AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION

CONCURRENCE IN THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. A. J. Bater (The Battlefords) presented the third report of the standing committee on agriculture and colonization, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CONTROL OF PROPERTY OF OLD AGE PENSIONERS

Mr. Hodgson:

How much money was acquired by the government in taking over property of old age pensioners in each of the years 1947, 1948 and 1949, by provinces?

Mr. Martin: The question implies that provincial pension authorities which administer the Old Age Pensions Act take possession of property owned by pensioners when pension is granted. Actually no pension authority takes possession of either real or personal property. Under provincial legislation, however, a pension authority may be authorized to control real property owned by pensioners.

At the death of a pensioner a pension authority may file a claim for recovery out of the estate of the pensioner of the amount of pension paid to the pensioner. In making its decision the pension authority must apply section 9(2) of the Old Age Pensions Act, which provides that ". . . no claim shall be made for the recovery of any such debt directly or indirectly out of any part of the pensioner's estate which passes by will or on an intestacy to any other pensioner or to any person who has, since the grant of such pension or for the last three years during which such pension has continued to be paid, regularly contributed to the support of the pensioner by the payment of money or otherwise to an extent which, having regard to the means of the person so having contributed, is considered by the pension authority to be reasonable." In the agreements made under the Old Age Pensions Act the pension authorities are given discretion to disregard estates where the net value is less than $2,000 or the first $2,000 of any estate.

The amounts recovered by provincial pension authorities from the estates of deceased pensioners and the federal share of such amounts for the fiscal years 1946-47, 1947-48 and 1948-49 were as follows:

1946-47

Province	Total	Federal share
Alberta	$ 32,330.76	$ 24,248.07
British Columbia	76,685.91	56,674.61

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—DISCONTINUANCE OF BRANCH LINES

Mr. Catherwood:

1. Did the Canadian National Railways cease operations on any of their branch lines during the year 1949?

2. If so, in what provinces did they discontinue these operations?

3. How many miles of line were removed from the system in each province?

Questions

Mr. Chevrier: The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. No.

2. See answer to No. 1.

3. 9·49 miles in the province of Alberta, operation of which ceased in 1948.

SYDNEY PILOTAGE DISTRICT—SUPERINTENDENT OF PILOTS

Mr. MacLean (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

Has a master's foreign-going certificate of competency always been demanded for the position of superintendent of pilots in the Sydney pilotage district?

Mr. Chevrier: No. However, the former superintendent of pilots at Sydney, Nova Scotia, the late Captain Norman Noel, held a master's coasting certificate issued before the Canada Shipping Act, 1934, came into force. This form of certificate, which is no longer issued, enabled the holder to sail as master of a ship of Canadian registry anywhere on the coasts of North America excepting only voyages through the Bering strait, and anywhere on the coasts of South America as far south as 40 degrees south latitude. The holder of such a certificate retained the rights and privileges thereof after the Canada Shipping Act came into force, but the same privileges required thereafter the holding of a foreign-going certificate.

POST OFFICE—REVENUE AND COST OF MAIL CONTRACTS

Mr. Fulton:

1. What were the total revenues received in the fiscal years 1948-49 and 1949-50 respectively, from the sale of postage stamps?

2. What was the cost to the dominion government in the same years for all contracts for the carriage of mail by land, sea and air?

(a) Postage stamps	$56,317,569.86
(b) Postage meters	26,772,032.53
(c) Postage paid in cash..	6,543,115.20
Total	$89,632,717.59

	1949-50
(a) Postage stamps	$57,249,306.24
(b) Postage meters	29,518,534.76
(c) Postage paid in cash..	6,774,075.51

Mail services	1948-49	1949-50
Land	$20,541,504.03	$21,769,719.71
Sea	2,512,115.95	2,117,488.80
Air	7,772,492.33	8,298,202.31

BOUCHARD PLANT, STE. THERESE, QUE.

Mr. Bertrand:

1. On March 31, 1949, how many civil servants were being paid on a monthly basis at the Bouchard plant, Ste. Therese?

2. On April 1, 1949, were any of such persons placed on the list of employees paid by the hour?

3. If so, how many, and what was the reason for the change?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. 104.

2. Yes.

3. Fifty-eight employees were placed on hourly rates of pay to bring them in line with other employees engaged on similar duties under approved prevailing rates established for Ste. Therese area on the recommendation of the Department of Labour.

Mr. Bertrand:

1. Does the Bouchard plant at Ste. Therese come under military district No. 4?

2. What military establishments are under the jurisdiction of military district No. 4?

3. Is the hourly rate of pay in all these establishments the same as the rate of pay in force in the establishments on the island of Montreal?

4. If not, for what reasons?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. No. The Bouchard plant is administered direct by army headquarters, Ottawa.

2. Headquarters Quebec command; No. 4 works company, Royal Canadian Engineers; Quebec command signal squadron, Royal Canadian Signals; Headquarters Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, Quebec command; No. 4 detachment, Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps; Headquarters, Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps, Quebec command; No. 3 area ordnance depot; Headquarters Royal Canadian Electrical and Mechanical Engineers, Quebec command; No. 4 company, Royal Canadian Electrical and Mechanical Engineers; Quebec command pay office; Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps School; No. 4 personnel depot; "A" and support company, Royal 22e Regiment; No. 4 company, Royal Canadian Army Service Corps; Headquarters Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, Quebec command; Montreal military hospital; Quebec Command Provost Company.

3. No.

4. Hourly rate employees at Bouchard plant, Ste. Therese, are paid at the prevailing rates established on the recommendation of the Department of Labour.

NORTH SYDNEY-PORT AUX BASQUES FERRY SERVICE

Mr. Higgins:

What steps have been taken to provide a motor car ferry to ply between North Sydney and Port aux Basques?

Mr. Chevrier: Representations were made some time ago by the premier of Newfoundland, urging the federal government to make provision for a motor car ferry to ply between North Sydney and Port aux Basques, and the matter is now under active consideration.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

IMPORTS OF ALBUMEN

Mr. Knight:

1. What quantity, in pounds weight, of albumen (dried egg whites powdered or crystal), were imported into Canada in 1949 and 1950 to date?
2. What were the quantities by months, by ports of entry, and by countries of origin?
3. Has any such albumen been imported into Canada from China during the period mentioned? If so, how much?

Mr. McIlraith: Return tabled.

U.S. AIR BASES IN CANADA—EMPLOYMENT OF CANADIAN CIVILIANS

Mr. Black (Cumberland):

1. Are Canadian civilians employed at the United States air base, Goose Bay, Labrador, and other such bases in Canada, paid in Canadian funds? If so, for what reason?
2. Were such Canadian civilians previously paid in American funds?
3. Are such Canadian civilians required to pay for meals, living quarters, admission to theatres, canteen expenses, etc., in American funds? If so, for what reason?
4. Do such Canadian civilians enjoy unemployment insurance benefits? If not, for what reason?
5. How many Canadians are at airports where the United States authorities are in charge?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

BONAVENTURE, QUE., BREAKWATER

Mr. Courtemanche:

For a copy of all payrolls showing the names of and amounts paid to all persons employed in connection with the construction of a breakwater in Bonaventure parish, county of Bonaventure, Quebec, along with a list of all materials used in this work.

ST. CHARLES DE CAPLAN, QUE., WHARF

Mr. Courtemanche:

For a copy of all payrolls and a statement of materials purchased in connection with the repairs to the wharf of St. Charles de Caplan, county of Bonaventure, Quebec, during 1947, 1948 and 1949.

Mr. Courtemanche:

For a copy of all payrolls and a statement of materials purchased in connection with the work done by the Department of Public Works between January 1 and May 1, 1950, on the protection or wharf facilities in the vicinity of the Henri Leblanc property, otherwise known as the Manoir St. Charles, at St. Charles de Caplan, Bonaventure county, Quebec.

PASPEBIAC, QUE., WHARF

Mr. Courtemanche:

For a copy of the specifications used in connection with the work performed on the wharf at Paspebiac, county of Bonaventure, Quebec, during the fall of 1949.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY—NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Hatfield:

For a copy of all letters, correspondence, maps, and other documents, from January 1, 1949, to date, exchanged between the dominion government and the province of New Brunswick dealing with the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Prudham: There is no objection to providing these papers, subject only to approval by the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. Speaker: Carried, subject to the reservation made by the parliamentary assistant.

DEFENCE SUPPLIES

PROVISION FOR PURCHASE OR ACQUISITION, STORING OF MATERIALS, ETC.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill, cited as the Defence Supplies Act, to empower the Minister of Trade and Commerce to buy or otherwise acquire and deal with defence supplies; construct or otherwise acquire, projects; acquire, store and otherwise deal with material entering into the manufacture of defence supplies or the development, repair or maintenance of projects; arrange for the performance of commercial and professional services; require priority in delivery or construction and to require persons who have received offers, fair and reasonable in his opinion, for supplies, projects or services, to meet the requirements subject to an appeal to the exchequer court on the question of price; also to empower the minister to buy or otherwise acquire defence supplies and construct or carry out projects required by the Department of National Defence; also to empower the governor in council to appoint assistants to the minister and advisers and advisory boards and to fix their remuneration and expenses; with provision also for the approval by the governor in council of contracts except in emergent cases and where the sum involved does not exceed a certain specified amount.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

PRIME MINISTER'S RESIDENCE

PROVISION FOR OPERATION AND MAINTENANCE OF A RESIDENCE FOR THE PRIME MINISTER OF CANADA

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the operation and maintenance of a residence for the Prime Minister of Canada, out of moneys appropriated by parliament for such purposes.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

The resolution and the bill to be based thereon refer to a matter which I am sure hon. members would wish to discuss in the absence of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). If I can obtain the unanimous approval of the house I would suggest that the resolution be passed now and the bill moved on to second reading, which would permit the distribution of the bill. Then perhaps the bill could be considered at three o'clock this afternoon. I understand that the leaders of the opposition parties have seen the bill and perhaps they may be in a position to agree that second reading take place later this day. However, I am entirely in the hands of the house.

Mr. Graydon: Are you trying to surprise the Prime Minister?

Mr. Coldwell: When will the Prime Minister be back?

Mr. Howe: Tomorrow morning.

Mr. Coldwell: I am quite prepared to accede to any reasonable request made by the government with respect to this measure, but I suggest that any indication that it is being rushed through might be misunderstood. I rather think what should be done is to pass the resolution and let hon. members see the bill before it is proceeded with.

Mr. Howe: That is what I suggested—that we pass the resolution now and discuss the bill this afternoon.

Mr. Coldwell: Has the bill been printed?

Mr. Howe: Yes, and it will be distributed as soon as the resolution is passed and the bill introduced.

Mr. Coldwell: I think the house would be well advised to follow the normal procedure and give the bill second reading tomorrow.

Mr. Howe: I am in the hands of the house. If that is the wish of the house, I cannot object.

Mr. Speaker: Shall we proceed now with the resolution?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. Fulton: What department will have the administration of the act? Will it be under the minister who is sponsoring the resolution, or under the Department of Public Works?

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. Howe: Two departments will be involved. The Minister of Public Works will have to do with the upkeep of the house, and the Minister of Finance will have to do with the upkeep of the grounds through the federal district commission, and general oversight over the internal arrangements of the house. I think I could explain these matters better after the bill has been distributed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Could the minister advise what the cost of the residence is to be, and whether or not the building in front of the house to be designated as the residence of the Prime Minister is to remain there or be removed? The question was asked whether this building was to be used as a house for the private secretary of the Prime Minister, and the reply given was that it would be leased to such persons as might be designated by the Prime Minister. Could we have information with regard to those two matters?

Mr. Cruickshank: I may get an apartment yet.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Chairman, as to the cost of the whole project, I can only say that the work is under way. I could not give a definite figure. This is an old building which is being torn down. Only the shell will be kept, and it will be remodelled. The work is under the supervision of, and according to plans prepared by, the firm of Allward and Gouinlock, architects, of Toronto. One thing I am sure of is that the work was given to the Garvock firm at a price of $10,000. As time goes on I shall give progress reports to the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the estimated cost? There must be some general estimate?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Those I have consulted so far dare not give an exact estimate, because in estimating the cost of remodelling an old building we are nearly always wide of the mark. I believe in the main estimates there is an amount of $80,000, but I am sure that will not be sufficient.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the general estimate?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I think it will be somewhere around $100,000—that would only be a personal guess, and if I make a mistake it will come back on me. I would rather not give my opinion. I am not a contractor.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Allow yourself a leeway of $100,000 for error.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If that is the attitude of my good friends, I would say between $150,000 and $200,000; that is about the closest I can come. That estimate is given in good faith, and in a kindly way.

The next question concerned the coach house, as they call it. At the moment opinion is divided on that subject. Some people believe we should keep that building, while others have been pressing me to have it demolished and keep only the lower part of it for a garage. Within the next few days a decision will be made about that building.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You might keep it for use as a parliamentary doghouse.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I would not know what the present or future prime ministers would think of that. Within the next ten days we expect to have a decision on it.

Mr. Howe: I believe I can anticipate the next question. I can assure my friend that it will not be used as a house for the secretary.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is somewhat different from the general picture a few weeks ago. What does the minister mean by divided opinion as to the use of the coach house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is a proper question. The government assumes the responsibility for this matter. What does the minister mean by that?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If the hon. member reads the local newspapers he will see that one newspaper advocates demolishing the building, while the other newspaper puts up an argument in favour of keeping it. There are outstanding citizens who are interested in this development of the national capital. I have met people who had one opinion, and others who had a different opinion on the subject. I cannot give names here. I believe the government, in its good judgment—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): —will make a proper decision. I shall let my friend know what it is.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Apparently it is the good judgment of the newspapers.

Mr. Fraser: Can the minister say what the approximate cost of operation and maintenance will be per year, or has that been estimated?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I would not want to anticipate the debate on the bill. Public works will have control of the maintenance and repair of the buildings; the other part, the maintenance of the grounds, will be under the federal district commission. As to the monetary part, I think that is under the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Ross (Souris): What was the original cost of this building?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am informed that the judgment of the exchequer court three or four years ago set the cost at $140,000.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is this estimate given by the minister, with the $100,000 leeway given by the member for Calgary West, in addition to the original cost?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Why, certainly.

Mr. Fleming: Will the bill cover the cost of furnishings and the maintenance of the grounds?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We are a little embarrassed as to the furnishings. We have to put up the house first in order to see what furnishings we shall have in it. I have no estimate on the furnishings. The architect is still working on that phase of the project.

Mr. Mitchell: I just want to say this to my friend—

Mr. Fleming: I asked the minister, Mr. Chairman,—

The Chairman: Order. The member for Eglinton has the floor.

Mr. Fleming: I asked whether the bill that is to be introduced will cover the cost of furnishings and the maintenance of the grounds. I believe it was made apparent in the previous discussion that it is proposed to provide the minister with a furnished house, not merely the building and grounds. Will the bill cover that, as well as the maintenance of the grounds?

Mr. Howe: Both will all be covered by the bill. I believe it would be more convenient to discuss these matters when the bill is before the house and the government's proposals are known. It would be improper at the moment, as my hon. friend knows, to give the details of the bill. If the resolution is passed the bill will be distributed immediately, and a full discussion of the details can take place on second reading of the bill.

Mr. Green: Did the figure given by the Minister of Public Works include the cost of furnishings?

Mr. Mitchell: Mr. Chairman, just give us a chance.

Mr. Green: Let the minister answer the question.

Mr. Mitchell: I am not going to speak for very long. I am not speaking as a minister of the crown, but as a Canadian. What we are discussing now is a residence for the Prime Minister of Canada. Let us be dignified about it. That is all I want to say.

Official Residence for Prime Minister

Mr. Green: I do not know who is being undignified about this matter, unless it is the undignified rush of the government to get it through without any questions. Will the Minister of Public Works answer my question, whether the figures he has given include the cost of furnishings?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Chairman, I do not know. I have given a figure as to what I believe this building will cost. Not being an expert on these matters, and not even having estimates from my own officials, I cannot say. The plans are made with the architects on the ground. Demolition of the building has started, and really only a shell will remain. I do not think any contracting firm would give a firm price on such a project. I may be wide of the mark in what I said, and I am a little sorry I did put a figure on Hansard, even though I did have $100,000 leeway. Later my estimates will come up and I shall have my officials here. I hope they are not as ignorant as I am about the figures.

Mr. Green: The minister has mentioned the architects. Surely the architects are not providing the furnishings as well. He has just said he based his figures on what the architects were going to do, but my question was whether or not the cost of the furnishings is over and above the figure given by the minister.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I would not know at this stage.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not think that we deserve the criticism of the Minister of Labour, given not in his usual kindly way. I should like to say this. We all want a dignified residence for the Prime Minister. There is no question about that. But there is nothing dignified in seeing large sums of money thrown about carelessly. At the present time, when we can get no accurate figures, when the whole thing seems just to be a hit or miss business, I think people will be disturbed by it—that is, the people who do not have residences provided for them.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Howe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 266, to provide for the operation and maintenance of a residence for the Prime Minister of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

REPAIRS TO BUILDING—QUESTION AS TO LOWERING OF LEVEL OF RIDEAU RIVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. T. Richard (Ottawa East): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works in connection with the work to be done on the research council building on the Rideau river. Is it the intention to lower the level of the Rideau river? If so, when is it the intention to begin this work? Can it possibly be delayed in order to allow the beaches to operate this summer?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): I do not think we would take water out of the Rideau river during the summer to do repair work on the national research council building. I will give instructions that these works be delayed until the summer season is over.

MARSHLANDS

INQUIRY AS TO RECLAMATION IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. MacNaught (Prince): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture. Have any plans been made to reclaim marshlands in Prince Edward Island?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member just presented me with notice of his question as I was coming into the house. My answer is that we are soon to undertake a diking project on the Johnston river marshlands in Queens county. It will take about three months to complete this work, and it will protect about 250 acres.

INSECT PESTS

QUESTION AS TO INFESTATION OF ARMY WORMS IN MUSKOKA AND KAWARTHA DISTRICTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has he had any complaints about the army worms that are attacking the trees in the Muskoka and Kawartha districts of Ontario? They are destroying the trees all through those districts, over hundreds of acres. Is his department doing anything about it?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Complaints have not been brought to my attention. I would not say that means that those in the department do not know about the matter. But that kind of effort is directed by the province rather than by the federal government.

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): In the absence of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister if the government has yet reached a decision with reference to the suggested introduction of an amendment at this session to the Official Secrets Act.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): I am unable to answer that question. I will make inquiries and answer it tomorrow.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

PUBLIC SERVICE—TRAVELLING AND LIVING EXPENSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I again want to bring to the attention of the Secretary of State the fact that the return which was ordered over six weeks ago with regard to travelling expenses has not been brought down. Yesterday or the day before he said there were a couple of departments that were still held back. Surely that should be available; and I would ask the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am raising a question of privilege, sir. These returns are too long overdue. Will the Secretary of State bring down the returns for all but the two departments that are holding back these returns? Will he bring the others down?

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): I do not think that on any occasion I said that these returns were being held back.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No?

Mr. Bradley: I said that they were not ready.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right.

Mr. Bradley: I will make inquiries and do what I can to facilitate the matter.

OFFENCES UNDER FEDERAL STATUTES—PROSECUTIONS AND CONVICTIONS IN NEWFOUNDLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): On May 22 a question asked by me was passed as an order for return. It was a simple question. I wonder if the answer has been prepared. The question was this: Have there been any convictions in Newfoundland since April 1, 1949, for offences under federal statutes? I understood that instructions had been given by the attorney general's department in Newfoundland that no prosecutions were to be taken; and I understand that prosecutions have been taken under federal statutes, although the Criminal Code was not in effect.

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): I will look into the matter.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

STATUS OF PERSONS COMPENSATED FOR FLOOD DAMAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Can the Minister of National Health and Welfare now give me an answer to the question I asked him yesterday?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The hon. member yesterday asked me whether or not payments made to old age pensioners by way of compensation for destruction of home as a result of the Manitoba flood would be treated as income under the Old Age Pensions Act. As he knows, of course, the decision with regard to the calculation of income, as well as with regard to the amount of the pension in any individual case, is a matter which under the act rests with the provinces. The compensation paid to an old age pensioner for loss of home by fire is not treated as income. So far as the federal government is concerned, we would treat compensation to an old age pensioner for reconstruction of his home as a result of flood damage as an analogous situation.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

SOUTHERN MANITOBA—MONTHLY PAYMENTS ACCRUING ON EVACUATED HOUSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Resources and Development, or, in his absence, to the parliamentary assistant. Has the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation made any representations to insurance companies asking them to permit evacuees to forgo monthly payments while their families are evacuated?

Mr. George Prudham (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Resources and Development): In the absence of the minister, Mr. Speaker, I will take the question as notice and bring down the information tomorrow.

Inquiries of the Ministry

SOUTHERN MANITOBA—SOFTBALL GAME ON PARLIAMENT HILL IN AID OF RELIEF FUND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, on behalf of the flood relief fund of Manitoba I should like to express appreciation to those who called off a parliamentary dinner tomorrow night, thus giving hon. members an opportunity to come to the softball game on Thursday and bring their pocketbooks.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE TO SOUTH AND SOUTHEAST ASIA—SYDNEY CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he expects the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew)—I would have directed the question to him, but he is not here this morning—to be able to give the house a report on the Sydney meeting?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am not quite sure. I will consult with my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries, and see if we can get his report to the house at an early day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT AMENDMENT—SITTINGS OF AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture if he will see that the third reading of the amendments to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is called at a time when the committee on agriculture is not sitting, because that matter is interlocked with the Canadian wheat board report. The other day these amendments were being dealt with in the committee on agriculture in another room while we were debating amendments to the Canadian Wheat Board Act here in the house. Many members are interested in both matters.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The chairman of the agriculture committee spoke to me a moment ago, and I think his intention is that if this legislation comes up in the house he will adjourn the meeting of the committee while it is being discussed.

ELECTRICAL AND PHOTOMETRIC UNITS

DEFINITIONS IN ACCORDANCE WITH RECOMMENDATIONS OF INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE ON WEIGHTS AND MEASUREMENTS

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the third reading of Bill No. 265, respecting the units of electrical and photometric measure.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

INCOME TAX ACT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 177, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister make a statement on these amendments?

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): These amendments, which the Senate made, were made at the request of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) because of instances which had been drawn to his attention between the time of the passage of the income tax bill in the house and its introduction in the Senate.

I can describe them generally as being in two groups. First of all, there are the Senate amendments relating to charitable foundations. There was a provision in the bill, as passed by the house, namely, section 21, which required that ninety per cent of the income of a charitable foundation had to be paid out as donations to charitable organizations. It was found that some of these charitable foundations themselves carried on charitable activities. The Senate amendment provides that the ninety per cent requirement may be fulfilled either by direct expenditure by the foundation itself on its own charitable activities or by gifts to other charitable organizations, or by both. The purpose of the original amendment passed in the house is unchanged; that is, the requirement that a charitable foundation cannot unduly accumulate its income but must pay out at least ninety per cent of its income on charity each year.

I will give an example of one of the foundations which was affected. The Canadian Cancer Society is a charitable foundation within the meaning of our act. This society, however, spends considerable of its income itself on educational propaganda with regard to cancer, and also makes a direct contribution to the Canadian Cancer Institute, a charitable organization which finances research. There is an example of a foundation which engages in charitable work itself, and also makes gifts to other charitable organizations.

The main purpose of the amendment with regard to charitable foundations is to permit a charitable foundation to make not only gifts to charitable organizations—that is, the organizations described in subsection (ea) of this section—but also actually to engage in charitable work itself. The provision that ninety per cent of its income must be spent on charity each year still applies.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the parliamentary assistant permit a question?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The illustration which he gives is clear, and I see no difficulty arising under it, because it is obviously an organization having wholly to do with charitable purposes. Is it considered that the definition of charity will be so clear that where you have an organization which itself is, let us say, not exclusively charitable, the gifts which it may make, and which will qualify it under the ninety per cent, will be to organizations so well defined that no question can arise as to their charitable nature?

Mr. Sinclair: I can assure the hon. member that it is the intention to spell out so clearly what is to be regarded as charity so far as the direct application of the funds is concerned that there will be no difficulty or possibility of evasion.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): When it is spelled out, where will it be spelled out?

Mr. Sinclair: By action of the Department of National Revenue, so far as the acceptance of the expenditure as being a charitable expenditure is concerned.

Then we come to the section with regard to trusts. Our original section covered charitable foundations which are corporations. There are, however, some trusts that are charitable foundations, broadly speaking, but they are not incorporated. It was drawn to the attention of the minister that these charitable trusts should also be covered. For that reason we have this amendment expanding this legislation on charitable foundations to include a charitable trust, with exactly the same provision, however, that at least ninety per cent of the income of the trust in any year must be spent on charity.

Then the other Senate amendment is with regard to the section on controlled companies; that is clause 11 of the House of Commons bill. This section provided for the disallowance of tax-free dividends from a corporation paid to a controlling corporation where control was acquired after May 10. There was no suggestion of this being retroactive. It was to apply only to corporations which became controlled by other corporations after May 10. It was found, however, that there were two ordinary business transactions of this nature well under way at the time of introduction of the bill in the house, where a corporation had acquired the right to purchase control of another corporation, where the latter's shares were on deposit with a trust company, but the actual deal had not been entirely completed. There was no desire to have any suggestion in the bill of retroactive legislation, but these cases were not known until after publication of the bill. Therefore instead of keeping the deadline on May 10, which was the date of introduction of the bill in the house, the Senate amendment reads:

> Notwithstanding subsection (2) subsection (1) is not applicable in a case where control of the payer corporation has been, pursuant to a right which existed on or before May 10, 1950, acquired before June 30, 1950.

As a consequence of the amendment, bona fide transactions which were almost completed before May 10 can go ahead to completion, provided it is done before June 30, 1950.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): May I ask one question on that? I agree with the intention that is sought to be carried out. But suppose we have a charitable foundation trust corporation, or something of the kind that is used, as we know, as a method of avoiding taxation which normally would be paid by individuals in charge of that organization. I think we all agree with catching up with that. Income tax should be payable. But when you let that organization make these gifts to other persons it strikes me that great care will have to be taken to see that we are not just carrying on the old chain reaction that we had before. It should be made certain that instead of catching A you catch B where B is in fact the alter ego of A. I think the assistant to the minister appreciates the care that must be exercised. We do not want to interfere with real charity. What we want to do is to catch those who are parading under the name of charity and who are in a money-making business.

Mr. Sinclair: I agree with the hon. member. I think there is wide approval in the country of this legislation, which will permit a genuine charitable foundation to carry on its work, but at the same time will stop the type of income tax evasion which fortunately up to now has not been prevalent in this country but which has developed to an alarming extent in some of our neighbouring countries.

We have taken two steps. First of all, it is provided that at least ninety per cent of the income must be spent each year on genuine charity, before the foundation can qualify as a charitable foundation under section 21 of the present bill. Second, we have prohibited the passage of funds from a charitable foundation to a charitable trust or trustee for other charitable foundations. A charitable foundation today can make its gifts only to the charitable organizations described in clause (ea) of section 21, which are full-time charitable organizations not in the form of foundations—and this would include the Red Cross, the Salvation Army, cancer and other medical institutes, and other organizations of the kind. Or, within the amendment today, if the foundation itself has a charity which is approved by the Department of National Revenue as coming within that section, they may spend money on their own charity. But they will not be allowed to pass money back and forth between so-called charitable foundations and trusts, and thus attempt to evade the spirit of the section.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): What I am going to suggest may not follow—and it may be that I have not read the amendments carefully enough—but let us assume that we have an organization already in existence. The parliamentary assistant to the minister says that these things may come from another country. One organization I have in mind was advised by a firm of lawyers carrying on business in New York. Suppose this organization, in using up its ninety per cent, said: "We are making a gift to enlighten the people about Seretse Khama, of Africa"; what would be the position there? I am referring of course to the African who married the white woman. Where is the judgment to be used in determining the bona fides of these gifts? Has the legislation gone so far as to name individual charities to which such gifts may properly be made?

Charity begins at home. Let us suppose someone makes a gift to a so-called charity in some other country, where we have no means of examining into its bona fides. It seems to me the statute might be evaded in circumstances of that kind, unless there is some specific provision against it.

Mr. Sinclair: That is true. We already have such protection due to the fact that we now give up to a ten per cent tax exemption to an individual and up to a five per cent exemption to a corporation for approved charitable contributions. These charities are approved as genuine charitable organizations within the meaning of clause (ea) of the present section 21 by the taxation officials of the Department of National Revenue. There must be also a receipt from such charities as are within the meaning of the act, and the taxpayers are thus entitled to the prescribed exemptions. It will be recalled, for example, that four or five days ago the Acting Minister of National Revenue said that Manitoba flood donations would be regarded by his department as charitable donations within the meaning of the act, and so can be claimed as exemptions up to the limits prescribed. All we are doing is to apply the same principle to moneys which foundations might wish to use in respect of their own specific charities. It will be determined in the same way by the Department of National Revenue, which already has experience in classifying our present charitable organizations, and naturally is anxious to secure as much in the way of taxation as possible, which it cannot do if it gives indiscriminate approval to doubtful charities. They have to be bona fide charities before the department will accept income deductions claimed because of such donations.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXCLUDE CERTAIN AREAS, ETC.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 209, to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Will the minister make a statement?

Mr. Speaker: I understand the bill is being reported from a committee.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Yes.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is not debatable.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—No award.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Mr. Chairman, I was unavoidably absent when the amendment was discussed before, because at that time I was attending committee meetings. Therefore I should like at this time to make a few remarks.

As I followed the discussion before the bill was sent to committee, I understood the general agreement to be that the act should no longer apply to submarginal lands. I believe that was the general agreement. It was pointed out by some that P.F.A.A. funds were really working against the splendid work being done under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, and it was agreed that that should not continue.

I should like at this time to put on record a return I received on March 16, although it was recorded in committee. It is as follows:

Question:

1. Under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939, to date, what amount of money has been deducted from sale of grain at one per cent, and paid into fund by the producers within the provinces of (a) Manitoba; (b) Saskatchewan; (c) Alberta?

2. What amount of money has been or will be paid out, 1939 to the end of the 1949 crop year, to producers by provinces under the act?

3. How many townships or part townships in each province have qualified for payments under the act during 1949?

4. How many of the same townships, by provinces, have qualified under the act since and including 1939 (a) 2 years; (b) 3 years; (c) 4 years; (d) 5 years; (e) 6 years; (f) 7 years; (g) 8 years; (h) 9 years; (i) 10 years?

Answer of Department of Trade and Commerce:

1. (a) Manitoba	$ 7,282,403.06
(b) Saskatchewan	24,607,978.74
(c) Alberta	13,109,306.60
Unallocated as at December 31, 1949	9,198.91

Answer of Department of Agriculture:

1. Answered by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

2. Manitoba	$ 2,547,590.77
Saskatchewan	94,884,155.58
Alberta	26,444,884.05
	$123,876,630.40

3. Manitoba, 82; Saskatchewan, 1,731; Alberta, 1,126.

4. Manitoba (a) 23; (b) 9; (c) 8; (d) 5; (e) nil; (f) nil; (g) 1; (h) nil; (i) nil.

Saskatchewan (a) 42; (b) 114; (c) 136; (d) 193; (e) 294; (f) 329; (g) 294; (h) 162; (i) 44.

Alberta (a) 152; (b) 109; (c) 64; (d) 58; (e) 71; (f) 71; (g) 121; (h) 177; (i) 41.

I believe that is useful information which has a bearing on the matter before the committee.

At the last session of parliament many resolutions were sent to me as a result of the aphid infestation. Owing to extremely wet weather, seeding in some areas was delayed until late in the year, and the aphid infestation affected some of those crops. In many instances the crops were completely destroyed. However, a number of townships had a fair average yield, with the result that certain people located within these townships at different points in southwestern Manitoba could not qualify for assistance under the act.

As a result of this grievance I received resolutions from several municipal councils in my riding, in which they asked that, where they were trying to diversify their farming methods and to get into the production of livestock, the acreage or yield of oats or barley should be used to a greater extent as a basis for qualification, replacing wheat acreage. I understand that under the regulations that can now be done—and probably it could have been done then. Anyway that provision now appears in the regulations, and I suggest this point should be made clear and publicized. In an area where oats or barley are grown to a greater degree than wheat, it should be permissible to use oats or barley as the basis for qualification. Last fall I had many resolutions from municipal councils asking for that. I want to make that point clear.

I am sorry that the administration did not see their way clear to bring it down nearer to an individual basis, because there are many cases of hardship. I am bound to agree that I can see difficulties in administration if it were brought down to an individual basis; nevertheless a lot of hardship has been caused throughout the years because that cannot be done. Many people scattered right across my constituency had practically a total crop failure last year and cannot qualify under the act for any assistance. I am sure the minister will agree that because of diversification in those areas, the raising of more stock, when they desire in a particular year to produce more oats or barley than wheat they should be allowed to qualify on that basis in the event of a crop failure.

Mr. Gardiner: In view of the discussion that I understand is to follow, there are only one or two words I should like to say now with regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Souris about submarginal lands.

There has been considerable discussion in the press of the west, and I presume it arises as the result of a loose use of terms in the debate in the house. Reference has been made to abandoned lands, as though the legislation were intended to make it impossible for abandoned lands to be brought back under cultivation. This legislation has nothing to do with abandoned lands. They do not come under it at all, and never have. From some of the discussions that have been taking place I am afraid that some abandoned lands have crept under it. It is partly for the purpose of rechecking that and making sure that abandoned lands are not under the act that we are anxious to have the amendment. They never were and never were intended to be under the act. Abandoned lands were not supposed to come under the act at all, even if they were later cultivated; therefore the amending bill has nothing to do with abandoned lands. They are barred by the act as it was originally drafted, and by the regulations.

Then there is the suggestion that we are trying to bar all submarginal lands. Some people would say that if you barred all submarginal land you would bar all lands that are under the act if you gave a proper definition to submarginal lands. The bill does not bar submarginal lands as such, and has no effect upon them. At present the act provides that people on land that does not yield a reasonable crop are paid assistance during the time they remain on the land. We are making efforts all the time to enable them to move from that land to some other location. Once we take people off that land and put them on other land, the land from which they are removed never comes back under the act, no matter who has it. It is not intended to.

We are not dealing with such lands at all under the bill. The only thing the bill is intended to deal with is lands that were not under cultivation at all when the Prairie Farm Assistance Act was put on the statute book. By the terms of the amendment made by the standing committee on agriculture and colonization we put the date not at the time when the act came into effect, but at the 31st of December, 1940, at the end of the first year of its operations. That gave people in that section of the country an opportunity to observe the operation of the legislation before doing whatever they did do. What we say in the bill is that any lands that were not under private ownership at 31st December, 1940, are not to come under the act when they have been taken over from the government by some private person or organization. Lands that were still held by governments on the 31st day of December, 1940, do not come under the act as amended.

The intention is that any lands still owned by the government after some forty or fifty years of homesteading, and almost as many years when the lands were open for purchase and nobody thought they were sufficiently good either to be homesteaded or purchased during that period of time, are not good enough to be brought under this legislation after it is passed. That is the only principle underlying the bill.

I still say that we should not assume in our discussions that when we finish dealing with the bill, all submarginal land is going to be excluded from the provisions of the legislation. I would say at least fifty per cent of the land still under the act is submarginal, and that provincial governments, individuals and the federal government are doing the best they can to get as large a percentage of that land as possible out of the present form of cultivation altogether and put to some other use. The particular uses we are trying to bring about are to get such land under irrigation or under pasture. Those are the two things we are trying to do with it. Even at the present time these lands are rated as submarginal by people who know land. They go out and look at them and say: "I do not want that land; it is submarginal." The act now provides that if a government body says the lands are submarginal, they do not come under the act, no matter who is on them.

I want to make it perfectly plain that the bill does not deal with submarginal lands as such. It deals with lands which up to a certain date everybody considered were not good enough either to homestead or to buy. It is true that having set the date at December 31, 1940, there will be a few pieces of land in Saskatchewan particularly that were homesteaded after that date, and there will be a few parcels that were purchased after that date but they are largely in areas where the act would not apply in any case.

Mr. Coldwell: Of course there are lands held by the provincial government which have not been cultivated because they were not thrown open for homesteading or for sale, and yet they are good lands. I am thinking particularly of an area in my own constituency, on the Matador ranch, where there is some very heavy land which was not cultivated until quite recently. The point I am raising concerns land that is bought and broken; then the following spring the weather is dry, and although the land is prepared for seeding the people do not seed it because they believe the weather is too dry. Does land of that kind come under the legislation? It is cultivated land. It is not summer fallow. It was broken and prepared for seeding but not seeded on account of the unusually dry weather.

Mr. Gardiner: Any properly cultivated land is defined under the terms of the act as summer fallow if it was not seeded.

Mr. Coldwell: That might be the difficulty under the act. You say summer fallow?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes. If it meets the other conditions of the act, that would not prevent it from coming in.

Mr. Argue: I know the minister was correct when he said a few moments ago that the purpose of the amendment is not to remove submarginal land from the benefits of the act. Instead of what the minister is doing, and even with the changes that he proposes to make in the original bill, I believe he should give consideration to taking away the benefits of the act from submarginal land, and then doing something else to provide a livelihood for the people affected. When the legislation was first introduced it discriminated against all lands, with few exceptions, leased by the crown. Since that time the minister has proposed further amendments which will increase the exemptions of provincial crown land and therefore allow a greater amount of provincial crown land to remain under the act. But he has discriminated against all land sold by the crown, whether by a province or by a municipality, since December 31, 1940.

I might make the same point now that I made in the agriculture committee, that it is not fair to make this legislation retroactive and remove from its benefits those who purchased land during the time when it was eligible for prairie farm assistance. It is not sound agricultural practice to have a section such as this, and that is the greatest fault to be found with it. All it says is that with regard to certain crown land, that land will not be under prairie farm assistance.

The next thing wrong with this amendment is that while certain land is removed from the act, in certain instances that land may be highly productive. I know of such parcels of land. It is not right that farmers should have paid one per cent year after year for prairie farm assistance and then be denied all benefits under the act. An amendment such as this must be discouraging to provincial governments that have been endeavouring to follow a sound land use program.

For example, the Saskatchewan government owns over 6 million acres, of which some ten per cent or a little over 600,000 acres has been leased for cultivation purposes. In other words, the department of agriculture of Saskatchewan has been most careful to lease for cultivation purposes only land that is suitable for grain growing. I do not think it is right that farmers who have purchased land from a municipality or the provincial government should be discriminated against by this amendment, when people who purchased land or who are leasing land from mortgage companies, railway companies or the Hudson's Bay Company are still eligible under the act.

I have a land use survey which was made in 1941 by the dominion Department of Agriculture. It shows that in 56 rural municipalities in south-central Saskatchewan at the time the survey was made there were 159,000 acres owned by the Hudson's Bay Company, some 23,000 acres owned by the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National, and 480,000 acres owned by mortgage companies. The minister is saying that any man who purchased land from a mortgage company or the Hudson's Bay Company, no matter if it is just sand, it will be eligible for prairie farm assistance if he cultivates that land. The same would apply if he leases that land.

For the life of me I cannot see any reason for this amendment. The minister says he wants to make a check, but the act has been in force for some ten years, and the proper economic and soil surveys have been made and all the information as to submarginal land is available. As I said, I expressed these same opinions in the committee, but I just wanted to emphasize them and say that while other things done under the act are advantageous, I am opposed to the first clause.

The hon. member for Souris mentioned what might be done under the act to help the people who have been flooded out in the Red river valley. I am afraid that even though the board switched from wheat to coarse grains in determining the yield for the purpose of deciding whether benefits would be paid, it would not result in any different decision from that which would apply if wheat alone were taken as the basis.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I agree with the hon. member.

Mr. Argue: The maximum for wheat is eight bushels to the acre, and, according to the regulations, the maximum for oats and barley is twelve bushels to the acre. In other words, a farmer must have a yield of less than twelve bushels to the acre of oats or barley if he is to get any benefits under this act. But if one farmer out of a hundred is able to seed part of his land, he may get a yield of 100 bushels to the acre of oats, sixty-five bushels to the acre of barley or forty bushels to the acre of wheat, while all the rest of the farmers in the township would have no crops because they could not seed or had seeded so late that the yield would be suitable only for feed purposes.

Mr. Ross (Souris): That happened along the Souris last year.

Mr. Argue: I imagine the hon. member is better acquainted with the details of that situation than I am, and it probably will happen again up there. I do not think it will make any difference to the farmers concerned. If these people are not able to seed, they should be brought under the act, even though an exception be made. They have paid a good deal into the fund under the act, and now when they are faced with adversity some exceptions should be made to bring them within its provisions.

Mr. Gardiner: There is no necessity of making any exception, because the provision is already in the act. Oats and barley could be brought in if the board decided that that was the proper thing to do, if these people have seeded this year. If these people have not been able to seed because of water, they will go on summer fallowing. If there is any wheat in the district I am sure that they would much rather take wheat as the basis than substitute something else. You do not need any amendments to bring them under the act, because the administration has always been on that basis.

Mr. Argue: If there were a hundred acres of wheat, that would be the yardstick and the production there might be forty bushels to the acre.

Mr. Gardiner: You would find it difficult to spread a little bit of wheat over a whole township and have it amount to more than eight bushels to the acre. It does not work out that way. I do not think you will have any great difficulty about that.

My hon. friend has repeated what was said in the committee, namely, that this government is expected to do something to help that district. They have said they are going to give financial grants to the province. Then they have said to the province, "You will have to deal with the municipalities and the municipalities will have to deal with the farmers." What I said in the committee was that if this act does come into effect down in that area I believe the first thing the committee will do will be to deduct anything the farmer gets under this act, when they are making a general distribution. I think that would be the sensible thing to do. If we are to have a special grant to take care of that area, there is no reason why this act should apply at all. If it did apply, it would apply only up to a certain point, and anything beyond that would be applied from another source.

Mr. Charlton: What appears on the order paper under item No. 5 is:

House in committee on Bill No. 209, an act to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939 (as amended).

Those of us who were members of the agriculture committee know what is in the amendment, but for the benefit of those who were not I would suggest the minister have the bill reprinted.

Mr. Gardiner: The bill has been printed for three weeks, and we do not usually reprint it to take care of amendments. I shall read the amendment to subsection (c) which is the provision that has been discussed up to the moment. It reads as follows:

(c) with respect to lands not sold or granted, or not agreed to be sold or granted, by His Majesty prior to the thirty-first day of December, nineteen hundred and forty, and for the purposes of this section such lands shall not be included in computing the cultivated land of a farmer, and the grain grown thereon shall not be included in computing the average yield in a township, but this paragraph does not apply to

(i) lands disposed of to a settler or veteran under the Soldier Settlement Act or the Veterans Land Act, 1942,

(ii) lands in a special area in Alberta as constituted by or under the Special Areas Act, 1939, of Alberta,

(iii) lands approved by the board and held by a co-operative farm association,

(iv) school lands, or

(v) lands with respect to which an agreement has been entered into between the government of Canada and the government of a province under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

The meaning of that section, for the benefit of those who were not in the committee, is as follows: In the provision which says that the act is not to apply to certain land, there is (a), (b) and now (c), which is this one. It says the act does not apply with respect to land not sold or granted or not agreed to be sold or granted, and that means lands that were not sold to someone outright or were not homesteaded; that is really the meaning of it. It does not apply to those lands if that had not taken place prior to December 31, 1940.

Then the latter part of subsection (c) says the first part of subsection (c) does not apply to certain lands within a group, such as lands disposed of to a settler or veteran under the Soldier Settlement Act or the Veterans Land Act in 1942. Those lands come back in under the act. Lands in special areas in Alberta, as constituted by or under the Special Areas Act of 1939, come under the act. Then there are lands approved by the board and held by a co-operative farm association—that covers the land to which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was referring a few moments ago, which is in the old Matador ranch. That land is now under a co-operative farm association, and by virtue of this amendment it would be under the act.

The member for Assiniboia has brought up the question of school land and Hudson's Bay land. He did not mention the school land so often today, so I presume the explanation given on that has satisfied him that it is an exceptional case. The school lands are lands that were set up to be disposed of by auction, and the funds so obtained put into the school fund. We are not interfering with those lands. We are assuming that the old provisions made for the school fund are still operative, and still should be operative. We are not doing anything about those.

Then there are the lands with respect to which agreement has been entered into between the government of Canada and the government of the provinces under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. We sit down with the government of Alberta, Saskatchewan or Manitoba, and say that certain lands which were not disposed of prior to December, 1940, we would like to use to set up a pasture organization. The province says that is all right, so we make an agreement to move the men off the area we want to put into pasture and onto a piece of land which is owned by the province and that land is eligible for payment under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. The discussions the other day had to do with the lands up in the north-eastern section of Saskatchewan which are still owned by the provincial government, because the timber has never been taken off them. They have never been cleared. The land is not owned by the government merely because it may be poor land, as much of the land in the south is. The provincial government have already come to us and asked us to assist in getting that land cleared, in order that they can move settlers onto it. It has been suggested to us that the settlers they want to put onto it are the settlers we want to take off this submarginal land in the south. We have gone so far in the discussions as to say that we would not be interested under any other circumstances. If the province merely intended to open this land up for different settlers, such as people coming from Europe, Britain or the United States, we would not be interested in making any special arrangements about it which would involve this legislation.

We say, if you are going to consider moving people off the submarginal land in the south upon which we are now paying prairie farm assistance, and taking those people up to that area, then we are prepared to talk about an agreement. This provision says that if that kind of agreement is entered into, provision can be made for this land being subject to prairie farm assistance; that is the meaning of the section. I believe that covers every case except one.

The member for Assiniboia has suggested that we are discriminating against some people. I do not think the act discriminates for or against anyone at all, unless it be the veterans. It discriminates in giving them an advantage over other people and it discriminates in giving persons who have gone into co-operative farms an advantage over other people.

Mr. Argue: It did not take away any advantage they would have.

Mr. Gardiner: They did not have any advantage when they took that land. This act did not intend that land to be under cultivation.

Mr. Argue: It did not say that.

Mr. Gardiner: It did not say that, but if we had been asked for our opinion, that is what we would have said. Then they come along and say: "Here is a veteran who wants to settle near his people. There is a piece of that land there. Surely you are not going to deny this veteran the right to settle on it." The Alberta government will tell you that is the sort of appeal that has been made to them, and the Saskatchewan government will tell you the same thing. I know it is the kind of appeal that has been made to us. We have discriminated against other people in favour of the veterans, and I think quite properly so. We may feel he has made a mistake in some cases, but I think he has the right to make a mistake. We have simply left him under the act, and there is discrimination there.

The only other case is that of men who have bought land from the government since December 31, 1940. So far as I have the records, only about 12,000 acres have been dealt with in that way. There may have been some more recently of which I have not the record, but if so it is a small amount. Then there are others who have leased land. We do not know how large that group is. They have leased it on exactly the same basis as the returned veteran has been asking for land. They say their parents live near there, and they would like to get a piece of land. In spite of the fact that their parents have been on prairie farm assistance every year since this act was put into effect, except one, they have taken that land and broken it up. They are trying to live on it. We are not objecting to their trying to live on it; that is their own choice. Under these circumstances we do not think they should come under this act.

So far as making a check is concerned, I suggested in the committee that we wanted this to be retroactive so that we could check those cases. I stated that the matter had already been discussed with the government and that the government had agreed that after we have checked these cases, if we find that there is any great hardship on persons who have not just entered into the hardships of their own free choice, we would consider bringing down an amendment next year. But we would like this legislation as it is now drafted so that we can go out and make a check and satisfy people in other parts of Canada that we are not bringing people under this act who should not be brought under it.

Mr. Argue: After the minister makes the check, would the criterion, with regard to anyone he might then bring back under the act, be whether or not the land being farmed was suitable for farming—in other words, that people were not misusing this act in order to bring in poor lands, but were farming land that was good. After the check is made to find out if that is the case, would he give consideration to that point?

Mr. Gardiner: I am satisfied that any area down in that section of the country in which the people have had to draw under this act for ten years out of the last eleven is not a good enough area in which to break up new land. I think the sooner they are told that, the better for them; otherwise they are just going to live there and half starve to death for the rest of their time. That is the thing that we want to check—whether these people are taking up land of that kind or whether their circumstances are better after they have taken up the land.

Mr. Argue: Of course that is the very thing the minister will not be checking, because he is not taking in railway lands or Hudson's Bay land. I am all for checking the submarginal land. Within those townships in which payment has been made for nine years or so, there is bound to be a good deal of submarginal land.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Ten years in some cases.

Mr. Argue: Yes, ten years in some cases. But even in those townships there can be land that is good wheat land and that is supermarginal, according to the economic surveys, just the same as you can go into a township in which there has never been any payment made under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and yet you may still find some submarginal land which is being used for wheat production. The only thing is that in one township it is a large percentage of the land and therefore shows up in the average yield; and in another it is a small percentage of the land and therefore does not show up in the average yield.

I want to make it perfectly clear that I am for the veterans preference at all times; but I would point out that any preference that is being given to veterans under this new clause is a preference which is given only because other people had a preference taken away from them. It is not an additional preference for veterans. You say: As to veterans, we will not touch them, but we will go after some of the others.

Mr. Gardiner: That is not correct.

Mr. Argue: I would not want the impression left that it gives all veterans farming on crown land a preference, because it does not. It gives a preference only to veterans who have taken up land under the Veterans Land Act. I see that the Minister of Veterans Affairs is here, and I think he will agree with me when I say that in the larger part of western Canada a half section of land is not an economic unit for a veteran, a civilian or anyone else. The Saskatchewan government believe that, as I am sure do other provincial governments. What the Saskatchewan government is doing in a great many cases is taking veterans who have obtained provincial lands under the Veterans Land Act and then saying to them: If there is another quarter of crown land available for you in the immediate vicinity and you make an application for that land, we will give you a preference. If that veteran has three quarters of crown land, two quarters of which he has obtained under the Veterans Land Act and the other quarter he has obtained only because he made application to the Saskatchewan department of agriculture and obtained a veterans preference, then he will not receive prairie farm assistance on the additional quarter. While there is a veterans preference, it does not go all the way for all veterans on all land they may farm.

Mr. Jutras: In view of certain statements that were made with regard to the act as related to the flood area, I should like to revert to that subject for a minute or so. I do not intend to go over the discussion we had in the committee on that section. I want to make it clear, however, that when I raised the question in the committee it was purely for the purpose of getting clarification of the regulations in view of a particular circumstance that may affect the Red river valley this year. I pointed out that this situation existed in the past in other areas. I quite agree with the Minister of Agriculture that we should not look for special relief treatment under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. In this regard I would disagree, as a matter of fact, with the hon member for Assiniboia, who suggested that we should in some way evolve a special method of getting relief assistance through the P. F. A. A.

When I raised the question my intention, as I said, was purely to get clarification. In other words, there is an act that provides assistance when there is a crop failure. There is a possibility that there might be, for once, a crop failure in my district. My intention was to find out if we would get our due. I was merely trying to get the regulations clarified in order to make sure that we would get what was coming to us. It was on that basis that I went into this matter.

In view of the statement made by the minister today, I am afraid that I shall have to say that I respectfully disagree with the second part of it, to the effect that assistance through the P. F. A. A. is in a way similar to relief assistance that might be given by the government. The P. F. A. A. is a statute, and therefore if the district meets the conditions of the act, we are entitled to payment under the act; and as such we are entitled as of right under the act. Consequently the share of the relief assistance that will be assumed by the federal government is in an entirely different category.

As a matter of fact, from the practical point of view if we are paid any money under this act, I do not think it will be deducted from the relief fund, because I would hope that any relief money will be paid long before any cheques under P. F. A. A. are received. If there is a crop failure, I do not suppose there is any likelihood of getting those cheques in before late next year. By that time we hope that the rehabilitation will have been completed. I think we should keep the two things separate and not confuse them. As I said, one thing is an act under which, if we qualify, we get payment he same as everybody else, irrespective of the cause. The cause may be flood in Manitoba. It may be drought. It will be drought in many parts of Saskatchewan and Alberta, because every year there are some parts of Saskatchewan and Alberta which get benefits under the act. I do not therefore see why the question should be brought in that there will be a deduction.

Some hon. members said that it did not make much difference whether the relief came from P. F. A. A. or whether it came directly from the treasury. I contend that there is a big difference between the two. As I said, one we are entitled to and we get. We are not asking—at least I am not—or advocating any special treatment under the act. What I want to make sure of is that we get what is coming to us. The other thing is an entirely different question, and I do not propose to go into it at this time. I refer to the money which will be contributed to the province by the federal government on a percentage basis.

So far as this amendment is concerned, I agree with the minister that the underlying principle is a good one. However, I repeat that in Manitoba we have had very minor benefits from the Prairie Farm Assistance Act over the years since its inception. So far in committee exceptions have been made to take care of particular situations in Saskatchewan and Alberta. We have proceeded more or less on the assumption that this amendment would not affect Manitoba. It is quite likely that it may not affect Manitoba; I do not know for sure. Apparently we have no way of finding out what effect it will have on Manitoba. I should like to put in the reservation that if it does cut down further the benefits that have been coming to Manitoba it may well cut them to such an extent that the usefulness of the act may almost disappear in that province.

The minister has given us the assurance that he wants to give this amendment a trial. That is quite agreeable to Manitobans as a whole. I am quite sure that we should give it a trial, and in that way we shall find out whether it affects our province or not. As I say, with the principle of the amendment I am in agreement. I think it is a good one, and we are prepared to see it tried out at least for the coming year.

Mr. Wright: There appears to be agreement on all sides as to the desirability of withdrawing submarginal land in certain areas in the south of the province from participation under this act. In my opinion, though, the best way to accomplish this is to spend a little more money under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. During the early years when the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act was in operation large numbers of settlers were moved from dried-out areas in the south of the province to better farming areas within Alberta, Saskatchewan particularly, and in some instances Manitoba.

I should like to get some information from the minister, if he has it, with respect to the number of settlers who were assisted under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act to move out of these marginal areas into other areas during the years before the war. As a matter of fact it seemed to me that very few moved. I do not think any were given assistance during the war years to move to other areas. Since the war the movement of those settlers from the southern areas into the northern areas of the prairie provinces has not again started. In my opinion that is the only way in which we can meet the problem of reducing the payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. The way to do it is to see that the settlers in those areas who took up land forty or fifty years ago, and some since that time, are given opportunity to move into better farming areas, either areas in which irrigation projects are being developed, or areas in the northern part of the province where we are not subject to drought and where land is still available.

There has been difficulty, I know. There has been a shortage of land in the northern areas of the provinces. Large areas in the northern parts of Alberta and Saskatchewan particularly were held in forest reserves until the timber had been cut. In a great many instances most of the valuable timber has been removed from those areas, and the land is now being opened for agricultural settlement.

As I said before, the best way to solve our problem with respect to reducing the Prairie Farm Assistance Act payments in the southern portions of Alberta and Saskatchewan is to see that these settlers are assisted in moving into better farming areas, either the irrigation areas or the northern areas which are not affected by drought.

Can the minister give the committee the numbers that were moved or assisted to move during those years into other parts, particularly in the two or three years prior to the war and since the war, if that movement has been started again? I mean assisted by the federal government through the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act since the war.

Mr. Gardiner: Approximately 1,400 families moved just prior to or in the early part of the war. Not many moved during the war period, for the obvious reason that the people who would want to move were not there. They were overseas, or somewhere else. It was mostly the young people who moved. They were not around during the war. They are back now. One of the things we should be very careful about is settling them in the area that they left rather than settling them somewhere else. We have been very careful about that. As I recall it, the first ruling that was made by the veterans organization was that people could not go into those areas at all. They would not agree to a favourable return with regard to applications that were made for lands in those areas.

Some of the members who have been speaking, including myself, have urged upon the Department of Veterans Affairs that they consider the fact that these people want to settle alongside their parents. Most of the places are in that category. Many members —not all of them are here now—who were in the house at that time would write me about it. I would take it up with Veterans Affairs, trying to insist upon their agreeing that these lands were good enough for the men to settle on. Some of us had to draw on our imagination in order to say that, but we were being kind. We were trying to be as kindly as we could toward them, trying to make it possible for them to get settled again near home. I say that we do not object to that, but it did interfere with the possibility of getting resettlement of these people. We have made arrangements under which we thought we would be right in the middle of resettling people. We purchased the Canada Land and Irrigation holdings in Alberta. The law is slow enough in this country, but we find that it is much slower over on the other side of the ocean. We have been moving heaven and earth to try to get titles to that land cleared, but we cannot speed up the courts over in that country. We do not know when we are going to get them cleared. It may be about the middle of this summer. If we had them cleared we would have been moving people right from the day in the spring that the work could be started. We want the settlers to do all their own work on this land. We do not want to hire a contractor to go in and level the land and do all that kind of thing; we want these people to go there and do it themselves. People appreciate much more a farm that they build themselves than they do one that somebody else has built for them. We want to do that. The delay in securing title is the only thing that held it up. We want to be in a position, just as soon as we possibly can, to move more of them.

Mr. Wright: What the minister has just said is that since the war practically no assisted movement under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act has taken place. We are only now getting to the point where the movement that was in fact taking place prior to the war is again becoming operative. He mentioned that with regard to the irrigated area in Alberta agreements are being reached. Will people now living in Saskatchewan in these submarginal areas be given the opportunity to move to Alberta, or will the irrigation project be used entirely for the people of Alberta from the drought areas? Has progress been made in reaching an agreement with the Saskatchewan government with respect to the area in northeastern Saskatchewan of some 200,000 acres that is being removed this year from forest reserve and being made available for settlement and agricultural purposes?

Mr. Gardiner: Replying to the first question, the Alberta government itself is opening up an area a little larger than that of Canada Land and Irrigation. It is all part of one scheme. We are assisting by widening the ditch and making it possible for them to get water. They are going to utilize that for the Alberta people, giving a preference to returned men. In the other area we can bring in people from anywhere. Our intention is that they will come only from submarginal areas, but they may come from Saskatchewan, Manitoba or any part of Alberta.

The answer to the last question is that no agreement has been entered into up to the present.

Mr. Fair: What is the position with respect to land homesteaded twenty, thirty or forty years ago, disposed of by sale by the government, and then, for non-payment of taxes, reverting to the government and being disposed of since December 31, 1940?

Mr. Gardiner: Any land that was homesteaded or sold prior to December 31, 1940, is eligible under this act, unless it was cultivated and abandoned. If it was once cultivated and abandoned it is not eligible. But this amendment does not affect that; that provision is in the act as it was.

Mr. Charlton: What is the position of a co-operative farm which was established prior to the passage of this act but which will not be approved by the board?

Mr. Gardiner: It is already provided that those co-operative farms are in. That has been agreed by letter, and in every way. The lands that are under this are practically all similar to the Matador ranch. They are suitable so far as the lands are concerned. Those co-operatives are under now and will remain under. If they have not been passed upon, they will be.

Mr. Charlton: In other words established co-operative farms will be automatically approved by the board?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Gardiner moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Charlton: I do not think it is fair to read the bill a third time when it has not been printed.

Mr. Gardiner: It has been printed. That has been repeated over and over again, and it is not so. Scarcely a bill goes through the house without some amendment. We do not reprint a bill because there is an amendment in it. One section in this bill has been amended, and that is all. That amendment was read and discussed for days in committee. My hon. friend sat there all the time it was being discussed, and helped draft the amendment. To say it has not been printed is not correct.

Bill read the third time and passed.

DEFENCE SERVICES PENSIONS

METHOD OF COMPUTATION—CREATION OF SERVICE PENSION BOARD

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 134, to amend the Militia Pension Act and change the title thereof.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Title of Militia Pension Act changed.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, this bill was referred to the committee set up to consider Bill No. 133, respecting national defence. Careful consideration having been given to the bill by that committee, I do not think it is necessary to repeat the objections raised at that time to some of the sections.

All these sections concerned money matters; therefore the committee really had no power to make any material change. During the course of discussion in the committee certain recommendations were made by some members, particularly by the hon. member for Nanaimo, and those recommendations are set out in the proceedings of the committee.

I understand that there will be further amendments to this act, either at the next or the following session. I draw these recommendations to the minister's attention and express the hope that they may be given serious consideration when further amendments to the act are suggested.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, I can give the hon. member the assurance that those recommendations are already receiving consideration. It was found that a number of them would involve consequential amendments, and also might involve new principles which would have to be considered. However I can give the hon. member the assurance he wishes to have.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONSOLIDATION AND REVISION OF EXISTING LEGISLATION—ORGANIZATION FOR DEFENCE—CODE OF SERVICE, DISCIPLINE, ETC.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 133, respecting national defence.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, before the house takes up consideration of the bill I should like to express my appreciation to the members of the committee established especially to consider this and the other two defence measures. I think it was their experience, as well as that of others concerned with these important measures, that during their thirteen meetings they met together and discussed objectively the matters contained in the bills, with the sole purpose of having just as good a set of legislation relative to national defence as was possible.

Bill No. 133 is the largest single bill put before the house and this committee since 1934, I believe. It contains 251 sections, incorporating in their text the provisions of a number of statutes relative to defence, totalling approximately 600 sections in all. This is far more than a consolidation. It is a new act which unifies and consolidates all the legislation having to do with defence.

I am sure I express the views of other members of the special committee when I say that the expeditious and thoroughly conscientious way in which their work was carried out was in no small measure due to the excellence of the chairmanship of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. In that regard I am sure he would be the first to say that he had the support of members of the committee representing all parties in the house.

The bill contains some forty-seven different amendments made by the committee, of which about thirty were proposed by representatives of the department, and the remainder originated in the committee. I do not think the general trend of the amendments is controversial. If they had any general pattern it was to provide measures which would be even more uniform in respect of the three services than those in the bill as it was referred to the committee. Also the changes in the provisions generally tended to favour the position of the accused, but they are entirely acceptable to the department and to the government.

I commend the bill in its amended form to the consideration of the committee.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, the minister has said that the bill was carefully considered in the special committee. We received fine co-operation from the representatives of the three service departments which are particularly concerned with the administration of justice in the services, and I should like to thank them for their co-operation. As a result of the contact that members of the committee had with them, I am sure we were all convinced that administration of justice in the services will be well looked after by them.

The minister has said that the committee suggested a considerable number of amendments. Of course some were suggested which were not adopted, and I presume that is always bound to be so. Everything suggested is not acceptable to the services concerned or to the government. By and large, however, I think the amendments adopted improved the bill to a considerable extent. I think the useful work done by the committee is an indication of the fact that a committee to deal with defence matters in a broader manner would be a useful instrument for investigation of all matters concerning defence.

All members of the committee expressed their views fully as to changes that should be made in the various sections of the bill, and so far as I am concerned I will have very little more to say now. The amendments were numerous, and in the committee we passed a motion that the bill be reprinted before it was brought back to the house. I do not know whether or not that has been done. I have not had a new copy of the bill, and I think it might be a little difficult for members who were not on the committee to follow it without having the reprinted bill before them. I presume we can go ahead with the old bill, however, and have the amendments read as they arise.

Mr. Gillis: As one of the members who had the privilege of serving on the special committee, I have a few observations to make. The first is that the title of the bill may be misleading. We may think we are starting to discuss a measure concerning national defence as such. My conception of the present bill is that we are not devising ways and means to build forts, an air force, and so on. The main objective of the bill is to bring about some uniformity in the matter of military law so far as the army, navy and air force are concerned. In the past the army was largely guided by the old British army act. Being a relatively new organization, the air force had their own rules and regulations in matters of discipline. The navy has its own formulas. The main objective of this bill is to arrive at some uniformity in matters of discipline, and I think in that particular the bill has achieved its objective. I do not think you will ever be able to have a workable arrangement that will tie the navy, the army, and the air force together; the navy should have some latitude because of the difference in its operations. Looking at the record of all three services I think we must admit that during the last war there was an excellent job of administration by all services.

I had the opportunity to go over this bill section by section, and I am satisfied with it; I think it is as good a job as could be done under the circumstances. I found the committee to be a most efficient committee, and its meetings were well attended. The chairman did an excellent job. He was cool-headed and seemed to have a lot of common sense, something which is rather rare today.

If there is any particular credit to be given to anyone in connection with this bill I think it should go to the officials of the different branches who were called as witnesses. There were three young men before the committee who were very well qualified, most efficient, and had all the answers at their fingertips. The dispatch with which the bill went through the committee was due largely to these men from the navy, army and air force who came before the committee with a bill which they had drafted themselves and which they thoroughly understood. Each one accepted the responsibility in his own field. If amendments were suggested that were not considered reasonable, our minds were soon clarified.

As we consider the bill section by section there may be other matters that I shall deal with, but, I repeat, it is about as good a job as could be done under the circumstances.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, as a member of the committee I want to say that I think a real job was done with this bill. The work of this committee proves the necessity of having a committee on national defence, which would be to the advantage of the three services as well as to Canada as a whole. From the work of this committee we have seen that matters of national defence can be studied by cool heads and real progress made. I do not see that any argument can be offered against the setting up of a committee on national defence.

Mr. Blackmore: I had the privilege of representing the Social Credit group on this committee. First of all I should like to commend the chairman. I do not believe I have ever served under a finer chairman, and I doubt if I have ever served under as fine a chairman as the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. Considering the fact that this was his first experience, he deserves the highest praise.

One thing that was observable in connection with the work of the committee was the fine spirit of sincerity and objectivity which prevailed generally among the members. I found no member of the committee who was not prepared to listen to suggestions from other members and weigh them. Generally speaking the members would hold on until everybody came to a sort of unity of faith as a result of considering the opinions of others.

We were fortunate in having on the committee so many men with such wide experience. I mention the hon. member for Nanaimo as only one, and when I say that there were several members on the committee who seemed quite as much at home with matters concerning the fighting forces as that hon. member, it will be realized that we had a genuinely fine committee which rendered the best of service to our country.

We are not saying that the bill as it now stands is the acme of perfection, but I think under the conditions under which we laboured it constitutes the finest contribution that we in our generation can make to a finer and better military service.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): After listening to these paeans of praise I hesitate to say anything which might be regarded as a discordant note, particularly as I was not a member of the committee. There is a good reason for that. As I told the house on another occasion some years ago, my total military experience consisted of having been a lance-corporal in the boys' brigade of a Methodist church in Regina.

Ever since I came to Ottawa I have been interested in courts martial. I want someone to explain to me why in peacetime serious crimes are to be dealt with by courts martial within the armed services. I know that there is an amendment dealing with murder, rape and other crimes, and I know that the attorney general of any province may direct that the matter be tried in a civilian court on the basis that the civilian authorities must always be paramount. But I have yet to hear it satisfactorily explained why serious crimes such as robbery with violence, or armed robbery, things which are becoming too prevalent in this country, should be dealt with by courts martial. Why is it that the armed services insist on having what is practically exclusive jurisdiction in matters of that kind?

We must remember that in the administration of justice generally all prosecutions begin by the laying of what we call an information. Sometimes an investigation is carried out by the police or the protective authorities before an information is laid, but when a crime is openly committed no further investigation is needed before the laying of an information. What I have in my mind is this. We say that the attorney general may remove a case from service jurisdiction to a court; yet that seems to me to be a nebulous thing to say when civilian officers of the law have had no part in the investigation of what may result in a charge under military law or an information in our civilian courts.

I accept the word of hon. gentlemen who have spoken as to the excellent job that was done, but it does seem to me, if I am correctly informed as to what the law, even though amended, is, that the civilian court jurisdiction is practically ousted, except in cases of rape and murder; and there is one other which escapes my memory at the moment. Let us consider robbery with violence, or breaking and entering. When someone makes up his mind to break and enter a dwelling house, you often see violence. In fact just the other day I was reading in one of the Ottawa papers about a householder shooting a housebreaker dead. The judge, in an Ottawa court I presume, directed the jury that there was nothing for them to decide, because the individual was acting within his rights. Someone died as a result of that incident. I wish, therefore, the minister or someone would explain to us why we have narrowed these serious crimes and confined the jurisdiction within the service.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, while the observations of the member for Calgary West might properly be made under section 62 of the bill, I am sure that hon. members will allow me to follow him and deal with his remarks, because I agree with him that they have a rather wider connotation than their relationship to section 62 and following sections.

I should like to point out, with respect, that the hon. member is clearly under a misapprehension as to the state of the existing service law, and also as to what is proposed under this bill concerning the relationship of service law to civil law. In the first place, it is part of the existing law of the land, whether it be service or civil, and it is fundamental to our system of law, that the civil authority is supreme.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I said that, of course.

Mr. Claxton: That is stated in section 62, subsection 1:

> Nothing in the code of service discipline affects the jurisdiction of any civil court to try a person for any offence triable by that court.

Quite contrary to the service courts ousting the jurisdiction of the civil courts, this provision, and indeed the common law, expressly provides that the civil courts shall be supreme. In any cases which service courts or service law purport or attempt to deal with, it is stated that that is exclusive of civil jurisdiction.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I agree with that, of course.

Mr. Claxton: Service courts have no exclusive jurisdiction in respect of civil offences. In fact, they do not try civil offences where the civil courts try civil offences, because if a civil offence is tried by a civil court then the service court has not jurisdiction. Under no circumstances does the service court oust the jurisdiction of the civil court. If the offence is in fact tried by the latter, in consequence of the civil attorney general laying an indictment or commencing other civil procedure, then the service court by that very fact has not any jurisdiction.

[Mr. Smith (Calgary West).]

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Yes, that is right.

Mr. Claxton: The reason, therefore, for providing that a number of civil offences shall also be service offences is to take care of the case where the civil court does not act or cannot act. It is for that reason that our statute makes the express provision that civil offences are also service offences. In that respect it is similar to the service law of the United Kingdom and the United States, as well as every other country of which I know. There is no other way of doing it. We must provide a complete system of law which is ready to go into effect if the civil law authorities do not act.

The reasons for that, I think, are threefold. In the first place, in the event of war, service personnel may be serving overseas where no civil court is set up. That was true of a large part of the areas in which our forces were during the second world war. In the second place, even in peacetime service establishments are set up at places where there are no organized civil courts, and if a man commits an act of assault against a fellow soldier there is no civil court operating there to deal with the case. The case should be dealt with. Then there is a third reason, and that is that the civil authorities themselves, in a considerable number of cases, prefer to have the matter dealt with by the military authorities. Take as an illustration the case I mentioned a moment ago. If within the confines of a camp a soldier commits an act of assault against another soldier, ordinarily the civil authorities prefer that we deal with it. We do deal with it. But if the civil authorities deal with it, then we cannot deal with it and we have no means of indicating to them our preference. The civil authority is always supreme.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): If the minister looks at section 61, he will see it is headed "Limitations with respect to certain offences." It reads:

> A service tribunal shall not try any person charged with an offence of murder, rape or manslaughter, committed in Canada.

May I say also that I agree with everything the minister has said about the law as it is or has been. But here we have those three things specifically excepted from the jurisdiction of service courts in Canada. My only suggestion is, and will continue to be, that other major offences should be added to section 61, such as those I mentioned a moment ago—robbery with violence, and breaking and entering. In these days those are the most serious offences which are committed. Obviously I was referring to peacetime; I was not suggesting that in wartime the army should not have all the jurisdiction in the world.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, there is a matter which I should like to bring to the attention of the committee. In doing so perhaps I shall need something more than the latitude which we are allowed on the first section of a bill. I hope the minister will be patient with me, because I shall take only a minute or two.

I should like to take this occasion to bring to the attention of the committee a matter which I have often thought of since I was in the army and on service myself. That is the fact that in the British army a chaplain is a commissioned officer and a non-combatant. In the French army I understand that chaplains are non-commissioned officers and are combatant. My observation was that being an officer and a non-combatant put a chaplain in our army under the greatest possible disability. First of all, he was separated from the men. He was associating with the officers. A man who wanted to consult with him about the state of his soul had to be paraded before him by a non-commissioned officer; and that always struck me as an extremely odd way to enter upon an intimate conversation.

In the second place, my observation was that only those chaplains who persistently disregarded what was supposed to be the conduct laid down for them were able really to have influence among the troops; by that I mean only those chaplains who persistently went into the danger zone and who, to all intents and purposes, were combatants—that is, at any rate, to the extent of sharing the dangers of combat. But in a great many cases chaplains through no fault of their own, found themselves relegated to rear areas. Perhaps the most serious work they did, apart from conducting funerals—there were no marriages—was to act as secretary of the officers' mess. In general, this disability seemed to me to be a great pity. It seemed to me to deprive nine out of ten chaplains of the great influence which they might have had. I suggest that it might be well for us to consider whether what I understand to be the practice in the French army is not sound and worthy of consideration.

The Chairman: Before proceeding with the bill, may I suggest that we call clauses 1 and 2, and then that I might call the bill by parts instead of calling each clause. We have twelve parts of the bill and 251 clauses. Is it the unanimous wish of the committee that we proceed by parts?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am through, Mr. Chairman; but to suggest that we are going to call a bill of this length by parts and not by sections would immediately allow the critics of the House of Commons to say, and with some justice, that we were completely disregarding our duties here. Let us go through the motions anyway.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 15 inclusive agreed to.

On section 16—Regular forces.

Mr. Wright: This is the clause which regulates the size of our forces in the army, the navy and the air force. I should like to draw to the attention of the committee the fact that in this clause we are departing from a principle which has a long tradition in British history; that is the tradition that the numbers in our armed forces are directly under the control of parliament as distinguished from the governor general and the minister in charge of that department. Formerly, by act of the House of Commons, a limit was placed on the numbers of our armed forces in the army. Under clause 16 this matter is left entirely to the discretion of the governor in council. Formerly the air force and the navy were left to the governor in council, but the number of the men directly in the army was provided for by act of parliament. It is an old tradition in British history, dating back to the time of Cromwell if not before that time, that parliament itself should control the size of the army in the country.

I just wanted to bring to the attention of the committee the fact that here we are making a distinct departure from the customs that have prevailed down through history in Great Britain and in Canada. It is all right to say that we control the size of our armed forces through the vote we pass here each year for the carrying on of our armed forces, but this is an indirect way. In Great Britain today each year there is passed the army act—and I understand there is also passed every year what is called the mutiny act—which directly controls the pay and allowances of the armed forces. Thus parliament itself keeps within its control the size of the army at any time in that country.

I do not want anybody to misunderstand me and say that I am trying to restrict the size of the armed forces we may wish to have in Canada at any given time. Under conditions as they exist in the world today, I think we must be prepared to meet any emergency. Nevertheless, this is a distinct departure and leaves within the control of the governor in council the size of our armed forces. That is a matter which is fairly important in a democratic country, and is a departure from traditional procedure in the British commonwealth of nations.

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member for Melfort is of course completely correct in both his statement of the position as it has been and of the change proposed. I think the justification for it is that, under existing arrangements for defence, the number of men actually involved in the defence of any country at any time is only one of a great number of factors that constitute the control of defence. At the time when the annual army act was brought into effect, in consequence of three uprisings in Britain in which the army had taken a leading part, the number and size of the army really determined what its effect would be on the state. The provision to which the hon. gentleman has referred, under which the size of the army in Britain is controlled by the annual army act, was introduced some two hundred years ago in order to prevent the army, through its size, from being a threat to the state. In Canada there never has been such a possibility, and I am sure there never could be such a possibility. With forces such as we envisage, of the magnitude of 50,000 for all three services, the army could not be a threat. But in modern times what is more important really than the size of the forces is the kind of equipment they have. In order to effect control it would be desirable not only to control the number of men but also the number of aircraft, tanks and so on. I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that that is done most effectively today through the control of the estimates and the appropriation bill. We believe that parliament in that way has, from year to year, complete control over the armed forces. That is certainly our intention.

Mr. Fulton: I am interested in this section. I recall that we had a similar discussion two or three years ago when the minister's predecessor was minister of national defence. My recollection is that at that time a similar change was incorporated in one of the acts, removing the actual control over the limits of numbers of the army from parliament and vesting it with the governor in council. My recollection, although not clear, is that as a result of the discussion some modification was made in the proposed removal of control from parliament. While I quite appreciate the force of the minister's explanation, what I am wondering is whether it would not be possible, without making it inefficient or cumbersome from the point of view of administration, to set the maximum number in the statute itself, and leave it still open to the governor in council to set the ceilings which from time to time may be authorized within that maximum number. Would that make it a matter of great difficulty in administering the forces or in bringing about the necessary changes from time to time?—because if not I would think that consideration should be given to that suggestion.

Mr. Claxton: The only time when any government would feel it desirable to go beyond the limits imposed in consequence of the last appropriation bill enacted would be in the event of an emergency that was anticipated in the immediate future.

If an emergency were anticipated in the immediate future, certainly if I were minister of defence and had the powers available under the War Measures Act, I would not hesitate to increase the forces over the statutory limit, if it were in the national interest and it were legally permissible. Therefore in the only case—

Mr. Fulton: That is true in an emergency, yes.

Mr. Claxton: —in which we would wish for a second, or conceive it possible, to go beyond the limits of parliamentary control as exercised the last time an appropriation bill was passed would be in the event of an emergency. Then, if it were justified, we would have to take action contrary to the limitation.

Mr. Coldwell: Is not the emergency which the minister visualizes an emergency which would require the calling of parliament, in any event? Parliament would then immediately be able to authorize the necessary extension, if an extension were necessary. I think under the Atlantic agreement it is understood that each country will decide what it will do for itself. I take it that will involve, as it did in 1939, the calling of parliament, and parliament authorizing the necessary action in the event of an emergency of the kind which I think the minister visualizes.

Mr. Claxton: If my recollection is correct, no effort was made by parliament in 1939 to fix the number of the forces. I would think that parliament would hesitate to put any limits on the activities of the government at that time.

Mr. Coldwell: This is peacetime; it is a little different.

Mr. Claxton: Yes; I say that in peacetime no government would find it possible to go beyond the limits imposed by the appropriation bill. In the event of an emergency parliament would not wish to impose any restriction.

Mr. Coldwell: Parliament would be called and could deal with the emergency and authorize the maximum—

Mr. Claxton: Yes, but I do not think parliament would even authorize the maximum except to say there shall be no limits.

Mr. Fulton: That is right.

Mr. Coldwell: Parliament would decide it in wartime. It seems to me to be unnecessary in peacetime to have this provision in the act.

Mr. Claxton: My point is this; in peacetime it is not possible because there will not be that money available. There will not be any more money available than parliament agreed to at the time the appropriation bill was passed, you see.

Mr. Coldwell: Yes, I see.

Mr. Claxton: In wartime parliament itself would not want to impose a restriction. Therefore, from the practical point of view we are better without it.

On section 17—Continuation of existing constitution.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I heard something said about reprinting the bill. Has it been reprinted?

Mr. Claxton: It has not been reprinted. It is being rushed through just as fast as it can be.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am not criticizing. It just is not available?

Mr. Claxton: It will be available late tonight or early tomorrow.

On section 21—Commissioned officers.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to say a few words in support of the remarks of the hon. member for Greenwood with respect to the question of chaplains having commissioned rank. What I have to say I say from a certain amount of experience with the armed forces and from observations during the last war, and from conversation with veterans of all three services. I think the suggestion made by the hon. member was a good one. It has always appeared to me that by giving a chaplain commissioned rank you are separating him to a great extent from the rank and file of the regiment, the group, company or ship. I could never imagine one of the apostles having a batman to clean his boots, or somebody springing to attention, and saying to them, "Sir". I have comments made to me on many occasions by troops in various places and in various stations on this question. I realize the necessity of army discipline but I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, it would be good enough if the chaplains had warrant rank instead of commissioned rank. That would not separate the chaplains as officers from the men probably so completely as it does at the present time. I would like the Minister of National Defence to inform the committee what a chaplain receives as an honorary colonel, as an honorary major, and as an honorary captain; what allowance he receives per diem and what services he is entitled to, such as batmen and so on.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, the point raised by the hon. gentleman who has spoken is of course one of considerable interest, which obviously does not come under this bill, but I should be very glad indeed to make some comment on it now.

In the first place, the point of view which hon. gentlemen have expressed is one which has often occurred to many of us. I must say that when I came into this office three years ago and was seeking to unify the forces as much as possible I discussed with representatives of the various churches and services the possibility of having a single chaplain service for all three services, and of having no ranks for all chaplains. I took this up with representatives of the Catholic and of the Protestant churches who are represented by a special committee dealing with the armed forces. I consult with the Vicar Apostolic of the armed forces and the representative of the Protestant churches with regard to all matters regarding the chaplain service and religion in the armed forces. I should tell you that their view unanimously was opposed to the view set forth by the hon. members. They felt that in the military organization rank is of importance. People know where they stand in relation to each other. For the chaplains to exercise their functions properly they must have not only the respect which is attached to their cloth and to their service, but the status which comes from their having that rank. Further, if the directorate of military engineering or of infantry training is to be headed by a full colonel the chaplain service, being equally important, should be headed by an officer of the rank of colonel or equivalent. I can assure hon. members that I voiced the same point of view as they have. I found the representatives of all the churches and of all the services unitedly opposed to me in that contention.

With regard to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Greenwood that it was necessary that men be paraded by an N.C.O. before chaplains, that simply is not so in the armed forces today. The men and officers have access to their chaplains in exactly the same way as they would have access to their spiritual advisers in private life. May I add that I have met almost all the chaplains in our armed forces. We had none in the permanent force before the war; we now have nearly a hundred. They are chosen in consultation with their churches. These are men who have fine records, usually both academic and in the services. They perform an exceedingly valuable and continuing service from day to day not only as spiritual advisers but also acting as they would in their normal pastoral capacity as applied to the service personnel, their dependents and children, at the service camps. I can assure hon. members that this matter has received consideration; and on the basis of all the information received and recommendations made I believe we should leave things as they are.

Sections 22 to 27 inclusive agreed to.

On section 28—Attachment and secondment, within the Canadian Forces.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): What is the difference between a member of the armed forces being attached and being seconded?

Mr. Claxton: The terms are defined in service regulations. When anyone is "attached" to another organization he continues to be paid by his own service and to form part of it. When he is "seconded" he is paid by the other organization and is really totally though temporarily detached from his own service.

Section agreed to.

Sections 29 to 31 inclusive agreed to.

On section 32—Active service, placing forces on active service

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): This section states that the governor in council may place the Canadian forces or any service, component, unit or other element thereof, or any officer or man thereof on active service anywhere in Canada, and also beyond Canada, for the defence thereof at any time when it appears desirable so to do by reason of an emergency.

Does the word "emergency" refer to defence measures, or is the word broad enough to cover, let us say, the recent Winnipeg flood? From a reading of the section I should not think it would be. Does the authority reside within the army itself when forces are sent to meet emergency conditions such as those which developed in connection with the floods? I ask the question only to be sure that we have some authority for doing that splendid thing which was done at Winnipeg.

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member is quite right in his assumption. The meaning of "emergency" is set out in section 2(1), as meaning war, invasion, riot or insurrection, real or apprehended. So that the word would not cover the Winnipeg flood. That would be covered by clause 35 in the bill. The legal justification or authority for using the armed forces in the Winnipeg flood, the Fraser valley flood or similar disasters, is in the power of the government to employ forces on training or exercises, or for any other national purpose.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Then the minister is satisfied that the authority is there? Then, what is the proper definition of the word "component" as it is used in this section? Has it any specific meaning?

Mr. Claxton: By clause 15 the Canadian forces shall mean—

—the naval, army and air forces of His Majesty raised by Canada and consist of three services, namely, the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army and the Royal Canadian Air Force.

Clause 16(1) states:

There shall be a component of each service of the Canadian forces consisting of officers and men who are enrolled for continuing, full-time military service.

Then we have another component consisting of those enrolled for part-time military service, and a third component consisting of those who may be called out on active service. The word "component" is equivalent to the word "part".

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): It refers to the individuals?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Is it customary, where the army performs such splendid work as it did in connection with the Winnipeg flood, to charge up the cost of that work for the time being to the province affected? Is it customary to charge up the pay and allowances of the entire personnel who, in this instance, did such a splendid job in Winnipeg, to the provincial government for the time being, until a later adjustment is made?

Mr. Claxton: That is a matter for arrangement. In respect of the Fraser valley and Winnipeg floods it was arranged with those provinces before service personnel went in that the provinces would cover the cost. In the case of the Fraser valley flood, the cost of that personnel was one of the matters which entered into the negotiation of the contribution to be made by the federal government.

Mr. Ross (Souris): But for the time being it is charged to the province.

Mr. Claxton: We are keeping accounts on that basis.

Sections 33 to 40 inclusive agreed to.

On section 41—Presumption of death; authority to issue certificate.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): May we anticipate any complications in view of the conditions surrounding presumption of death in civil life? In civil life, after an absence of seven years, the onus is on the person seeking the order of presumption of death to show that all steps had been taken to find the missing person. Then the court will issue an order of presumption of death. However, under our law, the wife of an absent person who has married again is still guilty of bigamy.

The last part of the section contains these words:

—in relation to his status and service in the Canadian forces, be deemed to have died on that date.

Has any consideration been given to the civil position where there is a presumption that a person has died on a certain date?

Mr. Claxton: Yes. Of course this has relation only to his status as serving in the Canadian forces. We are endeavouring only to deal with the matter from the point of view of a man's interest, and his dependents' interest, in having some determination as to his death so that, for example, a pension may become payable to his widow. We do not purport to make any declaration or presumption of death that will have any bearing on his estate from the point of view of the civil jurisdiction of the provinces. I should add, however, that the provinces have found it very convenient indeed to have a declaration made by us. In the case of several of the provinces they have said by statute that a declaration or presumption of death made by us shall for provincial purposes be deemed to be a declaration or presumption of death. There is no conflict, and in fact there is a good deal of complementary action.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): It strengthens the position instead of weakening it.

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Section agreed to.

Sections 42 to 53 inclusive agreed to.

On section 54—Powers of the defence research board.

Mr. Wright: In speaking a few moments ago the minister stated—and I think quite rightly—that the type of equipment and armament with which our forces are supplied is more important today than the numbers in the forces. Under section 54(c) the defence research board may, with the approval of the minister:

Enter into contracts in the name of His Majesty for research and investigations with respect only to matters relating to defence.

Under this section the defence research board is given the power to conduct the various types of research necessary for the armed forces today, and that is entirely under the control of the minister. The type of research necessary today to develop radar, atomic and other weapons which may be used in a future war requires several years to complete and the expenditure of vast sums of money. There is very little use in commencing a research project involving new weapons unless you are prepared to carry it on for a number of years until you arrive at a successful conclusion. I think the power to institute this type of research is a pretty wide one to place in the hands of one minister of the government. I have every respect for the present minister, and I am sure if he were instituting a new research project the matter would go to the governor in council before it was started.

I understand there is a regulation providing that where an expenditure for research is to be more than $15,000 the matter must be taken to the governor in council. Nevertheless that is not in the act. It is a regulation which can be changed from time to time without the consent of parliament. It is true that parliament will be notified of any change in the regulation when it is made. It seems to me, however, that the initiation of major research projects should be undertaken by the governor in council rather than the minister. At the present time I cannot conceive of the power being abused, but if one stops to think about it this is a permanent act. It will be on the statute books twenty-five years from now when we have passed on and other people will be concerned with it. With the world constituted as it is today it is possible that such a wide power placed in the hands of a minister might be abused. I would have preferred to see a provision in the act stating definitely that the governor in council should be the body to institute matters of major research rather than the minister on his own initiative.

Mr. Claxton: I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member. I think the situation here is the same as in the case of the national research council. The national research council can inaugurate research without reference to the governor in council but with the authority of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to whom it reports. The national research council is a most successful organization. It has operated very well and has never given cause for anything but congratulation and praise. In setting up the defence research board we followed closely the general set-up of the research council. We have set out here the constitution of the defence research board. In subsection 2 of section 53 the members of the defence research board are named and include the president of the national research council and representatives of universities, industries and other research interests. Our thought was that the defence research board would have powers corresponding roughly to those of the national research council, and that they would use the moneys made available by parliament for defence research in the way they thought desirable, but subject to the approval of the minister.

I can assure the committee that I have of course checked every recommendation they have made, and in major cases have secured the consent of the cabinet defence committee or of cabinet itself. I think the hon. member's proposal would unnecessarily hamstring the activities of the board and load cabinet with a great deal more work than would be justified by any results that would be obtained. I do not think the hon. member appreciates that we probably have in existence now somewhere between 500 and 600 contracts of this kind. Sums of money ranging from $250 to $50,000 a year are paid to virtually every university in Canada and a great number of industries to assist them, or an individual, to do some bit of defence research. To require that each one of those, or even any of them, should go to the cabinet would, I think, burden a body that is already pretty heavily burdened with an amount of detailed work which is greater than in any other country that I know of.

Of course somebody else should say this, but our experience is that it has worked very well indeed. I think you will find that other countries have regarded our set-up for defence research as being more desirable, more workable, and better controlled than theirs. It also has the advantage of being very closely tied in with other government activities and with the services.

Mr. Gillis: I listened to this argument in the special committee, and I have listened to it again now. Under the circumstances existing ten or twelve years ago I think perhaps the hon. member for Melfort would be absolutely right. There is a lot of merit in the argument advanced by the minister. As things are now I think even this provision in the act is going to cause some shifts within the cabinet itself in matters of research. For example, the act provides that in the event of an emergency there can be set up army, air force and naval ministers. If that is so the powers delegated to the minister would then be delegated to the new ministers. I think the minister is in a better position than anyone else to know the requirements of the services. The governor in council is a rather abstract thing in the mind of most of us, and this would presuppose that the government as a whole was responsible. I would rather have somebody in this house that I could see, some minister, whether it was army, navy or air or a joint ministerial post such as the present minister holds. There should be somebody coming into the house who was responsible for the appropriations being asked for, for the contracts being made and so on.

I think for the purposes of administration and clarity in the minds of hon. members the arrangement provided by this section is the best. The governor in council leaves nothing but a blank in my mind. There is nothing you can fasten to. The buck can be passed in nineteen different directions.

Take the matter of defence research. Atomic energy research is definitely defence reesarch, and will be for a long time. It will involve a lot of money. At the present time the Minister of Trade and Commerce is administering that particular research job. If it is continued as a matter of defence research I think that will have to be transferred to the Minister of National Defence to whom it rightly belongs. The same thing applies to the purchasing of stores and all that kind of thing. I notice there is a resolution on the order paper providing for powers to be given to the Minister of Trade and Commerce in this connection.

I am satisfied with the section as it is, and I say that with all due respect to my hon. friend. This indicates the flexibility of the C.C.F., how it is possible for us to have different problems. This may involve some shifts in the cabinet, but that would not be a bad thing.

Mr. Wright: I do not want the impression to go abroad that I think that every little piece of research should go to the governor in council, because that was not my intention. I was referring to major projects or the development of new weapons or new methods of warfare, which I consider are important enough to be dealt with by the governor in council rather than by the minister. I am sorry the hon. member for Cape Breton South thinks so little of our governor in council. I think it is a pretty important body in our democratic procedure and it certainly has more responsibility to parliament than any single minister.

On section 55—Expenses of the defence research board.

Mr. Harkness: This section makes it possible to appoint persons to the board without reference to the civil service commission. Will these employees come under the benefits of superannuation, pension and everything else?

Mr. Claxton: They are appointed in the same way as civil servants, and the salaries are closely related. They have all the benefits of the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

Mr. Harkness: But all appointments can be made without reference to the civil service commission?

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Harkness: That may be necessary as far as scientific and technical employees are concerned, but I cannot see the need for it in connection with cleaners, clerical workers and others.

Mr. Claxton: The provision is the same as that in connection with the national research council, with which we have close working relations. It permits of more flexibility in the carrying on of research work in isolated centres.

Mr. Graydon: What yardstick is used by the cabinet to decide whether appointments will be taken away from the civil service commission?

Mr. Claxton: The national research council and the defence research board are intended to co-operate closely with universities and industry and have close working relationships with them. As a matter of fact, they have salary scales that are worked out in conjunction with the universities and industry so as to arrive at a fair figure. I do not think there is much room for argument in the case of scientific and technical personnel, but in the case of others it has frequently been found that a stenographer may have some scientific training—I know of many in the service—and be more valuable because she is familiar with scientific terms or may be able to do a bit of research work herself. Such a girl does not fit exactly into the categories set up by the civil service commission. We think this works much better than it would if these people came under the civil service commission.

On section 58—No limitation.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Is there anything in the act or the regulations to indicate where within Canada an offence shall be tried?

> Every person alleged to have committed a service offence may be charged, dealt with and tried under the code of service discipline, either in Canada or out of Canada.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): If an offence were committed in Alberta the offender could be tried in Ottawa?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Claxton: Yes, sir, that is in the existing naval service act, the army, and navy and air force acts.

On section 88—Drunkenness.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I should like to ask the minister if he is satisfied with this section which refers to drunkenness. The same language is used with respect to other offences. It says:

> Drunkenness, whether on duty or not on duty, is an offence and every person convicted thereof is liable to imprisonment for less than two years or to less punishment . . .

I am wondering about the use of the second word "less" in that line. A man could be convicted and sentenced to two years less one day. He could be sentenced to one day's imprisonment or one hour. Now, what is less than that? The point I am trying to make is this, and once more it is merely to ensure that these things shall be clear. Let us say a man receives one hour's imprisonment, and another man, for the same offence, might have his pay and allowances stopped for a month. Now, would anyone say that the second man's punishment, because he was not imprisoned, was less than the first man's? I merely thought, sir, that it might need some clarification. I know there are many punishments which may be meted out other than imprisonment, and I was wondering who would decide on what punishment would be less than two years or something of that sort.

Mr. Claxton: What is less than each superior punishment is set out in section 121, subsections 1 and 2. In subsection 1 there is an order of punishment running from paragraph (a), death, to paragraph (n), minor punishments. Each one of those, in order, is less than all those prior to it in the enumeration.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The word "less" is defined there.

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Balcer: If this is the proper time, I should like to ask the minister whether his department is contemplating a change in the rum rationing to the navy, such as substituting beer for rum? Does the minister intend to apply rum rationing to the three services in a spirit of unification?

Mr. Claxton: This is a very complicated matter, and I do not want to say too much about it because I might get into some trouble. I will say that no immediate change is contemplated in the navy rum rationing. A man may take money, of course, in lieu of the rum ration.

Mr. Balcer: Has there been any change in substituting beer for rum in the navy?

Mr. Claxton: No.

On section 166—Trial of issue of insanity.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): This section reads as follows:

> Where at any time after a trial by court martial commences and before the finding of the court martial is made, it appears that there is sufficient reason to doubt whether the accused person is then, on account of insanity, capable of conducting his defence, an issue shall be tried and decided by that court martial as to whether the accused person is or is not then, on account of insanity, unfit to stand or continue his trial.

The section states that whenever at any time, after a trial commences this appears, then the issue shall be tried. Is that just the usual criminal procedure, making a distinction between insanity at the time of the trial, which will affect the continuation of the trial, and insanity at the time the offence is committed? I gather that somewhere, perhaps subsequently, that other branch of it is taken care of.

Mr. Claxton: Yes, the hon. member's assumption is quite right. This section 166, subsection 1, is practically identical with section 967 of the Criminal Code, and is intended to perform the same function. Section 167 deals with a case where the accused was insane when the offence was committed.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): As to the question of whether or not he is sane enough to stand his trial at the moment, are there any special provisions for the examination of witnesses? In other words, all military units have medical officers or M.O.'s, as I think they are called. Is there anything in the act with respect to the evidence necessary to come to that conclusion of insanity at the time of trial?

Mr. Claxton: The provision is exactly the same as in the Criminal Code.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): It is just the same?

Mr. Claxton: Yes. It has to be tried as an issue. The usual practice of course is to have specialists in that kind of medicine give evidence in addition to the ordinary medical officers.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): That, of course, is so. But I was asking if there is any special provision, for this reason. With regard to a man on an insanity plea—that would be at the time the offence was committed—our courts have said that there is no occasion whatever, and I mean that it is not a "must", to call expert or medical evidence with respect to the question. The English judges have gone so far as to say that if a man is crazy, to use their expression, no one knows it as well as his friends and neighbours, and that they rely greatly on conduct as observed by his friends and neighbours. What I have in mind is this. The other day we were discussing something in the house at the suggestion of the hon. member for Lanark. We put into the act—and I have just forgotten the name of the act which was under discussion—a provision that certain things might happen on satisfactory evidence of insanity being given. Perhaps the minister may remember the incident. It took place only a few days ago in the house here. My memory is so bad that I cannot remember just what it was. In any event, the authorities have not seen fit to specify in any way the kind of evidence upon which you might act?

Mr. Claxton: No.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): They have left it the same?

Mr. Claxton: Any evidence that may be relevant.

On section 192—Substitution of new punishment where illegal punishment set aside.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I just blew my nose, Mr. Chairman, and lost twelve sections. Is this the new appeal board that has been created?

Mr. Claxton: Yes, sir.

Bill reported.

Mr. Claxton moved the third reading of the bill.

He said: I should like to express to hon. members what I think everyone must feel, and that is appreciation of their co-operation. I should also like to acknowledge the fair and appreciative remarks made by hon. members with regard to the officers of the services, and I am sure they will include the officers of the Department of Justice also who, as I think all hon. members will agree, have done a really great work in preparing this monumental piece of legislation. I shall be glad indeed to convey to these officers the messages of appreciation that hon. members have voiced, and to add my own on this occasion as on others. In addition, I should once more like to thank the members of the committee, and particularly the chairman, for the excellent job they did in preparing the bill for our consideration which, I think, was probably record-breaking in view of the fact that we have been one hour and five minutes on the 251 sections.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Indian Act

INDIAN ACT

CONSOLIDATION AND CLARIFICATION—BAND FUNDS AND EXPENDITURES, ETC.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend, consolidate and clarify the Indian Act, and to provide, inter alia, for band funds and expenditures therefrom, and for other appropriations in case of deficiency or lack of band funds.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Low: Is the minister not going to make a statement?

Mr. Harris: The only statement that I think I should make at this stage is to say that I think all parties in the house agree that it is expedient to introduce a bill to amend, consolidate and clarify the Indian Act.

Mr. Harkness: There is a great desire on the part of the Indians and many other people interested in them to have this act come out so that people can take a look at it, and so forth. In view of that fact, I should not like to delay the appearance of the act by making any remarks on the matter this afternoon, except to say that I am extremely glad that after this long period of time the act is finally going to come out and get consideration here.

Mr. Blackmore: I have no desire to delay the passage of the resolution but I hope that the bill, when it comes down, will make some provision for two or three things which I consider to be paramount essentials in any attempt to deal with the Indian situation as it exists in Canada today.

In the first place there should be an Indian claims commission. If the bill does not provide for such a claims commission then it will be defective to that extent. In various parts of Canada Indians have experienced some of the grossest injustices by reason of the fact that conditions since the signing of their treaty have changed so materially that they do not at all resemble what they were like in former days. May I illustrate. Suppose an Indian tribe had free access to fishing on a great river which teemed with fish at the time they signed their treaty. At that time it was recognized that they would have free access to the fish in that river and no particular stipulation was made concerning their having perpetual access to the fish; but meanwhile the fishing at the mouth of that river has been commercialized, as it has within the Fraser river. The result is the Indians find that when they go to the river to get their annual supply of fish, the fish do not appear in the river. Clearly something has happened as a result of the white man's management of that river which has changed the conditions of life for the Indians beyond all possible estimation.

If something has not been done by His Majesty's government to recompense the Indians for the losses which they have sustained by reason of this commercializing of the fishing in that river then the Indians are suffering from a handicap which is very painful indeed, and can be ruinous. They have a claim against the government which ought to be investigated, and in consideration of which they should be compensated.

Conditions similar to that prevail in respect of, I would imagine, 60 per cent of the tribes throughout this country. In the reservation which I myself have the honour to represent, for example, when they signed their treaty in 1877—I believe it was treaty 7—it did not seem possible within the time that one could imagine that there ever would be a period when the Indians would not have limitless grazing land for their ponies and for their cattle. There were no fences in any direction; there was no settlement in any direction in the province of Alberta in 1877 where the Blood reservation now is.

The result was the Indians had limitless pasture. They could get all the wood they needed for their fires. There is not a plentiful supply of wood in that area, but there was enough for the Indians; where they could not get this wood from stream beds, rivers and creeks, they could go to the mountains. Now, what has happened? Mountain reserves have been made parts of forest reserves and parks, and the Indians have been fenced in in reserves so that they cannot get wood at all to supply their needs. A set of conditions has been built up as a result of that alone which has inflicted upon these Indians losses of tremendous extent. If we allow them to go on suffering from these disadvantages, without making any compensation or any investigation into the nature of their disabilities, we surely are not making for success in advancing our Indians.

Therefore I suggest there must be a claims commission similar to the one set up in the United States. If that claims commission is not provided for in the bill coming down, or in some bill soon to come down, I suggest to the minister in all earnestness, as one sincere Canadian to another, that he must look into that matter without any further delay.

There is another matter which I think must be talked about, namely, the matter of education. I am sure the minister has had much representation brought to his attention about Indian education. If the bill provides—

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I do not want to interrupt the hon. member, but the estimates of my department on Indian affairs have not yet been discussed. I wonder whether the hon. member would discuss education when they come up either later this week, or early next week. I realize that he wants to make a point that we should provide for the education of Indians, but I think that when he sees the bill he will find that it does that.

Mr. Blackmore: Very well, but it would not do any harm to outline it in a few minutes. I do not propose to talk very long, but I do wish to say just a word or two about the situation in respect of the Indians. I believe in preparing the minister for what I may or may not say in discussing the estimates, but it will do no harm to mention this question of education. We know very well that in a number of ways education on the Indian reservations has been taken care of largely by religious organizations. I have no complaint against religious organizations as such, but there are Indians who do not desire to have their children attend religious institutions in order to obtain education. On the reserve which I have the honour to represent there are two splendid schools, one Roman Catholic and the other Anglican. I believe they have been managed with the utmost proficiency in so far as the people controlling them have access to facilities; but there are many Indians on that reservation who do not desire that their children shall be under the religious influence of either of those organizations. And as Canadian citizens they surely have the right to have their children educated in a non-sectarian or secular school. Up to the present time there is no provision by which they can obtain that. That is a serious matter.

I wish to say only a word or two about it If we are going to prepare the Indians to be the citizens of tomorrow in Canada, along with our own boys and girls, we simply must be positively sure that we are making full provision for the adequate education of the Indian boys and girls. That is the second point.

This is the third point, and I hope it is in the bill. We must make provision without further delay for adequate nutrition among the Indians on the reservations. This more properly comes under the direction of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I am sure that he is giving it careful attention, but at the same time if the two fine young ministers co-operate and have the full support of the house and of the government on this program they will not have any more than just barely enough support to enable them to discharge the responsibilities they assumed when they undertook to see that the Indians of Canada shall be properly nourished. If the Indians are not properly nourished then they develop all sorts of deficiencies. Men now are nutrition conscious. We all know how important it is that we should be well nourished. What chance has the ordinary Indian to be well nourished when it is almost impossible for him to obtain enough food in Canada to keep body and soul together? The result of all this is that a very carefully designed provision must be made as to nutrition if the Indians of tomorrow are to be able to discharge their responsibilities as citizens.

Such measures as old age pensions, and all that sort of thing, should be provided the Indians. Some sort of provision must be made for adequate nutrition.

I have just one more thing to say. I trust that this bill is making provision for what might be called the rehabilitation and establishment of the Indians economically. We are having a hard enough time in our generation, we, the ordinary ones of us. We find it hard enough to fit into the life around us and to make a living; yet we have been admirably prepared as compared with the preparation given to the Indian. We are admirably equipped in both body and mind, as compared with the Indian who has been undernourished all his life. What chance has an Indian when we find it difficult to compete? What chance has he to compete and establish himself so that he can make adequate provision for his family?

I do not propose to go into the details of this matter, but we must take it into consideration and we must have results right away so that the Indians can establish themselves economically, so that they can use their reserves to the best advantage, and take part in the economic life of the community surrounding their reserves.

I trust that these provisions may be made in the act. I shall watch with great care to see whether they are or not; and if they are not, then the minister must naturally expect to give an accounting to me when he brings his estimates before us.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not propose to discuss the resolution for the simple reason that it gives no indication as to the nature of the bill to be introduced to amend the Indian Act. However I should like to make two suggestions to the minister.

Certainly nothing more important than these amendments to the Indian Act could have been introduced to the House of Commons, affecting as they do the rights, opportunities and privileges of the Indian population in our country. The minister will know, as I do, having on a number of occasions acted as counsel for the Indians—believing that one should assist them at all times, and doing it in a spirit of assistance and for no other consideration—that the Indians as a whole are suspicious of any legislation that will be introduced without their receiving at least an opportunity to examine, consider and recommend.

My suggestions to the minister are made with a view to removing many of the objections now being voiced in the Indian reserves across the country. These are objections in the nature of fear that full consideration of their hopes and aspirations will not be reflected in the legislation to be introduced. They have the fear that in too many cases the recommendations and suggestions will be the result of consideration by Indian agents and the officials rather than by the body of Indians as a whole.

After all, the Indian Act has been on the statute books for about seventy years, and it does require revamping, changing, and the removal of obsolete sections and sections which have no regard for present-day world conditions, sections which do not recognize what the Indian says is the right of all people today who during the years have been wards of the government. They say they have the right to a degree of self-determination which through the years they have been denied.

In that spirit I place these two suggestions before the minister, and I do so after having met with many of the Indian chieftains in western Canada, and also with the outstanding leaders of the Indians on the prairies. My first suggestion is that as soon as this resolution is passed by the House of Commons the bill should be printed, and that it should be distributed not only to Indian agents and Indian officials but also to the Indian chieftains and head men in the various reserves across the country. If the minister goes no further than to distribute copies to the officials, then in my submission he will not be removing one strong ground for objection which has found its way into the minds of many of the young Indians who today are asking for full consideration of their rights, and an opportunity to achieve their ambition and aspirations.

When I say that, I mean that all they need is opportunity. I could point to one family that appeared as delegates at a meeting of the Saskatchewan Indians held at Saskatoon some weeks go. One of these Indians named Eli Wuttunee—and I give his name because I think it should be given—pointed out what happened in his own family when a brother of his decided that in order to give his sons and daughters an opportunity for education, improvement and advancement he must voluntarily withdraw from the reservation. This shows what can be done if opportunity for education is given to our Indian population. In that family William Wuttunee is today a law student at McGill university; one of his sisters studied nursing until ill health prevented her continuing; another sister is in Prince Albert studying to become a psychiatric nurse.

All they ask is to be given the opportunity which too often is denied on the reservation. Therefore I ask the minister to send this bill out—broadcast it; print a few extra copies, and send them out to representative Indians, in addition to those copies sent through the regular channels of Indian Act administration.

My second suggestion is one I had made previously and which I reiterate. In the building and restoration of a new concept of dealing with the Indians, give them an opportunity to be builders. Give the leaders among the various tribes, the chieftains or whoever may be chosen in a democratic way among the tribes, an opportunity to come to Ottawa to meet with the minister and to discuss the bill. He may answer that the expense of bringing fifteen or twenty Indians to Ottawa would be heavy, and that the same result would be achieved if they were permitted to meet with Indian agents and officials. My answer is that the same results would not be achieved, because the presence of the Indian agent or official in its very essence has a coercive influence upon the Indians under his control and jurisdiction.

Since I first made the suggestion in the house I have seen a number of these Indian chiefs, and they have repeated their desire, their wish and their hope that the minister will give them an opportunity to deal directly with him, so that anything they may advance by way of amendments to the act and criticism of some of the officials will not have any detrimental effect so far as they are concerned. In other words, what they ask for is an opportunity to meet the minister, who represents to them what they so frequently refer to as the benevolence of the queen. They refer to Queen Victoria as though she were living today. Two of these Indian chiefs, both grandsons of the chieftains who signed the treaties in 1830 and sons of the chieftains who signed the treaty in 1873 that ceded the western plains to the British crown and to Canada, have asked that they be given the opportunity they used to have to come to the foot of the throne and discuss their complaints with the minister himself. After all, we have a responsibility to these humble people, and if he will do that he will receive from them a wealth of suggestions and that wisdom, evidenced by them when they discuss their affairs, which will go far to remove many of the causes of complaint that today activate and arouse the younger members of the various reservations.

Mr. Coldwell: I am sorry that the standing committee on agriculture is sitting this afternoon and that many hon. members who have taken an interest in this particular problem are otherwise engaged. I am thinking particularly of the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) who during the last parliament was most interested and active in endeavouring to improve the conditions of the Indians and to see written into our statute books an act which would assist us in helping the Indians to find their proper place in Canadian life. When we review the history of our country we realize how originally Indian lands have been taken away from them from time to time until today there are really insufficient means on some reservations to provide a decent living for many Indian tribes. Consequently we should realize that we owe a debt to them which we have so far failed to honour, a debt which should impel us to write a new Indian Act that will give the Indians an opportunity of becoming a part of our national life in every sense of the word.

The hon. member for Lake Centre made a reasonable plea for the circulation of the new Indian Act to the heads of the various tribes. He also made a plea that the minister should receive representations regarding the provisions of the act from leading Indians in the country. I have a great deal of sympathy with that suggestion, but at the same time I recollect that when the Indian affairs committee sat opportunities were provided for leading Indians to appear before it, and it was very difficult to get a consensus from those who took advantage of the opportunity. If this suggestion is put into effect I hope it will meet with better results than the committee was able to achieve when they invited representative Indians to appear before them during the last parliament.

I cannot see why Indian youth should not receive exactly the same opportunities for education and advancement as are available to our own children. As a matter of fact, when we look at the aborigines of New Zealand—and we call the original inhabitants of any country aborigines—and compare the Indian with the Maori we must feel that there is something wrong with the manner in which we have handled the Indian problem in Canada. As the hon. member for Lake Centre pointed out a few moments ago, given the opportunity Indian youth will achieve the same standards of education as Anglo-Saxon children acquire. They have not had that opportunity. I have visited reserves at various times, and engaged as I was in education some years ago I visited some of the schools on the reservations. When I looked over the work of the children from six to ten years of age I found that it compared quite favourably with that of children of the same age and in the same grades in the ordinary rural schools of Canada. Beyond that age, no attempt was made to get the children to remain continuously in school when the berry picking season was on, or the fishing season on the Pacific coast, and bit by bit they seemed to slip behind and later returned to a primitive mode of life.

I am of the opinion that when the new act is introduced it should be carefully scrutinized by the house from the point of view of the means we are going to provide for the better education of the Indian. I think that is the fundamental consideration we should have in mind. I do not believe that the educational system or systems that have been in effect on Indian reserves have been either suitable to modern needs or efficient. I should like to see Indian schools placed on the same level of educational requirement as the ordinary common schools in the provinces where Indian reserves exist. They should be placed under the same system of inspection with the same high qualifications for teachers engaged in educational work. I think that is fundamental. I know that there are those who emphasize the sectarian or non-sectarian aspect of the problem, but I do not wish to do that. I think a plan can be worked out which will be satisfactory to those who have been and are truly interested in the welfare and education of the Indian population, and who desire to see some better form of educational facilities provided than has been the case in the past. I say that a fundamental requirement is the reorganization and improvement of educational facilities for Indian children.

Given opportunities comparable to those provided for Anglo-Saxon or white citizens, whichever term you care to use, you will find that Indian youth will acquire just as good an educational standing as their white brethren. I am most anxious that this aspect of the proposals to be introduced by the minister shall receive the most careful and sympathetic consideration of the house.

I want to compliment the Minister of National Health and Welfare upon the fact that much has been done in the last few years to improve the health facilities on the Indian reserves and among the Indian population in our Northwest Territories and other places. But a great deal remains to be done. Living on the outskirts of civilization as they do, with uncertain means of life at their disposal, makes it necessary that we take steps to improve their economic condition and to see that adequate supplies are available. After all, the basis of good health and good physical condition is an adequate and proper food supply.

Hospitals are being provided and examinations for tuberculosis have been undertaken. I hope that the scourge of tuberculosis among Indian tribes will soon be stamped out. I have not seen the more recent statistics, but I was shocked at the statistics published a few years ago with regard to tuberculosis among the Indians and the northern residents of Canada. I welcome this particular piece of legislation and I hope that when the bill is before us we shall find in it all that we hope for.

I want to say something that I might not be able to say on the estimates because with so many committees sitting one cannot always be here when the proper item comes up. In my own province of Saskatchewan, and I imagine this is true of other provinces, considerable difficulty is encountered in connection with roads through the Indian reserves. I know that the government of Saskatchewan does not expect the federal authorities to do anything about provincial highways that happen to pass through Indian reserves, but we must remember that many cross-country roads are municipal roads. While it is true to say that the road allowance is part of the Indian property and has been turned over to the municipality or the province for the purposes of communication, it is equally true to say that the maintenance of these roads constitutes a considerable drain on some of the municipalities.

When the minister is considering his estimates—that is when this matter should really be considered—I ask him to consider the payment to the municipalities of something toward at least the maintenance of these roads. In some parts of Saskatchewan the Indian population use the roads for marketing purposes and I am glad to say that some of them have automobiles. Consequently communication across the reserve is as vital to the Indians as it is to the municipalities and the people of the province who live off the reserve.

I do not want to delay the passage of this resolution but I did want to let the minister know that anything he can do to improve the condition of the Indian population, to improve educational facilities, on the reserves particularly, to assist also their economic circumstances and, in co-operation with the Minister of National Health and Welfare, to improve health facilities and general conditions in regard to health of the Indian population will receive the unqualified support, not only of myself and my colleagues but of the political movement which we represent in this house.

Mr. Applewhaite: Mr. Chairman, it is hardly necessary to say that I welcome this resolution. There are many things in connection with the Indians I should like to discuss and there are many subjects on which the Indians would like to make representations to this government and to this parliament, and I suggest that the most efficient way to handle this matter would be to have the bill introduced and then we and the Indians could use it as a form of agenda or guide as to what should be done. If the Indians have an opportunity to consider this bill I am sure they will want to make representations, both on the omissions and on what is contained therein. I not only welcome the speedy introduction of the bill but I should like to see it widely distributed so that the Indians may know what it contains. If that were done both this house and the Indians would be saved the necessity of skipping around and discussing all facets of the Indian question instead of only those which in our opinion need consideration.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 267, respecting Indians.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

Soldier Settlement and Veterans Land Act—

547. To provide for the cost of administration of Veterans Land Act; soldier settlement and British family settlement, $4,563,514.

Mr. Hansell: The minister will recall that I asked some questions last night with regard to the veteran who had not served overseas, who was not pensionable or who had not served for 365 days and was thus unable to come under the provisions of the statute in order to obtain a loan. I have to be satisfied with his answer and I am not going to be over-critical, but I should like to ask him two additional questions. The first is: has he any idea how many veterans have applied and have been refused by reason of the fact that they did not come under this particular section of the act? My second question is perhaps predicated on the probable answer to the first one. If there are not very many veterans who have been refused, would it not be possible to bring in an amendment to the act so that the veterans might be able to receive the benefit of these loans?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, we have no record, exact or otherwise, as to the number of applications that have been made. If we had the number, I do not think it would answer my friend's question, because a great deal of publicity was given to the fact that a veteran had to have one year's service in order to qualify. Consequently, quite a number who would have liked to apply did not apply because they knew that. From the records a general estimate could probably be obtained as to the number of service people who had served less than a year. Those are the ones who are not permitted to come under this provision. I believe the number might be larger than the hon. member expects, but I shall try to get it for him.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, the main concern of a general nature which I have in connection with the Veterans Land Act is still a concern over the limitation in the size of the small holding. It is still too large for many veterans to take advantage of the act. I refer specifically to the limitation which says that a small holding must be a minimum of three acres unless the value of the land is more than $500, in which case the small holding may be 2.1 acres, I believe, if recommended by the administration. I realize that the purpose of the small holding scheme was not to allow the veteran to have a country home. I know that is the reason for the limitation as to the size of the holding. It is designed to assure that a veteran who is settling on a small holding will genuinely be engaged in at least part-time farming.

I know that the administration makes every effort, where a veteran genuinely desires to settle on a small holding, to interpret the regulations in such a way as to assist him. I know the mere fact that there is a statute, and regulations made under it, sometimes precludes the department from helping deserving cases. The fact is well known, Mr. Chairman, that land values, particularly in and around settled municipalities, are not going down but are continuing to rise. The result is that in many cases the cost of three acres, or even 2.1 acres, of land is much in excess of the maximum assistance available under the act, that is $6,000. This means that the veteran has to put up the money over and above this $6,000.

Take the type of small holding around a municipality where a veteran would be expected perhaps to engage in part-time orchard operations or a berry farm, something of that nature: three acres is actually too much for a veteran who has another job, such as working on the railway. Three acres is too much for him to handle on a part-time basis. On the other hand, three acres is too little for a veteran to make a living from it on a full-time basis. It seems to me the limitation on the size of the holding is, in effect, defeating the initial purpose of the act when it was introduced, which was not to ensure that veterans got country homes but that they got places upon which they could carry on part-time farming. The size of the holding he must have now makes it impossible for him, in many cases, to do that. I am not going to make reference to a specific request which I forwarded to the minister involving some veterans working for the Canadian National near Kamloops, because that is being considered at the moment. I bring forward this general consideration, because I think it is important that the act be reviewed to see whether that limitation as to size cannot be eliminated.

While I am not one who generally approves of leaving things to the discretion of the minister, I think this is a case where, if the limitation is insisted upon, the only proper solution is to leave it entirely to the discretion of the minister. The act should merely provide that, in approving a scheme for settlement or an individual application for settlement, it must be borne in mind that approval will only be given if it is for bona fide small holding operations. By removing that figure of so many acres from the regulations, then genuine cases, which at the present time cannot be helped, could be helped.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the hon. member has expressed very well an opinion which is held on all sides of this house. This subject has been fully discussed in my department. The hon. member makes some important points. I would, however, like to mention that the idea behind the small holding of two to three acres is finding expression this last year more fully than it did at the beginning. Early after demobilization there was an urgent need for a roof over the veteran's head. All hon. members will recall that before my time, 1946, there was a period when the subdivision came into being for that specific purpose, and to utilize half-acre patches of land. The subdivisions were built, and after a year that practice was discontinued and we went back to the original intention.

This year the applications for small holdings are greater than they were immediately after demobilization. It appears as though the interest is going to continue. I do not give that as an answer to the suggestion made by my hon. friend, but I do say that the intention behind that section of the act is being carried out. To put it plainly, that intention was to bonus the veteran to get out of the big cities, and to establish outside the large cities a new, pleasant way of life. After the war, when wages were high, that extra patch of land was looked upon as waste. I can tell my hon. friend that in the last year, when there have been sections of approaching unemployment down in my part of the country and in other parts of the country, the lad who had that patch of land was beginning to look upon it with a good deal more pleasure and satisfaction than he did before. If we do run into a recession in sections of Canada, I believe these men will be glad they have this land. That is that. I am going to add to that the statement that my colleague the Minister of Resources and Development under the bill which passed last year, in association with the provinces, is getting his plans under way. There comes up under that the question of what degree of veterans preference there will be in it. His officials and my officials, and he and I, have had a good deal of discussion on this matter. The director, supervisors and field men of V.L.A. have been carrying out winter courses for great numbers of veterans in the building of houses and acting as their own contractors. We have discussed whether we might not capitalize on that work as an auxiliary both to his scheme and to our own.

As is known we hold—it is in the estimates here and we have to pay taxes on it—patches of land, near centres of population across Canada, areas which have not been developed. It is just lying there as an asset of the crown. Some of these the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation could use and arrangements have been so made. Some of them have been taken into expanding cities but we have quite a number of others. I do not want to make this announcement yet, but I want to state that we are seeing if we cannot find out whether V.L.A. could assist, guide and direct the veteran in the construction—rolling his own, as the lads call it—buying a patch of that ground of an appropriate size but not getting the conditional grant at the end of ten years, and then under an arrangement with the National Housing Act administration getting his loan. If he can do that on these pieces of property that we own, it might lend itself to help to solve the problem which I know is in my hon. friend's mind as it is in mine. In a small town such as Campbellton, New Brunswick, which will never enter into an arrangement with the province of New Brunswick and the Dominion of Canada under the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation plan, an individual veteran or two or three veterans might be able to utilize the value under the Veterans Land Act and also the value under the National Housing Act. That might also be a means of assisting to solve the problem of what degree of veteran preference could come under the act of the Minister of Resources and Development.

Mr. Fulton: I appreciate the fact that the minister, in what he has just told us, is revealing something which is under consideration and which is not final. I will therefore not press him to go further into details, except to ask whether that arrangement which he indicated or hinted at would not be subject to the limitation as to the size of the land to which the present small holding scheme is subject. Could a veteran take a piece of land of any size that he himself wished?

Mr. Gregg: That is what we are attempting to work out.

Mr. Fulton: I am glad to have that information. I hope that the arrangements which the minister has in mind will come to fruition because, if I may say so, it sounds to me like a good scheme and the answer to a great many problems.

I just want to say this in addition. I fully agree with the minister that the land under the small holdings scheme is valuable now and will be increasingly valuable as conditions develop; we hope they will never become serious but nevertheless they may become more serious than they are now. My suggestion was not that the small holdings scheme should not be directed toward encouraging veterans to settle on and to work a small plot of land. My thought was rather that of the types of land which so many of these schemes must use, types suitable mainly for fruit farming, the growing of small fruits, berries and so on, three acres is actually too much for a man to handle on a part-time basis.

If he were unemployed—and we hope he never will be—then admittedly it would not be too much. But as long as he is employed or if he is, on the other hand, in the other category that this scheme was designed to help, namely a veteran in receipt of a disability pension, again three acres is probably too much for him to handle. That is why I say: Do not do away with the idea of a small holding for a genuine part-time farming operation. Merely give your directors and regional supervisors more discretion to recommend that in this case, because it is an orchard operation, because it is a berry farm or because the price of the land is extremely high, we think that this veteran should be allowed to settle on perhaps one and a half acres or two acres or 1·9 acres. That was my only suggestion.

May I now ask some specific questions with regard to the expenditure. Can the minister tell us what was actually expended last year on travelling expenses, on purchase and replacements of motor vehicles and on legal fees?

Mr. Gregg: Travelling expenses, $574,340; legal fees, $124,116. What was the third one?

Mr. Fulton: Purchases and replacements of motor vehicles.

Mr. Gregg: $29,689.

Mr. Fulton: Why are the legal fees continuing at such a high level? I know that when a veteran purchases privately under his own arrangements with the administration he is obliged to pay the legal fees for perfecting his title. I can appreciate the fact that, when the scheme was first being worked out and the department was buying tracts of land to be open to development, there would probably be extensive legal fees in connection with the searching and the conveyancing. But by this time I would think that those fees would be rather tapering off and that from now on it would be more a matter of the individual deal. That being the case, I am not quite able to understand why these extremely high legal fees are continuing to be necessary.

Mr. Gregg: There has to be payment to the lawyers for the searching of titles. We are fairly well at their mercy. While it is true that some of these properties were purchased some years ago, nevertheless, when the new veteran takes over, the title has to be searched in each individual case and registered.

Mr. Fulton: Does the minister not think that possibly he is overestimating a little bit? I notice that in 1948-49 the estimate for legal fees was $250,000 and the actual expenditure was $129,000, or just over half. I notice also that in 1948-49 the estimate for motor vehicle purchases and replacements was $125,000 and the expenditure was $19,778. Last year the estimate under that heading was $35,000 and the expenditure was $29,000. Does the minister not think that we could perhaps reduce the estimate a little bit under these headings?

Mr. Gregg: With regard to the legal fees, in 1949-50 the estimate was $125,000. Our estimate for this present year is $100,000. What I said with regard to the small holdings also holds good with regard to full-time farming and commercial fishing. The demand for properties there is on the up and up. It is not declining as are university training and vocational training. Of course that applies also to the necessity for supervision and transportation, travelling, and motor cars.

Mr. Cardiff: I have a few questions in regard to small holdings. I understood there was some change since the act came into force as to the amount of land that a man had to have to come under the regulation. Is it still three acres, or can he come under the act with a lesser amount?

Mr. Gregg: I wonder whether my hon. friend was in when the hon. member for Kamloops and I discussed this at length a little while ago. It is now exactly as it has been since 1946, namely, two or three acres, unless the man is a pensioner, depending upon the value of the land in the vicinity; but we are exploring plans, which my hon. friend will see in Hansard, which we discussed about a half hour ago.

Item agreed to.

548. To provide for the upkeep of property, Veterans Land Act, including engineering and other investigational planning expenses that do not add tangible value to real property; taxes, insurance and maintenance of public utilities, $132,500.

Mr. Blackmore: Before the item carries I want to say to the minister that I did not expect he would make as much progress last evening with his estimates as he did. I wanted to have something more to say about the McCann commission on one of these items. It became necessary for me to be out of the house. Since these items have passed I shall have to defer to a later time my remarks concerning the McCann commission.

Item agreed to.

551. To provide for the payment of grants to Indian veterans settled on Indian reserve lands under section 35A of the Veterans Land Act, 1942 (as amended by order in council P.C. 2122, dated 13th April, 1945), $500,000.

Mr. Harkness: Can the minister tell us what success has been secured up to date in the settlement of Indians on their own reserves under the Veterans Land Act? I see that there was a vote of $600,000 for this purpose last year. Was that expended, or to what extent was it expended? How much was put out in the form of grants last year for this purpose?

Mr. Gregg: Last year $479,838 was spent.

Mr. Harkness: Can the minister tell us how many Indians have been settled up to date under the Veterans Land Act under this provision?

Mr. Gregg: The number to date is just a bit over a thousand, about 1,012.

Mr. Harkness: Up to date have any of these people failed on their holdings, whether they be small holdings or more or less full-scale farming, or have they been coming along fairly successfully?

Mr. Gregg: That comes under the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I shall be glad to answer that question on my estimates.

Item agreed to.

553. To authorize and provide for necessary remedial work, to be approved by the governor in council, on properties sold under the Veterans Land Act, under individual firm price contracts, to correct defects for which neither the veteran nor the contractor can be held financially responsible, $30,000.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): I should like to ask the minister a question about items 553 and 554, which more or less come together. Does item 554 refer to the development at Windsor? If so, will the minister tell the committee how much has been paid to date in repairing these properties and what legal action, if any, his department took to recover any part of the money from the contractor?

Mr. Gregg: No, Mr. Chairman, neither of these estimates has moneys earmarked for the subdivision at Windsor. I believe that that is history. We have attempted and we did carry out in the last two years a good deal of remedial work in that subdivision. I have not before me just now the amount of money involved, but I do know that the results of the work were reasonably successful and that the subdivision is now going forward quite satisfactorily. These items before us—for instance, item 553—are for a few remaining places about which we have to do something. They are to repair the roofs on 14 Faircraft houses, $2,500; to demolish and replace the foundation walls, footings and basement floors in 6 houses in Vernon, British Columbia, $12,000; to provide drainage ditch at Baie d' Urfe, province of Quebec, $2,000; to provide for contingencies. On the basis of past and the current year's experience, the director will be unable to escape accepting certain liabilities to remedy defects where the contractor cannot be held legally responsible or where he will not be financially capable of making repairs, $13,500.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): With regard to the item of $104,000, and dealing strictly with the situation at Windsor, was there any legal claim against the contractor for the several hundred thousand dollars that the department had to expend to repair these houses?

Mr. Gregg: No; a settlement was arrived at. It was felt that there was no legal claim that could be carried through, and it was settled.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): How much longer does the minister think he will be spending over $100,000 a year to repair and keep these houses in shape?

Mr. Gregg: I do not want to make any prophecies but I will express the pious hope that it will not be much longer. One reason why I am certain that it will not apply to the main number of the new houses that are being built is the plan that is being adopted. When the veteran builds his own house it is a much better house in reality, and particularly in his opinion, than one that the contractor builds for him.

Mr. Fraser: The minister mentioned the Faircraft houses. Are they all repaired now and settlements made on them?

Mr. Gregg: They will be when this—

Mr. Fraser: There were 35 houses altogether, were there not, or was it more than that?

Mr. Gregg: About 35, as I remember. This is to repair the roofs on a few of them.

Mr. Fraser: I understood that there was to be a settlement. What was the average settlement made on those where the veterans repaired them themselves?

Mr. Gregg: I will get that for my hon. friend. It was worked out satisfactorily.

Mr. Fulton: What is the relationship between these two items, Mr. Chairman, and the write-down of the selling price which was authorized, I think, in 1948-49 and 1949-50 as well? Were these houses in which the price was written down also subject to repair under this vote? If so, what is the total that has been expended to date under the two headings?

Mr. Gregg: These are not related to that. That was a different job by itself. But I may tell my hon. friend that in round figures the total of write-down and remedial work will be, with these two smaller items, in the vicinity of $3 million.

Mr. Fulton: Has anything been recovered from any of the contractors in respect of those repairs?

