents, in the foreign or local port where the accident occurred, the bills and accounts in connection with the repairs, those accounts were sent to a marine insurance adjuster who would make up his statement. Until such time as the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited, receives from the adjuster an actual adjustment of what the different insurance companies will pay, it is impossible for the officials of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine to give to this House and to the country or to make a fair estimate of what they are to receive from the different insurance companies for repairs on the different steamers. I doubt very much if some of the officials of the Marine Department know enough about marine insurance to know how much should be deducted. But men in this country, with experience in marine losses and the way in which such losses should be written off and the amounts that should be deducted for the difference between the amount of insurance and the value of the ship as she appears in the insurance policy, must come to the conclusion that the merchant marine, instead of being able to collect the $686,805.51, will collect a very much smaller sum. I said a moment ago that I was doubtful if some of the officials in the Marine Department knew how a marine adjuster's statement should be made up. A few weeks ago I asked a question about the damage sustained by the steamer Canadian Recruit which went ashore in the Gulf of St. Lawrence last year. If hon. members will look at the answers that I received, they can only come to the conclusion that practically a whole clean-out is required in the Marine Department, nothing more and nothing less. The officials in the Marine Department or in the department at Toronto who have charge of this work, do not know their business, or they would never have given the answers which I received in regard to this matter some time ago.

The minister was good enough to call to my attention the fact that an item of deferred insurance, $908,390.73, had been left out of his statement. I presume that the amount is figured on the insurance premiums which the company is paying on the insurance written on the different ships, but no other concern in this country ever takes any notice of what is known as deferred insurance in regard to ships. In an ordinary business on land, if a private corporation or a private individual paid $20,000, $30,000, or $40,000 in insurance premiums, and if only one month of the insurance had run, they would be perfectly justified when making up a statement for the shareholders or the bank in showing that there were still 11 months' premiums to run off, but that is never done in the case of shipping companies. Why? Simply and solely for the reason that when you insure a ship, say, for $700,000 and pay, let us say for the the sake of illustration, $50,000 in premiums, if that ship is lost tomorrow, you do not collect the $700,000 plus the 11 months' insurance which has never been run off. Certainly not. You collect the $700,000, and the insurance company makes you pay by note or cash the $50,000 in premiums for the whole year. Consequently, I say that any person who understood the shipping business would not have placed in that statement of assets $908,000 for deferred insurance. While I have allowed that in deference to the statement of the minister, it is not right or proper that the amount should appear in the statement of assets.

Then the Minister of Railways or the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, or somebody else, due, I presume to the loyalty which is bubbling out of the hearts of the members of the Conservative party, or the Unionist party, or the National Liberal and Conservative party, when the Government called on the people of this country to invest their savings in the 1934 Victory loan, subscribed $500,000 for the bonds of that issue, for I notice by the statement of assets that somebody holds $500,000 of the Dominion of Canada Victory loan, 1934. Now either the Minister of Marine and Fisheries or his officials, or Mr. Hanna or his officials, or the auditors, Messrs. Marwin, Mitchell and Company have placed in that statement these Victory bonds at par. Now if they were making up a private statement for the minister or for his bank, for instance, to show how he stood with the world, Messrs. Marwick, Mitchell and Company would immediately say if they were shown in the statement of assets this item of $500,000 for bonds of the 1934 Victory loan: We cannot allow that to pass; the bonds are only worth $475,000 to-day, or $95 to the $100. Consequently, we can allow you on that item a credit of only $475,000. So there is a difference there of $25,000.

I think I have covered the matters in connection with this statement pretty thoroughly, but there is one thing I would like to say to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, especially in view of the fact that the statement issued by the Department of Marine and Fisheries was not what it should have been, and also in view of the fact that the people of this country for the last year or two, and especially during the last six months, have known that the shipping business was in a bad state. Whether or not the Government was justified in building ships, everybody knew the Government must be losing money, because every private individual in the business was losing money. Now, I might be excused for going out and saying about a private company in which I was interested that I was afraid there would be a deficit, and that things were not so rosy as they should be, but with regard to this Government enterprise I say it does not lie in the mouths of the officials of the Marine Department to say twenty-four hours before the minister issued his statement, that there were people in this country who were pessimistic about the merchant marine situation. I say that the officials of the Government should mind their own business, and not give out statements to the newspapers, as did some official in the Marine Department, the day before the minister issued his statement. Let me read what somebody in the minister's department said:

> "There's a great disappointment awaiting those who have predicted a deficit" in connection with the operation of the Canadian Merchant Marine. Parliament Hill, the press and the public of Canada, considering the showing of the national railways, have steeled themselves for further heavy losses when the promised merchant marine statement is brought in by Hon. C. C. Ballantyne: "A knockout," the Canadian Press Limited comments, "awaits the pessimists who have confidently predicted an operating deficit." Both the statements quoted as the "official verdict" of the department, and the tone of the press dispatch, have given offence. They imply that members, press and public have been hoping for a deficit.
> The fact is that any little hope will come as water in a desert of deficit. If the Canadian Government Merchant Marine shows a profit, with all the facts in to date, then there will not be disappointment, but national gratification. "Do they imagine that people actually like to hear of stunning losses"? demanded one member tonight.

The latter part is the comment of one of the newspapers in this country, and I think everybody will agree with its statement that if the merchant marine shows a profit when all the facts are in, there will not be disappointment but national gratification. I say it does not lie in the mouth of any official of the Marine Department to give out such a statement to the Canadian Press, implying that there are members of Parliament in this country, whether on the Government or the Opposition side, who would be delighted to hear of a deficit in the operations of the merchant marine.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: If my hon. friend will allow me to interrupt him for a moment, the only statement given out to the press officially was by my secretary, who sat in the gallery under strict orders from me to give out nothing to the members of the Press Gallery until I rose to speak, and then all that was handed to the members of the gallery was what appeared officially on the pages of Hansard. Surely my hon. friend is not going to attribute to any one connected with the merchant marine responsibility for the various newspaper articles which have appeared. I think his fairness of mind will surely grant that.

Mr. DUFF: I am trying to be fair, but it is useless, absolutely useless, for the minister to try and apologise for any of his officials. The country will not—I will not say believe him, but I say it is useless for him to try and apologise for his officials. Let me point out to him that this despatch is dated March 28, and his statement was not made to the House until March 29. So how can he say he gave instructions to his secretary not to give out anything until after he had made his speech, when this statement was given out from his Department twenty-four hours before he ever rose to speak.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: What is the name of the paper?

Mr. DUFF: It is a paper which supports the minister, the Halifax Herald. The item I have read is contained in a despatch dated March 28, from Ottawa, and was an interview reported by the Canadian Press Limited. The Canadian Press Limited is subsidized by the Government, and we all know they would not give out anything against the Government unless they had received it from one of the minister's officials. Now let us see what else the press of this country say about this merchant marine. Here is another despatch from Halifax. The reason I am reading despatches from Halifax is because Halifax is one of the greatest shipping ports in the world.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I suppose you have the Toronto papers there as well, the Globe, for instance?

Mr. DUFF: If the minister will send for the Globe and will mark any passage he wishes me to read, I shall be glad to quote it in full and make my comments. I have not the Globe nor have I seen its reference as referred to by the minister. Whatever the Globe said or did not say does not affect the situation. In Halifax we are differently situated. The Globe, I understand, is printed in Toronto, and with all due deference to its editor and those who are associated with it, I must say that they are not in as good a position to size up the situation as are the Halifax newspapers, and newspapers on the Pacific coast. I shall now give an extract from the Halifax Herald. The article is headed "Some Appetite," and underneath this caption is the picture of a great big elephant—a white elephant. Below the picture are the letters "C.G.M.M." which I take to mean "Canadian Government Merchant Marine." One foot of this elephant stands on "Canadian shipping enterprise;" another foot stands on "West India trade," squashing its unfortunate body to death, while another foot is trampling the life out of "private ship owners." On the trunk, and before the feet of this useless beast are scattered the seventy million dollars of the people"s money which the hon. Minister of Marine has wasted. Now for the substance of the article:

> Conservative Halifax business men—men who have been in the shipping and exporting business in this city for the past twenty-five years, are outspoken in their criticism of the present management of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. A prominent Halifax business man—a man who has been on the water front for years—gave The Herald the following statement yesterday:
> "The number of steamers built and being built for the C.G.M.M. is understood to be 65. These steamers each run from 3,000 to 10,000 tons deadweight capacity. It would be probably safe to say that they average 5,000 tons deadweight capacity each, and it is understood that the contract prices were from $180 to $200 per deadweight ton or an average of $190 per deadweight ton. It is not comforting news for the taxpayers of Canada to read in British Shipping papers that recently a new German built steamer was sold in England for nine pounds sterling per deadweight ton, or at to-day's rate of exchange, slightly under $40.00 as against $190.00 for the Canadian steamers.
> "It is alarming to look further into these figures; 65 steamers at an average of 5,000 tons each amounts to 325,000 tons which at a cost of $150 dollars per deadweight ton more than to-day's price in England, means that their reduced value today is forty-eight millions seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Had these steamers been sold, as they should have been, when the war was over there is no doubt but that this loss would have been considerable less, probably not one-half of the present depreciation, and the country is now saddled not only with this loss, but with also a probable tremendous yearly loss in operation."

After reading this article in the Halifax Herald, I had occasion to discuss the question of the merchant marine with some of the best business men along the water front of that city. I asked them what they thought of it and they unanimously agreed that there was no question at all as to the absolute correctness of the figures quoted; they all agreed that they were within the limit. Now, let me give the minister a little more food for reflection. Here is an article headed "Must Face Facts". The minister will no doubt be anxious to know the source from which I shall quote, and I am confident that the newspaper in which the article appears would not say anything detrimental to this Government if it were possible for its editor or its proprietor to say anything in their defence. This article also appears in the Halifax Herald, a supporter of the Government. As I say, it is headed "Must Face Facts", and this is what it says:

According to a despatch from the capital, the people of Canada must begin now to prepare themselves for one more unpalatable pill in the form of a second extensive deficit in a government-operated department. The ministerial prestidigitators unable to produce the doves and rabbits from the departmental hat, have evidently no alternative but to lay the headgear on the table and wait. The Canadian Government Merchant Marine, it is feared, "will show correspondingly heavy losses"—the relative factor being the Canadian National Railways.

"It is realized," says the despatch, "that all has not been prosperity with this branch of the service, and an announcement of a deficit would not be surprising."

Thus, the shadow is precursor of the event. Canadians will be disappointed, but they will not be astonished, at the failure of the merchant marine. This is the logical outcome of the government embarking in a competitive business on its own account without due regard to what the venture entailed.

On the 27th February, 1920, Hon. C. C. Ballantyne announced that the Merchant Marine would be constructed at a cost of $20,000,000. Eight months later, the entire estimate had increased to $72,890,476.03. The fleet has not yet been completed.

Contracts for the government-owned vessels were placed at the peak of ship-building prices. An instance may be taken from the Canadian Explorer and the Canadian Mariner where the contract price was over $190 a ton. Between the placing of the contract and completion of the ships, costs had fallen and, according to well-informed shipping interests in Halifax, steamers are now being built in Great Britain at prices ranging from no more than $63 to $75 a ton. That is to say, a ship built in Halifax, or any other place in Canada at the price prevailing when the contract was entered into ($1,636,050) and of the same type as the locally-built vessels, would now cost approximately $512,000, at the highest.

If this means anything at all, it means that the government-owned vessel has depreciated over $1,000,000 before it strikes the water at all. Basing its rates on fixed charges—interest, depreciation and insurance—and placing the principle of these charges as the actual cost of the vessel, usually rated at 13 per cent, the government ship must earn roughly $136,000 in order to clear its overhead, while the privately-owned ship is earning $65,000. This is the handicap of the Canadian merchant marine, and with the commissioning of the larger and more expensive vessels, the handicap is aggravated.

The figures quoted do not pretend to detail with any attempt at accuracy the actual obligations devolving on the vessels, for they do not take into account current expenses, nor do they embrace the money necessary to outfit and equip in order to make them operative at all. They are employed merely to indicate relatively the situation of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine as contrasted with that of private companies.

There are of course remedies, but before any measures can be applied the government must be prepared to accept the initial depreciation as a dead loss.

[Mr. Duff.]

Perhaps the minister would also like to hear more regarding the cost of these ships, and their present value. Let me read from an article taken from a London newspaper of February 26, under the heading "The Shipping Position":

Nearly 10 per cent of British shipping laid up—freight falling in 12 months by 75 per cent—five ships needed to do the work that four ships did seven years ago—running costs up by 300 per cent over the pre-war level—clearances of British steamers less than in 1890—coal exports a third of what they were in 1913.

Such are a few of the facts that may be gleaned from the very gloomy reports issued in the last few weeks by the Chamber of Shipping and the Liverpool Ship Owners' Association. The story that the shipping experts have to tell is perhaps no more depressing than any story told by any trade association at the present time, but shipping is the microcosm of international trade, and these unhappy facts reflect more clearly than any recent document the condition into which the business of the world has fallen. British shipping grew and developed in freedom—freedom from the paralyzing restrictions of government, freedom to bring merchandise without hindrance to our ports, freedom to do business wherever business was to be done. The depression is attributed in large measure to government interference, and in the broadest sense it is true, shipping will recover in the proportion that politicians leave trade to flow in its own channels.

That, to my mind, is quite right, and so long as any member of the Government cherishes the notion that he can operate ships better than private individuals, just so long shall we have exactly the conditions that we find to-day.

The newspaper goes on to say:

If the ship owners can convince the politicians that what we need is not guidance but freedom, they will have done the country a very great service.

Well, Sir, the only way that the shipbuilders can persuade the politicians to give them freedom is to tell the members of the Cabinet, who are now usurping the functions of government although they promised to go to the people and get a fresh mandate after the war, that the quicker they resign their positions and give the people a chance to express at the polls the opinion they entertain about them the better. I might also, perhaps, in order to be fair, quote what some authorities in this country and elsewhere say about the value of ships. One gentleman who is more familiar than others with shipping operations, by reason of his connection with that great corporation, the Canadian Pacific Railway, is Mr. Bosworth, and he stated a few days ago, when asked about the value of ships at the present time, that new ships were worth from $50 to $75 per ton. I quite understand that Mr. Bosworth would naturally put the best side forward, and in view of the fact that the Canadian Pacific company own and operate a number of ships he certainly would not state the value of these ships at less than they actually were. I think, therefore, that when Mr. Bosworth put a value of $50 to $75 per ton on ships it will certainly convince any person who wants to be fair that he was placing a limit on the value at the present time. Another gentleman who is greatly interested in shipping is Mr. Robert Dollar, whose name is very familiar to every person who reads the magazines and newspapers of this country. Mr. Dollar is a large ship owner and a short time since, when consulted with regard to the slump in shipping, gave his opinion that at the very outset ships were worth only $72 per ton. I think therefore that when, in making up my statement, I figured an appreciation of $150 per ton on the present Canadian Government Merchant Marine I made a fair presentation of the facts.

Now, Sir, there is a further matter to be considered in connection with this shipbuilding programme. However before I enter into that I wish to quote the opinion of another newspaper. The minister was anxious to hear what the Toronto Globe had said, but as he has not got that information I will read to him the opinions of another journal. The minister knows very well that the Montreal Gazette is a newspaper favourable to the present Government. I think I am within the judgment of the House when I say that the Montreal Gazette would not make any statement detrimental to this Government with respect to the management, the operation, or the building of the Canadian Merchant Marine, nor would it with respect to anything connected with the Government. The minister will remember that after the Peterborough election this good Tory newspaper came out and demanded the Government's resignation; but it found that the Government would not resign, but was determined to hold office in spite of the wishes of the people and in a very few weeks afterwards the Montreal Gazette was found trying to apologize for the Government and the Government's action. Still, Sir, I think I am quite justified in quoting what the Montreal Gazette says about this particular matter. The editorial is dated January 8, 1920, and is headed "The Canadian Marine." The article says:

It is interesting to learn, from official sources, that the Canadian marine is being operated at a cost lower only than that of the Japanese merchant vessels. The statement as printed is not, however, convincing; according to the report credited to the Marine Department the monthly cost of wages and board of the crew of a United States Government ship is $6,711, while that of a Canadian Government ship of like tonnage and dimensions is only $2,303, or about one-third that of its American competitor for international trade. Even poor old Britain's ship owners seem to have not yet mastered the art of efficiency and economy in the management of ships, as the cost of operating a British vessel of the Canadian Mercantile Marine class is set forth as $3,645.09 per month. Do not overlook the nine cents. So that taking the American cost for comparative purposes as 100, Britain manages to plough the sea with her ships at an expenditure of 54 per cent, Canada at an expenditure of 34 per cent, and Japan, because of cheap oriental labour and the addiction of its crews to rice, at an expenditure of 17 per cent of that of the United States.

The article goes on to say:

However gullible the public may be, they are not so credulous as to believe that a vessel operated under the auspices of the Canadian Government can be navigated at a cost 20 per cent, less than that of a British vessel. The ownership of some 66 ships by the people of Canada is a quite serious matter, second in importance only to that of the ownership of 22,000 miles of railway. There is a lot of money involved in the matter, a capital expenditure in the neighbourhood of $75,000,000, and a current operating account which may produce a surplus, but we fear will involve a heavy deficit upon proper accounting. The policy of the Government was admirable enough at the time of its conception. There was a dearth of ocean shipping caused by the depredations of submarines, and the creation of a shipbuilding industry was timely in the way of providing employment for many hundred persons, as well as promising of permanence. The use of the vessels in the promotion of foreign trade was also alluring, and it is to be said that many markets have been exploited through the agency of the Government Mercantile Marine. Nothing can be gained, however, by concealment of what we believe to be a fact, namely, that the continued ownership and operation of these ships is likely to prove costly. Conditions have swiftly changed. From a dearth of tonnage three years ago, there is now an excess. Many vessels have been tied up for want of freight. Rates are declining, and a business hazardous in private hands becomes more so when managed by a government.

In this connection there is an interesting article in the last issue of Bradstreets, from which we quote:

" The reports that come from the shipping business, whether from the freight or the construction side of that industry, point to the world as a whole having more than made up the losses of war, and there are now more ships than there is freight offering. Rate cutting is widespread, but as we noted in the case of some staples a while ago, lower freights seem to bring out only a small business, owing, it is said, to the reduced international trade moving. On the construction side of the case it may be said that with hundreds of ships tied up,said to be one-quarter of the entire fleet, the Shipping Board finds it hard to get business for its vessels, which are handicapped in the world competition for business by acts of Congress which were devised, apparently, for the purpose of making shipping expensive rather than cheap. The board according to Admiral Benson, has 200 of one type of ship tied up, and a consular report cabled from London says a big slump is noted in the British shipping trade at all ports. From the shipbuilding side of the matter the situation is no better. Japanese shipyards are reported to have comparatively little to do, and a Tyne river (British) shipbuilder is quoted in the day's news as saying cancellations in that line were never more numerous, he instancing one concern that had sixteen cancellations."

It is, therefore, a discouraging situation in which the Canadian mercantile fleet is placed Like the National Railway, deficits are likely to be the order of the day and the people may prepare to bear no small monetary burden as the price of the policy justifiable in its inception, but as to the wisdom of the continuance of which there may well be misgiving

That is what the Montreal Gazette says.

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE: I suppose the hon. member would have no objection to give to the House the very favourable editorial published by the Montreal Gazette the day after I made my statement in the House?

Mr. DUFF: I have not that editorial in my possession. If the minister will supply me with it I will be very glad to read it.

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE: It is there.

Mr. DUFF: Where.

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE: In the Montreal Gazette.

Mr. DUFF: Will the minister be good enough,—because I am very busy with the delivery of my speech as I have prepared it,— to send a page out and get the issue of the Montreal Gazette to which he refers, and I will be very glad to read the editorial. I said a moment ago that the Montreal Gazette asked the Government to resign after the Peterborough election, but after influence had been brought to bear on that paper it pulled in its horns and since then has been apologizing for the actions of the Government. Now, Sir, I will read what another newspaper says with respect to the Government's shipbuilding operations. It is contained in a despatch sent out from Ottawa and says:

The minister gives only one side of the C.G.M.M. story for the year ended December 31, 1920, that is, when it affirms a net operating profit of some $781,460. A man running a gasoline ferry would hardly be expected to strike a balance of profit and forget to debit the account with interest on the money he borrowed to buy the boat.

Nor would he be expected to forget that his boat was wearing out and that some time he would be faced with the necessity of buying a new one. But that is what the minister does.

Because he does not know any better.

An hon. MEMBER: That is pretty severe.

[Mr. Duff.]

Mr. DUFF: I know it is but it is absolutely correct. While I am waiting for the minister to pass me the Gazette referred to, I should like to avert for a few moments to what another member of the Government said with regard to the merchant marine. After the Minister of Marine had made his statement last Tuesday, and after some very fair criticisms had been made by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) and the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) the Prime Minister was compelled to come to the defence of his minister. Now, if there is anything the Prime Minister knows absolutely nothing about it is shipping conditions in this country, and I say that he had no right to intervene in the debate on a subject of which he is absolutely ignorant. I will prove to the satisfaction of hon. members that the Prime Minister did not know what he was talking about when he made the remarks which appeared on Hansard of March 29, at page 1346. He endeavoured to save the face of the Minister of Marine and the Government and in endeavouring to combat the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Red Deer and the hon. member for Maisonneuve he said:

I am sorry that, as things have turned out, hon. members opposite were found prepared for a very dismal presentation whereas, as a matter of fact, the statement made by the Minister of Marine reflects anything but a disastrous situation—possibly it is not as rosy as many of us expected when the programme was launched, certainly not as rosy as there were just reasons for expecting at that time, but on the whole fair and satisfactory.

Now when I said a few moments ago that some official in his department had given out a statement to the Canadian press the Minister of Marine denied it. Perhaps after all he was right; it may have been the Prime Minister who gave out that statement.

An hon. MEMBER: It sounds like it.

Mr. DUFF: Yes.

I am sorry that, as things have turned out, hon. members opposite were found prepared for a very dismal presentation, whereas, as a matter of fact, the statement made by the Minister of Marine reflects anything but a disastrous situation—

Well, Mr. Chairman, if the Prime Minister can get any comfort from the present condition of the merchant marine as shown either in the operating account or in the capital account, then I say he is welcome to that comfort, but I can assure him that the people will not agree with his statement that that condition of affairs is satisfactory. And I should like to know why the Prime Minister dared to interfere in the debate to say to hon. members either on this side of the House or the other that they were "prepared for a very dismal presentation" of the facts. Is that a fair statement to make? I say the Prime Minister was not justified in so speaking.

The Prime Minister also made another statement which I would like to quote because I want to show conclusively that he did not know what he was talking about. It will be found at page 1348 of Hansard of the same date and is in these words:

> Well, they are at least earning a good sum over operating expenses,—and you cannot make any trains do that over the Trascontinental railway, nor over the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. Those ships are at least earning some million odd dollars over operating expenses, and after allowance for depreciation and every other just allowance that need be made they are still able to pay a small percentage upon their actual cost,—

I say, Sir, that the Prime Minister had no right to make such a statement in view of the fact that these ships are not making a profit. They never have made a profit,—indeed, they are making a loss which this country is ill able to stand. I do not want to use hard language, but there are times when we have to be candid, and the Prime Minister would not have made these statements unless he was entirely ignorant of the facts connected with the merchant marine.

I have to thank the minister for the article, not from the Gazette but La Presse. I am only sorry that it is not in the original French version. I see it has been translated, and before I proceed to read it I want to say that I would not be surprised if the minister's department or the English translator has made the same blunder as was perpetrated in regard to the pilots. We all remember the answer we got from the minister in which he said that certain "decayed" pilots were receiving a bonus. It is only another instance of the way in which the Marine Department is conducted. There seems to be no person there who knows anything about its affairs.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Hear, hear.

Mr. DUFF: That is absolutely right, from the minister down. This is what La Presse says:

> The detailed and precise exposé. . . .

It should have read exposure.

> . . . made yesterday in the House of Commons by the Minister of Marine regarding the operation of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine shows that last year's operations yielded a net surplus of $781,460.

> This surplus amounts to only half the surplus for the preceding year, but this is due to the world crisis of last year. Canada did not escape the effects of this crisis, which owing to the dearth of maritime freight caused many vessels in Great Britain and the United States to remain idle in the harbours.
> The surplus acquired by the Government merchant marine represents a revenue of 2.35 per cent on the capital invested, a figure insufficient to meet the interest on that capital, which amounts to 2,750,000.

What a great showing that is, to be sure! Is it any wonder that the minister sent this article over to me? Here is his own statement sent across the floor of the House, in which I read that this merchant marine of his made a profit of 2.35 per cent on the invested capital. Is not that great? He is paying 5½ per cent interest on his capital and not allowing a cent for depreciation, and he is proud of the fact that he made 2.35 per cent.

> This therefore means that a loss of about $2,000,000 must be put down to exploitation.

That shows again, Mr. Chairman, that the minister would never have had to do this if he was seized of the facts. It shows, as I have said a dozen times in the course of my speech, that neither the minister nor his officials know what is going on in the department and are not conversant with Canadian shipping conditions.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Read on.

Mr. DUFF: Do not worry; I will read on. I want to repeat that about the exploitation:

> There is no reason for recrimination any more than there is for being alarmed. The Canadian Government Marine is an enterprise at its beginning and it could not be expected to escape the vicissitudes which accompany all new initiatives.
> From the figures quoted in the House by the Hon. Mr. Ballantyne it would appear that the cost of operating our vessels has been reasonable and compares favourably with that of foreign shipping.
>
> It should not be overlooked, on the other hand, that the cost of construction of these vessels, built during the war, has been excessive; that was a general law during the war period. There is therefore no need to be astonished beyond measure that the profits of exploitation are insufficient to meet the interest on this excessive capital.
> On the whole, credit should ge given this enterprise and we should be resigned to support the cost of such an initiative which must be considered an economic necessity, Canada being destined to reap great advantages from the same within a short time.

Evidently there is somebody in this country who is not seized with the facts regarding world shipping, somebody who is willing to pay that tribute to the merchant marine and the results which the minister has obtained.

An hon. MEMBER: He did not know any better.

Mr. DUFF: Of course he did not know any better; that is the whole trouble. He took the minister's figures, and that is why he made the statement that he did. But there is not very much comfort for the minister in this article. It is not necessary for me to deal with it in detail, because I have already covered these points. If my hon. friend will look at Hansard to-morrow and refer to my previous statements, he will find that I have answered all the points brought forward by La Presse and that La Presse has not one leg to stand upon so far as anything favourable to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine is concerned.

With regard to the costs of building these ships, to which I have referred, I may say that the worst is yet to come. The minister made certain contracts, on his own initiative, and without calling for tenders, with certain shipbuilding concerns in this country. For one reason or another, which I shall not discuss at the moment, these shipyards were compelled to go into liquidation, and by reason of the loose manner in which the Minister of Marine had the contracts drawn he is now compelled to have other ship-building concerns take over the half-completed ships from these different shipyards to be finished on a cost plus basis. Instead these ships costing the country $190 a ton, therefore, they will cost nearly $250 a ton before the minister gets through with his contract. Now, Sir, what is the result of all this effort on the part of the Government to build these ships at the highest possible prices and endeavour to operate them in competition with private enterprise? I agree that we should have a merchant marine; I agree that we should have a Canadian merchant marine, but a marine built with private capital. There was no good reason why, after a certain stage was reached, the minister should not have disposed of these ships, should not have sold them in such a manner as not to interfere with the operations of private concerns in this country.

I omitted to mention, Sir, that not only are we going to suffer a loss of about $59,000,000 on the operation and depreciation in value of these ships, but the minister and the Government have another serious matter to deal with. It will be remembered that the minister made a contract with a certain steel company in this country for the delivery of 250,000 tons of ship plates. As a result of the Government not taking delivery of all these plates—if I am correctly informed the Government took delivery of only 45,000 tons instead of the full order of 250,000 tons—the Government are going to have a lawsuit on their hands. This company claim that in good faith they went ahead, spent $5,000,000 in putting up a plate mill, bought the steel and prepared to turn out the 250,000 tons of steel plates. The Government have not been able to carry out their contract and the company are now asking from the Government, if I am correctly informed, $15,000,000 to $18,000,000 by way of damages.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Oh, no.

Mr. DUFF: How much?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: It is hardly worth my while rising to answer such exaggerated statements.

Mr. DUFF: Will the minister tell us how much?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes, I will tell my hon. friend with pleasure. The Government have cancelled the contract, as the hon. member states, but we have no claim whatever from the Dominion Iron & Steel Company. If they are entitled to compensation for the cancellation of the contract by the Government, the Exchequer Court will determine the amount of that compensation. But it will be nowhere near the amount my hon. friend has mentioned.

Some hon. MEMBERS: How much?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I cannot tell what decision the Exchequer Court will come to. But my hon. friend might just as well say $100,000,000 as to say $15,000,000 to $18,000,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What claim is made by the Dominion Iron & Steel Company?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Cancellation of contract.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What amount do they claim?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: They have not claimed any amount.

Mr. DUFF: I stated that on account of the cancellation by the Government of their contract with the Dominion Iron & Steel Company, it was the purpose of that company to claim from the Government some $15,000,000 or $18,000,000 by way of damages, and the minister immediately said that was not correct. When he rose

I assumed that he was going to tell us something; that he was going to inform us that there was absolutely no claim on the part of the company.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: No, no.

Mr. DUFF: There is no claim, perhaps, so far as the minister knows for the moment. What I say is that the Dominion Iron & Steel Company are going to make a claim for $15,000,000 to $18,000,000, and when such claim is made the Government will have to pay it, whether through the Exchequer Court or otherwise. The minister does not say that the Dominion Iron & Steel Company are not going to make a claim; therefore I am right in saying that owing to the cancellation of the contract the company intend to press their claim at no distant date. It is useless for the minister to get up and try to camouflage the situation.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: When any hon. member grossly exaggerates figures, it does not do the Government any harm and it does not do the people any harm, so that when he says that the Dominion Iron & Steel Company are going to claim the exorbitant sum of $15,000,000 to $18,000,000 I am perfectly satisfied to let it go at that.

Mr. DUFF: The minister said there was no claim; how does he know whether my figures are excessive or not? It does not lie in his mouth to say that the claim will not be from $15,000,000 to $18,000,000. When this matter is pressed and the Government has to pay the bill—and a sweet bill it will be, too—another $5,000,000 or $10,000,000 or $15,000,000, whatever the award of the Exchequer Court may be, will be added to the $59,000,000, the amount of loss which the country has sustained in connection with the Canadian Government Merchant Marine.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member when he is making a speech. I have had, of course, discussions with the Dominion Iron and Steel Company. The mill itself cost about $5,000,000. The claim, if any, that the Dominion Iron and Steel Company would have would be in regard to the remaining portion of the contract that the Dominion Government did not take, and there are 200,000 tons yet to be taken, supposing that the Government had not cancelled the contract. Does the hon. member mean to state that they would make fifteen to eighteen million dollars on 200,000 tons of plate?

Mr. DUFF: I do not know that I need—

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): Follow it up.

Mr. DUFF: The hon. member is not satisfied. I am very glad. If I remember aright, the minister made an excessive contract with these people of something like $83 per ton on this business. What I say is that the Dominion Iron and Steel —and I got the information from people who seem to know—are reported to be going to claim for the full value of the 200,000 tons of steel, and damages for having to put up an expensive plant at Sydney. Whether the amount is $5,000,000, or $10,000,000, or $15,000,000, they certainly have an action for damages against the Government, and that action will be decided in their favour in the Exchequer Court or some other way. Consequently, whether that amount is $5,000,000, or $10,000,000, or $15,000,000, the amount must be added to the $59,000,000 loss which the country has to swallow, because we have in the Government men who do not understand the shipping business.

As well as losing this vast sum of money to the country, owing to the fact that the Government have entered into the shipping business in competition with private enterprises, they have practically ruined all private shipping interests on the two oceans. I know, perhaps, more about the Atlantic coast than the Pacific; but during the war men with small means invested practically their last cent in wooden vessels in Nova Scotia. These vessels were built at a high price, because the people of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick wanted to do what little they could to help the Empire in the war. The result is that to-day these ships are lying at anchor with nothing to do, because Government ships, which are losing thousands and thousands of dollars every day, have taken the business away, not only from steamers, but from sailing vessels. That is the joke of this whole tragedy, because the sailing vessels can sail faster than the minister's slow tramp steamers; they can beat his steamers in any voyage they want to make. But the Government steamers are taking away the business from the wooden ships of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, with the result that large numbers of wooden ships are tied up in the ports of those provinces with nothing to do.

This Government—and I am now referring to competition with steamers—are running their steamers in competition with steamers or lines of steamers to which the country is paying subsidies voted by this Parliament. Let me refer the committee to the routes which the minister mentioned in his speech and on which these vessels operate. At page 1332 of Hansard, these routes are mentioned. I will not read them all:

Fortnightly sailings Canada to Liverpool.
Fortnightly sailings Canada to Barbados, Trinidad and Demerara.
Three-weekly sailings Canada to Nassau, Kingston and Belize.
Monthly sailings Canada to Pernambuco, Santos, Rio de Janeiro, Montevideo, and Buenos Aires.

This afternoon the minister mentioned that he is running a line of ships between Halifax, N.S. and St. John's, Newfoundland, although I cannot find it in this list. If you refer, Sir, to page 46 of the Estimates, you will find that this country is paying a certain steamship line to run a service between Halifax and St. John's, Newfoundland, $35,000. Yet these gentlemen, who are in charge of the Government merchant marine, are deliberately putting steamers on the same route in competition with the boats to which they are paying a subsidy. In addition to the line to which the Government are paying a subsidy on the Halifax-Newfoundland route and which is operated by a private company, the Furness-Withy Company, there are also two other companies operating steamers between Halifax and Newfoundland. There is a British company known as the Red Cross Line. What does that mean? These private companies have built up this business in the last number of years. They operated their ships during the war, and you, Sir, will no doubt remember the Red Cross ship which was sunk by a submarine off New York on her way from Newfoundland to New York, via Halifax. During the war they took the good with the bad and the bad with the good, but they have kept up a satisfactory service between Halifax and St. John's, Newfoundland. The Canadian Government Merchant Marine, however, because they know nothing about shipping and do not know what to do with their steamers, put their steamers on this route to interfere with private business and private ownership. What else did they do? In the Estimates at page 46, this item appears in the subsidies column:

Canada and the West Indies or South America, or both, steam service or services between, $340,666.66.

At the invitation of this Government some four or five years ago English capitalists—and I want to show how this Government treat people in England who are willing to invest their money in this country, and yet when the time comes to flap the flag, they are the Imperialists and Loyalists and we on this side are whatever they like to call us—a reputable English concern, decided to put on a line of boats between Halifax and West Indian ports, giving a fortnightly service to several ports in the West Indies. One of the considerations was that the Government should pay them a subsidy of $340,666.66 a year. Yet we find now that this Government, not knowing what to do with their boats, deliberately placed these slow tramp steamers in competition with the boats of the Royal Mail Packet Company. Not only do they take part of the freight away from that company, frieght which the Government under that contract should endeavour to give to them, but they are also interfering with the wooden vessels of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. To show you, Sir, the information in the possession of this Government with regard to this important matter, let me quote what the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) said when my hon. friend (Mr. Ross) asked him why the Government were running steamers in competition with this company which is being subsidized by the Government. It is well that the people of this country should know what kind of men we have at the head of the different departments of Government. I say that these men ought to get out, and the quicker they get out, the better. Listen to this:

Mr. ROSS: I am very much inclined to agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Cahill) with regard to this particular item. It seems to me that when we are spending $340,000 a year subsidizing boats for a service to the West Indies, and when vessels of the Canadian Merchant Marine make thirty-two trips, apparently, to the same ports that these vessels serve, we might very well effect some economy here.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Not to the same ports; they are thousands of miles apart.

There is only one conclusion, and that is that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, a servant of the Crown and of the people, is absolutely ignorant of where the boats go which are owned by the Canadian Government and the ones subsidized by his department. There is no other conclusion to come to, and I say that no one is fit to hold a portfolio or to be in charge of a department who would make such a statement of that kind to the House.

The minister was also anxious to put on Hansard a statement as to the kind of business the boats were doing, and the kind of cargoes they were carrying. Oh yes, these boats were expanding our export trade. Beautiful! It certainly reads very nice to the unitiated, but let me dissect the matter for a moment or two. One of our steamers that goes to Cuba, and the exports have consisted mainly of pulp and paper, malt, flour, hay, lumber, fish, potatoes, whiskey, oats and cement. This cargo was carried in the steamer called, if I remember rightly, the Canadian Mariner. Now I am going to make a humble suggestion to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I would suggest that he change her name, and that he do as he did last fall, get the hon. member for King's, the ex-Prime Minister, to rechristen her. We all remember how when the ex-Prime Minister and the Minister of Marine went down to Halifax to christen a boat, before she was christened she slipped into the water. She did not want the right hon. gentleman to christen her.

Mr. JACOBS: Was she a self-starter?

Mr. DUFF: This steamer which was carrying the products of this country in the shape of whiskey was the Canadian Mariner, if I remember correctly.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Canadian "Walker".

Mr. DUFF: She should be re-christened the Canadian Bootlegger. Here we have a Government passing prohibition legislation and using their own ships of the Merchant Marine to take whiskey from this country to Cuba. Consequently, I say the minister would be well advised if he could get the hon. member for King's, N.S., to re-christen her the Canadian Bootlegger.

Mr. McMASTER: How did she come back from Cuba?

Mr. DUFF: She came back light. I want to give a little more information as to how these Government steamers interfere with the legitimate business of private concerns. Before coming to that, however, I wish to say that a night or two ago the hon. member for Halifax, in speaking to his motion for a committee to investigate the National Railways and shipping, made certain statements by way of illustrating his argument, one of which was that the service operated by the minister from Halifax to St. John's, Newfoundland, was losing money in view of the fact that freights had declined, and that the ships were sailing back and forth with practically only half a cargo. The minister in his usual way—I need not describe it because you all know how he does it; evidently his conscience has been pricking him lately, for he cannot sit still—the other evening when the hon. member for Halifax said that these Government boats were losing money, got up and asked, "How do you know they are losing money?"

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Hear, hear.

Mr. DUFF: Hear, hear, absolutely. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries was quite right. The hon. member for Halifax does not know they are losing money, but will the minister tell me those boats are not losing money?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes.

Mr. DUFF: Well, I have to take his word, but if he were outside the precints of this House, I would say that he did not know what he was talking about. These boats are losing money, thousands of dollars a day. When I get through I would like the minister to give me a statement of how they are making money. It is impossible for them to make money when they leave Halifax with half a cargo and come back with their propellers racing from the time they leave St. John's until they get to Halifax.

There is another matter. We may as well have the whole story. The minister told us last year that the Government did not employ brokers to get business for their ships. Now that was a very bad admission for him to make, because the only way to handle ships properly is to have brokers in the different ports to get business for them before they arrive. If you have no broker, and have to wait until the ship arrives in port, she will likely have discharged her inward cargo, if she has any, long before the captain or somebody else, for the Government have no agents, can get an outward cargo for his ship. Here again I find the minister did not know what was actually being done by the officials who are mismanaging this great company. We find that somebody—I do not know whether it was Colonel John Cooper, or who—in an endeavour to promote business for the Government boats entered into an arrangement with certain New York shipping interests to come into what is known as the New York Shipping Pool. Now a gentleman who does not know anything about shipping, and who goes to New York among the shipping sharks to enter into an arrangement with them, well, all I can say is Heaven help him. Somebody entered into an arrangement on behalf of these 47 or 63 boats, whereby they agreed not to cut rates, that is to say, the Canadian boats were to take no lower rates from Canadian ports than the New York boats were getting from New York ports. The result was that thousands of barrels of apples from King's county and Annapolis county, and good apples they were too, and no doubt from Ontario as well, which were ready to be shipped to the London market and were offered to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, had to be refused because they had entered into this agreement with the New York pool. Were these apples shipped on Canadian steamers, on British steamers, on United States steamers? No, on Norwegian steamers. Here is a list of the ships that were chartered because the officials of the Government merchant marine did not know their business and refused these shipments of apples from Halifax to the Mother Country:

Steamers Chartered for Apples

		Barrels
Caxambu..	$1.50	14,000
Angelica Maersk..	2.00	12,000
Knut Hamsun	1.75	20,000
Lisa Brodin..	1.75	15,000
Marstenen..	2.00	15,000
Anders..	1.75	15,000
Danefelt..	10s.	14,000
Vesla..	2.00	10,000
Lorentz W. Hansen.. ..	1.50	18,000
Harald..	1.50	8,000

Now, Sir, I have not the total number of barrels or the total amount of freight, but I know that we had ships owned by the Canadian Government Merchant Marine leaving Halifax day after day with practically no cargoes, and going to other ports, although they refused Canadian products at $1.50, $2 and $1.75 per barrel for apples; and they allowed Norwegians to come here and take away the Canadian business. Yet they try to make out that they know something about running ships.

An hon. MEMBER: Why did they refuse Canadian products?

Mr. DUFF: Because, in the first place, they had an agreement with the New York Shipping Pool; and in the second place, they do not know their business.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Hear, hear.

Mr. DUFF: I am glad to hear the minister say "hear, hear;" he is evidently coming to his senses.

Mr. McMASTER: You have converted him.

Mr. DUFF: I am not the first person who has converted him, I am sorry to say.

[Mr. Duff.]

Now, here is what a large shipowner says with regard to these steamers:

I suppose that complaints are like "water on a duck's back" to the present minister and his friends, but unless a change is made, it looks to me as if the shipowners of this province are going to be wiped out. I thought these ships were built first as a war measure and secondly to develop Canadian exports. It is rather amusing to note the development of Canadian business as brought about by these steamers. With the exception of one or two routes they are simply running on trade routes established and operated by shipowners of this province before Mr. Ballantyne and his shipbuilding friends were ever heard of—

Listen to that; there is an insinuation there, I am sorry to say.

—before Mr. Ballantyne and his shipbuilding friends were heard of. Take for instance the West India Route, for which the Government pays the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company a subsidy of $330,000 a year, and which trade was developed by the enterprise of a local firm. Mr. Ballantyne's steamers are now running in fierce competition with this line. Can Mr. Ballantyne or any one else explain the wisdom of this, or how much this line tends to develop Canadian trade? For the past century our Canadian schooners—

That is to say, wooden vessels.

—have looked after the molasses business, which the steamers, to a certain extent, let them do to a certain extent, as they got the sugar carrying. I understand from Barbadoes' advices that Mr. Ballantyne's steamers are making every effort possible to get every puncheon of molasses they can, thus taking away the business from us. For many years our Nova Scotia and Newfoundland vessels—

Again, wooden schooners.

—have done practically all the fish carrying to Brazil and the Argentine, and have always done it satisfactorily. Now, Mr. Ballantyne's steamers are bidding for this business, and will probably succeed in taking it away from us, as rates on some routes do not seem to matter; whereas on other routes they have to join the North Atlantic Pool and have their rates dictated to them from New York.

I might also add that the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in addition to the West India and Newfoundland trade, provide subsidies to vessels going to South Africa, Australia and other places, and yet the Government are putting ships on these routes on which they are paying subsidies to other lines. It might be interesting to know what some of these ships are doing. Here is a short extract from a good Government paper, the Montreal Gazette. This article reads as follows:

The fact that the Canadian Government vessel Canadian Explorer, en route from Australia to Vancouver, was able to relieve the population of Fanning Island, is gratifying; but the remainder of the Vancouver despatch which says that the Explorer brought only a few hundred tons of cargo, and a large quantity of mud ballast—

Mr. LEMIEUX: What?

Mr. DUFF: Mud ballast.

—is not quite so cheering. Carrying mud around the Pacific ocean is not a money-making enterprise even for Government ships.

Did the Minister of Finance hear that?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No.

Mr. DUFF: Then, before he decides to pay over to some one this $8,000,000, I should like him to read my speech to-morrow.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS: It would take too long.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We should never get through with it.

Mr. STEVENS: We might, perhaps next week.

Mr. DUFF: I venture to say that the people will read my speech just as much as any speech of the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens). I am not interested in building elevators, dry docks, or wharves. Now, this article in the Montreal Gazette, says that this steamer came back —I presume from Australia—carrying three hundred tons of cargo, which would be only about 10 per cent of her carrying capacity, and the rest, mud ballast. It is indeed quite cheering. The Government steamers take lumber from Vancouver and other Pacific ports, cargo of a kind which ordinary sailing vessels could carry, thus taking the bread out of the mouths of the owners of sailing ships; and they come back, after a sail of twenty-five or twenty-six days, carrying nothing but mud ballast.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Shame.

Mr. DUFF: It is a shame, and I cannot express my indignation in parliamentary language; but the minister will, no doubt, conceive what I may not express. Here is another Cuban story:

Luck even in the discharging of her liquor cargo was with the Halifax built steamer Canadian Mariner. This novel occurrence for the port of St. John was consummated by the Canadian Government Merchant Marine who shipped the last case of the cargo Friday night. A close watch was kept during the unloading process and the C.G.M.M. officials are delighted to report that they got the cargo through without a single loss. This was the maiden round voyage of the Mariner with Captain Starratt in command. She took on her cargo at Genoa and other Italian ports and Captain Starratt reported that the voyage had been a very successful one. Her cargo consisted of 2,000 cases of Italian wine and several thousand cases of vermouth and other liquors.

Now, here is a ship coming all the way from Italy and other Mediterranean ports with 2,000 cases of wine and several thousand cases of vermouth.

Mr. JACOBS: Was there mud on that steamer?

Mr. DUFF: No, but she had water ballast. Now, this shows conclusively that these ships are not loaded.

Mr. JACOBS: No, not the ships.

Mr. DUFF: I have heard of the crews of other ships being loaded, but no one can truthfully make such a charge against the ships. This was about the time that the prohibition law passed by this Parliament, went into effect in the city of St. John. Here is another despatch from Halifax, headed "Steamer Just 'Ducks In" as Dry Line Closes."

An hon. MEMBER: A Government steamer?

Mr. DUFF: Yes. The article says:

Perhaps it was jealousy on the part of Neptune and Aeolus which led them to threaten the bibulous followers of Bacchus in Halifax and Nova Scotia with the loss of 18,000 cases of good Scotch whiskey which was shipped on January 15 from Glasgow, for Halifax, by the Canadian Runner. More probably it was just a friendly joke as they did not carry their threat into effect.

An hon. MEMBER: Another Government steamer?

An hon. MEMBER: What is the name—"Rum Runner"?

Mr. DUFF: No; "Canadian Runner." The article continues:

Whatever it was, for thirteen of the fifteen day voyage of the Runner they gave her one rough time of it as can be inferred from the fact that ordinarily she would have made the run in nine or ten days. Meantime, while she was battling with tempestuous winds and mountainous seas the thirsty ones of Halifax were breathless in an ocean of doubt.

"Would the 18,000 cases of joy water arrive in time," was the question which was whispered in dark places and empty cellars.

When at six o'clock Sunday evening the Runner anchored in the harbour more than one good citizen wended his way to church with a lighter heart and joined in the hymns with a lustier voice than was his want.

And further on:

Ordinarily the C.M.G. steamers remain in the stream until morning but—

I presume on the advice contained in a telegram or marconigram from the officials of the department—

An hon. MEMBER: Sympathetic souls.

Mr. DUFF: (reading)

The good ship was tied up at Pier 23, south end terminals, by 11 o'clock, ready to be unloaded at first dawn of Blueyear's Eve. All yesterday, from morning until dark, a full force worked at full blast to place those 18,000 cases safely ashore, stopping only when it was accomplished.

An hon. MEMBER: Where was that whiskey bound for?

Mr. DUFF: I do not know, it may have been intended for Nova Scotia. But here is a Canadian Government steamer, owned and paid for by the people of this country with only a part cargo. I do not care very much what she brought although the Government should because they are prohibitionists; but I do say it proves conclusively that these Government steamers cannot pay when a ship worth a million and a half of dollars leaves the port of Glasgow and crosses the ocean with the small cargo of 18,000 cases of joy water. Now let us go a little further and see how our merchant marine is developing Canadian trade. Developing Canadian trade forsooth! Here is another newspaper extract:

Steamer Canadian Voyageur, Captain Sprosen, leaves on Monday for Baltimore, having been chartered to load there for Tampico. The Voyageur, since her arrival here several weeks ago, has had her machinery thoroughly overhauled and is now in first-class condition again for long voyages.

I would like to call the attention of the House to the fact that this steamer left for Baltimore which, as we all know, is a port on the Delaware river in the United States. The Canadian Voyager left Halifax without a pound of freight in her hold to develop Canadian trade, remember, and proceeded to Baltimore having been chartered there to load for Tampico. Now where is Tampico? It certainly is not in England. I would not mind her going to Baltimore to load goods for the Mother Country but this vessel loaded goods from Baltimore, a United States port, for Tampico, Mexico.

An hon. MEMBER: Was that whiskey too?

Mr. DUFF: No these were goods that were manufactured in the United States and taken down to Tampico, in Mexico, yet the Minister of Marine gets up and with a straight face and serious mien endeavours to impress the House and the country with the idea that these Government steamers are being built and operated to develop the foreign trade of Canada. Here is another illustration:

The only steamship arrival Good Friday was the C.G.M.M. freighter Canadian Rancher, Captain Dickson, from Liverpool via Swansea. She is at Pier 23, south end terminals, to discharge 300 tons of general cargo, loaded at Liverpool, and then moves up to the Dockyard to land 1,000 tons coal she took on at Swansea for the Admiralty.

Now see the way in which the gentlemen in charge of this business are looking after the interests of the mercantile marine. Just imagine any private shipowner sending a steamship of the Canadian Ranger's size from Liverpool, England, to Swansea, Wales. She loaded 300 tons of cargo at Liverpool and then she was to proceed to Wales to take on board 1,000 tons of coal for the Admiralty. The point I want to make is that 1,000 tons of coal only occupies about one-seventh of the ship's freight capacity, and yet these bunglers send her from Liverpool with 300 tons of cargo in her hold down to Swansea to load 1,000 tons of coal to bring to Halifax. Any person in the shipping business knows that it is the grossest kind of mismanagement to send a ship from one port to the other unless there is a good paying cargo available. For instance, this ship, in order to get out of Liverpool, had to pay her disbursements and port charges there on 300 tons of cargo for which she received a very small amount of compensation; yet these bunglers sent her down to another port where her port charges and disbursement accounts would eat up not only the freight on the 300 tons of goods but also the freight charges on the Admiralty coal. These are the men who come here and ask us to vote $8,000,000 to enable them to build more ships under their present shipbuilding programme.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame.

Mr. DUFF: I now want to read an extract from the proceedings of the British Chamber of Shipping. I have here an account of the forty-fourth annual meeting of the British Chamber of Shipping of the United Kingdom held in London on February 25. I am quoting this in order if possible, to impress upon the House the reason why it should not vote this money, and the mistake we all made in sanctioning previous votes for this purpose. I will not quote the whole of the proceedings, but at this meeting the president called upon Mr. Howard Houlder, a large shipbuilder, to move a certain resolution. The resolution is in part as follows:

This Chamber desires to place on record its recognition of the success of the steps taken in furtherance of the British Government's policy of restoring the complete freedom of the mercantile marine, and its conviction that the best interests of the communities of the world will be served, only be leaving shipping entirely to private enterprise and by opening and keeping open all ports of the world to international shipping without discrimination.

That was the resolution. In the course of his remarks this shipowner said:

Now, with regard to the second section of the resolution, which is, that this meeting is asked to express its conviction that the best interests of the communities of the world will be served only by leaving shipping entirely to private enterprise, and by opening and keeping open all ports of the world to international shipping without discrimination, in my judgment —the only way in which our maritime supremacy can be maintained is by leaving the management of the business of shipping to private initiative and the enterprise of individuals.

Further on Mr. Howard Glover said this:

Of course, bureaucracies can do anything, and the Americans have proved that they have been able to produce a mercantile marine, but they find themselves to-day with a fleet of ships which I should think it would not be an exaggeration to say are not worth a fifth of what they cost, and even at that value there is not the remotest chance of making a halfpenny profit. What the American nation are going to do with those ships Heaven only knows. I, for one, am of the opinion that if our Government had been composed of real statesmen, six months after the armistice they would have got rid of nearly all their controls and realized their stocks. They would have made a colossal loss, but the liquidation of those stocks would only have added to the losses already sustained through the war.

I would like to commend these words to the Minister of Marine and the members of the House. These gentlemen in Great Britain spoke quite truly when they said the Government would have acted wisely by handing over the ships to private control immediately after the war. It is quite true that lately they have done so, and the Americans are in favour of doing it every day, but our Government and the men in charge of this matter are going on running these ships wnthout cargo and not knowing what they are going to do for future business.

What is the remedy for this condition of affairs? I think I am voicing the sentiments of the great majority of the people of Canada when I say that they realise whether the policy was a good one when it was inaugurated or not, that the only right and proper thing for the Government to do is to dispose of these ships as early as possible either by sale or otherwise. As I said a moment ago, what is the prospect this year for the Canadian Government marine? Is it going to make a profit or is it going to make a further loss?

I have made up a statement which I am going to put on Hansard and which I am willing to leave to the judgment of the business men of this country. I have gone into this matter carefully after consultation with shipping men who know their business, and they agree with me that my estimates are fair and reasonable. I am going to show that the operation of our merchant marine for 1921, will result in a loss. I do not believe that the minister or the Government realise what is going to be the result of their operation for 1921. As I said this afternoon, during the first eight or nine months of 1920 freights were almost as high as they were at any time during the war, and private capital invested in shipping gave a good return. I have proved conclusively to this committee that the Minister of Marine and his officials have made a staggering loss in 1920 when freights were high and business was good up to August or September and they had only three bad months. In view of that result, what is going to happen to-day when freights have gone down 200 and 300 per cent, when business is scarce, and when the operating cost has depreciated very little? It is true that wages are a little lower, but practically all the supplies required for running these steamers such as coal, oil, and everything else are, as the minister stated, at very high prices, and these prices are not likely to decline in the very near future. This is the statement that I want to place on Hansard:

Estimate of operating account for 1921:

	Dr
Operating expenses of 63 ships for 12 months at $875,000 per month.	$10,500,000
Interest on $70,000,000 at 5½ per cent..	3,850,000
Depreciation on present value..	750,000
Making a total of..	$15,100,000
	Cr
Credit by probable revenue based on present assets..	8,500,000
Leaving a loss on operation for the year 1921 of..	$ 6,600,000

It will be noticed that I have only allowed depreciation on the present value of the vessels. If I had figured depreciation on the actual value the amount to be debited would be very much larger, but in order to be fair, as I deducted from my statement this afternoon the present value of the vessels from the original cost, I feel it is only fair that I should in this statement deduct depreciation to the extent of not more than $750,000. I am not going to prophesy, as my genial friend the Minister of Marine did last year. It will be remembered that he said he was going to have a greater profit in 1920 than in 1919. Of course, in a sense he was right, because he had no profit in 1919, nor had he any in 1920. Consequently I cannot very well criticise his prophecy,—take nothing from nothing and nothing remains. But this year on operation alone, in addition to the $59,000,000 decrease in value and the damage they will have to pay to the Steel Company for cancellation of contracts, the country is faced with a loss on operation of $6,600,000.

There are several things which the Government might do with these boats. The first I would suggest is that they take them out of the control of the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries and give them to some other minister to look after, the Minister of Finance for instance. But undoubtedly they should sell the ships—clean up and take their loss. That would be the right thing to do. I am justified in making that assertion when I read in the same Conservative journal, the Montreal Gazette of December 29, an editorial advising the Government to do what I have just suggested. This is the editorial:

The Example of France

The French Government has introduced a bill which is of interest to all those nations that undertook to meet the requirements of war conditions by the construction and operation of merchant fleets. France, during the war, both built and bought a large number of vessels with which to make good the losses sustained through the operations of German submarines, to transport troops and to carry to the shores of France supplies and equipment for the armies and food for the civilian population. The fleet so acquired was operated during the war and has been operated since by the French Government. The time has now come to determine what shall be the future of these ships, and the Government has come at once to a decision; the fleet is to be sold.

* * * * * * *

The course which France is taking in respect to these vessels is significant. France is an ultra-democratic country, in which the popular will is quick to find expression and scarcely less quick in exerting its influence upon legislatures. If the French Government has come to the conclusion that the state-owned merchant fleet must be sold, it has done so in the interest of the French taxpayer. In other words, the ministry believes that these ships cannot be operated as a State fleet except at a loss, and it is not prepared to place the French taxpayer in the position of having to make good that loss. When due weight is given to the fact that the Government of France has had the advantage of expert advice, based upon long experience in marine transportation, the importance of the step taken may be appreciated.

What is being done in France is being done in other countries similarly situated, and notably in Great Britain, the greatest of maritime nations and the one best equipped of all for deciding between what is profitable and what is not profitable in shipping and the operation of ships. Great Britain has been steadily disposing of tonnage acquired during the war. These things must, surely, mean something to Canada, which has embarked upon an ambitious programme of ship-building and ship-operation. The lesson of experience in older countries has something to commend it as against the theories of inexperience in Canada, and what is taking place elsewhere should not be unworthy of attention and study on the part of those who are apparently determined upon committing this country to a dangerous experiment. Prudent counsel takes count of what is going on in other countries and Canada should stop, look and listen before making what may prove to be a mistake far transcending any of those that have yet held back the progress of the Dominion. What can be said with certainty is that the example of France warrants delay and investigation before the shipping programme of Canada is accepted at the value put upon it by its advocates. If it is found upon such investigation that Canada knows more about the operation of ships than does iether France or England, and that there are conditions peculiar to this country which assure success in a venture from which more experienced countries are turning aside, well and good, but the investigation should be made and the facts put before the public fully and clearly, so that those who must ultimately pay the bills may know exactly and definitely what is being done in their name. Canada cannot afford to rush in where older nations fear to tread.

Marine transportation companies in Great Britain, as elsewhere, are meeting the necessity of writing down war costs in order that ships may be operated successfully under normal traffic conditions. Long established private companies may take that course, with the consent of their shareholders, and the loss is their own. The application of the same method in respect of State-owned ships is a very different thing and cannot be resorted to under anything like the same conditions. The loss in such case falls upon the general public, the taxpayers, and the more heavily it falls the better is the apparent showing of the operation of the ships, for which credit is duly taken by those responsible for such operation. The French Government has rejected that expedient and, in the interest of the Freach public, is preparing to sell its ships. Canada goes serenely and confidently on. Labour in Canada, also does its part and is at this moment insisting that Government ships must not be constructed at anything less than the maximum war cost of labour, and the Government, if the Minister of Labour has his way, may be expected to yield to the demands of labour in this case, as it has done in others. The outlook is not encouraging. The whole question of the merchant marine calls for the most thorough discussion and examination and, if these are forthcoming, Canada may be saved from the worst consequences of a risky venture. If it is found that all is well, so much the better; no harm will have been done.

Now, I am sure that the members of this House and the people generally will read with a great deal of interest that sensible and seriously-worded editorial, which shows conclusively that France and England are getting clear of their publicly-owned ships by passing them over to private individuals. This Government should do as France has done; should get clear of their ships at the first opportunity. A week ago there were twelve Canadian Government merchant ships swinging at anchor in the port of Halifax—one-fifth or twenty per cent of the total ship programme, one-quarter of the total number of ships afloat, swinging at anchor in the port of Halifax without anything to do. A day or two afterwards the management were compelled to send one of these ships to Baltimore and other places with no freight, for the purposes of taking American products to foreign ports. It is well known that instead of bringing imports from foreign ports to Canada these ships are engaged in bringing sugar from Cuba to New York. Is that encouraging Canadian trade? Yet it is stated every once in a while that it is for the encouragement of Canadian trade that these ships are operated. As a second expedient I say that money would be saved if these ships were put at anchor as they arrive in the port of Halifax or elsewhere. If that were done, thousands of dollars of expenses incurred in connection with their operation at the present time would be saved. Then, there is another thing that might be done; they could be put in the hands of competent shipping men, in Halifax, St. John or Vancouver. There are men in any of these ports who are better qualified to handle the ships of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine than the men in Montreal or Toronto who are handling them at present. It would be far better and much more satisfactory to the people if the Government would decide to give these ships to the shipping people in Halifax, St. John and Vancouver, as well as Montreal in the summer, with the request that they operate them and pay the Government a commission on any earnings in excess of expenditure. In any case, the best bargain possible could be made in that regard. We should, therefore, either sell the ships, lay them up, or hand them over to someone else for operation.