Mr. Gregg: Recoveries have been made in some cases by settlement, and there are still some holdbacks on some of the contracts.

[Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough).]

Mr. Fulton: Has the minister the total of recoveries to date from contractors?

Mr. Gregg: I have not got it today. I shall try to get it for the hon. member.

Item agreed to.

Terminable services—

555. Post discharge rehabilitation benefits including out of work allowances, university and vocational training, including the training of merchant seamen and salt water fishermen pensioners, awaiting returns allowances, temporarily incapacitated allowances and unemployment insurance contributions, $14,045,500.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, I should like to speak briefly on this item, even at the risk of delaying the passage of my estimates. However, this vote from now on will decrease rapidly; before many years it will disappear altogether.

First I wish to express the federal government's appreciation of the cordial and capable co-operation of all provincial governments in the tremendous vocational training effort for veterans during the past six years. This has been a great example of effective teamwork between the two federal departments of Labour and Veterans Affairs, and the appropriate departments within all provincial governments.

Before the effort is over something approaching 100,000 young men and women will have gained special skills through this vocational training. As far as can be observed, so far the results of that training have been effective in bringing the veterans into working skills in every phase of our economic life.

And so within a year of our Canadian history which, I hope, will be marked by wider dominion-provincial co-operation, I point to this effort as a shining proof that it does work.

The other special point I wish to make is related to the other wing of our veteran training program, namely the university training effort. I do not think it is widely realized how great was the task that loomed up before all our Canadian universities in 1945, as demobilization got under way. Within a period of twelve months some had to double or triple their accommodation. But the universities turned the approaching task and the apparently impossible problem into a great opportunity.

The way they entered upon that opportunity is now becoming a matter of history. It is a magnificent period of achievement in the history of all of the universities, and it will enrich their traditions and experience in such a way that it will be reflected down through the years ahead.

In all the relations between the university authorities and the officials of my department the highest degree of cordial good will and devoted effort has been shown. I wish to thank the universities for their part in the rehabilitation effort, which has helped to make much more than a mere re-establishment job, but rather a rich investment for Canada.

Finally, all these efforts would have been futile, if it had not been for the determination of the veterans themselves to take advantage of the opportunity presented. It is not my intention at this time to enlarge upon that, because it has been said many times, and well said. From my files I could produce many personal letters from veterans who finished their training and who are on their way. They have written to express their thanks to the government and to the people of Canada for giving them their chance.

As the campuses teemed with veterans, there existed within the universities veteran-student organizations. They had a national body which they called the national council of student veterans. This last year a young man named J. Peter Kohl was president of that body, and I should like to read to the house a letter which he asked me to present on behalf of his organization. The letter is as follows:

Hon. Milton F. Gregg,
Minister of Veterans Affairs,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. Gregg:

The national council of student veterans is in the process of disbanding. Before its final dissolution, the council wishes to express the appreciation of Canada's veterans for the educational opportunities provided under the Veterans Rehabilitation Act.

The commendable foresight of the Canadian government in providing such an excellent university training program has proved, and will continue to prove, of inestimable value to our nation.

The council extends its warm thanks to you and your colleagues in the Department of Veterans Affairs. Your sincere efforts and spirit of co-operation have contributed to a great extent to the success of the program.

And this is the important part of the letter:

The student veterans of Canada are sincerely grateful to the people of Canada for their sympathetic and generous support of the rehabilitation scheme.

I would appreciate your conveying these sentiments to all those concerned.

Yours very truly,

J. Peter Kohl,

Past President, National Council of Student Veterans

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, it is most appropriate that the minister should have referred to the extremely satisfactory results of the courses given to veterans both in rehabilitation and in technical training at the university level. Those arrangements which were carried on between the dominion government and the department of education in each of the provinces do present a most striking example of what can be done when a spirit of co-operation is demonstrated, as it was in that case.

Actually, for strictly departmental reasons within the dominion government, the agreements were between the Department of Labour and the provincial departments of education. The Department of Veterans Affairs provided the very necessary payments that went to the student veterans, and of course co-operated in respect of the details of the courses.

One point however which I suggest might well be borne in mind in connection with this extremely interesting period, when many universities had their enrolments increased to two or three times what they had been before the war, is that while the arrangements were made to give training specially suited to veterans with some years of overseas experience, it definitely advanced the whole knowledge of education in this country. In discussing this matter I suggest it is appropriate to mention the fact that in these courses which were given in the training centres for veterans who were studying for matriculation, arrangements were made whereby the ordinary, rigid, annual examination period was changed, and veterans could proceed as rapidly as they were capable of taking the examinations. This produced some very remarkable results. There were veterans who had not even passed their entrance examinations before the war who, in only a fraction of the ordinary time that would be devoted to high school or collegiate work, were able to qualify for entrance to universities.

I believe that in every province much has been gained in the knowledge of educational procedure itself. Therefore not only have these courses which were provided under agreements between the two federal departments already mentioned and the departments of education in the provinces given to the veterans those educational opportunities they so richly deserve, but those veterans in turn, by the work they have done, have contributed to the educational knowledge of this country.

One of the most interesting aftermaths of that training is that today some of the places where technical training was given to veterans under these agreements are now being used to give special technical training below the university level to those who are anxious to have special qualifications.

All that grows out of this experience. It has been a fine demonstration of effective co-operation, prompted by a desire to assist the veterans as they should be assisted. It has also demonstrated what can be done in the field of education where provincial authorities are given that measure of financial support which they need to carry on special educational activities of that kind. I think there are suggestions along the very lines that have been discussed on other occasions during this session where, without any interference whatever with the jurisdiction of the provinces, arrangements can be made whereby the provincial departments are able to broaden the base of technical and other education in this country. At this very time of year there are passing out of the universities thousands of graduates who have benefited from these educational opportunities. I think it can safely be said that Canada never had finer graduates from its universities than these young men and women, and that they are going to make a great contribution to the future of the country as a result of the education they have received.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If I may say one word, speaking as a university trustee I should like to say that these young men and women were felt by the university authorities to have added a degree of seriousness to the work. I actually heard one university president say that for the first time in his life he had been tempted to ask students not to work so hard.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will take up Bill 266, an act to provide for the operation and maintenance of a residence for the Prime Minister of Canada. Then we will go into supply and take up the estimates of the Department of National Defence.

It being five minutes after six o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

Soldier Settlement and Veterans Land Act—

547. To provide for the cost of administration of Veterans Land Act; soldier settlement and British family settlement, $4,563,514.

548. To provide for the upkeep of property, Veterans Land Act, including engineering and other investigational planning expenses that do not add tangible value to real property; taxes, insurance and maintenance of public utilities, $132,500.

549. To provide for the payment to the government of the United Kingdom on account of losses under the 3,000 British family agreement of August 20, 1924, and the New Brunswick 500 British family agreements of August 4, 1927, and August 27, 1935, $10,000.

550. To provide for the payment of grants to veterans settled on provincial lands in accordance with agreements with provincial governments under section 35 of the Veterans Land Act, 1942 (as amended by order in council P.C. 2122, dated 13th April, 1945), and payment of grants to veterans settled on dominion lands, in accordance with an agreement with the Minister of Mines and Resources, under section 35 of the Veterans Land Act, 1942, as amended (P.C. 1550 of 18th April, 1946), $1,700,000.

551. To provide for the payment of grants to Indian veterans settled on Indian reserve lands under section 35A of the Veterans Land Act, 1942 (as amended by order in council P.C. 2122, dated 13th April, 1945), $500,000.

552. To provide for the reduction of indebtedness to the director of soldier settlement of a settler under the Soldier Settlement Act, in respect of a property in his possession, the title of which is held by the director, by an amount which will reduce his indebtedness to an amount in keeping with the productive capacity of the property and his ability to repay his indebtedness to the director, under regulations approved by the governor in council, $150,000.

553. To authorize and provide for necessary remedial work, to be approved by the governor in council, on properties sold under the Veterans Land Act, under individual firm price contracts, to correct defects for which neither the veteran nor the contractor can be held financially responsible, $30,000.

554. To authorize and provide, subject to the approval of the governor in council in each case, for the completion of necessary remedial work to houses and services constructed under the 1945 building program, $104,600.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, June 8, 1950

The house met at eleven o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

WORLD WAR II—RECRUITS REJECTED FOR COMBAT SERVICE

Mr. Knight:

1. What number and percentage of those examined for service during the second world war were rejected for combat service on account of (a) inability to meet the physical standards set for recruits; (b) inability to meet the requirements for the necessary emotional stability?

2. What number and percentage of those examined and accepted were later found to be unfit for combat service due to insufficient (a) physical stamina; (b) emotional stability?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. Comparative statistics for the three armed forces and for the full period of second world war are not available. Owing to the variation in requirements and statistical data available in each of the components of the fighting forces, separate figures are given for each service.

(a) Navy, 11,509 or 10·1% (period 1 Sep. 39 to 30 Sep. 45); Army, 262,830 or 35·5% (period 1 Jan. 41 to 31 Dec. 44); Air, 46,881 or 18·6% (period 1 Aug. 41 to 31 July 44).

(b) Navy, 436 or 0·38% (period 1 Sep. 39 to 30 Sep. 45); Army, included in (a) above, separate statistics not available; Air, 2,636 or 1·04% (period 1 Aug. 41 to 31 July 44).

The higher percentage for the army as compared with the navy and air force arose to a large extent from the fact that entries to the navy and air force were voluntary whereas the army had to classify not only volunteers but all personnel called up for the armed services under the National Resources Mobilization Act. After introduction of compulsory military training, rejection certificate for service in the armed forces could be issued by army only.

2. (a) 5,833 or 5·7% (period 1 Sep. 39 to 30 Sep. 45); Army, 105,201 or 14·4% (period 1 Sep. 39 to 31 Dec. 45); Air, 18,021 or 7·3% (period 1 Sep. 30 to 31 Dec. 45).

(b) Navy, 1,093 or 1·07% (period 1 Sep. 39 to 30 Sep. 45); Army, 47,646 or 6·5% (period 1 Sep. 39 to 31 Dec. 45); Air, 6,363 or 2·5% (period 1 Sep. 39 to 31 Dec. 45).

The above figures include all those discharged for physical disability resulting from active service.

MILITARY EXERCISES AT PLAGE AUX BLEUETS, QUE.

Mr. Courtemanche:

What was the total cost of the military exercises during the night of May 13-14, 1950, at Plage aux Bleuets, Oka, Quebec?

Mr. Blanchette: Estimated cost, $12,000.

AERIAL MAPPING AND SURVEYS, SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. Wright:

In contracts let for aerial mapping and surveys in the province of Saskatchewan in 1949, to Survey Aircraft Limited, Vancouver, and Air Service Limited, Edmonton (a) what was the rate paid per square mile; (b) what was the number of square miles surveyed by each of these companies?

Mr. Maybank: (a) Survey Aircraft Limited—paid $3.90 per square mile, plus federal sales tax; Air Surveys Limited—paid $4.35 per square mile, plus federal sales tax. (b) Survey Aircraft Limited—12,212 square miles; Air Surveys Limited—10,802 square miles.

Note: No contracts were let to Air Services Limited, Edmonton, figures above are for Air Surveys Limited, Edmonton.

BOUCHARD PLANT, STE. THERESE, QUE.

Mr. Bertrand:

1. Is there any ditch cleaning or ditch digging to be carried out this year at the Bouchard plant, Ste. Therese?

2. If so, is such work to be done with machinery?

3. Before reaching such decision, was consideration given to the number of unemployed at Ste. Therese at the present time?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. Yes.

2. Mostly day labour.

3. Answered by No. 2.

MOUNTED POLICE—BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Fulton:

1. On what date were consultations or negotiations between the federal and British Columbia provincial authorities commenced regarding the taking over by the R.C.M.P. of police work in the province of British Columbia?

2. Have negotiations yet been completed?

3. If not, what is the present status of the negotiations?

4. What steps are being taken to provide that personnel of the British Columbia provincial police who wish to do so may remain in their present categories or categories of not less seniority in the R.C.M.P. when the transfer has been completed?

5. What arrangements are being made to ensure that the pay of members of the British Columbia provincial police who continue in such equivalent categories in the R.C.M.P. will not be adversely affected?

Mr. Garson:

1. 18th April, 1950.

2. No.

3. Still under discussion.

4. The situation in this respect is being examined by R.C.M.P. personnel officers.

5. The situation regarding pay is being examined by R.C.M.P. personnel officers.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

DUNDAS, ONT., ARMOURIES—REPAIRS OR ADDITIONS

Mr. Lennard:

1. Are repairs or additions to be made to the armouries located at Dundas, Ontario?

2. If so, is the work to be done on a cost plus basis or by contract?

3. If by contract, were tenders advertised for, or was it by invitation?

4. Who has been awarded the contract, and at what price?

FIRE LOSSES, 1946-49

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

1. What was the value of the damage caused by fires during the calendar years 1946 to 1949, in each of the provinces of Canada (a) forests; (b) industrial property; (c) dwellings?

2. How many persons lost their lives in fires, and how many were injured for the same period?

Mr. Bradley: Return tabled.

DOMINION STEEL AND COAL CORPORATION—SUBSIDIES, ETC.

Mr. Gillis:

1. Was any money paid the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation for the calendar year 1949?

2. If so, what amount by way of (a) subsidy; (b) subvention; (c) rebate under the Maritime Freight Rates Act on the operation of the Sydney and Louisburg railway?

LOANS OR CREDITS TO OTHER COUNTRIES

Mr. Low:

With reference to loans or credits Canada has extended to overseas nations, how much was granted to each nation, and/or spent by each nation in each year from June, 1945, to March 31, 1950?

FLOOD CONDITIONS

SOUTHERN MANITOBA—VISIT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE—INQUIRY AS TO FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Has he received an estimate as to the financial loss caused by the Red river flood in Manitoba, and has he received any request from the province of Manitoba for an interim grant?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I had a very interesting visit to Winnipeg yesterday. I now have a progress report from the joint commission appointed by the Manitoba and dominion governments to accumulate factual material to enable the dominion government and the provincial government to ascertain the measure of their respective financial responsibilities. I shall be discussing the matter with my colleagues today, and I expect to be in a position to table the report and make a statement to the house tomorrow.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Prudham (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Resources and Development): Yesterday the member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) asked whether Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation had made any representations to insurance companies requesting them to permit evacuees to forgo monthly payments while their families were evacuated. In reply I may say that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has no authority to make such representations. I understand, however, that the loan companies have been engaged in discussions during the last few days on this problem, and as yet no decision has been announced.

DOMINION ELECTIONS

CARTIER BY-ELECTION—PRINTING OF NOTICES AND POSTERS IN ENGLISH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Is it to his knowledge that in the electoral district of Cartier the official electoral notices and posters are all printed in English, although thirty-five per cent of the population are French-speaking?

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): I have had no notice of the hon. member's question, but I will take occasion to inquire into the matter at an early date.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE TO SOUTH AND SOUTHEAST ASIA—SYDNEY CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Fisheries, I directed a question to the minister of external affairs; perhaps I may repeat it to the Minister of Fisheries today. When does he expect to be in a position to make a full report to parliament on the meetings which he attended in Australia a few weeks ago as Canadian representative?

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I was asked by the Minister of External Affairs to attend the commonwealth conference at Sydney. I considered it to be my duty to make a report to him as to what we were able to accomplish and I thought that he would make a statement. However, the minister has asked me to make a statement some time before the house prorogues, and I expect to do so when his estimates are before the house. I do not know of any other occasion on which I could make the statement.

Mr. Graydon: Does that mean the minister will make the statement before the external affairs committee which is dealing with the estimates?

Mr. Mayhew: No; I shall make the statement before the house.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 266, to provide for the operation and maintenance of a residence for the Prime Minister of Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for the maintenance and operation of the prime minister's residence. When the resolution was being considered yesterday there was some discussion about the construction of the house. I would point out that such discussion is not pertinent to this bill. Parliament has decided to construct a residence for the prime minister, and the house was informed that it was the intention to remodel an existing residence for that purpose. The problem that faced the government in connection with this property was similar on a smaller scale to that which faced the government of the United States with regard to the remodelling of the White House. It was known that it would be much cheaper to tear down the White House and rebuild it, but it was decided that in view of the historic aspect of the White House, the government would proceed to spend $4 million in remodelling the present structure rather than building a new house for about half of that sum. I am not suggesting that the two cases are entirely parallel; however, there was some reluctance about tearing down one of Ottawa's fine older houses and replacing it with a new building. Consequently the cost of remodelling the house is whatever the cost must be. The government has appointed a reliable firm of architects with wide experience in building better-class houses, and has appointed a responsible firm of local contractors to do the building. The work is being supervised by the architects, as well as by a clerk of the Department of Public Works. I believe, therefore, a discussion of the cost of building this residence is not pertinent to this bill.

The question does arise, however, of the position of the prime minister in living in that residence. We have looked up precedents and we find that in England the prime minister is provided with two houses, one at 10 Downing street and the other at Chequers, both of which are wholly maintained by the government. In England the practice goes even further, in that a number of flats throughout London are provided for cabinet ministers and maintained at public expense. I am not suggesting any extension of the prime minister's residence principle in Ottawa; I simply draw that to the attention of the house as a precedent for the position we are now considering.

In the United States the White House is maintained by the government and a skeleton staff is provided by the government. The president pays for the remainder of the staff and provides for the running expenses of the house. I point out that for that purpose he can draw on an expense account of $75,000 per annum, which is placed at his disposal to be used at his discretion.

The Prime Minister of Canada has no personal expense account. The Prime Minister does not wish to be better off as a result of occupying this residence than he is today, and has therefore insisted that he make a payment for the use of the house. According to the provisions contained in the bill the house will be maintained by the Department of Public Works, as to heating and repairs; the grounds will be maintained and improved from time to time by the federal district commission. The government will appoint a steward for the house, who will engage the necessary staff and provide the services that are required in the house.

No doubt a question will be asked as to why the prime minister's annual payment is fixed at $5,000. Several considerations were taken into account. One was that the salary of the prime minister is fixed at $15,000 per year, whereas the salary of a cabinet minister is fixed at $10,000 per year. It was felt that the $5,000 would cover the additional expenses the prime minister would have above those of other cabinet ministers, and that that sum might be a fair gauge of the amount that the prime minister should contribute in return for having a house and living provided in Ottawa. There was also the fact that a man living in Ottawa, who finds it necessary to maintain a home elsewhere, would spend about that amount for living accommodation in the capital.

The bill provides that the prime minister will pay a rental covering food and lodging for the prime minister's residence of $5,000 per annum. I believe that what I have said explains the objects of this bill. Members in all parts of the house were desirous that the prime minister should have a home in Ottawa, which would belong to the government, and which would be a type of house befitting his position. It is ridiculous to ask a man living on a cabinet minister's salary—which I may say has not been increased in the last thirty years, and incidentally I am not complaining about that fact—to maintain at his private expense the type of house that is being provided for the prime minister.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I was unfortunately absent when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) began to speak. I understand that he suggested that it was not seemly to be inquisitive about the cost of the prime minister's residence. Let me say what I said yesterday, that I think everyone in this house wants the prime minister to have a dignified residence. I agree fully with what the minister has said about the prime minister being treated in a most generous manner. I would not cavil about the allowance which he is paying. As a matter of fact, I would not have cavilled if he were not paying anything. That is one aspect of this matter. But when it comes to the other aspect of it, which is an expenditure apparently well into $500,000, then to suggest, if the minister did suggest it, that we are really doing this, as the boys say, "sight unseen", I do not think is reasonable. So far it seems to me we have had no intelligible picture of this transaction. Yesterday everyone on the opposite side of the house who had anything to do with it seemed to pass the ball to somebody else.

I just want to say that when we get into committee we should have the details of this transaction put before us in a reasonable and intelligible manner. Up to the present time I think the only piece of definite information we have is that the coach house, or whatever it is, in front of the residence, is not to be used for the residence of a secretary. That may be highly interesting, but it does not really cover the whole case. I therefore wish to say that I think we are entitled to an intelligible and detailed statement of the cost.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): When this matter was before the house, Mr. Speaker, on September 30 last, all parties in the house were in agreement that the Prime Minister of Canada should be provided with a suitable residence at public expense. The site that was chosen is, in my opinion, one of the most beautiful in the city of Ottawa, and is in every way suitable for such a residence. On September 30 I said, as reported at page 385 of Hansard, that I thought the government would be well advised to build a new house, with modern conveniences, and perhaps more suitable for the purpose in mind, instead of reconditioning or rebuilding the interior of an old house. I knew this particular piece of property when I spoke about it on that occasion. Yesterday at noon, after the discussion in the house, I went to see the property again and took a look at it. I think that a mistake was made in not demolishing the old house, and building something more in keeping with the purse-strings of future prime ministers of this country and perhaps of even the present Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. Fraser: You are one hundred per cent right on that.

Mr. Coldwell: I think the government itself may be disappointed at the cost of reconditioning this building, in spite of what was said to me yesterday as a matter of fact by one of the officials to the effect that this might be considered to be an historic building. It is of course different from the White House in the United States in that respect, because it has no history of any sort behind it which would recommend it to the public of Canada.

I also want to agree with the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) when he said that we should scrutinize the terms of this bill. It seems to me that it would be far better had we had a more modest arrangement and not included in the bill the $5,000 provision. I think that looks rather small on the part of this parliament. I can understand why the government put this provision in the bill, although I think it would have been better to leave the matter entirely open so that it could be dealt with, if it was felt necessary to do so, in some other way.

I want to say this, however. The emoluments of the Prime Minister of Canada, in comparison with those of some other offices under the crown, are exceedingly modest. We have for example, the governor of the Bank of Canada. I do not know exactly what his emoluments are, but I believe that they are at least twice as much as the salary the Prime Minister of Canada receives. Then we have the emoluments of the president of the Canadian National Railways, and they are, I believe, three times as much as the Prime Minister of Canada receives. Consequently I feel rather badly about this $5,000 provision.

I am all in favour of our providing a suitable residence but, as I said before, I think a bad mistake has been made. We may criticize the expenditure and the cost of this building as much as we will, but the deed is done. The building is there. It is being remodelled, and I must say from what I saw yesterday that the minister was quite right when he said we have a competent firm of architects who are doing the best they can with an old building which, when they looked into it, was found to be in relatively poor condition. Much more had to be done in the strengthening of the walls and all the rest of it than was expected. The government made a bad guess, and whatever we can do now will not rectify the results of that guess. I am therefore suggesting that we must accept the situation as we find it and give consideration to the provisions of the bill.

I think our country is doing the proper thing, in conformity with what other countries have done, in providing the first citizen of this country with a residence in which he may receive distinguished guests from at home and abroad.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): I should like to say a word about this matter, Mr. Speaker, in the first place because I intend to move an amendment to the bill when it comes before us. I believe I am in order in saying that I am going to move an amendment.

I come from a rural riding where we do not have pretentious places, but I object strenuously to that $5,000 provision, which was mentioned by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). I intend to move an amendment that the rental be $1 a year. After all, it does not matter what party is in power; the leader of that party is the Prime Minister of Canada, in a position analogous to that of the president of the United States. Naturally I hope that none of the parties opposite will be in power. But if they are, the people in my riding, and I as an individual member, will pay respect to the position held by the leader of it, whatever party it may be.

As the leader of the C.C.F. stated when he spoke last year, if I remember correctly, it would have been better to tear the old building down and build a new one. Two wrongs, however, do not make a right. We have a skeleton out there now, and the best we can do is to make it a credit to Canada, in keeping with the position we hold in the United Nations.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, I intend to move in amendment that the rental be $1, not $5,000, for the Prime Minister of Canada, whoever he may be and to whatever party he may belong.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I think the house has to distinguish between two things in approaching the second reading of this bill. On the simple issue whether the country should provide an official residence for the prime minister, I am quite certain that there will be no disagreement or difference of opinion in this house. If that were the sole principle of this bill, then of course it would be entitled to command unanimous support on second reading. But, sir, this bill goes further than that. This bill proposes to make a particular property in Ottawa the official residence. The bill sets out in detail a description of the property by metes and bounds. Therefore it seems to me that the acting leader of the government is quite wrong in saying, as he has intimated this morning, that the house should not concern itself with an examination of this particular property as to the cost, and the expenditures made upon it, in trying to fit it for use as the official residence for the prime minister.

There is one particular correction that I should like to make in the remarks of the right hon. gentleman. Early in his remarks this morning he used these words: "The house has decided to construct a residence." That may have been simply a slip of the tongue. What the house has intimated, informally to date it is true, is that it approves the idea of providing a residence. It seems to me that there was no suggestion in anything that has been said so far in the house that the selection of this particular property was approved; nor was the method that the government has pursued in renovating the property, and spending vast sums of money thereon, approved.

The acting leader of the government did not buttress his case one little bit this morning, sir, by bringing in the argument about historical values, and setting up the White House at Washington as an example. Certainly the White House at Washington is of the greatest historical interest. That would be a factor of leading importance to the government of the United States in deciding whether that building should be renovated or replaced by an entirely new building. Is anyone going to say that this particular property, the former Edwards residence, has such historical value to the whole people of Canada that it must be maintained in its present form? I think that argument does not add one little bit to the strength of the case put forward by the acting leader of the government.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has said: "True, the government has made a bad guess; but here we are faced with an accomplished fact, and we have to accept it." Sir, it goes a good deal beyond a very bad guess on the part of the government. The government has botched this whole undertaking from the beginning. The idea started off on a perfectly sound basis, and then was mishandled to the point where it is very difficult, in a bill of this kind, for some hon. members to give approval to it when they realize that by giving approval to it they have to overlook completely the botch that the government has made of it.

I think it is time, sir, to face this situation very clearly. What the government has done is this: Without asking for specific approval of parliament, without bringing before the house last fall, as it should have done, a bill to set aside a particular property, if they thought that was the best property, they made an announcement in the house without mentioning anything of that idea. They proceeded by order in council to set aside a house that had been acquired by the government several years before by expropriation for a purpose that we did not then know, and then proceeded with the work of renovation. All that was said in the house on that occasion, on September 30, by anybody who spoke in the house was that the idea that the government should provide at the expense of the country an official residence for the Prime Minister was approved; but no one went beyond that. Whatever has been done in regard to selecting this property, whatever has been done in the way of expenditure of vast sums of money upon it to try to modernize an ancient house, has been done solely on the responsibility of the government and without any approval on the part of this house.

Now, sir, what exactly has the government done? The right hon. gentleman said this morning that the cost is not pertinent. Sir, that is an extraordinary proposition, when we are asked as a House of Commons to—

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend should not use half sentences. What is the rest of that sentence?

Mr. Fleming: I must say that I have the full language of the sentence. The relevant part was this. He said that the cost was not pertinent and need not be discussed.

Mr. Howe: I said, was not pertinent to this bill. By deleting part of the sentence my hon. friend has completely changed its meaning.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No, no.

Mr. Fleming: I have not changed one iota of the sentence of the right hon. gentleman. What he said, sir, in a very plain statement to the house this morning was that the cost was not pertinent to the discussion of this bill this morning. There is no member in the house who could draw any other inference from it.

An hon. Member: You did.

Mr. Fleming: I submit that no hon. member can dismiss from his mind questions in regard to costs or the method of dealing with this property, in addressing himself to his responsibility in relation to this bill.

What did the government do, entirely on its own responsibility? I have said in the first place that by order in council they set aside a government-owned property for this purpose. I remember the occasion in the life of the last parliament when the exchequer court established the amount to be paid by the government on expropriation of this property. I believe the figure was $140,000. Being of an inquisitive turn of mind I remember rising and asking the prime minister at that time for what purpose the government intended to use the property. The answer was completely evasive. Nobody knew by the time the then prime minister had finished what the property was to be used for.

The government has taken the responsibility by saying this is to be the property which will be used as a residence for the prime minister. So far as the physical situation of the land is concerned, everyone I am sure will agree with what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said this morning, that it is a beautiful property, is handsomely located and from that point of view is very suitable. But what about the house? Would it not have been common sense on the part of anybody who has any claim to using his sense in reference to business to sit down first and try to count the cost? That is one thing this government did not do. They make no pretence of having done it. What they did was to decide, again without any consultation with or approval by parliament, that they would maintain the existing structure. So far as we are told, they did not ask for the preparation of any plans or for the submission of estimates on the cost of construction of a suitable modern residence. Apparently that did not enter into the scope of consideration on the part of the government. They just decided they were going to take this old building—I am told it is eighty years old. It goes back almost to the time of confederation. Perhaps that is what the acting leader of the government meant this morning when he talked about historical interest, an eighty-year old building—and they started in to disembowel it and tried to make an ancient structure suitable for use as a modern residence.

What is the cost? Well, at least at that stage one would have thought they would seek to have some estimate of the cost. Having failed to exercise any elementary sense of business in not ascertaining the cost of constructing a modern counterpart of such an ancient edifice, the number two mistake, the number two blunder was this. They did not even have an estimate of the cost of this type of renovation and reconstruction, because it is a major job of reconstruction, let there be no mistake about that. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) told this house that the alterations and improvements to the main building, so he was told, will cost $135,000. He also told the house that that was only an estimate. But, sir, let the house be quite clear on this. It was not an estimate given before the work was undertaken. The government decided on this task of renovation and reconstruction without having a firm estimate before them of the cost of construction. The government do not know even today what it is going to cost. They cannot even tell us exactly what the renovation of the grounds is going to cost. They cannot tell us today what the furnishings in the residence are going to cost; they cannot tell us in fact anything that I think most hon. members of this house making any claim to business sense would want to know or would have asked at the very outset of this undertaking before they gave approval to it. So I say that this government has taken a sound idea, an idea which will command general acceptance, the idea that the country ought to provide a suitable residence for the Prime Minister of Canada, and from that point on has proceeded to botch the whole job.

It may be that we are now faced with a situation from which it is difficult to retreat. The government exercised its power by order in council and as a result of that decision, which the house has had no opportunity to debate or to discuss, we are now faced with a situation where it becomes difficult to try to restore good business sense, in the face of what the government has done, and its series of blunders. One can only express in this situation the most profound regret that there was not somebody in the government sitting opposite who had enough common sense to stand up in cabinet council and say: Look here; are you going to prejudice this whole idea of providing the prime minister with a residence by going ahead and making a series of blunders, without sitting down first and asking yourselves, first, whether this is a suitable house for the purpose and, second, if the house is to be made suitable for the purpose, what it will cost? Apparently there was not one man in the cabinet yonder who had enough business sense or courage to stand up and try to defend a sound idea from botching on the part of those who have handled it since.

There is one other observation I should like to make about the bill, and it concerns a subject already touched upon by some hon. members who have spoken this morning. I refer to the provision which proposes to charge the Prime Minister of Canada $5,000 a year, and pro rata for any period less than a year, for his food and lodging for himself and family. I believe all hon. members will acknowledge and applaud the motives of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in his attitude concerning this provision, as related to us by the acting leader of the government this morning. He has shown a fine sense with which I am sure no one would quarrel.

On the other hand I do not think members of the House of Commons ought to make that fact the occasion for doing something that is wrong in principle. And, sir, it seems to me that the provision which proposes to charge the Prime Minister of Canada $5,000 for his use of the building is wrong in principle. The leader of the government indicated that this amount had been arrived at—at least, I so understood him; I do not profess to quote him exactly—from the fact that the Prime Minister's living costs on similar account today are approximately the same.

The Prime Minister is in office today. We do not know how long he will occupy this residence. It may be that the next prime minister will enter the residence under quite different circumstances. It may be that his comparable living costs will be somewhat less than $5,000 a year; on the other hand it may be that his comparable living costs will be considerably higher than that. Therefore, it seems to me that to relate this figure in the bill to the particular comparable costs of the present Prime Minister is to expose the entire fallacy in it.

Sir, there is nothing to prevent any incumbent of the office of prime minister who may now or in the future occupy this residence from making any contribution he may wish to the consolidated revenue fund of Canada, if he believes that in the occupation of the residence he is enjoying a benefit that he does not wish to accept without making appropriate payment. However, I say it is wrong in principle to insert in a bill which is to become a statute of the parliament of Canada a provision of this kind, which names a figure which has been arrived at in the light of the circumstances of the present incumbent of the office, and may be entirely unrelated to the circumstances of any future prime minister.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) has intimated his intention of introducing an amendment to this section of the bill, and I hope he will pursue his purpose and thus give the house an opportunity to express its opinion in the matter. I have a feeling that the house will not approve that section of the bill if it is given an opportunity to express itself freely in relation thereto.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Speaker, may I speak again?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Fraser Valley has already spoken. He cannot speak a second time on the motion for second reading of the bill.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there is one part of the speech of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) that I think requires some clarification. He introduced the subject of expropriation of this property by a charge of evasion against the former prime minister. With respect to his propriety or impropriety in using such language, I am quite sure history, and all members of parliament here, will know how to assess that charge and that language.

I think it only fair to point out that when this property was expropriated it was the last remaining piece of property, with the exception of that now occupied by the French embassy, along several miles of shore line of the Ottawa river, not held by the crown. All hon. members ought to know that all the shore line of the Ottawa river, extending from the property formerly occupied by the first prime minister of Canada, down beyond the Royal Canadian Air Force airport property at Rockcliffe, is owned by the crown, with the exception of the property I have mentioned. This expropriation, when made, was to complete that ownership by the crown of the shore line of the river. So that any charge to the effect that it was not stated at the time of the expropriation that a particular few yards of land was going to be made into a prime minister's residence, and then drawing from that the charge of evasion, is baseless and never should have been made at all.

Mr. Cruickshank: On a question of privilege—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Cruickshank: I think I can speak to a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: If it is a question of privilege, the hon member may of course speak. But would it not be better to discuss the question when the house is in committee on the bill?

Mr. Cruickshank: No; with all due deference, after what has been said by the hon. member for Eglinton to the effect that I had given notice that I was going to move an amendment, I think I should speak now. At the request of the Prime Minister himself I am not going to move it; but I am suggesting that every member in the house vote against that section.

Mr. Graydon: When did you see him?

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, when this property was first secured I read and watched closely editorials in newspapers all across Canada. Generally the press is a pretty good barometer. I did not see one unfavourable comment.

It is well known that the clergy and ministers all across Canada have their rectories, parsonages or manses furnished, and free. Why? Because these workers are allowed to pursue their work freely, and they are not bothered about homes and furnishings. This residence for the Prime Minister of Canada has been long overdue; in fact, each of the crown ministers should have a home of his own.

I would suggest that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) confer with the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) on another outstanding need in Canada, namely, a first-rate, well-equipped gymnasium for the young members of the House of Commons.

Mr. John Hunter (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I have been very patient for a long time with the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), and as a younger member of the house I have felt that it would be unseemly for me to interrupt his perorations. However, I have been forced to the conclusion that the hon. member for Eglinton regards himself as a new Canadian Messiah. It may be unbecoming for a younger member to offer advice to an older member, but in this case I think advice should be offered. I suggest to the hon. member that instead of these querulous scoldings he confine himself to offering constructive advice. It would be much better for him, and would certainly be less tedious to other hon. members of the house.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put myself on record as being in favour of this nation providing a residence for the prime minister, but I do not like to put myself on record as being in favour of providing the prime minister of this country with a residence that is to cost half a million dollars, if it is true that the cost of this residence will run to this amount.

I was interested in the reference made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) to Downing street, but I suggest that the historical associations which Downing street has is the only thing which justifies its use as a residence for the prime minister, and therefore that was not a good argument to bolster up his contention in favour of the use of this house, which in my opinion is too expensive and unsuitable for the purpose. I think a new and modern house costing perhaps $50,000 or $75,000—

Mr. Gibson: You will not get much for that.

Mr. Knight: I do not want to be misunderstood. I am prepared to agree that the prime minister of this country should have a worthy residence in which to live, and I indicated that in my opening remarks. I still feel that a residence costing $75,000 would be sufficient for anyone in this country. A new and modern house, such as suggested by my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), last fall would have filled the bill nicely.

Downing street has historical associations. I had the privilege of going through it once, and frankly I would not want to live there. Certainly if one had to cook on the stoves provided in the kitchen, at least when I went through the house, you would not want to live in the place at all. I would much rather live in a modern bungalow costing $5,000. As I say, to refer to the use of Downing street is no argument to bolster up the contention that this white elephant, if it is a white elephant, should be used. Although the hon. member for Eglinton did not use those words, that was his intent.

I am opposed to any rental being charged the prime minister of this country for the use of a house which I submit should be provided without cost. It is true that in one section reference is made to food that will be provided, but I do not think it is within the dignity of this chamber to discuss the matter of food that the prime minister may use either for himself and family or for his guests. The prime minister should have the use of this house free of cost, and whatever food he wants to provide for his family or for his guests is his own business.

The hon. member for Eglinton has suggested that a great deal will depend upon who is prime minister and what his circumstances are, and in that respect his argument is well taken. But I still contend that the prime minister should have the use of whatever house is provided, without any strings being attached as to the food that will be used, and so on. Matters such as that should be entirely in the hands of the prime minister, just as it is in the hands of any other private citizen.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Fulton: Can the minister give the committee any idea of what it is going to cost to maintain this house?

Mr. Howe: I have no such information. The position is that the government decided to use this particular house for a prime minister's residence. The question whether it should be torn down was discussed, and, rightly or wrongly, the decision was that the house would not be torn down.

Mr. Fulton: I did not ask for the cost.

Mr. Howe: You have made your speech and I will make mine.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps the minister misunderstood my question. I did not ask for the cost; I merely wanted to know what it will take to maintain the residence.

Mr. Howe: As I say, the decision was made to convert this house into a residence for the prime minister. It has been said that this house has no historical value, but whether that is so depends on one's sense of historical value. It has been one of the fine residences of Ottawa for eighty years. In discussing the matter some attention was given to the fact that people in this locality would be shocked if a residence which has long been a landmark of Ottawa were to be torn down and replaced by something else.

As the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) has pointed out, once the decision was made to convert the present house the situation subsequent to that decision was cut and dried. In other words, the problem was then to make a modern residence out of the Edwards house. If anyone can suggest that the work is not being carried on economically, then he may have a case against the government. Hon. members would expect that when this building is converted it will be a first-class modern residence. That is what is being undertaken.

After reviewing the experience of a number of architects, the government secured the services of an architectural firm which seemed to have the widest experience in work of this type. The government arranged for the services of a local contractor who has a first-class reputation in the district. The work has been carefully supervised. The suggestion has been made that it will cost twice as much to remodel the house as it would have cost to build a new house, but I know enough about the situation to know that that is not so. I think a new house of that size and with the same facilities could be built for about what it will cost to remodel this particular house.

It may be argued that a more modest house should be built for the prime minister, but when we consider that the prime minister's residence will on occasion be available for government hospitality I doubt whether a too modest house would have served the purpose. A house was recently built in my neighbourhood, fairly small in size and in my opinion totally unsuitable for this purpose, but yet I was told by the owner that it cost $85,000. This will indicate what it costs to build a house in this day and age.

I do not know what this house is going to cost. I have not even had the advantage that the leader of the opposition has had, because I have never been inside the house; therefore I cannot even guess what it will cost. Neither can I say what it will cost to operate the residence, because I do not know. I know what it costs to operate my house. It is not a modest amount, and I do not suppose this will be a modest amount. Just as hon. members expect that the residence will be converted into a modern house suitable for a prime minister, I am sure that they will expect that the necessary amounts will be provided to maintain and operate the house on the scale on which Canada's prime minister should live. That is all I can say as to operating costs.

Mr. Fulton: My question is not related to that point. While it may be said that we would be willing to support an adequate scale of maintenance, and so on, surely we should have some idea of what it is going to cost before we commit ourselves to it. I must confess that the way I would approach the matter would be to decide first what is adequate, and then how much it is going to cost, rather than simply say, in relation to any project, that we will commit ourselves blindly to whatever it may cost. I do not think that is an efficient way to go about it. My question was based on the assumption that the government had some idea as to the staff that will be required, what the annual cost of the staff will be, and what the annual cost of maintenance will be. If they have not that information, then they cannot answer the question.

Mr. Cruickshank: Do you know what a maid will cost next year?

Mr. Howe: I am sure my hon. friend cannot give any indication of how many official dinners will be required, or how many official guests will be entertained. Anyone who attempted to forecast the cost of government hospitality in a particular year would have some difficulty in knowing what the demands on that hospitality were going to be. I might point out that the prime minister has no expense account for the purpose. All I can say is that the cost of operating the house will be what the circumstances of the year may require. I think my hon. friend can expect that the house will be efficiently operated, and that the cost will not be higher than necessary to meet the requirements of the situation.

Mr. Fulton: I do not know why this matter should be made so difficult. What I asked for was an estimate of the cost of maintenance, not the cost of hospitality or anything of that sort. If the minister does not know, perhaps he will say so.

Mr. Cruickshank: It may take two lawnmowers next year.

Mr. Knowles: Can the minister say whether the amount necessary to provide for maintenance will appear in the estimates from year to year.

Mr. Howe: Certainly.

Mr. Knowles: Under what department or departments?

Mr. Howe: Either under Public Works or the Prime Minister's department. I cannot say which.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Chairman, I should like to lift the debate out of the realm of a brokerage office or Eaton's catalogue to a somewhat higher standard of discussion.

Mr. Graydon: That is an insult to Ontario farmers. They read Eaton's catalogue.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I should like to recommend to the architects engaged in renovating the house that they use some of the woods of British Columbia and other parts of Canada. This is not an ordinary home. It will be more or less a national shrine.

Mr. Casselman: An auction sale.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I should like to see the beautiful cedar shingles of British Columbia placed on the roof of the house. I should like to see edge grain fir, a great product of the mills of that province, used in some of the rooms of the dwelling. I should also like to see Ontario maple, oak and other hardwoods used. I should like to see woods used which will be typical of the various provinces of Canada.

Mr. Knowles: And Tyndall stone from Manitoba.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, every Canadian is going to be a critic of this house when it is finished, and that is perfectly natural, for every Canadian will have a stake in the property. I expect to be in the happy position that I can say I know nothing about what materials are going to be used in the remodelling of the house. The government has appointed a responsible firm of architects, and we expect them to protect the public interest. Therefore I cannot make the promise that the hon. member would exact, although I was told that cedar shingles from British Columbia will be used on the roof of the house.

Mr. Cruickshank: And B.C. salmon served.

Mr. Hodgson: I have done a considerable amount of building, and B.C. shingles are about the poorest thing you can put on a roof. They crack and warp. You have to be very careful how you nail them. If you want to have a shingle roof use good old Ontario shingles.

Mr. Cruickshank: Imitation.

Mr. Hodgson: I should like to ask the minister whether my understanding is correct that the renovation of the house is not being done under contract?

Mr. Howe: Correct.

Mr. Hodgson: How is payment to be made? Is somebody getting ten per cent plus?

Mr. Howe: No. A contractor was appointed and his fee was fixed at $10,000 for the job. The work is being carried out on force account.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to point out that an attempt is being made, I think rather foolishly, to suggest that the effort to introduce some common sense into this matter is in some way undignified. That was attempted yesterday, and I thought perhaps we were through with it. I think it is tiresome. We are all in favour of a dignified residence for the prime minister. Let us get that settled once and for all, and let us have a little common sense. At the present time we are being asked to approve something, and we know not what. I notice that the Minister of Public Works is not here. I think it would be proper if he were here. I should like to read what he said yesterday, and I ask hon. members whether sensible people should be asked to vote money in this helter-skelter ignorant manner.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I shall read it to you and you can judge for yourselves. The hon. member for Lake Centre asked what was the estimated cost, and at page 3302 of Hansard the Minister of Public Works said in reply:

> Those I have consulted so far dare not give an exact estimate, because in estimating the cost of remodelling an old building we are nearly always wide of the mark. I believe in the main estimates there is an amount of $80,000, but I am sure that will not be sufficient.

I guess we are all sure of that. Then the hon. member for Lake Centre said: "What is the general estimate?" The Minister of Public Works replied:

> I think it will be somewhere around $100,000—that would only be a personal guess, and if I make a mistake it will come back on me. I would rather not give my opinion. I am not a contractor.
> Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Allow yourself a leeway of $100,000 for error.
> Mr. Fournier (Hull): If that is the attitude of my good friends, I would say between $150,000 and $200,000; that is about the closest I can come.

I ask whether it is sensible, Mr. Chairman, for grown men to vote money in that way. All we are asking is that we should have an estimate given in good faith. We all know something of the difficulties of renovating a building. At the present time all we have is figures thrown at us in bits and pieces. We have not had a figure yet from any responsible person as to what the total cost is going to be. If it will be somewhere in the neighbourhood of half a million dollars, is it unreasonable to ask that we be given a serious figure to show roughly what it is? We will not be foolish and hold the Minister of Public Works to $5,000 or $10,000. We know that cannot be done in a situation of this kind. At the present time we are left absolutely at sea, and an attempt is being made to suggest that because we are asking for this information, somehow or other we are being disrespectful to the Prime Minister. I never heard such utter nonsense in my life.

Mr. Howe: I wish to correct an impression left by the last speaker that the bill appropriates money to build the house. It does nothing of the sort. The estimates of the Department of Public Works will be considered in due course. At that time my hon. friend will be entitled to an estimate of the cost of the house. There is no reference in this bill, in any way, shape or form, to the cost of the house, and he would not be entitled to that information at this time even if it were available. I can tell him I have not such information although I have the information necessary to discuss this bill. I cannot discuss the cost of the house.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I presumed we would have that answer. It does not seem to me a reasonable answer. If we approve this, then when we come to the estimates we shall be told we have approved the whole thing, so what is the use of cavilling at any figures. I see no reason whatever why we should not have an estimate in good faith from a responsible quarter as to what the cost is to be. We have nothing now except a lot of jocular figures.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 4 inclusive agreed to.

Mr. Bradette: I feel that there is only one way for me to vote on section 5. Until the emoluments of the office of prime minister of this country are increased from $15,000 to $25,000 or $30,000 per year, I shall have to vote against the section. I believe that this country is not being fair to the prime minister. As an example, I could cite men in my constituency who are working for large corporations and who are receiving from two to three times the salary of the prime minister of this country. I believe those people deserve all they are getting, they are worthy of their hire, for they are working for large mining and corporation interests. I repeat that I do not see how it is possible for this committee to pass section 5 without a promise that parliament will rectify the anomaly that I have just mentioned.

During the general discussion on the first section of the bill, some members mentioned the cost of the food. Surely Canada ought to be able to provide adequately for the prime minister without quibbling about such details as the cost of the food. After all, we voted tremendous sums of money to send food to other countries for which we do not expect any repayment and over which expenditure we practically have no control. Surely it is the duty of this parliament to see to it that if this item is passed, then within a reasonable time, and not later than early next session, the emoluments of the office of prime minister and of the members of the cabinet are properly dealt with.

Someone said that a future prime minister might not be able to pay $5,000 a year. We parliamentarians realize what it means to be mere members of parliament and the calls that are made upon us. I may say that I am satisfied with what I am receiving as a member of parliament, but how much money can any member save if he accedes to the requests made of him, and logically made, by his constituents?

On the other hand, consider the position of the prime minister, who always keeps himself at the entire disposal of every citizen and organization of this country. Let us visualize for a moment what the establishment of this government house will mean. It will come next to Rideau Hall as the rendezvous of officials, the place for receptions for prominent people from Canada and the rest of the world. Surely, we cannot afford to be niggardly about a matter of this kind.

Mention was made during the discussion of the estimated cost of the house, $100,000 or $200,000. If we cannot afford to provide proper accommodation for our prime minister, and to see that he gets a salary befitting his office, then this parliament does not seem to be fulfilling its duty in relation to matters such as this. The only way I can vote for section 5 is to have a promise that the emoluments of the office of prime minister will be increased before the next session. I am sure the majority of the people would wish that this be done.

Mr. Howe: This section was put in the bill at the request of the Prime Minister himself. The Prime Minister wishes to be in the same position as every other citizen of Canada, namely, that he pay his living expenses out of his salary after taxes. Whether or not the amount is a fair amount has been given a good deal of thought. It is believed that it is a fair amount. I believe it to be logical that the prime minister's salary should be increased, but this is not the time or place to discuss that subject. The Prime Minister would not wish that his salary should be increased as a result of anything that might happen in connection with the prime minister's residence. I sincerely hope, therefore, there will not be too much objection to this section. I did not like it when I saw it, and I do not like it today. Nevertheless if I were prime minister I believe I would feel that I would want to pay for the board and lodging of myself and my family, and that is what this payment is intended to cover. As I say, it is at the Prime Minister's request that this section is inserted in the bill.

Mr. Coldwell: I believe the great difficulty with this clause, apart altogether from the objections which have been voiced thus far, is that it is going to be static. No one knows whether the cost of living will go up or down. It seems to me it is a mistake to put a figure of this sort in the statute. If this were a regulation it might be a different matter, but to put it into a statute of the parliament of Canada is, I believe, fundamentally wrong. It would seem to me some better method could be devised if the Prime Minister insists on having this provision inserted. It could be stated that it be an amount to be decided from time to time by some organization responsible to this parliament, such as the treasury board. I do not like this section at all, and I quite agree with the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) that this is not the place to discuss the salary or the emoluments of office of the prime minister.

I well remember a discussion with the former prime minister and the leaders of the opposition parties of this house several years ago, when this matter of the emolument and residence came up quite accidentally. Perhaps it would have been better had these matters been settled when the former prime minister left the office a few years ago. We have to consider these two things separately, and so far as the emoluments of office are concerned we should forget them for the moment. This morning we have the question of the residence before us. Do we want to accede to the request of the Prime Minister and leave this section in the bill, or do we want to take it out? We have to remember that this bill deals with the residence of the prime minister, and not the residence of the present occupant of the office. While we would like to meet the wishes of the Prime Minister, and indeed greatly appreciate the fact that he wishes to do this, I think the house has to decide whether it is wise to write the amount into a statute.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether it would not be wise to rephrase the section and say:

> The prime minister shall pay to the Receiver General of Canada an amount to be determined by the treasury board for any period—

Perhaps that would meet the requirements.

Mr. Howe: I may say that that proposal has been put before the Prime Minister. Council followed somewhat the same approach that is being taken in this house. There are reasons why it is better to have the amount fixed by act of parliament. The amount can be changed when the prime minister's salary is changed. This amount is one-third of his salary as prime minister, and something like one-quarter of his income before taxes from all government sources. I believe it is a reasonable amount for the purpose. There are tax questions that hinge on the amount fixed, and since this provision expresses the wish of the Prime Minister, after all considerations were put before him, I ask the committee to approve this section.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): While I would be quite ready to vote for an amendment such as was indicated—in fact I would find it difficult to vote against it—it has been stated that the alternatives were discussed with him by those who are closest to him, and it does seem to me that his wishes should be followed.

Mr. Bradette: I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The sum of $5,000 was decided by the Prime Minister himself. We all appreciate what he did in this respect, and Canadian people will appreciate it too. But personally, not knowing the situation of his office in all its detail, I believe that the sum of $5,000 is too high a percentage to be taken from his emolument. I believe that twenty per cent would be sufficient. It is not necessary that the amount should remain fixed rigidly at $5,000. Twenty per cent would be $3,000, which in my opinion would be more reasonable.

After all, the prime minister not only has the obligations of the prime minister to fulfil and all the responsibilities that this high office entails but is called upon in connection with all sorts of good causes and activities. When the late lamented Viscount Bennett was prime minister I remember that he himself told me that there was not a single day in which he did not have fifty calls made upon him, on his own money. If he had had only the emolument of his office, it would never have been possible for him to take care of them. There is no doubt that the calls on the Prime Minister are as great, if not greater, at the present time; I am sure he would have at least fifty calls a day involving payments out of his salary. We are speaking in terms of dollars and cents at the present time. It is just as important for the prime minister to live comfortably as it is for others; and it is important that he personally be kept free from annoyances of a financial nature which sometimes are exceedingly depressing. I believe that twenty per cent of the emolument of the prime minister should be sufficient. I believe that it would be satisfactory to the Prime Minister himself and to the whole of Canada if such an amendment were made to this clause.

Mr. Howe: No, Mr. Chairman; I can assure you that the Prime Minister would not welcome that amendment. He takes the position that his expenses while in Ottawa today are about $5,000 a year. He does not wish to have that amount reduced in any way.

Mr. Gibson: I appreciate greatly what the hon. member for Cochrane has said, and I understand the difficulty of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The hon. member for

Official Residence for Prime Minister

Rosetown-Biggar suggested that this figure of $5,000 should be somewhat flexible. I think that a figure would be difficult to arrive at, because we would be haggling about the amount, and we would not like to have that. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar does not like that.

The other consideration of course that arises is this. One prime minister may be a man of independent means, but his successor could conceivably be an ordinary member of parliament like the rest of us, and he might be short of money. We have a statutory allowance in order that some of my ministerial friends may drive motorcars, but once in a while I see them in streetcars just like ordinary folk. Is it not possible that the Prime Minister would accept the suggestion from the committee, which I am sure he must feel is made in all sincerity, that we provide his particular department, the Prime Minister's office, with a residential allowance of $5,000? Most of the cabinet are here this morning. I should like them to talk the matter over amongst themselves and see if there is any way in which they could make that request; because I think they will find it meets with approval in all parts of the house.

Mr. Graydon: Perhaps, with every good intention in the world, some of the Prime Minister's best personal friends in the chamber are doing him an injustice in what they are attempting to do. No doubt the Prime Minister feels that he wants to be in an independent position with respect to this matter. He wants to pay his own way.

Mr. Gibson: How about his automobile?

Mr. Graydon: I don't know. I have never had a ride in it.

Mr. Cruickshank: I will take you in mine some day.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Graydon: I think perhaps the committee ought to respect the Prime Minister's wishes in this regard. He would not want to be put in the position of being coaxed by the committee into changing his position with respect to the payment of $5,000, which gives him an independent status, and as a result of which he and his family will feel they are paying their way. I do not think that we ought to press the matter any further, if it is the Prime Minister's wish to pay $5,000.

Mr. Lennard: I do not agree with that suggestion. If the Prime Minister wishes to pay his own way, if he wishes to pay his living expenses, that is his privilege. But it does not need to be in a bill to be passed by the House of Commons.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Defence forces—

202. To provide for the defence forces of the navy, army and air services, and to authorize total commitments for this purpose of $579,301,670 including authority, notwithstanding section 29 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, to make commitments for the current year of $438,178,000 and commitments for future years of $141,123,670 against which commitments it is estimated that actual expenditures in 1950-51 will not exceed $384,932,304.

Mr. Harkness: When the estimates of the Department of National Defence were up for consideration on March 17, I did not have an opportunity of making any general remarks, and I propose to take the opportunity of making them now.

During past sessions members of this party have made several suggestions for improvement, as we saw it, of the defence forces of the country. I am glad to see that some of these suggestions have been or are being followed to some extent. Last year in particular the hon. member for Nanaimo urged that much greater attention should be paid to the development of the air arm. He urged that a larger proportion of the defence dollar should be spent on that service, and that equipment in considerably increased amount should be provided for it. During these past several months I have noticed that the minister has spoken about this matter on numerous occasions, and has made quite a point of the fact that there has been a considerable increase in the amount of the defence dollar devoted to the air force. Apparently he has been anxious to assure everyone in the country that the air force is getting what we might call major attention amongst the three services.

On several occasions in the past I have criticized the top-heavy organization of the Department of National Defence. By this I meant particularly the fact that in my opinion an unduly large number of officers and men were employed at the various headquarters and in administrative duties, with the result that relatively few people were in the fighting units. The minister has indicated that some changes in that regard are in progress or are contemplated. It was, of course, one of the recommendations of the Mainguy report that, with regard to the navy, a considerable number of naval officers employed at headquarters should be relieved from what we might call desk duties so that they could devote their time to active sea duties.

When the minister comes to answer questions in detail or reply to the various speeches that were made last March 17, I hope he will tell us more specifically what progress has been made in that direction and what is the ratio, as we might call it, between the number of persons in the actual fighting units and the number of persons on administrative and other duties at headquarters and so forth, particularly breaking the figures down to show what has been done in each of the three services. I think there is just as much necessity for that procedure in the army as there is for it in the navy, if not more. I must say that I do not know very much about the situation as to the air force, but I suspect it is much the same.

On November 11, 1949, the minister enunciated the defence policy of Canada. It may be found in Hansard of that date at page 1663. I should like to make some comments on that defence policy and ask some questions in connection with it. In order to have continuity perhaps I had better read the seven points which the minister enunciated at that time. They are as follows:

1. The only possible aggressor is the Soviet union.
2. Any war would be a world war involving all western peoples who would be fighting for their survival as nations and their freedom as men.
3. The best way to prevent such war is to confront the forces of communism with such strength as to deter them from attack.
4. To provide such strength requires the co-operative efforts of the western nations, including the United States and Canada.
5. Consequently Canada welcomed the North Atlantic treaty as supplementing the United Nations, and pending the strengthening of the United Nations, as an organization for world-wide security.

These five points are what you might call general points. They deal with basic concepts of what we look upon as facts. Later I shall have something to say in connection with them in relation to what our present concepts are, whether there has been any change in them or not, and so on.

The sixth and seventh points are really the operative ones, the ones which concern the defence forces and what to quite an extent we are discussing.

The sixth one is:

6. Since an attack on Canada could only be made by air or by sea, emphasis must be placed on defence forces; by air—radar stations and communications, backed by interceptors and a relatively small mobile brigade group; by sea—anti-submarine and anti-mine vessels for protection of shipping and coastal waters.

The seventh is:

7. The best place to defeat the enemy is as far away from Canada as possible, and our forces should also serve as the nucleus for the development of our maximum potential.

In connection with the sixth point, which concerns particularly the permanent force, I should like the minister at a later time to indicate whether we have the radar stations and communications, the interceptors and the small mobile brigade group which are necessary to guard again any likely attack on Canada. In my opinion we have not. When the minister is replying I should like him to say, if we have not what is required at the moment, how much progress we have made toward getting it, and what we actually have. I think the committee is entitled to know just what we have in that regard. The same thing applies so far as the remainder of that point is concerned, namely, "by sea—anti-submarine and anti-mine vessels for protection of shipping and coastal waters". We should know definitely what vessels of that kind we have, and what they are capable of doing.

In introducing his estimates on March 17 the minister said that we have two interceptor squadrons at the present time and five more in mind, so that we would have seven all told. I should like to know whether the two squadrons we have at the present time are up to strength, both in men and in planes, or are they at quarter strength or half strength? As to the other five which are proposed, what progress has been made on them? Are they merely on paper, or have the nucleus staffs for them been got together? Have any planes been secured for them?

To revert to these more general aims of our defence policy, I asked last year, when we were considering defence matters, what our commitments were under the Atlantic pact. The minister replied at that time that we had none. It was interesting to note that about the same time that the defence discussion was going on in the house, the Secretary of State for External Affairs was down in New York where he made a speech at the United Nations, I think, in which he made reference to the commitments involved in the Atlantic pact, United Nations membership, and so forth. The result was this. I heard that somebody, having read in the press that the Minister of National Defence had said that we had no commitments for defence under the Atlantic pact, asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs this question: "Well, when is a commitment not a commitment?" That is still an appropriate query. When is a commitment not a commitment? We seem to be in a considerable amount of confusion as to what commitments we have under the United Nations, the North Atlantic treaty, and so forth. It is a matter which needs some clarification.

In his speech on November 17 the minister reiterated the statement that we had no commitments. I should like to read what he said at that time, as found at page 851 of Hansard, and to comment on it. He said:

> Under the North Atlantic treaty we have not made any specific commitment, but we have given the general undertaking contained in article 3 of the treaty to take such action as we deem necessary by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid to maintain and develop individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack. A second undertaking, as contained in article 5, comes into effect in the event of an armed attack against one or more of the signatories. That undertaking is to take such action as we deem necessary to restore and maintain the security of the north Atlantic area.

I take it that that means briefly just two things. First, we have undertaken self-help. That means the defence of Canada. We are going to look after our own borders. Second, it means that we have undertaken to take such action as we ourselves believe to be necessary for the common defence of the north Atlantic countries in the event of an attack upon any one of them. Only under these circumstances do we agree to pay any attention to what we might call mutual defence, other than protecting our own borders. It seems to me that this concept, and our entire defence planning, must be materially altered by the decisions which were taken in London last month, as set forth in the speech made in the house on Monday last by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

In connection with what the Secretary of State for External Affairs said about defence particularly, there are these three short sentences that I should like to read; they are to be found at page 3189 of Hansard:

> We have adopted the principle of "balanced collective forces" as the basis for our defence.

[Mr. Harkness.]

That is for all the north Atlantic countries, and he was speaking in the house particularly so far as Canada is concerned. Further on he said:

> We shall try to agree amongst ourselves which of us is the best able to concentrate on certain types of defence preparation.

I take it from that that each of the countries in the North Atlantic pact is going to concentrate on certain types of defence—to specialize on them, one might say. I take it also that Canada must follow that line and specialize in some certain line of defence, or at least direct the major portion of our defence effort to a certain line or certain lines of defence.

Then, a little further on—and perhaps this is the most important observation he made—the minister said this:

> North Atlantic strategy cannot mean, and our agreement does not imply a strategy of liberation after destruction and occupation. There could be no hope for Europe in that strategy, because the next time there may well be nothing to liberate.

That means that the strategy agreed upon would be such as to prevent the overrunning of western European countries by the forces of Russia. It is of course obvious that in order to do that, the countries of the North Atlantic pact must have forces which can go in and stop any Russian advance over those countries. If we in Canada have any definite commitment to put that strategy into effect—and from the speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I take it we have—this means that we must have forces which could be thrown into the struggle immediately.

We have abandoned the concept, which the Minister of National Defence has expressed before, that we have a small permanent force capable of meeting any diversionary raids which may be directed at our country, and looking after what might be called limited local defence; and, in addition, we were to have a framework upon which we could build up comparatively large forces which we could then send overseas in the general defence of western Europe.

If the new concept in strategy placed before us on Monday means anything at all, it must mean that in future we must have forces which can be dispatched at once. It would seem to me that the only forces which we could throw into action immediately would be air forces. Therefore, to a much greater extent than we have done up to the moment we would have to concentrate upon the development of our air arm. In addition I should think it would mean that if we are going to make to general western defence a contribution commensurate with our ability, we would have to have a considerably larger number of air squadrons. Otherwise we could not make this initial effort which would be required.

Further, it would mean that the only other type of force which could be thrown into action immediately and effectively would be specialized armoured forces, so far as land forces are concerned, and especially airborne forces.

I suggest that the minister should make some comment on what this new strategy of defending western Europe from invasion, rather than liberating it afterward, would involve in our defence planning. What changes in our defence program are going to flow from this change in strategy? If we are to have a great deal more equipment capable of being thrown in immediately when required, it would cost us a great deal more money. This year we are being asked to vote very large sums for defence; but if the new strategy is to be followed effectively by us, then we shall probably be required to provide much larger sums to implement our part of the program.

There is one further point I should like to make in this connection. One of the most important considerations in the strategy set out by the Secretary of State for External Affairs for the protection of western Europe is what is to be done with western Germany. Russia is now arming the Germans in the Russian zone of Germany. In my opinion the decision is squarely up to the Atlantic pact nations to do the same thing in the western zone or, if we are not prepared at the present time to arm the Germans in our zone, we must accept the proposition that none of the western zone of Germany can be defended. We shall have to write it off in the beginning as an area to be overrun by the Russians, in the event of war with them.

Personally I think it is also extremely unlikely that, without the armed manpower of western Germany, any of the western European nations with the exception of the peninsulas—Italy, possibly, and more likely Spain, and of course Great Britain because of her island position—could be held successfully. But apart from those countries it would seem to me most unlikely that the North Atlantic pact countries, as the strategy enunciated suggests, could be saved from occupation unless that large pool of manpower in western Germany is utilized.

I should like to know whether this aspect of the matter has been considered in formulating our defence policy, and what the conclusions have been with respect thereto. I know that this whole question is a very thorny one, concerning which most governments in western Europe do not wish to commit themselves, because there is still a large body of opinion mortally afraid of a rearmed Germany. However, in my view this is one of the most important questions to be faced—indeed, perhaps the vital one—if this new strategy is to be carried into effect.

If our government has any opinion in the matter, then we should be told about it in the House of Commons. If our military leaders have anything like the view I have enunciated, we should be told. If they do take that view, then we as a country should be prepared to press for its adoption. Someone has to take the lead in these matters, and, well removed from Europe, without any undue internal difficulty, we could quite readily take that lead, whereas, in a country like France the internal difficulty would be much greater.

This year the estimates were introduced early—and it was a good move. I had hoped that when on March 17 we began a discussion of the estimates of the Department of National Defence, such discussion would be continued shortly thereafter so that the entire estimates of the department might be dealt with more or less as a whole instead of having them broken up. But we find that this year the same thing is happening that has happened every other year I have been here. Almost three months has elapsed since the defence estimates were last discussed. We are now proceeding to consider them under circumstances which the minister described as terminal pressure. He tried to refute the statement made, I believe, by an hon. member in this party, that the defence estimates have always been considered right at the end of the session when there has been no time to deal with them properly. He made a lengthy statement which is to be found at page 755 of Hansard of March 14. At that time he indicated on what dates the estimates had been dealt with. I looked up those dates and compared them with the closing dates of the sessions, and I found that in each case these estimates had been considered a short time before the end of the session, and at a time when we were sitting, as we are now, in morning, afternoon and evening, with the committees sitting as well. I hope the minister will not try to argue that we are not under terminal pressure at the present time; we are under considerable terminal pressure. The suggestion this year that the estimates, particularly those of this department, which was the first one to be introduced, would be dealt with before the terminal pressure came on, when we could take the time required to deal with them without difficulty, has not been carried out. We are faced with the same situation as that with which we have been faced every other year.

This year the expenditures under this department are lumped in two large items which are the only items that really amount to anything. The first item covers all expenditures for the army, navy and air force, while the second item covers defence research and development. I referred to this matter last year, and asked the minister to consider introducing his estimates in the same manner as those of other departments, and in the same manner as they were presented before the war and even during the war. This should be possible now that the war has been over for some time and the rehabilitation and reorganization period is almost completed. These expenditures should be broken down into separate items instead of being lumped together.

This method of indicating the expenditures does not present as good a picture to hon. members as would be presented if the estimates were shown in the ordinary way. It does not show how many people are employed in the different branches, what their jobs are, and so forth. There is a certain breakdown in the back of the book, but it does not give any of this information. As a result it is much more difficult for members to know just how the money is being spent by the Department of National Defence, and it becomes necessary to ask many more questions and take up more time than would otherwise be taken.

Last year the minister said that serious consideration would be given to breaking up the estimates for the coming year, but nothing has been done. I ask once more that this be done in the future. I see no reason why it should not be done in this department as it is done in the other departments. Unfortunately there has been a tendency throughout to give as little information as possible in regard to this department. The minister has maintained consistently that that is not so, but everything points to the fact that it is.

I should like to say a word about recruiting. When the minister was speaking in the debate on the proposal to set up a committee on national defence he said, as reported on page 758 of Hansard of March 14:

> I believe it was the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) who said that if a committee were established it would help recruiting. Our recruiting for the active forces, the navy, army and air force, does not need any help. We are getting all the men we want. They are first-class men of fine character.

I was surprised to hear the minister make that statement. I should have thought he would have been glad to get all the help he could. I was particularly surprised at the statement because at that time, and I think this still applies, the minister was carrying on an extensive advertising campaign for recruits. There was also a radio program, about which the hon. member for Temiscouata made quite a lengthy speech. I heard it myself at various times. Large advertisements were carried in the newspapers, and so on. All this must have been very costly, and when we are dealing with the details later I shall want to know what this campaign cost.

In view of the fact that this advertising campaign was going on at the time, it was surprising that the minister should say he did not want or need any help in the matter of recruiting, that they were getting all the men they wanted. If that was so, why were they putting on this extensive advertising campaign? I do know that a large number of the reserve force units require men, and in that connection I think the minister should welcome any help.

Mr. Claxton: Of course I do.

Mr. Harkness: You said you did not.

Mr. Claxton: That was in a different connection.

Mr. Harkness: I made the suggestion that the Prime Minister and the minister should make special appeals to people to join the reserve forces, and I still think that that is a good idea.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, when the committee adjourned at one o'clock I was dealing with certain points covered in the speech the minister made on March 14. Before going on with that I should like to revert for a moment to a matter I dealt with earlier.

Speaking of the strategic concept adopted by the Atlantic pact nations at London last month to prevent the occupation of western Europe by Russian forces in the event of war, I overlooked one point which I should like to mention now. While the utilization of German manpower and fighting capabilities is, I think, the crux of carrying out such a policy and making it effective, the absence of Spain from the western military bloc is a serious defect. Up to the present time ideological differences between that country and the democratic countries of western Europe and North America have prevented the military co-operation that is desirable. I do not think ideological differences should any longer prevent us from securing the advantages which close co-operation with Spain in western defence would bring about.

During the war we were very glad of Russian aid when fighting for our survival against Germany. The question of ideological differences between us and the communist countries did not enter into the picture at that time. With the situation we now face of extreme danger from Russian imperialistic ambitions I think the same attitude should be adopted and that steps should be taken to make Spain and its resources available to the western powers. If it were impossible to carry out the strategic concept of preventing the occupation of the other countries of western Europe, possibly the one country which could be defended and kept as a bridgehead in Europe is Spain. In the over-all strategy of planning for defence it seems to me a most important matter that steps should be taken at the present time to put Spain in a position to contribute materially toward that end. For example, there should be large airfields constructed in Spain from which our air fleets could operate, and also strategic roads leading to the border. This matter should receive careful attention from the Atlantic powers generally and our own defence administration. They might put forward that point of view, if it is agreeable to them.

With reference to the minister's speech of March 17, he mentioned that standardization of battle procedures and organization was going forward. When he speaks later I should like him to tell us exactly on what basis that is taking place. Is standardization general throughout the Atlantic pact countries, or is it a matter on our part of standardization with the United States forces, and the adoption by us of their battle procedures in lieu of the British battle procedures which so far we have used? The minister said at the same time that standardization of equipment was necessarily slow, and I can see that would be so. I should think the amounts of military equipment now being shipped and about to be shipped from the United States to European countries would speed up that process to a considerable extent.

The minister made note of an offer on the part of Canada to train officers from other countries on somewhat the same basis as the empire air training scheme. Provision is to be made for the training of 150 ground officers and 100 air officers of other countries. I think that is a good move in the direction of standardization, but actually it is a very small one. When he is dealing with this point it would perhaps be of interest if the minister could tell us how many Canadian officers are receiving training in other countries at the present time, and what their services are.

The minister also made a statement in connection with the successful development of a Canadian jet plane, the CF-100. I am sure his announcement was received with great satisfaction by everyone in the house and elsewhere in Canada. Personally I am very happy that we are now producing a really up-to-date jet military plane. I trust that production will be sufficiently great that we shall be able to put large numbers of these machines into service in the near future.

The minister gave an interesting account of Exercise Sweetbriar. I am sure the committee was pleased to hear his report. He said that in our northern areas defence forces have the advantage, but in order to make that advantage effective they must be able to prevent the leapfrogging of the enemy from one airfield to another. That suggests to me this question. Have we the air force, the airborne infantry and other arms to prevent such leapfrogging? In other words, is our mobile brigade group of sufficient strength to do it at the present time, and even if it were at full strength, would it be sufficient to carry out that task?

In dealing with Exercise Sweetbriar the minister also spoke of the need for more tracked vehicles. He mentioned bulldozers particularly, and indicated that probably at least one per company would be necessary. I should like to ask what has been done since that time to provide not only bulldozers but also other tracked vehicles capable of travelling over snow.

The minister said that the target for our forces is to become more and more operational. Of course that is something which we on this side of the house have urged ever since the post-war army was established. I think there will be many questions as to the extent to which it has been accomplished. As I mentioned previously, a reduction in the number of officers and men in headquarters administration establishment and an increase in the number in the fighting units would be an important step in that direction.

With regard to the amount of the defence dollar which is being divided among the three services, there appears to be a discrepancy in the figures given by the minister. He said that in the past year, 1949-50, the air force was receiving 42·6 per cent of the defence dollar, while in the current year, 1950-51, they will receive 44·8 per cent. This statement appears on page 858 of Hansard of March 17, 1950. On page 857 of Hansard there is a chart which shows the distribution of the defence dollar. For the year 1949-50 it shows the air force receiving 38·8 per cent rather than the 42·6 per cent the minister mentioned, and for 1950-51 it shows the air force receiving 40·6 per cent rather than the 44·8 per cent. I should like the minister to explain that apparent discrepancy.

During the course of his statement the minister said that over one-half of the army brigade group were now tough, trained soldiers. That statement does not mean very much unless we know three other things. Is this half the present strength of the brigade group, or is it half the authorized strength? If the latter, is the authorized strength at the present time the full strength for the brigade group? Until we know those things, this general statement that over half the brigade group are tough, trained soldiers does not mean very much. If it were the first case I mentioned there would be a smaller number involved than if it were the last. I should like some further light on that point.

There was a statement that defence research was carried on on an increased scale during the past year. No details were given to indicate on what line defence research was conducted, what increase there may have been, or anything else. I think the committee is entitled to a full explanation. We all agree that defence research is one of the most important bases of national defence at the present time. So far as I have been able to observe in the house, it is a phase which there has been no disposition to cut down at all. The disposition has been the other way, to increase it.

The minister also made a brief statement about civilian defence planning. He said that it had progressed satisfactorily and had finished at the federal level, I think it was, or something to that effect.

> In civil defence we have completed the stage of planning at the federal level. Civil defence depends on close co-operation with the provinces, the municipalities and other agencies at every level. Following earlier preliminary discussions we are now in a position to make further progress.

I believe the minister will recall that I have spoken on this subject at length in each of the past three or four sessions. I believe that civilian defence is, in some ways, more important than any other phase of defence activities or defence planning. The statement that in civil defence we have completed the stage of planning at the federal level does not convey a great deal, and I should like to know what it implies. I know that General Worthington has been active for some time, and I noticed that the Secretary of State tabled a report on civil defence planning this morning. I have not, of course, had time to look at that report, but I shall be interested in doing so. The floods at Winnipeg and the fires at Rimouski and Cabano impressed upon all of us the desirability of having some sort of civilian defence set-up which could be used in such emergencies, quite apart from the extreme need for civilian defence in the event of war.

The minister said that the effective revival of the Hyde Park agreement had been advocated by Canada in order to enable the Canadian and United States forces to buy equipment from each other. I was glad to see an announcement in the press that some arrangement had been made which would enable the United States and Canadian forces to purchase from each other. Perhaps the minister can indicate what general types of equipment we shall produce in Canada and sell to the United States under that agreement, and what material we shall be purchasing from them.

We are being asked to vote large sums for defence. There is an amount of $425 million to be spent this year, but that is only part of the picture. So far as I can ascertain from a study of the estimates, there are further commitments amounting to nearly $200 million, so I think the total amount which we are being asked to vote for expenditures this year, or commitments in future years, is closer to $625 million rather than $425 million. In view of these large proposed expenditures this house should be given the fullest information as to how the money is to be spent, and particularly whether we are getting value for it. This involves, of course, being given information as to just what we are getting for the money expended; whether the expenditures will provide the defence necessary to look after this country, on a minimum scale of course. Everyone recognizes that it is impossible completely to defend this country, and no one dreams of advocating that. We should know whether the expenditures we are making are being made efficiently so as to provide this minimum force which the minister and the government have declared to be necessary. Now that this new concept has been adopted by the Atlantic pact nations, we should be told whether these expenditures are being made in such a way as to enable us effectively to play our part in carrying those plans forward.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, in the observations I shall make on the defence estimates I shall be speaking as an amateur. Indeed, I do not think there is anyone in the house today who can consider himself an expert on what our naval, military and air force tactics of the future should be. I do not think we have a yardstick by which we can measure that.

I agree with what the hon. member for Calgary East had to say about the matter of expenditures. They should be broken down. We should have some idea as to what portion of our defence estimates are allocated for this, that or the other purpose. His whole talk this afternoon, however, to my mind was definitely based on war and not on defence.

As I see it, the objective of the United Nations, and the main objective of the North Atlantic pact, is to build machinery which would be ready to meet any potential aggressor; but that machinery is not being built for the purpose of carrying on a war. Its main purpose is the prevention of war. In discussing international affairs in matters of defence we have to be careful not to lend fuel to the propaganda machine that is operating both in the United States and in Canada, and largely throughout the world, and make it possible for anyone to say that we are engaged in an armaments race for the purpose of making war in the future rather than in efforts to prevent war. Our language will have to be temperate.

I am a bit disturbed myself about all the emphasis that is given these days to military matters, war, and the possibilities of war, and the slight attention that is paid to the only instrument, in my opinion, that can prevent war in the future, namely, the United Nations itself. From what I have been reading in the press and have been hearing in the discussions in the house in the last few days, my impression is that we are getting away completely from the United Nations as an instrument of preserving peace in the future; and in my opinion, that is the only body that can preserve it. Unless we can get together there, fully implement the terms of the United Nations charter, and negotiate and iron out around the conference table matters of international conflict, I believe that we are headed for something that we may not be able to control.

I do not think there is anyone inside or outside of this chamber who can offer a valid criticism of the North Atlantic pact. We accept it as an outgrowth of the United Nations. The United Nations charter provides for regional pacts where they are desirable and necessary; and there is at this time no doubt about the North Atlantic pact being necessary. It is a "must". But that machinery, so far, is in the embryo stage. There is nothing concrete that one can fasten on. They have had a meeting. They decided on certain economic and military commitments, but they are not definite. The principle is right, and as such we shall have to support it and pay our share. Farther than that I am not prepared to go.

I think there are a great many difficulties in the world that we shall have to understand; for example, the situation in Germany. In my opinion it is the most explosive point in the world today. While the Russians are building peace fronts and talking about peace all over the world, in that particular section in Germany, in my opinion, they are building a war machine. They are now setting up a force consisting of 50,000 policemen. It is, in effect, an army, with tanks, artillery and all the rest of it. Canada should look at what the United States, Britain and France are doing in that particular sector and see what we can do to help in any way we can. As I say, I think that is the danger spot right now. Unless the situation is handled carefully and the difficulties are ironed out, there may be an eruption.

This afternoon what I want to focus the minister's attention on is not the broad matter of defence, because, as I said, most of us can fasten on to nothing that is concrete at the present time. The minister has nothing in history that he can use as a measure for the purpose of instructing his officials. I think if we vote the money, get an accounting of it as well as we can in the committee, and have some dependence on and confidence in those who are going to spend it and handle it in the future, with the minister as a contact between us and them, that is about all we can do at the present time.

What I want to talk to the minister about is a matter that we can do something about, and it has defence implications. In the house a few days ago I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question with regard to the naval air base at Dartmouth, Nova Scotia. According to press reports it is not in good shape. The Minister of Trade and Commerce at that time passed the question on to the Minister of Transport. The Minister of Transport took a look at it and said: "It belongs to the Minister of National Defence". I think that is one good argument for taking away from the governor in council some of the responsibility for decisions that can be passed around from one to the other, and for pinning it on someone specific. This particular question has to do with all three departments. I am going to talk about the part of it that comes within the scope of the Department of National Defence.

As the minister knows, in defence matters pertaining to Canada, Halifax area is a fairly strategic spot. It contributed greatly to the carrying on of the last two wars. The only airport in that whole area today is the one at Dartmouth; and it is a naval airport. T.C.A. uses it for some small aircraft, the ones that they can land. The DC-3's I think are the only T.C.A. aircraft that can land there. The matter has been under discussion for over a year. The city of Halifax wanted to know from T.C.A. what they were going to do with regard to providing in that area facilities that could be used to land the North Star, for example, and put the port on the map from the standpoint of air service. The Minister of Trade and Commerce visited the area, and his opinion at that time, as expressed in the press, was to the effect that it would be better to spend a few million dollars expanding that naval station at Dartmouth so that it could be used for the dual purpose of defence for naval purposes and of providing T.C.A. facilities at that point. That was a year ago. Nothing has been done about it since. The question was raised again as late as the end of May of this year. The Halifax members were actively interested in it, according to press reports. An examination of the situation was made. For the minister's benefit I want to read something that was said by a member of the flying patrol division in that area. This is from the Halifax Mail-Star of May 25, and it is official; that is why I am going to read it. I quote:

> Information about the present condition of the runways was offered by Lieutenant D. M. MacLeod, senior flying control at the Dartmouth naval station. "The runways are breaking up," he said. "Right now water is coming up through the tarmac, which is caused by the subgrade breaking down."
> He said all four-engined aircraft were included in the 60,000-pound ban, with the possible exception of Lancasters. Constellations which have used the base from time to time have a gross weight of 74,000 pounds, and the United States strato-cruiser which landed there about a month ago weighed 120,000 pounds.
> "The runways were originally built to handle 65,000 pounds," the lieutenant continued, "and the present ban is to prevent the runways from cracking up entirely."
> If the runways were further damaged, a serious landing accident could occur, he said.
> "It's to prevent this, and the cost of reconstructing new runways, that the ban has been placed in effect," he concluded.
> The proposed weight ban would have no effect at present on Trans-Canada Air Lines operations out of Halifax, T.C.A. officials said.
> At present T.C.A. are using the DC-3 passenger types which have a gross weight of 26,000 pounds when fully loaded.

That report from an official of the naval section paints a pretty bad picture of that particular station in Dartmouth. The runways are cracking up. Despite the fact that an active investigation has been carried on into the matter for the past year, so far nothing has been done with regard to expanding that Dartmouth station, or coming to the conclusion that a new station, particularly for the T.C.A. services, is to be established in that section. I am afraid this is another indication of no thinking in the matter of services east of Montreal. Halifax is one of the major cities in this country. It has been used very extensively in both wars for defence purposes. Apparently both trade and commerce, T.C.A. and national defence have written off that area at this time because a couple of million dollars would have to be spent in building or expanding the service there.

There is a large number of personnel at that point; it is strategic in relation to the European continent and to Europe. So far as I can see now, there are no facilities and no thought of any in relation either to defence or to general services by air, in the minds of any of the officials of the government.

In view of the fact that the Department of National Defence proposes to spend $419,985,500 this year, and in view of the importance of that section and the condition of that particular airport, which is a defence airport, and the lack of thinking by other departments which have already expressed an opinion on the matter, I expect the Minister of National Defence to make a definite statement, before his estimates are carried, as to what he is going to do with the naval station in that particular section.

I should like to refer to the matter of recruiting. The hon. member for Calgary East said that the minister made a statement some time ago to the effect that they were getting all the recruits they needed in the services now. That may be true. But I think that with the standards they have in all three services today it is not so easy to get recruits. I have had a good many representations from boys who were in the services in the last war, who came out medically fit, who made a good contribution during their service, and who could not find employment after they got out of the service and who made application to go back in. They then had to take an educational test to get into any branch of the service, and they found they did not have the necessary basic education, and they could not get back in. If a war broke out these boys would be accepted.

During the last war, when an emergency hit us and we were in a hurry for recruits, we found that the physical condition of about forty-five per cent of those who tried to enlist was a pretty sorry indictment against us. In addition to that, from coast to coast there was such a high percentage of illiteracy among the young service personnel coming into the forces that the Department of National Defence was compelled to establish a school at North Bay where these young boys were taken in and given a pretty thorough basic education in a short time. The whole curriculum was short-circuited in order to give them the necessary mechanics to understand map reading, gun laying and all that kind of thing. I suggest to the minister that one of the main defence preparations today should be an effort to see that our young people are qualified technically, and properly fed so that they will be physically fit when they come in.

The minister and his department should take another look at the number of applications that have come in from young men who want to get into the services but have been rejected because they have not the necessary basic education. Then, of course, we have to keep in mind the high percentage of young fellows who came out of the services at the end of the last war, but were not in a position to take advantage of even the vocational training supplied by the government because they did not have the necessary basic education. This is one matter that we should take a look at before we get into difficulties, because the condition of the world today is such that we cannot take chances. It may be too late to wait until you are hit in the nose before you start doing something about defending yourself. The general world condition, from the standpoint of possible war, is such that we should be building up the reserve army to the greatest extent possible. We should at least be giving, to those who desire to take it, the necessary basic training so that in the event of an emergency they will be called in with some knowledge of what is expected of them.

I think the policy adopted by the department shortly after the war is the correct one. They are building up a hard corps of well-trained personnel. They are keeping them in camps at strategic spots across the country. That is all to the good. That is what should be done at this time. In addition, emphasis should be placed on the reserve army, to see that in the event of an emergency, as many as possible have the necessary basic education in military matters. Next time it may be a matter of having to defend yourself, whether you like it or not. Everyone who is thinking at all will agree that if another war breaks out we shall be the Belgium of that war. It will not be a matter of going thousands of miles to get into the fight. You may find yourself in it overnight.

As I said, we hope that the formation of the North Atlantic pact, along with co-operation in economic and military spheres, tied in with whatever efforts we can make through the United Nations to fight to the last ditch in preserving peace—if that is possible—will keep the peace. If it is not possible, and we are forced into war by an act of aggression by the only country in the world today that is in a position to commit an act of aggression, then everyone in the country should be prepared to understand that situation and should be equipped so that we may be able to make the best possible fight under any circumstances.

My particular reason for rising was not to lecture the minister. I am prepared to pass these estimates. I have met some of the officials of the Department of National Defence. In those I have met I have confidence. The minister is here to be questioned at any time, and I think most of us have confidence in his ability and integrity. I rose this afternoon only to focus his attention on something concerning which he can take action; I refer to the naval station at Dartmouth.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, I take this opportunity to draw to the attention of the minister and the committee some matters in connection with the Department of National Defence which, I think, should receive some consideration. The point I am about to raise is one which affects not only this department but some other departments of government as well.

I have been interested in the case of a young airman whose name, for obvious reasons, I should prefer not to give. This young man was dismissed from the air force some time ago, apparently because of some charges made against him to the effect that at some time during his earlier life he had been connected with the communist party.

It so happens that I have known of this family for about forty years. It is a Roman Catholic family living in the province of Saskatchewan. The young lad to whom I refer was for a time a student in a Roman Catholic institution. That in itself is something by way of background that should reinforce what I am going to say. After serving several years in the R.C.A.F. this young man was suddenly let out—and he was let out under a cloud. He has never seen any charge made against him, and therefore has never been given an opportunity to endeavour to refute such charge.

So far as I am able to understand, some thirteen or fourteen years ago, during the period of unemployment, when protest meetings of all kinds were being held across the country, this young man attended a meeting —perhaps it was two meetings—in Regina of unemployed young men. When he discovered that the purpose of the meetings was to recruit young men for service in Spain, and to join the communist party as it was then, he went home and had nothing further to do with the matter. So far as I have been able to find out that is the only action that gave rise to suspicion concerning his associations. I know of no other.

I may add that Mr. Douglas, premier of Saskatchewan, has been acquainted with the family for the last twenty years, and perhaps has seen this lad and the other members of his family more recently than I have. But the point I make is this, that when any person in any public service is placed under a cloud and under suspicion, in a democratic country he should at least have the opportunity of knowing what the charges are against him. My criticism of the department is that, in this case, although they have been asked to state what the charge was, this has never been done and, so far as I know, no one has been given access to any of the information.

I have been keenly interested in the case and have gone so far as to suggest that if I could be given an opportunity to see the evidence and to be satisfied in my own mind, I was quite sure I could satisfy Mr. Douglas and that I could either give my word that the dismissal was deserved or, if it was not, ask the minister to look into the matter further. I know that even during wartime, when matters of a confidential nature arose concerning men in the air force, the minister's predecessors—and I am thinking particularly of the former minister for air—had no hesitation in trying to satisfy any member of parliament who was interested in a case that the action taken had been fully justified, and that there had been good reasons for taking it.

I have known the minister for a number of years. I have known him to be most insistent upon civil liberties, and it has been most difficult for me indeed to understand how this could happen under the minister's administration. I rise this afternoon not only in the interests of one young man who may or may not be guilty, and who may or may not have deserved dismissal from the armed forces. I raise the matter because, speaking generally, there is no opportunity in other departments for an accused employee to have a review of the accusations made against him.

We pride ourselves on our democratic traditions, and on the fact that to a large extent our parliamentary institutions are a reflection of the age-old institution of parliament in the United Kingdom. There a most careful screening is made, although mistakes occasionally do occur. However, when an individual is charged the minister receives advice from a competent and trustworthy committee to which the accused may appeal. While the committee has no power to reinstate or to take other remedial action, it can advise the minister who, of course, takes the final responsibility. There is a method of review and appeal. I suggest to the government, not only to the Department of National Defence in which the particular case I have mentioned falls, but to the government in general, that in cases of this kind there should be an opportunity for an individual to clear his name, if he can.

After all, it seems to me that an accusation of this description places a man under a cloud and makes it difficult for him to find other suitable employment. The young man to whom I am referring was at the beginning of last month among the unemployed and, because of a lack of references and because of inability to explain properly why he had been let out, had been unable to get employment of a kind suited to his particular talents. I am bringing this to the attention of the committee and I do not think anyone who knows my point of view will misunderstand why I bring it to the floor of parliament.

Under the present circumstances I think the government has to be wary. Where you have within the country a political movement that is the agency of a foreign power you cannot be too careful, but in exercising that care equal care should be taken that no injustice is done to any individual. Under our traditional democratic rights, according to our idea of justice, a person who is accused should have at least the opportunity of knowing something of the accusation against him and be given opportunity to review that accusation.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has made reference to a particular case I think I should reply at once. I think he has inadvertently failed to refer to one part of this incident which in justice to myself should be brought up. I am familiar with the case to which reference has been made. It concerned a young airman who was engaged in radar and electronic work and who was screened in the ordinary way. Because of facts that were reported to me it was decided that he should be released from the armed forces. He was not released under a cloud; he was released.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and the premier of Saskatchewan brought his case to my attention. Rightly or wrongly, not only did I review the case but I gave to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar the details of the information upon which a decision was made to release this young man.

Mr. Coldwell: I think the minister is under a misapprehension there.

Mr. Claxton: I have a strong recollection of it and I think as I give the facts the hon. member will recall that I did so. That information included a report which I had to accept that he had been an officer in the young communist party in 1938 and that while he had attended a Catholic college he had been released from that college for political activities. My recollection is that I told the hon. member both those facts.

Mr. Coldwell: Not the first fact.

Mr. Claxton: Perhaps my recollection is not correct. But we did discuss the matter. Subsequent to the hon. member making his representation I again had a special investigation made by the R.C.M.P. and by another means. On the reports, which I have mentioned, I could not do anything else but release this young man from the services. There was no finding of guilt.

I had the responsibility of deciding whether or not the circumstances were such that it was in the interests of the safety of the country that he be continued in a special kind of employment. It is interesting to note that about the time of his release this young man applied for employment with the national research council in similar work.

Here there was an honest division of opinion between the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and myself as to whether I should have acted on the information. I felt that I had to act. I did not like assuming that responsibility, but I did not see what else I could do. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and the premier of Saskatchewan took a contrary view. There was that difference of opinion. As to how such a difference is to be resolved would involve matters far outside these estimates. The possible desirability of having some special machinery for review is a general question far outside the scope of the Department of National Defence. On the present basis of responsibility the minister must decide on the reports made to him.

I should say that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is completely correct in his assurance of complete fairness and disinterestedness and desire to serve the public good. This was shown when he brought another case to my attention and when I gave him the facts he was completely satisfied. Certainly he never brought it to my attention again.

Mr. Coldwell: I was quite satisfied.

Mr. Claxton: I assumed that that was the case. I thought that I had given the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar the information he wanted. In one case he was satisfied, in the other case he was not. But it was an honest difference of opinion and I do not see how else I could have acted.

Mr. Coldwell: The minister brings to my attention that this young man was at some time an officer in the communist party.

Mr. Claxton: In a communist group.

Mr. Coldwell: That is certainly news to me; that is something I was quite unaware of, and the minister could not have mentioned it. As far as political activities go, I think I know what they were. I believe they were in connection with the C.C.F. movement some years before. I do not think anyone can accuse our movement of having any relationship with the communist party. The fact is that this young man was expelled or threatened with expulsion from an institution which he was attending along with some other young men who had formed a C.C.F. group in the town; this was subsequently the subject of inquiry and, I believe, of disciplinary measures by the superior authority of the institution. I have correspondence to that effect with the superior authority and as a matter of fact was given permission to publish it, which I did in 1934, I think it was. If that is the incident—

Mr. Claxton: I do not know if that is the incident.

Mr. Coldwell: That I think must be the incident.

Mr. Stick: Mr. Chairman, in taking part in this discussion one is conscious of not having detailed information which for security reasons cannot be disclosed. One must therefore necessarily talk in general terms. That defence today is most important to democratic countries who would maintain their free way of life has been amply proven by event which have happened in many countries. General Eisenhower speaking recently in the United States has warned that if we wish to be free we must be strong. I quote:

> General Eisenhower said last night that the United States has slashed her armaments below the danger point in a world that has not yet attained true peace.

And again:

> But until true peace is attained, the soldier-president of Columbia university declared, weakness in the face of soviet strength is "well-nigh as criminal as war itself."

And again:

> Plainly referring to Russia, Eisenhower declared that when even one power "builds and maintains a military machine beyond the recognized needs of reasonable security, a war of aggression remains a constant threat to peaceful nations."

And again:

> "Let us not delude ourselves that, in 1950, establishment of real peace is merely a matter of 'very important personages' signing papers or 'talking tough' in Paris, Geneva, Washington or Tahiti—"

And again:

"No sane man will challenge under the present circumstances the need for defensive strength designed to secure against internal or external attack the independence and sovereignty of a free state," he added. "But the continued existence of even one purely defensive force—a force of which there is no apparent need based in the logic of self defence—denies enduring peace to the world.

Those who have spawned such a force must either eventually destroy it by demobilization and find justification for the heavy cost already laid upon their people; or use it, tacitly or actively, as a threat or as a weapon. There is no middle course."

It is sad to think that after two terrible wars fought for the preservation of our free way of life we have to spend $425 million or more this year on our armed services which could be spent much more profitably in developing our great natural resources for the betterment of the people of this country and of all mankind. To such a state has this world now come. Truly it can be said, "Those whom the gods would destroy they first make mad." The honourable and gallant member for Nanaimo has spoken of the differences that exist in the higher command regarding which branch of the services needs priority of development. It is fitting that this should be brought to the attention of the house, and I do not propose to question the hon. member as to the source of his information. This difference of opinion amongst the higher command is not new. Those who have read military history know that such things have existed in all ages. In recent months we have had the spectacle of bitter differences of opinion between the United States navy and air force over which arm of the services will be most effective in modern warfare, and this wordy warfare still continues. It would be strange indeed if something of this struggle did not affect the thinking of Canada's higher command.

Therefore I am not unduly alarmed at such differences of opinion provided these officers are imbued with a high sense of their responsibilities, which I believe they possess, and their differences are animated by a sincere desire to serve the best interests of their country.

Since we evidently cannot develop all our services sufficiently to meet all our requirements, it may be necessary to give priority to one branch. This must be done by taking all the factors of defence into consideration. For myself I favour the air arm of the services for the following reasons: To those who have studied the lessons of the last war it must be evident that without air superiority armies are very seriously handicapped. It was the German command of the air that caused Poland to collapse so quickly. It was the same in the German break through to the channel ports. It was the German air force that captured Crete. It was this same force that prepared the way for the German armies in their advance into Russia, and it was only after the Russian air force became at least equal to the enemy air force that we saw the tide of war turn in that country. We would never have landed successfully in Normandy without command of the air, and it was that same superiority that made the break through possible.

It is the same story in sea warfare. It was the Japanese air force that first attacked Pearl Harbor and sank two of Britain's battleships in the China sea. It was the air arm that, unaided, found and crippled the Bismarck. The whole story of the United States naval victories in the Pacific is the story of the naval air arm destroying Japanese fleets almost single-handed. It was the air arm that played a large share in crushing the U-boat menace. I think I have said enough to show why our air force must be developed at all costs. Finally the lessons of Exercise Sweetbriar show that without proper air support you cannot fight successfully in the Arctic.

According to the latest reliable reports Russia has at least 300 modern submarines of the very latest design. When we consider that the Germans began the last war with about 60 submarines, and the great destruction they caused our shipping, the menace from this type of warfare becomes evident. That this is so recognized is demonstrated by the fact that the United States navy is pursuing antisubmarine measures with all possible speed and giving priority to them. We in Newfoundland know a good deal about what submarines can do. Our experience during the last war is not one we wish repeated. I am glad therefore to note that the Department of National Defence recognizes this danger and is building three ships specially designed for antisubmarine work.

It is pleasing to note that recruiting in Newfoundland is going ahead with excellent results. It is especially gratifying to know that the Royal Newfoundland Regiment has been reconstituted and incorporated into the Canadian reserve army. Without in any way boasting, but speaking purely from the record, I should like to tell the house that in Newfoundland we have some of the finest fighting material in the world, whether on sea, land, or in the air.

The times in which we live demand a strong defensive force, and if we are to maintain it in the highest degree of efficiency we have to show our young men that we are solidly behind them in every reasonable way. One of the greatest soldiers of all ages laid down as an axiom of war that morale is to the physical as three to one. If we are to carry out this great principle we must demonstrate our complete confidence in our armed forces. In this way we can do our part in building that morale which is so essential to any branch of the armed services. Finally I wish to say that the position Newfoundland holds is vital to the defence not only of Canada but of a large part of the North American continent. Canada must also play her part in that defence. Truly it can be said of Newfoundland, in the words of our national anthem, "O Canada, we stand on guard for thee".

Mr. Balcer: In taking part in this debate I should like to limit my few remarks to the present policy of the department in relation to the naval service. During the last war the navy rendered tremendous service to the allied cause. For a while we had the third largest navy in the world, and we had what was then regarded as the best anti-submarine service in all the allied forces. At that time there were 90,000 men in the navy. They were well trained, and we had the equipment to do the job. It was strictly an antisubmarine navy. That was then regarded as the proper policy for the navy, and I think the situation has not changed much as we can see from the various press reports and other information we get about our potential enemy.

We see that at the present time Russia has more fast and well equipped submarines than Germany had before the last war. Therefore it is only natural that we should look to our navy from the point of view of anti-submarine defence, and that we should do everything to make sure that it is an effective weapon in that regard. Unfortunately I think we are not spending the taxpayers' money, so far as the navy is concerned, in the best way we could. At the present time we have one aircraft carrier. It is costing a lot of money for upkeep and necessitates a fleet air arm with proper training stations, equipment and aircraft which are very expensive, and most of which are obsolete. At the same time we have in operation, so far as A.S. ships are concerned, only seven destroyers and four frigates. When an aircraft carrier is at sea during wartime such a ship has to be escorted by destroyers. If there were a war tomorrow one of our coasts would be defended by an aircraft carrier with three or four or five destroyers escorting her. At the same time the other coast would be defended by four or five A.S. ships. A few Russian submarines could attack our shipping lanes, and even our harbours, without much difficulty. In my opinion the money we are spending for a single aircraft carrier is not wisely spent, when one considers that for the same amount of money we could have more fast destroyers, and fast well-equipped A.S. ships, to fight submarines. These vessels could defend both the Atlantic and the Pacific coast lines at the same time, and we would not be in the position where a single torpedo could put half of our navy out of action. I believe this matter should be seriously studied by the department. I hope the minister will keep in mind the tremendous sum of money that has been spent for our single aircraft carrier, and I hope the navy will give careful consideration to these A.S. ships, which would be of vital importance if a war developed between Canada and Russia.

One other point I might draw to the attention of this house and the minister is that the parliamentary assistant to the minister replied to a question by the member for Nanaimo by stating that the cost of keeping up our single aircraft carrier in 1949 amounted to $2,940,000. For the two carrier groups, it amounted to $1,577,000, making a grand total for the carrier operation of $4,500,000. For the same amount I think Canada could maintain a fleet of fast and efficient antisubmarine ships which would give better protection to our shipping lanes.

One other point which strikes me, and I think this house should know about it, is that while the parliamentary assistant was giving this grand total for carrier operations of $4,500,000, the naval chief of staff was in Vancouver. According to a Canadian Press report he stated that the maintenance cost of the aircraft carrier H.M.C.S. Magnificent and the navy air arm was about $20 million per year. If the air arm is costing us $20 million, it could mean that we could afford to have even more A.S. ships than if the cost were the lower figure given by the parliamentary assistant, which was only about one-quarter of that mentioned by the chief of staff. We would still be able to do a more efficient job so far as the defence of Canada is concerned. If we decide to have these small A.S. ships, they can be built in Canada. In this way we could help our Canadian shipyards, which did such a tremendous amount of work during the last war, and which have been left high and dry since the end of the war. I believe it would be a good way to defend our coasts, and a good way to spend the taxpayers' money. It would also be a good way to help our Canadian shipyards.

These are a few of the remarks I wanted to make, and I hope the minister will explain to us why there is this apparent discrepancy between the $4,500,000 that his department gave as the maintenance cost of our air arm, and the $20 million that the naval chief of staff says it is costing.

Mr. Graydon: May I ask the minister one question? Under the recent decisions made at the North Atlantic council meeting in London, as indicated by the communiqué which the minister read to the house some time ago, a permanent deputy was to be chosen by Canada to attend the continued discussions of that council. Can the minister indicate who that permanent deputy is going to be, and, if he is not able to do that, when we may expect the appointment to be announced?

Mr. Claxton: That is really a matter for the Secretary of State for External Affairs but I can answer from my own knowledge that no selection has yet been made, and we do not know when one will be made.

Mr. Fulton: I am sure the committee will appreciate that any member discussing national defence at the present time can only do so on the basis of his own information, and it is extremely difficult to form any sound opinions in view of the extremely rapid changes which appear to be taking place in the over-all picture of defence policy, particularly with relation to the Atlantic pact conference in London. I am sure the minister will appreciate also that in the remarks which I, at any rate, will make this afternoon, although it is difficult to discuss matters of this kind and not to make a statement that at least appears dogmatic, whatever the result may be I am not trying to criticize his department but desire to secure an understanding of what our policy is. As I said, I do not wish to be critical, but I must say that I for one find it most difficult to get a clear picture of our defence policy, or whether any decision has yet been made as to the over-all constitution of our forces and the clear role which they are to fulfil, particularly with respect to joint Atlantic defence. It has not been made clear yet whether we are able to outline a policy of building up forces in accordance with a set design which is clearly formulated in the minds of defence officials. It is the answer to those questions which has been concerning me, and the questions which are raised by that consideration which I should like to discuss.

In approaching the matter this afternoon I shall confine my remarks mainly to an attempted analysis of the statements made from time to time by the minister and suggestions as to what it seems to me those statements mean, in the hope that if my analysis is wrong the minister will correct me and that, in the process, we can get some indication of what our policy is. In his statement made on March 17 this year, when he introduced his estimates, the minister dealt first with the meetings of the Atlantic pact countries. At page 851 of Hansard he is reported to have made the following statement:

> The defence committee meeting at Paris received reports on this work and arrived at unanimous agreement on the following:
> 1. A strategic concept for the integrated defence of the north Atlantic area.
> 2. The means to be taken to arrive at a program for the production and supply of armament and equipment.
> 3. Co-ordination of planning between the various regional groups.
> 4. Additional steps to further defence planning of the North Atlantic treaty organization.

Then he went on:

> Since the Paris meetings, further action has been taken in the various regional groups.

As the minister himself pointed out in the course of the next few paragraphs, work in the north Atlantic group was being continued permanently and further meetings were taking place later that month. He himself left during the month of March for meetings of the military committee and the defence committee at The Hague on March 24, 27 and April 1 respectively. Those meetings were held subsequent to the minister's statement, and I should like to ask him whether he is able to tell us what has been done with reference to the four headings he gave us on which he said unanimous agreement has been reached.

As I read them, those four statements are merely over-all statements of policy. What I should like to know is whether the defence committee of the Atlantic pact nations has been able to agree on any concrete measures by means of which to apply its policy; and particularly I should like to know if the minister can tell us in at least a general way what has been done to implement the decision he has referred to under item 2, namely, the means to be taken to arrive at a program for the production and supply of armament and equipment. It certainly appears that one of the most important decisions to be taken and then to be implemented is on this question of the unification of our arms production program. If the minister was able to say in March that agreement had been reached at that time on the means to be taken to work out a program for the production and supply of armament and equipment, I hope that he can tell us now what steps have been taken as a result of that decision.

On several occasions the minister has told us in the house that Canada has not yet accepted any formal commitment under the North Atlantic pact and therefore that he could not tell the house what was the role of our armed forces with respect to the pact. He has also, however, told us on several occasions the role of the various elements of our forces with regard to domestic defence. I hope that he can now perhaps carry the picture a little bit further forward and take us with him in telling us whether, as a result of those meetings at The Hague and the recent meetings in London, we are any closer to getting a picture of what is to be Canada's role under the integrated defence program of the Atlantic nations.

I refer there, of course, particularly to the communiqué issued after the London meeting and referred to by the Secretary of State for External Affairs the other day, when it was said that a decision had been arrived at to the effect that rather than each country of the pact having its own completely balanced forces of army, navy and air force, there should be joint balanced forces, with each of the member nations contributing that portion of the forces which its own position best qualified it to contribute. I am wondering therefore whether the minister can tell us whether any decision has been reached with respect to this country, as to what part of the joint Atlantic community defence forces will be Canada's main contribution. I use the phrase "defence forces". I realize that it might possibly be held that Canada's main contribution is not in the way of armed forces alone but rather in the way of armament, equipment and research. But I am using the phrase, in asking what contribution Canada is to make to the joint defence forces, I hope in a sense broad enough to include the question of armament production and research.

Coming to the question of immediate domestic defence, I should like to ask the minister whether he can give us any assurance or reassurance about what is being done to provide adequate defence for Canada's Pacific coast. The hon. member for Nanaimo —I realize that his opinion may not be fully shared by the minister, but I certainly do not hesitate to quote it as a qualified opinion— has stated in debate on this subject in recent years that there was a large defence gap on the Pacific coast, and that that defence gap consisted of Canada's British Columbia coast. I do not think that the point raised by the hon. member for Nanaimo at that time was fully or completely answered by any of the statements made since. The remarks just made by the hon. member for Three Rivers seemed to me to reinforce the argument which the hon. member for Nanaimo had advanced on previous occasions. In his statement on March 17 the minister gave us the present composition of our naval forces. This may be found at page 859 of Hansard. He stated:

> In the R.C.N. we shall have in commission on the west coast the cruiser Ontario; the destroyers Athabaskan, Cayuga and Sioux; the frigate Antigonish; the Algerine escort vessels Rockcliffe and Sault Ste. Marie; the auxiliary vessel Cedarwood; and the patrol craft 724.
> On the east coast we will have the aircraft carrier Magnificent; the destroyers Micmac, Huron and Haida; the weather ship St. Stephen; the frigate Swansea; the Algerine minesweeping vessel Portage; and the motor minesweeper Llewellyn.

In looking over that picture, it seems to me it is obvious that the naval force on the Atlantic coast is a much more integrated force—and I hope I shall not offend any of my friends of the navy because I realize that I am not familiar with naval terminology.

Mr. Claxton: You are doing very well.

Mr. Fulton: It seems to me that it is a much more integrated task force, if that is the correct word, or potential task force than we have on the Pacific coast.

Again to refer to this question of antisubmarine work, my understanding of it is this, although I must confess it has been to some extent shaken at any rate by what the hon. member for Three Rivers has just said. My understanding of the current theory with respect to antisubmarine naval requirements was that the force was built largely around an aircraft carrier, and that the naval aircraft from this carrier did a large part, if not the main part, of the work of spotting the submarines which were to be destroyed. If I am at all correct in that understanding, it would seem to me that we have at least the elements of a composite antisubmarine task force in our Atlantic naval units, but we have not the necessary elements, or hardly any of the necessary elements, on the Pacific coast. Therefore I come back to the question, do we intend to close that gap with respect to our defences on the Pacific, to which the hon. member for Nanaimo referred?

In his review of our domestic defence program the minister did point out that we were doing very much indeed to integrate the active army brigade groups and the active air force training, particularly with respect to northern defence; that we had made great progress in that direction, as shown by Exercise Sweetbriar. Well, no one should in any sense suggest that we should pay less attention to that aspect of our defence program, but I hope I may be allowed to lay before the minister as strongly as I possibly can the suggestion that we on the Pacific coast certainly feel that our defences in that region should not be neglected entirely as the result of an exclusive or over-emphatic concentration on northern and Arctic defences. I should like therefore to raise the question of the defence of our own installations in the Pacific area.

As the committee may know, the three main ammunition depots on the Pacific coast are in the vicinity of the city of Kamloops. We have the air force depot, the naval magazine depot and the army ordnance and ammunition depot. These are three very considerable establishments. The naval one particularly, I believe, is the largest of its kind in Canada. It does occur to me that in the event of hostilities these would be very likely targets of an attack on Canada. I should like the minister to indicate to us, if he can, without going further than he wishes for security reasons, as a part of the approach to the Pacific defence, what steps or plans are taken in the department for the defence of these three depots.

Dealing particularly with the role of the army in the domestic defence picture, the minister said, as it is reported on page 859 of Hansard of March 17:

> The role of the army is equally clear. It is to provide the forces necessary to meet an immediate attack on our country any time and any place. To do this we have organized a brigade group, a highly mobile, hard-hitting unit. More than half of this group consists today of well-trained, experienced, tough soldiers.

I am sure that all hon. members were very glad indeed to hear the minister report that progress made in the training and equipment of our brigade group; but I am reasonably confident that the minister will agree with me that, although this brigade group may be able, as he said, to fill the role which he himself laid down for it, namely, to provide the forces necessary to meet an immediate attack on our country any time and any place, yet it is not sufficient of itself to meet more than one initial attack, and that if the initial attack were multiplied, if it should come in more localities than one, then by its very nature a brigade group would not be able to deal with a diversified and sustained attack. Therefore I hope the minister will agree with me that in so far as Canada's own forces are concerned, to meet that type of attack—and I fully realize that in the event of a large-scale attack we will have to rely on, and would certainly receive the support of, the United States—in considering this problem from the viewpoint of Canada, it becomes obvious that in meeting, ourselves, any large-scale and diversified attack we do need a highly trained and immediately available reserve force in addition to that mobile permanent force brigade group.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Therefore I should like to refer to what the minister himself said on page 859 in analysing further the role of the army. He said:

> In addition to seeing to the immediate defence of our own territory, our forces must act as the organizational and training nucleus for the development of the largest forces we can develop to play our part where they may be needed. A large part of the personnel of the army—all the reserve units and a very large portion, certainly more than two-thirds of the active forces—are concerned with this side of the job.

I would like the minister, if he can, to give us a statement on the state of preparation, the state of manning and training of the reserve army. This may be an exaggerated concept that I am about to put forward, but I think it is the sort of thing we should work toward. That is, that the reserve army should not be the type of reserve army we have had in the past, and I am in no sense attaching any blame to anybody in what I say here. The picture has changed. But I do not think the type of reserve army we have had in the past meets the requirements of today at all. I visualize our requirements as calling for a reserve force in which almost literally every man has his number and his place in the unit and, as it were, his place in the barracks, in stores, and has a rifle and complete equipment, so that the procedure of mobilizing a reserve army and of fielding at least an initial reserve force would not be one of six months but rather of six—I was going to say six weeks or six days—that within a matter of days we would know where each man was to complete a unit, and that each man would have his own equipment allocated so that the man and the equipment could be conjoined immediately and the forces fielded. I realize that is easy to say but difficult to accomplish. I realize too it may involve a higher degree of training for our reserve army, but I hope not a higher degree of training than I visualize.

I should like the minister to make a statement on the present status of the manning, training and equipment of our reserve army, and what program is in mind for bringing that reserve army up to that category of an immediately available field force.

I should like to refer to some of the implications, on the broader basis, of the statement made recently by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and in the communiqué issued following the Atlantic pact meetings in London. Here of course one does get very much into the realm of the uncertain. But the impact of these statements on the thinking of the people of this country has been very considerable. On the one hand, we hear some who suggest that what was done at the Atlantic pact meeting was not more than a statement of broad general principles of no immediate application. But on the other hand there are those who say, and with a good deal of foundation for their statement, that the decisions taken at the Atlantic pact meeting involved an immediate and very substantial change, or necessity for a change, in our defence policy. If the committee will indulge me I should like to read at some length from a Canadian Press article which appeared in the Montreal Gazette of June 7, the day following the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in this house. The Canadian Press reporter says:

Atlantic pact arms developments in the next few years hold a strong possibility of working big changes in Canada's forces and in plans to send overseas a third expeditionary force mainly composed of infantry in any new war, informed quarters said today.

Within five years, they said, the use of massed infantry could easily be obsolete. Such military efforts as the tight, tough land battles in Italy and the D-day landings in Normandy would be ruled out by the violence of mass destruction weapons.

This trend is of obvious and vital importance in view of Russia's stress on land forces, her almost unlimited ability to reinforce them and her relative immaturity in the scientific and technical fields.

Then the article continues:

Defence officials here—

And this carries a dateline at Ottawa, June 6.

—said scientific advances now are moving towards push-button warfare at a pace which has defence headquarters constantly examining plans and revamping them.

Canada's plans to contribute are largely secret but may, it was learned, lead to loan of scientists, to work on guided missiles and rockets and to use of remote Canadian soil as ranges for testing those developed by Canada or her allies. Some secret projects now are on Ottawa drawing boards.

Then, skipping one or two paragraphs, the article continues:

Mr. Pearson said yesterday the pact's acceptance of the principle of balanced collective forces may mean new applications of scientific warfare and "abandonment of the old concept of defence by great masses of infantry . . ."

And later:

It doesn't mean that Canada would definitely not send another expeditionary force overseas. It does mean, however, that the proportion of infantry in any overseas force would be considerably less than before. In their stead would be the skilled technicians who handle rockets and missiles. The infantry division, as such, might vanish or be sharply altered.

The last paragraph states:

It is a "reasonable assumption," a reporter was told, that for the first time a new war would not be started the way the last one ended. The infantry's relative importance would drop and there would be a larger proportion of manpower dispatching mass destruction weapons.

If one examines this in relation to the minister's statement of March 17, I think several questions arise. I am not suggesting that the statements in this article must be taken as a statement of defence policy, although I do point out that it is a Canadian Press article, refers to government sources and statements of defence officials, and that the article originates in Ottawa. On March 17, as reported at page 856 of Hansard, the minister said:

Our planning must look several years ahead. On the one hand we must start work in time to produce the results in personnel and equipment when they are likely to be needed. On the other hand, we must avoid starting things now which might involve us in future commitments for the expenditure of money which might then be needed for other defence purposes of greater priority.

One may recall that only a couple of years ago in discussions on defence matters it was indicated by the minister, and such other statements of defence policy as were made, that the thinking of the department was to the effect that we should not commit ourselves at the present time to any definite form of armed services, that is to say to any permanent division of effort as between the three services, nor should we commit ourselves to any permanent line of equipment for fear that we might embark upon programs which would be obsolete, or at least obsolescent in a couple of years, when perhaps an emergency might arise and we would need those forces and equipment.

When one remembers that that was the defence policy only two years ago—and I believe it was the same last year—then in the light of the statement to which I have just referred I think a very definite question arises as to what has brought about the change of policy, and the present policy in the department which places such great emphasis upon the expenditure of money for the acquisition of equipment as though—and I think this is the only inference that can be drawn—we have now decided what will be the design of our forces and what basic equipment—indeed, in some cases what detailed equipment—we shall go in for.

I recall that only two years ago it was indicated that defence thinking was that there would be no war in the immediate future as a result of deliberate planning, that no country was contemplating waging a deliberate war, that we need not contemplate such an event for at least ten years, but that with the various tension spots around the world such as Berlin—it was the main one at that time, and perhaps still is—and with the various encroachments of communist imperialism in one country after another new tensions might arise, that there might be an explosion and that a war might result more or less accidentally.

The theory was that such accidental war would be fought generally along the same lines as the one just concluded. There would be certain developments of certain techniques which would be carried to further perfection as a result of the last war, but that generally speaking such accidental war in the few years immediately ahead would be along the lines of the last one. It was urged therefore that we should not make too early a decision as to new techniques, new weapons and new formations which would form a permanent design for our defence forces. It was felt that their use would not be likely until the development of something more deliberate, and that such could not take place until some ten years in the future.

What has caused the change in emphasis? What has brought about the change in policy in the Department of National Defence which results in the emphasis now being placed upon the purchase of equipment? Let me point out that so definite was the earlier policy that we should not begin too soon to build up a permanent design for our forces and equipment that there was indeed a good deal of criticism. I am sure the minister is used to criticism, and that he is particularly used to it when it comes from the source from which I am now about to quote. But the point I wish to establish is that the policy to which I have been referring, a policy of wait and see, was so firmly established and maintained that considerable criticism resulted therefrom in the newspapers, in the press, and indeed in the House of Commons.

The Montreal Gazette, of March 17, 1948, carried an editorial in which it pointed out the danger of too rigid adherence to the policy of wait and see. This editorial is headed "Small But Efficient". I believe some of the principles laid down in the editorial are so sound that it might be well to place them before the committee at this time. Referring to the fact that in the view of this writer the insistence upon a policy of wait and see resulted in inefficiency in the design of our forces, because the men were not being equipped with what they should have, and because the very purpose and design of the forces was not clearly laid down, the writer had this to say:

> This is not to say that the inefficiency of the forces comes about from their own failure to make the most of the opportunities that have been provided for them. But it does appear that they are not being furnished with every chance to attain true efficiency. For the only real test of efficiency in modern war is the adequacy of the new means to the new ends. It seems that since 1945 very few new weapons have been provided to keep training in close relations with a rapidly developing reality. Some of the hesitation in providing the modern equipment would seem to come about from a chronic sense that something a little newer and better may be just around the corner. This feeling is well founded, as no weapon, however new, will ever remain unimproved.

Then continuing:

> But the hesitation in providing modern equipment would seem to have deeper causes. There are evidences of a lack of decision as to just what purpose our armed forces are supposed to serve. Are we to have an offensive or a defensive force? Which of the three armed services is considered to be of paramount importance? Is our primary aim to defend our own borders from attack? With which of our allies is the co-ordination of our arms most important?

> The idea of a small and efficient force, if it is to be stated at all, could be stated as that of a "small but efficient force." The efficiency, in short, is the only justification of the smallness. There is no virtue or value in smallness as such. And yet there appears to be a very real danger that the smallness will be left to itself. And, from the figures, it seems that even that will be very small indeed.

I have read that to show that only two years ago the emphasis, in so far as it could be gathered from the statements by the minister and others in the defence department, was on "wait and see." The idea seemed to be that no deliberate war—if I may use that word—was likely for at least several years, perhaps up to ten, and therefore we should not go too fast in laying down a permanent design for our forces and adopting permanent equipment with which they would be finally armed.

Now the emphasis is all on bringing our requirements up to need, on equipping or catching up with the backlog of equipment for the forces which we have in existence. On several occasions in March the minister referred to the heavy proportion of our defence expenditures which was going to equipment, and I quote from page 852 of Hansard of March 17, 1950, where the minister is reported as follows:

> The greatest shortage is equipment as other commitments have so far prevented much production in quantity. We appear—

I am adding the word "now":

> —now to be spending in proportion more on equipment than the other countries.

And then I quote from page 856 as follows:

> In 1948, 12 per cent of the total appropriation was spent on equipment; in 1949, 24 per cent and in the coming year it will be 28 per cent. This trend reflects both the increasing cost of fighting machines and the importance which is attached to having up to date weapons in the hands of our services. It is, I am sure hon. members will agree, a desirable and proper approach.

In other statements the minister has made reference to the fact that the reason why our defence spending is as heavy as it is now is in large part the fact we are spending so largely on equipment. I should like to ask now why there has been what can be described only as a change in policy. Is there any change in the approach of the department to the concept of our defence requirements or the dangers which we face and which make necessary this change in policy in so far as equipment is concerned? Are we closer to an actual threat than was thought to be the case only two years ago when the other policy was formulated?

There are just one or two particular matters I want to refer to before I conclude and these arise out of the fact that we are spending so heavily on equipment. The hon. member for Nanaimo has referred already to the dangers inherent in our heavy commitments with respect to the purchase and construction of the United States jet fighter, the F-86. On March 17 the hon. member made this statement as reported on page 863 of Hansard:

> The proposed production program which I understand, according to press reports, will see the F-86 coming into production either at the end of this year or in 1951, raises serious doubts in my mind as to whether it will not be an obsolescent machine before it comes off the line. These doubts are reinforced by the decision which I understand has been taken in the United States in which orders for an improved type of Sabre, the F-93, have been cancelled. Doubts have been expressed in leading aviation papers in the United States that the F-86 will ever become a practical interceptor. I do suggest that money should have been saved to this country if the R.C.A.F. had continued to use the improved Vampire types during the interim until our own CF-100 becomes generally available, which I gather, from the remarks made by the minister this afternoon, will be toward next year.

The grave doubts cast by the hon. member for Nanaimo in his well-founded statement on the wisdom of equipping ourselves with F-86 machines has not yet been cleared up by the minister. In view of the current emphasis on uniformity in arms production it seems to me that those doubts are further accentuated, particularly when we understand that the United States now regard this particular jet as obsolete. Is Canada to be the only country using this fighter while the United Kingdom and other Atlantic pact countries, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Nanaimo, are adopting the use of the British Vampire and Venom machines, of which we already have the basic type here? It does seem to me that we are making a mistake in adopting the United States F-86 instead of using the up-to-date British jet fighters until our own are ready for delivery in Canada.

Mr. Claxton: I think I should say at once that there is no truth in the report that the United States are dropping the F-86.

Mr. Fulton: I hope the minister will deal with that.

Mr. Claxton: It was anticipated and dealt with before in the house.

Mr. Fulton: I hope the minister will deal with it at some greater length after this general discussion is completed.

Mr. Claxton: The matter has already been covered, but I shall go into it again.

Mr. Fulton: I do not think so. The final question I wish to raise is being raised at this time because it concerns large numbers of people in this country. First I should like the minister to state whether the Canadian war graves in Europe come under his department?

Mr. Claxton: They would be under defence.

Mr. Fulton: On the permanent headstones and crosses of the graves of Canadian soldiers who died in the last war there is no reference to the unit to which they belonged. This matter has been referred to before in a question and answer on the order paper. I am sure that other hon. members as well as myself have received reports about this from former members of the forces who have visited the graves of relatives or friends, as well as from relatives of soldiers who are buried overseas. The Canadian graves seem to be the only ones where no mention of the unit is made on the headstone or cross. Some of these reports have been couched in quite strong language. I am not going to use the same language because it seems to me that this is a matter which is bound to cause distress to the relatives of those who are buried there. Therefore I think the more moderately one can discuss the matter the better. My feelings are very strong. I do not really see any justification or reason for the identity of the soldier not being preserved, and it is regarded by those who served in the units that their identity existed—I will not say was submerged—with that of the other members of the unit with whom they served. It is only proper and fitting that such identity should be preserved on the headstone memorial marking their last resting place. It is a matter which I know has caused grave distress to many of the relatives in Canada.

I make no apologies for bringing it up at this time although, as I say, I am going to deal with it in as moderate language as I can. Nevertheless I say to the minister that I feel very strongly about it, and I know I represent the views of many others who feel equally strongly that there is no good reason or justification for it, and that the policy should be immediately reversed. Those who go to the burial grounds of Canadian soldiers overseas know so well the traditions, ideals, fortunes and adversities which their relatives shared with their fellow members of the same unit. The first question they ask is: Where are the members of the Edmonton regiment? They look for some reference to the regiment to assist them to find the burial place of their own relatives. It comes as a distinct and distressing shock to them to find that no reference to the unit is embodied on the memorial stones.

I think the minister should, and I hope he will, review the policy and change it so that the name of the unit may be carved on the headstones marking the last resting place of those Canadians who fought with and were proud of their units. A nominal roll by units of those who rest there should also be preserved in the records of the graves.

Mr. Dickey: Perhaps first of all I might say to the minister that I am not one of those who agree with the point of view expressed earlier this afternoon by the hon. member for Trois-Rivières concerning the fleet air arm of the Royal Canadian Navy. It is true that the operation of our aircraft carrier and the fleet air arm generally is expensive. Looking at it from that point of view alone, it is perhaps not too difficult to conclude that there might be some justification for a reduction of the expenses involved in the operation of that service. I think, however, that point of view does not take into consideration the development of operations and policies in naval services throughout the world, and the particular role that the Canadian navy will be called upon to play in any future hostilities. In spite of the fact that it is expensive I think we must keep a naval air arm and provide it with adequate facilities and the necessary equipment and training to maintain it as an efficient fighting force.

Consideration of naval air policy brings me to the main reason for my saying anything this afternoon on the defence estimates. I wish to refer to a problem dealt with earlier by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, the airport facilities at Eastern Passage, Halifax county. The airport at Eastern Passage is the main operational and training base for the fleet air arm, and is known as H.M.C.S. Shearwater. Everyone will fully appreciate that as a military base the Department of National Defence must see that it is an efficient operation, that its facilities are what are required for the immediate purposes of the service, and that its utility to the service is not unreasonably affected by any other consideration.

I should like to point out to the minister that ever since this airport was constructed at Eastern Passage as an air base for the R.C.A.F., it has also been used as the only civilian airport serving Halifax and the whole of the central section of the province of Nova Scotia. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the Department of National Defence must take into consideration the use of that airport for civilian purposes ever since it was brought into operation. Turning for a moment to the use of the airport for military or naval purposes, I should like to point out to the minister that, while the airport may be suitable for the main use to which it is being put at the present time by the naval air service, the landing of carrier aircraft, it is an unavoidable conclusion that developments in military and naval aviation are going to be in the direction of heavier and larger planes. I think that the Department of National Defence must see the necessity of having facilities for a purely military or naval airport in the Halifax area which will be immediately able to accommodate exclusively military traffic of all types in the event of an emergency.

The fact is that the facilities of the Dartmouth air base are apparently not suitable now to carry present military traffic of the heaviest type, and, unless considerably improved, certainly will not be in a position to take care of the military traffic which it may be required to handle in an emergency within even a very few years. From the civilian point of view the airport is not capable now of accommodating civilian traffic of a heavy type, and in this field development is also bound to be towards the use of larger, heavier and more economical planes. I would submit to the minister that the Department of National Defence, from a purely military point of view, in the near future will have to make some provision in the immediate Halifax area for the accommodation of much heavier aircraft than are being used by the fleet air arm at the Eastern Passage base. The other departments of government should, at the same time, consider the provision of facilities of a civilian nature for the accommodation of heavy aircraft traffic.

I am going to ask the minister to give us an assurance that the request will be considered, which I have already made to him in correspondence, that the officers of his department consult with the officers of the Department of Transport, and if necessary the officers of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and investigate carefully the immediate and future requirements for airport facilities in the Halifax area. If these requirements, both military and civilian, can be met by an extension or improvement of the facilities of the airport at Eastern Passage, and if such extension can be carried out and the airport's use for civilian traffic continued without unreasonably restricting the use of the airport for necessary military and naval purposes, then we request that his officers co-operate with the officers of the other departments concerned in carrying out such improvement and extension. If after careful consideration by all the departments concerned it is not felt that the extension or improvement of this airport at Eastern Passage could be carried out to conveniently provide the facilities that are required, then we ask the officers of his department to give any assistance which may be necessary to the other departments of government in providing additional facilities elsewhere.

The minister is aware that he and other ministers concerned have received a copy of a resolution adopted by the Halifax city council on May 26 last. This resolution, and other communications which have been received by the minister, indicate the importance of this question and the interest which is naturally being taken in it in the Halifax area. I hope the minister will be able to give me the assurance that I ask, and that the consultations which I have suggested to him in correspondence as well as on the floor of the house will take place with the greatest possible speed, so that the unsatisfactory situation which now exists will be dealt with adequately.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, hon. members in discussing these estimates have made a number of comments, and put forward a number of suggestions, and asked a number of questions which should be dealt with at this time. The nature of these would require considerable time to deal with in detail, because a good many of them involve questions of opinion concerning an appreciation of the present situation from a defence point of view, about which there are conflicting views. I should like to try to answer some of the points as briefly as possible.

In the first place, with regard to the effect of the announcement made following the London meeting of the council of the North Atlantic treaty, I think hon. members should read with care the statement made in the house by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on June 5 of this year, which appears at page 3189 of Hansard. He was careful to indicate, in that part of the statement dealing with defence, what the effect of it would be in so far as we could see. He said:

> As far as this government is concerned, in our defence policy we have already accepted this principle and have been trying to relate our policy to the defence of an area rather than merely to the defence of a country. We have been going on that principle and we will gladly do what we can to continue its application.

Now that follows from the nature of the problem of Canadian defence, because our defence has never been envisaged as the defence of Canada alone but the defence of Canada as part of a continent, and indeed the defence of Canada as part of the defence of the western countries which would all be involved in the event of a war for our freedom. It is not envisaged that this principle of balanced forces, forces that will be balanced internationally, will have any immediate effect on our own defence planning or on our own defence program. It must be evident that the only immediate effect of great consequence would be in the case where the north Atlantic powers had a surplus of weapons or of personnel of any particular type. If they have a surplus over all, obviously it would be unwise for any country to begin to construct new equipment that would duplicate existing equipment which is considered adequate.

For example, and I only mention it as an example because this has not received consideration yet, take the case of battleships or cruisers. It is quite possible that the view of those responsible for north Atlantic planning may be that we have enough battleships and enough cruisers. If so it would not be in the interests of total defence of the area to go ahead with the construction of more battleships and more cruisers. That is of course an extreme example, but it is an example of the way in which this will work.

We regard this principle as of great importance, indeed it is implicit in the idea of collective defence principle. It makes sense. But we do not believe it will have any immediate or very considerable effect on our own defence forces, because our defence planning has envisaged the operation of our defences in conjunction with other nations at all times. While I assure hon. members who asked questions on this point that it is not expected it will have any immediate effect on our defence program, I add that we will be ready to sit down with the representatives of the other nations and consider what should be done to attain the best possible results. We will enter those discussions, as we have in the past, with a free mind and with a strong desire to secure the best possible result.

Perhaps I might supplement this by another statement on the question of commitments. The position is just as I have stated it in the house time after time, that is that the undertakings we have made in the North Atlantic treaty, particularly those contained in articles 3 and 5, are of a political character. When my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs referred to those as "commitments", I think the expression "commitment" is equivalent to the expression "undertaking". But when I was asked if we had any commitments, I was considering this question from the point of view of specific military commitments; and I told the house then, as I tell the committee now, that we have not. I am not too sure that the North Atlantic treaty organization will ever develop in a way in which there are specific military commitments. That remains to be seen. It remains to be worked out. But if there are to be specific military commitments, those commitments will be the ones which are agreed to by the government of Canada made known to the parliament of Canada. That is expressly provided for in the terms of the treaty itself.

Mr. Green: Which article contains that provision?

Mr. Claxton: That we are to determine it ourselves?

Mr. Green: No, by parliament.

Mr. Claxton: It is article 11, which refers to constitutional authorities of each country.

With regard to the development of this principle, as I say it is implicit in the very nature of collective defence and the concept of collective defence from the start. It grew out of our own meetings of the defence committee on April 1. A most significant statement on the subject was made by General Bradley in an address given before the executives club of Chicago on April 14, 1950, in which he definitely anticipated the nature of the decision with regard to balanced forces. I will not delay the committee by reading it, but it is an important statement indeed and one which I am sure will carry with it the judgment of all hon. members.

Mr. Fulton: Where is it found? Where is it available?

Mr. Claxton: It appeared in the New York Times for the following day.

With regard to another allied subject which was raised by the hon. member for Kamloops, as to whether our emphasis on the acquisition of equipment has changed, I can assure him that any change there has been in that respect was envisaged at the time when I made the statement I made in the house on June 24, 1948, when I referred to some dangers in defence planning. I said that one danger is that the Soviet union, without any genuine change of attitude, may suddenly appear to be seeking co-operation which might result in a slackening of effort.

And I said that:

> A second danger is that we should come to regard war as inevitable.

And also I said:

> A third danger is that we should commit our future resources to expenditures, equipment and plans that will be out of date when needed.

In that statement I do not think any hon. member can find anything to cavil at for an instant. That was the only basis, as far as I know, for that "wait and see" editorial of the Montreal Gazette of March 17, 1948. I must say that that editorial and similar statements are typical examples of first distorting what I said and then criticizing me for the distortion. I think our attitude on this matter has been perfectly plain.

May I give an example. We have a large number of anti-aircraft guns in Canada. They are of the most modern type at the end of the last world war. They are still good guns. They could be modified with the addition of types of equipment at a cost of about $180,000 a gun. The question is: Is that type of gun going to be useful five years from now, and should we incur the expenditure of $180,000 a gun in respect of this particular weapon? That is a question of judgment on which we have got to take the advice of the experts in this and other countries. If we had at our disposal unlimited sums of money, then of course we should make the modernization just as soon as we could. But since our money is not unlimited by any manner of means, we have got to do the best we can with it. If now we believe that at the end of five years we may anticipate another means of effectively dealing with aircraft, then we have got to balance the pros and the cons and make the best decision we can.

Then with regard to the provision of aircraft and antisubmarine vessels, may I say that we did not proceed with the production of the CF-100 in 1948 and 1949 because the CF-100 had not yet been developed. We knew that it was in course of development. We had been working on it already for two years and we hoped that it would be a successful aircraft. As soon as it began to seem likely that it would be a successful aircraft, we placed an order for tooling, and a preproduction order; and we are now negotiating an order for a larger number of aircraft.

The same thing is true with regard to the F-86. We did not order the F-86 or start production on it because there were not

F-86's in 1947. But as soon as that aircraft had been tested and proved to be successful, we made the decision to go ahead with the production of 100 of them at Canadair Limited.

With regard to the statement made by the hon. member for Nanaimo about this particular aircraft, I must say that the figures he gave as to its performance, when the matter came up in the house before, are not in accordance with the information we have. This is not an obsolete aircraft. I was in the United States not long ago and went with the President of the United States and the Secretary of Defence, the Hon. Louis Johnson, and saw a great demonstration of the air power of the United States at Eglin field in Florida. It is the air proving ground. There we were given a book of photographs of the different types of aircraft. Here we have one of the photographs with the caption:

The air force's B-36, giant intercontinental bomber, beating off an interception attempt by the crack F-86 Sabre.

Then over the page:

The North American F-86 "Sabre," first line operational fighter of USAF tactical fighter groups is paced by the North American B-45 "Tornado," jet light bomber. The "Sabre," fully armed, holds the world's speed record of 670 plus.

This aircraft is the fastest aircraft in production known to us anywhere in the world. Far from being obsolete, it is the first-line aircraft in the United States. The rate of climb given by the hon. member for Nanaimo, when the matter came up before, was quite different from the actual rate of climb. Information about this is restricted in the United States, but I saw this aircraft and three others climb in a demonstration; and I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, that this one overtook the others as if they were virtually standing still.

Mr. Brooks: Can the minister tell us what the others were? It is a matter of comparison. What were the other aircraft?

Mr. Claxton: I can give the hon. member the numbers.

Mr. Harkness: Were they propeller aircraft?

Mr. Claxton: They were the second and third fighter jets in the United States at the present time. With regard to the choice of the F-86 vis-à-vis the Vampire, I have already given the reasons for that in the house. We wanted to have an aircraft made in Canada that could be made according to North American specifications and produced in the event of an emergency here. It seemed to us to make sense that the capacity of the British plants to produce aircraft should be used in Britain and in the other countries in Europe under the North Atlantic treaty. Further, the Vampire to which the hon. member for Nanaimo has referred, if there is one having anything like the specifications he mentions, is still not beyond the development stage. There is not even a prototype yet. We will have the F-86 in production in Canada according to North American standards and specifications before we could possibly obtain the Vampire to which the hon. member made reference.

The hon. member for Calgary East asked me a number of questions with which I should deal. He asked about the two fighter squadrons and whether they were up to strength. Yes, they are up to strength in personnel, and they are up to peacetime strength in respect of aircraft. Then he asked whether the brigade group was up to strength. I can tell him that it is at 80 per cent of the establishment. I might say, since the hon. member has expressed interest in it before, that at the present time we have more trained paratroopers in Canada than landed in the low countries in the German invasion in May, 1940.

Then the hon. member asked if the radar equipment we had was adequate and if the interceptor plans were adequate. I have already dealt with this question at some length in the house before, and pointed out that if we were to endeavour to have an air interception system on anything like the scale they had in England during the second world war we would be putting not only $425 million into defence, but a great deal more, and we would not be doing anything else.

Mr. Harkness: Just so there will be no misunderstanding, I did not ask whether the radar net and so forth were adequate for our defence. As a matter of fact I specifically said that they were not. I admitted it was impossible to produce in this country a defence which was really adequate to the country; that all we could hope to achieve was what you might call a minimum necessity. What I asked was whether the minister's own statement of what was to be provided in the way of a radar net, fighter squadrons and so forth, had been met.

Mr. Claxton: I am very much obliged to the hon. member. I misunderstood him. We are making progress on it. We have a plan under which we will do a certain amount of construction of radar sites and equipment each year. We have on order, in the way of equipment of the latest and most powerful sets, equipment to the value of approximately $25 million. We also have a considerable quantity of mobile equipment, which can be used in any locality at any time.

We are moving ahead with the organization of reserve air force radar units. There is a very successful one in Montreal, as the first, with a strength today of some 500. That is being spread throughout the province of Quebec, with sub-units in Ste. Anne de Bellevue, Sherbrooke, Three Rivers and Quebec city. That will be followed by the establishment of similar units in Toronto, Vancouver, and in other places. We have acquired the building necessary for the unit at Vancouver, and the organization of the unit will be proceeded with at a very early date.

Mr. Green: What building is that?

Mr. Claxton: It is a building formerly used as a club in the centre of the city.

The hon. member for Three Rivers asked about the justification for the Magnificent. He was rather opposed by his colleague, the hon. member for Kamloops, which just indicates—

Mr. Fulton: No, he was not opposed.

Mr. Claxton: I think the record will show that whereas the hon. member for Three Rivers questioned the desirability of having one aircraft carrier on the east coast, the hon. member for Kamloops endeavoured to make an argument in favour of having one on the west coast as well.

Mr. Fulton: The record will not show that.

Mr. Claxton: I am sorry if I misunderstood the hon. member.

To answer the hon. member for Three Rivers, the justification for an aircraft carrier in a country like Canada of course is that an aircraft carrier is considered to be an essential weapon today for antisubmarine activities. Whether or not that will be so five or ten years from now remains to be seen, depending on the development of other types of equipment. At the present time I should think that certainly it is the view of everyone that aircraft carriers are necessary for use in connection with antisubmarine work. If that statement is accepted, as I think it should be, the question is, can we rely on having the use of an aircraft carrier from the United Kingdom or the United States on loan in order to enable us to do the training on our antisubmarine vessels. Our view is that since we had this aircraft carrier—it is the property of Britain—since we had a naval air arm established at the end of the last war, we would not be justified in making any radical change in the immediate future, but should carry on with the one aircraft carrier, watch the development of the art, keep up with it, and then if any alternative method of dealing with it, or if this concept of planned forces developed to a very great degree, then we might reconsider the position; but certainly so far as we can see ahead we mean to maintain the aircraft carrier.

With regard to the expenditures on it, the answer to the question put in the house related to the cost of operation of the aircraft carrier only. I think the hon. member mentioned the figure of $4,500,000. My recollection is that that is substantially the answer given. Then he referred to a statement credited to the chief of the naval services in Vancouver that it was costing $20 million. The chief of the naval services has told me that he did not make any such statement. The actual figure for the over-all cost of the operation of the aircraft carrier, including the maintenance of the base at Dartmouth and everything that should properly be included, is approximately $10 million a year.

We could, as has been suggested, operate a destroyer at a cost of $2 million or $2,500,000 a year, but it would not provide nearly the same training facilities for active and reserve personnel; and of course it would mean that we would not have the services of an aircraft carrier for training in antisubmarine work.

Mr. Balcer: Which of the figures must we take? Which is the true figure? The minister said that the upkeep of an aircraft carrier, or its total operational cost, was $4,500,000. The minister then said that the chief of the naval services did not mean $20 million; what he meant was $10 million. There is still a difference of $5 million between the two figures.

Mr. Claxton: No; I am sorry. I did not make myself clear. The cost of the actual operation of the aircraft carrier and of the aircraft is $4,500,000. However, if you include major refits, new equipment and capital cost, it brings the cost of having the aircraft carrier up to $10 million per annum. But the cost of operation—that is fuel, oil, and stores —is $4,500,000.

Mr. Balcer: What about this $20 million?

Mr. Claxton: No figure of $20 million was ever given.

Mr. Balcer: What I read was a Canadian Press dispatch.

Mr. Claxton: It was mentioned in the press, but—

Mr. Balcer: And there was another report in the Vancouver Herald of the same date saying that—

Vice Admiral Harold Taylor Grant, C.B.E., D.S.O., R.C.N., Chief of Naval Staff, said Thursday the Magnificent cost about 19 per cent of the navy's $83 million budget. He considered that a definite asset to Canadian naval training, and he also said it cost Canadians about $20 million annually to maintain the aircraft carrier Magnificent, and the navy's air arm.

Mr. Claxton: As I said, the chief of naval staff told me that he did not say that.

Mr. Balcer: Both papers are wrong, then?

Mr. Claxton: Yes, or else the chief of naval staff is wrong in his recollection. However, he told me that he did not give the figure of $20 million.

The hon. member for Calgary East asked for an explanation of the amounts I had given with respect to expenditures on the air force. The table which appeared in Hansard gives a figure of 40·6 per cent whereas in a statement later I mentioned a figure, he said, of 44·8 per cent. The reason for that is that in the second figure I was giving the proportion of the defence dollar spent for the navy, army and air force. That gives the result the hon. member mentioned. However, if you include pensions, grants, defence research and the like, and take them separately, as is done in this table, the result is 40·6 per cent. Pensions, grants, research and so on are applicable over the services roughly in proportion to the other expenditures.

The hon. member then asked as to the state of training in the reserve forces, and what the target was. The target is to have the reserve forces trained up to the standard of the active forces. That is being achieved with officers, N.C.O.'s and tradesmen. However, it takes considerable time, on the basis of present training, to bring the rank and file up to those standards. It is hoped that those standards would be achieved over a period of approximately three years.

As to the state of equipment: the reserve forces have more equipment than they have ever had before. There is adequate equipment of modern types for all units—in fact, most units have more equipment than they have storage space in which to accommodate it.

I was asked about the state of recruiting. The hon. member for Calgary East referred to a statement I had made that recruiting did not need help. What was intended was acceleration. At that time the rate of recruiting in the active force—and I specified the active force—was quite satisfactory. It has been moving along in a satisfactory way for the last three years. Recruiting for the reserve force has been good in recent months. We would like to see it continued and better. We have in the active force 47,000 and in the reserve force 49,000, so that it is increasing steadily. However, we would like to have another 4,000, or 5,000 just as soon as we can get them in the reserve force. I think that in proportion to population Canada has more men in the reserve force than has any other country in the commonwealth. As I have indicated time and again to hon. members, and also to others, we are exceedingly glad to get every possible help we can in recruiting. I have made appeals to that effect to hon. members, to branches of the Legion and to others.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South referred to educational standards for the armed forces. We are in the position that at the present time we are getting men, at about the rate we want them, who have the very high standards we think we ought to get. If we accept men with lower standards we will have to give them in-service education, which will cost both personnel and money, and postpone their incorporation into the units in which they are to serve. It seems to us we should not seek to diminish the standards, but that we should endeavour to raise them as high as we can.

The hon. member for Calgary East expressed satisfaction with the procedure of having officers from North Atlantic treaty countries trained at our expense in the army and air force of Canada. I was glad to hear him say that. He said that the figures were small—only one hundred for the air force and one hundred and fifty for the army.

Mr. Harkness: I said "comparatively small".

Mr. Claxton: Yes, comparatively small. Well, in comparison with the numbers actually being trained, particularly in the air services in other countries at the present time, those are quite satisfactory figures. He also asked how many men we had training abroad. We have as staff and students in service and training abroad 405 officers and men of the three services.

Mr. Harkness: How is that split up?

Mr. Claxton: It is as follows:

Branch of service	Staff	Students
Navy	29	129
Army	54	63
R.C.A.F.	71	42
Defence research board	15	2
	169	236

This makes a grand total of 405.

Mr. Harkness: What countries are those for?

Mr. Claxton: The United States, England and a number of other countries. These include officers and men serving abroad as well as training abroad, because if they are serving abroad they are usually developing useful experience as well as training.

Mr. Fulton: Does that include air attachés?

Mr. Claxton: Yes, there are seven or eight air, naval and military attachés. The hon. member for Calgary East asked about civil defence plans. I have already made a statement to the effect that we have completed a plan of organization at the federal level. I should explain that when General Worthington was appointed co-ordinator of civil defence we had him look into what has been done in the United Kingdom, the United States and other countries. Then he went about to discuss the matter with the provinces. Following that we worked out a basis for a plan with all the government departments concerned. At the request of the provinces General Worthington put before them the results of that work. That part of the operation has just been completed but late in the summer or early in the autumn we propose to get together the representatives of the provinces in order to carry forward the organization at the provincial level. As we envisage civil defence we consider it largely a matter for co-operation of the closest kind with the provinces, and through them with the municipalities.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South and the hon. member for Halifax referred to the airport at Dartmouth which at present is operated as a land base for the fleet air arm. The airport is quite adequate for that purpose but if aircraft heavier than 60,000 pounds are to land the runway strips would be damaged and major damage would be caused. There is an item in the estimates this year for the maintenance of the runways and we will endeavour to keep them in condition in order to maintain the existing use.

With regard to developing the airport or increasing its size and capacity, I shall be glad to discuss again with the representatives of the Department of Transport the possible desirability of increasing the capacity of the airport along the lines suggested by the senior member for Halifax, both today and in correspondence, and also by the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

The defence of the Pacific was raised by the hon. member for Kamloops. I think it is axiomatic that a country like Canada can be defended only as part of the continent. It is obvious that we are in the fortunate position of being well to the east of lines of defence which include Japan and the islands to the south and the Hawaiian islands, and Alaska in the north. We are not in the same exposed position in the Pacific as we are in the Atlantic. However, the approximate size of the fleets and their distribution are much the same. The concept of coastal defence by static means seems to be passing out. It is much more likely that coastal defence will be secured by the operation of aircraft that are largely shore-based, and by the use of amphibian aircraft. On that account we are keeping our hands on the base at Patricia Bay and the other airfields, and are maintaining the air force establishment at Vancouver.

The hon. member for Calgary East asked about the progress made in standardization. We have made great progress in the standardization of procedure and battle orders and the like with the United States and also with the United Kingdom and other countries of the western union. There is now a generally accepted system of communications and battle procedure which would enable the forces of the countries of the North Atlantic pact to operate together. As a matter of fact, as hon. members know, great progress was made in this respect by the end of the second world war and that progress has been continued since. We can operate, certainly without any difficulty, with the forces of either the United Kingdom or the United States. Exercise Sweetbriar showed clearly that the staffs and the communications systems and everything necessary to operate armed forces, even under the difficult conditions of the sub-Arctic, could work together very well. I think I have covered most of the points raised by hon. members. If not, I am sure they will bring them to my attention.

Mr. Fulton: There was one matter in connection with Pacific defence I should like to have cleared up. I did not say that we should have an aircraft carrier on the west coast. I was simply asking whether I was right in assuming that aircraft carriers were an integral part of the antisubmarine task force. I then went on to ask what would be done to bring the Pacific antisubmarine defence up to at least a par with the Atlantic. The minister indicated that they are part of such a task force and answered my question in part, but I should like him to deal with the matter of naval units on the Pacific coast.

Mr. Claxton: If we had more money to spend on defence and if we did not have to do other things that have greater priority I would like to have an aircraft carrier on the west coast as well, but, as has been indicated, that would cost $10 million a year and our view is that one is better than none.

Mr. Fulton: Is not a great part of your cost in maintaining shore establishments and headquarters and could not a second carrier be maintained without duplicating entirely that expense?

Mr. Claxton: Our experience is that because of the geography of Canada there is a necessity to have the forces divided between the Pacific and the Atlantic. The overhead and operation in each case is separate and distinct. You must duplicate virtually every service. If Canada was fortunate in having only one major naval establishment we could reduce that overhead substantially, but as it is now we have to duplicate the dockyard machinery, equipment, personnel, stores, magazines and everything else on each coast. There is a considerable amount of duplication which is inevitable because of the geography of the country.

I shall look over my notes and if there is anything further I can deal with it at eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, I should like to refer to page 3237 of Hansard for Tuesday, June 6. The hon. member for Peel is reported as saying, in reference to myself:

> He has no question of privilege; he is just trying to make another speech.

I am reported as having said:

> I know, but I shall not be long.

What I said was—

Mr. Fulton: Did you say all that?

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): —"I know it will hurt but I will not be long".

Mr. Graydon: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): Just a minute. Let me finish.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Graydon: I understand that the proceedings upon which the hon. member is about to comment were held when the Speaker was in the chair. I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that this is not the time for the hon. member to raise his question of privilege.

The Chairman: The point of order is well taken.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): If it is well taken let me finish.

The Chairman: Order. It is a matter to be dealt with when the Speaker is in the chair and not in committee.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): Well, get the Speaker.

The Chairman: Shall item 202 carry?

Mr. Harkness: No.

Mr. Claxton: I told the hon. member for Calgary East that I would check my notes and answer all the points that he and other members of the opposition raised. In addition to the other points the hon. member mentioned before, he referred to the position of western Germany and Spain. Surely that is a matter for external affairs and one of general foreign policy. I can assure him that the status of western Germany and Spain are matters of great concern to the North Atlantic treaty nations and as he indicated himself they are thorny questions. I do not think he would wish me to express any view on them at this time.

Mr. Harkness: What I said was that if the defence chiefs of our services had expressed any views on these matters I thought the committee should have the advantage of them.

Mr. Claxton: These are matters which concern not only ourselves but France, the Netherlands, Belgium, Luxembourg, the United Kingdom, Denmark, and all the other nations under the North Atlantic treaty. It would not be proper for me to express any views to the committee at this time with regard to the question raised by the hon. member. I do not think that would help the situation, which is one that has to be worked out over quite a long term in conjunction with our allies. As the hon. member indicated, they are "thorny" questions, and I am not in a position to make any further comment.

In the same passage of his remarks the hon. member referred to a new strategy to the effect that we should not simply attempt the liberation of the countries of western Europe after they have been overrun. I can assure him that there is nothing new in that. That has been the view of the countries of the western union since it was formed, of Benelux and of the North Atlantic treaty nations ever since their inception. There would not be very much point in the alliance of the countries of western Europe if it simply provided that after they were overrun by an aggressor they would subsequently be liberated by other countries.

Mr. Harkness: This is the first time it has been definitely stated.

Mr. Claxton: I do not know whether or not it was stated before in the communiqués issued by the North Atlantic treaty powers, but certainly it has been implicit in the North Atlantic treaty organization from start to finish that we would endeavour to organize and perfect a system of defence so that we can defend our freedom and that of the other countries with which we are associated in the best place to defend it, wherever that may be.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would the minister permit a question on that point? I should like to refer to an article written for the London Observer and printed in the Globe and Mail of June 2. It is apropos of what is being discussed. The article reads in part:

It is impossible to overrate its importance.

The reference is to the importance of the decision made.

It commits America, Canada and Britain, no longer only to the rescue of Europe but to the defence of Europe.

I do not suppose it was ever consciously said that previously it was only for the rescue of Europe, but is it not correct, as has been repeatedly stated since the London decision, that this decision now brings it much nearer the realm of practical policy?

Mr. Claxton: I think it may be so that this is a decision on a question of principle which will help to assist the north Atlantic powers to achieve what was their object before. Nevertheless it was always their object to defend each other. That is stated in the treaty, and one of the undertakings therein is to come to each other's defence if any one is attacked.

Then the hon. member for Calgary East asked what has been done with regard to the provision of tracked vehicles. I can tell him that work with regard to the development of tracked vehicles of a suitable type is being carried on in Canada at the Ford Motor Company and at Churchill. We are continuing to work on our own types of tracked vehicles, but we also hope that in consequence of the experiences of the exercise we will develop even better tracked vehicles in co-operation with the United States.

Mr. Harkness: May I ask if any increase has been made in the number of tracked vehicles provided to the active units of the permanent force?

Mr. Claxton: Not yet, no. We have tracked vehicles of the type I mentioned in my previous remarks on this subject available for issue if we should have an exercise of this type or the opportunity to use them again.

The hon. member said that the disasters in Winnipeg and other places showed the need of civilian organization. I believe that is a matter for the provinces and municipalities across Canada. But I can assure him that at no stage of the operations, either in Winnipeg, the Fraser valley, Rimouski or Cabano, was there any indication that there was any failure on the part of the federal government agencies, including the armed forces, to co-operate with the civilian authorities. We propose, in consequence of these experiences, to develop further the doctrine of aid to the civil power in the event of emergencies, which has I think admittedly worked so well in these cases, and also extend to the provinces and municipalities the result of our experience with regard to disasters of a civil character not related to an emergency of the nature of war. What we aim to do is co-operate with them, and work with them in every way possible.

Then the hon. member asked about progress with regard to United States-Canadian procurement. A statement was made about that in the house.

Mr. Harkness: I said that.

Mr. Claxton: Yes. It represents a very great step forward. In consequence of the announcement made in Washington that authority had been given to permit the procurement of $15 million to $25 million of defence equipment in Canada, we are endeavouring to negotiate with representatives of the United States to see how the matter can best be dealt with, and what items can best be made available.

Mr. Harkness: What I asked was, in a general way, what sort of equipment, material and so forth would be produced by Canada and sold to the United States; and what, in a general way, would be the type of thing the United States would produce and sell to us.

Mr. Claxton: That is one of the questions that have to be explored. There is hardly any type of equipment that Canada could make which has not already been produced by the United States.

Mr. Harkness: That is one of the reasons I asked the question.

Mr. Claxton: On the other hand, there are many types of equipment which we could produce in Canada just as economically as they could be produced in the United States, provided we got an economic run to permit us to arrive at the lowest possible price. What those items will be depends on negotiations. We could, for example, produce any type of guns up to possibly the 105 in Canada just as economically as they will be produced in the United States, if those guns were required in large numbers. On the other hand, it might possibly be more economic for us to acquire heavier equipment, heavier motor vehicles, from the United States. Our general aim is to achieve a rough kind of balance with regard to defence procurements from both countries. At the present time we have under purchase from the United States components of the F-86 totalling $11 million, plus a great deal of other equipment. We would like to see that figure balanced by similar United States purchases of equipment from Canada, but that is a matter of negotiation. The announcement made last week in the United States resulted from a considerable period of negotiation.

The hon. member referred to the total amount we were asked to vote, and said we were committing parliament to $625 million. The actual amount sought by these estimates is, of course, $425 million. No other cash appropriation is sought under these votes, but we do ask an additional current commitment authority for accounting purposes of $54,245,696, and then future commitment authority in respect of future years amounting to $144,181,470. That is in order to permit us, with some authority from parliament, to make long-term contracts for the production of aircraft, shipbuilding, electronic equipment and so on, which cannot be produced within the current fiscal year. That applies to a great range of defence equipment, even cloth and uniforms for the armed forces. The actual amount sought is $425 million.

Mr. Harkness: To clarify that, does it mean that, including the vote for the research branch, we are being asked to make commitments for this year or future years of an extra $200 million, approximately?

Mr. Claxton: No, sir; the money that must be found for any commitment must be found out of each year's appropriation. On the other hand contractors would like to have some authority at least back of the contracts which we make with them extending beyond the current fiscal year; that is the effect of the future year's commitment authority. It enables us, for example, in the case of aircraft to undertake a program extending over a period of several years; but in respect of the payment to be made for each year, we must of course obtain appropriations from parliament.

Mr. Harkness: I had quite a long discussion with the minister last year over the appropriateness of having the future commitments included. I shall not go into that again at the moment. Nevertheless, I think he will agree that the general effect of these commitments, which he says are to enable him to place contracts more readily, is to make it appear that the present session of parliament has entered into commitments for approximately $200 million.

Mr. Claxton: That is always subject to the money being voted by parliament year by year. The appropriation for this year is $425 million.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then, what is the real need for them? Would any contractor refuse to take a contract if you were not able to point out to him that you had this authority, as you say, for what it is worth? It is not worth much, if you can imagine an appropriation not being voted. When I first heard of these future commitments, I was rather impressed by them. The more I think of them, the less I am impressed by them as either proper or appropriate.

Mr. Claxton: With regard to the propriety, I can assure the hon. gentleman I did not introduce this practice. It was done in order that we might plan defence in a sensible way over a period of years, and so that the officials of the treasury department and finance department could see what would be involved in future years' commitments in respect of contracts undertaken this year. It strikes me that is a desirable thing to do. It does not obligate parliament later to vote the money, but it does indicate to the contractor that parliament is likely to vote the money. I have never heard of parliament refusing to vote money for such a purpose before.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is what I was going to say. It seems to me it works against this.

Mr. Claxton: It seems to me it does put on the department the responsibility for planning its future commitments over a period of years. For example, in respect of the sum of $144,181,470, about $50 million odd is applicable to the year 1951-52; $41 million to the year 1952-53; $27 million to the year 1953-54; and $24 million to the year 1954-55. It therefore provides for an orderly way of defence planning in order to achieve treasury control.

Mr. Harkness: If I might just comment on that matter for a moment, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that a commitment of this sort either binds or it does not bind. If it does not bind, it is of no value whatever. If it does bind, it means that we are in effect voting a further $200 million, approximately. The minister evidently thinks that it has some value. If it has any value, it must have some value to bind us to make these commitments. In that event I think we have got to get back to the original point that I brought out and mentioned when I spoke this morning and immediately after the noon adjournment: that is that we are in effect this year voting about $625 million, $425 million of which is to be spent immediately and the other $200 million of which we are to some extent, at any rate, bound to expend.

Mr. Claxton: In order to comply with the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, before we can have a contract we must have a commitment authority. In order that we may have a contract extending beyond the current fiscal year, we must have a commitment authority extending beyond the current fiscal year. The alternative to doing it this way, I suggest, would be to make a contract, let us say, for ten aircraft in respect of 1950-51. We would then arrive at a price per aircraft that would be fantastic. Then towards the end of that year, as we got authority from parliament, through the appropriation, we would make a contract for another 50 aircraft to be produced in 1951-52, and so on. The proposal practice permits us to conform with the terms of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act and to make a forward commitment which will enable us to secure the advantage of a continuous run so as to secure an economic price. I understand this is also done in the Department of Public Works which is about the only other department having a similar problem.

Mr. Harkness: I am not arguing with the minister as to whether the practice is valuable or whether it is not. On the basis of his explanation, it would appear that it was a valuable practice. Without studying it further, I cannot subscribe to it. Nevertheless, as I say, it would appear that that is the case. The basic point I think is this. Whether it is good practice or whether it is not, the practical effect of it is that we are in effect committing ourselves to expenditures of $625 million rather than $425 million by this action.

Mr. Claxton: But the hon. gentleman must be fair. In respect of the year 1950-51, the only commitment and the only money available for expenditure by the Department of National Defence is $425 million. In arriving at the size of the estimates for next year, as was done in the case of the estimates this year, we had to take account of our forward commitments that had been made previously as authorized by parliament. Parliament has full control over the cash; but it makes sense for us to be able to make a contract in respect of deliveries and possible payments beyond the current fiscal year. I suggest that is fundamental to defence procurement.

Mr. Harkness: I quite appreciate what the minister has said and I agree that the actual amount which it is estimated will be spent this year will be $425 million. There was just one point that I do not think was quite correct. The minister said that is all that they can possibly spend. In item 202 this language is used: "to make commitments for the current year of $438,178,000", not $384 million as appears in the column on the right-hand side, and "commitments for future years of $141,123,670". As I read the thing, the department, if it wanted to, could spend not $384 million under this item but $438 million.

Mr. Claxton: No, sir. I am sorry, but the hon. gentleman is not right. All we can spend is the money voted by parliament; which is, $425 million. But in order to facilitate the work of the department and also to comply with the provisions of section 29 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, we can make from moment to moment commitments up to an additional sum of $54,245,696.

Mr. Harkness: That is for this year?

Mr. Claxton: That is for this year. We can make commitments but we cannot spend anything more than $425 million. The reason for that is to permit us to deal with this kind of situation. In the preparation of the estimates of a department like Defence, every unit commander must provide let us say, for the fuel of his unit: coal, gasoline and so on. He puts in an item which will be, he estimates, sufficient to take care of anything that may be required. There is no extra factor included. There is nothing for contingencies. He puts down, however, a figure which he is reasonably certain will take care of the requirements of his unit for that year. If all the units put in figures on that basis, the average experience of the units will be less than the expectancy. If we did not have this additional commitment authority, around about the month of January or February we would not be able to make commitments against unencumbered funds in respect even of salaries, wages, pay and allowances, and food because of the necessity for each person ensuring that he has enough to get by with until the year is ended, irrespective of the actual experience that year. By this means, therefore, I think we can secure the greatest possible safety and also the greatest possible economy under the control of parliament over the total sum appropriated. Otherwise we would have a larger estimate to do the same work and an extremely large unexpended balance at the end of each year because of the nature of the defence operations.

Mr. Harkness: I have not been arguing here, Mr. Chairman, against the necessity of these things. I say they may be quite necessary. But as I understand the minister's explanation of this last point about this $54 million, the actual fact is that under this item the department is able to incur debts of $54 million during the current year. In other words, they can run up bills, just the same as you and I might do at the grocery store. If we did not have enough money to pay our bill this month, we would have it run; and if we were still short of money next month, we would have it run during that month, and we would always be assuring the grocer that, come March 31, we would get the money and be able to pay him the amount of the bill. It seems to me that that is the position this $54 million is in. Under this item the department is given authority to run up a bill of $54 million which, of course, will be paid when we vote the estimates for the next year, 1951-52. Therefore the total effect is that in addition to voting this $384 million we are making a commitment to pay a further $54 million.

Mr. Claxton: No, I am sorry. We do not incur liabilities toward the public in excess of the money made available by parliament. This is only done by seeking an extra appropriation by a supplementary estimate, but this is purely to conform with section 29 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, to enable a contract demand to be made in respect of things that are needed, despite the fact that other demands may have been made which will subsequently be found not to be necessary.

Mr. Harkness: The minister himself used the example of a unit commander running up a bill for fuel in January and February.

Mr. Claxton: No; these are estimates. We build up our estimates on the basis of what each unit and service need. They are built up and they are criticized on every level and then they result in a total.

Mr. Harkness: The minister used an example of a unit commander running up a bill for fuel.

Mr. Claxton: No, not a bill, an estimate. He makes an estimate of what fuel he will need in respect of the approaching fiscal year, and he must play safe, of course. He puts in the average amount that can be expected to be spent in that fiscal year. Our experience is that over the whole realm of the defence expenditures the amount of the estimates put in in that way is not actually expended because of the safety factor that each person puts in, even though there is nothing for contingencies. Therefore it is the way in which we carry out economies rather than the reverse.

Mr. Herridge: I do not consider myself qualified to make comments or criticize the technical application, distribution or use of defence funds. It is sufficient for me to say that I have every confidence in the minister in the administration of his department; but I do rise, Mr. Chairman, because I was particularly interested in some remarks made this afternoon by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I wish to draw to the minister's attention a case similar to the one he mentioned. While I may not be an expert on military matters, I think I am quite competent to raise my voice as a member of this house to defend the civil liberties of the soldier and the civilian.

On my return home from the last session of parliament I was told by several people in my constituency that there had been a visit from someone in the army to a certain district with respect to a man who had long service in the forces. The general gossip in the village was that he was going to be discharged because he was a member of or sympathetic to the Labour-Progressive party, or something of that sort. I understand that later this man was discharged, and his discharge certificate read: "Not likely to become an efficient soldier". Later, on protests being made, that certificate was altered so that there was no objection to the terms of the discharge. I want to bring to the minister's attention the facts of this case. This man served four years in the first world war; he served five years in the second world war; he served five years in the permanent forces after the second world war. Then his department discharged him as not likely to become an efficient soldier. I think that was most unfair to that man in view of the fact that unfortunate gossip was general around the village and it was completely unfounded.

If an official of the minister's department goes to a small village and visits the butcher, the baker and the gas station operator and tells them why he is there it takes only twenty-four hours for everyone in that district to know what he was there for. I rise on behalf of that man, who served his country well. Fortunately the mistake has been corrected, though of course there are still some people who think the former gossip had some foundation.

As a matter of fact, this man is altogether unpolitically minded. I do not think he would realize the essential difference between the policy of the Progressive Conservative party and the policy of the C.C.F. I wish he would. I have talked to him on several occasions without any effect. He is one of those members of the working class who still have a great deal of faith in Toryism.

I wish to bring this matter to the attention of the minister because I think great care must be taken to prevent that sort of thing being done by an indiscreet official who visits a small village or community. I do hope that the greatest care will be taken in a case like this and in cases such as those mentioned by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, where there are supposed grounds for suspicion. I realize the necessity for security and support every care being taken to protect our defence arrangements, but I do ask again that great care be taken in a case like this, particularly in small places, because these things are not easily forgotten, and in this case a grave injustice was done to a very decent chap indeed.

Before sitting down I want to mention to the minister that several representative groups in my riding and responsible individuals have suggested to me that I bring to the minister's attention the fact that they are particularly interested in some permanent plans for civil defence. It has been mentioned to me that even if a skeleton organization were established so that these men could be getting some training they could be used in such emergencies as flood disasters and fighting forest fires. Even if there were a skeleton group of some organization they would gain experience in training and all the rest of it, and they could be used in the local district to support the forest branch in the event of forest fires, and other emergencies.

I should also like to return to the matter with which I dealt yesterday, namely, the question of chaplains in the defence forces having commissions. The minister explained the situation very well, and I am quite satisfied with his explanation to me at that time; but I want to repeat that I have met a large number of men of the three forces, and a good many members of the major religious denominations in this country, and some of the clergy of all the major denominations, who have expressed to me the opinion that it is not in the best interests of the men in the armed forces, and not in the best interests of the church, for the chaplains to have commissioned rank.

I should like the minister to advise the committee what are the pay allowances and what cars are provided for the chaplains of the honorary ranks of colonel, major and captain.

Mr. Claxton: In reply to the hon. gentleman I can assure him that on the facts that he has disclosed to the committee it certainly was a very improper note to put on anyone's discharge certificate. If he will draw the case again to my attention—I think he has done it before—I will make sure that everything possible will be done to ensure that such action is not taken in the future.

[Mr. Herridge.]

With regard to the chaplains, they have no cars. They have the pay of their rank, which I can give it to the hon. gentleman if he so wishes. Whatever it is, it is the same pay as any other officer holding the same rank would get.

Mr. Drew: I propose to have some other remarks to make, but there is one point I should like to clear up in regard to the section of the audit act that has been referred to. There has been constant reference to section 29 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act. I would ask the minister if that is not in error, and if it should not be section 39?

Mr. Claxton: I shall be glad to look into that.

Mr. Drew: It is section 29 in the printed estimates.

Mr. Claxton: I am rather inclined to think that the leader of opposition is correct. I shall check it up.

Mr. Drew: Unless there has been an amendment of which I am not aware, section 29 refers to the appointment of the Auditor General, and nothing more, whereas section 39 is the section which refers to payment upon warrant by the minister, and appears to be the section to which reference is made in item 202.

Mr. Claxton: I shall send for the act and check it up.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few observations of a general nature. I am not going into any involved discussion on training or equipment. I got a lesson in that in the autumn of 1939, when the second war broke out, which I think will do me for the rest of my life. I was asked to go to a meeting of members of my old battery, and I found that they were terribly anxious to be allowed to do some training with the new units.

As I listened to them for a little while I began to laugh. They said, "What are you laughing at?" I said, "I am trying to imagine what you would have felt like in 1915 if you were told you were going to be taught by veterans of the South African war." I never made such a successful argument in my life. They dropped it like a hot potato, because they realized that our war in 1914-18 was several years further removed from the second war than our war from the South African war.

However, I should like to say something about the general situation. We are engaged here in the voting of hundreds of millions of dollars for defence. To me it is an astonishing thing that there should be comparatively little interest throughout the country in this matter. I go further and say it is astonishing that in a democracy apparently in peacetime we cannot prepare for either peace or war.

After the first war I was one of those—and they were regarded as rather a queer lot—who tried to do something for the League of Nations Society. But you could not get people interested in peace. They were bored with it then. They would not do any work about it. I think it is reasonable to say, looking back, that if people had been more keen about it something might have been done.

Today the difficulty is greater, and I have no doubt whatever that those who are trying to do work for the United Nations are having the same trouble as we had twenty years ago —and probably more. On the other hand it is extremely difficult to get people to be interested in the question of defence, as we understand it. It is for that reason I am on my feet this evening. I should like to make a few observations because I think that that is where this government and parliament comes in.

The fact that we had a report made to us a few days ago by the Secretary of State for External Affairs raises the question as to whether we are not stepping into an entirely new phase in the matter of defence. I have one or two paragraphs I should like to read on the point. I wish to suggest that we think it is terribly important that the government somehow or other should let the people know about this. I do not know how they can do it, unless they let us know. If defence is going to be the private enterprise of the cabinet, and if the cabinet is not going to take the House of Commons into its confidence, then how much less will they be able to take the people into their confidence, and how much chance will the people have to realize the seriousness of the estimates which we are here about to discuss.

I should like to read briefly from an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail of Friday, June 2, and, I have no doubt, in other newspapers. This is written by a responsible authority, although the author remains anonymous. It is headed "Defense of the West", and is written by "A Student of Europe". I take it that it is serious comment, because the article is a "special" to the London Observer and the Globe and Mail. First of all the writer says this:

> Now the Atlantic treaty nations have "resolved by their united efforts, to build up a system of defense . . . capable of withstanding any external threat directed against any of them."

The article then states that there are two historic decisions, and he proceeds to set them out.

> This is the first of the historic decisions taken by the Atlantic treaty council. It is impossible to overrate its importance. It commits America, Canada and Britain, no longer only to the rescue of Europe but to the defense of Europe. It further commits them to build by "united efforts" with the western Europeans, a unified system of defense.

And one further thing I should like to read:

> How will this Atlantic defense system have to be shaped to be effective? Some useful guidance can be had from a book which, by an odd coincidence, appeared on the very day of the Atlantic council's decision, Defense of the West, by Mr. Liddell Hart. He was writing long before that decision, and some parts of his book are outdated by it; but his main argument gains added pertinence.

Summarizing the rest of it he says, in effect, that it is not going to be numbers that count. He points out that a few German armoured divisions with 200,000 men overran the whole of Europe and defeated millions of opponents. He then goes on to make very definite suggestions as to changes in military preparation which are involved in the present situation.

The only reason for my bringing this up is that we have had differences of opinion as to how much information should be given to those of us in the opposition and, indeed, to private members on the government side. But I do suggest to the minister that if he desires, as I am sure he does desire, that the people throughout the country should take this matter seriously and understand the importance of it, then he has got to begin by taking it seriously in this House of Commons.

I should hope that he would bear in mind what has been said before to him, that it is quite impossible for members of parliament to make up their minds for themselves—and by that I mean, something more than just saying that the minister is a good fellow, and that everything is all right in his hands. It is easy enough to do that, but it does not enable us to know what is being done or to answer the questions we will be asked when we return to our constituencies.

There is another thing which the present method does not cover. I said to a newspaper friend of mine this afternoon, "Do you think there is any real interest in the matter of defence?" He said "People cannot be interested in millions". What he meant was people have to have something definite and practical in which to interest themselves.

I do suggest earnestly to the minister that, with this new situation before us, and with the new problems which have to be faced, the minister should consider—even reconsider—whether it is not possible that this House of Commons might be given much more information than it has been getting. I am not overlooking the question of security. No one but a fool wants things to be told that should not be told. But on the other hand no one who is living in this world today can doubt that the great part of what we are doing is known to the Russians as well as it is to ourselves.

Of course we do talk much more frankly about these things than we did a few years ago. I think the minister should be more realistic in thinking about it and not merely back away from it, and give us what is inclined to be a service view. Years ago, during the first war when there was a question of information being given, a very responsible journalist commenting on this and on the withholding of information said, "We all know that there are many things which must not be told and we expect those things to be withheld. But, on the other hand, we can well imagine that there is a certain type of serviceman who says, 'What, the public wants to know? Well, damn them, they won't know' ". It is that kind of thing that we want to be protected against, both from the serviceman and, quite frankly, from our political associates.

I said I was going to be brief. I think I have covered all that I wanted to say. I take my seat saying this: We are being asked to spend—I will not haggle at the moment about a mere couple of hundred million; I will leave it at the lower figure—$425 million, which is quite a bunch of money. We in the opposition feel, and are entitled to feel, that unless we are taken into confidence more than we have been we cannot vote on this in an intelligent manner, by which I mean that we cannot make up our minds on direct evidence which is the only proper way for even semi-intelligent people to make up their minds.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, I should like very much to enable the hon. member for Greenwood to get the kind of information on which he can make up his mind; I should like to do that, but I just do not know how to do it. Day in and day out we have been subjected by the opposition to the charge of withholding information. Today some hon. members opposite said that we had held off presenting the estimates for the department of defence until the end of the session for some obscure purpose, which no doubt they were implying was a wrong one.

I want to tell this committee that I do not know of any information that has been withheld except that a year and a half ago when the hon. member for Calgary East asked for the strength of a parachute battalion which was trained and ready to face the enemy. I think that is the only specific question that I said I could not answer on security grounds, in addition to one or two others of a similar nature. On the advice of my advisers I felt that it was not in the interests of our country to give to any prospective enemy the one bit of information he wanted. Apart from that, time has been spent unreasonably with the suggestion that we are withholding information, time that might have been better occupied in requesting information which I would have been glad to give.

With regard to the consideration of the estimates, may I say that in the years I have occupied this position, that is since the end of 1946, the discussion of the estimates of this department has not been curtailed by the lapse of time on any single occasion in any one of those years. It has ended when the questions that were put, which were not rhetorical questions but those seeking information, were answered and there were no more questions. I feel that this committee is entitled to get everything possible, and that has been my view right through. If there is anything that we can give that we have not given, tell us so that we can give it and not keep on saying that you have not information that you have never asked for.

Comparisons are frequently made, and properly so, between the practice in this house and that in Westminster. If hon. members will look at the debates of the House of Commons of the United Kingdom they will see that four days were set aside for the discussion of the defence estimates. They will see also that the discussion proceeded very much as it has this afternoon, with few inquiries for specific bits of information but a good deal of observation and suggestions, a good deal of puzzlement being indicated. That is all quite proper because these are puzzling and difficult times. But in the end the parliament at Westminster did not get anything like the quantity of information that is given to this parliament in respect to defence estimates. I do not try to justify our position because we have no position except to give everything that is reasonably possible. But I do say that when we are continually charged with refusing to give information when the information is not even asked for, then I think we ought to get on to the next question.

With regard to the observations of the hon. member for Greenwood, the hon. member for Calgary East and the hon. member for Kamloops, may I say that these are difficult times indeed. It is very difficult for us to know exactly what the next ten years will hold. We cannot report history until events have taken place. But the same difficulty occurs in every country. Our desire is to work together with those other countries in order that we may make the best possible use of the resources put at our disposal by this parliament, speaking for the people of Canada, for the defence of our country, and not only of our country but of all countries with which we are allied.

I suggest that that is our object, and I am sure that that is the object of all members. I am sure that that is the desire of the people. Contrary to the views expressed by the hon. member for Greenwood I believe that the interest in defence has never been greater than it is today. I believe that the support for national defence throughout the country has never been greater than it is today. By reason of that support and by reason of that interest we are having very considerable success in the development of our reserve army as well as of our active forces. They are people of whom the Canadian people can well be proud.

I would be only too glad to deal with these questions in any way in which they can be dealt with properly according to our rules and in accordance with the decisions of this house, but I really must resent the continual suggestion that I am withholding information. If hon. members feel that I am doing that, then I assure them that it is for no other reason than that the uncertainties that are ahead cause one who is in a position of responsibility to be pretty cautious about his prophecies for the future.

If you look at the discussions in congress or in any of the other parliaments of the commonwealth you will see that there has been expressed exactly the same point of view as was expressed by the hon. member for Greenwood. I must say that I feel sympathy for his point of view, and I think he sympathizes with me in mine.

Mr. McLure: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to make any lengthy remarks about defence, but I was interested in hearing the hon. member for Greenwood say a few moments ago that there was no interest in this country in the estimates now before the committee. I shall go a step further and say that there is very little interest in them in this house. Between 4.00 and 4.25 this afternoon I counted the number of members in the house. At that time there were 14 Liberals, 10 Progressive Conservatives, 2 C.C.F.'ers and 4 Social Crediters, a total of 30.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): How many committees were meeting at that time?

Mr. McLure: You will have your chance later on. That shows the amount of interest taken in these estimates. I was glad that the minister said that now we can get an answer to any question we like to put to him. I have two or three questions concerning defence, and he can answer them very quickly. When his estimates were up a year ago I asked him at that time about the naval barracks to be built at Charlottetown, and I got a very interesting answer. He said that it was under consideration and I could look forward to seeing them built almost before I got home. I should like to ask him the same question again. In this vote of $384 million is there anything for the naval barracks at Charlottetown?

I also asked him a year ago about the armouries and he gave me the pleasing answer that it was under consideration. Charlottetown was the second place where armouries were to be built. Then a short time ago I asked the minister a question with reference to the bombing range off the north shore of Prince Edward Island. I had previously asked the Minister of Fisheries the same question because the interests of the fishermen of Queens county were involved. The Minister of Fisheries had no answer for me at the time but his parliamentary assistant gave an answer that did not answer the question in any way at all. About ten days later I asked the Minister of Defence the same question, and he said his answer was the same as that given by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Fisheries. That was nothing, so I had two nothings. I am asking the question once more because the fishermen of Queens county are nervous about the matter. They are wondering whether they will have a bombing range in the neighbourhood of their best fishing territory off the north shore of Prince Edward Island. Surely we can get some information whether it is going to be within the three-mile limit or outside the fourteen-mile limit.

If it is outside the fourteen-mile limit I would not have much to say about it. If it is just outside the three-mile limit it will be the ruination of the best fishing grounds on the north side of Prince Edward Island, which provides a living for a thousand families. I cannot see why they desire to have a bombing range there. Is it only because the R.C.A.F. unit want a range nearer to their base? There is a range off Chatham. It is marked as a danger zone, and it is only a few more miles for them to fly over there where they can conduct their bombing practice. I would like the minister to give a definite assurance to the fishermen of Queens county in Prince Edward Island as to where the bombing range is to be placed this coming summer.

Mr. Claxton: As to the naval barracks, as I told the hon. member, there are three places in Canada out of twenty-one naval reserve divisions where new barrack accommodation is needed. Charlottetown is one of them.

Mr. McLure: Good.

Mr. Claxton: As I told the hon. member before, just as soon as we can reach Charlottetown in the order of priorities we will try to provide adequate accommodation there. In the meantime the naval reserve division has very good accommodation in Charlottetown. It so happens, however, that the provincial government, from which we lease it, wants it back, and we are anxious to accede to their desires as soon as possible. The need of the army for an armoury was also referred to by the hon. member. In proportion to the number involved the army needs more armouries than the navy needs barracks. We have acquired several armouries during the last year and commenced the construction of one new one. We are commencing the construction of several others. The last time I was at Charlottetown the impression I got was that for the short term Charlottetown is rather well off because the armoured unit had been moved out to the gun park and the other units were able to use the space left which they found ample. That is not a long term solution, but having regard to the needs of other places that appear to be greater it struck us that Charlottetown was in relatively good condition.

As to the bombing range, we are working with the Department of Fisheries and the people on the spot to try to secure an area which will be adequate for bombing and firing practice, and which will not destroy the best fishing territory off the maritime provinces.

Mr. McLure: Will it be within the three-mile limit or without the fourteen-mile limit? That is what they are anxious to know.

Mr. Claxton: We are working on that now. The hon. member for Kamloops raised a question of considerable interest and importance that I have not dealt with before, the matter of headstones on Canadian graves. I think it was first raised recently in an article in the Vancouver Sun and another article in the Victoria Times. It was raised first in the house by the hon. member for Nanaimo. Since then I have had it looked into, and it was found that in 1946, when arrangements for permanent headstones on Canadian graves were being made with the imperial war graves commission, instructions were given that resulted in infantry and armoured corps personnel being described in exactly the same way as members of the artillery, engineers, army service corps and other similar units, without reference to their particular unit but with reference to their corps. The headstones would have the name, number, rank and the Canadian maple leaf. Then if they belonged to the Canadian infantry corps the headstones would have Canadian infantry corps on them in the same way as the artillery would be described as artillery. That was done before I took over this post. On the matter being raised again I have looked into it. I must say, having had a mixed service career in that I was in the artillery, like the leader of the opposition, and before that a member of an infantry unit, I can see both points of view. But I do think that the matter having been raised, and knowing the regimental traditions of the famous units of Canada, including the armoured corps—they are largely succeeding the cavalry—and the infantry, probably a considerable majority of the members of those units, and of their next of kin, would desire to see the names of the units put on the headstones. I found that a number of headstones have been erected with "Canadian Infantry Corps" or "Canadian Armoured Corps" on them, but pending further examination as to the possibility and desirability of what should be done I stopped further erection of headstones. We are actively exploring the possibility of having the names of the units of infantry and armoured corps put on the remaining headstones to be erected, and also replacing those already erected. At the present time that is certainly my own view, that it should be done; and that would be in accordance with the wishes of a great number of the men in the units and their dependents. That action has already been taken, and just as soon as we can secure a report on the situation from the imperial war graves commission, I shall make an announcement to the house. I hope it will be along the lines hon. members would like.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to express immediately, on behalf of all the members, and those who have brought up the matter with the members, their gratification at the sympathetic attitude shown by the minister to that request. I hope the report receives the kind of consideration which will enable the steps to be taken which the minister has indicated he personally favours, namely, the placing of the individual units of infantry or armoured corps on the headstones of the graves overseas.

I should like to refer to the statement just made by the minister to the effect that he feels there is not much justification for the criticism that information has been denied. My attitude towards that question is not so much that we say the minister refuses to answer questions when asked during the course of the discussion on his estimates, as that we are not in a position, owing to the manner in which the estimates are discussed in the committee of the whole, to direct the questions which will elicit the key information we desire. This matter has been discussed before, and I am not going into the details again, but so far as I am concerned that is the gist of the complaint. It is not that if we ask some general question we do not get a general answer. We do. But it is extremely difficult if not impossible under the procedure which we have in the committee of the whole, without any background information, for us to ask those questions which will produce the information we really want concerning the basic defence policy considerations which result in these estimates before us. That side of the problem has not been dealt with by the minister in the statement he just made. I do not think it could be dealt with except by adopting the procedure we have suggested before, and which the minister knows we have in mind; but I shall not press that matter now in view of the earlier decision.

There are some questions which were asked today and which, in the light of the minister's reply, I should like to follow up. I refer particularly to the question concerning the effect on our defence policy of the decisions taken at the London meeting of the Atlantic pact nations. This afternoon the minister said there would be no immediate consequences on our defence planning or defence program. As I recall his words this afternoon in that respect, he said that the formal adoption of the principle of balanced forces would not have an immediate effect on Canadian defence planning, because we have always regarded the defence of Canada as a part of the defence of an area, and the defence particularly of the North American continent. Then he went on to say, with respect to the question of commitments which Canada had accepted under the North Atlantic treaty, that we had undertaken no military commitments. I believe he doubted whether the working out of the Atlantic treaty would involve the acceptance by various powers of military commitments. If we are going to confine the word "commitment" to the dictionary meaning, I suppose that would be an acceptable answer. But surely, Mr. Chairman, if, as we are given to understand, the theory on which the Atlantic powers are working is that there shall be a joint over-all scheme of defence under which one of the powers when attacked will be immediately assisted and defended by the others, that calls for an over-all military planning. Surely it calls for the creation of planning and the preparation, in the initial stages on paper and later I would hope in being, of a joint or composite defence force. If we are to have that defence force which will be available under any one of a given number of circumstances to defend any one of the Atlantic nations which may be attacked, then surely the joint over-all military command must know which nations are going to furnish which part of the forces, at least in a general way. Even though we may say we are not going to accept military commitments in the technical sense of the word, surely we are going to indicate we are prepared to accept certain responsibilities with respect to our contribution to that joint force. It is that aspect of the matter about which we are seeking information. What is the basis of Canada's approach? Which element or elements of the joint force does Canada feel she can best furnish? Which elements do the other nations with which we have been in consultation, and which elements do the Atlantic defence committee, feel Canada should undertake to furnish with respect to that joint effort?

In referring to my suggestion that there had been a change in emphasis resulting apparently from a change in policy with respect to the acquisition of equipment, the minister said that there had been no change in emphasis. He answered the comments I made this afternoon by saying the editorial in the Montreal Gazette to which I had referred was based on an inaccurate interpretation of one of his earlier statements. Mr. Chairman, I did not criticize, nor did I intend to imply any criticism of, the emphasis being placed on equipment. What I did say was that statements made in recent months to the effect that a heavy proportion of our defence expenditure was going towards equipment did indicate to me, on the basis of a comparison with earlier statements, that there had been a change. We are now, as a matter of policy, concentrating heavy expenditures on equipment, whereas earlier we had said, and the minister referred to the statement he made two years ago which I think substantiates it, that in this changing world we should not commit ourselves to any formal design for our forces, or any substantial commitment on equipment, because we might find when we needed it in an emergency we were saddled with equipment of an obsolete type.

Mr. Claxton: I have not said anything of the kind.

Mr. Fulton: That is certainly my interpretation of the minister's own statement of 1948 which he himself referred to. I cannot see any other. As I recall the gist of his remarks at that time, he said that we should not undertake any heavy expenditures on equipment—and I am really just trying to interpret or paraphrase what the minister said. I hope he will correct me if I am wrong. I hope he will explain what he did mean. As I understood him, he said we should not make any heavy outlays with respect to equipment which might result in our being equipped and armed with weapons which were obsolete at the time when an emergency arose and when we might require them.

I am afraid that I cannot be satisfied by the minister saying that he did not say that. He may not have said it in those words but certainly it seemed to me that was the implication of what he said in 1948. I ask the minister this direct question. Is there not an increasingly heavy emphasis being placed in this year's estimates and in the forecast for next year's estimates on the provision of equipment? And if it is a heavier emphasis than was placed on that aspect in 1948, what is the reason for the change in emphasis? Is there a change in value? Is there a new assessment of the situation which has brought about the increasingly heavy expenditure on equipment?

Mr. Claxton: I can answer that question quickly, Mr. Chairman. There is no change yet in plan, because what is being done now was envisaged then. What I said at the time, after pointing to several dangers, was that there is a danger of getting large stocks of equipment that will become obsolete. But I did not say that we were not going to get any equipment. What has happened is that we have been using up stocks of equipment that we had left over from the war, and we have to replace them. In addition, aircraft and antisubmarine vessels that we were planning to construct in 1949, 1950, 1951, 1952 and 1953 were still in the design and development stage in 1947, 1948 and 1949. That is perfectly sensible, as the hon. member I am sure agrees.

I did not for a second suggest at that time that we should not require the equipment. But I would remind the house that in 1946 and 1947 it was not possible for us to spend all the appropriation that was voted by parliament at that time because of the rapid expansion of civilian industry and great need for civilian goods. At that time we felt that civilian needs took priority over military needs, particularly in view of the fact that we had considerable stocks left. But the next year that situation had eased and we moved into another period. We are now spending, as I say, 28 per cent on equipment. I should like to be spending more but I still think we are spending more proportionately than most of the other countries with which I am familiar.

Mr. Fulton: Has the minister anything to say with reference to my further question about our responsibilities under the Atlantic pact and how far the joint defence committee may have proceeded in dealing with the question of what countries are to furnish what elements of a joint or balanced force?

Mr. Claxton: There I cannot go beyond what I said before. Up to the present time we have an undertaking to do our best. That is what it amounts to. We are doing what we think it is right and proper for Canada to do at this time. It may be that circumstances will develop which might require us to do more. That would be for parliament to decide. But at the present time we feel that we are doing what we can.

With regard to this question of commitments, surely the hon. member and the committee recognize this fact. Staff planners may tote up a list of requirements in order to meet a possible act of attack or act of aggression in the year 1952 or 1953, showing a requirement for so many divisions, so many tanks, and so many aircraft. Then they look around to see where they can get them. That is a proper and necessary part of staff planning, and that is going on. But when it comes to the actual provision of what will be necessary or what can be done, that is a matter for each government to decide. But the Canadian government will only make decisions of that kind after consultation with our partners, and we will work together with them. We will only be able to implement any decision if we get the consent of parliament. In the United States and in the United Kingdom I have seen, on their records of congress and of parliament respectively, inquiries as to what their commitments were; and exactly the same answers have been given in both countries as I am giving now. We simply cannot anticipate decisions before they are arrived at.

Mr. Fulton: What I was really asking is perhaps answered. The planning under the Atlantic treaty, or the defence committee aspect of it, has not proceeded to that stage. That is the real meaning of the minister's answer, is it not?

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, the members of the North Atlantic treaty organization met in three or four different committees. The council of foreign ministers met at London. The defence committee of defence ministers, met at The Hague, in Paris and at Washington. The military committee composed of the chiefs of staff have met similarly on three occasions. We agree at the end of each meeting on a joint press communiqué and that is issued in consequence of each meeting. That is what is disclosed, and that gives the main gist of the result of the meeting. If my hon. friend will look at the statements made by my opposite numbers, Mr. Shinwell in the United Kingdom, Mr. Pleven in France and Mr. Louis Johnson in the United States, he will see that the statements they make are on all fours, I believe, with the statement I am making about the present stage of defence planning of the North Atlantic treaty organization.

Mr. Jones: The minister intimated that he would welcome specific inquiries for information. I should like to make a specific inquiry about the department's policy with regard to Vernon camp. Vernon camp represents an exceedingly heavy investment for the department. They put in a water system, a sewerage system, a first-class hospital and several excellent buildings including drill halls and everything else. All these buildings have apparently been abandoned by the department. In view of the ideal situation of this camp and the great use to which it was put in the first and second wars, and in view of the fact that both the ground, the climate and the surroundings are ideal for proper training, especially as it is in the interior of British Columbia, and is not as vulnerable as it would be on the prairies or at the coast, I feel that the department has neglected this camp, which is its own asset. I should like to ask the minister if he contemplates, in the increased estimates, making greater use of that camp on a permanent basis and bringing people from the various parts of Canada to be trained there. There are available there facilities for long-range fire, for commando training, for hill climbing, for tank training and for practically every mode of defence training. With the investment that we have represented there, I feel that some use should be made of that camp. I was wondering if the minister has that in mind.

Mr. Claxton: Vernon camp at the present time is certainly being used as a cadet camp. We are keeping up the buildings and are maintaining the camp. At the present time the general policy is that major units, particularly armoured, artillery and infantry, will go to very large camps, to large centres where there are very large ranges, for exercises during the summer months and also during the winter months. Generally speaking, the British Columbia units go to Wainwright, Alberta, where we have a magnificent exercise ground of something like a thousand square miles. That is the general practice. However, we have in mind the natural beauty and advantages of Vernon and there is no intention to give it up, but to keep it going. I will look into the question of further use.

Mr. Jones: Will consideration be given to the city of Vernon being used for exhibition purposes again?

Mr. Claxton: My information is that it is being used now as an army cadet camp.

Mr. Jones: Not all, only part of it.

Mr. Claxton: We will look into it.

Mr. Drew: I raised a question before in regard to this item, which is contained in vote 202. I believe that the minister now has the statute before him. I would ask him if it is not his opinion that it is section 39 that is referred to instead of section 29?

Mr. Claxton: No, it is section 29.

Mr. Drew: Oh?

Mr. Claxton: The section as it appears in the Statutes of Canada, 1930-31, 21 George V, chapter 27 reads:

> 29. (1) No contract, agreement, or undertaking of any nature, involving a charge on the consolidated revenue fund, shall be entered into, or have any force or effect, unless the comptroller, or an officer of the Department of Finance designated by him and approved by the treasury board, shall have certified that there is a sufficient unencumbered balance available, out of the amount authorized by parliament for the particular service, to pay any commitments under such contract, agreement or undertaking which would, under the provisions thereof, come in course of payment during the fiscal year in which such contract, agreement or undertaking is made or entered into.

Section 39 reads:

> 39. The governor general may, for the more complete examination of the accounts of Canada, and for the reporting thereon to the House of Commons, appoint an officer, under the Great Seal of Canada, to be called the "Auditor General of Canada" and such officer may be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund a salary at the rate of fifteen thousand dollars per annum.

That deals with another matter. I think some possible misunderstanding may have arisen since the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act was re-enacted in 1931 and the enumeration of the sections was completely changed. The section I have in mind is 29.

Mr. Drew: If that is so then it of course does give strength to the point that was raised, because this would be quite meaningless unless the effect of the voting of 202 is to commit this parliament to expenditures beyond the figure that is indicated.

The effect of section 29, which the minister has just read, is that amounts cannot be paid beyond the amount actually voted. The result of the wording of vote 202 is that such a limitation is removed, and consequently the whole commitment made by vote 202 becomes the commitment that this parliament approves. The word "commitment" is actually used, because vote 202 reads as follows:

> To provide for the defence forces of the navy, army and air services, and to authorize total commitments for this purpose of $579,301,670 including authority, notwithstanding section 29 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, to make commitments for the current year of $438,178,000 and commitments for future years of $141,123,670 against which commitments it is estimated that actual expenditures in 1950-51 will not exceed $384,932,304.

I submit that the effect of that is perfectly clear. This parliament, by voting this item, makes a commitment of $579,301,670 under this item alone. Then under another item it makes a commitment of $27,983,161; under another item $316,120; under another item, $15,814,215; or a total of $623,415,166. The importance of that is this: Without in any way at the moment questioning the necessity of the amount, the fact remains that we are passing on that amount by this vote, and this vote is one of those votes which appear in a number of places in these estimates which do more than merely allocate money. I might say that that is the stated opinion of the treasury itself. This is one of these cases where the decision of the house to pass the vote carries with it authority to go beyond the amount of the item itself. That being so, we are dealing here with this very large sum. And far from anyone indicating any impatience if a good deal of caution and a great deal of interest is displayed in finding out what lies behind this very large sum of money, there should be an earnest effort on the part of every member on both sides of the house to find out exactly what this money is being spent for or will be spent for and what it will produce; because this is an expenditure on national defence in peacetime such as this country never contemplated in the past.

Whether this amount is required or is not depends entirely upon whether Canada is getting value for the money spent. I must say that the impatience of the minister with the remarks made by the hon. member for Greenwood was hardly in keeping with the actual situation. He said that day after day we hear the suggestion that information cannot be obtained. Day after day this has not been before us. It came before us once during this present session on March 17, and this is June 8. Since that time, when the minister made his statement—there was an opportunity to reply, and only for a limited part of the day at that—this now comes before us. It is my hope that the minister will carry out the offer that he has made, and give us details upon which we can fully discuss this whole subject.

Here we have one item covering $384 million. Then there are two other items I referred to. It is true that at the back of the book we get what are described as details. In the case of national defence these are not details at all. They are not details from which any member of this house can draw any real information unless he is prepared to take the broad assurance that all is well in the best of all possible worlds as administered by the Minister of National Defence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: Of course, it is a very happy thing to have that blissful measure of confidence which is based upon absence of any information.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): We know him better than you do.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration who is doing everything else said that he knows it better than we do.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I said, "I know him better than you do".

Mr. Drew: He knows him better. Consequently because he knows him better he is prepared to take a blanket assurance without any more knowledge than is contained in these statements. That is exactly what I suggest to every member of the House of Commons is something that must be very disturbing to the people of this country, because we are seeing here a commitment for the Department of National Defence alone for a figure larger than was asked for in any ordinary budget up to the years before the war for the requirements of Canada.

Perhaps that amount is required. But there are ways in which this information can be presented to us which would make it possible to discuss these estimates with some knowledge of the facts. The hon. member for Queens referred to a statement last year about a naval barracks. Mr. Chairman, it should not be necessary to bring up an item of that kind in a general way because, if hon. members will look at the estimates for the Department of Public Works, they will find that every item of that kind is covered in detail. One can find out exactly what the Department of Public Works intends to spend on public buildings in each community across this country. Hon. members can direct their questions to specific details in the estimates themselves.

There is no reason at all why these estimates of the Department of National Defence could not give that same information. Let us examine what is regarded as detail in this statement of estimates. For instance under "Navy", the general heading, we find this:

Acquisition, construction, purchase, maintenance, repairs, rentals and operating expenses of properties, $9,920,000.

Does any hon. member know what that means?

Mr. McIlraith: We all do.

Mr. Drew: I imagine the answer that has been given by the hon. member is a fair test of his contribution to the useful discussion of the house. There is no hon. member here who can draw any single piece of definite information from that general statement.

"Acquisition of property"—what does that mean? It means purchase of properties, and in other departments of government that information is set out in detail in a way that we can examine it. Then we pass one to the next item:

Personnel supplies and services: Food supplies, medical and dental supplies and services, clothing and personal equipment, barrack, camp, hospital and miscellaneous equipment, laundry and dry cleaning, $5,770,739.

Stores and equipment; signal and wireless stores, ammunition and bombs, armament stores, mechanical equipment, including transport and spare parts, acquisition, construction and repair and upkeep of ships and naval aircraft, naval and aircraft stores, $38,135,386.

That is the whole of the information we get in what are described as details in respect of the navy.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): Unbelievable! Unbelievable!—that a former brass hat does not understand it!

Mr. Drew: It seems to me that the mascot from the baseball game must have strayed in here unnoticed.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): He is still here for other purposes.

Mr. Drew: The same type of detail is available for the army and the air force. The situation is this—

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): And he is not getting—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I do not believe there is the slightest chance that now or at any time in the future the hon. member who is making these unintelligible noises will make any useful contribution to this or any other debate. I am not going in any way to pay any attention to the comments he is making; and I would suggest that if he cannot understand what is being said he either keep quiet or go outside.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): Oh, wait a minute, wait a minute; Mr. Chairman, this is not a fascist organization. We are in a democratic organization. I do not agree that any man, even though he is the leader of a party that went down to defeat, should suggest anything of that sort—oh no!

Mr. Drew: This is certainly a democracy and I was suggesting that the hon. member remember that it is a democracy and that he should stop making noises of the kind he was making, and either listen or enjoy himself in some other way.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): I can enjoy you.

Mr. Drew: Then the hon. member will have an opportunity for some little time.

This afternoon the Minister of National Defence stated that the information we had received in regard to the effect of the recent meeting in London was going to have no immediate effect on our preparation for national defence. Well, I think it would be well to refer back to what the Secretary of State for External Affairs said three days ago. Either his words were intended to convey some meaning, or they were not. I think hon. members gathered from those words, as the press of the country did, that there had been an important announcement which indicated a new concept of the relationship between the governments of the Atlantic area in dealing with this whole problem of the combined preservation of peace in the face of one threat, and one threat alone.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs said on that occasion:

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, this is no less than the principle of the international division of labour to be applied amongst the members of the north Atlantic community for collective defence. We are now pledged—

Mark that word.

We are now pledged to do within the framework of the North Atlantic alliance what each of us has already been doing within our national defence system. We shall try to agree amongst ourselves which of us is the best able to concentrate on certain types of defence preparation.

This principle may come to mean the further application to defence, new techniques and tactics of scientific warfare; and eventually, possibly, to the abandonment of the old concept of defence by great masses of conscripted infantry, the bulk of which would be reservists called up on the outbreak of war.

That statement undoubtedly conveyed to the minds of many of us, as it very noticeably did to the editorial writers of a number of newspapers across the country, the idea that there was an intention here to allocate to each member nation a particular task that it could best perform in a combined military plan for the defence of our freedom. Then the minister went on to say:

In this planning allowance has to be made for the fact that certain states have commitments which are external to the north Atlantic area. Allowance has also to be made for the specially exposed position of some states to meet an initial attack.

And then the following words, it seems to me, presented to us a new idea of the role of different nations in relation to this pact.

These were his words:

> The acceptance of "balanced collective forces" does not of course imply a strategy by which less exposed countries, or at least countries less exposed to ground attack, can collect their resources of men and material behind the ramparts of sacrifices made by others so that eventual victory can be achieved. North Atlantic strategy cannot mean, and our agreement does not imply, a strategy of liberation after destruction and occupation. There could be no hope for Europe in that strategy because the next time there may well be nothing to liberate.

Then he went on further to say:

> The new principle recognizes, if I may pick out a purely hypothetical example, the waste and futility of one country trying to build battleships, let us say, if there are enough of these already in the navies of other members of the group. This principle in its turn must rest on the firm assurance that the other battleships, if I may continue that example, will be at your service if you need them.

Those words are not open to doubt. Either the minister of external affairs meant that or he was misinterpreting the situation. When he suggested that other battleships be used, obviously he intended that to apply to aircraft and to every defence arrangement. He then went on to say:

> Therefore I think, Mr. Speaker, that this decision in favour of balanced collective forces is of vital importance. Of course it is a decision of principle only. Many bridges will have to be crossed before its application can be worked out in practice.

I think what hon. members had hoped we would hear today was an explanation of how we are going to cross those bridges and when and how this country is going to play its part in that broad concept of balanced forces. Obviously what the minister of external affairs was saying was that this agreement means that we are not again going to be in the position of waiting while sacrifice at some distant point makes it possible for the nations less ready to prepare themselves to defend their freedom. I am simply interpreting in clear terms exactly what the minister of external affairs said—a very important declaration. He pointed out something that should be apparent to everyone today. Unless the nations which join in this are ready to use whatever force is necessary and to use it immediately, there may be no second chance.

Between 1914 and 1918, which is within the memory of many members in this chamber, the German onslaught was held by the sacrifice of the armies of France, of Great Britain, of Italy and of the other allies who were not fully prepared to meet that test. Human flesh and blood paid the price of that unpreparedness in desperate numbers, but nevertheless they were able to hold on those long lines of trenches. The United States came into the war in 1917 and then the combined strength of the free nations overcame the German power.

In the last war the striking power of Germany was infinitely greater in its relative strength. When the time came they turned on France and the low countries. Opposed as they were by highly trained and well equipped British troops, they broke that line in a matter of days, and in weeks Belgium, Holland and France had capitulated. That happened within a time that not one of us ever dreamed a great nation would be called upon to accept defeat. The thing that saved this country and other countries was the incredible miscalculation Hitler made when he turned on Russia, and when Japan attacked the United States and the combined forces of the United States and Russia were brought side by side with those of the nations of the free world. But at that time it was touch and go.

Today science has advanced hitting power to a far greater degree than was known then. The only defence of freedom that is going to be effective is defence that can be put into operation immediately it is required. I fully accept the proposition put forward by the Minister of National Defence that at all times this parliament must be supreme. I do not think anyone challenges that or would challenge that. But the fact remains that the words of the minister of external affairs were intended to convey only one thought, that there was a clear expectation that these nations would stand together and that the decision of one nation not to build battleships when another nation was building them meant that that other nation relied on the nation with the battleships using them.

If a nation relied on another nation to build aircraft and abstained from building them because of that, that abstention would be based on the belief that the nation with the aircraft would use them in the common purpose. If a nation which because of special industrial skill or facilities was able to produce the largest quantities of armoured vehicles and heavy land machines of war and concentrated on that production while others did not, those nations that had not those instruments of war would rely on their being used. The words of the minister of external affairs could have no other interpretation or meaning. In fact, there could be no other meaning behind this agreement which is now regarded as one of the historical documents of modern history.

If that is a correct interpretation then I think this committee must have heard with a great deal of concern as well as regret that we are not to be informed of any changes that are to be made in the organization of our defence forces in keeping with this allocation of special tasks.

An hon. Member: Amen.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): He is just agreeing with you.

Mr. Drew: I must say that I am happy that I have won at least one convert and that I am receiving support at this stage from an hon. member who earlier was unconvinced. This country and the United States are separated from Europe by an ocean which offers us a great measure of protection, but that ocean which separates us from the continental areas also imposes real difficulties of transportation. That is one factor that must be recognized in the examination of this whole subject. In Europe west of the iron curtain there are over 200 million people, people who can provide and who obviously are ready to provide the armed masses which would stand against attack if it should come. What they would require in this allocation of tasks is that those nations which are some distance away should provide those powerful heavy forces which can move at great speed and in compact formation so that they can immediately support, if the dreadful necessity should ever arise, those land forces which are prepared to launch themselves against the land forces of the only enemy that could possibly threaten our freedom. Therefore it seems obvious that on this side of the Atlantic any development of this concept of balanced forces means that in this country we would concentrate on the air force and on fast hard-hitting armoured forces which could be quickly transported to Europe or to any other battlefield that might be found necessary as a result of events of this kind. There are always those who will suggest that when we actually contemplate the reality of these things we are talking in terms of war. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that in discussing it in this way we are talking in the only terms that will preserve peace. One thing that opens the possibility of war at any time is the belief in the minds of the aggressor that those who are strong enough to defend their freedom will nevertheless not stand together immediately to do that job as one combined defence team. The one thing that will preserve the peace for which so many men and women died a few years ago is the belief in the minds of those who direct the only aggressor force in the world today that all the forces of freedom will be immediately ranged against them if they should attempt the aggressive movement of their armed forces.

Unless we are prepared to talk in terms of what this means then we have no right to be dealing in dollars with figures of this kind. When in peacetime we are dealing in terms of $625 million in commitments we can only be dealing with that if we believe that war is a danger, and that the only way we can hope to preserve peace is to make great expenditures of this kind. These expenditures are not for the purpose of having men and women in uniform. They are for the purpose of having men and women in uniform with equipment which will be effective in the event of their being required to use it. In this country today it is only necessary to ask how much of our armed force is in fact a hitting power in being and not simply a hitting power in preparation. Unless and until we have reached the point where whatever armed force we maintain is ready to go into action immediately, then we are not actually carrying out our part of the joint agreement upon which the hope of peace now rests so greatly throughout the world, and that includes those on the other side of the iron curtain as well as ourselves.

In so far as the reserve army is concerned, the Minister of National Defence has spoken about the splendid spirit of those in the reserve forces, and that is something with which every single person will agree. In two world wars, and before that, Canadians have demonstrated that there are no finer fighting forces in the world when they have been trained and equipped to do the job which we hope will never be imposed upon Canadians again in our lifetime. Nevertheless when we look at the reserve army and the money that is to be spent on it we certainly should have a breakdown in these items, as between the active and reserve armies, a breakdown that is clear and understandable so that we can examine what is being done for the reserve army as well as for the active force. When it comes to the reserve army it is not enough simply to have figures of the enrolment in the reserve units. I for one want to know about the attendance at camp of the reserve units, and that is one of the details I propose to ask for. I want to know what the average attendance of the enrolment of the reserve units is, because without that we do not know what the figures mean. The mere entering of a name on the enrolment books does not tell us the story.

At the present time our infantry units, with their great traditions behind them, are carrying out exercises with as high a degree of realism as is possible under the limitations that they must face. Very frequently they carry out their exercises over week ends. They do their drills in the various armouries across the country, and they get their firing practice and other training in camps in varying degrees depending upon where they are. So it is with the other units, but do not let anybody be under the impression that they are getting training which has brought them anywhere near the point that they could be put into the field. For instance, take the case of the artillery. This is the sixth summer after V-E day, and yet in the sixth summer after victory in Europe no firing practice will be carried out at the artillery camps across the country because they have not yet reached the stage where that has become a practical possibility.

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member will excuse me, but his information is not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. Drew: I mean firing practice by units. There is firing practice where men go to camp and are permitted to take part in firing or to see firing, but that is not the same thing as firing in units.

Mr. Claxton: I am sorry, but the hon. member's information is not correct. Units go to camp as units and have firing practice.

Mr. Drew: As units?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Drew: Under competitive firing?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Drew: I will not enter into a debate about it. I will give the minister the information because I made inquiries about it only today. There is no need for us to exchange views on the matter because we can both satisfy ourselves in regard to the point. In so far as this training is concerned, it is not training that has reached the point where there would not be a very long time required to prepare these men for the field. The minister has said that the objective of the training is to bring them in conformity with the active forces as soon as possible, and that is a high objective. We have as fine men and women in uniform as anywhere in the world. On the grounds in front of the parliament buildings a few days ago most of those in this chamber saw the presentation of the colours to the Royal Canadian Air Force. They saw men in drill formation going through movements comparable with any they would see in the guards parade in London, or anywhere else in the world. Nevertheless, no matter how high a degree of skill may be shown in drill or anything of that kind, it does not meet the requirements unless we have those forces actually ready to take their part. I think it is essential that we know what percentage of the forces is immediately ready for active service if they should be called upon, and how many are in various stages of training, so that we who are called upon to vote the money may know what it is we are voting it for. After all, under our system of parliamentary government there is no single thing which so much tests the real functioning of our parliament as the exercise of full control of expenditures. There is no single function of parliament over which parliament has so jealously exercised that control as over the expenditures for the armed forces. It will be recalled that it was the allocation of money for armed forces that began our present period of parliamentary responsibility several hundred years ago. Parliament is in duty bound to find out what the facts are, and in duty bound not to accept broad assurances, no matter what their regard may be for any minister or for those associated with him.

This country has great opportunities to economize, while at the same time greatly increasing its military strength. In this country there is an opportunity for training air forces, and training fast hard-hitting land forces as well. So far as armoured units are concerned, we have the space in which they can train; in which they can move over great distances and gain a sense of manoeuvrability which was such a decisive factor in the last war. It was no accident of circumstance that General Patton made that tremendous sweep up from Brittany, which had such an effect on the whole course of the war in Europe. His armoured forces had been training in the great spaces of the southern United States. They were accustomed to sweeping movement at a speed that had never been contemplated by those trained in restricted areas. In this country men could be trained in armoured vehicles to move hundreds or thousands of miles if necessary, with hard-hitting power and at the highest of speeds. It also affords a place to train air force personnel, not only our own but those who would be associated with us, and not only in combat formation, bombing and navigation, as well as in the naval defence service, but in all the combined operations which form part of the great air movements today. This continent is the place where fast-moving and hard-hitting forces, whether in the air or on the land, could be trained, in a way that they could be trained in no other country in the world. In case anyone says, why could they not be trained in Africa or South America or Australia, the answer is that on this continent we have these great training areas in close proximity to the great producing plants where the largest number of motor vehicles in the world are turned out each year. Consequently these opportunities present themselves not only for training our own forces, but for training fast-hitting forces in the air and on the land of the combined nations which met in London a short time ago.

I do hope that in dealing with this the Minister of National Defence will not take with any spirit of resentment the suggestion that there could be improvement. We do not want to see a repetition of what we saw on two other occasions, when attempts to bring up questions about items in the estimates were immediately presented as votes of confidence, and consequently placed in the position where there could be no free consideration of those votes. Let us examine this with full recognition of the vital importance of the subject we are discussing. I do earnestly hope that the minister will indicate there is some intention of examining our present structure so that there can be a reallocation of forces in keeping with the statement of the minister of external affairs only three days ago. There is no reason at all to believe that substantial economies might not be effected if we really followed a plan of concentrating on those things for which we could best train the armed forces.

In so far as the estimates themselves are concerned, I shall close these remarks by indicating a way in which I think the Minister of National Defence could save a great deal of time. He pointed out that in Westminster they set aside four days for the consideration of the defence estimates. We have only had a part of two days, so even if we move as expeditiously as they do in Westminster we still have more than two days left to consider these estimates. What we must remember is that the British house considers the defence estimates in four days because those defence estimates have already been before a subcommittee on estimates, before which the senior staff officers have appeared and been examined on the expenditures. This subject, therefore, has been reviewed just in the way other matters have been reviewed. Yesterday the Minister of National Defence expressed great satisfaction with the result of a committee which met to examine the defence bills that were before the house. The committee had the staff officers before it, and made some amendments in the bill. As a result of this combined effort, legislation emerged which quickly passed through this house. The government has seen fit, however, to oppose the appointment of such a committee. Nevertheless, there are still ways in which time could be saved.

I would suggest that time could be saved if the minister would give instructions to have a statement prepared showing the number of units, active and reserve, of the army, navy and air force, divided into the different types of unit in each of those branches. In the case of the army, that would call for a statement of the number of infantry units; the number of artillery units; the number of armoured units; the number of reconnaissance units, and the number of engineering units, in one column. Then there would be a statement of equipment which they should have, and in another column what they have; or if he will give it in terms of percentage even, that will be very helpful. In the case of the air force he should give the number of squadrons, fighter squadrons and bomber squadrons—no, we could leave that out. He could show the several types and the number of machines, and the personnel in each case. In the case of the navy, the ships and the personnel on those ships. Then, in relation to those divisions the expenditures to be devoted to each branch of the service during the present year, there should also be a statement showing the headquarters across this country, the personnel at each of the headquarters, and the amount that is being asked for the maintenance of those headquarters, the same as for the headquarters at Ottawa. Mr. Chairman, that would be in keeping with the type of information that is made available by other departments, and an examination of that would enable us to discuss these estimates with some knowledge of what is actually before us.

Then, in the case of buildings, there should be a statement prepared in exactly the same manner as that prepared by the Department of Public Works, showing the naval barracks at Charlottetown, if that is to be built this year; showing buildings of any kind that are to be erected in any part of this country. After all, these buildings are just as important as post offices and other buildings of that kind which are included in the details of the estimates by other departments.

Now, this information can be given. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this is the kind of information we should have. It is certainly not more than we should have. From that we could then proceed to ask what the state of the training is of these various units, with knowledge of the type of units we are discussing; of the number of personnel involved; and why that money is required. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I conclude these remarks with the earnest suggestion that the minister state that he will do this, and that before we again consider these estimates that information will be before us.

Mr. Thomson: Mr. Chairman, through almost two sessions I have sat and listened, but tonight I feel that the time has come when one as inexperienced as I am in parliamentary matters should have something to say. I have listened to the oration of the leader of the opposition. It was an excellent oration on his concept of the art of war. I noticed throughout that he sought more and more information, as he did on March 14 of this year, when, as reported at page 762 of Hansard, he expressed himself in this manner:

> That is the kind of thing, Mr. Speaker, that makes it so utterly impossible for hon. members to have any confidence in the statements made here on national defence.

Later he said there was an attempt to mislead this house. He does better a little later on by saying that the Minister of National Defence has extended him every courtesy.

From my position I feel that there have been too many harsh things directed towards the Minister of National Defence. Over the years he has attempted to meet all questions frankly, patiently and thoroughly. To compare this department with the Department of Public Works is folly. It is not a department of public works. It is not a department of "public" anything. It is a department enmeshed in secrecy. If the leader of the opposition asks for more information, I might refer him to the Ottawa Morning Citizen of March 17, in which there is an editorial supporting to some degree, and maybe substantially, his claims for more information. That article reads in part as follows:

> It is true that some opposition members, notably Mr. Drew himself, have not been conspicuously cautious in the use of confidential military information in the past.

That may sound like a reason why confidential military information is not forthcoming.

In one part of his speech tonight the leader of the opposition said "this great expenditure in peacetime". Later he said, "we are talking in terms of war." With the latter statement I agree. We cannot cry "peace, peace" when there is no peace. We are talking in terms of war. He made a reference to the war of 1914-18 and indicated unpreparedness. Do we know today how well prepared our enemies are? If we do not, then we are not giving them information to tell them how well or to what extent we are prepared. He expressed his concern and regret that we are not to be informed. I would say to him that we each have equal positions in this house; and speaking from here, we are content that we are not entirely informed. We are content to trust the people that have been given the mandate to run this country.

Mr. Harkness: You are content to be a rubber stamp.

Mr. Cavers: So are you.

Mr. Thomson: We say that we are content with our government, and the people of Canada said so on June 27 last.

Mr. Knowles: Forty-nine per cent.

[Mr. Thomson.]

Mr. Thomson: Do not let any member here try to back away from that fact.

Mr. Fraser: Hurrah for our side.

Mr. Thomson: The cabinet was appointed after that, and then the cabinet appointed the defence board. Who make up the defence board? On it there is the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent), undeniably Canada's greatest Canadian today. Who else is on it? The vice-chairman is the Minister of National Defence to whom everyone can offer plaudits, praise and thanks. Who else? The Minister of Trade and Commerce. Let me say this. It must be agreed and it is agreed that no shoulders bore a greater burden in the heat of war than those of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. No greater Canadian came through that war; no more was done by any person than was done by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. With him on the defence board we have the Minister of Finance and the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Their duty is to consider the needs of defence, pass it to the treasury board, pass it to this house, bring it back and then control the expenditure. But that is not all. Behind this defence board are the committees of the cabinet, the deputy ministers of national defence and the chiefs of staff. These men are not doing this alone. Do not let it go out to Canada that the Minister of National Defence is solely responsible for this. The Minister of National Defence is supported by a retinue of advisers unequalled in the history of Canada.

Mr. Fraser: You are singing for leadership.

Mr. Cavers: You will get it.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Thomson: I would suggest that that might be my hon. friend's greatest worry.

Mr. Fraser: Not a bit. That is what we should like to see.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Thomson: There seems to be a concerted attack upon the minister. Tonight he almost in a pleading way asked them to go on. He tried to show that he was ready and willing to answer in a constructive way or to listen to any constructive suggestions. But constantly he was plagued and held up to seeming ridicule. We can look at our Minister of National Defence and I think it can safely be said that from the services he is receiving great satisfaction, including loyal support from the officers and men of the three services. It might be a minor satisfaction to be abused in a manner similar to the way his predecessor was abused. Scripture was quoted the other day and I believe it can be quoted again:

"For so persecuted they the prophets which were before you." I do not want the minister to feel badly and to think that he is the only one that has been persecuted. Others have been persecuted before him. We can go back to March 1940 and quote the words of the Toronto Star.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Thomson: In his speech on March 16 the leader of the opposition is quoted as saying:

> I do not intend to waste any time on what Mr. Rogers says, however. That dyspeptic little son of Mars has been a standing joke in every military camp since he was appointed defence minister last September.

What do we find after that? The said late lamented Mr. Rogers, within ten days after that, held the biggest majority in the history of his political career and was returned with a majority of 2,134 to this house; and the Liberal party was returned with a majority of 67 seats, up to that date the largest in history. As I say, they did persecute those prophets that went before our present minister; because on October 6, 1944, the leader of the opposition is reported as follows:

> Referring to the reinforcement situation he charged Colonel Ralston with bearing "the heaviest load of guilt for this shameless situation", and described recent statements made by the Department of National Defence as "the most contemptible of all the contemptible excuses invented by guilty men to hide their guilt."
> Referring to Colonel Ralston he said, "Because of his bravery in action, and because of the stand he took at that time, he has been trusted and he has betrayed that trust."

Mr. Hodgson: Tell us why Ralston resigned.

Mr. Thomson: I say that these two men served Canada in war and in peace and they became targets of similar abuse.

Then we came to 1945. The leader of the opposition described General McNaughton as the most pitiful figure in public life, and in the general election of June 11 the government was again returned.

Mr. Hodgson: What happened to General McNaughton?

Mr. Thomson: General McNaughton is still regarded as one of Canada's greatest Canadians.

Mr. Hodgson: They did not regard him as such at the polls. He never was elected.

Mr. Thomson: If the hon. member for Victoria (Ont.) will just pause for a moment I have a few more pearls to cast. During the election of 1949 the leader of the opposition honoured Mr. Claxton with attention in speeches on May 9, May 18 and June 25. Mr. Claxton was flattered to have the opposition party spend $33,000 in attempting to defeat him, the biggest amount returned for any candidate in the election. The results of the election of 1949 gave us the biggest majority in the history of the country and gave Mr. Claxton a majority of 9,193, the biggest majority in the history of his constituency. You would think that possibly the opposition—

Mr. Harkness: Is this a political soap box, or a committee on national defence?

An hon. Member: You can't take it.

Mr. Thomson: I would suggest to the hon. member that if he does not wish to act in a democratic manner he could take the advice of his own leader and go outside.

Mr. Harkness: I asked a question and the hon. member does not seem to be able to answer it.

Mr. Thomson: You had the floor once, and you can have it again. It is all yours; I am not worrying about you.

Mr. Hodgson: Quote something else from the Star.

Mr. Thomson: I would be happy to quote things from anywhere that you gentlemen might suggest, but I cannot find anything in your favour.

Mr. Knowles: Address the Chair.

Mr. Thomson: I say that we are fortunate in having the defence committee as constituted and the cabinet as such, which have made disclosures to an extent greater than any other country in the world. Can we disclose things that may be taken by the enemy, or must we distrust everything? There must be trust in this House of Commons; there must be faith in the elected party, in the party that has been given the mandate to serve the people. Nothing can be better and nothing can be stronger than this. We have been given this trust. We have appointed our proper officers, our proper cabinet, and we will give an accounting of our stewardship. I have not attempted to revile the leader of the opposition. I have merely quoted his own words. I have only told you what he said about defence ministers of the past.

I would not suggest that we should lose him. We want him to remain with us. We feel that if he goes we will lose one of our best political friends. I hope that he stays forever, because we will then use the new residence of the Prime Minister for a long long time.

We want to know whether or not the defence minister is answering these questions properly. The majority of the house says yes, and we contend that the majority rules. I suggest that we get along with these estimates, stop this nonsense and this constant picking away at a man and asking for things without suggesting anything.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Higgins: I rather hesitate to take part in the pleasure of this debate at the present time because of what the last speaker has said. He has rather taken the attitude that you had better be careful or you may lose your head.

So far as I can see no time has been wasted. I have been sitting here throughout the day and to my mind at least the debate has been productive of some good. So far as I know no nasty words have been used. I did not see any need for the last oration we have had. So far as I am concerned it was entirely political.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. Members: Weak applause.

Mr. Hodgson: We have not so many rubber stamps.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Higgins: I merely have a few questions to ask the minister, but I should like to preface these questions by a comment with respect to the statement made by the Minister of Finance in the introduction of his budget. At that time he commented on the fact that Newfoundland was going to be a net burden on the federal treasury for many years. That was a most unfortunate remark so far as the people of that province were concerned. I am sure the present minister will agree with me that, if for no other reason than the strategic position of the island, that in itself would be of sufficient importance not to have made a statement of that kind.

Dealing with the strategic position of the island, there is the question of the Gander airport, and the very urgent necessity, I would say, of the lengthening of the runway. That is a big international airport. It is not from the point of view of the civilian use that I am speaking tonight, but it is the use by large transport planes and large bombing planes that are in existence today. This airport is now unable to handle these planes safely. The runways will have to be very considerably extended for that purpose. From the information I received from the Minister of Transport I judged that it is not contemplated that the runways will be extended immediately. It strikes me, Mr. Chairman, that this is a matter which should be taken into consideration because of what I read in a newspaper clipping. I grant the clipping is two months old. It deals with an interview with a Russian major who apparently escaped. He talked about manoeuvres which were held last fall in the Arctic by some 80,000 Russians. The exact words that he used in the interview are these:

> In the manoeuvres held late last fall, all maps and charts were duplicates of similar territory in Canada. The exercises were based upon the theory that simultaneous attacks were being conducted against twelve Canadian centres.

If this statement is true, and this article gives the name of the individual and everything, it would appear as though we were not too far away from the necessity of having all our airports in condition to handle the heavy bombers of today.

The minister might also think of the Torbay airport which was used so extensively in the last war by the R.C.A.F. The runways there, generally speaking, are unable to accommodate safely the large bombers. The other item is in connection with the reserve units now being formed in Newfoundland. From the return I was given, as it is set out at page 1569 of Hansard, the total strength of the regular army in Newfoundland is 52, consisting of 9 officers and 43 men. There are two reserve regiments now being formed. I am told in connection with the training of these reserves that there are no instructors available, and that the only personnel there capable of giving instruction are headquarters staff. I do not know whether that is so now, but that was the position in the middle of March when I was given the information. If that condition has not changed I do submit that some personnel qualified for that purpose should be sent there.

I do not believe at present they have enough men to do the training. I do not know what happened in connection with the naval installation. Last session when I mentioned this to the minister I believe he told me they were taking over some 22 naval installations and contemplated putting some in service. The minister can reassure us as to the situation. I believe he said at that time that the installation at Bay Bulls was going to be left in private hands.

The other point is that at the airport at Gander, and I presume also at Torbay, there is nothing in the way of protection. I am dealing with this matter perhaps in an amateurish way, because I do not know very much about it. However, it appears to me it might be wise to have at least a small mobile force there used to the terrain and the whole countryside. I do not know whether that is practical or not. I understand that it would not be practical to have large forces in all places where there might be attack, but I should think it would not be too difficult or too expensive at a vulnerable airport to have a highly trained mobile force. I pass that along for what it is worth.

Mr. Claxton: Replying to the hon. member for St. John's East, as he knows, the question of Gander airport comes within the Department of Transport, because it operates that airfield. My recollection of the runways, from having been there, is that they are considered quite adequate for any present-day use, and that they are in good condition.

We have no present intention of enlarging or extending the runways at Torbay. The main Royal Canadian Air Force installation in that part of the world is at Goose Bay, where we have one of the greatest airports, built entirely by Canada, and with long and first class runways. There, in addition to the Canadian air force, there is a considerable strength of the United States air force.

On the island itself there are three United States bases, one at Fort Pepperell, one at Argentia, which is a joint air and naval base, and one at Harmon field, which is an air base. I feel that in the interest of a balanced collective force we should not add to the number of existing major airfields in Newfoundland at the present time. They are adequate for all the needs we can see ahead.

With regard to the defence of the field at Gander, the observations of the hon. member made on the same point in November were taken into consideration, and I discussed this question again with my advisers. Generally speaking it is not considered that the installation of a unit even as small as a company would be justified for that purpose at that place.

With regard to the other defence forces, the 52 in the regular army consist of staff, administrative and training officers and also supply services. It is not planned to increase those numbers in any considerable degree. The staff is considered to be quite adequate for the job. They will provide administrative and training staffs for the units, and I believe they will be found to be quite adequate.

In connection with the organization of units, as will be remembered, we established H.M.C.S. Cabot as a unit of the naval reserve. It had a strength on April 26 of 70 officers and men, including a very considerable number of officers in the neighbourhood of St. John's who served with the Canadian navy during the war. We also have 20 cadets at Memorial university who have entered the University Naval Training Division, and there have been established three units of the reserve army, consisting of the Royal Newfoundland Regiment, the 166th Field Regiment of the R.C.A. and the 56th Independent Field Squadron of the R.C.E. These were organized in January 1950. We have already very encouraging enrolments of officers, non-commissioned officers and men. This indicates that what the hon. member has said about the good spirit in Newfoundland is quite true. We are getting recruits there in considerable numbers and of good quality, and we hope before the end of this year to have these three army units and the navy unit organized on a sound footing. This is the first time that there will be any reserve navy or army units in existence in Newfoundland. I understand that neither prior to the first war nor in between the first and second wars were there any reserve units there. This represents a very considerable advance.

This work of organization has been greatly facilitated by the encouragement of former officers. I met them myself in St. John's on July 1 last, and I also met representatives of the municipalities and industries and Legion branches at Corner Brook and Grand Falls, where we are putting up armouries. When they are completed, as I expect they will be at an early date, we expect that there will be sub-units of these units established there, in a healthy condition.

We have established a permanent headquarters at Buckmaster's field with adequate buildings for all services. We have a cadet corps, a C.O.T.C. unit in connection with the university, and we have also recruited officers and men for the active force. Altogether Newfoundland has responded very well indeed to the appeals made.

Mr. Brooks: I wish to make only a few remarks. We have listened to the debate today with much interest and have heard practically every subject discussed, from the chaplain service to the general defence of Canada. So far as chaplain service is concerned, I agree entirely with what the minister said, that the chaplains should have officer rank. I have had some experience with chaplains in my army experience, and I am sure that the minister's idea is absolutely correct. There is no reason why the chaplain service should not be treated the same as the medical or the dental service. I used to think that it would be a good idea if chaplains had a little more military training because possibly the sloppiest salutes you saw in the army were those given by some chaplains.

An hon. Member: How about route marches?

Mr. Brooks: They usually did that. A good chaplain looked after his men and provided sports and so on, which is another reason why he should have a higher rank than that of an N.C.O.

I do not think the minister should feel too badly over the criticism there has been of his estimates. I think he must admit that both inside and outside the house there is support for his estimates. But we would like to know what the money is being spent for. I do not think anyone is suggesting that the estimates should be reduced. I can remember before the last war when the estimates amounted to only $30 million or $40 million, but there would be long debates and many hon. members seemed anxious to have the estimates not passed. There were members who belonged to the government side, the same government that is in power now, who asked to have the estimates reduced to $1. I think the Minister of National Defence has practically 100 per cent support. He can hardly complain if there is an interest shown in his estimates and if members want to know just why the estimates are to be passed.

In 1939, before the last war there was considerable isolationism in this country which is not to be found today. As far as defence is concerned I think the people from one end of Canada to the other feel that there is a necessity for the defence of this country. Both before the first great war and the second great war we perhaps felt we could rely on Great Britain and the British navy, but that is not the case today. A great deal has been said about the possibility of Canada being attacked should war start. I was interested in reading an article not so long ago which was dated in January of this year. The article stated that considerable attention is being given in the European press to the observation of Brigadier X, that in a future war the first soviet blow would be dealt against Canada. The article refers to another article in a Netherlands daily which stated that Canada would be the objective of a soviet invasion. It was stated that the military experts of the United States and Canada have good reason to realize the danger of a soviet invasion of the North American continent and that recently the Canadian people were faced with this hard reality by an article in The Ensign by Brigadier X.

We in Canada along with the United States are responsible for the defence of the North American continent. That is probably the chief obligation of Canada. I was sorry I was not in the chamber this afternoon when Exercise Sweetbriar was being discussed. We must ask ourselves what is the situation as far as the defence of the northern part of this continent is concerned. We are only a short distance from Asia and we are told that in Siberia there are 25 million Russians. That country has the same area as Alaska, which along with the northern part of Canada supports a population of only one million. We are told also that Russia retains about twenty divisions in the northern Siberia country. This gives us some idea of just what danger there is should Russia decide to attack from that quarter.

It also impresses upon Canada the necessity of training for defence in the north country. We know that this was realized by the Department of National Defence and the defence council because they have trained men in northern Canada along with the United States forces. Some 5,000 spent a few weeks in northern Canada last year and they came through their short training quite well. I understand that many things were learned by the defence departments of Canada and the United States and the minister might well tell us some of the lessons that were learned with regard to defence in the north.

We hear that the Russians are training the natives of the Aleutian islands and the Eskimos in Russia for scout duties and to act as glacier outpost patrols. When the minister speaks later I should like him to state whether Canada, and possibly the United States along with Canada, is making any attempt to train the Eskimo or those who live in the northern sections of Canada and Alaska.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Tomorrow we will go into supply and continue with the estimates of national defence, citizenship and immigration and public works.

Mr. Green: In that order?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Yes.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, June 9, 1950

The house met at eleven o'clock.

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION

Fourth report of standing committee on agriculture and colonization.—Mr. Bater.

STATUTORY ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

TABLING OF CONSOLIDATION, 1949, VOLUME I, A TO D

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table two copies of the first volume of the consolidation of statutory orders and regulations, which I mentioned in presenting the bill concerning future orders and regulations. I am doing so at this time so that hon. members who are interested may have an opportunity of seeing in what form these are to be prepared. I understand that there will be four volumes of these statutory orders and regulations. A fifth volume will contain as complete an alphabetical index and analytical table as we may find it possible to prepare.

Hon. members will see that these are lettered "A" to "D". The procedure that is being followed is to indicate the statutory orders and regulations under the statute which authorized the making of them. Whenever a statute authorizes the making, by order in council or by any other authority, of regulations having legislative effect, whether or not the power has been exercised, the statute is referred to and explanatory notes given. I believe hon. members will find that it is a serious attempt to make all these orders and regulations as readily accessible as possible to the courts, the bar, and the public generally.

I may add that as soon as the volumes are complete they will be distributed to all those who are on the list for the distribution of the annual statutes.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the Prime Minister when it is expected that the volumes will be completed?

Mr. St. Laurent: The work has been completed, and it is now a matter of printing. I assume that, as soon as the session is over, priority will be given to the printing of the statutes of this session. There will be no avoidable delay in the office of the king's printer.

Mr. Fleming: Is it intended that these two volumes will be distributed now?

Mr. St. Laurent: No; there are not sufficient copies. Only a limited number of copies were run off, and I am tabling them now so that hon. members who are interested in seeing how the matters are being set up may examine them. As soon as the other copies can be run off they will be distributed to those who are on the list for distribution of the annual statutes.

FIRE AND FLOOD DAMAGE

FLOODS IN SOUTHERN MANITOBA—EXPRESSION OF SYMPATHY FROM ETHIOPIA

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I am sure hon. members will be interested in knowing that I have been advised by His Excellency the Governor General that he has received the following message from the Emperor of Ethiopia:

Addis Ababa
June 6, 1950

Field Marshal Viscount Alexander, Ottawa.

We convey our sympathy for the great flood losses and suffering in Manitoba. We would request Your Excellency to direct the distribution of Canadian dollars three thousand sent as a token of the cordiality and sympathy uniting the Ethiopian and Canadian peoples.

Haile Selassie
Emperor

To this message His Excellency sent the following reply:

Ottawa, June 7, 1950

His Imperial Majesty
Haile Selassie,
Emperor of Ethiopia,
Addis Ababa.

On behalf of people of Canada, I thank Your Majesty for your kind and sympathetic message to the Manitoba flood victims and for Your Majesty's very generous contribution for their relief. Your generous action and expression of friendship will long be remembered by the people of Canada.

Alexander of Tunis

The governor general is arranging to have the contribution from the Emperor of Ethiopia transferred to the Manitoba flood relief fund.

I feel sure that I speak for all hon. members and for the country as a whole in expressing deep appreciation of this very fine example of human brotherhood.

Manitoba Flood

FLOODS IN SOUTHERN MANITOBA—PROGRESS REPORT OF FACT-FINDING COMMISSION—FEDERAL FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I wish to table a copy of a letter dated June 6, 1950, and attached memorandum addressed to me as Minister of Finance, and Hon. D. L. Campbell, premier of Manitoba, constituting a progress report of the joint commission on flood damage in Manitoba, which, as the house is aware, consists of Mr. J. B. Carswell, representing the dominion government, and Mr. D. Bruce Shaw, representing the government of Manitoba.

Perhaps I might add a few words. As the house is aware, I flew out to Manitoba on Tuesday afternoon. I had three purposes in mind. I was anxious to see a bit of the flood damage which had been caused. I wanted to discuss with the members of the commission and with the Manitoba government the progress which had been made in ascertaining the damage caused by the flood. I found that my visit was a most helpful one. The weather was such that I was able to fly down in the afternoon over the upper part of the valley. I found that the flood waters certainly had receded extremely rapidly, and it was quite clear that large areas which had previously been flooded were already clear and that seeding was taking place even in some of those areas. We flew at a low level. Some of the towns, particularly Morris, had suffered great physical damage to almost every building in the municipality.

The next morning I was taken to some sections of the city of Winnipeg, which I was informed had suffered the worst damage, and certain sections of St. Vital, and the Wildwood area. It is quite clear today; while it looked pretty bad, it was obvious that a week or ten days ago it must have looked a great deal worse.

In the evening I had an opportunity of discussing with members of the commission the draft of the report which in final form has been tabled today. Mr. Campbell, the premier of Manitoba, participated in those discussions. The following morning I had an opportunity of meeting the members of the Manitoba cabinet and, finally, in the afternoon, had a concluding meeting with the members of the commission and received their report in final form which I have tabled today.

I do not intend to discuss the details of the report. It speaks for itself. I just want to say that I do not think one can speak in too high terms of the way in which the people of Manitoba and of the city of Winnipeg have responded to the calls made upon them by this terrible disaster. I was greatly impressed by the way in which individual citizens were setting to work to clean up their houses and to do repairs to their buildings. I had a chance to call at the offices of the Manitoba flood relief fund. They have done a magnificent job in raising funds voluntarily from all parts of Canada and abroad. The municipal government and the local government authorities seem to be working in harmony to co-ordinate the various services at the different levels of government. It struck me that the rehabilitation authorities, in the assistance they were giving to repair of the damage caused by this disaster, were operating very efficiently.

I reported of course to my colleagues yesterday, and placed before them this report. In the light of the facts disclosed in this report the government has decided to include in the supplementary estimates, which I hope will be tabled within the next week or ten days, an appropriation for $12,500,000 as an initial payment to the government of Manitoba to assist it in discharging the obligations which it will have to carry out as a result of the flood damage.

In addition, hon. members will see from the report that the committee has suggested that in the urban areas of Winnipeg certain emergency diking measures might be developed in order to prevent a recurrence of these floods. As was the case in the Fraser valley, the dominion government of course would participate on the basis of 75-25 in the costs of such works, if it is decided to proceed with them; and in the supplementary estimates an appropriate amount will be included to cover an estimate of what might be required in that connection in the forthcoming period.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister whether it will be possible to have the progress report which he has tabled printed as an appendix to Votes and Proceedings, or to have copies made available, so that we may all have it?

Mr. Abbott: It has been multigraphed. I asked those doing the work to be sure that there was a sufficient number of copies to make it available to all hon. members. If they are not already at the distribution office, I will see that they are there within the next half hour. I think that might be sufficient.

Mr. Knowles: Thank you.

FIRE DAMAGE AT RIMOUSKI AND CABANO—REPORT OF FACT-FINDING COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have just this to add in connection with the Rimouski and Cabano disasters. A report has just been received from the joint commission, composed of Brigadier Theriault and Mr. Edouard Laurent. There has not been time to discuss the terms of that report with the premier of Quebec, but we expect that some time next week it will be possible to table the report and to make a statement in connection with those disasters as well.

PRIVILEGE

SOFTBALL GAME ON PARLLIAMENT HILL—REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): I am rising on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, and I may say that this is the first time that I have ever had reason to complain of inaccuracies in the press. But in this morning's local paper, under the heading "Members wallop press, 15-6, in annual softball tussle," there is this paragraph:

> Conacher belted a pair of circuit clouts and a triple, while McDonald and Winters each hit one. George Hees, Liberal member for Toronto Broadview, added the last one.

I merely mention that matter, Mr. Speaker, because I knew that the government had great influence with the press, but I did not know that it went that far.

BACON

PRICE SUPPORT—AMOUNT PURCHASED UNDER UNITED KINGDOM-CANADA AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Charlton (Brant-Wentworth): I have two questions I should like to direct to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that he and his parliamentary assistant are both absent, I would ask him to take this as notice and answer as soon as possible.

Has any decision been made with reference to the continuation of the price support program for bacon after July 1, 1950? How much bacon has been purchased to date by the board for the purpose of filling the requirements of the Anglo-Canadian bacon agreement?

FREIGHT RATES

INCREASE AWARDED TO RAILWAYS—REQUEST FOR SUSPENSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): In the absence of the Minister of Transport, I wish to ask the Prime Minister if any requests have been made by the provinces to stay the coming into effect of the new increases in freight rates which have been authorized? If so, has any consideration been given to the matter, and what are the results, if any?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Requests were received from the premiers of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and those requests were considered by cabinet yesterday. Answers were mailed last night. If the hon. member is interested, I could have copies of the requests and copies of the answers tabled at three o'clock today.

Mr. Coldwell: Thank you.

[Later:]

TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE REQUESTING SUSPENSION OF INCREASE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with the leave of the house I would ask to revert to motions so that I can table, as promised this morning correspondence with the premiers of Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Manitoba, requesting that the government suspend the coming into force of the recent order of the board of transport commissioners increasing the freight rate, and the answers that were sent to the premiers yesterday.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

TABLING OF FURTHER CORRESPONDENCE WITH RESPECT TO AGENDA

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is some further routine correspondence with the premiers of the provinces concerning the agenda for the next dominion-provincial conference. It consists of letters written to the provincial premiers indicating the suggestions received from some of them about the agenda. Previously the correspondence has been printed as an appendix to Hansard, but since we are really operating as a post office to indicate to the premiers what has been received from the other premiers and asking them to make their own suggestions as soon as possible, I do not think that course need be followed.

Mr. Coldwell: They need not be incorporated in Hansard?

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not think hon. members would be interested in the text of these letters. It is routine correspondence.

BANKRUPTCY ACT

QUESTION AS TO PROCLAMATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Can the Minister of Justice now answer the question

I asked on Tuesday last in his absence with respect to the date of proclamation of the Bankruptcy Act?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I may say that we still have the target day of July 1 in mind, and I expect finally to confirm that date some time next week.

Defence forces—

202. To provide for the defence forces of the navy, army and air services, and to authorize total commitments for this purpose of $579,301,670, including authority, nowithstanding section 29 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, to make commitments for the current year of $438,178,000 and commitments for future years of $141,123,670 against which commitments it is estimated that actual expenditures in 1950-51 will not exceed $384,932,304.

Mr. Brooks: At eleven o'clock last night I was discussing the situation in our north country. I had asked the minister questions as to what was being done by Canada to train our native population in the north country to assist in our defences. I had pointed out that Russia, according to the reports we have received, was making great use of the Eskimos and other natives in northern Siberia and on the Aleutian islands, training them as scouts and patrols and for other work in that country. We also have reports that they have established many scientific stations in their north country, and that they are experimenting with the growing of crops and food so that the people of that area may be self-supporting. All this of course proves to us that Russia intends to keep that country in such a condition that if she should decide to attack she would be in a position to do so.

The reports also mention the necessity for the training of our soldiers in north country fighting, and contend that great attention should be paid to the defences of the Yukon and northern Canada.

It was very interesting after the Sweetbriar training exercise to read the United States papers. I may say that the United States is not only equally interested in the defence of the north country; I think she is probably more interested than we are, on account of Alaska, and also of the threat to themselves.

I should like to read from the Christian Science Monitor, the issue of March 16, which contains the opinion of that paper, and I think it also expresses the opinion of a good many people in the United States, as to the success of the Exercise Sweetbriar. The article is headed: "Whitehorse tagged for U.S. defence role". I may say that Whitehorse has been mentioned by the United States as the Gibraltar of the north. The article reads:

Divided Opinions

High Canadian and American military officials who attended as observers were inclined to be noncommittal when questioned openly about the success of Sweetbriar. Off the record, some expressed shock at the state of northern defences, while others optimistically believed that all will be well and that any deficiencies would be remedied as a result of the operation.

That neither the United States nor Canada is ready for Arctic warfare was made clear during the ten days in which a force of some 5,000 soldiers manoeuvred and fought with a so-called "aggressor" which had overrun Alaska and then threatened the whole continent.

I do not think that our department of defence, or the United States department of defence, believed that Sweetbriar would be a hundred per cent successful. By that I mean they did not believe that the equipment they had would be entirely suitable to the climate, nor did they believe that our soldiers were sufficiently trained in Arctic warfare. The success of Sweetbriar would probably be measured in the lessons that were learned, and also in a determination of the weaknesses of our northern defences. I am satisfied that our department learned many lessons, with regard to both the training of the men and the use of equipment in this barren and cold country.

I am sure we must all realize the great difficulties experienced in training men for warfare in a northern climate where there are deep snows, and where the temperature falls to sixty and sometimes seventy degrees below zero. I realize that it must be difficult for the equipment to stand up; I realize that it must be very difficult indeed for men to use the equipment. This test will be a great success if the defence department has learned the lessons of the difficulties in the north country and has tried to correct the difficulties and to prepare for the future.

I might suggest in this connection that one of the great problems that faces the Canadian army is training for these operations. Yesterday the leader of the opposition said that in connection with the training of our air force we have every facility in this broad country of ours for training airmen. We also have the facilities and territory for the training of our tank and other corps. For winter training also Canada is as well suited as any other country, especially Russia. I would impress upon the minister the necessity of more winter training; instead of having so much training of our men in the summer camps, our active forces and our militia should confine their training to a great extent to the wintertime. I do not imagine this would be a very popular suggestion with the men in the armed forces, but looking toward the necessity of this type of training it seems to me we could and should devote more of our time to such training.

I should like to pay a tribute to our national research council. A few moments ago I said that our department must have found many weaknesses in the equipment used in the northern country. I have had the pleasure and the honour of being a member of the committee on national research. On several occasions I have had the opportunity of visiting the national research building, and I have seen for myself the work which is going on there. Without divulging any secrets—it is amusing to go through the national research council and be told that there are certain things which are very secret and that you must not tell anything about them—I am satisfied that not a single member of parliament who goes into the national research council could come out and divulge any of the secrets that he sees there. He does know, however, that in a general way great work is being done by the scientists of Canada for the development of some of these matters I mentioned that are related to our defence.

Another matter of great interest to the Canadian people is the dispersal of our munitions plants. This subject has been discussed before in the house on numerous occasions. There is no question that in a great country like Canada, with the possibilities of bombing in wartime, our munitions plants should not be centred in thickly populated areas. They should be scattered across the country. In the last war Russia was prepared to retire to the Ural mountains; she had behind those mountains munitions plants to supply her troops. We in Canada would make a great mistake if we concentrated the making of munitions in large centres which might be subjected to bombing.

I had intended to speak about civilian defence, but the matter has been discussed at some length already. From the minister's statement I would judge that we are following to a greater or lesser degree the plan being carried out in the United States. I am informed that over there state and federal officials are working together. For instance the minister said yesterday that it would take practically all the money allocated to our defence estimates to provide radar protection in this country. In the United States I understand that under their civilian defence measures they have made provision to train 150,000 aircraft spotters, to augment the seeing eye, or radar. I should judge that something like that is planned for Canada. In the United States they also have training courses for the handling of radiation injuries, and they are issuing excellent booklets and other instructions in this connection. This of course is a great work, and if the same is being done in Canada I am sure satisfactory results will be obtained.

We have heard much about recruiting, and the debate has been interesting. However, as my leader pointed out yesterday, the mere fact of having a thousand names or five hundred names on a roll is not sufficient; it does not indicate to the house or the people in Canada the extent of the training. The number of men who are taken into camp would show what our training is, and would reflect the usefulness of our reserve and other units.

In the matter of recruiting I would say that we must have good feeling throughout the country before our efforts can be successful. The people must be sympathetic toward the armed services. They have not been getting all the information they would like, nor have we in the House of Commons. If recruiting is to be successful, the people must feel sympathetically toward the navy, the army and the air force.

There have been some developments recently which have not tended to increase the confidence of our people in our armed forces. One of these had to do with the marking of graves overseas. I was pleased to hear the minister say yesterday that this defect had been corrected, a result, I am sure, of the widespread criticism across the country that a great mistake had been made. That mistake is being corrected, I imagine at considerable expense.

There is also the matter of medals. This may not be strictly a defence matter, but it is connected with the army. There was and is today widespread resentment across Canada that the medals given to the soldiers who fought in the last war are not inscribed with the names and numbers of those soldiers, as was done after the first war. These may seem small matters, but they do arouse resentment and dissatisfaction.

A short time ago there was an announcement with respect to a change in the tunes and airs used in the navy. I am not well qualified to discuss this matter, but I do know that in many sections of Canada there is resentment over this change. The people who resent it most are those whose sons were the first to enlist in the last two wars, and who would be the first to enlist in the navy today should necessity arise. I refer particularly to the replacing of "Rule Britannia" by "O Canada". These conditions do not help in recruiting, and the government and the department before making such hasty changes should give careful consideration to them.

Perhaps we did not need to pay much attention to it, but I did listen to the hon. member for Ontario last night defend the defence department and criticize all those who had criticized that department. I could not help remembering that that great defender of the faith, the hon. member for Ontario, was the man who suggested that the description "Royal" should be taken away from the Royal Canadian Navy and the Royal Canadian Air Force. However, as I said before, no one is taking seriously what he said. The government, I hope, does not take it seriously, and I am sure the same feeling prevails throughout the country. Such a change would give rise to so much resentment that it would have grave repercussions.

In closing I should like to make reference to two units in my own province. My own town of Sussex is the headquarters of the Princess Louise Hussars. We are very proud of this unit, of which the hon. member for Westmorland is second in command. I have been informed by the defence department that it is one of the best, if not the best trained militia unit in Canada. We also take pride in our Canadian Scottish regiment. It, too, is well trained. There is a feeling in the maritime provinces that we should have down there a permanent force unit, and I would ask the minister if he is giving consideration to the appointment of the Princess Louise Hussars as a permanent force unit, and if not whether he will do so.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Royal has mentioned one or two points about which I should like to make some comment. He asked first whether we are training Eskimos and Indians in the far north. We are not endeavouring to give them military training, because in the nature of their living conditions they are fully occupied with survival. However, they are working very closely indeed with the armed forces in the north, and have been used extensively in transportation, construction, and the like. We have also borrowed to a great extent from their knowledge of northern living conditions, the first thing that forces operating in the north must learn.

The hon. member suggested that we should emphasize winter training. I can assure him that that is being done more and more. At Wainwright, Shilo, Rivers, Churchill, Valcartier and other places, both active and reserve force units are receiving winter training. To as large an extent as possible that is being supplemented by local training in week-end exercises carried out by units right across Canada. More of that is being done than ever before, and certainly the experience of Exercise Sweetbriar was that only personnel who were highly trained in winter warfare can hope to operate efficiently in extremely cold weather.

I appreciate what the hon. gentleman said about the Princess Louise Hussars, which he said was one of the best units in Canada. I do not think it is desirable to contemplate making a reserve unit, which is carrying on so well, into a permanent force unit. I am sure the hon. member who is second in command would have something to say about that.

With regard to the remarks of the leader of the opposition last night, there are one or two corrections I should like to make. With regard to artillery practice, the hon. gentleman said that there was no firing practice, and he made reference to competitive firing. There are unit exercises; the units do go to camp as batteries, and there is competitive firing. The hon. gentleman is quite right in the impression he gathered that the Royal Canadian Artillery Association has not yet put up a cup for competitive battery firing. Reading the remarks of the hon. gentleman together, he is quite right, but there are unit exercises and competitive firing being carried on. We are putting emphasis less and less on battery competition and more and more on the work of the teams; but still competition is desirable, and I understand that battery competitions will be reinstituted this year.

The hon. gentleman referred to the remarks of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and on page 3396 of Hansard he is shown as having quoted the remarks of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. But those remarks should be supplemented by what the Secretary of State for External Affairs went on to say:

> We do not yet know how it will affect the detailed responsibilities of any particular member of the alliance.

You will see that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is referring not only to the position of Canada but to the position of the other eleven countries in the alliance. It is still too early to say how this principle of balanced forces will work. The minister went on to say:

> As far as this government is concerned, in our defence policy we have already accepted this principle and have been trying to relate our policy to the defence of an area rather than merely to the defence of a country. We have been going on that principle and we will gladly do what we can to continue its application.

That was a point I made yesterday, and of course that is perfectly clear.

As reported on page 3396 of Hansard the leader of the opposition regretted, and I quote:

—we are not to be informed of any changes that are to be made in the organization of our defence forces in keeping with this allocation of special tasks.

I cannot inform him of any changes, because no changes have yet been made, either here or in other countries. The principle has just been agreed to. What I say would equally be said by any of the defence ministers of any other country.

I quote further the remarks of the leader of the opposition as reported on page 3399:

I do earnestly hope that the minister will indicate there is some intention of examining our present structure so that there can be a reallocation of forces in keeping with the statement of the minister of external affairs only three days ago.

Our program and the progress we are making in connection with it is under constant review. That has been indicated before. Changes are made in the program as they may be considered necessary. Now that this principle has been agreed to, we shall of course co-operate loyally and frankly and completely with the other north Atlantic countries in causing the allocation of our forces, their nature and composition and equipment, to be examined, and we will accept for consideration the views of the other countries. There is no doubt about that. When I said yesterday that this principle would not cause any immediate change, by "immediate" I had in mind a change within the period covered by these estimates, namely, 1950-51. In the future it may result in change, or in many changes. It certainly will result in some, both in this country and in others. But in view of the nature of our role and of the forces we have, those changes are not likely to be of a drastic nature materially affecting anything that has been done in the past in the way of defence.

As I say, we have never considered our defence as a thing that is separate, as something to be undertaken by us separately; we have always considered it as part of total defence in a total war.

Just a further word in this connection. It must be evident to hon. members that the reason why we went into the North Atlantic treaty—indeed, we are one of the nations which first suggested it and strongly supported it—is that we felt it to be in our vital interest and in the vital interest of the freedom of all nations that this treaty should be formulated and supported. We mean to carry out to the full everything that is involved in our participation in that treaty, and from what we have seen we have every reason to believe that that is the view of the other eleven nations who are participating in it. We went into the treaty because of our national interest, and we will support the treaty because we have entered into it and because it is in our national interest to do so.

It was emphasized by the hon. member for Cape Breton South that this is a treaty for the defence of peace. Of course it is. That aim is out in the forefront of the desirable objectives to be attained by this means. I indicated before that the North Atlantic treaty organization has as its objectives to deter aggression, and if necessary to defend ourselves against aggression and to defeat the aggressor. It has been said repeatedly by other leaders in the North Atlantic treaty countries that they believe that this is possible. Did we not believe it to be possible, the future would indeed look dark. But it is our conviction that by working together along the lines that have been indicated we can achieve these results.

With regard to some of the specific questions asked by the leader of the opposition, there is certain information that is not available yet but I shall deal with some of the questions now.

The hon. gentleman said that he would like to have information as to the number of units in the active and reserve forces of the army, navy and air force, divided into the differennt types of units. As he must appreciate, there must be several hundred units in the active forces and well on to a thousand units in the reserve, with divisions into different types of units.

Then he asked for details of the equipment which they should have and what they actually have. There are two schedules of equipment, one for training equipment and the other for mobilization equipment. With regard to training equipment, I can tell him that all the reserve units have all the equipment they need. There are large reserves and pools of equipment for reserve unit training at the different commands across the country. If any unit can use additional equipment, it only needs to ask the local G.O.C. and the equipment will be made available. There is no shortage of reserve army equipment.

With regard to war equipment or mobilization stores, information as to this is contained in army form G1098. There is an equipment table for each type of unit in the armed forces. There are 400 different volumes like these, each one of them about the size of a small Eaton's catalogue, and of course they are secret. I do not know anything that the enemy would like to obtain more than the strength of trained personnel in each type of unit, so as to show our whole battle order, its effectiveness, and the establishment figures for mobilization. There is a further reason why this is regarded as confidential, namely, that it would disclose information not only about our own establishment but also about the establishments of countries with which we are allied.

On the question of security I should add that often we would very much like to give information but we cannot do so because it is shared with other countries. There is also the fact that one of the things a prospective aggressor would like to find out is how accurate his own sources of information are, in order that he can check his own espionage and information services. Even though intrinsically the information may not be of great importance to a prospective aggressor, it is of great value in enabling him to verify the accuracy of his sources of information in respect of other matters.

I can give a figure as to equipment. Some time ago I asked for a statement showing the quantity of equipment it was estimated we would need during the first year of an emergency should it arise. For the army it totalled 171,381,981 different pieces of equipment. At that time we had in stores 119,336,386, which in numbers represents about two-thirds of the equipment needed for the first year of a war should it arise. I think that will give the hon. member substantially what he wants, in the way in which it can be made available.

The hon. member asked for the expenditure to be devoted to each branch of the services during the present year. As hon. members know, it is not the practice in this or in other countries to keep books by units. Equipment is not dealt with in dollar value per unit. It is dealt with on a physical issue basis. Army units are not accounting units in the sense of keeping books showing all costs in terms of dollars. Estimates in Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom are not built up on a unit basis. To provide the hon. member with the information he wants would require the complete reconstruction of our accounting practice, and a complete review of every individual item that was issued or went to any unit. So that the information is simply not available.

The hon. member asked for similar figures with regard to headquarters, and the amount that is being asked for the maintenance thereof. The same answer applies. I have, however, obtained information which may be interesting particularly in view of the question put by the hon. member for Calgary East. He asked what progress was being made in reducing the proportion of the numbers in headquarters staffs to other units in the armed forces. As at the 31st December, 1949, 9·1 per cent of the armed forces were in headquarters staff, and at other units 90·9 per cent. As at the 31st March, 1950, 8·7 per cent were at headquarters of all kinds and 91·3 per cent were with units, representing a trend in a desirable direction. In view of the nature of modern defence forces and the necessity for maintaining administrative and planning staffs to deal with very much larger forces should the need arise, I think the figures I have mentioned are not out of line. We will continue, however, to endeavour to put more and more personnel into operational units. Of course that is a very desirable objective.

In this connection I might mention two facts with regard to the navy, which will be of interest. I was asked to what degree the navy could be made fully operational in a short time. I think I can say to an exceedingly good degree at the present time, and that all ships in commission can be fully operational within a matter of hours rather than days. At the present time 41·5 per cent of the personnel of the navy are on commissioned ships, representing a very large proportion, much larger than any other navies with which we are familiar, and at least as much as we would want them to be.

We have made a similar comparison as to the air force, and we find that on the basis of man hours of flying per month the Royal Canadian Air Force compares favourably with other comparable air forces. At this stage of its development that seems to us to be as good a test as any.

I should say something as to a matter about which there has been some comment in the press resulting from the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I refer to the future role of the infantry. At page 3189 of Hansard for June 5 the Secretary of State for External Affairs had this to say:

> This principle may come to mean . . .

Then I will omit certain words.