I should like to refer to another matter in this regard, and it has to do with what the people think about this business. About two hours ago the Minister of Marine offered to send me a copy of the Montreal Gazette in which he said a laudatory article appeared the day after he made his speech. I have not yet received that paper from the minister. I do not know whether it is not in the reading room or whether the article to which he refers did not appear in the Montreal Gazette; in any case, it is very strange and very significant that the minister did not hand it to me, in view of my request that he do so. But as he has not allowed me to read that article I would like to give him some further food for thought. A few weeks ago the Royal Bank of Canada held its annual meeting at which the president made some very significant statements. Let us see what faith he has in the Government policy of operating and owning a merchant marine. He said:

> Government control has practically disappeared during the year just past—wheat, paper and sugar being the commodities to be freed from regulation. Government ownership of transportation systems has developed. Without any advantage to the public in efficiency or rates, the operation of our national railways during the last twelve months has resulted in a loss which will probably more than absorb the amounts collected on Excess Profits and Income Taxes for the year 1919. Unless government methods of operation are more efficient in this country than they have been in others, taxpayers in Canada may find the maintenance of their railroads and fleet more expensive than pension charges and other legacies of the war combined. Of a total of $6,400,000,000 spent by the United States during the last year, $1,037,000,000 went to pay the cost incurred by the Government in its control of the railroads. The present waste is obvious and the remedy should be speedy and effective. The needs of the country call for businesslike administration of its assets. If this be afforded, we can attack our problems with added confidence.

The Royal Bank of Canada knows more about the Canadian Government Merchant Marine than the Government itself does, because they have agencies scattered all over Canada, and, moreover, due to their progressiveness, they have agencies at practically every port in foreign countries where the ships of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine call. Certainly the agents of that company furnish reports to the president and directors as to what is going on in regard to the cargoes which the Government ships carry to and from these various ports, and generally, the business which these vessels do. In issuing this warning, therefore, the president of the Royal Bank is perfectly justified in condemning the whole project. Now, Sir, the Minister of Marine sometimes makes prophesies which are not fulfilled.

Mr. LALOR: Carried.

Mr. DUFF: I may say to my hon. friend that this item is not going to carry to-night.

An hon. MEMBER: It will carry in the morning.

Mr. DUFF: It will be perhaps carried some morning. The minister visited Halifax some time ago and he made a promise to the people of that city. I have here a newspaper article which makes reference to that promise. The minister or somebody connected with his department gave his pledged word that the ships built in the port of Halifax would be registered at that port. Is that correct?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Quite correct.

Mr. DUFF: The minister admits that he gave his word, and the word of a minister of the Crown and a member of the Privy Council should not be lightly broken. Here is what the Halifax Herald says in this connection:

> The contempt with which the Department of Marine has broken the pledged word of its chief administrator to the great port of Halifax has stirred up a feeling of bitter resentment. To advertise the port of Montreal with the products of the port of Halifax is an imposition which intensifies the feeling that the Maritime Provinces are being deliberately ignored at Ottawa. For Hon. C. C. Ballantyne, Minister of Marine and Fisheries, to establish himself an enthusiastic propagandist for Montreal, and no less at the expense of breaking promises, is an embarrassing situation for a minister of the Crown, responsible to all the people, and not to interested citizens in Montreal only.
> Mr. Ballantyne perhaps has not yet realized the fact that as a member of the Government he represents the entire Dominion, wherein the ports of Halifax and Vancouver have played a part of relatively equal importance to the port of Montreal.
> The duty of the maritime members is plain. If they can get no satisfaction from the Minister of Marine, they must push their claims further. At all events they must not be satisfied with being put off by any more tinsel excuses.

I presume he means the Tory members.

> And the Nova Scotia Senators.

That paragraph appears in the Halifax Herald, because the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, as he stated, told the citizens of Halifax that when the ships built in that port were launched, they would be registered in Halifax. This is a further despatch with regard to this matter:

> A letter read from the Acting Deputy Minister of the Department of Marine with reference to the registration of the C.M.M.S. Canadian Mariner. The board of trade had a promise from the Minister of Marine that the ships constructed in Halifax would be registered at this port, but it was found the Mariner had been registered elsewhere and the council of the board protested. The letter from the deputy minister stated it was entirely due to an oversight and that it was originally intended she should have been registered here, but in future the vessels built in Halifax for the Canadian Merchant Marine will be registered here. The board will ask for the transfer of registration of the Mariner.

This means that not only did the Minister of Marine and Fisheries promise that ships built in the port of Halifax would be registered in that port; but after his attention was called to the fact that one of the ships had been registered in Montreal, one of the officials of the department wrote to the board of trade of that city and promised that the next ship would be registered in Halifax. What do we find? We find that the minister or some one in charge wrote to the people of Halifax because, in answer to a question I put, I find that ships built in Halifax have been registered in Montreal. I could understand the Minister of Marine and Fisheries following a policy of registering ships in the city of Ottawa, because Ottawa is the headquarters of the Government, and the minister would be quite within his right in registering these ships in the capital of Canada. But if these ships are to be registered in any port outside of the city of Ottawa—and I say this for the Pacific coast as well as the Atlantic coast—ships built in Prince Rupert or Vancouver or elsewhere have just as much, if not more, right to be registered in those ports as to be registered in Montreal. Ships built in Halifax, Montreal or Quebec, or other ports should be registered in the ports in which they are built so that, if this is to be the great advertisement the minister says it is to be of Canada in foreign countries, people in foreign lands will be given to understand from the name of the port in which a boat is registered being painted on her stern, that these ships are built, not in one port, the port of Montreal, but in every port on the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. The minister, therefore, is wrong in deliberately, for some reason, taking the credit away from Halifax, Vancouver or some other port and having the ships registered in the port of Montreal.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Carried.

Mr. DUFF: The hon. member for Digby and Annapolis had better be careful. I remember reading in Hansard an interruption he made ten years ago, and he has not been heard from since. Therefore, he need not interrupt me to-night and call "carried." The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) referred to this whole project as a "painted ship on a painted ocean." That, of course, was very significant, and when I read the remark of the hon. member for Red Deer, I wondered if he intended to convey two different meanings. It is, of course, good business for some people to have Canadian Government ships, and these ships have to be painted with large quantities of paint. Therefore, I was wondering if the hon. member for Red Deer, when he referred to them as "painted ships on a painted ocean," realized the fact that paint was one of the articles which the ships required in great quantities.

We have ships registered in the port of Montreal, built in Halifax, Vancouver, Three Rivers and other cities throughout Canada, and managed in the city of Toronto. As I said before, if these ships are to be managed properly and if the Government are determined to keep these ships, they should immediately hand them over to some good reliable men in Halifax, St. John, Montreal, and Vancouver, and allow them to run the ships properly and with the least loss possible.

The latter part of the minister's speech the other night reads something like a valedictory. I was reminded, as I read his concluding remarks, of people who were likely not to remain for very long in their present status or location. We know that in colleges every year, when students get through their course and are about to go out into the world, on a certain day one of the students is asked to pronounce a valedictory. As I read the minister's concluding remarks, I was strongly reminded that he realizes he is not going to remain in possession of his present portfolio very long, or else that the Government is not going to remain in power very long. Before he concluded, in addition to endeavouring to get some comfort from the speeches of the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) and the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), he also tried to convey to certain persons words of commendation. I have no fault to find with that. The minister can say on the floor of this House that officials in his department have done good work in connection with this programme. Perhaps they have, and perhaps they have not. But I do not think, after the experience which we have had in the past two years in regard to this matter, it is necessary for the minister to endeavour to bolster up his case by giving words of encomium to certain persons. I think the people realize that they have been misled with regard to this shipbuilding policy. In two years the country has suffered a loss of something like $60,000,000 owing to depreciation, bungling and mismanagement in the operation of these steamers. The question arises: Is this Government going to keep on in this ruinous course? In the interest of the country—and I am not speaking politically; I am endeavouring to show as well as I can the reasons why the Government should halt in their programme—the Government should have endeavoured two years ago to make arrangements with the shipbuilders, to pay them damages, and to let them build ships on private account; and even at this late date, when there are several ships yet to be built, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries or the Government would be well advised if they would make the officials in charge of this matter go to the builders and make the best possible of a bad bargain. The people of this country do not want either Government-operation or Government-ownership of ships. The experiment has been a failure. Every right thinking man in the country realizes that, and the quicker the Government take such losses and close up this bad deal the better for the country.

Mr. H. H. STEVENS (Centre Vancouver): Mr. Chairman, we have listened very patiently for approximately five hours to an hon. gentleman who has launched a particularly vicious attack at the head of the hon. the Minister of Marine (Mr. Ballantyne). He speaks, I believe, with the full authority of the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), and of the party that he represents in this House. I assume that because my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition chose him from among all the members who surround him to travel through Canada a few months ago, and at every meeting my hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. Duff), who has just taken his seat, delivered a speech very much along the line that he has delivered to the House to-night, a speech characterized by exceedingly wild statements, a speech which if one could say that innuendo were reason, coarse sneers logic, and the circulation of unfounded rumours fact, might perhaps be characterized as a speech. I listened with a great deal of patience, and I asked my hon. friend only one question during the whole five hours he spoke. I asked him the date of a document he was reading, and he immediately turned and read me a brief lecture. I listened for these five hours with patience, and I tried to follow the ramifications of his argument, if I might dignify it by that term, and out of it all this is what I gleaned so far as any statement that is worthy of attention is concerned: that he himself personally, and speaking also officially for the Opposition, is unqualifiedly opposed to the Government ownership and operation of a merchant marine in Canada. If I am misquoting him or mis-stating the facts in any way, I am always willing to be corrected.

Mr. DUFF: You are quite right as far as I am concerned.

Mr. STEVENS: I am therefore on fairly sound ground to commence with. It is a debateable question, Mr. Chairman, whether any government should enter into the ownership and operation of any great public utility, but it does not follow that because a government does enter into it, that the minister in charge is therefore a crook, or that to use my hon. friend's own phraseology, the minister and the officials of his department know nothing; those were the words he used. I say that because the Government launches into a scheme of that kind, it does not follow that the minister is in any sense guilty of dishonesty or of any dishonourable act. Throughout my hon. friend's speech from beginning to end there was one desire permeating every sentence and argument that he presented, and that was to cast some aspersion on the minister, to try and insinuate that the minister in some way or other, or the members of his staff, were indentified with sinister influences and were despoiling the public treasury of this country.

I am going to do something which I think his speech does not merit, and that is take some of his statements and show to the House their unworthiness, and at the same time the untrustworthiness of his alleged or supposed argument. In the first place, my hon. friend complains, and very bitterly, that certain ships of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine left Canadian ports, went to United States ports, and took on there a cargo for a foreign country. Now he condemns that.

Mr. ARTHURS: Do not go away. Come back.

Mr. DUFF: I will go if I like, and I will stay if I like. I will be back tomorrow.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend apparently is afraid to remain and listen to any hon. gentleman who attempts to meet his argument. I am going to direct my remarks, in his absence, to his leader because, after all, the leader of a great party has some responsibility in regard to the statements of his followers, and my hon. friend who has just left the chamber hurriedly has already confirmed my statement that he spoke with the authority of his party. I was saying that my hon. friend complained because the Government ships went to the United States and took on cargoes there for foreign countries. He made the statement this afternoon that a certain ship, the Canadian Pioneer, left Halifax, went to Newport News, from there went to Gibraltar, and took on a cargo of grain for some Mediterranean port. That information was given to the House on his authority as one who knows shipping, and the minister was condemned, held up to ridicule as one who did not know his business. Now, even if his statement were a fact, there would be nothing extraordinary in a ship doing that, because it is quite a common thing for ships operating on the high seas to go in ballast to a point where there is a cargo. But his statement is not a fact in any sense of the term. The fact is this—and we have the official statement from Montreal; we have had lots of time to get it from London since my hon. friend mentioned it—that the Canadian Pioneer on that occasion went to Galveston, Texas, loaded a cargo of grain, took it from there to Greece, there to discharge her cargo and load a full cargo in return.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Wil my hon. friend give me the date of the voyage he is referring to?

Mr. STEVENS: I am referring tc exactly the same voyage that my hon. friend from Lunenburg referred to this afternoon.

Mr. GORDON: What was the date of it?

Mr. STEVENS: April the 2nd.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Is that the date of the sailing from Canada?

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend from Antigonish and Guysborough and I have been in this House together for ten years, and I do not think he would charge me, any more than I would charge him, with evasion.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I merely wanted to get a fact.

Mr. STEVENS: The date is April 2. We have it officially from the office of the Canadian Merchant Marine. The information was secured officially from that source for the House in view of the extravagant statement made by my hon. friend from Lunenburg. But that is merely incidental to the argument I am making. My hon. friend, after condemning the Government because these vessels went to the United States and took a cargo from there to some place else, next condemns the Government because the ships took business offering in Canadian ports to other Canadian ports. He condemned that because, as he said, it put the local shipping out of business. On the one hand, he condemns the Government for sending the ships out of the country, and, on the other hand, he condemns them for doing business in this country. I merely state that to show how absolutely distorted is his argument. Then, to cap his argument in that regard, he brought forward this point; he said that the reason why the shipping of this country is so hard hit at the present time is because there has been a great reduction in freight rates. That is correct; it is the one correct reason. The shipping of Canada is not necessarily hurt because of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. It is hurt because all over the world the movement of corgoes has stopped. In the last forty years there has perhaps not been a period when trade was so disconcerted throughout the world as it is to-day, when shipping, in the most unforeseen manner, is exceedingly plentiful.

Now, I come to another point raised by the hon. member in respect of which he particularly directed his attack upon the minister. He says that this country is going to be called upon to pay a loss to the Dominion Iron and Steel Co., of $15,000,000, plus damages. I took particular note of his statement, and I know that I am correctly quoting him. He would not accept the statement of the minister that no claims had been filed, and that if any claim is filed it will be a question to be determined in the Exchequer Court as to what the damages should be. Let us examine the facts. The Government and the country need not fear facts; but what we do resent is hon. gentlemen getting up in their places and spreading broadcast throughout the country inuendoes and insinuations that are not based on anything approximating fact. The facts are simply these: During the war period, or at least towards the close of the war, the Government, with the approval of nearly every hon. gentleman opposite, entered into a contract with the Dominion Iron and Steel for ship plates to start the shipbuilding industry in this country. It was established in order that we might roll these plates here for the shipbuilding industry, which at that time looked as if it might become a permanent one. There was no great criticism of this undertaking. I grant that there was some criticism from the other side, but many hon. gentlemen opposite stood in their places and supported it, and it was regarded as being perfectly proper at the time. The war closed earlier than was expected, and in the process of building the plant more time perhaps was occupied than had been foreseen; but in any case, we came to the point where the Government felt that it was not desirable to take the balance of the order, and for various reasons cancelled it. That contract stands cancelled. Now, up to this time no claims have been made. What are the possibilities? I say that we have no right to indulge in surmise as to what they are, but let us face them frankly, nevertheless. There are two hundred thousand tons of steel plate still undelivered. At the price the Government contracted, this would amount to about $15,000,000. My hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. Duff), either with deliberate design to mislead the country, or with a density of ignorance hardly pardonable in an hon. member, jumped to the conclusion that the Dominion Iron and Steel would be entitled to the full $15,000,000 of recompense, plus, as he said, damages. No hon. gentleman who has had any experience whatever in regard to the cancellation of contracts will fail to recognize at once the fallacy of the hon. member's statement. It will readily be realized that a contractor whose contract has been cancelled can claim only the possible profits on his transaction, and can make no claim for undelivered goods. He cannot claim for the whole amount of the contract, but for the established profits on the contract. The full amount in this case is about $16,000,000.

Mr. GORDON: Do you say he could not recover for the balance of his contract, and take proceedings for that?

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly not under circumstances where the contractor himself was a contributing party to the failure.

Mr. GORDON: How did he contribute to this loss?

Mr. STEVENS: In some respects he was derelict in the fulfilment of the terms of the contract; but the point I am getting at is that no claim was made. Now, I do not want to detain the House at any great length, but I desire to deal with one or two of the points raised by my hon. friend. The hon. gentleman, with considerable recklessness, entered the field of accountancy and auditing, and he held up to ridicule one of the most reputable firms of auditors in this country. Marwick, Mitchell and Company, one of the most reputable firms of auditors in Canada, whose audit will be accepted by any bank, by any private concern, and, I think, by any court, audited the statement of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, and their audit followed upon that of the officers of the company. Yet my hon. friend stands in his place in this House and sweeps that audit completely aside as utterly unworthy of the attention of the House; and instead of the figures submitted in that statement, audited by that company, produced statements of the most absurd and ludicrous character, placing them on Hansard as establishing and, as he said, proving facts. Let us examine some of his opinions. He very cooly deducts $150 per ton from the cost of the vessels, and writes it off this year. How does he arrive at that conclusion? One might possibly recognize his right to do so if he could establish some sound basis. He took pains to read to the House this afternoon quotations of the market value of ships offered for sale. Among those he fuond one at £9, built in 1920, a ship of a certain type and size, and without any comparison between the value of that ship and ships of the Canadian Government Marine, without offering one scintilla of evidence as to whether that ship which he gave in illustration was up to the standard of the Canadian Government ships, he adopts that lowest figure as the figure at which Canadian ships should be valued. He also quoted a ship at $9 per ton built in 1901, twenty years ago, and offers that to the House as evidence of the depreciation of Canadian Government Merchant Marine ships by $150 per ton, and cooly writes that off this year's operation, or, as he said, charges it against operating cost for this year.

But my hon. friend in making that calculation was guilty of another ludicrous misstatement. He gave another statement shortly afterwards—well, when I say shortly afterwards, I really mean an hour or two—in the same speech, in which he prophesied or ratheid affirmed that there would be a loss next year of a certain figure. Fixing the loss for next year, he included interest on $70,000,000, the total amount that had been spent in these ships He shows the country a loss and for this year writes off $150 a ton on the ships; and in calculating the ship earnings for next year, he charges operation with the full cost of the ships, $192 per ton. That is my hon. friend's idea of auditing and accounting. There is another point in this regard. The hon. gentleman took a statement of the minister and showed that there was depreciation marked there this year of some $670,000, which the minister's officials had written off as fair depreciation at 2 per cent on the first year's operation. Then my hon. friend says that because there is an item in the assets of $800,000 odd, therefore the minister is trying to deceive the House. As a matter of fact, the statement shows clearly that this $800,000 odd is made up of depreciation written off this year, plus the sum of $150,000 written off last year, carried to reserve account, which is an entirely different thing from depreciation account. The depreciation which is written off was carried to this reserve account which is a perfectly proper thing to do, and the auditors in so doing were doing what any proper firm of accountants would do. And yet that was made the subject of an attack on the Government, by the hon. gentleman. It was given as evidence that the Government's business was not being conducted in a proper manner.

My hon. friend went on and told a story wherein he spoke of there being a woodpile with an Ethiopian in it, and he drew a picture of himself circling around this woodpile with an axe in his hand—I am simply giving his own figure of speech. What is the Ethiopian and what is the woodpile in the case?—a certain deal made in regard to the dry dock in Halifax. I am not going into the details for I think it can all be answered with one statement. The hon. gentleman made a charge against the Government—I want to use his own words if I can. He said, "They took the owners by the neck and wrung their property from them." This was his own picturesque and classic language. And then he said further, that the owners of the dry dock had no recourse whatever against that proceeding. The answer to all his argument in regard to the Halifax dry dock situation is this: the dry dock company had the right of appeal to the Supreme Court against the decision of the Exchequer Court. If they were not satisfied that right of appeal was open to them. They did not take advantage of it, they have not yet done so, and there is no evidence that they desire to do so.

That is a complete answer to the hon. gentleman's argument. They did not take, nor attempt to take, advantage of the proper course open to them. As I have already said I am not going into the details of this transaction which was carried out a couple of years ago by Hon. Mr. Carvell. There is this point to make, however, that in the closing years of the war this dry dock was not operated as it was thought it should be operated. For that reason Mr. Carvell then Minister of Public Works, exercised his right to take it over. But in any case the right of appeal was never exercised by the dry dock company, and as far as I know the payment has not yet been made for the purchase of the dock. Therefore the story about the Empire Steel Corporation falls helplessly to the ground without a scintilla of evidence in support of the innuendoes and the insinuations made by the hon. gentleman in his speech.

Now another point. The hon. gentleman complains, and complains bitterly, that these Government ships are interfering with private shipping, that they are doing no good, and the hon. member repeatedly said that on the Pacific ocean these vessels were carrying lumber which could be carried by any "windjammer"—using again his own phraseology. The hon. gentleman is not now present, but I will go on anyway and finish my reply to him because it is but a little task. I have here an extract from the Vancouver Province of March 16, and it will be interesting to hon. gentlemen to listen to me while I read it. In my estimation it is an illustration of one of the strongest arguments in favour of the establishment of the Canadian Government marine:

GREAT ORDER FOR EGYPT

B. C. Mills Get Contract for Many Millions of Railway Ties

Two Government Ship Cargoes Leaving Vancouver in April

British Columbia mills to-day commenced to cut an order of eight million feet of ties for the Egyptian State railway. The ties will be shipped late in April to Alexandria on board two steamships of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine.

Announcement of the conclusion of the negotiations regarding this order was made this morning by Mr. Arthur E. Salsbury of the Canada Overseas Trading Company.

This order in all probability is a forerunner of further and larger contracts for British Columbia mills, as the Egyptian State railway is understood to be preparing for a large building programme.

The responsibility for success of the negotiations can be equally divided between Mr. Salsbury, Mr. B. C. Keeley of the C. G. M. M. Limited and Mr. J. G. McConville of the Associated Timber Exporters of British Columbia, together with valuable assistance rendered by Hon. T. D. Pattullo, Agent-General F. C. Wade and Provincial Lumber Commissioner William Turnbull.

I have a word or two further to say in regard to this article. Here is an absolutely new field of operation; it is a business that Canadian lumbermen have not been able to touch hitherto. I know something about it because I had some connection with business of that kind in years gone by. It has been almost impossible for Canadian lumbermen to get into the Indian and Egyptian lumber markets and they have been trying to do so for years. I have in my possession a letter which states that it was largely through the instrumentality of the agent of the Canadian Government Marine office that this order was landed, that the information in the office, and the official's knowledge of the business led to the landing of that order and the opening of a new trade, the forerunner, as has been well said, of large orders. That is exactly what we want. It is exactly one of the things that we have been endeavouring to bring about in Canada for years. I know that on the Pacific coast one of the difficulties of the Canadian export business in lumber has been the shipping ring at San Francisco, and which it has been impossible to break. I am told by those who intimately know the business that the so called North Atlantic Shipping Ring was not in it with the San Francisco concern. I could go at length into the operations of this ring but I will not do so to-night. I will simply state for the benefit of hon. members present the fact that during recent years—during the last ten or twelve years—the export of lumber from British Columbia fell off at an alarming rate until it had almost disappeared. Now, through the instrumentality of the Government Marine Service, we are making rapid strides. I should also say through the instrumentality of the Robert Dollar Company—that is now established in Vancouver instead of San Francisco——through the instrumentality of these two agencies we are making tremendous strides in re-establishing our lumber trade on the Pacific. In addition I have this further information—that the Canadian Government ships on the Pacific are going out fully loaded. I grant you that the times are getting very hard, and it may be that some of the ships in the near future will not have cargoes: but during the past year down to within a month ago the Canadian Government ships were carrying full cargoes out of the port of Vancouver. This, I mention as a sample argument in favour of the Government's programme —the programme being not only for the purpose of the development of trade, and the development of the shipbuilding industry—which has been of tremendous value to Canada—but also as as a compliment, shall I say, to the Canadian National Railway System. What we are faced with is this: By such attacks as the hon. gentleman made during the last five hours the Canadian Government ownership of railways and of marine will be damned before it has had an opportunity to establish itself. We all know that it is a new venture. In some respects you might term it an experiment. In some respects, perhaps, it will not show the result that we hoped for, but by the statement which has been presented by the minister we at least can say that it has shown an operating profit.

My hon. friend attempted to lead the House and the public to believe that he had discovered something when he brought forward the fact that the Government merchant marine had not paid interest on capital. Why, the hon. minister in his statement said so. He said that the balance sheet showed an operating profit, and he gave figures which are beyond all peradventure. There they are, and they are correct. They have not been disturbed in the slightest iota by this five-hour harangue of the hon. member for Lunenburg. He gave the House not one scintilla of new information. The Minister of Marine stated when he made his announcement to the House—I have his statement here—that the balance sheet did not provide for interest on capital, but that the net profit of some $700,000 odd would show a return of about two per cent on the capital cost. I submit that where you have that profit on these ships, some of them running only a few months and few of them running for more than a year, that that is not a bad showing in face of the complete collapse of the shipping market. I ask hon. gentlemen, particularly my hon. friends of the Agrarian party—who are not, I think, ill-disposed towards Government ownership, but who have looked askance at this particular venture—to weigh carefully their words and arguments before they condemn the showing made by the Canadian Government marine in the brief time it has been in operation.

My hon. friend's solution is to dispose of these vessels "by sale or otherwise." That was his intelligent suggestion to the committee a few moments ago after speaking about four and a half hours. He said, "Now what about a solution? Dispose of these ships by sale or otherwise." I submit that that is not a very helpful proposal. If it is the official declaration of the criticism of hon. gentlemen opposite, made through the mouth of the responsible representative of that party, then it is of very little help to the Government and to the country in solving this problem. "Dispose of the ships by sale or otherwise." Suppose we take the hon. gentleman at his word and, as I said a moment ago, dignify a statement of that kind as argument, if you please. He added further, that the existing contracts should be cancelled and the ships disposed of by sale or otherwise. What does that mean? It means loss and ruin to the yards that are now building the balance of this shipping programme—a programme launched in good faith, a programme aproved of by my hon. friend from Maisonneuve, a programme which he supported—not in war time, as he said the other day, but in peace time as a desirable peace programme. My hon. friend is sitting there and I want him to listen to me. He stated that it was a desirable programme in peace time. The other day he made an attack on the minister and said that he was in favour of it in war time, but not in peace time. This programme was endorsed by my hon. friends opposite as well as by hon. gentlemen on this side as a desirable programme. I venture to say that all of us perhaps would have acted differently if we could have seen all that was going to happen; but we did the best we could in the light of the information we had at that time and on the prospects which were in view. Now it does not become my hon. friend from Maisonneuve to join in such criticisms as his colleague has made and attack the Government because in peace time they carried on this programme. I say that if the Government followed their advice it would mean loss and ruin to these yards that had heavy commitments, and also to their subcontractors in this country who also had heavy commitments. You cannot build a 10,000-ton ship in a day. There must be preparation, you must buy your plates and angles and machinery from all parts of the country, and much of it out of the country, orders have to be given months and months ahead, and to undertake the work of building two, four, six or eight of these ships is a tremendous financial commitment. Not only that, but sub-contracts are let to other business firms, and it would mean the ruination of these firms, too. It would at once create a panic and throw into the unemployment market of to-day tens of thousands of men, not only the men directly operating at these plants but those operating with these other concerns subsidiary to them and also connected with the contracts.

This is a practical question. It is not a question that we can toss aside and say: Cancel the contracts and sell the ships. My hon. friend from Lunenburg speaks of this matter as if he were dealing with something out of a ten-cent store. We are dealing with a programme which has been debated in this House for four sessions—debated by hon. gentlemen on both sides. Some of them, including notably my hon. friend from Red Deer and one or two others took exception to it, but the great bulk of opinion on both sides of the House was behind the venture. I think we all felt that it was a heavy responsibility, but there was a feeling that it was the right thing to do, and we did it. Now I say it does not lie well in the mouths of these hon. gentlemen to round on the Government because at this juncture there happens to be a universal collapse in the trade of the world, creating temporarily a condition of which it is difficult to exactly foresee the outcome.

I counsel both the minister and the House that we should hold on to these assets. He is an unwise man who will sell out his plant when there are no buyers. It is a mighty poor business principle for a manufacturing industry when things become dead and the market is upset to say, "Well, here is my plant. I will sell it at any cost." That is a very vicious principle. What is the principle that a sane business man will follow under such conditions? He will conserve these assets, realizing that this particular slump which we are now passing through cannot possibly continue for any lengthy period, and that the time will come when these ships will in all probability not only earn a profit on operating expenses but pay a dividend as well.

Now, I want to say, I think the minister as well as every hon. gentleman will agree with me,—and I say it not for the sake of escaping captious criticism on the other side—that we must be prepared to write off a severe loss on the capital cost of these ships. It is quite true that the prices paid when these contracts were let is in excess of those now obtaining; that is obvious; but to say that we must write off $150 a ton out of this year's expenses is manifestly absurd. We must devise a scheme to nurse this project along, to conserve the assets, and to so administer our property that it will be operated as successfully as possible.

Another consequence of abandoning this project would be the repudiation by the Government of all its contracts entered into in good faith by both parties, and entered into with the approval of this House. Now, in case I should be tripped up and be told that the contracts in detail did not come before this House, I will at once recognize that point, but I say that the policy was adopted in good faith and approved generally by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. I have not the figures, and I do not think it is necessary for me to state them in detail, but in the United States the Government absorbed losses running into hundreds of millions of dollars through cancellation of contracts. Their shipbuilding programme was not carried out with a business ability at all comparable to the business ability displayed by our Marine and Fisheries Department. This Government's shipbuilding programme was carried out in a manner that puts to shame the programme carried out by some other countries. Now, if we create a similar situation and the Government cancel the contracts we will have to also absorb great losses. I think that is a point we might consider. I am not prepared to support it, but I do say that it is a point that hon. gentlemen might advance —whether or not it is advisable for the Government to cancel the contracts, pay the loss, and let the thing go. I submit that that would be unwise; our loss will be less in the long run if we carry out these contracts, accept the ships, and see the programme through. If the contracts were cancelled there would not only be the loss in dollars and cents, but there would be an indirect loss, and there would be also the moral effect resulting from the repudiation by the Government of its contracts at this time. These are serious problems, problems that we cannot lightly deal with or thrust aside.

The hon. member for Lunenburg in his speech attacked the minister because of his statement that one of the attractive features of his programme was the supplying of work to the un-employed, particularly to returned soldiers. Now, I want to endorse heartily the minister's view in that regard. The minister did not say that was the sole object of his shipbuilding programme. He did say, however, that that was one of its objects—and it was. I know one yard in Vancouver that employed over twelve hundred returned soldiers; indeed, it is employing them to-day, though perhaps not quite so large a number. Another yard employed about 450 returned soldiers, so that some 1,500 returned soldiers were employed in these two yards at Vancouver alone, to say nothing of the number indirectly employed. The hon. member for Lunenburg took the minister to task, however, I thought it did not very well become the hon. gentleman to cast aspersions on any policy having anything to do with returned soldiers in this country. I am sorry that my hon. friend is not in his seat. I am sorry that he left the chamber —left it, I think, because he knew there was something coming to him.

Mr. McMASTER: Oh no, he left the chamber to correct the report of his speech.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, that is a good idea; I hope he doctors it up pretty well. But I wish he were in his seat, because if he were I would remind him that it was hardly wise for him to meddle with any question involving returned soldiers or the war. It is very doubtful whether the hon. member for Lunenburg would have secured his seat in this House had he not distributed promises of exemption to young men in his county and counselled them to defy the law of Canada and not to register and report. Not only that, but he counselled young men also to break their parole who had been apprehended because they were defaulters. That, I say, is a pretty serious thing. The hon. gentleman has during the last four sessions been handing out all manner of insults to members on this side who dared to open their mouths, who asked him even a civil question; has cast aspersions on the Minister of Marine nearly every time he has been in the House; has been seeking to convey to the minds of the public the impression that some underhand work was going on. I say it does not become an hon. gentleman who won his seat in the House in the way that he did to indulge in any such reflections on other hon. gentlemen. I am sorry that he is not here. He may have gone up to revise the report of his speech, but it has been an act of common courtesy for many years in this House for an hon. gentleman to remain in his seat and take a reply to remarks that he has made. In this case the hon. gentleman made a speech lasting five hours; and I hope that my hon. friends opposite who are friends of his will give him a lesson in what is due to this House in the way of common courtesy.

The hour is late, Mr. Chairman, and it is useless for me to go on with any further remarks. I do not know that any good can come from a further analysis of the statement of the hon. member for Lunenburg. But I should like to say that we ought to approach this question of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine with a patriotic desire to make good, not with the idea of offering captious cricitism or of saying, in effect: Oh well, you are in that mess now, you can carry the burden. I ask the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), whom I have known quite intimately for the last ten years and who is generally pretty fair, to revise his rather severe criticisms of a few days ago and turn back to the Hansard report of his speech of only two years ago, after the armistice, when he made what I considered to be a very fair statement to this House. I would ask the member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) if he were in his seat; the member for Lotbinière (Mr. Vien), and one or two others—my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) and several of those hon. gentlemen who went into this business with their eyes open just as we did and knew exactly what they were doing—I ask them to assist in arriving at some sane solution of this problem, a solution involving not the scrapping of the whole scheme, but the upholding of this policy until it has an opportunity of demonstrating its value to Canada. Great Britain's supremacy of the sea was built upon just such a beginning as this. She made sacrifices; she paid amounts enormously in excess of what she really needed to have paid the Dutch for shipping at that time. But she established the policy of carrying her own goods in her own bottoms and passed very rigorous laws in support of it. The United States, with less success, has tried to do the same thing. As for Canada, about forty years ago or thereabouts we did occupy a very favourable position, as my hon. friend from Guysborough knows, so far as shipping is concerned; when wooden ships were more fashionable than steel we had a very high place in the shipping of the world. We lost that position because of the complete change in the type of shipping. Now we are launching into shipping in a modern way, and I again invite hon. gentlemen opposite to join in constructive criticism having in view the one object of making good the venture, in the inception of which they joined us, of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): The hour is late, and there is no hope that this debate can be closed to-night. I do not think it is advisable that the minister should endeavour to push a large item like this through with but a short discussion, particularly when so many hon. members are anxious to express their views with regard to this important question. The minister will not sleep any the sounder for having heard what I shall say, and I suggest that we adjourn the discussion until some future day when it is convenient for him to bring it up again.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The hour is not yet late, and I think all hon. members will admit that on this side we have been very patient in listening for some five hours to the hon. member for Lunenburg. I think it is only fair to ask the committee to sit a while longer and see if we cannot make some progress.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Of course, if my hon. friend wants a lengthy debate we shall have to try to accommodate him, but I do not think he will be able to pass this item to-night.

I listened with much interest to the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens), but I regret that he found it necessary to resort to personal abuse of the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff). I have sat with the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) for a good many years, and I think this is the first time I have heard him depart from the usual amenities of debate in the way that he has done to-night. The conduct of the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) is a matter for himself to deal with, and he is well able to look after himself. If the hon. member for Vancouver Centre will give him an opportunity of discussing his record in the war and placing it opposite my hon. friend's record in the war, the hon. member for Lunenburg will, I am sure, have no objection to undertaking the task.

We are all very much indebted to the hon. member for Lunenburg for the mass of facts that he has placed before us to-night. We may not agree with all that he said, but he quoted many authorities that we will not question. He has given us figures that we are at liberty to examine and criticise; he has given a great deal of study to this question, and I am sure the House should feel indebted to the hon. member for Lunenburg for the careful way in which he has gone into this question and the large collection of important facts which he has placed before us.

My only excuse for intervening in this debate is the gravity of the situation that faces the country in its financial affairs. It has been admitted that we are building ships now at a much higher price than the ships are worth when they are completed. The hon. member for Vancouver has admitted that; he has admitted that we are having to write off a very large amount of our capital cost of those ships, and it is an extraordinary situation that we are voting more money and going on building new ships, knowing that when we have them completed and have paid an average of $192 a ton for them, they will not be worth anything like that figure in the market. That is the situation, and it seems to be very unbusinesslike that we should proceed with a programme like that, with the fact staring us in the face that when we get through with it, our ships will not be worth more than perhaps 25 per cent of what we are spending on them.

The entrance of the Government into this programme is a different matter altogether. The war was on at the time, and there was a certain amount of excuse, but I think I can show that this programme of shipbuilding was not a war measure. The minister, in his speech the other day, stated that this programme started as a war measure. I think I can show that it was not a war measure, and I wish to take issue with my hon. friend on that statement. To begin with it came too late to be of any service. The eleventh of June is the date that I have as the date that the first keel was laid, and the first launch took place on the 23rd November, 1918, or about twelve days after the armistice, so that not a single ship built under this programme of $70,000,000 was of any service whatever in the war. But that is not all. Shipbuilding was going on at the time in Canada. The Government was urged by members of the Opposition during the early years of the war, to embark on a shipbuilding programme. Those of us who were in the House in 1914, 1915 and, I think, 1916, will remember that hon. members on this side of the House frequently drew the attention of the Government to the fact that British ships were being sunk at an enormous rate by German submarines and that Canada should do something towards helding Great Britain, helping the Admiralty, in that matter. The Government, however, took no steps during those years, but I think it was in 1916 that the Munitions Board took up the question of building ships in Canada. They started to build ships in Canadian yards, and in 1917, if I remember rightly, every shipyard in Canada was busy building ships for the Munitions Board. It was absolutely unnecessary for my hon. friend to enter upon this expenditure at that time, because the yards were all busy for the Munitions Board under the authority of the Imperial Government, and his advent into the business only brought about confusion, because it confused the good work that was being carried on by the Munitions Board. My hon. friend can hardly say, considering that fact, that his advent into this business was a war measure. If he had stayed out of the business altogether, the Munitions Board would have gone on with the work; they would have kept Canadian yards busy, and every ship that would have been constructed by the Munitions Board would have been at once handed over to the Admiralty for use in the war. If my hon. friend had been successful in building even one ship before the war closed, his ship would also have been handed over to the Admiralty for use in the war. It made no difference to the Admiralty whether a ship was built by the Munitions Board or by my hon. friend's department. Consequently, the excuse that the war had something to do with starting this programme will hardly hold when we remember the circumstances under which this programme commenced.

The second point to which my hon. friend referred—I am speaking now of the speech delivered by the minister the other day—was that the ships were necessary on account of our owning the railways; that is, owing to the fact that we have a large railway system consisting of some 22,000 miles of railway in this country, we ought to have these ships on the ocean to carry our traffic. That argument is not sound. The seven seas are covered with vessels that are quite ready and willing to compete for the traffic that is carried to the sea by Canadian railways. It is not at all necessary that the railways should embark on a programme of shipbuilding and shipowning. The railways of Great Britain, the railways of the continent of Europe and many railways in the United States have not embarked on the building of freight vessels. Some of them have fast passenger vessels, and if my hon. friend had introduced a programme of putting fast passenger vessels on the Atlantic or on some parts of the oceans connected with his railways, there would be a good deal to be said in favour of it. But that is not his programme; his programme is building what we ordinarily characterize as slow tramp vessels. I notice, in looking over the list, that about eleven knots is the best speed of the vessels he has had built, and some of them are slower than that. There is no justification for building those vessels in order to carry traffic that is carried over our Canadian railways, because as I said before, the ocean is covered with ships belonging to private companies, ready and willing to compete for that traffic and at a lower rate than that at which my hon. friend can carry the freight in Government ships. These great railway systems in the United States and Europe that have no freight vessels connected with their systems have found no inconvenience in that regard; they are able to make arrangements for any traffic that they have to carry. If the minister delivers a shipload of wheat in the elevators at any part of the coast of Canada, all he has to do is to go to the market in New York or London, and give his broker an opportunity of getting the lowest rate that is going for the ships that are looking for that kind of traffic. He will find that in that way he will get a lower rate.

Mr. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): If the principle enunciated that it is unnecessary to have ships in connection with the National system of railways, is correct how was it that the former Government in entering into the contract with the Grand Trunk for the operation of the Transcontinental and the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific insisted as a part of the contract that the Grand Trunk or the Grand Trunk Pacific must construct ships for operation on both oceans in conjunction with the railways?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I understood those to be passenger ships. If my hon. friend looks into the matter I think he will find that there was an attempt made at that time to have a line of passenger ships just the same as the Canadian Pacific Railway has.

Mr. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): How is it then that the Canadian Pacific finds it necessary to operate a fleet of between 60 and 70 ships of all kinds, but largely freight ships, on both oceans?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): The Canadian Pacific has a fleet of ships many of which I believe, were first built as passenger ships. Some of the old passenger ships, I understand are now being used as freight vessels. But that makes no difference to my argument. My argument is that a railway system does not need ships at all and that argument has found favour with the great railway systems of the United States and of Europe. Whatever the Canadian Pacific or any particular railway system might have done, my point is that it is absolutely unnecessary for a great railway system to have ships on the ocean to carry their traffic, because there are already so many ships ready to compete for that traffic at a low rate. Why do not the great railway systems in the United States and Europe put their money into the building of ships like we have done? It is simply because they have not the money to spare. They need the money for the operation of their railways, and dear knows, we need it for the operation of our railways.

Mr. STEVENS: Is it not because the Interstate Commerce Commission will not permit American railways to give a through rail and water rate which is just the opposite to the system in Canada?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): That is a comparatively recent regulation in the United States.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh no, it has been in force for years.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): There were great railway systems in the United States before that regulation came into effect, but they did not adopt the principle that has been adopted by this Government, of putting large sums of money into ships to be operated in connection with the railway. The Canadian Pacific have done so, but I think you will find if you inquire from men who know most about the Canadian Pacific Railway, that their shipbuilding programme has not been their most profitable venture. If you will look at the report of the Canadian Pacific Railway that was issued a few days ago, you will find that they have a capital investment of something like $43,000,000 and if you look at the profit they made, and allow for sinking fund and interest on their money, you will find that the shipping end has not been a very profitable venture for that compeny, any more than it has for the Canadian Government.

Hon. Mr. REID: All of these Government ships were built on account of war conditions. What would my hon. friend think of a suggestion of this kind; that a number of these vessels be operated permanently in connection with the Intercolonial or the Canadian National Railway system in carrying coal from Sydney and the lower provinces to Halifax and St. John's in the winter, and to Montreal and Quebec and even as far as Toronto in the summer?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): My hon. friend appears to think that I would be influenced by the fact that the coal comes from Nova Scotia.

Hon. Mr. REID: Oh, no, what I meant was that in that way we could bring the coal cheaper than if we had to pay a private steamship line a profit.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): The way to work up a coal trade with foreign countries is to get cheap transportation, and my view is that you will never get that by Government ships. Government operation of railways has not given us cheap transportation, either here or in the United States or Great Britain, and the history of Government operation of ships will be the same. If we want to deliver coal to Mediterranean ports, as we had an opportunity of doing last year if the Government had not interfered and put an embargo on the export of coal, we must have cheap transportation to the Mediterranean.

Hon. Mr. REID: That is not the question I asked. I am speaking of bringing coal to Montreal and Quebec and even Ontario. What would the hon. member think of making these Government ships part of the Intercolonial system and using them for bringing coal to Montreal and Quebec, and Toronto perhaps, instead of bringing the coal from the United States.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): It is rather strange that when the programme for the Canadian ships was drawn up, which the minister announced to the House on March 29, my hon. friend the Minister of Railways did not make that suggestion to his colleague. The ships of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine are now travelling on distant voyages all over the world, to India, South Africa, New Zealand, and Australia. It is strange my hon. friend did not induce his colleague to include in his programme the bringing of coal up the St. Lawrence. I do not know whether that is practicable or not. There are some reasons why I would think it was not. I question very much if the ships would do for the coal trade. It was discovered in trying to promote the coal trade between Nova Scotia and Montreal that you must have specially built ships that can be easily discharged, with large hatches, and with a great many appliances that are lacking in the Government ships. The Government ships, in the first place, are not economical. Too many of them are small ships. I find that about 30 of them are under 5,000 tons. Now it is an axiom in the freight business in these days that to make a commercial success of carrying a large and heavy cargo like coal or lumber, or any other product that requires a good deal of room, you must have a ship of at least 8,000 or 10,000 tons. If you consult the managers of the Dominion Coal Company they will tell you that the small ships they were using in the early days did not pay, and that the ship that has a chance to pay in that sort of trade is a 10,000-ton ship.

The Minister of Marine must have taken the advice of some marine engineer, I suppose, but it is a puzzle to me why he built so many small ships of 3,000 or 4,000 or 5,000 tons, when he intended to use them for ocean trade and expected them to pay their way. It is a fact that something like about thirty of the ships being built under the Government programme are too small to be a commercial success in any trade of that kind. They are good enough to travel around in as yachts, with a little freight, which is all that is offering in these times when freight is scarce. But if you want to make money, if you want to carry on a business that will pay its way, then you must have larger ships than my hon. friend has built. Now, I spoke of the reason that was given for the ownership of railways, and the reason that my hon. friend gave the other day for the building of these ships was that it was advancing the export trade of the Dominion. As a matter of fact, is it building up the export trade? It does not seem to be successful in any case, because the balance of trade has been increasing against us during the whole time that my hon. friend has been going on with this programme. I know he carries a certain amount of goods away from Canadian ports, but these goods could be carried in other vessels as cheaply as he is carrying them. His advent into the Newfoundland trade was referred to in this debate, and we may consider that phase of the subject for a moment. There were no fewer than four private lines carrying on trade between the Maritime Provinces and the island of Newfoundland last December. Freight was scarce, and none of them were making money. They had to cross to Newfoundland with half cargoes, and in that state of affairs, with these four private lines struggling to buy coal, pay wages, and keep their ships afloat, my hon. friend comes in and enters his ships into competition with these four lines. He does not reduce the freight, so far as I have heard; he charges the same rate of freight as is charged by the private lines. The effect of his entrance into the business there has simply been to make it unprofitable, not only for himself, but for all concerned, and that certainly is not developing trade. Is my hon. friend developing Canadian trade? If he is, should we not expect to find the balance of trade in our favour? I want to read a short paragraph from a newspaper that generally supports the programme of my hon. friend; I refer to the Financial Post. Here is what the paper says:

> During 1919, our surplus of exports was $151,037,000 while in 1920 we have actually imported $151,145,000 more than we have exported, a change for the worse of over $300,000,000, and a complete reversal of our trade position.

Now, that is the result of my hon. friend's operations in connection with steamships. The Minister, with his forty or fifty odd ships, has been trying to develop our export trade, but he has developed it in the wrong way, in one year, to the tune of $300,000,000. That is the report we get from the blue books and from the press. If a Canadian merchant has a cargo to ship, it is the easiest thing in the world to get ships. All he has to do is to ask for one and he will get it at the lowest rate. He can get ships at a lower rate than the minister can build or run one, so that our export trade would be developed just as well as if my hon. friend were out of the business altogether. The minister has given us a list of the routes to which he intends to send his ships during the coming year. He informs us that he is developing new routes of trade, and the first on the list is Liverpool. Did the hon. gentleman never hear of Liverpool before? Is that a new route? For the last hundred years ships from my province have been going there carrying Canadian exports, and they are doing it still. But my hon. friend gives Liverpool as one of these places; then he gives London, Cardiff, Havana and Australia as new routes. Is any one of them new? I question if my hon. friend can find a port in any part of the world, that is to say, an important commercial port, where Canadian ships have not already been. Why, in the province from which I come, the people are as familiar with the names of Shanghai, Negasaki, Singapore, and Hong Kong, as they are with the port of Montreal, for during the last fifty or sixty, or seventy years sailors of that province have been going to these places.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I do not want to interrupt the hon. member, but I think he will understand that my statement was that these were new routes opened up for the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. He will give me credit, I think, for knowing that these ports are old established ones, and are well known.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Where are the new ones?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: If you read Hansard you will see.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I have the list but I cannot see a single port that has not been frequently visited by Canadian ships in the last fifty or sixty years. I have observed in the press frequently the statement that my hon. friend was opening new ports. The newspapers that are writing up his shipping programme are very kind to him and represent him as a sort of Christopher Columbus, going over the world finding new places for Canada's export trade. I do not want to detract from the honours of the hon. gentleman, but he cannot find any new port in this list, any port that I would call new, at any rate. I read in a Canadian newspaper last autumn the statement that my hon. friend had sent one of his ships up the river Platte to Buenos Aires, and it was stated as a wonderful thing that for the first time in the history of Canada a Canadian ship had carried a Canadian cargo to this place. A Canadian captain happened to be in my office at the time and I read the statement to him. He was amazed, and the remark he made was that some years ago, as master of a ship, he carried a cargo of lumber from St. John to Buenos Aires, and that when he arrived at that port, there were no fewer than ten Canadian ships at anchor there, all having carried cargoes from this country. These statements are made in newspapers by men living a thousand miles from the sea who do not know what has happened at Canadian seaports in the years that have gone. My hon. friend has not so far been successful in developing Canadian trade to any extent.

Mr. BUTTS: Has any vessel from Guysborough ever carried a cargo to Buenos Aires?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Never mind him.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): If my hon. friend really wants to develop trade, he will find that private vessels can carry cargoes as cheaply as his vessels can, or more cheaply. My hon. friend claims that he made a profit in the year 1920. My hon. friend from Lunenburg dealt with that question, but I want to refer to it very briefly. I am not going to enter into details about my hon. friend's figures, but he admits himself, in the statement he presented to the House the other day, that his capital account at the end of the year stood at $53,687,649. The question is, does his balance sheet show a profit? Before we speak of a profit we have to provide for sinking fund and interest—those are the two things that we must make provision for before we make a profit. Shipowners do not consider they make a profit at all until they lay aside enough to pay for sinking fund and for interest. Has my hon. friend complied with that rule, well known to business men everywhere, in regard to the shipping industry? I do not profess to know a great deal about the shipping industry, but I know a little. I know it is the practice of business men, who put their money into ships, to charge five per cent as a sinking fund, and it is necessary to charge five per cent if you expect to come out at the end without going bankrupt. One of the most perishable things in the world is a ship, and a steel ship is also perishable. If the greatest care is not taken it will rust very quickly. Government officers are not apt to sit up all night looking after these things, and if you do not take the greatest care in painting a ship and taking the rust off, the hull of the ship will go in a very short time. The machinery cannot last very long anyway, and the boiler will have to be renewed every ten years. In order to do this you must have a sinking fund. If you are going to renew your ship at the end of twenty years, or whatever period she lasts, you must have a sinking fund of at least five per cent. Taking that principle to start with my hon. friend says he spent $53,687,649. The depreciation at five per cent would amount to $2,685,324.

What about the capital? Where did the capital come from? It did not come down from the skies without anybody being responsible; the capital came from the Canadian people. Every dollar of it was borrowed from the Canadian people at five and a half per cent, and if my hon. friend is going to go on with a sound enterprise he must pay that interest out of his business. The interest on his expenditure at five and a half per cent amounts to $2,952,820. Adding these sums together what do we get? We get a fixed charge of $5,637,144. But my hon. friend made some earnings. He tells us that he has done so and we are glad to give him credit for all the earnings he has made. He claims that he has made $1,293,525. If you subtract that from the fixed charge that I have mentioned it leaves a deficit of $4,343,619. That is to say that my hon. friend, when he charges his five per cent depreciation and his five and a half per cent interest on the operations of the past year, comes out with a deficit of $4,343,619—that is about $12,000 a day for the year that he was running these ships. If that deficit was experienced last year, what will it amount to next year? Does any one expect my hon. friend to make the same rate of profit in the year 1921 that he made in 1920?

My hon. friend from Lunenburg drew attention to the fact that the slump in freights took place in the autumn and summer of 1920. That is true; I could give my hon. friend numerous figures to prove that fact. I am somewhat familiar with the oil trade and I can give him an instance like this—where 74 cents a case was paid for oil shipped from Port Arthur in Texas to the West Indies. In the summer of 1920, as late as August and September, or even later than that, the rates went down, so that oil was carried from Port Arthur in Texas to the West Indies for 35 cents a case, or an absolute loss to the ships that were carrying it. That shows you there was a slump in that instance of more than fifty per cent in the freight. The same thing has happened in other trades as well as in the oil trade, so that my hon. friend will not be able to make the same money in 1921, that he made in 1920. Instead of losing $12,000 a day, as he did in 1920, I would not be surprised if he lost as much as forty and fifty thousand dollars a day in 1921.

My hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) did not say very much about the price of ships. He admitted, if I understood his speech, that we must have a considerable capital loss, and that we have to write it off. I was glad that he was frank enough to make that statement because everybody knows it. There may be a difference of opinion as to what that capital loss will be, but there are certain factors that no one will dispute. These ships were built at a very expensive rate. They were built at a time when the building of ships cost more than they cost at any other time in the history of the present generation. That was the time my hon. friend the Minister of Marine took to let his new contracts, because between the date of the signing of the armistice and the meeting of parliament—between November 11, 1918 and the meeting of Parliament in the winter of 1918, my hon. friend let eighteen new contracts without authority from Parliament, without tender and without competition. These contracts were let at an exhorbitant, profiteering rate, at a figure which the minister himself says was about $192 a deadweight ton. Now prior to the war the ruling rate on the Clyde and at the large shipbuilding ports in England, was not more than $50 a ton. So that my hon. friend paid four prices for his ships—he paid four times as much as was paid prior to the war. Those ships have to compete with the vessels that were built at $50 a ton, for there are millions of that tonnage still on the sea—a great deal of it was sunk, but there are millions of tons left. My hon. friend has to compete now with ships that were built at $50, his ships having been built at $192 a ton. You can therefore understand how difficult it will be for him to make a clean sheet and keep his head above water in hard times like we are having at present.

Now in reference to the value of these ships I want to read an extract from a paper called "Shipping," published in New York. The date of the article is March 25, 1921 and it is to the following effect:

> If the Shipping Board were to fix a price for the sale of the steel tonnage with regard for the world market figures ruling to-day, it would be forced to offer the cargo carriers with $35 a deadweight ton as the top price. One of the most recent sales in the United Kingdom on a new 6,750 d.w.t. ex-German freighter, completed in 1920, was recorded at £60,000. This was at approximately £9 a deadweight ton.
> The depreciation in the value of tonnage is indicated by the comparison with £14 a deadweight ton at the end of the past year. Before the British are able to dispose of the ex-German tonnage it would seem that the Inchcape commission will be almost giving away the more antiquated and seaworn cargo carriers. It is extremely doubtful if any considerable number of steel ships could be sold to-day to American companies even if they were offered at nominal figures.

There is no doubt at all that the price which can be obtained for ships at the present time has depreciated enormously. I would not venture to put down a figure as I do not know what it would be. It might not at present be practicable for my hon. friend to carry out the suggestion of my other hon. friend from Lunenburg to sell the ships, although it might be possible to sell them on some kind of terms. If my hon. friend had followed the example of Great Britain what would he have done? Why, Sir, within ten days after the armistice the Government of Great Britain announced their policy to return all their freight carriers to private ownership, and they have since done so. The United States tried to do the same, but they asked too high a price and the private owners would not take the vessels. If the Canadian Government had followed the example of Great Britain and had shut down all further building at the time of the armistice and disposed of the tonnage they had then contracted for, they could have saved millions and millions of dollars to the people of this country. My hon. friend did not take that course. He was very optimistic then, but I noticed a different note in his speech the other day. He did not seem to be so optimistic as he was last year and the year before; in fact, his tone was somewhat apologetic. He began to tell us the reasons why he went into this venture and tried to blame hon. members on this side of the House for having some part in it. But my hon. friend has got to take the whole responsibility himself. He is the man who inaugurated this system. He had the reputation of being a level-headed business man, and people trusted him. He has this merchant marine on his hands now, and it is for him to decide what is the best thing to do. We on this side of the House will assist him in any way we can, because the country is very much interested in what he is going to do. If he continues to operate these ships as he is operating them at the present time in competition with other private lines and with subsidized lines, there is no telling how many million dollars we may lose. It might be better for him to tie these vessels up. Thousands of ships all over the world are tied up because that is more profitable than to operate them. It is a question for my hon. friend to look into. It looks to me as very improvident, that as requested the other night by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), we should be asked to subsibize a vessel running to Auckland, New Zealand, to the extent of $340,000 to beat us off that route. We are starting in the pace with a handicap against us to that extent. If my hon. friend will look at the returns made to the Government by his officers of the trade between Australia and New Zealand and Canada he will find it is very small indeed. His competitor, the New Zealand Company, has worked up that trade and is running better ships than his, ships that make 16 and 17 knots while his can only make 11, and the total trade last year was about 35,000 tons by measurement, and less than 1,000 tons by weight. That is the trade that existed last year on that route. If he got it all it would not give him one cargo for the five freighters which he is going to put on this route between Vancouver and Auckland. One can readily understand that a man sending out a ship to run across the Pacific ocean 6,000 miles burning expensive coal, without any cargo to carry, would find it far better to tie his ship up at the wharf at Vancouver or somewhere else and wait until there was some business to do. But the insane part is that the Government is paying a competitor that is likely to get the trade $340,000 to prevent its own merchant marine from getting any business on that route during the coming year. That is true not only of New Zealand trade but of the trade with South America and with Newfoundland, for we are paying $35,000 to subsidize a line of steamers to this island. In all these cases we are in competition with lines that we are ourselves subsidizing. That is the most unbusiness-like proceeding imaginable and would not be attempted by any private concern. I should like to know if my hon. friend would put his own money into this venture? He is reputed to be a rich man.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Not a cent.

Mr. CANNON: He never would.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I question if he would put his own money in this venture.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: He is too poor.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): What position does he occupy? He is trustee for the Canadian people. If I understand anything about the doctrine of trusts, it is that a trustee has to be more careful about trust money than about his own. That doctrine does not seem to influence my hon. friend at all. He does not seem to think there is anything wrong in taking this trust money now and building ships at the rate of $192 deadweight ton when he knows that when those ships are launched they will not be worth more than a quarter of that amount. It is hard to say how far this may go. We are committed to an outlay of $70,000,000 I suppose to complete our present contracts. But, as I have pointed out, last year we actually lost four or five million dollars in our shipping operations, if we allow depreciation and interest on our money, and we will lose a great deal more next year; indeed, instead of $70,000,000 it may easily become $100,000,000. I would impress upon my hon. friend the importance of looking into this matter and applying his best business ability to its solution. Now, if my hon. friend is willing that we should adjourn this debate to some more christian hour, when we will not all be so tired, I should like to get his consent. I have a few more remarks that I may wish to make, but I need not make them to-night.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am quite willing to agree to the request of my hon. friend if he and his colleagues will allow one small item to go through. I have seen the leader of the Opposition, and he has kindly consented to it. I would ask the committee to revert to item 206, ocean and river service, examination of masters and mates, $20,000.

Ocean and River Service—examination of masters and mates, $20,000.

Mr. CANNON: That has nothing to do with pilots?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the explanation of the increase of $2,000?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: It is the usual increase of the civil government Estimates and other incidental expenses.

Mr. PARENT: Are pilots interested in the item of masters and mates?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: No.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Ballantyne for the adjournment of the House:

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is my hon. friend in a position to inform us what business the Government will take up to-morrow?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The business for to-morrow will be the motion for the appointment of the special committee on Government Railways and Shipping, and any Estimates which we are entitled to take up.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 12.26 a.m. Friday.

APPENDIX

[The tables comprising the answer referred to on page 1673 are given below. The answer was to the following series of questions asked by Hon. Charles Murphy (Russell):

1. What rates are paid now as compared with 1916 on Canadian National Railways, per month, per day, or per hour, for the following classes of employees:—Engineers, Firemen, Conductors, Trainmen, Shop Mechanics, Carmen, Agents and Operators, Freight Shed Men, Trackmen, Bridge and Building Men?

2. Have there been any particular changes since 1916 in working conditions, such as length of working day, overtime regulations, etc., which further increased compensation over changes in rates? If so, what are such changes for each of the classes named in question number one?

3. What would be the comparative monthly compensation as between now and 1916 paid each to engineers, firemen, conductors, and trainmen (allowing average overtime conditions), in the following classes of service:—Through passenger run, Local passenger run, Through freight service, Local freight service.

4. What are the monthly earnings as compared with 1916 for the following classes of employees working full regular working hours:—Shop Mechanics, Carmen, Agents and Operators, Freight Shed Men, Trackmen, Bridge and Building Men?

5. What would be the monthly earnings of the classes of employees named in question 4 if required to work the same regular working hours as existed in 1916 at present rates as compared with the rates paid in 1916?

6. Do any of the classes of employees named in the foregoing questions receive any compensation or privileges in addition to their rates of pay, such as commissions, free or reduced rental, living accommodation, fuel, light, transportation, etc? If so, in a general way what are such concessions and what are they valued at in individual cases?

Hon. J. D. Reid (Minister of Railways and Canals) in reply to the foregoing questions furnished the statements which follow.]

NOTE.—As the average speed of Passenger trains exceeds 20 miles per hour the difference between the 20 miles per hour in 1921 and 10 miles per hour in 1916 mostly affects cost of Branch Lines service and arbitrary allowances. In Branch Lines service the elapsed time at 20 miles per hour may at times exceed the miles run and in such cases the allowance is increased through the change from a 10 mile per hour basis in 1916 to a 20 mile per hour basis in 1921.

Changes in Working Conditions, 1921–1916

EASTERN LINES—CANADIAN NORTHERN SYSTEM

QUESTION No. 2

Engineers—

Basic day decreased in 1921 as compared to 1916. In passenger service from 10 hours to 5 hours. In Freight, Work and Yard Switching, from 10 hours to 8 hours.

NOTE.—The five hour day referred to in Passenger service is brought about by the increase in allowance of miles per hour used in computing the basis for overtime. In 1916 this was computed at 10 miles per hour and in 1921 at 20 miles per hour. The increase affects the cost of all terminal time, as well as overtime. The adoption of a guaranteed monthly mileage on assigned runs affects runs which are only in operation 3 days per week.

Engineers in through freight service making more than 5 stops to pick up or set out cars belonging to their own train are paid Way Freight rates for full trip. In 1916, paid only Through Freight rates.

Short Run Clause adopted whereby Engineers are paid 100 miles, or a minimum day for a trip, the mileage of which is 50 miles or less, and where it is over 50 miles, 100 miles is paid for first leg of run, plus terminal switching and overtime earned. In 1916 this would be paid for as continuous service, 10 miles per hour from the time of starting until return to terminal, plus terminal allowances and switching and overtime, if any earned.

Yard Service.—Continuous time now paid for the 20 minutes Engineers are allowed for meals. In 1916 they were allowed 1 hour for meals, without pay.

Firemen (All Services)—

Same remarks apply as to Engineers.

Conductors—

Passenger Service.—Overtime now paid in addition to monthly guarantee. In 1916 overtime could be used to make up monthly guarantee.

Short Turn-around Service.—Overtime now paid after 10 hours (8 hours within 10 hours). In 1916 overtime paid after 12 hours (8 hours within 12 hours).

Freight Service.—Basic day changed from 10 hours in 1916 to 8 hours in 1921, increasing the overtime rate from 10 miles per hour to 12½ miles per hour.

Brakemen and Baggagemen—

Same remarks as to Conductors.

Agents and Operators—

1921.—Overtime and work on Sundays and Holidays paid at rate of time and one half. When called for duty outside regular hours are allowed a minimum of three hours straight time at present rates. The cost of a call outside regular hours is from $1.80 to $3.42 which includes the first two hours service.

1916.—Overtime and work on Sundays and Holidays paid at pro-rata rates. A call for work outside of regular hours was 50c. per call which included the first hours' service. Telegraphers residing in station dwellings required to attend a schedule train due at his station within three hours of his regular hours of duty was only allowed 30c. for the call, which covered one hour's service.

Freight Shed Men—

Working day changed from 10 hours in 1916 to 8 hours in 1921, requiring us to pay overtime after 8 hours at time and one half.

Trackmen and Bridge and Building Men—

Working day changed from 10 hours in 1916 to 8 hours in 1921. Paid time and one-half after 8 hours in 1921. In 1916 only after 10 hours.

Monthly Earnings of the Classes of Employees named in Question 4 based on rates paid 1921, but working Regular hours in effect 1916, as compared with rates paid in 1916

EASTERN LINES—CANADIAN NORTHERN SYSTEM

QUESTION No. 5

A 1921 represents monthly earnings of employees based on regular hours in effect 1916 (10), at 1921 rates per hour.

The application of 1916 conditions would mean paying employees in the service two hours per day more than at present, as the basic day would become 10 hours; this, however, would permit of a reduction in the number of employees from the requirements under the eight hour day.

B 1921 represents monthly earnings of employees based on the present daily wage for 8 hours being continued for a ten hour day, which of course would mean a reduction in the rate per hour.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Compensation or Privileges in Addition to Railway Pay Received by Employees

Question No. 6—

Agents and Operators—

Agents are allowed living quarters in stations and free fuel and light for which they pay from $2 to $5 per month. The money value of this, if the Agent had to secure lodgings and supply his own fuel, would be approximately, for rent, $10 per month, and for fuel and light, $9 per month.

Agents are also allowed Commission for handling Express and Telegraph business. This is difficult to average on a monthly basis as the amounts vary from $5 to $100 per month.

Agents and operators are granted free transportation for themselves and family at least once a year, and two weeks holidays per year with pay.

Trackmen—

Section Foremen are allowed to occupy Company's dwellings at reduced rentals of $5 per month. The money value of this, if they had to provide their own lodgings, would be approximately $10 per month.

Trackmen are granted the same privileges as all other employees in respect to free or reduced transportation for themselves and family.

QUESTION No. 1—Con.

Trackmen—

Example as to cost of Crossing Watchmen in 1921, as compared with 1916.

Crossing where continuous service required for the 24 hours (exclusive of Sunday).

1921—3 men 8 hours each at $96.72 per month			$290 16
1916—2 men 12 hours each at 67.60 per month			135 20
Increase 114½ per cent, or				$154 96

If Crossing only required protection during 10 hours in each 24 hours, cost would be—

1921—1 man, 1 day	$3.72
Overtime, 2 hours	1.39½	$5.11½ x 26	$132 99
1916—1 man, 1 day	2.00 x 26		52 00
Increase 155 per cent, or				$80 99

QUESTION No. 2

Engineers and Firemen—
1921. Basic Working day changed as follows:—

Passenger Service—
Basic day, 100 miles, (5 hours or less) at 20 miles per hour.

Short Turn-Around Runs, Suburban Branch Lines, etc.
In 1916 were paid at 10 miles per hour. Overtime paid after ten hours, where time exceeded the mileage. Now paid on basis of eight hours work within 10 hours, and for all overtime after 10 hours, as well as for all mileage made during the day.

Mixed, Freight, Yard and Work Service—
Basic day 100 miles, 8 hours or less, at 12½ miles per hour.
Overtime—1916—all classes of service based on 10 miles per hour at pro-rata rate per hour.
Overtime—1921—Passenger Service, 20 miles per hour at pro rata rates per hour.
Mixed Freight, Yard and Work Train Service—18¾ miles per hour, equal to time and one-half.

Preparatory allowances at Initial Terminal.
1916—No arbitrary allowance rule in effect.
1921—30 Minutes arbitrary allowance for preparing engine for road trip.

Conductors and Trainmen—
Passenger Service.

Short Turn-Around, Suburban, Branch Lines, etc.
1921—Overtime paid after 8 hours within 10 consecutive hours and for all time after 10 hours.
1916—Overtime paid after 8 hours within 12 consecutive hours and for all time after 12 hours.
The spread of hours reduced from 12 in 1916 to 10 in 1921, after which overtime accrues.

Mixed Freight and Yard Service—
1921—Overtime paid at time and one-half or 18¾ miles per hour.
1916—Overtime paid at pro-rata rates or 10 miles per hour.
1921—Basic day 8 hours—100 miles, or 12½ miles per hour.
1916—Basic day 10 hours—100 miles, or 10 miles per hour.
Increase in cost of overtime, exclusive of increase in rates per day—87½%.

Agents and Operators—
Basic day—1921 8 hours, overtime at time and one-half.
1916 10 hours, overtime at pro-rata rates.

Special Calls—1921—Minimum allowance, 3 hours pro-rata.
Sunday 1916—Minimum allowance, 30c. which included the first hour's service.

Special Calls—1921—Minimum allowance, 3 hours at 65c.—$1.95.
1916—Minimum allowance, 50c. which included the first hour's service. If living in Railway dwelling, was only allowed 30c. for each call, to include first hour's service.

Starting time—1921—Between 6.30 and 9 a.m.
1916—Between 6.00 and 8 a.m.

Trackmen and Bridge and Building Men—
Basic Day—1921—8 hours.
1916—10 hours (except Watchmen).
Overtime—1921—Time and one-half, after 8 hours.
1916—Time and one-half, after 10 hours.

Pumpmen, Track and Bridge Watchmen, Crossing Watchmen—
1921—8 hours continuous time to constitute a day.
1916—10 hours in each 24 hours to constitute a day. Hours of work need not be continuous but may be intermittent. This manner of working meant paying for service of work performed only.

Station Agents—

Agents entitled to occupy station dwellings (with free fuel and light) for a nominal rental of from $2 to $5 per month. The value of the rent would be approximately $10 per month. The value of free fuel and light would be approximately $9 per month.

Agents and Operators enjoy in common with other Railway employees, free and reduced transportation.

Trackmen—

Section Foremen are allowed use of section dwellings free of charge. They are allowed same transportation privileges as other employees, and in isolated territory, and along the Transcontinental railway trackmen are granted market passes so as to enable them to purchase at points where prices are the most reasonable.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—EMPLOYEES' REMUNERATION—SUPPLEMENTARY ANSWER

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, since answering the question yesterday asked by the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy), I have received from the Vice-President of the Canadian National Railways a further memorandum giving additionnal information, and I should like to have this placed on Hansard to complete the answer already given. Therefore I would ask the consent of the House for that purpose.

Mr. SPEAKER: It would be the right of the hon. minister when questions were called to have this additional answer to the question submitted placed on the Table and subsequently printed in Hansard; but I can see it would be of great advantage to have it printed in Hansard of to-day rather than wait until questions are called on Monday. I therefore trust that under the circumstances the House will offer no objection to the supplementary answer being incorporated in to-day's Hansard. Is it the pleasure of the House that this shall be done?

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REFERENCE TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I beg to move the following resolution:

That a Select Standing Committee on National Railways and Shipping be appointed for the present session, and be instructed to inquire into the following questions:—

(1) What information as to operation of Canadian National Railways and Shipping as conducted by the Board of Directors and Management should, in the public interest, be brought down in Parliament on Question, Motion for Production of Papers, or otherwise.

(2) When, by what method, and under what conditions, if any, should such information be given, regard being had for the necessity of securing to Parliament and the public all facts requisite for the determination of policy (including finance), and to the Board of Directors the best possible conditions and efficiency of management.

(3) What system of auditing should be adopted, and what extent of detail should be given in the Annual Report.

(4) Whether and for what perposes the said committee should be continued, and that for the above purposes and for such other purposes as the committee deem in the public interest there be referred to said Committee the Annual Report of the Board of Directors and that the said committee have power to examine witnesses under oath, to send for papers, persons, and records, and to report from time to time.

Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of the resolution has been under debate in the House fully on one occasion and partially on another; consequently there is little necessary for me to add by way of explanation in moving the resolution. The committee that I propose is designed to perform, if it can, a very difficult but a very necessary task, and I think it well that the appointment should be made at the earliest possible date—to-day if it be the will of the House—so that the committee may have the most ample opportunity to call witnesses, make all necessary investigations, secure the best opinion available, and report.

When the matter was first under discussion some ten days ago on the motion of the hon. the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) in amendment to Supply, I intimated that I felt the House might well consider the appointment of such a select committee as was already foreshadowed in the motion of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) and that there should be committed to it, first, the duty of finding and reporting upon the best method of bringing into this House the necessary information as to the National railways, the time and the conditions, and whether or not there might be any information that, for a time at least, should not be brought down. On April 5, when the hon. member for Halifax moved his motion, I took occasion in the debate more specifically to set out what I thought might be the duties of the committee. At page 1660 I used these words:

I have merely outlined in brief what has occurred to me as proper subjects for the deliberation of the committee. I am not going to say that nothing else could be submitted to them. It might be conceivable that the general question of the devolution of responsibility within the managing body might also come up for consideration there. I have no comment to offer upon that suggestion. It can be reviewed when the motion that I shall give notice of to-night comes up for discussion.

And I commented on the four topics that I had then suggested. Later in the debate when I gave the notice I said:

During the course of the discussion with regard to the Canadian National Railways, I promised that I would give notice to-night of a motion for the appointment of a committee. I am prepared to hand the motion in, in the regular way, but as in that case hon. members would have no chance to peruse it, I think it would be fairer, that I should read it to-night. In that connection I wish to say that the subjects here outlined are not given finally and conclusively as the subject to be under the review of the committee. In the course of my remarks, indeed, I said that such was not the case.

Consequently the attitude of the Government throughout has consistently been to give Parliament the fullest right of review as to what in the public interest can well be taken in charge by this committee for the purposes of report. In view of comment that had been made to the effect that the annual report would not be brought down, at least for all purposes—although I had stated previously that it would be laid before the committee and would be used for all purposes that the committee had to serve—it will be observed that by incorporating in the motion an additional purpose the committee gets the annual report for that purpose as well, which virtually puts it in the power of the committee to use it for any purpose it desires.

Now, I have noted somewhere that comment was made, to the effect that the duties, as indicated in this resolution, are purely academical. I am afraid that I am not able to understand the applicability of that adjective to these duties. The House has discussed many times, not only this session but in previous sessions, the very question that is embodied in the first charge to the committee. That question is about as far from the academic and is about as intensely and markedly practical as any question possibly could be—what actual information as to operation of Canadian National Railways and shipping as conducted by the board of directors and management should in the public interest be brought down in Parliament on question, motion for production of papers, or otherwise. That is the first question, and really it is very difficult to understand how anyone who reads it can have the faintest idea that it is academical. It is a question as to just what facts relating to operation may be brought down. The Government has always taken the view that this at least must be said: the actual operating data, the facts connected therewith, the managing of the road, must not, until a certain time passes— at least during the period of operation to which they apply and until the annual report covering them appears—must not be producible to the competitor of the road, to the public, to competing tenderers, and all others. As respects these business facts of operation, this corporation must have the same rights as any other, must have the same opportunities as any other, to make a success of its system. In the judgment of the Government, that is vital; it is essential; without it there is no use going on. If these are to be destroyed, then the time has come to turn our backs upon government operation of a system of the magnitude of ours. Any attempt to expose and place the management in the position that has been sought in this House is, whether so intended or not, an attempt to paralyze government operation of railways. Consequently it is an intensely practical question as to what information can be given without prejudicing the management of the system, without prejudicing its efficiency; when it can be given, and under what conditions, if any, and by what method—possibly through the committee itself. That covers the first two duties as outlined in the resolution.

The third reference entrusts to the committee the obligation of looking into the question whether we can have a better audit system. It has been suggested—as I recall it, chiefly by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier)—that some audit system might be evolved under which there would be an ultimate if not an immediate responsibility on the part of the Auditor General. I know of practical objections that have been raised to this. I do not feel myself competent thoroughly to discuss it; I would like to hear evidence upon it. It will be for the committee to hear such evidence as it may desire and to come to a conclusion thereon. The Board of Management has in the past adopted in its annual report the principle of following the same lines and adopting the same system and going into the same detail as in the case with the Canadian Pacific in disclosing its operating facts, its business year to its shareholders. It might be that under a Government system operated by a board of directors a fuller annual report should be necessary and desirable. That question also can be reviewed by the committee and if this motion passes the House expresses its desire that the committee should make a recommendation thereon.

Lastly, the committee will inquire and will report—I have no doubt that after it gets the evidence and the facts necessary to enable it to report on the first three it will need little more as to the last—as to what functions a standing committee on national railways and shipping should have. It might come to the conclusion that the work could be done by the regular railway committee of this House. On the other hand, it might not come to that conclusion; it might think that a closer supervision could be exercised by a select standing committee charged with this duty and this duty alone. That is for the committee to decide. I am sure hon. members will agree if they think the matter out in a business way that the House and the Government, after they have had the advantage of a report from a careful and thorough committee, will be in a much better position to decide these questions which go to the very root of the success of the management of this system.

The motion also states that the committee shall have before it the annual report and it will be for the committee to decide what investigation they desire to make based on that annual report. The committee is left to decide for itself, what can be done or how it can be done without impairing the rights of the management in connection with the operation itself. It is conceivable that the committee might, without achieving any end in the public interest, seriously embarrass the management of the road. It could were it so disposed, but it is inconceivable that unless commissioned to do so it would be so disposed.

Now, I need not add again what I have said often, that no committee ever appointed by this House has been entrusted with more important, and, I doubt not, more difficult duties than those which are being assigned to this one; certainly no more practical duties were ever assigned to any committee. I say again that there might be some other functions performed by the committee, but I think there is about enough here to occupy its time during the rest of the session—for a good part of the rest of the session, anyway.

When I was speaking on this subject last Tuesday I mentioned that the suggestion had come that the committee might inquire into the question whether any improvement in the scheme of management could be made, and report to the House thereon. The suggestion came that possibly some board might take the place of shareholders in an ordinary company. I do not know that that is practicable; I am inclined to think it is not. But, if the House is of the view that any useful object could be served by adding that as one of the functions of the committee, namely, inquiry and report—and the inquiry the committee makes on the other subjects would help it to report, perhaps, without any further investigation—as to whether there could be any improvement in the general plan or scheme of management, it could be added to the duties of the committee. I need not suggest to the House that it would be wholly improper to commit to a committee the duty of examining into the efficiency of an official. If we adopt that course we may give up hope of ever getting officials who will be big enough or able enough to manage a system of anything like the magnitude of the Canadian National Railways. The responsibility for the appointment of the directorate must rest with the Government and the Government alone, and we must not expose officials of the road acting under the directors to review without specific cause by any other body. If we do, we may abandon hope of ever having either officials or directors fit for their duties.

I need scarcely add that the task of managing a system of this magnitude, surrounded by the difficulties that inevitably surround government management, is in itself none too inviting; it is easy for hon. members to believe that the task of securing just the man you may want in each post is easier than it really is. Therefore I say to the House in all seriousness, having had some acquaintance with the problem for many years, that we must take care to be fair to those who are entrusted with this great duty. We must take care that they are placed in a position that will enable them to perform their task to the best of their ability. We must take care that we do not prejudice the interests of the country by pursuing a course in this House, or in a committee of this House, that does injustice either to the system or to the management.

I have again presented to the House, in very brief form, my reasons for moving for the appointment of this committee. The reasons for it have been argued at very considerable length by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean). He, however, did not have any definite ideas as to just what the committee should do. I do not think it would be the part of wisdom to place in the statement of the duties of the committee any omnibus clause, making it their task to do almost anything that they take it into their heads to do. If you do that, you simply turn them out into a wilderness, and you are not going to get any results at all. That has not been the custom of this Parliament. One cannot emphasize too strongly the wisdom of making concrete, practical, and definite, the duties of any committee of this House. If you do so, then you will secure concrete, practical, and definite results; but if your commitment in the first place is vague, open, and aimless, then you are likely after you get your report, to find yourselves where you began, or you may get no report at all. Consequently, I think, with the suggestion that the duties as embodied in the motion are open to amendment if any practical, concrete amendments can, in the judgment of the House, be made with advantage, it would be wise to take care that, whatever may be the purpose, we do not add terms that are likely to destroy altogether the usefulness of the committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) proceeds, I deem it my duty to draw the attention of the House to the circumstance that a strict application of the rule would leave only a fragment of this motion debatable, because the House will bear in mind that one portion of it was debated by the leader of the Opposition, on going into Supply, on a motion for the production of papers appertaining to the railways. It will be borne in mind that, on a subsequent motion of the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean), this subject was widely debated, and as the House is aware, there is a rule that the same subject may not be debated twice in the same session.

The Chair is also not unmindful of the circumstance that the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen), in the course of his remarks, infringed the well-known rule that there may not be reference to a previous debate of the same session; but no exception was taken to that on the part of the Chair, for the reason that the Prime Minister was dealing largely with the question of policy. Over and above all that, I have had in mind this circumstance, that the motion has to do with a subject of tremendous importance, of such great importance that it seems to me in the public interest, that technicalities (if I may use that term) of the procedure of this House should not interfere with the widest possible discussion of this subject. At the same time, while hon. members are debating the motion, I hope they will not be unmindful of these rules and will infringe upon them no more than the circumstances will warrant.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the few remarks which I wish to make in reply to my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen), I shall endeavour not to take a wider range than he has taken with reference to the motion which he has presented to the House. As my right hon. friend has reminded us, the circumstances under which this motion is presented to the House to-day, will be fresh in the minds of all hon. members, and need not be reviewed. In a word, we have been seeking, in this House, to find a way in which Parliament may be informed with respect to expenditures on the Canadian National railways. We, on this side of the House, have taken the broad position that, as regards expenditures on railways owned and controlled by the Government, the responsibility upon the Government is precisely the same as it is with respect to expenditures by any department of Government.

The customary methods whereby information is supplied to Parliament, so far as I am able to see, are three in number. Information can be supplied in answer to questions of the Ministry; it can be supplied by orders for the production of documents, or it can be supplied through a committee of Parliament appointed for the purpose. With respect to the Canadian National Railways and also the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, the Government have taken the position that it is not public policy, or, at any rate, it is the decision of the Ministry, not to give information with respect to these matters where the questions asked appertain to the management or control of the roads or the ships, and where it will be necessary to get an answer from the companies, so-called, which are conducting these great public services. As hon. members of the House well know, the Government, in conducting these public services, have adopted, in each case, the method of creating a corporation for the purpose of carrying on the particular business. We, on this side, take the position that the Government are perfectly within their rights in adopting any method they think will carry out most efficiently the purposes for which Parliament is voting public money. On the other hand, we maintain that, with respect to whatever method they adopt, they cannot relieve themselves of the responsibility which, at all times, must rest upon ministers of the Crown to account to the people's representatives in Parliament for every dollar of public money which has been voted by Parliament for any public purpose.

Naturally, when my right hon. friend gave notice that he intended to move in this House for a committee to consider this aspect of public expenditure, we, on this side, were only too glad to have the Government intimate at last that they were prepared at least to consider some way of giving the public information in regard to public expenditures. We, therefore, welcomed the suggestion of a committee, whether it were a select standing committee or a special committee, which would give promise, at least, of Parliament being supplied with necessary information.

May I point out that the Government have taken three distinct attitudes towards this important matter of supplying Parliament with information with respect to the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Government Merchant Marine? Their first attitude, the attitude taken last session, shortly after Parliament had been informed of a deficit of some $48,000,000 on the Canadian National railways, was that Parliament would have the fullest information, the fullest powers of investigation, the right to get details on any particular phase of management, operation or control of the National railways, all that was asked was that Parliament should wait until the report of the Board of Directors was laid on the table of the House. In other words, we were asked, when voting the Estimates of moneys required for the coming year, to wait until that report was laid upon the Table, and then once the amounts were voted we would be given the right to the fullest information; we would be able to get answers to any questions that we might wish to ask.

The second attitude which the Government have taken is the one which has been apparent throughout the whole of this session; it has been to deny to Parliament any information with respect to these public services except with respect to such matters as might come within the very circumscribed field of correspondence between the official departments, and other persons, as contrasted with the companies. In taking that position, the Government have found themselves running counter very strongly, to opinion, not only throughout the country, but even in this House, and, I think, among their own supporters. The consequence is that we have now a third attitude, that, namely, of offering to Parliament a committee to find out what means and methods, if any, should be adopted for giving information to the public with respect to these great public services. We contend, Mr. Speaker, that the first of these attitudes, is the only position which the Government are justified in taking; that as long as we are dealing with the expenditure of public moneys, the responsibility must rest upon the Government to give the fullest possible information, and that the Government have no right to restrict the powers of Parliament with respect to obtaining information to which it is entitled by referring the matter to any committee to determine one way or the other.

May I say that when my right hon. friend expressed his intention of moving for a committee, we naturally awaited its precise terms with eager expectation. Looking, however, at the terms as they have now been formally set forth, we find that the committee proposed is not so much a committee formed for the purpose of giving Parliament information, as it is a committee for the purpose of placing restrictions around the giving of information to Parliament. We say that is an entirely wrong position. What the Government should aim at is not a method of restricting the giving of information to Parliament in regard to great public services, involving expenditures amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars, but to find a way whereby the fullest information possible can be given to Parliament with respect to these all important matters.

May I, in this connection, draw the attention of the House to the different clauses of the proposed resolution. My right hon. friend suggests that this committee should first of all be instructed to inquire:

> What information as to operation of Canadian National Railways and Shipping as conducted by the Board of Directors and Management should, in the public interest, be brought down in Parliament on Question, Motion for production of papers, or otherwise.

Mr. Speaker, we do not require a committee for that purpose. This House has the right to any and all information on any matters of great public interest and concern. That is the position we take, not that a committee should be formed to find out what information should be brought down. We contend it is the duty of the Government to bring down anything that is asked for by hon. members of Parliament, or to take the responsibility for not so doing. The Government are not obliged to bring down information if they do not wish so to do, but they have to take the responsibility for refusing to bring down information. That is the position we take. We contend that the Government cannot relieve itself of an obligation, fundamental as respects every ministry, to be accountable to Parliament for any and every transaction of a public nature, and to give to Parliament the fullest and amplest information whenever that information is requested. We say that any attempt to restrict that right by throwing on to a committee of this House the duty of finding out what information should or should not be brought down, is simply depriving this House of a right which it has, and which it must continue to hold, if it is to continue to exercise a right which the representatives of the people in Parliament are expected at all times to possess.

The second question which my right hon. friend proposes the committee should inquire into is this:

> When, by what method, and under what conditions, if any, should such information be given?

There again, Mr. Speaker, is precisely the same point. This committee obviously is not for the purpose of enabling Parliament to get full information in regard to the great public services, but to determine when, by what method, and under what conditions, if any, information is to be given. We contend that the information ought to be given without restrictions, excepting where the Government itself is prepared to take the responsibility for withholding the information, and we cannot relieve the Government of their first and fundamental duty in that regard by sanctioning any reference to a committee which will, even impliedly, restrict the rights and powers of this House.

The next question which the committee is to inquire into is:

> What system of auditing should be adopted, and what extent of detail should be given in the Annual Report.

That is a matter that may very properly be taken up by a committee, but it does not help towards a solution of the great question that is before this country at the present time. It does not enable us to get information with respect to the manner in which the deficit of $70,000,000 on the Canadian National Railways has been brought about. Now that is the very information that we want to obtain; that is the information that the people of this country want at the present time; and if there is to be any solution of the railway problem in this country it will only be found by Parliament and the public having the fullest knowledge and the amplest information possible on which to base their suggestions. So any reference to a system of auditing, while it may be very useful in some other connection, does not help us at all in regard to the main situation that is before the country at the present time.

The last reference to the committee is this:

> Whether and for what purposes the said Committee should be continued—

Here, again, is a matter wholly aside from the main question. The resolution goes on:

> —and for such other purposes as the Committee deem in the public interest there be referred to said Committee the Annual Report of the Board of Directors and that the said Committee have power to examine witnesses under oath, to send for papers, persons, and records, and to report from time to time.

Let me say with reference to this particular clause, which refers to the committee the annual report of the Board of Directors, what I think the House pretty generally recognizes, that a select committee has no powers to deal with any matters except such as are referred to it by Parliament. Now the resolution as drafted sets forth a number of subjects which are to be referred to the proposed select committee. By implication it follows that matters not explicitly set forth in the resolution will not come within the scope of the powers of the select committee. Instead, therefore, of the select committee, in any probability, functioning with regard to the obtaining for this Parliament of information with respect to the all important matters on which we have been seeking information, the committee undoubtedly will take the position that its powers are restricted to the matters that have been expressly referred to it by this House of Commons.

What we feel, Mr. Speaker, is this, that instead of placing a number of restrictions upon the duties of the committee, instead of limiting its powers, there should be conferred on it by this House of Commons the amplest and fullest powers to inquire into all matters pertaining to the control, operation, and management, of the Canadian National Railways, and of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, these being the two important public services and issues with which the time of this Parliament is likely to be most occupied during the present session.

That, Mr. Speaker, I think, covers the point of view which we on this side take with respect to the motion of my right hon. friend. Let me, as regards the matters referred to the committee, supplement what I have said by quoting the remarks of my right hon. friend made the other day when speaking of the committee with respect to which his motion is now made. On the 5th of April, as reported at page 1660 of Hansard (unrevised), my right hon. friend said:

> It must never be thought that we should give to a committee powers or duties exceeding those we ourselves are ready to exercise. For example, if it is not in the interests of the country that we so hamper the management of the road as to render efficiency impossible by doing in this House what this House decided some few days ago it would not do, namely, bring out merely upon question or motion all information, no matter what it is, if that is not going to be done by Parliament, then Parliament is certainly not going to commit to a committee the power to do what in the public interest it is not right for Parliament to do itself. That could not be considered at all.

That statement of my right hon. friend must be read in conjunction with the clause in the motion which he has just put before the House setting forth the scope of the committee's work. Clearly my right hon. friend has intimated that he does not propose to allow this committee to elicit information of a kind which the Government has refused to give to the House. We contend that a select committee should be formed for the purpose of getting for Parliament, through that source, the information which has been denied to us through other channels, and in that connection, we think, the committee should have the widest possible powers which this House can confer upon it.

Let me mention in passing that while my right hon. friend's motion refers to railways and shipping, he confines the references in the several paragraphs of the motion only to matters pertaining to the national railways. We think that the same duties and powers should be given to the committee with respect to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is intended.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad we have been able to enlarge the scope of the committee even that much. I wonder if it is also intended that the committee should have the power to engage counsel and transportation experts to assist it in connection with its work. It must be apparent to hon. members that in view of the magnitude, and of the technical nature in many particulars, of transactions pertaining to the Government merchant marine and the Canadian National Railways, and with the time of hon. members occupied as it is certain to be between now and the end of the session, it will be impossible for any committee of this House to elicit information that will be of real service to the House unless they have the right to retain counsel, and particularly transportation experts, to assist them in carrying out their duties. I propose, therefore, in the amendment I am about to move, to suggest that these larger rights and powers be conferred. The powers of the committee should not be restricted in any way, but should be the amplest which Parliament can give.

As my right hon. friend says, it will probably take to the end of the session for any committee to deal with the several problems he has outlined. What does that mean? It means that, as respects the Canadian National railways and the Canadian Government marine, we shall end this session without obtaining any inforwithout obtaining any information at all with regard to the facts upon which we have been seeking light. We shall get a report from a committee setting forth, notwithstanding my hon. friend's objection to the term, an academic statement of certain methods of proceeding. But we shall not get the facts and the information which will account before the public for the enormous deficits that have been incurred during the last few years, and which will probably be still larger next year; nor shall we get the light needed to enable us to deal intelligently with the whole railway and shipping situation. In the circumstances, therefore, I beg to move, seconded by my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding):

> That all the words after the word "session", on the second line, to the end of the question, be omitted, and the following be inserted instead thereof:
> That such committee shall have power to inquire into all matters in any way relating to the railways owned or controlled by the Government of Canada whether under the direction of the Department of Railways and Canals or under any corporation in which the Government are stock holders, whether relating to the construction or operation, from the date of the appointment by the Government of the Board of Directors of the Canadian Northern Railway Compay down to the present time; and similarly to inquire into all matters in any way connected with the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, either in respect of the construction or operation of the ships, and that such committee shall have power to send for papers, persons, and records, to engage counsel and transportation experts, and to make such reports and recommendations from time to time as, in their judgment, will be calculated to promote the public interest.

In connection with this amendment, I hope the House will not lose sight of the fact that the country is demanding to-day full light upon the circumstances which have occasioned a deficit of something like $48,000,000 last year and $70,000,000 this year on the National railways; also that Parliament is being asked by the Government to vote for railways and canals for the ensuing year a sum amounting to over $167,000,000, while thus far we have not been able to get any information of a substantial or vital character in regard to the operation, the control, and the management of these public services. It is to enable Parliament and the country to obtain the fullest light possible on these vast expenditures of public moneys that this amendment has been drafted in the comprehensive form in which it appears.

Hon. Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Minister of Finance): I am very glad to know that there are some things in connection with which I can join my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) in hearty accord. We do agree that the present situation, having particular regard to the railways, their deficits, and their general operation, is of grave importance. But we differ slightly as to the way in which we should endeavour to get something done to meet the difficulty; and it is by reason of the fact, among others, that the Government is impressed with the gravity of the situation and is fully alive to its importance, that we are so anxious to have the best possible committee that can function upon this subject entrusted with the determination of perfectly plain and simple issues upon which we may base some concrete answer and give some concrete information that may be of assistance to the House. In the first place, I do not know that it makes so much difference, in so far as this motion is concerned, as to just exactly what the Government has been doing in connection with the giving of information. Whether what we have been doing is right or wrong, we desire to see if matters cannot be handled in a better and more simple manner and in a more concrete form than heretofore. My hon. friend is entirely correct, in one respect, in his statement as to the Government's course. He says that last year it was understood that the fullest information was to be given to the House just so soon as the report was laid on the Table. Well, the position is the same to-day; it has not been varied in the slightest. The reports have been tabled and they are not only open to hon. members, but they may be sent to any appropriate committee, on the request or the motion of any hon. gentleman. But the fact is that this year, as last year, no action has been taken by the Opposition in connection with the annual report with a view to obtaining information which they thought necessary for their purposes. This year, it is said, we have refused all information; but the position is exactly the same as it was last year, so far as the reports are concerned. Now, if I understand the tenor of my hon. friend's remark's,—and I have tried my best to follow them—what he wants, apparently, is that the Government should bring down any information that is asked for or else take the full responsibility for declining to do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hear, hear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend says "hear, hear." Well, if that is the position, why is he worrying? Why is he annoyed? Why is he vexed? We have refused to bring down information and we have taken the responsiblity for that refusal; we ought to be perfectly happy. But we want to do something more. We do not want to leave this matter to the arbitrary exercise of any government right of refusal. We do not want to take that position if it can be found, having regard to the tremendous values of these properties and the great task of properly managing them, that information can from time to time be brought down to any greater extent than has been the case in the past. We should like to remove the subject from a position with which my hon. friend would appear to be entirely content.

The motion is drawn for the purpose of including both the railways and the marine service. And it is not only drawn with that intention but it carries that intention into effect, because it is the same committee, it is the same board of management, the same directors manage both systems. Both systems are covered, the same directors are covered, and the same jurisdiction is given to the committee over the marine as over the railways. Then I am afraid that my hon. friend likes very much the present situation. He likes having it left so that information is asked for and information is refused. And the reason why I think he was perfectly sincere in his statement that he thought that that ought to be the position is fortified by the amendment that he now brings down—and I only had the opportunity of looking over it while my hon. friend was speaking.

After all how does the question come up? The whole question comes up with the request for information—that and nothing else. I notice that my hon. friend's amendment strikes out all reference to this burning question of information altogether. It is struck out entirely—apparently there is no immediate hurry for information in this committee. In place of it—in place of a clear, a defined field of operation—a field is left which is of itself so great that unless some particular programme be laid down I do not know when any report could be expected; certainly not for a long time, certainly not within any reasonable period—and my hon. friend lets the committee loose on that large field. Well, I do not know what that is for, what the idea is—whether it is to be a general fishing expedition or whether they were to go back and find out why at one time railways that had to be built went in a certain direction, or whether some farm crossing in a certain concession was taken up that ought to be left and what it is for, matters far removed from the present difficulty that, I take it, we are all honestly anxious to have solved. No matter how far removed these questions may be my hon. friend proposes that they be all left to the committee with full powers for a general fishing expedition.

Now I think my hon. friend was wrong in another direction. He says that instead of finding excuses for not bringing down papers, the object of the Government ought to be to find a way to give the fullest information to Parliament. That is exactly what we are trying to have done; that is exactly the concrete thing that is left to that committee. I do not know any other way whereby you could pursue anything like a course of action, which would not hurt business, to let you know where you are, or any method more likely to bring it about, than leaving the concrete question to that committee.

Then my hon. friend says the committee wlil have no powers except in connection with these three matters—the papers containing information, the method of bringing them down and the audit. Well, I would like to point out that the whole report was referred to the committee. The whole of that report is in the hands of the committee and that being so they have the right of going into anything and everything they want arising out of that report. My hon. friend will find nothing having regard to the conduct of its business which is not directly or indirectly covered by that report.

A further thing that my hon. friend points out is that there is nothing in the resolution giving them the information which they very much desire—namely, information as to why the deficit is as great as it is. Well, I dare say that hon. gentlemen opposite have better memories than I have, but does any one remember any questions being put on the Order Paper asking for reasons as to why the deficit is so large? Nobody ever heard of it. On the other hand, we have heard of questions put for the purpose of showing that the deficit ought to be greater, questions put for the purpose of ascertaining why some agent is not working twenty-four hours a day, why the office is not open twenty-four hours a day, or why at some point there is not a regular station instead of a flag station—these are the questions that are being asked.

4 p.m.

Mr. McMASTER: May I interrupt my hon. friend? Does the Minister of Finance not remember questions put on the Order Paper asking what other directorships were held by the directors of the Canadian National Railways, and what business has been done with the companies in which they were interested?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know that is any answer to the question I put. I do not know whether the object in making such an interrogation on the part of my hon. friends was to find out whether or not the men of business being put on the National system were men so little known to the business world that no other business organization had any confidence in them. But that is not a question as to why the deficit is as great as it is and what can or ought to be done with regard to reducing it.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Does my hon. friend remember a question like this—whether the coal used in the running of the mercantile marine was bought by tender or by private contract,—and a refusal to give any answer?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My recollection upon that point—and I speak entirely subject to correction—is that the question was put at one time as to whether the coal was bought by tender or not, but the question also went further and desired information as to the tenderers. My recollection is that the answer was that coal was bought by tender, but information as to who the tenderers were was refused. However, that may be, what I submit with very great confidence is, that it would be impossible for us to ever ascertain why railways do not pay by asking questions across the floor of the House—that is absolutely impossible. On the other hand it well may be that if we had a committee properly manned and properly constructed—as I have no doubt this committee will be—with fixed and definite objects ahead of it, much good can be done.

Now the query is also made by the hon. gentleman as to whether counsel may be retained. Well, I have had a good deal to do with railway matters and I do not know that I ever found any farmer who appeared before the Railway Board—either in a rate case, or in a cattle case, or any other kind of a case—handicapped because he did not have a lawyer. After all, the issues here while they are very serious and very great are not legal. I would say that the committee could get along very well without the assistance of counsel.

There are lawyers in the House, and I have no doubt some of them will be on that committee, and it would occur to me that the expense of counsel is entirely unnecessary. Then, so far as traffic experts are concerned, again I do not know that it is necessary to take very much evidence from them. We want to get at the actual facts relating to transportation and the like. The committee may be able to get an expert who is not associated with or interested in either one system or the other —they may, but I would doubt it. It would occur to me that the best thing to be done on the question of retaining counsel and traffic experts is to leave it open, so that the committee can if the necessity occurs come back to this House and ask power to retain such assistance.

Now, Mr. Speaker, our position is simply this. We are sincerely anxious to see something done. We do not think that a general fishing inquiry as to what has happened in railway circles in Canada is going to help us very much in deciding what ought to be done at the present time. On the other hand, we have a direct commitment to this committee of something definite, and calling for a definite answer, which answer may, and we hope will, be of great assistance toward a solution of our railway problem.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that this question, which is one of tremendous importance, is at this moment narrowed down to what I may call very small bounds—narrowed down to points which the public will clearly understand, and about which I believe there can be no possibility of misapprehension. It seems to be the general wish of the House that a committee should be appointed to inquire into these matters. The question is as to what power shall be given to that committee. When it is appointed it will undoubtedly contain a majority of members supporting the Government. Now, just how that committee shall exercise the powers that may be assigned to it we are not to determine; we shall have to take the risk of that.

The motion of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) gives the committee certain specific and limited powers. I am not a lawyer, but somewhere in the dusty bins of the legal profession I think there is a maxim which says, that the expression of one thing is the exclusion of another; and if you specify in a statute or public document a number of things, you thereby exclude all others. If I am wrong in my legal doctrine, no doubt some one will correct me. At all events, if it is not law it is common sense. The motion of the Prime Minister assigns certain subjects to the committee; that means that no other subjects can be considered by it. The amendment moved by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition takes in everything. I want that noted. Every thought and word that is in the motion of the Prime Minister is included in the amendment. But we go further. Ah, that is the point. The hon. minister says: No, you must not go further. Why go further? We have a great difficulty before us, a tremendous financial problem involving a very large deficit last year, a much larger deficit this year, and rumour says even larger again in the coming year. In regard to that I make no charge; I make no accusation against any of the managers of the road—I do not even find fault; I do not know what all the trouble is. If I am asked: Have you a particular solution to offer for this great problem?—I say frankly, I do not know. In that respect I do not differ from other members probably. But if we are asked to provide a solution, surely the first thing we must do is to get all the information possible; all the information, not on this, that or the other point, but on all points which in any way relate to this transaction, or which can have any bearing whatever in remedying the condition of things which we all desire to remedy.

Again I say I am not finding fault with the management, I make no accusatons. In anything I have had to do with any of the gentlemen connected with these railways I have invariably received every courtesy and consideration, and the last thought in my mind is to suggest that there is any wrongdoing. Here is the position: an enormous deficit of $70,000,000,—equal to the total expenditure of Canada only a few years ago. Now, this tremendous financial problem calls for serious reflection, and reflection of an impartial character; in other words, a non-partisan study. It is that which we desire. But surely members of the Government must see that when they start out by putting restrictions on the investigation and saying: You may investigate that particular thing, but you must not investigate something else, surely that is a position they cannot defend before the people of Canada. Our proposal is to appoint this committee and give them unlimited powers. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), and I think the Prime Minister also, said that unless you give this committee some particular instructions to do some particular thing nothing would come of it. That is a very queer doctrine. We often appoint committees in general terms. I have in my hands the terms on which we appointed the committee on pensions. According to my hon. friend's contention, since we gave that committee no instructions they will do nothing, but we know they are giving attention to that very important subject, and I have no doubt are arriving at a solution which will be of great value. Here is the motion:

> That a Special Committee be appointed to consider questions relating to the pensions, insurance and re-establishment of returned soldiers, and any amendments to the existing laws in relation thereto which may be proposed or considered necessary by the committee; with power to send for persons, papers and records, to print from day to day its proceedings and the evidence taken, for the use of the committee, and to report from time to time; and that Rule 11 be suspended in relation thereto.

That, in different words, is exactly what we are proposing now. We say: Here is a great problem. Appoint your committee and give them unlimited powers. I think the Prime Minister made one remark in that connection, which I fully endorse. He said that it would be in the power of the committee to embarrass the management of the road, but, he added, "it is inconceivable that they would do so." I accept that view. I say that this committee appointed in general and unrestricted terms would neither embarrass the management nor be disagreeable and insist on calling people whom it is unnecessary to call. It would be in their power to do a great many things, but I agree with the doctrine of the right hon. Prime Minister that it is inconceivable they would do them. Why not, then, give the committee all the power that is possible? I cannot for the life of me see the need of restriction, to say that they are not to be given a free hand, but must report on certain particular things and those only. By our motion we say: Let them report on whatever in their judgment is best calculated to bring about a solution of this problem. That is the great duty. at every stage we should have a full open inquiry, trusting the committee to be reasonable, to exercise their power as members of Parliament with a sense of their responsibility to their constituents, to this House and to the country; and to report whatever in their judgment is fair and reasonable. Everything that is contemplated by the motion of the right hon. Prime Minister is included in our amendment; let there be no mistake about that All he asks we are asking too, but we say if there is anything more that can be brought to the knowledge of this committee, by all means let us have the benefit of it, and leave the committee unrestricted in any way, shape or form. The matter seems to me so simple that I really could not debate it at any length; the principles are too plain and too clear. It is a question whether we shall have a restricted and limited inquiry, or whether we shall give an absolutely free hand to this committee to bring their best judgment to bear upon this question, to exercise their responsibility to their constituents, to this House and to the country and invite all available information, giving the House every possible suggestion that the judgment of the committee may tell them is going to be helpful towards a solution of this problem. We by our amendment enable them to do that, but they are told by the motion of the Prime Minister that though they may have notions in their mind of some solution of this problem they must not say anything about them, because they do not come within the four corners of his resolution. It is a question between full inquiry—that is what the country wants—and restricted inquiry. Again, I say that I make no charge or complaint. We are confronted with a great financial problem which is disturbing the country, and justly disturbing the country. I approach it in every spirit of fairness to all concerned. I complain of nothing; I find fault with nothing. I say that what we all need is information. Let us get the fullest information that is possible and then try to find a solution.

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding), echoing in that regard, if I am not mistaken, the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), persists in speaking of the committee for the appointment of which the leader of this House (Mr. Meighen) has moved as a committe to provide restriction upon information. The hon. gentleman suggests that his proposed amendment remedies that alleged defect by providing for the appointment of a committee with a roving commission to get all or any information whatsoever about anything great or small connected with the operation or management of the railways or of the shipping. In taking that position, hon. gentlemen are simply refusing to consider the first problem that presents itself; their motion simply begs the real question. The committee for which the right hon. leader of the House asks is a committee to study the problem of how we may remove the obstacle which presents itself to the obtaining of information. While we must recognize the right of this House to have all information necessary to the intelligent performance of its duty of controlling the expenditures made out of the moneys of the people, on the other hand it is the duty of the House to protect the people from any injury that might come to them through the making public of all the details of the operation of their business carried on in competition with others. Now, that is the problem we have to face, and the purpose of the proposed committee, far from being to restrict the information to be obtained, is that the Government may obtain the judgment of that committee as to the best method of obtaining all possible information without involving the particular injury that I have mentioned.

And what position do hon. gentlemen take in regard to that? They say: Our principle is that, whatever may be the injury to the public interest, we must have all information about every detail in connection with the operation of these roads, and we refuse to give one moment's consideration to the question whether the obtaining of information may not be infinitely more damaging to the public interest than our doing without it. I ask this House, is that an intelligent position? Is that the position that ought to be taken by a Parliament desirous of really protecting the substantial and material interests of the people of this country? Is it not quite clear that our first duty is to determine to what extent it is essential that information should be obtained? It may be conceded that there is an absolute right to obtain all information, but it is not always wise or prudent to insist upon absolute rights. Certainly no one would speak in high praise of the action of an agent or trustee, who, because he had an absolute right to obtain and to give broadcast to the public certain information, would insist on exercising that right, even though his doing so would ruin the interests of his principal or of the persons for whom his trust existed.

Now, what we are asking this House to do is, first, to submit to the committee the question how we are going to get the necessary information without causing detriment to the public interest. Surely hon. gentlemen should at least be willing to consider that question.

Mr. FIELDING: Will the committee not consider it?

Mr. DOHERTY: We are asking the committee to consider it. The hon. gentleman objects to our asking the committee to consider it.

Mr. FIELDING: No.

Mr. DOHERTY: He says we must say to the committee: We do not want your opinion or your report as to what information ought to be obtained; we send you out to obtain all information that it may occur to you to ask for. The hon. gentleman seems to misapprehend the purpose of the appointment of this committee; it is to enable us to determine a preliminary problem that necessarily must be determined before we proceed to the obtaining of information. Suppose the committee were appointed under the terms of the amendment and proceeded to obtain, as the hon. gentleman boasts they are going to be authorized to do, any and all information concerning the details of the operation of the road; it would be only after they got and made public certain information that we should realize that that information should not have been made public at all. There would be no remedy; after all information had been obtained, we should proceed to judge whether or not certain details should or should not have been made public. I appeal to the common sense of this House: is it not reasonable to endeavour to regulate the action not only of this committee but of its successors, if it should be determined that it shall continue in existence—is it not the part of simple common sense to determine first what information should be got and what is the best way to go about getting it? Then it will be time enough—

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Does my right hon. friend contend that it is necessary to appoint a committee to inquire into what information should be given to the House?

Mr. FIELDING: That is what the motion says.

Mr. DOHERTY: The contention is this —I have tried to make it clear—that it is desirable that we should consider the nature of the information that it is desirable, in the particular situation that arises, should be asked for, obtained, given to the House and made public. Possibly that committee may arrive at the conclusion and may advise that there should be no limit, no restriction. I am not anticipating what their decision will be.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Does my right hon. friend contend that it is necessary to appoint a committee to inquire into what information should be given to the House? Will that committee specify what information should be given to the House?

Mr. DOHERTY: It would be exceedingly useful—

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I want a straight answer.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is going to go just as straight as the line that runs from my eye to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Will my right hon. friend make an effort to make the matter clear?

Mr. DOHERTY: I have struggled to make things clear —

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: We will admit that.

Mr. DOHERTY:—and I have been astonished at the obtuseness which I find myself up against. I however, have rather an inclination to think that the hon. member who is owning to obtuseness, only thinks it useful or, perhaps, a little bit amusing—

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: No, I am most serious.

Mr. DOHERTY:—to claim a little more obtuseness than he really possesses. To give him a straight answer, when people are faced with these two considerations which the public interest requires them to give thought to, on the one hand the right of Parliament to obtain all the information that is necessary to enable it properly to perform its functions, and, on the other hand, the interest of the people of Canada to be protected against unnecessary and unwise disclosures to the whole public of the business operations of the people of Canada, I think it is useful and the part of wisdom and common-sense to sit down and consider the best methods of reconciling those two things, both of which you want to respect and both of which it is your duty to respect. That being so, I think this committee is a useful method of studying that problem. It is not for me to anticipate what the report of the committee will be. They will be put in a position to ascertain all the circumstances, all the conditions, to obtain information and advice with regard to the question of just how far it is disadvantageous to the carrying on of the businesses of this country that there should be absolute revelation of all the operations, and they will be able to report to this House the opinion, the conclusion to which they have come, in view of what they have so ascertained. The House then will have the benefit of that advice in determining—because ultimately, of course, the report of this committee must come to this House—what in its judgment is the nature of the information that ought to be obtained and to be insisted upon. The Government, in the determination of that question which, the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) says, should rest entirely with the Government and be dealt with entirely on the Government's responsibility, will have the advantage of the advice of this committee and of the views held by Parliament and expressed as a result of its consideration of the report of this committee.

There is the problem that presents itself, the problem that must be determined, before we start out to obtain indiscriminate information with regard to the carrying on of those business operations. As I have said, I put it to the common-sense of this House whether it is or is not wise that we should examine into the question of what information should be obtained?

What objection there can be to that question being considered, I confess I am at a loss to understand. We are face to face with a simple determination to refuse to recognize the existence of that question at all, to refuse to give it thought, to refuse to consult about it, to refuse to look into it at all, and simply to fall back on the absolute assertion: We have a right to have every information without regard to the possible effects that I have pointed out, and we propose to appoint a committee to go out and gather in that information, exercising simply, without any control from this House, whatever powers of discrimination it may have itself. The amendment seems to me to be just another means adopted to avoid doing what common sense calls upon us to do, and it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the inspiration that is behind the moving of that amendment is a desire to conserve and to preserve a grievance of which we may have perpetual iteration in this House. If the hon. gentlemen want information, surely they ought to be willing to consider the best methods of getting it. If the hon. gentlemen do not want information, then it would seem to me they are, by this amendment, adopting the proper course to reach that result,—because by this amendment they persist, in face of the vote of this House that there is discrimination to be made between the information to be obtained and that which should not be obtained, in refusing to recognize that necessary discrimination; and they insist upon maintaining the position that we are to have nothing but the abstract affirmation that we are to have anything that any member of this House chooses to ask for and that we are to authorize this committee to ask for and obtain any information which, in their judgment, they may consider that they are entitled to ask for.

Mr. VIEN: Does my right hon. friend seriously believe that, through the instrumentality of the committee now proposed, any valuable information will be forthcoming to this House?

Mr. DOHERTY: I very seriously believe that, through the instrumentality of this committee, this House has every prospect of obtaining the necessary material to enable it to decide what its attitude should be upon this question of obtaining information with regard to the operation of the Canadian National railways. And when this House has obtained that material, the advice of the committee, it will be able to lay down rules, which, in its judgment—

Mr. VIEN: And to avoid all information.

Mr. DOHERTY: Of course, the hon. gentleman is entitled to his opinion upon the subject, and he will have an opportunity of exposing it when I get through.

[Mr. Doherty.]

But it strikes me as extraordinary that it should be suggested that consideration of the best way to obtain information is a means to avoid getting any information at all.

Mr. VIEN: Surely.

Mr. DOHERTY: The logic of that conclusion I have difficulty in perceiving. It seems to me that there is perhaps a misapprehension. There are two things that require to be done, and one requires to be done, it seems to me, before the other. The first one is to determine what is sought to be determined by the report, or, at all events, upon the report or by the advice of this committee; that is to say, the problem of how we are to proceed with regard to obtaining information respecting this public service. The second one will be, when the first problem is solved, to proceed to obtain that information in accordance with the conclusion reached upon the first question. The present motion of the right hon. the Prime Minister is for a committee to enable us to solve the first problem, and I am confident that this House will see the wisdom of our reaching a solution of that problem as a preliminary—

Mr. VIEN: What objection is there to giving to the committee itself the power to obtain the information that it is suggested the committee should have? Why not let the committee obtain the information and submit it to the House?

Mr. DOHERTY: That takes away from this House any power to control the determination of the question what information ought to be obtained. The House would be abdicating entirely its own judgment. This committee is not going to pronounce final decisions. It is going to make a report to this House to enable this House to decide; and it does seem to me that what my hon. friend is asking is that this House abdicate any exercise of judgment on its own part as to what information should or should not be obtained, and put absolutely in the hands of the committee the determination of that question, with the possible result that they may determine it in a manner to which this House would not assent, and may, in virtue of that determination of their own, proceed to obtain and give to the public information which it might be perfectly manifest, and which the judgment of this House might be, should never have been given to the public.

This House, after all, should retain the control of the ultimate determination of this preliminary question as to what information should be obtained, and the best method of obtaining it. There will be nothing lost by our protecting ourselves in the exercise of that right, and hon. members who will not be on that committee will have the opportunity of passing in review the decision of the committee—if one may call it a decision, or at all events, the conclusion to which the committee will have come—and possibly acting upon it, possibly modifying it, or possibly coming to the conclusion that there is error with regard to it. This House will then have acted the part of a wise man, that is to say, will have considered the preliminary problem first, and before it starts out to secure the information, either directly or through the committee, will have formed an intelligent judgment on which it can base an intelligent rule as to how it is to be guided in the obtaining of that information, the extent to which it should go, and the best methods in the public interest to procure that which is necessary; and preserve from publicity, on the other hand, anything which it is in the public interest should be withheld from publicity.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): May I put a question to my right hon. friend? If, as he seems to contemplate, the committee should be restricted in its own search for information, how can it give to the House an opinion of any value on information which it does not itself possess?

Mr. DOHERTY: The committee is not restricted in the slightest degree with regard to the obtaining of information useful for the purpose of reporting on the questions that are submitted to it. It may have whatever information in its judgment be deemed necessary to enable it to report to this House as to the nature of the information, generally speaking, that should be given, and the best method of obtaining it, and as to the other matters that are submitted to it, including the report of the Board of Directors and all matters that come up in connection with it. They are not restricted in any way.

Mr. VIEN: That is without the scope of the reference. The reference does not give to the committee the power to collect information, but only to report on what information should be supplied by the Government to the House.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I must remind hon. members that the House is not in committee.

Mr. DOHERTY: There are four distinct purposes for which this committee is constituted, and upon which it is asked to report. The motion after enumerating those things upon which the committee is to report, says:

> —and that for the above purposes and for such other purposes as the Committee deem in the public interest there be referred to said Committee the Annual Report of the Board of Directors and that the said Committee have power to examine witnesses under oath, to send for papers, persons, and records, and to report from time to time

Where is the restriction upon their obtaining any information whatsoever that can in any way be useful to enable them to attain the purposes for which they are appointed. Surely, you could not get any wider terms. Surely, hon. gentlemen who are making these objections have not looked closely into the terms of the motion.

Mr. FRANK S. CAHILL (Pontiac): Mr. Speaker, this is a question on which the Government and the Opposition would naturally find themselves divided. The Government in seeking to restrict the powers of the committee are asking just what you would expect them to ask. They act on the principle: Mistrust the people and give them as little information as possible. We, on the other hand, believe in this principle: Trust the people and give them the fullest possible information. It goes without saying that Parliament itself must finally be responsible for the conduct of the Government railways. it is impossible to get away from that fact. To this committee which the Prime Minister is proposing to-day we are asked to delegate work that should have been undertaken by the Government itself more than four years ago, when they took over the railway system. At that time the Government should have determined on a policy as to the management of the railway. I say that the Government are going beyond their powers when they say that to give certain information would not be in the public interest and therefore they withold it. It is taking away from the people's representatives their rights, and that cannot be permitted, and will not be permitted by the people when they have an opportunity to pronounce their verdict. Either Parliament must control or there is irresponsible control; it must be one or the other,—if Parliament does not control, there is no control. We must therefore get back to Parliamentary control. Then the question arises, what information should be given to Parliament? In former days the Government gave practically all information as to expenditure and the management of the roads under their control, but when the Act was passed incorporating the Canadian National Railways, the Government took out of the control of Parliament certain expenditures which they said would not be submitted to the Auditor General's Department. Since that practice has been in vogue, we find that the management have been losing enormous sums of money. At that time we objected to that principle. We maintained that every expenditure should be audited by the Auditor Generals Department but the Government took the opposite view, and since then they have not given the information that the people of this country are entitled to. As a consequence rightly or wrongly, the people of this country have lost confidence, not only in the Government, but in the management of the railways. They feel that there must be something wrong when the deficits run up to such huge proportions.

The Minister of Finance said this afternoon that we had not been asking questions. Well, one of the reasons why we have not been doing so this session is the fact that the Government intimated that they were going to find some means of giving the House information. The resolution of the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) was on the Order Paper for some time, and until it was disposed of we felt that we should give the Government an opportunity to state their case and tell us what they purposed doing on the question of information. Now they come with the proposal to shift the responsibility from their own shoulders and place it on a committee which shall be restricted in its operations. Well, we ask in turn that the committee have the fullest powers to go into everything connected with the railway management and control. The argument advanced by members of the Government against this proposal has been that they do not want to give away the secrets of management. Let me tell my hon. friends that the people of this country are not looking for secrets to failure they are looking for secrets to success. If any secrets concerning the failure of the railway management are vouchsafed, I am quite satisfied that they will not be adopted by any railway operated under private management.

Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation in saying that I would not for a moment support the Government in any way if I had the assurance that they were going to the country within a few months. But they have given us no such assurance; on the contrary, they have quite plainly signified their intention to hold on until the expiration of their term, which means another two years. During that time they will have squandered another $300,000,000 of the people's money on these railways. With that possibility facing us I think it is the duty of every citizen of Canada to try to find a solution for this serious problem; not that I want to assist the Government particularly, but because I am anxious to do what I can to help the people of Canada. We ought to have a committee with the fullest possible powers to send not only for railway experts but for people from the business world whose opinions and advice might be of assistance. The committee, I think, should be given power to send for any person whom they might desire to consult; if they are restricted in any way we cannot hope for any results.

Every one will agree that the Government are still trying to deceive the people, and I believe they have no intention of attempting to solve the problem. It is ridiculous to say that the committee should not cross-examine the management and ask them questions relating to any phase of the railway situation. The management must come and ask for money, and the Government should want some reason and some explanation as to how that money is to be spent. If the management refuse to answer that question, then the Government should refuse to give the money; for the people have taken the stand that no moneys should be spent on the railways except under parliamentary control. The Minister of Finance said that we had not asked for the report of the Railway Board. I do not think the report has been tabled this year. Am I right?

Hon. Mr. REID: I laid on the table of the House the annual report of the Minister of Railways, which contains the annual report of the board up to December, 1919. The other report, up to December 31, 1920, has not yet been laid on the Table because it takes some months to get all the figures together. It will be tabled in the course of a few days.

Mr. CAHILL: The Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) then, was wrong if, according to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid), the report has not yet been laid on the Table.

Hon. Mr. REID: It will be tabled in a week or so.

Mr. CAHILL: But in the meantime we have not had an opportunity of perusing it. Now, the Minister of Finance also said that we did not ask questions last year regarding the management. We attempted then to ask questions on that subject, but the invariable answer of the Minister of Railways was that it was not in the public interest. He would not give us any answers; he always gave the stock reply, "it is not in the public interest." Now they propose to appoint a committee the majority of whom will be supporters of the Government, and the result will be that any information will be blocked. It is the duty of the Opposition to ask for information, as it is the duty of the Government to give that information or take the responsibility for refusing it. The Government intimated that they would like assistance in this matter. Well, we are willing to lend them assistance if they will lay their cards on the table, play square, and give us a committee that will have full authority to investigate the very matters in regard to which the minister asks for advice. If they do not do that, I cannot see how they can ask the Opposition to offer suggestions or give assistance to help them out of the hole in which they find themselves.

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways): I shall say just a few words on this question. At the outset, I must say that the Government have made an honest attempt to keep the operation of the railways out of politics, but this amendment, to my mind, would have no other effect than to put the whole subject back again into that sphere.

Mr. VIEN: In what way?

Hon. Mr. REID: Well, it is an omnibus resolution intended to embarrass the administration of the railways and to throw the whole thing back into politics. The Government are now submitting a resolution, and if hon. gentlemen desire to help the situation, let them consider the different matters contained in that resolution, and after full investigation of them the committee can come back, if they so desire, and ask for powers to go further.

Mr. MURPHY: Does the minister say that the Government will enlarge the scope of the subject to be submitted to the committee?