> . . . and eventually, possibly, to the abandonment of the old concept of defence by great masses of conscripted infantry, the bulk of which would be reservists called up on the outbreak of war.

I have not had an opportunity to discuss this point with my colleague, because he has been away since I saw the statement. I have no doubt, however, from the language used, and from our common knowledge of the situation, that he has in mind possible developments, particularly on the continent of Europe, which might bring about that result. With the increased application of scientific techniques and increased mechanization, there would not be the same value in great masses of conscripted infantry, but I should like to make it very plain that we in Canada do not envisage any considerable change in the role of infantry in the foreseeable future. I think it would be a great mistake for any such misconception to go out, because it might adversely affect people interested in the infantry, and recruiting for infantry reserve units. At the end of the second world war I believe experience showed that the infantry were just as important as they had ever been in the history of modern warfare, and probably more so. I believe that the trend of modern development in the immediate future will increase the importance of infantry, because there are developments coming in weapons and projectiles which will increase the defensive power of infantry against armour. So that while the concept of great masses of infantry may cease to be so prevalent, that does not reduce in any way whatever the great importance of the infantry soldier with his modern weapons—sixteen of them—in modern warfare. If he is fully trained and equipped with those weapons, then he may become the determining factor in the final stage of any such warfare.

Do not let what I have just said, however, in an endeavour to correct what may be a misapprehension, lead anyone to think I underestimate the importance of the other arms of the service or of the other services. They all have their roles, and they must all work together as a team. I must agree completely with the remarks of the leader of the opposition and others with regard to the role of the air force. Those remarks are completely in accord with the policy we have had. Certainly from the point of view of immediate activity in the event of an emergency, in a war as far away as we hope the centre of activities would be, the air force will play a big role. On that account we are putting the emphasis we are on the air force, as regards both organizing squadrons and equipment. At the same time it is much too early to say that that role can be played to the complete exclusion of anything else. As I say, defence is a team operation, and while we mean to support the idea of balanced collective forces between nations, the time when that is likely to produce major changes in the allocation of forces within Canada is not yet upon us. The matter is just receiving consideration at the international level, and while there will be changes in the foreseeable future which I shall be glad to discuss when they arise, they will be changes in the development of forces and the standardization of equipment, which will provide the partnership of the north Atlantic nations with the power which is essential to the preservation of peace, or, if peace cannot be secured, the restoration of peace.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I wish to deal immediately with one or two points that have been made by the Minister of National Defence because it seems to me they go to the root of the understanding of this problem with which we are dealing, the most important single departmental problem the government faces.

Referring to the discussion which took place last night about the competitive firing practice at artillery camps, the minister indicated that he has checked on the situation since then and has found that the view I expressed was substantially correct. But what disturbs me is that the answer he has now given is not correct. He states that there are exercises as units, and he says that there is competitive firing as units. Mr. Chairman, I say most emphatically that is not so.

The present plans call for no competitive firing by artillery units at Petawawa or the other artillery camp this year; nor do they have the opportunity for movement and training as units, which in itself is the basis of training for active service. I can only point this out, because unless we understand these things we do not understand what the state of training actually is, and what is being produced by the money that is being spent. As the minister has already indicated, the competitive firing that is done by the artillery is under competitions that are arranged by the Canadian Artillery Association. None of that firing practice will be carried out this summer, unless there is a change between now and then, which seems unlikely, in view of the fact that the units will be starting to move into camp almost any day, and will continue to progressively move into camp at different times during the summer.

The procedure that is followed is that the artillery units send men from their own units. Those men are brought into training groups, and receive excellent training in special subjects. They do participate in firing; they do see the theory of firing explained and carried out in actual firing practice, but they do not operate as firing units. Artillery that does not operate as a firing unit is a long distance from being even near the point of readiness to prepare for active service conditions. That is true also of the infantry. At the infantry camp the infantry do not train as field units under field conditions. There again the members of those units are given excellent training in the details of infantry work. As a result of that training they will be able to go back and pass on that training to others with whom they will be associated in the training at the local armouries and elsewhere. There again, excellent though the training may be, the units are not getting that type of field training as units, with the use of their own fire power, in competitive contests. Such training is the basic qualification for obtaining real results.

As I believe the minister must know, the Canadian Artillery Association has indicated it intends to discuss this subject at its meeting in the last week of October, but that is for next year, not this year. So it is with the infantry. They are discussing this subject. Everyone recognizes the difficulties, but, in the name of common sense and in the name of preparation for real defence, let us not accept any explanation that is not in keeping with reality. If the minister was informed in accordance with the statement he made to the house this morning, I suggest that he ascertain exactly what training the artillery units will be receiving at Petawawa, Shilo and other artillery camps across the country, as well as what training the infantry will receive in the field, as units, under unit competitive circumstances.

Referring to the assumption of our obligations, the minister said that we mean to carry out to the full everything that is involved in that treaty. I believe those are his exact words, or so close to them I feel he will accept them as a correct statement of the effect of the words he used. If the minister means just what he says, that we mean to carry out everything that is involved, then of course he means that it is agreed this government will carry out what was described by the minister of external affairs as the new principle recognized by this recent London meeting. That principle is that if one nation can perform a particular task, then those nations which cannot do it so well will leave that task to be done by that particular nation. The minister of external affairs qualified that, in what was much the most important part of his statement, by saying that this principle carried with it the necessity of knowing that the nation which had that special type of equipment would use it. That of course must be obvious; because if one nation is to let another nation concentrate on fast land armoured forces and does not provide them themselves, they will then place themselves in a position of pitiful weakness and utter helplessness, unless their failure to supply those forces was compensated by the existence of forces immediately available and in a state of war readiness the moment the call came—not war readiness three months from now, or six months from now, but war readiness today.

One fact that should be in the mind of every member of this committee is that when we are discussing the figures before us now we are not in a position of war readiness with regard to any part of those forces in any number that could be recognized as substantial fulfilment of the agreement that was entered into in London. We are not within six months, at a minimum, of being able to carry out our part. That fact applies not only to the fulfilment of our part in any joint enterprise overseas, but also to the fulfilment of our part within our own country to meet the type of force that we would be called upon to meet if that force were brought to our shores by air or by sea; but presumably the threat would be by air.

In discussing these matters let us not regard the statement of what the realities are as a challenge either to the quality of the forces we possess or the earnestness of the effort that they are making. We have in our forces men and women doing their utmost to bring those forces to the highest level of training efficiency possible. One of the tragic stories of the democracies in a considerable part of this century is the lulling of the people by the assurances that they are ready when that term "readiness" is taken to mean readiness by our standards, not by the standards of readiness of the enemy we are called upon to face. Do not let anyone today forget the reassuring statements that were made before this last war; and do not let anyone forget the knowledge of everyone who participated as to the time it actually took to bring our training to the state that we were assured it possessed in the months and years before this last war.

As the Secretary of State for External Affairs has pointed out, this situation calls for immediate action. We cannot hope to have time to build up behind the ramparts of the sacrifice of other people. We must be prepared to take our part the moment these forces are needed. It will be the knowledge that we can do that and that other nations can do it that will be the one assurance we can ever have of peace.

As to the question of the changes envisaged by the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, there was a statement carried by Canadian Press and extensively published throughout Canada, on June 6, the day after the Secretary of State for External Affairs made his statement. I think that the first four paragraphs of that reported statement are of value—and I am quoting in this case from the Montreal Gazette—because they indicate statements that were made here to the Canadian Press. When the Canadian Press says that officers of the Department of National Defence made those statements, I accept their word for it—and I feel sure that the minister will accept their word for it—that such statements were made. I quote from this report as follows:

> Atlantic pact arms developments in the next few years hold a strong possibility of working big changes in Canada's forces and in plans to send overseas a third expeditionary force mainly composed of infantry in any new war, informed quarters said today.
> Within five years, they said, the use of massed infantry could easily be obsolete. Such military efforts as the tight, tough land battles in Italy and the D-day landings in Normandy would be ruled out by the violence of mass destruction weapons.
> This trend is of obvious and vital importance in view of Russia's stress on land forces, her almost unlimited ability to reinforce them and her relative immaturity in the scientific and technical fields.

Then may I emphasize these words which I am now quoting, still from that Canadian Press report:

> Defence officials here said scientific advances now are moving towards push-button warfare at a pace which has defence headquarters constantly examining plans and revamping them.

That is a statement by the Canadian Press, based, according to that report, upon the statements of officials of the Department of National Defence. When I spoke last night of the concern that must be felt that we have no statement as to what the new plans are in relation to the situation envisaged by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his statement last Monday, I referred to this very word "revamping". What I had hoped to hear, and what I think many other hon. members had hoped to hear, was a report on what revamping will be done and what rationalization will be done in accordance with the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to the effect that each nation is going to perform, as part of this great team of free nations, the military task which it can best perform. His statement, if it was not specific in that regard, implied that the masses of infantry would be found amongst the teeming millions on the European continent which are being armed by the United States so largely today; and that we at a greater distance would find and train the harder hitting, more compact, mobile fighting forces in the air and on the land which could be quickly transported to any threatened area. In the light of that statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in the light of the situation disclosed, and in fact in the light of the difficulty that the minister has in dealing with individual problems, even with officials of the department in front of him—as indicated by the explanation given in regard to artillery training—I think we should have the details before us.

The Minister of National Defence says that his books contain the records of a thousand infantry units. Certainly they do. But that fact presents no difficulty. There is no difficulty in putting down in a statement that there are so many infantry units, divided into active and reserve, and that there are so many artillery units. That just takes one line. Then there is no difficulty in putting down whether there are one hundred or two hundred, or whatever the number may be, active and reserve; and under each of these, the personnel of establishment and the personnel actually training; then under other headings, the units of the air force, active and reserve; machines in their possession; machines called for by establishment. The same with the navy; the number of ships, the number of units active, the number of units reserve, and the equipment they have—that would not take any volumes of books as was suggested by the minister. It is the kind of information that is available with regard to other departments of infinitely less importance than this one.

Even with what he said today, I still hope that the minister will agree to prepare a statement showing in simple and graphic form, first of all, the division of our defence areas into five commands, the inclusion under those commands of the armoured units, the ordinary infantry divisions, and the component units of those divisions, and the allocation of men to those units, so that we may have in front of us, in simple, graphic and understandable form, exactly what it is we are dealing with. Then, to take the case of the active units, of what use is it to us to be told that there are 40,000 men, or whatever the number may be? What we need to know is how many of these are in headquarters, how many at command headquarters, how many in permanent tasks that are not part of the active force, how many in the active force ready to go into service if they are called upon to do that. The relationship between the number at headquarters here, at command headquarters, at the various points throughout the country where there are detachments of this kind in relation to the number actively training, will give us the kind of picture we need.

In dealing with these remarks at this point, and in dealing with what the minister said about the state of training of the artillery, I simply have risen, first, to point out to him again the information that I have received from what I am satisfied is an entirely reliable source in regard to this; and second, to urge him once again to give us information which involves no measure of secrecy, but will make clear to us the structure that we want to understand when we are putting up this money.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make plain the position as to artillery training. It is as stated by the leader of the opposition, and I do not think that what I said at the outset was any different, except that he, having been the former president of the Canadian Artillery Association, attaches very great importance to battery competitive practice. No doubt his own battery and regiment won the competition. I think that is so. However, emphasis is not placed by my advisers on that type of training at the present time. The note on this which I got since I came into the house is I believe substantially correct, and is in accordance with what both the leader of the opposition and myself said. Reserve force artillery units go to camp as units. Training is conducted there either on a course basis or on a unit battery basis. Battery training is now on the increase, and it is expected that several units will be trained that way this summer. Royal Canadian Artillery Association has not yet reinstated the pre-war competitions, but is considering a similar program to be instituted shortly. Initially competitive shoots are likely to be on a troop basis.

The oral information I had when I came into the house was that it had been decided to institute competitive shoots this summer. Apparently it is still being considered. It is a matter outside the control of the department; it is within the control of the association. I think what the leader of the opposition said and what I said are substantially in accord and in accordance with the facts.

With regard to the assurance of readiness, we have been very careful, and I think accurate, in giving any assurances. Admitting that everything the leader of the opposition said is true, and a great deal of it is, then that is every reason for our pressing on with training and equipment with a view to making the active force as militarily operational as it is possible for it to be, and for the reserve forces to approach just as rapidly as possible the standards we want to have for the active force.

Mr. Green: There are one or two thoughts I should like to place before the minister and the committee this morning. But before doing so may I say that I realize the difficulties of the minister's position and of his department. Probably no one in the house would have thought it possible two or three years ago that within less than five years of the end of the fighting Canada would be faced with the necessity of appropriating at least half a billion dollars in any one year for defence purposes. That necessity of course arises because of the unfortunate trend world affairs have taken, a trend which has resulted in the world being divided into two blocs, the peoples of each bloc worrying about war and discussing appropriations for defence in their respective legislative chambers. It is a very sad situation, but of course it is a situation that Canadians must face.

I do not think it will be questioned that if there should be another war it will be fought on a world-wide basis, though primarily in the northern hemisphere; and that the two chief participants will be the United States and Russia. These are facts which are perfectly obvious to everyone.

I believe that because of the North Atlantic treaty, and the steps that are being taken under that treaty, Canadians do not have to worry as much as they formerly did about warfare in the north Atlantic area. I am hopeful that that is the situation. While it may take some time, there is little doubt that eventually the nations which have signed that treaty and set up the North Atlantic council will be able to build up exceedingly strong defence forces which it would be very risky for Russia to attack.

However, as a member representing a constituency on the west coast I am very much disturbed by the attitude of the Minister of National Defence with regard to the Pacific. Just a few minutes ago he referred to Canada as a country as far away from the centre of activity as we hope we will be in the event of another war. I hope he is right, but I think that statement was absolutely unrealistic in view of the situation around the shores of the Pacific ocean.

In dealing with the defence for Canada on the Pacific coast yesterday, the minister used these words, as found at page 3380 of Hansard:

> It is obvious that we are in the fortunate position of being well to the east of lines of defence which include Japan and the islands to the south and the Hawaiian islands, and Alaska in the north. We are not in the same exposed position in the Pacific as we are in the Atlantic.

Once again I fervently hope that he is right, but I believe that statements of that kind by the Minister of National Defence of Canada are very unfortunate because they will have the effect of lulling the Canadian people into a false sense of security with regard to the position on the Pacific. Statements of this kind are unfair to the Canadian people. I know the minister did not intend to be unfair. I think his intentions were perfectly good, but, in the final analysis, statements of that kind are unfair unless there is absolutely no doubt about their accuracy. Personally I believe that never in her whole history has Canada been in as dangerous a position as she is today in the event of war. We are vulnerable on the Atlantic; we are vulnerable across the Arctic, and we are vulnerable on the Pacific.

As I said a moment ago, the two nations most directly involved in a third world war would be Russia and the United States. It is only reasonable to expect that one of these nations, sooner or later, in order to win will have to get at the other one. Russia's main objective in any such war would be to get at the United States. She could not possibly win a third world war without attacking the United States; and whether she attacks across the north Atlantic, across the Arctic or across the north Pacific, she must cross Canadian territory. That means, just as surely as night follows day, that in the event of a third world war Canada will be in the position of Belgium in the first one.

It is the duty of the members of the House of Commons to make it perfectly clear to the Canadian people that this is so, in order that there can be no misunderstanding of what Canada's position will be. The minister has said that we are safe behind the United States line in Alaska. Well, on April 1, General Dwight Eisenhower, the famous American leader, had this to say with regard to Alaska:

> Strengthening Alaska and its major airfields against surprise airborne attack, by a permanent force of well-trained and equipped ground troops and a radar screen to detect and warn against air forays.

He stated that as one of the three main defence programs that should be undertaken by the United States. Two weeks later, General Omar N. Bradley, chairman of the United States joint chiefs of staff said he believed that Alaska is the weakest link in the United States military defence. The article goes on to say:

> He added Alaska air bases must not fall into enemy hands since they could be used as long range bomber bases for attacks against the U.S.

Earlier, on February 22, we find this heading from San Francisco: "U.S. sets up air defences on west coast". The article goes on to say:

> Establishment of a civil air raid warning system for U.S. western states was announced Tuesday.
> The system is expected to be in operation within weeks. It will extend east to the rockies.
> Special telephone communications will be set up within the entire western area. Civilian centres will be warned in less than a minute should the defence centre receive word that air attack is imminent.
> Modern weapons and long-range aircraft were cited as a reason for the warning system.

And then a dispatch from Los Gatos, California, dated April 7, states:

> Atomic-powered submarines may lead attacks which would turn U.S. coastal cities into world war three Pearl harbors, Vice-Admiral Charles A. Lockwood predicted here Thursday.
> Admiral Lockwood, retired wartime commander of the Pacific submarine fleet, warned that Russia "probably" has entered into a race with the U.S. to build the first "A-sub."
> Admiral Lockwood predicted atomic-powered submarines would be "miracle warships" with an almost "unlimited" surface cruising range and capable of carrying atomic guided-missiles to U.S. shores completely undetected.
> He pointed out that even the conventionally-powered Russian subs "can make a round-trip to the west coast, deliver guided missiles and return without refuelling."

This means of course that Russian submarines could stand off the Canadian coast and use guided missiles against our west coast Canadian cities, just as easily as they could against the American cities. These are some of the very serious possibilities we must face.

I have a statement from our own naval chief of staff, Vice Admiral Harold T. W. Grant. It was made in Victoria on April 28 of this year, and is reported in this way:

> He reviewed the west coast defence picture and said it is becoming more important in view of the cold war and conditions in China. However, there were no plans to augment the Esquimalt-based fleet with ships from the east coast.

Then of course we had Exercise Sweetbriar, in the Yukon Territory and Alaska, which was based on the hypothesis that the Russians had taken Alaska. The exercise was to work out methods of stopping them in the vicinity of Whitehorse.

Yet I am afraid the situation is that Canadians, from the Minister of National Defence down, are still European-minded—or perhaps I should say Atlantic-minded. There is good reason why that should be our outlook as a people. We stem from European stock, and the first world war was essentially a European war. The last one was primarily European. Our thinking in regard to war naturally turns to the Atlantic and to Europe.

I remember so clearly the difficulty we had in the early months of 1942 in convincing the government that there was real danger on the Pacific coast. That was several months after the Japanese had struck at Pearl Harbor. On the coast we had practically no defences. It turned out later that we did not have as many aircraft on that coast as would have been carried by one Japanese aircraft carrier, and many of the aircraft we did have were very much out of date.

The Vancouver Sun took an active part in demanding that some steps be taken to defend the Pacific coast. Indeed, they took such an active part that they were dragged into police court by the defence department and fined because of some of the articles they had published. Members of the House of Commons from British Columbia also took a determined stand and went after the then minister of national defence pretty hard. At that time it was Hon. J. L. Ralston, who, incidentally, was one of Canada's greatest sons.

Those of us from British Columbia were much concerned about the situation. Our families and our people were out there, exposed to attack. The Americans had suffered at Pearl Harbor, and we knew there was no way of stopping the Japanese if they chose to invade the west coast. A day or two after I had attacked the defence department with considerable bitterness, the late Colonel Ralston called me out of the chamber, took me into room 16, and, in his friendly way, said, "Green, you are very much worried about the west coast. I can see that now. What is the trouble?" I tried to tell him, giving him my point of view. He said: "Well, you may be right; and if I could get one of my staff to agree with you I could do something about it. I'll tell you what we will do; we will go down and have a talk with the chief of staff. You can put up your side and he can put up his. I shall just sit and listen; and we shall see what happens." Next day Colonel Ralston took me down to defence headquarters, where the late Lieutenant General Kenneth Stuart and I had a debate on the need for defending the Pacific coast. By the way, General Stuart was another great Canadian whose services to his country have never been fully appreciated. He gave his life for his country, just as did Colonel Ralston.

I think it would be most fitting that there should be placed in the halls of this building a statue of Colonel Ralston. He was a great battalion commander in the first war, commanding the 85th Nova Scotia Highlanders. His men loved him, and would follow him anywhere. During the second great war he served in a much less spectacular way by working here fifteen, eighteen and twenty hours a day doing a wonderful job. There is no doubt in my mind that his work during the second world war brought about his untimely death. I know of no Canadian more worthy of having a statue in his memory placed in the halls of this building than the late J. L. Ralston.

It was not long before the Japs took Kiska and to the south had a fleet on the way to invade either the Hawaiian islands or the west coast. Fortunately that fleet was defeated in the battle of Midway by the United States fleet air forces. Had it not been for that defeat, the west coast of Canada and the United States might well have been invaded. After taking Kiska the Japanese started out to take Dutch Harbor, the next great United States base in Alaska. Fortunately they were turned back because the United States flyers flew out behind them and came in from the west, deceiving them into thinking there was a United States force behind them, and the Japanese turned back.

Canada then was inclined to be European-minded, and I am afraid that is still the situation. It would not be so bad if we were not so vulnerable on the north Pacific. Russia is a much tougher opponent in the Pacific than Japan ever could be, because Russia has Siberia. For years she has had a Siberian army able to carry on as an independent fighting force. That was the position in the recent war. The Russian Siberian forces were able to carry on, even though the European forces had been defeated.

Siberia reaches to within a few miles of Alaska. Russian airmen by the hundreds flew the route to Edmonton in order to take United States planes back to Siberia during the war. The Russians are accustomed to warfare in northern climates. There has been some discussion in this debate about the need of Canadians having training in Arctic fighting, and I think the defence department is realistic about that need. However, the Russians have been carrying on that type of training for years and are accustomed to fighting in cold weather. Added to Russia we now have China, with over 400 million people, the biggest reserve of manpower in the world today, and under the domination of Russia.

That is the situation we find in the Pacific area. Just the other day there was a dispatch in the Vancouver Sun dated May 31, just nine days ago. It is entitled, "Expansion in Asia Russia's main goal" and is from Warsaw by Daniel De Luce, Associated Press correspondent. The articles reads:

> Some Poles within earshot of Moscow assert that this is the Russian planning for the next decade:
> 1. Defensive consolidation in eastern Europe.
> 2. Dynamic expansion of influence in Asia.

And again:

> They say the Russians have more to fear than the western powers from a shooting scrape in Europe. It is Asia that's a soft touch, not the Rhine—with others to do the fighting, not the Soviet army.
> They make this comparison of power:
> American guns face Soviet frontiers in Germany and Austria. But where are they on the Asia mainland?
> A hard-boiled communist is his own boss in Yugoslavia. Where is another like him in the Far East?
> Marshall plan dollars continue to pour into western Europe, stronger industrially than ever in history. Where is the effective help for a weak Saigon or Bangkok or Rangoon?

The following is the substance of what I heard in Poland on a visa granted by the foreign ministry to encourage interest in a trade fair:

"You westerners don't see further than the end of your nose. You seem oblivious to the inner stresses and strains in our eastern bloc. You underestimate your strength in Europe. You are purblind to your weaknesses in Asia. Russia is winning there without having to fire a shot."

I have some suggestions to make to the minister with regard to the north Pacific. We should have there an air force ready to fight, with airfields adequately defended. There should be a coastal patrol able to deal with submarines. So far as I know there has never been any emphasis placed on Canada developing an air coastal patrol of that kind. It is essential for the defence of the cities, in fact for the defence of the whole west coast of Canada.

With regard to the army, I suggest that the permanent armoured brigade should be kept up to fighting strength and ready to strike at a moment's notice. That was the promise made to us in 1945 by the then minister of national defence; and I quote from page 1131 of Hansard of October 16, 1945, where the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) is reported as having said:

This formation will be maintained as a trained field force, fully equipped, ready to meet whatever commitments may arise.

Such a force is essential for the defence of Canada's territory in the northern Pacific area.

I suggest also that there should be at least a division of the reserve army trained to the point where it could take the field in a short space of time. We older soldiers can think only in terms of divisions. It may be that we are out of date and that a division is not the proper unit under present conditions. In any event I believe there should be a substantial group in the reserve army told that they would be the first part of that reserve army to get into the fighting, and they should be trained and equipped accordingly.

This would be much on the basis of the selection of the first division in the recent war. In British Columbia there was only one regiment taken into the first division, the Seaforth Highlanders of Canada, a regiment of which we are justly very proud. There were other excellent regiments in British Columbia, but the Seaforths were picked, I believe, well in advance of the fighting, as the regiment from British Columbia to go with the first division.

In depending on the reserve army as a whole—we were told in 1946 it would be six divisions—to back up the permanent brigade, we are not being realistic. We should have some designated force prepared to take the field within a very short period of time if trouble comes. Incidentally it would be interesting to know how long the minister thinks it would take for Canada to field a division or similar body of men under present conditions.

With regard to the navy, I submit that there must be an adequate number of ships on the Pacific coast to deal with submarines, and that steps should be taken to protect our harbours. Now is the time to make the arrangements necessary for the protection of the harbours on the Pacific coast. I forgot one suggestion about the army which I had intended to make. There should be an expansion of the Canadian militia rangers. I do not think the minister has mentioned them so far in the debate. As hon. members know, there was set up during the last war on the west coast a body known as the Pacific coast militia rangers. They were not very popular with the army staffs, because they were woodsmen and men accustomed to the sea, first-class outdoor men, but they were not of the disciplined type. It took quite a while for the army staff to get the idea that this force might be of some help if the Japanese invaded the west coast. The morale of the force was excellent. I have never seen anything finer since the days of the Canadian corps in the first war. They were in all the hamlets up and down the west coast and right into the interior. They were very proud of the part they were playing, and if there had been an invasion they would have been of inestimable value to Canada.

Eventually arrangements were made to carry on an establishment of that type in peacetime. I do not know what the strength is at the present time, but I think the Department of National Defence might well consider expanding that force and setting up units not only in British Columbia but also in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. They would be excellent leaders in any guerrilla type of warfare.

I believe also that steps should be taken on the west coast without delay to set up a civil defence system. I read to the committee an extract indicating that the United States have been doing that since early this year, and I believe a beginning should be made as quickly as possible on the west coast of Canada.

Looking a little further afield in the Pacific area, I believe Canada has so much to gain, and nothing to lose, from a Pacific defence pact that no time should be lost in bringing it about. The people on the Pacific coast will suffer most if there is another world war. If there is trouble we are going to need help badly from all our friends on the shores of the Pacific. I am afraid that Canada hangs back too much on this question of a Pacific defence pact. Yesterday I saw a dispatch from Canberra, Australia, in the Ottawa Journal indicating that Australia would join the United States in a Pacific pact. The article reads:

> Percy Spender, external affairs minister, said today Australia is ready to join the United States in a Pacific defence pact even if no other countries go along.

If there should be trouble, Canada will need the help of Australia, New Zealand, and other Pacific countries. Our two sister nations are not members of the North Atlantic council. They were not asked to sign the treaty, and there should be the same kind of arrangement for the Pacific.

Another sign which makes me wonder whether the Canadian government is being realistic about the Pacific is the delay in getting a statement about southeast Asia from the Minister of Fisheries who has just returned from Australia. I do not blame him. He made statements when he was in Sydney indicating what he was going to recommend to the Canadian government. It was stated that Canada would likely be making some contribution to help the countries of southeast Asia. On different occasions we have asked for a statement, but there has been delay. Yesterday the Minister of Fisheries said he would have to wait until the estimates of external affairs were under consideration. I hope the difficulty is not that he has met opposition in the cabinet, that there are some members of the cabinet who are taking the position that no help is needed, and that Canada need not become involved in that area.

From what the Minister of Fisheries has said I am convinced that he is in favour of Canada taking action. The same applies to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, because one need only read his speech made earlier in the session, reporting on his trip to the Pacific, to be reassured with regard to his attitude. I urge the Minister of National Defence as strongly as I possibly can that he support these two ministers in cabinet council in urging that Canada announce quickly what she is going to do to help those countries which are trying to stand off communism. I urge him that he see to it that there is an estimate put through the house before the end of the session. If that is not done I do not see how it will be possible to give a great deal of help. I am sure that members of the house would approve such an estimate, but I am worried about the delay. I am afraid that time is of vital importance in the Pacific; that the sands are running out against us in the Pacific area, and that in the event of trouble Canada will be the nation to suffer most.

As I said in opening, these suggestions are placed before the minister with a pretty clear realization of the difficulties he and the Department of National Defence are facing so soon after they have been through the second world war. Nevertheless that is the position. They, the members of the house and the Canadian people can only meet these sobering problems with courage. I am sure that will be the attitude of the Canadian people as a whole.

Mr. Claxton: I should like to say that I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. I know he wants to be fair, and I should like to assure him that I never said and did not wish to imply that I thought the Pacific coast was safe in the sense that he has ascribed that to me.

Mr. Green: I quoted exactly what the minister said yesterday.

Mr. Claxton: The hon. gentleman also said that I had said it was safe, and I did not say that. I was referring to the remarks of the hon. member for Kamloops, who had compared the forces on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. I referred to the two situations very briefly, but I would not like the impression to go out that we do not have regard to the Pacific situation and its needs, which the hon. member has expressed so well.

As to the Canadian rangers, we have twenty-one companies organized. I have seen the locations of the various groups of of men, and I can assure the hon. member they cover every place in the north all the way up to the extreme Arctic as well as in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and northwestern Ontario where there is more than a handful of people.

Mr. Green: How many did the minister say?

Mr. Claxton: Twenty-one companies.

Mr. Green: During the war there were far more than that in British Columbia alone.

Mr. Claxton: Now they are in larger groupings.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Fraser: Will the minister inform me how the Royal Canadian Air Force calculates the charges made to another department for the special use of a plane? What is the cost per mile for the use of a North Star non-pressurized plane?

Mr. Claxton: The amount charged includes the cost of the oil and gasoline, and what are called running spares. The cost of the oil and gasoline is the actual cost averaged, and the cost of running spares is the actual cost averaged. I would have to get the information as to the charge per mile. I believe it is calculated by the hours flown, and not per mile. I rather think we have that information here.

Mr. Fraser: I should like to have that information, because of an answer given in the external affairs committee referring to the charge to the external affairs department for a special plane. The R.C.A.F. absorbed half the cost because they felt it was a flight that might help them in the future, and charged the other half to external affairs. I wondered how they calculated the total cost as $16,000 for the Colombo flight, because that is less than a dollar a mile.

Mr. Claxton: I shall have to get that information for the hon. member.

Mr. McLure: I should like to ask the minister a further question with regard to one I asked him yesterday, to see if I can get more definite information. My question related to the bombing range off the north shore of Prince Edward Island. The reply I received appears at page 3390 of Hansard, and is as follows:

> As to bombing range, we are working with the Department of Fisheries and the people on the spot to try to secure an area which will be adequate for bombing and firing practice, and which will not destroy the best fishing territory off the maritime provinces.
> Mr. McLure: Will it be within the three-mile limit or without the fourteen-mile limit?

It is the latter question to which I should like to have an answer. I believe the fishermen in that locality deserve some assurance on this point. If the Department of Fisheries is not able to give the minister full information about the territory, I am his humble servant and shall be glad to give all the details. I hope to have some assurance from the Minister of National Defence to give the people.

Mr. Claxton: Since the hon. member raised this question yesterday I have been informed that the Department of Fisheries and the Department of National Defence have completed discussions. A bombing range area has been picked out as suitable for use should the need arise for it. It is not proposed to proceed further with it at this time. I can assure the hon. member that the fishermen, and the fish, are both safe in that area at the moment.

Mr. Higgins: Mr. Chairman, I have one or two questions concerning an item which appeared in the Montreal Gazette this morning, datelined Washington, concerning the United States bases and an expenditure of approximately $6 million. The part of the item to which I refer reads as follows:

> The navy was allotted $3,193,000 to construct permanent communications facilities, family quarters and utilities at Argentia, Newfoundland.
> The air force got $3,050,000 for fuel storage and refining facilities at Goose Bay airport, Labrador.

In that connection I refer the minister to the exchange of notes in 1944 between Canada and the United States. Paragraph 4 of the Canadian government note reads as follows:

> It was subsequently agreed between the two governments that, in addition, the Canadian government should assume the cost of permanent air installations elsewhere in Canada and at Goose Bay (Labrador) built by or on the account of the United States government, the cost of the telephone line from Edmonton to the Alaska boundary—

Well, that does not come into the picture. The agreement reached is contained in paragraph 6, which reads as follows:

> It is my understanding that the following has been agreed as a result of these discussions. The Canadian government will pay to the United States government the following amounts in United States dollars for construction carried out by the United States government:—

In that list we find the airfield at Goose Bay, Labrador, at a cost of $543,000. Then in paragraph 8:

> The costs incurred by the Canadian government on United States government account which the Canadian government will assume pursuant to the decisions reached are as follows:
> . . . Airfield at Goose Bay, Labrador, $9,950,000.

On that basis what will the situation be at Goose Bay?—because this would almost suggest something of a permanent installation that the United States government are building. Can the minister enlarge on that, or is it the proper place to ask it? Can he tell the committee something about it?

Mr. Claxton: The United States air force has asked permission from us, and we have given it, to provide for some permanent construction at Goose Bay on the Canadian base. I have no means of knowing, without inquiring from Washington, what is covered by the $6 million to which the hon. member refers. I can make inquiries, and no doubt our American friends, as a matter of courtesy, will give us the information.

Mr. Higgins: The paper says there is $3,050,000 for fuel storage and refining facilities at Goose Bay airport, Labrador. The other item is for Argentia, on the naval base. Would that be of any assistance?

Mr. Claxton: With regard to fuel storage and refining facilities, at Goose Bay the arrangement is now that we provide the fuel storage facilities for our own Canadian air force and also for the use of naval aircraft that may use the base, on a repayment basis; and the United States air force provides its own fuel. This is to cover the cost of tanks, and, I suppose, of the ultimate refining of it, in effect filtering, certainly not a large-scale commercial refinery.

Mr. Higgins: This would look like an abrogation of the notes exchanged in 1944. These appear to be permanent installations at Goose Bay; I do not know.

Mr. Claxton: We are not making any arrangement with the United States with regard to their having permanent rights in Canadian territory. But we have indicated to them, in consideration of various concessions that they may make to us, that at Goose Bay they can put up permanent or semi-permanent constructions on parts of the base we will make available to them under a limited-term lease.

Mr. Higgins: I have just three questions more, and then I shall be through. What is the present condition of the negotiations with respect to the base? What is the position with respect to command in the event of war? Does the Canadian officer in command still take over? Do the United States still have the right to take any land in Newfoundland they may deem necessary in the event of war?

Mr. Claxton: The state of the negotiations is that in consequence of the matter having been dealt with between representatives of the governments and by the permanent joint board on defence, the basis for an understanding has been arrived at. But that has been reported for consideration by each government by its section in the permanent joint board, and that consideration is being given now. I believe it is likely to produce an agreement; but I am not in a position to say yet that an agreement has been made or what its terms are. The negotiations have been conducted in a most friendly and co-operative way, and we look forward to being able to make at an early date an announcement which I hope will be acceptable to everyone.

There is no understanding with regard to command in the area. The ordinary rule would be that in Canadian territory a Canadian officer would be in command. In the event of an emergency, however, or in anticipation of an emergency, we would certainly work with the United States to ensure that the best possible method of dealing with the situation was followed by both countries. For example, with regard to air operations which involved major forces of the United States and included territory outside Canada, it is possible that in the sector concerned we might agree to an American commander being in charge; but that would have to be in consequence of our agreement. It is interesting to note that, in connection with Exercise Sweetbriar, we agreed to there being an American officer in command, Lieutenant General Chamberlin. The American forces and the Canadian forces were roughly equal, but the operation was planned to conclude in Alaska, which was its object. That arrangement worked out very well indeed. Canadian and American officers worked together, at every level, so that sometimes you would have Canadians in command of Americans and vice versa. There was no difficulty at all. That was one of the valuable experiences of the exercise.

With regard to the American right to occupy or take any land outside the leased base area, that is one of the matters which is under negotiation.

Mr. Blackmore: If I might, Mr. Chairman, I should like to discuss with the minister for a while the question of military morale. In the course of the discussion I might depart considerably from orthodox methods of carrying on debate in the House of Commons, but under the circumstances I believe that what I shall endeavour to do will be justified.

I believe that all hon. members will agree that in order for a nation to fight effectively, it has to have faith: faith in itself, faith in its cause, and faith in its country's future. What I have to say pertains to the development of faith in our people. We are living in an age in which men, in many cases, are losing faith. A large number of the people with whom I speak find themselves bewildered and disheartened. If I might contribute to some extent to the rejuvenation of some of their courage I would consider it worth while, and I believe that you, Mr. Chairman, would also consider it worth while.

We hear a good deal of discussion about where the next war is going to be fought. We had a measure of attention given to that matter this morning. Many hon. members, justifiably I believe, are gloomily forecasting that in all probability Canada will be the cockpit of the next war; in other words, that Canada will be the Belgium of world war III.

It is difficult, Mr. Chairman, to say whether or not the war which we fear is about to come on us is going to be the last great war referred to in scripture.

They tell me that years ago the bible used to be quoted often in the House of Commons, although I have rarely heard it quoted since I came here fourteen and a half years ago. Maybe it is about time we quoted it again. Suppose we turn to the bible and see what the bible says is going to be the location of the next great war, granted that that war is the winding-up war, or the final one, which it may be. May I direct the attention of hon. members to Ezekiel, chapter 38, verse 21, in which we find these words:

> And I will call for a sword against him throughout all my mountains, saith the Lord God: every man's sword shall be against his brother.

The "him" to which reference is made, as those who have read Ezekiel 38 will realize immediately, is Gog, which most people take to be Russia of today. The meaning of this passage, taken with the rest of Ezekiel 38, would be that the last great battle will be in Palestine, centred around Jerusalem. Hon. members who desire to read into the matter to some extent can read Ezekiel 38 and 39, and also Zechariah 12 and 14, where they will find considerable evidence in support of what I am saying.

I should like to draw the attention of hon. members and of the minister to the words which occur last: "Every man's sword shall be against his brother." I am not quite sure whether that refers to civil war or not, but I am rather afraid it does. Civil war would be the natural result of the communist propaganda which is being circulated so industriously all through our country, and against which many hon. members, including the leader of the opposition, have declaimed during the last year or so.

What can we do to offset this evil propaganda and give our people generally faith? I am glad, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member for Royal brought to the attention of the minister his recent action in abolishing "Rule Britannia" from the Royal Canadian Navy ships. The hon. member for Royal did the house and the country a service when he said that there was great unhappiness throughout the country today by reason of that action. He spoke in completely moderate terms. Except for just a few people of a certain particular class, I have not met a person who is not saddened because of the ministers' action—not a person.

People will say: "That is a foolish thing; that is funny; why is that?" The important thing is that people do feel unhappy about it. I should like to discuss this question briefly and in a perfectly friendly and mild way. Although the hon. member for Royal raised it the minister overlooked it when he came to make his answers. This matter is one which I believe requires earnest and calm discussion. It is not altogether a matter of sentiment. It is a matter of both sentiment and sense.

I wonder why the minister could not have merely authorized the use of "O Canada" on the ships, so that they could have gone on with the playing of "Rule Britannia" and "O Canada" just as we have our carillon player here play "O Canada" and "God save the King". I do not see why in this way the minister's purpose might not have been accomplished quite as well.

I have been casting about ever since the announcement, wondering what it was that caused the minister to do that thing. Does he feel that the Royal Canadian Navy failed to do the best that it was capable of doing in the last war? Does he feel that it lacked morale, and something like the abolition of "Rule Britannia" would help to restore that morale and bring the navy up to the peak of achievement which the minister desires? I wonder whether that was in his mind. I wonder what he felt might be achieved by abolishing "Rule Britannia."

The minister must have known that in making that change he would certainly give comfort to our enemies. Has the minister taken time to consider what the effect on a certain man named Joseph Stalin would be of the announcement that Canada had abolished "Rule Britannia" from her ships of the Royal Canadian Navy?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blackmore: This is not an occasion for levity. I am just about as intelligent as the hon. members who are scoffing at this matter, and I think you will find that I am just about as well informed, too.

Mr. Knowles: Granted.

Mr. Blackmore: I think you would be surprised at the rejoicing that went on in the camps of the communists when that occurred. I am afraid the minister would feel shocked on learning that he was playing into the hands of the communists in making that move.

There are several international forces that have been seeking the destruction of the British commonwealth for centuries, three of them at least. I am not going to name them. My judgment is that in the ranks of every single one of these three organizations there was nothing but rejoicing on the announcement that Canada had abolished the tune "Rule Britannia" from her ships. This is a matter which requires careful consideration.

I should like to ask what any one of these international forces has ever done for us that would make us want to kowtow to them, or play into their hands, or seek favours from them. They have done nothing but seek our destruction over hundreds of years. Anyone who is well informed knows that.

On the other hand, what did the move do to our friends? Did it give any comfort to them? Before I read what I am going to read I wish to throw out some protection, because I am going to read from the remarks of Churchill. Five years ago we hung upon every word of Churchill. He was standing between us and destruction. Well, he has not lost any of his intelligence and judgment since that time.

An. hon. Member: Just an election.

Mr. Knowles: Two elections.

Mr. Blackmore: On May 22, when in Worcester, England, he received the freedom of that city, Reuters carried the following report:

> Winston Churchill, receiving the freedom of Worcester city, Saturday publicly expressed his distress that "Rule Britannia" had been abolished in the Royal Canadian Navy. The Conservative party leader said: "It was with a bitter pang that I read in a newspaper that the Canadian navy had abolished 'Rule Britannia' as the tune to be sung on Canadian ships.
> It seems to be a very great pity to sever links with the past so full of lustre as that expressed by the words 'Rule Britannia'."

There be those, and I have heard some say it, who say: "Well, it was none of his business whatsoever to interfere in Canadian affairs." I submit that he was not interfering in Canadian affairs. He was just indicating his own feelings to his own people. It was an involuntary cry of pain from Britain—Britain, always our surest guard, our surest recourse in time of danger, ever since we first began to be.

Men in our time are likely to underestimate the importance of spiritual values. We are engaged in a desperate struggle between belief and non-belief, between belief in God and atheism.

Atheism suggests communism. We have had a number of members rise in this house and cry out against communism. May I suggest that one of the ways to offset communism is to teach people to believe in God. I have never heard anyone suggest in the house up to the present time that that ought to be done. I suggest that it is time that we did it.

Internationalism tends to atheism. There will be those who believe in internationalism who will be shocked by that remark. As evidence that internationalism tends to atheism, I suggest that you read the records pertaining to the San Francisco conference; read the whole United Nations documents; read the accounts of Bretton Woods, Dumbarton Oaks; read the accounts of all the trade conferences; read the accounts of the Atlantic pact. Do you find any reference in them to God? After reading these documents you would think that we had managed to divorce God from the universe.

You rarely hear anyone in our house refer to God when he rises to speak. If I may say so without casting any reflection on hon. members, I would ask how many of them seem to consider it worth while to come in here and listen to the beautiful prayer which is offered by the Speaker every day, calling for the assistance of Almighty God to be with us in our endeavours to cope with our problems. I will not say anything about it; I will just let hon. members come in and count them for themselves a week or two and see just what the situation is. I do not think it indicates very much attention to the important factor of God in our affairs.

I am not a colonialist; I am not an imperialist; I am merely one who desires to preserve the precious heritage of our British people's past—and no people in the world today has anything like as glorious a past as have the British people.

May I read "Rule Britannia," which was abolished from our navy. As I read these words hon. members and the minister himself can say whether they are glad that we turned our backs on these sentiments.

An hon. Member: Sing it.

Mr. Blackmore:

> When Britain first, at Heav'n's command,
> Arose from out the azure main,
> This was the charter of the land,
> And guardian angels sang the strain:
> "Rule, Britannia, rule the waves;
> For Britons never shall be slaves."

Well, does it offend the minister or anyone in the navy or in the army to have the origin of our nation attributed to the divine, to heaven's command? Does it offend any of them to know that guardian angels are taking care of the land and looking over us and our affairs? Does it offend any of them to think that we are aiming at freedom and that Britons never shall be slaves?

Then let us take the second stanza:

> The nations, not so bless'd as thee,
> Must, in their turns, to tyrants fall;
> While thou shalt flourish, great and free,
> The dread and envy of them all.

Does it offend the minister to think that Britain shall flourish great and free, and with her the British commonwealth? Does it offend him to think that Britain shall be the dread and envy of them all? I wonder if the minister would not be rather pleased, as well as other members in the house, if at the present time the British empire were standing as the dread and envy of Stalin? It would save us plenty of anxiety and headaches just now if she were so standing. And she could have been, if there had been just a little more wisdom used after world war I, and if so many people, ourselves included, had not been so ready to defer to the United States in international affairs.

Still more majestic shalt thou rise,
More dreadful from each foreign stroke;
As the loud blast that rends the sky
Serves but to root thy native oak.

Does it offend any member in the defence department or in the naval organization to think that Britain might actually become stronger from every stroke that she sustains? And the last verse:

The Muses, still with freedom found,
Shall to thy happy coast repair;
Blest Isle! with matchless beauty crown'd,
And manly hearts to guard the fair.

Surely there is no reason why the minister should be sorry that freedom goes back to Britain. I do believe that if we look the world over today and endeavour to find that land in which freedom is freest, we shall find that condition existing in Britain.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that as that hymn stands there now, that hymn "Rule Britannia," every time men of the navy, men of the army or people of the country play it or sing it, it constitutes a challenge to communism, a challenge to every manifestation of the anti-Christ in our day. It is a challenge to all atheistic forces.

I have not found anyone yet who, for any reason, is able to refute what I have said.

Let us examine the meanings of "Britain", "British", and "Britannia". We have been for forty years the victims of skilfully concocted and subtly disseminated propaganda which has sought to weaken the attachment of our people to Britain.

Let us examine these words:

What does "Britain" mean? "Britain" means "covenant land". What does "British" mean? It means a covenant man. What does "Britannia" mean? "Britannia" is the personification of what Britain stands for throughout the world and throughout the British commonwealth.

Why may Britain be called the land of the covenant? Why are British covenant men? Just by way of a simple illustration, let us turn to the lion and the unicorn in our coat of arms. Where do we get the lion and the unicorn? They came down out of the past, a past that is very remote—indeed so remote that we have no record whatsoever of the ultimate origin of the lion and the unicorn in our emblems. Yet there they stand, fighting for the crown, part of the emblems, part of the coat of arms of each and every British nation in the world.

What do they stand for? Well, the lion stands for Judah. The unicorn stands for Joseph or for Ephraim. Judah and Joseph were the two leading tribes among the children of Jacob, who became the children of Israel.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Blackmore: These two emblems take us right back to the 48th and 49th chapters of Genesis. They go back to the whole of the Old Testament. As they stand in our coat of arms they represent to us the Old Testament, the sacred bible, the word of God.

May I read into Hansard some pertinent passages from the bible. I direct the attention of hon. members to Genesis 12/3, where the Lord speaks to Abraham and makes a remarkable covenant with Abraham. There is where the covenant which gives Britain its name apparently originated. This is the verse:

And I will bless them that bless thee,—

And this is God speaking to Abraham.

—and curse him that curseth thee: and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed.

If we are descendants of Abraham—and we are; every person in this House of Commons at the present time I believe is a descendant of Abraham—then, there is the beginning of the covenant that makes us covenant men.

Now may I turn to Genesis, chapter 49, verses 22 to 26. Here Jacob, before dying, is blessing his son Joseph. We read:

22. Joseph is a fruitful bough, even a fruitful bough by a well; whose branches run over the wall:

23. The archers have sorely grieved him, and shot at him, and hated him:

24. But his bow abode in strength, and the arms of his hands were made strong by the hands of the mighty God of Jacob; (from thence is the shepherd, the stone is Israel:)

25. Even by the God of thy father, who shall help thee; and by the Almighty, who shall bless thee with blessings of heaven above, blessings of the deep that lieth under, blessings of the breasts, and of the womb;

26. The blessings of thy father have prevailed above the blessings of my progenitors unto the utmost bound of the everlasting hills: they shall be on the head of Joseph, and on the crown of the head of him that was separate from his brethren.

There is scarcely a member in the house today who is not a descendant of Joseph. In other words here is a blessing which pertains to us, to our race, to our nation, French speaking and English speaking.

I turn now to Genesis, chapter 48, verses 14 to 20, which read:

> And Israel stretched out his right hand, and laid it upon Ephraim's head, who was the younger, and his left hand upon Manasseh's head, guiding his hands wittingly; for Manasseh was the firstborn.
> And he blessed Joseph, and said, God, before whom my fathers Abraham and Isaac did walk, the God which fed me all my life long unto this day,
> The Angel which redeemed me from all evil, bless the lads; and let my name be named on them, and the name of my fathers Abraham and Isaac; and let them grow into a multitude in the midst of the earth.
> And when Joseph saw that his father laid his right hand upon the head of Ephraim, it displeased him: and he held up his father's hand, to remove it from Ephraim's head unto Manasseh's head.
> And Joseph said unto his father, Not so, my father: for this is the firstborn; put thy right hand upon his head.
> And his father refused, and said, I know it, my son, I know it: he also shall become a people, and he also shall be great: but truly his younger brother shall be greater than he, and his seed shall become a multitude of nations.
> And he blessed them that day, saying, In thee shall Israel bless, saying, God make thee as Ephraim and as Manasseh: and he set Ephraim before Manasseh.

I venture to say that there is hardly an hon. member of this house who is not a descendant of Ephraim. In other words, this nation of ours, this Canada, is young Ephraim. But what does it mean? First of all, may I point out that in the verses which I read a promise is made to Ephraim that he shall become a multitude of nations. Will hon. members tell me where in all the world's history there is anything which comes so near to fulfilling that prophecy, that his seed shall become a multitude of nations, as does the British commonwealth of nations? Yet there are people in this country, and apparently in the minister's department, who would destroy that wonderful fulfilment of the promise given to Ephraim.

I think I shall take a few minutes to show something of what it means to us that the British commonwealth is Ephraim. I turn to Jeremiah, chapter 31, verse 9, where the Lord speaking, says:

> They shall come with weeping, and with supplications will I lead them; I will cause them to walk by the rivers of waters in a straight way, wherein they shall not stumble; for I am a father to Israel, and Ephraim is my firstborn.

In other words those Ephraimite people who constitute the British commonwealth of nations are the firstborn, the Lord's especially chosen people. In abolishing "Rule Britannia" I wonder if it was intended that we should turn our back on all these wonderful blessings, which the Lord, in the passage of Jeremiah which I have just read, implied for us? Those who want some source of comfort for the days that are to come should gather a great deal from that passage. I should like now to quote Jeremiah 51, verses 19 to 21 as follows:

> The portion of Jacob is not like them; for he is the former of all things: and Israel is the rod of his inheritance: the Lord of hosts is his name.
> Thou art my battle axe and weapons of war: for with thee will I break in pieces the nations, and with thee will I destroy kingdoms;
> And with thee will I break in pieces the horse and his rider; and with thee will I break in pieces the chariot and his rider;

There is a remarkable promise. We have seen abundant evidence of its fulfilment in world war I, in world war II and in the wars of the nineteenth century. Why are we not trusting the Lord in the times yet to come? Why should we abolish the hymn "Rule Britannia"?

I turn now to one more passage of scripture. Jeremiah 30, verse 11, reads:

> For I am with thee, saith the Lord, to save thee: though I make a full end of all nations whither I have scattered thee, yet will I not make a full end of thee: but I will correct thee in measure, and will not leave thee altogether unpunished.

Tell me where there is a nation on the face of this earth that has a finer promise than that. That promise is made to the British people concerning whom "Rule Britannia" was written. Do we want to participate in that promise? I think we do.

May I turn briefly now to some recent British history? Everyone will recall that the Israelites went out of the land of Egypt into the land of Palestine. They remained there for some time and finally they took Saul as their king. They went on to develop under Saul and David and Solomon. After Solomon there was a rebellion, as the result of which Israel was divided into two kingdoms. The first, consisting of ten tribes, was in the north; the second, consisting of two tribes, was in the south. The tribes in the north took the name of Israel or Ephraim because that was the name of their chief tribe; those in the south took the name of Judah as Judah was their chief tribe.

In 721 B.C. the northern kingdom was carried away into Assyrian captivity, the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh being among them. Later these tribes went away into the north and became the Lost Tribes. Ephraimites and Manassehites in considerable numbers found their way into Britain and Britain grew from them. Probably there will be those who will not accept that story, but I think the evidence upon which it is based is dependable. I would be glad to talk it over personally with anyone who is interested. Thus we have a summary of the history of the British. Several times we have had people agitate in this house for the abolition of the union jack from our flag.

Let us see what these people want to abolish from our flag. I should like to go briefly into the scientific background of the whole subject of the union jack so that we shall be able to see that those who cling to old British traditions are not mere sentimentalists.

What is the meaning of the union jack? Well, the expression "union jack" means the union of Jacob, it means Jacob's flag, the flag which would be flown by the Israelites, by the descendants of Jacob.

What does the union jack consist of? It is made up of three Christian crosses. Many of our French Canadian compatriots, for whom I have the highest degree of admiration, have risen in their places in this house and asked that the union jack be eliminated from our flag. In doing that they are asking that these three Christian crosses be eliminated from our flag. This is the only flag on the face of the earth that is made up entirely of Christian crosses. It is the most Christian flag on the face of the earth. There is no gainsaying that statement. The next time they want to abolish the union jack from the flag of Canada it would be well for them to remember that fact, and also some of the things I am going to suggest to them.

There is a fine scientific treatment of this whole matter to be found in a book entitled "Tracing our Ancestors" by Frederick Haberman which was copyrighted in the United States in 1934. The book is published by the Kingdom Press of St. Petersburg, Florida, U.S.A. Here is a passage taken from the frontispiece:

> Ancient pattern for the Union Jack and the Star Spangled Banner.
> The Topez of the Sachi:
> A rock carving near Bhopal in India of the 4th century B.C.
> Taken from Roberts "British History Traced." (See Chapter XI.)

These words are taken from under the picture on the frontispiece of the book. Some hon. members will be astounded to know that in Bhopal, India, there is a big stone, upon which are carved drapes of the union jack and the stars and stripes, the date of the stone being 450 years before Christ. At the bottom of the picture is the unicorn and the lion!

A good many members will find it hard to believe that our history goes back as far as that. The information is taken from Roberts' "British History Traced", chapter 11, according to Mr. Haberman.

The book "Tracing our Ancestors" is respectfully dedicated to President Franklin D. Roosevelt in these words:

> In the hope that it will help him in guiding our nation through this period of chaos and transition—by explaining the true origin of our race, our mission, and our destiny.

Anyone who desires to be much enlightened on all matters pertaining to Great Britain will do well to read this great work, "Tracing our Ancestors", several times and also to read "Israel-Britain" by Adam Rutherford 1939. May we turn to certain aspects of the union jack? First of all take the transverse cross of St. Andrew of Scotland. This flag, when it stood alone, consisted of a white cross on a blue background with the transverse cross shaped like an X. Where did it come from? What is this transverse cross that the Scottish people loved so dearly? At page 46 "Tracing our Ancestors" has this to say:

> It is by means of this battle axe or hammer that Thor, a Gothic deity spoken of also as Indiri the Divine, overcame his enemies and the devil. Thor's hammer is shown to be composed of four bolts and reference to those bolts is also made in the Indian Vedas, where we read:
> With thy Spiky Weapon, thy deadly Bolt,
> O Indra, thou smotest the Dragon in the face.

Much information concerning this whole matter is given in Professor Waddell's fine book, "Aryan Origin of the Alphabet". Professor Waddell further shows that the name of St. Andrew, the patron saint of the Goths and the Scots, is derived from the word Indra or Indara. Thus the story of St. Andrew and his typical X-shaped cross or weapon is simply a legendary form of the story of Jehovah. In other words, the white cross on the union jack against a blue background is the emblem of Jehovah himself. That white cross represents the weapon with which he beat the dragon. It is one of the crosses composing the union jack!

St. George's red cross, the upright cross representing the cross on which Christ was crucified, also has a most interesting history which I am not going to go into in detail. My object now is not to be exhaustive but merely to give enough detail to suggest that there is some sense behind the attitude of many of us towards Great Britain and the union jack. It is not all sentimentality. The stories of St. George's cross and St. Patrick's cross are just as interesting, just as impressive and just as faith inspiring as is that of St. Andrew's cross. All three are combined in the union jack.

Let us contrast the union jack with the hammer and sickle. Ranged on the side of Great Britain you are ranged against such a mundane emblem as the hammer and sickle which stand for materialism pure and simple. Those people who are so active in their efforts to design a new flag for Canada should take their new designs and contrast them with the union jack with all it signifies over thousands of years of history. Contrast the union jack as an emblem under which to fight, under which to live, under which to die and under which to lie in your grave, with any other flag on earth today, or any other flag you can conceive! You will not find any other flag to compare with the union jack.

"Rule Britannia" recalls the British flag, the union jack. In abolishing it we are turning our backs on the union jack, not of course overtly but by implication.

Great Britain has always been the champion of freedom. Parliament originated in Britain. In 1215 the British fought and won Magna Carta from King John. We have plenty of trouble right now maintaining the rights that were guaranteed under Magna Carta. We bring in a wide variety of high sounding recommendations about human rights, fundamental freedoms and all the rest of it. They won habeas corpus and trial by jury in 1215. Since that time Britons have insisted that they enjoy those rights. "Rule Britannia" recalls the great achievements for freedom made by Great Britain. The very words "Britons never shall be slaves" emphasize that.

"Rule Britannia" suggests Britain's future. We do not know what it will be except from what the prophets say. We have already established the fact that the British are Israelites and Ephraimites. The quotation I have given from scripture indicates what the Lord is going to do with them. He says, "Though I make a full end of all nations, whither I have scattered thee, yet will I not make a full end of thee".

The Chairman: The hon. member has now spoken for forty minutes. Has the hon. member leave to continue?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Adamson: I was hoping that the hon. member could continue. I was very interested in what he had to say about a Canadian naval song because it is apropos of what happened when a Canadian squadron of corvettes left the Mediterranean during the recent war. As they sailed through the straits of Gibraltar a famous signal was sent by the admiral to the Canadian squadron. I have not been able to look it up in the recent book sent to us by the minister, but I think it was something like this: "Good hunting and good luck to you, Canada. You have been a breath of fresh air to this hot and murky sea." I was talking to the yeoman of the signals who took that signal down, and he told me that the garrison was at a loss to know what national song to play as a salute to the Canadian navy. He said that, as a most acceptable and peculiarly Canadian naval song, they struck on the song known as "The North Atlantic Squadron". It seems to me interesting that that song was played at that time, and I think appropriate.

Mr. Chairman, today in Canada we find ourselves in an entirely new role so far as defence is concerned. We are no longer an isolated country. The old policy of "no commitments" which was practised so assiduously by the Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King is no longer possible. Many of us on this side of the house, and myself in particular, think he adhered to that policy far too long. Politically it was wise, but internationally it was tragic. Today we are an integral part, and a very important part, of the community of nations who desire to be free. The recent declaration of the Atlantic pact, the recent formation of a group of allies whose one aim is individual and personal freedom, is of great significance to us in Canada because we are an essential part of that organization.

The so-called cold war has been going on for a period of three or four years. Unfortunately, apart from one or two major successes, the greater portion of the victory must go to our enemy. Certainly, on the basis of territorial considerations we have lost ground. Not only have we lost ground in Europe through the loss of Czechoslovakia, but we have lost ground seriously in the Far East. China, Indo-China, and great areas of Thailand have been debauched to the point of endorsation of the communist ideal. One of the most potent weapons in the communist armoury is the weapon of propaganda. It may seem trite for anyone in this house to say that. But, Mr. Chairman, we have had to battle propaganda and so far we have suffered many defeats. In the cold war, which is costing us nearly half a billion dollars in these estimates, one of the most important weapons is the weapon of propaganda. It is a weapon which we are peculiarly capable of using. The propaganda issued by the communist countries has attempted to show the United States as a war-mongering, predatory aggressor nation. Even so learned a person as the Prime Minister of Pakistan, who addressed this house a short time ago, stated that the feeling in Asia was that the United States was bent on war with Russia.

As a neighbour of the United States, and as a small and defenceless neighbour, I feel that we have not used our position to full advantage in international affairs. I believe the government is remiss on this point. For years politicians on both sides of the border, but particularly on our side, used to talk about the great undefended border. It was the opening gambit in most speeches about international good will. It meant very little in North America and it was taken as a matter of form. Mr. Chairman, it means a great deal to the rest of the world. To us conflict with the United States is unthinkable, and that fact is taken for granted. But in many cases it seems strange to an oriental, or even a European, that a great power could live at peace with a small power, without any predatory instincts, particularly when the small power has the essential sinews of war that the great power must have. I mention this because in Canada today we have more and more of the raw materials and other sinews with which any future war will be fought, and the United States is becoming more and more deficient in those materials. The very fact that the stockpiling program is going on at the present time shows how serious this condition is. Today not only our base metals, but our food, our supply of fissionable material, and our supply of ferrous metals as well as of the newer metals such as titanium, form the basis on which any war in which the United States is engaged will have to be fought. Copper, lead, zinc, iron, nickel and aluminum are the metals which form the background of all wars. We have them. The Americans are becoming deficient. Yet, Mr. Chairman, we live in complete peace and friendship with the United States. Too little has been made of that fact in our dealings, not between ourselves on this continent but in our propaganda directed to the oriental countries and countries behind the iron curtain even if we could get it there; and believe me, Mr. Chairman, that is not an impossibility. I would therefore hope that the government and the Department of National Defence, through shortwave radio or through other methods would show not that we are not a warlike people but that the Americans are not a warlike people. They cannot say that for themselves, but we as their small and defenceless neighbours can say it with great effect throughout the rest of the world.

I want to deal briefly with the national defence committee that was set up on Bill 133. That committee, which had to deal with an involved and complicated matter, has just made its report. I think almost without exception the members of the committee agree that it was one of the most valuable, the most interesting and the most productive committees that had ever sat in the House of Commons. What were the reasons why that national defence committee was such a success? I think the first one is that members on all sides are agreed that on the subject of national defence there shall be no politics. The matter of the defence of the country, involving the welfare of our families and our homes and in fact our very lives, transcends all questions of political loyalties. The committee therefore was successful and worth while, first, because the question of politics did not enter into the deliberations.

But there was another important reason why that committee was successful. It was that all during the extremely lengthy sittings we had the advantage of having before us in the committee the senior officials of the Department of National Defence. The adjutant general was not there but the judge advocate general was in constant attendance. The heads of the law branches of all three services were in constant attendance. The provost services were represented at frequent meetings. The deputy minister was there for several of the meetings. Other experts from the Department of National Defence were also available for that committee.

The committee had to deal with an involved matter, for it dealt not only with matters of discipline but with aid to the civil power, security and a great number of other matters having to do with national defence. Whenever a particularly technical question came up, the service experts were there to answer it in committee. Questions could be asked and the information accurate and complete was immediately available. If the question could not be immediately answered, the experts of the services got together and jointly answered it, or as happened on many occasions, they referred it back even to the chiefs of staff committee.

The problem before us was complicated and involved; but the fact that we had available to us the expert opinions of the high officers of the department dealing with this matter tremendously aided the deliberations of the committee. Again I want to make this plea to the minister. Here today, in the committee of the whole house dealing with national defence estimates, we have had question after question asked of the minister and many more questions will be asked of him. Those questions could be dealt with and answered immediately and technically by the chiefs of staff or by the heads of the naval, military and air branches. They are questions which I think the committee is entitled to have answered.

Mr. Claxton: May I ask the hon. member what questions he is referring to that I have not answered today?

Mr. Adamson: The questions that are given—

Mr. Claxton: What questions?

Mr. Adamson: The question of the cost of the North Star.

Mr. Claxton: I have that right here. It is the only question I have not answered that was put to me today. I have the information.

Mr. Adamson: The question of the cost of Magnificent.

Mr. Claxton: That was given.

Mr. Adamson: Yes, with very considerable discrepancies in cost.

Mr. Claxton: No.

Mr. Adamson: One senior officer gave one answer and the minister gave another.

The whole problem of national defence is something that cannot be dealt with secondhand because it is so involved and so technical. If there is the question of the use of a new weapon, if there is the question of the use of the air arm, if there is the question of the expenditure on, shall we say, atomic warheads, the proper people to have that information are the technical advisers in the defence services. The minister gets the information from his advisers. He gets it secondhand. He must get it secondhand because no minister, no single person, can carry that information in his head. It is impossible. The question of national defence is so involved that, even in dealing with the one question of uniformity of the code of discipline that this bill dealt with, we had no fewer than five persons to answer various questions put to them by the committee. They were in constant attendance while the committee was sitting. That was efficiency. That was not having a question asked and the minister asking his experts in front of him. They have a great deal of the information, but they cannot give as detailed and as factual information as could the actual staff officers who will have to deal with the operation of the department and probably with the use of the weapon in question.

An example of that was given this morning in the question of the value of various appreciations of artillery fire and artillery competition. I am not an expert in artillery, but there was certainly left in the minds of the committee some considerable doubt as to the value of these various types of competitions. If we had a senior artillery officer who could answer the questions immediately and give the factual details about the problem facing modern artillery, it would be to the advantage of all. The minister cannot do that. The minister must get his information secondhand. The minister could go and see artillery being fired; but with all due respect, I submit that he does not know as much about it as the men and the officers who are actually doing the work, using the weapons.

To deal with a matter such as this we need the best possible advice. There is no question of secrecy. If there are new weapons on the secret lists, that fact can be stated. Mention can be made of the fact that they are on the secret list, and, as in the national defence committee, nothing further will be discussed in regard to them. But I do want to say again that on this matter of national defence the greatest single item of governmental expense, the thing which may make or break our security and on which our whole life depends, requires the most efficient and effective treatment that this house can possibly give it. I think the other hon. members of the national defence committee will say that the efficiency and the effectiveness of that committee could be copied by this committee of the whole house, and that a great deal of good would come from it.

Unfortunately, I was not here yesterday. In reading over the discussion in Hansard I could not find anything being said about preparation for submarine warfare. I am not now referring to antisubmarine warfare, because that is one of our principal tasks. Today, whether we like it or not in any future conflict, no matter what the new weapons and weapons of mass structure are, one of the jobs that Canada will have to do will be the job of transportation. We will have to continue to keep the sea lanes open between ourselves and our allies, particularly on the Atlantic. Today the air arm is being stressed, but with the new weapons the underwater arm, the submarine arm, has assumed almost equal importance with the air arm. With the tremendous speed of the modern submarine, with the enormously improved hitting powers of the modern torpedo, with the tremendously increased distance that can be travelled at very much greater speed, the submarine is not only an offensive weapon of the first magnitude, but a defensive weapon of equal power. We are vulnerable with an enormous sea coast, vulnerable in our harbours, vulnerable also to the atomic weapon used under water. We have apparently decided not to embark on the construction or bringing into force of a submarine arm of the navy at all. I mentioned this before. I still feel that the submariner is one of the most important warriors of the future.

I should like to ask the minister whether it is on account of costs, whether it is on account of our shipbuilding industry, or what are the reasons that we have not embarked upon this type of warfare. The major countries of the world, including Russia, the United States and the United Kingdom are concentrating more and more upon the submarine as a weapon. Apparently however that is not the policy of this administration. Perhaps there are good reasons for this; perhaps we have not embarked upon it because of costs. But the submarine nearly beat us in 1916-17, and came even closer to beating us in the last war. It seems to me that to neglect this weapon, which so nearly destroyed us, is not realistic. I should remind the house that the first submarines to cross the Atlantic were built in Canada. We cannot train, we cannot build, we cannot produce a submarine force in a short time. It is expensive, as are all matters connected with defence. But if we are met with this problem after war has broken out time will be our enemy. Now time is on our side, and I would therefore ask the minister what consideration has been given to this matter and what are the reasons for failing to embark upon this particular phase of naval warfare.

We do not know whether the weapons of mass destruction, particularly the hydrogen bomb, can be produced. But from every authority, including the Secretary of War in the United States, it seems pretty well established that the hydrogen bomb can and will be produced. There is no need to be unduly depressing; but if these can be released and can be detonated—if that is the correct term when speaking of fissionable material—then whole tracts of country and hundreds of thousands or even millions of people will be destroyed, not by the explosion itself but by the radioactive effect left on the contaminated ground by this new weapon. That is something to which consideration should be given. Just how far the matter has been considered, I do not know. Perhaps the minister will say what has been and what is being done in connection with atomic warfare. This is something in which the civilian population will have to take part. Let us not fool ourselves: there will be no scruples on the part of any enemy to refrain from using the weapons of mass destruction.

In the United Nations we pass pious resolutions about genocide. Believe me, there will be no adherents to that resolution if another war breaks out.

Mr. Claxton: I am sure my hon. friend would not like to convey the impression anywhere that we would break any resolution we passed, and be the first to do so. It is important that that impression should not go out.

Mr. Adamson: Atomic weapons are those which produce the mass destruction of a population. In the terms of the resolution they must be genocide producing weapons. Believe me, if these are used against us, as they will be, we will certainly retaliate. We must be realists about this thing; there is no use passing pious resolutions. We have got to be prepared to fight with the weapons that have been discovered, and the whole question of our defence depends upon the effective way in which those weapons are used. It is just idle talk to assume that a conference of the United Nations or a resolution passed anywhere will stop any enemy of ours from using these weapons against us. That is one of the horrible things we have to consider.

I suggest again that the whole question of defence requires a treatment similar to that it receives both in the British House of Commons and in the Congress of the United States. We are inescapably woven into the same defence mechanism. I feel that our people in Canada must be told the facts—and told the facts in as great detail as possible. There is no way of having security in the world today except by being adequately prepared. I feel the Canadian people must have an opportunity of getting the fullest possible details as to that preparation.

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member apparently crept up to the suggestion that parliament should deal with the matter of defence in some way other than that in which it is now being dealt with. In that respect he was out of order, but he took some time to arrive at that point and only came to that conclusion at the end of his remarks. Otherwise I would have felt it necessary to raise the point. I shall not follow him in being out of order.

With regard to the suggestion that we should have one or more submarines in the Canadian navy, I remember the hon. member made the same suggestion when the defence estimates were under consideration in 1949. I indicated to him the objections we had to that. The submarine is a very specialized type of vessel and its crew require special training. It simply is not economical for a navy with a strength of approximately 10,000 to divide its forces so that there are one or two units of each type. To have a single submarine would require equipment and stores, highly trained technicians and personnel, all of which would be exceedingly expensive and would not bring about any results that we cannot obtain under the existing arrangement by which we borrow submarines when we need them from the United States or the United Kingdom. That works out very satisfactorily.

With regard to the question asked by the hon. member for Peterborough West and also replying again to the hon. member for York West, I think it is the only question so far put to me today that I have not answered. The hon. member was inquiring about the trip of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and his party. It should be remembered that he had with him members of the delegation going to the conference at Ceylon and to the other places which were visited. The cost was based on $115.74 per flying hour for 130 hours and 50 minutes, and amounted to $15,142.65, of which external affairs share was $7,571.33, which they paid.

The R.C.A.F. took the position, which seems to be quite justified, that this was a valuable training exercise. There were two complete crews and they had the advantage of circumnavigating the world, the first R.C.A.F. aircraft to do so. Flying is one kind of military occupation which you can learn only by doing. It is of great value to fly in every part of the world and familiarize yourself with weather and landing conditions, airfields, geography and the like.

Mr. Harkness: I was surprised at the statement made yesterday by the minister as part of an answer to a question of mine. This is to be found on page 3377 of Hansard, where the minister is reported as follows:

> I might say, since the hon. member has expressed interest in it before, that at the present time we have more trained paratroopers in Canada than landed in the low countries in the German invasion in May, 1940.

I find it extremely difficult to accept that statement. At the time of the invasion of the low countries by Germany in May, 1940, the general idea spread about by the newspapers was that there were many thousands of paratroopers landed there. As a matter of fact, I think most people are still under the impression that there were thousands.

Mr. Claxton: Twenty-two hundred.

Mr. Harkness: As a matter of fact, the picture was considerably exaggerated. The actual number of paratroopers and airborne troops that were landed was discovered after the German capitulation when the commander in chief of the German airborne army was interrogated. The details of that interrogation are to be found in a book by Liddell Hart, who was chief military commentator for the London Times before the war and is one of the best known military experts and writers on military matters. In his book called "The Other Side of the Hill" he gives details of the interrogation which show that the actual number of German paratroopers landed in Holland was 4,500, with another 500 being landed in Belgium, making a total of 5,000 for the low countries. In addition one airborne division of 12,500 men was landed.

As I say, I find it extremely difficult to accept the fact that we have 5,000 trained paratroopers. That would be more than the number of men that would be trained as paratroopers in our mobile brigade group if that brigade group were completely up to strength, which it is not. The people trained as paratroopers are chiefly infantry men. There are infantry battalions in our brigade group and if all the men were trained—I know they are not—you would have a total of only 1,800. In addition to that there would be signallers, engineers, a limited number of artillery men who would act as forward observation officers, and other personnel of that sort. If the artillery is to be landed and is to be effective it must be from gliders or planes, and the same thing with the armoured corps people. Under those circumstances I find it extremely difficult to accept the minister's statement.

Statements of that sort do a great deal of damage. I know the minister has no intention of deliberately misinforming the house or the country, but it so happens that that particular statement has been given wide publicity in the newspapers and over the air. To put out the idea that we have more trained paratroopers than the Germans dropped on Holland and Belgium in May 1940 is just ridiculous. It creates a false impression as to our defence situation.

This is the type of thing—I think it is unintentional in most cases—which the minister does quite frequently. This morning the leader of the opposition brought up the matter of artillery training. There are two or three other incidents which I shall refer to later, but I simply wanted to point out that it is absolutely useless, as far as giving information to this house is concerned, to make statements such as that.

The general public do not know just how many paratroopers the Germans did drop, but the general idea is that it was tens of thousands. Therefore the statement is misleading from that point of view. I am quite convinced that we do not have over 5,000 trained paratroopers and I doubt whether the minister will maintain that we do have that many. My remarks would apply also to statements setting out percentages, to show that the percentage of personnel in the navy was greater than in any other country. That gives a wrong impression to the general public who do not have any detailed knowledge of these things. I think it is time we got away from statements of that kind and were given some definite information which would outline the picture as it is. I wish the minister would comment on the paratroop statement which he made yesterday.

Mr. Claxton: The information I have is that the total number of airborne troops that were landed is 2,200. The hon. member has referred to Liddell Hart's book. I have no means of verifying the accuracy of that but it would seem to me that the discrepancy would probably be explained by the fact that the men concerned would certainly land more than once in successive operations. The number I have in mind, which is the number I was given, is 2,200.

Mr. Harkness: What is the source of your information?

Mr. Ferrie: It is not general so why should you have it?

Mr. Harkness: I am asking the minister what is the source of his information as to the 2,200 because if he has taken a figure of 2,200 which he picked up any place the statement he made is all the more misleading to the country. It is all the more reprehensible to have a statement made along that line. I do not know of any better source of authority than the interrogation of General Student, who was the commander in chief of these men, when he was in allied hands after the war, as to the number of people dropped. I do not know where you are going to get anything more accurate. I would refer the minister to the book if he wants to look it up for himself, but I can assure him those are the figures that are there.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I wish to refer again to questions which have been asked concerning the effect upon this country of recent and other decisions under the Atlantic pact. I must say with regret that I am not satisfied yet with the minister's answer. That brings immediately to the fore the statement the minister has made with reference to our complaint about the difficulty of getting information. That matter was referred to last night, and after the hon. member for Greenwood had spoken, the minister, with a considerable display of heat for a time, replied that no question asked in committee of supply on his estimates went unanswered, and that the only questions he had ever failed to answer were two or three concerning details of strength and so on which for security reasons it would not be proper to answer in the committee.

Mr. Harkness: I just asked him one and he has not answered.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member for Calgary East points out that another question has just been asked now which has not been answered. Referring to this matter the minister said, as reported at page 3388 of Hansard for June 8:

> I feel that this committee is entitled to get everything possible, and that has been my view right through. If there is anything that we can give that we have not given, tell us so that we can give it and not keep on saying that you have not information that you have never asked for.

I say we have asked for information, Mr. Chairman, as to the effect of the Atlantic pact and the various decisions made and conferences held under the pact on Canada's defence policy, and that we have not yet had an adequate answer to those questions. The only answer we have had in this debate is that the treaty and these decisions have no immediate effect upon Canada's defence plans. At page 3375 of Hansard for yesterday the minister said:

> . . . our defence has never been envisaged as the defence of Canada alone but the defence of Canada as part of a continent, and indeed the defence of Canada as part of the defence of the western countries which would all be involved in the event of a war for our freedom.

A little further down on the same page the minister said:

> But we do not believe it will have any immediate or very considerable effect on our own defence forces, because our defence planning has envisaged the operation of our defences in conjunction with other nations at all times.

At page 3376 he is reported as saying:

> . . . I told the house then, as I tell the committee now, that we have not.

That is, no specific military commitments.

> I am not too sure that the North Atlantic treaty organization will ever develop in a way in which there are specific military commitments. That remains to be seen. It remains to be worked out.

I point out to the minister that the statements by the United States military authorities are at variance with the statements made by him in discussing the effect of over-all defence strategy under the Atlantic treaty and similar mutual defence arrangements. Taking the minister's statements that I have just quoted and analysing them, it surely must become obvious that there is an effect or ought to be an effect on Canada's planning because if we have envisaged the operation of our defence in conjunction with other nations at all times, we have reached the stage now where the other Atlantic pact nations with whom we are associated are assuming certain definite responsibilities themselves with respect to the elements of the joint force they are going to contribute. If they are doing that then surely we are in a position, and certainly should be, of making up our minds as to the elements of the joint force that we are going to contribute, and particularly making plans as to the role in the over-all strategical concept which Canada must discharge.

Looking at the white paper on defence we find we are in the very humiliating position of referring at length in our statement on defence policy to what the Americans have said is their concept of the role of the United States in the mutual defensive arrangements which are being made, and at the same time we have no indication of what is Canada's role under these mutual defensive arrangements. We have to look to the pronouncements of the United States chiefs of the joint staffs to find any indication as to what arrangements have been made and what responsibilities have been accepted by any of the members of the mutual defensive arrangement with regard to the problem of joint defence. I think it can and should be said that the minister's statements in answer to the questions in the course of the debate yesterday are at variance with his own statements in the white paper on defence published last November because in that paper he said at page 8:

It is still too early to spell out the consequences of the pact in terms of men and dollars. One thing must be emphasized: the North Atlantic treaty is a pact for peace. Its final result will not be to increase the expenditures which every nation on our side must make. By pooling resources, the effect of the pact should be to reduce the total expenditures which each of the twelve countries would have found necessary for their security had there been no pact. However, that result is some distance off and in the meantime, Canada will have to make such modification of her plans as may be found necessary to meet the situation. While the North Atlantic treaty makes for security, it will only be effective in so far as it represents a pooling of strength rather than a dilution of strength.

We are told in the high sounding statements which have been made in the house with respect to the communiqué after the joint meeting in London that decisions of vital and far-reaching importance with respect to the over-all defence planning have been taken. If that is the case, then surely we are entitled to take the words at their face value. But assuming that those decisions are what they are said to be, decisions of far-reaching importance, and that progress is being made in the planning of joint defence under the pact, then the answer the minister made last night, that it has no effect upon our defence strategy, is at variance with his earlier statement in the white paper that the Atlantic pact will have an effect in reducing the total expenditure which each of the twelve countries would have found necessary if there had been no pact.

[Mr. Fulton.]

This white paper goes on to analyse the defence implications, and those are the words used, with respect to the Atlantic treaty. It says:

At the meeting of defence ministers on October 5 the north Atlantic nations requested that the regional groups should complete their organization early in November.

That is eight months ago.

Strategical planning will then be undertaken by representatives of the nations in each group. Those plans will be co-ordinated by the military committee standing group composed of representatives of the chiefs of staff of France, the United Kingdom and the United States. In this way there will be prepared an over-all strategical plan with an indication of its requirements and how they will be met. Requirements of equipment will be referred to the military production and supply board. Reports on progress will be made at the second meeting of the defence committee.

I wish particularly to emphasize the words, "In this way there will be prepared an over-all strategical plan with an indication of its requirements and how they will be met." Canada, as a member of the North Atlantic treaty, must obviously, in view of the statements which have recently been made with regard to collective security and balanced forces, be prepared to meet certain requirements when those requirements have been laid down. Again, unless we are being told that the decisions taken at London were not of such importance as has previously been indicated, then we can only assume that decisions along the lines of what would be the joint requirements have been taken, and we are therefore entitled to be told what their effect is upon Canada's defence strategy.

Then the white paper continues:

While the strategy of the north Atlantic powers has not yet been formally stated, our participation in planning for the defence of this continent and of the western union gives a clear indication of the main lines of strategy though they may not have been put into words. Our planning has been flexible and can be adapted to any responsibilities we may assume.

This passage clearly indicates that the western union, which is another name for the north Atlantic alliance, will have a definite strategical plan, or has one. Canada, as part of that alliance, must undertake certain responsibilities with respect to carrying out that strategical plan. We want to know what the effects of that are upon our defence planning at home.

It is interesting to note, Mr. Chairman, that immediately following this section in the white paper outlining the defence implications of the North Atlantic pact, there is a lengthy statement quoted from General Bradley's testimony before the foreign affairs committee of the house of representatives on July 29, 1949. His statement was made during the hearings on the Mutual Defence

Assistance Act of 1949. Is it important to realize where this comes in the context, because this statement of General Bradley is quoted immediately following the purported analysis of the defence implications of the North Atlantic treaty. It can only be taken therefore, as indeed is obvious, as implying that General Bradley's statement on the Mutual Defence Assistance Act is immediately related to the over-all strategical plan under the north Atlantic alliance. The minister tells us that he cannot say what the effect of the Atlantic treaty on Canada is. He cannot outline any responsibility which we have assumed, or any commitments which we may be prepared or preparing to consider. It is significant that General Bradley goes into clear and concise detail as to the responsibilities which the United States might have assumed under this over-all defence set-up. It is significant to note that General Bradley gives his outline to the foreign affairs committee of the house of representatives. He stated:

> In our approach to this arms-aid program, the joint chiefs of staff have followed the principle that the man in the best position, and with the capability, should do the job for which he is best suited.
> Further, our recommendations—

That is the recommendations of the joint chiefs of staff to the government of the United States.

> —for this program have been predicated upon this basic principle, and the following assumed factors:
> First, the United States will be charged with the strategic bombing.
> We have repeatedly recognized in this country that the first priority of the joint defence is our ability to deliver the atomic bomb.
> Second, the United States navy and the western union naval powers will conduct essential naval operations, including keeping the sea lanes clear. The western union and other nations will maintain their own harbour and coastal defence.
> Third, we recognize that the hard core of the ground power in being will come from Europe, aided by other nations as they can mobilize.
> Fourth, England, France, and the closer countries will have the bulk of the short-range attack bombardment, and air defence. We, of course, will maintain the tactical air force for our own ground and naval forces, and United States defence.

Then he goes on to outline other considerations and specific undertakings or responsibilities assumed by the United States in connection therewith.

I want to close by saying that General Bradley, who is head of the joint chiefs of staff committee, has indicated clearly the responsibilities of the United States under this over-all defence arrangement. In Canada we have had no such indication. In the United States, General Bradley gives his evidence before a committee of the house of representatives. We are told that this committee of the whole is the only committee we will have, so we cannot be given such information because apparently Canada has not been prepared to assume any responsibilities. That is the meaning of what the minister told us yesterday. If his statements were correct, the inference is that we seriously lag behind the United States in assessing our responsibilities, and apparently in our preparedness to assume those responsibilities. I for one am not content to believe that is the case. I am therefore more dissatisfied with the minister's failure to make a clear statement to this committee in answer to our questions as to the effect upon Canada's defence planning of the recent decisions taken under the North Atlantic pact.

Mr. Claxton: I have already dealt with those—

Mr. Fulton: You have not; you have evaded it.

Mr. Claxton:—in every possible way that plain English could be used. This is an extremely important principle which was declared at London, and the announcement of that declaration was made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in this house on June 5, 1950. I have said, and I repeat, that this involves no immediate change in the composition of our defence forces, and we do not envisage it as involving any change in the immediate future—and by that I mean within the period covered by these estimates, 1950-51. However, I gave the leader of the opposition, in reply to his question, the assurance, which certainly would not be necessary because I have made it quite plain before, and it makes common sense, that Canada's position will be considered and is being considered in the light of changing circumstances, and of this new principle. I would point out to the hon. member and to the committee that in the statement he read from General Bradley reference is made to the special role of the United States with regard to the provision of strategic bombing. Canada has no such special role. We are not going to do any strategic bombing, as that term is now known. That is one of the special roles for which one country is earmarked. He did not mention any other special responsibilities of the United States, but of course there is one. The United States is making a substantial contribution towards the re-equipment of the countries of the North Atlantic treaty. Canada has not to date felt it possible so far to make that kind of contribution but the situation is constantly being examined and will continue to be examined. I cannot state that the situation has changed until a change occurs. However, that it will produce changes in our defence planning is likely; but from the nature of our defence forces I do not believe that there will be major or drastic changes.

As the hon. member referred to General Bradley, I should like to quote a statement made by him which is important not only because he is chairman of the joint chiefs of staff of the United States but also because he is chairman of the standing group under the North Atlantic treaty. This is from a speech he gave at Chicago on April 14 in which he said:

> The defensive plans made at The Hague and submitted to our government need not change the balance of forces nor decrease the appropriations requested from congress for the armed forces this year.

This statement indicates that the position taken by General Bradley at that time is exactly the same as the position taken by myself. No other position is possible, because the agencies of the North Atlantic treaty which are considering requirements and ways of meeting them have not yet met to deal with the changed situation since the declaration made at London in favour of balanced forces. There simply has not been time for these agencies to meet; and that should be perfectly clear to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Fulton: I wish to say just a word or two in reply to the minister, Mr. Chairman. In the first place, there are some omissions from and inaccuracies in what he has just said. He said that, in the statement of General Bradley to which I referred, General Bradley outlined only one special commitment or responsibility of the United States and that was with respect to strategic bombing. That is not the case at all. General Bradley referred to a second responsibility of the United States:

> Second, the United States navy and the western union naval powers will conduct essential naval operations, including keeping the sea lanes clear.

Mr. Claxton: That is not a special responsibility.

Mr. Fulton: It is obvious that the United States has assumed the responsibility of making a substantial naval contribution to this mutual defence force in addition to the strategic bombing force to which the minister made reference.

The minister says that no change can be forecast, as a result of this Atlantic treaty and the decisions taken under it, that will have any reflection or bearing upon the estimates which are now before us. Therefore his answer, he says, is correct, when he says that they have no immediate effect upon Canada's defence force. I think his words were "no effect within the time within which these estimates are forecast".

That seems to me to indicate the unreality of this method of proceeding because these estimates are forecast upon building up armed forces of a certain composition: so many men in the navy, so many in the army and so many in the air force, with so much equipment for each of these three components of our defence forces. It is not realistic to say that we should not look beyond the end of this year in dealing with the estimates that are now before us. Our whole point is that we want to know whether or not we are spending this money efficiently; whether we are in fact spending money now to equip with good weapons forces which may be thoroughly efficient forces in the abstract, when in a year or two from now, or less, we are going to have to change the relative composition and components of our forces. It would be a shocking waste of money to spend millions now upon building up any one of the components of our defence forces when in a year or two's time that component will be reduced possibly quite substantially, relative to the others, as a result of some joint agreement with the other Atlantic pact powers. That is why it is impossible and unrealistic to expect us to confine our attention only to this year and to say, "Do not look ahead beyond the end of the fiscal year and the estimates that are now before you." That might, and I think it would, involve the most shocking and disastrous waste of public money.

Then as to the other point which the minister made, with regard to the further statement of General Bradley on April 14, I think he said it was where the general was quoted as saying that the decisions under the Atlantic pact would have no effect or make no change in the amount of money that congress was asked to authorize for the United States forces. That is perfectly natural because, as we have already seen, the United States has accepted certain responsibilities with respect to the forces that it will provide under this mutual defensive arrangement. Those responsibilities are already known and were known last November. In fact, they were known in July of 1949 when the statement which I have read was made by General Bradley. Therefore the composition of the United States forces for this year, which he was discussing in his later statement referred to by the minister, was determined on the basis of those responsibilities which had been accepted under the mutual defensive arrangement. Therefore, of course, no change will be effected in the United States forces by these decisions, because their responsibilities were already outlined; but apparently Canada's were not. We therefore may be in a position where a change in the composition of our forces will result from decisions under the Atlantic pact. That is the point that we make. That is why we are so insistent upon being given the fullest information as to the effect it will have. We are reluctant to vote money for building up forces which may not be required when the joint defensive arrangement is concluded.

Mr. Claxton: I quite agree with the hon. gentleman in his last statement. If he or anyone else could indicate that any part of our forces was not required at the present time, I should be glad indeed to get that information, consider it with the officers of the department and act on it. But he cannot give that information and he cannot give that advice. He refers to the responsibilities of the United States being known. If by that he means the same thing, then, as I have said time and again, our role in naval operations is definitely known by all Canadians and certainly recognized by the House of Commons. It is antisubmarine work, largely in the waters across the north Atlantic and coastal protection on both coasts, something which I have stated ever since 1947 and which I do not think anyone has ever disagreed with. That role has been recognized by us and acted upon by us; and it corresponds, I would say, closely to what he says General Bradley said was the role of the United States navy.

Mr. Fulton: But the minister never said that. That is the point. The minister has never indicated that that is our role in the north Atlantic alliance. That is the sort of information we want.

Mr. Claxton: I have indicated that the existence of the north Atlantic alliance has not so far changed in any fundamental way our role as we have already conceived it, stated it and are acting on it. I never suggested for a second that we should not look ahead. Of course we have to look ahead. That is what we are doing, constantly revising programs and implementing policies. This new and important principle of course will be a very important factor to be taken into consideration. We have been looking ahead so far as it has been possible to do so, myself and officers of the department, in anticipation of the meeting of the agencies of the North Atlantic treaties, but that is no indication that we should stop any part of our defence activities right where they are and change them for anything else. There are no factors which would lead us to take that course of action at the present time.

Mr. Blackmore: I should like to tell the minister that I feel he is handling the situation well. I have listened carefully to the questions. I think the Conservatives have done a good job in questioning the minister and I believe he has done a good job in answering. My own feeling is that our defence is in good hands and being taken care of. The minister has my confidence in that respect. I am sure he will justify it.

Before closing my remarks a bit earlier in the afternoon I wanted to make one or two comments that I do think are important at the present time. I wanted to say that whereas there are a great many people who believe that our security is to be found in international agreements I do not concur in that view. I think we shall find that the more we rely on international agreements the greater will be our disappointments and frustrations in the end. I may be wrong in that. But I want to urge upon the minister that while he co-operates with international organizations such as the Atlantic pact, which thus far could be all to the good, he take the very greatest care to see that nothing is done which will cause Canada to surrender her sovereignty in any respect to any agency which is set up under the Atlantic pact.

The other day we had a discussion of the estimates of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. If one-tenth as much of Canada's sovereignty had been required by Britain even in the war of 1914-18 there would have been a scream that would have rent the skies and torn the stars down. But we calmly accept the most extravagant suggestions as to what we are going to agree to do in obedience to some single individual appointed by the Atlantic pact!

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is serious. I happen to know that for over 75 years certain definite international forces have been aiming at the destruction of the British commonwealth and the establishment of a world state under which no nation will have sovereignty.

I can find on record statements that are unchallengeable, which will prove that such has been designed. I have strong evidence to show that world war I was deliberately designed by these men who aim at this objective. All during that war they carried on their manipulations, their machinations, with the aim of bringing about their objective; and as soon as world war I was finished they began to plan world war II with the same object in view. They by that time started talking openly about what their aim was, as I pointed out the other day in the debate on the external affairs estimates, they started telling us about what they were working for as early as 1941 and 1942, and the evidence can be found in great United States magazines. The handwriting is too clear for us to disregard, Mr. Chairman.

If our greatest security, economically, politically and in every other way were to be obtained through such measures I should not find it bad enough; but there is no guarantee whatsoever that that security can be secured or will be secured by such measures, or that the object of these men, who are aiming to build up this world organization, is to provide security. Rather the appearance is that the very opposite is their aim, namely, not to provide security but to make us take what they want to give us and make us like it.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that when the objective of these gentlemen is achieved it will be too late to get up and talk. We shall have given over our sovereignty. That is one reason why I am talking as I am today. I see a genuine danger.

I wish to urge on the minister that while we are ready to co-operate with any person of good will or any number of persons, we are not prepared to surrender one jot of our sovereignty any more than this parliament would have been prepared to surrender any of our sovereignty to Great Britain in 1934 or 1935 when the need for preparation was tremendous, and Great Britain was prepared to offer leadership, but we were everlastingly worrying about how much of our sovereignty we were going to surrender. Let us worry just as much about how much of our sovereignty we are going to surrender to these international people, no matter how high their position may be.

I say again to the minister that while he may work and co-operate with all of these people, I wish him to give careful consideration to this possibility, that the finest organization that we can possibly have, looking toward our political security, our economic security, and every other kind of security that the heart of man desires, is an organization based on the pattern of the British commonwealth, in which there is complete unification of action, but in which there is no surrender of sovereignty whatsoever. The effectiveness of such an organization was amply demonstrated in world wars I and II, and the effectiveness of such an organization was demonstrated in 1932 when the representatives of the various members of the commonwealth met here in Ottawa and signed the Ottawa agreements as the means of offsetting the economic adversities that were swelling around us.

Why depart from a thing which has served us so satisfactorily on so many occasions during past years? Therefore, I say, let us do everything that can possibly be done to liberate the members of the British commonwealth so that they may be free to act together effectively, and then encourage them so to do. Then let us teach our people that there is hope in co-operating with the British commonwealth. The quotations which I gave this afternoon, if hon. members find interest in reading them, will be sufficient to show that our faith in the British commonwealth is based on very solid considerations.

We already had autonomous communities within the British commonwealth under the Balfour declaration of 1926. Every hon. member is familiar with what was said. There is no need of repeating it. But while we were completely autonomous communities and Canada, Australia, New Zealand and any other part of the commonwealth was equal in status to Britain, yet we were bound together by considerations of common allegiance to the crown. Not only will a common allegiance to the crown provide a means of binding us together. We can be bound together by such considerations as our common ancestry, which I mentioned this afternoon, and which constitutes one of the reasons for the talk I gave this afternoon. We realize that members of the British commonwealth are blood brothers, in a very real sense. We have a common heritage, which I hinted at this afternoon but barely touched upon. We have a common aim. We have common ideals. We have a common sense of the need for each other's aid in defence and in general economic security. We have a common destiny.

What more do men and nations need to impel them to act together in unity? If we bring about a united nations through the means of the British commonwealth we shall have everything that can possibly be offered by any other group of united nations, and we shall safeguard everything which our race has fought for through thousands of years. I say let us act. Let us British people not barter away our precious birthright, our hard-won heritage.

I should like to commend the Minister of Labour in this connection for the most excellent contribution he made to the debate on June 2, as it appears at page 3151 of Hansard. I do not know when I have heard a more genuinely British speech, and at the same time a more downright Canadian speech, a more genuinely common-sense speech than the one he delivered on that occasion. I wish it could be read into the record right here, in connection with what I have to say.

I suggest to the minister that as the days go by he take steps to restore "Rule Britannia" to be played on the ships of Canada—but not to displace "O Canada". I do not have to be any less an Albertan to be a Canadian. As a matter of fact, generally speaking, the more loyal and passionately devoted I am to Alberta, the more loyal and passionately devoted I am to Canada; because they are one. We do not have to be any less devoted to Canada in order to be devoted to the commonwealth and the motherland, and to play "Rule Britannia". Let us play them both on the ships.

I suggest to the minister that from now on he resist every effort to have Canada or any other British country surrender any of its sovereignty to any agency outside the British commonwealth, or inside the commonwealth. Everyone says that we do not want in the empire centralized control. What astounds me is that we will turn from making a remark like that and favour centralized control with a lot of people with whom we have in common hardly anything whatsoever. Let us see that we do not do that kind of thing.

I suggest to the minister that he take every step he can take to disseminate knowledge and understanding among our armed forces as to the meaning of these great things we have, our ancestry, our flag, our emblems, our institutions, our ideals. All we have to do is to follow up the kind of study I was indicating this afternoon, and we shall get our armed services to understand that there is a great scriptural and prophetic background behind this British race. They will know then that there is a glorious destiny prophesied for this race, and that it is a wonderful and a joyful thing for all of us to co-operate to attain that noble destiny.

I suggest that all men in our time should be constantly on the alert lest they put forth unhallowed hands to desecrate sacred things.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, in order to keep the record straight I should like to give a figure I placed on record a little while ago in connection with the number of men, according to General Student, who were dropped in the low countries in May of 1940. The way I had the figures made up I misread them. The figure of 4,500 includes the 500 dropped in Belgium. The total is 4,500.

Mr. Claxton: My information was received at a meeting of a very considerable group of staff officers. They had been in western Europe and in England at the time, and I took their information to be correct.

Mr. Harkness: The minister said before, I believe, that he had taken the figure of 2,200.

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Harkness: I take it from that that the number of paratroopers we have trained has a strength of possibly just over that figure. Otherwise there would not be much point in taking that particular number.

I would ask the minister, instead of taking a figure like that, which practically no one except himself would understand, to give an exact figure. If the figure is 2,250 to 2,300, then I submit it is very much better to give that exact figure than to give one as he has given it which could mean all things to all men. To the general public it might mean tens of thousands. I suggest it is an extremely bad way to give comparisons.

I should like next to refer to a question I asked the minister yesterday in connection with the percentage of officers and men employed in administrative duties, desk jobs and the like, as compared with the number in the fighting units. The minister partially answered the question this morning. He said that some time ago—and I did not get the exact date—there were 9·1 per cent of personnel on headquarters staff, and that on April 1 of this year the figure was 8·7 per cent. In other words he indicated that there had been a reduction in the percentage of officers and men in headquarters staff.

That is all to the good. It is carrying out one of the recommendations in the Mainguy report, that the number of officers employed in these desk jobs should be reduced and replaced by civilian personnel so that service personnel can get on with the fighting job. The minister then said that all the rest were in units. That, again, is misleading. To the ordinary person in the House of Commons and outside the house it would mean that on April 1, except for that 8·7 per cent, all the other personnel were in units ready to fight. That is absolutely wrong. What I asked for was the number of fighting units. These personnel may have some nominal units to which they are attached, but the vast majority of them are not at all in units which are ready to fight. They are not in fighting units. A large number of them would be in the army service corps, moving and handling food and supplies, and all sorts of other materials. A large number would be ordnance corps, looking after stores in various ordnance depots across the country. A large number of them would be employed in repairing vehicles, and occupations of that kind.

These units I know are all officially designated as combatant units. During the last war the troops in them were, to some extent, trained to fight. But actually they were not fighting units; their job was not that of fighting, and they would be required to fight only when their backs were to the wall and every available man would have to be used.

Under normal circumstances those troops do not fight at all, but are engaged in performing these other very essential jobs. I think as a matter of fact that during the last war it was estimated that, for every man fighting, there were ten men in various rear areas who were bringing in supplies, and the like. True, this is most essential work; but the personnel so engaged are not in fighting units. To say that all personnel except that 8·7 per cent are in units leaves, I say, a wrong impression, and it gives the general public the idea that over 90 per cent of our fighting defence forces are in units ready to go ahead and fight tomorrow, or in two or three days' time. Therefore, taking the figure of 50,000 in the permanent force, which the minister has given, this would mean that we could count on 45,000 who could be thrown into battle in three or four days' time.

That is simply not true, and the minister knows it. I do not think it is proper to give figures in this way, when placing the situation before the general public.

I should like to ask the minister what percentage of those in the army are actually in fighting units, in other words, in the mobile brigade group. Also what percentage of those in the air force are in operative squadrons, either fighter or transport. The minister has given this information with regard to the navy and that is why I think he should give it for the army and air force. He said that 45·1 per cent—

Mr. Claxton: 41·5 per cent, I beg your pardon.

Mr. Harkness: —that 41·5 per cent of the navy personnel were in ships in commission. That is the question I asked and that is the answer I wanted, but we should have the information for all three services.

Mr. Claxton: It is not possible to give it for the army or air force because of the nature of their operations. The hon. gentleman knows that there are two interceptor squadrons fully up to strength having an establishment of some hundreds, and then there are the transport squadrons. But their work is so intimately related with that of the ground crew and the other branches of activity of the air force that it would be completely misleading again to give any such figure. Speaking from recollection, we have in the air force about 1,600 qualified air crew.

With regard to the army, the hon. member says that the figures I gave were misleading. I gave what I understood to be the figures he wanted, in the form in which he wanted them.

Mr. Harkness: If you look at what I said I think you will find I referred to fighting units.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Claxton: I did not get the impression that "fighting" had been used. Those who make up the notes for me and who note these things carefully made them up without any special instructions as referring to other units. The same thing applies in the case of the army. The hon. gentleman has just described the situation where you have headquarters formation, the Royal Canadian Armoured Corps, the Royal Canadian Artillery, the Royal Canadian Engineers, the Royal Canadian Signallers, the Army Service Corps, the Army Medical Corps and the ordnance corps; there are 15 corps in the army but many of them are not fighting units in the hon. member's sense of the term. But they all contribute to the effective work of the army and it is quite impossible to sort out who is "fighting" in the sense apparently implied by the hon. member.

He knows that the brigade group has an establishment of something in excess of 5,000, and I have told him that it is approximately 80 per cent up to strength. The formation with regard to that was the one bit of information to which I referred before and for which he had asked in the house. On the advice of my advisers I told him that it was not in the public interest to give information about the actual strength and the state of training of individual formations, particularly of the brigade group, because that group represented the means we have of defending ourselves against such attacks as might be made suddenly in the way of diversionary or other attacks. It was the piece of information which a potential aggressor would most want to have. It is the one piece of information which on the advice of my advisers I said that I felt we should not give, and I referred to that yesterday.

With regard to the army, it is difficult to differentiate between the active and reserve forces. As the hon. member knows, a considerable proportion of the active force devotes a large part of its time to reserve force training and activities. A large part of all the training staff in the active force spends its time training the reserve force and yet it appears exclusively in the active force lists and votes. It really is not possible to sort out the functions of the armed forces in the way the hon. member mentions.

Mr. Harkness: I think the minister understood quite well what I wanted when I asked for this information and I think he has sorted it out fairly well as far as the army is concerned. I want to get the number of people in the permanent force who are trained and in position to fight if necessary. The only people who are in effective fighting units, if they are effective, are those in the brigade group. The minister has just told us that at the present time the brigade group has an authorized strength of 5,000.

Mr. Claxton: Over 5,000, I said.

Mr. Harkness: The minister said also that it is 80 per cent up to strength. That means there are some 4,000 men in the brigade group. Those are the people we have to depend on if there is such a thing as a diversionary raid. That is the sort of figure I have been trying to get for the last two or three years. In the course of saying that he could not give it, the minister gives it. This is the first time it has really been given. Of course all those men would not be used in combat, but the figure is close enough to let us know fairly well where we stand.

This leads up to another question which I asked the minister yesterday and to which I did not get an answer that really covered the matter. I was referring to section 6 of our defence policy which was enunciated by the minister on November 11, 1949, and which reads:

> Since an attack on Canada could only be made by air or by sea, emphasis must be placed on defence forces; by air—radar stations and communications, backed by interceptors and a relatively small mobile brigade group;

Yesterday I asked the minister if we had those radar stations and communications, backed by interceptors and a brigade group capable of doing the task which he himself has said was necessary in preventing diversionary raids and things of that sort. Although the minister gave a considerable answer in connection with radar stations and communications, although he told us about the two interceptor squadrons which are in being and something about the other five that are to come into being, as far as the brigade group is concerned he really did not say anything.

In dealing with Exercise Sweetbriar in March the minister stated that our defending forces should be able to prevent an attacker leapfrogging from airport to airport. I asked whether or not we have sufficient interceptors and trained men in the brigade group to prevent an enemy leapfrogging from airfield to airfield, but that is another question to which I have not had an answer.

The minister has made quite a point that he has answered every question that has been asked, but he answers a lot of them, such as the two or three I have mentioned, in a way which does not constitute an answer at all. The answer does not give you the information you want and you have to keep coming back and asking several more questions to get what you are after. This is another example of that fact. I wonder if the minister could make a statement with reference to the ability of the two interceptor squadrons, the transport planes and the brigade group of about 4,000 men that we have at the present time to prevent an enemy from leapfrogging from airfield to airfield, which he has stated is a necessary thing for us to be able to do.

Mr. Claxton: The defence of our northwest must be considered in conjunction with the defence of Alaska. The experience of Exercise Sweetbriar was, I believe, that with the forces we have and the forces planned by the United States for Alaska, in the opinion of my advisers our forces are sufficiently great to deal with an attack on the scale that might be anticipated as part of a total war.

Mr. Harkness: I wonder if the minister means that they would be sufficient to deal with an attack along the Alaska highway. If there happened to be an attack at the same time on Gander, Churchill or some place else, have we sufficient forces to deal with all of them?

Mr. Claxton: If the hon. member wants to go on and name a third, fourth, fifth and sixth, of course I cannot follow him because this is a matter of opinion. War is a very uncertain business, and he knows that just as well as anyone else in the house. One also has to be cautious about expressing views as to the safety or security of any place at any time. I have avoided doing that, and I will continue to do so because it is not realistic to do it. All I can say is that on the basis of advice from the people with whom I deal we think a sufficiently large part of the defence dollar is being spent on immediate local self-defence either in the navy, army or air force. Of course we are not satisfied with the condition, and we are going to improve it steadily as a part of the program. Nevertheless, having regard to the amount of $425 million made available today, our view is that we spend a sufficient proportion in our own local defence so far as money, personnel and equipment are concerned.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I did not mention anything about a fourth, fifth or sixth. The point I am trying to get at—and I think the minister knows it quite well—is whether we have sufficient forces. He has said that in his opinion and that of his advisers we have sufficient troops in conjunction with the United States, which is established in Alaska, to defend the Alaska highway. I merely asked whether we have sufficient troops in addition thereto to perform any other task, or is that the only thing we could do? He says it is not realistic to talk that way. I think it is extremely unrealistic to talk as though the only place in Canada that might be attacked is the Alaska highway. I think we are entitled to know whether it would take our entire fighting forces, so far as the army and air force are concerned, the interceptors, transports and the brigade group, to deal with one attack, and whether that would leave us completely bare so far as any other attack is concerned.

Mr. Claxton: No, it would not at all. The hon. member must appreciate that in the case of an attack from the northeast—and that possibility certainly must not be excluded—there are not only Canadian but also United States interests to defend. The United States has rights in respect of bases in Newfoundland and has forces there which she would use in her defence. Furthermore, I did not say it would be unrealistic to consider a first, second, third and fourth attack. What I suggested was that it would be unrealistic for me to express views with any certainty on such an uncertain thing as war, particularly global war today. All I can do is to express an opinion as to whether we are spending the defence dollar in the best possible way. Further and finally on that point, not only have we got a brigade group which would be instantly available but we also have the officers and men of the reserve force units which are in very good condition indeed. The unit to which the hon. member for Royal referred this morning, the Princess Louise Hussars, is virtually up to strength in officers and men. It has the equipment and a large number of qualified N.C.O.'s and tradesmen. It is a unit that would be quickly effective to meet any emergency. There are other units in a similar state of preparedness across Canada which could be used to back up the active forces in meeting any emergency that might arise.

Mr. Drew: Within what time?

Mr. Claxton: Varying times, depending on the unit.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that a message has been received from the Senate informing this house that the Senate has passed the following bills, to which the concurrence of this house is desired: Bill No. 268 (letter W-8 of the Senate) intituled an Act to amend the Foreign Insurance Companies Act, 1932; and Bill No. 269 (letter X-8 of the Senate) intituled an Act to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932.

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it was hoped to have these bills on the order paper today. I have spoken to the leaders of the opposition parties and asked if these bills can be given first reading today. If that can be done, on Monday they will be referred, as requested by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), to the standing committee on banking and commerce for detailed investigation.

FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENTS TO CHAPTER 47, STATUTES OF 1932

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved the first reading of Bill No. 268 (from the Senate) to amend the Foreign Insurance Companies Act, 1932.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN AND BRITISH INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENDMENT OF CHAPTER 54, STATUTES OF

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved the first reading of Bill No. 269 (from the Senate) to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

AMENDMENT OF CHAPTER 54, STATUTES OF 1947-48—ENFORCEMENT REGULATIONS

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gillis for second reading of Bill No. 6, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (enforcement).

Hon. Humphrey Mitchell (Minister of Labour): I believe I adjourned the debate on this motion, Mr. Speaker. I am opposed to this bill for the same reason as I was opposed to the bill introduced by the member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy). I want to make this observation, if I may. There is a wrong conception here of the responsibility of the members on this board. They are not free agents, nor do they represent particular interests. They bring their talents to the board, and once they are members of the board they are servants of the state carrying out the will of this parliament. I have checked this with the leaders of the British trade union movement, and other countries that follow our form of government. I believe the hon. member, upon reflection, will see that the present machinery is in keeping with the spirit of what he suggests. I say that not critically, but analytically. I must take the same stand I took on the other bill, that this is not a court but a labour relations board.

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Mr. Speaker, before the motion is put to the house I should like to register my own opposition to this bill. I consider it objectionable for the reasons which have already been so well explained by the minister on other occasions. My own belief is that if this bill were to carry it would strike at the root of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act which, as the house knows, is predicated upon the conciliation of industrial disputes, in addition to its other functions of course.

Since 1944 labour relations have been satisfactorily administered under the wartime labour relations regulations, and since the first of September, 1948, under the present act. Under both the act and the regulations the function of the Minister of Labour was to strive towards the bringing together of management and labour. This has been working satisfactorily. From every quarter in this house, not to speak of high authorities in the ranks of both labour and management inside and outside this country, the achievements of the Department of Labour in the administration of the regulations and the act have been highly praised. I do not think we should hurriedly change the spirit of that act, which has really been the secret of the success which has been achieved.

The act was adopted by this house after thorough consideration by the standing committee on industrial relations during the course of two sessions. I feel therefore that it is wrong to try to change one of the basic features of the act without giving that same committee an opportunity of going over the act once more. After a year and a half of operation, I submit it is premature to consider any such radical change. As a matter of fact not very many complaints have been placed before the minister requesting leave to prosecute. Many of those requests did not result in the issuance of any such consent, because the dispute which was the cause of the request was settled. In only a few exceptional cases was there any occasion for the minister to give his consent to prosecute. Under those circumstances, and without rehashing the reasons that have been given for objecting to the passage of this bill, I believe it is sufficient for me to invite this house to vote against the bill.

Mr. J. H. Harris (Danforth): If I may be privileged, sir, I should like to make one or two observations about this bill. First, sir, I quite realize that those who are charged with the responsibility of labour relations in the province of Ontario are so anxious, so happy, to be able to help labour relations in every possible way. But, sir, as one of the young members of this house, in common with you, I may say that we have seen rapid progress made in labour legislation. I think, sir, that today we have reached the stage where we ought to stop, look and ponder on what has transpired with regard to our labour relations, and be careful not to get too far ahead of ourselves in this country. We should do so for this reason; that the economy of this country, compared with the economy of the rest of civilization, is still in advance of all countries from the standpoint of labour relations. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, we could inveigle our friend, or persuade him, into letting this particular bill ride over for another year. We are into the hot weather now and we shall be cooler next January or February when the next session comes along. I would ask the hon. member who introduced this bill to give us, please, a chance to check and double check with regard to how far we are going in this country of ours in the matter of labour legislation —yes, in the matter of all kinds of legislation, not just labour legislation alone. In common with other hon. members in this house, I am a labourer in the vineyard, and we are doing the best we can. I seriously ask, Mr. Speaker, that we do not make haste so fast. Let us make haste slowly so that when that haste is made on labour legislation, the legislation will be of a kind that will stick and of a kind that will, in the final analysis, be of great benefit to the major portion of our population, namely, those who produce.

I should like to see this particular bill stand over until another session when we can give it more thought. Do not let us get ahead too fast with this sort of thing.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): I am not going to take more than five minutes, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) will have plenty of time in which to close the debate. I speak now only for a moment in order to confirm the principle which I supported and advocated in another bill a short time ago, that is, that in labour matters, any legislation that has assisted labour in every jurisdiction should be allowed at least a trial and that our courts should be permitted to exercise the jurisdiction granted them by the sections which it is sought to repeal or alter, in order that we may find out how it works. If it fails, then perhaps there might be the necessity for some such legislation as is sought to be passed in this particular bill.

I am anxious to make that statement in order that the hon. member for Cape Breton South will have ample opportunity to answer it; because, strange as it may seem, we are rather friendly and we have had some discussions about this particular thing; and I know that he is anxious to refute the principle which I advocate.

I am going to say something more, still watching my five minutes, Mr. Speaker, and it is this. Something happened the other day which I think is the greatest advance in industrial relations that has happened on this continent in all the years that I can remember. That is the settlement within the past week or ten days of the General Motors strike in the United States. The point I make there is this. It was a five-year settlement. Business could proceed with the knowledge that that problem was settled for that time. I make no comment on whether that settlement was good for labour or good for management. That is something on which I do not express any opinion; but having regard to that five-year basis, which is the longest time in recent years—anyway within my memory—for which a contract of that kind has been made, I say that is a great advance in the relations between management and labour.

I say this also. No one will get any money at all from the operation of a business unless he gets it from the profit dollar which the business makes. Shareholders will not get anything and labour will not get anything unless they get it from that source; because no one is foolish enough to carry on a business for any length of time to the point where he may lose his capital investment. He will adopt some other method of seeking something from the wreck. I think that settlement is a splendid affirmation, both by the management of General Motors and by Walter Reuther and labour. I think it is the first real evidence of a long view being taken by both capital and labour; and I use the word "capital" advisedly because I believe in it and I know of no better name to give it. I think they have accomplished a great deal because, as we know, Mr. Speaker, in numbers this labour organization is certainly the largest one we have on the North American continent. That that difficulty was resolved on a basis of conciliation is, I think, eloquent proof of the fact that both parties, the shareholders who will be seeking dividends and the labourers who will be seeking wages, have shown, by that positive act, an appreciation of the fact that the business must succeed and make a profit in order that either element or either party to the difficulty which they had may receive anything. We know that they have agreed on an advancing scale of wages year by year to the end of that contract. That is one of the finest expressions that I know of of confidence in business and in our present system of carrying on business.

I find that I have gone one minute beyond the five about which I spoke to you, Mr. Speaker. May I repeat this particularly to my hon. friend who is the sponsor of this bill. May I remind him of the co-operation that we had when this bill was passed after long, interesting and well-attended sessions of a committee of this house; and may I suggest to him that perhaps he should not be in too great a hurry to alter what we did at that time. Irrespective of that, I am one of those who are opposed to taking jurisdiction from the courts, as this does, until we have some proof that the courts have failed in their duty in respect to matters of this kind. I do not want to be technical, but I point out to him that he probably should have provided in his amendment for something which apparently was overlooked, namely, an appeal of some kind from the summary jurisdiction which he seeks to have exercised by the board.

It is true his amendment says that, the labour board having found so and so, you simply place that finding before a magistrate. He calls it a magistrate's court. I may say that in law I do not know that name for a court. It is a court of summary jurisdiction. The bill provides that having placed the finding of the board before that court, then the court may make an order by way of penalty, having regard to what the statute provides, for a breach of the provision which the labour board found the individual or the corporation guilty of.

I am very much afraid that if we were to pass his amendment in its present form there would be nowhere else to go after the board had made its finding, right or wrong. I am not basing my opposition on that. I am merely pointing that out to the hon. member. He may have a complete answer, because I have discovered that in this House of Commons he is one of the practical lawyers, and he certainly has appeared before boards often enough to know. Perhaps the word I should have used is "advocate." I know he is an excellent advocate; but I point out that technical difficulty to him and ask him in closing the debate to point out whether I am wrong, as it may well be that I am.

I do know that in all matters of summary conviction before summary courts, which are usually courts presided over by a justice of the peace, two justices of the peace or a stipendiary magistrate—that is a big word, sir, but I do not know any other to use; that is what they call them—in every line of endeavour there is always an appeal to a higher authority. I know I am right about that. It may be I am wrong in saying that in this particular instance he has not provided a further opportunity for the accused and convicted person to seek redress.

I have gone beyond my five minutes, but I am sure I have left the hon. member plenty of time to answer the very short observations I have made.

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the hon. member for Cape Breton South speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I might say nothing at this time, have the house take a vote and have the bill voted down. If there were any danger of its carrying, the bill would likely be talked out; but I am going to take a little time to do something that I have not done to date, namely, explain what I mean by this bill.

When the industrial relations committee discussed the present national labour code I went into this matter very thoroughly before the committee, and the committee did not see its way clear to write this provision into the act.

Just before taking his seat the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) made the observation that perhaps I was in a hurry about this thing. Well, a couple of years have elapsed since the drafting of the code; and if haste is a crime in the matter of amending the code there were many people on the other side of the house in great haste to amend the code as provided by the labour relations committee. We wrote into the labour relations code the check-off clause. When it came before this house, and before the house had a chance to discuss the matters that were written into the code by the committee, an amendment was made in this house that took out of the code the provision that the committee had written in.

If I am exhibiting undue haste in endeavouring to have this clause written in, the precedent was set by the government, and I have waited considerably longer to press a matter that I had strongly emphasized in the committee.

At this time I just want to make a few observations on what has been said, namely, someone else's interpretation of what the amendment means. I gave this matter a great deal of consideration. As the hon. member for Calgary West has indicated, I have been before many conciliation boards in the last thirty years. I am not recommending something here that I do not know from practical experience is going to be of great benefit to the future of labour relations in this country.

A few nights ago the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Stewart) waved his arms but said very little as to the bill itself. He made just the old line political attack on the C.C.F. What did he say? You could pick this out of the ravings in the time that he occupied in discussion. He said that labour in this country did not want this bill, that they knew nothing about it. I want to say that the bill was carefully drafted with the assistance of the law officer of the crown who is provided for that purpose. From the legal standpoint I think it meets the requirements. But before we did anything to this bill we called in representatives of the Canadian Congress of Labour. We sat down and discussed this bill clause by clause, and without any reservation they endorsed the bill and said it would be a good thing to have written into the code.

In addition to being an excellent lawyer the hon. member for Calgary West is also a labour advocate of long standing. He has been legal adviser to the united mine workers, district 18, over a good many years. While he sticks religiously to his law as defined by the Criminal Code of Canada, he slips a lot in his philosophy with regard to the labour movement, and indicates that he has not followed as closely as he should the development of provincial law in the matter of labour relations in this country.

We are not asking for anything new. Hon. members who opposed this bill indicate that they have not followed the matter of provincial law very closely. We are a long way behind the provinces on this particular point, because in Canada today every province has a labour relations act, and a labour relations board on a provincial scale. It is equivalent to the national labour code, but more than that it covers many more classifications of labour.

Mr. Mitchell: Will my hon. friend give this parliament credit for setting the example?

Mr. Gillis: You are away behind; you should have set this example long ago. But as it is now we are following the provinces, and we should not be doing that. In this matter of enforcing the act, every labour relations board in this country has the right to do what we are trying to enable the national labour board to do here. And if there is any doubt about that, then my hon. friend can just look back to what happened a couple of years ago. At that time the privy council rendered a decision in this matter, as to whether provincial boards had the right to enforce that legislation. That was in connection with the John East Company of Regina against the labour relations board of Saskatchewan. It was decided by the Supreme Court of Canada that they did not have jurisdiction to enforce their legislation. Then the case went to England. The then provincial minister of labour, the Hon. L. D. Currie, who at the present time is a judge of the supreme court of Nova Scotia, attended at the hearing, and backed the Saskatchewan labour relations board. He is a progressive man in that field, and he said that an adverse decision against the Saskatchewan board would mean that it was taking power from the other boards across the country which had been exercising those powers for some time.

Then my hon. friend goes back to the question of stare decisis which I have heard them talk so much about: the decision of the privy council stands. That decision has been made, and it has given jurisdiction to the provincial boards to do this very thing.

My hon. friend is a Conservative in politics. Surely he is not going to take a position in the house against what a Conservative government in Ontario has done on this very question. They were functioning under the national code for some time.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I will accept stare decisis but not "Clarie" decisis.

Mr. Gillis: The parliamentary assistant said a moment ago that this has not been tried. "Just give it a chance. We have not had any disputes recently in this regard or in the provinces. Things are going along pretty well." Well, he had some pretty bad disputes under the old national code, as it was. I am sure he will not say that the Canadian seamen's dispute was not a bad one. I am reasonably sure he will not say that the strike of automotive workers at Windsor a couple of years ago was not a bad one. I am sure he will not say that the mine workers' strike in Nova Scotia a few years ago, which lasted five months, was not a bad one. All those strikes at that time came under the supervision of the Department of Labour here in Ottawa.

Since Ontario has set up its own act, and has benefited by the difficulties of the past in regard to labour relations and authority in that field, they have written a code of their own. Since they wrote that code of their own they have provided machinery that gives the necessary authority to the minister of labour, provincially, to get in there, and, through his power, to prevent strikes.

That is what I am aiming at here. I do not suppose there is anyone in the House of Commons who went through more strikes when we had no legislation. I take a back seat to no one in this country today in my desire to prevent strikes, because strikes are like wars: no one wins; everyone loses.

I want to see legislation in this country that not only gives responsibility to bodies like the national labour board or provincial labour boards, but I want to see such bodies having the necessary authority to carry out their functions. The national board has not that authority at this time.

For the benefit of the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), who is a Conservative in politics, and who, I am sure, will not disagree with the Conservative government of Ontario, let me place on record a short synopsis of the provincial statute on this very point of the authority to prosecute:

> The Ontario labour relations board will have power to decide if a conciliation board is required in a dispute and to authorize prosecutions for unfair labour practices. These powers formerly were held by the minister.

That is exactly the position the national labour relations board and the minister are in today. The minister now has supreme authority in matters of prosecution. Regardless of what employers or employees or the national labour relations board may think in the matter of a prosecution, they must get permission from the Minister of Labour. I say that is unfair to the minister, and places in his hands dictatorial powers he should not have. Personally, I would not want it.

Last Sunday night I listened to a reporter from the Press Gallery give a news round-up from Ottawa. I would advise him to get in touch with somebody, or to get a little book on labour relations and the functions of national and provincial boards, as well as conciliation boards. He broadcast at some length on this particular point, and said, "Oh, that is asking for judicial power for every conciliation board across this country." For his benefit let me say that this has nothing to do with conciliation boards. If he was not any better informed in respect to the rest of his subjects that night than he was on this one, I would advise him to get another job, rather than attempt to interpret the news to the Canadian people.

Mr. Knowles: What were his other subjects?

Mr. Gillis: Markets, international affairs, and that kind of thing. But if he did not understand something that has been discussed in the House of Commons a good many times, and discussed in a committee I have seen him attend—and I refer to the labour relations committee—then I say we cannot accept his advice very seriously on such matters as marketing, international affairs and so on.

This particular bill has nothing to do with conciliation boards. The parliamentary assistant said that this question has never been brought up since the adoption of the code. The matter has been tested. He could check back and find the case of the Hull Transportation Commission v. the Canadian Congress of Labour. That particular matter was ironed out before the board and finally went to a magistrate in Hull. The Minister of Labour sent it there. I talked with some of the people who appeared before that magistrate, and they told me that the employer went in and stated his side of the case, that they came in and stated their side, and that the magistrate, trained to administer in respect of decisions in criminal law, sat to hear the case.

Industrial relations are human relations. There is no prosecution or defence of a criminal in a matter of this kind; rather there is a duty to deal with the technicalities of industry and the mechanics of unionism. The magistrate must have some knowledge of agreements, contracts and procedure. But the magistrate does not have that knowledge, and after sitting around for some time and spending a large sum of money the case is dropped. I am not speaking disparagingly about the magistrate in question, because he is all right in his own field.

All we are asking in this instance is to give the labour relations board something by way of status. When parties to a dispute come before them they hear all the evidence. This is their act, and they know the mechanics of it. They know who is in the illegal position when they assess the evidence. All we are asking the house to do is not to give them judicial power. They take evidence, just as the income tax appeal board does, and the matter is then placed in the hands of the magistrate. However, the evidence is properly placed before him and assessed, and in this way we have an impartial body, such as the board, presenting a case on its merits. If they are turned loose today, after going through the national board, the only alternative for the worker is to strike. This idea of sending union representatives to get permission from the minister to prosecute will not work. Today the unions are dealing with large organizations with lots of money and the cost of carrying on litigation cannot be borne by the average union. They can drag you through the courts until you are bankrupt and that is the end of your organization. In the meantime you may have delayed the settlement of a dispute that finally culminates in a strike. All this while your labour relations board is sitting idly by without authority to do anything.

We contend that this is a good time to test this when the national labour relations board has jurisdiction over so few workers. The national harbours board employees, the C.B.C. employees, the railroad employees and the employees of certain shipping companies in interprovincial trade come under their jurisdiction, but that is all. We could go on and by trial and error find out if it works.

The provincial boards have the power to do this and it has been found that the employer is not as tough as he used to be. He knows that if he forces a matter into the courts he will be fighting the provincial government. Apparently the government has little respect for the judgment of the people they appoint on this board. I say that instead of stepping up prosecutions, this legislation would cut them by 75 per cent. Instead of promoting strikes, it would prevent them.

Mr. Mitchell: If you cut them down 75 per cent there would not be any prosecutions.

Mr. Gillis: You have had quite a few and you would have a lot more if litigation were not so costly.

Mr. Mitchell: I do not want to put the unions into the courts, as they are in the United States.

Mr. Gillis: I am trying to take them out of the courts. You had that transportation matter not so long ago.

Mr. Mitchell: That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. Gillis: It is not a matter of opinion, it is a matter of record. The idea has been built up in the minds of hon. members that this is something new, but that is not correct. Every provincial labour relations board is doing this. As the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) said a moment ago, we should be leading the provinces. As it stands now, we are following them. I am safe in saying that if the labour relations board had this authority you would not have had that mess in connection with the seamen that disrupted the whole industry; the board could have stopped it.

Mr. Mitchell: Do not bring up that old chestnut.

Mr. Gillis: Certainly I will bring it up.

Mr. Mitchell: You are not kidding me.

Mr. Gillis: That dragged along because no one had any authority. I am not speaking in favour of the communists at all. You had a man like Mr. Brockington write a report about it. I am not advocating support of the communists.

Mr. Mitchell: I agree that the hon. member is not advocating support of the communists.

Mr. Gillis: At that time the seamen were made up of hundreds of good Canadian citizens who had done a wonderful job during the war. The report that Mr. Brockington wrote against the companies left much to be desired.

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. friend knows that the communists feed you up like a turkey at Christmastime and then slit your neck.

Mr. Gillis: They will even borrow your handkerchief to wipe the blood off their knife after they are through with you. I am reasonably sure that if our labour relations board had had the necessary authority they would have stopped that whole thing. I realize that the Minister of Labour is only one ordinary human being and he has a large department to administer with authority over a large country. I do not expect him to keep his finger on everything. What we are trying to do is to set up machinery to help him.

It is not a new thing for me to be advocating this sort of legislation. I remember the first time I went before a provincial government in connection with mothers' allowances—I was almost arrested. Yet we have all those things today. This is just another step forward. The provincial governments are getting ahead of us with this kind of thing. I have a little pride in our national forum and I want to see us pass legislation that the provinces will follow. In this particular matter they are ahead of us.

I do not want to talk out this matter because I should like to have a vote although I know how it will go. I do not want to leave the impression in the minds of hon. members or of members of the press gallery that we are taking a step in the dark because this legislation has been tried out already and it is working. It will not be taking anything away from the courts because it places the matter of assessing evidence and imposing penalties as contained in the act—

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The courts would do that.

Mr. Gillis: —squarely in the hands of the magistrate. That is exactly the same thing the income tax department is doing.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Do not talk to me about that.

Mr. Gillis: The hon. member for Calgary West says, "do not talk to me about that".

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): That is a czarist outfit.

Mr. Gillis: The income tax people may from your files gather evidence; they institute prosecutions and they take these matters into the courts.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): My hon. friend is trying to establish an analogy between the machinery set up for the administration of the Income Tax Act, on the one hand, and the machinery for the administration of this labour act. Does the hon. member consider that the collection of taxes should be compared with the conciliation of disputes and the administration of human relations between employers and employees?

Mr. Gillis: I am merely making a comparison. The hon. member for Calgary West says that there is no provision for appeal, but there is a provision in the bill that the board may appeal the decision or the judgment of the magistrate, and the employer can do the same thing.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The board may.

Mr. Gillis: There is no appeal from the decision of compensation boards and they deal with human beings.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Why not give the workman the right to appeal when you are giving the board the right to appeal?

Mr. Gillis: We are.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): According to the section you read you are not.

Mr. Gillis: A workman may appeal if he wants to and so may the employer.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Nonsense.

Mr. Gillis: There is nothing new in this legislation. It is simply following precedents already established. The bill has been drafted very carefully and it conforms to the law in every way. It is merely giving to those who administer the act the same status and authority now given to the provincial boards.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

202. To provide for the defence forces of the navy, army and air services, and to authorize total commitments for this purpose of $579,301,670 including authority, notwithstanding section 29 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, to make commitments for the current year of $438,178,000 and commitments for future years of $141,123,670 against which commitments it is estimated that actual expenditures in 1950-51 will not exceed $384,932,304.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, today the house has heard a number of questions asked and a number of answers given; and there has been noticeable a certain measure of impatience in certain quarters that still further questions are being asked. On a number of occasions the minister has repeated that we have more complete information than similar elective bodies elsewhere, but the repetition of that statement does not make it correct. If anyone wants to know how correct or otherwise that statement is, it is only necessary to read any one of the great metropolitan dailies of the United States. One can then see the amount of information that is given in congress in regard to every detail of national defence, except that which comes under the real veil of secrecy such as the details of the development of the hydrogen bomb; the development of atomic energy, and even that is now subject to some limitations; the development of secret weapons that have not been announced. There is a discussion on those that are generally known, although they are still described by the use of the particular term "secret weapons".

Moreover, when we are told we have more information than is available at Westminster, that again is simply not so. At Westminster the estimates go before a subcommittee on estimates, and the members who make up that committee have the right to call and do call—within this last year they have, as on other occasions—upon senior staff officers of the different branches of the service. These men are questioned about the details connected with those military services. It was only in the late afternoon that some measure of information was given which had been sought all day. Over and over again an attempt had been made, not only today but earlier, to get some idea of the real breakdown of the figure that is given for the active army. We are told that there are in excess of 40,000 members of the active army. We are told of their high state of training. In so far as their training goes, with whatever limitations there are upon that training, it is true that they are keen; that they are devoting themselves to that training; and that they give an example on parade which might well be accepted anywhere as a standard of what military appearance should be. Only in t late afternoon we learned that of those 40,000 the hitting force, and it is the hitting force that counts, is in the neighbourhood of 4,000 in the brigade group. We were given that information indirectly, because it was stated that the brigade group was about 80 per cent of strength, and we know the establishment of a brigade group. Therefore, subject to whatever additional figures may be added by the minister, the hitting force that we have available through our land army is something of the order of 4,000 men.

Having said that, it is appropriate to point out that the staff, the officer body, and the men generally of the active army are called upon to train the reserve army. Therefore the relationship of the staff, and of non-combatant to combatant, could not be expected to bear the same proportions as a group of military formations in the field. Nevertheless there must surely be some reason for concern, and there must be a recognition of the lack of balance, when out of some 40,000 our apparent hitting force is in the neighbourhood of 4,000. I say, Mr. Chairman, it is our apparent hitting force. It may be greater than that, and if it is we are still waiting to be told what the figures are. I hope we will not again in this chamber hear a statement that this information might help Russia. Surely we are talking in terms of reality, and not in terms of children's make-believe. We are talking in terms of the threat of a military power that has some 160 fully armed divisions in the field, and that has a potential of some 600 divisions that could be quickly brought into military service. It is that potential to which the free nations of the world are now directing their attention, and which they are seeking to restrain by their combined strength.

The only people who will be misled or the only people who will be in any way fooled by hiding information are the people of Canada who should know exactly what the facts are and who are prepared to meet those facts. The people of this country will respond to a challenge. The people of this country, if they are told of the need really to prepare ourselves for the test that lies ahead, will undoubtedly meet whatever reasonable demand is made upon them or any call for sacrifice. But it would be criminal folly for any Canadian to forget what happened in 1914 and in 1939, and not to remember what happens to the bravest men if they are confronted with superior armed force and a determined enemy who has been preparing for active aggression with the deliberate intention of using his weapons for that aggression.

In so far as the figures are available, we do not know. I hope that the minister will indicate that the figures are much better than they now appear. But one of the things that this committee should know and should insist upon knowing—and this insistence should come from every part of the chamber —is how many of the active forces are in headquarters, how many are staff, how many are in command headquarters, how many are engaged in the work in the various military establishments across the country and in the armouries as well. We should know what the proportion is of each of those groups brought right down to the actual hitting force itself. When I speak of the hitting force, I am not including those vitally important services—and may I emphasize the words "vitally important services"— such as the medical service, the army service corps and the various organizations required to support troops in the field. Their place is as a component part of any successful military effort. But the effort from the staff organization down and up again is all related to what hitting force can be put in the field. If our hitting force is only of the order of 4,000 or 5,000 men, and if that is the total number of men that we could put into the field if the call came tomorrow, then there is a disproportion that should alarm everyone here and everyone in this country; because that proportion is not one that is in keeping with any balanced allocation of military tasks.

When the minister was asked about those forces, and it was mentioned that 80 per cent of the establishment of the brigade group would be in the neighbourhood of 4,000, he said quite properly that it must be remembered that behind and associated with that were the reserve units. There again is something about which we should have a great deal more information than we have now before we even think of passing this item. We must remember that this item is the one that embraces the whole broad field of military expenditure in the general field of military training.

The minister pointed out that certain units of the reserve forces which have been mentioned are in a high state of training and that they would be able in a short time to give an excellent account of themselves. He was asked, "Within what time?" His answer was, "Varying times". I do not think any words in this discussion have been more descriptive of the nature of the information that we have than the answer that was given to that question, "Within what time?" The answer was, "Varying times". What is meant by "varying times"?

Do not let anyone accept the statement that we are getting accurate information when we are simply told that the reserve units could be put in the field in varying times. We know from experience that units of the reserve forces were put in the fields in varying times in the last war, and they ranged from two and a half years upwards. It takes a long time to bring a reserve unit up to combatant standards, unless its training has been on a combatant level, whether it has full equipment or not. I greatly question whether there is a single reserve unit in Canada today that, with any justice to the men in that unit, could be put in the field against a trained army in less than six months. We are talking in terms of what can be done in the face of an immediate threat, not what can be done at some distant time.

I would hope that the members of this committee would ask that the Minister of National Defence speak with words that have the same clarity as those used by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, because the Secretary of State for External Affairs left no doubt that I can see in reading the words as to his interpretation of what happened so recently in London when the twelve member nations of the Atlantic community met there and reached certain agreements. Speaking as the man who had actually been there, speaking on behalf of Canada, and speaking as the man who represented Canada, the Secretary of State for External Affairs told us here in this chamber last Monday that never again could nations wait behind the ramparts of sacrifice of other nations to build up their strength to defend themselves. Those are clear words and they are words that face the reality. Never again, he was telling us in effect, will there be that period which we were given in the first world war and in the second world war to make up for the time which had been lost in making any effective preparation to meet the threat of war which was actually before us. Never again can we hope for a channel to protect freedom in the way that the channel protected Britain as the great outpost of freedom in 1939 onwards until the free nations were ready to re-invade the European continent.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs also used words which were open to no doubt when he said that this agreement laid down a new principle and that principle was—and he used an illustration to show what he meant —that each nation within this group of twelve nations would decide what task it could best perform and what things it could best produce as part of the combined effort. Let us take the illustration of the battleships, and this has already been mentioned; but in the face of the uncertainty of the statements that have been made, it obviously needs to be repeated. He pointed out that if the battleships could best be built by one nation, then other nations would not build them; but he pointed out that such an economy of forces—and may I emphasize the words "economy of forces"—would only be possible if the other nations knew that the nation which was building the battleships would put them to immediate use in the event that a threat had to be faced; and that applied to aircraft, to armoured vehicles and to everything else. It is not only that the nation which can best produce those things will produce them and train with them, but that whole principle rests upon the clear understanding that if other nations leave that job to a nation that can best perform it, that nation which is doing that particular task will carry out that task at the moment that the task is of importance.

We have no such definite statement from the Minister of National Defence. On the contrary, we are told that what has happened in London calls for no change that should be announced to us now. All over this country the agreement was hailed as one of the historic documents of our time. The newspapers very naturally, in editorials and in feature articles, spoke of the fact that this presented the possibility of a reorganization of our forces which could increase the effectiveness of those forces and at the same time make it possible to economize in some of these things. And yet we are told that there is no change from what has been placed before us for so long, and that this calls for no new announcement, no new plan, no statement that there will be a re-adjustment of the proportion of units or anything of that kind.

Mr. Claxton: What suggestion have you to make about a re-apportionment of units?

Mr. Drew: I will make that suggestion in a moment. In so far as these details are concerned, I asked last night—and I asked in the hope that the minister would comply with the request—that the minister agree to prepare a statement which could be presented to this house and could be printed as an appendix to the records of the house, which would show the actual military formations in this country, would show the headquarters organization here in Ottawa, would show the command organizations, would show the groups within those various commands; would show the number of infantry units, the number of artillery units, the number of engineering units, signal units, medical units and all the other units required by a land force; would tell us the number of air units of different kinds, whether of fighter, bomber or other squadrons, would give us the numbers and types of ships, both in active service and included in these estimates for construction or for the beginning of construction during the current year.

The minister comes forward with nothing of that kind. He still talks in generalities, still talks in very vague and uncertain terms of the things that must be secret, and we do not even know what he thinks should be secret and what should not. There is no mystery about the organization of our forces in this country. We have a headquarters staff here in Ottawa, and we should know—and I propose to ask in detail—exactly the number of staff officers in this headquarters, what the military staff organization is under them, what the general civilian body is that is employed here in Ottawa; what the number is at command headquarters, what the number is at every other military location throughout Canada, and the number of people, not giving them in individual points, but the number employed at armouries and at other establishments for maintenance and otherwise. These figures could be given without producing volumes to do that task.

Let us look at the situation. We have this headquarters here. The general staff is situated here, and all the supporting organization. Then we have in this country five commands. We have these commands divided as follows: We have the eastern command, with headquarters at Halifax; we have the Quebec command with headquarters at Montreal; we have the central command with headquarters at Oakville; we have the prairie command with headquarters at Winnipeg, and the western command with headquarters at Edmonton. In turn these commands have certain special duties and certain special tasks. One of the things that should be explained to us, when the detailed organization of these commands is given to us, is what is being done at these commands for divisional organization, and what is the divisional organization within these commands; because that also is something that relates to the type of training that we are giving, and whether there should be a reallocation of forces in this country.

Also there is the question of the interchangeability of units between eastern and western commands because of the similarity of their tasks. Certainly it is not in any of these secret categories when we recognize the fact, which is not stated in any of these records, but nevertheless is fully recognized and generally known but has to be stated in order to examine the whole picture, that our military establishment is based upon the acceptance of the proposition that we will have six divisions, four independent infantry brigades, two independent tank brigades as well as certain ancillary troops.

[Mr. Drew.]

The divisions in the various commands are as follows. The eastern command has the fifth infantry division; the Quebec command has the third and fourth infantry divisions; the central command has the first infantry division and the second armoured division; the western command has the sixth armoured division and the Pacific command has part of the fifth infantry division, so that the fifth infantry division is made up of the parts that are in both the eastern and western commands.

When the Minister of National Defence asks what should be considered, well, here is something that certainly should be considered, namely, whether or not the decisions that were made in London so short a time ago have any bearing on whether there should be a greater concentration of armoured divisions than of ordinary infantry divisions. I think the minister should tell us whether he thinks that with the developments of the past few months, let alone a few years, infantry divisions can ever possibly be expected to go into active service except in association with armoured divisions; and whether the whole plan should not be to create fighting teams in which the armour and infantry are integrated at all times without any degree of separation between the two formations.

The war establishment, and it is the active service establishment that we are contemplating in this discussion of an armoured division, consists of an infantry brigade of four infantry battalions, an armoured brigade, four armoured regiments, divisional troops. These divisional troops include divisional artillery, self-propelled regiments, self-propelled anti-tank regiments, armoured car regiment, motor battalion division, signal regiment, divisional engineers, divisional service corps, divisional medical corps, divisional ordnance corps, divisional electrical and mechanical engineers. That is the type of force that is included in one armoured division on a war establishment. I think that is the kind of thing we should be asking at a time like this, when the very survival of this nation rests upon the subject we are discussing.

Mr. Ferrie: What do you want to tell the world about it for?

Mr. Drew: As I was saying, when the very survival of this nation depends upon the subject we are discussing. First: what is the actual situation in regard to each one of those units that are embraced in an armoured division of this kind? As would be indicated by the very fact that the fifth infantry division is divided between the east and west coasts, it is clear that the fifth infantry division is for coast defence in both coastal areas.

Then, outside of those particular troops that have this particular task there are five other divisions and in addition four independent infantry brigades and two independent tank brigades. These are all reserve organizations. I am convinced that there is no one who would speak with any measure of responsibility who would suggest that with the most concentrated training that could possibly be conceived those units could go into action in less than six months—and many of them would require a great deal more than that.

It is in the light of that situation that we must then go back to the words of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who said that we have come to the time now when never again can preparation go forward behind the ramparts of sacrifices of some other nation, but that the task now is to have a hitting force that can be put into the field the moment the demand comes.

When the Minister of National Defence asks what can be done, then I say to him that what can be done and what should be done—and we should be having staff officers right here to tell us—is, in the light of this new principle enunciated last Monday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to tell us what is the maximum hitting force which can go into action immediately and that we as a nation can maintain.

That is the question. And on the answer to that question depends the answer to the demand for money which is being made in this House of Commons. It may be a great deal more than the money that is asked for, and it may be less. It may be that, if our forces are organized on a highly efficient basis, with every unit trained to work as a team that can go into action the moment the whistle blows, we actually would save millions and scores of millions of dollars. On the other hand, if on the advice of the staff, and with that advice presented to members of parliament, it is clear that more money is needed, then I am satisfied that parliament and the people of Canada will vote whatever money is needed to preserve that freedom which means more than life itself to our people.

But let us know what is the force. I say the definition is simple, and the definition is not contained in anything that has been put before us here. The definition is simple, and it is this: We are members of the Atlantic community of nations. According to the Secretary of State for External Affairs we have agreed to become part of a team of free nations pooling all their strength for the preservation of their freedom. We have agreed as a free nation to pool that strength upon a basis which will economize by using that strength which each nation can best produce.

Our contribution may well be limited in the field of a land force; it may be very great in the air. I have no doubt that that is our major role. It certainly would be very great in hard-hitting armoured units. Also there are undoubtedly certain types of service craft which this country has learned to make so well, manned by men who have shown as high a natural instinct for seamanship as the members of any navy in the world. There again our task is to determine what proportion of those should be used, and whether in the light of this new principle enunciated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs we are to maintain aircraft, carriers, cruisers, destroyers, submarines or vessels of any other kind.

All we are asking, and I am sure what the people of Canada are asking, is to know what the facts are and to know the best contribution we can make and, knowing that, then to relate the expenditure of money called for by parliament to the most effective organization of a force of that kind that can be put into operation the very moment danger of war should threaten. It is upon that basis that we will have not war but peace.

If there is one clear and tragic lesson that has emerged from all the dreadful and heartbreaking evidence at Nuremberg last year, it is the clear evidence that where there were two world wars there could have been peace, if the free nations of the world, with all their vast resources, and that greater energy which freedom gives, had only had the vision to stand together and to say to Germany and to other aggressors before war actually came, "We will give everything we have to save this freedom that we love so much. Do not be misled into believing that we have gone soft, or that we are not prepared to fight for the freedom which you threaten."

Today there is only one possible enemy in the world—only one. Never before in the whole history of the world have the lines been drawn so clearly. Those of us of my age and over have lived through the most eventful years in the whole history of the world. My memory as a small boy goes back to the days immediately following the South African war, and to the time when those who served in that distant field came back. To us they were almost like men from Mars. They had been in a distant world the rest of us could not understand. They had come from a distant land the rest of us would never know. There was romance, there was glamour—yes, there was an appeal about the thought of marching men on the distant veldt that had no relationship to the tragic hardships, the disease, the death and the horrors that went with that struggle in a comparatively limited part of the world.

Then, in the years between 1901 and 1914, there were a number of great powers any one of which might have threatened the peace of the world. There was Germany, the Austrian empire of 55 million people, France, Italy, China, Japan, Great Britain and the United States. They were all strong powers.

Then war came, and out of the holocaust of war a very limited number of nations carried on as great powers. Actually in the years after the war Japan in the east and Germany in Europe presented the only real threat. Mussolini could not build a formidable army although he put many men under arms. Two threats were there and we knew they were threats. Russia was not yet a threat in the same way because it was still gathering its forces together under the new tyranny which had emerged. But it would be a good thing for us to recall that the real driving power that created the tyrannies in Germany and Italy was communism itself. It was because of the rise of communism in Germany after world war I, after the dreadful horrors of the communist governments of Prussia, of Saxony, of Bavaria and other German states, it was after the horrors of communism in Italy as well, that these dictators emerged and built up their military power.

In the Orient the military power of Japan was built up upon another basis. But there was that threat; we saw it and we knew it. War came. The war destroyed much. But for Great Britain, for the commonwealth, for the United States, for many nations in Europe and the rest of the world, thank God, it did not destroy freedom. But freedom has been lost in many parts of the world. Freedom is being lost day by day, under the threat from one power and one power alone.

That power has vast military strength which was built up largely by the assistance given by Great Britain, by the United States and by Canada as well. Let us be under no delusion as to the strength of Russia in many lines. I am not questioning the wisdom of the decisions arrived at at the time, but we sent some of the finest electrical equipment ever produced in Canada to help rebuild the great power plants on the Don, the Dnieper, and the Dniester. Those great projects are producing the power for the munition plants of Russia where they are turning out arms and equipment with the help of the conscripted skill of eastern Germany which they control.

It is not an easy picture to accept. We know that the machine tools which they cannot turn out as yet on a satisfactory basis were supplied by ourselves in limited quantities, by the United States, by Great Britain, by Sweden and other countries which are able to make machine tools of the highest quality.

That threat is there and must be dealt with, not by promises of what can be done within six months, within a year or within two years; it can be blocked only if we face the realities of what it means. We, along with other nations, must create armed forces in being, not armed forces on paper, not armed forces that can go into action in six months or a year.

The Minister of National Defence knows that I had some experience with this problem and it is because of that experience that I am concerned about any delay in the reorganization of our forces in keeping with the principle that has been laid down. As he has stated, I had the privilege of being the president of the Canadian Artillery Association at a time when all the defence associations came together for the purpose of drafting a plan for the reorganization of our land forces. At that time there was a complete disproportion between the infantry units, the artillery units and the other units. The resolution upon which the reorganization took place was a simple one calling for the integrated organization of the land forces in Canada on the basis of not less than four and not more than six divisions on an active service basis. With the acceptance of that principle the six-division basis was adopted and the reorganization took place. It took several years and it was only because there were several years in which to carry out that reorganization that it was possible for the reserve units of this country to be mobilized as they were in 1939.

We are confronted now with another demand for a type of armed force that will be adapted to the principle enunciated so clearly last Monday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. We want to know exactly what is the maximum hitting force that can be put into the field right away, not something that will take months to prepare but right away. Whatever that force is, we want to see the equipment and we want to see the training. We want to see the sort of organizations which can put those units in the field at the earliest possible moment. So much for the land force.

What is our role in the air? That too must have been discussed. There cannot be any secrecy about this. As the organization of our air force is developed it is known to everyone. They know what the types are. The Russians do not think that a Vampire or other jet machines are bombers. They do not think they are anything else but what they are. They can tell by the type of machine just what it is intended for. When we have five jet squadrons, which is the present objective, they will know that those five jet squadrons are for a particular purpose. If we have jet transport squadrons or turboprop squadrons or squadrons of any other kind, they will know what they are for. For that reason, let us know what is needed. Let us know what fits into this pattern. Then let us insist that the plan be completed.

The same is true of the naval force. Let us know whether the aircraft carrier is still part of the force or whether it should be reallocated to the navy of Great Britain. On the other hand, let us know whether we should have more aircraft carriers. Let us know what the task is.

In this respect may I point out that it is not enough for us to be told by the minister what he thinks this is; we should have the evidence of what is required. It is for this house to say how far it is prepared to go and to insist that this government, with the full support of the members of parliament, must create the most efficient fighting unit consistent with this new principle which will economize our effort and which will make it possible to develop our strength within this team of free nations.

Beyond the armed forces is the question of military supply. We have the statement of General Howard, chairman of that board, that the developments are not as advanced as they should be. We should know how much of this money is needed by that board under the chairmanship of General Howard. Having regard to the allocation of tasks, we want to know that that also is brought up to date.

That is the broad picture. We are not dealing simply with marching men; we are not dealing simply with aircraft flying over our heads; we are not dealing simply with the magnificent sight of ships; we are dealing with the last chance for freedom in our generation. That is what it is. It is time that every one of us grasped this problem with full recognition of all that it means. If there is one call that should come to us from those whose memory is perpetuated in the cemeteries, money for which is a part of the requirements to be voted, it is: Do not again put young men against steel, iron and explosives without the steel, iron and explosives that they need for their task. Do not pit flesh and blood against steel. Do not test the bravery of a free people beyond endurance. We have risked that twice. Let us not try it again. That is the issue before us. In the light of that issue I once again urge the Minister of National Defence to give us the complete breakdown to which we are entitled.

Mr. McIvor: I have listened to many speeches in this debate and a lot of them have been good, but I must admit that the greatest force in keeping a nation alive and winning wars has not been emphasized. As the dramatist said: "There's a divinity that shapes our ends, rough-hew them how we will." Behind parliament, behind the soldiers and behind the nation if we have not that power which is divine we will be licked to a frazzle. Napoleon said: Talk not to me of Providence; Providence is on the side of the heaviest battalion. As somebody has said, Napoleon lived to rue the day when he found that Providence was on the side of the white snowflakes of Russia, when the flower of France were frozen in their saddles. I would advise the opposition, the minister and the government to put the emphasis on the greatest force possible. We have to keep ourselves in shape and well equipped physically and mentally, but certainly we must keep ourselves equipped spiritually.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, there is one correction I should like to make. Because of the fact that the over-all figure of 40,000 odd was referred to I used it. I want to correct the figure in relation to the army as distinguished from the armed forces generally. The total for the army as distinguished from the armed forces is in the neighbourhood of 20,000 whereas the armed forces are in excess of 40,000.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, we have listened to a speech by the leader of the opposition which was rather similar to a speech he made yesterday and to others which he has delivered throughout the session. I do not say on that account that it was necessarily a bad speech.

An hon. Member: Friday night.

Mr. Claxton: Not necessarily, but I say that the problem of our national defence is a problem which must be decided by parliament and the country, and one which must be decided in the light of the circumstances as they exist at the time. Hon. members will appreciate that I have made a good many speeches throughout the country about the communist menace. They will appreciate I have made a good many speeches to arouse interest in the work of our armed forces and explaining their needs, but I do not feel it is necessary to make that kind of speech tonight. I feel that this is one kind of audience which might have been spared the speech made by the leader of the opposition. He has made it before, and we agree with a great deal of it.

We are concerned now with voting $425 million for purposes of national defence for the year 1950-51. That is the matter before the committee. I must say I have been ready to take part in that discussion since the 17th of March when this department was the first to be brought into supply. We have not been assisted to any great degree in making any progress by the various measures that have been brought forward by opposition groups from time to time. But here we are. We have had two days of the most ample and general discussion. A good deal of it has been first-class and very welcome; but why the leader of the opposition, the hon. member for Kamloops and other members of the opposition should in some way find fault with us because we have not anticipated meetings that have not taken place, because we have not anticipated decisions that have not yet been made, because we have not declared history before it has been written, I just do not understand.

That has gone on for two days, apparently in some kind of notion that in the statements of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and myself there is room for finding some point of difference. I should like once and for all to scotch that type of childish effort to provoke some kind of division in the government. The Secretary of State for External Affairs and I have known each other for over twenty-five years. We have worked together on international conference after international conference. When he was away in London at the recent conference it was given to me to represent him in the house as Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, as it has been my duty in his absence ever since he was appointed Secretary of State for External Affairs. So far as I know, when I have acted with him as his junior on a delegation, or when we have worked together on any other occasion, we have worked together as one person speaking the same language, as members of this government work together under the leadership of the Prime Minister. We have gone over the text of what the Secretary of State for External Affairs said and I think I have quoted parts of it twice, but I only did so because members of the opposition failed to quote the parts that were necessary to complete the picture. The statement is there. If you look at the statements made in consequence of the first meeting of the council of ministers under the North Atlantic pact in Washington; then the defence committee held in Washington; then the defence committee held in Paris; then subsequently the defence committee held in The Hague; and finally the council of ministers held in London; you will see a record of gradual, steady but rapid accomplishment of the ends for which the North Atlantic treaty was signed by this and the other eleven nations.

Let no member of this house and no person in Canada ever fail to remember that among the nations which put forward the idea of this treaty, Canada, through the statement of the Prime Minister at the United Nations, was one of the first. That was followed through in our work in the working group. In fact I believe we were the first country to sign the pact, and then we were among the first to ratify it without a dissenting voice in either this house or the Senate. Make no mistake about it, any effort by anyone anywhere to indicate that we are less than faithful to our signature and desirous of the interests of freedom is an effort to distort the established record and to thwart the interests of the Canadian people.

Why should it be necessary for me to say this after we have gone through all these debates, and the discussion in the house yesterday and today? Only because an effort has been made to indicate that Canada, in some way or other, is doing less than she should. Sir, I am one who has had to face the Canadian people in some elections, and I never want to face any section of the Canadian people unless I can say that we have done everything that is necessary to live up to our bond, to seek our interests, and to do what the Canadian people want. The record of the armed forces of Canada in the great war of 1914-18, and the second world war, has given us a place second to none among the nations of the world, irrespective of size. We have earned their respect, and we are going to hold their respect.

Why have the members of the official opposition brought up this series of questions as to whether we are going to make changes; whether we are doing enough; whether we should not suddenly stop in the middle of our defence preparations this year and make some other preparations, because of the declaration of an important principle? I do not know why they have done it. I do not see where they are getting. I do not see any political advantage from it. I certainly see no national advantage to it. I see nothing in the speech of the leader of the opposition that would help us in either raising forces for our own defence or meeting the enemy should he come tomorrow. I do not see it. I have been trying through three years to develop the sort of idea that I believe is thoroughly understood by this country, and that is that defence is a matter of major government policy, of major national policy, because of the attitude of the Soviet union. Owing to that fact, we have been seeking increasingly large amounts from parliament in order to secure the means of defending ourselves, but also to contribute to the defence of other nations who think with us that we must defend our freedom wherever it can best be defended. Towards that end I believe a good many hon. members on both sides of the house have spent their efforts. I believe also that, to a greater degree than ever before in the peacetime history of this country, the needs of national defence are recognized and appreciated by the people in every part of Canada, and no one has done more to arouse that appreciation and that recognition than the Prime Minister.

But far more than the efforts of any person have been the realities of the situation. On that account, as I say, we are seeking an increasingly large amount from parliament for national defence. This year we have come before you for $425 million. I shall not say for a moment that with $425 million we can guarantee Canada, or any part of it, against attack. I shall not say that with $425 million we can replace all the deficiencies that may be found in western Europe; that is ridiculous. What we must do is see what part of our national income, of our national budget, of our national production, we can spend on defence, having regard to our appreciation of the international situation. Then having regard to that sum, but always having arrived at it with regard to the international situation, we must see how we can best spend it. During this discussion I have not heard very much criticism of the work of the members of the Royal Canadian Navy, or the army, or the air force, and they are people who are our defenders today.

It is possible, of course, to say that we should spend a little more in respect of the air force; a little more in respect of the navy; a little more in respect of the army, or the reserve, or the active forces, or cadets. But every cent more that is spent in one direction must be taken from somewhere else. You cannot use these dollars that are voted by parliament more than once. You can use them for personnel, for construction or for equipment. You can use them for the navy, army, or air force. You can use them for active or reserve forces, but you cannot use them right across the board. The point which I believe must be emphasized before this committee is that, on the information I have given today and having regard to comparisons that are available to us of the accomplishments of our navy and air force, and then from what we know of the army, the division seems to be as good as we can work out. I have not heard any suggestion that there is anything wrong with it. I have only heard suggestions that I should announce some change in consequence of some decision that has not yet been made. But I think that this committee will agree with my suggestion and also the people of Canada, judging from what I have seen of them—and I dare say I have travelled about the country on my job more than most other hon. members, meeting the people and trying to persuade them that what the defence forces need is their support and then explaining defence policy to the defence forces. What I have found everywhere is that the need is for appreciation, and that the defence forces are not only accepted but are respected to a degree that has never been attained before in our country's peacetime history.

Every now and then there is thrown out the suggestion that everything is fine with the defence forces but everything is wrong with the minister. I do not claim a bit of credit for anything that is good about the defence forces, and I think they are good; but I demand the right here or anywhere else to defend them, and I have done so from one end of the country to the other whenever the need has been apparent.

I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, to have taken up so much of the time of the committee, but I do not think I have taken up nearly as much as have some of the hon. members of the opposition who have made statements today. I should like to deal again with a matter I dealt with before; and always on these questions it is difficult to know how much one can go beyond the terms of the actual communiqué that we agreed to have announced. One of the things the leader of the opposition said was, "Let us know what is needed" and he said he was sure that the Canadian people would respond. I am finding that the Canadian people are responding quite well to the appeals that are made to them. But "Let us know what is needed", he said; and I ask, "Let us know what is needed, where, when, by whom, and with what?"

I would tell the leader of the opposition this, and here I think I have the precedent of General Bradley in the speech he made on April 14 to which I referred. The list of the requirements of the countries of the North Atlantic treaty far exceed their present available resources of personnel or equipment. That is so in almost every computation of military needs. I do not suggest for a second that we should not take the list of requirements as being serious. Of course they are. But when he says, "Let us know what is needed", I say that we can only answer that in terms of what we think we should contribute to the common pool of defence, and then also relate that to our own local defence needs; and relate for our own local defence just as small a portion as is possible for us to relate in that way. We want to have in Canada engaged in static defence as small a force as is regarded as being needed. But then we get into the question of equipment, personnel and what is needed for balanced forces; and that is one of the questions which are coming before the deputies who have not met yet—they have not been appointed yet—and before the other agencies of the North Atlantic treaty organization.

I must say that I am astonished at being accused steadily throughout the last few days of not disclosing something that has not been revealed or yet disclosed to me or to anyone else in the world yet. I am also surprised at being accused of saying that we are not taking care of the future, not thinking ahead and so on, when all of our defence planning, as far as I can see and as disclosed to hon. members, has been based on the principle of continuing examination to meet changing circumstances. Just because we seem to have done so well in anticipation as not to require any change in the immediate future does not mean that we will not require a change over the long term or over the intermediate term. As I said today, we shall be ready and glad to discuss with our partners in the North Atlantic treaty ways and means of pooling our resources so that we can make the best possible use of them. But that does not remove from us in Canada the responsibility of trying to work out what is the best pattern for our forces. I must say that during the last few days or in the previous defence debates I have not heard anything which has caused us to alter greatly the pattern that has been worked out since the war. I must also say that we have heard a good deal, particularly from the hon. member for Nanaimo, which has confirmed us in the course that we have been following; and I hope that we shall hear more in the future to the same effect. But let no one try to separate us one from another by any charge based on false premises. And let no one suggest for a second that this government or this department is not doing everything in its power to press forward the preparation of our defences within the means put at our disposal. In that I am sure we shall have the support of members from every part of the committee.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. Harkness: I am somewhat surprised at the speech the minister has just made, particularly the earlier part of it. On reading it over in the morning, I think he will find that it will not stand up well to critical examination.

An hon. Member: Who are the critics?

An hon. Member: General know-all!

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Harkness: I should just like to comment on a few things that he said. He started out his speech by saying that he has been ready to go on with his estimates ever since they were first introduced on March 17; and then he tried to give the impression that the reason he had not been able to go on with them was that the opposition had prevented him from doing so. Nothing could be more arrant nonsense than that. The government has the conduct of the business in its hands. It decides every day what will come up for debate the next day. If it had wanted to bring on the estimates of the Department of National Defence for the five days following March 17, except Saturdays and Sundays, it could have done so; and if it had wanted to bring them on at any time after that, it could have done so. The idea of trying to leave the impression that the opposition has prevented these estimates from being discussed for almost three months is, as I say, complete nonsense. The government could have brought them on at any time whatever, and they must take full responsibility for not having done so.

Mr. Ferrie: The hon. member has been talking all day and has not said anything.

Mr. Harkness: I have been interrupted by the hon. member for Mackenzie—

Mr. Cavers: Not only by the hon. member for Mackenzie.

Mr. Harkness: He has spent his time mumbling and grumbling—

Mr. Ferrie: Who would not, with you?

Mr. Harkness: —and shouting "carried" for the last several days. I happened to go to the performance of Hamlet which was held here on Wednesday night, and when the hon. member for Mackenzie started shouting and mumbling tonight it reminded me of Shakespeare in another play of his called King Lear—

Mr. Ferrie: Much ado about nothing.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): A midsummer-night's dream.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I can see that hon. members are in a very good mood. I am sure we all hope that this debate will be carried on in a very serious manner. Therefore I ask hon. members not to interrupt the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Harkness: I am in this difficulty; I could not hear the interruptions, there were too many at the one time. However, as I was saying, Shakespeare was the most versatile writer who has ever lived, I presume—

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Ferrie: That has nothing to do with the estimates.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think the hon. member for Calgary East should relate his remarks to the item now before the committee.

Mr. Harkness: I think I am, Mr. Chairman. I am relating them particularly to the interruptions. It will only take a moment. I am sure that the hon. member for Mackenzie is a great student of Shakespeare, and I would like to draw his attention particularly—

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Ferrie: Ditto, my friend from the west.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. All hon. members will admit that this is a very serious debate which we are now carrying on. I should think that the decorum and prestige of the house should be maintained. I have asked the hon. member for Calgary East to relate his remarks to the item under discussion. If he relates the little story of Shakespeare that he has before him—

Mr. Harkness: I hold in my hand—

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member should resume his seat. If he wants to relate his remarks to the interruptions which the Chairman has been trying to prevent, and which he is now trying to prevent, and will try to prevent until eleven o'clock, he will not be carrying out the Chairman's ruling. I should like the hon. member to relate his remarks to the item under discussion. The story he was about to tell has no relation whatsoever to the item under discussion.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I will just read these few lines—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I ask the hon. member to co-operate with the Chair in this instance. It is very difficult to keep order in the committee when hon. members do not want to co-operate. I would again ask the hon. member to relate his remarks to the item under discussion. I know that is what he will do.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, if any member wishes to read it it can be found in act 2, scene 2, line 71 of "King Lear" where Cornwall asks:

Why are you angry?

You know, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this house is degenerating when it has come to the point that one is not allowed to quote Shakespeare.

Mr. Adamson: Shakespeare is now out of order.

Mr. Harkness: Hon. members seem to quote everything else, but when you come to quote Shakespeare you are ruled out of order. I tried to do so.

Mr. Adamson: Shakespeare was not a Canadian.

Mr. Harkness: To come back to the remarks which the minister was making, he said that an effort had been made to show that Canada is doing less than she should. No such effort as that was made, Mr. Chairman. Nobody on this side of the house made any attempt of such a nature. What we have done is to have asked for information. And it is information which we think we are entitled to get. There is surely nothing in the matter of asking for information which should cause the Minister of National Defence to say that an effort was being made to show that Canada is doing less than she should. Nobody has suggested that; nobody has thought it.

Then the minister asked this question: Why have the opposition been asking these questions? Well, by that he meant the questions that we have asked about the possible change in defence planning, and so forth, because of the agreements made last month in London. The answer to that is very simple. We have been asking the questions because we want to know the answers. What other reason is there for asking certain questions? The minister was making a great point of it. We asked these questions naturally because we want to know, and we think it is our duty to know, what our defence policy is; whether there have been any changes in it as a result of these agreements which were made last month, and also how the defence policy is to be or is being implemented or carried out. That is why we have been asking these questions. There is nothing else we can do except ask them.

One reason that we have to ask them probably more often than we would like to ask them is that we do not get direct, straight answers to the questions. We have to keep asking and asking over and over again to get anything like the information that we want. In other words, we draw it out in bits and pieces. If we could get a complete and full answer the first time, then we would not have to repeat the question, and ask for another bit of information on something else.

Finally the minister said he had not heard any criticism of the navy, the army or the air force. Certainly he has not heard any criticism of them. Why should he hear any criticism of them from us? They are carrying out the duties assigned to them, and the policy which is adopted by this government. So far as we have been able to determine, they are carrying them out very well. But what we are criticizing, what we are asking questions about, is the policy. What is the policy? That is what we are trying to find out, particularly as to whether these forces have the strengths, the equipment and so forth to be able to carry out these policies properly or not. That is what we are asking for, and that is what we want. In many cases these are not the answers we have been getting.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Ferrie: Mr. Chairman, I have not said anything in this debate. I have sat around here for quite a long time listening to colonels. The minister and I happened to be in the first war and we were of the same rank and we are proud of it. I am proud of every Canadian boy in the army, the navy and the air force. I will not sit here and listen to any man say that we have got divisions here that could not go into a war tomorrow and lick anything that there is in the world today. There are 40 million people in Siberia and we have 14 million in Canada. I want to say right here and now that these gentlemen on my left ought to be ashamed of themselves when they try to get information out of the minister when, as colonels, they themselves know that they would not under any circumstances give anything that they thought would help an enemy, if they were in power.

In the first war the late Colonel Ralston said, "Boys, you are going up to the front line. Remember one thing: silence is golden, and the less they know"—

An hon. Member: What about putting it into practice?

Mr. Ferrie: You don't need to talk, buttercup. Silence, as I said before, is golden. I am going to say very little more. Maybe some of my friends to my left will listen to me when I say this: The heart of government is in Britain; the muscle of government is in the United States; the brains of government are in Canada today.

Mr. Drew: Well now, Mr. Chairman, let us all be perfectly clear about one thing, and that is that there is no one in this chamber who has been casting any reflections on Canadians in any of the armed forces—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: —and anyone who suggests that any member of this house did cast such a reflection is not worthy to sit in the House of Commons. Because I might point out that interest in the men of our armed forces is not the exclusive privilege of the hon. member for Mackenzie, or any other member in the House of Commons. There are members in the house who have as much reason for interest in and concern about those in the armed forces as any others who have spoken. I am prepared to attribute that interest to every member. I hope we will keep the discussion on the basis of the broad problem, and not try to divert the discussion to any such improper suggestions as those which were made.

When we are asked why any question should be raised—

Mr. Ferrie: On a question of privilege.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Ferrie: Did not the leader of the opposition say that there was not a force in Canada today that was trained well enough to meet the enemy?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, that merely indicates how necessary it is that things be repeated frequently, because if the hon. member had listened, or if he had been capable of remembering, he would have remembered that what was pointed out was that we were told that there was a brigade group with an approximate number of 4,000 men who would be in position to go into active service right away. When the minister was asked how soon these other reserve units could go into action, if necessary, his reply was simply that it could be done at some uncertain time.

Mr. Claxton: Various times.

Mr. Drew: At some varying times. "Varying times" is the very expression I used, and "varying times" is something that not one of us can define. Varying time is something that all of us should try to understand. I, for one, have tried to impress upon the minister the desirability of preparing a statement which would show a break-down. I do not believe for one moment that the minister is not fully aware of the kind of statement that would answer the request that has been made, and would greatly simplify this discussion.

I have stopped to point out that during the lifetime of many of us here we have seen events move through to the point where there are only two camps and where, if we succeed in our effort, we have brighter hopes of peace than ever before and, if we fail, there is nothing but disaster.

In so far as what we are discussing is concerned, I have merely suggested that we discuss it with a recognition of the seriousness of the problem. I am urging the minister to prepare such a statement. If he will not do it, then there is no alternative but to take these items one by one, go through them and get the information that could easily have been presented in a statement. That would have saved time—and the other way will take a very long time.

Now I shall ask my first question.

An hon. Member: Filibuster.

Mr. Drew: "Filibuster"—no; it is a subject about which we not only have the right but the duty to know something. That information could have been given to us in the form of facts, and perhaps disposed of in a very short time. However, since we have not got that I shall proceed to ask my questions.

My first question is this: How many officers, N.C.O.'s and other ranks are employed at headquarters at Ottawa?

An hon. Member: Carried.

Mr. Drew: No, it is not carried.

Mr. Claxton: I believe the answer to that question was given before. However, I am checking up.

Mr. Drew: Then, I shall put the next one: How many civilians are employed at headquarters in Ottawa?

Mr. Claxton: I think that was answered, too.

An hon. Member: Silly question No. 2.

Mr. Harkness: I do not think that was answered. I have a note down here in connection with it.

Mr. Drew: If it has been answered, then it would be very easy to give the information to me. We want it right up to date. I should like to ask that I be given answers to both the first and second questions.

Mr. Claxton: I will find out whether they have been answered. If they have not been answered we will be glad to get the figure for the leader of the opposition.

Mr. Fulton: How many civilian personnel were involved or employed in departmental administration in 1949-50, this year, and in the year 1948-49?

Mr. Pearkes: Perhaps it would simplify things if the minister would explain why there is an increase of something in the neighbourhood of $1,175,409 in the general administration item?

Mr. Claxton: I can give the hon. member the answer to that. It is almost entirely due to increased inspection services. A total of $758,433 of the increase is due to increased inspection services made necessary by increased purchases of defence equipment.

Mr. Pearkes: Where was that shown last year?

Mr. Claxton: Under the same item.

Mr. Fulton: How many extra personnel are performing the increased services?

Mr. Claxton: In the inspection branch?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Claxton: Eighty-nine people. In addition there is an increase in the amount of work let out by contract by the inspection services.

Mr. Pearkes: I am trying to be helpful and not critical, but in every other department you find a separate item for general administration while in the Department of National Defence everything is lumped in the one huge general item. It would be much easier if we could discuss under general administration the problems which we discuss under that item in other departments.

I noticed that other departments list under that general administration item the number of officials employed which I assume covers the administration of the several branches at Ottawa. But in the case of the Department of National Defence no such breakdown is given to us. Would it be asking too much to ask the minister to tell us what the ministers of other departments tell us, the number of officials employed in the various branches of the department and how much of this general administration item is for pay and allowances of officers and other ranks and personnel at national defence headquarters and in the several commands and divisions throughout the country? It is impossible from this one general statement to get any idea of what is covered by general administration in this particular department.

Mr. Claxton: I shall be glad to give that information. Departmental administration is $3,466,205, as shown on page 168 of the details. That is divided into three main heads: Departmental administration, $1,708,490; director of public relations, $100,485 and inspection services, $1,657,230. The details making up the item of $2,202,728, in respect to the employee figures, are as follows:

1 Deputy Minister	$ 12,000
2 Associate Deputy Minister—$10,000	20,000
1 Assistant Deputy Minister	6,600
1 Co-Ordinator of Works and Accommodation	6,900
1 Financial Adviser, National Defence	6,000

10 Principal Clerk (8—$3,060, 1—$2,910, 1—$2,820)	30,210
2 Packer and Helper—$1,920	3,840
7 Stenographer Grade 3 (3—$2,280, 1—$2,130, 1—$2,100, 1—$2,070, 1—$2,055)	15,195
1 Stenographer Grade 2B	2,040
2 Storeman Grade 1 (1—$2,055, 1—$1,965)	4,020
1 Secretary to Executive	2,760
1 Supervising Clerk	3,360
3 Typist Grade 2B—$2,040	6,120
2 Technician Grade 2 (1—$2,880, 1—$2,970)	5,850
1 Technician Grade 1	2,580
1 Watchman	1,920
1 Fitter-Machinist	2,160
1 Labourer	1,800
1 Private Secretary to Minister	5,000
1 Assistant Private Secretary to Minister	3,000
3 Departmental Accountant Grade 2 (1—$3,180, 2—$3,060)	9,300

Then there are 760 temporaries totalling $1,781,213.

Mr. Pearkes: I wonder if the minister would like to put the list of temporaries on the record rather than read them? He has had a hard day and it may save time.

Mr. Claxton: I have enjoyed this day.

Mr. Pearkes: I was only trying to save the time of the committee. In the long list that the minister has just read, did that include officers of the army, navy or air force, or are they all civilians?

Mr. Claxton: All civilians.

Mr. Pearkes: Is this amount of $3,466,205 all paid out to civilians?

Mr. Claxton: Oh, no, the total for salaries that I mentioned was $2,202,728. Those are civilian salaries and wages as shown on page 168 of the details.

Mr. Pearkes: Are any military personnel included in those?

Mr. Claxton: Not at all.

Mr. Pearkes: Then it is all paid to civilians?

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Pearkes: That is the point I asked a moment ago. Then in addition to the $3,466,000, which is for departmental administration, there are a certain number of officers of all three services employed at headquarters in Ottawa.

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Pearkes: Can you give me any idea what the pay and allowances of the total number of officers and other ranks employed at national defence headquarters would amount to?

Mr. Claxton: That figure changes from day to day, as the hon. member must appreciate. I can get the figure for him as of any date he mentions. It will take a little time but that can be obtained.

Mr. Fulton: The minister has just given us a list of the permanent civil employees at headquarters under the item of departmental administration. Therefore he must be able to give us the actual number of both permanent and temporary employees. He said 760 temporaries, but how many permanent?

Mr. Claxton: There are 115 permanents and 760 temporaries.

Mr. Adamson: Those figures just include national defence headquarters?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Adamson: Not for any of the commands?

Mr. Claxton: No.

Mr. Adamson: That includes national defence headquarters for the three services?

Mr. Claxton: This is departmental administration in respect of the whole department but not within each service.

Mr. Pearkes: You referred to the inspection service. Is it carried out entirely by civilians?

Mr. Claxton: No. We have attached to the inspection service a number of service personnel in order to secure the advantage of service experience and training, and also the reverse with regard to inspection. It is mostly civilian but at headquarters in Ottawa there are a limited number of rather senior service personnel.

Mr. Pearkes: Are their pay and allowances included in the amount you quoted for the inspection service?

Mr. Claxton: No, they are additional. They are paid out of the pay and allowances of the armed forces. As I understand it, they are attached, not seconded.

Mr. Pearkes: That would not include of course any inspection services dealing with the efficiency of personnel or the state of training of the various units?

Mr. Claxton: No.

Mr. Pearkes: They are purely an inspection service dealing with the inspection of equipment, buildings and that sort of thing.

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Pearkes: Does that include buildings which are under departmental—

Mr. Claxton: Perhaps they may have to do with some of the materials that go into the buildings that are constructed by the department itself, but that would be a very minor item. They have to do with equipment and supplies.

Mr. Pearkes: Do they inspect buildings which are being erected now for the department?

Mr. Claxton: No.

Mr. Pearkes: In the various headquarters?

Mr. Claxton: No. A very large part of the construction of defence quarters, particularly married quarters, is done by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and we do no part of the inspection of that. I would have to verify to see whether or not our inspection services have to do with the inspection of materials or work entering into such part of our construction program as we do ourselves. My impression would be that they do not but I can verify that. They have to do with the inspection of armament, equipment, motor vehicles, clothing and the like. As an offhand figure, I would suggest that they inspect certainly in excess of 50,000 or 60,000 contracts a year representing approximately $150 million.

Mr. Pearkes: Is that in addition to any inspection staff employed with the Canadian Commercial Corporation?

Mr. Claxton: No, the Canadian Commercial Corporation is a procurement agency for the Department of National Defence. We are the consumer and we provide the inspection services.

Mr. Pearkes: You provide the inspection services in that case?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Pearkes: And that also applies to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation?

Mr. Claxton: No, not to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. We do not provide any inspection service.

Mr. Pearkes: I am sorry for that because certain complaints have been made regarding the type of houses which have been constructed. I believe you had a communication only a short time ago from the city of Victoria making a complaint. We accept these houses without any inspection? There is no check at all by the department?

Mr. Claxton: The houses are not delivered to the Department of National Defence. In effect they are leased to members of the defence forces. It is quite true that it is not precisely the same as a civilian lease because they do not receive their allowances. In their place they receive a house. In effect the defence personnel occupying Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation houses are in the position of tenants. Of course we try to see that the houses are in good shape before they are delivered. We do everything possible towards that end but we are not responsible for the condition of the houses.

Mr. Pearkes: Do personnel have to live in them?

Mr. Claxton: There has been no difficulty about forcing personnel to live in the houses. There is a waiting list at every military establishment for such houses.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, on Monday we will take up the second reading of Bill No. 268, an act to amend the Foreign Insurance Companies Act, 1932; second reading of Bill No. 269, an act to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932. I understand these two bills will be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

Mr. Fulton: Where are they now?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): They received first reading by leave of the house just before six o'clock. We will then take up the resolution in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce concerning the Defence Supplies Act; Bill No. 89, an act to provide for the publication of statutory regulations. Then we will move to go into committee of supply and call one item of the Department of National Revenue, that item to stand. We will then take up the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, June 12, 1950

The house met at eleven o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

DR. FRANCIS SCOTT MACKENZIE—REFERENCE TO PHOTOGRAPH IN BRANTFORD "EXPOSITOR" OF JUNE 10

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West): On a question of personal privilege, Mr. Speaker, I have before me the Brantford Expositor of June 10, 1950, which has on the front page a photograph and under it an article, under the caption of the Canadian Press, dealing with Dr. Francis Scott MacKenzie, moderator of the seventy-sixth general assembly of the Presbyterian Church of Canada. In all fairness to Dr. MacKenzie, and not wishing to defame him at all, I think it should be clearly understood that the photograph is not that of Dr. MacKenzie but of myself.

WHEAT

REFERENCE TO REPORT IN WINNIPEG "FREE PRESS" OF JUNE 8

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): On a matter of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I have before me the Winnipeg Free Press of Thursday, June 8, in which there is an article headed: "The wheat agreement—Mr. Howe's explanations"; and the last paragraph of that article, in the third column, reads as follows:

> It is a matter of record in and out of parliament that the Conservative and C.C.F. parties were just as blind as the Liberal party to the weakness of the wheat agreement. Both the Conservative and C.C.F. parties have voted for this agreement on every occasion when it has been put to the test. . . .

That is not true, Mr. Speaker. The United Kingdom-Canada wheat agreement as such has never been voted on in this House of Commons. The agreement was sanctioned by order in council, under extension of the War Measures Act, in July, 1946. As reported at page 4833 of Hansard of August 15, 1946, I said, with respect to the present Canadian-British wheat agreement: "I am absolutely opposed to it." I stated my reasons, and quoted a portion of the Winnipeg Free Press editorial of August 1, 1946. I trust that the Free Press will make the proper correction or explanation.

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES DISCHARGED OR RELEASED—RESTORATION TO ORDER PAPER OF QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): On June 5, a week ago today—Hansard, page 3172—in my absence in western Canada, a question which stood on the order paper in the name of the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) was by inadvertence passed as an order for return. The question read as follows:

> 1. In each department or branch of government or board or corporation set up by the government, how many employees, if any, have been discharged or been in any way released for reasons having to do with security?
> 2. What was the effective date in each such case?
> 3. What were the position and duties of each such employee at the time of his discharge or release?

I discussed this matter earlier this morning with the hon. member. On the basis of that discussion I should like to move that the order for return be rescinded and that the question be restored to the order paper, and I shall answer it later when the questions on the order paper are dealt with.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I understand that the minister is making a motion that my question be restored to the order paper. In the light of the earlier discussion, may I say a word? I should like to confirm what the minister has said, that I have no objection to the course he suggests being followed, on the understanding that the question will be answered today.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

C.G.S. "ALBERNI"

Mr. MacInnis:

1. Is the C.G.S. Alberni, Department of Transport lighthouse tender, operating on the Pacific coast?

[Mr. Fulton.]

2. Did this vessel while on duty in Queen Charlotte sound in June, 1949, spring a leak or get into some other marine difficulty with danger of sinking?

3. Is this vessel equipped with a radio transmitter?

4. If so, did the radio equipment on this vessel go out of operation shortly after the first distress signal was sent out?

5. Does the C.G.S. Alberni carry an emergency dynamo?

6. If so, was this dynamo in working condition when the vessel got into difficulties?

7. Is the emergency equipment kept in working condition constantly?

8. How many of a crew does the C.G.S. Alberni carry?

Mr. Chevrier:

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. Yes.

4. No. The main transmitter was rendered inoperative owing to the temporary shutting down of the ship's generator. The radiotelephone transmitter operating from batteries was serviceable and was used to communicate particulars of the casualty until the ship's electrical supply was re-established, after which both radiotelegraph and radiotelephone facilities were available.

5. No. The C.G.S. Alberni carries two working dynamos. Emergency communications are taken care of by battery.

6. See answer to No. 5.

7. Yes.

8. Twenty-eight.

WOODSTOCK, N.B., POST OFFICE BUILDING—D. R. BISHOP

Mr. Knowles:

1. Did Mr. T. S. Hunter, district architect of the Department of Public Works, recently (between May 1 and May 18, 1950) visit Woodstock, New Brunswick, for the purpose of investigating possible sites for a new post office building in the town of Woodstock?

2. Did Mr. Hunter confer with Mr. D. R. Bishop?

3. If so, did such conference relate to the possible site for a new post office building in Woodstock?

4. Who is Mr. D. R. Bishop and what official position, if any, does he hold in relation to federal government matters?

5. Has Mr. D. R. Bishop been a candidate in any federal election campaign for the electoral district of Victoria-Carleton? If so, for what party?

6. Does he have anything to do with federal government patronage in or for the electoral district of Victoria-Carleton?

7. If so, is the patronage he handles restricted to matters relating to the Post Office Department and the selecting of sites for post office and customs buildings, etc., or does he handle patronage for other federal government departments, and if so what departments?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. Yes.

4, 5, 6 and 7. Not known.

BONAVENTURE, QUE., BREAKWATER

Mr. Courtemanche:

1. Was any work done by the Department of Public Works in the construction of a breakwater in Bonaventure parish, county of Bonaventure, Quebec, during December and January last?

2. If so, what was the cost of same?

3. What is the name of the foreman?

4. What salary did he receive?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. No.

2, 3 and 4. See answer to No. 1.

DOMINION STEEL AND COAL CORPORATION—MACHINE SHOP AT GLACE BAY, N. S.

Mr. Gillis:

1. Was government assistance given the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation for the purpose of expanding the machine shop of that corporation at Glace Bay, Nova Scotia?

2. If so, in what amount?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. No.

2. Not applicable.

VETERANS AFFAIRS BUILDING, OTTAWA

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood):

With regard to the demolition and general excavation work for the east office building for the Department of Veterans Affairs, Wellington street, Ottawa, bids received May 11, 1949:

1. To whom was the contract awarded, and what was the amount of the tender?

2. (a) How much has been paid to the successful tenderer; (b) how much, if any, still remains to be paid?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. Taggart Construction Limited, 588 Sussex street, Ottawa, $159,000. 2. (a) $164,940.09; (b) nil.

OMEMEE AND OAKWOOD, ONT., POST OFFICES

Mr. Hodgson:

What was the revenue of the post office (a) at Omemee, Ontario; (b) at Oakwood, Ontario, during each of the years 1948 and 1949?

Mr. Rinfret: (a) 1948, $3,365.08; 1949, $3,522.20.

(b) 1948, $2,261.08; 1949, $2,199.40.

GANDER, NFLD., AIRPORT

Mr: Higgins:

1. Have arrangements been made to increase the length of the runways at Gander airport?

2. If so, when will the work be started?

Mr. Chevrier:

1. No.

2. See answer to No. 1.

DOMINION STEEL AND COAL CORPORATION—BORROWINGS FROM FEDERAL GOVERNMENT—PLANS FOR EXPANSION

Mr. Gillis:

1. Did the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation borrow money under the provisions of Bill No. 217, an act to assist the producers of coal in the Atlantic maritime provinces in the year 1949 and to date in 1950?

2. If so, what amount and for what purpose?

3. What steps are taken by the government to see that the purpose for which the money was borrowed is carried out?

4. Has the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation submitted any plans to the government or the dominion coal board for the purpose of (a) expanding the steel industry; (b) expanding the coal industry?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. No.

2. See answer to No. 1.

3. See answer to No. 1.

4. (a) No; (b) Yes; the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation did submit plans to the dominion coal board with respect to the mechanization of its mines in connection with their application for a substantial loan, the negotiation of which has not yet been completed.

MANITOBA FLOODS—HOUSES OWNED AND SOLD BY CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING

Mr. Bryce:

1. How many houses does the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation own in the flooded areas of Manitoba?

2. How many houses have been sold by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in the flooded areas of Manitoba and (a) are fully paid for; (b) have a balance still owing?

1. 631.

2. (a) Nil; (b) 28.

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT—SCREENING OF EMPLOYEES—PERSONNEL DISCHARGED OR RELEASED

Mr. Fulton:

1. In each department or branch of government or board or corporation set up by the government, how many employees, if any, have been discharged or been in any way released for reasons having to do with security?

2. What was the effective date in each such case?

3. What were the position and duties of each such employee at the time of his discharge or release?

Mr. Garson: I think I should answer now this question of the hon. member for Kamloops, which had earlier been passed as an order for return but has now been restored to the order paper. The hon. member's question should be considered in relation to two other sets of questions standing in his name on today's order paper as Nos. 9 and 10, as follows:

1. In each department or branch of government or board or corporation set up by the government, on what date respectively was any security screening first completed?
2. Are there any such departments, branches, boards or corporations where no such screening has taken place? If so, what were the reasons?
1. What were the positions in the national research council held at the time of their discharge by the two employees who were discharged for security reasons in March of 1946?
2. What was the nature of their respective duties in these positions?

These questions all have to do with what has been referred to as screening of civil service personnel for security reasons, and I think it is desirable that I should answer them orally, all at the same time, in the following terms:

Those who serve the state should be loyal to the state. The loyalty of civil servants is expected by the government of Canada as a routine condition precedent to their employment. The responsibility for ensuring that civil service employees are loyal rests upon the head of each department or agency, usually the deputy minister. It also rests in part upon the civil service commission. The departmental head and the civil service commission is each expected to take such steps as may be considered necessary to make sure that this responsibility is properly discharged.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): All of them.

Mr. Garson: To this end a minister or deputy minister, where he considers it necessary, may refer to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for a report on any civil servant doing work in connection with which it is necessary that there should be no doubt whatever as to the civil servant's loyalty. When the names of such civil servants are referred to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, a check is made and the information thereby secured is reported back to the deputy head of the department concerned. In this report the mounted police do not in any case express any opinion as to whether a given civil servant should be retained in employment, or should be discharged. They provide merely a factual report concerning the civil servant reported upon; and it is the head of the department who decides whether, upon the basis of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police report or otherwise, the civil servant in question should be retained in employment or discharged.

The standard by which the loyalty of a given civil servant is judged depends in an important measure upon the degree of trustworthiness which is required in the work which he is doing. In some cases entire departments have been designated by the cabinet as vulnerable departments which require from the civil servants operating them a special degree of trustworthiness. In other cases sections or branches of departments dealing with secret matters have been declared as vulnerable. In still other cases, departments or branches of departments which had not been dealing with secret work previously are declared vulnerable upon being given secret work to do.

The civil servants employed in vulnerable branches or departments must have such a high degree of trustworthiness as to be beyond any doubt whatever. The government cannot wait for actual cases of espionage or sabotage or other offences to take place; the government cannot safely employ or continue to employ in secret or unusually confidential work persons about whose trustworthiness there is any doubt whatever. Thus, in considering the report from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and data from other sources, the head of a vulnerable department must resolve all doubts, even the slightest, in favour of the government. He should therefore refuse to continue in employment to do secret or confidential work any person concerning whom doubt exists.

This being so, it would be most unfair to the civil servant whose trustworthiness is perhaps no more than in some slight doubt that in addition to refusing to continue his employment, the government should, without proof, brand him as an untrustworthy person. The government considers that it would be quite unwarranted in taking any overt action which would injure such person's reputation or interfere with his chances of alternative employment in positions not of the same secret and confidential character.

The two employees of the national research council—and I am referring now to question No. 10 on today's order paper—who were discharged for security reasons in March of 1946, were two who, having been mentioned in the report of the royal commission on espionage, had been convicted of offences under the Official Secrets Act. Therefore the government had no objection to disclosing information concerning them in reply to a question by the hon. member for Kamloops on May 22, 1950, and will answer in due course the question No. 10 on today's order paper, in the name of the hon. member for Kamloops.

In connection, however, with each of the other civil servants who have been released for security reasons, the government feels it would be unjust to disclose the information sought by the hon. member's question with regard to the date of discharge and the position and duties of such civil servants at the time of their release. Such information would in almost all cases disclose their identity.

It will be seen, moreover, from the foregoing that the security responsibilities of the departmental head and of the civil service commission are such that the checking or screening of all government employees in the Canadian civil service, with or without the assistance of factual reports from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, is a process which never ends and which, therefore, is never complete as of any certain date.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I realize that answers to questions are not debatable, but perhaps Your Honour will permit me to make two or three observations to indicate my point of view.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think it is improper at this time to debate the answer to a question. The hon. member may have an opportunity later.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to ask the minister two questions. First, does he not feel it would be possible to give some factual information as to the number of persons affected, without disclosing their positions? Second, will he give a full opportunity to discuss this matter, despite the fact that other departments are involved, when the estimates of his department are under consideration?

Mr. Garson: It goes without saying that even if I were disposed to do so, there is no way in which I could refuse to discuss this matter when the estimates of the Department of Justice are being considered. However, I have no desire not to discuss it; on the contrary we shall be delighted to do so.

With regard to the second question, I would prefer not to answer a hypothetical question of that kind. What we have done this morning is to answer a question on the order paper. If my hon. friend has any further questions, and will put them on the order paper, we shall endeavour to answer them as they come.

Mr. Fulton: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I would point out that my question has not been answered, because it contains a separate part asking information merely as to the number that might have been released, quite distinct from the part touching upon the positions they held. I am asking whether the minister could not give that information in reply to the question on the order paper.

Mr. Coldwell: In view of the statement made by the minister, and the fact that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police make a report to the officials, has consideration been given to allowing accused persons the right to appeal to some committee which would review each case?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that is scarcely a supplementary question. Perhaps the hon. member would withhold it until the minister's estimates are being considered.

Mr. Coldwell: I have no objection to that.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I should like to make one or two observations on a question of privilege. It is pretty nearly time in this most highly civilized country that the significance of the remarks of the Minister of Justice should penetrate into the minds of the Canadian people. Nowhere else in civilization is there an opportunity to live as we live. I am asking the House of Commons this day to respect and honour the observations of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. McIlraith: Supplementing the answer given by the Minister of Justice, I should like to give the answer to question No. 10, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Fulton:

1. What were the positions in the national research council held at the time of their discharge by the two employees who were discharged for security reasons in March of 1946?

2. What was the nature of their respective duties in these positions?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. Junior research engineer and assistant research engineer respectively, in the electrical engineering and radio branch.

2. Both worked under supervision on the development of radar equipment.

Mr. Fulton: On a question of privilege, may I point out that I have already drawn the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact that certain factual information is not contained in the general terms of his reply, and, as that information has not been given, I suggest, with respect, that the questions have not been answered.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The questions may not have been answered to the satisfaction of the hon. member for Kamloops, but I must declare that they have been answered.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

DIVERSION OF WATERS OF MISSOURI RIVER NEAR KANSAS CITY

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has any department of the government any reports or detailed information with reference to the construction and maintenance of the by-pass which was built to carry part of the waters of the Missouri river around Kansas City?

2. If so, what department has the same, and what are the titles of any such reports or documents?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY—BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Goode:

For a copy of all letters, correspondence, maps and other documents from January 1, 1949, to date, exchanged between the dominion government and the province of British Columbia, dealing with the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Prudham: On behalf of the Minister of Resources and Development I should like to say that there is no objection to producing the maps, letters and correspondence asked for, when approval has been received from the province of British Columbia.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion subject to the remarks of the parliamentary assistant?

Motion agreed to.

WARTIME LEASEHOLD REGULATIONS—MRS. BESSIE ELLIS-REID

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of the record of the conviction and evidence taken at the trial of Mrs. Bessie Ellis-Reid of Ottawa on two charges laid under the provisions of the wartime leasehold regulations and prosecuted by the enforcement branch of the wartime prices and trade board under complaint dated 29th of March, 1950.

Mr. Abbott: There is no objection to this order passing, but I am informed that by agreement between the parties no written evidence was taken in this case. However, the order can pass for the rest of it.

The hon. member asked for the costs in the two cases referred to. In one case the costs were $36.20, and in the other, $39.10, a total of $75.30.

Mr. Speaker: Carried.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

SLIDE DETECTOR FENCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport when I may expect a reply to a question standing in my name which has been on the order paper since May 16, and which asks merely for factual information which I presume would be readily available. I certainly would appreciate it if the minister could expedite the answer.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): All questions that have to do with Canadian National Railways must of necessity be referred to them. I must inform the hon. gentleman that notwithstanding certain representations which I have made that answers be not unduly delayed, I have not yet the answers. I shall ask them to hurry the matter.

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): On June 7, as reported on page 3305 of Hansard, I asked the following question:

In the absence of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister if the government has yet reached a decision with reference to the suggested introduction of an amendment at this session to the Official Secrets Act.

To this the Acting Prime Minister replied:

I am unable to answer that question. I will make inquiries and answer it tomorrow.

I wonder if the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice can answer that question now?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I may inform my hon. friend that a draft bill is in the possession of my deputy for consideration by him and by myself at the first opportunity. It will then go before the cabinet and, if approved, will be introduced in due course.

BACON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Charlton (Brant-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last I asked two questions of the Minister of Agriculture, and in view of his absence on that day I suggested that they be taken as notice to be answered as soon as possible. Is the minister going to answer those questions today?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The first question asked by the hon. gentleman was this:

Has any decision been made with reference to the continuation of the price support program for bacon after July 1, 1950?

The second question was:

How much bacon has been purchased to date by the board for the purpose of filling the requirements of the Anglo-Canadian bacon agreement?

With regard to the first question, may I say that I have read the statement which was issued on January 3 and I am not at all certain that any further announcement is necessary. I am having the matter looked into, and if a further announcement is necessary it will be made.

With regard to the second question, the figure as to marketings of hogs from January 1 to June 3, 1949, was 1,785,003, and for 1950, 2,196,081. Shipments of bacon on contract for 1949 were 16,906,075 pounds, and for 1950, 12,625,944 pounds. It will be noticed that the marketings are higher in 1950 and the shipments to Great Britain are lower.

Mr. Charlton: On a question of privilege, I did not ask for the 1949 figure. I asked for the 1950 figure, and my question of privilege is this: On June 9 of this year there was an article in the newspapers saying that the support of bacon price may continue after July, and that that information had been given out on that day by an informed official.

Mr. Gardiner: I see these articles in the press from time to time about what informed officials have said, but I have not been able yet to find the well informed official who gave that statement.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

SOUTHERN MANITOBA—REMEDIAL MEASURES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the Prime Minister to give consideration to a question of mine which is No. 25 on today's order paper, and which refers simply to a communication from the council of the city of Winnipeg with respect to the flood situation. I hope it can be answered soon. The question was placed on the order paper on June 2. On that day I had thought of asking it on the orders of the day, but I put it on the order paper so that it might be looked into more carefully. It has been there now for ten days. I should like to have an answer as soon as possible.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I shall seek from the proper quarters the information asked for in the question, and endeavour to have an answer given soon.

IRON ORE

INQUIRY AS TO SALES FROM NEWFOUNDLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he is in position to make a statement with respect to the sale of iron ore from Newfoundland.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): No, sir.

FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 268, to amend the Foreign Insurance Companies Act, 1932.

He said: As the house is already aware, this bill and the companion bill to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act were passed in the other place. Since the original insurance acts were passed in 1868 they have necessarily had to be revised from time to time, and the last substantial revision was in 1932. While there have been certain amendments made since that time, the acts have stood substantially unchanged.

Several desirable amendments have been accumulating for a good many years, including especially a revision of the investment provisions in order to bring them up to date. The purpose of this bill, and of the companion bill, is to bring the acts into closer conformity with current conditions and to remove certain anomalies in the treatment of Canadian companies as compared with the treatment of British and foreign companies.

The bills were prepared in collaboration with the superintendent of insurance, and it would be my intention after second reading is approved to have them referred to the banking and commerce committee in order that the clauses may be given detailed consideration and the superintendent of insurance may be available to explain the different provisions. I think I should say that there are no amendments of great moment; none that will arouse any particular controversy.

The investment provisions have been amended to bring these acts, as I have said, into line with modern conditions. I do not know that I need to go into the changes in detail. They include such things as authorizing investment in equipment trust certificates, which have become a common vehicle for railway financing. Provision is also made for investment in revenue producing real estate which is subject to lease—in other words, the lease option agreements with which hon. members of the house are familiar, and which have become extremely popular in recent years, both here and in the United States. Since it is a relatively new departure under the Insurance Act, the amount which can be invested under that category is limited to five per cent.

Then there are some changes in connection with the qualifications for investment in common shares. The criterion at present is that investment may be made, within the limitation provided under the act, in the common shares of any corporation that has in each of the seven years preceding the date of investment paid dividends of at least four per cent of the par value, or $4 per share if the shares have no par value. It is proposed that in place of the $4 test for shares of no par value, the dividends in each of the seven years must have been equal to at least four per cent of the average value at which the shares were carried in the capital stock account of the corporation. That is an illustration of the type of change provided to bring the legislation in line with modern conditions.

The other important change in connection with the investment provisions is that what is known as the amortization principle will be allowed in connection with the bonds of the dominion, any province of Canada, the United Kingdom, or the United States of America. At the present time, as the house is aware, all insurance companies registered under the act are required to take their securities into account at market values in the annual statement deposited with the department. In practice, however, Canadian companies have been taking them into account at the market values or book values, whichever was lower, and since this is a conservative practice it has been encouraged. It is now proposed that life insurance companies be permitted to carry securities issued by the government of Canada or of any province of Canada, or of the United States or the United Kingdom, at values not exceeding the "amortized" values, that is, values calculated mathematically having regard to the purchase price, the actual interest payments, the date of maturity, and the amount to be received at maturity. I think that basis is used in almost all of the states of the United States.

Then there are other provisions, such as a clause which would permit a company to reduce the par value of the shares below $100 if desired. The house will recall that in the last revision of the Bank Act an amendment was introduced permitting the shares of banks to be reduced to not less than $10. There will be a similar provision in the insurance companies act.

There are a number of other provisions of perhaps no general significance. They are technical in some cases, although important for the efficient administration of these companies.

As I say, the bill will be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce, and in that committee detailed consideration can be given to the provisions to which I have referred.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I only want to say that I welcome the minister's suggestion to send the bill to the banking and commerce committee. It seems to me we have there the double advantage of the presence of officials of the department and representatives of the insurance business.

I think the minister has given an adequate résumé of the reasons for the changes. It is to some extent a tidying up and consolidating process. There is perhaps one comment which might be made. I think one of the reasons for the changes, which are comparatively minor, is that our own companies found that United States companies were coming in here and were able to carry on business and to do certain things, which I am sure will carry the approval of the committee and of the house, which in fact it was not possible for our own companies to do.

I do not think it is necessary to say more. I welcome the statement that the bill is to be sent to the standing committee on banking and commerce. As the house is aware, it has already been before the other place, and I understand the work of the department was so satisfactory that the amendments made there were trifling in degree.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

CANADIAN AND BRITISH INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENTS TO CHAPTER 46, STATUTES OF 1932

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 269, to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932.

He said: As I indicated, this is a companion bill to the one we have just dealt with. Our insurance law is in two parts.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

DEFENCE SUPPLIES

PROVISION FOR PURCHASE OR ACQUISITION, STORING OF MATERIALS, ETC.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill, cited as the Defence Supplies Act, to empower the Minister of Trade and Commerce to buy or otherwise acquire and deal with defence supplies; construct or otherwise acquire, projects; acquire, store and otherwise deal with material entering into the manufacture of defence supplies or the development, repair or maintenance of projects; arrange for the performance of commercial and professional services; require priority in delivery or construction and to require persons who have received offers, fair and reasonable in his opinion, for supplies, projects or services to meet the requirements subject to an appeal to the exchequer court on the question of price; also to empower the minister to buy or otherwise acquire defence supplies and construct or carry out projects required by the Department of National Defence; also to empower the governor in council to appoint assistants to the minister and advisers and advisory boards and to fix their remuneration and expenses; with provision also for the approval by the governor in council of contracts except in emergent cases and where the sum involved does not exceed a certain specified amount.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the defence supplies bill to be based on this resolution will make new provision for the procurement of munitions and defence supplies. At present provision for procurement is made in the Department of Munitions and Supply Act, 1939, as amended to date. The existing statute was drafted at the outbreak of war, and revised in the light of experience and to meet changing war conditions. It well served its purpose, both during the war and after. It was, however, designed primarily to deal with a state of war and with the aftermath of war. We consider that the time is fitting to replace it with legislation which will be more closely suited to the conditions of the day.

Clearly this is no time to take any action that would hamper the defence of the country; for we are not free from the threat of aggression. Indeed we must devote much of our energies and our resources to deterring aggression. We must strengthen ourselves so we may be able to resist the aggressor and overcome him if we fail to deter him. Hence we have endeavoured to frame the legislation so that we shall not lessen our ability to provide for the needs of defence. We have aimed at retaining such powers, and no others, as will under present conditions safeguard the interests of defence in the field of procurement of supplies.

The bill grants the minister the general authority to procure defence supplies, to stockpile strategic materials, to construct defence projects, and to let contracts for shipbuilding and ship repairing for government departments. We consider that it is highly desirable to continue to vest in the minister the procurement authority for the requirements of the armed services. Our experience has shown that the method which we have adopted of centralizing defence purchasing in civilian hands is efficient and economical.

During the war we developed in the department of munitions and supply one of the best methods of procurement of any of the allied nations. We built up an extremely efficient civilian purchasing agency for the services. Many of the key personnel involved in these activities during the war carried on as employees of the Canadian Commercial Corporation, and we have been able to secure in peacetime much of the efficiency, economy of effort and concentration of purpose that we secured during the war. In the last fiscal year, the Canadian Commercial Corporation made purchases of over $200 million for the services, at a cost of less than one-half of one per cent.

The minister is also given the powers which may be necessary to enable defence contracts to be completed. I well realize how greatly we can rely on our own people and how little we need rely on mandatory powers. I have had a good deal to do in the past years with the industrial aspects of war and defence. Some of those years have been bitter and trying, but throughout them all we have been heartened by the ready co-operation that every section of Canada and every sector of Canadian life have given to the tasks that faced us. Nevertheless, even with the best good will and co-operation on all sides, circumstances may still arise where some mandatory powers are needed. A supplier may be unable to meet an essential defence need because of prior commitments at home or abroad. A contractor may be unable to make delivery, on schedule, of defence supplies because of conflicting requirements, domestic or foreign. Hence the bill grants the minister power to obtain a priority for defence contracts over other contracts, and power to ensure the delivery of materials essential to the production of defence supplies and to the completion of defence projects.

Before the minister enters into a contract, the approval of the governor in council must be obtained, except:

(a) where in the minister's opinion the contract must be executed immediately in the interests of defence;

(b) where the estimated expenditure does not exceed $15,000;

(c) where the estimated expenditure does not exceed $50,000 in cases where competitive tenders have been obtained and the lowest tender accepted.

The minister, however, shall report to the governor in council contracts involving more than $5,000 which have been entered into without the latter's approval.

The minister is granted authority to enter into contracts without calling for tenders as required under section 36 of the Public Works Act in four cases:

(1) Where the disclosure of the specifications would, in the opinion of the minister or of the Minister of National Defence, be prejudicial to the interests of defence.

(2) Where the supplies are to be acquired from, or the project executed by, a crown company. This provision is intended to extend to crown companies an exception already contained in the Public Works Act for works to be executed by government employees.

(3) Where the contract covers ships or ship repairs.

I shall deal for a moment with the special provisions relating to ships. The bill gives the minister authority to place contracts for shipbuilding and repairs to meet the requirements of the Department of National Defence and of other government departments. He is authorized to let such contracts to any shipyard specified by the governor in council. The purpose of these provisions for allocation is to ensure the continuance of shipbuilding facilities in Canada adequate to the needs of defence. In the last war tremendous demands were made on Canadian shipyards, and they met their task magnificently. If there should be another war, we can be sure that they would be again called upon to make a great contribution. Although we have undertaken what is an extensive shipbuilding program for defence, it does not utilize the full capacities of our yards. We consider it is therefore desirable that such shipbuilding as we are undertaking be allocated with the object of sustaining in Canada a nucleus of facilities strategically located. The bulk of such contracts would be placed to meet the requirements of the Department of National Defence.

There is in addition a comparatively small amount of shipbuilding for other departments, such as the Department of Public Works and the Department of Transport. It is considered practical that the minister be given authority to place such contracts so that the full benefit of allocation may be obtained. We intend to consult the Canadian maritime commission and to obtain the advice of the commission as to the yards in which contracts should be placed to best further our general objective.

The fourth case in which the provisions of the Public Works Act would not apply is when in the opinion of the governor in council the contracts should in the public interest be exempt from that act. This provision is designed to meet the situation that can arise in our defence works in remote areas. A contract is let to a contractor for works in the north. While he is at work new factors may enter into our defence planning. As a result we may find we need more buildings than we contracted for. The practical course is to come to terms with the contractor already at work and on location. Or again we may need to place a contract for a project which calls for very highly specialized technical knowledge where we have no choice of contractors. We would be able to cover these cases under this provision after the approval of the governor in council had been obtained.

Hon. members may be interested in a brief comparison between some of the main features of the bill and of the existing authority, the Department of Munitions and Supply Act.

The proposed bill relates to the same defence field as the present act; the definition of defence supplies is what is defined in the present act as "munitions of war" and "supplies". "Project" has the same meaning in the bill as in the act.

The provision which gives the minister the exclusive authority to procure for the Department of National Defence corresponds with the provisions in the present act.

The minister's powers respecting production and the delivery of supplies are a curtailment of his powers in the act. The power to compel manufacture of supplies or the construction of projects has been removed.

The bill does not grant the minister the authority to mobilize, control, and regulate any branch of trade or industry; or to issue orders, permits and licences; or the authority to do such things as the minister deems incidental to or expedient for the exercise of any of his powers.

The provision has been dropped which permitted the minister to exercise his powers without restriction or limitation by any other legislation. In the proposed bill the specific cases in which it is intended existing legislation should not restrict or limit him are set out.

The mandatory powers—that is, those dealing with priority and with delivery of supplies—are a considerable curtailment of the present powers in the act. The priority authority is effective only in respect of persons who actually contract to deliver defence supplies or to construct projects, and the powers relating to the delivery of supplies are effective only in respect of persons in the business of dealing in materials used for defence supplies or projects. There is a difference, too, in the terms and conditions. Under the present act the minister may specify such terms and conditions as he deems to be fair and reasonable, whereas in the bill delivery is to be at current market prices, which in case of dispute may be determined by the exchequer court.

Unlike the present act the bill does not authorize the minister to ascertain fair and reasonable cost and profit and to direct repayment of excess profit.

The bill also calls for the repeal of the Defence Purchases Act. In wartime we had to set up in great haste to produce munitions and supplies which had never been made before in Canada. There was no fair way of determining in advance what the cost should be, and no time to negotiate. Legislation was enacted to control profits and to provide for the renegotiation of contracts. We then got on with the job, placed contracts and settled the financial outcome later, invoking where necessary the legislative authority. A few of the old contracts are still under examination, or are the subject of pending litigation. There is provision in the bill that in these cases the effect of the present act is preserved.

We consider that in the peacetime conditions of today the control which the government, as a purchaser, exercises over a contractor's profit should be the control which a buyer can exercise in the course of the negotiation and execution of a contract. On this subject I would underline that the proposed bill is designed to meet today's conditions. Emergency conditions would call for new legislation and for an approach to this and other questions in keeping with emergency conditions. As part of our general planning we have draft legislation in readiness for an emergency.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this resolution raises a question which goes far beyond the mere carrying forward of the legislation which has been referred to by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). While it is, according to his statement, similar to the legislation known as the Department of Munitions and Supply Act, there are certain variations and certain curtailments which would appear to limit the mandatory authority of the minister in this case. It will not of course be possible to examine these details until the bill is before the house. Nevertheless in this resolution itself, there is sufficient before us now to enable us to consider the principle involved in declaring that it is expedient that such new legislation be introduced as has been described this morning by the minister.

On several occasions during the past year and a half—and I mention a year and a half because that period embraces the three times that the house has met—we have been informed that the procurement agency for the Department of National Defence is the Canadian Commercial Corporation. This does more, therefore, than merely give to the minister in peacetime powers similar to in many respects but less in others than those contained in the wartime Department of Munitions and Supply Act.

One of the questions which immediately arises is this. If the purchasing is to be taken from the Canadian Commercial Corporation, and if that device is not to be employed, why should this function be under the Minister of Trade and Commerce? Why should it not be under the Minister of National Defence himself in peacetime? We are not now talking so much about the individuals concerned as about the principle involved. Except in relation to matters that would normally come under such a broad and embracing department as the Department of Public Works, it has been the general practice for departments to deal with their own requirements. I think that this house should have a great deal more information before it approves in principle the declaration that it is expedient that there be introduced legislation with the wide powers contemplated in this resolution.

I think it is important to indicate the scope and effect of the resolution in peacetime. The resolution reads:

> That it is expedient to present a bill, cited as the Defence Supplies Act, to empower the Minister of Trade and Commerce to buy or otherwise acquire and deal with defence supplies; construct or otherwise acquire, projects; acquire, store and otherwise deal with material entering into the manufacture of defence supplies or the development, repair or maintenance of projects; arrange for the performance of commercial and professional services; require priority in delivery or construction and to require persons who have received offers, fair and reasonable in his opinion, for supplies, projects or services, to meet the requirements subject to an appeal to the exchequer court on the question of price; also to empower the minister to buy or otherwise acquire defence supplies and construct or carry out projects required by the Department of National Defence; also to empower the governor in council to appoint assistants to the minister and advisers and advisory boards and to fix their remuneration and expenses; with provision also for the approval by the governor in council of contracts except in emergent cases and where the sum involved does not exceed a certain specified amount.

If the wording of this resolution is to be interpreted in legislation, then without waiting for the bill we are being called upon to declare that it is expedient to turn over to the Minister of Trade and Commerce functions of parliament itself and transactions which will not be subject to the ordinary protection and restraints which over many years have been regarded as important for the protection both of government itself and of the use of the people's money.

There is the provision that the contracts are not to be subject to the requirement of calling for tenders in certain specified cases, four in number. The first of these is when the details are such that the disclosure of them would be regarded as contrary to the public interest. We have seen a great many surprising demonstrations of what is regarded as contrary to the public interest. Hon. members of this house—I am basing this statement on what I have read in Hansard and elsewhere—were obviously reluctant to examine too strictly procedures which, as they stated from time to time, would not be acceptable in peacetime but which in the dreadful emergency of war they were prepared to approve with some concern and with some reservations.

The second specified case is that of this crown corporation which by its authority can deal in activities of this kind; the third is where the contract affects ship repairs and the preparation for the construction of ships; and the fourth, cases in which the government decides that it is contrary to the public interest that there should be any disclosure even of the existence of such a contract because of the danger of conveying to possible enemies knowledge of steps that were being taken; and also certain other cases illustrated by the minister in his remarks.

These are wide exceptions—so wide, in fact, that they would make it possible for the minister to deal in almost any case with projects of this kind without tenders being called for or there being taken those other steps which over long years of parliamentary practice in this country, in Great Britain and in other countries in which there is a similar parliamentary system, have been found to be essential in the public interest. Indeed they have been regarded as so essential that in the case of the Department of Public Works they are explicitly covered by statutory provision.

We are asked to declare that it is expedient that this legislation should replace the Canadian Commercial Corporation as the purchasing agency for the Department of National Defence. With whatever limitations and reservations the bill may contain when it is presented to us, substantially we are being asked to declare as a matter of principle that it is expedient to confer these extremely wide powers in peacetime upon the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

One of the things that must surely impress itself upon the mind of every hon. member, Mr. Speaker, is the difference between the sense of urgency which seems to be implicit in the presentation of this resolution at this time, and the lack of any sense of urgency which was implicit in the position taken by the Minister of National Defence in the discussion of his estimates and in his definite statement that there was nothing new to announce to us in regard to the plans for national defence. The two do not go hand in hand. Either the Minister of National Defence is not disclosing to us all the information in his possession, or there is no immediate need of this resolution and the bill which would follow it. If there is the need which is indicated by this legislation, then the government should insist that the Minister of National Defence come before us and make a statement as to what the circumstances are that require a revised attitude toward our whole defence problem.

One of the arguments which has not been made, but which could well be made if it has validity, is that the Minister of Trade and Commerce might have referred to the clear statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) that an historic agreement was made in London a few weeks ago, by virtue of which it had been decided to determine which nation could best produce certain things, best build battleships or aircraft or guns or tanks; that the nation or nations which could best perform that task would be called upon to do the job and that the others would rely upon those nations to supply them.

The Minister of National Defence said something that was not suggested by any member of this house, namely, that the reference to this was an attempt to represent that there was a cleavage between the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs. If such a cleavage exists, it is only in the mind of the Minister of National Defence, or to his knowledge; but it certainly is not in the knowledge of any member of this house, because we have no knowledge yet of what the Minister of National Defence wants.

An hon. Member: He has not either.

Mr. Drew: I heard someone remark that he has not either, and I am inclined to think that is right.

Mr. Ross (Souris): It is quite evident.

Mr. Drew: It may well be that the Minister of Trade and Commerce thinks that he has not, and that is why he is presenting this resolution. Perhaps he is going to give the Minister of National Defence the same treatment that the Minister of Justice got.

Mr. Howe: This is his nasty day.

Mr. Drew: No. Whether we are judging a horse race or anything else, we have, after all, to try to study the form.

Mr. Howe: Don't let me interrupt you.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of National Defence was critical of any attempt to find out what issue was raised by this new principle so clearly stated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs a week ago today. I should like to refer to the words of the Minister of National Defence, as reported at page 3457 of Hansard of Friday, June 9. He said, in reference to what I had been asking:

> But "Let us know what is needed," he said.

Referring to what I had said, he went on:

> And I ask, "Let us know what is needed, where, when, by whom, and with what?"

That is exactly what we were trying to find out. Under this new principle, what is needed, where, when, by whom, and with what? In view of the fact that the Minister of National Defence has told us that there are no changes which he has to announce affecting the general program during the coming year ending March 31 next, surely it is wise for us to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and also perhaps to suggest that the Minister of National Defence ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in relation to this legislation: Let us know what is needed, where, when, by whom, and with what? We do not know. The Minister of National Defence indicates that he does not know. He explained to us that it was impossible for him to indicate even anything in the future when the bases of decisions have not yet been reached.

If the Minister of Trade and Commerce says to us: Yes, there is a crisis; these are dangerous days; we must prepare ourselves, I believe most hon. members would agree with that, would agree with measures which would expedite the general activities of this country in relation to every aspect of our defence measures—and obviously the preparation of defence material and the production of defence supplies are almost as vital, if not as vital, as the training of men. Perhaps in some ways it is more fundamental, because, until we have the defence equipment and the defence supplies, much of the training cannot be so carried out on a practical basis as to simulate that measure of realism which prepares men to go into battle if it should become necessary so to do. There certainly must be a measure of urgency indicated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce if the complementary activities are to be regarded as having the urgency which calls for a resolution of this kind. The minister has explained that whereas the act which this is to replace was for the purpose of dealing with an actual state of war, this deals with a period of peace, which nevertheless must be regarded as a period of emergency. He tells us that in this period of emergency circumstances may arise in which mandatory powers will be required. I suggest that if such mandatory powers are required, the simple course to follow is that which was followed in other emergencies—immediately to assemble this parliament so that it may give such mandatory powers as the emergency then apparent demands.

I find it difficult to agree, when the Minister of National Defence tells us that the London decisions presented situations that offer reasons for his projecting changes which a measure such as this would be intended to implement, that the House of Commons has any right in principle to say that it is expedient that these broad powers be conferred upon the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

After all, the house has retained, and the government has made it clear that it has retained, the authority to declare war. Most certainly emergencies far short of war might arise where it would be necessary to deal with such emergencies. It is the hope of each one of us that by recognizing emergencies as they appear, and dealing with them as such, peace may be preserved. I have no doubt the Minister of Trade and Commerce would tell us, and tell us sincerely, that in his opinion the granting of powers of this kind is part of a broad plan to do those things which are essential if we are to play our part in the effort to preserve peace.

In other words, the very name of the act, which abandons the earlier term related to war, does indicate that concept; and I am sure it is a concept of the broad situation in the world today that must meet with the approval of every member of the house. But these wide powers—and they are extremely wide—as explained by the Minister of Trade and Commerce are powers which to a very considerable extent once again would place a large segment of our industrial and other economy beyond the control of parliament, except by way of subsequent examination, and give to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the government powers which could only reasonably be asked for in a time of war.

The minister has stated that certain mandatory authority will be continued, but he points out that such mandatory powers will be restrained to the extent that the minister does not have power to compel any industry to produce a particular thing. Nevertheless he can establish priorities; and each one of us with any knowledge of what took place during the war years and since knows perfectly well that from the practical standpoint the control of priorities has a mandatory effect upon industries concerned in the exercise of such authority.

The answer may be that these powers are to be exercised only in those cases where industries have voluntarily agreed to produce certain types of equipment or defence supplies. But we all know that from the practical point of view the authority of government over industry today is such that few industries would at any time place themselves in a position where it would be necessary to use compulsion to have them carry out certain tasks. The very fact that these wide powers exist, particularly the power to enter into certain contracts which are not subject to the ordinary provisions of publicity under the four headings explained by the minister, indicates the extent to which a considerable segment of our industrial and other economy would once again come under this very general authority.

In any remarks I am making I am not suggesting that there is no emergency. On the contrary I was taken to task by the Minister of National Defence on Friday for seeking to emphasize the extent of the emergency. I do believe there is one. I believe there is an emergency which has been in no way admitted by the government in the statements made by the Minister of National Defence. The extent of that emergency is indicated by press dispatches such as this one from Washington on May 5:

> Defence and state departments of the United States have decided that western powers have at most four years to build up their combined military strength for defence against Russia.

If anything I would think that a generous estimate of the time factor involved. If that is so, then the proper sequence of events to deal with an emergency of that kind is for the Minister of National Defence or the Prime Minister to state to us what the effect of these London agreements really is, and to answer the very question posed by the Minister of National Defence: "Let us know what is needed, where, when, by whom and with what?" Let this parliament know, and then, having let this parliament know, present a resolution of this kind when the members have been informed of the extent of the emergency and of the way in which the emergency is to be met.

Of course most of us read this morning that this is not the business of the opposition. Most of us read this morning the remarkable speech made on Saturday by the Prime Minister, a speech remarkable in its childish arrogance, a speech which said in effect that the role of the opposition was simply to get up and say, "Please, Mr. Speaker, may I make a little suggestion?" and beyond that just to sit and learn. [Inaudible interruption.] Obviously, the Prime Minister, like some other hon. members whose voices are not loud enough for the reporter to hear, which is a pity—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: Some of the voices that are heard indicate a measure of impatience and an unwillingness to discuss matters involving the very survival of this nation. [Inaudible interruption.] I do wish the reporter had heard that one, because I cannot imagine anything—I shall not repeat it—that more clearly indicates the intelligence of the member who used it. Without quoting it, I will repeat the word to him and say that it applies to everything he has done in this house.

Mr. Speaker: I think it is necessary that the Speaker should hear all the words that are used. If the word is on Hansard of course I shall know what it was. I did not hear the word, and I do not think many other members did.

Mr. Drew: A number of members around me heard it quite clearly, as I did, and as the member knows perfectly well, because he was speaking in this direction and not toward you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: If the word happens to be unparliamentary, I shall order it expunged from Hansard.

Mr. Drew: I shall tell hon. members the word afterwards.

An hon. Member: Let us have it.

Mr. Drew: I am mentioning this merely because it is of interest only to the hon. member who used it. These sounds are indicative of the thought behind the speech of the Prime Minister on Saturday. After less than three and a half months, great impatience is being shown that this parliament is still seeking to find out the business of many of the most important departments.

One reason why hon. members should be reluctant to pass this resolution is that it is intended to give wide powers of this kind without explanation either by the Prime Minister or the Minister of National Defence of some of the details of the emergency which calls for these wide powers. The powers which the same minister possessed on an earlier occasion should be placed under real control by this parliament without renewing other powers.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce has referred to the magnificent job of war production which was done by the people of this country. It was a magnificent job. The reason why tremendous production was carried out in the fields of industry, mining, agriculture and forestry was that the citizens, with great personal skill, both in management and in the technical aspects of these many problems, were ready to serve unselfishly in time of war.

The minister showed one quality which deserves a great deal of commendation in that he gave authority to these men. May I say that the men who did these jobs were certainly not doing the jobs because of their political point of view, as their identity will indicate. When the minister did give jobs to these men, he delegated authority as well. That was a quality which had a great deal to do with the success of this effort. While questions may be raised about the way in which some of these things were handled, there is no doubt that that quality permitted those men to go ahead and perform the tasks that were allotted to them.

As a result of the wide powers conferred by the munitions and supply act a good deal of public property came under the control of the government which was not the kind of property a government ordinarily handles. The time is long overdue when parliament should reassert its authority and insist that the same standards of protection of public property and public funds be applied to the handling of properties acquired in this way as would apply to the handling of other properties by other departments of government.

We are not dealing with imaginary cases. We are dealing with a situation where many properties of considerable value have been disposed of by private negotiation without any notice to the public that they were being offered for sale. In some cases those properties had great value. In one case a property which had a stated value of $32 million, according to the figures supplied by the government itself, was disposed of by private negotiation and transaction without any of the ordinary notices being given that such property was for sale. In another case a mine in British Columbia was sold without any notice.

Mr. Howe: That is not true. That mine was advertised.

Mr. Drew: The official who explained that was not aware of it at the time.

Mr. Howe: I shall be glad to file the advertisement.

Mr. Drew: If that is so, it indicates the difficulty we have to face, because in the explanation given, that information was not available. If that mine was sold after due notice, we learn it only now, because the information was not previously given to us.

There are a number of other cases. We find, for example, that in the case of one crown corporation under the authority of the same minister—and in this instance the head of the corporation stated that it was done on the authority of the corporation itself—mining stock held by the Eldorado Corporation was disposed of by private transaction without public notice. The stock was sold last December at one cent a share without notice, and today it is being quoted as an unlisted stock at from 13 to 15 cents a share.

These are merely incidents which indicate the importance of bringing back under normal control and procedure the corporations and the properties which have been acquired. They also indicate that we should be most careful about passing a resolution that it is expedient that property which would be acquired under circumstances of this kind may be dealt with in a similar manner. The broad terms of the resolution would of course imply authority not only to acquire but to dispose of the same property. In the broadest possible terms the resolution places powers under the Minister of Trade and Commerce which can only be related to an emergency that has been stated to us in general terms but not in any definite way by the Minister of National Defence, who is the minister responsible for the preparation to which these activities would relate.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that if this emergency is such that it requires wide powers of this kind, let the Prime Minister or the Minister of National Defence answer the questions that were asked to the point where a number of members were expressing a great deal of impatience. Having given us that explanation, then let them say why it is necessary to create a new procurement agency instead of the one outlined in the last white paper of the Department of National Defence, which has been regarded as so satisfactory by the Minister of National Defence in any statements that he has made. I suggest also that the resolution involves something that would have a profound effect upon our whole economy in peacetime. It comes so close to the passing of legislation which can only be justified by a war emergency that I believe it should not be agreed to until the emergency can be stated explicitly by the Prime Minister or some other member of the government.

Furthermore, it should be remembered how wide the authority of the Minister of Trade and Commerce already is over some aspects of the economy of our country. By P.C. 5700 of December 8, 1948, the following were transferred to the Minister of Trade and Commerce: the atomic energy control board; Canadian Arsenals Limited; the dominion coal board; Eldorado Mining and Refining 1944 Limited; its subsidiary, Northern Transportation Company Limited; incentive bonus to industry; liquidation of contracts; the national research council; the Polymer Corporation Limited; research and development of jet engines and aircraft; subsidized production and transportation of iron and steel; Trans-Canada Air Lines, and War Assets Corporation. One might almost go on and say, "all this and heaven too". Certainly if we give these wide powers or express our belief that it is expedient that these wide powers be conferred, without any clear declaration as to what the emergency is, we are giving emergency powers which can only be justified by an emergency which has not been defined.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): With the last remark of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) I find myself in pretty substantial agreement. The resolution seems to visualize an emergency.

Mr. Howe: It is a peacetime bill.

Mr. Coldwell: The minister shakes his head, but let me say that I was here in March, 1939, when we had a prolonged discussion on a resolution and bill to set up a defence purchasing board. At the present time we have the Canadian Commercial Corporation, which, so far as the house is aware, has been doing a satisfactory job for the department concerned. Consequently the introduction of a resolution such as this seems to indicate a change in the point of view of the government with regard to the present international situation, a change which, from what I have been able to read, is not warranted.

By chance I was reading, in the British Hansard over the week end, the debate on the defence measures of the United Kingdom. Incidentally I found how different that debate was from the debate which has been proceeding in this house during the past week or so. From time to time the questions asked in this house, and even the answers given, have led me to believe that if I were an agent of the Soviet union all I would do would be to take the Hansard of this House of Commons and send it to Moscow. Indeed it appeared to me that the responsibility in the British house was such that some members were asking for a secret session in order that the kind of information asked for and given in this house during the last week or so could be obtained by the members of the parliament of the United Kingdom.

The resolution before the house differs substantially, and I think gravely, from the resolution preceding the bill of 1939 when there was an emergency foreshadowed. Hon. members will recall that just a few days before the introduction of that measure Hitler had broken his agreement, had overrun Czechoslovakia, was threatening Poland, and the people of Canada were gravely disturbed. The national defence purchasing board resolution read in part as follows:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to establish a defence purchasing board with exclusive power, subject to approval of the governor in council, to enter into all contracts for the purchase of munitions, equipment, materials and supplies required by the Department of National Defence in cases where the expenditure exceeds $5,000;—

Then I should like to draw the attention of the house to the following:

> —to provide safeguards to assure that such munitions, equipment, materials and supplies shall be purchased at a reasonable cost to the government and without unreasonable profit . . .

The bill subsequently introduced made good the outline given in this resolution. At that time the government was conscious of the fact that public opinion in this country was determined that if we were to engage in an armed conflict and required supplies for our men, those supplies should be provided at least without undue profit to those engaged in their manufacture. While that point of view has not been particularly vocal lately, I believe it still remains substantially the feeling of the Canadian people. Yet under this provision, and after our experience during the war, there is no assurance that this point of view will be recognized in dealing with the appropriations and purchases that may be necessary after this legislation is brought in. As a matter of fact I have before me Hansard for March 10, 1939, when the then minister of national defence, the late Right Hon. Ian Mackenzie, who introduced the resolution and the bill, went into this aspect of the question very thoroughly. At page 1764 he said:

> The bill that is to be submitted to this house consequent upon the adoption of the resolution I am now discussing provides that maximum profits upon defence contracts shall not exceed five per cent per annum on working capital actually utilized in the performance of the contract, and this is to be achieved by the simple, clear and definite process of taxing away the excess.

And at page 1767 he went on to say:

> The government, if I may speak for them, believe in the principle of equality of sacrifice; that in wartime men should not be required to offer their lives and limbs while those who provide the weapons of destruction have even the possibility of reaping undue profits.

After the outbreak of war the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, who was then the newly appointed minister of munitions and supply, made the statement that this five per cent limitation had been found unworkable; none the less the government shortly afterward introduced an excess profits tax in an attempt to prevent undue profits from being made during the war. Of course in my opinion—and we may hold and express different opinions in this matter—the minister did a remarkable job during the war, a job that I believe did him great crédit which can never be taken away, no matter what may be said or thought in the future. In doing that job, however, and in cutting through the provisions laid down by parliament, Canadian business did acquire great properties and in that respect made enormous profits out of the war. I am not saying that was done deliberately, but it is a fact. When you examine the capital equipment of industry at the close of the war and for a year or two later, and the manner in which that capital equipment was obtained, you can only conclude that industry in this country did very well out of the war, as indeed was the case in the United States and other countries. But the right hon. gentleman who in 1939 introduced the defence purchasing legislation made it abundantly clear that the government and people of Canada did not expect that when men were called upon to risk their limbs and lives, undue profits would be made by industry. I have before me Hansard for September 12, 1939, where at page 179 the minister said, in reply to a question as to why we were not proceeding under that legislation:

> The provision of five per cent was put in the last act after a good deal of consideration as a minimum return for the service rendered. . . .

I think that word should have been "maximum".

Mr. Howe: Yes; maximum.

Mr. Coldwell: It is "minimum" in Hansard.

> . . . but it was one which men of considerable experience believed to be unworkable. I can say to my hon. friend that from that day to this the defence purchasing board has done its very best to place contracts on that basis and has used every pressure that could be brought to bear in the form of patriotism and so on, but to date it has not succeeded in placing a single contract on that basis. To carry that provision into another bill would be out of the question at this time. That part of the act we can consider as having proven to be unworkable.

That was because of the immediate onset of war. While it may have been unworkable at that time, however, if we may take the assurance of the minister that there is no present emergency, we are now discussing this matter in a period of peace. That being so, while a similar provision may have proved unworkable because of the immediate impact of war, I believe we should consider how best we can limit the possibility of profits by munitions industries during this regrettable period of preparation.

I should say the first way in which we might limit the possibility of profit is by nationalizing the straight munitions industries of this country. Where the manufacture of armaments is the main or principal part of an industry, any possibility of profit should be removed by nationalizing that industry. If the present Minister of Trade and Commerce were in charge of the nationalized industry engaged in the manufacture of munitions and supplies I would have no hesitation in saying that a good job would be done. We saw what he did with the Polymer plant; we saw how he built up Trans-Canada Air Lines, and so on. So where there is a determination to do a job we know it is possible for a public authority or a public institution to do that job well.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Coldwell: Before lunch, Mr. Speaker, I was discussing what I believe to be the fundamental difference between what is proposed now by the government in this resolution and the bill which was adopted in March, 1939, immediately prior to the outbreak of the second world war but of course before we knew absolutely that war was imminent. I was saying, as I say now, that the idea behind the defence purchasing board bill of 1939 was one to which I think this house should give quite serious attention. I do not intend to discuss the various clauses in that bill but when the new bill is before the house I think that hon. members might look into that previous bill and might also read the debate which preceded its introduction in 1939.

I was also saying before lunch that I think the people of Canada, though lately not vocal about it, believe that in the preparation for the defence of our country the motive of private gain should be eliminated to the greatest possible extent. In order to achieve that objective I suggest again that we should see to it that industries which are primarily engaged in the manufacture of munitions should be under national ownership and control. I am well aware of the fact that, should war occur, and in preparations for defence, there are many industries which can be converted into munition industries but which are not primarily and fundamentally munition industries. When such industries are engaged on defence contracts or in supplying war materials of every description, in our opinion their profits should be strictly scrutinized and indeed limited. The purchasing board which was set up in 1939 of course had the obligation of limiting profits to 5 per cent on the capital employed in the production of munitions. In looking over the address of the late Right Hon. Ian Mackenzie who at that time was the Minister of National Defence, and from which I quoted to some extent this morning, I find that he said this:

> The government is determined that in peacetime, where private industry must be utilized, there shall be the strictest possible regulation of profit both in the interest of the taxpayer and in deference to public abhorrence of profits made from products which involve destruction of human lives and misery among nations.

That will be found at page 1767 of Hansard of March 10, 1939. I am sure that that is the opinion of the Canadian people at the present time.

The resolution before us does not foreshadow a bill in any respect resembling the bill that was before the house in 1939. When we look at the amount to be spent in 1939, namely $63 million, in warlike supplies and the amount to be spent now, and when we analyse the $425 million for defence appropriated this year, we realize how much more we are spending on the various types of equipment and on munitions, in the equipment of our forces, than we were spending in 1939. I of course regret, as I have always regretted, that the government at the end of the war saw fit to hand over to private industry many of the wartime industries that had been set up to make much of the equipment that was made so successfully during the war, and that today we are in many respects without the facilities owned by the people of Canada. To bring the industry again under public control would, and indeed I think should, require that we should repossess ourselves of these particular munition industries.

I do not propose to prolong the discussion at this stage. When the bill is before us I think that the house could go into the matter carefully. I want, however, to express the point of view that we in this party hold, that if we are going to build up defence forces for our country—and we must do so under the conditions that now exist—and if our men are to be properly equipped, I think they must be equipped without any section of the Canadian population, or indeed any population outside Canada, obtaining huge profits from the manufacture of the essential equipment for the defence of our country.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a word on this resolution, but it is not my intention to go over the points that have been brought before the house thus far by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and the leader of the C.C.F. party. I find myself quite surprised that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), for whom I have a high regard, would subject himself to the criticism that will be heaped upon him for bringing in a bill of this kind; I do not believe that it is coming to him. Although he has not told us the reasons why, it is evident that the present procurement agency, the Canadian Commercial Corporation, is not able to do a job efficiently in the purchase of defence supplies. That is implied in the minister's statement this morning, although he did not say so. What I should like the minister to do on rebuttal in this debate, if he sees fit, is to tell us if that is right, if the present Canadian Commercial Corporation is not able to do the job of purchasing defence supplies efficiently and well, and if so, in what respect it has not been able to do so.

The bill which is to be brought in, based on this resolution is, according to the minister, to replace the Defence Purchases Act. I think that is understandable, in the light of the fact that the old Defence Purchases Act was drafted hastily during a time of high pressure, and doubtless a good many improvements could be made in it. But I cannot quite square what the minister said this morning, namely, that this bill was not meant to meet emergency conditions. I think these are the words he used: "It is not meant to meet emergency conditions at all." He said that he had another piece of legislation ready if an emergency did arise. These things hardly square in my mind. It seems to me that it would take an emergency of some sort to induce the minister to bring in a bill naming himself and his department as the purchasing agent for defence material, rather than to allow the purchases to continue under the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

The Social Credit group, like the other two groups on this side of the house, are opposed to any corporation making undue profits out of the supply of war materials. We want to see a strict limit placed on the profits that can be made out of such industry. But at the same time we cannot feel that we can subscribe to the nationalization of all these industries which do contribute to the process of defence by supplying materials that are needed for our defence. I am satisfied in my own mind that because of the way industry is organized today it would be impossible for the people of Canada to own and operate such industries efficiently and well and without a great deal more cost than they have to bear now to supply the defence materials. I am all for having this done by private industry, but under the strictest possible kind of scrutiny and regulation in regard to profits.

I wish the minister would make it very clear to us why he feels that he must have mandatory powers at a time like this, unless he does see some sort of emergency. These are questions which went through my mind, Mr. Speaker, and while, as I said, I do not wish to speak at any length at this stage, yet we are opposed to the idea of bringing in a bill of this kind unless it is to meet an emergency. We will await the minister's further statements before we take a definite position one way or the other, hoping that he will make it more clear to us, either in closing this debate or on the second reading of the bill, exactly why it is necessary to make the radical change that is being made.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have one or two brief observations. The first thing I want to say is that we should be very clear on just what this resolution forecasts. What we are really being asked to do is, to all intents and purposes, to restore the Department of Munitions and Supply Act. I am not overlooking the fact that the minister made some distinction between them, and was at some pains to indicate that the powers were not as great. But quite frankly to me that was most unconvincing. The minister can make a little power go a long way. If you give the minister the power contained in this resolution I suggest again that there is nothing he could not do. I was not sure that he nodded his head.

Mr. Howe: Not to your remarks.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That raises the question whether now, in peacetime, which we admit is a kind of qualified peacetime, nevertheless in what is described as peacetime, we have to submit to these extraordinary powers.

I think it is undesirable that we should do so. Nobody will grudge these powers when it is perfectly clear that the emergency is on; and nobody has ever grudged praise to the minister for the way in which he exercised them in wartime. We are not quite sure, therefore, that we like the minister exercising so many powers in peacetime. I am not going to give a long recital, which would be as long as my arm, of the powers which he does exercise now. I think it is very hard to make people realize that unfortunately when danger is very great for those who live in free countries, when we are in the very act of defending our freedom, we may do things which so curtail it that we eventually find it has passed out of our control. That has happened, as we all know.

I just want to make this one point. The suggestion has already been made by the hon. member who spoke last. He says this very pertinently raises the question whether in fact it means that the Canadian Commercial Corporation has been a flop. I think it is a pertinent question, and I would put it in just a little different way. I say that before we can be asked, or should be asked, to give any such power as these we should know exactly what kind of difficulties are facing the minister at the moment. What are the things that cannot be done under the powers of the Canadian Commercial Corporation and the other authorities which do exist? Nothing has been said yet to indicate that. I am quite sure that I can speak not only for myself but for those in our own party that when we are satisfied that there is an emergency there will be nobody readier than we to concede the necessary powers. But at the present time it seems that this is just a measure to restore to the minister virtually all the war powers of the munitions and supply act.

I just make this one last observation. Power is a very pleasant thing. I have never had it, but I have known people who have had it, and I am sure they liked it. I am sure they could never get too much of it. Indeed, I will go so far as to say that they are quite able to convince themselves that power in their hands is a very desirable thing from the point of view of the country. I am quite sure they feel that way, and as time goes on they feel that way more and more. Therefore I just make this observation. To an extent which perhaps the minister does not even know himself this is a suggestion, these broad powers, which I consider will enable him to do anything that he wants to do. With respect to these broad powers, however pleasant they may be to him, however satisfied he may be that they will be exercised in the public interest, I think it is our duty to try to bring to the realization of this house, and I hope to the country, that every time unnecessary powers are handed to people they are themselves to that extent endangering the freedom that we talk so much about and often do so little about.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: There is no right of reply on this motion, unless with the unanimous consent of the house. I think it is customary for the minister to reply when the house goes into committee.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, Canada is relatively a small nation; certainly, it is in so far as her manpower resources are concerned. It seems to me that a deficiency in manpower can be made up by the utilization of our natural resources to the fullest possible measure, thereby providing a reserve which can be made available to ourselves and our allies in an emergency, in case any of those allies of ours should be attacked.

Therefore a ready-to-go mobilization plan would ensure that these natural resources would be available the instant an emergency arose. I think that during the past there has been a lack of direction on the part of the government to indicate where industrialists should concentrate their efforts in order that the resources of the country might be made available if and when an emergency arose.

Earlier this year the president of the industrial preparedness association made a nation-wide tour. Upon his return he reported that the industrialists in western Canada had complained bitterly that they had not received sufficient information to enable them to do the necessary planning so that, if necessary, they could convert their plants to a point where they would produce those things which would be essential for the supplying of warlike materials to ourselves and our allies. The importance of that planning has been enhanced by the recent decisions made in London within the last month, upon which occasion the means of forestalling the catastrophe of war were examined, and where the new scheme for the collective peace-securing force was initiated, rather than having all the allied powers working on their own and preparing their own limited defence forces.

We have been told also that during the conference great emphasis was placed upon not only the means of preventing war but ways to help in the recovery of Europe. It was urged that there should be collective economic planning so that the various states would be able to direct their resources in the most economical way and in the most effective manner to help in the general recovery.

As I said at the outset of my observations, in many respects Canada is a small country. We cannot spread our endeavours in too many different directions. It is going to be very much a matter of specializing. Therefore one comes back to the question asked last Friday by the leader of this party, "Let us know what is needed." I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) to give notice to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) that the very first question he, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, must ask the Minister of National Defence is this: "Let us know what is needed." To that the Minister of National Defence can give a more effective answer than merely to say, "Let us know what is needed—where, when, by whom and with what."

There is not much use proceeding with this legislation—because it would not be very effective—until the Minister of Trade and Commerce can get those very definite answers. He must be told by the Minister of National Defence, and perhaps also by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, what is needed; because we cannot just go ahead producing everything and dissipating our efforts in that way. It will have to be specialized planning, and direction will be required. I do not think it is up to the Minister of Trade and Commerce to say what will be produced; he will be told what is required by the Department of National Defence. When the minister replies I would ask him to tell us the system of liaison which will be in operation between the Department of National Defence and the authority now being placed in the hands of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I wish to indicate here that I am opposed to the resolution. After listening to the remarks of the various speakers thus far I gather that practically all opposition members are opposed to it, although it may be that we will not oppose it by a formal vote at this stage, when we have not the details of the bill before us. I do think it is essential that we indicate to the minister that, from the terms of the resolution, our only conclusion can be that the legislation will fulfil our fears in that it will be legislation of the type that should be opposed.

My remarks will be confined chiefly to the fact that at present it appears the legislation contemplated by the resolution is entirely unnecessary. According to the statements made by responsible ministers on those occasions, the Canadian Commercial Corporation, a body which has been discussed on numerous occasions since 1945, was set up to do the very thing we are now asked in this resolution to empower the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) to do exclusively, or with the assistance of such boards and advisers as he in his discretion may see fit to set up.

Remembering, as one can if he reads the debates of the past, the objections taken to the principles embodied in setting up the Canadian Commercial Corporation, and giving it the wide powers it now has, it surely must be obvious that those of us who held those views must be opposed to duplicating the work of that corporation by setting up further agencies and bodies and giving them the same overlapping and, in some cases, even wider powers than those allotted to the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

I should like to refer to the debates of the last few years so as to remind hon. members what it was intended to do when the Canadian Commercial Corporation was set up, and the powers which in fact were given to it. On the basis of the statements made by the various ministers who outlined the purposes of that corporation, it appears perfectly clear that with proper direction, it can do all the things this new bill would hand over to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

In 1947 when the amendment was before us to enlarge the powers of the Canadian Commercial Corporation the then member for Carleton, Mr. Boucher, had this to say as reported at page 4949 of Hansard for July 2, 1947:

> The amendment now before the house in effect asks the government to give to that company—

That is the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

> —the power to produce goods, to manufacture goods, to procure goods and to construct articles in Canada or elsewhere. By this amendment the scope of the activities of the Canadian Commercial Corporation is widened beyond anything comprehended in the original act. The amendment gives this crown company the power to do almost everything possible in the industrial, the economic and even the financial life of our country.

Those were some of the objections which we had at that time to the amendment to the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act, but it goes without saying that the government, having a majority in the house at that time, as they have at the present, saw no merit in our objection to the granting of the powers referred to in that amendment. We find that in the further discussions the powers of the corporation were more specifically defined by the ministers themselves. For instance, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) is reported on page 4958 of the same day as saying:

> The Canadian Commercial Corporation was created, not only for the purposes of purchasing for the Department of National Defence, but for the other purposes that parliament or the government might provide for it.

Up to that time the purposes of the corporation had been fairly exclusively confined to purchasing for the department of defence, but the Minister of National Defence said that the government had in mind that the corporation might well have its powers enlarged and if it was found necessary to enlarge the scope of government purchasing to include matters not immediately connected with defence, such as the stockpiling of strategic materials or materials for construction and so on which might be needed in a war, the power to do that would be given to the Canadian Commercial Corporation. Incidentally, while we are discussing this question of the advisability or otherwise of giving wide powers to the minister without specific limitations, may I remind the house that we were told this morning by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that we know perfectly well that he will not use them in an improper manner.

Mr. Howe: I did not say that this morning.

Mr. Fulton: I beg the minister's pardon. I understood him to say that, but if he did not, I think he might well have said it. If he says that he did not, I accept his statement. But when we have pointed out the tremendous authority granted by different pieces of legislation to individual ministers we are told, "It is true that this authority and power is granted, but we are going to use it only for certain specific purposes which we have outlined and you need have no fear that it will be used for any other purpose." It is interesting to note that in the debate to which I have just referred, when the Minister of National Defence said that the Canadian Commercial Corporation was created, not only for the purposes of purchasing for the Department of National Defence, but for the other purposes that parliament or the government might provide for it, when we pointed out to him that the corporation had not been set up for the purpose of exercising those enlarged powers he went on to say:

> It may not have been made known when the corporation was set up by statute that that purpose was envisaged, because we had not reached that stage in the process of reconstruction; but that purpose was in mind at the time the corporation was set up.
> Mr. Fraser: Why was not parliament told?
> Mr. Claxton: Because the time had not come for parliament to be told.

That is the attitude taken with respect to these powers given to ministers or to various corporations or agencies of the government. We are told that they are set up for one purpose, that the powers will be used for that purpose only, but then a couple of years later, with an astonishing disregard for parliament and for what has been said earlier, we find that the powers are being used for different and wider purposes. When we ask why we were not told that when the corporation was set up the answer is given, "We do not think it was the time to tell you all those things when we set up the corporation."

I for one, and I know I am joined in this by many members, am very reluctant to give ministers or boards or corporations powers without there being the clearest limitation in the statutes upon the extent to which those powers will be exercised. I find no such limitation in this resolution and I cannot subscribe to a resolution which seems to confer such wide powers when it is not indicated that certain limitations will be set out in the bill itself.

We are left in the position of having the Canadian Commercial Corporation set up to exercise the powers which the Minister of National Defence described in the debate to which I have just referred. Later in the course of that same debate the same minister described the advantages of using the Canadian Commercial Corporation, and I quote from pages 4974 and 4975 as follows:

> Under this bill the Canadian Commercial Corporation will be primarily responsible for obtaining tenders for contracts. In addition, there are other functions in connection with the procurement of munitions which are just as important and which, together with procurement, form part of the whole complex of industrial organization for war.

Which embraces the very things the minister is talking about and which are contemplated in this legislation. As I said a moment ago, the Canadian Commercial Corporation could be used for the purpose of stockpiling. The Minister of National Defence continued:

> There are four main aspects of that: standardization, industrial organization, inspection and procurement, and all must work very closely with research. We are setting up a series of agencies whereby the Department of National Defence, Canadian Arsenals Limited, the Department of Trade and Commerce through one agency or another, the defence research board, and industry, probably represented in part through such agencies as the Canadian Standards Association and the Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps Association, will all be linked into co-operating groups which will enable industry to know what is likely to be expected both in peacetime and in the event of an emergency, and which will enable the Canadian Commercial Corporation to know where it can get the materials, and which will enable the Department of National Defence to know that it can get the equipment and materials which are needed either in peacetime or in war.

That is the set-up which was envisaged and which presumably has been put into effect for the Canadian Commercial Corporation, and is the actual set-up which is envisaged by this resolution. Unless we are told that the Canadian Commercial Corporation, far from realizing the tremendous results expected, has in effect been a dismal failure, then I can see absolutely no justification for this resolution which would bring about a complete duplication of what we already have. The minister said this morning during the course of his remarks—I do not pretend to quote him accurately, but I think I am giving the effect of what he said—that many of the personnel engaged in the purchasing branch of munitions and supply had been absorbed into the Canadian Commercial Corporation. That is certainly the case on the evidence of the earlier debates, and in fact that was one of the justifications put forward for extending the functions of the Canadian Commercial Corporation in order to keep in being that group of men who it was said, and said accurately, had made such a great contribution to the wartime work of the department of munitions and supply.

Then in the debate in 1948 on a further amendment and discussion of the corporation, we find the advantage was stressed that all the people of munitions and supply who had been engaged in defence purchasing were now being absorbed into the Canadian Commercial Corporation. At page 5901 of Hansard for June 25, 1948, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) spoke as follows:

> The Department of Munitions and Supply, which had done our purchasing during the war, gradually contracted; but it has preserved its records and some of its key personnel, and they have been incorporated into the Canadian Commercial Corporation, which has been entrusted with the job of acting as agent for the present Minister of Trade and Commerce in doing purchasing for the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Howe: And that position is unchanged.

Mr. Fulton: I am glad to hear that. The minister will find that a little later he himself said that it also acts as the purchasing agent for foreign governments.

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: The Minister of National Defence went on to say:

> We find that it does not lead to delay; that the corporation uses its resources of information and trained personnel to ascertain from whom we should procure supplies. By and large we are finding that it is working out very well.

So that a great number of people who did our defence purchasing during the war for the allied war effort are in the Canadian Commercial Corporation. Why then do we need some other body, some other minister, some other advisory board established with this enormous and unlimited power to do all over again the very work which the Canadian Commercial Corporation was set up to do, and for which it has the qualified personnel? So far it might perhaps be objected that everything that has been said has been confined to the domestic situation, providing for our own defence requirements and stockpiling. Under the Atlantic pact we are going to pool our resources. We have subscribed to the principle of balanced forces, and of collective pooling of resources, so that we may have to purchase for foreign governments, but the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is on record as saying just last year that the Canadian Commercial Corporation acts also as the government agent to carry out such purchases for foreign governments. At page 1952 of Hansard for March 24, 1949, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in discussing the corporation, said this after referring to the function of purchasing for our own Department of National Defence:

> The other function is that of procurement for foreign governments purchasing in Canada or for Canadian agencies purchasing abroad. In the case of foreign governments purchasing in Canada it may be necessary, for example, to finance the building of a ship which would be paid for on delivery.

The minister went on to outline how the Canadian Commercial Corporation acts in that respect as the agent for foreign governments in procuring supplies necessary for defence purposes. Earlier the minister was the one who took the lead in defending the corporate structure of the Canadian Commercial Corporation as the one most ideally suited to the work of defence procurement both for our own and for foreign governments. As a matter of fact, some of us criticized the fact that this purchasing agency was being set up as a crown corporation, and the minister rejected those criticisms and said this was the best way to do it. As reported at page 1894 of Hansard for March 23, 1949, he said:

One of the primary purposes of this corporate agency of government is to meet the needs of international trade. It has been, and continues to be, the policy of the government to provide for the procurement of the needs of the defence services by a civilian department rather than direct procurement by the services themselves. This purchasing function could be performed by a department of government rather than a corporate body—

As the minister intends to do under the resolution now before us.

—although the corporate form provides certain positive advantages, not only to the government but also to those who supply the requirements. However, a corporate form is almost essential in connection with certain foreign trade transactions, and it has obvious advantages to have but one buying agency rather than two separate organizations, one a branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce and the other a crown company.

Could anything be clearer, Mr. Speaker, than the fact that if the resolution and the bill based upon it pass we will have two separate agencies—

Mr. McIlraith: That does not follow at all.

Mr. Fulton: —one the minister and the Department of Trade and Commerce and such boards and advisers as he may set up, and the other a crown company, namely, the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, my hon. friend has been speaking for fifteen minutes on something that is not contained in the resolution at all. There is nothing in the resolution to suggest that the relations of the Canadian Commercial Corporation with regard to anything are changed in the slightest, and I can tell him they are not changed in the slightest by the bill that is based on this resoltuion. It is a very interesting speech, and I am glad to have his endorsement of the Canadian Commercial Corporation, but he is entirely out of order when speaking on this resolution.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I thought I was speaking distinctly and had made my point distinctly, but apparently the minister has not appreciated it at all. I certainly did not understand the minister to say that the Canadian Commercial Corporation would be ended, that the act would be repealed or anything to that effect.

Mr. Howe: He did not say that it would.

Mr. Fulton: That is my whole point. We now have the Canadian Commercial Corporation qualified to do all these things that I have been describing which the ministers of defence and trade and commerce said it should do in the field of defence procurement. All these things were to be done by the Canadian Commercial Corporation and, as the minister himself has said, done very much better by that corporation than they could be in any other way. The point is that under the resolution in addition we have it clearly contemplated that the minister will be empowered to act in exactly the same way as the Canadian Commercial Corporation, and to set up boards and advisers to help him to act in that same way. I am not saying that the act creating the Canadian Commercial Corporation should be repealed. I am not discussing that at all. What I am discussing is the fact that here we will have a duplication of agencies, and we are going to have a body set up to do the very things which the minister said last year could be much better done by the Canadian Commercial Corporation in its form as a crown corporation. That is the point I am making.

Mr. Howe: You are not making any point at all.

Mr. Fulton: There could not be clearer words than those used by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of National Defence in describing first the initial powers and then the extension of the powers of the Canadian Commercial Corporation, and the advantage of having it done that way.

Mr. Howe: May I ask my hon. friend one question? Did he not say a few moments ago that the Canadian Commercial Corporation is the agent of the Minister of Trade and Commerce for the procurement of defence services? He read those words in the quotation he gave earlier.

Mr. Fulton: I do not remember whether I used that exact word, but that certainly is my understanding.

Mr. Howe: They are and they will continue to be the agent of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Fulton: The agent of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the agent of foreign governments which wish to purchase here.

Mr. Howe: That describes the relationship.

Mr. Fulton: I come back to the words that the minister used last year. If that relationship is going to continue why is he taking a separate power under this new legislation? The minister said that a corporate form was almost essential in connection with certain foreign trade transactions, and that there were obvious advantages in having one buying agency rather than two separate organizations.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend has asked a question, and perhaps I may answer it. Responsibility for buying for the defence services has rested in the past and rests at present upon the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who in carrying out his duties, uses the services of the Canadian Commercial Corporation. He has done so in the past and will continue to do so in the future, and there will be absolutely no change resulting from this legislation. If there is any change I wish my hon. friend could tell me what it is.

Mr. Drew: If there is no change why do we need this legislation?

Mr. Howe: I will explain that.

Mr. Fulton: If it makes no change what is the need for the legislation? It seems to me a purpose would be served only if some change were contemplated in the set-up. Presumably that change is conceived by the government to be necessary, so we have this resolution; and that is what we are objecting to, the fact that a change is being made. Now the minister says this is entirely unnecessary, that no change is being made.

Mr. Howe: There is to be no change.

Mr. Fulton: If there is to be no change, what is the need for this legislation? Either it means a new agency and new powers being taken, or it means nothing at all. The minister says it does not mean new powers or any change, so we are left with the conclusion that the resolution means nothing at all.

Mr. Howe: Maybe that is right and it means nothing at all. It means nothing to you, I am sure.

Mr. Fulton: The minister says that is right. That is very interesting. Before this we have heard the minister make statements which later on he admitted meant nothing, that he had nothing in mind at the time he made them.

Mr. Gauthier (Sudbury): That is your story.

Mr. Fulton: No, that is based on the records of one of the committees of this house. The minister said he was not concerned with what he said last year, that what he said last year did not mean anything at all. He is on record as having made that statement in the committee on railways and shipping. We are accustomed to the minister making statements which later he finds mean nothing at all, and I am quite convinced that later on he will find that he did not mean the statement he made a moment ago. I am quite convinced the government would not have placed upon the order paper a resolution meaning nothing at all, as the minister has said; so I intend to continue to deal with the resolution as a serious piece of legislation, though one to which we are opposed.

After having said it was more desirable to have these things done by a corporate body than by a branch of the department, the minister went on to point out that the Canadian Commercial Corporation could indulge in many other activities such as stockpiling, and so on, which in fact it was carrying on at that time, in March of 1949. Let me read what the resolution says:

> . . . it is expedient to present a bill, cited as the Defence Supplies Act, to empower the Minister of Trade and Commerce to buy or otherwise acquire and deal with defence supplies; construct or otherwise acquire, projects; acquire, store and otherwise deal with material entering into the manufacture of defence supplies or the development, repair or maintenance of projects—

So under this legislation the minister is given power to control the whole realm of industry in this country. He can control the mining industry; he can control the lumber industry, because lumber enters into the construction and maintenance of projects. Yet in 1947, 1948 and 1949 we were told on numerous occasions that under this act, which contains surprisingly wide powers, the Canadian Commercial Corporation is authorized to do all these things and is in fact the best agency that can be devised to do the very things the minister is now being empowered to do under this new legislation.

At the moment we are not discussing whether or not any agency, whether it be the minister or a crown corporation, should in fact be given these powers. In the past we have opposed giving such powers to the Canadian Commercial Corporation; nevertheless that corporation has those powers today. Perhaps the minister is right; perhaps it is a meaningless waste of time to put on the order paper a resolution giving the minister the same powers, particularly when he says this new legislation makes no change. If the minister is prepared to justify the action of the government in placing upon the order paper and bringing before the house a resolution which he says has no meaning, I shall leave that difficult task to him.

Motion agreed to on division and the house went into committee, Mr. McCulloch in the chair.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, seldom have I heard a debate go so far afield and miss the point of the resolution so completely. This is not legislation to add to the powers of the Minister of Trade and Commerce; it is legislation to take away from his powers. The munitions and supply act is still in force and on the statute books today. I do not know how many hon. members have read that act recently, but if some contractors were to read it now I am sure they would be reluctant to enter into contracts with the government. The munitions and supply act was wartime legislation which gave the minister the widest possible powers; power to renegotiate contracts, power to order a man to accept a contract at prices fixed by the minister, and various other arbitrary powers.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Was that legislation not regarded as dead, in effect?

Mr. Howe: No, sir.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Has it been availed of recently?