Hon. Mr. REID: I say that the committee can bring in their report to the House and ask for authority to deal with further questions if they want to. That has been done many times.

Mr. MURPHY: And voted down.

Hon. Mr. REID: It has been done several times, and no one knows it better than the hon. member himself. Now, the leader of the Opposition, in my opinion, has endeavoured to convey to the public the impression that the Government have been refusing to answer almost every question that has been asked since they undertook the control of the railways. But if hon. members will be good enough to consult Hansard they will discover that during the last two or three years, or since the railways were taken over, the only questions in regard to which information has been withheld are those in connection with which it has been felt that disclosure of the facts would not be in the interests of the operation of the roads, and therefore of the public. If this committee is appointed I am satisfied that the management will be able to explain the reasons why that information should not be given. Why not let them go to the committee and explain just why it is not in the public interest to answer those particular questions. After hearing their views it will then be for the committee to decide whether the information should be given or not. I am satisfied that if the management appeared before that committee and expressed their views in regard to many questions that are put on the Order Paper, even the interrogators themselves would admit that those questions were not fair, bearing in mind the effect and disclosures sought would have on the proper and efficient operation of the system, and therefore were not in the public interest. That is one reason why I am most anxious to have this committee appointed—in order to demonstrate to the committee itself, as well as to the public, that we are justified in taking the position that there are questions which should not be answered.

There is another impression that the remarks of the leader of the Opposition would be likely to create in the minds of some people. It is, that since these railways have come under the control of the Government no information whatever has been given to Parliament with respect to their operation. That impression is an erroneous one because the annual report of the Department of Railways brought down last year, as well as the annual report tabled this year gives details of the operations not only of the system as a whole, but also of each particular branch of it.

The total earnings and the total expenditures are set out in that report as well as many other details. As regards the Intercolonial it is as complete a report of the operations and expenditures, under the respective heads, as was ever given. The Auditor General's Report gives very full details of the operation of the Intercolonial system. Hon. gentlemen will find there exact details of the amount paid to every single individual employed on it. His name appears there, the amount paid to him, and what it was for. But several volumes equally large would be required to give all the details of the expenditures on a system of railway comprising 23,000 miles. It may be that the committee will decide that that should be done. If they come to that conclusion they can report to Parliament and their recommendation can be carried out. But what I had in mind was this: A blue book is laid on the table, just the same as in the case of the report of the Department of Railways, setting forth the details of the operations of the whole Government Railway System—the Canadian Northern, the Intercolonial, the Transcontinental, and all the branch lines. If the leader of the Opposition desired any further information he could have asked that this report be referred to one of the committees of the House, and we should then have seen whether any information had been refused by the Government. Now, when the Estimates of my department were under consideration in Committee of the Whole last year I presented all the information that was desired with respect to it—I never refused any information that was asked for. I do not think there is any hon. member but will corroborate that statement.

Mr. CAHILL: What about insurance?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: What about coal?

Mr. CAHILL: No, let us take the question of insurance first.

Hon. Mr. REID: My hon. friend apparently does not want the coal question answered, but I would say to the hon. gentleman who put the question, that if he will turn to page 4252, of Hansard of last year, he will see there a detailed statement containing the names of those from whom coal was bought for every part of this system, the number of tons that were purchased, and the price that was paid. Last year an hon. gentleman also wanted information about ties. Well, a reference to page 4251 of the same volume will show that full information was given on that subject also. Let me quote what was then said:

Mr. Cahill: I want to find out who the tenderers are, how the contracts are let and to whom they are let. I want to know the number of ties they bought in 1919 and what they paid for them.

Mr. J. D. Reid: On July 21, 1919, tenders were advertised for our requirement of ties for the whole system. We advertised for 1,000,000 ties to be delivered on the Canadian National lines in British Columbia.

In answer to this advertisement we received tenders from twenty-eight firms, the lowest tenders being:

The answer then goes on to give the lowest tenders that were accepted. Now I ask my hon. friends in all fairness, was there any refusal on that occasion to give the information that was sought?

Mr. FOURNIER: Is there information regarding the number of rails that were taken out of the road-bed of the Transcontinental and where they were sent to?

Hon. Mr. REID: I have not now the information before me, but if my hon. friend would like to have it I will certainly get it for him. I have never refused to answer questions of this kind. Yet hon. gentlemen are trying to create the impression in the public mind that the Government are refusing such information. My hon. friends seek to obtain information on transactions that are going on during the present year, and I contend it is not in the public interest that such information should be given except in the manner that was customary prior to our acceptance of office, and when the Intercolonial was the only railway under Government control. That information, however, was given after the annual report had been made and the transactions for the year had been closed.

5 p.m.

Mr. CAHILL: Now, what about the insurance on the railways?

Hon. Mr. REID: Does the hon. gentleman refer to the insurance being placed at the present time?

Mr. CAHILL: No, last year.

Hon. Mr. REID: I was under the impression that I gave the hon. member that information, but perhaps I am mistaken. At any rate I see no reason why we should not tell my hon. friend what insurance there is and where it is placed. Only the other day I was asked what insurance there is on the hotel in Winnipeg. Without any hesitation I told the hon. member who asked the question what the amount of the insurance was, and the names of those with whom it has been placed. I also stated that tenders were called for, and if I did not say so then I wish to say now that public tenders were invited for that insurance and we accepted the lowest tender.

Mr. CAHILL: Has the same plan been adopted all over the system?

Hon. Mr. REID: I am informed by the general manager that wherever it can be followed that system is in force on the Canadian National system, not only as regards insurance but with respect to every article purchased.

Mr. CAHILL: When was that system adopted?

Hon. Mr. REID: So far as I know it has always been the system.

Mr. COPP: May I ask when the tenders for insurance were called?

Hon. Mr. REID: I do not wish to appear discourteous to the hon. member, but I really have not that information. I will be very glad to get it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must remind hon. members that the House is not in committee, and that therefore the questions which are now being asked of the hon. minister are not strictly relevant to the discussion before the House. We are discussing the powers to be given to a committee; we are certainly not discussing the administration of the Canadian National railways.

Mr. VIEN: May I say on that point of order, Mr. Speaker, that the minister affirmed that no information was refused to the House? In that respect he was subject to correction.

Hon. Mr. REID: If I made any statements that the hon. member thinks are not correct, of course he can make any reply he wishes. But the statements that I am making now are absolutely correct. Now, another impression that I would get from the speech of the hon. leader of the Opposition is that he would like it to go out to the public that the loss of $49,000,000 last year was, through interference by the Government increased this year to $70,000,000. If the hon. gentleman wishes to do justice to the operation of the Canadian National railways, in the public interest he should have also stated what he knows himself, for he has had it told him in this House and in the press, that some of the causes for this great increase in the deficit were: First, the McAdoo award, which compelled the railways of Canada to further increase the wages of their employees, and that increase being retroactive, the Canadian Government railways, if my memory serves me right, had to pay about $20,000,000 to its employees for the period between the first of May and the first of September,—a period during which there was no possible chance of getting any increased return from traffic, because the increased freight rates took effect only on September 1. Second, there is a very heavy increase in operating costs on account of the greatly enhanced price of fuel; the hon. leader of the Opposition knew this also. Third, during last year the Canadian National railways had to do exactly what the Canadian Pacific railway had to do, that is, increase the expenditure on maintenance, in other words, attend to what is called deferred maintenance; this also the leader of the Opposition knew. We had to expend a very large amount on that account, which, of course, is charged to operation. When those several amounts are taken into account, the reason for the greater deficit is obvious, and but for these additional expenditures the loss in operation would not have been as much this year as for the previous year's operation.

Another impression needs to be corrected. One would think that the taking over of the operation of the Canadian Northern railway means that that railway is losing $70,000,000. But the leader of the Opposition knows that $20,000,000 of that loss is caused by the operation of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and that $7,000,000, for the reason I have given here, is caused by the operation of the Transcontinental; or a total of $27,000,000 of that loss is due to the policy of the leader of the Opposition and his party when they were in power.

Mr. VIEN: Mr. Speaker, may I rise to a point of order in view of the ruling which was given at the beginning of this discussion? I have no objection at all to the minister continuing along that line, but it must be understood that we will be at liberty to follow him. At the very opening of the debate the Speaker ruled that the question of the policy and the history of the national railways, and particularly the question of responsibility for the present conditions, were not to be discussed. The minister is now discussing them. If he desires to do that, well and good, but I think it should be clearly understood that we are to be allowed to follow him along that line.

Hon. Mr. REID: Mr. Speaker, I will promise the hon. member not to trespass any further along that line.

Mr. VIEN: But, Sir, I want it to be clearly ruled that we will be authorized to follow the minister to the same extent so far as we are concerned.

Hon. Mr. REID: Mr. Speaker, I am extremely anxious to have this committee appointed and, if it is necessary, to bring before it every member of the management who understands the railway situation, in the hope that we may find out from them if it is possible to operate our railways in any better way. I am anxious to let this House know, by the management explaining to the committee, why it is not in the interests of our national railway system, and, therefore, of the public, that some of the information—and it is only of very limited amount—should be given. I think that the statements about information not being furnished are hardly fair to the management or in the interests of the operation of this system. In every case I have endeavoured to give all the information that any hon. member has requested, unless the management honestly felt that it would not be in the public interest to give it. When we have this committee functioning, I am sure hon. members who are now criticising the management, as well as the Government, for not giving certain information will change their minds, and, instead of creating an impression throughout the country that the operation of the road is not being carried on in the public interest, they will join with us in trying to make it a success. With that co-operation, I am satisfied, the Canadian Northern Railway system, with all its subsidiary companies, will in a few years prove one of the greatest assets we have not only in the development of this country but in bringing down freight rates to the lowest possible point.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve—Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to delay this discussion. I am in favour of the amendment moved by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. I do not understand all this wrangle about the motion in itself and the amendment which has been offered. But it is easy to understand why, under such circumstances, the parliamentary institutions of Canada are falling into disrepute. Facing as we do a problem of such appalling magnitude, it seems to me, Sir, that all parties should unite with a view to seeing that light is freely given to the taxpayers of Canada on this vexed question.

I repeat that I do not understand this wrangle. Here is a motion moved by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen), a motion granting a committee. It is rather involved and restricted in its terms. I hear the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) say: I am quite ready to accept the motion, provided the suggestion of the hon. leader of the Opposition is also accepted. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the two motions which are before you are complete in themselves, so to speak. The Prime Minister grants a special committee to investigate railway matters but restricts its powers, and the leader of the Opposition, by his motion, offers to widen the scope of the inquiry. I object to the action of Parliament being restricted in any way in connection with this proposed investigation. No one, so far has averred that there is anything sinister behind it. For my part, I know the general manager and president of the Canadian National Railways, and speaking with a sense of at least some responsibility I have nothing to reproach Mr. Hanna. I will go further and say that under the circumstances under which he was handed the management of our railway system, he was perhaps the only man available. I do not see, therefore, what there is to fear from the investigation. I do not like the style adopted by the right hon. Prime Minister in his motion. It is much too involved; and the scope of the investigation too much restricted. Why all this mystery, Mr. Speaker? What the people expect is a full investigation in order that we may know how we can get out of the terrible muddle in which we find ourselves. I agree, therefore, with the attitude taken this afternoon by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's; I support the principle of the motion of the Prime Minister, but the powers of the committee are not wide enough, and I accept the principle involved in the amendment, that of affording to Parliament all facilities necessary to a full inquiry.

Mr. Speaker, the House must face the issue squarely. The time has gone by when parties could play politics with such a grave situation; for my part, I do not intend to do so. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) had to confess the other day that he was face to face with a deficit of $70,000,000 in respect of the government-owned railways, and one of the best informed heads of his department came out in the press next day stating that the real deficit is $138,000,000. This is a serious gap, and how can we know who speaks the truth in the matter and who does not? We have, as I said the other day, become so accustomed to dealing in millions and even billions during recent years that we have lost all sense of proportion. But the people are beginning to feel the pinch, and they are clamouring for a halt in that carnival of expenditure. It is useless for any hon. member on either side to re-open old sores. It is of no avail to use the old argument: You are another. Having sat in the House for twenty-five years, I am, with others, partly responsible for the situation in which the country finds itself to-day as regards the railway question, and I do not wish to shirk my responsibility. If I have erred, Mr. Speaker, I wish to improve matters. But in order to improve matters, we must find a solution—How shall we solve the problem if not by the experience and the wisdom of those experts who will be heard before the committee? But let us vest in that committee the necessary authority to examine thoroughly the books, the correspondence, the orders and the management generally of the whole system. Is that a fair attitude to take? I think it is.

I say further that Parliament must not only save the railway system of Canada; it must above all save the credit of the nation—for the national credit is involved in the solution of this problem. Why should not the Prime Minister, with all his ability and his undoubted courage—why should he not, as they say in England, "take the bull by the horns" and give this committee the fullest powers? What can we learn with such restricted powers as are outlined in this motion? If he maintains the attitude which he has taken, what will be the result of the investigation? A committee will be appointed composed of members from both sides of the House, and with the restriction of the scope of the inquiry there will be a lack of unanimity. The committee will submit a minority as well as a majority report. This will not be because either side refuse to shed light upon the subject, but because they will be prevented by the very wording of the motion itself from inquiring fully into the administration of the railway system. Mr. Speaker, it is imperative that we should secure a unanimous report from that committee. It should be composed of the best men on both sides of the House. I exclude myself at once; I have but limited knowledge on railway matters. But the committee should be selected from the most experienced men in the ranks of the three parties, men who know and who can speak with authority. I am not afraid to trust hon. members on both sides if you give them the necessary power to probe this whole situation.

Just now, the situation is very much embroiled. You do not meet two men on the street, but they will at once ask you: "What are you going to do with the railway problem and where is Canada drifting?" You have only to throw up your hands, to shrug your shoulders; you do not know what will be or what can be done. My right hon. friend has accepted the idea propounded in this House by the senior hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean), and he has granted at last a committee with a view to disentangle the problem. Why not do at once the right thing? Why not give that committee all the powers which Parliament has undoubtedly the right to grant? Parliament, we all know, is defined by the authorities as being the great inquest of the nation. I trust the wisdom, the patriotism of members on both sides of the House; I trust their good judgment, their loyalty to Canada, and I say that to give that committee the widest powers would not imperil the railway situation, as my right hon. friend seems to fear it would.

As I read to-day press reports from the other side, I hang my head in shame. When I see the bondholders of the Grand Trunk congregating at the various banking institutions in London, clamouring for their dividends and the rumour being spread throughtout Great Britain that Canada will not pay, I say that I hang my head in shame. This is the first time in the history of Canada that it is said, with some semblance of authority, that Canada does not meet her obligations. Do you not believe, Sir, that if the amendment of the leader of the Opposition is voted down if that committee is not given the widest powers, people in England, and in the United States will say: "Canada by its Government wishes to dodge the issue; does not face it squarely; there is something so rotten that the public must not know the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth." I say again: Give the widest powers to that committee.

Remember, Mr. Speaker, that there is no sentiment in business, and that capital is easily frightened. Remember that if in 1849, the captains of industry in Canada were shaken in their faith in their country, it was because they realized that there was no sentiment in business. Let not the faith of the Canadian people be shaken in their institutions, if you wish to maintain this country as it has been maintained in the past. Sir, I am reminded, whilst we are witnessing in this chamber, the wrangle about the scope of the inquiry on the most momentous issue that has ever confronted the Canadian people, of the words of that great French orator at the time of the revolution, when to avoid a financial collapse, the states general were deliberating the urgency of levying a quarter of the national wealth of France: "Bankruptcy is at your door, and you are still deliberating." Far be it from me the thought that bankruptcy is at the door, but we are in a very serious crisis. We are facing the most complex situation that has ever confronted Canada, and when we are asking that the whole matter be probed to the bottom and a way found out of this trouble honourably for the credit of the country and to alleviate the burden of the tax payers we are stopped by a motion, involved, restricted in its terms. This is not the proper way to settle this difficulty. Again, I appeal to my right hon. friend to amend his motion, have it adopted unanimously by the House of Commons, then strike the strongest committee possible, go to work and thus relieve public anxiety.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, the motion moved by the leader of the Government (Mr. Meighen) and the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) have, at any rate, this much in common, that they both propose reference to a committee, of matters relating to our Canadian National Railways and our Canadian Government Merchant Marine. In the discussion that took place in this House a few days ago upon a motion moved by the leader of the Opposition, I took the ground that the floor of Parliament was not the place to receive answers to questions relating to every detail of the administation of our national railways or merchant marine, nor was it the place in which to move for Orders for Returns in regard to any particular phase of the business or administration of those enterprises. At that time, I took the position that, in my judgment, the whole matter should be referred to a committee with power to make to this Parliament such recommendations as it saw fit. The reasons for that position to some degree at any rate, I think I made clear at that time. If we are to have brought down in this House returns that will bring up discussions, going into every aspect of detail of the administration of those great enterprises to which this country is committed, I can see no possibility of securing efficient or successful management, for this reason, if for no other, that no self-respecting man, who has the capacity properly and adequately to manage those enterprises, will sit down under the cross-fire of debate in this House where, for political reasons, in the expectation possibly of political gain by either side of this House, his administration may be challenged, may be criticized, and he has not the power, nor the opportunity to make explanation or defence. No self-respecting management will submit to that, and consequently, the first essential, if we are to secure the efficiency in management which those enterprises require, is that we free the management from that possibility. But when I took that position, I took also the position that the matter should be referred to a committee and the opportunity given for full inquiry.

If I may refer again to what I was saying a moment ago, discussion of these details across the floor of this House will lead in itself to no useful purpose, nor give any effective aid to the solution of this question. Take the Canadian Pacific Railway, the best managed road for its size in the world, at the present time,—I think that claim can be made without fear of successful contradiction. But if you place the management of the Canadian Pacific Railway in the position that every detail of its business, every contract entered into, every purchase made, every station-house built, and the case of every man dismissed on the system, can be reviewed in Parliament, the efficiency that now exists in that corporation would not last for twenty-four hours. The railway would go down. Consequently, we must clear ourselves from this disability in the consideration of this great question. Now at the time I took the position I did, on the occasion of the resolution introduced by the leader of the Opposition, my hon. friend asked me a very definite question. He said:

Mr. Mackenzie King: The hon. gentleman has intimated to the House that he is favourable to the resolution standing in the name of my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean) which is that these matters might be referred to a select committee. Is it my hon. friend's understanding in that connection that such a committee shall have the right to ask any questions with respect to these railways that may be thought in the public interest and have it answered?

Mr. Crerar: If I am in order in answering the question, Mr. Speaker, I would say that I certainly think so.

Having taken that position, I find myself now faced with the question of deciding between the motion moved by the leader of the Government, and the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition. The motion moved by the leader of the Government undoubtedly restricts the inquiry in some degree. I think that is clear. The difference between the motion and the amendment moved by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition lies in this, that the amendment of the leader of the Opposition embraces a wider scope of inquiry than the reference in the motion moved by the leader of the Government. Now, it does seem to me that when this matter is referred to the committee, it would be wise to give the committe power to inquire into any phase or aspect of the business that in its judgment may be deemed advisable, and I understand that this is the purpose of the amendment moved by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. Believing that, I shall support the amendment. In all the discussions we have had on the railways in this House, we have had as yet very little in the nature of constructive suggestions as to how we shall overcome the difficulties that face us in reference to this business of railways and shipping. My hon. friend from St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) who spoke the other evening, did in my opinion offer a few constructive suggestions. I would like to see this committee when it gets to work, consider this question solely from the point of view of the national interest. Let us, if we can, drop all partisan spirit in connection with this matter. The criticism I have to offer, if I may offer it here now to my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, is this, that while he has criticised a great deal so far, he has offered no constructive suggestions as to how this serious problem can be solved. If I may take the liberty of saying so, my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition runs some danger of leaving the impression on the country that he is more concerned with making political capital out of this problem than he is with finding a solution for it. I do hope, Sir, that when the committee come to consider this matter, they will approach it free from any spirit of that kind.

There are a great many matters that have to be settled in connection with the national railways. I shall not at this moment, because I do not think I should be strictly in Order to do so, attempt to discuss them, but when I face this fact, that last year our national railways lost $49,000,000, that this year the taxpayers of Canada are called upon to put up $70,000,000 to make good the fixed charges and operating deficit on the national roads, when I contemplate, as was indeed mentioned in this House the other evening that the loss for the coming year may be even greater, I am impressed with the gravity of the situation. To my mind the solution of this railway problem constitutes one of the greatest problems that this country has been called upon to solve in the last fifty years, and it cannot be solved unless it is approached by all with the single-minded purpose of finding the best solution of it. It must be approached as a business proposition. We are called upon to pay in Federal taxes in this country $582,000,000, for that is the amount the Government have placed in the Estimates now before Parliament, and there are still the Supplementary Estimates to be brought down; I venture to say that if the total burden of taxation on the Canadian people could be estimated—I have made no close estimate of it, because I have not had the facilities for doing so—I think it would be found that for federal, provincial, municipal, and school purposes the Canadian people are to-day paying little less than $1,000,000,000 a year. On top of that, we have annually to send out of this country from $225,000,000 to $250,000,000 for interest on investments in Canada from abroad. When we take all these facts into consideration, we cannot escape the gravity of the situation. I do hope that the members who compose this committee, when they get to work, will sit down with the single-minded purpose of finding the best possible solution for this question. And if they do, they can find it. There is no question so difficult that it cannot be solved, but this question can only be solved if we approach it with the high purpose and in the spirit which I am convinced the Canadian people are demanding of this Parliament to-day.

Right hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (King's, N.S.): Mr. Speaker, I regard this motion which has been proposed by the Prime Minister as a very important one, but not altogether for the reasons which have been advanced by some hon. members who have addressed the House. There has been from time to time, especially during the present session, the question raised as to the amount and character of information with respect to the operation and management of the Canadian National system of railways that ought to be afforded to the House of Commons in the public interest. I think every hon. gentleman who has addressed the House has realized that this is a question of very considerable concern not only to this Parliament but to the people of this country. The hon. member (Mr. Crerar) who has just addressed the House spoke in that sense the other day, and again this afternoon. I entirely agreed with the view which he expressed on both occasions, that if you are to drag the details of management of this system of railways into the discussions of this Parliament in every conceivable way, or even into the discussions of a committee of this House appointed for this purpose, you would not only place the operation of the system under a very grave handicap, but also find it exceedingly difficult to obtain a man with the requisite ability at the head of the management.

The next thing I have to say as to the position taken by my hon. friend the member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) is this: He apparently is of the opinion that you ought to be able to do immediately in committee what, according to his own judgment, it would not be proper to do in the House of Commons. But I should like to remind him that if you once make these matters the property of a committee of this House you make them at once the property of the House itself, and every question which in his judgment ought not to be raised in this House would naturally come before the House, for the reason that it would have been raised and investigated by the committee. Therefore, I am disposed to think, with all respect, that the position which he took the other day in the House was the correct one, although not altogether consistent with the position he has taken to-day.

I regard this committee as of the highest possible importance. It is in the first place to define a principle which will be for the guidance not only of this Parliament but perhaps of other parliaments in the years to come. It is to define a principle according to which the Government of the day will be relieved from the invidious position of saying that this information may be accorded because it is in the public interest but that some other information shall not be accorded because it is not in that interest. I am sure my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) made it clear, both the other day and to-day, that he does not regard it as right or proper that the Government of this country should be the sole judge in that respect; and I certainly understood, when this motion was proposed the other day, and further, when it was moved this afternoon, that the purpose of the committee was not in the first place to make an investigation, but was, first of all, to define a principle, and thereafter the committee would proceed to make its investigation according to the principle so stated and fixed. It seems to me that the public interest would be perfectly and absolutely guarded if that were carried out, and it can certainly be carried out under the resolution as proposed by the right hon. the Prime Minister. But for the moment I am at a loss to see how it could be carried out if the House were to adopt the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). That amendment is based upon a principle, stated very frankly by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), that every item and every detail with regard to the operation of the Canadian National system of railways shall be brought up, and if necessary taken up in the House.

Mr. FIELDING: Will the right hon. gentleman permit me to interrupt him? I did not state that they should necessarily be brought up, or taken up in the House. I pointed out that in respect of other departments we did not bring such matters up unless some emergency arose.

Mr. McMASTER: They "may" be brought up.

Mr. FIELDING: Certainly they may be brought up.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: "May" be?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I suppose it is hardly worth while to confer upon a committee a power which it is not intended that that committee shall exercise. If we are to give power to the committee, our action to that end is surely in vain if the committee is not to exercise that power. It is intended that the committee shall exercise the power given it, and, moreover, it would be its duty so to do. I therefore venture to think that the proposal presented to the House by the Prime Minister is along right and sane lines, namely, to confer upon the committee, in the first instance, the power and duty to establish a principle as to the information which may properly be brought down in the public interest, and then, having dealt with that question, to come to the House if need be for such further powers as will ensure that principle being carried into effect. So far as I am concerned, I propose to support the resolution which has been moved by the Prime Minister and to vote against the amendment proposed by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, for the reason that the investigation ought not to precede the definition of the extent to which the committee shall go, but that the definition should first be made and then the investigation proceeded with along the line so fixed.

I should like to add one word further. There are many aspersions cast in these days upon the principle of national ownership, and very many gloomy forebodings as to what the future of the Canadian National system of railways will be. The efficient management of the Canadian National Railways will be a test of Canadian democracy, and I have a very confident hope that the spirit and intent of the Canadian democracy will make that management efficient. At the present time it is beyond question that we have a greater railway mileage in this country than our population can very well sustain. We embarked upon a project of three transcontinental railways with a small population—I think the United States had a population of forty millions before they embarked on the project of a second transcontinental line. We have not too great mileage for our area, although it is out of proportion to our population. But is there any hon. gentleman in this House, who has given attentive consideration to the question and who will not reach the conclusion that when our population doubles, when we have eighteen millions of people instead of nine millions, the Canadian National system of railways, if operated intelligently and efficiently, and free from partisan interference in the meantime, will be a great national asset in the years to come? I have no more doubt about that than I have of my own existence, and I hope—in this I echo the words of my hon. friend the member for Marquette—that both sides of the House, all parties in the House, will join in a sincere and earnest effort to give to that great system of railways the efficient, honest and unbiased administration that will make it a national asset of enormous value in the years to come.

At Six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at Eight o'clock.

Mr. THOMAS VIEN (Lotbiniere): Mr. Speaker, when introducing his statement on the financial condition of our railways for the operating year ending 1920 the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) invited suggestions and co-operation from both sides of the House as to the best methods of extricating the system from the difficulties into which it had become involved. But in order to come to his assistance and to render him the help of which he stands so much in need, we require the information which we have sought to obtain by the many questions we have placed on the Order Paper. To some of these questions answers have been forthcoming, but as to the balance we have been refused any information. We have also made other attempts to obtain particulars. A resolution was introduced by the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) to the effect that documents and letters should be produced and witnesses summoned to inform the House in relation to our national railways. Later on the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) introduced a resolution to appoint a committee with full powers to summon witnesses and collect all necessary data. The Government prevailed on the hon. member to withdraw his motion and promised themselves to introduce a resolution for the creation of such a committee as that suggested by him. But, Sir, the resolution which is now the subject matter of this discussion will not fulfil the purpose that the hon. gentleman had in view. Far from giving to the House the required information, this resolution is one of those numerous side-tracking devices of the hon. Minister of Railways to dodge the issue and prevent the information sought from being laid before the House.

We have been accused this afternoon of introducing party politics into this matter. I think, Sir, that no accusation was less deserved by the Opposition. I do not believe there is a single hon. member, and surely not one on this side of the House, who is not desirous of treating this matter on broad national lines with a view to finding the best methods of getting the country out of this serious difficulty. I do not believe there is a single member on this side of the House who is not sincerely anxious to help the Government, and who would not be glad to-day to be able to congratulate the hon. minister on a profitable operation of the road during the past year. But the financial report presented by him is appalling. It shows that we are face to face with a deficit of at least $70,000,000, without taking into account $75,000,00 of bonds issued for the renewal of the rolling stock; and if we are to accept the statements of some of the employees the deficit is really $120,000,000 or $130,000,000. To any lover of his country this distressing situation immediately removes the question from the sphere of party politics. It can be treated only in the light of our national interests. And notwithstanding the taunts that the Opposition has been playing a party game on this great question, I am going to deal with it purely and simply in the light of our national interests.

To my mind, Sir, the crux of the whole question is not whether we shall derive any political gain by discussing it, but whether we can ascertain the best methods of helping the Government to get out of the difficulties in which they have become involved. To help the Government what must we have? We must have full information; the House must be put in possession of all the facts. How can we judge the question otherwise? We sit to-day as a tribunal. We are the representatives of the electors of this country, who are the shareholders of our national railways, and the Minister of Railways, representing in this House the management of the system, has laid before us a financial statement which discloses a tremendous deficit.

Comparisons are made between the national railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway. My hon. friends opposite say that they will not give us any fuller details than the Canadian Pacific Railway management would be willing to give to their shareholders. Sir, the position of the directorate of a company which comes before its shareholders with such a statement as that presented by the Minister of Railways is quite different from that of the directorate of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which has presented to its shareholders a financial statement showing a substantial surplus on the year's operations, the result of sound and progressive management. Were the minister in a position to lay before us a financial statement similar to that of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the House and the people might congratulate him and rest assured that the administration of the railways was of a satisfactory character. But the conditions are very different. I do not believe that the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific would be satisfied with the manner in which that road was managed if the directorate laid before them a financial statement similar to that submitted by the Minister of Railways. I think they would require some information; I think they would press the directorate for fuller details than those which have been submitted to us. But when the Government refused to the House the other day the information of which it was in need, public sentiment was aroused; from one end of the country to the other newspapers friendly to the Government took up the question and intimated that such a condition should not prevail; that the Government should lay before the people, through the House of Commons, all information necessary to enable the legislators to find a remedy for the great evil which existed.

The right hon. gentleman has felt the pulse of public opinion. He says to-day: I am desirous that all information that is required shall be laid on the Table, but there is some information which we cannot give, which it would be against the national interest to make public; therefore we will appoint a committee and instruct it to make inquiries as to what information should be made available to the House.

This committee will not be instructed to call witnesses in respect to the management of the railway. The Minister of Justice, answering that point, says that they will. Well, paragraph 4 of the resolution says that the committee shall have the right to examine witnesses under oath, to send for persons, papers and records and to report from time to time. Sir, for an hon. gentleman who was several years on the bench and who is to-day Minister of Justice of Canada, I think his legal interpretation of the resolution is not to be commended. I am sure that the right hon. gentleman did not read the resolution aright. I am sure that he did not deliberately attempt to lead the House into error. But he did make an error. The reference as it reads on the Order Paper does not assign to the committee the duty of investigating the management of the Canadian National railways; they will be entitled to summon witnesses and call for papers, but only on such questions as may involve the determination of what information concerning the Canadian National railways and shipping should be furnished to the House. It is quite clear that the committee will not investigate the management of the Canadian National railways. It will simply report to the House what information the House should seek, and as has been suggested by one of the ministers, if the actual information is to be obtained by the committee, a further step will have to be taken to that end by the grant of further powers. The method adopted by the Government is the surest method of avoiding what they want to avoid, the laying before Parliament of any information whatever. The committee will sit from time to time. Their investigation may be quite protracted. After they have sat for months; after the Government have passed all their Estimates and have advanced their legislation to a sufficient degree, the committee will lay on the Table a report advising the House to seek such and such information. Then a full discussion will take place in the House as to what further reference should be made to that committee, and after another protracted discussion the committee will be instructed to summon witnesses and obtain further information—but by that time prorogation will be at hand. I am afraid, therefore, that the information which we now require to enable us to form a sound judgment upon the question before the House will not be forthcoming during the present session. Sir, if the Government are absolutely sincere in their purpose they should not hesitate to accept the proposal of the leader of the Opposition. If they really want to lay the required information before the House during this session, now is the time to refer the matter to the proposed committee and to give them such powers as will enable them to collect the information. Under the method adopted by the Government, however, such a course will be impossible.

In discussing the resolution this afternoon, two words fell from the lips of the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) which made clearer the real purpose underlying the resolution now before the House. He said: "Information was sought and we refused it; we take fully responsibility for doing so." But mark his following words. "But not to appear arbitrary we now propose this committee." What did the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) say? He said: "Before this committee we will bring the management who will say why the information should not be given." You have there in two words the whole principle underlying the policy of the Government in presenting that resolution. The Minister of Finance says: "We refuse the information; we take the responsibility of that refusal; but to save appearances, not to appear arbitrary, we propose a committee to report on what information will be given." Then the Minister of Railways says: "We will bring the management of the Canadian National Railways before the committee to say why the information should not be given." Therefore, the committee, after it has concluded its work, will not be in a position to give such information to the House. Is it not a farce to treat such a serious matter in such a light way? If the committee were armed with full powers, it could judge what information the management should lay before the House. Why not entrust it with that work? As the right hon. member for King's (Sir Robert Borden) said, we now instruct the committee to lay down the principles which will direct the operations of this House in respect of our Canadian National railways. If we can instruct a committee to lay down the principles which will direct our deliberations on such an important matter, why should we not entrust it with the work of collecting this information. This committee would be non-partisan; it would be, I am sure, willing to give to the Government all possible assistance and to collect such information as would enable the House to judge soundly and fairly the big questions which are at present involved. We knew that information was not forthcoming. The Minister of Railways, who is very busy at present—

Hon. Mr. REID: I am listening to every word.

Mr. VIEN: I hope so.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: With only one eye open.

Mr. VIEN: Not with both ears anyway.

Hon. Mr. REID: Yes, with both ears, and I have my eyes open at the same time.

Mr. VIEN: The Minister is really a marvel; he says that he can listen to two members at the same time. The minister told the House this afternoon that he had refused no information; that he had given an answer to all questions put. Why then should he object to give to the committee which will be entrusted with the work, whatever information that committee may require? But the minister was not accurate in his statement. There were put on the Order Paper quite a few questions which could not be answered. I put some questions that the minister did not answer, and I am going to refer to them. But the greatest fault of the minister is not that he did not answer some questions; other questions he answered, but did not answer correctly. Of the two, I do not know which I prefer—his refusal to answer questions or the incorrectness of the answers that he gave. I put on the Order Paper this question by which I was trying to obtain some information as to financial results per division:

1. How many divisional points are there on the Government railways, and what are their names.
2. In each of the said divisional points, during 1919 and 1920, what were gross receipts, the operating costs, and the surplus or deficit?

This was a pertinent question. The Minister of Finance this afternoon complained of the fact that we did not inquire as to the cause of the deficit. My question was in relation thereto; in an endeavour to find out where the deficit came from, I tried to obtain from the minister the results by divisions. In answer he said:

Railway accounting does not provide for earnings being shown for each divisional point.

My information was to the contrary. I went back to my informant, because I had seen financial statements so drawn, and my informant said: "Well, you were wrong in your question; a divisional point is purely and simply the chief place of a division." For instance, Fraserville is the chief place or divisional point of one division. The same is true of Rivière du Loup. Parent is a divisional point, and "the old foxy minister," my informant said, "took advantage of the form of your question, and he did not answer because you asked the financial statement for each divisional point. Put your question otherwise." I did so; I put my question in this way:

1. How many divisions, or operating divisions,—

So that the matter might be quite clear to the minister.

—are there on the Canadian National railways, and what are their names?
2. What was the result of operations for each of the said divisions in 1919 and 1920?

I was not more lucky. The answer was this:

Railway accounting does not provide for receipts, expenses, surplus or deficits being shown by divisions.

The minister is wrong. This is a falsehood. He did not wittingly answer so, but I tell him it is a falsehood. He told me that the accounting was not kept by divisions; I tell him that it is—

[Mr. Vien.]

Hon. Mr. REID: Of course, as the hon. member states, the answer that I gave was that given by the management from the head office. When this committee meets my hon. friend will have the opportunity of getting further information, and I am sure it will be proved to him that my answer was absolutely correct.

Mr. VIEN: I shall prove that it was not.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I hope the hon. member will bear in mind some remarks from the Chair in the earlier stages of this debate. I am sure he will agree with me that there has been no disposition on the part of the Chair unduly to restrict the discussion. I would ask the hon. member to indicate clearly how the line he is now pursuing has reference to the question before the Chair, because obviously it would be inadvisable, inexpedient, and unprofitable to discuss railway problems in general on a motion for a committee.

Mr. VIEN: I have strictly adhered to your ruling, Sir, as laid down at the opening of the discussion. I am following closely on the footsteps of the hon. minister, who said that he had refused no information, and am trying to make clear to the House that he has refused information in some cases, and in others given wrong information. Moreover, Sir, during the time you were replaced in the Chair, the hon. ministers notwithstanding your ruling, trespassed on many grounds on which we did not intend to enter. I would not like their statements to be spread broadcast throughout the country unchallenged, and what I am now trying to do is to challenge some of the statements of the hon. Minister of Railways. I shall try, however, to confine myself closely to one or two points.

There was, to my mind, a very serious condition of affairs in connection with the Canadian National railways in the northern part of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. The condition was this. A number of railway conductors were operating trains in northern Quebec and northern Ontario, running through a country entirely settled with French-speaking people. Most of the passengers on these trains were lumber-jacks, going to and from the camps, and the farming population, most of whom could not speak English. The conductors could not speak French. Moreover, my information was that a considerable number of these conductors were drunk half the time.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: In Ontario?

Mr. VIEN: In northern Ontario and northern Quebec. I tried to obtain from the minister the names of these conductors, not to intimate to the House that they were drunkards, but so that our information might be complete and be of some assistance in discussing railway matters. From Quebec westward there are a number of stations which have no resident station agents. The result is that the passengers cannot purchase their tickets until they are on the train. Then one of two things happens. Either they pay the conductor on the train when he is drunk and he puts the money in his pocket, or he does not collect the fare at all. My information is that in two specific instances people boarded the Canadian National train at Cochrane and came down to Quebec without having their fares collected, and that in another case the conductor was drunk. So in order to obtain data which would be of some information to the House I put the following question on the Order Paper:

How many railway conductors are employed on the Government railways in Quebec?

The answer was 296. I asked also:

What are their names?

The answer was:

It is not considered to be in the public interest to publish the names of these conductors.

You see my point, Mr. Speaker. The minister said this afternoon that he had never refused any information, but here, in reply to my question, he says that it is not considered in the public interest to publish the names of these conductors. I say that it was in the public interest to know the names of these conductors so that we might find out by personal investigation, as no official information was forthcoming in the House, whether or not these conductors were reliable, and whether or not they should be dismissed. So on these two points it will be seen that the minister did not give full information to the House.

The deficits of which we now complain are due to several conditions. Some of these conditions apply generally to all railways. The general industrial and commercial conditions, for instance, affect the railways in the United States just as they do the railways in Canada, and affect private-owned railways just as they do public-owned railways. Then such factors as increased pay-rolls, and increased cost of material, affect all railways, but these conditions will re-adjust themselves when normal times return. Wages will be re-adjusted, as well as the cost of material, but there is another cause of our deficits which it will be more difficult to remove.

I refer to the question of management, and this also involves the question of state ownership. This question was touched upon slightly this afternoon by the hon. member for King's (Sir Robert Borden), who tried to justify state ownership. It was not our intention to discuss state ownership to-night, but I do not think we should allow his statements to go unchallenged. There are in this country friends of state ownership and there are also enemies of state ownership. The friends of state ownership belong mainly to the western provinces and to the province of Ontario. The other provinces are more conservative in this sense, and are opposed to state ownership. The friends of state ownership, Mr. Speaker, have no greater enemies than those who have introduced the principle into our legislation and those who were entrusted with the management of our national railways. If state ownership had been given a fair trial it is possible that we might have adjusted our national conditions to this new venture; but the management which has operated since the introduction of this policy will make, I think, for the prompt return to private ownership. It was quite easy to forecast that the present situation could not be avoided under the management that was provided for our national railways.

How did this situation come about? The Canadian Northern became insolvent and we took it over and nationalized it; and after that we entrusted the management of the Canadian National railways to the very group of men who had run the Canadian Northern into bankruptcy. They had not been able successfully to manage their own property, but when we took it from their hands as a private concern and assumed all their obligations, we put them in charge of the railways as public property. And that is a point intimately connected with the question now before the House. We want to have full and precise information as to how this group of men came to manage our railways in such a way as to create a deficit of $48,000,000 last year, $70,000,000 this year, and a predicted deficit of $100,000,000 next year. Mr. Speaker, the whole management has been altogether unwise, and no business man in this country could have followed a more foolish course. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) tells us that we shall have a committee before which we shall have the management of the national railways to tell us why the information should not be forthcoming. Of course, they will try to convince Parliament that it is not in the public interest for them to submit any information. They have to hide the ways and means by which these deficits are created, and naturally they will try to prevent any information tending to throw light on the subject from getting to the public knowledge. We want the management of our Canadian National railways to give us, not, as the Minister of Railways says, reasons why information should not be forthcoming, but an account of their stewardship and reasons why they have not managed our railways to better advantage. We want them to give us some satisfactory explanation of the deficits that are making such inroads into the public treasury. All true Canadian patriots are greatly concerned over the state of affairs to-day.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. VIEN: They are very much exercised over conditions, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the senseless laughter I hear on the other side. I see one hon. member laughing. Well, the situation is too desperate for any serious-minded man to indulge in laughter.

9 p.m.

Mr. McMASTER: He does not sit on our side.

Mr. VIEN: The people are worried to see our national heritage being squandered, and stolen, and wrecked, and yet an hon. member can find something in the situation to laugh at. Evidently the facts do not appeal to the hon. gentleman in their true light. However, he has given us the measure of his intelligence and his patriotism. Sir, those Canadians, whose ancestors settled in this country generations ago, and battled with adversity that future generations might have a country in which they could live happily and in prosperity, cannot look with equanimity upon the wreckage of the early hopes of their forefathers. It is painful to see our national heritage jeopardized in this way by the Government, who see nothing wrong in entrusting the management of our railways to the very men who ran their own property into bankruptcy, men who are evidently above Parliament and who can refuse this House the information of which it is badly in need. It is high time that we appointed a committee, not for the purposes of party politics but solely for the national welfare, who will work effectively and devise some policy that might extricate the country from its present difficulties. It is useless appointing a committee merely to report to Parliament as to what information should be sought and what should not. We must appoint a committee armed with powers and able to summon witnesses and conduct a thorough investigation, behind closed doors if necessary, but an investigation that will provide us something as a basis for intelligent discussion and sound legislation. In my opinion the resolution is purely and simply a sham; it is nothing but camouflage and will only serve to distract the attention of the House from the real issue under discussion. It will create a committee whose report will be purely and simply a "whitewash" for the Government, and will preclude this House from getting the information which it badly needs. On these grounds I cannot support the resolution of the Government, and I think that if they were sincere they would gladly welcome the amendment of the leader of the Opposition. For all the reasons I have given I am ready to support the amendment and to vote the resolution down.

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (North Oxford): I have been a strong advocate of the appointment of the proposed committee for some time, although I confess that the reference is not worded exactly as I would have worded it. At the same time it affords the committee an opportunity, especially under the fourth clause, to make a great many inquiries. The annual report of the Board of Management will be laid before the committee, and I am inclined to think that by the time the committee have inquired into its contents they will have gathered a great deal of information. I have no hesitation whatever in thinking that should the committee, when organized, find that the reference restricts their investigations in any way, and they ask the House to enlarge their powers, the House will be very glad to meet their wishes. Whether they will be able to formulate a report satisfactory to themselves will depend upon the information they bring out during the inquiry. I have no doubt whatever that the reference is quite wide enough to enable them to get all the information they require, at any rate to commence with. I am not in favour of appointing counsel for the committee or of bringing traction experts to testify. In the majority of cases traction experts, in my judgment, would talk over the heads of the committee. I take it that the committee will consist of business men selected from both sides of the House, and it is the operation of the national railways that will form the subject of inquiry. The members of the committee will be perfectly competent, in my judgment, to elicit the necessary information without the guidance either of counsel or traction experts. Should this not prove to be the case it will be the easiest thing in the world for the committee to agree that they need legal and technical advice and upon a representation to that effect the House will, no doubt, comply with their wishes.

I have sat on a good many special committees and the experience gained in that way leads me to support the present proposition. Through the medium of a committee information can be obtained very promptly without consuming hours of talk. If the House itself were to undertake to probe the details of the management of the national system of railways, and were to spend an hour or two, or a whole afternoon, in discussing why a station master was dismissed, or why ties were not laid in certain spots at a certain length, or why the management did not buy coal from John Jones in place of Thomas Oliver, or similar questions, Parliament might just as well sit for the whole year, instead of for only a few months. For the reasons I have given I am very much in favour of a committee being appointed, and I am quite sure their deliberations will result in the presentation of information that will be very valuable, even if it does not reduce the deficit on the operations of this railway system, as I hope it will.

I agree with everything that has been said as to the desirability of carrying on the inquiry from a non-partisan standpoint, and I was sorry to hear one hon. member state this afternoon that the appointment of such a committee even under the powers given by the reference, would mean that there would be a majority and a minority report. Personally, I do not think that observation should have been made. In my opinion predictions of that kind should not be indulged in. None of those who are chosen as members of the committee should be influenced by such a spirit as that, because it is useless for hon. gentlemen to become members of this committee if they are going to make up their minds in advance as to what conclusions they shall reach. In my opinion, those hon. gentlemen who are honoured with a seat upon the committee should go to their deliberations with open minds, they should discuss any matters which may come before them in a quiet and businesslike way, and make their report to the House after due consideration. I hope that is the policy that will be followed in this case.

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (George Etienne Cartier): I am in favour of the amendment and intend to vote for it, my reason therefor being that I feel it is something that will appeal to the people of this country, whereas the resolution of the Prime Minister cannot appeal to any person who has made a study of the railway and shipping problem as it presents itself to-day in Canada. The resolution has, to my mind, been rendered ineffective at the very moment of its birth. No matter what conclusion is arrived at it is not going to give satisfaction, because it appears to me to be something which is made purely for the purpose of shelving the important question now before the House. For instance, the first clause of this resolution states that the proposed committee will inquire into:

> What information as to operation of Canadian National railways and shipping as conducted by the Board of Directors and Management should, in the public interest, be brought down in Parliament on Questions, Motion for Production of Papers, or otherwise.

What information should be brought down to Parliament? I ask myself how the people outside are going to view this highly important question. What information should be brought down to Parliament on "questions, motion for production of papers, or otherwise?" I venture to say that not one person outside really knows what that means. To parliamentarians, of course, it simply means that the Government is asking a committee of this House to tell them what they ought to do. The Government practically abdicates its functions and asks a committee—the majority of whom will be from their side of the House—to tell them what they shall do. Well, Mr. Speaker, water never rises above its own level. How is it possible that this committee, the creatures of the Government, can tell the Government what information shall be brought down to Parliament "on question, motion for production of papers, or otherwise"? The second paragraph says:

> When, by what method, and under what conditions, if any, should such information be given,—

"If any." That is simply placing a fence around the committee before any question is submitted to it at all. And I ask again what the people outside the House will think of that. The third paragraph reads:

What system of auditing should be adopted, and what extent of detail should be given in the Annual Report.

I feel like saying, as did a celebrated character in Shakespeare, "A plague on both your houses." What does the public care about auditing and the extent of detail of the report? They will look at what is called the "demnition total." They will not care what system of auditing has been adopted. Then the fourth and final paragraph:

Whether and for what purposes the said committee should be continued, and that for the above purposes and for such other purposes as the committee deem in the public interest there be referred to said committee the Annual Report of the Board of Directors.

Just imagine! We have the annual report of the Board of Directors before us now, but we are still in Egyptian darkness with regard to the entire situation. Yet we expect that a committee which we are going to appoint—is going to study the annual report of the Board of Directors and tell us what we shall do! Well, my experience of the annual report of any board of directors is that usually it is a recital of what the board does not do rather than of what it does. We have the annual report of the Board of Directors here, we have a Government, at the head of which is one of the most astute and agile minds in the country, and we know something at least about auditing and details,—and yet this is what the committee are going to study! In my opinion we have wasted an entire day of valuable time at a considerable cost to this country, and we have arrived nowhere.

Now, this amendment which is proposed by the leader of the Opposition contains something constructive. It reads:

That such committee shall have power to inquire into all matters in any way relating to the railways owned or controlled by the Government of Canada whether under the direction of the Department of Railways and Canals or under any corporation in which the Government are stockholders, whether relating to the construction or operation, from the date of the appointment by the Government of the Board of Directors of the Canadian Northern Railway Company down to the present time; and similarly to inquire into all matters in any way connected with the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, either in respect of the construction or operation of the ships, and that such committee shall have power to send for papers, persons, and records, to engage counsel—

[Mr. Jacobs.]

That appeals to me.

—and transportation experts, and to make such reports and recommendations from time to time as, in their judgment, will be calculated to promote the public interest.

Put these two documents side by side, the proposed resolution and the amendment, and ask yourself, Mr. Speaker, which will appeal to the man in the street, to the people outside—because, after all they are the people who pay the piper, and surely they have a right to call the tune. I venture to say that if any hon. member on the other side of the House were to back up this resolution on the hustings proposed by the Prime Minister and ask that it be preferred to the amendment, he would be considered a candidate for a lunatic asylum. There is no comparison between the two. One proposes to do something constructive, to get at the root of the trouble, to explain to the public what is the difficulty; and the other is a sterile resolution which, as far as I can judge, appears to have been drawn by the hon. Minister of Justice—I recognize his hand.

We are told, and told rather seriously, that it is not in the public interest that everything should be known in regard to the operation and management of these two enterprises. When a person is sick and goes to a physician, he tells the physician what it is that he is suffering from, and the physician then diagnoses his case and prescribes the remedy. But suppose the patient were to say to the physician, "I suffer from this, that and the other thing but I also suffer in another way, and I cannot tell you what it is because I feel that you may possibly lose confidence in me and not consider me to be such a gentleman as you thought me before, for telling you what I am suffering from." How is it possible, Mr. Speaker, to diagnose a case and prescribe the necessary medicine unless you know what the patient is suffering from? Yet our friends on the opposite side of the House tell us: "We will only let you have such information as in the public interest we can let you have." What is the public interest in this case? The public interest is the interest of the public in this country, the men who pay this $70,000,000 or $80,000,000 a year deficit, and who are going probably to have to pay $100,000,000 next year; they are the people who form the public, and they are interested in knowing all the facts. The public interest, as I understand from this resolution, is that of the management of the national railways. Apparently it is feared that some information may come out which may not be favourable to the management; they are the people who want to save their skins.

Now, I challenge my hon. friends on the opposite side of the House to give me one instance of what they consider would be damaging to the public if it came out in the investigation before this committee. What is this insidious trouble that is preventing the Government from bringing it before the public? We are the public, we represent the public, and we say we are satisfied to know what it is all about. We want to know what the difficulty is. We care not at all about the interests of the management of the system; we want to know what it is that this line is suffering from which results in such enormous deficits every year. I challenge the Government again to tell me what possible item could there be which might not be in the public interest if it came out. My hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) says that the Canadian Pacific may copy our methods! As we say in French, C'est pour rire; or in English, it is to laugh. As my hon. friend from Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) said toéday, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company copy the secrets of success, they never copy the secrets of failure. What is there in the Canadian National Railway system which if to-day given out to the public would enure to the advantage of the Canadian Pacific Railway or any other company or person?

When a person is suffering from the dread disease of tuberculosis, Mr. Speaker, the doctor prescribes sunshine and fresh air, and that is what you want here. We are suffering from hemorrhages at the rate of $70,000,000, and we want sunshine and fresh air to cure us. Nothing, Mr. Speaker, was ever accomplished in the way of a public enterprise by hole-in-the-corner methods. These gentlemen on the other side are merely temporary stewards of the affairs of this country; they are here to-day and to-morrow they will be elsewhere. But the people are here all the time, and they are demanding in no uncertain tones that a full investigation be made into the affairs of these enterprises, in order that they may ascertain whether it is possible to stop this ensanguination; whether it is possible to get these government lines on the proper track in the same way as other successful lines.

Will the Government tell me in what possible way we can be in a worse position than we are to-day? It is declared by those on the other side who are supposed to know that the public interest would not be served if certain information was brought out. Well, even if it were brought out, would the result be the loss of more than seventy or eighty millions a year? Should we lose then ninety millions a year? I say that it would be well if we lost one hundred millions a year if the result would be to enable us to put a finger on the sore spot and obtain some relief from the situation.

The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar)—I do not see him in the House this evening—took high moral ground this afternoon. He spoke words of wisdom, and his manner of uttering them was such as a statesman would be supposed to employ in the delivering of weighty opinions. He told us that he had a complaint, not against the Government who were charged with the responsibility of the operation of these railways and who are the chief offenders in this matter, but against the leader of the Opposition. He complained that the leader of the Opposition had put before the House no constructive suggestion in regard to the operation of these two Government enterprises. Well, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that he should not have passed so lightly over the head of the Prime Minister, who, after all, is the most serious offender in this matter. How is it that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Railways threw themselves on the mercy of the country when in the House a few days ago they told us they were willing to receive suggestions from any and all sources in regard to the operation of these Government enterprises? Was that a constructive policy, Mr. Speaker? Why did the hon. member for Marquette not deem it necessary to advert to this so-called constructive policy on the part of the Government? Then, strange to relate, the hon. member passed over himself, the leader of a party which, though not yet great, is potentially great, a party which at least hopes to be great and hopes very shortly to be seated on the other side. That is a very noble ambition; I am sure that many of the people are of the opinion that anything would be better than the aggregation we have on the Government benches at the moment. Well, the hon. member for Marquette did not suggest any constructive policy. He did say a few weeks ago, when he was discussing this subject that the only solution of the problem now before the country was to revalue the assets of the national railways. That was the constructive policy which the Agrarian party put forward. Well, what is the use of revaluing this property? What purpose would be served? I venture to say that if it were suggested that a provision for the revaluation of the property should be inserted in this resolution, the Prime Minister would not allow it to go in, on the ground that it is not in the public interest that a revaluation should be made. The only ostensible reason why the property should be revalued at the moment is that we might make it enticing to some party or syndicate who would went to purchase it on the basis of that revaluation. Does my hon. friend from Marquette want to sell out so soon to a private syndicate? It is only a few months since the whole of the aggregation sitting close to us—but not of us—were proclaiming in the loudest tones that the only salvation of this country was public ownership. Now the leader of their party states that he wants a revaluation of the lines. This is his constructive policy, and then he puts it up to the leader of the Opposition to declare the constructive policy of the Liberal party in this regard. Now, I have a great regard for the leader of the Opposition. I have followed him and I hope to follow him for some considerable time. But I am not prepared to say that he is a superman, and it would certainly require more than an ordinary human being to bring some order out of the chaos which at present prevails, at least until we have before us such facts and figures and such information as would be brought out by a committee operating as the leader of the Opposition suggests. "Are you guilty or not guilty?" asks the magistrate of a prisoner in the dock. The prisoner replied: "Well, how can I tell until I have heard the evidence?" That is the position in which we all find ourselves. We would like to hear the evidence; we would like to know something concerning this matter before we find the Government guilty, although we have very shrewd suspicions that they are guilty.

In 1916 I was one of the counsel employed in connection with the Meredith-Duff Commission appointed to inquire into matters affecting shell contracts with which the names of several ministers of the Crown had been connected in some way. The matter was brought up in the House by Mr. Kyte, I believe, in a very strong speech. The Government decided, of course, that no investigation would be granted, but within a week or ten days, and after hearing what the country had to say, they retracted their steps and were glad indeed to grant a commission with the fullest powers of investigation. No question was raised about the public or private interest, although it is to be borne in mind that we were investigating the matter of munitions, of shells, of explosives, in the midst of the war. We were obliged to bring before the commission of inquiry some matters the disclosure of which might have been considered at that time to be highly dangerous, in view of the fact that all this information was going abroad to the enemy. Information was brought out concerning the places at which these shells were being manufactured, the quantities that were being turned out, how they were being delivered across the ocean, the prices that were being paid for them, and various technical details in that connection,—all of which, it could have been said at that time, might furnish valuable information to the enemy. But in view of the fact that the public were demanding this investigation and that the honour of certain members of Parliament was at stake, the fullest and freest investigation was made and a report was submitted accordingly. Now, if during war time we were able to go into such a delicate matter as that to which I have referred, why should information not be given to the House and to the country in regard to the important and momentous question which we are now considering? I venture to say that if a plebiscite were taken on the question whether this information should be given or withheld because its disclosures is not in the public interest, by ninety-nine to one the people of this country would declare that they wanted information of the fullest character no matter what the result would be. They would want us to hew to the line no matter where the chips were to fly. It is not at all surprising, therefore, that we should insist upon the amendment proposed by the leader of the Opposition and refuse to accept the proposal put forward by the Government.

It is evident—and the extent to which this is true is a source of surprise to me—that hon. gentlemen on the other side will follow blindly the lead of the Prime Minister on this question and, as is most probable, vote accordingly. The matter which we are discussing is one of the most important which has come before the country for some considerable time. Probably they feel that they have very little to lose. "Those whom the Gods wish to destroy, they first drive mad," and my hon. friends feel that, as long as they last and as long as they occupy the Government benches, they will hang together with their friends on the Canadian National Railway. They alone are the people interested in not disclosing information. They alone are attempting to burk this inquiry before it is started.

Mr. T. M. M. TWEEDIE (West Calgary): Mr. Speaker, the discussion in connection with this resolution has gone pretty far afield, and it has been presented to the House in different forms on many occasions since the opening of the session. While I do not purpose discussing in detail many of the matters which have been referred to, I must ask the indulgence of the House to-night while I refer to one or two matters.

The leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), in his endeavours to bring these matters before the public, has no doubt served a public purpose, and the various discussions which have taken place have been of the utmost importance in that they have impressed upon the people of this country the financial condition in connection with the national railways which are operated by this Government. If the people generally throughout the length and breadth of this land have followed these discussions, there can be hardly a man or a woman in Canada who does not recognize the fact that government operation and government control of railways have resulted in a heavy deficit. Notwithstanding the fact that that information came to the public in connection with the operation in 1919, when there was a deficit of some $45,000,000, I do not believe that there was spread over this country the gloom which hon. members of the Opposition would lead us to believe there was, because, notwithstanding the fact that we had a deficit then this Government has been besieged with requests from every part of the Dominion to carry on to a greater extent public works which were commenced or which were delayed during the war. Not later than January of this year there met in the city of Edmonton the United Farmers of Alberta, and notwithstanding the "blue ruin" which they, the Opposition, pointed out, they have submitted to the Dominion Government a whole series of resolutions in connection with railway construction, insisting and urging the Government still to carry forward with the utmost speed the policy which they have carried on in the past in connection with railway construction. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) must have received a copy of these resolutions and, if so, he will know that the very first thing which they enacted by resolution was:

> That, in the opinion of this Union, No. 1 U.F.A., the time has arived when, for the best interests of Canada, her railways should be nationalised over all lines.

As regards respect and admiration for the Canadian Pacific railway, the hon. member for Marquette expressed himself clearly in the words of adulation and praise which he uttered in this House this afternoon. The Canadian Pacific railway, as he stated, is a railway which has the best management and operating staff of any railway in the world. With this I quite agree, and would even go farther. The Canadian Pacific railway was a railway which, from the very inception of the road, started its management and operation with such an eminent and capable man as Lord Mount Stephen; it has always maintained this high standard in the selection of its officials and it has attained greater degrees of excellence in its management and operation than has ever been attained by any other railway in this country. But while the hon. member for Marquette took great care this afternoon to express to the House his views in relation to the Canadian Pacific railway he stopped short of the real vital question, with which the people of Canada are concerned. Members of the House directly opposite us say that they are opposed to the nationalization and government operation and control of railways. The hon. member for Marquette, who stands up in this House and lauds the management of the Canadian Pacific railway and points out that it is without a peer in this country, was by that same convention which passed that resolution, approving of the immediate nationalization of all railways, approved as leader of the Agrarian party in the Dominion of Canada. Let him state in this House whether or not he, as leader of the Agrarian party, is in favour of the immediate nationalization of the Canadian Pacific railway and let him make his position clear to the people. Personally, I have no hesitation whatever in expressing my views in regard to that road. This Government should make its decision absolutely clear that it has no intention to undertake in any way, shape or form the nationalization of the Canadian Pacific railway, but that it is its opinion that we should keep our hands off one of the best organized, best administered and best managed railway corporations in the world. We shall be pleased to have the leader of the Agrarian party state clearly, irrespective of the views of the party which he leads throughout Western Canada, what his views are in connection with that problem.