Mr. Howe: We have not been invoking it recently; nevertheless that is the statute under which the Minister of Trade and Commerce operates today in making defence purchases. The purpose of this legislation is to repeal the munitions and supply act and replace it with legislation limited to powers required in peacetime. These emergency powers we have heard so much about are not new powers; they are a mere fraction of the powers the minister has today. The powers being retained are two in number. One is the power to obtain priority of delivery from a contractor who has signed a contract to supply war materials. We are giving up the right to order a contractor to produce war materials, but if he does contract to produce them and fails to deliver on time, this legislation gives the minister the right to demand priority from that contractor for the delivery of defence projects as against peacetime projects, in the event that the terms of the contract are not being lived up to. The other mandatory power that is retained is the power to requisition materials required to carry out a defence contract. If there is a shortage of lumber and lumber is needed for defence purposes, the Minister of Trade and Commerce can requisition lumber. If there is a shortage of copper and copper is required for defence purposes, the minister can requisition copper. In other words the two powers are first that he may require a government contractor to give priority of delivery under a defence contract he has already signed, and second to requisition material necessary for the carrying out of a government defence contract. I could give you the list of powers that the minister is giving up, but it would take considerable time, and would perhaps shock hon. members to know that powers so arbitrary can still be used in peacetime.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We knew that even the minister would not exercise them in peacetime.

Mr. Howe: The leader of the opposition said there must be an emergency to justify this legislation. If there were an emergency, we would not be passing this bill. The reason we are passing this bill is that we believe the emergency is past and that we are operating in peacetime. We are operating under the threat of war, but we believe that peacetime is restored to the extent that wartime powers should now be given up and replaced by peacetime powers. The peacetime powers that are being retained in connection with defence purchasing are fewer than those retained by any other country that has defence purchasing legislation. They are far fewer than those under the defence purchasing acts that govern in the United States and fewer than the powers that apply to the Ministry of Supply in the United Kingdom. The point I want to make is that this is a divesting bill rather than a bill adding to the powers of the minister.

The leader of the opposition asked the question: Why is defence purchasing not returned to the armed services? I think that the principal reason is that the armed services prefer to have defence purchasing left where it is. They have found that the principle of civilian buying works well, and to the satisfaction of the Department of National Defence. It is rather significant that those countries that resorted to civilian purchasing of defence materials during the war have not returned those powers to the services. In the United Kingdom we had the Department of Supply buying for the army during the war period, and the Department of Aircraft Production buying for the air services.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Does the minister remember when the Department of Supply was set up in England?

Mr. Howe: Yes. It was set up just before the outbreak of war, as I recall. Those two United Kingdom departments of government are now combined in the one ministry, the Ministry of Supply; and the purchases for the army and for the air services continue to be made by a civilian department.

A good deal has been said about some changed relationship between the armed services and the Canadian Commercial Corporation. I should like to correct a few remarks made in that connection. The Canadian Commercial Corporation was not established to purchase war materials. It was established about 1943 for the purpose of assisting foreign governments to purchase in Canada. It was not until 1946, I think, when the Minister of Munitions and Supply was attempting to wind up his department; and, as this agency was working efficiently, it seemed logical at that time to transfer responsibility for the purchase of military materials from the Minister of Munitions and Supply to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. That transfer was carried out by legislation. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has made use of the Canadian Commercial Corporation to carry out the responsibilities which have been his, just as the Minister of Trade and Commerce in future will use the Canadian Commercial Corporation to exercise the responsibility that is his, namely to make purchases for the armed services. There has been no change in that relationship from the beginning, no change is contemplated, and absolutely no change is suggested in the resolution that is before the committee at this time.

Someone said that if legislation of this kind is needed we should assemble parliament when the emergency arises. Again I say that this is a divesting bill which is being enacted because no emergency confronts this country at the moment. Should an emergency arise, parliament of course will be assembled. A purchasing bill suitable for wartime is in hand and that bill would be placed before parliament at that session. I am sure that parliament would enact that more drastic bill into legislation. But I repeat that what is before parliament now is a bill to govern peacetime purchases.

The leader of the C.C.F. party referred to the Defence Purchases Act, which is also being repealed by the bill that is based on this resolution. The Defence Purchases Act might be described as a noble experiment.

The difficulty came about in attempting to put the legislation into practice. The legislation provided that defence purchases would be made on the basis of 5 per cent on the capital employed in carrying out the contract. If it had been 5 per cent on the cost of the goods, it would have been understandable, and the act might have been effective at least in the vast majority of purchases. The ordinary contract during the war, or rather, the average of all the contracts placed during the war, varied a profit factor of about 4¼ per cent. But the act did not say "5 per cent of the cost of the article". It said, "5 per cent return on the capital employed in turning out the article".

How could the amount of capital required be determined? For example, a $100,000 contract might be placed with the Canadian General Electric Company which has a capital of a great many million dollars. How much capital would be required to carry out that $100,000 contract? How could anyone determine that? The government certainly could not determine it, and I doubt if the contractor could determine it. Unless it was agreed that a certain capital would be set aside for the purpose, no one on earth could tell how much the government owed the contractor when that particular contract had been carried out. I think that explains why the Defence Purchases Act, as experience determined, was not an act that could be made operative. It was for that reason that the munitions and supply act was passed shortly after the outbreak of war. It is for that reason that the bill that is based on this resolution repeals the Defence Purchases Act.

I think my statement fairly well covers the points raised in the discussion on the resolution, but I shall be glad to answer any other questions that may be in the minds of hon. members while we are in committee.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to ask the minister whether it is not a fact that the Canadian Commercial Corporation at the present time operates under its own empowering statute.

Mr. Howe: Certainly it acts under its own empowering statute, but there is nothing in that empowering statute that makes it the agent of the Minister of National Defence; it is the agent of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Fulton: Exactly; and it is a defence procurement agency, is it not?

Mr. Howe: Only to the extent that the Minister of Trade and Commerce cares to call on it to assist him in carrying out his function as the procurement agent for the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Fulton: Exactly; and it is available there for that purpose.

Mr. Howe: It is available, yes.

Mr. Fulton: Last year the minister told us, I think, that it had already exercised that function under his direction in connection with the stockpiling of tin.

Mr. Howe: Yes. It will continue to do that.

Mr. Fulton: So that it is a corporation or an agency which is now empowered to buy or otherwise acquire and deal with defence supplies, is it not?

Mr. Howe: Yes, but only as directed by the minister. There is a separation of its duties. The Canadian Commercial Corporation was established with certain powers originally.

Mr. Fulton: Later I think enlarged by an amendment.

Mr. Howe: Later enlarged by an amendment, to enable it to assist the minister in obtaining defence supplies.

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Howe: But the responsibility in the one case is with the corporation, and in the other case is with the minister. In other words, requisitions do not go to the Canadian Commercial Corporation from the armed services; they go to the minister, and the minister asks the Canadian Commercial Corporation to exercise his powers in filling those requisitions. But it is working for the minister, and it is the agent of the minister, and it will continue to be the agent of the minister for that purpose. There is absolutely no change in the position of the Canadian Commercial Corporation as a result of this legislation.

Mr. Pearkes: In the third line of the resolution, as it appears on today's order paper, there are the words: "construct or otherwise acquire, projects." When the Canadian Commercial Corporation was first brought into being it had the power to construct projects, but I think last year that power was withdrawn. It has not been found practicable for the Canadian Commercial Corporation to do construction work. I think that the construction work contemplated is now to be done either by the Department of Public Works or under the Minister of Resources and Development.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend is quite mistaken. The construction projects are carried out by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He does not build them himself, as my hon. friend would know, but he procures the building of such projects. He procures the building by calling for tenders and awarding a contract to an organization capable of carrying out that particular project. But he is the sole procurement agent for structures, just as he is for materials for the armed services.

Mr. Gillis: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion and to the minister's explanation. As I understand the matter now, this bill will replace the munitions and supply act. In effect the minister says that this new legislation will restrict powers that he had under the munitions and supply act. We will have to take the minister's word for that. On reading the resolution upon which the bill is to be based, I think the powers are unlimited.

As many hon. members have indicated, this is peacetime legislation. We are not living in a peaceful world. I assume that the powers are delegated here, having in mind that in the event of an emergency the machinery that is ready can be put into operation to take care of the emergency. It might mean that the powers are emergency powers. Personally I am not objecting to that. My reason for rising was to say I trust that both in peacetime and in the event of an emergency these powers will be exercised a little more realistically with regard to the placing of our defence projects than they were during the last war. During the last war there was a complete concentration of our munitions industries, and generally our war industries in the two central provinces. They were pretty well bundled together, to the extent that in Ontario a power shortage was created as an aftermath of the war.

When the war ended, of course, all the industries were handed over to someone for very little money. The matter of decentralization of industry in the event of another emergency is a live issue in the United States today, and it should be a live issue in Canada.

The minister has been working through the Canadian Commercial Corporation, and he says that he intends to continue to do so. The machinery is not changing at all. All they are doing is changing the name of the body that is to do the purchasing under the same minister. Apparently that organization has been functioning for some time. I think the same trend that has been apparent over the years, namely, the concentrating of everything in the two central provinces, is being followed. This matter has been the subject of inquiry and investigation. The Dawson commission report on this very question is a strong indictment of this thing, with particular reference to the denuding of the maritimes and western Canada. The figures are there. I am not going to repeat them. Anyone can look them up.

What I am disappointed in is this. Recently the minister put out a report on private and public investment in Canada, outlook for 1950. On page 4 of the introduction to the report he sets out that there is a forecast of public and private investment amounting to $3.6 billion for 1950. In looking over the report I find that so far as Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick are concerned, their share, the total maritime share of that potential investment, is around 6.67 per cent—practically nothing.

In the light of international complications today we are wise in providing legislation that is workable in peacetime and could be used in an event of an emergency. I think the efforts of the department of munitions and supply in the concentration of industry in one spot that could be knocked out with a few bombs was unrealistic in the last war. I think too it was bad for the whole economy of the country. The terrific public investment made during the war in plant and industry across the country was lost in the aftermath of the war; it was practically given away to private industry. I am not objecting to this machinery. I am in hopes that, with the experience of the past and with the machinery that is being set up having to do with the regulation of public investment, in the event of an emergency some regard will be had to keeping the major industries decentralized so far as that may be possible, not only because of power and other factors, but because I think in the event of war you are going to be hit quickly from the air with something pretty powerful. If you have too much concentration in one spot it will be easy to knock it out overnight. The forecast of public and private investment for 1950 certainly does not indicate anything along these lines, because the same old concentration is taking place in the same two provinces.

I should like to endorse what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar had to say in emphasizing government ownership. You can call it nationalization, socialization, or whatever you like; I believe that the munitions industry, which will be created largely by government funds, should be in large measure under government control. The government should have control over the munitions industry in the event of wars and prior to war, because I believe there will always be wars as long as there is money to be made out of them.

I am not going to emphasize that matter now. We have discussed it time and time again. I have always been convinced that nobody should make any profit out of war. We are all in it together. You requisition the lives of the young people and send them to fight for the institutions of the country. Why should the fellow who stays at home make a lot of money? When the war is over, the blood, sweat and tears employed in it should be the payment in full. There should not be interest charges. But that is not the issue at this time. I wish to leave that thought with the minister when he proceeds to his discussions with those who are going to set up in this country plants and industry which may be used for defence purposes. That should be decentralized and scattered across the country to the greatest possible extent.

[Mr. Gillis.]

When we build plant and equipment for an emergency I think we should keep in mind what can be done with that plant and equipment after a war, so that we might level off the economy of the country. I am not opposed to the resolution. I believe that under circumstances such as exist today we must be ready for emergencies. It is not good enough to begin doing that after something hits us. The machinery should be ready now. I am accepting the minister's statement that this is merely a process of transferring the operations under the Department of Munitions and Supply Act to the Canadian Commercial Corporation, which seems to be doing a pretty good job.

I am not objecting to that; but I do object to the concentration of industry in the two central provinces. I say that is bad planning for defence, and I have risen at this time to focus the attention of the minister on that point.

Mr. Fulton: In connection with the explanation given by the minister a moment ago, I would suggest that the logical way to proceed would be to amend the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act. The minister has said there is no duplication, and that there is no change intended from the existing situation. Surely the existing situation is that the Canadian Commercial Corporation is at the present time the procurement agency, or the agency which makes contracts and enters into agreements with suppliers for acquiring and dealing with defence supplies, and for constructing or otherwise securing projects.

Those actual arrangements are entered into by the Canadian Commercial Corporation as agent, admittedly, of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. That is the present situation. In order to enable the present situation to continue, or to enlarge upon the pertinent provisions, some further legislation is necessary; surely that further legislation should be legislation modifying or enlarging or otherwise dealing with the powers of the Canadian Commercial Corporation. All one has to say is that the Minister of Trade and Commerce shall be responsible for the supervision of the Canadian Commercial Corporation, as obtains today.

However the corporation is the agency which does all these things. When it has those powers under the act that set it up, and then the same powers are given to the Minister of Trade and Commerce under a separate act, I do not see how it can be urged that there is no duplication.

Mr. Howe: I have great difficulty because I find I am to be condemned for doing either one thing or the other. I have been condemned by the opposition many times for establishing bureaucracy in this country. Under the present arrangement—

Mr. Fulton: Oh, may I make myself clear. I said that I was not questioning the merits or demerits of having the Canadian Commercial Corporation. Now we are discussing what to do with it.

Mr. Howe: But the hon. member is suggesting that the responsibility for the procurement of defence supplies be transferred from the minister to the corporation. Surely not if the hon. member is not advocating that there is no change required at all. The responsibility for the procurement of defence supplies rests with the Minister of Trade and Commerce today. Now, if the Minister of Trade and Commerce wishes to obtain the help of the Canadian Commercial Corporation in carrying out that responsibility, doing so does not relieve him of his responsibility. But if my hon. friend wishes to place the Canadian Commercial Corporation in the same relationship to the defence department as it now holds with respect to foreign governments, then he is creating a bureaucracy for the carrying out of a responsibility that is now carried out by a minister of the crown.

Mr. Fulton: When we discussed this matter the Minister of National Defence told us that the Canadian Commercial Corporation entered into contracts for the procurement of defence supplies required by his department. We were told that during the course of the discussion—and I am sure if I had time to do it I could find the place in Hansard where that was said.

Mr. Knowles: A few moments ago the Minister of Trade and Commerce made comments with regard to what was said by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar concerning the profit limitation in the Defence Purchases, Profits Control and Financing Act, 1939. I listened with interest to the explanation the minister gave as to why he felt that that particular formula for the limitation of profits in producing munitions and other war supplies was unworkable.

I would remind the minister that in 1939 the government itself took a very strong position that profits in war supplies should be controlled. The late Right Hon. Ian Mackenzie, then minister of national defence, who introduced the bill, went out of his way to make it clear that that was the government's position. He argued that the provisions of the bill then being presented to the house were stiffer in that regard than anything he could lay his hands on, and that the government was proud of that fact because it wished to make sure that profits would not be made in munitions and other war materials.

If the minister contends that that particular formula for limiting profits in war supplies is unworkable, is that any reason for throwing out altogether the principle of limiting or controlling profits in respect of defence purchases and supplies?

Mr. Howe: Far from doing that, the best protection the government can have is an experienced purchasing staff, a staff that knows the capacity of the country and its capacity for turning out anything the government wishes to buy, as well as the cost of operation of any industry. We are putting the ability and experience of Canadian Commercial Corporation in the position of safeguarding the public purse; and I can assure the hon. member that it is quite capable of carrying out that responsibility.

We give the government of 1939, of which I was a member, full marks for good intentions; nevertheless they attempted to legislate arbitrarily something that was not capable of being arbitrarily restricted. Had the act of 1939 governed buying during the war period there would have been no munitions effort in Canada, because in practice that legislation was found to be entirely unworkable—and not unworkable because of the greed of industry, as has been suggested by my hon. friends, but because it set up a formula in which there were too many unknown factors.

It was found impossible to determine the amount of capital required to carry out a given contract, or to devise a way by which it could be determined. For that reason the act proved unworkable.

Mr. Knowles: I accept the minister's explanation as to why he regarded that particular formula as unworkable. My question is this: Is there any other formula being put in the legislation, or do we depend entirely upon the ability, interest and concern in these matters of the men appointed to the defence supplies board and to the board of the Canadian Commercial Corporation?

Mr. Howe: Yes, that is the best, most practical and surest safeguard we know. That is the safeguard relied upon in the present act.

Mr. Knowles: The minister gave figures a while ago as to the over-all percentage of profits made during the war in relation to the cost of war supplies. I think the minister gave a figure of four and a fraction per cent, something under five per cent. Has he the comparable figure for the defence supplies purchased since the end of the war or for the period during which the Canadian Commercial Corporation has been doing this work?

Mr. Howe: No. It would be difficult to arrive at that unless you could work out the cost of every contract. We could do that during the war when the contracts were for large sums and when we had the machinery to put in cost accountants and determine the cost at the factory. When the profits were found to be excessive the contract was renegotiated and the profits recaptured. We have no machinery to do that today. Practically everything that is bought for defence purposes now is bought by tender.

Mr. Adamson: I gather from what has been said that if the Minister of National Defence wished to have a building constructed it would be done under this measure. Would that apply also to the construction of such works as radar screens and other purely military projects? As I recall, during the war there was a branch in the Department of National Defence which dealt with fortress construction because I used to know the colonel in charge. If that is so, this would appear to be a new departure in connection with national defence under which this agency would build all works for that department even though they were fortresses or for purely military purposes.

Mr. Howe: The Department of Trade and Commerce would place the contract for the construction of radar screens and for all other works for the defence services, as it did during the war, except such works as were carried out by arrangement with the Department of National Defence by its own troops. There was a construction battalion during the war, I think in both the army and air force, which did a certain amount of work by arrangement with the Department of Trade and Commerce. That would still be possible, but the act requires that all construction be procured through the agency of the Minister of Trade and Commerce except by special arrangement.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Howe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 302, respecting defence supplies and projects.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

THE REGULATIONS ACT

PROVISION FOR UNIFORM SYSTEM OF PUBLISHING REGULATIONS AND LAYING THEM BEFORE PARLIAMENT

The house resumed, from Wednesday, May 31, consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for the second reading of Bill No. 89, to provide for the publication of statutory regulations.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on May 31, when the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) moved the second reading of this bill, he explained the bill. I think it is only proper to say that we in this party are in agreement with the intentions of the bill as indicated by the Prime Minister. We feel that a real attempt has been made to place statutory orders, regulations, orders in council and so on, on a footing where it will be more feasible than it has been in the past for members and others interested to ascertain what is in the orders and regulations and how they are affected by them. However, there are one or two reservations which we have with respect to the bill and which I should like to indicate, and there are certain questions we would like the Prime Minister to answer when we are in the committee stage.

Although we now have a statute which as I read it provides for the consolidation of all effective orders and regulations up to the present time, and of which the Prime Minister tabled the first volume in the house recently, the bill goes on to provide for a system of consolidation of subsequent orders in council and regulations but the method by which that publication and consolidation is to be carried on is in turn to be left to order in council. We would have preferred if it had been possible to have had some specific provision in the bill as to how this was to be done and the basis upon which it was to be carried out. As the situation is at present, under section 9 there is provision for the future publication and consolidation, but that is left to the governor in council by regulation.

I do not refer to the fact that there are statutory requirements for publication in the Canada Gazette, for the laying on the table of parliament within certain statutory periods of regulations and orders in council, except such as may be excepted by order in council, but rather to such regulations governing future consolidations along the lines of the volume already tabled and which are to be left to order in council. I think it would have been desirable if at least an outline of that system could have been incorporated in the bill itself.

It is appreciated that this task of providing adequate publicity for orders in council and regulation and ensuring that all those who are affected shall have a chance to know what they are before they become law is a difficult one, and the whole problem of delegated legislation under present-day conditions of carrying on government is bound to be a difficult one. Therefore I think the Prime Minister and the house will appreciate the import of my remarks, that it would be desirable if we could have a statutory definition of how these things are to be published.

One will recall that in the past orders in council and regulations did not have the effect of law until they had been passed by the house in the form of a bill, not simply being tabled. Orders in council that had been laid upon the table were given second reading and it was only after they had been formally approved by the House of Commons that they had the force of law.

My authority for this statement is to be found at page 2382 of Hansard of May 22, 1918, where the following is to be found under the heading "Concurrence in orders in council":

Sir George Foster moved that the orders in council laid on the table of the house on the 2nd April, 1918, be concurred in. He said: The orders in council which have been issued and laid on the table form a long list of two pages. They are formal to a certain extent, but the law requires that these orders in council when passed shall be laid on the table of the house within a certain time.

That is the situation at the present time. Orders in council have to be laid on the table of the house generally fifteen days after they are passed, or if parliament be not then sitting, within fifteen days of the commencement of the next session. Then Sir George Foster continued:

I think they are not law until they are so laid on the table of the house, and thereafter if approved by the house.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier replied:

These orders in council, as I understand the law, have to be submitted to the house and ratified by the house.

Sir George Foster: Yes.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier: So I would suggest that my hon. friend allow this motion to stand until tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

That understanding was confirmed the next day when the matter again came before the house. The discussion is reported at page 2479 of Hansard for May 23, 1918, and reads as follows:

Sir George Foster: I move, seconded by Mr. Carvell:

"That the orders in council, copies of which were laid on the table of the house on the 2nd of April, be concurred in."

Sir Wilfrid Laurier: As a rule these orders in council are considered in committee of the whole because it is more convenient to discuss them in committee than with Mr. Speaker in the chair. I have looked at the orders in council referred to in the motion and I see nothing of any importance in them, so that possibly we can approve of them without going into committee, if my hon. friend will call attention to any particular one of them which may be of importance. As I am advised at present, and from a cursory glance at them, I see nothing objectionable. They appear to be in most respects merely technical orders in council.

I refer to that to show that the discussions we have had on the practice of order in council government and the dangers inherent therein are by no means to be passed over lightly because so seriously was it regarded at the end of the first world war that these orders in council and regulations, which were laid on the table of the house in pursuance of statutory requirements, did not in fact become law until concurrence of the house had been formally moved and granted. I am not going to go so far as to move an amendment to the bill at this time to incorporate in it any such provision, but I think it gives force to the suggestion that it would have been desirable if the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), while going as far as he has, after a great deal of careful study and consideration, to provide that orders in council and regulations will be fully known and understood so that those affected may know what laws they have to operate under, had gone a little further and provided in the bill he has introduced actual statutory provisions governing their publication and consolidation instead of leaving that in turn to be made the subject of an order in council. With these observations, however, I say that we concur in the bill and approve its objectives. We would like more information as to the classes or types of orders in council which it is intended to exempt by regulation from the provisions of this statute with regard to consolidation and publication. We would also like more information as to the method which it is proposed to follow in the future to provide for that consolidation and publication.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I will take only a moment or two because generally speaking this bill strikes us as a piece of good legislation. Indeed anything that makes it more clear to parliament and to the general public just what the laws of the land are is all to the good. We have got to the situation where regulations passed under statutes are far more numerous than the statutes themselves, and in the very nature of things they are a part of the law of the land. The two or three reservations mentioned by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) have been in my mind as well. I shall not take time to spell them out. He used almost the exact language that I had intended to use when he said he hoped that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) would give us a little clearer statement as to the classes of regulations which the government has in mind with reference to the clause providing for exemption from the requirement that all regulations be tabled and published.

In fact I noted when the Prime Minister made his speech on second reading of the bill he said that the publishing and tabling of all regulations would now be made compulsory, and I took it at the time that was an unequivocal statement. There is in the bill, however, the exemption clause, which we would like to have explained fully at some stage of the debate today. The other comment I should like to make is that I trust the bill will be passed in time for its effect upon a great host of statutes to reach the commission revising the statutes of Canada. I note that a good many statutes will have sections repealed or a few words struck out of a section, and I think it would be desirable when the Revised Statutes of Canada appear that those changes should be incorporated therein.

The Prime Minister might also say a word when he replies, or when we get into committee, with respect to the tabling of reports. When the legislation was first forecast, as a matter of fact by comments made by the Prime Minister during the last session, I thought it was going to cover both regulations passed under statutes and reports of departments that are laid on the table of the house each session. The same lack of uniformity applies in connection with those reports as in the case of regulations. The period of time within which a departmental report must be laid upon the table varies from ten days in some cases to fifteen in others, and longer periods in others. As a matter of fact I believe there are some departments which are not required by statute to place their reports on the table of the house, although I believe in most cases they do. It would seem to me that it is desirable that there should be uniformity in that regard as well. I would appreciate it if at some stage of the discussion the Prime Minister would indicate whether that matter has been given consideration, and with what result. I need not take longer because, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, generally speaking we think this is a piece of good legislation.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, it is said that order is the first law of heaven. I want to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on introducing this measure which is designed to make the parliament of Canada a little more heavenly. With the reservations that have been made so far, I want to tell the Prime Minister that we think this is a good piece of legislation. We certainly congratulate him on introducing it, and we support it.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker —

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must inform the house that if the Prime Minister speaks now he will close the debate.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): There is just a word I wish to say at this stage. Most of the remarks that have been made will form the subject of discussion when we are in committee on the sections of the bill. There are just two matters which it might be more appropriate to deal with at this time than in committee. The first is with respect to the citations from the 1918 Hansard read by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). They refer to something quite different from what we are talking about at the present time. They refer to orders in council which could not be effective until they had been ratified by parliament. Here we are dealing with the exercise by the governor in council or by other bodies of powers granted to them to make legislation in the form of their own decisions effective. That is something quite different. I have not looked at the orders in council involved in the reference made by the hon. member, but I would imagine they were for the continuation in force of wartime legislation made by order in council which could not continue without parliamentary action. That is quite different to what we have here. Here we are dealing with the exercise by the governor in council, or other bodies, of delegated authority, authority parliament has given them to make effective decisions of their own, and we want the public to be properly notified.

The second matter with which I think I should deal at this time is the question of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) as to reports of departments. An interdepartmental committee has been working on that matter. I did not think it was going to involve as much work as it appears to have involved; but we do want—not at this session, but as soon as possible—a statute dealing with such reports as are required to be tabled. A great many other things are tabled from time to time by the government without any express requirement that this be done, and the practice in that regard is being examined by this interdepartmental committee so that in the legislation we will introduce a distinction may be made as between those matters for which there is a statutory requirement as to tabling and those other matters which it may be found convenient to table for the information of hon. members but as to which there may not be any statutory requirement.

At the same time we are having this committee consider whether there is not quite a lot of duplication in the form of the reports that are tabled. We would like to avoid unnecessary duplication. It frequently happens that the departmental reports contain matters that have been made public already and which it is not necessary to reprint; because all those who retain these documents in their libraries find that in addition to the initial expense, space is a consideration that must be taken into account. We do not want unnecessary duplication if we can reasonably avoid it without inconvenience to any hon. member of the house or to the public; and that is being rather carefully considered.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to refer to a matter mentioned in the speech of the Prime Minister in which there appears to be some contradiction which might be cleared up. At page 3039 of Hansard the right hon. gentleman said:

> This procedure was established by order in council P.C. 4876 on the 26th of November, 1946, under authority conferred by section 30 of the Public Printing and Stationery Act.

At that point he was referring to the procedure of publication in the Canada Gazette. In the next paragraph the Prime Minister referred to the consolidation of such statutory orders and regulations in effect on December 1, 1949, as having been prepared and in the hands of the king's printer; that is the volume now before us. He then went on to say:

> The order in council to which I have just referred is known as "The statutory orders and regulations order, 1947."

In trying to follow the discussion I find myself at a loss because I am not sure whether there were two different orders in council, the one of November 26, 1946, and another in 1947, which I could not find, or whether the reference to the statutory orders and regulations order, 1947, should have read "1946".

Mr. St. Laurent: No, I think 1947 is correct. It was called the statutory orders and regulations order, 1947, because it was intended to operate as from January 1, 1947, and at that time it was intended to separate the ordinary notices in the official gazette from the statutory orders and regulations which were published in a different form.

With respect to this definition, I want to state again that we found it would not be possible or prudent to make statutory exemptions with respect to the application of this statute. We wanted it to include everything, to make it necessary for us to call attention to anything that was not going to be governed by it. So we said we would make it as sweeping as possible so it would apply to every kind of order that has legislative effect, made under authority given by parliament; and if we wanted to take anything out of that general, sweeping declaration we would have to call attention to what we were taking out so if there should be any controversy as to whether it should be in or out the matter would be brought to the attention of hon. members and the public. This would apply to a great many things if we did not make exceptions. It would apply, for instance, to all the orders given from time to time from the control towers at our airfields. Of course no one would want those published in permanent form, for they operate once and are spent. We have quite a variety of things of that character which are spent immediately, and which will be excepted from the application of this act.

This legislation will apply not only to the regulations made by the government, either the governor in council, treasury board, or boards or commissions set up by parliament. It will apply to regulations made by railway companies, for instance, if those regulations, by virtue of federal legislation, have the sanction of a penalty in the form of a fine or imprisonment. Railways make bylaws for the proper conduct of their passengers. If those bylaws are sanctioned, by virtue of a federal statute, by a penalty in the form of a fine or imprisonment for violation, they will have to be registered and published. We thought it desirable to have something comprehensive, that could be relied upon as containing the complete picture of the things having the force of this parliament behind them, and that we would have to specifically indicate everything that was not going to be included in the general, sweeping assertion.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. Fulton: Would the Prime Minister tell us why it was decided to exempt from the definition of "regulation" the classification under subparagraph (v)— > —a rule, order or regulation governing the practice or procedure in any proceedings before a judicial tribunal.

I imagine those of greatest interest would be the rules of procedure in the Supreme Court of Canada and the Exchequer Court of Canada, and I wondered why it was decided to exempt them from publication.

Mr. St. Laurent: They are required to be published otherwise, and are available in a separate booklet from the king's printer. That is the reason these rules of practice are made by the supreme court, by the exchequer court, by the board of transport commissioners and by the income tax appeal board, and they are available separately for the convenience of those who practise before those tribunals; they can be obtained separately. It was felt that they would not be of general interest to the public at large. They are of special interest to those who practise before those courts but they are not of general interest to the public at large.

Mr. Fulton: Then they have not in the past been published in the Canada Gazette? Is that the case?

Mr. St. Laurent: They are published in the Canada Gazette, but they will not be treated in the same manner as the ordinary statutes and regulations that are of general interest to the public and they will not be put into the consolidation of those orders and regulations.

Mr. Low: They will continue to be published?

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes; they will continue to be published.

Mr. Fulton: I can appreciate the fact that it would not be necessary to put them in this consolidation, they having appeared in the Canada Gazette and being, as the Prime Minister says, generally available to those who are in practice before the courts in question. But as I understand it the effect of providing that a regulation does not include a rule, order or regulation governing the practice or procedure or any proceedings before a judicial tribunal, or in other words of providing that the rules of procedure and practice in the supreme court and in the exchequer court are not regulations, will exempt them now from the provision of section 6 which provides as follows:

> Every regulation shall be published in English and in French in the Canada Gazette within thirty days after it is made.

What concerned us was whether the effect of that will not be to prohibit them from being published in the Canada Gazette or to make it questionable whether they should be, since they are not now classed as regulations which must be published in the Canada Gazette.

Mr. St. Laurent: Those orders and rules of practice have to be published under statute at the present time, and the provisions of the statute requiring their publication are not being repealed in this schedule. This schedule does not repeal the existing law requiring the form of publication for these court orders or rules of practice.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he can make a little bit clearer to me the reason why the conjunction "or" comes at the end of section 2(a) (i) and not "and"?

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. St. Laurent: Because there are orders that we wish to have come under the provisions of this statute which are not made by government agencies such as, for instance, those made by the board of directors of a railway company with respect to the conduct of the passengers on their trains. Suppose they are regulations the infringement of which is punishable by fine or imprisonment under a section of the Railway Act. We want those included. If we used "and" they would not be included unless they were orders made by the kind of government agency described in one of the subsections.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That is what puzzled me. Would you not call a railway company a "corporation"?

Mr. Knowles: Not the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Oh, I understand.

Mr. St. Laurent: It is not a corporation representing the government.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Now I understand. Thank you.

Sections 3, 4 and 5 inclusive agreed to.

On section 6—Publication in Canada Gazette.

Mr. Knowles: Will the Prime Minister indicate what will be the situation as between the Canada Gazette, part I, and the Canada Gazette, part II, after this bill passes? Will part II continue to be published? Will it be under that name or some other name?

Mr. St. Laurent: That has not been determined. I would not like to commit the government at this time to what will be found to be the most practicable form to carry out the provisions of this legislation.

Mr. Knowles: I suppose the same answer would be given, when we get over to it, with respect to the regulations and classes of regulations that are exempted from the provisions of the bill and which are thereby required to be published in the Canada Gazette; that is a matter to be worked out later, I take it. It might be in the main volume or it might be in a supplementary volume.

Mr. St. Laurent: In a supplementary volume.

Mr. Fulton: Subsection 3 of this section 6 provides:

> No regulation is invalid by reason only that it was not published in the Canada Gazette . . .

Then it goes on to provide that no person shall be convicted of an offence unless it was proved that the regulation was exempted from publication, and that reasonable steps had been taken to bring it to the notice of the person affected. I would not ask the Prime Minister to tell us or to attempt to tell us here what would be accepted as evidence of "reasonable" in a court of law. That is not the implication of my question. I would ask him, however, if he would tell us what steps are considered reasonable by the government and what steps are in fact taken to bring to the attention of the persons affected such regulations as are not published?

Mr. St. Laurent: Because of the sweeping terms of the definition "regulations", it will include all sorts of orders; and it may be that, for instance, some regulation of a railway company had not been published and the penalty for infringement sanctioned by a section of the Railway Act is fine or imprisonment. If it had not been published, and there had not been, to the satisfaction of the court, the publicity given to it that made the offender a voluntary offender, the court would not convict.

In these matters I think it is better not to attempt to bind the courts down too tightly. I think this statute will show that it was not the intention of parliament that everything be published, and that considerable discretion should be left to the court, if one was prosecuted under an order that was not published, in determining whether or not the offender should be looked upon as having done something that he knew was wrong. I think it is preferable to leave that.

Then the circumstances may vary. There might be an occasion when there would be a question about the regularity of registration and publication. The hon. member will notice that we require the order to be sent to the clerk of the privy council to be recorded, and then the publication is required to be made within a certain time after that is done. A question might arise, although it had been published in the official gazette, as to whether it was done within the proper time after the recording in the privy council office. I think it is better to leave it to the courts to apply in a manner that will make it workable rather than to be too specific about it. If something had been published simultaneously with the recording or if it had been sent to the official gazette at the same time at it was sent to the privy council, and if as a matter of fact it were established that the clerk of the privy council had not recorded it until the day after it was published in the Gazette, the question might arise whether that was compliance with the statute. I think those matters should be left for the common-sense determination of those presiding over the courts.

Mr. Fulton: I appreciate the principle that the Prime Minister has suggested. What limited experience I have had does suggest that courts, on the other hand, have great difficulty in interpreting the word "reasonable" in a statute such as this. I am thinking particularly of an instance where a regulation is in the exempted class, and it is not necessary to publish in the Gazette. It will be difficult to say what are the reasonable steps which should have been taken to bring it to the attention of the person affected. I am wondering whether the Prime Minister would consider putting the onus more upon the authority publishing the regulation to bring it to the attention of the person affected. If the words "all necessary steps" were substituted here for the words "reasonable steps" so that it would read:

Unless

(b) it is proved that at the date of the alleged contravention all necessary steps had been taken—

—and so on, that would bring the matter to the attention of the person affected. I think these words would clearly establish not only the onus of proving that it had been brought to his attention but the necessity of taking the steps necessary to bring it to his attention would be on the body making the order or the regulation.

Mr. St. Laurent: Let me suggest this case. An order goes out from a control tower in an airfield to a plane that is coming in, and the apparatus in that plane is not in a position to receive the message; and because of the neglect of the pilot, or of the owner of the plane, he is not in a position to receive the message. Well, the sending of the message would not be all the necessary steps to bring it to his attention. What would have been necessary to bring it to his attention would have been an inspection of the plane to make sure that there was a private receiving apparatus in his plane. Well, that would not be reasonable. Today if one attempts to use public airfields one is supposed to be in a position to receive the directions that come from the control towers. I think that no court would find it difficult to say that it would not be an excuse for him to say: "Well, my receiving set was out of order and that is why I did not comply with the order I got from the control tower." These orders from the control towers will certainly be in the exempted class.

Regulations Act

On section 9—Governor in council may make regulations.

Mr. Knowles: With respect to subsection 2 of section 9 which deals with exemptions, may I ask the minister this question? Am I correct in assuming that when an order has been passed exempting a class of regulations from being published, that order is published in the Canada Gazette once and that is the end of it so far as that class is concerned? For example, if an order is passed which prevents the control tower messages from being published, that will hold for all time or until a change is made.

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: But in the case of individual regulations which may be of a temporary character, every time an order is passed exempting that particular individual regulation from being published, that exempting order will have to be published.

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: So that about all it amounts to in these individual cases is that you are publishing it in a way that is not permanent; you are publishing it in the Canada Gazette rather than in the consolidated volume.

Mr. St. Laurent: No; the exempting order will be published, and it may be merely a temporary order. For instance, at Chalk River there may be an order made that a certain area for a certain number of weeks would be out of bounds. It might be felt that for security reasons it was inadvisable to call the attention of the general public to that. No one could be prosecuted under that unless it had been brought to his attention. But if it were at Chalk River, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and I as member for Quebec East would not be interested at all. It would have to be shown that there had been indications in the immediate locality bringing that order to the attention of those who might be affected by it.

We had quite a discussion over the necessity of even publishing the order made exempting such things because of their security implications; but the decision was that we wanted to give as complete information as possible, and that we would have to take the risk. If there was something of a legislative character that was not going to be published we would have to take the risk of describing it as an excepting order, and we would have to make the excepting order public so that all members of parliament could question the propriety of our doing it. We wanted in no way to call attention to everything that was not going to come under the general provisions of the statute.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. Knowles: So that it is clear that there cannot be any completely secret regulations. The regulations themselves can be secret, but only by virtue of an order in council passed under this subsection which exempts those regulations from being published?

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes, and you will have to make the exemption public. It may be that in certain cases we will have to use terms perfectly innocuous to attract as little attention as possible to anything that we think should not be talked about; but nevertheless it will be on the table of parliament, and if hon. members choose to talk about it, it will be their privilege to do so.

Mr. Fulton: I appreciate the fact that the Prime Minister does not want to tie his nor the government's hands with respect to future plans; but I wonder whether he can indicate the type of program for consolidation and publication he has in mind. In his speech on May 31 he said, as reported at page 3039 of Hansard:

> A consolidation of such statutory orders and regulations in effect on December 31, 1949, has been prepared and is in the hands of the king's printer.

Then he refers to the fact that not all of them are to be published in the form of the volume which was tabled. With respect to the future he said:

> Then we would have a systematized regular form for publishing anything new, so that it would be easier for all those who ought to be informed to know that, if it is not in such and such a place, it does not exist, and there is no need for taking into account anything that is not in this consolidation or that has not been published in the form called for by this bill.

That seems to me to indicate that the Prime Minister had in mind a form of publication. If I am right I should like to ask him what is the form? Is it the same as the one which I hold in my hand, and at what intervals is it proposed at present that they should be published in the future?

Mr. St. Laurent: There has been no decision in that regard. It has appeared to me that it would be desirable to have yearly, for a certain number of years, supplements to those five bulky volumes. I do not think it would be a proper expenditure of public money to republish these things too frequently; but I think there should be an annual supplement referring to the first consolidation just as we have in these indexes of case law every ten years or so a new issue and then yearly we get a supplement referring to such a page of the last publication and adding to or commenting upon whatever change has been made with respect to the matter disclosed on that page. I am not putting that forth as something that has as yet been decided upon by the government, but it has been considered and it is the desire to do something practical.

One suggestion has been that we follow what has been found to be practicable by those law publishers with respect to consolidated digests of case law.

Mr. Fulton: Once a year.

Mr. St. Laurent: Once a year.

Mr. Fulton: It will not be in any sense a new consolidation; it will be a supplement bringing it up to date?

Mr. St. Laurent: I would not like to say that it will be this or it will be that. We are considering at the present time doing something which will not involve republishing too frequently these bulky volumes, and which nevertheless will be a handy instrument at the disposal of those who wish to see what has happened to whatever is contained in the bulky volumes.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

259. General administration, $1,687,155.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Departmental administration, $293,670.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Mr. Chairman, first I should like to pay a compliment to one of the staff of the Department of Agriculture.

An hon. Member: The minister?

Mr. Ross (Souris): I am never too uncomplimentary about him, although I do entirely disagree with his policy.

On this occasion I refer to Dr. Archibald, who was honoured recently, and who is head of the experimental farms throughout Canada from coast to coast. He has had a long record in the public service. When he was designated a year ago as the No. 1 farmer in Canada some difference of opinion was expressed from different parts of the nation. I have known this gentleman for a number of years; indeed I was associated with him in connection with P.F.R.A. before coming to Ottawa, in some of the very good work that organization did. I say without fear of successful contradiction that Dr. Archibald has earned for himself, without any argument, the title of No. 1 farmer in Canada.

He has been either head of or associated with the experimental farms for some thirty-three years. As most people will understand, these farms carry out research in connection with agriculture, and have performed a great service for the country. I have never known a public official with a greater knowledge of the problems with which he has been working, or one with more zeal and energy than Dr. Archibald.

In addition to the valuable work he did in connection with P.F.R.A. one must not forget the great service he has given in connection with the exhibitions held in the different provinces of Canada. Most people realize that those exhibitions are the show windows of agricultural communities. We have the Royal Winter Fair, which is recognized as the show place of Canadian agriculture, held every fall in Toronto.

As we have learned through the newspapers, this splendid public servant is due for retirement this year. I make this urgent request of the Minister of Agriculture, that while Dr. Archibald may be due for retirement, because of his vast knowledge of agriculture and the work he has done to assist that industry, his services be retained for some time to come. I make that request of the minister because I am sure Dr. Archibald could render a very useful service in the department, with that zeal and energy he has always applied to his task. I hope the minister will give serious consideration to retaining the services of this most valuable public servant who is now in his department.

Having said that, I turn to a matter in which I shall have to be somewhat more critical. This has to do with a question I placed on the order paper which was passed as an order for return. That return is contained in sessional paper 4E of Tuesday, May 16, and is as follows:

1. Is freight assistance on western feed grains granted in Canada beyond Fort William, Ontario or Vancouver, British Columbia?

2. If so, where to?

3. Are milling companies or feed companies permitted freight assistance or drawback on freight on oats or coarse grains purchased or handled by them?

4. If so, what companies during 1948 and 1949 obtained freight assistance or drawback on coarse grains and what amounts?

The attached information has been received by the Secretary of State of Canada from the Department of Agriculture.

Answer:

1. Freight assistance is paid on feed grain shipped from Fort William to all eastern provinces, and from Edmonton and Calgary to points in British Columbia.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Freight assistance is paid to wholesale handlers of feeds and feed grain on submission of proof that—

(1) The grain has been shipped and the freight paid.

(2) That the grain has been sold to a consumer, retail dealer or co-operative and

(3) That the consumer or retail buyer has been allowed the freight assistance claimed by the wholesaler.

4. Answered by No. 3.

I suggest this need not have been a motion for return; rather it could have been answered by the minister. Was not question No. 4 properly drawn? If it was, why was it not answered?

Mr. Gardiner: My recollection was that there were names attached to the answer. However I shall look into it, and if it is not complete I shall complete it after the dinner recess.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I have never received an answer, despite the fact that I raised the question in debate on another matter to show that we have had difficulty in securing answers to our questions.

Since that time I have been checking the public accounts as they are set out in the Auditor General's report for the year ending March, 1949. In that part of the report dealing with the Department of Agriculture I have found the following statement of expenditures for freight assistance since the inception of the policy:

	1948-49	Total to date
Grain shipped to:
Eastern Canada	$16,015,428.67	$109,622,840.10
British Columbia ...	1,705,387.51	12,318,958.27
		$121,941,798.37
Refunds credited to previous years' war and demobilization expenditures		22,551.56
	$17,720,816.18	$121,919,246.81

These figures do not answer precisely the question I asked, because they refer to the fiscal year, whereas I referred to the calendar year. There will be a great deal more since that time because this policy has been continued since over a year ago. It will run well over that figure at this time.

I checked further down on the page to see what companies received the larger amounts and it is rather strange that these companies are the Lake of the Woods Milling Company, Ogilvie Flour Mills Company Limited, Purity Flour Mills Limited, Quaker Oats of Canada Limited, Robin Hood Flour Mills Limited and a number of smaller companies. Here are some of the amounts received, according to the Auditor General's report:

Ogilvie Flour Mills	$781,231.78
Purity Flour Mills	727,462.08
Robin Hood Flour Mills	817,934.50
Quaker Oats	597,844.01
Lake of the Woods	622,165.50
Maple Leaf Milling Company	1,221,038.00
Toronto Elevators	1,695,256.78

Then payments were made to the Hiram Walker Grain Corporation, Walkerville; the St. Lawrence Flour Mills, Montreal, and many others. I do not suppose there is any connection, but the first four names I have mentioned happen to be the first four milling companies mentioned in the report on the flour milling industry by the combines investigation commissioner.

Mr. Gardiner: Only because they are the largest mills.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I pointed out that they were the large mills and I am not saying that there is any connection. There is some rather interesting evidence in that report about these companies quite apart from the fact that they are the largest. I well recall early in September, 1947, when the price ceiling was still on, that dairy people and livestock feeders in my part of the country found it impossible to purchase feed. It is interesting to point out that one of these officials happened to be the controller of flour and feed at that particular time. Immediately the price ceiling came off on September 15, 1947, these people were able to get all the feed they wanted by the carload. That was the situation where I lived.

Mr. Gardiner: On a point of order, I have no objection to what my hon. friend is saying but I think he should say it on item 30. It is a little difficult to keep on hand all the information with regard to every item so that it will be available when we are dealing with the administration item. A general discussion is quite in order on this item and this is the third day that the general discussion has been going on. It is going to be rather difficult if we are going to have a discussion on each item at this time.

It is quite evident that these are the large milling companies who deliver feed to other persons and naturally they send in vouchers and the payment is made to them on account of freight, which they pass on to the individual who secures the grain. I think it would be much better to take up the items in order and as we come to them I shall be glad to answer the questions.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I raised this because it was a matter of administration. This practice has been followed in connection with other departments. I worded my question very pointedly and I did not receive the information.

Mr. Gardiner: It is quite all right on this administration item to ask why you did not get the information, but I would only have to guess at the answer if you start to discuss matters which should be taken up on a particular item.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I shall give the minister an opportunity to have these facts before him and at hand when we come to that item. I have simply quoted what is a matter of public record. I should like now to refer to a newspaper article which I am not going to say is authentic because we do get newspaper reports that are not correct. There has been nothing less than consternation over the cost of feed. This matter has been raised by eastern members and I want to put the figures on record. If this matter has been drawn to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture or other ministers I am surprised that nothing has been done about it. I quote from the Financial Times of April 28, 1950, as follows:

> What has been described as a nigger in the woodpile was handed us.

And again:

> Here is how my Montreal expert, Dr. Bose-Schlecht, describes the manoeuvre:
> "This week a grain merchant in Montreal shipped one carload of oats to Newfoundland. Drawback on the freight over $700. Dealer is reimbursed by the government—but is the consumer benefited?
> The dealer declares that the whole thing is one of the biggest scandals of recent years. Dairies, paper companies, purchasers of feeds all benefit. But does the small stock raiser who was supposed to get assistance ever get it? That is up to the retail dealer."

Then later on it goes on to say:

> Dr. Bose-Schlecht goes on to say: "The big thing as I understand it is that Montreal millers making oatmeal, etc., bring down supplies as 'feed'. A well known Montreal figure runs the lobby with his old pal (name omitted) and it is all for the farmer at both ends of the line, the grower in the west and the stock feeder in the east."

I want to make it quite clear that I do not suggest that the "name omitted" refers to the minister.

Mr. Gardiner: The obvious answer to that question is that the gentleman who is apparently giving the information is himself the culprit; he must have been the man who puts in the vouchers.

Mr. Ross (Souris): The article goes on:

> But as I heard it, at least at the receiving end—most of the benefits, that is to say, dollars, are going to people who can rebate to the party campaign fund. Liberal party that is.
> And of course it was only justified in the first place as a wartime measure to increase production of meat in eastern Canada and now Newfoundland is in it. And the war has been over for years.

We all know that it has been over for some five years.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend knows also that that is just ordinary, rank political twaddle because there is no way in which any money of that kind could get into the campaign fund unless the farmers who receive it are using it to elect a government which has done something they wanted done.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I made it quite clear that I was not taking any responsibility for the article, but it is a newspaper article which people have read. The facts and figures I dealt with are to be found in the report of the Auditor General or in the report on the flour milling industry by the combines commissioner. I took no authority for those figures. I come back again to my original question to the minister as to why I did not get the definite answers I asked for and which have a direct bearing on the figures I gave.

Mr. Gardiner: The proper answer under the rules of this house would be to refer the hon. member to the documents he has mentioned. Hon. members are not supposed to ask questions of that kind, to ask for information which can be obtained from a government blue book.

Mr. Ross (Souris): That would not have been a proper answer because the report of the Auditor General only takes us up to March 31, 1949. If the minister will read my questions he will see that I asked for information covering the calendar years 1948 and 1949. You cannot get information with regard to the calendar year 1949 from any book. The department would be the only place to get that.

Mr. Catherwood: Could the minister give the details of the $10,000 for the delegation of technical agriculturists to Canada from the United Kingdom?

Mr. Gardiner: That is a return visit of British technical men. We sent over a delegation of seven last year. They examined activities over there and reported back. This year the British are sending seven to this country.

Mr. Fulton: What international agricultural conferences is it expected we will attend this year?

Mr. Gardiner: I do not know just which we will attend. I could probably give some information about those we might be expected to attend. Of course one would be

FAO, and there are others. The continuing committee, which has an agricultural representative on it, will be meeting shortly in London. We will probably have a representative there but we do not send representatives to all the conferences that are held. We will probably send delegations to the usual number, which is not more than five or six.

Mr. Fulton: You said that you will probably send delegations to the usual number. Did you actually spend the $16,000 last year? Perhaps we could get away with a little less this year.

Mr. Gardiner: I understand not all of it was spent last year.

Mr. Fulton: How much?

Mr. Gardiner: As to FAO I am told that the amount of $16,000 was allotted to this department, but we must pay the expenses of all those who attend that particular conference. They may not all be people from the Department of Agriculture. Finance, fisheries and a number of other departments are represented at that organization.

Mr. Fulton: What has happened to the director in chief of agricultural services? Has there been any change in the classification or have the services of that officer been disposed of?

Mr. Gardiner: He is the new deputy minister who happens to be sitting at the table.

Item agreed to.

2. Information service, $316,495.

Mr. Fulton: Referring to the details of this item at page 73, may I ask the minister what is the reason for the inclusion of an amount of $45,000 for the production of films?

Mr. Gardiner: It was in supplies and materials last year, and it is set up as a separate item this year.

Mr. Fulton: Is that paid to the national film board? Do they produce your films for you?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Since this item deals with the information service, I wonder if it would be an opportune time to ask the minister if any part of the extra expense is owing to the fact that Newfoundland is now the tenth province? Have you any such establishment there?

Mr. Gardiner: A small part of it will be for Newfoundland, but there are other things as well. For greater efficiency in administration the information service was established by order in council P.C. 12/4847 of September 21, 1949, to take over the work of the former publicity and extension division, the departmental library, and such other units as might be assigned. The former publicity and extension division had thirty-eight permanent and seventeen temporary positions, making a total of fifty-five, while the departmental library had five permanent and ten temporary positions, a total of fifteen. This made a grand total of seventy positions in the units so grouped. The present authorized positions for the information service number seventy-three, indicating a net increase in positions of three, as follows: bilingual information officer; exhibits technician transferred from national film board; and exhibits technician appointed new.

Those are the changes that have been made in organization. Comparing the estimate with that of the former publicity and extension division, there is an apparent increase in the estimate of the information service of just under $74,000. This is made up as follows: (a) increase in printing and stationery vote to cover general increased costs of paper, etc., and to provide for payment of 8 per cent sales tax not formerly charged, $5,000; (b) transfer from general administration of the vote covering the library's purchase of books and periodicals and costs of binding, which for 1950-51 is estimated at $13,000; (c) salary increases due to (1) transfer from general administration of the library staff; (2) provision for salaries of the three new positions above; (3) increases in salary provisions for the service as a whole due to ordinary statutory increases, reclassifications and salary revisions, $57,000.

As to the change in setting out the item for films, the new item for documentary film production is $45,000. This actually represents a reduction of $2,000 for this purpose from the previous fiscal year, as it was formerly part of the item for acquisition of material, which now stands at $5,000 compared with $52,000 last year, a net provision in that year for film production of $47,000. In other words, the total amount is reduced by $2,000 but it appears here as a new item although it is expended elsewhere.

Mr. Bryce: I do not know whether I am on the right item, but I want to talk about advertising in Great Britain. Does that come under the Minister of Trade and Commerce or would it come under this item? I refer to the advertising of agricultural products.

Mr. Gardiner: We do not do the advertising in Great Britain. That is done by the Department of Trade and Commerce. It does not come under any item in this department.

Mr. Bryce: I think we should convince the people of Great Britain that United States bacon is not Canadian bacon, and that Canadian bacon is a far superior product.

Mr. Gardiner: When I came here fifteen years ago I had the idea of trying to put that into effect. The house and others raised the kind of objection that has been raised during the present session, namely, that there was an overlapping of expenditure, that it ought to be done by the department. It was put under trade and commerce, and I have not had anything to do with it since.

Mr. Bryce: It is absolutely necessary that it should be done in order to help us to sell our agricultural products in the British market. When over there last year I was surprised to see on a couple of occasions that Canadian new-laid eggs were being sold in Glasgow and London. We have to do something more than that. That is quite a job when you consider that these new-laid eggs came from western Canada. If we can prove to these people how rapidly we can transport the eggs and the facilities we have for keeping them cool so that they will not deteriorate in any way, we will be getting some place. I will raise the matter on the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Catherwood: Is the farm broadcast over the C.B.C. covered in this item for information service?

Mr. Gardiner: No, the costs are not covered here. We supply them with material but we have nothing to do with the costs.

Item agreed to.

3. Advisory committee on agricultural services, $5,000.

Mr. Fulton: Will the minister say a word about this committee? Who are its members and whom do they advise?

Mr. Knowles: And does he take the advice?

Mr. Ross (Souris): He has probably taken too much sometimes.

Mr. Gardiner: I have read this into the record each year for about fifteen years, and I wish someone would memorize it; it is not very difficult. The chairman is the Minister of Agriculture for Canada, and the committee is made up of the ministers of agriculture of all the provinces.

Mr. Fulton: Whom do they advise?

Mr. Gardiner: Would you like the names?

Mr. Fulton: No, but this seems rather odd. It is called an advisory committee, but whom does it advise?

Mr. Gardiner: Those men form the committee. The advisory committee is made up of the deputies of the same departments.

Item agreed to.

4. Contributions to commonwealth bureaux, $56,821.

Mr. Catherwood: Is this an empire organization set up for the purpose of pooling information on scientific agricultural advances? Would the minister outline the duties of this body and how this estimate is made up, as far as the commonwealth countries are concerned?

Mr. Gardiner: The commonwealth bureau of biological control is an organization that has its headquarters in Ottawa now. Prior to the war it was in London, but it was moved here and still operates here. The others are all in England. The headquarters of the bureau of biological control are now in the science service building at the dominion experimental farm, Ottawa. This building houses the Canadian division of entomology, including the national insect collections. It is now the headquarters of the biological control investigations unit of the division of entomology, the chief of which is Mr. A. B. Baird. Substations of the bureau are now located in the dominion parasite laboratory at Belleville, Ontario, the citrus experimental station at Riverside, California, the imperial college of tropical agriculture in Trinidad, in Montevideo, Uruguay, and Zurich, Switzerland. Agents and temporary assistants are handling projects for the bureau in many parts of Europe. The bureau is prepared to supply information on the natural enemies of insect and plant pests or in regard to any questions relating to work in the field of biological control. I think that information will give a general idea of the work being done.

5. Science service administration, $1,229,750.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): How much was spent last year for co-operative investigations? That is the last item on page 74 of the details.

Mr. Gardiner: I presume the hon. member is referring to co-operative marketing organizations?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It just says "co-operative investigations."

Mr. Gardiner: I understand we are still on item No. 4, so it is not the last item in this vote; but it has to do with work carried on in the universities.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The item now before the committee is No. 5, science service administration.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I wonder if the minister could tell us what sort of investigations are being carried on, whether they are in connection with marketing, producing or what?

Mr. Gardiner: This is the scientific work carried on in the laboratories of universities, where they have equipment to do things we cannot do here at the central farm or elsewhere. We make arrangements with these universities right across Canada to carry on such work. I do not know whether it is generally understood, but some of the universities in Canada have their agricultural colleges right on the same campus with the other university institutions. That is true in Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and British Columbia. Some of the others have their agricultural colleges at other points.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It has nothing to do with co-operative marketing or producing, then?

Mr. Gardiner: No, not with what are generally understood as co-operative organizations. It is co-operation between the universities and ourselves.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): What is the explanation for the increase?

Mr. Gardiner: It is only about $900 higher, and is accounted for principally by increases in salary.

Mr. Catherwood: Under this item I see an amount of $984,950 for the acquisition or construction of buildings and works. That is quite an expenditure. Would the minister give us an idea where this money is to be spent?

Mr. Gardiner: Those are the buildings that are to be put up at different places, one at London, another at Kentville and another at Ste. Anne de la Pocatiere. They are buildings with which we are assisting which do not properly belong under any of the other general votes.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Does this concern the new building you have put up at the university of Western Ontario?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

6. Animal and poultry pathology, $388,640.

Mr. Pearkes: During the last few months the flocks on Vancouver island have been attacked by Newcastle disease, which apparently has been brought over from the Fraser valley. During April I asked whether it would be practicable to make Vancouver island a protected area, a request which had been sent to me by the farmers' institute. I was told at that time that the disease was well in hand, but now it has broken out at half a dozen places on the island. Last year the pathological laboratory at Saanichton was closed and moved over to Vancouver. Is there an adequate number of veterinaries now available to cope with this disease, and will the minister consider permitting vaccines to be used in the way I understand they are used in the northwestern states?

Mr. Gardiner: I would prefer to deal with that question under item 17, the administration of animal contagious diseases. However, I may say it is being dealt with rather effectively. Of course, as always occurs in such outbreaks, there are some unexpected things happening along the way, but they think they have it fairly well under control.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Catherwood: Can the minister tell us what progress is being made in research looking toward the elimination of coccidiosis in poultry? I should also like to know how many animal and poultry pathology laboratories there are across Canada.

Mr. Gardiner: There are Macdonald College, Hull, Ottawa, Lethbridge, Vancouver, and Sackville.

Mr. Catherwood: I should also like to know what progress is being made in research with regard to the elimination of coccidiosis in poultry.

Mr. Gardiner: I am sorry, but we do not appear to have a record of it here; but it is proceeding.

Mr. Catherwood: Would the minister be able to get that information later?

Mr. Gardiner: We can get it later.

7. Bacteriology and dairy research, $177,305.

Mr. Catherwood: On this item—

Mr. Gardiner: I wish my hon. friend would speak out. I cannot hear anything he is saying.

Mr. Catherwood: I think this matter of dairy research is an extremely important service; and every effort should be made to develop new uses for dairy products. If there were an increase in the estimates for further research in this matter, I think it would be greatly justified. I would suggest that a further increase in the amount for this purpose should be given serious consideration.

Mr. Fulton: Can the minister tell us what new equipment and so on it is intended to acquire that accounts for the $35,000 increase in this item over last year?

Mr. Gardiner: It is practically all for equipment for the London laboratory and for the research branch here at Ottawa.

Mr. Charlton: I do not know whether this is the proper item under which to take the matter up, but I think that you, Mr. Chairman, and all other members of the committee will realize that there has been a considerable change in the ice cream, especially that which we have been getting in the parliamentary restaurant and cafeteria within the last year or so. There is a good consistency about any bulk ice cream that we get but as to the bricks and the "MelOrols" particularly, when they get a little bit soft there is practically nothing left; it seems to be half air. Can the minister tell us what the requirements are as to the butterfat content and the solid content of ice cream and whether there is any difference in that requirement for bricks or "MelOrols" and for the bulk ice cream.

Mr. Gardiner: They are all the same; that is, there is no difference between bricks and other forms. The regulation is that the butterfat content shall be—I am not absolutely certain, but I think it was 14 per cent before the war. Then we reduced it to 9 per cent and we put it back to either 13 per cent or 14 per cent but I think it is the same as it was before the war.

Mr. Charlton: How about the solids?

Mr. Gardiner: They are on the same basis as they were before the war.

Mr. Charlton: Then what accounts for the difference in this ice cream, as between the bulk ice cream and the bricks and "MelOrols"?

Mr. Gardiner: I suppose it will depend somewhat on where you are eating the ice cream. Some people may provide you with ice cream that is even above the minimum requirements, and some do not.

Mr. Knowles: Not in the cafeteria.

Mr. Charlton: If it is the same brand of ice cream, no matter where you get it, it is all the same.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Gardiner: Oh, no.

8. Botany and plant pathology, $1,343,687.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to ask the minister a question with regard to little cherry disease. This is a matter of great interest to cherry growers in the interior of British Columbia. In the minister's report there is a brief account of what is being done in that respect. I think the investigation is of such great importance to the fruit industry in British Columbia that the report should contain a more detailed explanation of the work that is being done. I should like to ask the minister what has been done to date, and if it would be possible to obtain a fairly detailed report with regard to the research, and the success, to date, with respect to little cherry disease.

Mr. Gardiner: The report which I have here on little cherry disease indicates that it is caused by a virus and that it continues to spread in the Kootenay and Arrow lake districts, as revealed by surveys conducted by dominion and provincial officials. The insertion of buds from diseased cherry trees into peach, prune, apricot, choke cherry and wild cherry and of buds of peach, prune and choke cherry growing near diseased cherry trees into healthy trees, and the artificial pollination of healthy cherry trees with pollen from diseased trees all failed to produce any clear-cut symptom the following year, as it would be expected if the little cherry disease had been transmitted. A tree-to-tree survey was conducted in the Okanagan valley by provincial officials, with assistance from the staff of the Summerland laboratory of plant pathology, and which covered all the southern part and up to the end, including Kelowna. No tree with definite symptoms of little cherry disease was found. One tree in the Oliver district was removed on suspicion.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The other day, in answer to a question, the parliamentary assistant to the minister told me that potatoes could not be sent from Newfoundland to any other province in Canada because of the prevalence of wart disease. I should like to know if the departmental officials are doing anything to help overcome that disease.

Mr. Gardiner: We are carrying on experiments this year for the first time. Of course this is the first year we have had an opportunity of doing so.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): On that subject?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes. But potatoes are not permitted to be imported or to be exported from there up to now. I hope that these studies will lead to our finally getting to the point where they can be.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I hope so, because we can do a business of exporting seed potatoes if we can get that disease cleared up.

Mr. Gardiner: I can quite understand that.

Mr. Fulton: There is a substantial increase in the number of employees in this branch, from 344 to 407, or an increase of 63 employees altogether, with a somewhat corresponding increase in travelling expenses. Can the minister tell us what enlarged activities the branch is undertaking that account for the increase?

Mr. Gardiner: The figures are given there for the different increases, right through. There was one director before; there is one now. The figures are the same down to agricultural scientists. There are two now where there were none before, grade 8. The next increase is in clerks, grade 4. There are two now where there was one before.

Mr. Fulton: I appreciate the fact that the number of personnel are set out and that the increase is detailed. But what I am wondering is what increased activities the branch is undertaking that should make necessary the 63 extra personnel in one year.

Mr. Gardiner: I understand that the main increase has been in the taking over of some of the staff from entomology. That is the new laboratory at Lethbridge.

Mr. Fulton: There are 64 extra personnel in the agricultural entomology branch this year as compared with last year.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes; we have the new building at London and at other places; these new buildings we were speaking of before dinner. There was an expenditure of $984,950 on buildings, and there was an expenditure of $682,500 last year. These buildings have to be manned with staff. Their staffs are dealing with just that particular kind of work.

Mr. Fulton: This entomology—

Mr. Gardiner: The building at Lethbridge, for example, which we discussed at some length last year, has been put into use this year. The building at London will require a staff. Any other buildings that are put in operation will require more staff.

Mr. Catherwood: Is any progress being made in developing grain resistant to smut? We realize that the seed is being treated with good results, but this is only a temporary measure. Will the minister tell us what progress has been made in this matter?

Mr. Gardiner: They are producing of course, and have been for many years, smut resistant varieties of grain; but as was suggested by the hon. member, the chief method of dealing with smut is to have the seed itself treated, and that has met with very considerable success. Back over the years we have changed from one thing to another to be used on the grain, but nevertheless smut has been very effectively dealt with in that manner.

Mr. Charlton: Is there any effective cure for root rot in oats?

Mr. Gardiner: Organic mercury dusts are effective in preventing the development of root rot, particularly where the seed or the soil was badly contaminated by root-rotting fungi. That is the only effective method that we have knowledge of.

Mr. Catherwood: I see there is an increase in the number of temporary employees by 25. What is the general nature of their work? Are these mostly students working part time with the idea of taking them on permanently?

Mr. Gardiner: Mostly students, but there has been some extension of work which did require more temporaries other than students. The department, as will be understood, has had a certain percentage assigned to it as to the number of temporaries that they can have on their staff, and as the number of employees goes up the number of temporaries in relation to the permanents will go up somewhat also. But this mostly has to do with what has been suggested by the hon. member, namely, the taking on of students to do temporary work.

10. Agricultural entomology, $1,546,510.

Mr. Ross (Souris): What contribution do the federal authorities make toward assisting the provinces in fighting grasshoppers? For instance, in the three prairie provinces their employees make surveys of the eggs and draw maps of the areas. Under favourable weather conditions it looks as if we may have a bad outbreak even this season. How far do the federal people go in helping to fight that plague?

Mr. Gardiner: We make the surveys and map the areas where there is likely to be infestation. The provinces really fight the grasshoppers.

Mr. Ross (Souris): The federal people do not enter into paying for any of the poison bait at all?

Mr. Gardiner: No.

Mr. Fulton: I want to ask a question about the travelling expenses in this branch. I want to say this by way of preface. I realize that when these various science services and so on are set up in the departments, to give the service to the people, in whose behalf they operate, namely, the people of Canada, they obviously must travel around and do a certain amount of research. My approach to this question, however, is based on the fact that if we can get travelling expenses down to a minimum then we shall have more money to expend on the concrete results of their work; and that applies generally throughout the government service. For instance, I notice there has been an increase in an already very substantial account for travelling expenses from $105,000 to $117,000, about one-thirteenth of the total expenditures of the branch. It causes me to question the matter and ask the minister how much was actually spent last year, and whether there is any chance of reducing this item below its present level?

Mr. Sinclair: That is because of foot and mouth disease in Kamloops.

Mr. Fulton: That was caused by the Liberal politicians who came into that district in the election campaign in an attempt to defeat the present member. If they had stayed away we would not have foot and mouth disease; at any rate we would not have had mouth disease.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Has the minister the same confidence in the other prairie provinces fighting grasshoppers as he professes to have in the Saskatchewan government? Does it apply to Manitoba?

Mr. Gardiner: I think they all did all right.

Mr. Fulton: I asked the minister a question about travelling expenses and the reason for the increase.

Mr. Gardiner: The difference is $117,000 as compared with $105,000 last year. And that of course would be brought about by the fact that there are some extras on, as was indicated a few moments ago. I do not altogether agree with the suggestion that you will have more money to spend doing a job if you travel less. I do not think it is possible to do this work without travelling. The inspectors in connection with the kind of work that is carried on, or anyone who is associated with it, must do a certain amount of travelling. If we reduce the travelling it does not necessarily mean that they are doing more work. It may mean that they are doing less.

Mr. Charlton: In that regard, how many government officials are there in that department driving government-owned cars? Are there any of them driving their own cars on a mileage basis?

Mr. Gardiner: There are about 300 in the science service.

Mr. Charlton: The total in the science service? Has the minister any figures of the difference in costs as between keeping up a government car and paying mileage to a man who owns his own car?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, we try to make it pretty much the same. If it becomes more costly to do it in one way, then we switch over to the other method. But it depends somewhat on the length of mileage a man travels. If a person operates on a great mileage, then of course we usually supply him with a car.

Mr. Charlton: The minister should have some idea of the mileage cost of a car, for instance, that has been going two years and has travelled 30,000 or 40,000 miles. I realize that as a car gets older it costs more to operate. The minister should have some idea of the cost of the mileage of a car, say, in the second year.

Mr. Gardiner: The operation costs have been different at different times. When I went into the government service first they allowed 10 cents a mile. At a later date it was 7 cents a mile. There seems to be a little doubt among hon. members as to whether it is 7 or 8 cents a mile. But one can understand that when gasoline is costing 45 cents it must cost considerably more to operate a car than it did when gasoline was costing 23 cents. I understand now, having been corrected as to the figure, that it is actually about 9 cents at the present time. It has been up and down, having been 10 cents at one time and 7 cents at another.

Mr. Charlton: I did not ask what we were paying in respect of cars owned by persons working for the department. What is the cost per mile of government-owned cars?

Mr. Gardiner: Between 5 and 6 cents, depending somewhat upon who operates the car and the distances the cars are operated. On that basis it costs less to operate a government car than to operate the others. It must be considered however that the individual has to replace his car as well as pay the cost of operation. It works out at about the same figure.

Mr. Charlton: Taking the total cost of capitalization, interest and everything?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Charlton: Are the government cars covered by insurance?

Mr. Gardiner: No, the government carries its own insurance.

Mr. Charlton: What about public liability and property damage? Is the driver of a government-owned car personally liable for any damage, whether it is his fault or that of the other driver?

Mr. Gardiner: If our man is responsible, we pay it.

Mr. Charlton: I do not like to say the minister is not telling the truth, but his answer is different from the way I have heard it. I have known chaps driving government cars who have felt their responsibility very heavily and, knowing very well the government is not going to stand behind them, many of them have put insurance on in which they have covered themselves for public liability and property damage. This has been done at their own expense. I understand further there is no way they can get that money back from the government.

Mr. Gardiner: Perhaps one case I have in mind would illustrate the point about as well as any. These cases, by the way, are taken to treasury board, when they come up. If they are payments which ought to be made by the government, they are made by the government. Perhaps the hon. member for Kamloops will recall the one I am about to mention, where the gentleman went out and got his groceries to bring them back to his home. When he came out to his car there was a bear on top of it trying to pick a hole through the car, to get at the food. He could not chase the bear off, so he undertook to shake it off by starting his car and running it down the road. So intent was he upon shaking off the bear that he ran into a tree and smashed his car. We thought we ought to pay for the damage, and we did pay for it. That is one case, but there are many others—perhaps not quite like that one. However, the government does pay when we feel we are warranted.

Mr. Pearkes: That is a good fish story.

Mr. Charlton: I have driven government cars, and I know what it feels like. But if a man takes enough interest in his car to insure it, I do not think it is right that he should have to pay for that insurance himself. When he gets into an accident, whether it is his fault or not, I think he should be protected.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Gardiner: Every case is examined into. He may insure if he desires to do so. However, examination is made into every case where there is a claim, and if it is considered that payment should be made it is made.

11. Forest entomology, $1,222,839.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, this department administers a great industry in Canada, and I hope hon. members will not question the additions to staff that are so necessary. Throughout the years there have been shortages in staff in many of the provinces, and I am quite sure farmers of this country are pleased to see work being done that has been neglected for some years.

So far as travelling expenses are concerned, it is my opinion that the men working in this department cannot do a good job unless they travel. It has been my experience that officials of the Department of Agriculture travel as cheaply as those of any department of government. I have found them on many occasions seeking to get accommodation by getting rides, and have even found them trying to cut down expenses to the extent of borrowing my own broncho and buggy.

I understand the minister's department is conducting investigations in connection with forest insect tests in conjunction with the forest service of the Department of Resources and Development. Some investigation is being carried on in the interior of British Columbia. How many men are engaged in that work at the present time, and what work is contemplated during the coming season in that area?

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. member is correct when he says that the Department of Agriculture does research work in this connection. We conduct research into the matter of providing parasites to fight other insects. We breed armies of them and arrange to have them turned loose so that they may put up a battle against the worms which damage the crops and the forests. That kind of work is done in our laboratories, and these insects are put out. The best illustration which comes to my mind, offhand, was the cutworm infestation of my own farm on one occasion. These little insects we have bred and put out were there in large numbers. After a rain, when the cutworms had to come above the ground to get air, these insects were darting around the place, stinging each worm, and gradually wiped them out.

Then, we do breed parasites that prey upon insects and worms which damage crops and forests in general. That is our end of the work; but the work of actually fighting the difficulties that arise in the forests is not under this department.

Mr. Fraser: The other day I asked a question about the worm or caterpillar which attacks the oak, basswood, maple, elm and other trees. I believe at the present time they are found in great numbers in Muskoka, and have gone up to Haliburton. They travel by the million, and when they cross a road it is absolutely black with them. They will bleed a tree in half an hour.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): A kind of yellowish black.

Mr. Fraser: They are green in colour, and range from one to two inches in length. What is the government doing about this pest?

Mr. Gardiner: There are different ways of dealing with them. I do not know about the particular movement of army worms to which the hon. member has referred, but we have worms of that kind in the west, and I believe they are found in all parts of Canada at different times. One method of dealing with them is to put tarpaper around the bottom of the tree, and then put grease on it. But one should be properly informed before he begins to do that. A whole row of trees on my own place were killed by a man who stopped reading where the instruction said to put on the grease; he did not note that it had also said to put tarpaper on the tree first. This man put the grease around the bottom of the trees and killed them more effectively than the worms would have done. So it is necessary to inform oneself properly before beginning to fight these pests.

However, there are successful methods of fighting them, depending of course upon the nature of the worm. The method I have described is one that is followed in fighting the army worm—that is, to put grease on paper around the bottom of a tree, so that they will not go up the tree. However we have found in the west that, so far as that particular grub is concerned, they do not actually kill the trees. They take the leaves off the tree and there is a dropping of sap to the extent that you almost need an umbrella when walking underneath. But the leaves come on again and the trees continue to live. For example, some three or four years ago the leaves came off the apple trees down around Trenton three times in the season for different reasons, one being frost, but eventually most of the trees lived. The battle has to be continued against them, but one has to be careful whether he sprays or what he does in order to deal with them in the right manner and at the right time. I think those who are familiar with the necessity of fighting pests of that kind know the method to use in connection with their own operations.

Mr. Fraser: I would like the minister to come up to our part of the country where we have some million trees and try to put tarpaper around them. The oak trees are suffering especially. The leaves came off some of them last year and today some of those trees are dead while others are only half alive, the tops being gone. With the leaves going this year again on the same trees I am afraid they will die. I wonder if some other method could be used than the tarpaper and grease. We have tried that but you can handle only a few trees with that method. If you use D.D.T. from the air you kill the birds and then you are worse off than before.

Mr. Ferguson: Has the minister's department discovered why the apples from Simcoe county are so far superior in all respects to those from British Columbia?

Mr. Fair: Have any effective means been discovered to deal with the aphides that are affecting grain at the present time? I understand that this pest is now to be found in Manitoba and if it is not treated successfully, sooner or later it will reach the other provinces.

Mr. Gardiner: The campaign being carried on against the green aphides is the same as that carried on against the grasshoppers. We undertake to map the different areas that may be infested and the provincial government does the actual work to combat the insect.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I think it would be most useful if the minister could give us a little more information about this pest. We had a considerable infestation in our part of the country last year. A rather expensive poison was brought in from the United States but it was so deadly people were frightened to use it because there were reports of loss of life in the United States from its use. Then we are told that where crops are sprayed in an effort to kill weeds apparently there are also killed those parasites that would take care of these aphides. In my neighbourhood crops that were sprayed for this purpose were those that suffered most severely from this infestation.

Mr. Gardiner: I am instructed by the officials that so far as they know there is no relationship between spraying the crop and the infestation; it is a matter of weather conditions rather than actual spraying. The green aphid or green bug appeared suddenly in enormous numbers in southern Manitoba and southeastern Saskatchewan and inflicted extensive damage. They were reported from widely scattered points in southern British Columbia. Normally this insect is a severe pest in the southern United States and occasionally appears in numbers in the Dakotas, Minnesota and Wisconsin but is rarely found in Canada. It is not known whether this insect can successful pass the winter in Canada but it is generally supposed that the Canadian infestations are a direct migration from further south. The green bug appeared so suddenly last year and in such enormous numbers that it was thought quite unlikely that they had developed locally. Pyrethrum sprays gave a good deal of control when used in a control campaign. I am referring to the 1949 report.

Mr. Charlton: I understand that the two per cent wettable spray which is not allowed into Canada is not nearly as dangerous as the fifteen per cent powder spray that is available. Has the minister any information on that?

Mr. Gardiner: We would have to know the content of the powder or the liquid before we could give definite information.

Mr. Charlton: This is a particular chemical that is used to kill aphides and it is the only one that can be bought in large quantities. There is considerable danger in mixing this dry powder while there is not nearly the danger in using the two per cent wettable or fluid mixture. I suggest that the department get in touch with the customs and excise branch to see if the less dangerous material cannot be allowed to enter the country.

Mr. Hodgson: Could the minister have someone from his department go into the northern parts of Victoria and Haliburton counties to see if anything can be done about the army worm that is destroying great stretches of forest in those areas?

Mr. Gardiner: There are men up there on that work at the present time.

Item agreed to.

12. Plant protection, $731,705.

Mr. Catherwood: What precautionary measures are taken in connection with the importation of plants and bulbs from foreign countries? Is an inspection made when they enter the country?

Mr. Gardiner: There are rather strict regulations and an inspection is made at all ports of entry. It is rather difficult to have plants put on a boat or a plane or offered for transportation in any other way without inspection, whether they are coming in or going out.

Experimental farms service—

13. Experimental farms service administration, $129,780.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Will the minister give some thought to establishing an experimental farm north of the Peace river in British Columbia? There are large settlements of people there and a great many more are coming in. Entirely new conditions in regard to agriculture are being met. It seems to me that one of the experimental farms in the older part of the south might be spared and removed bodily beyond the Peace in order to help meet these new conditions.

Mr. Gardiner: I think the nearest approach to an experimental farm in the north is at Beaverlodge, which is not far removed from Dawson Creek. I am going to drive the Alaska highway as soon as we can get this house closed with the idea of visiting all the stations which we have from Dawson Creek north. I think we have about a dozen of them between there and Dawson City. I intend to visit them all with the idea of determining whether they are performing the service which is necessary, and if they are not performing the service necessary to determine whether or not we require further developments in that region. I hope I will see the hon. member when I am in that area.

Mr. Wylie: The constituency of Medicine Hat happens to be one that does not have an experimental farm with the exception of the dominion range station which has been of wonderful value not only to the ranchers of that area but to many others. The citizens of Medicine Hat have one complaint concerning it, that it is too far away from the city. It is a distance of about eighty or eighty-five miles from Medicine Hat to the range station. The Manyberries range station has been specializing in grass and investigating the number of cattle that a quarter section can support. In addition they have small fruits and trees which they have shown can be produced on similar irrigation projects where there is a supply of water.

No doubt the minister knows the range station quite well. A coulee has been dammed off where they store the water from the spring run-off, and they utilize it during the summer. The majority of the citizens of Medicine Hat never see the range station, and in view of the fact that we expect great irrigation developments in that area within the next three or four years I believe it would be to the advantage of everyone there if the Department of Agriculture should see fit to open a new experimental station close to Medicine Hat. There is a small irrigation project at Ross creek, and part of that land could be easily utilized to show what can be done by irrigation. I should like to ask the minister if any consideration has been given to having an experimental farm established close to the city of Medicine Hat so that the people of that area can really see what can be done when you provide some water for the land.

Mr. Gardiner: The experimental farms we have across Canada are of many different kinds. They are placed in different areas to do the work required in those areas. The region south of Medicine Hat has been a ranching area, and while it is quite true that the station at Manyberries is located beside a pool of water created by damming a creek, nevertheless we have 30,000 acres of land in that region with which we are experimenting. I think it is by far the largest experimental operation in Canada. We have 30,000 acres of land leased from the provincial government, and the primary purpose of the experiment is to find out whether or not grasses which can be sown in that area will maintain more cattle per acre than the natural grass, or what the relationship is between the grasses. My understanding is they have found it requires about 30 acres of natural prairie to maintain an animal. That will indicate to people in eastern Canada who maintain thirty or forty on a hundred acres of land that ranching is an undertaking which requires a considerable amount of land. That is the experimental work necessary in that section and the work which is done there. Very close checks are kept. I have gone over a considerable part of the area, examined the markings they have and the manner in which they test the number of cattle that can be run on the different acreages. The work is very successfully carried on, and I think it is most helpful to people living in that section.

As to the other areas, I think nearly all of the irrigation districts have special experimental stations. As the hon. member for Medicine Hat knows, the operation at Brooks is a provincial one and there is experimental work carried on there. We have other experimental stations in connection with other operations in Alberta, and I think it is generally acknowledged that they are as well supplied with that kind of station as any of the provinces of Canada.

Mr. Wylie: I realize that the Manyberries range station has done wonderful work so far as grazing land is concerned. We have a provincial station at Brooks, but as the minister knows it is mostly concerned with horticulture. We have substations throughout the area where test plots are operated by the elevator companies. I believe it is the wheat pool and the Searle Grain Company that have small plots throughout the district growing certain kinds of grain, but they are insufficient to give the people a real idea of what can be grown there. I see no reason why we should not have an experimental station closer to Medicine Hat where the people could see what can be done with irrigation. There are many areas similar to the Manyberries range station where dams can be built, the spring run-offs held back and many grasses, grains and fruits grown. I think that would be most beneficial to Medicine Hat especially in view of future irrigation developments.

I appreciate the wonderful work that has been carried on at the Manyberries range station. As the minister said, it requires about 30 acres of land per head of cattle per year. Many eastern members might want to dispute that but it must also be remembered that the provincial government lease their lands on the basis of three head per quarter section, 160 acres. Wonderful results have been achieved at the Manyberries range station, but we would like to see a station established closer to Medicine Hat, perhaps on the Ross creek irrigation project, or some place within easy driving distance of the city. Then the people could see what can be done. I think it is a good idea and a timely one.

Mr. Thomas: I should like to ask the minister how many employees there are currently at the Lacombe experimental farm, and also the amount of damage incurred during the storm from which they suffered last autumn. I understand it was quite considerable.

Mr. Gardiner: Last year there were drought, hail and frost.

Mr. Thomas: The particular storm I was referring to was a windstorm which blew down many of the trees.

Mr. Gardiner: I have no particular report on a windstorm. They tell me there was hail damage, which probably went along with the wind, and that there was also damage at that farm last year from drought and frost. I will get the number employed at the farm.

Mr. Thomas: While you are looking that up, if you cannot give me a break-down on the storm damage perhaps you can tell me the cost of upkeep for that station last year.

Mr. Gardiner: The cost of the Lacombe farm last year was $147,395. This year it will be $203,048, an increase of $55,653. That increase is largely accounted for by a building item.

Mr. Wylie: May I ask the minister if his department has given any consideration to establishing an experimental farm at Medicine Hat.

Mr. Gardiner: The best experimental plot I have even seen in western Canada is only about a mile away from Medicine Hat. It is not operated by the government, or was not when I was familiar with it. I refer to the area just west of the town, where they have pump irrigation. The first time I went to Medicine Hat to investigate anything they took me there to show me the good job that had been done by the two men who were working as partners handling and feeding cattle. They grew corn, sunflowers and everything that can be grown, by means of irrigation; and they fed cattle very successfully. As far as the government is concerned, as my hon. friend knows we are endeavouring to develop the Vauxhall area just as soon as we can get title to the land, so we hope it will not be too long before we will have an experimental station there. That is within easy distance of Medicine Hat; it does not take very long to get out there, and that is certainly under consideration. I cannot say any other area is under consideration at the moment.

Mr. Wylie: Even the Vauxhall area is sixty or seventy miles north of Medicine Hat, and we would like a station closer than that. The farm to which the minister refers, where they grow corn and feed cattle, is but one of a number of such farms all along the river, both east and west of Medicine Hat. These small irrigation projects, where they pump the water from the river, have been very successful, but the people of Medicine Hat want a farm with nice trees, where they can really spend an enjoyable day. There is plenty of land within a few miles of the city that could be utilized for this purpose, and that is their request at the present time.

Mr. Fraser: Is there any revenue from the central experimental farm at Ottawa?

Mr. Gardiner: The total revenue is about $400,000.

Mr. Bryce: I wonder if the minister would care to comment on the work being done at the experimental farms of Canada in connection with artificial insemination. I have had the opportunity of discussing this matter with the minister, and I know he has carried on some investigations during his visit to Europe. This is something we must face sooner or later, and I believe it is a step in the right direction. If you want to increase your milk production this is the best way to do it. In three years you could have practically the same amount of milk from about seventy-five per cent of the cows now required. I believe something has been done in that connection at the Kemptville farm, and this spring I had the opportunity of visiting one of the stations operated by the Scottish milk board, where they have had wonderful success.

There is another feature to it. Every year in Canada at least half a dozen farmers are killed by bulls. Artificial insemination would do away with that danger on the farm. It is also cheaper. Some bulls in Britain cost ten thousand guineas today; but by this method, instead of getting just an ordinary heifer that will give maybe 800 gallons of milk, a farmer can get a cow that will give perhaps 1,200 gallons of milk. This means that with fewer but better animals the milk production can be increased. I do not know how it would work with beef cattle, but as far as the dairy breeds are concerned it has been a great success. I would be glad if the minister would comment on this matter for my own personal information, if not for the benefit of the rest of the committee. It seems to me that it would be a wonderful thing for farmers who have only from eight to twenty cows, and no bulls, to be able to get heifer calves that would be really worth something in the market.

Mr. Gardiner: Of course the proper item under which this should be discussed is production services, but for the moment I might just say that in the Fraser river valley we did assist by supplying bulls for this purpose, and we have also assisted in the same way at Truro, Nova Scotia. That is about as far as we can get from Manitoba in both directions. Most of that kind of work is done by the provinces. In Ontario, for example, experimental work is being carried on at Kemptville. I have seen the activities there, and I quite agree that very helpful work can be done. I also understand that some prominent breeders in Ontario carry on this work themselves, no doubt with some assistance from the provincial government. At Dryden farm, for example, they do a good deal of that kind of breeding, and I think it is becoming quite a common thing elsewhere. However, we are not promoting it beyond providing some bulls in certain areas for these purposes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wonder if this would be the proper item under which I might return to a question I asked the minister some little time ago with respect to the apparent duplication of scientific experts as between the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of Agriculture. At that time the minister made a very interesting speech, in the first part of which he more or less gave me an answer, and in the latter part of which he ranged all over the place in a very delightful manner. I realized that I had served a very useful purpose by giving the minister an opportunity to make that speech which no doubt had been in his mind, but now I want to come back to my question. He partly answered it by pointing out that there was an apparent duplication in the selling agencies but that it was only apparent, because the Department of Trade and Commerce had the foreign field in which to operate while the Department of Agriculture had the domestic field. That was his answer as I recall it. At that time I think the minister said nothing with regard to the apparent duplication of scientific officers, of whom there are quite a number. If this is the proper place to ask this question, perhaps the minister would indicate to us how many scientific officers there are; how many officers there are in the Department of Trade and Commerce dealing with scientific agricultural subjects and how many there are, roughly, in the Department of Agriculture, and satisfy us that there is in fact no duplication, if that is a fact.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not know of any scientific agriculturists in the Department of Trade and Commerce. My officials tell me that that is true, that there are not any as far as they know. There are some what might be called scientific operators in the Department of Resources and Development which has to do with fighting pests in the forests and that sort of thing. Their work does not overlap with ours but there is co-operation between the two departments in operating there. So far as I know, however, there are no scientific specialists in the Department of Trade and Commerce. There may be some persons who could qualify as scientists who are there employed on certain work that is being done; but we do not know of any employed in that way.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If the minister will allow me to do so, I will return to this question a little later on. In the meantime I will go and get my list because I am afraid I have left it upstairs.

An hon. Member: The telephone book.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes; that is quite right. I should be happy if the minister would just indicate how many there are. I have no means of knowing that they are experts. They just look, in the list, as though they were experts, and they appear to be called that; but I will revert to this question later.

Mr. Thomas: Has the minister the number of employees on the Lacombe farm?

Mr. Gardiner: About 35 people are employed on the Lacombe farm.

Mr. McLure: I should like to ask one question with regard to item 13, on the experimental farms service. This year there is quite a large increase, about half a million dollars, in the central experimental farm estimate. Can the minister give the committee some idea what this is for? I understood him to say a few minutes ago that the total revenue from the experimental farm was some $400,000. That seems to be a small revenue for the wonderful acreage there and the amount it is costing to run that farm. I might also say that there is a certain rumour that has been gaining ground here in the city of Ottawa and I have been asked several times about it. I do not know anything about the matter but I happened to be out in that section a few days ago and the rumour was that consideration was being given to removing part of this experimental farm to some other locality. For instance it is said that the locality in which they are situated now is not proper nor has not been found useful for growing certain kinds of fruit. It was thought that part of the farm was going to be moved to another section in order to cultivate berries and fruit of all kinds. I said that I would make inquiries whether there was any truth in this rumour that is going around. Those are a few of my questions to the minister.

Mr. Gardiner: In the first place, there is no plan to move anyone so far as we know. There are of course people who would like to see us move someone so that they can get room to do something else they want to do, but we have no plans to move anyone.

On the other question, as to what this additional expenditure is for, it is largely for building and the increases in salaries because of the natural increase which is provided for as civil servants go on serving one year after another. But the fact that the building cost is up this year has something to do with the activities of the gentleman who was spoken of so highly by the hon. member for Souris at the beginning of this discussion. Dr. Archibald has been at the head of the experimental farms staffs for thirty-one years, I think; and during the last four or five years, since the end of the war, he has been advocating the carrying on of building programs at different places, plans which he had laid even before the war and which we delayed until the war was over. Then when the war was over, because we could not get materials we delayed still further. This year when we were discussing our estimates before the treasury board, in view of the fact that Dr. Archibald is coming towards the end of his service. I insisted strongly that he should get the credit for this work that he has been developing and which someone is going to do shortly in any case, and that the erection of buildings to provide for activities which he has been building up and advocating over the years ought to be carried on while he is still there; and so we are going ahead with the work this year.

Item agreed to.

Experimental farms service—

14. Central experimental farm, $1,868,118.

Mr. Knowles: The minister explained that one of the reasons for the increase in these items had to do with the natural increase in salaries and so on. At the outset I may say that I am not rising, as some of my friends do, with the object of complaining about these increases. I am rising to inquire as to the situation under this item for central experimental farms, inasmuch as over on page 80 it is indicated that part of it was an increase in the wages paid for temporary assistance and part of it was in wages paid to casuals and others. My question is this. Has there been any improvement in the position of carpenters and of manual workers, non-skilled workers and others, about whom the minister and I have had discussions during the last couple of sessions?

Mr. Gardiner: There has been a general increase all along the line in connection with what is generally known as casual labour or persons who are employed in the neighbourhood round about these farms. I do not think anyone would call it a big increase. One of the reasons for that is that we find it necessary to keep the pay of those we are engaging upon the experimental farm in reasonable relationship to what farmers are paying in the district round about. If we get out of line, it sometimes makes it difficult for persons who are employing labour in the neighbourhood. That to an extent accounts for the fact that perhaps the pay looks to be lower in some of these cases than it otherwise might be. But nevertheless there has been an increase, although not as much as my hon. friend was asking for a year or so ago. There has been an increase in the rates.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should now like to ask this question of the minister in somewhat more detail. I have now the list. Would it suit the minister if I just read some of them out? If the men in his department do not know them, it would be nice if they could meet their opposite numbers in the Department of Trade and Commerce. I will just read these out. Of course I cannot tell by looking at the names whether they are scientists; but as far as possible I have omitted those that are in the export division because the minister did explain about those. I will therefore just read a few that look to me as if they were scientists and the minister can explain what the situation is. This is the agricultural commodities branch: director, G. R. Paterson; commodities section, chief H. A. Gilbert; dairy and poultry products, K. L. Melvin; livestock and animal products, D. G. W. Douglas; plants and products, C. F. Clingan. Then I read again later on, under agriculture division, crop section, the chief is W. D. Porter. There are other names which I will not read. Will the minister tell me how this question can best be answered if this is not the best way. It seems to me it would be very desirable for those of us who do not understand these things very well to have it made clear to us why there appears to be this rather wide duplication.

Mr. Gardiner: I think I can best illustrate what the meaning of that is by just taking the first name, Mr. Paterson. I met Mr. Paterson first over in London, but I knew from the records of the department that he was first an employee of the agricultural department years ago. Then he went from the Department of Agriculture to the Department of Trade and Commerce because they wanted a man overseas who understood the agricultural position in Canada, so that he might promote the sale of agricultural products over in Britain. Trade and Commerce had him over there for a number of years. The next place I met him was down in Washington. He was there up to within the last year. Then he was moved back to Ottawa largely because of the wide experience he has had in the markets in which we are going to sell farm products.

In the first place, he is a practical agriculturist, trained in the Department of Agriculture. Over the years he has been trained in the Department of Trade and Commerce as one advocating the sale of Canadian farm products over in Europe and then down in the United States. He has gained experience there, and the department has brought him back here because he can instruct those who are working here in what is required in those other countries, and in what they ought to be attempting to do in the way of promoting sales. That, in general, is what has happened so far as Mr. Paterson is concerned. I think you will find that that is pretty well true of the others. That is the general practice.

For example, I was over in Britain in 1936, and I started looking around for persons who were promoting the sale of agricultural products. When I came back from Britain I said to my officials that I met only one man over there in the service who really understood agriculture. They said: "Where is he?" I said: "He is in Glasgow." I told them of my experience, of how I went to the auction sale ring where they were selling a load of Canadian cattle. I told them that this man seemed to know all about cattle. He seemed to know all about the individuals who wanted to buy cattle in Scotland, and talked to me very intelligently about the whole matter. Well, two of my officials went over to Scotland a month or two later. When they came back one of them came into my office and said: "You don't seem to be a very good checker on persons who understand agriculture." I said: "What makes you think that?" He said: "We were travelling on the train from Glasgow to Edinburgh and we were naming the different kinds of cattle as we went along, and this fellow said: "You fellows must be remarkable chaps, that you can tell these cattle at this distance. Apparently he did not know very much about cattle. He could not tell Ayrshires from Holsteins, passing them on a train." After that experience we thought there should be more people in the service who did know agriculture and knew it in detail, because when you get over there talking to individuals with regard to livestock, and particularly in a place like Scotland, you have to know something about them or they will soon find you out. It is important that there be men with practical experience and that they have technical knowledge with regard to agriculture in general in that department if they are to assist in selling our produce in other countries.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister say in answer to me that these other names that I read would be in a category similar to that which he has described? In other words, although it is not apparent at first glance, that they are in fact either directly or indirectly engaged in the export trade and in the business of selling our products and that is merely because you have people in agriculture engaged in that business that they are there in the Department of Trade and Commerce. Is that correct?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, that is true, and they do this as well. When persons come over here from Europe who are looking for cattle, let us say, these individuals take them in tow. They bring them over to our department and we get the best experts that we have to go along with them. They go out and visit herds in different parts of the country and select what they want to take back with them. They assist them in that way. It is much better of course to have men in that department to meet them firsthand when they come into the office, talk to them and then act as co-ordinators between that department and our own.

Mr. Catherwood: What is the total acreage in the central experimental farm in Ottawa, and also the land taken over from the Scott property last year? What additional facilities are being provided at the farm with the additional property taken over?

Mr. Gardiner: The farm is about 1,200 acres. I think the price that we paid for the Scott farm was about $68,000. It is used largely for the purpose of experimenting with seed production of different kinds.

Mr. Knowles: When the minister answered the hon. member for Queens a few minutes ago with regard to the rumours about moving the experimental farm, or even part of it, away from the city he indicated that his department was not doing anything about it, although he said he did understand that some people were anxious to get the farm moved away so that they could do something else there. What had he in mind, the Ottawa city hall that keeps moving around from place to place, or was it a housing development? I myself am not pressing for the moving of the farm, but it does seem to me that a case could be made out for the large acreage being moved out a bit, although I am not in favour of the beautiful park being moved from where it is. In view of the interest in the whole question, it does seem to me that the minister might have commented further on it.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, I have been spending the last two years keeping out of that discussion, and I am going to stay right out of it. It is none of my business where they build the city hall.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Keep the farm.

Mr. Knowles: That is not an answer to my question.

Item agreed to.

15. Branch farms and stations and illustration stations, $5,977,447.

Mr. McIvor: I am very proud to announce that we have an experimental substation in our community. If the other substations and experimental farms throughout Canada prove their worth in the same way they certainly are worth all the money that is spent upon them. But it depends upon the superintendent. We have a superintendent who does his work splendidly. The farmers may visit him at any time except Sunday, and sometimes they try to slip in on him then but he is not there.

Mr. Ross (Souris): You would be surprised what he does on Sundays when you are not there.

Mr. McIvor: He works the substation well, but he helps the school fairs, the rural fairs, and the different clubs like the one hundred bushels to the acre oat club and the five hundred bushels to the acre potato club. I announced earlier in the year the success of the experiment. The expert farmers in the east might learn something from our district. We had fourteen contestants in the potato club of 500 bushels to the acre, and the average was 350. If some of these men, even from the maritimes and from eastern Ontario, think they can grow a crop of potatoes I say that we can teach them something. If you will visit Fort William we will take you out and show you an experimental substation that is doing its work in a splendid way, and which has had 105 bushels to the acre. Not many farmers in the east raise it; yet we do it and I pay tribute to our substation and our superintendent.

Mr. Ferguson: How is it that Simcoe county gets a thousand bushels to the acre?

Mr. Herridge: The hon. member for Simcoe North asked the minister a question some time ago, as to why Simcoe county apples are better than those from British Columbia. I am not admitting that they are; but the British Columbia fruit growers sold large quantities of British Columbia apples in Ontario while the Simcoe apples were being offered for sale. At the present time we are taking orders right here in Ottawa for this year's crop.

I should like to make a few remarks about the experimental station at Summerland, which has been doing excellent work throughout the years on behalf of agriculture in the southern interior of British Columbia and even on a wider field than that. Some years ago the staff from the experimental farm during the winter months attended farmers institute meetings, and meetings of fruit growers, and gave lectures. However in recent years that practice has not been followed. I do suggest that where it is possible, and does not interfere with the work of the station, the officials might be made available to farmers institutes and fruit growers organizations, so that they could render a valuable assistance to farmers, particularly during the winter months, by giving them information on the latest method of farming, and as to tests they have been conducting.

Mr. Gardiner: Extension work is done largely under the agricultural colleges. We discuss education here from time to time, and we always come to the conclusion that it is a provincial responsibility. In connection with agriculture, in common with other activities, it has been carried on largely by the provinces. The extension work is from the agricultural colleges and, while our men do go out, they do so on invitation to gatherings of the kinds mentioned. The common practice is for our cereals men to be at the experimental stations at a certain time of the year. People will gather in there from the surrounding community, and the representative will go over the plots with them and indicate the method of planting, pointing out the different rows representing different methods, and what the results have been.

Mr. Herridge: At Summerland there are valuable tests of fruit and vegetable varieties, and the conclusions are published in reports. As many of the farmers do not see those reports, it would be very helpful to the farmers in the interior if occasionally officials could attend farmers meetings during the winter months, and give them a personal report of those tests on certain fruits and vegetables. Personal contact by officials with the farmers is worth a great deal.

Mr. Sinclair: Does the hon. member, the acting leader of the C.C.F., realize what that would add to the travelling allowances the Tory party is fighting about?

Mr. Herridge: We are not fighting about it.

Mr. Sinclair: The travelling allowance would be increased.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Perhaps they could travel a lot farther on the same allowance.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): When my colleagues and I ask for explanations of increases we should not be said by the parliamentary assistant to be complaining. Surely we are entitled to know what the money is being spent for? In respect of item 15, which deals with branch farms and stations, and illustration stations, would the minister tell us whether his officials in Newfoundland are active in trying to set up illustration stations there? The report of the department for 1949 refers to 203 illustration stations across Canada, throughout the different provinces.

There are parts of Newfoundland in which the people do not practise even the rotation of crops. They plant potatoes in the same plots year after year. I never see any agricultural representative visiting them or telling them about this new scientific service mentioned over the C.B.C. I should like to see some of the officials who understand these things go down there and help our people take advantage of the latest discoveries. Perhaps it might be possible to bring down films showing exactly what can be done in the matter of strip farming, and other agricultural practices. Is the minister in a position to make a statement in this respect? I know his department has taken over the experimental farm, which was already doing good work, but which did not reach out far enough. Some students were taken in and given training, and then permitted to go away. I am thinking more particularly of the districts of Ferryland and Trepassey. There the people raise cattle, and graze them on pasture and hayland. I believe they have land there that could be developed considerably through proper methods. I should hope that the minister could assist us by having a representative come and look into the matter.

The minister has promised that he will make a visit to the Peace river area and the Alaska highway. Is he going to visit Newfoundland? This is the second year of confederation for us, and we would deem it a great honour to have so distinguished an agriculturist visit us. I would suggest that he come at the end of the growing season so that he would be able to see the kind of produce we have. Perhaps we could entertain him at dinner, using our produce, and giving him an opportunity to compare it with what is produced in other parts of Canada.

Mr. Gardiner: As the hon. member knows, on April 1, we took over the experimental farm in Newfoundland. We have taken over the organization that was there, and are adding to it as we think necessary. In addition to that we are preparing to make a soil survey. I do not know that it can be completed in one season, but we are beginning it this year.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): A soil survey was made by one of our highest officials. He has been conducting this for several years.

Mr. Gardiner: Any information that is there will be utilized, of course. We will go on from that point. This will lead to the establishment of experimental stations, because we establish those stations in relation to the nature of the soil in the different areas. My office files indicate that people are writing in almost weekly pointing out that their soil conditions are different from the conditions at some other point—just as the hon. member for Medicine Hat indicated a moment ago that it is all very well to have a station associated with the ranching south of Medicine Hat, but that they want another station associated with irrigation west of Medicine Hat. We receive requests of that kind all the time.

We are not in a position to determine whether we should put in a station until we know the nature of the soil. We do not want to have three or four stations operating in the same type of soil. However, all that work will be proceeded with as rapidly as possible. I might add that much of the production service in connection with agriculture has always been carried on by the provinces—and still is. I presume that will be the condition in Newfoundland, as well as in the other provinces.

With regard to my own trip to Newfoundland, may I say I have flown over that province on two or three occasions, and have landed a number of times at the airport. I have never yet flown over the Alaska highway, and that is one reason I am driving it first. However, I hope that as soon as possible after that I will be able to go to Newfoundland. I am pleased to know that it is best to be there in the fall, because I would not find it possible to be there before that. If at all possible I shall come down there later in the season.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): We will look forward to seeing you.

Production service—

16. Production service administration, $56,015.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Mr. Chairman, with your indulgence and that of the minister perhaps I can eliminate two speeches by commenting on items 16, 17 and 18. I think the minister is apprized of what I am going to say, but before I say it I must compliment the hon. member for Haldimand, the hon. member for Brant and the hon. member from Newfoundland who have opened up these problems that are facing the minister. I am speaking on the administration item so I believe I am thoroughly in order.

When I think of what they have said I think of something else I have observed in the quarter century I have been here. You, Mr. Chairman, are younger than some of the rest of us, and along with others you may think that I have no right to speak about agriculture. I came into this honourable house as the member for York East, which was a farming constituency. I lived on lot 30 of a concession of East Scarborough where I was carrying on my occupation as an agriculturist. A quarter of a century is not a very long time to go back.

Mr. Sinclair: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I think I have a perfect right to talk about agriculture as I may know something about it, with all respect to the "hear, hear." If I can add anything to these deliberations I have the right to do so because wherefrom came my bread came my livelihood, and wherefrom came my livelihood came my tenure of office in this assembly. I should like to make a few observations of a general nature and then deal particularly with items 16, 17 and 18.

In the quarter of a century I have been sitting here I have seen how different governments operate and I have seen how ministers dominate the entire situation as far as the estimates are concerned. I may not be here very long but I ask those charged with the administration of the departments to allow the deputies or the deputies' deputies to pay attention to the humble remarks which hon. members on all sides of this chamber put on Hansard and reply to them in one way or another. Some machinery should be set up so that the minister would not have to answer every two-cent question we ask.

Some way should be found whereby the plethora of men, women and children in your department who are drawing big pay should be able to discuss these matters with the members and answer some of the questions that are asked from all sides of the House of Commons. In my opinion, those in the department have some knowledge of departmental matters. If they do not have that knowledge they should not be within the confines of the department and drawing the pay which we extract from the taxpayers of Canada.

Mr. Sinclair: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I speak with the voice of experience because I have asked questions for a quarter of a century. I am ashamed to say in this chamber tonight that it is my experience that while I have presented a simple problem, while I have placed my questions on Hansard, never yet have I got an answer. I do not want it from the minister who is away up in a seventh heaven; I just want a simple answer such as a farmer from the constituency of York East would expect. But I have not got it. Yet you and I and the rest of us in this honourable chamber think that we are working for democracy.

Mr. Sinclair: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Never mind the "hear, hear". I think it is the loud voice of mine that is getting an echo. It is very hard for me to hear. If for a moment I may go to some other sea—I think the hon. member comes from near the sea.

Mr. Sinclair: That is right.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Or away out the other way.

Mr. Ross (Souris): He is the margarine branch.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): The margarine branch. When the Angel Gabriel comes down to this earth and puts one foot on part of British Columbia and the other out in the Pacific ocean and proclaims that earth shall be no more, my hon. friend from British Columbia will rise in his place and say, "Hear, hear."

If I may now get back to the subject I rose to speak about as quietly as possible, I think our democracy would extend its democratic tendencies if attention were paid to what appears in Hansard, and to what is said by members like myself. We are not highly educated, we may not be Rhodes scholars and know how to use language, but generally we know what we are talking about. We use plain English. The minister has to toil twenty hours a day as some of us did in our youth in order to gain a footing in this world. He has a great deputy alongside him, who in turn has other deputies, and it should be possible for them to reply to simple questions asked by hon. members on all sides of the house so that they may realize that they are working in a democracy.

Ninety-nine times out of one hundred you and your deputies will be right because we are an innocent-minded sort of people. But neither the minister nor his deputy has answered the question which I asked a year ago. I doubt if one bit of attention was ever paid to what I said, or if there was I never heard of it. I have reiterated these statements time after time because if they were worked out they would add a million dollars to the economy of this country. There are enough idlers in the research branch to do what I would like to see done.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not think you said this on our estimates last year.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I know what I am talking about. When I was young it was not just a case of taking a bear off a Ford car. I was dealing with boars with two big tusks and other appendages that were not at all necessary. I bought them for $5 apiece and sold them for $40. That is the way I made my election expenses in 1921 to the extent of nearly $20,000.

An hon. Member: It was not worth it.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I want to improve the economy of this country if I can and attention should be paid to ideas that emanate from members of this House of Commons regardless of their politics. We are not politicians. We are here because we have a job to do for Canada. At the present time of necessity the minister must handle everything with his own hands, but there are able men and women in his department who could work out these different problems and answer these different questions. Among the problems which I have recited to him before—and I never will again because I may never be here again—is the problem of waste. Every time you feed 100,000 people you have enough waste left over to feed 10,000 hogs. When I realize that 10,000 hogs will gain at least a pound a day, as some members know, and most of them a pound and a quarter, when I realize that hogs are worth 30 cents a pound, I also realize what we could do for the economy of Canada if that one little bit of waste could be avoided. One and all should read the speech made by Lloyd George in 1911 about the waste in the United Kingdom at that time and try to visualize that compared with the waste of all kinds that is going on in Canada now. It is not waste entirely because I sat in the Chateau last night, paid $5 for $2 worth of food and saw the "waists" around there. It reminds me not only of the waste that Lloyd George referred to, not only of the waste that is going on in Canada all the time, but of the waste of our talents, efforts and energies in this Canada of ours.

I should like to ask the minister if some sort of research could not be instituted to take care of the change in the trend of the feeding of waste to hogs because of the advent, as I mentioned a few years ago—and I hope I never have occasion to mention it again—of the soap operators and the increased production of alkali soaps and cleansers such as Spic and Span and so on. All these things eventually find their way into the swill can and from there into the production of millions of pounds of pork in Canada. There is one pound of this stuff in every hundred pounds and it finds its way into the organs of the hog which is affected by it. That in turn is destroying the economy of Canada to the extent of many hundreds of thousands of dollars, and it could be very easily taken care of under the vote which we are considering now. Some thought should be given to the feeders of hogs outside the large municipalities. There is one just two miles from where we are sitting who picks up the garbage from the restaurant. I hope there is not too much alkali in it and that they are not poisoning the hogs. They disturb the inner activities of the hog.

I run a hospital but I am not a doctor. If I were I could tell you exactly how they are disturbing the inner workings of the hog. The hog gets swine fever and not cholera. The minister and his deputy think only of cholera coming from some foreign source but it is swine fever. I know because that is how I earn my living. If they could have one of the men in their research department spend some of his time to clear up this matter and neutralize the effect of the alkali feeds that are finding their way into hog production then they might be doing something on behalf of the economy of Canada and for those of us who make a few dollars out of this particular vocation. They might be doing something for us but I am thinking more particularly of the general economy of Canada. I appreciate that the minister may not be a pig man and that perhaps other things are of more interest to him. Nevertheless here is one portion of our economy to which one of his thousand servants might at least give some attention, and which would work out in due course in my opinion to the general advantage of Canada.

Item agreed to.

18. Compensation for animals slaughtered, $1,091,292.

Mr. Charlton: Under the amended Animal Contagious Diseases Act, what was the amount of compensation paid in Brant, Oxford, Middlesex and Elgin counties last year?

Mr. McCubbin: If I understood the question of the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth, he wants to know the amount of compensation paid in Brant and Oxford counties?

Mr. Charlton: And also Middlesex and Elgin.

Mr. McCubbin: I think there was a return made for the counties of Oxford and Elgin but Brant and Middlesex were not given. We have not that information now. It will take us about twenty-four hours to get it, but if the hon. member wants it we will secure it for Brant and Middlesex and give it to him.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Perhaps the minister might make a two minute reply to my twenty minute diatribe.

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. member has had a lot of hogs fed and no doubt has fed a lot of them, and for that reason he will know that we must keep a check on the feeding of hogs that are fed in the manner he was describing, namely, from cooked garbage. There are 601 such licensed feeders in Canada and right now they are feeding 53,565 hogs. Therefore it is not a part of the industry that is not flourishing. It is carrying on at present time and is under supervision of officials of the department.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): It will soon cease if you do not take care of it.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not know whether I have answered your question. I think it is true that we have as good a record, and probably the best record, with regard to cholera and other hog diseases as any other place in the world.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Make sure that the alkalinity and acidity are carefully checked as to these 53,000 hogs.

Mr. Gardiner: The only thing I can say is that the losses are not great.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Don't wait for losses.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not altogether understand the remarks of the hon. member. He has been here for twenty-five years and I have been here for fifteen. I do not think that in that fifteen years he has ever asked me a straight question to which he has not received a straight answer. I have not taken the same liberties with him that I take with some others for certain reasons, and particularly when he is talking about hogs and the feeding of hogs, because I know he knows what he is talking about. I also know he is not trying to put in a little time. Therefore I have always undertaken to answer him when he has asked me questions.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Will you promise us some research?

Mr. Gardiner: We are at it all the time, and the very fact that we have the lowest amount of disease from that kind of thing of any country in the world is the answer.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): That is not the answer.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not say it is all due to what we do.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): It is due to cold weather and God's good grace.

Mr. Gardiner: It is also due to the efforts of feeders like yourself.

Mr. Quelch: Can the minister say how many new t.b. free areas were established in Alberta last year?

Mr. Gardiner: I understand that eight or ten were started but only one was completed.

Mr. Quelch: Is it the intention of the federal government to proceed with that work? I believe only a small portion of the province is organized at the present time. I remember that some years ago a district was formed and it was said to be the intention of the federal government to expand the area as rapidly as possible. Then the war came along, of course, and the work was stopped. Is it the intention to proceed fairly rapidly with the expansion of these areas?

Mr. Gardiner: We are proceeding as rapidly as we can obtain the men to do the work. As I said last session and the session before, we have not limited this work by keeping down the cost. We have been voting all the money we could profitably expend, and it is purely a matter of getting a sufficient number of veterinarians to do the work. As far as Alberta is concerned, as my hon. friend knows it was the last province to permit us to come in and do this work. The ranchers were absolutely opposed to it. It is only since I have been in Ottawa—and I have been here fifteen years—that this work has been commenced in Alberta. We have been carrying on there as rapidly as possible, but the service has not gone ahead in Alberta, because of that fact, as rapidly as in other provinces.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Approximately what percentage of the cattle population of Canada have been tested?

Mr. Gardiner: About 63 per cent of the cattle.

Mr. Charlton: If the minister would permit me to go back to item No. 17 for just a moment, I see that the number of veterinarians is somewhere near what it was before the war. I wonder if the minister knows how many graduates will be coming into the permanent service from the Ontario and Quebec veterinary colleges this year.

Mr. Gardiner: We expect about thirty new appointments this year.

Mr. Charlton: To the permanent staff?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Catherwood: Could the minister tell us when we may expect the time to be shortened between the application and the actual testing? At present it takes almost a year from the time the application is made until the herd is tested, and many of our farmers who have made application to have their herd accredited would like to have it done much sooner. Can the minister say when that position might be cleared up?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, a year seems quite a long time, but if it is that long it is because of what I just stated. We have difficulty in getting enough veterinarians to do all the work that has to be done, not only in districts but in the testing of accredited herds.

Item agreed to.

19. Livestock and poultry, $1,342,738.

Mr. Pearkes: This is the item under which the minister said he would explain the steps that have been taken to control Newcastle disease on Vancouver island. I have had reports of new cases discovered as recently as June 6. I am particularly anxious to know not only what is being done, but whether the department has enough veterinarians in that district to control the disease, and also whether tests have been made with the vaccines used in the United States, I believe with a considerable degree of success.

Mr. Gardiner: Perhaps the best answer I can give with regard to Newcastle disease on the coast is to merely recite the figures. The flocks under slaughter order numbered 201 as of June 10. Up to that date the destroyed flocks numbered 194 and the birds destroyed totalled 307,217. The eggs destroyed in fully reported destroyed flocks numbered 202,140. The compensation awarded in fully reported destroyed flocks was $421,357.83; and the officials in charge think they have it under control. I believe that is the most complete answer I can give my hon. friend.

Mr. Pearkes: Is it possible to import into British Columbia and use on the flocks there the vaccine which has been tried in Washington with success, as I am informed?

Mr. Gardiner: The department is satisfied that the vaccination which has been found successful in some areas south of the line no doubt will be utilized in this country at a later stage in fighting the disease, but it is felt that at present the most important thing is to slaughter the herds and get rid of them entirely, and also get rid of the eggs produced by the flocks. When the matter is fully under control the question of vaccination in order to prevent the disease from infecting flocks elsewhere may be considered, but at the present time it is felt advisable to go on with the slaughter of flocks, paying for those destroyed.

Mr. Pearkes: The vaccine cannot be imported now, I believe; is that right?

Mr. Gardiner: There are two vaccines, one known as dead vaccine and the other as live vaccine. It is not permitted to import the live vaccine from the United States, but the dead vaccine is produced here in our own laboratories. Up to the present time the importation of live vaccine has been prohibited because under those circumstances it does spread the disease.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): Out in our part of the country the provincial governments are attempting to control Bang's disease. Is the federal government giving any assistance, or is there any federal program to eliminate this disease or prevent it from spreading?

Mr. Gardiner: The federal government cooperates with the provinces. We provide the vaccine and the province applies it.

Mr. Douglas: I wonder if the minister can tell us how many reactors there were among the cattle tested in Prince Edward Island?

Mr. Gardiner: About 90,000 have been tested and there have been about eleven reactors. And the last test, about eleven: one in one county, one in another county and nine in another.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Catherwood: I should like to refer back to item No. 17, and ask the minister if he would just answer one question with regard to efforts being made to combat shipping fever. This is a serious matter among farmers and many farmers hesitate to purchase cattle particularly from the west. I wonder if the minister would make a statement as to what is being done.

Mr. McCubbin: We supply the vaccine in Toronto and Winnipeg and the stockyards and the provincial governments supply the veterinaries to inoculate.

Item agreed to.

Production service—

21. Grants to fairs and exhibitions, under such terms and conditions as may be approved by the governor in council and subject to allocation by the treasury board, $536,400.

Mr. McLure: I should like to ask whether there is any change in class A and class B fairs and how many class A fairs and class B fairs there are in Canada today. While I am on my feet, I should also like to ask what is allowed under the new policy on fairs, with regard to building on property in connection with the show fairs of Canada and so on. I understand there is a new policy this year in the Department of Agriculture with regard to all class A fairs, and that if they are building barns, et cetera, for their stock they can come under this new policy and get assistance from the federal grant.

Mr. Gardiner: There has not been any change in the policy this year. The policy is the same as was set up following the war. Prior to the war we had a certain policy which we followed in making grants. During the war we had none at all. At the end of the war, after negotiation with the associations right across Canada, we agreed on a plan. Under that plan we pay $2,500 to class A fairs, and the qualifications have remained the same since. We pay $1,800 a year to class B fairs. Then we make it possible for class A fairs to capitalize their grants over ten years, to spend all the money or any part of it in one year in order to put up buildings. But if they do that, of course they do not get the grant, or whatever percentage of the grant is taken, in order to put on the building program. For class B fairs it is exactly the same, except that there is only $1,800 to deal with over ten years.

We have another plan under which we carry on with the support of the province as well, under which we put up a certain amount of money, the province puts up a similar amount and the fair board obtains from some source or another a similar amount, a three-way program; we do make arrangements for spending up to $10,000 a year or what accumulates, at $10,000 a year, up to $100,000.

Then there is a special provision under which we deal with some special fairs such as London, Ottawa and Quebec and a number of the larger places, under which we enter into negotiation with the province; or at least they enter into negotiation with the province and with us, and it usually follows that if the province agrees to undertake their part of the expenditure, and we consider that the project is one that should be proceeded with, we put up a similar amount of money. That sometimes runs up to $150,000. In the odd case it has run up to $200,000.

Mr. McLure: I have one other question and that is in connection with winter fairs. In the maritime provinces we have a winter fair at Amherst. That fair at Amherst does for the three maritime provinces and I suppose now it will have to do for four; that is, including Newfoundland as well. It is a maritime province, although it wants to be called the Atlantic province. We get a grant of $5,000 for the Amherst fair, and that is hardly sufficient when the minister considers that three provinces are going to that one fair. For the winter fair or livestock show up in Fredericton later on in the year, they get three times as much money as we get for the winter fair in Amherst. If it is possible, I think that for another season at least the Amherst fair should get further consideration.

Mr. Gardiner: The winter fairs have a flat grant which is not affected by the specially arranged building grant. We do make special arrangements with those who are putting on winter fairs to provide for building on a plan similar to the last one I outlined, namely, where it is usually a three-way proposition. but there is the flat grant that goes right on in so far as winter fairs are concerned even if we have entered into an arrangement of that kind.

Mr. Herridge: Under this item there is one matter I want to bring to the minister's attention, at the request of a number of prominent British Columbia people. I refer to Mrs. Amy Kelsey, who is the only Canadian woman who has won the world wheat championship twice. She won it in 1946 and in 1949. In addition she won at Toronto in 1947. In addition to that she has won 54 other prizes for various grains at international grain competitions. That elderly woman has accomplished a great deal to advertise British Columbia and Canada to the world. It is a remarkable achievement, from my point of view and from the point of view of many people who know her.

This elderly woman, who has had to sell her farm because of the chronic ill-health of her husband, has now gone to Victoria to live. I know, Mr. Chairman, that we have given decorations, such as C.B.E. and others, to people who have done a job for which they have been well paid and in some cases, in my opinion, they have done it in leisure and in great comfort. I am of the opinion that we in Canada fail to recognize the people who make great contributions to agriculture in the same way as we recognize people who make great contributions in other respects. The latter sometimes, in my opinion, are well recognized for making a much smaller contribution than this elderly Canadian woman has made to Canada and to Canadian agriculture.

I mention this matter to the minister and to the committee because I know the position, as do many other people, of this woman who has accomplished a great deal in winning these prizes. She is the only Canadian woman to do so. I know her present position. Because of what she has done and because of the value of her work in agriculture I am going to ask the minister that his department give considerations to making a grant to this woman for her achievements. While she has received various cups, many ribbons and so on, I understand that for her winning the world's wheat championship twice the total cash return has been exactly $25. That did not even cover a fraction of her expenses. I bring this matter to the minister's attention, and I should like him to see if there is any possibility of his department and the cabinet giving consideration to some particular recognition of this Canadian woman.

Mr. Gardiner: There have been a number of persons who have done fine work in exhibiting grains grown in western Canada and in eastern Canada as well. Among those who have attained distinction at these different fairs is a man named Mitchell, south of Moose Jaw, and Seager Wheeler, who I think is also living at the coast now. He was employed by this department for a time on a part-time basis, doing some of the work that was associated not only with grain production but with fruit production as well on the prairies. In my opinion the government has not paid as much attention to what these people have done as it should have or has not found itself in a position to do as much for them as probably should be done. That no doubt applies to Mrs. Kelsey as to the others. She has had a remarkable record in the last few years in the production of wheat and in the showing of the wheat at the best exhibitions on the continent, including Chicago. She has been most successful. I am sure that everyone in this committee, and everyone associated with agriculture, would like to pay her the highest compliments possible in connection with these activities. I did not know that she had disposed of her land and gone to the coast. But having been informed of that fact I shall certainly take into consideration the suggestion made. I do not know what can be done this year on this short notice, but we shall give consideration to the suggestions that have been made.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Item 21 deals with grants to fairs. I think at this time I should mention some of the facts surrounding the London and western Ontario fair. I notice that this item is up $60,500, and that the building fund, which is part of the $60,500, is up $50,000; and the total grant is $170,000. Recently in the city of Toronto hon. members had an opportunity to visit the international trade fair. We realized what a boon it was to industries abroad and to buyers in Canada. I think I am safe in saying that it was of more benefit to foreign nations than it was to Canada; but trade is a two-way street; therefore it is all to the good.

I want to say a word about London and Middlesex county in particular, pointing out the value of these fairs. Not so many years ago the livestock and grain exhibitors from the county of Middlesex were able to draw more prize money from the Chicago livestock exposition than any state in the American union. I point that out with considerable pride. I want to draw to the attention of the minister and also to the attention of hon. members the value of exhibitions in marketing produce wherever markets may develop.

On the 24th of April the mayor of the city of London and his officials were down here in connection with the grant for the new arena. The livestock arena has become a necessary part of the fair at London. They returned home a bit disappointed, I think. That is putting it probably a little mildly. All members from western Ontario, regardless of their party, are interested in this. The parliamentary assistant to the minister who comes from Middlesex West is as much or more interested in this as anyone else. It seems to the man on the street and the man on the farm that the dominion government has been seesawing back and forth with the provincial government over these grants. I would think the best thing for the federal government to do would be to announce that they were going to make a grant, and then there would be nothing else for the province to do but follow suit, and we would have our arena at London.

At London they are also planning to have a winter fair as well. We already have the nucleus of the winter fair in the seed fair that has been going on for some time. It is one of the finest seed fairs in all Canada, if not the finest. It would seem to me that now is the time to make this grant.

A moment or two ago I mentioned the international trade fair. If hon. members will turn to page 52 of the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, they will see that in 1949, $624,000 was expended for the international trade fair alone, and in 1950 the estimate is $602,000. That is quite a sum of money, and it was expended on industries other than agriculture. I am hoping at this time that the minister will make a statement as to what they are prepared to do, telling us that we are going to get our grant.

Mr. Gardiner: I find it a little difficult to make a statement in reply to what has just been said. If I read the list of those who get grants, London would stand at the top of it in amount. If I did that I am afraid that some of the others would be along wanting as much. I do not think there is much reason for there being any disappointment, and I did not think that there had been much disappointment.

The representatives of the board and the mayor of London have been here on a number of occasions. We have had very helpful discussions in connection with what they desire to do in London, and I do not think they have been unduly disappointed in the results of those discussions.

The fact is that it is the only fair in Canada of that kind that is getting $20,000 a year for 10 years from this government, which is $200,000. They are getting a similar amount from the province, and I understand that the city is putting up a similar amount. If they want more than that to spend I presume the city will be putting up some more. I do not think there is anything to suggest that we have not treated London fairly. I think London really believes that we have treated them fairly, as compared with what we have done for others across the country. I feel that, whether others do or not.

I know the position in London about as well as I know it anywhere in Canada, since I was born and brought up in that neighbourhood. When I did go to a fair as a boy I went to the London fair, so that we have some interest in it here. But in addition to that it is in one of the best agricultural areas in Canada. It does lend itself to the type of show which warrants the extra $5,000 that it is getting each year over a ten-year period. There is no other fair that is getting more than $15,000 a year outside of Toronto, which is a much bigger thing and does draw more money from all sources; but London is next to that, and is being dealt with in a manner which is outstanding as compared with other fairs. I agree that it should be, but I do not think there is very much disappointment there over what they have obtained. As a matter of fact, it is more than they asked for in the first instance. They came back the second time for an increase and I think they are pretty well satisfied with what they have obtained.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): The minister is not saying no exactly.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Can the minister tell me whether there is any way in which the city of St. John's can get assistance in regard to an arena? We had an agricultural exhibition of a fine quality in St. John's, Newfoundland, up to a few years ago, when the arena which we had there, and which was partly used as a skating rink, was destroyed by fire. A building next door, which was also used in connection with the exhibition, was destroyed at the same time. The Lions club down there are trying to make a collection from the citizens to build one. Is there any condition attached to the grant given by the federal government which would prevent such a building being used partly as a skating rink during the time when it would not be used for agricultural exhibitions or fair purposes? It is a lot of money to tie up for any considerable length of time, and it seems to me that the parliamentary assistant did lead me to understand that it could not be used for any other purpose. It would be absurd to tie all that money up and keep it idle for nine months of the year, when it could be earning money.

Mr. Gardiner: There is no restriction as to the use of the building. Most of these buildings about which I have been speaking operate for different purposes throughout the greater part of the year. Some of them operate part time as skating rinks. At least one-third of the activities connected with the building must be agricultural before we will become interested in it at all. I understand they have not been having a fair in Newfoundland.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Not for several years.

Mr. Gardiner: In order to establish themselves in a position where they would be able to get a grant under the provisions here they would be required to hold a fair for three years. That would probably require that they do what is done in other provinces, namely start their fair in a small way with assistance from the province and the surrounding community. After they have been in operation for three years and reach the point where they can pay prize money of $3,000, they classify as a class B fair. When they can pay $6,000 in prize money they classify as a class A fair.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): They have been holding exhibitions in which they have paid far more than $5,000 or $6,000. Does the minister mean that they have to have exhibitions for three years before they can qualify for the grant under this item?

Mr. Gardiner: That is the position under the regulations as they are.

Mr. Quelch: Is Saunders wheat considered a satisfactory substitute for Red Bobs? This is the year in which Red Bobs is to be degraded from No. I to No. III. Consequently the farmers in Alberta are switching from Red Bobs to Thatcher, Regent and Saunders. Until recently Saunders wheat had not been grown extensively enough to prove it. What is the situation today?

Mr. Gardiner: Saunders wheat grows in a shorter season than the other wheats. All that means is that it can be grown farther north than the other varieties. I doubt very much if it is a substitute for the other wheats which are growing farther south, because of lower yield, and for other reasons. If it is going to be grown farther north, Saunders wheat has an advantage over the others.

22. Grants to agricultural organizations, as detailed in the estimates, $44,500.

Mr. Blair: Does the government contemplate any change in the method of identifying purebred dogs? I have had protests from purebred dog raisers in my constituency, and they feel strongly about the idea of tattooing dogs, pointing out that it works a hardship and costs a considerable sum to have the tattooing machine to do the work. They believe the method of doing it would place Canada in an unfavourable position, in that no other country is using this method of tattooing purebred dogs. It is pointed out that we have the lowest per capita of purebred dogs of any country in the world. However, one of the dog breeders in my constituency last week won the highest award at Madison Square Garden, in perhaps the greatest show of its kind. He won not only in one class, but also in the class of best dog in the show.