We have heard a great deal about this deficiency in connection with the operation and management of the Canadian National railways; but the proper comparison has never been made, and I trust that it will be made at some time before the close of this session of Parliament. Hon. members opposite have taken a deficit of $45,000,000 last year and a deficit of some $70,000,000 this year, and they say that, because there was a deficit in each of those two years and because there probably will be a deficit next year, this country is facing blue ruin, because it has taken over the operation of the national railways. If they wish to be fair in that question, their comparison should be made, not with the Canadian Pacific as it exists at the present time, but with the Canadian Pacific when, some thirty or forty years ago, it was a pioneer railway in this country. We all recall that, when that great organization, of which we are all now so proud and which we lend our voice in this House to praise, was passing through pioneer days in the Dominion of Canada, insolvency faced it, even though under private management, and if the Dominion Government had not come to the aid of that corporation, insolvency would have been its state. There is not in the Dominion of Canada a single railway corporation which has not received aid from the treasury of the Dominion Government, and the time came, in connection with the Canadian Northern railway and the Grand Trunk railway, for us to say whether or not we should still continue giving further aid to those roads, or whether we should take and appropriate them to the Dominion of Canada and spend our money on that which is our property.

A great deal has been said back and forth about the question of government ownership; but the question of government ownership in connection with railways has never come properly and fairly before the House. Government ownership was not the result of the expression of the will of the people; it was not the result of any overwhelming desire on their part that these roads should be taken over; but we found ourselves in a position that we must take these roads over in order to protect the investment of the country.

On a former occasion, when this matter was being discussed, we had the privilege of hearing the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) deliver in this House an address in which he said that the West had been practically purchased by the Dominion; that Western Canada was the vassal of eastern capital; that they were supporting us and that the Dominion treasury was being bled for those people. I want to tell the hon. member for Dorchester that Western Canada is no vassal of eastern capital; that Western Canada is not dependent upon Eastern Canada for support; but that Western Canada is delighted to receive the investment of eastern capital, and eastern capitalists are pleased to invest their funds in the West, because they feel that there is no other part of the whole Dominion and very few parts in the world where they can receive better returns for the money they invest than Western Canada.

So far as the railway problem in Western Canada is concerned, they go on to say that these railways have been built for the development of Western Canada, and that as a result we have these deficits growing larger from year to year, and they will grow still larger in the future. But, Mr. Speaker, if at the time these Transcontinental lines were constructed a safe and sane policy had been carried out by the Government under the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, if he had followed the policy which was advocated by the Hon. Andrew G, Blair and had refused to come to the assistance of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, refused to embark upon the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental, we would be absolutely freed from the position in which we find ourselves to-day. If they had confined themselves, as they started out to do, to the construction of railway lines in the Prairie Provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, I believe that under present conditions every foot of railway in the Dominion of Canada would be self-supporting, and that there would be no charge against the public treasury for maintenance, operation, or overhead charges in connection with any of the roads. Throughout the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba we must originate practically all the freight which must take care of the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Transcontinental and the Canadian National. That is the burden which was unfairly and unjustly imposed on the West. Those roads go through the wilderness of northern Ontario, through the wilderness of Quebec, and through part of the wilderness of the province of New Brunswick. They serve these three eastern provinces, yet hon. gentlemen will get up in this House and charge the deficit on these roads to the three Prairie Provinces, when the roads are their own children, and run through their own territory. I submit that these deficits are not chargeable to the West, but to the three older provinces, from which came the majority who forced upon the Government the programme which compelled them to build these lines as a matter of political patronage. But these matters will be gone into at some other time at great length. I just wish to say now that there is not one private road in the United States, I believe, but what has passed through the bankruptcy court, or at all events very few. So far as deficits and the matter of insolvency are concerned, the position which we have in Canada to-day corresponds exactly with that which existed in the United States. I believe that the Government did its duty when it took over the responsibility of the administration of these roads.

I wish to say a few words in connection with the resolution of the Prime Minister which is now before the House. Great exception has been taken to it, and an amendment has been moved by the leader af the Opposition. I wish to point out to the leader of the Opposition the inconsistency of the stand which he as a party leader in this House takes in connection with his amendment. On March 15, we were discussing, at the instance of the leader of the Opposition, the question of the public accounts of this country and he complained bitterly on that occasion that only three volumes of the Auditor General's report had been placed before the House, and that they could not investigate the financial condition of the country until they had the fourth volume. He says, on page 946 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, before this motion carries I should like to point out to the Government the impossibility of this House proceeding intelligently with a consideration of the Estimates until it has before it the full report of the Auditor General.

He goes on:

> A part of that machinery is the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act which has a special provision respecting the presentation to Parliament of the Auditor General's Report.

Then on page 949 he says:

> That is the point of which we are complaining at the moment. There is not an opportunity to intelligently discuss these Estimates until we have in its completed form the Auditor General's report of the preceding fiscal year, and until we have several other reports which have already been asked for, and concerning which we can get no definite information from the Government. I think, Sir, that until we get a definite assurance from the Government that we are going to have a proper opportunity of discussing the Estimates with reports in their complete and full form we would not be justified in proceeding at the present moment with the consideration of any portion of those Estimates.

What is his position briefly? He says we cannot have a meeting of the Public Accounts Committee because only three volumes of the Auditor General's Report have been laid upon the Table and we have not got the fourth. We will assume for the purposes of argument that his reasoning on that occasion was just. What do we find his position to be at the present time? Has he any details of the operation of the Canadian National railways? Have there been submitted to the Auditor General or to any one else the detailed accounts of the business of those railways? Why, Sir, that is just what they have been complaining of in this House, complaining that they have not received those details. Yet the hon. gentleman stands up in his place in this House, and notwithstanding the fact that only a short time ago he said, we must have all the details before the committee can intelligently discuss this matter, he says now, let us have a committee to go into all the accounts of the Canadian National railways, when he has not before him one vestige, not one detail, he says, except the report which was laid on the Table. Is he sincere when he says that in the interests of the people of Canada we must investigate the transactions of the Canadian National railways? What is the genius of his mind which on one occasion says, I cannot examine without facts and figures, and on the other occasion says, I do not need anything before me, all I want is the committee? Does this House want any further proof that his amendment means simply and purely one of two things? It means either a fishing excursion in which he wishes to get a little group of men around the table and then produce from his vest pocket or from the vest pocket of some other hon. member, some bit of gossip which he may have picked up on the street and then say to the witness, Tell us all about that. Can it be that that which he has alleged to be the policy of the Government, that which he has so consistently denounced in this House, in alleging the denial on the part of the Government of information to the House of Commons, is the proper course to pursue, or does he wish to lead the people to believe that this House is suppressing information which should be given out? Mr. Speaker, whichever one of these alternatives he accepts, I submit that neither of them should justify this House in supporting the amendment which he has introduced. As between the resolution and the amendment the difference is this: The hon. the Prime Minister says that this is something new in the history and development of this country, that the operation of transcontinental railways was never before contemplated and that we want instructions. All that the resolution asks is for the committee to determine whether information shall be given, when that information shall be given, and what shall happen in connection with the auditing of the accounts. The leader of the Opposition says, we must have all the information. His amendment is definite, it is conclusive. Mr. Speaker, I submit that this House should appoint that committee to consider the question of whether or not the information should be given. We should call before that committee representatives of the management of the road, in order that they may point out to us the difficulty there would be in making the whole thing public. We should also call before that committee representatives of the men, in order that they may lay their views before the committee as to what the effects of this publicity would be. These questions should be considered by the committee and reported on to the House.

As to the question of auditing, if my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition wishes to accomplish the purpose which he has in view, it should be accomplished only in connection with the Audit Act and the Consolidated Revenue Act of this country. There should appear in the public accounts every single dollar of expenditure in connection with that road, and the accounts should be audited and approved by the Auditor General and submitted to the House. Is either of these courses wise? Do we want to allow a committee of this House to investigate every transaction in connection with the railways? Why, a man out in British Columbia may have a team of horses killed and the board may determine what compensation he shall receive; but he may be dissatisfied and he immediately communicates with the member of Parliament representing his constituency and that member brings the matter up before the committee. Under such circumstances the whole session of Parliament might be taken up in determining whether or not such people were properly compensated or not. Do you want these questions investigated by that committee? Do you want the committee to go into such matters as, for instance, the removal of a roundhouse at a certain place, the discharge of one of the section hands, the question of a conductor who is drunk on duty or negligent in his duty, the expropriation of a right-of-way, and so forth? Do you want every single question of this nature brought before the committee?

I quite agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Lafortune) in his reference to the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar). The hon. member for Marquette says that we do not want all these things to be gone into, and that is the reason why he opposes bringing down the papers and documents. He does not want these matters discussed in the House. But the hon. member must know that if the committee were given the discretion to consider whatever questions they saw fit, every single one of these things could be discussed by the committee and the House; so that when he advocates a wide open door it simply means the institution of a political campaign in connection with the administration of the railways. The hon. member for Marquette said he did not believe that all these things should be inquired into but that we should inquire into questions of policy. Did he move any amendment? He made no suggestion, so that his position is simply this, that we should throw the door wide open, carry all our political quarrels into the committee on railways, and simply debauch the administration of the railways of this country. I know of no rock which is more likely to wreck the ship of government control in connection with our railways than permitting the House of Commons to get its hand on the adjustment of these various matters. The effect of such a policy would be to destroy the authority of the management and of the officers of the roads. They might make a decision in some matter and the party concerned would simply say:

10 p.m.

"Your decision is not final; I have another court of appeal. I can go to my representative and he will bring the matter before the Railway Committee of the House." Now, Mr. Speaker, we are at a crisis in connection with the administration of our railways, and this House must determine once and for all whether or not it is going to tolerate any committee that will inquire into private differences and private arrangements, and all these minor transactions in the operation and management of the railways. I believe that the constitution of the railway employees now is such that, while the management might possibly not object to interference of this kind, the men themselves would undoubtedly oppose it very strenuously, because, having got any matter in contention adjusted with the management of the railways, they would not want this or any other government to intervene. Nothing fairer can be suggested to the House than the resolution of the Prime Minister that this matter should go to a committee for consideration as to what the extent of inquiry shall be, and the House could then either adopt or reject the report of that committee and perhaps establish a final policy for all time.

Mr. F. L. DAVIS (Neepawa): To paraphrase the language of a British statesman of about a century ago, we are to-day like fishermen sitting on an empty chest by a bottomless pool of deficiencies seeking for a method of management. Our trouble to-day is that we have endeavoured to engraft upon the methods and practices of responsible government the advantages of corporate management, and the fact that the Government has had to bring down this request for a committee is evidence that that graft has not been a successful one. And now we are asked to examine it and decide what is to be done in the matter. As I have sat listening to the debate to-day, I have been trying to imagine this concern as a body of shareholders considering the report of their directors upon a deficit in the operations of the company. Now, why have we not been able to examine the situation just as such directors would? The reason is quite plain. Here we are playing a bigger game than that played by the directors of any company; we are playing a different game. These deficits on shipping and railways are after all but one-sixth of the whole field of management that comes under our control. Consequently, every question which may come up in relation to this subject, if it can throw discredit upon the government of the day, is a matter of public importance to the Opposition. Not only is that true of the existing House, but it would be well for us to keep in mind that some day there will come a change in the government of the country and then what is now set up as precedent may continue to operate to the grave disadvantage of the country in general and of this enterprise in particular. In examining the resolution of the Prime Minister, it seems to me that, were it not for the many speeches that have been made as limiting the sense and scope of the inquiry, the wording of the first sentence would carry us far on the road towards what the amendment asks for:

> (1) What information as to operation of Canadian National Railways and Shipping as conducted by the Board of Directors and Management should, in the public interest, be brought down in Parliament on Question, Motion for Production of Papers, or otherwise.

Now, two or more years ago when we considered this matter the case was hypothetical. We had not then the reports of the company for examination; we had not the record of government ownership. To-day we have that record, and in my opinion the country will absolve us from any charge of party politics and will say that we have been wise if, in view of deficits amounting to more than $120,000,000 in two years, we turn the whole management upside down, shake it apart and see what has happened. I cannot see that it is wise to approach this question in any other way, and taken in its widest sense and devoid of the interpretations that have been put upon it by Government speakers, that is what that first sentence means. How can you judge of the conduct of the Board unless you go into all matters with which they have had to do?

Now there are one or two things that cause grave discredit to the Government, or at any rate to the management of the railways, at the present time. A gentleman at one time sat in this House whom the Prime Minister of that day read out of the party who to-day is a purchasing agent for the national railways in the city of Chicago. If such things can happen it points directly to some political connection between the management of the railways and the party of which he was a member. In consequence I take it that we have to go the whole road in connection with this examination; and if it were not, as I say again, for the speeches which have been made in limitation of this interpretation I would take that first sentence to mean that very thing. Again, as was pointed out, I think, by the Minister of Justice, in the fourth clause of the resolution there are words going to the same extent:

> —and for such other purposes as the committee deem in the public interest there be referred to said committee the Annual Report of the Board of Directors and that the said committee have power to examine witnesses—

And so forth. But with the interpretations which have been put upon the report, and no answer having been made to the hon. member (Mr. Jacobs) who spoke a moment or two ago asking for instances of what should be exempted from examination by this committee, I am inclined to believe that the Government do mean something by their language other than what I would take the broad meaning of the resolution to be. Now, finally, I would say this with regard to the matter. It could all be fixed with the addition of perhaps a dozen words if the resolution read:

> That a Select Standing Committee on National Railways and Shipping be appointed for the present session and be instructed to enquire into all matters relating to Government Shipping and Railways, and to report upon the following questions—

And so forth. Then I would be entirely content with the reference. We are playing a bigger game here—and the country realizes the fact—than merely managing a railway; we are managing a country, and the expenditures for this railway system represent only a sixth part of this year's estimates of expenditures. That being the case we cannot examine the situation apart from the political position, and the result is that we have apparent limitations put upon the meaning of this reference. Now, if the matter could be read in the light that I have suggested, I would support the resolution. But just as I stand at present I shall have to vote for the amendment, although I shall never consider it as a precedent for the House going, every year and on every possible occasion, into the management of these railways. But with the experience that we have had I think we must now investigate the management in order to satisfy the country. Should the Government accept the interpretation of their resolution which I have suggested I would be pleased indeed to vote for their commitment and a confining of the investigation to those purposes which, in the long run, must be the purposes sought by the House.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): Having sat through most of the afternoon and evening listening, as intently as I might, to the remarks that have been made on the resolution and amendment before the House, I have been forced to the conclusion that many of the hon. members who have spoken, and have taken the position that they have with regard to each proposition, were either not in the House when the Prime Minister made his statement in relation to the scope of the inquiry he suggested the committee should have, or else they have not read the amendment proposed by the leader of the Opposition. In addition to the four clauses specifically set out in the motion, the Prime Minister stated that he was willing to accept an amendment that would provide that the committee might inquire into what was the best system of management for the Canadian National railways—into the whole question of the general policy of the Government in relation to the management and operation of these railways. The Prime Minister stated definitely that if the resolution did not now provide that, he was willing to accept an amendment that would make it just that wide—that is that a committee of the House—let me repeat it—might inquire into the whole question of policy in relation to the management and operation of the Canadian National railways. The amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition sets out, not that the policy shall be inquired into, not that we shall determine whether we have decided on the correct management of the Canadian National railways, but that every detail of the management of the Canadian National railways must be investigated by this committee.

Mr. FIELDING: No, that is not the amendment.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Very well, I will read the amendment, and I will accept correction if I am wrong in my interpretation. It says that such committee shall make inquiry into all matters in connection with the operation of the Canadian National Railways. What does "all matters" mean, if not all details? What is there excluded when you inquire into all matters in regard to operation?

Mr. FIELDING: If my hon. friend will permit me, he stated a moment ago that the amendment required the committee to go into all the details of the operation of the railways. That is not in the amendment. We have the power to go into all the details of the returns of every department of the Government but we do not do it; but if any proposal were made that the power of Parliament to do that should be restricted we would oppose it. My hon. friend used the expression—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must remind the hon. gentleman that he has not the floor and presumably the only reason for his rising was to submit a question.

Mr. FIELDING: Only with the consent of the hon. member for East Algoma, and I thought I had it.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am perfectly content.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not within the competence of the hon. gentleman for East

Algoma to give consent nor is the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's in order in making an argument.

Mr. FIELDING: I rose to explain the point of difference between the hon. gentleman's interpretation of the amendment and my own, but I am content.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am sorry to be forced to disagree with my hon. friend, but if the amendment means anything it means that the committee would be appointed for the purpose I have indicated. If the committee does not carry out the purpose for which it is appointed then we had better not appoint a committee at all. The terms of the amendment are that the committee is to be appointed to inquire into all matters in connection with the operation of the Canadian National railways. Now, the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) spoke in relation to this matter, and in the first part of his speech he laid down a perfectly sound policy. I would ask that hon. gentleman particularly to pay attention to what I say for I think we are very largely in agreement. He laid down the perfectly sound policy that if we are ever going to have successful management of government-owned railways we must keep them clear of political influence; if we are ever going to be able to go out and get the right class of men to manage and operate these railways we have to place that confidence in them that will enable them to feel that we are going to let them do their work just as if they were employed by a private corporation. These were not his words, but I think he will agree that I have given a fair interpretation of what he said. Now he immediately turned round and followed that up by saying that while you cannot expect to bring these men into a situation that would make it possible for their acts as operating officers to be the subject of debate across the floor of this House, nevertheless, we should appoint a committee of Parliament who will have power to inquire into every matter in connection with the details of the operation of the Canadian National railways. Again, I think that is a fair statement of the position taken by the hon. gentleman. Now that is where the fundamental difference occurs between the proposals of the Prime Minister, and the proposals set forth by the leader of the Opposition. The first clause provides, that a committee shall be appointed to inquire into how far it is wise for Parliament to go in delving into the details of operation of the Canadian National railways. That is what it means, to determine how far it is wise for us to go if we are to have successful management of our railways. The second clause is to ascertain by what method this information shall be given to the House and to the public. The third is to determine what system of auditing shall be adopted. The fourth, the broad clause, provides for referring the annual report of the board of directors to the committee, that they may inquire into it. And, finally, the Prime Minister says: If this is not sufficiently wide, we are ready to accept an amendment that will make it possible for the committee to inquire into what lines of policy may be followed in developing a better system for the management of the Canadian National railways.

I should like to submit one or two questions in relation to inquiring into the details of operation, because I submit that right there is the rock on which Government ownership is going to wreck itself, if it wrecks itself at all. We must either have management of the Government-owned railways independent of politics of we cannot operate such railways successfully. If you open the door, as being suggested, to inquire into every detail of operation of these railways, how are you going to keep that operation free from politics?

When this committee meets and starts to inquire into this question in detail, and some point arises such as has been referred to in this and in previous debates—as to why one station has one agent and another two agents; as to why a section foreman was dismissed on some part of the line; as to why there are two trains running where somebody thinks there should only be one; as to why ties were purchased from one man and rails from another, and so on—in connection with the operation of these lines all over the country, who are we going to ask for detailed information? I submit that the very first man the committee would appeal to would be the president of the Canadian National railways. He would be brought before that committee to answer these questions. But what information would he be able give to the committee? He would say at once, "I know nothing whatever about any of these matters, and I am not in a position to answer your questions. You will have to bring such and such an officer who is in charge of that particular work in the department." And before you get through with the investigation you will have the whole operating staff herein Ottawa answering questions, and then the Parliamentary committee would not know anything more about the operation of the railways than they did before, simply because they are not competent to pass judgment on matters of operation. That is the situation. The whole discussion would seem to indicate that it is in the minds of some hon. members that some one individual somewhere can be brougnt here and by being asked a series of questions can give to the House all this detailed information. Does anyone suggest that the president of the Canadian National railways is in personal contact with all of the diverse activities in connection with operation? In the first place, the system is divided into two parts, the eastern and the western, each with its general manager. These are the next executive officers we would bring here. The eastern lines are divided into a certain number of grand divisions or districts, and those in turn are divided into sub-districts. All the general superintendents or assistant general managers of these divisions would be the next group of men we would bring here. It is needless to labour the point further. Anyone who has any appreciation of a business of that character will see at once that to embark on such an investigation would not only lead the committee and Parliament into a hopeless maze, but would create a situation that would make it impossible for the Canadian people to get men to undertake the management and operation of their railways.

We must all admit that we are faced with a difficult situation, and that it is not easy to determine just where we must begin and where we must end in connection with how far Parliament can go in respect to these matters. It may be that this committee can serve a useful purpose in so far as getting some light with regard to how much detailed information Parliament may secure and how much it is unwise for it to expect to secure. But let we repeat, that if there is a man in this House who expects that Canada is going to develop a system of publicly-owned railways efficiently operated, and that the officers of such railways are going to be dragged before parliamentary committees to explain why they did this or that particular thing in connection with details of operation, you may make up your minds once for all that our Canadian National railways instead of becoming a success will eventually bankrupt the country. You can never operate under those conditions.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

The hon. member for Lotbiniere, Mr. Vien) in speaking on this subject indicated what is in the minds at least of some hon. members in regard to all these questions of detail when he said that there were 208 —I think that was the number; perhaps it was 228—conductors on a certain section of the Canadian National railways and they were going out on their trains in a state of intoxication, that they were stealing the public money, either not collecting it or putting it in their pockets, and so on, and the desire of the hon. member and of others who are supporting the position he takes was that the names of those conductors should be brought before the House of Commons for debate in order that we might dismiss them if found delinquent. Well, if that is the function of Parliament in connection with the operation of the Canadian National railways, the best thing we can do is to dismiss the officers whom we now have endeavouring to operate these railways. How long does any hon. member expect you would keep a self-respecting superintendent or general superintendent if the House of Commons is going to bring his employees before it and determine whether he is maintaining proper discipline or not? And yet that is what is stated on the floor of this House that we should have an investigating committee for, in order that information of that character should be secured and we should dismiss employees.

Mr. BUTTS: Turn out the bosses.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): The question was asked, what is there in connection with the operation of the Canadian National railways that in the public interest cannot or should not be given. The answer to-that can simply be summed up in this way. If there is going to be successful government ownership of railways there must be independent management. I am not for one moment saying that the present management is all that it should be. It may be wholly wrong. When the general question of what has already taken place and the position we at present find ourselves in comes up for debate, I may take advantage of the opportunity and say something with regard to that.

The principle, nevertheless, is this: so long as this managing body is retained, and until Parliament determines that it no longer has our confidence, we cannot ask it to appear before a committee of the House or before the House itself and answer questions with regard to details of operation and management. I am inclined to think, knowing, as I do, some of the junior officers of the Canadian National railways, that the very moment you asked them to do that they would hand in their resignation. The hon. member for Marquette, I am sure, would say they would not be self-respecting men, not men with the capacity to do the work we expect of them, if they took any other position.

Is this proposed committee to sit in camera, as has been suggested? Has the House of Commons authority to appoint a committee to go off into some room, lock the doors, examine witnesses and obtain a lot of information and then determine what part of it shall be furnished to the House? Every single item of evidence taken by any such committee is the property not of the committee itself but of the House of Commons. The whole report and the evidence upon which it is founded will be the subject of debate in the House; every particle of detailed information will be threshed out here. Officers will be attacked, as was suggested this afternoon, with regard to matters concerning which they cannot defend themselves, and attacked, too, by men who know nothing about the subjects with which they deal. There is only one way out of this difficulty; accept the proposal of the Prime Minister. If this resolution is not wide enough, make it sufficiently wide so that the committee may inquire into the whole question of the management of the Canadian National railways. The question whether or not we have a proper system of management is a proper one for a parliamentary committee to inquire into, and is a proper subject for this House to debate. There are genuine differences of opinion on the question whether we are employing the best system of management. Here is exactly the difference between the resolution proposed by the Prime Minister and the amendment of the leader of the Opposition: one involves the question of principles, the other a question of details. If we want to set the principles to one side and go into the details; if we want to inquire how many section-men are working at a certain point; how many telegraph operators there are at certain stations; how many ties were laid in certain mileages—if we want all these things, then let us vote for the amendment. But if we want to inquire into the principles underlying the whole question of the government ownership and operation of these railways, let us adopt the resolution proposed by the Prime Minister. Personally, I have no difficulty whatever in making up my mind on this point. I have contended ever since I have been in the House —not as an arden advocate of public ownership of railways, but as one who has had some slight connection with the operation of railways—that you will never operate successfully a publicly-owned railway or any other kind of railway so long as it is subject to political interference and political influence. That is what is contemplated in the amendment proposed by the hon. leader of the Opposition, and for that reason I will vote against it.

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly-Verchéres): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few remarks to make in support of the amendment of the leader of the Opposition purporting to enlarge the scope of the committee which is to inquire into matters affecting the operation of the Canadian National railways and the Canadian Government Merchant Marine.

In my humble opinion there is only one point to consider, and it is this: who are the proprietors of the Canadian National railways and the Canadian merchant marine? Are the proprietors entitled to information with regard to the management of these Government enterprises? That is the only question to be decided, the only question before the House. The management of our railways issue a report showing a deficit of $70,000,000 this years—the deficit last year was $49,000,000—and ask for a vote of $165,000,000. Surely we have the right to inquire into the circumstances which are responsible for this condition. Surely the information should be laid before the House in order that we may be able to ascertain the cause of these large deficits and endeavour, to the best of our ability, to remove that cause.

Let me illustrate my thought. If the Canadian national railways or the Canadian merchant marine were a private corporation in which you, Mr. Speaker, were a shareholder, and if the management brought down a report showing a deficit of $70,000,000 for the operations of last year and asking for a fresh budget of $165,000,000, surely it would be your right to have all the details and all the information made available in order that they might be examined and considered. You would ask for instance, what the company were paying for locomotives and for various kinds of equipment; what amount was paid out by way of salaries to the different employees of the company; how many employees there were, and so on; and having all these facts you would compare these amounts with the expenditure made by other companies on account of locomotives, equipment, salaries, etc. As a shareholder you would be entitled to and would insist upon being furnished with all this information, and if the directors of your company dared to take the attitude that the Government is taking to-night, dared to refuse this information, you would, through the medium of the courts, force the company to furnish it.

It may be said that in the case of a private company these facts and details are given only to the shareholders. True, but is it not a fact that the people of this country are the shareholders in the Canadian National Railway system and the Canadian Merchant Marine? This excuse, therefore, is a preposterous one.

Now, Sir, why are the Government refusing to give that full information to which we are entitled, not only as shareholders, but according to every sound principle of responsible government? Prior to this debate to-day only one reason was given, and that by the Prime Minister, to the effect that if all these details were laid before the House and before the country, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company would obtain and profit by them. I cannot imagine Lord Shaughnessy, or Mr. Beatty, or Mr. Wanklyn straining their necks and ears in order to get pointers on a policy which has been pregnant with deficits. I cannot imagine these successful and talented officials trying to gather sagacity or wisdom from the National railway board, trying to incorporate into their management the methods of a manager who has already wrecked a railway company. If this excuse of the Government was sound, it might be a very strong argument against government ownership of railways, because it would prevent the people of this country from ascertaining the facts in relation to the expenditure of their money, a principle for the recognition of which many great constitutional battles have been fought with the ultimate victory of the people for the recognition of this undeniable right.

There is another reason. Why should the Department of Railways or the Department of Marine be different from other departments in relation to which we are entitled to all particulars regarding expenditures? But to-day the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) gave us another reason and it is as unsound as the first one. The Prime Minister said—and I took his words down:

[Mr. Archambault.]

"The committee will inquire into what can be done and given without impairing the rights of the management." I may say that I expected that reason from the Prime Minister, but I expected it sooner than to-day. Surely, it is only natural and within the scope of the mentality of this Government that they should do everything to protect the interest of their protegés, the management, but nothing to protect the rights of the people of Canada. In the opinion of the Prime Minister, nothing should be done or given that might impair the rights of the management, even if the rights of the people of Canada are impaired by that being done. It is an unsound, reactionary, Tory principle. The rights of the management! Why, I was under the impression that the members of the Canadian National Railway Board were high salaried employees of the Government and of the people of Canada, and nothing else, and as such that they were entitled to fair treatment and their pay envelopes at the end of every week. I fail to understand what other rights the directors of the Canadian National Railways have as such and by what process of reasoning the Prime Minister can come to the extraordinary conclusion that by giving information to this House, they would impair the rights of that board.

I was greatly amused this afternoon to listen to the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) and to witness the noticeable uneasiness which he displayed in trying to rescue his leader. So uneasy was that hon. gentleman that he made the most amazing statement that no questions were ever put by the Opposition asking for the cause of the deficit on the Canadian National Railways. Surely every hon. member remembers that last year there were put on the Order Paper at least fifty questions in an endeavour to ascertain the cause of the deficits on the Canadian National Railways. All those questions were not answered. But if the mind or the memory of the Minister of Finance is not very good, I will remind him that as recently as March 31 of this year there were put on the Order Paper some questions relating to the causes of the deficits of the Canadian Mercantile Marine. I put one of those questions myself and it will be found at page 1443 of Hansard. My question was this:

Mr. Archambault:

1. What was the initial cost of the steamships Canadian Squatter and Pioneer and when were they first put into commission?

2. How much was spent in repairs to each of these ships since she was built up to December 31, 1920?

3. What was the gross amount earned by each of these vessels for the calendar year 1920?

4. What was the gross amount of expenditure of every description in connection with the operation of each of these vessels for the calendar year ending December 31, 1920?

5. What were the net earnings of each of these vessels from the date when she was first put into commission up to December 31, 1920, after deducting all expenditure of every description?

6. What were the net earnings of each of these vessels for the calendar year 1920, after deducting all expenditure of every description?

7. How many tons of coal did each of these vessels consume during the calendar year 1920. and what was the average price paid therefor?

The hon. member for Antigonish and Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) asked the same question regarding the steamer Voyageur. The hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) asked the same question regarding the steamships Canadian Conqueror, Canadian Commander and Canadian Planter. What was the answer of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries? His answer to the first question was the original price paid for the ships, but we did not get any other information in regard to all the other questions. Does my hon. friend not believe that in asking the Government to tell the House what the Government is paying for coal, what the Government is paying for repairs, how much money was spent on repairs on each of those ships, the members of this House wanted to be enabled to examine these figures, to compare them with the prices paid by other similar companies so that they might find out whether the deficits were incurred through the Government paying too high prices for coal or having too many and unnecessary repairs done on their ships? The Minister of Finance, however, tells this House that hon. members on the other side have not asked any questions regarding the deficits of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Merchant Marine.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) admitted this afternoon that the purpose of the committee was to inquire into what information should be given to the House. I heard my hon. friend make that statement. I repeated my question and my hon. friend answered, in his own way, it is true, but his words meant that the purpose of the committee was to inquire what information should be given to the House. Why, Sir, what is the need of such a committee? We do not need a committee for that purpose. The Government may indeed need it in order to delay giving information, or to stifle enquiry and try and shift the responsibility for so doing, but let me tell the members of this House and the country at large that we on this side do not need such a committee. What we desire is the information necessary to determine the cause of the appaling, extravagant and Highwayman-like expenditure of the people's money. Sir, for these reasons I shall vote in favour of the amendment of my hon. leader.

Mr. BUTTS: Would my hon. friend allow me to ask him a question? What does my hon. friend estimate the cost of operation of a 10,000 ton ship per month?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I have great respect for my hon. friend who has just asked me a question, but not at all times. I am always delighted to answer any questions of his when he is serious, but I am sorry that he is not so to night. I have no desire to be discourteous, but I do not care to enter into a discussion with him at the present moment.

Mr. BUTTS: You do not know anything about it do you?

Mr. C. A. FOURNIER (Bellechasse): I should like to interject a few imperfect remarks into this debate. When one speaks of railway matters in this country, one might as well make up his mind that he is speaking of the very life of Canada, for there is no use disguising the fact that the solvency of Canada is very gravely challenged to-day by the present railway situation. I would agree to a committee being appointed with full powers to look into the railway situation and get all the information, but I am not in favour of a committee that will only ask for information that it will not get. If that is to be the bright feature from which Canadian democracy is to draw solace, I am not in favour of a committee of that kind.

When the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) submitted his annual statement on March 17, I felt a little pity for him, because he had the inglorious task of disclosing to the House another deficit on the year's operations of $70,000,000. But is that $70,000,000 the actual deficit? It is because I want to make sure that I favour the appointment of a committee with full powers to inquire and ascertain just what the deficit is. If the minister were in the House to-night, I would challenge him, as I did at the second session of 1919, when this House was sitting in the Victoria Museum, to deny that the deficit, this year instead of being $70,000,000, is nearer $132,000,000. What can a committee do that has no powers at all? Can it change the capital liabilities of the different lines? Can it change the fixed annual charges? Not at all. I would also like to see a committee appointed that would inquire into the management, I think that is absolutely necessary. After all, Mr. Speaker, I think the great fault in the National railway system is the centralization of the management in the city of Toronto. I grant you that Toronto is a beautiful city; but it is also a peculiar city. It is endowed with many gifts, I grant, but it has a fatal defect. It is an intellectual city, a cultured city, a hospitable city. In matters literary, and in matters military, Toronto can always be depended upon to use discernment, but in matters political the vision of Toronto has always been distorted. We have the proof of that in connection with railway matters. It has always been a failure, and always will be.

If we had a committee with full powers to inquire into railway matters, Mr. Speaker, it would find out that on the Intercolonial, for instance, we have absolutely no modern bookkeeping methods. The Intercolonial is divided into three divisions—from Montreal to Mont Joli, from Mont Joli to Moncton, and from Moncton to Sydney and Halifax. Last year the Intercolonial had a $5,000,000 deficit, but yet the division from Montreal to Mont Joli had a $2,000,000 surplus. This year the very same thing is repeated. There is almost a $2,000,000 surplus on the division from Montreal to Mont Joli.

Mr. McMASTER: Is Bellechasse in that division?

Mr. FOURNIER: Yes, it is. Then I would point out that the superintendent of that division is handicapped in having always to await orders from Toronto. His name is Mr. E. L. Desjardins, and the general superintendent is Mr. J. E. Morazain. I can commend these men to the minister. They are the only two who are showing results on the Intercolonial Railway, and I think the minister would do well to get a few more French-Canadians of their calibre as railway men. All the train despatching orders for the division come from Toronto. From Chaudière to my parish it is only 18 miles, and you cannot send a train out unless the locomotive hauls a certain amount of tonnage. Well, during the winter, when it is 10 or 15 below zero, a locomotive with a load of 60 cars cannot clear the sidings, and to accommodate such trains it would be well to lengthen the sidings. It takes 8 hours to make that 18 mile run, with such tonnage, and time and a half to go to the end of the run. If this matter were inquired into I am sure that it would result in a great deal of money being saved in demurrage. I do not wish to criticize the increase in rates that has been granted by the Railway Commission, except to say that they did not use discretion in granting increases on commodities that could not stand the increase, such as brick and lumber. These increased rates have paralized the building industry. That is another matter that the committee might well look into.

The people of this country are called upon to pay an appalling amount to make good the losses on these railways, and they might as well open their eyes to the situation. Mr. Speaker, the burden imposed upon the public treasury by the mismanagement of the national railways cannot be characterized in fitting terms. War expenditures have accustomed the public to fabulous sums, but the figures in connection with the railway situation cannot be mitigated by familiarity with reckless expenditure. The deficit in 1919 totalled some $48,000,000; this year it is stated to be $70,000,000, but I contend that it is nearer $133,000,000. The people, I say, might just as well realize that this great system of railways is nothing but an old cripple which they have taken on their backs. Last year when the Minister of Railways submitted his statement he had not very much encouragement to offer the House and the country, but he did promise that proper steps would be taken to apply business methods. Now, the Minister of Railways is a politician, and as such he stated that the only way to overcome deficits in connection with our railways was to increase the revenues, and the only way to increase the revenue is by increasing the rates. The deficit on the national railways does not fall on private shareholders but on the Canadian people, who have to meet it in taxation whether in the form of customs duties, income tax or taxes levied on the profits of business, and a deficit on the railways made up in this indirect way, which has to take the place of inadequate transportation rates, is unfair to the people.

The minister said last year that the management of the railways had urged the adoption of business methods and an advance in rates, but speaking for the Government, he got rid of this dilemma by passing it on to Parliament and to the people. The rates were increased during the last year, however; but after all, notwithstanding these increased rates, the increased rates produced 19 per cent more revenue and advanced wages absorbed 16 per cent. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen opposite, when they talk about the railways, to say that we on this side are at fault because we have over-built; but I return the compliment and say that if we have over-built they have over-bought. Now, in view of the fact that the minister is not disposed to give us the information we want, we are obliged to take our own figures. I remember that in the Grand Trunk debate I submitted a detailed statement of operations and I challenged the Minister of Railways and the then Minister of the Interior, now Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) to refute them, but the right hon. gentleman declined to take the challenge up. I am sorry he is not in the House, but I shall have an opportunity at some time to repeat my challenge. Mr. Speaker, no one will buy these railways, and the only thing we can do in the circumstances is to appoint a committee, secure all the information we can, and make the best of a bad job. I wrote a letter to Mr. Hanna asking that the Ocean Limited be allowed to make a regular stop, as it had always done in the past, at St. Charles de Bellechasse. Any one who knows anything about the railways in the province of Quebec knows that this is an important station, also an initial station, but the Ocean Limited, instead of stopping at this station, simply slows down. I kept a record, covering a period of six months, of people who wanted to take the train to Montreal, but they had to take the Canadian Pacific railway from Quebec and then proceed; and although I did not give Mr. Hanna the figures, I may say that in six months the Canadian National Railways lost in this way the sum of $8,000. I told Mr. Hanna that I was prepared to do all I could to make the Canadian National Railways a success but he paid no heed to me. All these things could be inquired into if we had a proper committee.

11 p.m.

It would be interesting to go into the question as to why the Canadian Northern people, when they handed their railway over to the Government, were allowed to keep strips of land along their line for which the Canadian National Railways today are held up; and it would also be interesting to know who disorganized the Transcontinental. If the Transcontinental had been operated for the purpose for which it was built it would have been a great success. From the West to St. John it would have meant a shorter route by 440 miles. But instead seventy per cent of the production of western grain is taken to New York. I asked the Minister of Railways this afternoon who had lifted the rails of the Transcontinental and where they had gone to; and there are other things of great interest which would be brought out before a committee. I will not go further into these matters to-night. I shall have an opportunity to explain these and other things later on when the Estimates of the Minister of Railways are under consideration; but when I make this statement about the rails being lifted on the Transcontinental I make it on my own responsibility as a member of Parliament, and when the member for Bellechasse makes a statement he is prepared to substantiate it. The management of these railways has disorganized everything. This board disorganized the shops at Rivière du Loup by taking about 114 men from their homes there and planting them at the St. Malo shop, Quebec. Is that what my hon. friends opposite regard as a constructive measure? It is to inquire into matters of this kind that we want a committee. If the Government is not ashamed of the way in which these railways are being managed let us have a thorough investigation. Let us get at the facts and I am prepared to do my share in futhering the necessary investigation.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): I am extremely reluctant to keep the House, for even a minute or two, from a division so late upon a Friday night. I do not know that I should have intervened at all, because my position was stated perfectly from my point of view by my hon. friend from Marquette. If it had not been that my hon. friend (Mr. Jacobs) who represents the George Etienne Cartier division of Montreal made what I conceive to be a somewhat unjust attack upon my hon. friend near me. He charged him in so many words with having offered no constructive suggestions in regard to railroads in this country. Well I am not altogether sure that I agree with the constructive suggestions that my hon. friend from Marquette has made in their entirety as to their usefulness with regard to the railroad situation, but I had observed his doings carefully enough to notice that he had at many points in this country advocated a re-valuation of the railways for specific purposes. He did that in the city of my hon. friend from the division of George Etienne Cartier. In the same city he advocated a wise and well directed policy of immigration as a policy which might help the railroads of this country out of their difficulties. I mention these things to bring to my hon. friend's information up to date, and to repel his charge that my hon. friend from Marquette has not made constructive suggestions.

Sir, the course of the debates on railroad matters within the last two weeks has been a little peculiar, and has debarred us from discussing the railroad question at large or I might have extended the constructive suggestions of my hon. friend considerably at the present moment. I will not do so however, because I have regard to the ruling which you, Sir, gave out at the beginning of this debate this afternoon, that the platform upon which we could speak to-day was a very narrow one. I am quite sure that with different occupants of the Chair this debate has gone far beyond the limits which you yourself, Sir, had in your mind at the moment, and I desire at this hour of the night to keep strictly to the question which is before the House. Now that question, like all new questions of this magnitude, presents a very great national difficulty, and I want to reiterate a statement which I have given expression to myself, and to emphasize it as it was expressed to-day by my hon. friend from Marquette—a sentiment to the effect that our railroad difficulties are far too great for us to approach them except in the spirit of helpfulness and co-operation with a view to getting the nation through them.

The question before us to-day, in the form of the two motions upon which we shall presently decide by a vote, is a very difficult question. There are two considerations that are in the minds of all of us who are thinking earnestly upon the subject, and I think that is the case with every hon. gentleman in this House. We must have regard in the first place to the necessity of the management and directors of the National roads having that freedom and secrecy from day to day—and I emphasize the phrase "from day to day"—which are in the possession of the management and directors of all business corporations. Now, if the House was, as was proposed two weeks ago, to seek for itself, as a House of Commons, to exercise the power of so overlooking the management and the directors of the National roads from day to day that they could pursue the ordinary course in regard to a Government department, then I am advised that the biggest railroad men on this continent would not take the job, because they would consider that they were foredoomed to failure owing to their operations being hampered and restricted in that way. For what would happen? I assume that even on occasion we should have some question directed to the Government on the Orders of the Day. They would either have to have that information, or they would immediately have to trouble the management about it when perhaps they were engaged in some other very important business. We should have questions put upon the Order Paper from day to day, we should have all the devices known to members of parliament, which would lead to the railroads being made a political football—all the devices usually used by members of parliament, I fear too often with a view to party or personal advantage rather than to the success of this great business enterprise which is being handled in a new way by this young country and is, I want to repeat, presenting us with problems of the very greatest difficulty.

On the other hand, there must be present to the minds of all of us another necessity which, to my mind, is equally urgent, and that is the necessity of Parliament and the people—who are the shareholders of these roads—being possessed of the means of exercising a vigilant oversight over the handling of their property. If they have not the means of that oversight, Mr. Speaker, it is clear even to a tyro in matters of business, that slackness in the management will inevitably creep in, that business evils will creep in, and—as some have anticipated—our deficiencies, our deficits, will rise instead of falling as the days go by. Well now, the Government have thought it wise to make an attempt along that line by proposing in the first place, that we should relieve ourselves of the difficulties to which I first alluded by appointing a committee of this House to make inquiries under certain very definite restrictions.

May I say at once, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot see what would be the use of that committee at all operating under those restrictions. It is proposed to confine the work of this committee to making up their minds what information, if any, should be given to the House of Commons, and the methods by which that information should be communicated. Well, I am bound to say that if that be all the committee is to do, that is something which the House of Commons surely has the power to decide for itself here and now. And, holding that view, I shall vote for the amendment.

I asked my right hon. friend, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), when he was speaking, how a committee could possibly decide on what information ought to be communicated to the House if the committee itself knew nothing about the information at all or was to be restricted in the information which it did have. If the committee is to be restricted in respect to the information which it possesses, it would baffle the human intelligence of this committee to form a sensible opinion on what information should be given to this House. The committee would meet in ignorance, it would deliberate in ignorance, and it would decide in ignorance if it were restricted in the way in which this motion proposes. So that I repeat I cannot see what the use of a committee working under these restrictions would be at all. On the other hand, if they choose, as doubtless the Government will, a committee of men of parliamentary experience—most of our committees do have hon. gentlemen of considerable parliamentary experience chosen by preference—and, in addition hon. members who have devoted their attention largely to railroad matters, then I am with the demand that they should have the power to get what information seems to them wise as a parliamentary committee.

I would only add, in conclusion, that I should think they would exercise those powers with discretion. I understood my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) to say in his remarks to the House to-day that we should rely on the discretion of such a parliamentary committee conducting its inquiries with a view to the two necessities which they would have peculiarly placed upon them—the necessity, on the one hand, of not unduly hampering the management and directors of the road; and, on the other hand, the necessity of bringing to Parliament at least sufficient information to enable it to exercise a vigilant oversight of those who are managing this great national property.

Mr. G. W. ANDREWS (Centre Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, like my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Clark), it is my purpose to be very brief at this stage of the debate. I find myself in sympathy with the resolution before the House, but before recording my vote I should like to ask my right hon friend, the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen), two questions, which he will have an opportunity to answer when closing the debate. In the first place, I would call to his attention the fact that when the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) was presenting his report to this House he referred specifically to the high wages paid the railway employees as being one cause of the large deficits. I should like to ask my right hon. friend if I am right in assuming that the wage earners of the railroad will be given an opportunity to present their side of that question before this proposed committee? The second question I would ask my right hon. friend is this: Will the gentlemen who recently came from Winnipeg to present their case before the Board of Railway Commissioners relative to railway rates be given an opportunity to re-state their case before this committee?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker, in answering the hon. member I would like also to make a few remarks anent the amendment itself. The fixing of wages or of rates could not, no matter whether the amendment or the motion passed, come within the jurisdiction of the committee. The first matter is necessarily in charge of the Canadian National Railway Company on the one side and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company on the other; and the control of rates is delegated by statute specifically to the Railway Commission. But the men employed on the road could personally or through their organizations give evidence before the committee as to anything that the committee is deputed to ascertain, and among the things deputed to it the question of the form of the annual report and what it should disclose would be something upon which they could be called and could give evidence, as well as on any other subject within the purview of the committee. I do want to say a word too, as to the peculiar position this House would be in if it accepted this amendment. I do not know that I can make it any clearer than it was, to me at least, stated in the speech of the right hon. gentleman the member for King's, N.S. (Sir Robert Borden). It will be recalled that in previous debates—and I do not wish to refer to them again in extenso—it was very generally conceded, and particularly by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), in language that to my judgment was precisely right, that unquestionably there is information as to operation in respect to which the management must have the same secrecy and control as the management of any other system, and which information, as expressed by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), will not be subject to disclosure in Parliament while the operation is going on. For example, supposing we should have to disclose in Parliament the shipments made by a certain firm of their particular line of goods, manufactured perhaps in Chicago or at some other point served by our roads, will any hon. member for a moment suggest that this House would be justified in publishing that information? But it is a matter of operation and is within the meaning of this amendment. And so with other matters. I am told that if the management were to make known the differentials as to the rates given, it would make operation impossible, that is, they would not get the business and the loss would be disastrous to the system. I can pass from one thing to another, and in each instance I can assure the House that if the information is disclosed it will add millions of dollars to the deficit. There is no question in the world about it. I do not need to argue it with the hon. member for Marquette, who has himself stated in language that he would be expected to use as the manager himself of a large business concern. Now, we will suppose this amendment passes. Then where are we landed as respects this very information that the hon. member says cannot be disclosed without disaster? What is the duty of this committee, if it is appointed, what is it entrusted to do, yea, deputed to do by this Parliament? Is it deputed to bring in a recommendation as to anything? Has it any definite purpose? None whatever; it is not asked to do anything; it is not asked to help us in any respect whatever. It is simply asked to inquire into—what? Into all matters that in any way relate to the railways owned and controlled by the Government. It was suggested by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) that the committee would not take the position of permitting anything and everything to be inquired into. But suppose some member got up in that committee and said: I want to know these things that the member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) says should not be known; that the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's says it could not be conceived that any committee would disclose. Suppose that member of the committee said: I want to call a witness to find that out—who could rise in the committee and say, "no"? This House told the committee to get the information.

Mr. CRERAR: May I ask my right hon. friend a question to elucidate the matter? Would it not be entirely proper for the committee to exercise its discretion in the matter?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, decidedly it would not. Hon. members say "hear, hear," but they know it would not. It is in the motion; that is why the motion is worded as it is—worded to say that the committee may ascertain anything that the committee deems it necessary to inquire into. If this amendment passes the committee is deputed to inquire into everything connected with the road, and no chairman of that committee and no member of it would be doing his duty who would get up and say that the committee had any right to prevent the disclosure of anything whatever relating to that railway. How would he have the right? Upon what would he base his right? Would he say: I know better; I know that will do harm? Oh, the reply would be, Parliament has told us to inquire into everything; that is what we are here for. Parliament has not given us any discretion; it has told us to go so far as we deem necessary. Parliament does not tell the committee to go as far as it may deem necessary for certain purposes. No purpose is set out in this amendment. The committee are to be sent out into the wilderness and told that they have power—indeed it is their duty to go into anything that anybody wants to go into—and hon. members boast that that is the power which is given to the committee. And once any information under such a reference gets before that committee it is before this House; it is in the press the same day. Everything may be done that hon. members have said must not be done if we are to have any regard at all for efficient management and for the success of the system.

Now, I do not think the hon. member for Marquette understood—there is a habit in this House of sprniging these things suddenly—he did not understand that that was the effect of the amendment. But that is the effect, and that is precisely why the amendment was worded as it is. The only thing that approached an argument in this matter—I do not want to use the language discourteously—or that appealed to me as being most within the region of relevancy was something urged by the member for Sunbury and Queen's.

Mr. FIELDING: Will the hon. gentleman try to get that right, now? It is Shelburne and Queen's.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon; I shall be glad to give it the right designation. There will be a member for Sunbury very soon, but he will be on this side of the House.

Mr. FIELDING: The hon. member is not going to give him a chance.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There will be no mistaking him.

Mr. FIELDING: When he comes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And he will come. My hon. friend's contention was with regard to pensions. The committee, he said, was given carte blanche to make any recommendations to the House that it thought best with regard to pensions and civil reestablishment. That is true, and if the same course could safely have been pursued here it would have been done. But the reason why it could not safely have been pursued here is just the reason which was urged in such strong terms by the hon. member for Marquette; as regards pensions, those reasons would not apply at all. It is because there was the necessity for protecting the management in the running of their concern that restraint was necessary here where no restraint was necessary in respect to pensions. There was nothing that could not be disclosed with respect to pensions at any time without hurting anybody, and that is just the difference.

Now, let me repeat: if we adopt a resolution establishing a committee which shall have power to inquire into all matters relating to the railways owned and controlled by the Government, that makes it a committee so to do, and in order to get information on any subject all a member of the committee has to do is assert in the committee that the subject into which he wishes to inquire relates to the railways owned and controlled by the Government, and he has no right to be stopped. Does the hon. member say that in the Pensions committee, which had a similar deputed power, any one could have prevented an inquiry into any matter relating to pensions? Certainly no one had the power to do so, and the chairman of the committee would have been derelict in his duty if he had prevented any such inquiry. It is the same here.

Mr. TRAHAN: Will the right hon. gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly.

Mr. TRAHAN: Does he think that when a committee has the right to exercise a certain power, it is obliged to exercise it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why, no, it is not obliged to do it; for that matter, the committee does not need to meet. No one is going to exercise physical force to make them do it. But what I say is that if any member of the committee wished to go into any matter, the chairman of the committee, under the authority given in the amendment, has no right whatever to resist it.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the right hon. gentleman permit me a question before he leaves that point? A few moments ago an hon. member brought to the attention of the House a question regarding the closing of a small station in the province of Quebec, a question which he wanted to argue before the committee. Could that be done under the terms of the amendment? He declared that that was exactly what they wanted to do.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There would be nothing in the world to prevent its being discussed and information brought out concerning it, so long as it related to the road.

Mr. CRERAR: If the committee gave its consent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Under the amendment the committee has no discretion.

Mr. FIELDING: Will my hon. friend permit me a question? If the Committee on Public Accounts should endeavour to get information respecting the private and confidential business transactions which a merchant carries on with a customer, what would happen? The committee have the power to go into that, but they will not do it; neither would the committee in this case be unreasonable.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It does not matter how private and confidential it is; if it affects the public business and a member of the committee takes an affidavit that it does, the Committee on Public Accounts does not prevent him from going into it.

Mr. FIELDING: They have the right to refuse, and would always do it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all, if the public interest was affected. I never knew it to be refused, and I sat on the Public Accounts Committee for many years. It is for Parliament to say what shall be within the discretion of the committee. If there is no need for restraint, there will be none; if there is need for restraint, it is for Parliament to say so when it constitutes the committee.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): May I ask my right hon. friend if the committee under the Government's resolution would have the right to seek any information at all about the management of the road?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. I am glad the hon. member rose, because I know that he too is under a misconception. The hon. member at the close of his speech indicated that there was some restraint put on the committee in the reaching for evidence to enable it to come to the conclusions that are therein set out. Under the main motion the committee is under no restraint at all; it can inquire into anything it thinks necessary to inquire into that will assist it in arriving at conclusions on the subjects that are set before it.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): If the committee is to have the power to seek information, why restrict it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The committee has definite objects; it has the discretion to say whether any inquiry is necessary to enable it to reach the objects set out. That discretion is given it by resolution. But in this amendment no objects whatever are set out; the committee is simply given the duty of inquiring into anything at all that relates to the railways.

Mr. CRERAR: If the committee sees fit.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The amendment does not say that; it provides that anything relating to the railways may be gone into. If there were any object set out and it was provided that the committee could decide whether or not it was necessary to go into anything in order to reach that object, that would be all right. But no purposes are set out here; it is merely a blind resolution. It turns the committee out in the dark, and all the committee has to do is to hunt around and see if it cannot find something for no purpose which the committee knows anything about. That is put forward in order to get in this House some votes that will, if possible, vote down the Government's motion.

My contention is that the Government has submitted this motion in good faith for definite, concrete purposes and has made it as wide as there was any possibility of making it, if any regard is to be had for the wisdom of leaving the management some opportunity to make the road a success. If no regard is to be had for that, as hon. gentlemen immediately opposite argue, then certainly there would be no need for any restraint; but if regard is to be had for that, then we have made the very least possible restraint that you can make. I have submitted this, I know, not with any hope that I will change the vote of any hon. member who has declared himself; I could not expect that; but I lay it before the House in the hope that I will change their minds or, at least, give them some grounds for reflection whether they are on solid ground or not, and certainly with the hope that I will convince them that the Government has nothing in the world to conceal for its own purposes; that it has submitted this in the utmost good faith as the furthest step that can be taken, and the best designed to get real and useful results for the country.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): Mr. Speaker, my contribution to this debate will be a brief one, and I will endeavour to confine myself strictly to the point at issue. In the latter regard I know that I will have your cordial good wishes.

Adverting to what was said by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) in the last of his many admirable speeches, may I point out to him, with all respect, that as regards the fears which he has expressed of what would happen if we had what is called parliamentary control, or House of Commons control, of the railway systems of this country, his argument proceeded upon the basis that such a thing apparently had never existed. The Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) enlarged upon that and pictured, for the purpose of creating bogeys to frighten his friends angularly opposite, some terrible things that might ensue. For over fifty years we had parliamentary and House of Commons management of the Intercolonial, and none of the things which were pictured here this evening and this afternoon has ever happened.

Mr. MEIGHEN: All of them happened.

Mr. MURPHY: There was no interference with people; there was no disclosure of information that militated against the Intercolonial. Matters were carried out in a regular and businesslike way through the responsible department. The head of that department made his statement to Parliament, came before Parliament and was interrogated in the usual way regarding the details of his administration of the department and of the railroad committed to his care, so that we are not at all without precedent in connection with that phase of the matter.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): May I ask my hon. friend if the business results have been satisfactory?

Mr. MURPHY: The business results that were obtained were eminently more satisfactory than those that have been obtained since this House abdicated its functions and appointed this irresponsible board. The Prime Minister would have been more effective in the argument that he addressed, particularly to his friends angularly opposite, although towards the conclusion of it he gave up hope of affecting their votes—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not start in time.

Mr. MURPHY:—if he had spoken before the right hon. member for King's (Sir Robert Borden), because that right hon. member's argument destroyed, in advance, the effect of the argument of the Prime Minister. My right hon. friend has just interjected that he did not start in time. His remark reminds me of an Irishman who came running into a railway station just as the train was moving out and who made a similar remark. His friend said: "You did not run fast enough." The Irishman replied: "I ran fast enough, but I did not start soon enough." This was the case with my right hon. friend in attempting to affect the votes of his friends angularly opposite.

Hon. Mr. REID: It was a Scotchman who said that.

Mr. MURPHY: If the Government really desired, through a series of questions to be submitted to a committee to give effect to what is in the mind of the Canadian people at the present time in regard to the railway situation, these are the questions that ought to be submitted to their proposed committee:

(1) What is the total amount of the present railway deficit?
(2) What are the causes that produced that deficit?
(3) What remedy should be applied to prevent a recurrence of railway deficits?

Then, if the Government further desired to go about the matter in a thoroughly practical way, they would invest the committee with the powers prescribed in the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition. But the Government has done nothing of the kind. Instead of submitting practical questions of that kind to be determined by this committee, the Government proposes to submit a set of questions that will entail prolonged discusssion, endless hair-splitting, and, in the end, no practical results. One has only to read the questions to see that standing out in all its nakedness before him. Let me read them:

(1) What information as to operation of Canadian National Railways and Shipping as conducted by the Board of Directors and Management should, in the public interest, be brought down in Parliament on Question, Motion for Production of Papers, or otherwise.
(2) When, by that method, and under what conditions, if any, should such information be given, regard being had for the necessity of securing to Parliament and the public all facts requisite for the determination of policy (including finance), and to the Board of Directors the best possible conditions for efficiency of management.
(3) What system of auditing should be adopted, and what extent of detail should be given in the Annual Report.
(4) Whether and for what purposes the said committee should be continued, and that for the above purposes and for such other purposes as the committee deem in the public interest there be referred to said committee the Annual Report of the Board of Directors and that the said committee have power to examine witnesses under oath, to send for papers, persons, and records, and to report from time to time.

That is not the kind of information that the Canadian people are looking for at the present time and expect this Parliament to obtain. The people expect, yea, the people demand the fullest possible information on the railway situation. On that score, there is complete agreement between those who advocate public ownership and those who advocate private ownership and operation of railways. In support of that, let me read a few extracts from a couple of editorials published immediately after the preceding debate in this House upon this subject. On March 24, last, the Toronto Globe said:

In his speech on the condition of the Government railways Dr. Reid made an appeal for advice as to how the situation could be improved. Obviously the House could not respond to the appeal unless it were put in possession of the facts, and from this point of view there was force in Mr. King's amendment asserting the right of Parliament to full information as to the working of the railways. The taxpayers, who will have to make good a deficit of nearly $70,000,000 this year, have also a right to be informed. The objection that information of this kind might give an unfair advantage to the Canadian Pacific railway, a formidable rival of the Government railways, has not a great deal of weight. The success of the C.P.R. has much more solid foundation than the obtaining of an occasional glimpse into the business of its rivals. Nor is it fair to assume that the amendment moved by the Opposition was actuated by hostility to Government ownership. Public ownership must be accompanied by publicity and responsibility.

Further in the same article the Globe says:

What the House and the country require is not fragmentary information as to details, but a clear understanding of the working of the system, its weaknesses and their causes, with a view to finding a remedy if possible. This is not to be found either in the annual statements of the Minister of Railways or in any accounts or other information submitted to Parliament. Government ownership on so vast a scale is a new departure, and new means of communicating information must be devised.

Still later the same editorial goes on:

The general principle that the House should control the expenditure of public money applies as much to railways as to any other branch of the public business. Public ownership does not mean, or should not mean, the denial of one of the first principles of responsible government.

And again:

The vastness of the system and the huge expenditures it involves are reasons, not for less, but for more information.

Then on the same date the Montreal Gazette, an exponent of the principle of private ownership and operation of railways had this to say in an editorial:

Perhaps as good an illustration as can be found to prove that the National railway has been taken out of politics is the proposed appointment of a Parliamentary Committee to bring it into politics. The absurd pretence that the property of the people can be turned over to an irresponsible Board of Directors compelled the Prime Minister to take up a wrong attitude towards the amendment of Hon. Mr. King on Tuesday evening. The constitutional principle which the leader of the Oppositon invited the House to approve is absolutely unassailable, that principle being "that it is the undoubted right of Parliament to demand and receive copies of all reports, accounts, correspondence and papers in relation to the management of every department of the public service, including the affairs of the Canadian National railways, whether operating directly under the control of a department or under corporate form."

The Government treated Hon. Mr. King's amendment as tantamount to a vote of want of confidence, and as a consequence it was rejected; yet the principle that the people who pay the taxes have a right to know how the proceeds of the taxes are applied survives.

The pretension that to submit the National railway management to the inquisition of Parliament might lead to divulging of important business secrets to the Canadian Pacific Company is not to be taken seriously. We imagine the executive officers of the Canadian Pacific will not sit at the feet of the National Railway Board to learn wisdom. The point, however, is this: who owns the National railways; out of whose pockets come the money to make up the operating and interest charges of that system? The people of Canada own the roads; they and they alone are the proprietors and if the management has been entrusted to half a dozen or more reputable gentlemen, does that deprive the owners of the right to demand an accounting? The truth is that the Government made a false step when it set up the pretence that the National railway was taken out of politics by intrusting its affairs to a government-appointed Board. The National railway has not been taken out of politics; it cannot be taken out of politics; and it should not be taken out of politics. As well contend that the Canadian Pacific Directorate, or that any other corporate institution should not be amenable to its shareholders. It is the last thing to be tolerated that a dozen gentlemen, however estimable, should be given a free hand to do as they will with the property of the people. The Government is accountable to Parliament for its administration of public affairs; why should that accountibility be removed from the men who manage the largest and most important branch of the public service?

The editorial concludes with this statement:

The question is of supreme importance, and the sooner the Government drops the flimsy pretence that the responsibility for the management of the people's railways has been committed to an irresponsible directorate, and is therefore immune from criticism, the sooner will the country arrive at a solution of its most difficult and disturbing problem.

So that the position taken by the hon. leader of the Opposition, as expressed in the amendment that is now before the House, is endorsed as I have said by those who advocate public ownership, as well as by those who advocate private ownership of these great public utilities.

Now, Sir, up to the time the right hon. gentleman the member for King's (Sir Robert Borden) spoke this afternoon, the discussion had proceeded on the assumption that this Government committee which the Government proposes would investigate something, but the right hon. the member for King's made it quite plain that this committee would not investigate anything. In so doing he destroyed practically all the arguments that had been advanced in support of the Government's position up to that time, and he also took the force out of the argument which the leader of the Government addressed to the House just a few moments ago. What did the hon. member for King's say? In rather vigorous language he criticized the position taken by my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) in supporting the amendment, and in doing that he made the definite statement, a very proper statement, I submit, that the purpose of this proposed committee is not to conduct an investigation, but to define a principle. That, Sir, I submit, is precisely the fact, but that, Sir, I again submit, is not what the people of this country expect of any such committee at this present time, and, Sir, in view of that fact, I commend not only the wisdom of my hon. friend from Marquette, and his friends who sit about him, in supporting this amendment, but the greater wisdom of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition in embodying these sound principles in the resolution which he has placed in your hands.

Then the right hon. gentleman from King's said that after defining a principle, and he took good care not to say how many weeks or how many months it would take the committee to define this principle, the committee could come to this House and ask for powers to carry out this principle. Now may I inquire how long the Government intends that this farce should go on? How long is this performance to be kept up about defining a principle and then coming back to this House to find out how you are going to apply that principle, when, and to whom? If the Government are allowed a free hand in the matter, I venture the prophesy, that the leader of the Government will not be able to get away to the Imperial Conference in June next, because long after that time this House will be deliberating some feature of this principle which is to be defined by this committee. Now is it not apparent to everybody who has given a moment's thought to the subject that while the Canadian people are hungering for the facts about the railways, this proposed committee, limited to these four questions, will spend its time debating theories and in discussing academic issues? This committee will not only spend its time in doing that, but in bringing in interim reports to this House, and further time will be taken up in discussing these reports here and in issuing further instructions to this committee. Then in the end what will happen? My hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) expressed grave regret this afternoon that somebody on this side of the House should have even mentioned the prospect of a majority and a minority report. Well, it is not so many years ago that my hon. friend and I served on the Soldiers' Boots Committee of this House, and I recall with a good deal of pleasure that he was then very glad to join in a minority report when the majority in the committee undertook to stifle the facts and prevent them from being known to the House. So majority and minority reports are not as strange to my hon. friend from North Oxford as he would lead the House to believe.

There will be time spent in doing all these things. Then a debate will take place in this House, after the majority and minority reports are brought in here, and finally the majority report will be endorsed by the majority supporting the Government in this House. Well, Mr. Speaker, what period of the year do you think we shall have reached then? We will have gone long past the time when the right hon. gentleman should have sailed for the Imperial Conference, and the country which at this moment expects us to be busy eliciting the facts as to the total amount of the railway deficit and the causes contributing to that deficit, and studying means for providing a remedy to prevent a recurrence of that deficit—the country that expects us to do that will by that time have become so disgusted with this Parliament that the force of public opinion will, I believe, drive these gentlemen to the polls no matter how disinclined they may be to face the electorate.

The situation has been referred to as a serious one. Of course it is. Nothing could be more serious than the railway situation that confronts us to-day. But how is it possible that there should fall from the lips of hon. gentlemen who pictured the gravity of the situation, the proposition that the time of this House and of a committee embodying a large number of members from every section of the House should be occupied in debating theories, in defining a principle, instead of going into matters in a businesslike way and ascertaining the facts. I am glad to see my hon. friend from Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) coming to his seat; he also expressed the hope that this committee would be composed of business men. In that remark I find an echo of some observations heard in this House a few days ago regarding the desirability of having business men and not lawyers on this committee or similar committees. Well, I may point out to my hon. friend from Oxford that a lawyer is the head of the most successful transportation system in this country, if not in the world. The president of the Canadian Pacific Railway is a lawyer; and I might also point out to my hon. friend and those who entertain this idea, that a business man has been the head of the institution that has made the mess we are called upon to deal with at the present time in connection with the Canadian National Railway system. A lawyer is also the head of the great United States Steel Corporation, one of the best managed and most successful institutions in the world; while a business man made the terrible mess of the railway situation in the United States. I could go further in this connection, but it is unnecessary to extend the argument.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend might proceed along that line, keeping in mind the speeches of his leader out in Western Canada.

Mr. MURPHY: True, I could proceed along that line, but the further I went the worse would become the case for the Government; I have already made it bad enough. Now, Mr. Speaker, at this hour I do not intend to detain the House any longer. The Government, in effect, are resorting to a manœuvre to rid themselves of a responsibility which is essentially theirs, and theirs alone. They propose to have a committee prescribe a line of procedure which they themselves, by their attitude in this House, have already made it plain to Parliament and to the country is their policy in regard to railway matters, and they are doing this so as to throw upon Parliament a responsibility, which, as I have already said, is the Government's alone and from which the electors of this country will not allow them to recede.

12 m.

Mr. BUTTS: Will the hon. gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

Mr. BUTTS: Was it not the late Laurier government that made, to use your own words, the greatest mess of the railway situation?

Mr. MURPHY: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before putting the question, I must direct the attention of the House to the fact that a misprint appears in the last line of the second paragraph of the main motion, the word "and" having been inserted instead of the word "for" before the word "efficiency." I think this will be obvious on perusal.

The House divided on the proposed amendment of Mr. Mackenzie King, which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. ROBB: I was paired with the hon. member for North Grey. Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. FIELDING: I was paired with the hon. member for Victoria (Ont.) Had I voted I would probably have voted for the amendment.

Mr. PROULX: I was paired with the hon. member for South Waterloo. Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I was paired with the hon. member for Halton. Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. McDONALD: I was paired with the hon. member for North Huron. Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): I was paired with the hon. member for West Elgin. Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I was paired with the right hon. member for Kings, N.S. Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN: I was paired with the hon. member for Brant. Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. McCURDY: I was paired with the hon. member for Laurier-Outremont. Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Right Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: I was paired with the hon. member for Bonaventure. Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. BONNELL: I was paired with the hon. member for Victoria (Alta.). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): Before the main motion is put I should like to suggest to my right hon. friend the leader of the Government that the motion might well be enlarged in one particular, and I propose to offer an amendment to that effect. I will take only a minute or two in suggesting one or two reasons for it. One of the essential needs to final success in the operation of our national railways and merchant marine, is the complete establishment of confidence on the part of the public in the management and control of the enterprise, and I am bound to say that that confidence will, in large measure, depend upon the freedom from political influence of any kind with the proper administration of the system. Only in such a way also can complete efficiency in management be secured. Now under the present method of handling this matter, the appointment of the Board of Directors, and consequently the control of the management, lies in the hands of the Government. I am not here offering any criticism of the Government for the manner in which that responsibility has been discharged by them in the past, but nevertheless I wish to point out the fact that so long as that condition obtains, whether it is under the present Government or any Government that succeeds it, the possibility of that power being used by the Government of the day for political ends will be present in the minds of a great many people in this country, and it is very desirable, Sir, that it be removed if possible from them.

Now, I quite recognize the difficulty that confronts one in the consideration of this question. It has been said to-night that the people of Canada are the shareholders in this railway system, and that is absolutely and entirely true. At the same time they cannot discharge the functions that are ordinarily discharged by shareholders in a private corporation. On the other hand if the matter is left entirely in the control of the Government, the abuses that I have already referred to will arise as far as the election of directors are concerned and the appointment of the management. It seems to me therefore, Sir, that it would be well if my right hon. friend who leads the Government would consent to an enlargement of the powers of this committee in one particular, and to that end—without any desire to keep the House sitting any longer because I trust I have made my position clear in the short statement I have made—I beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark):

That the motion be amended by adding thereto as clause 5, the following words:

What aproximation, if any, consistent with the responsibility of Parliament in the matter, can be found to the appointment and the control of directors and management ordinarily exercised by shareholders in a private corporation.

I think this is a matter that might well engage the attention of the committee. If we are to reach any sound settlement of this very important question it must, I think, be found, if possible, along the lines I have indicated. I could extend my remarks and amplify the argument in favour of this amendment; but I do not wish to do so at this late hour; it would be a hardship on the House after we have spent so many hours to-day in debate. Therefore, I submit this amendment to my right hon. friend in the best of faith and with an honest desire to help, and I trust he may see his way clear to accept it.

Mr. FIELDING: Will you accept the amendment?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I find myself in general agreement with the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), Mr. Speaker, as regards the object that he has in view, and I am glad to say that I am able to give him another evidence that my argument was correct on the motion in chief, by assuring him that I am prepared to accept the amendment in wider terms than he puts it. Among the subjects to be deputed to the committee for inquiry he suggests:

What approximation, if any, consistent with the responsibility of Parliament in the matter can be found to the appointment and to the control of directors and management ordinarily exercised by shareholders in a private corporation.

What the hon. member has in mind, if I read his amendment correctly, is as to whether or not there might not be appointed in some way some body which would take the place usually occupied by shareholders in relation to a private concern. That is the suggestion the hon. member makes as to a possible improvement in the plan that Parliament has adopted for the management of the system. I would suggest to him that it would be better to make it wider, so as to include not only any recommendation the committee might see fit to make along the line of his amendment, but along any line at all that the committee might feel would be a suggestion looking to the improvement of the general scheme of management. I intimated when the matter was first before the House, that that might be well submitted as a suitable subject for inquiry by the committee, and I know the hon. member will admit in a moment that if it is to be a subject for inquiry, while it should of course be definite, still keeping it definite it should be as wide as it can be made. If, for example, the committee should feel that the Board of Directors might be differently appointed, without establishing any body to take the place of shareholders, or if they might have any other recommendation that they saw fit after inquiry to make, that would enable Parliament to improve the general scheme of management of the system, it should be recommended. The plan now is to appoint, by the Government, a Board of Directors of business men, a president and general manager. If there is any better plan, whether it is along the line the hon. member suggests by his amendment or not, then if this committee can recommend it, it will be of advantage to this House.

I have re-drafted the amendment myself in these words, which I think cover the ground:

What, if any, improvement could be made in the general scheme of management.

That undoubtedly would enable the committe, if they saw fit, to report in favour of just such a plan as the hon. member intimates is in his mind by the amendment that he moves, and it would enable the committee, if they thought there was anything better or anything additional to that, to recommend that as well. I am prepared to accept the amendment in that form. I do not think it would be put in the best shape just in the way it is submitted by the hon. member, first, because it is too confined, and, second because I do not know that the expression means in the ultimate just exactly what the hon member intended it to mean.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) has, of course, exhausted his right to speak, but I am sure that under the circumstances the House will accord him the indulgence of stating whether or not he will accept the substitution suggested by the Prime Minister.

Mr. CRERAR: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the courtesy of the House in extending to me this privilege. I must confess at once that I have not the definiteness and ability in drafting amendments that my right hon. friend the leader of the Government has. Nevertheless, with the statement he has made and the suggestion he has also made for the change in the wording of my amendment, I am quite willing to agree. The main purpose I had in bringing it forward was, if possible, to get some consideration by this committee of this important matter. The change my right hon. friend has made, accompanied by his statement that it would be even broader in its application than the amendment I submitted, is entirely satisfactory to me and I am quite willing that his suggested amendment shall be substituted for mine.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The words should appear, Mr. Speaker, after the word "continued" in the first line of clause 4. That is where the clause really ends; the rest of the motion applies to all the foregoing clauses.

Mr. McMASTER: Might I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that "5" had better take the place of "4" and then that "4" be changed to "5"?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is quite satisfactory.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, the resolution of my right hon. friend related primarily to discovering the methods whereby information could be given to Parliament in respect to the management, control and operation of these National railways. The amendment which is now proposed has to do not so much with the question of information, which is the one that we have been discussing throughout the day, as it has with considering a different method of control and management. As such, it seems to me that it introduces an entirely new subject for the consideration of the committee.

I have already pointed out that I thought the object of the Government in instituting the committee was to get away entirely from the question of disclosing information as fully as this House wishes to have it, and to substitute a series of other questions for the committee to consider. This amendment adds just one more to the list. Much more time of the committee will now be taken up in considering questions of management and control, and we shall probably be put off further than ever from getting the information which we wish to receive. On the other hand, if there is going to be a committee I suppose there is no harm in referring to it any number of questions. The subject dealt with in the amendment now proposed is an important one, which might well be debated in Parliament at any time. But if the reference of one additional question to the committee will have the effect of assisting the Government to discover a policy for itself, I for one have no objection to its addition. At the same time, I should say that the committee as a whole is not acceptable to us on this side of the House, because it is not a committee with power to get full information and to get it at once, but is rather, as I have already stated, a committee for the purpose of engaging in studies of an academic character. While I do not think the proposed committee will meet the purposes which we have in view, there is not enough objection to the reference to it of the additional question to warrant our asking the House to divide on the amendment.

Mr. CAHILL: Before this amendment is adopted I should like to say a word. It would seem from the discussion to-night that this resolution as drafted is not sufficient to meet the requirements of the situation. Would it not be possible for the leader of the Government to have the House moved into Committee of Supply on a given date in order that we may discuss this question and determine just what should be submitted to the proposed committee? I make this simply as a suggestion. I am satisfied that the Government will find themselves in great difficulties even after this proposed committee is appointed, but not nearly in as great difficulties as those with which the country will find itself confronted. We are all looking for a solution of this question. Hon. members opposite accuse the Opposition of playing politics, but certainly hon. gentlemen on this side have had no hand in the playing of politics in regard to these railways. It is the earnest desire of every member of the Opposition, I am sure, to find a solution. It is quite apparent that if this resolution is amended at the eleventh hour—which is after twelve o'clock—it will still be not capable of meeting the conditions. I think the Prime Minister should consider some method of arriving at a committee that would have complete power to handle this whole question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Crerar moves in amendment, seconded by Mr. Clark (Red Deer), that the following be inserted as clause 4:

4. What if any improvement could be made in the general scheme of management.

And that the present clause 4 of the resolution be made clause 5. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Amendment (Mr. Crerar) agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the main motion as amended?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried on division.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Meighen moves, seconded by Sir Henry Drayton:

That a Select Standing Committee on National Railways and Shipping be appointed for the present session, and be instructed to inquire into the following questions:—

(1) What information as to operations of Canadian National Railways and Shipping as conducted by the Board of Directors and Management should, in the public interest, be brought down in Parliament on Question, Motion for Production of Papers, or otherwise.

(2) When, by what method, and under what conditions, if any, should such information be given, regard being had for the necessity of securing to Parliament and the public all facts requisite for the determination of policy (including finance), and to the Board of Directors the best possible conditions for efficiency of management.

(3) What system of auditing should be adopted, and what extent of detail should be given in the Annual Report

4. What if any improvement could be made in the general scheme of management.

5. Whether and for what purposes the said committee should be continued, and that for the above purposes and for such other purposes as the committee deem in the public interest there be referred to said committee the Annual Report of the Board of Directors and that the said committee have power to examine witnesses under oath, to send for papers, persons, and records, and to report from time to time.

The House divided on the motion of Mr. Meighen; as amended, which was agreed to on the following division:

APPENDIX

The statement referred to at page 1755 as ordered to be published in the Debates is given herewith. The statement is accompanied by the following letter:

TORONTO, April 7, 1921.

Dear Dr. REID:—Referring to my letter of yesterday's date, enclosing answers to questions asked in the House by Hon. Mr. Murphy, relative to wages paid on the Canadian National railways.

You will note answer to Question No. 4, showing the monthly earnings paid to certain classes of employees, is based on the regular working hours, but in order to show the effect of the overtime conditions, I am enclosing herewith a memorandum, in duplicate, giving total earnings of twelve agent-operators at different points on the eastern lines of Canadian Northern railway for the years 1916-20, which you may wish to add to our answer to Question No. 4.

Yours very truly,

A. J. MITCHELL,
Vice-President.

The Honourable J. D. REID,
Minister of Railways & Canals,
Ottawa, Ont.

Question 4 of the series asked by Hon. Charles Murphy (Russell) on 7th instant. is as follows:

4. What are the monthly earnings as compared with 1916 for the following classes of employees working full regular working hours:—Shop Mechanics, Carmen, Agents and Operators, Freight Shed Men, Trackmen, Bridge and Building Men?

The statements given in answer to the series of questions, including the No. 4 above, will be found appended to the Debates of 7th instant. The supplementary statement ordered to be published in the present issue follows:

QUESTION 4— MEMORANDUM

The earnings per month shown for the various classes of employees are exclusive of overtime for emergency service. We are, however, showing below a statement prepared for the years 1916 and 1920 showing the total earnings of 12 agents, which will show that the total earnings are greatly affected by overtime conditions. We would, however, point out the stations referred to were some of the stations where the highest amount of overtime had been paid, and does not mean that every station would be affected the same way, as far as the individual earnings are concerned, as at points where it is found more economical to add an extra operator it is done, rather than pay overtime. However, the expense to the Railway is practically the same whether it is paid in overtime or for additional staff, due to the eight hour day. The earnings shown below would be further increased through the application of Decision No. 2 of the United States Railway Labour Board dated July 20th, 1920.

CIVIL SERVICE—LIST OF RETIREMENTS

Hon. J. A. CALDER (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): Mr. Speaker, I beg to lay on the table of the House the First Annual Report of the Civil Service Commission on its Operations under the Act respecting the Retirement of Certain Members of the Public Service, as required by section 7, chapter 67, 10-11 George V. In other words, it is a report of the retirements made during the calendar year 1920 under the Retirement Act passed at the last session.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REFERENCE TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE

On the Order being called, "Motions:"

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am ready to move the motion for the appointment of the special railway committee of the House, authority for which was given in the form of a resolution passed on Friday, but owing to the absence of the leader of the Opposition I defer it for the present. Later in the afternoon I shall move that we revert to this Order.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

PECUNIARY CLAIMS CONVENTION

Mr. DEMERS:

1. Does the Board of Arbitration, established pursuant to a convention called "Pecuniary Claims Convention" to give award upon the claims of money existing between the British Empire and the United States, among which are included the claims of Canadian hay dealers for overpaid rates of duty, still exist?

2. If so, does the Government know when the reopening of the sittings of said Board, which have been suspended since 1914, will take place?

3. Does the Government intend to take steps toward the resumption of the hearings of said Board in a near future?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN: I am informed that this question was answered on March 10 and that it appears on page 774 of Hansard. Perhaps it had better stay on the Order Paper, however, as the hon. member who put the question is not in his seat.

Question stands.

DAYLIGHT SAVING

Mr. ETHIER:

1. Is the Government aware that in certain sections of the country daylight saving has been prescribed as from May 1 to October 1 next?

2. Is the Government aware that the change from solar time thus separately fixed, in various parts of the country, is such as to bring about great confusion and actual inconvenience, patricularly to the rural communities?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to pass legislation in this connection, through the enactment of a uniform statute providing for the regulation of the time throughout the Dominion?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER:

1. The Government is aware, through reports in newspapers and otherwise, that daylight saving has been prescribed, as from May 1 to October 1 and other dates, in certain sections of the country.

2. The Government is not prepared to go into any explanations nor to give any information with reference to that complex question.

3. It is not the intention of the Government to pass legislation, through the enactment of a uniform statute, providing for the regulation of the time throughout the Dominion.

BLOOD INDIAN RESERVE

*Mr. MOLLOY:

1. Did the Government of Canada in the year 1883 make and conclude a treaty with the Blood Indians in which it was provided that there should be reserved for the use of the said Blood Indians forever that tract of land in Southern Alberta known as the Blood Reserve?

2. How many cattle belonging to the Blood Indians and to the Indian Department were on the Blood Reserve during the fiscal year 1917-18, according to the reports of the Indian Agent?

3. How many Blood Indian horses were on the reserve at that time, according to the same authority?

4. Were there in the said year approximately 10,000 head of white ranchers' cattle grazing on the Blood Reserve with the consent of the Indians and under a formal grazing concession (or a renewal thereof) granted by the Indians themselves some fifteen years before, with the approval of the department and continuously utilized during that period?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN:

1. The treaty, being a public document, speaks for itself.
2. 3,300.
3. 3,462.
4. No.

*Mr. WHITE:

1. What is the total number of cattle and horses that were already on the Blood Reserve when the Government started its greater production campaign on Indian Reserves in the Spring of 1918?
2. What income from the grazing on their reserve of cattle and horses belonging to white people did the Blood Indians receive for 1917?
3. Was the Blood Reserve one of the Indian Reserves classified by the Minister of the Interior as largely vacant and unutilized when he was answering objections to the passage of the amendment to the Indian Act on April 23, 1918, as reported in Hansard, pages 1048 to 1055?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN:

1. Cattle 3,300, horses 3,677.
2. $10,250.
3. Yes.

*Mr. WHITE:

1. How many grazing leases of portions of the Blood Reserve were issued in 1918 by officers of the Department of Indian Affairs?
2. Was the leasing done by public tender?
3. Who authorized the granting of leases on the Blood Reserve without asking or obtaining the consent of the Indian owners?
4. Under what law were the grazing leases of 1918 on this Reserve issued?
5. Does the Government believe that war urgency is a valid excuse for breaking treaties?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN:

1. 38.
2. No.
3. Answered by No. 4.
4. Under authority of Order in Council of February 16, 1918, and section 4, Cap 26, 8-9 George V.
5. Answered by No. 4.

*Mr. MOLLOY:

1. Did a delegation of prospective lessees come to Ottawa in the early months of 1918 to secure leases on the Blood Reserve from the Government? If so, on what date?
2. Who were the delegates, and who was the member or representative of the Government with whom they discussed the matter in Ottawa?
3. Did the Indian Department, or any of its executive officers, without obtaining the consent of the Indians, grant a number of grazing leases on the Blood Reserve in the spring of 1918?
4. If so, for how long a term were said leases granted?

[Mr. Molloy.]

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Yes, under authority of Order in Council of February 16, 1918, and section 4, Cap. 26, 8-9 George V.
4. One year term renewable yearly up to five years, and subject to termination upon giving six weeks' notice in writing.

*Mr. WHITE:

1. Is the Government aware that certain Blood Indians were by the Greater Production leases of 1918 deprived of their means of living on the reserve and have since been obliged to roam about the surrounding country hunting odd jobs by which to support their families?
2. Is it the intention of the Government to continue the said grazing leases on the Blood Reserve for 1921?
3. How many Blood Indians are at present homeless as the result of the said Greater Production leases of 1918 and the continuation thereof in 1919 and 1920?
4. Is it the intention of the Government to repeal the amendment of the Indian Act under which these dispossessions took place?
5. Has the Indian Department offered compensation to any of the dispossessed Indians? If so, when, to whom, and what was the compensation offered?
6. If not, why?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN:

1. No.
2. Yes, if it is in the interest of the Indians to do so.
3. Answered by No. 1.
4. It is not the intention of the Government to introduce any amendments to the Indian Act during the present session. (See answer No. 1).

5 and 6. Answered by No. 1.

*Mr. SHAW:

1. What revenue has been received for the Indians owning the various reserves in Saskatchewan and Alberta from grazing leases since the spring of 1918?
2. What rentals were previously received for the benefit of the Indians from these lands?
3. What amount of the total revenue was received on account of the Blood Reserve and credited to the Blood Indians?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN:

1. $321,976.
2. $10,000.
3. $97,190.

*Mr. SHAW:

1. Who was the agent of the Blood Reserve from June, 1908, to June, 1911?
2. Did the financial inspector of the department report on the cattle conditions of this reserve in July, 1911?
3. What was the nature of his reports?
4. Did the agent refuse to sign the statement of the cattle owners?
5. How many cattle were there on the Blood Reserve according to the statements of the agent in 1909?

6. How many were found on the reserve in 1911 when the cattle were dipped for mange?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN:

1. R. N. Wilson.
2. Yes.
3. The inspector reported as follows:

The cattle business which should be the greatest industry here has for some years been declining at a tremendous rate. The agent's annual report shows that in 1909 they had 7,348 head, which in 1910 had fallen to 5,285 head, or a loss of 2,063 head, which, if estimated at $30 each, would represent $61,890, and the calf crop had fallen from 1,667 to 980 in one year. At the count this year which was made during the dipping for mange, and which can be relied upon as nearly correct as can be made under the circumstances, the count was 2,934, and 459 calves branded in addition. This makes a loss to the herd of 2,351 head, which at an average of $30 per head represents $70,530, or a loss in two seasons of over $132,000 in value, besides a reduction in the calf crop from 1,667 in 1909 to 459 in 1911, although it is altogether likely there will be more calves dropped this year. It will be noted that there are only 912 cows left and 98 two-year-old heifers. These are the classes that a hard winter affects the most here, because nothing was done to provide against the cold weather, no hay was put up, the calves were not weaned, and the yearling heifers were not kept away from the bulls. Consequently when the severe weather came the calves sapped the strength of the cows, and the heifers raising two years, heavy with calf and maturing their bodies, were not able to stand it. I cannot understand how everything was allowed to go on so recklessly after the previous year's loss. I asked the stockman how it happened that no preparations were made, and his reply was characteristic, that "the agent would rather provide a diamond ring for the engineer than a toothpick for the stockman."

4. Yes.
5. 7,348.
6. 3,393.

*Mr. WHITE:

1. How many leases were granted for grazing purposes on the northern end of the Blood reserve in 1918 under the Greater Production scheme?
2. Approximately, what was the total acreage covered by said north end leases?
3. How many of said leases fixed a limit as to the number of live stock to be grazed and in such cases how many head of stock were allowed to each section of 640 acres?
4. Were any of the above lessees compelled to fence their leases?
5. How many of the above class of leases, on the Blood reserve in 1918, were free of both fencing conditions and restrictions as to the number of stock brought on to the reserve under them?
6. Did these leases give the holders thereof practically unlimited grazing privileges over the unleased portion of the Blood Reserve?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN:

1. 21.
2. 43,299.78 acres.
3. None.
4. No.
5. All.
6. No.

*Mr. MOLLOY:

1. Was that southwestern portion of the Blood reserve containing approximately 40,000 acres and habitually used by the Blood Indians for hay-making and as a winter grazing range for their cattle leased by an official of the Indian Department to white men in 1918?
2. Was access to the said land by the Blood Indian cattle herds shut off by the construction in 1918 of a 12 or 13 mile fence dividing the said area from the rest of the reserve?
3. Has the attention of the Government been called to the fact that in 1918 a large portion of the hay land, upon which the Blood Indians were dependent for the feeding of their cattle and the support of their families, was leased by the Indian Department to white men?
4. What quantity of hay was removed from the Blood Reserve by the Greater Production lessees during the fiscal year 1918-19?
5. What quantity of hay and straw was removed from the Blood reserve by the "Production" lessees during the fiscal year 1919-20?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN:

1. Grazing leases were granted on the southwest portion of the Blood Reserve in 1918 in order to produce revenue for the Blood Indians, ample areas remaining for the support of the Indians' cattle.
2. No.
3. Answered by Nos. 1 and 2.
4 and 5. The Department of Indian Affairs has no information that any quantity of hay and straw was removed from the Blood reserve by the greater production lessees during the fiscal years 1918-19 and 1919-20.

*Mr. SHAW:

1. In what year did the Blood Indians first engage in the business of raising cattle?
2. How many cattle were supplied by the Department of Indian Affairs in that year?
3. Who took charge of the Blood reserve in 1903, and when did he leave the service of the department?
4. How many cattle were on the reserve when he took charge?
5. How many cattle did he report to be on the reserve in 1905, 1906, and 1907 respectively?
6. How many cattle were found to be on the reserve when he left the service of the department?

Right Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

1. 1894.
2. 50.
3. R. N. Wilson was appointed by Order in Council of December 21, 1903, to take charge from February 1, 1904. His resignation was accepted June 15, 1911.

4. 3,519.
5. 1905, 6,000; 1906, 7,500; 1907, 7,621.
6. 3,393.

CAMP BORDEN—AEROPLANES

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough):

1. How many aeroplanes are now in commission at Camp Borden?
2. What was their total initial cost?
3. How much was expended on repairs during the year 1920?
4. What was the total expenditure for the staff and the wages of all operators and employees for the year 1920?
5. How many planes were wrecked at this camp since the armistice?
6. What has been the total expenditure for all purposes in connection with the maintenance of this camp since the armistice?

Hon. Mr. GUTHRIE:

1. 59.
2. Nil.
3. $29,814.66.
4. $130,925.15, including pay and allowances of all officers and airmen.
5. 6.
6. $33,959.50.

CANADIAN CITIZENS' WAR CLAIMS

Mr. DUFF:

1. What are the number of claims received by the Government from Canadian citizens, for damages sustained and loss of property by the depredations of German submarines during the period of the war?
2. What are the amounts of the said claims, for loss of goods and for loss of shipping?
3. What is the total amount of saleable assets at present in the hands of the Government which formerly belonged to the German government or German citizens?
4. Will the Canadian Government, following the example of United States and Great Britain, settle the claims of Canadian citizens and pay to them the reparation due them? If so, when?

Hon. Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1. 459.
2. (a) Loss of life and damage to persons, number of claims, 105, $1,452,-194.06; (b) Loss of merchandise and personal effects, number claims, 320, $900,-785.64; (c) Loss of shipping, number for claims, 28, $17,105,904.94; total, $19,458,-884.64.
3. This amount can only be estimated, $23,000,000.
4. There is no legal claim for payment of reparation. Such claims cannot, therefore, be said to be due. The Government is not aware of any policy respecting payment of claims for reparation announced by the Government of the United States. The policy of the United Kingdom was announced by the then Chancellor of the Exchequer on May 4, 1920, as follows:

[Mr. Meighen.]

But His Majesty's Government recognize that in particular cases, while there can be no legal claim, a private individual may have a strong moral claim for compensation for sufferings or damage for which it will be the desire of Parliament to make provision. They propose, therefore, to set aside a sum of £5,000,000 out of the first receipts on account of reparation which are allocated to the Exchequer of the United Kingdom as distinct from the British Empire (which cannot be till after payment has been made for the cost of the Armies of Occupation) to be used as fund out of which payments can be made to individuals as an act of grace on the part of His Majesty's Government.

MONTREAL INLAND REVENUE OFFICES

Mr. RINFRET:

1. Is it true that the offices of Inland Revenue Department, at Montreal, have been transferred into the Customs building?
2. If so, for what reason?
3. Is it the intention of the Government to change the number of employees of the Inland Revenue Department, at Montreal?

Hon. Mr. WIGMORE:

1. The Inland Revenue offices at Montreal have been transferred to the Customs building.
2. Consolidation of Customs and Inland Revenue services.
3. The question of reducing the Customs and Inland Revenue staff is under consideration.

HIGHWAY GRANTS—SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. WRIGHT:

1. For how many highways in the province of Saskatchewan has a project statement been approved by the Minister of Railways for Federal grants under The Canada Highways Act, chapter 54 of the Statutes of Canada, 1919?
2. What are the highways in respect to which agreements for Federal aid have been reached between the province of Saskatchewan and the Minister of Railways?
3. Have any sums been paid to the province of Saskatchewan under the Canada Highways Act?
4. If so, what is the total amount up to March 31, 1921?
5. To what road or roads do these payments apply?

Hon. Mr. REID (Grenville):

1. 3.
2. Cadillac-Battleford highway, Section "G," extending from Battleford to North Battleford, a distance of 2½ miles.

Assiniboia-Prince Albert highway, Section "B," extending from Crestwynd to Moose Jaw, a distance of 25 miles; Section "D," extending from N.E. 36-19-27-2 to N.E. 32-20-26-2, a distance of 9 miles; Section "G," extending from N.E. 33-34-27-2 to Dana, a distance of 25 miles.

Big River-Prairie River highway, Section "A," extending from Big River to S.E. 6-43-7-2, a distance of 16-1/4 miles; Section "F," extending from Prince Albert to Shellbrook a distance of 26½ miles.

3. No.
4. Answered by No. 3.
5. None.

HIGHWAY GRANTS—ALBERTA

Mr. REDMAN:

1. For how many highways in the province of Alberta has a project statement been approved by the Minister of Railways for Federal grants under "The Canada Highways Act," chap. 54 of the Statutes of Canada, 1919?
2. What are the highways in respect to which agreements for Federal aid have been reached between the province of Alberta and the Minister of Railways?
3. Have any sums been paid to the province of Alberta under the Canada Highways Act?
4. If so, what is the total amount up to March 31, 1921?
5. To what road or roads do these payments apply?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. None. The general plan of roads to be improved under the Canada Highways Act has been approved by the minister, but no separate projects have yet been submitted by the province.
2. None.
3. No.
4. None.
5. None.

GRIFFENHAGEN AND ASSOCIATES

Mr. ETHIER:

1. Are Messrs. Griffenhagen and Associates still in the employ of the Government?
2. If so, what is the nature of their present work?
3. Does the Government intend to dispense with their services? If so, when?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Answered by No. 1.

Some members of the Griffenhagen and Associates are still employed under supervision of the sub-committee of Council and in conjunction with the Civil Service Commission in carrying out the reorganization already begun in the Post Office Department, and the Department of Customs and Inland Revenue.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. ETHIER:

1. How many civil servants were appointed to permanent positions on April 1, 1921, and what are the names of such employees?
2. What is the classification of each of the said employees and the department in which they are employed?
3. What is the date of their first appointment to a temporary position?
4. Upon whose recommendation have said employees been made permanent?
5. Have other temporary employees been recommended for permanency? If so, when will they be so appointed?

Mr. CURRIE:

1. How many promotions have been made in each grade in each separate department of the Inside Service in Ottawa for the year ending April 4.
2. How many of these promotions were made on account of qualifications obtained through Civil Service examinations?
3. How many promotions were made without qualifying certificates being held by the candidates as a result of having taken the Civil Service examinations?
4. How many promotions were made in each department without reference to Civil Service examination and without classification?

Mr. MYERS:

1. How many officials are now employed by the Canadian National Railway system in the traffic and operating departments?
2. How many officials were employed by the Canadian Northern Railway in the traffic and operating departments prior to the Government taking over the system?
3. How many officials were employed by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway in the traffic and operating departments prior to the Government taking over the system?
4. How many officials were employed by the Canadian Government railways, namely, the Intercolonial and Transcontinental, in the traffic and operating departments prior to the amalgamation of the companies into the Canadian national system?
5. What was the total cost in connection with wrecks on the Canadian national railway on the line between Saskatoon and Calgary for the year 1920?
6. Was the cost of wrecks charged up to operating expenses or to capital account?
7. What was the total detention expenses on the Canadian railway between Saskatoon and Calgary for the year 1920?
8. Why is it that certain equipment of the Canadian national railway is charged to operation expenses instead of capital account?
9. What is the total amount charged to capital account for the year 1920 in connection with Canadian national railways?

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. SMITH:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, petitions and other documents exchanged between the Dominion Government and the Ontario Provincial Government or any ministers of either administration, relative to the removal of the British embargo on Canadian cattle.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough):

For a copy of all telegrams, correspondence, petitions or other documents exchanged between the Government of Prince Edward Island and the Federal Government relative to the taking over and operating of the Dalton Sanitorium by the Federal Government and the handing back of the same to the Government of Prince Edward Island.

SULLY, QUEBEC, PROPOSED STATION

On the notice of Motion:

Mr. GAUVREAU:

For a copy of all letters, correspondence, petitions, financial statements and all other documents, exchanged between the settlers of Sully and along the National Transcontinental in the county of Temiscouata, and the Superintendent of the Government railways in connection with the erection of a station at Sully, Quebec.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN: It occurs to me that as the mover of this motion is here, he would probably consent to the motion being transferred to the committee which was ordered by the House on Friday.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Yes.

Motion dropped.

MURRAY BAY-TADOUSSAC—PROPOSED STEAMSHIP SERVICE

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Montmorency) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, an up-to-date steamship service should be established between Murray Bay situated in Charlevoix County and Tadoussac in Saguenay County.

He said: Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of my remarks I think it is well that I make plain to the House that the steamship service which I ask the Government to establish between Murray Bay and Tadoussac is especially for the fall, winter and spring months. It may be that the House is not familiar with conditions that prevail in that part of the province of Quebec, and I would like hon. members to bear with me for a few minutes in order that I might make my position clear. In the month of October when the Canada Steamships line ceases its summer service in that part of the district, the people of Tadoussac and other parts below, as far as Belle-Isle, and further down the river, rely, for communication with the district of Quebec, upon the service of a small ferry boat between Tadoussac and Baie Ste. Catherine. A few years ago there was in operation in the province of Quebec, in connection with the Department of Railways and Canals, a ferry boat service running between Rivière Ouelle and Murray Bay, conducted by the C. G. S. Champlain. This service was discontinued at the time when the Quebec and Saguenay railway was put into operation in 1919. At that time I succeeded in obtaining from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne), with the asistance of the Department of Trade and Commerce, that this steamer which was making the service between the north and south shores, would be transferred for the fall, winter and spring months to the service between Murray Bay and Tadoussac, calling at intermediate points, Cap à L'Aigle, Ste. Fidele, St. Simeon, Baie Ste. Catherine, and crossing over to Tadoussac. This steamer, I am told, made twenty-eight or thirty trips in 1919, until last spring when finally the service had to be discontinued because the boat was sold to the Gulf of St. Lawrence Navigation Company, Quebec. Since that time, I have been endeavouring on numerous occasions, through communications, petitions and letters addressed to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and also through communications addressed to the Department of Trade and Commerce, to have established a new means of communication between that part of my county, Murray Bay, Cap à L'Aigle, St. Fidele, St. Simeon, Baie Ste. Catherine and Tadoussac, but I have always met with a refusal on the part of the Government. The Government contends that the service which at present exists between Baie Ste. Catherine and Tadoussac is sufficient. There is, I admit, a certain little boat which is supposed always to transport the mail from Tadoussac to Baie Ste. Catherine and vice versa. I have received numerous letters about this boat, and I am informed that it is quite inadequate for the needs of the people. I understand that it is only about 12 feet in length, and that very often during the heavy storms in the spring and fall and winter it is unable to cross from one side of the river to the other. I hold in my hand a letter from a gentleman who is well known in the district of Quebec, Mr. D. H. Pennington, a prominent lumber and timber merchant, who writes under date of March 16, as follows:

Mr. CASGRAIN, M.P.,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—I am owner of Mille Vache Seigniory in the county of Saguenay, and I had occasion to drive down there last week, and I was surprised when I arrived at Baie St. Catherine to cross over to Tadoussac, to find nothing but a small canoe about 12 feet long, to cross the Saguenay river; that is all they have there to cross passengers and mails now, and when there is a wind blowing you cannot cross and when it is fine it certainly is not very agreeable.

With all the lumber operations that are now going on below the Saguenay, it is a downright shame for the public, and the very important mails to be subject to such treatment, and they tell me that only a few days before I crossed, that half the mail bags went adrift and were picked up out of the water. No doubt it is too late to do much for this winter, but other winters are coming.

This Mr. Pennington is the owner of a large pulp mill, the Saguenay Lumber Company, at Mille Vaches. There are also other pulp mills of great importance in that district, and nearer Murray Bay, at St. Siméon there are pulp mills conducted by the MacLaren people and by the Provincial Industries Limited. Then there is another mill in which my hon. friend from Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Brouillard) is heavily interested. Very often in the winter when the people down there have requisitioned supplies, the supplies have been sent as far as Murray Bay, and from there they have had to be taken by sleigh for thirty-five or forty miles to Baie Ste. Catherine, and from there the supplies have to take their chance in crossing the river in this little canoe of which I have spoken. When in company with Mr. Philippe Dufour, the local member for the county, who lives at Murray Bay, I took this matter up with the Department of Trade and Commerce, I was informed that it did not come within the jurisdiction of the Federal authorities, and that the Department of Trade and Commerce could do nothing in the matter because it was a river wholly within a province, and the ferry should be supplied by the Provincial Government. I took issue with the department on that point at that time, and I was very much surprised to find out to-day that not only the Department of Trade and Commerce entertained that opinion but the Department of Finance also. Some time ago I put a question on the Order Paper asking what was to be done with regard to the petitions for a better service that had been sent in by the people in that part of the country and I received the following reply on March 8:

Mr. Casgrain:

1. Has the Government through the Department of Marine and Fisheries and Post Office, received any petitions or demands for a steamer service between Baie Ste. Catherine and Tadoussac, in the County of Saguenay, under the control of the Government.

2. Has the Government considered the necessity and advisability of such a service being granted?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to grant the request contained in the said petitions?

Sir Henry Drayton:

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. Upon consideration of the Department of Marine and Fisheries it was decided that as this was a ferry service it should be supported by the Provincial Government.

I join issue with the Government on that very point. It is clear by the British North America Act that navigable rivers come under the control of the federal authorities. In fact, a few years ago there was some trouble in the county I have the honour to represent, at Baie St. Paul, where a certain lumber company had erected dams along the river. The Government by Order in Council last year compelled them to demolish those dams. There is proof that the Government or their experts considered this a navigable river and, as such, coming within the control of the federal authorities. Furthermore, I am informed that recently when a bridge was built on the St. Charles river, the Provincial Government had to obtain the consent of the federal authorities before construction could be commenced. Surely, a navigable river of the width and length of the Saguenay, which is two-and-a-half miles across at the place I am speaking of, comes within the jurisdiction of the federal authorities.

I do not want to detain the House much longer, but I should like to draw the attention of the Government to the contract which now exists between the Post Office Department and the person who is taking the mails across at that point. It is in French, and reads as follows:

L'entrepreneur devra effectuer la traverse de la rivière Saguenay aussitôt que possible après son arrivée à la Baie Sainte-Catherine, ou après son départ de Tadoussac, quand bien même il serait obligé de se servir d'un yacht à cet effet.

I am told that this clause in the contract was never put into effect. If it had been put into effect, the contractor would have been forced to secure a yacht or some vessel of sufficient capacity to enable him to take care of the passenger traffic at that point as well as the mails. As the Government apparently does not want this man to live up to the letter of his contract, I have presented this resolution, in order to obtain from the Government the grant of a subsidy or assistance from the Department of Marine and Fisheries in the way of a Government boat between Murray Bay and Tadoussac, stopping at the places I have mentioned.

Last year, when this matter come up on the Estimates of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, I drew the attention of the House to the fact that in that matter the Government was entering upon an adventurous policy, the advantages of which had not been shown, and the results of which were very doubtful. I said that the Government surely ought to be able to spare a few hundred thousand dollars to provide a boat service for the people in that part of the country. I blamed the Government at that time for not taking proper steps to provide a service, and I again, this year, make the same complaint, and would urge upon the Government that a subsidy be granted as was done a few years ago, or that a regular boat service be provided by the Government for the people in that part of the country which I represent. I think the merchant marine in this way would be performing better service than by doing what it is now, sailing the seven seas. A boat of 100 tons could perform this service and call at the different ports, and I am sure that if the merchant marine performed service of this kind instead of what it is now doing the deficit on the merchant marine would not be so big as it was last year.

Mr. SAVARD (Chicoutimi-Saguenay): (Translation.) The subject of my hon. friend's resolution (Mr. Casgrain) would perhaps concern my constituency more than his own. I therefore heartily endorse this resolution. The facts of the case have been so ably put forward by the hon. member that I have very little to add to what he has already said. However, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will make a few remarks on the subject. The population of the whole county of Saguenay and of the Northern Coast, which includes a great number of parishes and some very important industries, has been since two or three years, absolutely isolated from the rest of this country, on account of the niggardliness of this Government.

Some years ago the firm of Price, one of the largest business concerns in the province of Quebec, had an important mill at St. Catherine's. As it was necessary to communicate with the North Shore, the firm maintained a ferry service between St. Catherine and Tadoussac, thus benefiting the North Shore's population from Tadoussac to Labrador by giving it the means of communication. This company maintained its ferry service during many years, but having finally shut down its plant at St. Catherine, had no further interest in continuing the ferry. It was then that the Saguenay people asked the Government, at that time under the leadership of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, for the necessary assistance to maintain the ferry between St. Catherine and Tadoussac. The Government having understood the importance of the request and the necessity for the people of the Northern Shore to communicate with the rest of the country, immediately granted about three thousand dollars. With the aid of this subsidy those interested hired a fine boat and organized a daily service between St. Catherine and Tadoussac, which continued without interruption during the winter. I did not expect to speak upon this question so I have not the exact dates at hand, but it was some years ago before I had the honour to sit in this House, that the right hon. Minister of Commerce, as my hon. friend the member from Charlevoix has just stated, cut off this subsidy, claiming that as a ferry-boat this service should be subsidized by the Provincial Government of Quebec. In consequence that part of the country is isolated. I do not know whether the member then representing these people made any effort to prevent this crying injustice, perhaps one of the greatest committed by the Government. I do not mention these facts simply because it is a part of the population of my county that suffers from this state of affairs; I cannot believe that the right hon. Minister of Commerce has understood the importance of keeping the population of the North Shore in touch with the rest of the country, and the injustice these people are suffering through his department. I refuse to believe that, to save a few hundreds or thousands of dollars, this service has been cut off, depriving of communication an intelligent population that has given soldiers to the country, many of whom sleep their last sleep in Flanders. Even while admitting that the Government was not absolutely obliged to maintain this steamboat service, due consideration should have been taken of the great inconvenience caused by its suppression, especially at a time when millions of dollars are being thrown to the four winds and when twenties and even hundreds of millions are being talked about for ships that we claim are absolutely useless. To deprive this population of a service which is absolutely necessary in order to save a few thousand dollars, as a serious mistake, and I to not believe that the right hon. Minister of Commerce has realized the injustice committed by his department, for if he had, he would not have cut off this subsidy. I do not know whether the member who represented this county before me endeavoured to prevent this injustice being committed, but I am inclined to think not; for I imagine that the then member had influence enough with the Government to prevent it. I will further say that there was laid upon the table on September 19th, or October 19th, 1918, a letter from Mr. Girard, former member for Chicoutimi, addressed to the Hon. Postmaster General, in which he said, referring to the assistance asked for by the Priest of Tadoussac and also myself, to permit a gasoline launch service to carry the mail between St. Catherine and Tadoussac, that it was useless. I can, then, only conclude, since he had the courage, not to call it the cowardice, to affirm that this little ferry service was useless, that he did not do his duty towards his electors when the right hon. Minister of Commerce cut off this subsidy in 1916.

I have had occasion to talk with the right hon. Minister of Commerce on this subject, and he told me, as I have just said, that it was a ferry service, and should be looked after by the province of Quebec. He added, "the province of Quebec is so flourishing, its coffers are so full of money, that it would be easy for it to give some thousands of dollars to this population to permit it to communicate with the rest of the country." I did not contest his statement concerning the finances of the province of Quebec, because if ever there was a true statement, it is that one.

I had the occasion, at the time, to meet Sir Lomer Gouin, the Prime Minister of the province of Quebec, whom I apprized of the opinion of the right hon Minister of Trade and Commerce. The latter had told me: "consult Sir Lomer Gouin on this matter and let me know what he thinks about it." This I did, in the course of a pretty long conservation I had with him; Sir Lomer Gouin stated that the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce was certainly mistaken, and that he would endeavour to show him so when he next came to Ottawa.

Sir Lomer Gouin came up to Ottawa a few days later, but he did not meet the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, as the latter had left the Capital to go to Europe. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean), the then acting minister, would not intervene, although he was fully convinced of the justice of the case, nor would he alter the decision which the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce had taken. The Question remained as it stood. These people were deprived of all means of communication during the long winter months. Deprived of every means of communication, I stated, but let there be no mistake: They had a mail service every eighth day, but at times they would be without it for a fortnight.

A population as that which inhabits that immense territory extending from Tadoussac to Labrador, a territory composed of from fifteen to twenty parishes, numbering from twelve to fifteen thousand inhabitants and in which important industries are established, is deprived of a postal service during whole weeks. To my mind, any intelligent people would but need a knowledge of such conditions to be unanimous in calling it an indignity, an infamy perpetrated on that population. I must say that I did all I could to obtain from the Government some relief for these citizens, and that we have succeeded to some extent, not through the Rt. Hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, but through the Postmaster General. The hon. member for Charlevoix is now proposing a resolution which I fully approve, and I would be very glad if it were readily accepted by the Government.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve—Gaspé): As a summer resident of the district under consideration, I desire to support the motion made by the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Casgrain). There is a very large population at the mouth of the river Saguenay in the county of Charlevoix, and as my hon. friend the member for Chicoutimi-Saguenay (Mr. Savard) has said, there is also a large population on the other side of the river from Tadoussac to Belle Isle. There are at least twenty or twenty-five large fishing posts besides the Hudson's Bay posts in that district, and trade has been improving of late years, especially in view of the establishment of a large pulp industry. I might mention the Clarke establishment at Seven Islands, for instance, and several others. The district is certainly going to prosper, and the mouth of the river Saguenay ought not to be considered as a minor outlet. Considering its expanse, I should be inclined to compare it to an arm of the sea; and I might mention to the right hon. gentleman (Sir George Foster), that it is navigable in all seasons. For many years the department over which I presided, the Post Office Department and the Department of Trade and Commerce, I think, subsidized the steamer service between Fraserville and Baie Ste. Catherine; and, much to the surprise of the navigators in the Quebec district, a tug-boat could even in winter perform the service between Fraserville, on the south shore, and Baie Ste. Catherine on the north shore. That little service gave excellent satisfaction for many years. I do not know whether it is still maintained; but I claim, at all events, that between the extremity of the county of Charlevoix and the beginning of the north shore settlements, there should be maintained a ferry service subsidized by the Government. The right hon. gentleman says that it ought to be subsidized by the province of Quebec. Technically he may be right; but I will remind him that in those far-away districts, where the habitations are scanty, and the posts are widely scattered, the Federal Government is usually somewhat generous towards the population. As we know, the Federal Government is not obliged to subsidize roads and highways. It is true that some years ago we passed a statute granting to the various provinces some subsidies which have to be spent according to certain fixed rules. Since Confederation, however, in the county of Gaspé, which I have the honour to represent, the Marine Department has maintained, on the northern portion of the peninsula, what is, known as the Maritime Road. That road in the county of Gaspé covers a considerable distance from Ste. Anne des Monts to Fame Point. Until very recently that highway has been maintained by the Federal Government because it was necessary to have it in good order for the repairs of the various lighthouses. I do not know whether the Marine Department has ceased subsidizing that road. At all events I know that since Confederation it has been maintained by the Dominion Government because around all these light houses and in all these little coves there are fishing posts. I claim, Mr. Speaker, that the case is analogous to that which has been presented to the House this afternoon by my hon. friend from Charlevoix. The county of Charlevoix is a large county, and the county of Chicoutimi still larger. Indeed it runs from Tadoussac, the oldest settlement in Canada, up to Belle Isle and away beyond up to Labrador; it is without railway communication and, as I said a moment ago the lumber industry —not to speak of the fur industry, or the fishing industry—is at the present moment undergoing such a development that the Government would be justified in maintaining that service on that arm of the sea, the Baie Ste. Catherine, the outlet of the Saguenay River. It is unfair that those far-away settlements should be deprived of their mail service during so many days of the months. It seems to me that when we pay such a large subsidy for the maintenance of a mail service in the Yukon District, which is comparitively new, we should not begrudge a small amount which would maintain this particular service in the oldest section of Canada all the year round.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have to thank my hon. friend from Charlevoix-Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) for his courtesy in deferring the discussion of this question from last Monday until to-day to suit my personal convenience. I have listened to his remarks, which have been ably supported by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Savard) who sits behind him, and as is usual in all cases which concern Quebec, by my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux); but I am afraid that the premises upon which they found their arguments are scarcely correct and maintainable in comparison with services which we carry on in other parts of the Dominion. No amount of good-will or sympathy can convert the mouth of the Saguenay River into an arm of the sea if you take into consideration where the Saguenay River enters the St. Lawrence, and the long expanse of the latter river, before it goes out to the sea. So that the good-will of my hon. friend from Maisonneuve rather played havoc with logic and with geographical definitions when he tried to argue that the Saguenay was equivalent at least to an arm of the sea.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Our people down below Quebec, past Fraserville, when they speak of the River St. Lawrence, always say, "C'est la mer."

4 p.m.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: But the facts of the case are that the service from the county of Charlevoix to the county on the other side —that is between Ste. Catherine and Tadoussac—is really a service across the river Saguenay, and that river is an internal river within the province of Quebec. There is not an instance that I know of in all the Dominion where public money is voted from the federal treasury for the maintenance of any service between two banks of a river that flows within that province. My colleague (Mr. Calder) who was listening to the discussion that was taking place, brought to my attention this fact—that the province of Saskatchewan itself pays out over $150,000 a year for maintaining ferry services from one bank of a river to another bank, both banks being within its own territory; and in all the provinces such ferries are kept up and maintained by the province itself. It is difficult to establish any difference, in point of administration, between the river Saguenay itself and any other river in a province where the convenience of the people makes it necessary to have a ferry service between the two banks of a river, or between towns and villages situated on either bank of that river. That is the view which has commended itself to the Department of Trade and Commerce and to the Government as well, and one can see no good reason for spending the money of the Dominion on a ferry service on that river, and declining to do it on other rivers in other provinces of Canada. It is a service which belongs, practically and primarily, to the province itself, and I am happy to know—as I believe my hon. friends opposite also are,—that the province of Quebec is in such a good financial condition at the present time as to enable it to take care of all these ferry services without being in the least incommoded thereby. I am glad also to know that I have the approbation of my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) when I make that statement.

Mr. McMASTER: Silent approbation.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Silent at times but still my hon. friend's countenance speaks on such occasions. With reference to the postal service, that comes within entirely a different category. The postal service must be carried on by the Federal Government no matter whether it crosses provincial rivers or over provincial highways —that is the duty of the federal Government alone. I noticed what my hon. friend from Charlevoix-Montmorency said with reference to the contract made in this case by the Post Office Department with the man who carries the mail. I will call the attention of the Postmaster General to my hon. friend's statements, and if the contract is not lived up to I think the Postmaster General will give his personal attention to the matter. When the old ferry service was done away with by the federal Government, it then fell to the duty of the Postmaster General to get his mail carried across at the point in question, and he had to enter into another contract with whomsoever he could to have that service performed, and in part that particular ferry service has been aided to that extent. When the Dominion Government subsidized the service the mails were carried by virtue of that subsidy and no extra drain was made upon the Post Office Department, but when the subsidy was withdrawn, of course it became the duty of the Postmaster General to make other arrangements.

My hon. friend from Charlevoix-Montmorency advanced the argument that as navigable rivers fall under the jurisdiction of the Dominion Government, therefore it followed that the Dominion Government should subsidize services upon such rivers. I do not think he will find that in the constitution, and if he revises his argument I think he will come to a different conclusion, because I know that once he gets his premises right he is pretty sound and logical in building up his argument. Because the Dominion Government has jurisdiction over navigable rivers as to obstructions to navigation and other cognate matters that therefore it is bound to undertake all the provincial services which may be required on those rivers is, in my opinion, an argument that cannot be maintained.

With reference to the north shore generally, the Dominion Government has carefully and uniformly done the best it could towards serving the segregated settlements along that shore clear down to the straits of Belle Isle, and this year we are putting on at large expense what I hope will be the best service that we have yet attempted to furnish there. That will provide for the necessities of all the population from Quebec down to the furthest settlements, along that coast. We consider it the duty of the Dominion Government to do that, not because the trade warrants the expense, for up to the present time the trade has been small and the expense has been steadily growing, but because they are widely separated settlements and it is the part of the Dominion Government to be generous in providing services along such a coast line. I do not think that my hon. friend's constituents living along that coast will have any cause for complaint when the service which we are providing for the present year is inaugurated. It is in responsible hands and the vessels will be of a good class, and I hope there will be a decided improvement in that service.

I am afraid, therefore, that I cannot speak very hopefully to my hon. friend as to putting on a second service for a certain portion of that coast, or a ferry service on that portion of the river Saguenay on the opposite sides of which the two towns referred to are situated. It must be the duty of the local government to look after a proper ferry service under conditions such as obtain there.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Before the hon. member (Mr. Casgrain) rises, it is my duty to advise the House that he will exercise his right to close the debate, and therefore if any other hon. member desires to speak he should do so now.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Mr. Speaker, I have listened with considerable interest to the remarks of the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), but without being convinced. I am personally familiar with one case, as the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) has pointed out. These are the facts. The people of these two counties bordering on the river Saguenay are not at all in the position of people living on each side of a river, for this is not a river service, it is a sea service. The boats crossing from Murray Bay to Tadoussac or in returning have to go right out to sea. The circumstances here are of a special character and necessitate special treatment. This is not simply a service across a river as instanced by the hon. minister. As to the granting of the service I am asking for establishing a bad precedent, I would direct the attention of my right hon. friend to the fact that on the very same river St. Lawrence, right in the open sea, the Government has for fifteen years subsidized the steamer Champlain to make connection between the Intercolonial at Rivière Ouelle over to Murray Bay. We are only asking for the continuance of this service down below from Murray Bay as far as Tadoussac in order to afford a link with the other portions of the county as far as Belle Isle and to be a feeder to the Quebec and Saguenay railway which is now being operated by the Government. As the hon. member for Gaspè has pointed out, these people are in a very peculiar situation. The settlements along the north shore were established in the early days of Canada, and the people living there have had to bear the burden of taxation that went towards improved railway and other facilities for the rest of the Dominion, and now that they ask this House to vote a few thousand dollars to help them keep their scattered communities in communication with one another the answer is that to grant such a request would be creating a bad precedent. As a matter of fact, we have already created similar precedents by contributing to improvements in other provinces, and I think this part of the country which I represent ought to be better treated than the hon. minister is prepared to treat it now.

Motion negatived.

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE

WEDNESDAY SITTING. REGULAR ADJOURNMENT AT ELEVEN O'CLOCK

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that the rules of the House be so amended as to provide (a) that the hour of meeting on Wednesday be 3 o'clock instead of 2 o'clock, as at present, and (b) that the House adjourn at eleven p.m. unless exceptional circumstances recognized by the House generally, require a later sitting.

He said:

Mr. Speaker, the object I have in view in putting this resolution on the Order Paper, I need hardly say, is, not to divide the House, but to afford an opportunity, which I think is desirable, for the members on both sides to express their views on one or two points which it seems to me have an important bearing both on the comfort of members and on the efficiency of our work.

The resolution touches two things: First, the rule respecting Wednesday sittings, and, second, the hour of adjournment at night. In regard to the Wednesday recess, I think I may be accused of being the father of that particular baby, because I believe it was at my own suggestion that the Wednesday recess was at first adopted. I am not responsible, however, for the attachment thereto which requires the House to meet at two o'clock. I think the idea of an evening when the members shall be free to avail themselves of any opportunities that may offer for social engagements, is a very desirable thing. It makes for the efficiency of the House. There are members, of course, who take their duties somewhat lightly, and those may not attach much importance to an evening recess because they will take that recess whenever they want it irrespective of rules. But there are other members who give close and earnest attention to public business, and many of them, although they do not take a very active part in the debates, nevertheless feel it their duty to be present and listen with close attention in order that they may be fully informed of the public business of the country. To men of that class it is a burden to be here night after night without any recess at all. Men have a natural desire to be entertained, or to entertain, and they need opportunities for social engagements in one form or another. I believe it is not unreasonable that there should be one such evening during the week, and if we so provide by rule, I do not think that the efficiency of the House will be diminished. On the contrary, hon. members would adapt themselves to the rule and say: Well, since we can make engagements for Wednesday evening we shall feel it our duty to be present on other evenings. I think, therefore, that the Wednesday evening recess is a very desirable thing; I regret that the Government, in the pressure of business, as they think, have already cancelled it for the present session; I would hope that even yet they might see the wisdom of changing that. However, we are dealing now with the general principle.