It is pointed out to me that to tattoo some small dogs they have to have anaesthetic. They say there is no special advantage, and the Canadian Kennel Club in particular would like to go ahead with the idea of identifying purebred dogs by colour description. Is this method being put into effect, or is it contemplated?

Mr. Gardiner: My understanding is that tattooing has been used voluntarily. Of course the committee understands the relationship of this department to the matter of keeping livestock records in general, including those of dogs. It is not done by the Department of Agriculture, but is done under a recording organization set up by the different breeding associations. I think the Holstein breeders are about the only important breeders of livestock who do not have it done in that way. They have their own registration.

All other kinds of livestock are registered by this organization which is set up by the breeders themselves. I believe we pay a grant of $18,000. It is only that grant which gives us the right to say anything about what is done. The regulations require that these associations shall present their regulations to us. They are not permitted to act under them until we agree or otherwise with the recommendations made.

The present position in relation to dogs is that there has been a discussion as to whether they should be required to tattoo the dogs. Consideration has been given to the point as to whether the method should be changed from a voluntary one to one in which they would be compelled to tattoo. Many of the dog breeders object to the tattooing.

There is another method, not as satisfactory, I believe, in which note is taken of the colour marks of the animals. However, there are so many animals of the same colour that this is not satisfactory. Another system is being advocated at the present time in which the noseprint is taken, in the same way as thumbprints of individuals are taken. It is said that no two dogs have the same noseprints, and it is advocated that this method be used.

The mounted police and others have been consulted in the matter, and my understanding is that a decision is to be made this week as to the recommendation to be made. No doubt we will agree with whatever recommendation is made, assuming always that the associations themselves are the ones to be satisfied in this matter. However, we are interested in having some method by which we can be fairly certain in respect of the registrations of registered animals.

Mr. McLure: Why could they not be tattooed in the same way as foxes? Thousands of foxes used to be tattooed annually, and they were all recorded. Very little expense was involved in the use of the tattooing machines. The animals did not have to be given anaesthetics or anything else. The marks are plain, and carried all through the years. They are never obliterated. One would have to cut the ear off a dog to obliterate the mark, and it could be done just as easily as it is with foxes.

Mr. Gardiner: The chief objection is that in respect of small dogs the tattoo would take up most of the ear, and that with some dogs the most attractive part is the ears. The dog breeders are particular about this, and objection is raised. Nevertheless about 2,000 of the 3,000 dogs registered are tattooed. I do not know what the kennel association will decide finally, but we will not quarrel with them if they come along with a reasonable suggestion.

Marketing service—

23. Marketing service administration, $162,006.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to ask a question in connection with the situation of apple growers in the whole of Canada, and particularly in British Columbia. The situation I refer to is the loss of the United Kingdom market. I am not going to take much time but I have some figures I should like to lay before the minister. It is well known that the prosperity of the apple growers of this country now and in the past depends largely on the fact that there is a substantial export market in the United Kingdom. The result of that has been that in the main the Ontario and Quebec crops have gone to supply the domestic market, with a substantial portion of the British Columbia crop being marketed domestically but the main portion of the British Columbia and Nova Scotia crops supplying the bulk of the United Kingdom market. That market has been lost completely in the last two years as a commercial market.

I suggest to the minister that he use all the influence he and his department have and in co-operation with the Minister of Trade and Commerce endeavour to persuade the British government to take at least a reasonably substantial quantity of Canadian apples. I appreciate the difficulty and realize the reluctance with which one government would approach another government to tell it what it needs in terms of food products. However, I think it would be fair to put the proposition before the British food ministry that as our production has been largely geared to the existence of the British market, as we have made substantial contributions, quite willingly it is true, toward helping them solve their food problem during and since the war, they should take some portion of the Canadian apple production. It might be suggested that they divert, perhaps $3 million or $4 million —we would hope for a minimum of $5 million —toward the purchase of Canadian apples. Perhaps I should not mention a figure because this would be a matter of negotiation.

I can understand that the producers of Canadian agricultural products who depend upon export markets are anxious that they get some share of the United Kingdom market. I am not suggesting that we want to interfere with what the wheat grower or the bacon producer or anyone else gets, but I do hope the minister will lay before the British the suggestion that in what they spend for the purchase of Canadian food there should be something allocated for this Canadian product which has always had a traditional market in Great Britain.

There are certain figures I should like to lay before the minister to indicate the gravity of this problem. I have figures showing how many apples were exported to Great Britain from British Columbia and from Canada as a whole, and what percentage of our exports were sent to the United Kingdom. The following are the exports of British Columbia apples to the United Kingdom:

1934-35	1,563,000
1935-36	2,097,000
1936-37	1,686,000
1937-38	2,355,000
1938-39	2,422,000

Then follow the figures for the post-war years:

	bushels
1944-45	529,000
1945-46	719,000
1946-47	2,552,000
1947-48	.....
1948-49	.....

The average British Columbia apple crop is from 7,000,000 to 9,000,000 bushels per year, while the average exports to the United Kingdom have been 2,000,000 bushels per year. On the average, one-third of our apple crop has been exported to the United Kingdom so it will be realized what the complete loss of that market means to our apple growers. The figures for the whole of Canada are as follows:

	bushels
1934-35	5,314,000
1935-36	6,462,000
1936-37	3,862,000
1937-38	6,196,000
1938-39	7,454,000

Then in the post-war years:

	bushels
1944-45	1,034,000
1945-46	794,000
1946-47	4,492,000

The apples exported to the United Kingdom represented the following percentages of our total exports of apples:

	per cent
1934-35	88·5
1935-36	96·4
1936-37	85·5

It will be seen that in the post-war period practically 90 per cent of the exports of apples from Canada went to the United Kingdom. Another way of looking at this is to say that in the years, 1934-38, our exports of apples represented 46 per cent of the apple crop in Canada or an average of 6,483,000 bushels per year. By 1948 that average was only 21 per cent, or an export of 2,850,000 bushels. The percentage of the crop exported fell 25 per cent or 4,000,000 bushels in that period while the domestic consumption of fresh apples increased to a considerably smaller extent.

In the post-war years 40 per cent of the total crop or 5,645,000 bushels were consumed domestically and by 1948 this percentage had increased only to 57 per cent of the crop or 7,729,000 bushels. The percentage of crop exported decreased by 25 per cent or 4,000,000 bushels while the percentage of domestic consumption increased by only 17 per cent or 2,000,000 bushels. It will be seen that the decline in the export market in the United Kingdom has not been offset by more than 50 per cent by the increase in the domestic consumption of fresh apples.

There has been some increase in the processing of apples, but the net situation is that our growers are faced with surplus apples. While I place the emphasis upon the British Columbia figures because they are more readily available, this situation affects not only British Columbia but Nova Scotia, which are the main exporting provinces, and will in turn affect the producers of Ontario and Quebec should an increasing percentage of apples have to be marketed domestically. No other market has yet been found to take the place of the United Kingdom market. Along with this goes the other problem to which I think the government should be giving consideration immediately, the instituting of some floor or support price program for our apple producers now so that they will be able to say with some certainty what their future is. That perhaps comes up under a later item, and I will not go into detail here, but I think the two should be considered together.

In closing I want to ask the minister and the committee to bear in mind the serious import of these figures, the very grave position that faces our apple producers through absolutely no fault of their own but because of the complete loss of the British market. I know the minister's influence is considerable, and I ask him to do his best to persuade the British, in allocating their dollars for the purchase of food, to include a fair share for the purchase of apples. Before I sit down, I want to say that this matter cannot be put off by saying that there is not a market in the United Kingdom. The figures which have been given recently of the increasing quantities of apples imported from Australia, New Zealand, Italy and countries other than Canada, where they can purchase them with soft currency, show quite clearly that there is a market for apples in the United Kingdom. I hope the minister will tell the committee, the apples growers of British Columbia and the rest of the country, that they may expect some very concerted effort by the department to look after their interests in so far as the British market is concerned.

Mr. Herridge: Before the minister replies, I should like to support the remarks of the hon. member for Kamloops in connection with doing something more than we have to obtain a share of the British apple market. I think the minister has already indicated that he believes the prosperity of the apple growers depends in the future upon their receiving a share of the United Kingdom market. To support that view I want to read from a statement in the Montreal Gazette of December 15, 1949. Speaking before the closing session of the tenth annual dominion-provincial agricultural conference the Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner is reported as having said in part:

> Canada's farmers could not be prosperous without British food contracts. It was "essential" that Canada sell to the United Kingdom most of her surplus bacon, cheese, egg and apple production. There appeared to be no other markets available.

The minister has recognized the Canadian apple producers' need for the United Kingdom market. We are not speaking tonight simply for the apple growers of British Columbia but also for the apple growers of other parts of Canada who have depended in the past on the export market. Over a number of years we have been told by the experts of the department of Trade and Commerce that the market in Great Britain was finished, that there was no future market, but the experience of the past year proves them to be absolutely incorrect. There was $2,500,000 worth of Washington and Oregon apples shipped through Seattle to Great Britain last year. The British contracted for $3,500,000 of Australian apples. Considerable quantities of apples have been shipped to Great Britain from the Netherlands, and also considerable quantities from Italy, so there is no question that there is a market available there if we can overcome the currency restriction.

Last year the minister's department made arrangements with the people who were purchasing for Great Britain to defer the purchase of $25 million of wheat out of approximately $300 million. Of that, $17,500,000 was spent on bacon, $5 million on salmon and $2,500,000 on lumber. My point is that the minister has already indicated to the house during the present session that he believes we will have no difficulty in selling our wheat crop, that what we do not sell to Great Britain we can sell to other countries. Therefore I support entirely the proposal made by the hon. member for Kamloops that the minister and his officials should do what they can to see if we cannot have a similar arrangement made to take care of a certain quantity of Canadian apples. So far as the Minister of Trade and Commerce is concerned, I am quite sure that he is not particularly enamoured of the sale of apples. He made a very interesting remark that apples were not food. As a matter of fact apples have had quite a lot to do with the history of mankind, but I will not go into that tonight. I shall content myself by saying in reply to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that man does not live by proteins alone.

I happen to have the special issue of the Times that has been sent to members, and I was reading it this evening. There is an article in it entitled "The Dollar-Sterling Trade Board, Now a 'Going Concern'." The first paragraph reads:

> One of the most heartening signs of positive action to break the threatening crisis in trade between the United Kingdom and Canada is the recent formation of the dollar-sterling trade board in Canada. The board will act in an advisory capacity to Britain's dollar export board and although in no sense a government agency it enjoys full support of the Canadian government.

Near the end of the article there is this paragraph:

In addition to the board and its secretariat, working committees of specialists in various industries are being established. These working committees, whose personnel have been selected by members of the board from within their own trades and industries, have the task of examining in detail the statistics of exports and supplying to Britain's dollar export board technical information for the use of British exporters. . . .

Some of the technical information that we want them to supply is the fact that we have a large quantity of Canadian apples we want to sell to Great Britain. The board is composed of prominent industrialists including Mr. H. R. MacMillan, a great business executive, Mr. Hannam, the president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, and many other competent gentlemen. I say that the apple producers of British Columbia and Nova Scotia expect Mr. Hannam as president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture to do his best as a member of the dollar-sterling trade board to see not only that bacon, eggs, cheese and lumber are marketed in Great Britain but also that surplus apples which must be exported are included in the arrangements that are made with the British government for this coming year.

Therefore I ask the minister to tell the house if he thinks it is possible with the co-operation of his department and the dollar-sterling trade board to secure some of the British market for Canadian apple producers, the market that he says is essential for the prosperity of the apple industry in Canada.

Mr. Gardiner: All I can say in reply is that we did all we could do. We even offered wheat for apples but the offer was refused. I am sure the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce the other night was not an expression of his own view. When he said something with regard to the food value of apples it was an expression of the view of the British government. I am quite sure it is not an expression of the view of the British people because I have in my hand a copy of an article which appeared in the Vernon News which I think answers very well some of the suggestions that have been made as to how the lack of desire on the part of some in Great Britain might be overcome. The heading of the article is:

Twenty thousand letters pour in to thank growers for fruit. British people send small gifts, words of appreciation for apples.

[Mr. Herridge.]

The article reads:

A realistic indication of how much the shipment of Okanagan valley apples to the old country meant to the people of the United Kingdom is revealed by B.C. Tree Fruits Limited this week. The number of letters of appreciation received cannot be counted, but to date nearly 20,000 have come in and they are continuing to arrive with the docking of every boat. This year, for the first time since 1946, B.C. apples have been shipped to Great Britain. Movement from the 1949 crop to the United Kingdom totalled 1,593,544 boxes. Previous to the war, Britain purchased annually approximately 2,500,000 boxes of B.C. apples and twice during the war, in the face of wartime shipping conditions, shipments reached more than the 2,000,000 mark.

Shipments this year, of course, were distributed across the length and breadth of the British isles. The British food ministry has seen fit to distribute 50,000 boxes of B.C. apples free to schools and institutions. The appreciative and enthusiastic reception which has been accorded this fruit augurs well for the future of our B.C. industry in the U.K. markets when exchange difficulties have been overcome.

The newspaper article goes on in the same vein and indicates what these people have done for themselves. I do not think any group have done a better job of marketing their product this year than the fruit growers of British Columbia. They not only marketed fruit in Canada, as was suggested a few moments ago, in competition with fruit grown elsewhere in this country; they marketed apples in thirty-two states of the union in the face of one of the biggest crops the United States has ever had. Then, when they could not market the remainder of their crop, they sent those apples to Great Britain. I believe the twenty thousand letters coming back from the British people who ate those apples is the best indication one could have that at least the British mind is being turned toward British Columbia apples, and I do not think it will be very long after the British mind turns toward British Columbia apples until the British government also turns in that direction. The suggestion coming from these people to the effect that they desire these apples may bring about the same result that their desire for more gasoline brought very recently. Probably some people over there will change their minds, if we continue to send apples as we did this year.

Mr. Fulton: I know the remarks of the minister concerning the work of the British Columbia tree fruits board in marketing their apples will be appreciated. Certainly it is a well deserved tribute; and I also believe the minister is perfectly correct when he says that appreciation of the gift of the million and a half boxes will do much in future to influence the British government to buy Canadian and particularly British Columbia apples again when the currency difficulties are overcome. But those difficulties are not yet overcome, and we want an assurance from the minister that he will apply pressure, in a proper manner of course, upon the British food mission when they next come to discuss the purchase of food products in Canada. In that way we may have pressure from both directions, from the people at home in the United Kingdom and from our own government making representations which I submit it is perfectly entitled to make. It should be impressed upon them that our apple growers deserve some consideration in the allocation of the very limited supply of Canadian dollars they have to spend on food in this country.

Mr. Gardiner: I might as well be perfectly candid. I have done every nice thing I know of to try to persuade those who come here to talk about buying food, but I have not succeeded. Others have gone over there and attempted to be even nicer than I was in the last stages of the discussions, and they have not succeeded. I think it is about time we stopped talking nicely to some people over in Britain. That does not apply to very many people, just one or two; but until they are spoken to directly I do not think we should look for very much success in the marketing of some of those products in that country.

Having said this, it does not mean that we have not been able to market our farm products. Over and over the story is repeated that we have lost the British market, or we have lost markets generally. All I have to say in reply to that statement is that with the exception of apples, which after all were marketed—

Mr. Fulton: A million and a half boxes were given away.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, they were marketed, and this government paid $2 million into the treasury of those who marketed them. The apples of Nova Scotia were marketed, and we paid $500,000 into their treasury.

Mr. Fulton: That is a new definition of marketing.

Mr. Gardiner: It is not so new. Previous governments, and perhaps this government, permitted them to be marketed at returns which were not as high as would have been received now even if that additional amount had not been provided. That money was provided in order to increase the returns to those who produced the apples. Those apples were marketed at a return we thought was too low, and that level was increased. It is too late this evening to enter into a discussion of the general question, but it can be pretty successfully shown that our farm products have been marketed. We would like to market more apples in Britain, but I do not think they are going to be marketed by nice talking. I think more direct talking must be done than we have had so far, and I am quite prepared to do it.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Second report of standing committee on external affairs.—Mr. Bradette.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that a message has been received from the Senate informing this house that the Senate has passed the following bill, to which the concurrence of this house is desired: Bill No. 303 (letter Y-8 of the Senate) intituled an act to amend the Canada Shipping Act, 1934.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): May I ask the unanimous consent of the house to have this bill moved one step forward by giving it first reading?

Mr. Drew: No, Mr. Speaker. The members of our party who are interested in this matter indicate to me that they do not feel it is desirable that it be proceeded with in this way.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will take up the resolution to ratify the convention of the world meteorological organization signed on October 11, 1947; second, Bill No. 302, the defence supplies bill. Then we will move to go into supply and take up the estimates of agriculture, citizenship and immigration, trade and commerce and public works.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Administration service—

1. Departmental administration, $293,670.
2. Information service, $316,495.
3. Advisory committee on agricultural services, $5,000.
4. Contributions to commonwealth bureaux, $56,821.

Science service—

5. Science service administration, $1,229,750.
6. Animal and poultry pathology, $388,640.

7. Bacteriology and dairy research, $177,305.

8. Botany and plant pathology, $1,343,687.

9. Agricultural chemistry, $495,320.

10. Agricultural entomology, $1,546,510.

11. Forest entomology, $1,222,839.

12. Plant protection, $731,705.

Experimental farms service—

13. Experimental farms service administration, $129,780.

14. Central experimental farm, $1,868,118.

15. Branch farms and stations and illustration stations, $5,977,447.

Production service—

16. Production service administration, $56,015.

Health of animals—

17. Administration of Animal Contagious Diseases Act, and Meat and Canned Foods Act, $3,661,965.

18. Compensation for animals slaughtered, $1,091,292.

19. Live stock and poultry, $1,342,738.

Plant products—

20. Seeds, feeds, fertilizers, insecticides and fungicides control, including grant of $40,000 to Canadian Seed Growers' Association, $1,261,533.

21. Grants to fairs and exhibitions, under such terms and conditions as may be approved by the governor in council and subject to allocation by the treasury board, $536,400.

22. Grants to agricultural organizations, as detailed in the estimates, $44,500.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, June 13, 1950

RADIO BROADCASTING

SECOND REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Second report of special committee on radio broadcasting.—Mr. Maybank.

REFERENCE OF CERTAIN ESTIMATES TO COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved:

That votes 267 and 268 of the main estimates 1950-51, approved and reported upon by the special committee on radio broadcasting this day, be referred back to the committee of supply.

Motion agreed to.

EUROPEAN ECONOMIC CO-OPERATION

ACCEPTANCE BY CANADA OF INVITATION TO ESTABLISH WORKING RELATIONSHIP

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I wish to lay on the table two copies of the text of the invitation from the secretary general of the organization for European economic co-operation, inviting the Canadian government to become associated with the work of that body, and the text of Canada's acceptance of this invitation.

REPORT OF MR. JUSTICE BIRD ON CLAIMS WITH RESPECT TO PROPERTIES SOLD BY CUSTODIAN

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, consequent upon a number of complaints of Canadian citizens of Japanese origin who resided in British Columbia in 1941 that their real and personal property had been disposed of by the custodian of alien enemy property at prices less than the fair market value, the government, as soon as possible after the cessation of hostilities, by order in council P.C. 1810 dated July 18, 1947, as amended, appointed Mr. Justice H. I. Bird of the appellate division of the Supreme Court of British Columbia as a royal commissioner under the Inquiries Act to conduct an inquiry. Mr. Justice Bird's report was received in due course and I am tabling it now.

The government will provide compensation totalling $1,222,829.16 in accordance with those of the commissioner's recommendations which fall within the terms of reference. For this purpose it will bring down, at the present session, a supplementary estimate.

The commissioner also felt it incumbent upon him to deal with several claims which, strictly speaking, were outside the terms of reference and which he has dealt with in sixteen special reports. The government intends to carefully consider these special claims and the commissioner's special reports are before the treasury board for this purpose at the present time. These claims total approximately $150,000.

I wish at this stage publicly to express to Mr. Justice Bird the government's appreciation of the service rendered by him during the two years and four months which he has devoted exclusively to this important work, carried through, as it has been, in the most painstaking and comprehensive manner.

Mr. Justice Bird's report dealt with a total of 1,434 claims relating to residential, farm and business properties; household effects; agricultural tools and equipment; stock in trade and trade fixtures; fishing vessels, gear and nets and motorcars and trucks, which had been vested in the custodian and had been sold by him. These claims related to 7,086 parcels of real and personal property, and involved filing of 8,996 exhibits. After a number of claims had been rejected and withdrawn, the report finally recommends payment to 1,300 Canadians of Japanese origin of various amounts totalling $1,222,829.16.

Having regard to these facts, and also to the difficulties encountered in eliciting the necessary information from many claimants who were not familiar with the English language, the monumental nature of the task with which the commissioner was faced at once becomes apparent. Only his unlimited patience and clear thought have made possible the report which reflects so much credit upon himself.

In his report Mr. Justice Bird makes complimentary references to the good faith and sincerity with which the custodian of alien property discharged his duties. He also pays tribute to the efficient and co-operative manner in which counsel for the claimants and for the commission carried out their duties, and it is quite apparent that without such co-operation, the report which is now being tabled could not have been as good as it is.

Mr. Fleming: Does the report of the commissioner the minister has tabled include also the sixteen reports the minister indicates are now before treasury board relating to matters outside the scope of the report?

Mr. Garson: No, it does not. As I indicated in my statement, these are simply communications to the government apart altogether from the terms of reference.

Mr. Fleming: Will the government consider tabling those also?

Mr. Garson: When we have had an opportunity to consider them with treasury board, and to dispose of them, we shall be glad to consider tabling them.

FEED GRAINS

FREIGHT ASSISTANCE—PAYMENTS OF $5,000 OR MORE, FISCAL YEAR 1949-50

On the order for motions:

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): At yesterday's sitting the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) commented on a return which had been made to an order of the house, dated May 3, 1950, with respect to freight assistance on western feed grain. It would appear that the hon. member wished to obtain a list of the companies to whom freight assistance payments were made in 1948 and 1949, together with the actual amounts paid. Through a misunderstanding of the question this information was not supplied.

In the public accounts for 1948-49 all freight assistance payments in excess of $5,000 were listed. Some items from these lists were placed on Hansard by the hon. member. In the forthcoming public accounts for 1949-50 similar lists will be published. The comptroller of the treasury has furnished the appropriate copy sheets for the public accounts, and these are now being tabled for the information of the hon. member.

I am requesting the hon. member to note that the information is not complete, because only payments of $5,000 and more are listed. Payments of less than $5,000 were made to 167 companies. These can be produced if the hon. member wishes, but some time will be required to prepare the list.

One further point might be noted, and that is that the reports are for the fiscal years, not calendar years. To classify the payments by calendar years would require some time, and would delay the presentation of the information.

[Mr. Garson.]

The list of companies to whom freight assistance payments in excess of $5,000 on western feed grain were made in 1949-50 is lengthy, and to obviate the necessity of reading it I would request the permission of the house to table the list to be added to the return.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

AMENDMENTS TO RATIFY INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION FOR SAFETY OF LIFE AT SEA

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the first reading of Bill No. 303 (from the Senate) to amend the Canada Shipping Act, 1934.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

BRITISH COLUMBIA LUMBER INDUSTRY—QUESTION AS TO THREATENED STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, has the Minister of Labour any comment to make on the possibility of a strike in the lumber industry of British Columbia?

Hon. Humphrey Mitchell (Minister of Labour): That industry does not come within my jurisdiction, although it did for a good many years during the war. However, if my hon. friend wants to have my comment, I shall give it to him. I say this, to both sides, that it is the easiest thing in the world to get men out on the street, but it is a good deal harder to get them back to work.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DEFENCE SUPPLIES BILL—QUESTION AS TO PROCEEDING WITH SECOND READING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before we proceed to the business of the house, can it be made clear that, in view of the fact that Bill No. 302 has not reached us, the government will not ask us to proceed with its second reading today, as was announced last night

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, we intended to bring it up later this day, after it had been handed to hon. members. If there is objection I suppose we can put it off until tomorrow, but I had thought we could go on with it this evening.

METEOROLOGY

APPROVAL OF CONVENTION OF WORLD METEOROLOGICAL ORGANIZATION SIGNED AT WASHINGTON OCTOBER 11, 1947

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the convention of the world meteorological organization signed at Washington on October 11, 1947, and tabled on February 14, 1949, and that this house do approve the same.

He said: Mr. Speaker, following the debate which took place when this motion was originally made, the convention was referred to the standing committee on external affairs and discussed there section by section. At that time hon. members had an excellent opportunity of getting such further information as they desired, and I think I need not add anything to what I said in my original statement. I recommend the approval of this convention.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, it was at my suggestion that this convention was referred to the standing committee on external affairs. As I had expected, the committee gave the matter its usual careful consideration, and has now recommended approval of the convention.

We learned that the world meteorological organization will be a successor to what has been known as the international meteorological organization, which has been functioning for about seventy-five years, and apparently with a considerable measure of success. When I spoke before I expressed some concern about other countries, such as Russia, getting weather information from Canada. It now appears that Canada needs weather information from Siberia, and that Russia needs weather information from western Europe. So that both blocs in the world today require this weather organization, and it is no doubt for that reason that there has been co-operation.

One can only express the hope that it may be possible to convince the two world blocs that they need each other in world affairs generally as well as in connection with weather reports. If they should reach that conclusion, then much of the friction in the world would be removed and the United Nations would be enabled to fulfil its high aim of preserving peace.

I am personally grateful to the committee for giving careful consideration to the convention, and I agree that Canada should join this organization.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps I should say a word on the position taken by this party with respect to this convention. Generally speaking this group is very careful in international matters. We were happy when the convention was referred to the standing committee on external affairs. The members of that committee heard the evidence and asked a number of questions, and we gained the impression that the convention is not a binding treaty having the force of international law. It is more or less a co-operative arrangement, a sort of gentlemen's agreement. On that basis we have no objection to approval of the convention, because we think it will serve a good purpose.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) has discovered the silver lining in the dark clouds that pass by. It is hoped that with co-operation among the nations of the world we can expect good weather all over.

Mr. Knowles: Carried.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Marketing service—

26. Subsidies for cold storage warehouses under the Cold Storage Act, and grants, in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $644,159.

Mr. Pearkes: There has been a recent development in the northwestern states described as gas refrigeration for the preservation of fruits. This has nothing at all to do with the Alberta pipe lines, but it is a process by which gases are thrown off from the fruit, causing it to go dormant and thereby enabling apples and other fruits to be kept in a better state of preservation than in ordinary cold storage. Could the minister state whether experiments in this connection are being carried on at any of the stations, and if plants are being established for the co-operative use of farmers so that they could have the same benefits as those derived from other forms of cold storage?

Mr. McCubbin: Before the minister answers the hon. member for Nanaimo, I should like to reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Lake Centre when the cold storage bill was under discussion; I was unable to answer it at the time. I told the hon. member I would give him the information when the estimates were under consideration. The hon. member asked what grants were made in Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba under the act. I now have this information, which is as follows:

Name	Approved Subsidy	Year Built	Location
Manitoba
Brandon Creamery and Supply Company	$ 9,600.00	1912	Brandon
Winkler Co-operative Creamery	5,931.00	1949	Winkler
Crescent Cold Storage Limited	87,567.93	1947	Winnipeg
North Star Cold Storage Company Limited No. 1	23,743.20	1943	Winnipeg
North Star Cold Storage Company Limited No. 2	23,835.60	1946	Winnipeg
Winnipeg Cold Storage Company Ltd.	104,950.26	1949	Winnipeg
Manitoba Cold Storage Company Ltd.	181,000.00	1939	Winnipeg
Saskatchewan
Moose Jaw Cold Storage Co.	27,000.00	1913	Moose Jaw
Central Cold Storage Ltd.	48,403.72	1947	Prince Albert
Saskatchewan Co-operative Creamery	14,477.00	1912	Regina
Saskatchewan Co-operative Creamery	32,400.00	1918	Saskatoon
Saskatchewan Co-operative Creamery	6,735.00	1914	Vonda
Alberta
Merchants Cold Storage	27,000.00	1911	Calgary
O'Riorden, R. D.	6,231.26	1946	Camrose
Alberta Poultry Producers Ltd	31,515.87	1945	Edmonton
Edmonton Cold Storage Co. No. 1	45,600.00	1913	Edmonton
Edmonton Cold Storage Co. No. 2	22,500.00	1944	Edmonton
Central Alberta Dairy Pool	10,380.90	1945	Red Deer

The Central Cold Storage Limited at Prince Albert was the particular plant in which the hon. member was interested. The following warehouses are under construction throughout western Canada:

Name	Estimated subsidy	Location
Manitoba Dairy and Poultry Co-operative Ltd.	$17,520.00	Brandon, Manitoba
Winnipeg Cold Storage Co. Ltd.	36,180.00	Winnipeg, Manitoba
Davidson Co-operative Association Ltd.	10,539.00	Davidson, Saskatchewan
Limerick Co-operative Association Ltd.	4,500.00	Limerick, Saskatchewan
Edmonton Cold Storage Co. Ltd.	60,000.00	Edmonton, Alberta

I hope that this is the information asked for by the hon. member.

Mr. Gardiner: In connection with the question raised by the hon. member for Nanaimo, may I say that there is an organization, I believe with headquarters at Vancouver, which has been promoting a plan along the lines suggested. I believe they already have a cold storage plant in Vancouver, but they are hoping to have cold storage plants also at Edmonton, Calgary, Regina and Saskatoon. They will promote the marketing of products in farming communities as well as urban centres.

The proposal was brought to our attention by the promoter, and we think it is good. The only reason it was brought to our attention was to inquire whether they could get the thirty per cent grant. I do not think there is any question about the idea being good; I believe it has been tried out and found to be successful in the United States, and I am sure it would give good service in this country. When an application is made for the thirty per cent grant we check to see whether there are sufficient cold storage plants in the vicinity. If it is determined that there are sufficient cold storage facilities, then we do not make the thirty per cent grant. But that does not mean that the company cannot go ahead and put up a cold storage plant if they desire to do so.

So far as I can recall at the moment, a check was made in Calgary and it was reported from all sources, including provincial government sources, that there is sufficient cold storage in Calgary, and that it would be detrimental to the cold storage that has been subsidized to have more cold storage at that point. There has been some inquiry made at Edmonton, but I do not think a final report has been obtained. My impression is that any reports or investigations that have been made at Regina and Saskatoon would tend to indicate that there could be more cold storage at those points. To my knowledge that is as far as the discussions have gone. I do not know to what extent the company has been proceeding without giving consideration to possible grants from Ottawa, but the grants are available on the same basis as they are available to cold storage generally—that is, if conditions are such as to warrant it.

Mr. Bryce: I have had some difficulty in hearing what the minister said. I do not think he is properly warmed up yet. When you advance money to cold storage companies to erect and operate cold storage plants, is there a clause in the agreement allotting a certain amount of space to patrons of the district?

Mr. Gardiner: I am having as much difficulty in hearing my hon. friend.

Mr. Bryce: I would suggest that the minister sit nearer the centre of the chamber; then he will hear me and I will hear him.

Mr. Gardiner: You will have to suggest that people stop buzzing around us. There is too much murmuring going on. Otherwise I think we could hear all right.

Mr. Bryce: What I am asking the minister is whether there is a clause in the agreement with the cold storage company providing a certain amount of space for patrons of the district.

Mr. Gardiner: The old regulation in the provision for securing grants provided that there could not be more than fifteen per cent, but there is a provision in the act now, which was introduced in 1947, that where a strictly co-operative organization organizes locker space for the benefit of the people of the community they can have one hundred per cent if they so desire.

Item agreed to.

Marketing service—

27. Fruit, vegetables and maple products, and honey, including grant of $5,000 to Canadian Horticultural Council, $989,000.

Mr. Cardiff: Are we going to take a little time to ask a few questions, or are you going to railroad these items through without giving us a chance? If you are, we might as well let them all go through and allow things to remain as they are. I see that this item is down somewhat. Are we not getting the service we were getting before?

Mr. Gardiner: Service on what?

Mr. Cardiff: Under item 27. Nearly every item is down. Are we not getting the service?

Mr. Gardiner: It is an increase of $60,340. I do not think that is down.

Mr. Cardiff: I thought it was down. I beg your pardon.

Mr. Bryce: Is the government still carrying any honey?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, the government is carrying about 2,800,000 pounds.

Mr. Charlton: Has the minister any idea as to the honey surplus that is being carried in the country at this time?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, that is about what it is. I have the figure here somewhere. My hon. friend probably wants the story more than just the figure. The figure is just about what I gave a moment ago.

Mr. Charlton: I do not want a story. I want the number of pounds.

Mr. Gardiner: Last year the persons handling honey came to us and suggested they had a surplus of 5 million pounds. I asked the house for a vote sufficient to purchase the 5 million pounds. When we started out to search for the 5 million pounds we managed to get approximately 3 million pounds. We have carried the 3 million pounds until quite recently. The honey people came back this year and asked for assistance again. When they came back I asked them whose honey the 3 million pounds was. Of course the fact is that there is one place you can sell honey at the present time, and that is in Canada. This year the production is low compared with last year. There was not any more honey in the country, so far as we could see, than had been sold before. I asked them whether they considered the 3 million pounds was government honey or whether they considered it was their honey. At first they took the position it was the government's honey. I said, "All right, we are going to sell it on this market." That changed the course of the discussion to a certain extent, and it was finally agreed that it was not our honey, that all that had happened was that they had a surplus of honey and the government stepped in and said that they would take it off the market for the time being until it could be sold. They said it should come back and be handled by the people who handle honey in Canada. As the result of the discussion we have made an agreement with them that they are going to sell the 3 million pounds, together with their own honey. So far as we know, the honey can be sold in Canada this year.

Mr. Charlton: As I understand it, that is all first grade honey?

Mr. Gardiner: What we have is nearly all No. 1. One of the points involved in the discussion was that the honey they now have was not all as good quality. Some of it is what they call dark honey, and it is difficult to sell in this country, but it is sold at a lower price elsewhere. We sell it in Israel, Belgium, Italy and other places.

Mr. Charlton: Has the minister any idea what quantity of second grade or dark honey is in surplus supply?

Mr. Gardiner: I expected that more information was going to be asked for, and I have too much here. It is difficult to find the information, but it is here somewhere. I shall have to send out for the exact figures. As I recall it, the division has some 300,000 odd pounds of dark honey, but I have not the figures before me.

Mr. Tustin: I do not know whether the minister answered this question before, but is it the intention of the government to place a floor price under honey this year, and has the association requested this?

Mr. Gardiner: Up to the present it has not been considered wise to place a floor price under honey. We think there is a market in Canada for the honey that is available. On the basis of last year's sales there is a market for more honey than is available, with the exception of this dark honey, which is not salable in Canada.

Mr. Tustin: Has there been any request from the honey producers for a floor price?

Mr. Gardiner: No, there was no definite request. The discussion was along the lines I suggested a moment ago.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Would the minister let the item stand until we get that information?

Mr. Gardiner: There are many matters coming under this item in addition to honey.

Mr. James: Mr. Chairman, I cannot let this opportunity go by without having something to say about apples generally, and especially the apples grown in Ontario, with particular emphasis upon the excellent apples produced in Durham county; and I could include in that category Northumberland county as well. Had the supersalesmen from British Columbia not started peddling their wares and their grievances here last night I should have maintained my sphinx-like silence and allowed the business of the house to continue without interruption. As it is I must leap to the defence of the Ontario apple growers, whose produce throughout the years has been proven to be the finest in Canada.

For a few moments I would like to deal with the importance of the apple in the development of our world. Even in the beginning there were apples, and poor Eve fell victim to their irresistible charm. She knew that the McIntosh red upon which she gazed would have a flavour incomparable among all the fruits of the earth. She knew that one bite from the apple would make her healthy and wise. Could the devil have tempted her with a sheaf of western wheat, a bunch of grapes, a gold nugget, or a B.C. fir? No; it had to be that most attractive of all things, the apple.

The great law of gravitation was also discovered because of the apple; for when Newton sat under the trees in his orchard and saw one of those apples fall he began to wonder why the apple did not fall upward. Could he have discovered the law of gravitation by looking at a Prince Edward Island potato or the iron ore of Labrador? No; you and I must admit that the apple falling on Newton's head was of great importance in the progress of our world.

In national affairs the apple plays a great part. If you visit a certain town in Italy you will find a most delightful little chapel erected in honour of William Tell, who won his greatest fame because he shot an apple from his son's head. He never could have shot a grape, or a Winnipeg goldeye; therefore the apple all the way round, religion, science, sport and in every other particular, is the greatest of all the fruits, and we owe it an immense debt of gratitude.

Even in our bodies we have the Adam's apple, and when we talk of a thing of beauty we say "She is the apple of my eye." Why was it the apple was chosen to set forth those delightful, those entrancing, those incomparable qualities and virtues? Because it has within itself the very essence of value.

But I will give you the best proof of all that the apple plays a part in life when everything else fails. You remember King Solomon. He wrote a love poem at one time; and he had a good deal of experience in love. If ever there was a man qualified to write about love it must be King Solomon. You will find at one time that he got very sick of love, and when he desired something that would be a very excellent substitute he wrote this line in his poem: "Stay me with flagons, comfort me with apple, for I am sick of love." You can picture King Solomon with a jug of cider and a plate of apples. and he found that more consolation than all his wives.

I could go on giving example after example of the importance of the apple in our economy and in the health of our nation. Let us never forget the adage that an apple a day keeps the doctor away. I could tell of the versatility of this fruit. You can bake it, boil it, roast it or fry it; serve it with meats, or preserve it, or jam it, or pickle it. You can drink it; you can eat it. It has many forms and many uses; that is what makes it so wonderful that no other fruit can be compared to it.

For the benefit of those who have listened so patiently, let me bring you up to date on the apple industry in Canada. For the past several years the industry has been flourishing and happy. The growers in Ontario and Quebec have watched the federal government extend financial and marketing assistance to the growers in British Columbia and Nova Scotia, a situation which was satisfactory to the Ontario people because it kept the British Columbia and Nova Scotia apples away from the Ontario market, giving the local producers a good domestic market which in most cases took care of the Ontario crop. To appreciate the picture fairly well it must be explained that in Nova Scotia and British Columbia the growers are confined to small areas compared with Ontario, so it was a comparatively easy matter to have the western and eastern apples packed and shipped or processed through a central agency. Such central agencies made it comparatively simple to distribute subsidies. In Ontario the growers are spread across the province, and it has been very difficult to set up any centralized control and sales organization.

This year an unfortunate event occurred which has left a sour taste in the mouths of the Ontario growers. Production of apples was high and markets were not too plentiful. Many orchardists in Ontario lost a considerable amount of money. One large grower has told me that he lost $40,000 and that a friend of his lost over $20,000. Others just broke even, and a few made costs but not much more. Early in the spring an announcement was made in this house to the effect that $2 million would be given to the British Columbia growers and $500,000 to the growers of Nova Scotia. There was no complaint from the Ontario people, who in many cases had also taken a financial beating. To make matters worse, a few weeks after that announcement, just when Ontario growers normally market their Northern Spies, it was found that British Columbia had been able to sell the large Ontario and Quebec chain stores on a proposal to give exclusive rights to British Columbia apples for a period of several weeks, during which an intensive advertising campaign was conducted in the press, paid for, as I understand it, half by the British Columbia growers and half by the chain stores involved. Needless to say this program literally wiped out the market for Ontario Northern Spies, which had to be held over and sold later or disposed of in other ways. Now we hear the hon. member for Kootenay West bragging how many apples they sold in Ontario and will sell in the future, to which I reply that had the Ontario growers received a $2 million subsidy, they might have been able to sell apples in British Columbia. But Ontario growers have received no subsidy, and find themselves in a grim position at the moment. Even though the subsidies, we are told, definitely will not extend to cover this year's crop of apples, both British Columbia and Nova Scotia have their marketing and packing organizations well established, due in the main to the assistance provided from federal funds. Certainly had it not been for that assistance they would not have been financially able to build up and maintain such organizations. It should also be pointed out that despite this yearly support from federal funds both British Columbia and Nova Scotia have continued planting young trees so that their production is now greater than it was ten years ago. In fact, as I understand it, the entire apple industry in Canada, is now producing about forty per cent more apples than can be consumed under present conditions in Canada.

The future of the industry appears to be precarious. Ontario growers have recommended that the federal government undertake a program of tree removal, in co-operation with the provincial authorities, to decrease the production of apples, but the minister has stated that any such program must be initiated by the province, which would appear to be the logical place for such a project to start. However, I do hope that the minister will continue to give serious consideration to evolving, in co-operation with the growers and the provinces in all of Canada, some method either of stemming production of apples or of increasing the demand for apples through advertising and other means, so that this industry, which is most important to the economy of our country, will again be able to carry on in a self-sustaining manner without the need for annual hand-outs.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the question about honey, I have finally obtained the record, and as usual the record which I had in my mind was approximately correct. The amount of honey which we had on June 1, 1949, was 9,897,408 pounds. The amount which we had in stock on June 1, 1950, was, with the government, 2,949,000 pounds; as of June 10, which is the latest figure available, 2,896,000 pounds. The round figure which I gave to the house was 2,800,000 pounds. The amount which others have, as of June 1, 1950, is 6,502,000 pounds. That makes the total stocks 9,451,000 pounds, or 428,000 pounds less than we had at the same time last year. The amount of dark honey is close to the figure I gave. It is 336,000 pounds, and I believe the round figure I gave was 300,000 pounds.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Is it the intention of the government to use the prices support act in dealing with other farm products? Is the pattern to be the same as that used in marketing the honey?

Mr. Gardiner: No; we have not any particular pattern that applies to everything. It is impossible to find a pattern that applies to everything. We consider each product on its merit, and deal with it on its merit. When the honey people came to see us, they did not ask us to apply the plan to this honey—

Mr. White (Middlesex East): In 1950.

Mr. Gardiner: —in 1950. They asked us to take all of the dark honey. During the discussion I brought up the question of who owned this other honey, the good honey, and who was going to sell it. When they suggested they were going to sell their own and ours was to remain, I suggested that we would sell ours in competition with theirs. It would have to go on the same market. There was sufficient market for all of it. We were quite prepared to have them market it, but if they were not prepared to market it, then we would market our own. They agreed to market all the honey. We did, however, assist in an advertising campaign for which we are paying $12,000.

Mr. Cardiff: Is the government carrying any maple products?

Mr. Gardiner: No, we carry no maple products. The only assistance we give maple products is in connection with taking care of the equipment.

Mr. Jones: I do not know whether item 29 covers the marketing of apples, and if it does, I shall hold my question until that item is called. I notice that item 29 contains an amount for marketing assistance, and I was wondering whether that included the marketing of fruit.

Mr. Gardiner: The marketing of fruit comes under item 27, which we are now considering.

Mr. Jones: In reply to the member who has just spoken, I wish to say that we grow apples in British Columbia, and I should like to remind him of the fact that half the Canadian apples are grown in that area. The remainder of Canada—Ontario, Nova Scotia and the other provinces—account for the other half, so that the amount produced in the Okanagan valley equals that produced by the rest of Canada.

I wish to deal briefly with the British market situation. I believe the member for Kootenay West and the member for Kamloops have already outlined our difficulties by showing how the British market constitutes our normal outlet. It is the normal outlet because the industry has grown up around it. I was wondering whether a special effort could not be made to market our apples this year. I noted what the minister said last night that we have to talk a different language. Perhaps that is so, but personally I believe there are other ways of doing it than by talking tough. The only way to do it is to have someone appointed especially to do the job. We send trade commissioners and other representatives to Britain to sell our wheat, bacon, cheese, and so on, and away behind come apples. I should like to see funds taken from one of these items to send a special delegation, appointed by the government and the tree fruit growing areas, to Britain. I am not speaking for our own area alone, but for Canada as a whole.

This delegation could go to the United Kingdom for the sole purpose of trying to sell apples and re-establish this market, not just for this year but for all time to come. As I have pointed out, Britain is buying apples from the other countries, such as Australia and New Zealand. I do believe that if a special delegation, with the strength of the government and the knowledge of the tree fruit board behind it, went to England and remained there until they made some sort of a deal, we would be satisfied. Special instructions should also be issued to the trade commissioners in the various countries to exert themselves to assist the growers in marketing their fruit, and pointing out to them the difficulty in which we find ourselves. I hope it is only temporary. The trade commissioners should be instructed to help the growers of Nova Scotia, Ontario, and all the provinces, to sell their fruit in these various markets.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to leave the committee with the impression that less has been done to sell apples than has been done to sell other products. I venture to say there has been at least ten times as much done abroad to sell apples as needed to be done to sell anything else. We have been unable to sell apples in Great Britain; at least Britain has not wanted to take apples since 1939. We have discussed the matter with them every year to try to obtain a market for apples. When we could not obtain a market we have been called upon to subsidize the apple industry. Our complete subsidies in Nova Scotia have amounted to $18 million; our subsidies in British Columbia have amounted to $4 million. This has been done in an effort not only to market the apples, but to make it possible for the producers to get a proper return. All the fruit has been marketed in some way or other. At times the apples were canned and given away, and at other times they were dehydrated and given away. We have tried in every way to market apples, and we have succeeded in marketing them. I do not believe the money which has been put into these subsidies has been thrown away. The apple industry is going to be necessary in order to supply the market.

The fact is, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce stated the other day, that right from the beginning of the war Britain said that the freight on apples was too high as compared with the food value of the fruit. During the time the war was in progress there was a shortage of shipping space, and Britain would not take apples at all. It was only at periods when there was shipping space available that they did enter into arrangements with us to take apples. When the war was over it was another problem. They started out as though they intended to take apples; but since then they have got into the position where they are battling with regard to dollars and sterling, and they are just not taking our apples.

I find it difficult to understand even the figures I gave last night. As I understand it, the British Columbia apple producers gave the British about 1,600,000 boxes of apples. They gave away 50,000 boxes, according to the statement from the press that I read to the committee last night. They gave 50,000 boxes to the school children and to the institutions. What did they do with the remainder of them? If they were sold to the people of Britain at the usual price, I just want to ask one question. Who ought to have the returns? I think that is an obvious question. I do not know what was done with the remainder of them, but I think the people of British Columbia who gave the apples ought to know. If they intended them to be an advertisement to the British people, then I think more than 50,000 boxes should have been given away. If they intended them to be a gift to the British government on which they could make money to put in the treasury well, all right; that is their own affair. There should be some questions asked about it. That is what I meant by talking to these people a little straighter than we sometimes talk. I do not think that the thirteen or fourteen million people of this country should be attempting in peacetime to feed a population of fifty million in a country that is now actually boasting, and I think properly boasting, of the extent to which they have rehabilitated their people up to now as compared with other nations of the world.

I do not think that a little bit of straight talking to them is going to do any harm. If we are to go on assuming that the people of this country are to give away everything they have, I do not know where we shall find the people who are going to buy what we have, because people apparently like having things given to them.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, I was at a committee meeting when one of my colleagues came into the meeting and told me that an hon. member from the province of Ontario was discussing apples. I left the meeting and came here. My riding is not particularly noted for the production of apples, although it is noted for being the greatest agricultural riding in the Dominion of Canada. I am sorry I did not hear what the hon. member from Ontario said, but I shall read Hansard with interest tomorrow to learn what he said about Ontario apples. I can explain even to the member—I have forgotten his title now—who comes from down near London, why we have the great record that we have in British Columbia for our apples. The record of our British Columbia apples is based on our grading and packing. If the rest of Canada, particularly that great old province of Ontario, and to a lesser extent Quebec, would adopt our method of putting out only the best of fruits, and putting them up in the best way possible, they would be able to compete with British Columbia.

I wanted to say one further word on this. I am sorry I had to leave the other committee, but when I am told that something is being said about British Columbia apples I will leave any committee.

I agree with the minister. However, as a private member I can speak more plainly than he can as a cabinet minister. When the people of Great Britain needed our cheese, our butter, our evaporated milk and our fruits, they were delighted to get them to the extent of approximately $3 million as a gift. Since the war has ended they have been quite willing to buy, on a so-called cheaper market, products that have been produced by cheaper labour costs, cheaper production costs, and cheaper costs of all kinds. I think it is time that we talked in plain language to Great Britain. I know all about their foreign exchange control difficulties and the trouble they have in getting money. But after all, if Canada stood behind them in war, as we should have stood behind them, with manpower, financial assistance and assistance in every other way, Great Britain should think a little bit more about buying our production, be it agricultural products, fisheries, lumber, or production of any other kind.

I know that the minister cannot say what I can say. I may lose a few votes for saying what I am saying, but I will still have enough to get in. I think my friends over here will agree it is time that we told some of those whom we assisted so much that they owe a little to Canada and to Canadian producers. Coming from British Columbia I do know that our fruit, whether it be apples or other fruits, but particularly small fruits such as strawberries and raspberries of the Fraser valley, are unequalled anywhere in the world.

Mr. Cardiff: No flavour.

Mr. Cruickshank: We want a part of the market. We in British Columbia want a part of whatever the foreign exchange control board permits our production to have.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Can the minister tell us whether the 7 million pounds of honey that were sold between 1949 and 1950 were sold on the domestic market or on the export market?

Mr. Gardiner: The amount which was sold in Canada last year, as I remember the story that was given to me by those who sold it, was more honey than we have to sell this year, which is around the 9 million pounds spoken of here.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Was this the honey that was held by the prices support board, or by the beekeepers?

Mr. Gardiner: We did not sell any of it. We bought it toward the end of the season when they thought they had 5 million pounds left over, but they only had 3 million pounds. In other words the amount sold was approximately 9 million pounds, and the amount held was approximately 3 million pounds, which made 12 million pounds. This year the amount which is held, all told, is just about sufficient to supply this market.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): The impression that I got was that the minister said that the agricultural prices support board had sold 7 million pounds of honey.

Mr. Gardiner: No, we never did that.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): That is the effort of the individual producers across the country.

Mr. Gardiner: Certainly; we have not sold any honey at any time in Canada, and do not intend to sell any honey at any time. We turn the honey back to the people who sell honey. We do not go into business.

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Did the minister do that with the butter that he had in storage?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes; we do not sell butter direct to the consumer in Canada; we turn it back to the trade, and they sell it.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): It seems to me that the minister is taking a lot of credit for things that he is not doing.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend has been giving us a lot of criticism for things we are not doing.

Mr. Quelch: The minister has been carrying on a campaign to increase the sale of apple juice. Recently my attention was drawn to a flier put out by the Canadian Consumers Association—I think that is the right name—in which they stated that there was no food value in apple juice unless it was vitaminized. During the war you could buy vitaminized apple juice in this country. Today vitaminized apple juice is very hard to obtain. Would it not be possible for the minister to increase the campaign to get apple juice vitaminized? If that were done there might be a greater sale for it. If, on the advice of the Canadian Consumers Association, the people are not going to buy apple juice because it has no food value, the minister is not going to have much success in increasing consumption.

Mr. Gardiner: I think we would take a lot of the pleasure out of life if we consumed only the things that the consumers league thought had food value. It does not make any difference to me whether it has food value or not; I like it, and I am going to drink it.

Mr. Ross (Souris): You will be surprised to learn where some of the food value is.

Mr. Major: I wish to commend the minister for the attitude he took some time ago when he referred to apple juice in the House of Commons. It occurred to me that if some arrangement were made whereby honey could be used in the desserts in the Ottawa restaurants from now until the end of the session, we could sell a good deal of our honey.

Mr. Jones: Dealing first with the advertising given by the minister in connection with apple juice, may I say that I have received several letters indicating that sales have been increased already this year.

Coming back to the matter of the gift of apples to Great Britain, I understand that the tree fruit growers have been asking why the apples were sold when they reached Britain. Presumably steps will be taken to recover some of the cost of offering the apples for sale.

Mention has been made of the high cost of our apples this year. Naturally we are anxious to do anything we can to place our apples on the market at as low a price as possible. However, the freight rate is something beyond our control. Anyone who looks at the apples offered in the Ottawa stores will find that the price per box is high. However, in that connection I should like to place on record some figures from one of the best orchards in the Osoyoos district. These figures are interesting in that they give a comparison of the prices received by the growers for the 1949 and 1948 crops. Three apples have been chosen, and the figures concerning them are as follows:

		Price per Box
		Fancy Medium	Fancy	C-grade
Winesap	1949	$1.13	$0.96	$0.71
	1948	2.12	1.75	1.40
Delicious	1949	.99	.73	.44
	1948	1.85	1.49	1.09
Newtowns	1949	1.01	.83	.54
	1948	1.89	1.64	1.28

I place these figures on record because the impression is often left that the price has been extremely high. However, it must be pointed out that the average cost of production is between 90 cents and $1.05, and an examination of the figures I have given will indicate that the price received has been well below a dollar, which is the cost of production.

I fully appreciate what the minister has done in assisting the industry, but I fear that before the season is much further along an appeal will have to be made for help from the prices support board. However I am not dealing with that matter now. I have risen only to place these figures on the record, if hon. members would care to check them.

Mr. Charlton: In view of the fact that the minister has not commented on the observations of the hon. member for Durham, are we to assume that any further policy pursued by the dominion government will be acted upon only when a province has taken the initiative in a tree removal program?

Mr. Gardiner: I think it is correct to say yes to that. The only continuous tree removal program with which I am familiar in Canada has been carried on by the Nova Scotia government. It was carrying out such a program before the war started. During the war we were asked to take part in it, after we had begun to assist the apple industry in Nova Scotia because they could not market their apples in Great Britain. Out of that grew a program under which we assisted in paying for apples people could not sell, and taking the trees out so that they would not be there to sell. That was not a tree-pulling campaign, but rather part of a campaign to assist the apple industry of Nova Scotia. At the end of the war the suggestion was made that we carry on with that program right across Canada, but we said we would not. A minister of agriculture in one of the provinces came to see me about it, and I stated to him definitely that we were not going to proceed, but that we would expect the province to make a proposal to us under which they would pay at least half of the cost. He smiled and said that we could not be expected to accept that proposal.

That is the policy we are following. We say to the provinces: If you wish to have a tree-pulling program, then you must pay a very considerable part of the cost; present your proposal to us and we will consider it. However up to the present we have had no definite proposal other than the Nova Scotia plan except a brief one from Ontario to the effect that they thought the cost ought to be $3 a tree, and asked us if we would consider a program on that basis.

Mr. Charlton: That is, the dominion government was to pay $3 a tree?

Mr. Gardiner: We have said that we will not pay the full amount. The position taken at first was for $5 a tree, and we said it would not cost that much to pull a tree or to remove it. Then the next stand was at $4, and we said it would not cost $4. Now the sum is $3, and I presume they mean they will pay half and we will pay half. I do not know exactly what the proposal is.

Mr. Fulton: As the minister has outlined it, the program applies to any province. If a province wishes to institute a tree-removal program it must first put forward its program and a concrete suggestion as to the basis upon which it wishes the dominion to contribute?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: Is this program in the minds of the federal authorities primarily an improvement program, so as to bring orchards up to date and enable the growers to have the kind of apples which are more readily marketable, or is it directed primarily to the removal of trees so as to cut down the overall production of apples?

Mr. Gardiner: So far as we have taken part in it—and all our activities have been in Nova Scotia—our objective has been to assist in the program they had undertaken and established. I believe they had both things in mind. There were many trees in Nova Scotia producing apples which reached the local market. If they were grown, they were offered for sale. It was better to have improved varieties which could find a market outside Nova Scotia to better advantage. So they were promoting both things, namely, cutting down the number of trees, and changing the varieties to those which could be sold to better advantage. We helped finance the program during the war. We have not undertaken to do anything about it from then on. The matter is under discussion with the provincial government.

Mr. Fulton: I understand the federal authorities do not look at this as a program for cutting off production, but rather as an effort to concentrate upon finding markets for better varieties. I am not trying to minimize what has been done in the past, but I should hope the dominion government would try to market the apples rather than follow the questionable procedure of cutting back production because of a circumstance which we all hope is only temporary.

Mr. Gardiner: We have taken no position whatever in that matter, and we do not intend to take any. We will listen to whatever representations are made to us by the provinces.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to make a few observations, not only as a member but also as a grower, with a view to assisting with this problem in British Columbia. It is my opinion that the industry itself should soon take a definite stand with regard to unsuitable varieties. We have been producing a large percentage of unsuitable varieties. That was not serious during the war years, but it is serious now. I am of the opinion that the industry itself should lay down a policy for the elimination of undesirable varieties and for guidance in future planting of apple trees in Canada. I believe in the individual carrying a certain amount of the load, and the grower should perhaps pay one-third, the province one-third and the federal government one-third of the cost of changing from one variety to another.

Mr. Robertson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to associate myself with what has been said by the hon. member for Durham with regard to the apple industry in Ontario. Northumberland county adjoins Durham county, and we have many apple producers. These producers have been disturbed by the conditions that have existed, especially during the past year, and many are at a loss to understand why a subsidy should be paid in other provinces while the growers in Ontario receive nothing. I realize that the conditions in other provinces may be different, but I should like to have assurance from the minister that payments will be made under the agricultural prices support program rather than in the form of direct subsidies to the provinces.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. McLure: Mr. Chairman, much has been said about apples, and I think something should be said about the second staff of life, potatoes. I intended to speak on this matter when the first item was before us, but it was passed while I was out of the chamber. At that time the minister referred to this matter, as reported at page 2694 of Hansard of May 19. The king of potato growers and shippers was to have been here today to speak about potatoes—I refer to the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton—but he is unavoidably absent.

Following the minister's remarks there are a few things I should like to place before the committee. The minister did not agree with what had been said by other hon. members with regard to the sale of potatoes. Referring to the prices received by the potato growers, mainly those in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, the minister said that the average price for the year was 98 cents per hundred pounds, with a price of 99 cents per hundred pounds the year before. The hon. member for Brant then inquired whether that would be the price at the farm, and the minister replied:

> That is the price to the grower, as I said at the beginning of my remarks.

And again:

> I suppose he would deliver them at the village or in town or probably at the railroad station, but in any case that is his price.

That does not coincide with what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar had to say with regard to communications he had received from potato growers in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. I should like to put the record straight in this regard, and say that our people have not been getting the price they should, nor have they been receiving the best consideration from the department. I should like to quote from a report made by the potato industry promotion committee of Prince Edward Island, referred to in the Charlottetown Patriot of May 18 and reading as follows:

> It is impossible to accurately estimate the total gross value of the potatoes shipped this year, but it would run at a little better than 50 cents a bushel. The cobblers have been running around 75 cents per bushel for seed and the other varieties averaged about 50 cents per bushel to mid-January (1950) and from 45 to 47 cents a bushel since that time.

That was the price the potato grower or producer was receiving. The report winds up by saying:

> But the province's potato growers were not too happy about the record. It proves once again that the province can produce a bountiful as well as a top-notch crop. But the growers have been taking a financial beating because of the low price.

There has been considerable talk about surplus potatoes, and the suggestion has been made that the acreage should be reduced. I do not believe there is a surplus; if there is, it is not caused by overproduction so much as by underconsumption. Last year certain agriculture specialists and leading professors in some of the large colleges in the United States endeavoured to find out the eating habits of the people of Canada and the United States, particularly with reference to the consumption of potatoes. It was found that the per capita consumption of potatoes had dropped nearly one bushel per year during the last twenty-five years. As compared with a per capita consumption of three bushels a year, the consumption had been reduced to less than two bushels. With a Canadian population of 13 million people, if the consumption was back to normal the entire Prince Edward Island crop of 13 million bushels could be marketed in this country.

What is the reason for this drop in consumption? It is due largely to dietitians, faddists and others who state that potatoes are fattening. The farmers at one time had the same idea, and they fed large quantities of potatoes to hogs with the idea of fattening them. While they were of some value as food, it was found that there were other things that were much better for fattening purposes. The farmer does not now believe that potatoes are fattening.

Let us go a little further with this question of the use of potatoes as food, and consider the countries that use them most for that purpose. Take, for instance, the people of Ireland, where potatoes were first used as a food and sent out from there to the whole world. What a great food they were! Let us see the effect that potatoes had on the building of a strong and virile manhood. At the age of twenty-one the young men of that country, after living on potatoes three times and sometimes even five times a day—it was their chief food, and should be in every home—left Ireland and brought their virile manhood to New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, all the large cities of the United States. What are they today? Because of their strong virile manhood they are chiefs of police in ninety-nine towns out of a hundred in the United States. Over eighty per cent of the policemen of the United States were born and bred in Ireland and fed on potatoes day in and day out.

A few years ago flour was more or less sidetracked because some faddist said it was not a really good food, although we know it is a staple of life. The department went to work and advertised the great benefits of flour. They told different stories about what a wonderful food it was, something that we all knew. Flour consumption returned to normal. Today what we need is advertising as to the food value of the wonderful potato. Let us break down the ideas of the dietitians and faddists. Let us go a step further and not allow any dietitians employed by the government or the Department of Agriculture to tell people how to cook a potato, because they do not know themselves. The way some of them mash a potato you would not realize what it was. Let the people eating potatoes cook them the way they want to. Let us advertise their food value, and tell the ladies that if they expect a virile race of men they must feed them potatoes. Feed them potatoes, more potatoes, and still more potatoes, because if consumption continues to drop we shall certainly have a surplus. It is not because we are overproducing; it is really because consumption is declining year by year. I hope the minister will see that advertising is carried on to place before the people the benefits of this wonderful food, which is not a luxury but a real food.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): If bread is No. 1 and potatoes are No. 2, then perhaps you will permit me to say that apples might be No. 3. I was a little disappointed that the minister did not answer the question raised by the hon. member for Northumberland (Ont.). I do not want to detract from the remarks of my young fifty-year-old friend from Prince Edward Island. In order to save time, when the minister is answering the hon. member for Queens about No. 2, potatoes, he might at the same time answer the question raised by the hon. member for Northumberland (Ont.) with regard to No. 3, apples. Let us get rid of Nos. 1 and 2, bread and potatoes, and deal with No. 3, apples, in answer to the hon. member for Northumberland.

Mr. Gardiner: In order to finish these matters as we go along, I might add to what I said earlier, part of which was read to the committee a few moments ago. I think the position has developed as to potatoes that we expected at that time would develop. There is not a surplus carryover of potatoes at present. The price today is from 50 to 75 cents higher than it was in January. What we said at the time was that we would keep a close check on potatoes as we went along through the season and do whatever we could to assist in getting potatoes marketed to better advantage for the producers than a year ago. My understanding is that the producers and those who handle potatoes have marketed 6,000 cars more this year than they marketed a year ago, and they are obtaining a better return now as the result of what we did than last year. Therefore I think the situation has been handled satisfactorily. The fact that we are not receiving, and have not for some time, any further requests with regard to it would indicate that it has been satisfactorily dealt with.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): What about No. 3?

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, following the remarks of the senior member for Queens—I can never satisfy myself which he is—I wish to say that Prince Edward Island produced about 10 million bushels of potatoes in 1949. We shipped 11,000 cars, which is approximately 8,250,000 bushels. If we take another million for domestic purposes and another million for seed, that is approximately 10 million bushels. As to the price, I sold potatoes last fall in our own district through a co-operative company, and the price paid in November for foundation A cobblers was 75 or 80 cents. Later on it dropped as low as 60 cents per bushel. I think one week it went up as high as 92 cents a bushel to the farmer, which is no more than the cost of production.

I kept a record of a sixteen-acre field three years ago as to the cost of fertilizer, seed and labour, and it cost $112 an acre to produce an acre of potatoes. I kept a record of a twenty-acre field last year, and it cost $116 an acre. You can understand that the growing season has a great deal to do with the crop of potatoes. The average production in Prince Edward Island is 200 bushels per acre, and some farmers get as high as 350 and 400 bushels. The revenue from the potato crop accounts for about thirty-five per cent of our annual income.

A great many things could be said about the potato business as I look back over my years of experience since we commenced producing certified seed. The first thing we should have is sufficient storage to look after our crop. Last year I made a survey of storage facilities in Prince Edward Island. There are 102 stations on the Canadian National Railway where potatoes and turnips are assembled and shipped, and at those stations there are frost-proof warehouses with a capacity of 1,600,000 bushels. If you compare that with our production of ten million bushels you will see that we are far short of meeting our storage requirements. At our own station of Douglas we can store forty cars of potatoes. That serves a radius of about ten miles, or four school districts. We have been operating that warehouse on a co-operative basis for the last three years to the satisfaction of everyone, and the farmers have had good returns.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

I believe the grant of $100,000 which we receive from the federal government through the Department of Agriculture, as well as the assistance we get from the provincial government, should be used to the fullest extent possible to provide warehouses at the points where they are needed. At Summerside, Charlottetown, Georgetown and Souris we have large warehouses that are used for only about two months in the year for assembling potatoes for water shipment. However, those are not cold storage warehouses where potatoes could be kept for six or eight months. Our potato shipments are not made in one or two months; they extend over eight months of the year.

I believe we should have more storage capacity in order that the marketing of potatoes could be better regulated. We need an orderly marketing system. During the last few years a great deal of cutthroat competition has been going on among the dealers, large and small. I keep track of the markets in the larger cities, such as Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal, as well as western Canada. Many times I have been in those centres and have seen wires received in the morning quoting potato prices varying from ten to twenty-five cents per bag. You can see how confusing that is to the buyers. If we had an orderly marketing system we would be able to do away with this competition, as well as with the consignment of potatoes to over-depressed markets.

When I was in Toronto this year potatoes were selling for as little as $1.18 for a 75-pound bag, delivered. When you take away the price of the bag and the cost of freight, the dealer back in Prince Edward Island has left only about 60 cents, and you can see what the grower gets after the dealer takes his small commission. In the last eighteen months the freight rate has increased by 16 cents per hundred. For the last ten years the rate to Toronto was 39 cents. Now it is 55 cents. Someone says that can be passed on to the consumer, but I do not know whether that can be done. This high freight rate has made a great difference in the returns to our potato growers.

Over the last twenty-five years our producers have learned all about growing and grading potatoes. As I see it, the only problem now is marketing. As I said a moment ago, if we had an orderly marketing system I believe many of our difficulties would be overcome. We have the finest potato inspection service in existence, both with respect to table stock and seed potatoes. This service has been developed under two able men. One is Mr. Peppin, of the seed department, who I am sorry to say is leaving the service next year because of his age, and who has done a wonderful job over the last thirty years. The other is Mr. Chester E. Shaw, the chief table stock inspector, who is also retiring in about another year. I am sure everyone who knows what he has done for the potato growers of Prince Edward Island will have a word of praise for him.

I could go on for an hour; in fact I could write a book on the potato business, having been connected with it since 1921. I have seen many ups and downs. Many people have gone broke in the potato business, though for the last few years the growers, and the dealers especially, have done very well. To solve our problems, however, we should have more and better storage facilities, and the growers themselves should make some suggestions to the government that would bring about a system of orderly marketing. I have been speaking to many people in Ottawa and Toronto who say they would be quite willing to pay a decent price for potatoes, which this year were much cheaper than other foods on the market. I believe we must blame ourselves for this system of marketing, which can be corrected by those in the industry. I do not think we can blame the federal government.

Last year many representations were made to the Department of Agriculture with respect to a floor price. Well, if you start paying floor prices you never get to the end of it. I do not believe in a floor price unless you have control of the acreage, because if a farmer is making the cost of production he will keep on growing potatoes. In Prince Edward Island and the maritimes we are like the people in western Canada; we are great "next year" people; we always hope that next year will be a killer and we will make a lot of money.

I do not believe it is necessary for me to say anything more. The senior member for Queens understands the situation in our little province as well as I do, and I am sure both he and I will be glad to do everything possible to help the potato growers. I should like to give just one quotation that I read in the newspapers, credited to the New Brunswick minister of agriculture, who said: "We are still carrying on the same old antiquated marketing system we had fifty years ago." I thought that was the truest thing I had heard in many a day, and I heartily agree. It is up to ourselves to improve the situation and help our people who, after spending their time and money, after getting up at three o'clock in the morning to spray potatoes, after wearing out machinery, at the end of the year find they have scarcely enough money to pay the fertilizer bill.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I hope hon. members realize that the hon. member for Durham raised a question—

Mr. Gardiner: If you will allow me, I will answer it. I have tried three times to do so.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I am just trying to interpolate something else I think the minister should know, if I may. I quite agree that potatoes are the No. 2 item, but it has been my happy privilege to realize that central Ontario is in the apple business. We have heard only about the apples grown in Nova Scotia and British Columbia, but I might say that Ontario is also in the apple business. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that there are other parts of the world, largely within the confines of the British empire, that are in the apple business. I do not apologize for taking a few moments of the time of this committee to inform the members that I saw an area in Tasmania one mile long by several rods deep covered with red apples. This was during the war, and they were not being harvested because there were no bottoms to handle them. I realize that the socialist government subsidized the farmers who grew those apples. I realize, sir, that the time is coming when those orchards will again be in production, and the markets of the empire will be supplied from Tasmania.

Did I say one mile? Yes, one mile on one side of the valley and a mile on the other side, as far as the eye could see, there were thousands of bushels of apples lying awaiting ships which were not available. Ships are now available in the harbours of Tasmania to bring those apples to the British market. I am putting these facts on the record for the benefit of the Canadian apple industry, because I believe that within the next decade that industry will be in a precarious position. The member for Northumberland (Ont.) asked the minister a question, which has not been answered, concerning the apples grown in central Ontario. I believe that within the next decade our apple industry will find itself in difficulty. It is my duty, Mr. Chairman, to put these facts on the record, so that those charged with the responsibility of the No. 3 item—bread first, potatoes second, and apples third—can give them some consideration.

Since we have to depend on export markets for the revenue to keep this industry going, we must consider the various places that produce this No. 3 item. In my opinion apples will come from Tasmania in the future because that area's production is of such magnitude, and of such a nature, that the producers of central Ontario should carefully consider what they are going to do about expanding this industry. My real reason for rising, Mr. Chairman, was that I thought the member for Northumberland (Ont.) should have an answer to the question which he brought up about twenty minutes ago.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, as I recall the remarks which were made by the member for Northumberland and the member for Durham, they were calling attention to the fact that financial assistance had been given to the apple growers in other parts of Canada but not the Ontario growers. That is true, of course. On a previous occasion I believe I indicated that other assistance had been given the Ontario apple growers during the war period. It was indirect assistance, because the apples from British Columbia and Nova Scotia were ruled out of the central Canada market until permits were issued for the marketing of them. This left the best market in Canada open to Ontario and Quebec apples.

Later the action taken was not quite so drastic, but we did have an understanding with the Nova Scotia and British Columbia apple producers that they would not put their apples into that market until a certain time of the year. This understanding was religiously carried out until last year. The result has been that the apple growers in Ontario, and I think they will agree with me, received the best returns they ever had for their apples during that ten-year period. Last year again there was considerable care taken with the marketing. When the season opened we told both British Columbia and Nova Scotia that we were not making an agreement in advance this year covering the marketing of the crop. We were prepared to consider what had happened at the end of the marketing season, and deal with the situation on the basis of actual results.

When the end of the season arrived, we checked the returns which the Ontario growers received as well as the returns received by the growers in the other two provinces. Even after assistance had been given to British Columbia and Nova Scotia, the returns obtained for apples in Ontario were considerably higher than in those areas. There is no reason, therefore, why the government should assist Ontario in obtaining a higher level than that which has been attained, unless we are prepared to raise the returns received in British Columbia and Nova Scotia to a higher point. The Ontario returns are still higher than the returns in either of the other places.

As I understand the question, it related to whether assistance is to be given in the future. The only legislation under which assistance could be provided in connection with price levels is the Agricultural Prices Support Act. The apple producer has a right to expect consideration under that act, the same as any other agricultural producer in Canada. The question would be considered on its merits when the application is made. No undertaking can be given in advance. It is a matter that will be dealt with on its merits when the time arrives.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Marketing service—

27. Fruit, vegetables and maple products, and honey, including grant of $5,000 to Canadian Horticultural Council, $989,000.

Mr. Shaw: Before this item passes I should like to refer for just one moment to the subject of apples. This morning, and upon previous occasions, representatives from the apple growing areas of Canada expressed considerable alarm about disposal of the Canadian apple crop at remunerative prices. At the time that that discussion was going on there went through my mind a recent press dispatch. I looked it up and I found that the Ottawa Evening Journal of Wednesday, May 24, 1950, carried the following dispatch from Montreal:

> Port officials said today that the freighter Port Alma carried coals to Newcastle. The freighter brought 30,000 cases of apples from New Zealand to Canada, one of the world's largest apple producers.

My questions are these: Can the minister give us an indication of the total value of apples imported into Canada during the past year, and the total exports during the same period and the prices in each instance, that is, the retail prices of the New Zealand apples as compared with the market price of the Canadian apples?

Mr. Gardiner: I am sorry but I have not the exact figures on the exports here, but they are very small. I presume—

Mr. Shaw: Is the minister speaking of exports?

Mr. Gardiner: Imports, rather. Imports that come into this country from outside are very small. I have not the exact figure here.

Mr. Shaw: Would it be impossible to get it?

Mr. Gardiner: No, it would not be impossible; it could be obtained. I think likely I have it in this pile, but it would take a while to look it up.

Item agreed to.

Marketing service—

28. Livestock and livestock products, $1,204,012.

Mr. Hodgson: I should like to say a word or two on this item. Since quite a number of farmers and hog producers in my riding are quite perturbed about the way being made possible for United States' meat and meat products to be allowed on to the Canadian market I ask the minister to make a statement as best he can as to how long the market will be left open, and what effect it might have upon our Canadian market.

Mr. Gardiner: What is the first part of the question?

Mr. Hodgson: Has the minister any idea how long the embargo will be off products coming in from the United States, and what effect it will have on the Canadian market?

Mr. Gardiner: A question was asked the other day with regard to what the government's intention is in connection with the payment of a premium on pork which goes to Britain following the thirtieth day of June. I said here I was under the impression that from the nature of the announcement made on the 3rd of January probably a further announcement was not necessary. I have read the press reports of that time carefully, and I would say that a further report is necessary. Because of that I have, since discussing it in the house the other day, taken it up with council, and the government has decided that the premium will continue to be paid, or a subsidy will continue to be paid, until we have taken in the 60 million pounds. That means it will go right on just as it is from the 1st of July on; and all other regulations with regard to the handling of pork products will go along in the same manner as they are going along now.

Mr. Hodgson: I have a supplementary question. Can the minister give us any reason why bacon took such a big jump just lately from 90 cents a pound to as high as $1.25 a pound?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, I suppose it is because hogs took a jump from $26.50 to $32.

Mr. Charlton: Since the minister made his statement with regard to the hog subsidy continuation it probably alters the remarks I have to make at the present time, but it does not alter the fact that at the end of his remarks yesterday in answer to my question and in answer to the question of privilege I brought up regarding a news report by an informed official of the department, he said this, as reported at page 3471 of Hansard:

> I see these articles in the press from time to time about what informed officials have said, but I have not been able yet to find the well informed official who gave that statement.

What I have to say is this: I doubt very much whether any one of us who knows the minister as well as we do would have any thought that someone else would be running his department for him. Here is part of the statement, as it appeared in the press on Friday, June 9. It is a Canadian Press dispatch in the Globe and Mail and reads as follows:

> On the Farm Front
> Support of Bacon Price May Continue After July
> Ottawa, June 8 (CP). The government is considering the possibility of extending price-support for bacon beyond the termination date of July 1, and it is expected that in all likelihood the program will be continued for another half-year, an informed official disclosed today.
> He said the decision to reconsider government policy arises from requests by hog producers that the program be extended and the fact that the government has not as yet been successful in buying sufficient bacon to fill the 1950 Anglo-Canadian bacon agreement.

The last paragraph of the article reads as follows:

> The official said there is now no need to follow through with such a plan immediately. Pork would be in comparatively short supply during the months of June, July and August. Marketings are expected to increase in September, when the government again hopes to be able to make purchase under the agreement and possibly fill the Anglo-Canadian contract before the end of the calendar year.

The minister's reply to me was:

> I see these articles in the press from time to time about what informed officials have said, but I have not been able yet to find the well informed official who gave that statement.

Mr. Cardiff: He gave it himself.

Mr. Charlton: To me that is utter nonsense, because no official of any department of government, I do not care who it is, would give a statement of this kind to the press without first consulting his minister.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend either does not know very much about departments, or he does not know very much about the press. As a matter of fact everything in that statement is wrong, every single thing in it, and I do not give out wrong statements with regard to my department. That is simply a guess in order to get my friend to get up in the house and say something. He has got up and said it.

Mr. Charlton: I am afraid he is—

Mr. Gardiner: I would not be at all surprised if he discussed it with some of the press before he got up and said it.

Mr. Charlton: That is absolutely untrue. I did not discuss it with any member of the press.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend had better listen to my language again. I said: "I would not be surprised"; and I would not be surprised at all. The actual position is that the government never had discussed it until half an hour ago. I took it up with the council since I was here this morning and had it considered; and this is the first time it has ever been considered by the government since last January. Now, read your article again in the light of that.

Mr. Charlton: I have read it several times.

Mr. Gardiner: Your article says that it was being considered by the government. It was not being considered by the government at all. The whole article, as you go through it, is just in the same tone. It is for the purpose of stirring up more discussion so that there will be more news to write. There never was any official who discussed it with me and then gave it to the press. It may have been discussed by an official with the press—I would not deny that—but it certainly was not discussed with any official who ever discussed it with me, or I would know who the official is, and I would know how to deal with him. That statement was never given out by the department at all.

Mr. Charlton: Is the minister suggesting that the press is simply fabricating these stories and publishing them without discussing them with anybody?

Mr. Gardiner: I did not say that, no.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): They set up a straw man.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: There is one point I wish to raise in connection with the discussion that has been taking place on this item. I refer to a statement that was made by the minister last night in dealing with the general discussion of this very same item, and repeated again this morning in other words.

Mr. Gardiner: I am afraid my hon. friend is not correctly informed up till now, because this item came up for discussion just five minutes ago.

Mr. Drew: I am not referring to this item; I am speaking about something else.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I understand the minister was under the impression that I was speaking about the subject he has been discussing. I have no desire to break the continuity of that discussion, if it is being proceeded with, or if there was some question to answer in connection with it.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Gardiner: My point was that last night we were discussing item 23. We were on other marketing service items until five minutes ago, when we switched to the subject of livestock, which is the next item.

Mr. Drew: The general discussion has to do with production and trade in various agricultural products, and what I have to say relates to the general discussion which has been under way.

I wish to refer to a statement made by the minister last night, and repeated in other words this morning, which it seems to me does call for clarification. That is particularly so in view of the fact that here in Ottawa at the present time are representatives of the press from every part of the commonwealth.

Throughout the whole of Canada today the Canadian Press has carried a dispatch based upon a statement made by the minister last night. I quote now from the Canadian Press dispatch:

> Agriculture Minister Gardiner indicated tonight he thinks it is time Canada started to talk tough to Britain in trading matters.
> It is time, he told the commons, that Canada stopped talking nicely to some people in Britain when she tried to obtain British markets for Canadian food products. It was time for "more direct" talk by Canada.

That statement by the minister may well be a statement that should have been made; but the minister has said either too much or too little. This is the kind of statement which very naturally and very properly will receive considerable attention in the United Kingdom. If this statement was intended to be taken seriously, as I think it was, then it is important that the minister should go further and say exactly what he does mean; and he should indicate whom it is he is talking about.

There is not, I suggest, any doubt, in the minds of members of this House of Commons that the people of Britain have every desire to trade with the people of Canada. I do not think there is any thought in the minds of members of the house that the people of Great Britain would not willingly wish to have arrangements made which would make available to them the products of this country.

The statement is made that there are some people who should be spoken to in a much firmer way than they have been spoken to before. I think we should know whether those are members of the present government of Great Britain, and I do not know why we should be left to guess as to who they are. After all, the way this matter stands today, a very important statement has been made affecting the relationship of two countries in trade matters, affecting the relationship of two governments, and I think it should be specific.

I think there is an added reason why it should be specific, and that is that there is also carried in today's press a very important statement from Great Britain. The Canadian Press also carries a report of its correspondent newspapers today which reports on a decision by the party which forms the present government in the United Kingdom. This has some possible relationship to the statement that was made, and cannot therefore be ignored. If it has no relationship, then I think we should know it.

In an announced decision of the party from which the government of the United Kingdom is formed it is stated that they last night reached a decision based upon a statement prepared by the Hon. Hugh Dalton, who is a member of the cabinet of the United Kingdom, and was presenting this statement in his capacity as a member of the executive of the party to which he belongs. In this particular case they are explaining the reasons why they reached the decision not to enter into a plan for the pooling of resources of a certain type throughout Europe, with which it had been suggested that they might be associated. And in that statement that was given in support of their decision not to agree to join in that plan, the party which forms the present government of the United Kingdom is responsible for this statement, among others:

> Socialists would of course welcome a European economic union which was based on international planning for full employment, social justice and stability. But international planning can only operate on the basis of national planning. And many European governments have not yet shown either the will or the ability to plan their own economies.

That paragraph in the statement issued last night has already been interpreted by the responsible press in Great Britain and elsewhere as a declaration that the government of Great Britain is being guided in certain of its actions by its willingness or otherwise to deal with those countries which are accepting certain doctrines of which they approve.

In view of the fact that this statement appears at the very same time as the statement by the Minister of Agriculture to the effect that there are certain people who should be spoken to frankly, then I think his statement should go further and indicate whether it has any relationship whatever to the insistence upon the acceptance of certain types of sale and purchase related to political doctrines, or whether there are other reasons. Also he should tell us who the people are to whom we should direct these franker points of view, which might have some practical results.

May I say as one member of the House of Commons that in connection with any dealing with Great Britain or any other country my first concern is certainly the advantage of the people of Canada. If any steps are being taken to our disadvantage, then I think we should have full information, and I think also that all of us should join in a perfectly frank expression of our opinion.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, in reference to the words used last night, I do not think it is necessary to take them from the press, because they are in Hansard—and they are much more correct in Hansard than they are in the press. They are not so different, except as to the first term that was used. These are the words:

> I think it is about time we stopped talking nicely to some people over in Britain. That does not apply to very many people, just one or two; but until they are spoken to directly I do not think we should look for very much success in the marketing of some of those products in that country.

At that time we were discussing the item relating to apples. I still maintain that that is correct. Coming down to the suggestion that it might result from the attitude of some political party, I would answer that by saying this, that the plan under which we operated from 1940 until 1948 was a plan which was set up under the Churchill government, with Lord Woolton as minister of food. The system of having the government purchase food coming from outside of Britain as well as food produced in Britain was set up by the Churchill government. It was continued in much the same form at least until 1948, and probably is still continued in Great Britain in relation to most countries.

Under that plan it did not make any difference which government was in power, whether it was a Conservative government, a coalition government or the present socialist government. The general plan was to take all the food they could get from Canada—that was their attitude—and our attitude was to supply all the food we could. When we met together to discuss the question it was merely a matter from their point of view of how much we could give them, and from our point of view it was a question of what they were able to pay for it. We entered into an agreement and we then went out to our farmers and asked them to produce enough so that we could at least provide the quantity which they desired to have. That was the general trend of it.

But as I said last session, when we got along to 1947 it was intimated that that was not their general desire, that what they would like us to do was to cut out everything but wheat. We suggested that that was going to be most difficult. We were prepared to co-operate as far as it was possible to co-operate in getting our sales made elsewhere or in our own markets at home in order to consume the food we were producing and we did co-operate in every possible way in getting that done. We have been co-operating in every possible way down to the present in getting that done.

Up until now we have been able to market our farm products. We have not very much complaint about the prices of farm products, which are just as good or a little better in this country than they are in most places, with one or two exceptions. For that reason we are not complaining about what the farmer is getting for the products he has to sell. He is doing as well now as he has ever done in selling his products.

I am sure many people, either in this house or outside, have the feeling, and it certainly is true among farmers throughout the country, that we are not always going to be able to eat all that we produce or even as great a percentage of what we produce as we are able to eat at the present time. Some people think that the natural place to sell any surplus we have is in the United States; some think that the natural place to sell it is in Great Britain; but in my opinion the natural place to sell it is in both places to the extent that it can be sold.

I think that when our friends who depended upon us so greatly during wartime for food are going to take the position, "Well, we would like to get food anywhere but in Canada," we should not even attempt to say anything different from what I have said either in this house or outside this house, with regard to their attitude. I do not care whether that attitude is the attitude of the government or of the opposition. The last time I was in Great Britain they invited me to sit in the gallery and there was a debate on food put on. I listened to it and afterward I told them what my impression was. I was told that they thought that that would be my impression when they asked me to sit in the gallery. My impression was there were there many people who were concerned, and properly so, about getting all the food they possibly could produced within Britain. That has been the long-term Conservative policy in Great Britain, and it is still the policy in that country. There was not much difference between the two sides of the house on that particular question. Their first desire, like ours, is to produce in Great Britain all they can. Then their second desire is to have it sold at as good a price as possible in their own market, and they subsidize the sale of it before it goes to their people.

We are a little differently situated. I personally think most hon. members—and I am quite certain the leader of the opposition thinks likewise—should pride themselves on the fact that we belong to the British commonwealth. For many years we prided ourselves on the fact that we belonged to the British empire, but in more recent years we have called it the commonwealth of nations. I may be wrong, and if I am I am quite prepared to be considered wrong, but I do not think there has ever been a better organization set up in the world, and I include the United Nations, to promote peace throughout the world than the British commonwealth of nations.

I think it most important that our relationships with the centre of the empire should be of the most cordial kind and I believe the manner in which they can remain on that basis as between a considerable part of the population of this country and of Great Britain is for them to take our food in the same free way during peacetime as they did during wartime. That is what I meant by saying that we should speak to them bluntly.

I do not think there is any dollar-sterling question in the world or any dollar-sterling problem as between Canada and Great Britain that is more important than the maintenance of good relationships between those two areas. That is all I meant by what I said, and that is what I still mean and that is what I am still prepared to say, either in the house or outside. I think it is the duty of Canada to produce all the food for Great Britain she can, and I think it is equally the duty of Great Britain to buy all the food she can from us rather than to go elsewhere for it. If they do that and if we keep up our production I think we are both going to be better off even if it does take some dollars that they otherwise would pile up.

It would have required only $30 million last year for Great Britain to have satisfied all the demands of agriculture in this country as to the sale of food. If the $30 million had been proffered, under the plan of co-operation in solving their problems as well as our own, I venture to say that they would not have had to use half of it. Our people would have been perfectly satisfied that they were being treated properly, and their people would have been perfectly satisfied that they were getting all the surplus food there was from this country. With a question as simple as that I do not think we should be carrying on controversy and discussion as to whether Great Britain should take our apples or whether she should take the little bit of pork we have. When I said a little bit last year some people were inclined to scoff, but it has turned out to be even smaller than I thought it would be. I thought we were going to have 60 million pounds by this time and we have only 12 million pounds. When this problem is such a small one, I think all this talk about its being caused by the fact that there is some dollar-sterling problem just is not the case at all.

If we could get that into the minds of one or two people probably we could settle the question so far as Great Britain and Canada are concerned. We are not going to settle the dollar-sterling question so far as the world is concerned. But I repeat, I think it is important that we produce as much food as we can for Great Britain, and I think it is important that Great Britain should take as much of it as she can take, important from the point of view not only of ourselves and herself but of the whole world over a period.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I just want to say that I for one welcome the statement by the Minister of Agriculture that there is nothing so important as to take such steps as will make it possible to carry forward this trade. As may be recalled, we have introduced a number of resolutions which had as their purpose the presentation of that very point of view. When the Minister of Agriculture says that he hopes there will be those who will understand that there is no dollar-sterling problem nearly as important as arranging for this sale, I hope he will convince the Minister of Finance of that very fact, because in answer to our argument along that line we have been told by the Minister of Finance that this is an insurmountable barrier. The minister has not yet answered the question I put to him. Frankness is just as desirable in one's own family as outside, and perhaps more so, and if frankness is desirable in this case then at least put us all in the position where we can join in being equally frank, and tell us who these one or two people are who need to be spoken to. We know it is not the people of Great Britain generally, and I think it is desirable that there be complete frankness.

I certainly concur in all the minister has said about the importance of the trade between Great Britain and Canada. Since this subject has been brought up by the minister, I would go further and say that Canadians cannot look without some measure of concern at the published statements that some of the food products we have been supplying are now being bought from countries behind the iron curtain. There may be explanations for that, but I think we would be less than frank if we did not say quite clearly to these friends who are so close to us that the purchase of things which we produce from countries against which we are arrayed in so many ways can only create uncertainties at this time. Whether we call it an empire or a commonwealth, the main thing is that it is the greatest partnership of free nations that the world has ever known. If frankness will help to remove any ground of misunderstanding, then I think all hon. members will welcome the opportunity to be quite as frank as the minister, but I think it would help if we knew where to direct our remarks.

Mr. Gardiner: In dealing with the name of the person who was mentioned I will say that Mr. Dalton was one of the most friendly persons I have met in Great Britain on any occasion when I have been there to discuss anything relating to Canada. Whatever his position may be on international relationships, I am certain that he agrees that Canada did a good job during the war, and that she is entitled to have a good job done for her in times of peace. I know he thinks that.

Mr. Ross (Souris): In view of the statement the minister made a few minutes ago in answer to the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth, and coupled with the remarks he made just a little while ago when he stated that members of his department did not issue this information to the press without his knowledge—

Mr. Gardiner: I did not say that.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I understood you to say that.

Mr. Gardiner: I said they did not issue it with my knowledge, and I had not yet found the person who issued it without my knowledge, if there was any such person.

Mr. Ross (Souris): The minister further said that if they did he would know how to deal with them. I think those were his exact words.

Mr. Gardiner: That is right.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I presume that would also apply to his parliamentary assistant. Would that be true?

Mr. Gardiner: My parliamentary assistant was elected by the people of Canada, and he has the same freedom of speech as my friend on the other side.

Mr. Ross (Souris): All members of the cabinet are elected in their respective constituencies by the people. There was a time when we used to think there was cabinet solidarity on certain principles. Has that also gone by the board?

Mr. Gardiner: No, no.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Then the same thing does not apply within the department between the minister and the parliamentary assistant? They are not supposed to see eye to eye on government policy?

Mr. Gardiner: He is not sworn in as a member of the government.

Mr. Ross (Souris): If the hon. member who is saying something over there would care to rise and make a speech I will sit down now and let him have the floor.

Mr. Gardiner: You are asking me questions and I am answering them.

Mr. Ross (Souris): A great many people where I live thought that probably the parliamentary assistant was flying a kite for the minister last fall in what he was reported to have said by many newspapers, and newspapers right in Ontario too.

Mr. Gardiner: And he corrected it.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I have not heard it corrected in the house. If he wishes to do so this will give him an opportunity. In British Columbia Country Life there is the following:

> Advice of Robert McCubbin, parliamentary assistant to Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner, Minister of Agriculture, to his fellow farmers, so the Canadian Press reports, is that they develop their own markets and do not rely on the dominion government to help them secure outlets. Under normal circumstances that would be sound advice but under present circumstances it is difficult to understand how such advice could be followed, because the farmers are helpless, in respect of developing markets within the British commonwealth of nations and in foreign countries.

That is the very matter we have been discussing. The parliamentary assistant is in the seat beside the minister, and if he wishes to contradict that statement I think this would be a most appropriate time to do so. If he was not flying a kite for the Minister of Agriculture I think he should explain what he meant by the statement because it was taken very seriously by farmer producers across Canada from coast to coast. As I say, we have been led to believe in the past, if not under the present government, that when a minister made a public statement he was setting forth government policy for the government. Probably that is not the case today. I do not know. I think we should be able to take it that the parliamentary assistant would be stating the policy for his department at least. If the parliamentary assistant wishes to contradict that, this is his opportunity to do so.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, because this is such old straw and has been dealt with so often, the parliamentary assistant did not expect it would be brought up today. He has sent out for the statement that was made. In due course it will be here and he will make his reply.

Item agreed to.

Marketing service—

29. Marketing of agricultural products, including temporary appointments that may be required to be made notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act, the amount available for such appointments not to exceed $6,000, $100,000.

Mr. Knowles: Item 29 includes an amount not to exceed $6,000 which is to be used for temporary appointments that may be required, notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act. I have not gone back to the year one, but I have gone back a few years, and I find that this item has been in the estimates at least since 1945. The total amount of the vote has been increased from $25,000 five years ago to $100,000 now. I should like to point out that the portion of the vote about which I am talking, namely, the item for appointments notwithstanding the provisions of the Civil Service Act, has been reduced. The amount available for such appointment or appointments used to be $15,000, and now it is only $6,000. I wonder whether the minister is aware of the fact that this is one of the items about which the Auditor General has commented in his memorandum to the Senate and to the public accounts committee of the House of Commons this year. His comment centres around the fact that this is the kind of item in the estimates that has legislative effect without parliament having gone through the normal procedure to provide for such legislation.

The Civil Service Act makes provision as to how people are to be appointed, but in this case apparently some one or more persons are being appointed to allegedly temporary positions notwithstanding the provisions of the Civil Service Act. In all fairness I should point out that the Auditor General recognizes the convenience of this procedure for temporary appointments. However, he deprecates the practice of repeating it year after year. As a matter of fact there are some twenty or thirty items throughout the estimates to which the Auditor General calls attention under this general heading. This happens to be the only one that he points out in the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, so far as the practice of legislating by items in the estimates is concerned. I would like the minister to tell me how many persons are covered by this $6,000 portion of the item now before us. If it is only one person I should like to know how long that person has held the position. Perhaps I can get that information and then ask my next question.

Mr. Gardiner: My information is that only one position is set up under this amount at the present time, and that position is on the staff of Mr. Robertson over in London. It was occupied for some time by a lady, whose name I do not have at the moment, and the position has to do with the publicizing our marketing possibilities in Great Britain. This item, which has been increased from $25,000 to $100,000, is the general marketing item in the department. Up to last year we did not use it to the extent we are using it now. The largest item being spent under it is the $50,000 we are using to advertise butter and dairy products. Another item will be the $12,000 we are going to utilize to advertise honey and other products. We set up the amount for the purpose of having money available that can be utilized for that kind of work when it is necessary; and those who might be appointed to such positions, either in this country or in Britain, would be people associated with the promotion of those sales. Judging from the position, the person in Britain occupying it would be engaged in keeping records more than anything else; but this whole amount would not be paid to that individual. It is an amount we could use, if we desired, to put a person on the road in connection with the advertising of butter, for example, to offset the advertising of oleomargarine. We might put a person on the road for that purpose for a time without having to wait for an appointment under the civil service commission.

If I might give an example, last March we discovered that all over Canada there were stores that had no butter at all. They were selling margarine only. I assume the reason was that they were not fully informed as to what the government was prepared to do after April 1, when there was to be a reduction in the price of butter. They were making absolutely sure they would not have to take the five cent drop, so they had no butter at all in stock at the end of the month. That would have something to do with the size of the surplus we had to carry at the end of the year; and if it were desired to do so, under this item we could send persons out on the road for two or three weeks without waiting for appointments by the civil service commission, in order to correct such a situation.

Mr. Knowles: The minister has gone far beyond the narrow confines of the question I asked, and since he has done so I might make the comment that I have had complaints from some city people, whose incomes are such that they must buy margarine, and who have discovered that public money is being spent advertising butter. I realize that if I were to press that point we might get into quite an argument here, but the fact that there could be an argument indicates that there are two sides to the question, and I suggest there is that other side.

The particular point I raised had to do with this amount of $6,000. The minister tells me that although the details of the estimates indicate three temporary positions under this amount, at the moment only one position is set up under it. My question, then, is how long that person has held that position.

Mr. Gardiner: My information is that the person does not hold it now. That was why I said the position was set up. My information is that the particular position I am speaking of was established in 1949, that it was filled for a time, but that it is not filled at present, and the salary is $1,500, which is only one-quarter of the amount provided here. This is a sum of money which can be utilized if it is required, and if it is not required it is not used. I think there were years when we did not spend any of it.

Mr. Knowles: Then no person has held a position under this vote for a period of years, but it is a fact that the minister can appoint persons to this job or to these jobs without going to the civil service commission?

Mr. Gardiner: There has been no one on continuously, I am told. The particular person I have in mind occupied the position for a short time in 1949 and perhaps into 1950; I am not sure of the exact dates. I am told that prior to that other persons in Britain had been engaged for short periods, and there may have been a few in Canada as well. However, there are no continuous jobs in connection with it.

Mr. Knowles: But it is possible to make such appointments under the provisions of this vote without going through the civil service commission?

Mr. Gardiner: Not while I am in charge of the department, because that is not the purpose of the vote at all. Its purpose is merely to employ persons temporarily to do a job that has to be done so quickly that it is not possible to employ them through the civil service commission.

Mr. Fair: This item contains an amount of $91,078 for advertising, and so forth. I suggest to the minister that something be done to advertise butter a little more than it has been advertised. If my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre is going to bolster the case of margarine I think the people of Canada should be told the food value of margarine, and what they are doing to put themselves out of employment when they buy it. If that were done I think the hon.

member and others would keep very quiet and not try to increase the sale of margarine in this country.

Mr. Knowles: The farmers themselves are buying it.

Mr. Fair: It is not widely known that most of the ingredients going into margarine are imported into this country, and perhaps the people most interested in having those ingredients imported are making a little profit out of it on the side. Then not long ago at the other end of this building it was advocated that the eight per cent sales tax be removed from the ingredients being imported to manufacture this very poor food. Only yesterday in the Ottawa Citizen an article appeared under the heading "Production of butter drops; margarine up" and in it I find this:

> The bureau of statistics reported yesterday that production of creamery butter in May dropped from 31,987,000 pounds a year ago to 28,616,000. The total five-month output for 1950 was estimated at 78,791,000, a drop of more than 3,000,000 pounds from last year's January-May production of 81,865,000.
> Production of the butter substitute during May increased to 8,019,000 pounds from 7,190,000 last year, the bureau said. In the first five-month period of 1950, margarine output climbed to 42,922,000 pounds from 26,259,000 in the same period a year ago.
> A comparison of stocks on hand June 1 showed that holdings of butter are increasing, while margarine stocks are going down.

Something was said a moment ago about the farmers using margarine. I should like to direct a few words to the farmers who are cutting their own throats, and using their own knife to do it. By this time farmers should realize that they have an industry of their own which is well worth saving. The farmers should remember that they are helping out some of our big packers in the country who are importing the raw materials to make margarine. Instead of using butter, which could be made at home and is a better food product, our farmers are using margarine. I believe it is time for our farmer friends, and their friends in the cities and towns all across this country, to get busy and use our own homemade product, butter. They should leave margarine to the people who can and should use it in other countries.

Mr. Gardiner: May I put on the record the information that was requested earlier, and which I think should be given in order to correct any false impression that may go out from here. No apples were brought into Canada from Tasmania last year or this year. In 1949 apples were brought in from New Zealand, and these may have been the apples that were discussed, amounting to 32,210 boxes. So far in 1950 there have been 12,000 boxes imported from New Zealand and there is about one bushel to the box. I am informed that this figure covers all the apples that have come in from those places.

Mr. Ferguson: There seems to be a great deal of talk about the high cost of living and heavy taxation. On the other hand a great number of people have been agitating that we tell the farmers of this country how to produce a lot more milk with less effort, and more butter with less effort. These people are advocating the spending of a great deal of money to tell the farmers how to sell it. I want to say that more money should be spent in telling the farmers how to co-operate amongst themselves in putting forth their own publicity. They should be told how to organize properly so that the people will know the value of their products and will buy them.

I have advocated this in my own riding. I have told the farmers to get together and tell the world what they produce. I have suggested that they call meetings to see if they can get some constructive ideas, and that they should bring in marketing experts. I am sorry to say there has been little response to that suggestion. This has to be a two-way street. If the government is going to spend a lot of money helping the farmers—and I am sure the rest of the farmers in Canada are no different from those in my constituency—then those farmers have to pull their weight. They should try to see that taxes are cut, and that the price of food is lowered so that people can buy it. Nobody can buy their products today. There should be more people advocating more effort on the part of my friends the farmers. I have said this directly to the farmers. We can give these farmers too much. Soon they will be spoon-fed and cradle-rocked. They have to go along with the government, and try to reduce taxes and produce better results. They have to sell a greater quantity with more effort contributed by the farmer.

Now some members who represent purely rural constituencies are going to glower at me and say, "He should not talk that way; he will lose votes." I do not think I will lose many votes. I shall have the votes of better farmers and richer farmers if they will listen to reason, and get together to market their products. The finest apples in the world are produced in my county. There is no argument about that, because they won all the prizes. I have suggested to those men that they sell the apples in smaller cartons, so that a woman would not be asked to go out of a chain store with 105 apples under her arm; something she could not possibly do. At the same time, she would have liked to buy ten apples. A woman living in an apartment cannot possibly consume 105 apples before they go bad. There is no place to keep them. Yet these men have gone on for years trying to force down the throats of the people large hampers of apples. Their attitude is: take them or leave them. For years I have advocated that the apples be packed in small cartons containing ten or eleven apples, so that a person could put it in a basket and take it home. The apples could be kept in the cold storage plants until needed, and packed in these small cartons.

Last fall the farmers were whining about whether they would get rid of their apples. I tasted Northern Spies from the cold storage plant at Thornbury not more than three weeks ago, and they were as fresh as when they were picked off the trees last fall. As a matter of fact they were improved. Last fall these men were trying to market them in barrels or hampers. A woman could not possibly take home a barrel or hamper and keep the apples without the proper refrigeration.

I do hope the government will do something to tell the farmers of Canada how they can start helping themselves to some extent. A large number of them do work together and sell their products intelligently, but there are still a large number who will not get on the bandwagon. They want to be outlaws; they want to cry and whine. They do cry and whine. May I suggest to the minister that, on the cheapest, unglossed paper, he tell the farmers in no uncertain terms about the lack of common-sense business methods used by the farmers in their selling. I hope that will be done. Then less of the general taxpayers' money will be spent in publishing "Five Ways to Cook Apples". I saw one pamphlet with that title, published by the department. If the people of Canada have to be told how to cook apples, I think they had better go without them.

Mr. Fair: I am afraid the member for Simcoe North is trying to push baskets of apples down the farmers' throats, and they are not going to stand for it. Apparently he is not aware of the fact that those who produce milk, cheese, and butter are spending large sums in advertising their products. Apparently he is not aware of the part the farmers have played in our economy ever since they began to work the land. He is not aware of the fact that no group of citizens in this country made greater sacrifices during the war years to the end that our own people as well as the people overseas might be fed. In spite of these facts, which he has not yet learned, he continues to put forth the gas he has been putting forth for the last few minutes.

Mr. Gour (Russell): Mr. Chairman, I do not think this is the place for hon. members to begin quarrelling about the farmers and saying things against them. I am the best person to advise my good friend who spoke a moment ago if he wants to know what the farmers of Canada are doing. If he can find more successful farmers than the Canadian farmers, I should like him to show me. I know enough about farmers and the job they are doing to know that they should not be criticized by any member. If the hon. member thinks the position of the farmer is better than the position of member of parliament, he ought to try it. He will soon find out. The farmers have no complaint against this federal government; they have only thanks for the best Minister of Agriculture we have ever had. Every dollar that has been spent to help the farmer of this country is money well spent. My riding is a little more urban than rural. I have to speak on behalf of both sections. We have not too much production. If our farmers lose money on their production we have to help them out. If they are losing money on the production of butter it is because of margarine. The labouring people of this country are sufficiently well off to eat good food. They should eat butter, subsidized by the government if it is necessary to sell it at a cheaper price. People should not eat that old margarine which is going to cost millions and millions of dollars because of its effect on butter production. It has been suggested that the less fortunate people have to eat margarine. Our people should all eat good butter and not margarine. I am not in favour of labourers being obliged to eat margarine. They should eat good butter. Excuse me; I resent what was said about the farmers, and I am glad to defend them.

Mr. Knowles: Tell the farmers to eat it, too. They are buying margarine.

Mr. Gour (Russell): The hon. member believes he is intelligent enough to tell everybody what he should do. Try to do your best yourself and do not try to tell everybody what to do. You are at the point where you will soon try to tell God what to do. Farmers are just as intelligent as you are, but they have not the same advantage of being here in the house to defend themselves.

Mr. Knowles: Don't worry, I eat butter in preference to margarine, but many people cannot afford it.

Mr. Gour (Russell): My hon. friend is always telling everybody what they should do. I think we should thank God that we have farmers producing the best products. They are working. They are not talking. If the hon. member knows what the farmers are doing he should be ready to help them to a certain extent. I do not want to spend money unnecessarily but if the farmers lose their market they will not have any money to buy the produce of labour and labour will be out of work.

When there was unemployment last winter the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was one of those who talked the most about it. If the farmer cannot sell his produce at a profit he cannot buy the produce of labour and labour will be out of work. The labouring people should eat good butter.

Mr. Ferguson: I never suggested for one moment that nothing should be done toward helping the farmer. I simply suggested that additional aid be given him to instruct him how to help himself. At no time did I say anything against the farmer. My only suggestion was that advice be given him on how to market his production. There was no suggestion that they should eat margarine rather than butter. I have never eaten an ounce of margarine since it has been produced. I strongly advocate eating Canadian produced butter, and that the farmers be aided in every possible way. I also suggest that the farmers as a class be told how to help themselves. That is construction, not destruction or criticism of the farmer.

Mr. Anderson: I wonder if this committee knows that of all the money collected in Canada by taxation the farmer gets two cents out of every dollar. There has been a lot of criticism hurled at the farmer this afternoon about butter. I want the committee to know that if it does not rain, and rain very soon, in some parts of Ontario there will be a lot less butter produced than has been produced in the past. The farmers had a late season; they are short of hay; they are short of grain, and the grass is three weeks late now; in my own section of Norfolk county the pasture is very poor. Our milk production is going down, and I contend that it will go down still further. Before the year is out the price of butter and cheese will have to be increased because they are selling below the cost of production today.

Mr. Catherwood: Under this item there is one point I should like to mention, namely, the marketing of our poultry products. This is an item that is of great concern not only to the people of Ontario but to all the provinces in the Dominion of Canada as well. Last year we marketed something like 40 million dozen eggs in Great Britain. Today we have not that market. Our imports from Britain are now pretty well equal to our exports to Britain in dollar value. Can the minister make a statement with regard to the possibilities of the resumption of our British market for poultry and poultry products?

Mr. Gardiner: The same thing applies to this question as to the other products that we have been discussing, except that apples always were sold in Britain. Beef in quantities was sold to Britain. Bacon has been sold in Britain for many years, but prior to the war we sold very few eggs. We were selling a million dozen a year before the war. During the war we sold as high as 86 million dozen in a year. Recently Britain has said we had not been the main supplier before the war and they were not so much concerned about buying eggs from us. They refused to buy eggs from us. We are doing the best we can to overcome that difficulty and will get back into the British market as soon as we can, but so far as I know there is no hope of our getting back that market immediately.

30. Freight assistance on western feed grains, $5,000,000.

Mr. Brooks: I notice that this item is for freight assistance on western feed grains. In 1949-50 the amount was $17 million. This year it is $5 million, a difference of $12 million. As the minister knows, we are greatly interested in eastern Canada in assistance on feed grains, especially in the maritimes, because to a great extent the success of our farmers depends on getting cheap feed for their hogs and their cattle. Do these figures mean that there is less feed grain for eastern Canada or that the government has decided to give less assistance in freight rates on feed grain to the eastern farmer?

Mr. Gardiner: No, it does not mean either. The amount of $5 million is the amount necessary to cover the cost down to the 31st day of July, because this is the way it has always been voted. The original vote has always been an amount to carry it through the crop year we are in. The year spoken of is the grain year which begins on August 1 and ends on July 31. I have proposed that there be $13 million in the supplementary estimates to cover the remainder. It has come down previously in two votes, one for the main vote and one for the supplementaries. That question is another which was discussed at the same time as the previous question that I brought up with regard to hogs. It has been decided just today so that there was no possibility of making the announcement earlier.

This is not a vote which necessarily goes on from year to year. It is voted annually, and has been ever since the beginning. The origin of the vote is that the maritime provinces were very anxious to have part of their freight removed because of the high cost of getting feed from western Canada to the extreme east of the country. There was an agitation for that before the war started at all. We were considering the possibility of doing it in the maritimes. I think it was early in 1941 we decided to pay a quarter of the freight. Very shortly after that we brought in price control, in the latter part of 1941, and then we changed over from paying a portion of the freight to the paying of what we expected would be nearly all the freight in all of the eastern provinces and in the province of British Columbia. The freight is paid from Fort William to a location in the eastern part of Canada, and from Calgary and Edmonton into the province of British Columbia. This vote has been, as I say, renewed from year to year. We said a year ago, and I think the year before that, that it was the intention to have the whole question of discrimination in freight rates studied by a commission and a report made upon it. We have always called attention to the fact that this policy will probably be given fuller consideration when that report comes in. It will then be determined whether we are going on with the policy or whether we are going to have some other plan of equalization which will bring results. In any case what I wish to emphasize is that this is just a year to year vote. It is made in two amounts because we continue it until the end of the crop year. We have enough money to take us from April 1 to the end of the crop year, in the regular estimates, and then if we determine to go on for the complete crop year we put an amount in the supplementary estimates. That amount will be in the supplementaries this year.

Mr. Pearkes: Everything the minister has said about the maritime provinces will apply to British Columbia?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Cardiff: How much of the freight allowance is paid on grain to central Ontario?

Mr. Gardiner: It is about $6 a ton. Does the hon. member want to have the total amount?

Mr. Cardiff: What is the total amount, and how much is paid by the government?

Mr. Gardiner: We pay about $6 a ton. The freight averages about $8.40, and we pay $6 at the present time. Some of the $8.40 is due to the fact that there have been recent increases in freight rates.

Mr. Charlton: That $8.40 is the all-rail freight, is it not?

Mr. Gardiner: The system by which it works out at $6 is that we pay the lake rate to the port. Then we pay the rate into the interior, which does not exceed $6 from Fort William, down.

Mr. Charlton: I understand the provision last year was a straight $5, regardless of where it went in Ontario. Then there was a change by P.C. 3803 so that there was a sliding scale applied with so much being paid to Owen Sound, so much to Goderich, so much to Port Colborne, to Sarnia and to Toronto. Would the minister give the rates for those various ports? Then they pay the rail freight from those ports, inland, to a maximum of $6 a ton, as I understand it. But there is nothing at all paid now for trucking.

Mr. Gardiner: That is approximately correct. Some time ago the rate was $4.50. Then later on it was $5.50, and now the maximum is $6. Georgian bay ports, Sarnia and Walkerville, it is $3.50, per ton; Port Colborne and Humberstone, $4.10 per ton; Toronto, $4.30; Kingston, $4.50 and Prescott, $4.65. Those are the rates. It is when no further rail haul is involved that that payment is made.

Mr. Charlton: But on top of that they pay up to $6?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, on water shipments from Fort William or Port Arthur to ports designated in paragraph (b), when distribution is made to inland destinations by rail, payment shall be made on the basis of the amount payable at each port plus the actual rail freight charges to destinations within the Montreal freight rate zone, but not to exceed $6 per ton. And when the destination is beyond the Montreal freight rate zone payments shall be made on the same basis as is designated in paragraph (a) of the order. Paragraph (a) says that on any rail shipments from Fort William, Port Arthur and Armstrong the payment shall be the sum of $6 per ton when the destination is within the Montreal freight rate zone, and the sum of $6 per ton plus the remainder of the actual through carlot rail freight charges to destinations beyond the Montreal freight rate zone, actual carlot freight rate charges not to exceed $6 per ton to destinations in northern Ontario to which the local freight rate is less than the Montreal zone freight rate.

In other words, it works out at what my hon. friend says.

Mr. Charlton: Prior to the time the order in council was passed, feed companies on the lakes were getting the same subsidy as those inland. I understand in some cases it was away above the actual amount of the freight paid. Now, with order in council P.C. 3803, a feed company located forty or fifty miles from a lake port either has to load the grain on a car and take it in by rail, or be content not to receive any compensation whatsoever if they bring it in forty or fifty miles by truck.

Mr. Gardiner: That is right.

Mr. Bater: Does this freight assistance on western feed grains apply to feeders in British Columbia as well as those in the east?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Kickham: May I take it from what the minister said in reply to the hon. member for Royal that the freight assistance measure will be carried on after July 31 this year?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, for this crop year. I am referring to the crop year we are about to enter at August 1.

Mr. Fair: What quantity of grain has been shipped to the east each year since the freight assistance was brought into effect, and what subsidies have been advanced? Would the minister give similar information with respect to British Columbia?

Mr. Gardiner: The statement I have here shows the quantities on which freight assistance has been paid in respect of grain and feed shipped during each crop year, August 1 to July 31. Does the hon. member wish to have all the crop years, or just some of them? He would not wish me to read this whole book?

Mr. Fair: Just the crop years since the freight assistance policy has been in effect. Perhaps if the minister does not wish to read it, it might be placed on Hansard.

Mr. Gardiner: It begins in 1941, and the information is given for every year.

Mr. Fair: Give us the grand totals.

Mr. Gardiner: Perhaps the information for the last year would be satisfactory. It will be noted in these figures that the freight in respect of Quebec is approximately $2 million more on a million less tons. That of course is because of the greater distance.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

These are the figures showing the total tonnage and the total amounts of money paid out in freight assistance:

	Tons	Amount
Ontario	10,732,578	$50,463,111.61
Quebec	9,254,362	52,298,293.60
New Brunswick	1,105,545	8,675,844.65
Nova Scotia	1,289,466	11,007,743.40
Prince Edward Island	368,209	3,174,603.85
British Columbia	2,163,350	13,889,738.49
Newfoundland (from April 1, 1949 to date)	13,934	280,237.38

Taking the figures of last year the average rate per ton was as follows:

Ontario	$ 4.62
Quebec	7.61
New Brunswick	10.30
Nova Scotia	11.20
Prince Edward Island	11.20
British Columbia	6.42
Newfoundland	20.11

Mr. Fair: Do those figures bring it fairly well up to date?

Mr. Gardiner: To May 31, 1950.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Has the minister the total?

Mr. Gardiner: The total tonnage is 24,927,445 and the total amount is $139,789,572.98.

Mr. Ross (Souris): The minister was going to give the names of the firms and the amounts paid in 1948-49.

Mr. Gardiner: I tabled that to be added to the order for return.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): One of the greatest objections to this assistance comes from those who are located at points not accessible to the railroad and which are serviced by truck. They do not get the benefit of this assistance and I was wondering if there was any way that could be given?

Mr. Gardiner: It is hardly correct to say that they do not get the benefit because most of the freight is paid from Fort William to the point of distribution. It is assumed that from there on the individual will bear his own cost.

Mr. Bater: If a dealer brings down a carload of grain is there any way of seeing that this assistance is passed on to the feeder?

Mr. Gardiner: He must produce his vouchers or invoice to indicate that it was paid to the producer.

32. Dairy products board, $22,000.

Mr. Charlton: Could the minister tell us the quantity of butter of the 1949 production that the government is carrying, and also of the 1950 production?

Mr. Gardiner: I have not the information at hand in that form, but I will give the hon. member what I have. The purchases of 1949 butter amounted to 48,600,000 pounds; the sales down to June 10, 1950, were 37,900,000 pounds, leaving a balance of 10,700,000 pounds. Butter purchased in 1950 down to April 30 at 58 cents per pound amounted to 5 million pounds; butter purchased from May 1 to June 10 at the 53 cent level, 4,225,000 pounds, or a total of 9,225,000 pounds.

Mr. Charlton: You still have the 10,700,000 pounds of the 1949 butter?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, but there is only 7,700,000 more in store than at the same date in 1949.

Terminable services—

33. Meat board, including quality premiums on A and B1 grade hog carcasses, $5,854,633.

Mr. McLure: I should like to direct the attention of the minister as I did last year to the fact that hog raising in Prince Edward Island is still ahead of all the provinces in Canada for quality. I have the hog grading results given in the monthly market review which show the following results for March:

	per cent
Prince Edward Island	53·3
Nova Scotia	45·1
New Brunswick	40
Quebec	32·2
Ontario	38·1
Manitoba	25
Saskatchewan	29
Alberta	28·3
British Columbia	26

No one knows better than the minister the quality of Prince Edward Island hogs and I hope he will see that the grading of hogs in other countries is brought up by the purchase of the proper stock.

34. Special products board, $11,575.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): How much cheese has been sent to Great Britain so far? How much cheese has been requisitioned? How were the details worked out between the eastern Ontario producers of cheese and the producers in western Ontario?

Mr. Gardiner: The amount of cheese purchased in 1949 for the ministry of food was 50·1 million pounds. As you will recall, the British contract for that year was for 50 million pounds, and we delivered it. Then we bought another 20·7 million pounds after we had filled the contract for which we paid the same price. The total was 70·8 million pounds for last year. We shipped to the ministry of food 50·1 million and sold to the trade 7·2 million, a total of 57·3 million. The balance on hand as of June 10, 1950, was 13·5 million. I do not think that exactly answers the question asked as to the requisition of cheese now. I do not think that has proceeded far enough to mean very much to us at present. As near as I can give the figures, this is the situation. The agricultural prices support board had no cheese as of June, 1949. Others had 29,454,000 pounds, or a total of 29,454,000. At the first of June this year the agricultural prices support board had 14,400,000 pounds and others had 22,610,000, making a total of 37,010,000 pounds. In other words, there are about seven and a half million pounds more in Canada this year than there were at this time last year. As of June 10, 1950, the position had changed to the extent that the agricultural prices support board had 13,500,000 pounds, or almost a million pounds less than we had at the first of the month.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): How much has been sent to Great Britain under this year's contract?

Mr. Gardiner: About 8 million pounds have been sent up to date.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): What about arrangements between eastern and western Ontario producers so far as the requisitioning of cheese is concerned?

Mr. Gardiner: We are requisitioning all of it. I am not sure of the make as between the two.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): It was going to work to the disadvantage of the western Ontario producer.

Mr. Gardiner: We are trying to see that it does not.

Mr. Charlton: You are just requisitioning 90 pound cheddars, are you not?

Mr. Gardiner: We are requisitioning all cheddar cheese, but we are only sending that particular type of cheese to Great Britain. We utilize the other in taking care of the requirements of processors and others in the trade in Canada. The arrangements we have with the trade is that we turn back to them as much cheese as they used last year in their processing of fresh cheese, and they utilize it along with the old cheese.

35. To provide for assistance to encourage the improvement of cheese and cheese factories, $1,400,000.

Mr. Tustin: I notice that the item has been reduced by $300,000 this year. There is a reduction of $100,000 in the amount for the improvement of factories, and a reduction of $200,000 in the quality bonus for cheese. Why has there been a reduction? Is it the opinion of the government that we are going to have less first quality cheese produced this year or does the government think that we are going to have less cheese produced on the whole this year than we had last year?

Mr. Gardiner: The answer to the first part of the question is that we are more or less catching up on the factories that require adjustments in order to bring them up to standard. Therefore there is less money required for that purpose. As to the other point, it is only an estimate of what we are going to spend. It is a statutory amount, and if there is not sufficient here we will have to supply it. I presume it has been cut down from time to time because of the actual expenditures in preceding years.

Mr. Tustin: It is actually $200,000 below what it was last year.

Mr. Gardiner: Below the estimate.

Mr. Tustin: Below the estimate for last year. Can the minister tell us how much was paid last year for quality subsidies?

Mr. Gardiner: The amount paid in 1949 was $905,791.91. As a rule it runs around a million dollars.

Mr. Tustin: Have you separate figures for 94 score and 93 score?

Mr. Gardiner: I have them in pounds. There are 41,740,029 pounds of 93 score, and 24,419,581 of 94 score. Of course there is one cent for 93 score and two cents for 94.

36. To provide assistance for the replacement of maple production equipment, $500,000.

Mr. Lennard: We again have this item, and I should like to ask the minister when it is going to end. An item to replace maple production equipment has appeared in the estimates in various amounts for the past fifteen years. As I said last year, if this goes on much longer we will be replacing the replacements. It seems ridiculous to me. If the equipment was not right and did not measure up to qualifications fifteen years ago it should have been replaced in a period of five years at the most, and that should have been the end of it so far as the province is concerned that has taken advantage of this subsidy. It has run along for fifteen years with no apparent relief from it. I should like to know from the minister when it is going to end, and how much of this amount was spent last year.

Mr. Gardiner: In the first place it is not fifteen years. The first payment was made in 1940-41, which is ten years ago.

Mr. Lennard: Was it not started late in 1938 or in 1939?

Mr. Gardiner: The policy was adopted at that time.

Mr. Lennard: Even earlier than that.

Mr. Gardiner: No, it could not have been much earlier. It was after I came here, and that is fifteen years ago. Therefore it is not quite fifteen years. In any event, the first payment was made in 1940-41. The expenditure that year was $106,198.41. Probably I should first remind the committee of the purpose of the expenditure. It was found that maple sugar and syrup which were being produced in the province of Quebec were being produced in equipment which had been lead-covered to avoid rust. When this was checked in the United States it was condemned because it contained some lead. They were going to refuse to take it, but we persuaded them to accept it for the purpose of sweetening tobacco for cigarettes, and it was accepted for that purpose. Then we agreed with the province of Quebec that we would pay one-third of the cost of replacing this equipment, Quebec would pay one-third and the farmer would pay one-third. We started replacing the equipment in 1940-41, and it is being replaced I think largely by aluminum.

As the figure indicates, we were at it only a short time before we had to stop. In other words, we could expend up to $300,000 a year, but we spent only $106,000 that year, which indicates that we had to stop early in the war. In 1941-42 we spent only $12,000; in 1945-46 we spent $87,784 and in 1946-47, the first year after the war, we got it up to $194,271.49. So I would point out that it took us four years to spend what we had intended to spend in one year. There was only one reason for that; aluminum was being used for war purposes, and we could not get it. So the utensils were not changed during that period. We started again as soon as possible after the war was over, and in the next year we spent $203,000. The following year for the first time we got above the amount we had undertaken to spend in the beginning, and spent $360,000. Last year we spent $471,000, and this year we have put $500,000 in the estimates. As to when we will be through with this undertaking, I am not absolutely certain. It is being administered by the Quebec government, and we are paying our share.

Mr. Charlton: Can the minister tell us the total amount spent so far?

Mr. Gardiner: $1,879,528.28.

Mr. Lesage: May I ask the hon. member for Wentworth if he is outlining the Progressive Conservative policy when he objects to this item?

Mr. Lennard: Smart aleck!

Mr. Lesage: That is what you are. You object to it because it is for the province of Quebec. We know you.

Mr. Charlton: Almost $2 million has been spent so far, which is one-third of the total amount?

Mr. Gardiner: That is right.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): The minister said a small amount of lead was supposed to have been found in the syrup that went to the United States, and that is why it was found necessary to undertake this program. If that syrup was not good enough for the Americans, surely it was not good enough for Canadians either. If you are going to make this program applicable in Quebec, let us have it right across the country. I bought new maple syrup equipment this year, but I did not get any assistance. I know of many others in my county who would be glad to take advantage of this. If we are going to have that unity in this country that we talk about, let us do things fairly and squarely, across the board, or not at all.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. White (Middlesex East): No; I want to hear what the minister has to say about it.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not know of any way of correcting that situation unless you get a new government in Ontario.

38. For assistance in construction of potato warehouses under regulations to be approved by the governor in council, $100,000.

Mr. Brooks: Where are these potato warehouses being constructed, and what assistance has been given each province in connection with their construction?

Mr. Gardiner: There are eight warehouses under construction in Prince Edward Island, of which I believe only one or two are completed. We have not been billed for any of them yet, so we have not much information about them. This is another of those arrangements between the province and ourselves. We do not pay until we are billed, and we have not been billed. I understand one in Saskatchewan has been paid for, at a cost of $12,654.62. I believe it went up in 1949-50.

Mr. Brooks: Are there any in New Brunswick?

Mr. Gardiner: Inquiries have been received from British Columbia, Alberta, Manitoba, Ontario, New Brunswick and Newfoundland with regard to the application of the order in council, but no construction has been commenced.

Mr. Brooks: Why has there been so much construction in Prince Edward Island and none in New Brunswick? I am not outlining Progressive Conservative policy, nor am I criticizing Prince Edward Island, but I should like to know the reason for it.

Mr. Gardiner: The policy was first advocated by Prince Edward Island. They came here and presented the case, and we accepted the plan. It has been taken up by other provinces as well, but they have not got as far along with it as Prince Edward Island.

Mr. McLure: As I understand it the only outright grant the committee in charge of the construction of a warehouse may expect is the 37½ per cent from the federal government. I understand that does not have to be paid back, but that the grant of 37½ per cent from the provincial government must be paid back, while the remaining 25 per cent must be raised by the committee. I am glad the other hon. member for Queens is here; he knows all about these warehouses. As a matter of fact I believe he or his friends have built half a dozen of them, and he knows the cost of construction. The point on which I should like information is this. What grant is given the committee in charge of one of these warehouses? As I understand it, in the one case the 37½ per cent is a grant, while in the other case it is a loan.

Mr. Gardiner: My understanding is that when the proposal was first made by the government of Prince Edward Island they suggested that the farmers put up 25 per cent and the two governments split the other 75 per cent equally, which would be 37½ per cent each. We proceeded on that basis, and I think one or two warehouses were built. Then the provincial government decided it wanted to collect its 37½ per cent. We sort of suggested that we had just as good reason to collect our 37½ per cent if they were going to collect theirs, and the result of the discussion was that they decided to collect 37½ per cent and we would get half of what they collected. So the present position as I understand it is that the grant amounts to 37½ per cent. Then the farmers must raise 25 per cent themselves, and the other 37½ per cent must be paid back.

Mr. McLure: And that grant is shared equally by the provincial and federal governments?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

39. Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage, $3,750,000.

Mr. Studer: Mr. Chairman, in the national interest I believe that, on an item of such magnitude as the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, any member who is in a position to offer any suggestions whereby some of this expenditure may be eliminated in the future in connection with this item as well as the Prairie Farm Assistance Act should endeavour to make whatever contribution he can. I should like to state briefly what I have to say because I do not wish to prolong the session. From my observations most of the time has been taken by the opposition, so I would ask them please to bear with me for a few minutes in order that I may put the conditions at home before this house.

I have been existing, and I repeat "existing", in the constituency of Maple Creek for thirty-three years. Many of those years have been spent in scanning the horizon in the hope that it would rain. Most of the people living in that area have been doing the same thing. As a consequence it is my duty, as the member representing that district, to say a word in connection with the rehabilitation of those people. It is not my intention to repeat what the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act has already accomplished in connection with the building of thousands of small irrigation projects and small dams in that area. I know they number in the thousands. Community pastures number nearly a hundred. Then there has been the moving of the people and the regrassing that has taken place in that area under this item. I believe that if a member can suggest anything that might possibly hasten the process of rehabilitation of these people he should certainly do so.

The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act was established to correct in the future the mistakes of the past. This act, or its counterpart, has been in existence in some part of the world ever since the beginning of time, because it is part and parcel of agriculture. It is only history that tells us whether agriculture is feasible in any area. If after the people are settled in an area for a period of time it is determined the soil is not suitable for agriculture, then the rehabilitation of those people has to take place. We have heard much about the floods in Winnipeg and the other disasters that have happened in this country. I do not know of a greater disaster that can happen to people than that those people should live in an area for a lifetime and not be in a position to earn their living. They then find that they will have to leave that area in which they have laboured so long and begin life anew in some other area; that is what the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act proposed to do and has done for many people in that area. If it is to be done, the sooner the better.

For many days we have been talking about areas in the central part of Canada that have had too much water. As everyone knows, the area of which I am speaking has too little water. The problem this presents is too great for the individual, so society, through this government, comes to the assistance of the individual. Mr. Chairman, we wish to hasten the process of alleviating suffering in that area. Again this spring in the municipalities surrounding my home over 510,000 bushels of seed grain had to be supplied to these people. Vegetables were shipped into some parts of the area during last fall to enable the people to live through the winter. This means that under the P.F.A.A. the people are not receiving sufficient to keep themselves for a year. The cost of living today is entirely different from the cost ten years ago, yet today the maximum amount obtainable under the P.F.A.A. is exactly the same as it was ten years ago. I have heard it stated that some of the farmers in the drought area are living and farming for P.F.A.A. benefits. I would make it clear that there is not one farmer in that area doing that because to operate the average farm it costs between $2,500 and $4,000. The maximum amount any farmer can receive in one year under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is $500. One can imagine, therefore, what would happen in that area over a period of years, if anyone was farming for P.F.A.A. alone.