With regard to the meeting at two o'clock on Wednesday, I never approved of that; I think it is a mistake. With the engagements that members have in various ways during the forenoon—attending committees or possibly fulfilling private engagements —it is not easy for them to get to the House at two o'clock. I am sure that every hon. gentleman who has endeavoured to comply with that rule has found difficulty in doing so. I remember that not long ago one of the Cabinet ministers came in at three o'clock on Wednesday and expressed surprise that the House had been sitting for an hour. More than once I have known that to occur in the case of private members. I think it is well that we should have a regular and established hour of meeting for each day in the week, so that hon. members will not find it necessary to charge their memories as to what is the hour of meeting. Therefore, while I support the idea of the Wednesday evening recess, I strongly advise the meeting at three instead of at two.

As to the question of the hour of adjournment in the evening, it is found that little or no business of importance is ever done after eleven o'clock at night. Of course, under exceptional circumstances the House might sit until a later hour, and for that I am providing in my resolution. But as a rule, after the House has been sitting from three o'clock in the afternoon, and having regard to various engagements of hon. members and their committee meetings in the mornings, I think that until eleven o'clock is quite late enough to sit. If we adopt automatically the eleven o'clock rule, subject to exceptions in urgent cases, when the House generally would agree, members will adapt themselves to that rule and will arrange their business accordingly. I do not believe that we should lose any time as a result. As it is, the House quite frequently sits until a very late hour; one or two cases have occurred recently when adjournment did not take place until well on into the morning. On one occasion during this session we sat until about five o'clock in the morning. I think that is a foolish thing to do. In my long parliamentary experience I have had to do with a good many late night sittings. I have participated in some, possibly I have been responsible for some; but I have never looked back on one of those occasions without thinking how foolish it was that we did not close up our business at eleven o'clock and go home. Little or nothing is done when you have members sitting here after eleven o'clock at night; those who give close and careful attention to the business of the House are tired and weary and not in good condition to do business when the House meets the next day. I do not want to dwell on the question; I think these reasons are strong and will commend themselves to hon. gentlemen on both sides. My chief purpose in introducing the resolution is to afford an opportunity for a free and open expression of opinion on the part of hon. members, and I shall be glad if those who feel interested will tell the House frankly how they view the matter.

Mr. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) has brought up this subject —not that I agree with him, but in order that I may have this opportunity of expressing the view of one who comes from a great distance and is forced to remain in Ottawa practically during the whole session. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen who live within a few hours' journey from the Capital and who can give fair attention to their private affairs while the session is in progress to be anxious to restrict the hours of sitting of the House. But it is exceedingly unfair to those of us who come from a distance, who have to remain here during the whole session and who have no opportunity of attending to private business, that there should be two days of the week during which very little business is done, namely, Monday and Friday—the result of an ancient tacit arrangement between both sides of the House. It is generally understood that no contentious business will be carried on during those two days. When the House meets on Friday we note that there has taken place a general exodus of hon. gentlemen who live eastward in Quebec and in eastern Ontario, and who leave Ottawa on the 3.30 or 4 o'clock train on Friday afternoon and remain away until Monday or Tuesday. On Friday night about nine o'clock nearly all the Ontario members, or a very large number of them, living west of Ottawa, in the vicinity of Toronto and in western Ontario, leave the city, and return, as a rule, on Tuesday morning. I submit that this is exceedingly unfair to those of us who are not privileged to communicate with our business associates at home or with our families. Now, I have no apology to make for speaking as I do, because during the thirteen sessions—I think it is—that I have been in the House I have only on one occasion missed more than seven days in a session; in many sessions it has been three or four days. I speak, therefore, with some conviction and with a considerable degree of feeling. I do not wish to make personal references, but I know how it is with myself. Business has suffered very seriously, and this condition could be remedied somewhat if hon. gentlemen attended the sittings of the House on Mondays and Fridays and evidenced on those days the same degree of interest in the business that they do on the other days of the week. If, moreover, we were to cut the speeches on ordinary occasions—excepting, perhaps, those of the mover and the seconder of a motion—down to about twenty minutes or half-an-hour, I think that would be a move in the right direction. But I submit to my hon. friend who moves this motion that nearly all the late sittings are occasioned by the participation in debate by hon. gentlemen who take very little interest in the business and who come in at the last moment when an important vote is about to be taken. I have seen it scores of times, and my hon. friend has seen it oftener than I have. An important subject is under consideration—we will say, the Budget, the speech from the Throne, or some other important matter—and it is generally understood, after a debate of perhaps two or three weeks, that a vote will be taken, say, on Tuesday. Well, under ordinary circumstances it is expected that the vote will be taken during the evening, but, one after another hon. gentleman whom, perhaps, we seldom see in the House and whom we seldom hear, get up and the debate drags on until two, three or four o'clock in the morning. That is invariably the case, so the condition which prevails is not the fault of those who regularly attend the sittings of the House; it is not the fault of those of us, I contend, who come from the remoter sections of the country. It is largely the fault of such hon. gentlemen as I have described.

Now, I would not favour restricting the hours as suggested by the hon. gentleman, because it would simply mean the prolonging of the session and the imposing of greater hardships upon those who attend regularly the sittings of the House. In my estimation, the adoption of this proposed rule would do no good. But I would like to see the rules amended, as I moved in the House about two sessions ago, so as to restrict the length of speeches in debate. That, I think, would tend greatly to facilitate the business of the House. I further would like to see this unwritten law of no serious business being taken up on Monday and Friday entirely done away with, so that during the five days of the week that the House is sitting we may accomplish as much business as possible.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I find myself in complete agreement with fifty per cent of the resolution of my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding). Speaking from personal experience, I have found the two o'clock to six o'clock sitting long and irksome and such as to make it difficult to follow closely all the business that goes on during those four hours. With regard to the recess in the evening on Wednesdays, I think we are doing very well. We have a recess in the evening for the first portion of the session when the darkness comes early and it is the pleasure of members to meet in social gatherings on that particular evening of the week.

I am not in agreement with my hon. friend as to his further proposition. There is something in what has fallen from the lips of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens)—that we ought not to have these days in the week when we do not do any serious business. All the working days of the week ought to be treated very much alike. I cannot, however, quite agree with the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) that no serious business is done in this House after eleven o'clock at night. Why, Sir, if I may say so, he himself is the very embodiment of the contradiction of what he has laid down in that respect. I have the pleasantest recollection of a speech which he delivered in the old Museum while we assembled there. I am sure it was after eleven o'clock at night when he renewed his reciprocity discussion with the former Minister of Finance, and to the delight of everybody, in perfect temper and in round and éloquent periods, long after eleven o'clock at night, he assailed his opponent with horse, foot and artillery. Indeed, I think my hon. friend's brain considering the years it has functioned, is a perfect miracle of activity after eleven o'clock in the evening. I say that with all sincerity and, therefore, I contend that he himself is a contradiction of what he has stated. He has made so many good speeches in his time that he has forgotten the time of night at which he has delivered them, but I am sure I have not. I have heard many of his speeches delivered after eleven o'clock at night, all of them while he was an older man than I am at the present moment.

The resolution has some misgivings about itself, so to speak. It says that we might still find exceptional circumstances in which we should sit after eleven o'clock at night. It is only in exceptional circumstances that we do so now, and, indeed, at the beginning of this session, the disposition is all the other way. On the very first night of the debate on the Address, the House was adjourned at ten minutes to ten by a leading front-bench man on this side of the House. That is a reprehensible practice. We should as in so many things in life, begin as we mean to carry on with the sittings of Parliament; we should be a businesslike body from the beginning of the session to the end. I am in thorough agreement with the hon. member for Vancouver Centre in that respect. And his argument might be carried further in regard to the meetings at the beginning of the session. We ought to do business then just as we do it later; and I think there are special circumstances when the Government of the day would be justified, from the very beginning of the session, in refusing adjournment at 9.50 o'clock in the evening, because at 9.50 o'clock we have not sat two hours in the evening. Improvement could be made along the lines mentioned by my hon. friend and along this line. The resolution, as I have said, would allow us to sit still later in exceptional circumstances; and I think that debates that have been carried on in a traditional way so long as almost to become constitutional might very well still be carried on in that way, and that the common-sense of the House of Commons could use its time on the whole wisely with the rules as they are in regard to our general meeting. I am getting old enough to have to restrain some of those revolutionary tendencies that show themselves unaccountably in men older than myself, and I would feel if we made the alteration on Wednesdays and and the Government would consider before another session came up, of giving fifty per cent of this resolution their earnest attention, we might leave the conduct of our general debate on the other days of the week to the commonsense of this assembly, which has never erred very far and which, I feel, will be a growing quantity in this great young country as the years go by.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I am one member of the House who find I cannot quite agree with the hon. gentleman who introduced the resolution. Some years ago the rules of the House were under review, and a number of corrections were made in them. At that time it was supposed that we had reached finality in the matter of change. Two questions are brought under review by this resolution. The first is the matter of the elimination of Wednesday evening sittings. Mondays and Wednesdays are private members' days. Many members do not realize that, in the Old Country, owing to the large amount of work they have, they are compelled to shorten up the time, so that private members who wish to bring resolutions or private Bills to the attention of the House, have to go into the lobby and ballot, and possibly not more than 15 per cent of the members who wish to bring private matters before the House, have an opportunity of doing so. Fortunately, that is not so in this House; the utmost latitude is given to members to bring in matters of a private nature and to discuss them, and generally during the first two months of the session we spend Mondays and Wednesdays in discussing matters brought forward by private members.

It would be a great mistake, to my mind, to eliminate the night session, especially until some rule is adopted with reference to Supply. Those of us who have been in this House for a long time know very well that the greatest enemy, the wolf of time, in this House, is the discussion over Estimates. A small item, amounting possibly to not more than a couple of hundred dollars in the aggregate, will be discussed in committee of Supply for a whole day and a whole night and the same thing argued over and over again. Nothing very edifying is achieved by that operation and no particular information gained. When our rules were changed some years ago, we inserted a clause giving cloture with notice, and cloture with notice meant simply, in the matter of the Estimates, that a minister, coming into this House in the afternoon or at night with his Estimates, was at liberty to stand up and call a series of items, ten, fifteen or twenty as the case might be, for the next day, and the next day the items would go through automatically, the time limit for speeches being twenty minutes. We have never taken advantage of that rule. Had we done so, the time occupied by the House in putting Estimates through would be cut down by seventy-five per cent, and that is where the great loss of time occurs.

As regards work on Mondays and Fridays and the understood rule that no matters of a controversial nature should be brought up on those days, apparently the blame for everything is cast upon those members who are so fortunate, as regards Parliament, as to be able to go home at the end of the week. I am not so selfish as to turn around and say that most of the time of the House is occupied by members from the remote provinces; but if you compare the amount of talking done by members from Ontario and that done by members from remote provinces, you will find that fully seventy-five per cent of the talk is done by members from remote provinces. If you adopt this resolution, you are going to prevent every man, who has a business of his own and knows anything at all about the business of the country, from coming into this House. This country at the present moment is faced with a grave crisis in its business affairs, and surely hon. members do not wish to have this House full of professional politicians. If you adopt any such rule as is proposed you are going to have that. If you want to shorten the sessions, apply closure to the Estimates, and you will cut the length of the session by fully one-half, but if you are going to prevent business men in the eastern part of this country from going home and looking after their affairs over the week-end, you are simply going to eliminate all the business men from Ontario and Quebec from this House. I do not think it is in the interests of this country that anything of that kind should take place. If you are going to deprive private members of their privileges on Mondays and Wednesday, why, of course, you can do so, but I warn you that in doing so you are doing grave injury to the country. I claim that with the rules as at present laid down, if they were as religiously enforced as they should be, the length of the session could be cut fully one-half.

What good purpose is served by lengthy debates on Estimates? I have sat in this House for many years, and again and again I have seen an item come up and discussed, and then when the discussion was over and the minister had given his explanation, some member would wander into the House from the lobby and the whole discussion would be gone over again. When that member had got all the information he desired another member would come in and want the whole thing argued over again. There is nothing to be gained by that mode of procedure. We must get down to business, and some method must be adopted of expediting the work, either by a committee outside of the House going over the Estimates, or by limiting the discussion in this House on the various items of Supply, as our rules provide. But the trouble is that no ministry has been strong enough or fearless enough to carry out the rules of the House as they are laid down. If that were done, there would not be one-half the trouble. We had endless debates in this House, running over three and four days, until the closure rule was adopted. I remember the first time closure was applied. Notice of the business to be taken up on the following day was given, and when the business came up for discussion speeches were limited to twenty minutes. Half of my hon. friends opposite could not occupy their twenty minutes and the vote went through long before it was anticipated it would. Had closure not been applied on that occasion, the debate would have gone on for two or three weeks. If you desire to do justice to men who are not professional politicians,—and I think the country at large needs a few of these men,—you must be as reasonable as possible to the business men in the House and give them an opportunity once in a while to give a little attention to their own affairs. I know it is a great hardship on the western member who lives at such a distance from Ottawa that he cannot go home over the week-end, but I think the eastern members and those nearby Ottawa can help matters out very much, and they have been trying to do so, by inviting the members from a distance to go out socially and see some of the country in the East. There is a great deal to be seen in the East as well as in the West. The East is an important part of this country, just as much as the West. We should not have any class ideas whatsoever. It is very much in the interests of the whole country that Parliament should be of a cosmopolitan character, that all interests should be represented here, not as classes but as a whole. We should have a certain percentage of the professional classes, a certain percentage of the trading class, of the manufacturing class, and of the agricultural class. Every class should be represented here, every race, religion, and colour, and then Parliament would get a proper view of the mind of the people of this country as a whole.

I have had occasion to sit at the head of committees of this House, and I have found that the business men in the committees were very active, and very willing to carry on the work of the committee just as they would their own private affairs. There is a Joint Committee on Printing, of which I have had the honour to be Chairman for many years. The membership includes a number of Senators, and amongst them some of the ablest men in the whole of Canada. By organizing, and through earnest efforts to achieve some saving in that branch of the Government business, we have succeeded, in three years, in making a saving of close to a million dollars in very small expenditures. I am satisfied that if the gentlemen composing other committees were of that character and made up their minds what they were going to do, the business would be done much more expeditiously. For instance, if we had a committee on Supply composed of members of the House with good executive ability, I am satisfied that the discussion on Estimates in this House would be very much shortened. What is the situation now? From now on, three-fourths of the session will be given over to Supply, and when the end of the session approaches about twenty per cent of the Supply may have passed, and then the rest all goes through with a rush in one day, or two. Hundreds of millions of dollars will then be voted without any one having a word to say.

If a number of items were called by a minister for discussion on the following day, and we had to get those items off the slate, and the discussion were limited, I am sure we could discuss properly every item in the Estimates and shorten the session very considerably. Sometimes a minister has items he does not want discussed. I know, when I was in Opposition we had to watch for those; we knew the minister would delay bringing them up until the very last day, when they had to go through, and not a single word could be said about them at all. Our rules as a whole are far better than the rules of the British House of Commons. In the British House they have a form of closure which is called the Kangaroo or the Scissors, with no notice. The minister can call any item, and jam it through, and there is no discussion whatever. Our form is closure, with notice. No item can be put through unless notice has first been given and opportunity for proper discussion afforded; speeches are limited to twenty minutes, and the items must automatically be voted or struck out. I have sat in the House for a great many years, and wasted a great many hours in Supply listening to talk, and I have never yet seen more than three or four items in the Estimates struck out or reduced, and when that did happen it was generally at the instance of a minister. The waste of time is largely due to the discussion of small matters in Supply, and I think hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House should seriously consider whether we cannot reach a unanimous decision to shorten the session by using the method of closure provided in the rules of this House. Let the items be closured through with notice. The items would be called that were to be taken up the next day, then after a discussion the items would automatically go through. I am satisfied that this method would achieve the object sought by the hon. member who has introduced this resolution. I would be the last man in the House to limit the rights of private members on matters that affect them, but I do not think it is necessary to go to bed every night at eleven o'clock. I think the business of the House should be carried through until finished. We are not on the eight-hour day here, but even if we were and we got paid for overtime, there would still be no limit to the debates. If we got double time after eleven o'clock, I suppose we would keep the discussion going until six in the morning. Therefore, I think we had better leave the rules as they are, and I would strongly urge the Government to enforce closure with notice on the Estimates. No harm can come from doing that, it would shorten the session by a month or two, and I think every hon. member would have ample time to discuss any item he wished in the time provided.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): As an old member of the House I wish to give my support to the motion moved by my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's. It is true that we are not under the eight-hour system, as my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie), has just said. But we are here to perform our duties as diligently and intelligently as possible, and I submit that under the present system it is impossible for us so to do. I appeal to my friends on both sides of the House, whether we should not be sorry indeed if, on occasion, towards the close of the session, our electors were in the gallery witnessing the spectacle presented in this House, a few seats being occupied by ministers and a few others by members of the Opposition, and, for the rest, practically an empty chamber. Why is that? It is because, from ten o'clock in the morning until late in the evening, members have been going from committee room to committee room, and, from the opening of the session at three o'clock in the afternoon, have been discussing in the House different questions varying in their scope and in their importance. I say that it is not in the interests of the country that absurd rules of that kind should govern this Chamber.

Sir, as regards the Wednesday half holiday I consider it a Godsend to the members, and a mistake was made when the hour of meeting on that day during the first part of the session was fixed at two o'clock. As my hon. friend says, every one forgets that the House meets at two o'clock. And besides, it is not conducive to health that so early in the afternoon members should be called upon to legislate in the House of Commons. Furthermore, we do not do so much work during that additional hour that we could not very well meet at the usual hour of three o'clock. I therefore agree absolutely with my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's in asking the House favourably to consider amending the rule so that on Wednesday the House might meet at three o'clock and adjourn at six, giving us the rest of the day.

Now, as regards the late sittings, I will be more emphatic on this question than some of my hon. friends. I say that it is unbusinesslike that we should sit from practically the first day of the session until the last, after twelve o'clock at night. Under such circumstances, how can you expect a member of Parliament, who is anxious to perform his duties with diligence and care, to study any question either in the library here or at his own residence? How can you expect him to give any subject the consideration it deserves, if he is obliged to be in his seat from three o'clock in the afternoon until one o'clock or sometimes two o'clock in the morning? And in the morning, Mr. Speaker, the member is not idle; he has to attend various committees—the Railway Committee, the Public Accounts Committee, the Insurance Committee, the Banking Committee, and others. How can a member of Parliament attend to the business of the country with reasonable diligence and care if his day is filled as I have described? It is not fair to the member; it is not fair to his electors; it is not fair to the country.

My hon. friend from North Simcoe says that we have the very best rules possible. Well, take the British Parliament. Except on certain occasions agreed upon between the Government and the Opposition, the House of Commons at Westminster never sits after eleven o'clock in the evening; unless it be by reason of some very grave question under consideration. It is true, however, that the British House of Commons sits nearly the whole year round, with just a few intervals of adjournment; but at all events, except on very special occasions, as I have said, when there is an agreement between both leaders, the House never sits after eleven o'clock. In France it is the same; except on questions of grave importance, the Chamber never sits after nine o'clock in the evening. Take the United States Congress; it is very seldom that congressmen sit after ten or eleven o'clock at night. So that we might very well amend our rules and make it a question of agreement between the Government and the Opposition as to when the House shall sit after eleven o'clock. Of course, at the end of the session, when there is much business to be overtaken, there might be a few sittings beyond that hour; but for the rest of the session, I contend that there is no reason for those late sittings. My hon. friend asks: How can we shorten the session? Well, they have found a remedy in England. The hon. gentleman, a moment ago, spoke of the closure, and the wisdom of enforcing this measure. I must say that while the closure exists under our rules, it is not one of those weapons that any parliamentarian would care to use. In the United States, there comes a moment in any debate when, by mutual agreement, between the Whips, the speeches delivered thereafter shall not take more than ten minutes, or perhaps even five minutes. It is agreed that some of the principal speeches on both sides will cover a certain length of time, the others being limited to ten minutes, or twenty minutes at the outside. But in England there is a better rule still than the closure. There is a time-saving system which is about to be adopted. They have, during the war, established over there a select Committee on National Expenditures, composed of members of both sides of the House. That committee scrutinized the various items of the Estimates; called for expert witnesses from the several departments; submitted to the Government proposals for reductions; and thereby exercised that very function for which Parliament exists, namely, the control of expenditures. My hon. friend suggested a moment ago that a minister might come before the House and say: To-day I give notice that so many items from the Estimates will be taken up, and after a delay of twenty-four hours they will be automatically voted.

This is not the way I understand British freedom. If these items had been scrutinized and reported upon, not by a committee of the whole House, but by a Select Committee, there would be very little discussion, except on a few selected items. That is the way they proceed in the Parliament in London. There they will have the Irish night, they will have the Scotch night, they will have the Welsh night, and they will have the English night. They take the items affecting these sections of the United Kingdom, and the time of the House is not lost there as it is here on items of the Estimates. It seems to me that this would be a proper reform, and when accomplished I am quite sure would have the effect of reducing the session by at least one or two months.

Mr. CURRIE: I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken about the Committee on National Expenditures. That committee investigates expenditures that have been made, but there is no change in the rules with regard to the Committee of Supply of the House.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I advise my hon. friend to read the book which has lately been published by Mr. Davenport.

Mr. CURRIE: I have got the rules of the House.

Mr. LEMIEUX: This committee was established during the war and saved millions to the Government in Great Britain by pointing out useless expenditures. The chairman of that committee was the ex-Postmaster General, Sir Herbert Samuel, who is now Governor in Palestine, and there is a recommendation by them that the National Expenditures Committee be made permanent. I understand that the question is now before the British Parliament, and that the committee has ninety-nine chances out of one hundred of becoming permanent. At all events I desire to say—

Mr. CURRIE: If the hon. gentleman will pardon me, the impression which I, and other members, gathered from my hon. friend's remarks was, that in England there was a permanent committee of Parliament on national expenditures dealing with this question, and that consequently there was no necessity for discussion there in Committee of Supply. But the House goes into Committee of Supply over there just the same as it ever did. The committee to which my hon. friend refers was purely a special committee, and is not a permanent one under the rules of the House.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It may not be a permanent committee at the present moment, but it was established and maintained during the war and has rendered most valuable service to the Government and to Parliament, and as an institution it will remain. I say that when you have that committee you need not have closure, because the items will have been scrutinized in advance by members of the House and the debate on these matters will be much more intelligible than it is at the present time. I think it would be wise if, on certain occasions, there was an agreement between the Whips to limit the duration of debate. They have that system in the United States and they are a most practical people. The moment closure is imposed by the Government it has not the same flavour; but if there is a mutual agreement, a gentleman's agreement, between the Whips that the speeches will be limited we will have here what they have in the United States—a common-sense debate on the big issues of the day. On the whole I support the motion of my hon. friend for Shelburne and Queen's.

Mr. H. B. MORPHY (North Perth): I think it is a good thing in the interest of the House and of the country that this resolution has been introduced. On listening to the arguments which have been advanced, not only during the present but during other recent sessions, I have been very much struck with the idea that if the principle of the closure were applied all the time it would raise the standard of debate in this House. That idea is based upon a recollection of what happened after the one occasion, I think, upon which closure was applied in this House, under the rules; but I think if any hon. gentleman will take the trouble to consult the record of the first and second sessions after closure was introduced on the occasion in question he will be convinced, overwhelmingly convinced, that the standard of 5 p.m. debate in this House was never in its history as high as it was immediately after closure had been tried. The speeches were shorter, they gave evidence of more thought, and to my mind abundantly showed more preparatory work on the part of the individual member in connection with the subject matter which he rose to discuss. I have always been convinced of that; and I put forth the suggestion that if, by co-operation among the members generally, we could obtain the same result as followed from the application of the closure this Parliament would shine forth to the outside world, and in particular to all our constituents, as a more business-like assembly of men sent here by the people to conduct the country's affairs. The other night the House was regaled with a speech by one hon. member which lasted for five hours—five hours of what I would call destructive criticism; in fact it was hardly worthy of the name of criticism, its every tendency was factious and destructive. There was hardly an item in that five-hours speech that was of a nature tending to assist the Government in the solving of the great problems that are now on hand. Now, a speech of five hours in the British Parliament, or in any other parliament in the world, would bring down the wrath of the nation. That wrath would be aroused by anyone having the temerity to waste that much time in a deliberative assembly. Yet we are treated occasionally to five-hour speeches, although sometimes they are shorter—sometimes they occupy three hours, and sometimes two hours. I venture the assertion that any man who wishes to speak two, three, four or five hours can enhance his reputation a thousand fold by occupying far less time and limiting his speech to three-quarters of an hour. I did notice, in the celebrated example to which I have referred, that the speech consisted of verbiage—it was wanting in logic, in reason and in objective, except that there was apparently the idea of stultifying the opposite party. I do not believe the people of Canada to-day are very much concerned with the "Ins" and the "Outs" in this House, with what party shall take the Government side and what party shall go into Opposition—not nearly so much concerned with that idea as they are concerned with the great problems the country has to solve, and the solving of them by members generally bending their energies towards assisting the Government in reaching a sane solution. This should be a business man's Parliament, because our problems are greater than they ever were before in the history of Canada. It is a business man's opportunity, and, if I may be permitted, I would say to the members of all parties that the closer they get to the idea that there are great problems to be solved, and that the country is looking to hon. members to solve those problems, instead of talking captiously and destructively for two, three or five hours, the more correctly they will interpret the feelings of their constituents. In that sense I would like to suggest, that parties should unite as far as possible upon the great problems confronting the country and bend their energies to a sane Canadian solution of them, and that credit for honesty of purpose should be given to any constructive suggestion no matter whence it comes. In a word, that hon. members should get down to close business-like efforts, irrespective of party, to solve these problems as quickly as possible in order to expedite our national affairs, save the time of the House and let the members get back to their homes. It seems to me that we are forgetting that time is valuable outside the House as well as inside.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) spoke of the Wednesday evening holiday being a God-send. I quite agree with him that it is, but that is because we waste so many other nights and get home so late in the mornings that it becomes absolutely necessary to have such a respite from our arduous labours. I believe that nearly all hon. members will agree with my statement that there is a factious opposition, a speaking of words, and words, and words, until sometimes, I must confess, I think that the brains of some hon. gentlemen have ceased to function, for they speak without thinking, purely for obstructive purposes, saying this, that or the other thing by way of organized opposition to some hon. minister who is not very well liked. What has that got to do with the policy of the country? It is prostituting parliamentary life to gratify personal animosity. We have notorious examples of that sort in the House. Such tactics do not make for high parliamentary standing, and we may be certain that the country does not approve of the actions of such hon. gentlemen.

I have a suggestion to offer which I think will appeal to us all, Mr. Speaker,—including myself probably, although I have tried not to dilate at undue length on any subject which I have debated in this House. There is a rule, I think, in the United States Congress that members who wish to speak to their constituents—and that seems to be the great desire here—so that their speeches may be published in the local newspapers, may hand those speeches in to the Speaker already typewritten, and the Congressmen are then free to attend to other business with the full assurance that their speeches will duly appear in the Congressional Record. It seems to me that that might be a very good rule to introduce here. I am sure that the hon. member for Maisonneuve in the quiet of the library or in the shelter of his own home, would find it a welcome relief to write out his speeches, of course not at too great length, and hand them in to the Speaker to be printed in the next day's Hansard; and thus having seen to the enlightenment of his constituents, he would be free to attend to some other business.

I believe that the Wednesday holiday is a good thing, if we are bound to sit up until such late hours. But this debate, even if it should serve no other purpose, from my point of view, has enabled me to express my opinion that we waste too much time in factious and destructive criticism, and that we do not spend quite enough time over business which ought to engage our closest attention,—that while we oppose the Estimates of one minister's department we let the Estimates of another minister's department go through practicaly scot free, and the factious opposition is just for the purpose of creating an effect which even though it is reflected in the press, is but evanescent, and for which the country does not care a snap of the finger.

Mr. A. B. COPP (Westmoreland): Mr. Speaker, I did not notice anything in this very innocent resolution introduced by my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) that would give my hon. friend opposite the opportunity of reading a lecture to the Ooposition for having, as he put it, organized factious and destructive criticism against some cabinet minister to block his Estimates. During the time I have been a supporter of the Opposition I do not know that such a condition of affairs has ever obtained on this side of the House, and I am sure that my hon. friend has entirely misinterpreted our attitude.

My hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) expressed himself personally along the same line that I would have folowed with regard to the attendance of hon. members. Coming from some distance, I realize that it is very important for all the members to get through with the business of the House as quickly as possible having due regard to the importance of that business. I have been a rather regular attendant both in this House and also on committees to which I have been appointed, and I have found that in sitting on committees until one o'clock—and that always means a few minutes after—it is impossible to get out to lunch and be back in time for the two o'clock sittings on Wednesday afternoons. I do not believe that the earlier hour of our meeting on Wednesday afternoons expedites public business very much; but if I felt that meeting at 3 o'clock would lengthen the session by one day, I would feel as my hon. friend from Vancouver said, that the House should meet at two o'clock. I do not believe it has had that effect, and for that reason I think the House should meet at three o'clock every day.

With regard to the Wednesday evening off, my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's said that hon. members desired this evening for social engagements. I am not very much given to such engagements, but still I feel that Wednesday evening is very important to a large number of hon. members. If we cannot engage in social affairs, at least we need recreation along different lines, and I believe that this freedom on Wednesday evenings is a very real benefit to hon. members. I have always thought that that evening is taken away by the Government too early in the session. I do not mind losing it towards the end of the session when it is necessary to get business through as rapidly as possible, but I think, with the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, that if we have not that evening free from the work of the House a great many of us will naturally take any evening that suits our convenience. Therefore there is a very real advantage to the conduct of the business of the House by reason of hon. members making their social engagements for Wednesday evenings.

As to adjourning the House at eleven o'clock each night, I quite agree with my hon. friends resolution because he has added a proviso—unless circumstances may require a later sitting—which, of course, must be left to the Government to determine. My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) expressed himself against that part of the resolution, and he instanced the fact that my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's on one occasion made a very eloquent speech after eleven o'clock at night.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Many.

Mr. COPP: I have no doubt he has made many such speeches. My hon. friend knows that the eloquence of the mover of this resolution is such that he can always be depended upon to make a very interesting speech at any time of the day or night when he feels called upon in the public interest to address the House. But I would say to my hon. friend from Red Deer and to other hon. members that there should be no necessity for any hon. member to be called upon to deliver an important speech after eleven or twelve o'clock at night. The House should adjourn not later than midnight and give hon. gentlemen an opportunity of making such a speech at a time when there will be a full attendance of members to listen to their arguments. Personally, I feel that the work of this House should not be a test of physical strength. It should be a matter of getting the public business before this House in a reasonable, earnest, straightforward manner. The duties of Parliament are important, and they can be properly attended to only during reasonable hours,—such hours as those during which a man may ordinarily be expected to give attention to his public or private business.

The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) says that if the rules are changed so as to enable members of Parliament who are business men residing in Ontario to go home on Fridays and attend to their business, this whole Parliament will become a farce. With that assertion I am not in agreement. It is quite obvious that we want business men in this Parliament, and it is true that we have a number of them here. Business men from Toronto, Montreal and other places which are near the seat of Government can, I submit, attend to their business and at the same time carry on their legislative duties.

I do not know that there is much to be said in regard to what has been referred to as an unwritten arrangement concerning Mondays and Fridays. I do not know that any such arrangement has been followed in Parliament during the time that I have been here. Of course, an item of business has been occasionally held over because an hon. member specially interested in it desired to take part in the discussion, but, generally speaking, the work of the House proceeds on Mondays and Fridays just as it does on the other days of the week. I know that last Friday night the work of the House went on as usual; we sat here until half-past twelve.

In reply to my hon. friend's remarks concerning the proposal that the House should adjourn at eleven o'clock each night, I submit that we do not make very much progress by sitting considerably later. As I say, to sit a few moments after eleven will not matter, but in the case of Estimates or any other subject coming up after eleven o'clock members of the House are tired and weary and more or less fretful and annoyed, and we do not get on with the business as we would if we had a regular hour for adjournment. Once the feeling prevails that someone is trying to force something through, the attitude is naturally taken by some that it shall not go through, and if it does not go through at eleven it will not go through at twelve or at one, so that sitting later is productive of no advantage. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I support the motion of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (West Toronto): Mr. Speaker, I have a great deal of sympathy with the motion presented by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). I think that when we start work at ten o'clock in the morning and keep at it until eleven at night, we ought to "call it a day." If we continue to extend our sittings until two or three o'clock in the morning it will be necessary for some one to organize a National Union of Canadian Orators and strike for an eight-hour day or something of that kind. If the members of this House would exercise their privileges —I was going to say with more intelligence; perhaps I ought to say, with greater care—it would not be necessary to organize such a union and it would not be necessary to sit after eleven o'clock. When a man speaks for four or five hours on one subject, as happened the other night, he not only wearies Parliament but I think he commits an oratorical crime. We listened to the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) the other day for nearly an hour and a half reading from a newspaper. Practically every member of the House had read the article in question. If the hon. member wanted that to go on the record, I submit that it should have been taken as read, and, as the member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) suggests, handed in for insertion in Hansard.

Since coming to this House I have been very much surprised at the length of the speeches, at the verbosity of some hon. members. My training has been entirely different from that of the lawyer, who seems ordinarily to earn his fee by the length of his speech.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Not at all. We do not do that.

Mr. HOCKEN: Well, I am judging simply by what I have heard since coming here. If some of these lawyers had taken courses in journalism they would condense their speeches. The reason why the gentlemen of the press do not occupy the gallery on occasions is this extraordinary verbosity to which I have referred. They get only a grain of argument out of a bushel of remarks, so they spend their time elsewhere than in the gallery. I would like to submit to members who offend in this respect that they not only waste the time of this House, but they offend against their own reputations. Some of the most important speeches made in the Imperial House of Commons occupy but twenty minutes or half an hour; and in these speeches statements are made not merely of national but of international and world-wide importance and significance. But to make a speech like that requires some work. I am reminded of the young rector who was complaining to his bishop that it made him sweat to prepare his sermons. The bishop patted him on the shoulder and said: "Well, my boy, somebody has to sweat; it is either you or the congregation." And that is about the way it is in this House; if the members will not sweat in the preparation of their speeches, then the rest of the members have to suffer. The Lord knows we do suffer, Mr. Speaker, from some of the addresses that are given, for a man will take an hour or two, sometimes more than that, to say something that he should condense into about twenty-five minutes. Now, I do not want to transgress in this respect, but I just want to make one reference to my hon. friend from Graspy—

An hon. MEMBER: Where is that constituency?

Mr. HOCKEN: —the hon. member for Graspy, who, I think, is one of the greatest offenders in this respect. He speaks at tremendous length and on every question. Nothing is quite settled until the member for Graspy has—

Mr. CASGRAIN: He has more experience than you have. He knows more than you do.

Mr. HOCKEN: I have no doubt; I am but a very humble and inexperienced member of the House. But I have lived in the world about as long as my hon. friend from Graspy. I have had some experiences elsewhere, and, perhaps, being of the same age as the hon. gentleman, I might be able to give him a bit of advice—advice, Sir, such as was tendered to me when I was a young man. I began my career as a reporter on a newspaper; and you know, Sir, a young reporter always imagines that the particular article he writes is the most important thing that is going into the paper. Now, we had a very efficient city editor on that journal, and I remember that on more than one occasion when I brought in a comparatively insignificant story, spread out at length, as the hon. member for Graspy spreads out his remarks, the city editor would look it over and would say to me: "Young man, you are too damn diffuse; cut this down to a stick."

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. HOCKEN: I am simply quoting the story verbatim. Now, I would tender that advice to my hon. friend from Graspy—

Mr. CASGRAIN: Where is that place?

Mr. HOCKEN: —and to some of those four or five-hour runners who get the track and keep it till the end of the session. There are half a dozen men in the House who could save us a good deal of time if they would. But, Sir, when I recall the distinguished appearance of my hon. friend from Graspy as he utters one of those orations—taken largely from the speeches of Lord Palmerston—I am afraid that he will not accept my advice. What I would propose would be this—a change in the rules that would limit speeches to half an hour, unless the unanimous consent of the House were given for an extension of time for the speech of any hon. member. I have sat in other legislative bodies where we had a rule of that kind; and if a man had really anything to say that required more than that time, he was always given permission; but the rule gave us an excellent opportunity to see that the debate was not carried on simply for the purpose of some man hearing himself speak or preparing material for the next general election. If the House would make a rule that half an hour should be the limit for a speech, we would not need to sit after eleven o'clock at night and we would not need to form a Canadian National Union of Orators.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, when this matter has been brought up as it has been on other occasions in this House, I have always subordinated my view as to the time spent in this chamber to the opinions of members representing constituencies in the far East or the far West. It is possible for myself and many other members from Ontario and Quebec constituencies, to go home on Fridays and to get in touch with their businesses. That is a privilege and a very great advantage to those hon. gentlemen; but members from the far West and those from the Maritime Provinces cannot very well do that without losing time in the House. Therefore, I have felt that, whatever my views might be in regard to the time that is spent in this chamber, I should be willing to give way to the opinions of those members who represent constituencies at a distance from Ottawa.

I do not think there is any more time wasted in this House in proportion to the number of its members, the vast extent of this Dominion and the multiplicity of questions that come up, than is wasted in other deliberative assemblies throughout this country. It has become a common practice to refer to long speeches and the length of time wasted in this House, and frequently we see our newspapers writing editorials on the question. This has always struck me as somewhat inconsistent on the part of newspapers when one has only to turn over a page or two in order to see the quantity of space absolutely wasted with "Peter Pal," "Mutt and Jeff" and other stuff of a like nature which is not of any benefit to any person in the Dominion of Canada. Another waste of time that I have seen on the part of newspapers and newspaper editors is a repetition of one day's editorial in the next day's issue. I do not think there is any more time wasted in this chamber than is wasted in county councils or other municipal bodies in proportion to the number of members in those bodies and the subjects with which they have to deal. We are all fallible; we are all liable to make mistakes and I presume, as long as there is a Parliament for Canada, there will always be a certain amount of time wasted in this as in any other assembly, I do not care what it is.

It has always struck me that some time might be saved in the early part of the session. It is usually two or three weeks before committees get down to work, and I see no reason, and I have never been able to see any, why Parliament should not meet in the mornings in the first few weeks of the session, at least until committees organize and get to work, when, of course, morning sittings would be impossible as members could not be in the chamber and on committees at the same time.

As regards Wednesday evening sittings, it has always seemed to me that the Wednesday evening holiday, which is given to members in the first few weeks or month or so of the session, has been for the benefit of two classes of persons who attend Parliament, those persons who have formed the habit of attending prayer meeting once a week, usually on Wednesday night and who, having formed that habit, of course, want to continue it when they come to Ottawa—and there is very great reason why they should continue it—and those other persons who have got caught in the social whirl in Ottawa and want Wednesday evening to attend to that. I have never been greatly troubled in either direction and, therefore, I have always been willing to attend sessions of Parliament on Wednesday evenings. I can see no earthly reason why Parliament should sit from two to six o'clock on Wednesday and not sit on Wednesday evening, but sit from three to six o'clock on Thursday and from eight to eleven or twelve o'clock the same night. I am absolutely opposed to the Wednesday evening holiday, whether it is for the benefit of those who want to attend prayer meeting that night or for the benefit of those who are caught in the social whirl and want to attend to that. In other words, I think that they might confine all their dances to Saturday evenings and their prayer meetings to Sunday afternoons and evenings.

As regards limiting the evening sitting to eleven o'clock, I do not think it would be advisable to make any hard-and-fast rule in that respect. We have an hour fixed for the meeting of Parliament, but to fix eleven o'clock or any other hour as the hour at which the House should and must close at night, would be inadvisable. Very often you might be in the midst of something of importance, perhaps a matter of getting through some Estimates; the subject might have been pretty well exhausted in debate and just about ready to go through, some progress to be made about eleven o'clock; but some person realizes that there is a rule or an understanding that the House is to adjourn at eleven o'clock, and, availing himself of that, keeps the thing going for a few minutes more until the House automatically rises. The closing hour should be left to the common sense and intelligence of members composing this House, and when, in their wisdom, they think it advisable for the House to sit until half past eleven or eleven o'clock or a quarter to eleven, well and good. We are not schoolboys; we are men of mature age, and common sense will regulate the matter pretty well. There may be some nights when we will exceed the limit and go to one or two o'clock in the morning, without doubt to the regret of every person in the chamber. That sort of thing is not likely to be repeated night after night, and why? Because the common sense of members is opposed to anything of the kind. Therefore, it would be far better to leave the hour of closing to the good judgment of the members composing the House.

Right hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): The first section of the motion of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), to the effect that the Wednesday afternoon sitting should open at three o'clock commencing with the first of the session, deals with a matter that I think should be regulated pretty much to meet the will of the majority of members, and consequently could best be done after inquiry and report by a committee. The rules of the House are almost invariably amended on report of a committee. It is now some years since such a committee sat, but I would not think it would be wise at the present session to appoint another. We have so many important and special committees now, and so many hon. members are engaged thereon, that, particularly at this period of the session, with the work becoming heavier for each and all of us, we should consider carefully before embarking upon another.

As to the second and more important portion of the resolution I have views that I desire to oppose to those of the hon. member who moves it, and I do so with deference, knowing that his experience is much longer than mine, and that he doubtless has studied the subject more carefully. I, of course, naturally look upon this matter from the standpoint of the Government. He, just as naturally, looks upon it from the standpoint of the Opposition.

Mr. FIELDING: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member for Maisonneuve has reinforced the argument of the mover of the resolution by a reference to the practice of the British House. I think I can use that reference to show wherein we necessarily differ from that House. The British House does have some general rule whereby it closes at about eleven o'clock, but there is this very great difference: In the British House closure became a fact and a rule away back in the eighties, I think. It became a matter of constant practice through many years and even decades, and growing out of the constant application of closure there evolved what is looked upon as a sort of voluntary closure, agreed upon by the whips of both sides—a practice that never could have become established, and never, indeed, would likely have existed, had it not been for the fact of the closure being constantly applied by the Government, and necessarily applied, to get the public business done. In this House we have voluntary closure at times, but it is very, very rare, and I do not think that with the practice we have now, even though we have a rare resort to closure, we could ever make much progress by agreement between the whips for the shortening of speeches or the shortening of debates. We try that, but we do not succeed; that has been the practice under both Governments. The reason, chiefly, is the one I have just given, that closure in Canada is of much later growth. In England they have had closure all through these years, and consequently there has been time for this practice to grow, a practice that naturally takes root in the closure rule, because the whips on both sides know that unless they succeed voluntarily, then by force majeure the debate comes to an end anyway, because closure is applied. Consequently, they are able to get business done from day to day under the influence of the rule on the one hand, and this practice that has grown out of it on the other.

But there is this further. In Great Britain the closure rule is immediate and almost automatic, that is to say, they can bring discussions to a close almost at any time, and without notice. In Canada we have a much more considerate closure rule. We can only apply it one day to take effect the next, and then only at one o'clock on the following morning. I think it is well that in these matters we move slowly. While the closure rule remains as it is in this House, it is a matter of actual experience that we can make no sufficient progress if we are going to have an automatic rising of the House at eleven o'clock at night. Of that I have not the least doubt whatever. Why, what progress have we made up to now, Mr. Speaker? Any real business that has been done since the House opened on February 14, this year,—and we have not had any eleven o'clock automatic rising,—has been done mainly after eleven o'clock at night, and much of it well on towards morning. On the whole of this question I am very much in agreement, under present circumstances, with the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark). I do not think it is possible to make progress if we have anything like an automatic rising of the House at eleven or any special hour.

While I am on my feet, I call attention to the hours at which the House has risen. Sometimes, but very rarely, have we risen much past eleven o'clock. I have before me the hours from the beginning of the session until now, and eleven would represent about the average. I know the dates on which we rose later, and those are the very dates when we got the work of Parliament done. I would like, indeed, if faster progress could be made. I am not saying this to complain especially. Possibly if I were on the Opposition side I would have another viewpoint, but I am going to try, if I ever get there, to be more reasonable in this regard than I have found the present Opposition. We are met practically every time we attempt to go into Supply with a motion on one subject or another; I will not say of no importance, but I do say that if this House sat 365 days in the year I could guarantee to place in the hands of the Opposition an amendment every day that would be of equal importance to any that they have advanced so far. You can always get a matter, I will not say of no importance, but one that will serve the purpose of creating a discussion and creating press material, and that is what really goes on. So if we intend to make progress from now onwards, it would be fatal, indeed, if we should now come to any decision to rise automatically at eleven o'clock. I would think we would soon be where the British House is to-day in one regard: we would be sitting the whole year round, for that has become the British practice. Indeed, so great is the effort there to get on with public affairs, that automatic closure is applied constantly, and even then they frequently do not rise for dinner. The House will run right on from six to eight o'clock, certain members going out at certain times. That is how they are able to rise at eleven. If they had our practice in other respects, had our closure, and the rare application of it, the business of the Old Land could not begin to be done if they rose at eleven o'clock or at any set time, though it were hours later than that. Consequently, while I do not feel there is any possibility of the acceptance by the Government of the latter part of his resolution, there is considerable to be said for the first part, and it would appear to me it would be better for that matter to be taken up by a special committee at the beginning of a session.

Mr. J. A. MAHARG (Maple Creek): I find myself in agreement to a certain extent with what the hon. member for Centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) has said. The method of conducting the business of this House, and the length of the sittings is of considerable importance to those members whose homes are a long distance from Ottawa. It appears to those of us who are so situated that several changes might be made with considerable advantage to us, at least, and without any great disadvantage, I believe, to members residing nearer to the seat of Government. Take private members' day. I can see no good reason why private members, instead of having Monday and Wednesday, should not have Monday and Friday. I believe it is usually understood between the party whips just what matters are to come up on private members' day, and members who were sufficiently interested in any matter that would come up for discussion might very well remain over the week-end. I do not think that would seriously interfere with the rights of any one.

For once at least, I agree with the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards). We do not usually see eye to eye, but I do concur in his views, to a considerable extent, in the matter of Wednesday sittings. He is of the opinion that we might very well sit on Wednesday mornings during the early part of the session. I would go much further and suggest that during the early part of the session we might also sit on Wednesday night, at least while the debate on the Address was being discussed. After all, no particular question is ever under discussion in that debate; it is usually a rambling repetition from beginning to end; it is practically a re-hash of what has been previously dealt with. In the debate on the Address the same matters come up that have been talked over scores of times before and I think we might very well devote Wednesday nights to a continuation of that debate until its conclusion. I would not press my point in regard to the Budget debate. But I do think, Mr. Speaker, that we might very well sit on Wednesday nights during the early part of the session, at least until we disposed of the debate on the Address.

I was much interested in the remarks of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken), regarding the length of speeches It struck me forcibly at the time he was speaking that there is very little difference between an hon. member making one long speech on a specific subject, and another hon. gentleman making several possibly shorter speeches on another subject. I have listened, on several occasions, to the hon. member making somewhat lengthy speeches in regard to the Civil Service Commission, and if we took the various periods taken up by him and added them together the result would probably compare favourably with the length of time occupied the other night by an hon. member who spent, I believe, something like five hours of the time of the House discussing a certain subject. Even if the House adjourned at 11 o'clock I am doubtful if it would have shortened the speech of the hon. gentleman very much, for I am convinced that, from his point of view, the subject was far from being exhausted, and had the House adjourned at 11 o'clock, supposing he had the floor then, it might have been possible for him to have started again the next day and to have continued for several hours more. So that in that respect we might not have been further ahead on that occasion by an early closing.

Members from a distance would suggest an earlier calling of the session. Why not go back to the old practice of calling the session in November and giving a fairly lengthy recess during the Christmas holidays, so that those engaged in the retail business might have sufficient time to wind up their affairs for the year, and also better cope with the Christmas rush? If that were not quite convenient, then I would suggest that we meet as early in the New Year as possible. Then again, in the matter of Easter holidays, we think it is rather unfair for members who reside in proximity to Ottawa to object to a longer recess at Easter. I understand the objection comes principally from those who are so situated and who can attend to their business over the week-end. Now, we do not very seriously object to their paying particular attention to their business at that time, but we do submit that to those of us who live at a distance from the Capital, a five-day recess is of no use; we should have the privilege of a two weeks' vacation to enable us to attend to our affairs at home. If we calculate strictly the number of days which members have off, we find that in addition to the fifteen days to which members of Parliament are entitled, a great many members can avail themselves of the week-end holiday. If I might make the remark, I observe in the lobbies on Fridays quite a number of coats, canes, etc., hanging around, which disappear shortly after the House opens; and a similar condition prevails on Mondays, when members on their return even have their grips in their hands in order to get into the House before adjournment. Those who can avail themselves of the week-end, in addition to the fifteen days allowed, are to all intents and purposes taking forty-seven days to themselves out of a total of eighty days, if we reckon on a basis of sixteen weeks as the length of the session. Those of us who cannot take advantage of more than the fifteen days think this is scarcely fair.

A point raised by the member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) was that if you did away with this Friday and Monday holiday, if I might term it a holiday, you would practically prevent business men from becoming members of Parliament. I wonder whether we are to conclude from that remark that there are no business men in the House other than those who are enabled to attend to their business over the week-end. Leaving myself and those employed in the same occupation out of the question, I could mention several business men in this House whose business is just as difficult to manage from a distance as that of the average commercial and industrial business man, if not more so. We have such men representing western constituencies. We have a number of professional men who cannot delegate their business to others without very serious loss, and I do not see why it should be any more difficult for an eastern business man to be a member of Parliament than it is for a western business man, from my hon. friend's point of view.

Now, as to the closure, I do not think I can be accused of taking up more than a fair share of the time of the House, but to me word "closure" sounds somewhat harsh. I think that other methods just as effective and less objectionable might be devised. For instance, suppose you cease the publication of Hansard. I wonder what effect that would have. I am of opinion that if you cut out the printing of Hansard, it would have considerable effect on the length of debates; and, to use the ordinary expression, it would then be up to the member himself if he wished to have his speech distributed among his constituents. I would still furnish the facilities for him if he wished to have that done; but as to his speech being printed, it would be a matter entirely for him to decide and it would be for him to defray the expense. Again, referring to the question of closing at 11 o'clock, I fully agree with the Prime Minister when he says that so far this session the real business of the House has been conducted after 11 o'clock. I believe I am within the mark when I say that the Opposition have been largely responsible for this fact.

On almost every occasion when a motion has been made to go into Committee of Supply an amendemnt has been moved which, in most instances, has occupied very nearly the whole of the sitting up to eleven o'clock. I am not criticizing this proceeding—it may be absolutely necessary and the submission of such amendments may be quite proper—but nevertheless if we are going to limit the time within which we shall sit to eleven o'clock, then I think we must be prepared for a similar condition to that in the Old Country where Parliament sits practically all the year round.

In the discussion considerable importance has been attached to the matter of physical endurance, and as to the possibility of the limit of that endurance being reached when members are asked to sit so late. If hon. members occupied their seats all the time there might be some foundation for that argument. I quite agree that if hon. members had to keep their seats during the entire sitting of the House, there might be force in such an argument, but, the actual facts do not support the contention. A casual observation will show that, on the average, not more than one-fifth of the seats of the House can be claimed as occupied continuously; the attendance of members varies and has even fallen to the point where the Speaker has had on one occasion to adjourn the House for want of a quorum. Very often the attendance will only number some fifty or sixty members—indeed unless the occasion is a special one it is very seldom that more than fifty or sixty members are in their seats. Unfortunately for me I am not a smoker, and I have not as good an excuse to advance for leaving the chamber as some hon. gentlemen employ when they wish to take a little leisure out in the lobby or elsewhere. I do not think, therefore, that any hon. member is suffering very much by reason of the continued occupancy of his chair, and we do not need to worry very much about such a point as that when we are not compelled to remain in the chamber continuously. For these reasons I do not know that I can support the resolution except as to opening the proceedings at three o'clock on Wednesday. I am unable, however, to support the proposition that the latest hour for sittings, unless there be good reason to the contrary, shall be eleven o'clock.

Mr. FIELDING: If the House will bear with me for a few minutes I think I shall be able to say before the House rises for dinner, all that I wish to say in reply. I regret that the motion has come up at a time when so many hon. members are absent, because, from the conversations I have had with many hon. gentlemen on both sides, I am satisfied that the purpose of this motion has a larger degree of sympathy than has been made evident in the discussion to-day. I have already intimated that I have no intention of asking the House to divide upon this motion. If I felt that such a motion would have the effect of prolonging the session, as suggested by the hon. member for Centre Vancouver (Mr.Stevens) I would be among the first to oppose it. However, I do not think it would have that result; I think the effect would be quite the opposite.

I sympathize with the views expressed by hon. members who have been described —I think it was by my hon. friend from Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg)—as the "long distance members." They are in a different position from those hon. gentlemen who come from Montreal and Toronto, and I quite sympathize with them in their attitude. On the other hand I must make this observation—which I hope will not be found to be inaccurate—that in looking around at the empty seats at a late hour

I find that just as many "long distance members" are absent as those who might be described as "short distance members." I do not find that in that respect distance makes very much difference. There is a disposition on the part of members not to submit to the long and continued sittings; and if you are not going to have 6 p.m. an occasional recess—if you are going to sit on Wednesday nights, and on other nights as well, until eleven o'clock, you may do so nominally but later than that you will not do so in reality because members will not remain; and anybody who wants evidence of that fact can come into this chamber almost any night right after eleven o'clock and he will find that in most cases there is little more than a bare quorum on the Government benches—that is an actual fact.

Now the discussion broadened into one upon the advisability of a general revision of the rules of the House. Much has been said on questions of interest, but I do not think such questions bear directly on the matter at issue here. The Prime Minister, for example, talked about motions to go into Supply and amendments thereto. That is a very interesting subject and I should like to deliver an essay some day on what is the real basis of amendments to Supply in this chamber, but I do not care to do so now. My hon. friend from Maple Creek proposed that Parliament should meet earlier. I agree with that. My hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) proposed to enlarge the closure. Well, that is a large question. Possibly there may be wisdom in that suggestion, but I confined my motion to one or two particular points which seemed to me to be easily within the grasp of the House, and I do not think any sound reason has been advanced against those suggestions. It has been said by the hon. member for Centre Vancouver that there is an unwritten law that on Mondays and Fridays no business of importance shall be transacted. My hon. friend has certainly no warrant for that statement; there is no such unwritten law to my knowledge. There is a convenience at times in not bringing on matters on Monday or Friday afternoon; but there is no written law or no unwritten law on the subject. As the best evidence of that I call attention to the fact that the Prime Minister on Friday last brought forward a motion of great importance, one that he knew was likely to be a matter of contest. Still he brought it forward on Friday; he felt free to do so and I make no complaint of his taking that course. However, I think there is no such Monday and Friday rule as my hon. friend from Centre Vancouver describes. Now, as I pointed out, if hon. members are not to be allowed an evening off they will probably take it for themselves and the only result will be that we will take up business when the House is largely empty.

There is another thought that I would like to express. Much has been said about the waste of the time of the House. There are 235 members in this chamber—I think I am correct in the statement—men with heads on their shoulders and brains in their heads. They have not been sent here to be indifferent to what is going on, and if we are going to have democratic government, if we are going to have real representation of the people, those men must give expression to their views from time to time. That is not a waste of money and it is not a waste of time—it is simply a feature of the democratic government under which we live. Very much has been said about the waste of time in Parliament which is entirely unwarrantable.

There is only one other thought which I desire to express at the moment, and it relates to a matter as to which I have no personal grievance, and from which I suffer no personal discomfort. Some of the members of the House are not as young as I am. Some that may be as young in years are not as blest with health and strength as I have the happiness to be. There are members of the House on both sides—perhaps to be accurate more on the Government side,—whose condition of health does not permit them to sit here and yet we find them brought to the House at two, three, four or five o'clock in the morning. These men have been dragged out of their sick beds to come here and take part in the discussion or to vote. That, I think, is a thing exceedingly to be regretted, and in my opinion it would be very much in the interest of good government, very much for the comfort and convenience of members as well as in the interest of efficiency, if we had rules which would enable more regard to be paid to the condition of health of these gentlemen. Mr. Speaker, I desire to withdraw the resolution.

Resolution withdrawn.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEE APPOINTED ON THE MOTION OF THE PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: With the consent of the House, and the leader of the Opposition being present, I would like to move that the House return to motions in order that I may move for the appointment of a Select Standing Committee on Railways and Shipping.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move, seconded by Hon. Mr. Reid:

That the Select Standing Committee appointed on the 8th instant, respecting the production of information, the system of auditing, the publication of detail in the Annual Report and the improvement that could be made in the general scheme of management of Canadian National Railways and Shipping as at present conducted, and the continuance of the said Committee and the reference thereto of the said Report, consist of the following members:

Messrs. Allan, Ballantyne, Bureau, Cahill, Casgrain, Chaplin, Copp, Crerar, Davidson, Duff, Hocken, Long, Maclean (Halifax), Maclean (York); Manion, McLean (Royal), Mewburn; Murphy, Nicholson (Algoma); Papineau, Reid (Grenville), Reid (McKenzie), Stevens, Stewart (Lanark), Tweedie, White (Victoria).

Mr. FIELDING: Is the right hon. gentleman correct in the form of his motion? It reads, "That the Select Standing Committee appointed on the 8th instant." There was an order of the House that there should be a committee, but I do not think he is correct in saying the committee was appointed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I noticed that. I asked the Clerk of the House to prepare the motion, and this is his drafting.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not object if the right hon. member is satisfied.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The question is, did the resolution of the 8th instant really appoint a committee?

Mr. SPEAKER: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then this resolution should read:

That the Select Standing Committee pursuant to the resolution of the 8th instant, respecting the production of information,—

And so on.

Mr. FIELDING: That is right.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion as amended?

Motion as amended agreed to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move, Mr. Speaker, that the House do return to the Order Notices of Motion.

Motion agreed to.

At Six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at Eight o'clock.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—EXPROPRIATION OF LAND AT LEVIS

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence since January 1, 1912, between the Minister of Railways and Canals or any officer of the Department of Railways and Canals at Ottawa, and any officer of the Intercolonial Railway, and between any of such officials and Messrs. G. T. Davie and Son, or any solicitor or agent of the firm, respecting the expropriation of land at Lévis, Quebec, for the purposes of the Intercolonial Railway.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the transaction referred to in this motion for papers began, as the dates will show, several years ago, but has attracted public notice only recently through an action that has been tried in the courts—one which, indeed, is still before the courts. In August, 1912, the Government of Canada, for the purposes of the Intercolonial Railway, acquired by expropriation a property in the town of Lévis in the province of Quebec owned by the firm of George T. Davie and Son and other members of their family. In the course of the transaction they employed the services of a gentleman in the real estate business in Montreal, Mr. D. W. Ogilvie, doing business under the name of D. W. Ogilvie and Company. A little later they brought into their service another gentleman in Montreal, a member of the legal profession, Mr. C. A. Barnard, K.C. These gentlemen were employed to carry on the negotiations with respect to the property. When the transaction as respects the Government was closed and the compensation determined, some difficulty arose between Messrs. Davie, the owners of the property, and Mr. Ogilvie and Mr. Barnard, who had been employed in the negotiations. A dispute having arisen as to the compensation which Messrs. Ogilvie and Barnard should receive for their services, Messrs. Davie effected a settlement with Mr. Barnard to his apparent satisfaction, but in the case of Mr. Ogilvie they were not so fortunate. Mr. Ogilvie objected to the compensation allowed him, whereupon he brought an action in the courts of the province of Quebec against Messrs. Davie. At the first stage of the action Ogilvie failed; Davie was successful. The case was then appealed to the Appeal Court in the province of Quebec and there again Mr. Ogilvie was unsuccessful. The case was then brought to the Supreme Court of Canada and was dealt with quite recently, judgment being given in favour of Mr. Ogilvie, the judgment of the lower courts set aside and a new trial ordered. That is the way the case now stands in the courts. It is but right to say that in these proceedings the Government was not a party and neither the plaintiff nor the defendant appears to have had any interest in probing the Government's side of the question, if there was a Government side; so that any information we get in the matter concerning the Government's action comes from what we might call the side lights; we get a glimpse of it occasionally as we look over the proceedings in the courts. Information of that character is necessarily incomplete, and it would not be wise to form a conclusion based upon it. But I think when I state in outline the facts as they appear on the records of the courts the House will agree that it is a case in respect of which we ought to have further information.

It was on August 12, 1912, that the Government acquired the property. On that day the engineer of the Intercolonial railway deposited in the Registry Office of the county of Lévis a plan and description of the property in question. I think I am right in stating that in accordance with the law, upon the plan and description being so deposited, the title to the property became vested in the Crown, subject, of course, to the right of the late owner to receive fair compensation. Now, there are two methods, either of which may in the ordinary way of business be employed to determine the compensation. The Government may themselves, by such method as suits them, fix a valuation on the property and may offer accordingly the price which they are willing to pay. If the late owner —whom I shall speak of now as the owner —is content with that; if he accepts the price so offered, the transaction is ended. But if he is not satisfied with what is offered, or if no offer is made, then the owner has the right to take his case into the Exchequer Court and that court will determine the compensation to be paid. It seems to me rather strange that neither of these ordinary business methods was adopted in this case. The Government do not appear to have made any offer to Messrs. Davie, and Messrs. Davie certainly entered no action in the Exchequer Court. The matter appears to have been allowed to drift along in the expectation that negotiations would in some way bring about a satisfactory solution. Messrs. Davie seem to have had the notion that they could not go about this thing in a straight, simple, businesslike way—send in their claim and establish it; they seemed to have had the notion that influence—I use the word that is found in the record—was required, and they obtained the services of Mr. Ogilvie because they thought his influence would be useful. Later they thought they needed more influence, so they obtained the services of Mr. Barnard. Let me say at once that Mr. Barnard himself says he was not employed in a professional capacity; he, therefore, was not to be considered as merely making a claim for ordinary legal services—he was employed as negotiator, as he says himself, to get all that he could for the parties. Mr. Barnard, as I have said, was brought into the transaction some time after Mr. Ogilvie became concerned in it; Mr. Ogilvie seemed to have conducted the negotiations at first, and later Mr. Barnard came in. At the beginning there appeared to have been negotiations with Mr. Gutelius and others, officers of the Intercolonial Railway, but after a short time the conclusion seemed to have been reached that the matter could not be settled in that way; that recourse must be had to higher authorities. So it came about that Mr. Gutelius and others dropped out of the matter and the scene was transferred to Ottawa.

Shortly after Messrs. Ogilvie were employed they wrote a letter to Messrs. Davie with regard to the compensation that was expected. On May 7, 1913, Messrs. J. W. Ogilvie and Company wrote this letter to Messrs. George T. Davie and Sons, of Lévis, Quebec:

> Dear Sirs,—The Intercolonial railway of Canada have sent us a blue-print of your property situated in Lauzon Ward, Lévis, showing the land they purpose to expropriate lying between the present Intercolonial railway and the King's Highway; the strip of land having a superficial area, according to the plan as prepared by C. A. Bourget, of 36,900 sq. ft. E.M.
> In order to take up this matter with the Intercolonial railway, will you kindly write us giving us the best cash price you will accept for the 36,900 sq. ft. of land. On receipt of your letter we will communicate with the proper officials and endeavour to make a sale of the property direct to the Intercolonial railway without expropriation proceedings.
>
> Trusting you will give this matter your early attention, as it is advisable to settle with the railway before expropriation proceedings are started.
>
> Yours very truly,
> (Sgd.) D. W. OGILVIE & Co. Inc.
> Per D. W. Ogilvie.

Here you see that the agent was asking from his principals a definite price for which they were prepared to dispose of the property. This is the reply of George T. Davie and Son, dated at Lévis, May 14, 1913:

Levis, May 14, 1913.

Messrs. D. W. OGILVIE & Co.,
11 St. Sacrament Street,
Montreal, Que.

Dear Sirs,—In answer to your letter of May 7, we beg to say that we are asking one dollar and twenty-five cents ($1.25) per foot of our property which has been expropriated by the Intercolonial railway.

Yours very truly,
(Sgd.) GEO. T. DAVIE & SON,
Per J. O. A. V.

That communication offering the land at $1.25 per foot appears to have been conveyed, although I do not know how, to the Intercolonial Railway authorities, because at some later stage when Mr. Barnard endeavoured to get $3 per foot for the property, he was told that was ridiculous, as the Government already had the offer of Messrs. Davie and Son to sell at $1.25 per foot. That seems to have been for the moment rather a knock-out blow to the negotiators. They recovered, however, and they represented that when they offered the property for $1.25 per foot, they really meant $1.75, and that the error was merely a clerical one. The negotiations appear to have proceeded for some time on that basis and, in fact, the matter was ultimately settled without reference to the original offer. At one stage Mr. Gutelius was offered the property at $1.75 per foot, and he said that that was too much and he refused to pay it. After the principals and their representatives made further representations to the Government, they ultimately, as I shall show, effected a settlement in which they got a very much larger price than Davie was willing to sell for. It is important, in view of what occurred subsequently to notice this letter signed by George T. Davie and Son per one of their officials offering the property at $1.25 per foot, when at a later stage the demand was made for a much higher price, and as I stated the representation was made that this letter contained a clerical error. It appears that when the matter came to trial, the gentleman who wrote this letter, under the authority, presumably, of George T. Davie and Son, was no longer in their service. He was, however, available, but he was not called as a witness. I suppose it did not interest either party to the suit to probe that question of the $1.25 per foot. After the matter was all settled, when there was no longer any question with the Government, but when there was some question between Ogilvie and Barnard regarding their compensation, we obtained through the record, for I have no other source of information, a statement of what Mr. Barnard thought about this mistake. Mr. Barnard, writing to Mr. Ogilvie in connection with the arrangement about their compensation said :

We have succeeded in getting them—

The Davie's.

—$1.75 per foot, notwithstanding the fact that they had at one time offered to take $1.25, and I do not possibly see how they can raise any objection to turning over everything over $1.75 per foot.

That is Mr. Barnard's letter to Mr. Ogilvie after the transaction was settled with the Government. Mr. Barnard also wrote to Mr. G. C. Stuart, K.C., of Quebec, one of the counsel in the case, as follows:

As regards the Davie's themselves, they should remember that Ogilvie's services, outside of these $15,586.15—

That has reference to a previous portion of the matter which is of no importance here.

—has resulted in their getting in any case 50 cents per foot for their property more than they had at one time been willing to take, which 50 cents amounted on 36,900 to $18,450, so that even if they pay Ogilvie the amount I consider he is entitled to, they are still $18,450 better off than they would have been had they not dealt at all with Ogilvie.

That is Mr. Barnard's statement. Then Mr. Barnard was a witness at the trial and this occurred in his testimony:

I thought therefore, that I ought to point out to Mr. Stuart that as a matter of fact our joint services—

Ogilvie's and Barnard's.

—in any case had resulted in getting $1.75 for the property that Davie's had been willing to take $1.25 for.

Q. That was the fact? A. That was the fact, yes.

The Government, you see, had then been settled with; but while the transaction appears to be carried on on the basis that this $1.25 per foot offer was a mistake, we find Mr. Barnard, in correspondence and in his evidence at the trial, stating and swearing that $1.25 per foot was what the Davie's were really willing to take at that time. The story is too long to burden the House with it all, because I only want to show sufficient ground to make a basis for getting further information. There was some question of difficulty at an early stage about the area in question. At the beginning there seemed to have been one or two surveys and some misunderstanding arose in that way. At one stage a larger quantity of land was mentioned, and Mr. Campbell, Deputy Minister of Railways, in a letter stated that he thought they had included some land already owned by the Intercolonial. Messrs. Davie and Son, however, had that matter all amicably settled by declaring that the quantity of land was 36,900 feet, and in all their negotiations later on they mentioned that quantity and at the trial they swore that that was the quantity. When the deed was ultimately passed, a larger quantity of land was mentioned; instead of 36,900 feet the deed contained a mention of 63,000 and some odd feet. Mr. Barnard, commenting on that, said that it appeared to him that it was a manœuvre—I am using his word—

Hon. Mr. REID: The hon. member said 69,000; it should be 39,000.

Mr. FIELDING: Yes. The quantity mentioned in the deed is 38,000 and some odd feet. The "sixty-nine" comes in a more substantial matter of dollars and cents. Mr. Barnard said that he could not quite understand why that change was made. At all events, he said, Davie was not getting any more for 38,000 odd feet than he was going to get for 36,900 feet. He said that this was a manœuvre to cover up a sum of $5,000 which he was to get in the transaction, and that so far as he was concerned he did not want to be covered up at all. That matter, however, in the end, perhaps did not affect the general question. The main question seemed to be that Davie offered this property to the Government for $1.25 per foot, and in the end the Government paid not only $1.75 per foot, but $5,000 more. Davie allowed Barnard $10,000 for his services. Some may say: "If it suited Mr. Davie to pay to Mr. Barnard a sum of $10,000 for his services, what business is it of ours; we need not care." We need not care if it were absolutely the fact that Davie paid the $10,000; but a more careful examination of the facts shows that what Mr. Davie did was to pay only $5,000, and the other $5,000 to Mr. Barnard was paid by the convenient device of adding that sum to the charge to the Government and making the Government pay it. Mr. Barnard got $10,000, but only $5,000 of it came out of Mr. Davie. The record seems to show very clearly that for a property which the Government were offered for $1.25 per foot, they paid in the end $1.75. Not only that, but they also paid an additional sum of $5,000 under the circumstances I have described.

These are the facts set forth in the proceedings in the court. If it be true that an offer was made in good faith, and Mr. Barnard treats it as a bona fide offer, to sell this property for $1.25 per foot, and if the negotiations were carried on for a long time and finally carried to Ottawa, and negotiators were employed to do that which ought not to have needed negotiators, it seems to be as simple a fact as we can present that the Government paid $18,000 odd more for that property than the owner was willing to take, and that an additional $5,000 went, not to the Davies, but to Mr. Barnard. These facts are only sidelights which come out in the course of the inquiry in the court. Again I say, one only gets a partial view of the situation. I do not want to draw any conclusions from incomplete information of that character. I quite admit that we should reserve our judgment, and I present these facts accordingly. All I ask is that in view of these facts set forth in the court—I have no other source of information—the House should adopt the resolution, whereby we would get all the papers relating to the subject.

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways and Canals): When this motion was placed on the Order Paper I asked one of my officials to get all the facts in connection with the case in order that I might be able to reply to my hon. friend when he moved his resolution in the House. I am sorry to say that up till six o'clock I had not received the information, but since that time I have endeavoured to get what little information I could in order to give it to the House this evening.

Let me say at the outset that there is no reason why all the papers and correspondence in connection with this transaction should not be brought down, and they will be brought down at the earliest possible date. This whole transaction from start to finish took place prior to my being Minister of Railways and Canals and therefore I was not personally siezed of the facts in connection with the case, but in the short time I have had since six o'clock to look into the matter I understand that these are the facts:

On December 15, 1911, the town of Levis advised the railway officials that they proposed to abandon the city stock pens which the Intercolonial had been using until that time. The officials of the railway, after studying various locations for a new stock pen, decided that that site was the best, and that they should try and purchase the property. Accordingly Mr. Brady, the general manager of the railway, on July 2, 1912, recommended to the then Minister of Railways, the late Mr. Cochrane, that the property be purchased, and on August 12, about a month later, the property was expropriated by an Order in Council upon the recommendation of Mr. Cochrane. The matter then stood for about two years. Negotiations in the meantime were carried on between Mr. Gutelius and D. W. Ogilvie and Company, representing G. T. Davie and Sons, Lévis. I understand that Mr. Gutelius offered $1.75 per foot, but that was refused. Accordingly, Mr. Gutelius appointed, as was the custom, three valuators, Jos. Gosselin, contractor, Lévis, Télesphore Charland, Mayor of Lauzon, and Jos. Edouard Parent, Beaufort, to value the property.

Mr. FIELDING: What was the date of their appointment?

Hon. Mr. REID: They were appointed on December 30, 1913, on the recommendation of the Postmaster General, dated December 16, 1913, to ascertain whether $1.75 per square foot was a fair and reasonable price. The result was that these arbitrators reported on February 2, 1914, giving a valuation of $3.00 per square foot. On January 30, 1914, D. W. Ogilvie and Company withdrew the option for the lower price,—I presume that means $1.75,—and on April 4, named the price of $2.75 per square foot. Negotiations were continued with D. W. Ogilvie and Company through their solicitor, Mr. Barnard, and finally on March 15, 1915, Mr. Barnard after an interview offered to accept $69,575 in settlement, the terms being a cash payment of $9,575 with interest thereon, leaving a balance of $60,000, with interest thereon at 4 per cent from date of taking possession, payable when convenient to the Government to do so. Mr. Gutelius in the memorandum signed by him says:

> Personally it was my intention to recommend the acceptance of the $1.75, and hoped that the valuators would confirm this as being fair and reasonable. When they raised the price, however, to $3.00 per foot and the owners were apparently aware of this figure, it made it more difficult, so that the settlement which was finally affected was to my mind a good business proposition and less than the Exchequer Court would have awarded us, having in mind that our own valuators would endeavour to protect their valuation of $3.00 per foot before the court.

[Mr. Reid.]

I mention these facts merely to show that Mr. Gutelius as general manager was trying to protect the interests of the railway and the Government by endeavouring to get the property at as low a price as possible, and also to show that Mr. Cochrane acted under the advice of his officials, and, I believe, in good faith. I am quite satisfied that if there was anything wrong in any shape or form my predecessor knew nothing whatever about it; nor, I believe, did Mr. Gutelius. On the recommendation of Mr. Cochrane the order was dated October 26, 1915, advising the acceptance of $69,575 for 38,723 feet of land. That was the official Order in Council, and from the information I have received since six o'clock I think it was the understanding that the $60,000 was not to be paid for two years, during which time 4 per cent interest was paid on that amount. The final payment was made, I think, in 1918. Of course, that payment was made after I became minister, but the matter had already been settled, so that I never heard of it until the hon. member placed the motion on the Order Paper. As I have said, however, so far as the Government is concerned, I believe that the transaction was carried out by the officials and by the minister in good faith, and if there have been commissions or anything of that kind they know nothing whatever about them. We are only too pleased to bring the papers down and have the matter thoroughly investigated from start to finish.

Mr. FIELDING: There is little I care to add to what has already been said. I am quite aware that the matter must have taken place largely before the minister entered the department, and I have no desire to cast reflections upon any one. But the facts as I have stated them, on the authority of the proceedings in the courts, show the necessity for further investigation. I want to state one or two points in reply to my hon. friend. He says that an Order in Council was passed to pay this sum for 39,000 odd feet.

Hon. Mr. REID: The quantity is 38,723 feet.

Mr. FIELDING: Yes, nearly 39,000 feet. Now, Messrs. Davie, all through the latter part of the negotiations, held, and in the trial distinctly swore, that there were only 36,900 feet. There is no information yet to account for the larger quantity of nearly 39,000 feet mentioned in the deed.

There is a suggestion from Mr. Barnard that there was a manœuvre to cover up something which he did not want covered up. My hon. friend says that an Order in Council was passed to pay $69,575; but 36,900 feet at $1.75 does not amount to that sum; it gives only $64,575. The facts seem to be that Messrs. Davie and Company offered the property at $1.25 per foot, and though there was some talk of that being a mistake, we have the sworn testimony of Mr. Barnard that it was correct, that Messrs. Davie were getting 50 cents per foot more than they themselves asked for. They were paid, not the sum of $46,125 which they were willing to take, not the $64,000 odd that would be the amount at $1.75 per foot, but the higher price of $69,575. On the surface it does appear that there was something peculiar about the management of this affair. I do not wish to press the matter further, because I admit that the information is incomplete and I would prefer that we reserve judgment until we are in possession of all the papers.

Motion agreed to.

CORRESPONDENCE RE JUDGES ACT, 1920

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve—Gaspé) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence between the Chief Justice of Ontario and any Member of the Government as to the Judges' Act of the Session of 1920.

He said: I have nothing to say about this motion except that I think it is in the public interest that this correspondence be laid on the table of the House. I understand that there has been between the Government, especially the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), and the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen), and the Chief Justice of the province of Ontario, some correspondence regarding the Judges' Act as amended by the legislation of last year. When that correspondence is laid on the Table we shall be in a position to deal further with the matter.

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): I had not observed this motion on the Order Paper. I shall ascertain whether there is any correspondence of an official character that should be produced. If there is I shall be glad to table it.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. SPEAKER: Orders of the Day.

Mr. LEMIEUX: With your leave, Mr. Speaker, I understood that we would revert to some other motions.

Hon. Mr. REID: I understood otherwise.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member (Mr. Lemieux) says there was an understanding that the House would revert to certain motions that had been passed. It might be well for the Government to intimate their desire in the matter.

Hon. Mr. REID: I understood that we would proceed with the Orders of the Day.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not wish to press the point if my hon. friend prefers to take the Orders of the Day. It was my impression, however, that we would take up motion No. 15, dealing with the question of the Chicago Drainage Canal, in which, I think, the Minister of Marine is interested.

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE: I should like my hon. friend to let that motion stand; I have not had an opportunity of looking into it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Until Monday next?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—REDUCTION IN NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. B. COPP (Westmoreland): I desire to refer to a matter which has been dealt with in the public press for the last two or three days, and I should be glad to have an expression of opinion regarding it from the Minister of Railways. I refer to the reduction in the number of working men in the Canadian National shops in the city of Moncton. There is a rumour to the effect that from 600 to 800 men are to be turned out from the C.N.R. shops in that city. Is that report correct, and, if so, is the order only a matter of temporary expediency or is it to be permanent? This is of great importance to the people in that city as well as to the public generally. Will the minister be good enough to make a statement to the House?

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways and Canals): The hon. member was kind enough to inform me at six o'clock of his intention to bring this matter up on the Orders of the Day. I called up President Hanna at Toronto, and asked him what the real situation was. Mr. Hanna informs me that owing to a decline in the business of the railways, they could not find work for all the employees in the shops. They therefore offered to keep on all hands and reduce work to half-time. All employees in shops west of Port Arthur accepted. Those on the Government railways as a body refused, and the management could therefore do nothing but lay off temporarily all surplus employees. Just as soon as there is work the men will again be taken on.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—PRICE OFFERED FOR RAILS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOHN C. DOUGLAS (South Cape Breton and Richmond): I desire to draw the attention of the Minister of Railways to a despatch which appears in the Canadian press of yesterday, as well as the newspapers published to-day, which reads as follows:

> Roll Rails at Cost for C.N.R. is offer
> Sydney, N.S., April 9.—In a statement to the Canadian Press today, R. M. Wolvin, president of the Dominion Steel Company, stated that the company had offered to roll rails for the Canadian National Railways at actual cost, but he gave positive denial to a statement appearing in an Ottawa despatch, which reported the offering of a large rail order to the company by the Department of Railways.

In view of the importance of this matter, and the large amount of unemployment that prevails at Sydney and Glace Bay in consequence of the small amount of business being done in connection with coal and steel operations. I desire to ask the minister if he has any statement to make on the subject.

Hon. Mr. REID: I noticed the article in question and I wish to make the following statement with respect to it:

> The Canadian National Railways have rails for renewals and repairs for 1921. Notwithstanding this fact they have offered to take a large quantity of rails for new work. They have offered the Algoma Steel Company the same price as paid them for rails during 1920, namely, $55 per ton, and have offered the Dominion Iron and Steel Company the same price. This price both companies have refused and are asking higher prices. As the mills have reduced the wages of employees, and rails in the United States are offered at $47 per ton, it it not considered reasonable that the Government should be called upon to pay an increased price for rails for 1921.

REPORT OF DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka): I wish to ask the Minister of Health if there is any report from that department, and if so when it will be laid 2before Parliament.

Hon. Mr. CALDER: If I am not mistaken the report has already been laid upon the table. If it has not I will make enquiries and see that it is laid on the table as soon as possible.

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY

On the Order for resuming the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Campbell, as amended:

> That, in the opinion of this House, work on the Hudson Bay railway should be resumed as soon as financial conditions permit, and that the project be completed with the least possible delay.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution desires to reply.

Mr. J. A. CAMPBELL (Nelson): I was not aware that this matter was coming up to-night. However, as it has been taken up, and as the opportunity is afforded me of replying to some of the statements made during the debate which took place some days ago, I shall take advantage of the occasion to say a few words. May I say, by way of preliminary, that I was somewhat amazed—in fact I was dumbfounded—by the somewhat cold-blooded manner in which the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) when this matter was last brought up, showed his indifference to the pledges and promises of the Government, and of his party generally, in connection with this scheme. Surely the country has come to a sorry state when a responsible Government, such as we presumably have at the present time, can lightly wave aside the solemn pledges which they have made in connection with a matter of national importance such as the construction of the Hudson Bay railway. The only excuse, or at least the chief excuse, which was given by the minister for the absolute disregard by the Government, and by the party which supports them, of the pledges and promises made in connection with this railway, was the fact—or the alleged fact—that the financial condition of the country would not warrant a further vote of money in connection with this road at the present time. Actually, Mr. Speaker, this statement was made despite the fact that money is being spent like water in connection with all other kinds of public undertaking such as shipbuilding, the construction of dry docks, improvements in harbours, the carrying out of the St. Lawrence improvement scheme and various other undertakings. We look at the Estimates this year and we find that sums ranging from two to ten millions, are being spent in various parts of Canada on public works of this nature. Nevertheless we are told that even so small a sum comparatively as $1,700,000 is not available to complete the Hudson Bay project on which $21,000,000 has been already expended.

Two members of the Liberal Opposition, the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) and the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Vien) criticised the project and quoted some evidence given in the past against the scheme. Now, as I have already pointed out, the evidence which they cited is not new; it has been produced in the House from time to time on previous occasions and it has been answered. As the result of various commissions and investigations held from time to time, the Government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier started the building of this road and intended to carry it to completion but were not allowed to do so. As a result of the elections of 1911 another Government stepped in and went on with the work after further investigation was made. I intimated to the House when this question was last before it that I did not wish to take up the time of the House in giving details as to the evidence in connection with this matter. That evidence is very extensive, in fact, it consists of volumes, and I do not propose to-night to go into it. I would simply refer the two gentlemen in question to the statements of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his Government and I ask them if they repudiate the action of Sir Wilfrid and his Government in 1910 when they began the construction of this railway after having thoroughly investigated the project. I have the same question to ask of hon. gentlemen supporting the Government. Do they repudiate the statements made by Sir Charles Tupper, by the former Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden); by the present Prime Minister, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and others—statements which I quoted in the few remarks I made the other day and which were emphatically in favour of the scheme? I ask hon. gentlemen opposite if they repudiate the statements made by these gentlemen and by the governments which they represented.

The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) during the previous debate told a very gruesome story of the horrible things he had done at various times in the past, and declared that he was not now playing politics. I would like to ask my hon. friend who is playing politics at the present time? Are those who are asking to have the Government's promises carried out playing politics, or is it those who propose to set aside one scheme which has been promised, undertaken and nearly completed in order to carry out another scheme which was only put forward in order to win a by-election? I ask him who is playing politics when the Hudson Bay Railway project is set aside, after so much money has been spent on it, in order to construct a dry dock at Esquimalt to fulfil a pledge that was made in order to win a by-election at Victoria not so very long ago? It looks to me as though hon. gentlemen opposite are carrying on the same programme as that which my hon. friend from Oxford declared he had been supporting in the past, although he is now repentant. I would like to ask my hon. friend if he thinks the Estimates in connection with the construction of dry docks, canal improvements, and other matters that are on the Government's programme at the present time, indicate a sincere desire for economy? I propose, Mr. Speaker, when the time comes to bring these questions definitely before the House to ascertain whether the House correctly appreciates the situation—whether we are simply going to have economy in one particular and not in all? If we are going to have economy—something which I very much desire to see brought about as a matter of public policy, then it should be applied everywhere and not simply applied in one particular part of the country.

The hon. member for North Oxford also indulged in certain remarks about something that somebody had told him as to the great amount of dredging that had to be done at Port Nelson. As a matter of fact if the hon. member had cared to obtain reliable information about that particular subject, he could have gone to the Department of Railways and the chief engineer would have told him definitely what the situation was as far as dredging is concerned. He repeated a story that some one had told him, but I may tell him that it will be emphatically denied if he goes to the proper quarter for information. But this hon. gentleman as well as other hon. members have brought down here a lot of hearsay evidence and retailed it as arguments against a scheme which has been thoroughly investigated and pronounced sound and feasible, and the feasibility and practicability of which is not an issue at the present time.

It would seem from the statements made by certain gentlemen that in the case of the Hudson Bay project they contend that this should be a ready-made route. There never was such a situation existing in the Dominion before. The St. Lawrence was not a ready-made route. I have a vivid recollection of taking passage in the steamship Victorian, I think it was fifteen years or so ago and when we were only a few hours' out from Montreal about nine o'clock one morning we ran aground this side of Quebec, and the passengers had to be taken off in small boats and landed at Quebec. In my own case I lost so much time that I had to abandon the voyage. I was told that the Victorian remained aground for some months. If anything like that had happened on the Hudson Bay route the hon. gentleman would have used the incident to condemn the project; yet millions of dollars have been spent on the St. Lawrence route, and although it is not perhaps quite as satisfactory as it should be, we are not condemning the route. But if half as much money were spent on the Hudson Bay route I have no doubt that it would be a certain success. Regarding my hon. friend from Battleford—

Mr. LONG: North Battleford.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Regarding my hon. friend from North Battleford, notwithstanding the rather critical tone of his remarks, I think that, generally speaking, I am considerably in accord with the statements made by him. I might interpolate here that in any remarks which I made I was not in any way casting aspersions on my hon. friend. I believe he has honestly investigated this proposition—something that certain other hon. members have not done—but cannot see his way clear to advocate continuance of the project at the present time. He read an article from the Grain Growers' Guide—I have not got it here as I did not know this matter was coming up to-night—written by some one who had been to the Bay, criticizing severely the character of the work that had been done.

9 p.m. I am fully in accord with that criticism, because the scheme appears to have been muddled from start to finish, and to have been so handled, as some think, in order to show that the project will not work out successfully. Although I agree with him that certain of the work already done has been unsatisfactory, owing perhaps to insufficient investigation in some respects, still I disagree with him in his opinion that the work can well be stopped altogether at the present time until the matter is thoroughly investigated. I say that certain work should go on, and that as to other work for instance, such as that in connection with the terminals, further investigation might be made.

I made a proposition to the right hon. Prime Minister a short time ago which I think covers the ground. The dump or grade is completed to the bay. I suggested that the rails be laid from the present end of steel for a distance of about forty miles, which would bring the line to the head of navigation on the river. The Government own and operate a stern wheel river steamer at Port Nelson, and if my suggestion were adopted the railway would connect with the steamer and thus complete connection with the bay. The cost would not be excessive, and by this means men and material could be brought into the bay for any investigation or work that may be necessary there. I am told that as soon as connection is made with the bay, commercial fishing will be indulged in. I was also told by a prominent official of the Marine and Fisheries Department that it was the intention of the department—the hon. minister can correct me if I am mistaken—as soon as the railway is completed to the bay to put on one or more steam trawlers for the purpose of investigating the fisheries. I was informed that the department had this in view before the war broke out, but the war forced them to abandon this proposal and it was then decided to allow it to remain in abeyance until connection is made with the bay by means of the railway or otherwise. I received a letter a few days ago from a gentleman interested in iron properties on the east shore of Hudson bay—he is only one of a number who are so interested. He had told me some years ago that he and his colleagues were waiting until the railway was completed in order that they might start work on their properties. Now he wants to know what the prospects are for getting in this year. If this connection could be effected now a great deal of work of an exploratory nature would be undertaken, which will add to the regular traffic resulting from the building of the road.

Now a few words in conclusion with reference to statements made by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals. He stated that the road did not pay. Of course it does not pay. Does anybody in this House know of any public undertaking with which the hon. minister is concerned that does pay? The day after the debate on this matter recently he read a statement regarding the Canadian National railways, and if ever there was a proposition that did not pay we had a glaring example there. I could name a number of other undertakings with which he is connected that do not pay; for instance, the Welland canal and the Trent canal in which he takes a great deal of personal interest. As far as the Hudson Bay railway is concerned, it was never intended to pay as a local proposition. The idea was to connect the wheatfields of the prairies with the Bay, and local traffic was not in the minds of those who undertook the enterprise. But we find a situation has developed in the meantime which shows that the country through which this railway passes is not the wilderness we thought it was, and that there are resources there which, if properly handled, will produce a great deal of local traffic, and it is within the bounds of probability that when the road is completed the local traffic itself will form a substantial part of the operating surplus. The line was to be constructed to Port Nelson and the work was proceeded with at great speed during the war, but when peace came that work was stopped. The road is about two-thirds built, and when operations ceased the road was left practically in a field. It is being operated—not for the 332 miles on which steel is laid, but only for about 214 miles. It does not go any place in particular, indeed, as I have said, it practically stops nowhere. How could any road under such circumstances be expected to pay? Yet my hon. friend says that because it does not pay we are going to stop work, and go ahead and spend millions and millions of dollars on other public works that we do not expect to get any revenue from whatever.

This matter was brought before certain members of the Cabinet on one occasion by a delegation of members of this House and the statement was then made by one of the ministers that we had to economize, and so far as he was concerned no public works were going to be built that year, although a number of places wished to have public works proceeded with just as the West wished to have the Hudson bay railway completed. I asked him if he had any public works under way, such as post offices or similar buildings which had been left partly constructed without any roof on, and which he proposed to leave in that way until financial conditions should improve. He said there was no instance of that kind. That would have been an instance analagous to the conditions existing in respect to the Hudson bay railway at the present time.

I might say here, Mr. Speaker—and I have said it before—that if this were a one word of its immediate construction. I would not prefer one request to have the work commenced. Further, if the Hudson Bay railway had been completed for a distance of only one hundred miles or thereabouts, you would not hear one word from me by way of request for an extension of the line at this time. But neither of these conditions applies to the Hudson Bay railway project. The roadbed is practically completed to the bay; the rails are laid three-quarters of the way, about one-half the line is operated, and only a comparatively small expenditure and an inconsiderable amount of work is required in order to put the road in such condition that connection can be made between The Pas and the Bay. In view of these facts, and in order to protect the money that we have invested in the enterprise and to make something out of it; in order to make it a business proposition in a real sense, it is urged that certain work in the way of construction be gone on with.

The Minister of Railways intimated that all expenditure made on railway account was needed for the building of branch lines in the West, and he said that I had appeared before him on several occasions in connection with the building of those branch lines. He speaks very truly; I am as much interested in the building of branch lines in connection with the Canadian National Railway system, as I am in the Hudson Bay railway. But the fact is that the money is not being used for the building of these branch lines in the West. The 1919 programme so far as the building of branch lines is concerned has not yet been carried out. When the minister puts as an alternative to the building of the Hudson Bay railway the completion of these branch lines, he merely attempts to pull wool over our eyes, because, as I say, the branch lines programme is not being carried out. At different times delegations from the West have asked for the construction not only of the Hudson Bay railway but of certain branch lines. The minister has said: We cannot build both; will you take the branch lines or will you take the Hudson Bay railway? That is a very unfair proposal? I remember that this question was put specifically to a large delegation from the Melfort district in Saskatchewan, and the reply was: Go ahead with the construction of the Hudson Bay railway if you cannot give us both. It was stated in the resolution on this subject signed by western members that the construction of necessary branch lines should be carried on in addition to the construction of the Hudson Bay railway; that the one should be done and the other not left undone. The question of terminals has been raised. The proposal which I have made is such as would allow for the making of further investigation so far as terminals are concerned. There is a feeling throughout the country, right or wrongly, that the proper terminal has not been chosen. I have been careful to avoid the issue with respect to terminals; I am not prepared to state conclusively whether the proper terminal has been chosen or not. I am not an engineer, though I have my own opinion in the matter, as I have been to both Churchill and Nelson. It is possible that the engineers can make a satisfactory terminal at Nelson; I am not here to say. But apparently there is a feeling that sufficient investigation was not made before the decision with respect to the terminal was arrived at; that a sufficiently careful inquiry was not carried out by experts. My suggestion therefore, as previously outlined, is that the road be completed to the head of navigation on the Nelson, and if there is any doubt in the mind of the Government—and they have not expressed any —with regard to the question whether a proper terminal has been chosen, let the matter be thoroughly investigated by competent harbour experts. If it is then deemed advisable that a change should be made, it can be made without the necessity for any extra work, because the turn would have to be made at a point beyond the end of the construction which I now suggest. I wish in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, to emphasize the fact that the West is paying for this road, not the East, and not Canada as a whole. Preemptions and purchased homesteads have been set aside in the West for the purpose of realizing money in order to build this railway. As I have said, approximately $28,000,000 worth of these lands have already been sold—at least, had been sold up to a year ago; the amount is probably greater by this time. What is the Government doing with this money? It is ear-marked, I am told—and this came out in debates in this House—for the construction of the Hudson Bay railway, but instead of going on with the work for which this money was provided the Government have decided to let it stand for the time being, and they do not say how long it will be before the work is resumed.

I contend, therefore, that the case against the completion of the work to the point suggested has not been made out. The question of economy does not enter into the matter. If the Government were carrying out a programme of economy throughout the whole country, not a word would be said by the West so far as the construction of this road is concerned. But when money is being spent lavishly upon other enterprises that do not involve the production of revenue, surely the West is being differentiated against, it is being sacrificed, for interests which appear, for reasons which we can surmise to have a more powerful pressure. Now, I do not know whether it is in order at this stage to withdraw the resolution, owing to the amendment which has been made. But the resolution as amended, is of no benefit, and there would not seem to be any advantage in asking for a vote on it. If I am in order, therefore, I would ask leave to withdraw the resolution.

Motion withdrawn.

EXCESSIVE OR INADEQUAE PUNISHMENTS

On the Order for the second reading of Bill No. 18 to amend the Criminal Code so as to provide for the revision of excessive or inadequate punishments.—Mr. Tweedie.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): There is much to be said in support of this Bill, but it touches directly the Department of Justice, and it does seem proper that we should make inquiries of judges who will be called upon to operate under the proposed provision and of the attorneys general of the different provinces who are responsible for the administration of the criminal law, as to their view concerning the effect of this legislation on the proper administration of justice from the point of view of criminal law. We have instituted this inquiry. We have not yet received replies from all the sources to which we addressed ourselves, and as it is desirable that we should have an answer to this question before coming to a final conclusion with regard to the adoption of the measure, I suggest to the hon. gentleman who is responsible for the Bill that if he will let it stand for the present I shall endeavour to expedite the obtaining of this information.

Mr. TWEEDIE: That will be satisfactory to me. I simply wish to point out that this Bill has been passed by the Senate in three successive years; unfortunately in other years we have not been able to get it before the House. On the assurance of the Minister of Justice that the matter will be brought before the House during this session I shall be very glad to let the Bill stand until he obtains the information to which he refers.

Mr. BUTTS: May I ask the minister if he would consider the matter of doing away with that part of the Criminal Code which gives power to judges to suspend sentences?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I fear that the question asked by the hon. member (Mr. Butts) is not in order at this time. The hon. member in charge of the Bill has consented that the order stand; therefore no discussion is permissible at this stage. I am sure that the Minister of Justice will, when his Estimates are under consideration, or on some other convenient occasion, answer the question put by the hon. member.

Order stands.

THE HOUSING PROBLEM

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF A FEDERAL HOUSING BOARD

On the Order for resuming the adjourned debate on the proposed resolution of Mr. Hocken, as amended.

That, in the opinion of this House, the general interest of the people of Canada will be served by making it possible for every industrious, frugal and thrifty citizen to become the owner in fee simple of a house and lot; that the Government of Canada should grant assistance to make that possible; and to that end, an annual appropriation should be made to buy land and build houses for men of good character who can make a small initial payment and undertake to liquidate the indebtedness incurred by monthly instalments as may be agreed upon; that a Federal Housing Board be appointed to carry out the plan which, for the first year—or such longer period as in the opinion of the Governor General in Council may be desirable—shall be confined to men who have served overseas.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (West Toronto): I would like to withdraw this resolution.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. gentleman have leave to withdraw the resolution?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Resolution withdrawn.

FUEL SUPPLY PROBLEM

On the Order for resuming the adjourned debate on the proposed resolution of Mr. Steele.

That, in the opinion of this House, the future fuel supply of Canada should be considered by Parliament, and that a Special Committee of the House of Commons should be forthwith appointed to inquire into all matters pertaining thereto, with power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath and to report from time to time.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The committee called for by this resolution having been appointed, I would ask if it is the pleasure of the House that the hon. gentleman have leave to withdraw the resolution.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Resolution withdrawn.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

On motion of Mr. D. A. Lafortune (Jacques Cartier), Bill no. 52, to amend the Criminal Code, was read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

On section 1—penalty.

Mr. DOHERTY: I would like to make a suggestion to the hon. member. I am fully in accord with the purpose of the Bill that he has introduced, so fully in accord that, in a Bill that is in course of preparation, making a number of amendments to the Criminal Code, there is included this particular provision. Under those circumstances it would probably be more desirable that this amendment should appear in the Bill amending the Criminal Code, rather than that we should have a separate Bill for this purpose. I have no objection to the hon. member's Bill passing, should he prefer having it pass in that way; but I make the suggestion that, having advanced the Bill this stage, he might let it remain in committee, and I will have it disposed of in another manner.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In the meantime, the hon. member might explain the nature of the amendment.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: I am quite satisfied with what the minister says, and I have no objection to joining my Bill with the one proposed by the Government. The object of the Bill is to protect the citizens from a species of fraud committed particularly in our large cities. As everyone knows, we have in Montreal men who defraud the public by playing the game called "Three Card monte." We had a case before the Assizes. We had a man arrested; but the Court of Appeal, in which I was acting as Crown Prosecutor, decided that that mode of playing cards was not in itself a fraud sufficiently established to maintain the accusation made against the person. In the case of the King vs. Rosen and Lavoie, the Court of Appeal rendered this decision:

It is by the Court of our Sovereign Lord the King now here considered, that the question stated by the Judge of the Sessions should be answered in the negative, and it is accordingly adjudicated, and finally determined, that this appeal be granted, and the conviction be quashed and set aside, and the said conviction is quashed and annulled.

We were then bound to bring in a Bill to amend the criminal law so as to prevent fraud being committed by the game of "Three Card monte," by enacting that it in itself would be a crime. I had the honour of discussing the matter with the learned judges of the Criminal Court of King's Bench, and they were all in favour of the Bill. As the minister said, there is no objection to the Bill, and it is very necessary to have this legislation enacted so as to protect our citizens. As we were unable, as the law stood, to proceed against people who defrauded the public by means of "Three Card monte," we thought it proper to have the law amended by the addition of this clause:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment or a penalty not exceeding one hundred dollars, or both, who,

(a) In any premises under his control, to which the public have access, engages in or permits other persons to engage in the game known as "Three Card monte" or similar game played with other instruments than cards.

If we made it a crime for people to play with three cards, they might play with four cards or they might play with other instruments than cards, and that is why we thought it proper to enlarge the clause so as to endeavour to cover other cases. I am glad the Minister of Justice approves the Bill, and I am satisfied to join him and have the Bill passed as he suggests so as to protect every one. I am also pleased that both sides of the House are unanimous in approving the Bill.

[Mr. Lafortune.]

Mr. DOHERTY: Under those circumstances, I would move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT

On the order for the second reading of Bill No. 56 to amend the Immigration Act (Deportation of undesirable persons):

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) has told me that he proposes to incorporate the provisions of this Bill in another Bill which the Government intend to introduce at this session. Under the circumstances I shall not therefore press the second reading of this Bill. I would ask that it be allowed to stand.

Hon. Mr. CALDER: I intimated to the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) the other day that it was the intention of the Government to introduce in the House of Commons the Bill that was defeated in the Senate last year. As a matter of fact, a Bill is now in course of preparation amending the immigration law in a number of respects. It is almost completed, and I expect to give notice of it on the Order Paper in a day or two. I thought it would be well to have all the amendments embodied in one Bill.

Order stands.

SUPPLY

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Public Works—chargeable to capital—Marine Department—Government shipbuilding programme—Amount required for the contruction of vessels in accordance with Government programme, $8,330,000.

The CHAIRMAN: This item was before the committee for discussion on Thursday last during the entire afternoon and evening. Shall the item cary?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): Dealing with this subject when it was before the House last week, I pointed out that the minister's statement this year was decidedly different in tone from his statement last year. Then my hon. friend was bold and aggressive. He put all the big strawberries on the top of the basket, but this year he is apologetic and gives a number of reasons why he embarked on this policy. He has evidently begun to realize that in the present financial condition of the country an expenditure of $70,000,000 which is considered by the ordinary man on the street to have been wasteful and unnecessary, is a very heavy responsibility, and I am very glad to know that he is showing signs of repentance. The minister gave some reasons why we on this side of the House according to his view, have no right to criticize his programme. He said, among other things, that we made no effort to stop him when he was asking for these large votes for this purpose in former years. I think that is true with respect to the vote that he obtained at the inception of the shipbuilding programme in 1918. At that time, in the session of 1917-1918, the war was on, and as everybody knows, ships were being sunk by the submarines. Furthermore, hon. gentlemen on this side of the House were not then acquainted with the facts in regard to the operations of the Imperial Munitions Board. I endeavoured all through the war to keep track of what was going on in the shipping business, but I did not know that in so many of the shipyards in this country ships were being constructed at that time for the Imperial Munitions Board. You are aware, Sir, that the censor was busy at that time and that any news relating to the construction and launching of ships was suppressed. I might say that if I had known in 1918, when my hon. friend came forward and asked for a vote to build these tramp vessels, as a Government venture, that the yards of Canada were all busy building ships for the Munitions Board, on the account of the admiralty, I should have had a great deal of hesitation in allowing him to go forward with his programme without a protest. I took care to enter my protest as soon as the facts were disclosed. The ships built by the Munitions Board were just as good, for the purposes of the war, as the ships built by the Government of Canada. When those ships were finished they were turned over to the British Admiralty, just the same as the ships built by the Canadian Government would also be turned over to the British Government for use in the war. So one ship was just as much use as the other so far as the war was concerned. It was at that stage that my hon. friend stepped in, I think unnecessarily, and asked for the expenditure of what has now grown to be a very large sum of money in connection with this venture.

I also pointed out that it would have been very easy for my hon. friend to retire from this shipbuilding programme at the close of the war. When the war ended, on November 11, 1918, there were actually only four keels laid. I have a table here published by the Canada Railway and Marine World which, I believe is a reliable publication, showing the dates. I have no doubt that its information is official, but if there is anything wrong my hon. friend can put me right. The names of the vessels for which keels had been laid were the Voyageur, June 11, 1918, the Pioneer, July 17, 1918, the Warrior, July 17, 1918, the Volunteer, October 1, 1918. None of these ships were launched prior to November 11, 1918, so all that my hon. friend had to do if he wished to discontinue his programme, was to settle with the parties with whom he had made contracts and had not commenced to build, and he could have gone on and finished the four vessels whose keels had been laid. That would have involved a very small outlay comparatively speaking, but my hon. friend did not choose to do that. He went on with his programme, and has attempted to justify it on different occasions since on various grounds. In my former remarks, I challenged the statement of my hon. friend that these ships are necessary in connection with our railway systems. They are only freight vessels. Their speed is about 11 knots, or under. If my hon. friend was projecting a line of fast steamers, and if the country could afford to put the money into them, to connect with our railway system and take passengers across the Atlantic or across the Pacific, that is an enterprise that has often been mentioned in this House and has been favoured by both sides. Of course, it would cost a great deal of money; but that is not what my hon. friend is doing. He is building tramp vessels to compete with private owners. I pointed out to him that the sea is covered with such vessels at the present time. It is estimated that there is now afloat something like 50,000,000 tons of shipping. At the time the war broke out there was only about 40,000,000 tons, so that there is now some 10,000,000 tons more than there was at that time, while trade has decreased enormously since the close of the war. It is therefore easy to see how difficult it will be to make money with freight vessels for some years to come, the shipbuilding programme throughout the world having been overdone. It was unnecessary for my hon. friend to go on with his programme in view of the fact that the war was over, and that he was only building freight vessels that had to compete with ships built prior to the war for about a quarter of the sum he paid.

I pointed out to my hon. friend that on the Clyde and in other British and European ports, prior to 1914, ships of the same kind as he is building were being built at about $50 per ton deadweight. He admits that the average cost of the vessels he is building is about $192 per ton deadweight, almost four times as much. In these hard times with low freight rates the minister has to compete with vessels that were built at about one-quarter the cost of those he is operating. I have already pointed out that the venture cannot be called a war measure; nor was it necessary, so far as our railway systems are concerned. If there is any freight at all delivered at the coast by our railways, it is easy to find a ship to carry it forward to destination. All that need be done by the owner of the freight or produce is to employ a broker in the big markets of London and New York, and he will find that he can send produce across the ocean at a lower rate than the minister can run his ships and carry it himself. So that government operation of ships is not economic, at the present time at all events, in connection with our railways. The other question was regarding our export trade. I pointed out to my hon. friend that he had not been able to show that he had done anything in the way of expanding our export trade through these vessels. At any rate, our export trade has been going the wrong way ever since these vessels have been operating. I showed that while in 1919 we had a balance of trade in our favour of $150,000,000, in 1920 we had an adverse balance of $150,000,000; so that the balance of trade went the wrong way during the past year to the extent of at least $300,000,000.

But the main difficulty is that these ships must be losing money; they did not pay their way last year. While my hon. friend shows a small earning; he made no proper allowance for depreciation and for the interest on the money that he put into these ships. If he cannot pay at least 5 per cent for depreciation and 5½ per cent for interest on the money—for that is what he is paying for it to the public—if he cannot pay 10½ per cent on capital, then he is losing money and will end in bankruptcy. Now, he has not done that within four or five million dollars. I have shown you, making the calculation on the capital which my hon. friend says he has put into this venture, that he has come out the wrong way to the tune of $4,343,619 for the last year. That is not a very good showing. Let me point out, not for the purpose of making the story worse than it is, but in order that we may arrive at the facts, that freights are not nearly as profitable this year as they were last year; in some trades there is not more than 50 per cent this year of last year's output. So that we can easily see that if my hon. friend lost over four million dollars last year he stands to lose a very much larger sum this year. In the face of that we are still going on with the building of ships, knowing that when we get through with them, they will not be worth anything like the money we are paying for them. If I am correct in the statement that in the market they are not worth to-day more than 25 per cent of the amount they cost, the ships we are building now, and for which we propose to vote this money to-night, will be worth, when they are finished, only one-quarter of what is spent on them; the other three-quarters will virtually have been thrown over the bridge.

According to the statement given to the House a few days ago by the minister, which will be found at page 1331 of Hansard, there are no fewer than sixteen ships now in course of construction. The minister puts the deadweight tonnage of these ships at 114,470 tons, and the average price at $192 per ton. To complete these sixteen vessels will cost the country, according to that statement, $21,978.240. If it be true that these sixteen vessels now being constructed will be worth only 25 per cent of cost when they are finished, we shall, by finishing them, sustain a loss of $16,483,-180. That is a very serious matter. We have not the information as to how far this work has been proceeded with. It may be that it is not possible for my hon. friend to stop at the present time. I do not know whether any of these are new contracts or not; that information has not been given to the House. It would be interesting to know what state these contracts are in. I am assuming now that all the money which the minister is asking for is to complete contracts that have already been entered into. I pointed out the other night that, looking over the list of routes on which the minister proposes to put his ships this year, I find that no fewer than three of them are subsidized routes, routes on which the Government are subsidizing ships to compete with those which they purpose operating. That is unbusinesslike. For example, under the minister's programme, we are going to run a line of ships from Vancouver, through the Pacific ocean, to New Zealand and Australia. We have a line of ships running now from Vancouver to New Zealand and Australia, and we are subsidizing those ships to the tune of $130,000 for the present year, in fact the money was voted a few days ago. But if it be correct—and I think it is—that they call at the same ports—undoubtedly they do in some instances;—then we are giving our competitor an advantage to the extent of $130,000 and that competitor already has the trade. The company that is running the present line has been conducting that service for a number of years. It has worked up business connections and knows all the details. It has fast vessels—better vessels than ours; vessels, according to the blue book which I have on my desk, that run at the rate of sixteen and seventeen knots an hour, while ours only make about eleven knots. These vessels are competing with us for the small trade between Vancouver and those far off ports in Australia and New Zealand. Looking over the returns of the Department of Trade and Commerce I find that the whole trade of last year was very small, that the whole business done between these points would not furnish one cargo for the five large vessels that my hon. friend is proposing to put on the route. I would like to know where he expects to get business for these vessels during the year 1921, remembering all the time that our competitors are on the route and that they have the business at the present time? My hon. friend may have some plan that I do not understand, but it looks to me as if he would be burning expensive coal in sending these vessels on a 6,000 mile trip across the Pacific ocean with very little in them.

In the discussion the other evening my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) dealt with the question of the dry dock at Halifax. This is a question, I think, that is not properly discussable in connection with this shipping venture, but I want to point out, seeing that my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre dealt with it, that he has not studied the question sufficiently. He said that the company that formerly owned the Halifax graving dock had not appealed from the decision of the Exchequer Court and consequently had no right to complain about the amount that was awarded. I understand that is not the question about wihch they are making complaint. What happened was this: The company were carrying on business in Halifax as a graving dock company for a number of years. Most of the money invested in the enterprise was British capital. It had been invested in this dock a good many years ago, and subsidies were also paid the company. A new company, called the Halifax Shipbuilding Company was started, and what the Government did was to expropriate the property belonging to the old company and hand it over to the new company who have it now,—at least the Halifax Shipyards, Limited have a lease of the dock. The dock was taken from the original company. The Government stepped in and expropriated the property, took it from the old company and gave it to the new concern, without a justification for doing so. That is the camplaint, as I understand it and it is for the Government to explain why they pursued such an arbitrary course.

That, according to my information, is the complaint that has been made by the Halifax Graving Dock Company.

Now considerable has been said in this discussion about the refusal of the Government to give information, not only about the operation of its vessels, but also in regard to the operation of the national railways. The Opposition have repeatedly demanded information, which information has been refused. It should not be necessary for me to undertake to prove the statement, for every member of the House must know it to be the case. I was surprised to hear, however, the Minister of Finance, and also the Minister of Railways, state in the discussion that took place the other day that ample information had been given to the members on this side, and that the questions the Government refused to answer were trifling questions relating to the salary of a station master or something of that kind. I submit that the questions asked by gentlemen on this side were not trifling questions, but that at the last two sessions of Parliament both the Minister of Marine and the Minister of Railways have constantly refused to answer the most vital and important questions that were submitted to them. Let me give one or two examples. Last session a supporter of the Government, the senior member for South Cape Breton (Mr. Douglas) desired to get some information in regard to the purchase of coal for the use of the Government ships and he asked these questions:

What quantity of coal was consumed by the Canadians Government Merchant Marine in the year 1919? How much of same was Canadian and how much American?

He also asked:

Was this coal purchased by tender and what was the price paid?

Now these were very simple and yet important questions, but the answer the Government gave its own supporter was this:

The Government has no information. These transactions were carried on by the Canadian Government Merchant Marine as an incorporated Company.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I question the truth of the statement that the Government had no information as to the prices they were paying for coal, and that they had no information as to whether the coal had been purchased by tender or not—I simply do not believe it. We expect to get correct information from ministers of the Crown when plain questions of that kind are asked in this House. I submit that there can be no good reason why such questions should not be answered. The transaction was completed, it was not for the year that was to come, it was not even for the current year—it had reference to the year 1919. I can understand that when negotiations are going on, and tenders are being invited, it would not be proper to disclose such matters; but after the transaction is over, after the coal has been purchased and has been burned, and during the following year a member of Parliament asked "What did you pay for your coal?" there should be no secret about it. Our competitor could not get any information from the answers to the questions, unless it was that the Canadian Government were buying coal at better prices than they were themselves, or at a higher rate. In any case these questions should have been answered.

It could not do any possible harm to disclose that kind of information, although the Government has persistently refused to furnish it. About the time this question was asked it was reported in the Halifax papers that the Government had one of their ships there for which they had not provided a cargo and therefore found it necessary to purchase a cargo of coal for the river Plate in order to give the ship something to do, and it was said they purchased about 8,000 tons at a dollar a ton above the market price. Whether that statement be true or not, you can understand, Mr. Chairman, how it makes the public suspicious when the department refuses to answer such simple and proper questions.

On Thursday of last week I endeavoured to get some information myself with regard to a certain ship called the "Beaver" that had cleared from Halifax for Barbadoes. I asked this question:

How many passengers did this vessel carry on the said trip?

The answer was:

The department has no information.

I also asked:

What is her deadweight tonnage and how many tons of freight did she carry from Halifax on said trip?

The answer was:

The deadweight tonnage of the vessel is 3,972½ tons. The department has no information as to the quantity of freight carried on the voyage referred to.

The department went to the trouble of telling me what the tonnage of the ship was, but they had no information as to the quantity of freight that ship was carrying. That was the very thing I wanted to find out, because I was told the ship sailed from Halifax with so little freight that it was not possible for her to pay her way.

Another example. Last year we were informed that a ship by the name of the "Recruit" was stranded in the St. Lawrence river, and we were assured that the Government would not lose any money because the ship was well insured. I was glad to hear that at the time, and I took occasion during the present session to find out whether the Government really did come out of that transaction without a loss. I put this question on the Order Paper:

Was the steamship Recruit of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine that went aground at Vache Point, St. Lawrence river, rescued and refitted for sea?

That was answered in the affirmative. I also asked:

If so, how much was expended in repairs? and how much was collected from insurance companies?

This is the answer:

The information asked for is information as to operating details under the Canadian National Railway Board, and is not in possession of the Government.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the question as to whether we collected that insurance was a question which there was no reasonable ground for refusing to answer.

In another case I find this question asked by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff):

What are the names of the steamers of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine which entered at the port of Montreal since May, 1918?

That question is answered and the names are given of a large number of steamers. The next question reads:

What are the names of the steamers of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine on which work was performed by the Hall Engineering Company, of Montreal?

This is the answer:

Information in so far as work performed on Government steamers, no reports are filed at Ottawa as these are matters in connection with operation and under the Board of Management of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine who are responsible for all matters in connection with operation.

My hon. friend has led us to believe on various occasions that he would give us information about construction, but not about operation. These two questions I have quoted are both questions relating to operation. And I would like my hon. friend to explain why he was able to give us the facts in connection with the first question, but was not able to give us the names of the ships that were repaired by the Hall Engineering Company. I could multiply instances of such refusals, but I will not detain the committee because every hon. member knows that the pages of Hansard are covered with such questions regarding railways and ships where the information desired was persistently refused.

10 p.m.

I would like to give a sample of the management of these vessels as disclosed in the answer to a question by my hon. friend from Westmoreland a few days ago. It appears that one of the government steamers by the name of the Laurentian was repaired in the port of St. John. The question is this:

Is the steamship Laurentian owned by the Government?

The answer is: yes.

If so, when was she purchased, from whom and what price was paid?—A. The Laurentian was purchased in April, 1917, from the Canada Steamship Lines, Limited, for $50,000.

Q. Was said steamer out of repair and tied up at St. John for five months or for any time? If so, for what length of time?—A. Yes, four months.

Q. During the time said steamer was so tied up in St. John, how many of the crew remained aboard?—A. Twenty-two.

This answer goes on to say that the wages of these 22 sailors were paid by the Government during the four or five months that the ship was under repair. That is an extraordinary thing for the department to do. A private owner would never think of doing it. As soon as the ship of a private owner comes into port he discharges his crew and pays them off. He hires another crew when ready to send his ship out again. He does not keep his men on board feeding them and paying them wages for four or five months, but that seems to be the way in which at least one of these government vessels was handled by the department. To my mind that is a very unbusinesslike proceeding and requires some explanation. In the minister's statement of the other day, I find the following:

There is a further consideration from which as the minister primarily responsible for the programme I derive some comfort, and that is that every contract made, every voucher paid, every letter and telegram exchanged between the department and contractors is open for the fullest inspection of any member of the House who desires any further information.

My hon. friend has not produced these papers; he has not given us the pleasure of seeing them. I am glad to hear that they are open for inspection. I am also glad to hear that he derives comfort from anything in connection with his programme. I did not think there was very much comfort for anybody else in conection with it; I am quite satisfied there is no comfort in it for the people of this country. It may be quite true that the minister has the vouchers somewhere. But the question is; where is the money? Are we ever going to see it again? I submit it is rather cold comfort to realize that we are spending $70,000,000 on this venture and that there is no prospect of our ever seeing our money again.

Attempts have been made not only by the minister but by other hon. gentlemen on that side to throw responsibility upon the shoulders of hon. gentlemen on this side for the enormous present and prospective losses in conection with the railways as well as with shipping. A few days ago in the course of the railway discussion the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) used this language:

Why are we in this country staggering like weary Titans under this burden? It is because my hon. friend and the hon. gentlemen who led him at that time were in a government that launched railway schemes upon the country fifty years in advance of their time.

My hon. friend from Brantford seems to have forgotten some very recent history in which he himself figured. I would like to ask him who it was that forced the Canadian Northern railway upon the people of this country by closure? Did we not resist that transaction to the utmost? Did he and his party not enforce the closure rule to put that measure through? Did he not speak and vote in favour of it? The hon. member for Brantford has a very heavy responsibility to answer for in this matter. He has the reputation of being a business man, and I have no doubt that his word goes for much in the councils of his party. He assured the House at the time this matter was up that within from three to five years this project would be a paying venture. I do not think he would give us that assurance to-day, but he was willing at that time to place an additional burden of from four to five hundred millions on the shoulders of the people in order to take over the Canadian Northern system. Then again, what about the Grand Trunk deal? Who is responsible for the additional four or five hundred millions of dollars of liabilities involved in the purchase of that system? Are members on this side responsible for that? We voted against it; my hon. friend from Brantford and the hon. gentlemen who sit with him voted for it. We were assured that that was going to get us out of our difficulties; that the acquisition of the Grand Trunk would help us in regard to the other lame ducks that the Government had taken over. But it has not turned out that way. If you look at the Estimates you will find that the railway system that requires the largest sum for the current year is the Grand Trunk—something like $89,000,000. In that estimate, I believe, is included the fixed charges on the Grand Trunk Pacific, which, according to the Public Accounts, appear to be a little over $8,000,000. So that if you choose to make us responsible for the Grand Trunk Pacific and take off that $8,000,000, there is still $80,000,000 required for the current year to operate the Grand Trunk system. So the men who insisted on taking over the Grand Trunk have very heavy responsibilities to answer for before the people of this country. We do not know how much of the eight millions is deficit; the estimate does not disclose the fact. It bunches the whole thing together —improvements, betterments, and deficit are lumped in one sum and we are asked to vote the enormous amount of $89,000,000 en bloc to keep the Grand Trunk running for the current year. I submit that my hon. friend should not have blamed us for all these difficulties of which he himself is guilty. It would be better for that weary Titan from Brantford to manifest a spirit of repentance and to show some contrition for his own mistakes instead of throwing railing accusations at the heads of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. But everybody knows that the Government is responsible for our financial condition both in railways and in connection with merchant ships. They cannot escape the responsibility. Parliament has little responsibility regarding our shipping debt because Parliament had nothing to say with reference to these ship contracts; Parliament was not given an opportunity to discuss them. Hon. gentlemen will remember that at the time of the armistice, November 11, 1918, there were only four keels laid in the ship-building programme, and not a single ship had been launched; but before Parliament met the following February the minister by Order in Council entered into eighteen contracts without competition and without tender. Now can anybody say that members on either side are responsible for these transactions. They were carried out by Order in Council behind closed doors, without Parliament being informed and without our knowing anything whatever about them. Questions were asked when the minister's Estimates came on, and then we discovered that in the interim my hon. friend had entered into these new contracts involving an expenditure of many millions. The trouble is that the war spirit seems to be rampant on the part of the Government. Although the war has been over for two and a half years the Government are carrying on as if the war were still in progress. You know, Mr. Chairman, that description in the New Testament of the Roman centurion who had men under him, and who said: "I say to this man, Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh; and to my servant, Do this, and he doeth it." That is the spirit that seems to pervade the Cabinet. It is the military spirit, the war spirit, and I submit is the reason why members of Parliament were not consulted about these shipping contracts and large expenditures and are not even now consulted. We are told that sixteen ships are in course of construction; but we do not know what stage they are in, nor whether it will be possible to save any of this money or not. We know that if we build a ship to-day for $2,000,000 and launch it to-morrow, she is worth when launched only $500,000; we know that we have thrown away $1,500,000 in the operation. Any shipping man who knows anything about the shipping business knows that to be the fact. Is it not important that we should know in what stage the shipping programme is? The minister, however, has not told us anything about the matter, and I hope he will not hold us responsible for anything he is doing in connection with it.

Now we come to the question as to what we should do with those ships, my hon. friends on my left always want a constructive policy, and I have no hesitation in giving my views, that if the ships are losing money by our operating them at the present time, we should not continue to operate them, because we have no money to throw away. I am also firmly convinced that it will be better for all concerned if we get rid of them, and put them into the hands of private owners. I read at the time in the London Times, that, within two weeks after the armistice, the British Government announced their policy that the freight vessels that they had purchased and built should be placed on the market and turned over to private owners.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Not bad for a slow little country.