In the area of which I am speaking there is a rainfall of from twelve to fourteen inches. The situation is entirely different from what it is in other areas such as Ottawa, where I understand the rainfall is between twenty and thirty inches. Under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, through the co-operation of the federal and provincial governments, methods have been devised whereby the people may be able to live there in the future and make their living. I am saying that because I wish to leave this committee with the idea that the money which has been spent thus far in dealing with the matter has been well spent. I wish to tell the committee that the larger the appropriations are under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, the smaller the appropriations are going to be under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in the future. It is that ideal towards which we are striving. We want to enable every farming community throughout the length and breadth of Canada to stand on its own feet. Then, crop failure assistance will not be necessary. The farmers living in those areas, wherever they may be, would be able to take their place along with the rest of the people of Canada, and make their contribution to the country as a whole.

In these areas we have the triple S system of farming, that is the summer-fallow system. It means that we have to allow the land to rest one year to accumulate moisture so that we will have enough moisture for the next year. We have to have two years' moisture to grow one crop. Under this system we have to summer-fallow the grass also. We have not been doing so well at that, and last year the grass did not come up on my farm at all. As I say, we have to summer-fallow the grass so that our stock will have something to fall back upon. We have to summer-fallow the water because we have about 6,000 small irrigation projects. I am not speaking of the larger ones because even at the best, with all the larger irrigation projects one hears about, only about one-tenth of the land can be irrigated. What are we going to do with the rest of it? The altitude of my farm is about 2,880 feet, and that is about 900 feet higher than the average land in Saskatchewan. How is water going to be forced up to that land? As I have said, in spite of these large irrigation projects, only about one-tenth of the land can be irrigated.

We are interested in knowing how these farmers can assist themselves in places where the land cannot be irrigated, and cannot be looked after by means of this summer-fallow system. I suppose it will have to be done by impounding the water on a small scale on the various farms. This will mean that if one dam is built and that fills with water, you will have to build another one because there will be some years when the first dam will not be filled with water. You have to summer-fallow water as well as everything else. On that basis it will mean larger farms. We have heard in this committee that it takes from forty to fifty acres of pasture to sustain an animal, and that is possibly true. As the Minister of Agriculture pointed out, sometimes cattle can subsist on a smaller number of acres in other areas so our farms will have to be larger to make them self-sustaining. In that case I suppose some of our people will want to move to other areas.

I do not want to be too long, Mr. Chairman, but I do want to say that in my opinion not enough attention has been paid to grasses. Any member of this house who has had anything to do with agriculture can identify wheat, oats, barley, rye and flax plants if I hold them in my hand, but how many could identify the plants of five of the native grasses? I do not suppose anyone could name those five native grasses; at least I know I could not. This fact was brought forcibly to my attention by one of the scientific men at the Swift Current experimental farm whose name was Heinricks, and it has stayed with me because I believe it is more important in the general agricultural picture throughout the world than we realize. We should realize that it is grass that keeps the earth in place. I think more money could properly be expended in a scientific inquiry to determine what improvements could be made in these various grasses. Grass is the only possible crop in so many of our areas.

I would like to point out, Mr. Chairman, that some of the townships in the western part of Saskatchewan, the southwestern part, and in Alberta have been receiving crop failure payments for ten years. If the past is any indication of the future it would appear to me, and to many others, that possibly for the next ten years these same lands will receive the same amount of money in crop failure payments. Therefore if these 44 townships over the past ten years have received $5,000 it would mean that this government, or the government of Canada, if history repeats itself, will have to pay the same lands that same amount of money, namely, $5,000 in the next ten-year period, or in the next fifteen or twenty-year period, whatever the case may be. It is well known that history always repeats itself.

I understand that there are thousands of applications from people who want to move to other areas where they may make a living and absolve themselves from this unhappiness that has been going on there for years. The land where these people are to move on is not available at the present time. We hear members of parliament and others suggest that there are hundreds of acres here, there and elsewhere that they would like people to move to. But you cannot take people who are fifty and sixty years old and who have worked all their life and put them in a bush area that is not cleared, and where they have to start all over again to make their living. You have to provide some other means for them. Therefore I was wondering whether we could not change the basis of movement and bring in a voluntary movement. By that I mean instead of the government undertaking to move them it could be done in this way. Let us assume that in the 44 townships I have mentioned we are going to have to pay $5,000 a farm for the next ten years. Why not make the $5,000 available to those people in one lump sum? If that were done I am sure they would find a place to move to and make themselves self-sustaining on their own, without any additional assistance. They would find a place somewhere in this country of ours to which they could go, and not have to go where the government would have to place them. If that system were inaugurated they could go voluntarily.

The reason these people are not moving is that they have not enough money to move. It takes money to move. They have to depend on the government assisting them. If this were made voluntary they could move on their own and the government would not be spending any more money. I am sure it would relieve the situation to some extent, a situation which is going to be aggravated if there is another extensive crop failure this year, if means were provided whereby they could move voluntarily and make their own living.

Mr. Wylie: I was wondering what item we are on? Are we discussing the Prairie Farm Assistance Act?

The Chairman: Item 39.

Mr. Gardiner: Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

Mr. Studer: It involves the whole thing. You cannot separate one from the other. One causes the other. You have to take causes and effects. If we did not have the one the other would not be there at all.

I suggest that possibly this could be done. A system could be devised whereby these people could go on their own. They would be much happier and the government would save money, and no doubt the general situation would be better.

There is one other point I should like to mention. In most of these places out there where dams and dugouts have been built a lot of the soil is light. The dams and dugouts hold the water for a short period of time in the spring and then the water seeps away. I would suggest that a considerable appropriation be permitted under this item for a scientific investigation to provide means whereby the water can be retarded in its seepage by an ingredient that could be placed in the water. I suggest that something like what is done in road building be carried out. I suggest that something be devised that would prevent the water from leaking out of these dams. During the war the scientific men could provide almost anything for any purpose that was necessary. I believe that if a determined effort were made and a sufficient appropriation given for determining ingredients for the retarding of the seepage of water, a means to that end could be devised.

If something could be done to keep the water where it is originally impounded in the spring it would be a great help to those people who stay there, and they would be able at least to provide water for their gardens and their small irrigation projects, and that would at least make it possible for them to stay there.

This is all the time that I would dare ask the chairman to give me at this time. We base it all on the assumption that in the future in that area of ours we are going to develop a system through P.F.R.A. whereby the people can make their own living and be happy along with the other people in Canada.

That means the summer-fallow system that I have outlined, the scientific sealing of dams, the economic unit of farms and ranches, contour farming, which is being practised in this country at the present time, and all in all to bring about a system and a policy whereby these people, working along with the other people of Canada, will make their contribution, which is the effort and the desire of all of us.

Mr. Hansell: I very largely agree with the remarks that have been made by the hon. member for Maple Creek, although much that he has said has been said very often in the house over the past number of years. In connection with this particular item, prairie farm rehabilitation and water storage, I notice that the amount of the vote is $3,750,000. When we turn to the explanatory note on page 96 we find that $1,346,000 of this amount is for small projects. That is rather a big item without any further explanation. I was just wondering whether the minister could give us a break-down of the $1,346,000 for small projects. Would it be possible for us to get the break-down say of all these small projects that would cost about $20,000? If it is handy, can he give it to us, or would it take time?

Mr. Ross (Souris): Before the minister replies I should like to add a question or two and he can reply to them all together, or would the hon. member sooner have his answers right now?

Mr. Hansell: That is all right, but I have one or two other questions.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I want to endorse a great deal of what has been said by the hon. member for Maple Creek as well, and to agree that it has often been said in the past years. It is quite a problem out there. It involves the lives and happiness of a great many people in that particular part of the country.

Following what the hon. member for Macleod has just said, I have checked the increase. There is an increase of $750,000 over last year's vote. In checking it over on the pages where it is broken down I find that $630,000 is for community pastures, reserves and grazing areas, and about $105,000 is for large irrigation and water storage.

When the minister is replying to the hon. member for Macleod will he tell us where these community pastures and grazing areas are to be located, and where the irrigation projects are to be undertaken?

Mr. Gardiner: To answer the hon. member for Macleod, I think he will realize that to give a break-down of the individual projects would be almost impossible when I read him the figures. To begin with, none of them costs $20,000. Most of the projects cost $125, so far as we are concerned. There are 4,718 small projects. That is the number of dugouts. The total number of the different types is 5,246, some of them being for small irrigation purposes and some of them for other purposes.

The financial assistance paid in 1949-50 on these small projects numbering 5,246 was $626,836.87. The total number, to begin with, is 43,042, and the total amount expended is $4,810,824.91. It will be seen from that that the amount is very small. These dugouts we assist in digging on farmers' lands are either dug by the farmers themselves or the municipality brings in equipment to dig them and we pay four and a half cents a yard on the earth moved. The remainder of the cost is paid by the farmer himself in most if not in all cases. So, to break it down, it would take in 43,000 farms in the three western provinces. That, of course, would be a very considerable list.

Mr. Hansell: The answer is more or less what I expected. I have wondered if there appears in these projects what is known as Beauvais dam near Pincher Creek. That is the reason I looked up the explanation and details of the item. I could not find anything there to indicate the various projects in which one might be interested. I understand that we cannot ask the minister to put on record the information in respect of four or five thousand projects.

However I understand this particular one is estimated at about $25,000. Is that project to be proceeded with this year? I have worked on this matter for a good many years. I remember first taking it up with the government before the war. If my memory serves me correctly I mentioned it first in 1937, because it was a project which would not only assist the farmers in that area but would raise Beauvais lake high enough to provide a reserve of water for the town of Pincher Creek. I even took it up with the government in those days on the basis of proceeding with it as a public works relief scheme. However we made no headway at that time.

The war came along and many of these projects were left for the time being. Men and machinery were not available. Now the war is over and some of these projects have come under review. Is it expected that this one will be proceeded with this year?

Mr. Gardiner: The Beauvais project is under investigation at the present time, and is listed among those we hope to get started this year. However that does not guarantee that we will get started. We have it listed and the money set aside for it. If we get the final report and are in a position to proceed, in all probability it will be proceeded with. I understand it is a combination of irrigation and water for Pincher Creek. The intention is to proceed with it in due course, but we cannot be certain if it will go on this year.

Mr. Hansell: I hope it may be proceeded with, because when the minister was out west a few months ago the report was circulated, on the basis of his visit, that it would be proceeded with this year, and that the work would commence in the spring. We are now beginning to leave spring behind and summer is upon us. If these things are not started earlier in the year they generally are not completed before the work season is over. The people's hopes have been raised through the minister's visit. I hope they will not be dashed to pieces on the rocks of disappointment. I have recently received further communications asking if it would be possible to have the project completed this year. That is why I was particularly anxious to have the minister's definite pronouncement upon it.

For the purposes of the record, and so that the country may know, would the minister tell us the procedure followed when a small project is desired. I am not referring to a small pothole, but one similar to the type I have mentioned, involving some $20,000 or $30,000. What is the process by which one eventually realizes a project? I would understand that the government must first be approached. From there on, what happens?

Mr. Gardiner: What happens is pretty much what is happening in connection with the project to which the hon. member has referred. The engineers have been there since the spring. That is the beginning of any construction. As has been said, first an application is made. Then we send men there to make a survey of the possibilities. They go and look the country over. They may or they may not be engineers. Then they will decide whether the plan is feasible. Once we decide a project should be proceeded with we call in the engineers so that they may go over it, check the whole area and give us estimates as to costs and other related matters. Then, as a rule, we have soil surveys to indicate whether water can be put on it successfully. We ascertain the necessity for drainage, and all that kind of thing. We do not say definitely that we will proceed with any project until all that work is done. If that work reveals that it is a project which will be helpful to the community, we then proceed with it.

So far as this particular project is concerned, I believe it is drawing to the point where the report will be made by the engineers as to the possibilities of the whole plan. Reports to date are favourable. I think probably the plan will be proceeded with. In the beginning the engineers must discover whether there are any conditions which make it impossible to carry out the plan—either soil conditions or conditions of other kinds. Then, where it is a matter of irrigation, it must be decided whether we can provide the water.

All those different questions enter into the matter. I might say that I have here a type of project which perhaps is similar. We deal with it by watersheds. The South Cypress watershed of Saskatchewan is in much the same classification and is not far removed from the district mentioned. These projects are as follows:

Adams Lake	$ 8,831
Eastend	161,000
Valmarie	214,000
Valmarie west	150,000
Richardson-McKinnon	53,900
Consul-Vidora	56,500
Middle creek	18,663
Spangler project	4,950
Cypress storage	467,691

That is the large lake that is really the source of the Missouri river. That group is located in the southwest corner of Saskatchewan and just across from where it is anticipated this other work will be done. Then there are works in the North Cypress watershed—Maple Creek, Swift Current and North Herbert extension ranging from $14,000 up to $350,000.

The Wood river is another watershed which is being covered with smaller projects, and then there is the Qu'Appelle watershed with projects ranging from $4,000 up to $83,000. There are other irrigation projects covering a considerable area and numbering 20 or 25.

Mr. Hansell: I did not ask my last question just for my own information because I have not been sitting here for 15 years without getting to know this procedure. I thought it would be well if hon. members knew what the procedure was. Just one more question and I shall be through. I asked that a return be brought down covering this project six weeks ago, and I inquired about this ten days ago and asked the minister if he would facilitate it. I want to familiarize myself with what is going on backstage. Sometimes when we want information we have to dig it up and I wonder if the minister would see that that return is brought down before we close?

Mr. Gardiner: It came to my desk for the first time this morning but as my estimates have been on ever since I have not had a chance to read it carefully. I read part of it and that is why I know something about this matter. I am afraid that when I do read it all there will be some things which will have to be considered a matter of privilege and would require to be taken out because there are reports from one official in the department to another.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I asked the minister if he could tell us where this $530,000 additional is to be spent on community pastures and reserve grazing areas and where the $100,000 additional is to be spent on large irrigation projects.

Mr. Gardiner: I am not too sure that the plan under which this vote is handled is fully understood, although I know it is understood by the hon. member for Souris, who has been associated with it for a long time. In view of the criticism that has been offered in committee meetings and elsewhere I think perhaps I should say something with regard to it. Ever since this vote has appeared in the estimates suggestions have been made that it should be broken down like other votes, but we have always objected on the ground that we are dealing with a problem which depends largely on weather conditions and which must be carried out in an area where you can operate only from five to six months in the year. Two or three months might be lost if you had to wait for a decision as to the transfer of money or anything of that kind and we might end up this summer with very little being done.

We have always insisted that this should be a single vote, and this year it is for $3,750,000. It is only one vote; it is not half a dozen votes or a dozen votes. If I were to read off a list of the pastures we are going to build this summer we might have to stick to that list. If someone were to read in the paper tomorrow that we intend to build a certain pasture, he would consider that that was going to be done.

In connection with these pastures you must decide first to build them. There may be a dozen people living in the area and you may have to move them off. There may be no difficulty, but then again you may have one or two obstreperous people saying, "if you are going to move us off, you move us." That takes a little longer and the result may be that the pasture would not be built this year.

These pastures are scattered pretty well all over the area. There are 232,000 acres and they are spread pretty well all over the western section of Saskatchewan. In some cases pastures that we already have are being enlarged, but there are a few new ones, one being in Manitoba.

I would be pleased to let the hon. member see this but I would hesitate to have this list appear in the newspapers for the reasons I have given.

Mr. Ross (Souris): There is a breakdown on page 96. For instance, an amount of $891,380 is shown for community pastures as compared with $361,400 last year. Is that amount allocated for that definite purpose?

Mr. Gardiner: No. We have insisted that it should not be, but the treasury board and the comptroller of the treasury asked us to make an estimate of what we think we are going to do. We do make that estimate so that there will be some guide, but it is not a vote. The vote is in the form of a lump sum; there are not votes for wages, and other items.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I agree with the minister's statement that it is one vote and I know how it operates, but why is this breakdown shown?

Mr. Gardiner: We have no control over the writing of this document. The treasury board, the comptroller of the treasury and others having to do with these matters have suggested that we estimate what we intend to do and then they put in the breakdown. We are not bound by that as we can go to treasury board and get these things changed.

If we were voting that amount separately we would be tied to the vote and would not be able to change the money from one thing to another during the season. That is just our idea of how the money is going to be divided up. We stick pretty closely to it but there are occasions when we must ask them in midseason to change money from one to the other and we always get that done.

Mr. Ferrie: I want to say how pleased we are in our part of the country to have the P.F.R.A. So far as the land is concerned it is good soil and will hold water. In past years there was plenty of surface water but as the years have gone by we have had to go farther and farther north to find such a condition. The northern part of my constituency used to be well supplied with all kinds of water but the water level has dropped, and today the people have to dig dugouts. These small projects are dugouts 65 feet wide, 175 feet long and 12 feet deep involving the removal of 2,500 square yards of earth in their construction. The water there is sufficient to cover an acre to a depth of a foot. The water is gathered in the dugout mostly in the spring of the year, is stored there, and generally there is enough rain to keep it up to that level. It provides water all summer and all winter for the people, and enables them to keep stock in that part of the country that otherwise would not be there. They would have to get rid of them.

It is not a grain growing country. It is bush, but for some reason the water level has gone down over a period of years. In one part of my constituency they are drawing water a distance of twenty miles, and they are not in a P.F.R.A. area. I should like to ask the minister to try to extend the area covered by P.F.R.A. farther north so that these people can receive some assistance and retain their stock. The assistance is only small but it helps the farmer to co-operate with the man who has the heavy machinery necessary to dig the dugout.

The people in the area are on small homesteads of a quarter or half section. A lot of the land has bush on it. Some of the people only have 25, 30, 40 or 50 acres of land broken, but they have to have water for their stock. I would ask the minister to do something about moving the line farther north so that these people can receive the benefits of the P.F.R.A. I am not going to take any more time. I have a 16-page speech that I had intended to deliver on the subject of P.F.R.A. In our municipality we have 600 dugouts, and I will not rest until we have one on every quarter-section in the municipality. If there is any salvation for such a community it is water. When you have water you have a certain amount of protection from insects. Birds will remain in the region if you have bush and water, but if you have no water the birds will leave. They attack all kinds of insects that destroy crops. If you do not have birds where you grow grain sooner or later you will suffer from the attacks of insects, because that is what happens in the long run. Over a period of years it has happened all over the world. Where you do not have birds you have poor crops because insects ultimately come along and devour them.

I want to say a few words about crop conditions in that part of the country, conditions that may come some day to the people of eastern Canada. I heard one man say today that they needed rain in this part of the country, and if they did not get rain they would soon be in a pretty bad condition. That is often the case in western Canada, and it was for that reason that P.F.R.A. was started. I should like to say that instead of the item being $3 million it should be $30 million. It should be available to help all the people of Canada, and the sooner we start to develop Canada in that spirit the better it will be for us. The farmer is the foundation of the country. He is the one who provides food for the people of Canada to eat, and the amount that the people of Canada spend on him is very small.

Mr. Harrison: I should like to say a word about prairie farm rehabilitation. Unlike the hon. member for Maple Creek I am not so much interested in rehabilitation as I am in the small projects mentioned by the hon. member for Mackenzie. When the P.F.R.A. legislation was introduced in the west in the first place, and in Saskatchewan, in which I am particularly interested, it was brought in to cover what was then the dry part of the prairie provinces. As the hon. member for Mackenzie has said, the dry area has extended somewhat farther north. In the constituency I represent it now affects the southern part of my riding to a depth of 50 to 100 miles. The top 250 to 300 miles has a good supply of water but the bottom 50 to 100 miles is getting fairly short. The water table in the latter region has dropped some 20 or 25 feet, and it is beginning to affect the people who are raising livestock. We are not in the same position as people farther south in Saskatchewan who raise grain entirely, and who are in a serious plight if they do not have a crop. As long as we have some feed and water, there is always plenty of livestock to keep the people in good shape financially.

The point I want to make is that the money spent on these small dams is not something that is poured into the west and never comes back to the east. So long as these people are able to raise livestock they are always in good financial condition and are able to buy the products of the east. I want to bring this point to the attention of hon. members because sometimes it appears from all these votes for P.F.R.A. that we are pouring money into a pail with a hole in the bottom. So far as small projects are concerned in an area of that kind, that is definitely not the case because livestock constitute the insurance policy of these people. The expenditure on these small dams only amounts to about $150 each, but when each farmer has water he knows that his stock are going to be taken care of, and that he will not have to get rid of them on short notice.

Practically every municipality in an area of some 50 to 100 miles in the southern portion of my riding has brought it to my attention that they are in need of assistance under the P.F.R.A. in the form of small water projects. We have never had such assistance in any part of my riding, but the time has now arrived when we feel it should be extended to cover an area 50 to 100 miles farther north than is now the case. It varies from east to west according to whether you are on the east side or the west. As you go farther west it extends farther north. It would have to extend possibly 50 miles farther north on the east side and 100 miles farther north on the west side in order to be effective. It is not my intention to delay the committee, but I thought this matter should be brought to the attention of the government. I know the minister is quite conversant with this situation, but many hon. members who are being asked to vote on the proposition as to whether this area should be extended are not acquainted with the facts. I am making these comments in order to present the point of view of the people of that area, and to assure the committee that we are not asking for something that will not be returned tenfold.

In conclusion I would like the minister, if he would be so kind, to tell us what he thinks we may expect in the future with respect to the extension of this area, and how soon we may expect it. I know my people in Meadow Lake will be greatly interested.

Mr. Fair: Before the minister replies, I should like to join with the hon. member who has just spoken in asking that the area be extended further north. Many of the people in the northern part of my constituency are not able to come under this plan, and I have had several requests that something be done along this line.

Mr. Gardiner: I think I explained earlier in the session that two bills we had intimated would be brought down this year would not be brought down until next session. One of those bills is based upon P.F.R.A. in the west; the other is based upon the marshlands operations in the maritimes. The one is based upon the need to procure and conserve water; the other is based upon the need to control water. It has been said here from time to time that we should extend P.F.R.A. right across Canada. Well, that would be difficult, because after all that has to do with prairie farm rehabilitation and has particular application to irrigation, stock watering dams and dugouts such as have been described by the last few speakers. On the other hand a considerable portion of the work in which this government might assist in eastern Canada would be in connection with rescuing land from the ocean, as is done in the maritimes by means of dikes. The same thing probably would be necessary at certain points along the St. Lawrence river, and even at other points around the great lakes.

Another activity which might be undertaken is the development of the black marshes in eastern Canada. There are such marshes on many farms in Ontario. I remember there was one on the farm my grandfather homesteaded when he came to Canada a hundred years ago. That black marsh is still there, and I remember that we used to spend our Sunday afternoons going down and pulling livestock out of that bog. Mr. Hepburn, who used to be premier of Ontario, has developed one of these black marshes on his own farm; that is where he grows the onions we hear so much about. It is one of the best producing areas in Ontario, requiring the work of as many as sixty men in the summer months, though a few years ago it was more or less of an eyesore on his farm. His cattle and horses used to get bogged down there, too; but he drained that swamp. As a result he has one of the finest fire fighting systems I have ever seen on a farm. The water is piped into his buildings, and then is taken below his place where it feeds one of the finest lakes I have ever seen. He does not have to go somewhere else in Ontario to find a summer resort; he has one just outside his door. That sort of thing on a farm makes farming really worth while, and there are black marshes like that all over eastern Canada, particularly in Ontario, which can be developed into highly productive areas.

We think work of that kind could be assisted from Ottawa over the years to come. So the legislation we intend to bring down next session will include two bills, one of which will provide for an extension of the work in the west while the other will deal with work in the east. I think I can say both those bills will be brought down next session.

Mr. Fulton: I remember that three or four years ago the minister told us it was his desire to do just what he has described now; that is, bring down two bills, one of which would extend the P.F.R.A. in eastern Canada and the other which would extend P.F.R.A. in the west. Then there was a compromise, for reasons which I do not think were clearly stated, and the minister outlined another program. Under that program, if the provinces put forward specific projects for reclamation or irrigation, the dominion government would consider them and would be prepared to make a contribution toward the cost if the projects were approved. I understood that program was to go on for five years, and I do not believe the five years have expired.

Mr. Gardiner: I am afraid my hon. friend has not quite followed that through, probably because it was not made too clear. These bills I am speaking of were actually drafted four or five years ago but were dropped at that time because of the difficulties experienced at the dominion-provincial conference. They have stood aside ever since, and I am saying they will probably come down next session because we hope those difficulties will be overcome in September and we will be able to get along with the job. The larger projects we have with the provinces are the large irrigation schemes in the west, and that is something quite different. We are working on those with the staffs of the P.F.R.A. assisting, because there are engineering staffs suitable for that work. As hon. members can see, the two votes are separated in these estimates, and they have always been kept separate. They are different types of projects.

Mr. Fulton: At the present time P.F.R.A. does not operate in British Columbia on a wide scale; the only things done are these special projects to which the minister has referred. One of them is at Lillooet lake, and I think it was started even before 1945. The other project at Kelowna, and one or two others in the dry belt in the interior, were not commenced until after the minister made his announcement as to the general principle that would be applied, which I think was in 1947. That principle was that the province would bring forward a project; the dominion authorities would review it and, if they approved, would contribute to the cost. It is under that scheme that these things are being done; and, as the minister says, they are separate votes. Under the new legislation the minister has mentioned, will the operation of the prairie farm rehabilitation administration extend to the whole of western Canada, or will we still have to deal with these individual small projects? In other words, will the P.F.R.A. administration be permitted then to engage in large scale irrigation undertakings in British Columbia on the same basis that it is now engaging in such undertakings on the larger rivers in the prairie provinces?

Mr. Gardiner: The projects on the prairies are being undertaken in much the same way as those under vote No. 38 and vote No. 42. Those are the two votes that were put in the estimates first about 1947. They were put in deliberately, because we were not then in a position to proceed with the legislation I have mentioned. We thought these works ought to be moved along, and that in the meantime we should get some experience in handling them; and we have had considerable experience. These votes I think will be brought under the new legislation, but it is sometimes thought that in this work we are doing on the prairie we just go out there and do the work; that is not true. In connection with these dugouts we only pay 4½ cents per yard for the removal of the earth. It often costs three times that to move the earth, and the farmer pays it himself.

In other cases where we have put in water for irrigation, as for example the Swift Current project, the provincial government actually promotes the irrigation of the land, that is the utilization of the water, and the farmers themselves pay a considerable part of the cost. Practically all we do is put in a dam, and then put in a ditch to distribute the water to surrounding points. From that point it is taken up by the provincial government and by the farmers, just in the same way as we started in the Pemberton valley in British Columbia. The first project we had there we started because it was a returned soldier settlement. I was taken out there and looked at it, and I thought it was one of the finest valleys I had seen and could be made habitable. It was being flooded every spring, and these returned men were practically being put off their land. The government did spend a considerable amount of money there, and spent it directly, in order to determine whether anything could be done. We wanted to get to a point where we knew it could be done. We knew the province had land there and if it could be taken care of an arrangement might be made. We entered into an arrangement with the province whereby we paid one-third, the province paid one-third, and the farmers paid one-third. We feel that this administration will have been improved by the time the bill is brought down, and we can bring all that under this legislation.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Fulton: When the minister is out in that area this summer looking at the drainage project, there is another project near Lillooet which I should like to have the opportunity of showing him so he can consider it.

Item agreed to.

Special—

40. Major irrigation and water conservation projects in the prairie provinces, $7,719,500.

Mr. Thatcher: On this particular item will the minister state the amount of money, if any, which is included for the south Saskatchewan irrigation project? I wonder if he could bring the house up to date on the present status of this project, and whether or not construction is going to start this year. If it is not going to start this year, perhaps he would give the reasons.

Mr. Gardiner: The south Saskatchewan project is at the point now where I can discuss the matter with the province. I hope to make an appointment to see them at the end of next week. I am going out there to attend a function which has something to do with the south Saskatchewan, so I hope to discuss the matter with the provincial representatives at that time. We are in a position to make suggestions and recommendations, but we want to have a discussion with the province before we proceed further.

Mr. Thatcher: Will the minister state whether there is any amount in these figures for the south Saskatchewan?

Mr. Gardiner: There is a million dollars.

Mr. Thatcher: Is that for survey work or construction?

Mr. Gardiner: It is for the completion of the survey work. No matter what discussions we have, I do not expect it will be possible to actually get the construction work started this season. There is some work to be done there which will not take more than the amount in these estimates, but even if we decided definitely to proceed this fall, a decision of that kind cannot be arrived at until this work that has to be done is completed. That will take until October and by that time, even if the decision were favourable, there could not be any more money spent this year.

Mr. Quelch: In this vote there is an item of $995,750 for surveys and engineering costs on major irrigation and reclamation projects, including the Red Deer diversion. Can the minister give any idea when the surveys on that project will be complete?

Mr. Gardiner: I believe we can complete any surveys that need to be made in order to arrive at the position where we can make a final decision this year with this amount of money. I do not think it will be necessary—

Mr. Quelch: What do you mean by "final decision"? Is that a final decision as to whether or not you will go ahead with the project?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, we have to have the same kind of discussion as we had about the St. Mary. We are not going to start on a project and discuss it for four years afterwards. If we start this one it will be after we have had a discussion, the same as we are doing with the south Saskatchewan. I am not blaming anyone, but in order to meet a situation which developed during wartime whereby we had to put water in reservoirs if we were going to claim it as against our United States friends, we proceeded without having a full discussion about it. I think both sides realize it is better to have this discussion before we start, and I hope we will have the discussion with the Alberta government this fall and get the matter settled so we can proceed or do whatever we are going to do.

Mr. Wylie: I should like to ask a question about this item. Quite recently an agreement was signed between the dominion government and the provincial government in connection with the St.Mary-Milk river project. In view of the fact that this is considered a master agreement, could the minister give the committee some of the details of that agreement, that is how the arrangements are to be made between the two governments?

Mr. Gardiner: The arrangements are completed between the two governments, and we are covering all the costs from the Waterton storage, which is near the United States boundary, until we come to the Ridge storage, which is just outside the areas that are to be irrigated. Now all the costs of this part of the project are to be borne by the dominion government without any cost to the province at all, but from that point on the province is responsible for all the costs. According to the estimates, that means we will be paying a little more than half the cost, and the province will take care of the remainder. We have not attempted to say that the province must pay it. They can suit themselves as to whether they pay it or charge it back to the farmer, but in any case they have undertaken to be responsible for having the work done.

Item stands.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved that the following bills be read the second time:

Bill No. 270, for the relief of Joseph Lucien Andre Bergeron.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 271, for the relief of Thelma Leggo Chicoine.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 272, for the relief of Anna Kathleen Olga McCone Shaw.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 273, for the relief of Martin Luke Marlow.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 274, for the relief of Helena Wilhelmina Thornburg Lawton.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 275, for the relief of Bonnie Ruth McNab Sarrasin.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 276, for the relief of Lyndia Betsy Mayes Bernier.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 277, for the relief of Sarah Modlinsky Markis.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 278, for the relief of Anna Patiris Sarakinis.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 279, for the relief of Julia Ann Ramsell Blane.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 280, for the relief of Cyrile-Orance-Horence Presseau.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 281, for the relief of Paul Edmond Meerte.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 282, for the relief of Charles George Storey.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 283, for the relief of Mary Muriel Inez Larman Jarry.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 284, for the relief of Mary Zilda Alix Runcie.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 285, for the relief of Aili Esteri Kankaanpaa Toebben.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 286, for the relief of Pierre Bouchard.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 287, for the relief of William Aubrey Ricardo Aird.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 288, for the relief of Marguerite Carmen Samson Wrigglesworth.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 289, for the relief of Andrew Cerat.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 290, for the relief of Marie Lucille Giselle Roy Veilleux.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 291, for the relief of Mabel Pearl Speirs Lazor.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 292, for the relief of Lena Grace Connolly Hibberd.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 293, for the relief of Lilian Ferguson Gardner.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 294, for the relief of Marion Leonard Ryan.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 295, for the relief of Joseph Georges Neville Poirier.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 296, for the relief of Marie Gisele St. Laurent Therrien.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 297, for the relief of Norah Nichol Meighen Allan.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 298, for the relief of Dora Eleanor Chalmers Grisley.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 299, for the relief of Ruth Desiree Morrissette Chevalier.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 300, for the relief of Richard Martello Johnston.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 301, for the relief of Ernest Beliveau.—Mr. Winkler.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Gagnon: On division.

Mr. Speaker: Carried on division.

Motion agreed to on division, and bills read the second time.

WESTCOAST TRANSMISSION COMPANY

AMENDMENT OF ACT OF INCORPORATION, TO STRIKE OUT "OR OUTSIDE CANADA"

On the order:

Second reading of Bill No. 131, to amend an act to incorporate Westcoast Transmission Company Limited—Mr. Sinnott.

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I ask that this bill be dropped.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to have this bill withdrawn?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Bill withdrawn and order discharged.

DIVORCE JURISDICTION

EXCHEQUER COURT TO HAVE JURISDICTION IN ACTIONS ORIGINATING IN QUEBEC AND NEWFOUNDLAND

The house resumed from Friday, May 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Knowles for the second reading of Bill No. 13, to provide for the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court of Canada in matters of divorce.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre speaks now he will close the debate.

(Translation):

Mr. Pierre Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, for the second time I am availing myself of my right, as a free man and as a representative of a Quebec constituency, to discuss a divorce bill. Indeed, whatever aspects it may deal with, it still is a divorce bill.

The hon. member would like to have referred to the exchequer court those bills that are now being dealt with by the Senate. Even if such a measure did in effect tend to rid us of a disgraceful list of bills submitted for our approval periodically, we cannot agree with him. Nor can we agree with his claims that reference of those divorce bills to the exchequer court would not set up, in so far as Quebec and Newfoundland are concerned, a divorce court. On the contrary, I believe it would set up such a court for Quebec and Newfoundland. My hon. friend from Newfoundland has explained the situation very well when he gave the reasons why they had not agreed to this change proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

I have here an article written by a Quebec Jesuit, Reverend Father Louis C. de Léry, an expert on such matters. He mentions several reasons why Quebec opposes any change in the present procedure. Father de Léry states:

> Quebec has never recognized divorce. When our ancestors came to this country over three centuries ago, they had their own religion and their own laws, which recognized the indissolubility of marriage. This indissoluble character was recognized by the organic law of 1774. In 1865, the union parliament sanctioned in Lower Canada the use of our civil code, recently consolidated. Section 185 of that code asserts the indissoluble character of the marriage ties. Again, according to the British North America Act (1867) the provinces have exclusive legislative authority in the matter of civil rights. Those rights are contained in our civil code.

In transferring the authority in the matter of divorce to the exchequer court, we would infringe upon provincial autonomy, because the provinces have exclusive rights to legislate in that field.

> The constitution of 1867 therefore sanctioned our civil code, and in section 185, recognized the indissolubility of marriage as law of the province.

To those who claim that regard for the minority groups of the province of Quebec and of Newfoundland entitles them to divorce courts, I reply that the establishment of such courts in the province of Quebec would affect not only minorities but everyone else.

According to the Act of 1867, the dominion parliament is empowered to legislate with reference to marriage and divorce while the provinces have the exclusive right to pass legislation concerning marriage within their respective provincial sphere and to organize provincial and federal courts dealing with divorce. However, by entrusting any court with the duty of hearing divorce cases, the federal parliament would violate the indissolubility of marriage recognized in our province.

As is pointed out by Father de Léry, we have, for the past three hundred years, believed in the indissolubility of the marriage ties. This conviction does not stem from bigotry or narrow-mindedness; we hold it because, knowing marriage to be indissoluble. we refuse to open the door to those who would strike at our democratic institution by weakening the family, the foundation of our national and social structure.

Other attempts have already been made in this direction, in order to make it easier to obtain a divorce. If the bill introduced by the hon. member from Winnipeg North Centre were to pass, divorce would, of course, be much easier, since this would be a general act that applied to all. However, I am of the opinion that we cannot pass it without changing the British North America Act.

I have here a quotation from a speech delivered in this house on March 24, 1944, by the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). The quotation reads as follows:

> In Quebec not only is there no jurisdiction to deal with divorce, but there is a pre-confederation law, which was continued in force by the British North America Act, and which will remain in force until this parliament chooses to deal with it, as it has jurisdiction to do under section 91 of the British North America Act. This pre-confederation law declares that marriage is dissolved only by the natural death of one of the spouses. No matter what jurisdiction you set up, so long as that is the law of the province, no divorce could be granted by any court.

Consequently, if we were to pass the bill introduced by our hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre, we would be obliged to set up an entirely new general law which would grant those provinces that are opposed to divorce, Quebec and Newfoundland, greater facilities to that end. Such a law would provide changes not approved by everybody and would therefore create new problems from the constitutional point of view, in regard to the rights enjoyed by the provinces and the federal government.

Another minister of justice, the Hon. Charles Doherty, stated in 1916:

> The parties come here asking for it, just as they come with other private bills when they want to get something that the general law of the country does not give them. And it is precisely because the general law of the country says: once you are married you cannot marry again while your consort is alive, that when one wants to be relieved of the operation of that general law, he comes to the parliament of Canada and asks for a law for himself.

Then, if the power to grant divorce was taken away from the Senate, we would commit the very mistake to which the minister of justice, the Hon. Mr. Doherty, was referring. On the subject of our belief in the indissolubility of marriage, the Right Hon. Mr. St. Laurent said on March 24, 1944:

> There are applications for legislation which come before this parliament, and where divorces are enacted. This is not a matter of right; no one has any right to a parliamentary divorce. That is a special legislative grant that is made under special circumstances revealed by the investigation carried on before a committee.

And to those who ask: "What about the minority?" we would answer:

> Courts cannot be set up only for those who feel they might use them. To set up a divorce court for Quebec would in effect give to the people of the province the right to apply to it. If a court exists, anyone who feels he has been wronged may apply to such court for relief. Setting up a court would be tantamount to recognition of divorce.

So that, if it were passed, the hon. member's bill would in effect set up a new court for the province of Quebec and Newfoundland, and divorce would thereby be recognized. For this reason, we from the province of Quebec are opposed to the passage of this bill.

In making it easier to secure divorce we can only fall into a kind of exaggeration that has distressed other countries and in respect of which I have given figures.

You may say that we have not yet reached a point where divorce is granted with excessive liberality, but I do believe that such a stage would necessarily be reached if we go at it step by step. If we don't resist the manoeuvres and the requests of those who seek to make divorce easier, we will make a step forward today and another one tomorrow. But I don't believe that this is intended by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. What he wants is merely to free the Senate and the House of Commons from all those divorce bills. I understand his intentions. However, he will never reach his objective. On the contrary, he will lead us into another mess and we will never be able to get out of it, because he cannot understand our way of thinking in Quebec or the way of thinking in the new province of Newfoundland. I have already quoted figures on juvenile delinquency in a country where divorce is free.

I was quoting the example of Russia. I am aware that by referring divorces cases to the exchequer court the provinces would still retain the right to legislate in the matter of forsaken children. I think that children should not be left in the care of parents who are so little concerned about their duty.

Soviet Russia gave much freedom in the matter of divorce. In fact, even Lenin's wife realized one day that thousands and thousands of children,—I believe there were millions,—roamed about after being forsaken by their divorced parents. Of course, they were roaming about the streets of Moscow and other cities in Soviet Russia, stealing, attacking and even killing passers-by to such an extent that when the so-called popular commissaries in Russia realized the situation they were compelled to introduce restrictions and to amend the divorce laws and even the laws concerning abortion.

In addition, they had to enact a very restrictive law and to inflict upon these vagrant children severe penalties in order to eliminate this public menace. They had to turn back. They had embarked on a very costly experiment. They had to depart from too easy divorces and come back to normal.

When I stated in this house that this experiment could be used by the Russians against the democracies, I believe I was perfectly right. When the family is broken by divorce, it becomes an easy prey to communism, which thus creeps into our democratic community.

As a result of that experience, there is no doubt that communists, knowing where the weaknesses are and how they can best spread their doctrines, will try to impress upon our modern democracies that there can be no harm in facilitating divorce.

Those who are caught in the trap are surely not aware how greatly the stability of the family can strengthen the whole democratic structure.

Quebec's position in the matter of divorce is sufficiently clear and firm, I believe. Therefore, those that wish to help that province or seem to think that dissolution of the marriage ties should be facilitated, will know exactly where we stand in this connection, since our position has been clearly defined.

Here is an article taken from the Toronto Daily Star of June 12, 1950. I shall read it all, because I think it is excellent. It deals with an opinion expressed by communist Russia on the matter of divorces imposed upon foreigners who marry Russian women.

(Text):

I hope I will not be out of order if I quote an article from the Toronto Daily Star which shows what can happen if we do not take the necessary precautions to prevent an increase in the dissolution of marriage or against the providing of additional facilities for the obtaining of divorce. This article which supports the argument I have expounded in French reads:

[Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf).]

The nullification in England by the appeal court of a marriage in Russia between a British citizen and a Russian woman serves as a reminder that the soviet union, although she professes to be above racial discrimination and to have respect for human rights and personality, possesses the narrowest and cruelest policy in the world with respect to marriage and emigration.

The soviet forbids marriage between her citizens and foreigners. In that respect she is in a class by herself. Worse still, she refuses to permit the Russian wives of peoples of other nationalities to leave soviet territory.

In 1947 when a Canadian bacteriologist who had been in the Canadian legation at Moscow as military attaché sought to bring his Russian wife to America, he having been transferred to Detroit, the soviet government refused to let her go.

Vyshinsky, now Russian foreign minister, explained that this was no indication of racial prejudice on the part of the soviet union; that it was "the duty of a Russian woman to produce soviet children, not children for the Canadian government." He also said, and this was nearer the true explanation: "Women talk too much and give the wrong impression of the soviet union."

As I have stated already in my brief remarks in French, they realize the weaknesses in their system of dissolving marriages because they know that that in turn breaks up the basic family cell. The article continues:

It is believed that more than 800 persons who claim United States citizenship have been denied permission to leave Russia. In addition, 350 Russian women who married western soldiers or diplomats have been held by their homeland. During the past 17 years only 50 women who wished to stay with their American husbands were permitted to leave. At least 15 British husbands have tried in vain to get their Russian wives out of the soviet union. Many hardships, much distress of mind and broken marriages have resulted.

I realize that in quoting that article I am not entirely in order and I thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for not having raised a point of order about it. I realize that he is sincere in introducing this bill, and while it may not provide additional facilities for the obtaining of divorce it does create a new court for divorce in Quebec, the exchequer court.

Mr. Knowles: But I think the hon. member will admit that the bill does not provide any new facility for divorce to the people of Quebec and Newfoundland?

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): In taking the power to grant divorces from the Senate and giving it to the exchequer court the law of Quebec is being changed. You are instituting a new court of justice for divorce in that province and that is why we oppose it.

Mr. Knowles: But no new facilities are being provided.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I just stated that in French and I am glad my hon. friend understood me so well.

Mr. Knowles: Merci.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Just to show how far this can go, just to show how it has reached the point where it can be referred to as a national disgrace, I should like to quote from another article in the Toronto Daily Star of May 2, 1950, as follows:

> Riverside, California, May 2—If she follows her schedule, Mrs. George W. Ettinger soon will divorce for the fourth time a husband who has spent 18 of his last 22 years in various prisons.
> Ettinger, 37, is headed for San Quentin today after being convicted on bad cheque charges.
> Probation officers told the court yesterday that each time he has gone to prison, his wife has divorced him and married someone else. But upon Ettinger's release, she always has shed her interim husband to remarry him.

That is the kind of record they are creating in the United States and I would not like to see Canadian parents give their children a similar example. That is why we always oppose additional facilities for the obtaining of divorce. I am sure also that my hon. friends from Newfoundland would not want to change their present procedure.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I believe my position with regard to a bill of this kind is well known because I have spoken on this subject in this house before. However, I feel that I would not be doing justice to the people I represent if I did not say something about it. I think I understand the motive that actuated the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) when he introduced this bill. I am sure he did it with the best of intentions. Hon. members may not be familiar with the proviso in the bill that when an application for divorce is made to the exchequer court the court may decline to grant it when it is satisfied that the petitioner or the plaintiff has committed either adultery or acts of cruelty toward his spouse. I think the chief motive actuating the sponsor of the bill was to rid parliament, and especially the House of Commons, of the embarrassment that comes to it so frequently during a session when a large group of divorce bills is brought before it and we are faced with saying yes or no to granting the dissolution of these marriages. I think there is a great division of opinion among hon. members as to what should be done about divorce. So far as I am concerned, I regard marriage as indissoluble. Once it has been properly formed it is indissoluble. I think hon. members are fairly familiar with the arguments advanced by Catholics as to the only grounds upon which annulment may be granted.

As has been explained, there is of course a distinction between annulment and divorce; annulment applies where no proper valid marriage has taken place. Divorce occurs when there has been a valid marriage, and parliament, by a right which it assumes to itself, intervenes and says that the valid marriage shall no longer be a valid marriage because one of the parties thereto has violated his agreement.

We are all prepared to recognize that marriage is a very solemn event in anyone's life. It should be very carefully considered before being entered into, and it seems to me in many cases that come before the courts the trouble between the parties has arisen because they married too hastily. I have read some of the evidence in the cases that have come before us, and I find that the people did not know each other properly before they went through the marriage ceremony. Again, when they have been married and have lived together some trouble has arisen. Sometimes you will read evidence where one party has left the other and never gone back, and the other party has made no effort at reconciliation. Nobody has intervened to try to bring about a reconciliation.

Therefore I say all hon. members are faced with the question of how we regard marriage. I am a little astonished that the sponsor of the bill, who I believe is a clergyman in private life, should be the one to introduce a measure of this kind even though it has as its purpose the sending of divorce cases to the exchequer court. If we regard the marriage contract, as the words of the ceremony put it, "for better or for worse, for richer or for poorer until death do us part," I cannot understand how anyone can reasonably argue that such a contract can be dissolved even by parliament.

One must regard marriage as a sacred thing. It was instituted by Our Lord himself. We are Christians, and therefore we ought not to interfere with it. There have been cases where marriages have gone on the rocks and people have been forced to live apart, but is it not better that they should live apart than that they should bring about a condition of society that might mean its ruin? I suppose the Roman state was the greatest state the world has ever seen. Rome was mistress of the world without a rival for hundreds of years. The material, literary, artistic and architectural accomplishments of Rome have not been equalled by any other state. We may build greater things but I doubt whether we have built the better things, things that after 2,000 years will still win the admiration of those who will be alive at that time as the art and architecture of Greece and Rome still win our admiration. Yet that society, strong as it was, was destroyed.

It seems to me we are making all kinds of provisions for the material happiness of people. We are providing family allowances to help families overcome the difficulties that they encounter. We are providing for their old age, and in spite of all these material advantages that people have today we find that many of them are not a bit happier, that some marriages are not being observed in the way that they should be, and that divorce is becoming more frequent.

In the debate that took place on the motion introduced by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) during the first part of the session I pointed out—and I think he recognized—that divorce has been increasing, and until the last year or so was increasing at a very rapid rate. It was not a question of two or three extra a year but two or three hundred. In the space of fifty years or so the number of persons seeking divorce has risen from almost zero into thousands. At the beginning of the century there were very few people applying for divorce, and in some of the provinces there were none. Therefore when you provide more methods by which divorces can be granted and make it easier to secure a divorce you are going to have more divorces. That was the purpose of the hon. member's motion and he was good enough to withdraw it.

I think we all agree that, in addition to material benefits to the family, we would like to see spiritual benefits as well. We would like to see families happier and marriages more enduring. Therefore we have to consider what the purpose of marriage is. It is not only the procreation of children but also the spiritual attachment that exists and the spiritual benefits that come to each of the spouses when they have gone through the marriage ceremony. There is a complementary and natural relation between husband and wife, wife and husband, and parents and children, so that in a normal family there should be children. There will be continuity of the tradition of goodness and a way of living passed on from parent to child. When we have divorce the continuity is broken, and from our own experience we know many families where that has taken place and the children have become more than orphans. When parents marry again we get even greater complications. That may not seem to be very serious at the present time because the number of divorces granted in Canada only reaches about 6,000 or 7,000 a year, but in the United States, the number is seven times as great today in proportion to population as it is in Canada. We can feel confident that the rate of divorce is going to increase in Canada as well.

I think the time has come for us to realize that we must face the question of whether we are going to permit divorce in Canada, and not only the question of whether we are going to make it more convenient by having divorces dealt with by the exchequer court. Are we going to abandon that system? Is every hon. member really satisfied that divorce is a good thing in itself? I do not suppose many people in this house really think it is a good thing; they are happy in their married life and would like to see their children happy in the same way. I do not suppose many of them would care to see their children suffer the public scandal and unhappiness that so often follow divorce. I suggest, therefore, that we should see that our young people take greater care in the selection of a partner before marriage, and that if difficulties arise afterwards provision should be made for counsel and advice to help overcome those difficulties. I have already mentioned the fact that many times I have seen people who never wanted to speak to each other again, but who, after a little time had elapsed and as a result of good advice, became reconciled and lived happily together again.

In my opinion it is not possible for two people to live together and always be happy. They are bound to have difficulties; but with the proper attitude they will be given the necessary strength to overcome them.

When Admiral Byrd was going to the south pole he refused to take a companion with him because he said it would be only a short time before they would be quarrelling. He spent six months in isolation rather than have a companion because he appreciated the problems that would arise. When a husband and wife have trouble of that kind there are ways of overcoming it. At the university of Notre Dame there is a priest, Father O'Brien, who was once called by a family where a terrible dispute was going on. He found that the cause was nothing really serious, and at that time made a resolution that from then on every time he performed the marriage ceremony he would make the parties promise never to say an angry word to each other. For thirty-five years he carried out that resolve. After the wedding ceremony was over he would take the parties aside and make each promise the other never to say an angry word. I know that is a very hard promise to keep, but he says it has worked.

In my view divorce is one of the great evils of our times. What we should do is try to build up a good family life and family solidarity, as the last speaker said. I believe we would be better occupied if we spent our time looking for ways to improve the conditions of family life, perhaps on a higher plane than has been the case in the past. There is no doubt that family allowances and old age pensions have removed some of the economic causes that led to divorce, and have helped families to get along better. In my view there are other things that would also help, and I believe we would be better occupied if we spend our time considering them instead of considering ways of making divorce easier.

As far as my province is concerned, we have not asked for this legislation. As a matter of fact, in the constitution of Newfoundland as it existed prior to confederation there was a provision that the governor should not permit a divorce bill to be passed. I am not sure, but it seems to me questionable whether persons resident in Newfoundland can be divorced. It could be done only on the authority of parliament; and that brings me to another point.

Mr. Knowles: They are being divorced here.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I know they are. The hon. gentleman has brought in this bill to give the Exchequer Court of Canada power to grant divorces. That still would not take away the power of parliament to consider bills of divorce, as we sometimes see divorce bills going through concerning persons resident in Toronto, or other parts of Canada, as well as those living in Quebec and Newfoundland. Parliament cannot divest itself of that authority. Even if this bill were passed there would be nothing to prevent anyone applying to parliament for a divorce.

Mr. Knowles: Is it not a fact that when one of the parties is resident in Toronto, as the hon. gentleman says, the other party is a resident of Quebec or Newfoundland?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am not sure on that point; I have tried to study this matter, but I cannot remember that. Sometimes, of course, the other party cannot be found. The other day I read the evidence in a couple of cases coming from Newfoundland, and I was very much surprised at the method adopted to prove adultery. The main evidence was given by counsel for the petitioner, who visited the home of the respondents and interviewed the two persons who were living together in an illicit state. That was the evidence upon which the divorces were granted by the other place; and of course when those bills came here the evidence was not read at all. As far as the matter of evidence is concerned, I have no doubt that the method proposed by the hon. member would be much sounder from the legal point of view, but I am afraid it would have the effect of making divorces easier to obtain.

This bill does not touch the fundamental, basic issue at all, as to whether or not we should have divorce. I am opposed to divorce in any form, and for that reason I am opposed to this bill.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, apart from the sponsor of the bill, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), all those who have spoken have been in opposition to it. My purpose in speaking this evening is to offer support, and I shall give my reasons for doing so as I go along. I have been a member of this house for more than ten years, and this is the first occasion on which I have uttered a word with respect to our method of handling divorce cases. Whenever the opportunity presented itself to vote against our procedure, I have done so. When I came here over ten years ago and witnessed the way we handled divorce cases from Quebec and Prince Edward Island, I was amazed. After having been here a while and witnessed that procedure during several sessions, I became shocked. Now, in the course of my eleventh year, I am completely disgusted.

I should like to stress one extremely important fact in connection with this bill. In no sense does it broaden the grounds for divorce. It seemed to me that the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne), consciously or otherwise, conveyed the impression that the grounds for divorce were being broadened by this legislation, but that is not the case. As a matter of fact I can easily appreciate that divorce might be made more difficult as a result of transferring jurisdiction to the Exchequer Court of Canada. Perhaps I should say at this point that I dislike divorce just as much as any hon. member of this house. I think it is appalling when one examines the statistics in Canada, and learns the extent to which divorce is increasing within our nation. Thank goodness it is not as bad as it is in the United States where divorce, in my opinion, has made marriage nothing more than legalized adultery. I am not too certain that transferring the jurisdiction to the Exchequer Court of Canada is the best method of dealing with the question, but certainly there is no doubt in my mind that it is preferable to the method which we are applying at the present time.

I would be the last one to offer any suggestions or any hints that hon. gentlemen in the other place do not do the best possible job, having regard to all the circumstances. But, Mr. Speaker, not so long ago we had occasion to discuss in this chamber the work of the other chamber. The thought that entered my mind at the time was that if we would not tie them up by forcing them to deal with over 300 divorce cases in the course of one session, possibly they would be in a better position to render more effective service on behalf of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I have a clipping from the Montreal Gazette of June 13, and I think I should refer to it because it is extremely significant. It is under the dateline, Ottawa, June 12, and reads as follows:

> The Senate committee on divorce presented its final report of the session today and with a last flourish, protested again the system that annually brings hundreds of divorce seekers to the doorstep of parliament.

The report then refers to the fact that Senator W. N. Aseltine, sixty-four year old Rosetown lawyer and wheat farmer and father of five children, who has been a member for sixteen years and chairman for ten, now finds it necessary to resign. Here is a further paragraph from the report:

> The report disclosed that in granting divorces to 235 Quebec petitioners and 5 from Newfoundland—other provinces have their own divorce courts—the dominion treasury would get $47,330 in fees. But it indicated the work of hearing petitions was getting tougher every year and it wasn't worth the money.

In concluding the report states:

> Your committee regrets that parliament has not yet seen fit to solve the problem of parliamentary divorce by setting up suitable tribunals before which these numerous cases from Quebec and Newfoundland can be heard.
> It is to be hoped that something will be done in that regard in the near future because members of the divorce committee are compelled, under the present set-up, to spend the greater part of their time in hearing evidence, thus leaving little or no time for the performance of their other important duties.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that as long as we leave that growing burden on their doorstep we have little justification for criticizing them if they do not happen to do as much as we believe they should in other spheres of activity.

I should like to quote one more paragraph from this article:

> Senator Robertson said whether or not another method of dealing with divorces from Quebec and Newfoundland could be found remained to be seen. But at the moment this was a responsibility of the Senate and he believed Senators should be willing to shoulder their responsibility.

I hasten to add that I believe they have shouldered the responsibility, but I certainly believe it is a responsibility that should no longer rest upon them.

[Mr. Shaw.]

In summarizing let me repeat that I am as much opposed to divorce as any other member in this house. I repeat also that I think the statistics which are available to all should present cause for alarm, but certainly in imposing upon parliament this onerous task we are doing nothing to cause any decrease in the number of divorce applications from those two provinces. We are becoming a joke, as it were, in the method by which we deal with these petitions. Today we pick them up in blocks, whereas ten years ago we at least gave some consideration to each individual divorce case. We have now reached the stage where we say, shall section 1 of a group of twenty-five or thirty divorce bills carry? Shall section 2 of a group of twenty-five or thirty divorce bills carry? I ask hon. members what could be more ridiculous than that?

Someone may say that these cases are thoroughly considered by the divorce committee, and that is true. Some say that the committee on miscellaneous private bills goes through the evidence and makes recommendations. That is true, but we cannot escape the responsibility that arises from the fact that these divorces cannot become final unless they are approved by this house, and it is the method by which this house handles these divorce cases that I am protesting very vigorously. Certainly, sir, in speaking thus I am speaking for myself. I have not consulted my colleagues. I do not know what they think about this matter, but certainly I have no hesitation in advancing my personal support of the bill now before us.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, I suggest this is a bill which should receive a great deal of consideration. I do not know whether the mover of this bill had in mind the fact that the bill might be voted upon tonight. I intended to speak in favour of the bill, but since it is nine o'clock and I have not time to make any lengthy remarks, I shall merely register my approval of the bill, and ask to adjourn the debate.

Mr. Speaker: The hour for private and public bills having expired, the house will resume consideration of the matter under discussion at six o'clock.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Special—

40. Major irrigation and water conservation projects in the prairie provinces, $7,719,500.

Mr. Wylie: I should like to ask the minister a question in connection with the Bow River Development and Irrigation Company. Have final arrangements been made for the government to take over that company, or are negotiations still being conducted?

Mr. Gardiner: So far as the discussions with the company are concerned, and the discussions with the provincial government, final arrangements have been made. As my hon. friend knows, these companies went into receivership, and the two companies have not been cleared from the records over in Great Britain. We thought that would be accomplished by April 1, but there have been some delays on the other side. We do not feel we should proceed with any development work until the titles are clear. I do not believe there will be any trouble about it, but it is a matter of delay. We regret the delay, but we cannot do anything about it.

Mr. Wylie: What I object to is that over a year ago it was announced that the company had agreed to sell to the dominion government. At that time most of us were anxious that that should be done so that we could get ahead with the irrigation projects in Alberta, especially west of Medicine Hat. However, another year has gone by, and nothing has been done; that is two years of inaction since the election. Surely they are not going to wait until another election comes around before they tell us that they are going to do something in connection with the scheme. May I say we in that corner of the province have listened to these promises for years and years. We are still listening to them. Canada is lagging far behind in irrigation in comparison with other countries. I am going to put on record what some of the other countries have done in connection with irrigation. In India they have 60,100,000 acres under irrigation. In China they have 47,500,000 under irrigation; in the United States they have 21 million; in Russia they have eight million; in Japan, 7,600,000; in Egypt, 6,500,000; in France, 5,720,000; in Mexico, 5,700,000; in Italy, 4,900,000; in Iraq, four million; in Spain, 3,500,000; in Java, three million; in Chile, 2,970,000; in Brazil, 2,200,000; in Morocco, 1,500,000, and in Canada we have one million acres under irrigation.

Mr. Gardiner: How much have they in Babylonia?

Mr. Wylie: In so far as irrigation is concerned, we are at the bottom of the list of these countries. In Alberta we who have suffered one loss after another are beginning to realize that the government is not very anxious to put in irrigation.

I want to refer to a very important speech that was made in this house on May 31 by the Prime Minister of Pakistan. What he had to say certainly applied to this country. I am reading from page 3043 of Hansard:

> But democracy, in Pakistan or elsewhere, is of little use to the common man unless its advantages are made available to him in his daily life and his standard of living is raised at least to a level which gives him a substantial stake in the way of life which he has chosen for himself.
> We are fully conscious of this, and consider it our foremost duty to develop the resources of our country at the greatest possible speed. Even in the days of our greatest anxieties we were able to go ahead with this task, and though much remains to be done we are glad that we have been able to revive our trade, to plan the development of our irrigation, the expansion and modernization of our agriculture and the utilization of our power resources; to keep our budgets balanced and to throw the gates wide open to private enterprise in our industrial development. For this task there is nothing more essential to us and nothing that we could or do desire more passionately than peace.

The Prime Minister of Pakistan realizes, as I am sure we do, that we must advance the development of our resources. We in southeastern Alberta, an area which this year has been hit by one dust storm after another. and an area in which crop conditions at the present time are not good—as the minister knows, the whole of the province is only 57 per cent of normal, which is a serious situation because when the whole of the province is 57 per cent of normal one realizes that the southern part is the driest and especially the southeastern part—look upon this irrigation development as something that we want to see go ahead. Nothing has been done on the Canada Land and Irrigation Company or the Bow river development last year, and nothing will be done this year. We are still waiting for someone over in London, England, to agree to the price that the government wants to pay for the land. I think it is absolutely ridiculous, and we are still—

Mr. Gardiner: It would be ridiculous if it were true; it is not.

Mr. Wylie: The minister make a remark. I did not hear what he said.

Mr. Gardiner: I said: "It would be ridiculous if it were true; it is not."

Mr. Wylie: It certainly is true. I will be glad to sit down if the minister wants to tell me what is going on, and what is going on in connection with the development of that project.

Mr. Gardiner: You would not listen, anyway.

Mr. Wylie: I will listen. I will listen to the minister at any time if he can tell me where there is any development going on in that project whereby the cities of Redcliff and Medicine Hat are going to benefit by the extension of that irrigation project. I will be glad to sit down and listen to him, but nothing has been done. The minister knows as well as I do that nothing is being done.

Mr. Gardiner: No, I do not. My hon. friend and his friend up there, who is one of the local members, are spending considerable time spreading rumours that keep the people more or less worked up about it all the time. By coming here and saying that nothing is being done about it he is obstructing it all he can.

Mr. Wylie: I certainly disagree with everything the minister has said, because I do not know to whom he refers as the local member. If he refers to me I am certainly willing to debate it with him at any time; but so far as talking to some local member is concerned, I do not know who the local member is. Perhaps the minister knows more than I do about what is going on.

Mr. Gardiner: You know all about it.

Mr. Wylie: If the minister knows I wish he would tell us. It would overcome the worry, and many people are worried today. There are letters in the Medicine Hat News almost every week wondering what is happening to our irrigation project. A big debate went on between the Medicine Hat News and the Lethbridge Herald about bringing water down from the St. Mary dam, which I stayed out of completely. These letters are appearing every week. People want to know what is going on. I would certainly like to hear what is being done on the Bow river development scheme.

Mr. McCusker: Perhaps this is the item on which I should say a few words. Hon. members will recall that in the house last year I told of the sad plight of Regina city owing to the government in the early days having located it in the wrong place. I gave hon. members a picture of the rapidly falling water table; I told of the difficulties we had in obtaining a supply of water and of having to go to the Saskatchewan river to seek one.

Last year a conference was arranged between the provincial authorities, the city of Regina and the dominion government in Ottawa. At that conference the city was willing and said it was able to pay one-third of the cost of bringing a water supply to Regina. The provincial government denied any responsibility. I remember the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who was at the conference, stating that had the provincial government been willing to assume its responsibility he would have found it very difficult to have refused to assume the other one-third.

That conference came to naught. We went back home and this summer we studied our problem and carried on, and again we came back for another conference. There is one principle I want to make clear, namely, that the first responsibility rests upon any municipality for a water supply of its own. First, the municipality, then the provincial government and lastly the dominion government is responsible. If it is beyond the means of the municipality to supply its own water it can get assistance from the others. But the provincial government is one that is next responsible for that assistance. This whole issue is being obscured today because it is being charged by provincial authorities that when I was seeking election in Regina City I claimed that I alone would get the city of Regina a water supply. I am not quite equal to that; but I wish to say today that out of the last conference has come an offer to the city of Regina and to the province of Saskatchewan that the dominion government will place water in Buffalo Pound lake, which is about forty miles from Regina. That means that the dominion government will bring water from the Saskatchewan river to Buffalo Pound lake, which is north of Moose Jaw, and about forty miles west of Regina.

Here they offer to maintain a supply of water until such time as the dam is built at Outlook, and water will flow by gravity down the Qu'Appelle river. They offer to put it into Buffalo Pound lake, and stand the cost of maintaining the water supply there, but I do not think they have gone far enough. That would probably mean an initial outlay by the dominion government of $650,000 or $700,000. There would be a yearly outlay for keeping it there by pumping of about $12,000 or $15,000—perhaps even $20,000.

But that water is not being kept there for Regina and Moose Jaw alone. It is being kept there to supply irrigation projects, stock-watering projects, and irrigation all down the valley to Brandon. So that by doing this there is not a great deal being done for Regina and Moose Jaw. What they are doing is saying that they will replace any water out of Buffalo Pound lake that Regina and Moose Jaw will use. As urban municipalities Regina and Moose Jaw are perfectly entitled to go to Buffalo Pound lake, take all the water from there and leave the farmers high and dry.

However I think, though I wish to thank the government for what it has done in assuring us of a supply of water, and while the people of my city are vigorous and willing to face problems—I repeat that—I think the cost is too high. The second step of that project is to bring the water out of Buffalo Pound lake up about 175 feet to filtration beds, and from there it can be taken to Regina and Moose Jaw. That will entail another expenditure of about four million dollars. Surely hon. members sitting in the House of Commons this evening do not want to see Regina and Moose Jaw have an insufficient water supply.

Hon. members will agree with me when I say that it is the duty of the dominion government to pump that water out of Buffalo Pound lake and bring it up to the filtration beds, and say, "Here is your fresh water supply. You can pipe it in yourselves." That is what should be done, and that is what I am asking the minister to have done, if at all possible.

Mr. Thatcher: Mr. Chairman, there are one or two comments I should like to make on this item. If the Minister of Agriculture meant what he said before six o'clock, it might mean a good deal to western Canada. Because if I understood him correctly he said that next week, when he goes west, if a suitable agreement can be signed with the provinces construction work might be started next year on the south Saskatchewan irrigation project.

I am disappointed of course that it is not being started this year. But if it is actually going ahead next year the minister will have accomplished a good deal, and I shall then be happy to congratulate him. There is one word of admonition I should like to express. I understand the agreement he will probably try to make with Saskatchewan will be based upon the master agreement of the St. Mary project, which he made with Alberta. If that is so, I hope he will not be too difficult with the Saskatchewan government. Alberta might be able to sign an expensive agreement because of their oil wells and oil leases, but Saskatchewan may not be able to do quite so well.

I hope the minister will take all that into consideration when he is drawing up this proposed agreement with Saskatchewan. I do not know whether eastern members realize just how badly the south Saskatchewan irrigation project is needed, but I can say I was in western Canada last week. Between Moose Jaw and Saskatoon I had an opportunity to look down from an aeroplane, but could not see the ground because of the dust that was blowing. The tragedy of the situation is that through the middle of the dust bowl area the south Saskatchewan river flows, and it hardly seems sensible that we as a parliament should permit that condition to continue. The water is there, flowing out into Hudson bay.

If we would put a dam there, or several dams, and utilize that water we could eliminate many of these P.F.R.A. and P.F.A.A. expenditures which we now have. So far as the statement made just now by the hon. member for Regina City is concerned, he pointed out that the Buffalo Pound lake project would cost too much. I do not think the people of Regina or Moose Jaw feel that the federal government made a proper offer recently at all. I speak from memory, but my recollection is that the federal government offered to pay about half a million, while the total cost was five or six million. The mayor of Regina expressed great disappointment in that.

I do not think that the Buffalo Pound project is a proper solution. If the minister and the government would proceed with the south Saskatchewan irrigation project next year, Regina and Moose Jaw would get a proper water supply and we would have the whole area irrigated. I must emphasize again that this is not the only western project, because if the west has another recession, or if they hit another drought period, the eastern manufacturers who sell merchandise in that part of the country will suffer, as well as anybody else. I say again to the minister that if he does what he promised about this south Saskatchewan irrigation project, then he will go down in history as a great westerner.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Charlton: Is the parliamentary assistant going to answer the question asked this afternoon by the hon. member for Souris?

An hon. Member: Too late.

The Chairman: Everything is carried.

Mr. Graydon: I think the parliamentary assistant would like to answer. He should not be denied that opportunity.

Mr. McCubbin: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to answer the hon. member for Souris in respect of the statement he made a while ago. However, before doing that I should like to answer the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth who asked yesterday about the number of t.b. reactor animals condemned to the tank, and the amount of money paid in the counties of Brant and Middlesex. I should like in that connection to place some figures on record. The figures in the following table give the numbers of animals condemned, and the amounts expended in connection therewith:

	No. of animals condemned	Amounts expended
County of Brant:
1947-48	21	$ 2,202.43
1948-49	9	1,305.28
1949-50	3	444.05
County of Middlesex:
1947-48	2	235.24
1948-49	763	118,723.36
1949-50	146	21,549.83

This afternoon the hon. member for Souris referred to a statement that I had made between Christmas and New Year's in 1949 and in connection with which I was quoted as saying certain things in respect to government controls and the marketing of farm products. I did make a statement at that time to a group of young people at Western university and I am not backing up one bit in what I said. When I spoke I was not speaking for the Minister of Agriculture nor was I flying a kite for him; I was speaking as a member of parliament and as a farmer. One headline in the London Free Press read:

Extension of marketing boards, McCubbin plan.

I have other quotations here, one from the Winnipeg Free Press:

More marketing boards defended by McCubbin.

I have always felt and I feel now that the marketing boards that have been set up in the different provinces can do a good job in marketing farm products. I think that such boards offer a part solution for the problem of marketing farm products in the future. I am not opposed to subsidies or floor prices. I am in favour of them and always have been. As I said at London, I think we should have subsidies and floor prices to help the farmer through periods such as the one he is passing through at the present time. During that speech I urged the government to put a floor price under eggs as we had lost the British market and egg prices had fallen to a low level. I felt the government should step in, which they did, and a floor price was placed under eggs.

There has been some discussion about what I said there. I attended many protest meetings during January throughout western Ontario at which were repeated many of the statements I had made at Western university. I will admit that some people were opposed to what I had said because they felt that the government could market our farm products perhaps better than marketing boards. I congratulate those farmers because it shows that the farmers of Canada have faith that the Liberal government will do a good job for them.

But I feel also that marketing boards with the assistance of the dominion government can do a good job in the marketing of farm products and I urge the farmers of Canada to set up these boards so that our agricultural producers may be assisted.

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

48. Departmental administration, $90,620.

Mr. Croll: Mr. Chairman, some time ago I joined with many hon. members of this house in expressing my good wishes to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration upon his appointment to this new office and, like other hon. members of this house, I looked forward to his first official address. On April 21 the minister outlined the departmental policy. I have always had much regard for the minister's ability and integrity; I thought that his appointment was a mark of recognition that was well deserved and I looked forward to hearing the government's immigration policy. I must confess that like other hon. members I was disappointed.

On reading the minister's speech I found that he said what every other political party has been saying since 1945. As a matter of fact, he did not go one step further. He said that he was in favour of immigration, but as I read Hansard I find that every party in this house is in favour of immigration. The Tories were in favour of it; the Conservatives were in favour of it; the Progressives were in favour of it; the C.C.F. were in favour of it; the socialists were in favour of it; the Social Crediters were in favour of it, and I gather that the Liberals were in favour of it. That seems to be the signal for real action.

Yet to date we have heard very little about any new immigration policy enunciated by this government. The minister said in his statement that the country has benefited in the past from immigration. That proposition has been around for a long time because I have been hearing it ever since I can remember and I imagine my father heard it also. The minister said also that this country could support a larger number of people than we have at the present time. That has been around for some fifty years. We have believed in that. Then the minister repeated the words of Mr. King, as prime minister, in 1947 as follows:

> The policy of the government is to foster the growth of the population of Canada by the encouragement of immigration. The government will seek by legislation, regulation and vigorous administration to ensure the careful selection and permanent settlement of such numbers of immigrants as can advantageously be absorbed in the national economy.

I think it will be admitted that that is not a new policy or a very forthright one. In fact I am inclined to agree that it is not a policy at all. The best you can say for that statement is that it is a pious hope, except for the use of the word "vigorous" which perhaps does something to save the situation.

The only virtue about the suggestion made at that time which might be called a policy is that it had aged for a long time, but I am not at all sure that age is a necessary requisite of an immigration policy although it may be an advantage with other products. We have heard that for some thirty years and so far it has not got us anywhere. Speaking in this house in December, 1949, I said:

> I ask this house, by what stretch of the imagination is a nephew 25 years old less desirable as an immigrant than his younger brother of eighteen? He is still excluded, however. Why should we admit a niece, but not a cousin? Why may a single man come in, yet we exclude married couples. I believe these categories are unrealistic. They should be abolished.

And again:

> I think the test of admissibility to this country must be twofold. First, is the immigrant a useful citizen; and second, is there someone in Canada who will accept responsibility for him, who will guarantee accommodation and maintenance until he becomes self-supporting. Then, providing they are in good health, physically and ideologically, they should be encouraged to come to Canada to build new lives here.

We have set up a new department, and all of us were happy that that had been done. But there is just one thing that has been left out, a new policy. We expected the Department of Citizenship and Immigration to be an improvement over the old immigration department that was tucked away in the department of mines and resources. Instead in its first statement of policy we find that it hesitates, falters and stumbles. When it speaks now on immigration it has a hollow sound because its policy at the present time is an echo of the past. Canada's immigration policy over the last thirty years has in fact been a "no immigration" policy. I hope we shall have a better policy in the third quarter of the twentieth century than we have had in the second quarter.

Mr. Fulton: We had better get a new minister.

Mr. Croll: The minister is doing very well and performing satisfactorily. I have no complaints against him and neither should the opposition. If we do not have a more vigorous policy then we shall be hard put to justify our exclusionary laws both to our own citizens and to the world at large. As has been pointed out by a member of the house, we have in Canada the last great reservoir of land in the western world today. With a larger land area than the United States we have a population one-tenth of that of the United States. Yet our total immigration last year amounted to only 95,000 people. On May 27 the minister spoke before the Kiwanis club, and the Ottawa Journal has the following report with reference thereto:

> It was estimated that Canada could absorb approximately 140,000 immigrants yearly into her economy . . .

Mr. Fulton: Shame.

Mr. Croll: I really do not need any help from the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, you do.

Mr. Croll: No, I am not that hard up. Here are some statistics.

Mr. Fulton: Get a new minister and a new government.

Mr. Croll: In 1948 the monthly average of immigrants entering Canada was 9,352. In 1949 it was down to 6,966, and in 1950 it was down to 4,823.

Mr. Fulton: And the hon. member for Kamloops got that information for you.

Mr. Croll: I thought the press party was over. Let me give the committee some interesting statistics with respect to British immigrants. In 1948, 46,000 British immigrants came to Canada, in 1949, 22,000, and in 1950, on the basis of the first three months, only 15,000 will come to this country. The total number of immigrants in 1948 was 125,414, in 1949, 95,215, and in 1950, on the basis of the number that have come to Canada in the first three months, it will be 60,000 at the most. I think that is a very sad picture indeed from our point of view. When we deduct from that the number of people those who have been emigrating to the United States, we realize that our net increase is a pretty insignificant number.

The minister tells us that the policy of the government is to foster the growth of the population of Canada by the encouragement of immigration. My purpose in speaking tonight is to try to build a fire under the minister and the department so that he may get on with his job. One hon. member referred to an article by Sir Norman Angell which appeared in the London Observer. The article pointed out that at the time of Lincoln's death the population of the United States numbered little more than 30 million. Today it is a nation of 150 million people enjoying the highest standard of living in the world. In the fifty years following the civil war the United States has admitted over 33 million immigrants, or almost two and a half times the number of people in Canada today. I think it is well for us to reflect what would have happened to the United States and to the world if her population had remained at 30 million or thereabouts. I doubt very much whether we would have been here today to even talk about this problem.

We in Canada are facing the same challenge in 1950 that the United States faced in 1865. At our present rate of increase our statisticians predict that we will reach a static population of only 18 million by 1980, and that beyond that we can only hope for a decline. I, and I hope other members, will not accept what appears to be the fact that Canada must reach the peak of her development in 1980. Not only our prosperity but our very existence compels us to prove that the statisticians are wrong. There is only one way to prove they are wrong, and that is by more and more immigration of the desirable kind. We cannot have an immigration policy based on a tailor-made labour program. I call on the minister to take a leaf out of Australia's book. There is a country with half the population of Canada and only a tiny fraction of our resources. They are taking in 200,000 people a year. I refuse to believe that we cannot absorb any more than 95,000. I think Canada can and must admit a minimum of 200,000 immigrants a year over the next thirty or fifty years. If we do less we are deliberately stunting our growth. If we deliberately fail to build up this country's population then we deserve whatever the consequences may be.

The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has inherited an able and conscientious department but I ask him not to inherit the old hand-me-down policy as well. It served us badly in the past and it does not look any better for the future. Times have changed with regard to many things, and as to immigration as well. The people of the world are no longer clamouring at our doors to come here in the same way that they used to. Many have grown tired of waiting and have gone to some other place—and I do not mean "the other place", as you well know. It is up to us now to go out and get immigrants, to sell them the idea of coming to Canada in the same way that Australia is doing at the present time. We must have more British immigrants. I have an article from the Windsor Star of June 6, 1950, which reads:

> Canada's parliament now is in the last great rush to conclude the business of the present session. It should not be in such a hurry, however, that no attention will be given the problem of immigration from the United Kingdom. In the past, that has been the most important source of immigration. It should be also in the future. But it won't be unless some action is taken to unblock the dam holding back a flow of immigrants, the fact they are unable to bring their money with them due to currency restrictions. Meanwhile, the British are going in great numbers to Australia and New Zealand. This should not be so. It isn't good for Canada or for the commonwealth. The government should devise, if at all possible, some way around this obstacle, and do it this session. Otherwise we will be missing out on some of the most desirable immigrants who will go elsewhere.

According to an article which appeared in the Toronto Star of May 15, a Gallup poll in Great Britain indicated that 48 per cent of the people between the ages of 21 and 29 were prepared to emigrate, and that 41 per cent of those between the ages of 30 and 49 were also prepared to leave that country. Their first choice, of course, is Australia; their second choice is New Zealand, and their third choice is Canada. They are very anxious to come here. In 1949, as I have already indicated, there was a decline of almost 50 per cent in immigration from the British isles as compared with the previous year, and we may expect that decline to continue unless we do something about it and do it now. Britain has been traditionally a source of very good citizens, but at the present time we find them fenced off by currency regulations. Somehow we must break down those barriers; and I am sure if there is the will to do it it can be done. I feel that in future we shall regret our failure to stock this country with more people from the British isles.

Australia is actually subsidizing British immigration. As a matter of fact an immigrant leaving Britain today for Australia can save a thousand dollars, because he has all transportation costs paid for himself and family, while he must pay for his own transportation to this country. It may be that we will have to do the same thing, or work out some method of unfreezing a man's assets in Britain. Perhaps the answer would be for the government to take over a certain proportion of the assets in Britain of a prospective immigrant, and advance him the money in this country. Whatever the solution, we must find it; it is our bounden duty to do so.

There are other countries where we have to go shopping for immigrants. We are doing very well in Holland at the present time, and fairly well in Italy. The Benelux countries are available to us, as well as Norway and Sweden. For almost sixty years we have drawn people from those small countries, and they have helped build up Canada. They have given us farmers, artisans, technicians and labourers, and we could use very many more if only we would get out and encourage them to come to this country.

My chief purpose in rising this evening was to point out to the government that we seem to have completely overlooked one great source of immigration. On May 10 an answer was given to a question asked by the hon. member for Victoria (Ont.) as appears at page 2356 of Hansard. The question was:

1. How many displaced persons were brought to Canada during the year 1949?
2. How many other persons immigrated to Canada during the same year, and from what countries?
3. How many from each country?

The answers are very interesting. During 1949 England provided us with 14,403 immigrants. The next largest number came from the United States, 7,756. Then came Italy, with 7,654; Holland, with 6,812, and so on down the line. From 1945 to the present time over 45,000 Americans have settled in this country; and they have come without any particular encouragement. For many years, as everyone knows, we have been losing population to our neighbour, simply because we have not made any very serious effort to reverse the flow. In the United States are a great number of potential immigrants; people who want land, people who want opportunities that to some extent are denied them in what is becoming a very crowded country. I have met a great number of Americans who have found in Canada the room, the easier pace and the opportunity to develop that to some extent do not exist across the border. There are thousands like them; and, what is more important, they are our kind of people. There is no question of integration, or of education for citizenship. They are well versed in it. These people are not only good citizens; they are good democrats, and we should encourage them to come here to make up for the many people we have given to the United States over the years. I believe there is available to us in the United States a great untapped source of immigration. Farm land is available here, and there are farmers on marginal land in the United States who would like to come here. There is no question of security, no question of living standards. They are accustomed to about the same thing we have here, and I think it would be far wiser for us to attack that problem instead of moving our employment offices over to Europe and attempting to obtain immigrants in that fashion.

Before the war we maintained immigration offices in the United States. I believe the time is overdue for us to reopen those offices in California, in the middle west, and in the great congested areas of the east. I am convinced that we can attract from the United States tens of thousands of people if only we have the initiative to go after them. I urge the minister to frame a bold immigration policy, to make that policy realistic, and to make it produce. I hope the minister is not going to be frightened by a few anti-immigration resolutions from here or there, or by the insignificant noise of small groups. The Globe and Mail of February 14 reports the minister as saying:

Mr. Harris said labour unions did not oppose Canada's immigration scheme. Nor did they think they were being hindered in any way. They were willing to accept these people.

I want this house to understand that labour in this country has grown up; labour knows that what is good for the country is good for labour. In immigration we must adopt a national outlook. We must put into effect a truly vigorous immigration policy that will benefit every part of the country from the lumber camps of British Columbia to the fishing banks of Newfoundland. More than anything else in this country we need people of every kind and description. I agree that we must choose wisely and carefully, but on the other hand we must also choose generously. I believe the time is overdue for the minister to tell us in unmistakable language what we are going to do about immigration.

I want to conclude with this quotation. James S. Duncan, the president of Massey-Harris Limited, is a great Canadian, as this house will agree. Speaking in Toronto on June 6, as reported in the Globe and Mail of June 7, he had this to say:

"It is necessary for us to carry our products to a wider group of countries," he said.

He was speaking about trade. Then he went on:

"Almost of equal importance, we should open wider the doors of immigration, welcoming to Canada worthy, self-reliant immigrants in ever greater numbers, so as to build up our national strength and to provide a larger consumers' market at home."

Mr. Duncan warned that people should not be fearful that a rapid growth in population will lower our living standards. He pointed out that today, in terms of pre-war purchasing power, our real national income per capita is 71 per cent higher than in the boom period of 1926-1930.

I hope other hon. members will join me in asking this government to come to grips with this problem here and now, and to declare itself.

Mr. Decore: I should like to make a few observations in connection with Canadian citizenship as I see it. First of all, may I congratulate the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration upon his elevation to the important post which he now occupies. The responsibility placed upon him is great, and those of us who know him, especially the new members like myself, are impressed with his sincerity of purpose and his sympathetic attitude. I believe those are important qualities in discharging obligations such as he has.

Today when we consider our position as citizens in this country of Canada, as well as members of the British commonwealth of nations, I believe it is clear to most of us that subtle and insidious indoctrinations emanating from without, and cleverly worked out propaganda from within, are at work today trying to undermine the very foundations of our way of life. I feel confident that we need not be much concerned about the potential forces from without which threaten to destroy us, providing that we as Canadians clearly understand our duties and responsibilities to Canada. With a common unity of purpose to common ideals, come what may we can always face with confidence any threat to our existence. That is where good citizenship plays such an important role. Even if the forces from without which are threatening our existence did not exist, it is only through good citizenship that we can improve the conditions under which we live, and bring happiness and well-being to our people.

The essence of good citizenship is one's love or loyalty to his country, or what is termed patriotism. Patriotism welds all the diversified elements which we have in this country into a hard core of resistance should outside forces not only threaten but challenge us. I think it is fortunate that the genius of the British and American peoples lies in their gift for successfully integrating various stocks, and in making the citizens conscious of their duties and responsibilities to the country in which they live. I say it was for this reason they were able to build up strong nations within the commonwealth, and within the United States. That is why Canada, after the last two world wars, has emerged much more powerful and is able to play a greater role in international affairs; that is why, during the last war, Canadians made a contribution to the war effort which was noble and enduring.

Although we have reason to be proud of our achievement in our unity of purpose, yet I think we must admit that our record of good citizenship is not without blemish. Although we take pride in championing the democratic rights of the individual, yet too often in the past have we found ourselves, or have we seen people, the victims of prejudices. Too often in the past have we found people prejudiced because of a man's colour, or because of the church he attends, or because of his racial origin, or because his name does not sound Anglo-Saxon. It may be Petrosky, or Eisenhower, or pronounced "Yonson" instead of Johnson by his friends. Too often have we seen various clubs refusing the applications of applicants because they were considered to be foreigners or of foreign extraction, although they may have been naturalized in this country many years ago or may have even been born in this country. Too often in the past have we heard statements made with a certain undertone of contempt when reference was made to a Jew, or a Catholic, or a damn Englishman. I know some choice expressions, Mr. Chairman, about the Scotch and Irish, but I think my better judgment tells me not to use them at this time. At any rate too many people have entertained in their minds a dislike for the unlike. Fortunately this is now becoming past history, and I think we are getting away from that.

I believe our fault was that we were not building a strong Canadian conscience. We were not selling Canadianism to Canadians. During the course of this debate the member for Lake Centre made reference to the difficulty with regard to the census regulations as they existed prior to the passing of the Canadian Citizenship Act. Incidentally, although we may not all agree with everything the member for Lake Centre may say in this chamber, yet I do say that that was one of the finest speeches on citizenship I have ever heard. To those who did not have the good fortune to hear it, I would suggest that they read it in Hansard. In any event he pointed out the difficulty that existed with reference to the census regulations prior to the passing of the citizenship act. That is why I feel that the Canadian Citizenship Act was one of the greatest pieces of legislation ever enacted by this parliament. Under it, regardless of our racial origin, regardless of what church we may attend, regardless of what occupation we may follow, one thing we have in common with our fellow Canadians is Canadian citizenship. At the same time we remain as members of the British commonwealth of nations, and retain our status in that great organization which I believe is the greatest organization the world has ever seen.

After the last war considerably over a quarter of a million immigrants came to Canada from various parts of the world. I should like to speak particularly of those people who came from continental Europe, many of whom were formerly in displaced persons camps. The interesting question arises, what do those newcomers expect and hope for in Canadian life? What do we, as Canadians, expect from them? Are we to regard the newcomer as a queer individual with a name that is hard to pronounce, unable to speak English, and leave him to his own devices; or do we as Canadians have a duty and obligation to those people? I believe all hon. members will agree with me that, no matter where one goes, people's wants and desires are similar. The newcomer's desires may be summed up as follows: First, he wants to learn the language. Second, he wants economic security. Third, he wants to be accepted socially in the community in which he resides. To the newcomer the language is of the utmost importance. If he is to obtain and retain a job; if he is to follow or understand instructions from his employers; if he is to get along with his associates, he must know the language. If he is to know what is taking place in the world, he must read the newspapers and follow what is being said on the radio.

I have had occasion to personally interview many of these newcomers. One of the first things they set about learning is the language. I must say that I was pleasantly surprised in finding many of them have made progress in learning the language of this country. Economic security is also a major desire on the part of the newcomer. After having spent years in concentration camps or displaced persons camps he wishes to find a job, to do some work, which will give him and his family a fairly happy surrounding and a decent home life. Only by their achieving this can one expect those newcomers to retain their self-respect.

The third desire, namely, social acceptance in a community, is such that the newcomer wants to be on an equal footing with his fellow citizens. This probably is the most important factor in developing in him a love for the country which he has adopted as his own.

In general, a newcomer has a feeling that he will not only enjoy the privileges of his newly adopted land, but be able to do his share in contributing to his community and to the Canadian national life.

We, on the other hand, want people with new skills and new devices for the development of our natural resources, and who will supply us not only with unskilled but also with skilled labour, who will increase our national income, and who will help to defend this country should the need arise. I believe that probably the strongest defence program that we could have for this country of ours is by getting more people into this country, although I do not intend to dwell on the question of immigration at this time. In any event we want immigrants who, when they come into this country, will become good Canadians.

The question therefore arises: What part are we as Canadians going to play in helping newcomers to become good Canadians? Many people are concerned about some of these people who come into Canada; they are concerned about teaching them the basic principles of democracy and the freedom to the individual that democracy implies. My submission is that these people who come in from displaced persons camps are probably more conscious of the value of democracy than we ourselves are. We take too much for granted. Let us not forget that these people have actually witnessed and have experienced the very converse of democracy in its worst form. Let us not forget that they have spent years in concentration camps, in Russian and German slave camps; that some of them have actually seen the liquidation of their brothers, of their sisters, of their neighbours and of their friends. These people after being chased all over Europe, and not being certain at any time whether they were going to live the next day or not, made a desperate attempt to reach the shores of Canada, leaving behind them everything that may have been dear to them.

The principle of democracy as we understand it is the foundation on which citizenship is being built. I say that that foundation with these newcomers is already there. First, it is for us to help in building up the structure of citizenship on the foundation that already exists. If these people are to become real citizens on an equal footing with us in the shaping of the destiny of this country a lot will depend on the way you and I play our part in helping them to become real members of our respective communities.

I have already pointed out to this house that considerably over one-quarter of a million people from various parts of the world came to this country and wished to become Canadian citizens. Let me remind you that each and every year in Canada one-quarter of a million boys and girls attain the age of 21 years and thereby through the operation of law reach full status as citizens. The destiny and the future of our country will to a very great extent depend on them. We as Canadians therefore have a duty to Canada in assisting not only the immigrant in order that he may properly adjust himself to our way of life, but also in being more effective in selling Canadianism to Canadians and especially to our young boys and girls right here in Canada.

Citizenship is something that must be acquired through education, through experience, through training, and through a desire to subordinate one's own wishes to the common good. However, we must ourselves have a clear conception of what we mean by good sound citizenship.

In order to be a good Canadian, does it mean that a person coming in from, shall we say, continental Europe must immediately go through some wholesale transformation whereby in the shortest period of time he has to think as we do, act as we do, dress as we do and speak as we do? Does it mean also that this person, immediately upon arrival in Canada, will have to give up all sentimental ties with the land of his birth, give up his customs and his traditions, abandon all arts and culture and even religious faith for something that we think is good for him? Does it mean that he must even give up his language as something unworthy? If so, we Canadians are going to lose a lot. We have a lot to lose. If so, you can expect bitter and determined resistance to that type of Canadianism. If so, we are letting loose forces of disunity instead of unity.

Some people feel that the use of other than the English language is not conducive to sound Canadian citizenship. The question of language has never been a serious problem in Canada, and most certainly is no longer a problem today among smaller ethnic groups.

In western Canada, and I may use my own constituency as an example, you will find people of various ethnic groups, Poles, Scandinavians, French, Germans, Anglo-Saxons, Roumanians and Ukrainians. Anyone who knows these communities will agree with me that regardless of where you go there is hardly anyone who cannot use the English language and use it effectively. I think you will also agree with me that it would be a pity and a loss to the contribution of our Canadian national culture if these people completely forgot or ignored the language of their forefathers.

Nearly all modern languages are being taught today in our Canadian universities. Should we insist that a group, a certain ethnic group, give up its language, we are in effect insisting that that group give up the key to its culture. Any culture without its own language would be bare and insignificant. Even religious faith would lose its value. Moreover, I think hon. members will agree with me that anyone who knows more than one language certainly has the advantage.

With regard to the question of assimilation, and I prefer to use the term "integration", there are two schools of thought. The first is the so-called melting pot program which would give us a uniformity in our cultural life and make us all the same in the shortest period of time. The other is what is now becoming known as cultural pluralism, which encourages a variety of cultural patterns, and may be defined as a variety of groups with diversified cultures living together as Canadians with a common purpose. It is my belief that the theory of the melting pot is becoming outmoded and is no longer desirable.

[Mr. Decore.]

Culture is never static but is dynamic and is forever changing and gaining new light in this ever changing world. It is in effect an expression of the life of the people. It is taking the best which each ethnic group in Canada has to offer, thereby giving to Canadians a more vibrant and a richer way of life.

I strongly hold the view that the various ethnic groups in Canada, with their diversified backgrounds, have each a contribution to make to our Canadian way of life. Our strength lies in our diversity. I think Canada would have a lot to lose if my fellow Canadians of, shall I say, Irish origin, did not celebrate St. Patrick's day, or the Scotsmen did not celebrate their beloved bard, Robert Burns, or the Canadians of Ukrainian origin their national poet Taras Shevchenko.

I am not a Scotsman, but I certainly like to hear—and I am sure most members in the chamber feel as I do—the music of the bagpipes from the sixth floor of this building, played by Senator Reid, better known to all of us as Tommy Reid. I think the music we hear from those bagpipes in the parliament buildings at Ottawa is symbolic of a true Canadian spirit.

The differences in culture of the various ethnic groups in Canada, with the contribution of each to our national way of life, may be compared to an artist painting a picture. When the artist paints the picture he uses various colours, and tries to harmonize them. The harmony of those colours gives the picture its beauty, just as the harmony of the various cultures we have in Canada gives Canada her strength. You and I are the artists who are today playing an important role in the painting of that picture, or the harmonizing of these various cultures into a truly strong Canadian national life.

After all, what made the British people so strong and made it possible for them to contribute so much toward the civilization of the world was the diversity of stock originally found in England, which diversity—still present today to some extent—has made it possible for those people to contribute so much for the good of mankind.

Canada I think is a model nation in the eyes of the world. We have here over thirty different ethnic groups, and these people have given to Canada their skill, their determination and their talents. That is at least one explanation why today Canada occupies such an enviable position among the nations of the world. Let us therefore pursue with renewed and determined vigour the building of a strong Canadian consciousness.

Mr. Hansell: I have no intention of making a major speech on immigration. Would the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration tell the committee what the present policy of the government is in respect of immigration from Italy, and whether it is expected that that policy may be changed in the near future?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, I shall be glad to answer the question any time it suits the committee. However I have thought that I might wait until we reached the immigration item before discussing questions such as that just asked by the hon. member.

Mr. Hansell: That is quite satisfactory.

Mr. Rooney: Will the minister take into consideration making it possible for Canadian girls, who married boys from other countries during the war, and thereby lost their Canadian citizenship, to regain that citizenship? Many of them belong to Canadian families of three and four generations, and many married prior to 1947.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Perhaps I should give the same answer to that question as I gave to the hon. member for Macleod. I shall be prepared to answer it when we reach the citizenship item.

Mr. Hodgson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word about immigration. I appreciate, perhaps more than I can express, the words of the hon. member for Vegreville. Undoubtedly either he or his parents came to this country by choice because of the freedom it offered at that time—a freedom they have enjoyed down through the years. I noted that in his words of patriotism and loyalty he referred to Canada as part of the British commonwealth. That was an apt reference, but I should have been pleased if, when he was speaking of Canada, he had referred to it as the Dominion of Canada, that great land reaching from sea to sea.

I have had considerable contact with the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, reaching back to a time before the minister took office, and since. I have received at all times from the department the greatest degree of courtesy and efficiency, within the bounds of the regulations governing the functioning of the department. But there are some of those regulations that could be improved upon to some extent.

I have been instrumental in helping to bring to Canada in the last four years a number of Italians, some from England and a few from Scotland, some from Norway and some from Holland. I want to say tonight that that is the proper mode of immigration in my view, so far as Canada is concerned. I am not in favour of dumping d.p.'s into this country. This process of admitting so many d.p.'s is not going to be successful, from the Canadian standpoint. About twenty or twenty-five per cent of them will be good Canadians, but I have grave doubts of the other seventy-five per cent.

A number of these displaced persons have been in my constituency for the last three years. One day last year a fire broke out close to my home. My boys were out fighting the fire, and a number of these displaced persons went along with them. But they would not fight fire in Canada; they did not care if Canada burned up. In fact, fifty of them threw their shovels on the fire so that the handles burned out of them, while our Canadian boys fought for the lives and property of their countrymen.

That class of displaced persons will never make Canadian citizens. However, the other twenty per cent may do so. We have some of them up there who have built their own homes and who are working well. I have in mind one man who happened to be working on a hydro project, one of the greatest we have in Canada today. When he first came to Canada he started out by digging footings with a pick and shovel, but he learned some English. It developed that they were doing some technical work on a diversion project and were more or less at a loss to know what to do. He said he could do the work. They gave him a try-out, and it turned out that he was the best man on that project.

After the war my leader, who was then premier of Ontario, started a selective immigration program which operated most successfully for immigrants from the old land. Those immigrants knew where they were going and for whom they were going to work before they left their native country. In fact, we have five families in Victoria county, good Canadians, who I am proud to say came in under that scheme. They brought in their wives and families since that time, and have become prosperous. After working their terms they have gone on with those farms. Some of them have made deals with the men who brought them out here whereby, in another few years, they will own the farms. They are a real asset to our country.

The problem of bringing out Italians presented some difficulty in the beginning, but the immigration branch has loosened up to some extent—and I do not know whether the minister can take credit for that. The fact is that there has been some change there, with the result that there is a settlement of Italians in my own village who, I am proud to say, are good Canadians. I was the cause of their coming out some 20 years ago. They came here to work as ordinary labourers cutting cordword; in fact, I cut cordwood with them. Since that time one fellow started and developed a good fruit store in my village; another one started a transport business which has been very successful; another one of these boys owns a saw mill while another one operates a little planing mill; several others have small farms. Many younger Canadians would not stay on those farms but these boys went in, cut a little wood, got a few cows and made a go of it. They own their own cars and they pay their taxes. During the relief period, the hungry thirties about which the Liberals talk so much, not one of these Italians took one cent of relief. They paid their own way and they came out with flying colours and we certainly appreciate it as citizens.

I was endeavouring to get some of their friends out here. There were many people they felt sorry for who had been left in the old land after the war. They were hard up and did not have enough to eat or wear. These boys were willing to put up money to bring their friends to Canada. The immigration inspector came up to see them and said, "You have got one out, you get another out; that is all you can get." They were told they had better go down to try all over again. I have brought five out in my own name because I am not afraid of bringing that kind of man to Canada, especially when his friends or relatives have been in this country for 20 years and had come through a period of hard times with flying colours and without asking for one cent of relief.

I had a little difficulty in connection with one Italian who had come to Canada some 40 years ago and who now lives in Lindsay. He married a Canadian girl, raised a family in that town and now owns his own home on a half or three-quarter acre of land in the best part of the town. His family has grown up. The oldest boys served in the first war while the younger ones served in the last war. They are all prosperous and have good jobs. Two of the older boys are engineers with the Canadian National Railways and have been for years. The younger boys have probably had better education and are holding better jobs. But they are all good citizens.

I have been endeavouring for nine months to bring out a nephew of that gentleman to Canada. I will agree that in the first place he made a mistake when he said he wanted this nephew to come out as a gardener. When the inspector came up and and saw only three-quarters of an acre of land he knew that that would not require a gardener. Then they got a farmer who is anxious to have this nephew come out to work for him. But so far permission has not been granted. This young man fought with the Canadian army in Italy and can speak English quite well but through some hitch in the department he is not permitted to come.

His relatives here are ready to sign papers that they will look after him for one year, five years or for the rest of his life, and besides that there is a job ready for him on a farm. The department has written letters and said that they are going to try to fix this up in a few days, but nearly nine months have passed. Having received such courteous treatment from the department I have been hesitant to go to the minister with the first bit of difficulty I have had, but if we do not get this man out I am going to the minister before the end of the session.

I should like to see selective immigration. I should like to see brought in English, Irish, Scotch, Dutch, Norwegian, Finnish and Italian people, but they should be carefully screened on the other side. There are thousands of these people who want to come to Canada. Millions of people in the old world know that Canada is the best country in which to live. They know that it is part of the old British commonwealth of nations. They know that when they come to Canada they are coming to a country that has freedom that cannot be equalled in any other country in the world.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Chairman, I have listened carefully to the speeches that have been delivered, especially that of the hon. member for Spadina. It is not my intention to make lengthy remarks on the subject of immigration, but I cannot say that I agree with the views expressed by the hon. member for Spadina when he asks for what I would term mass immigration. I have always been opposed to that kind of immigration and I still am. My stand in that connection has been well known. There are too many economic, political and social considerations involved in the matter to permit throwing caution to the winds.

A well organized, disciplined and cautiously worked out policy of immigration is necessary for any country. After practically every war there have been strong and urgent appeals for immigration, even for mass immigration such as has been advocated tonight by the hon. member for Spadina. Some of those who have been responsible for such appeals do not seem to think them out. For reasons which I shall not attempt to analyse here there seems to have existed what the medical profession would refer to as a neurosis. There are many neuroses in the world. Some are known as social neuroses, others as revolutionary neuroses and there are other types of neurosis developed by national disaster. Then I think it might well be said that a certain neurosis exists in connection with some immigration policies. A human being is bound to be the victim of his own imagination if in time of trouble he does not look to the true source of relief, hence the reason he is at a loss so often when he needs the complete possession of all his faculties.

I remember that after this war considerable pressure was exercised upon the government, I shall not say to institute mass immigration but certainly to adopt a strong policy on immigration. I would not dare to say that that was a neurosis, but there certainly was a strong offensive to bring in immigrants by the hundreds of thousands. At times one would think that even air transportation was not sufficiently swift for certain people.

I think the government was wise in not yielding to the pressure for strong immigration. Quite apart from the lack of ship transportation, or even air transportation, the reasons could be easily and properly assessed when one stops to think of the state of the souls and minds of people in Europe at that time. Economic, political and social conditions were bad and while a country might be willing for humane and charitable reasons to receive unhappy and displaced persons, nevertheless it has a moral obligation towards its own citizens and should not lightly consider the bringing in of new citizens. I believe Canada did more than any other nation to provide relief and solace for thousands of human beings. If Churchill was amazed at our war effort, many others must have been amazed at the helping hand we offered to devastated areas as well as to devastated souls. But I think we still have as our first duty the protection of our country. We still have the right to choose those whom we are ready to receive, to whom we are ready to extend hospitality and make them new citizens of the happiest country in the world.

When I was listening to the hon. member for Spadina I was glad to hear him quote the words of the former prime minister, the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King. I am going to quote Mackenzie King myself. Speaking on May 1, 1947, he said, as recorded at page 2646 of Hansard:

> With regard to the selection of immigrants, much has been said about discrimination. I wish to make it quite clear that Canada is perfectly within her rights in selecting the persons whom we regard as desirable future citizens.

He also said:

> There will . . . be general agreement with the view that the people of Canada do not wish, as a result of mass immigration, to make a fundamental alteration in the character of our population.

I believe those are very sound and accurate words as to the kind of immigrants that Canada should receive. If the country has a moral obligation towards its citizens as to the kind of immigrants they are ready to accept, at the same time we must not lose sight of the very important fact that we cannot receive more immigrants than the nation can absorb.

I was quite surprised to hear the hon. member for Spadina say tonight that 95,000 immigrants a year are not enough. If Canada is absorbing 95,000 immigrants a year then I say it cannot absorb one more without disrupting the economic and social conditions of our country to some extent. I think Mackenzie King was quite right in stating that we have a right to choose and that we cannot disrupt the fundamental features of the population of Canada. At the same time we must not forget the physical examination that all those selected as immigrants should be required to undergo. I have great confidence in the minister. He is a hard worker, and I think every aspect of the work under his jurdisdiction is as vital in importance to the country as it can be. I ask him to be most severe in the orders and regulations given to officials here and abroad for complete and persistent attention in the process of screening immigrants so as to have a complete picture of their religious, political and social affiliations, past and present, and also of their political activities and business connections. I emphasize the word "religious" because I believe that communism is a religion, and in screening immigrants on religious grounds you have to screen the communist immigrants who want to come here. I read a lecture given at McMaster university in April, 1949, by Miss Betty B. Robinson, Master of Arts, on the economic background of immigration. She said:

> It is better to be overcautious than to be reckless in the matter of immigration.

These are strong and accurate words. I should also like to quote Mr. James S. Duncan, who was quoted by the hon. member for Spadina, and who had this to say on the same occasion at McMaster university:

> A thoroughly competent and adequate organization in the British isles and Europe for screening, selecting and facilitating the movement to Canada of the best immigrant types . . . By all means let us screen and select those whom we desire among like-minded peoples.

As you can see, everyone speaking on the matter of immigration reveals a special interest that care should be taken in the screening and selection of our immigrants. Senator

Gouin, speaking on the same occasion, quoted in his lecture the memorandum of La Confederation des Travailleurs Catholiques du Canada presented to the dominion government. While opposed to all policies of mass immigration the confederation accepts that a selection may be made among war afflicted people to bring them in limited number to our country. I used to hold the same views years ago. I was absolutely opposed to immigration of any kind, but in studying immigration policies I have come to the conclusion that we have to admit—and everyone who knows anything about ethnology must admit—that there is a certain movement between nations of the world amounting to 25,000 or 30,000 people a year going or coming from one country to another. In accepting a certain movement of immigrants I think my stand is still reasonable. I ask the minister to give strong orders to his officials so that they will carefully screen immigrants coming to Canada. I believe our experience has been costly enough that we should not forget that side of the situation.

The confederation was answering, as were many others in French Canada, the appeal of Pius XII on behalf of displaced persons and orphans. This appeal has been underlined by Monseigneur Charbonneau, former bishop of Montreal, as reported by l'Action Catholique in August, 1947. If one reads carefully the speech of Senator Gouin at McMaster university—and I commend it to every member of the house—

Mr. Pouliot: And of the Senate too.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): And of the Senate too—he will have a picture of the views on immigration policy expressed in the province of Quebec, a picture starting from the nineties and carrying on up till now. He will see that in the province of Quebec there are radical expressions of opinion as to immigration, and at the same time there are very reasonable and intelligent considerations of the subject.

No one could blame my French compatriots for showing a preference for French, Belgian, Dutch or Italian immigration. I was pleased to hear the hon. member who spoke before me ask for Italian immigration. I am always glad to hear that people like immigrants of Italian extraction. I am in favour of that to some extent. No one can blame my French compatriots for asking for Belgian or French immigrants. In doing so they simply follow the same path as other provinces in asking for immigrants from the British isles. There is nothing wrong about that on either side. It is quite natural. I have certain figures which I secured from the department in 1948. It is surprising to find that if Ontario, for example, shows a preference for British immigration it also accepts other racial origins. The table is as follows:

	1947		1948
	Ontario	Quebec	Ontario	Quebec
French	341	542	373	1,115
Italians	173	67	2,192	757
Belgians	688	114	642	150
Dutch	1,990	172	4,901	318
British	24,226	4,542	29,975	4,612

In reading these figures very carefully we can see that Quebec has not been receiving such a large number of French, Italian or Belgian immigrants. In 1948 Ontario received four times as many Belgians as Quebec, and over ten times as many Dutch. La Terre de Chez-Nous, a French periodical issued by the Union Catholique des Cultivateurs, of Quebec had this to say in the issue of November 5, 1948. I do not read this in any critical sense, but merely to show the picture in Quebec province, because I believe the article gives a good résumé of the whole question. It was written after the announcement that French immigrants were to be on the same footing as Britishers. The article said:

(Translation):

It is not enough to have fairer immigration regulations. They must also be put to good use. Immigrants from France have access to our country just like those from England and the United States. Many French people wish to settle in Canada. This contribution from the mother country could be useful to us in a thousand ways. Here, however, the provincial authorities or some private organization would have to be willing to take care of them. What has been done in this respect? Silence is the only answer . . .

Again, in La terre de chez nous, one can read in the report of an inquiry conducted for Le Devoir by Mr. François Zalloni:

One wonders, finally, if now we will see the province of Quebec admit French immigrants in as large a number as the group of British people welcomed to Ontario. Observers feel that it is up to Mr. Duplessis and the industrialists of this province.

If British immigrants settled in great numbers in the neighbouring province, it is due to the fact that, first of all, Premier Drew went and fetched them in Great Britain and that, with the agreement of Ontario employers, he opened a provincial employment bureau for immigrants in London.

If we want the French to settle here, our government and our businessmen should do likewise. If we feel that recent immigration from Britain disrupts the ethnical balance of our country, the remedy lies, after all, in our own hands.

(Text):

I hope there will be no misunderstanding of my position on this matter. I simply wish to give the complete picture, and to show the different opinions that have been expressed in my province by different newspapers. In every expression of opinion can be detected the desire that the best possible choice be made, that the best methods be followed and that reasonable consideration be given to such matters as mentality, way of life and way of thinking. I believe that is the right angle from which one must approach the question.

After these citizens are here it is our duty to show them that despite diversity of religion, language and tradition, Canada is proceeding toward complete unity of action. In Mr. Zalloni's report one perceives the lack of any organization to bring good and assimilable immigrants to Quebec. Here is a report from Relations of January, 1950:

(Translation):

We are not the ones who acknowledge these facts, who compare, proclaim and applaud; it is Maclean's magazine of December 15:

Relations quotes Maclean's magazine:

According to Premier Frost, the population of Ontario increases by 10,000 people a month and now exceeds four and a half million. The largest of our provinces keeps its lead; Quebec has less than 4 million people and its population increases by only 8,000 a month.

Autonomy allows others, smarter than we, to bring in reinforcements, tens of thousands of refugees, especially British or Dutch, who are well established on farms. The Pope has asked countries with vast territories to receive those who have none left, since that is better than almsgiving. Will Quebec therefore continually refuse to open its doors, its barricaded territories, even to our own kin?

(Text):

This quotation shows once more that prominent people of Quebec are ready to help these unhappy people find a new country and build a better life, and to deplore the ineptitude and indifference in some quarters in facing the situation intelligently and in a spirit of Christian charity. Not long ago the Gazette gave the views of prominent French newspapers in our province. The first was Le Canada:

The era of mass immigration to Canada has come to an end because the conditions that inspired it are no longer in force . . . but from the simple point of humanitarianism we cannot close our doors to foreigners who seek to establish themselves here. This does not mean we should accept anybody whatsoever, but we should exercise a judicious choice. Nor is the question of offering a welcome to these new Canadians something we should longer neglect. It is our duty to initiate them into the way Canadians live and to facilitate their assimilation. The new Minister of Immigration has a full enough program facing him and he will be able doubtlessly to rise to the heights of his task.

Then Le Droit had this to say:

It is to be regretted that similar steps are not being taken in Quebec as in Ontario to increase the population . . . There are not only Frenchmen, Italians and Belgians whom we could settle in Quebec. We are assured that it would be advantageous to welcome those Dutch Catholics who are desirous of settling in our country.

Do and say as we like, Canada will always receive immigrants, and if we do not make use of them for ourselves they will be made use of against us.

As you see, this newspaper speaks very frankly.

If Quebec had shown any vision, it would, during the last fifty years, have practised an intelligent policy in regard to population. This province does not lack wealth. It lacks only strong arms to exploit it.

Then Le Soleil:

It is impossible to oppose all immigration in principle, provided that it be reasonable, in good order, well selected and in no way directed against one of the two principal elements of the Canadian population. This is what our representatives in the Commons must say when the opportunity arises and they must demand a guarantee that immigration must be kept within fair limits if recruiting begins again.

I could give many other quotations to prove once more that it should be the care of everyone to maintain a fair balance between provinces, and at the same time get immigrants particularly likely to be assimilated in this or that region. And we must also be careful in our choice and screening abroad. I believe we had our lesson in the past. Without discriminating against any race or religion, it is our privilege to bring here only those whose political philosophy is not opposed to ours. Too often in the past—and I do not reproach anyone—have we received in good faith people who themselves were not frank and have not been grateful to Canada for the marvellous hospitality granted them.

The communist fifth column is always in action, and takes every possible means of increasing its effective number and efficiency in action. Everyone recalls the lottery which, international in scope, was discovered in Montreal before the Italian election. Its purpose was to provide funds for the Italian communists. The first prize was a thirty-day trip to Moscow. This lottery would have had no chance of success if its sponosors could not count on the activity of new immigrants. These people must have been well informed, because they knew where to go. Within our time we have had the declaration of Lieutenant General W. Anders, wartime Polish army leader, which reads as follows:

Communist agents disguised as refugees are entering Canada.

In a letter to Mr. MacNamara, deputy minister of labour, as reprinted in the Toronto Star of May 1, General Anders added:

Insufficiently screened persons are coming to Canada among Polish refugees and are creating ill feeling towards Polish immigrants as a whole.

I know personally that extreme caution has been the motto of both the departments of labour and immigration in the screening of immigrants. It would be impossible to create an air-tight wall against every undesirable entry. No nation can praise herself for never having been deceived in that connection. But with strict orders and attention every minute, we can diminish the number of those whose patriotism does not even extend to the country of their adoption but to only one sovereignty, and I need not mention it by name. The question is not how many thousands of immigrants we are going to bring, but how many good immigrants are we going to accept? How many are fit to accept our way of living, our views on the democratic way of life? How many can be assimilated, and in what regions? It has been the experience in some districts, a somewhat costly experience, that many of those we have received have been a burden, and a source of trouble. Many have forgotten the manner in which we received them, and the welcome that was extended to them. They have turned their activities against the land of their adoption, and tried to sabotage our institutions. Let us not be too confident. Let the officials of the department be more and more cautious. The choice must be judicious, and the screening parsimonious.

Let me repeat the advice of Miss Betty B. Robinson:

> It is better to be overcautious than to be reckless in the matter of immigration.

If perchance someone cheats the screening, at the first sign of anti-Canadian activities he should be sent back where he belongs.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Chairman, it is timely to pay a tribute to the hon. member for Portneuf for his industry in compiling such data on immigration. He and the hon. member for Spadina are both specialists in immigration. They hold divergent views, and this illustrates the difficult task of the minister in deciding the issue. One thing struck me in the speech of the member for Portneuf. It was his contention that communism is a religion. If I read the dictionary I see that religion is the practice of sacred rights; one of the prevalent systems of faith and worship; human recognition of a superhuman controlling power, and especially of a personal God entitled to obedience; the effect of such recognition on the mental attitude, et cetera.

I do not understand how an atheist can be a religious man, but perhaps the communists are worshipping Stalin. He may be their god. In that connection they must be considered rather as pagans, but the pagans are religious too. What I cannot understand is how an atheist can be a religious man.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I can explain it to the hon. member if he wishes.

Mr. Pouliot: Yes.

[Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf).]

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): When you want to destroy the notion of God you have to develop a philosophy, or what I call a religion, to destroy the notion of God. You have to form what I call the anti-God religion, and that is what communism has done in the world. If my hon. friend will look more closely into communism, he will see that they have their god in Stalin. They have their thirteen apostles in the politburo. They have all the pictures of their saints and their god everywhere in the country. That is why I say it is a religion.

Mr. Pouliot: I appreciate what my hon. friend has said, but a religion is necessarily something positive, while atheism is the negation of a positive act, that of worshipping God or a superhuman being. I will tell my hon. friend that I am not a doctor of divinity, so I shall not proceed further with the matter.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): They worship matter, materialism.

Mr. Pouliot: They worship the cinders of Lenin. I will tell you, sir, that it is very important to have men in this country to defend the people in a spiritual matter, in a religion that is in accordance with the statute passed a hundred years ago by the upper and lower provinces of Canada. This statute concerned the freedom of worship, and has been incorporated in the statutes of the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario. It is to the effect that we have freedom of religion in this country provided that the practice of this religion is not against the established order of this country. It is for this reason that the way the Doukhobors worship is not acceptable to us, and why there are punishments in their case.

It is most important to bring men from other countries who are worthy of being Canadians; whatever is their belief; whatever their race, provided they decide to become Canadians and consider this country as the country of their adoption just as the missionaries did in the early history of the colony. There was Monseigneur de Laval, the first bishop of Quebec, who belonged to one of the finest families in France. There was Monseigneur de Saint-Vallier, who was a chaplain in France. These men came to preach the gospel amongst the Indians. They sacrificed all the advantages and benefits they might had had in the old country, and came here to civilize the new world. They were true Canadians. They were French by birth but they were Canadians by spirit, and that is the type of men and women we want in this country.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will take up the resolution to ratify the Niagara diversion treaty; then Bill No. 302, respecting defence supplies and projects. I do not know whether we shall follow this order. Then we shall go into supply and continue this interesting debate on immigration. If we get through we shall take up labour.

It being three minutes after eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Marketing service—

23. Marketing service administration, $162,006.

24. Agricultural economics, $438,225.

25. Dairy products, $654,876.

26. Subsidies for cold storage warehouses under the Cold Storage Act, and grants in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $644,159.

27. Fruit, vegetables and maple products, and honey, including grant of $5,000 to Canadian Horticultural council, $989,000.

28. Live stock and live stock products, $1,204,012.

29. Marketing of agricultural products, including temporary appointments that may be required to be made notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act, the amount available for such appointment not to exceed $6,000, $100,000.

Terminable services—

30. Freight assistance on western feed grains, $5,000,000.

31. Agricultural lime assistance, $435,000.

32. Dairy products board, $22,000.

33. Meat board, including quality premiums on A and B1 grade hog carcasses, $5,854,633.

34. Special products board, $11,575.

Special—

35. To provide for assistance to encourage the improvement of cheese and cheese factories, $1,400,000.

36. To provide assistance for the replacement of maple production equipment, $500,000.

37. Agricultural Products Act—to provide for losses incurred in respect of the purchase, sale and export of agricultural products under the Agricultural Products Act, including authority for the Minister of Finance, at the request of the Minister of Agriculture, from time to time, to pay amounts in the aggregate not exceeding $40,000,000 out of any unappropriated money in the consolidated revenue fund as recoverable advances, $4,350,000.

38. For assistance in construction of potato warehouses under regulations to be approved by the governor in council, $100,000.

39. Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage, $3,750,000.

40. Major irrigation and water conservation projects in the prairie provinces, $7,719,500.

41. Prairie Farm Assistance Act administration, $500,000.

42. Land protection, reclamation and development in British Columbia under such terms and conditions as may be approved by the governor in council, $900,000.

43. Land protection and reclamation; clearing and settlement of new lands under such terms and conditions as may be approved by the governor in council, $200,000.

44. Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act, $991,120.

45. To provide for administrative expenses, Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944, $60,000.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, June 14, 1950

The house met at eleven o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN WINNIPEG "FREE PRESS" OF MAY 9

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I am indifferent to the praise or slurs of the press, but there are times when a member of parliament must rise to protest against false insinuations. I would not have paid much attention to an article appearing on the editorial page of the Winnipeg Free Press of May 9 had it not been reproduced by the Free Press Weekly of Winnipeg, the Moncton Daily Times, the Fort William Daily Times Journal and the Woodstock, Ontario, Daily Sentinel Review.

The article to which I refer is entitled "Isolationist". It was written by one of those bloated and narrow-minded colonials who have an inferiority complex with regard to imperialism, and who try to forget it by going to the other extreme and trying to have the superiority complex of internationally-minded people.

In the editorial they describe me as being "highly intelligent". This is not a compliment, because when a man is intelligent it means only that he is normal. I remember saying that one day about the Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret), and everyone applauded. I said it was no compliment to his illustrious predecessor.

But, sir, I come to the issue:

> Mr. Pouliot is a highly intelligent man, but his instinctive isolationism often warps his judgment.

In the latest edition of Funk and Wagnalls dictionary, published in 1949, I find this definition:

> One who advocates an isolated condition, especially of a nation or country, as regards alliances and relations with others.

This is not my case. But I believe in the sovereignty of Canada, and I do not believe that we should be under control of any so-called great nation. That is why the Atlantic pact is much superior to the United Nations organization. I remember, sir—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member should state his question of privilege.

Mr. Pouliot: Yes, sir. I remember that two years ago I was abused, with the leader of the Social Credit group, and my late and lamented friend, Mr. T. L. Church, for having said that the United Nations—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member has now stated his question of privilege. It would not be proper for him to go back to what happened two years ago.

Mr. Pouliot: Yes, sir; but I have been vindicated this week. I said at that time that the United Nations could not guarantee the future of the world. No later than Monday the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) said in Montreal that the United Nations could not guarantee the security of any country. It was late; I had said it two years ago, and it is such a long time ago that everybody has forgotten I said it then.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

CONCURRENCE IN FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Hughes Cleaver (Halton) presented the fourth report of the standing committee on banking and commerce, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 304, for the relief of David Allan Ferguson.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 305, for the relief of Ann Louise Fuller Brais.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 306, for the relief of Helen Leola Davidson Hunter.—Mr. Winkler.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—SLIDE DETECTOR FENCES

Mr. Fulton:

1. Have the electric slide detector fences on the Canadian National Railways lines, Ashcroft subdivision, between mile 93·7 and mile 94·0, been rebuilt following damage done to them this past winter?

2. In how many cases since the initial installation of the fences have the block signals been caused to be placed at the danger position due to rocks or slides striking the fences?

Questions

Mr. Chevrier: The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. The slide detector fences have been repaired and were restored to service on April 5, 1950.

2. There were twenty-three occasions on which the signals were placed in the "stop" position by the slide detector fence mechanism, when it was in normal operation. On seventeen of these occasions no evidence was found of any rocks having struck the fence. On three occasions small rocks were found in the ditch beside the slide fence, and on three occasions there was a large enough rock fall or slide to obstruct the track.

*CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—LUMP SUM RETIREMENT ALLOWANCES

Mr. Knowles:

1. How many employees or officials of the Canadian National Railways, upon retirement, have been given lump sum retirement allowances (a) of more than $25,000, but less than $50,000; (b) of $50,000 or over, since January 1, 1930?

2. In what years were such lump sum retirement allowances made?

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to answer this question orally. It is obvious why the question is being asked. The subject matter was discussed at some length in the committee on railways and shipping, and after a statement had been made by the president of the Canadian National Railways the committee accepted that statement and felt that it should not insist on additional information. However, since then an hon. member of this house asked a similar question, to which I took objection on certain grounds, as may be found in Hansard. Later he moved a motion in which he asked for production of the amounts of the cheques that the Canadian National Railways had paid over a period of time, but that motion was negatived. I do not think it would be fair to answer this question when the hon. member has not been successful in getting the information. I suggest that the hon. member may feel like withdrawing the question.

Mr. Knowles: May I point out that the minister has already answered a similar question covering the brackets below $25,000? If it is possible to get that kind of information, I think it should be provided in these particular brackets, and the question should be answered.

Some hon. Members: Dropped.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

Mr. Knowles: No.

Mr. Speaker: I cannot require the minister to answer a question to the satisfaction of the hon. member who has asked it. The minister has given an answer. It may not be satisfactory to the hon. member, but so far as I am concerned I shall have to declare the question answered.

ST. CHARLES DE CAPLAN, QUE., WHARF

Mr. Courtemanche:

1. Were repairs made to the wharf at St. Charles de Caplan, Bonaventure county, Quebec, in 1947, 1948 and 1949?

2. If so, what was the cost of such work?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. Yes.

2.

1947-48	$11,901.85
1948-49	12,992.84
1949-50	12,537.60
Total	$37,432.29

Mr. Courtemanche:

1. Between January 1, and May 1, 1950, did the Department of Public Works construct protection or wharf facilities at St. Charles de Caplan, county of Bonaventure, Quebec, in front or in the vicinity of the Henri Leblanc property, or Manoir St. Charles?

2. If so, what amount was expended?

3. Who was the foreman, what daily salary did he receive, and how long did he work?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. Yes.

2. $2,999.81.

3. (a) Henri A. Leblanc; (b) $8; (c) December 15, 1949 to March 31, 1950.

FLOOD CONDITIONS—SOUTHERN MANITOBA—REMEDIAL MEASURES

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has the government received from the council of the city of Winnipeg a copy of a resolution dated May 29, 1950, urging the federal government to set up an engineering group to bring in recommendations and remedial measures to prevent a future Red river flood, and urging the federal government upon receipt of such recommendations to undertake the design and construction of the work so recommended?

2. If so, what reply has the government made thereto?

3. Is consideration being given to the request set out in such resolution?

Mr. St. Laurent:

1. Yes.

2. Letter of acknowledgment was sent to the Winnipeg city clerk dated June 8 informing him that the matter was being brought before the government.

3. Yes. The question of action which might be taken to prevent a recurrence of flooding in the Red river valley is under consideration by the federal government in consultation with the government of Manitoba.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—POINT EDWARD, ONT., FREIGHT SHEDS

Mr. Murphy:

1. What are the names of the contractors engaged in the construction of the whole or any part of the Canadian National freight sheds at Point Edward, Ontario?
2. What are the names of those who submitted tenders for each contract, and the amount of each tender?
3. Was any contract awarded prior to the tenders being opened?
4. Was the lowest tender accepted? If not, for what reason?

Mr. Chevrier: This again is a question affecting the Canadian National Railways. It relates to the internal operation of the system, and it has always been the view of the management that it is not in the interests of the railway that they give information which falls within the category of ordinary business transactions and which their competitors or any other business organization would not be required to produce. For these reasons I would ask the hon. member if he would consent to withdrawing his question.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

Mr. Fraser: Under protest.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT—EMPLOYEES AT GANDER, NFLD.

Mr. Noseworthy:

1. How many employees has the Department of Transport at Gander, Newfoundland?
2. What kind of work do they perform?
3. How many hours a week do they work?
4. What is the hourly rate of wages in the several work categories?

COUNT JACQUES DE BERNONVILLE

Mr. Gagnon:

1. Does the file relating to Major de Bernonville contain any evidence or information supplied by Jean Bradley, of Montreal?
2. Is the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, or the Department of Immigration, or any other agency of the federal government, in possession of any information on the said Jean Bradley?
3. If so, when was he admitted into Canada?
4. Is Jean Bradley his real name?
5. What is his nationality by birth?
6. Was he a member of the Red brigades during the Spanish civil war?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—POINT EDWARD, ONT., FREIGHT SHEDS

Mr. Murphy:

For a copy of all contracts for the construction of the whole or any part of the Canadian National freight sheds at Point Edward, Ontario.

Motions for Papers

Mr. Chevrier: The information sought by this motion is the same as that asked for in the question on the same subject that has just been dropped. Therefore I submit with deference that it should not pass, and perhaps the hon. member will consent to its withdrawal.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

S. S. "KINGSTON"

Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of all correspondence in the possession of the government relating to the sale of the former S.S. Kingston; also all correspondence relating to the refitting of this boat, also relating to any plans for putting it in operation again, including a copy of any correspondence protesting against putting this boat in operation again.

Mr. Chevrier: The Department of Transport has no information on file regarding the sale of S.S. Kingston. If the ship had been sold, there would be a transfer of registry in the department, and there is no such transfer or no indication of a transfer. The information I have, and I cannot control it, is that the vessel at present is being broken up for scrap. Under the circumstances perhaps the hon. gentleman will withdraw his question.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

NIAGARA DIVERSION TREATY

CANADA-UNITED STATES—APPROVAL OF RATIFICATION AND OF AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND ONTARIO

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the ratification, without reservation, of the Niagara diversion treaty between Canada and the United States of America, signed at Washington on February 27, 1950, and do approve an agreement between Canada and Ontario with respect to the said Niagara diversion treaty, signed at Toronto on March 27, 1950, and that this house do approve same.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, a situation has arisen which affects the privileges of and is a matter of great concern to all members of the house. The motion just moved, concerning which the minister will be explaining the subject matter to the house, is one of considerable importance, because it is more than just a question of the diversion of power water at Niagara. It relates to a proposal that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has very properly been pressing, the development of international power resources generally. In addition to this extremely important question, the next order of business involves probably the most important legislation that has been presented to the house during this session. Five committees are meeting today, three of them this morning. Without raising any question at the moment about the circumstances which have led to this congestion of business, I submit that, while in respect to certain matters coming before us it is relatively easy to allocate to a limited number of members the task of dealing with them, the two resolutions I have mentioned are of such importance that every member should be permitted to be in the house to hear the explanations of the ministers concerned, and to take such part in the debates as may be regarded as appropriate.

With three committees actually called to meet at the present time, namely, banking and commerce, public accounts and radio broadcasting, and with others to meet later today, I submit that on subjects of this kind it is almost an affront to our responsibility as members that we should be called upon to leave the chamber when discussion of them is about to take place. Therefore I hope the house will concur in the motion I present that meetings of all committees be suspended until this afternoon.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I have no objection to the suggestion, but it is a matter for the committees themselves. We have no authority in that regard. We would be ready to agree to it.

Mr. Drew: There may be certain technical problems in connection with the chairmanship of the committees, but I should imagine that the chairman would recognize the wish of the house if the government is prepared to consent to such a motion.

Mr. St. Laurent: I have no doubt the chairmen of the committees are present in the house, and that they will sense the desire of the house. I would hope that when their respective committees meet they might adjourn for the forenoon, as suggested by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew).

Mr. Speaker: It will be unnecessary for me to read again the motion of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). We will proceed with the motion moved by him.

Mr. Cleaver: Before the matter is dealt with, as chairman of one of the committees I should like to say that we have witnesses from out of town attending our meeting who are here after notice. I think perhaps the public accounts committee might excuse the leader of the opposition from attending their meeting.

Mr. Ross (Souris): They would be pleased.

Mr. Drew: Since I made the motion, I am not going—

Mr. Maybank: Mr. Speaker, who has the floor?

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. Speaker: Are we dealing with the motion of the Secretary of State for External Affairs?

Mr. Maybank: I wish to speak to the motion that has been moved by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member does so, I think I should allow the leader of the opposition to make another statement.

Mr. Drew: I simply want to say that I have no intention of dealing with the remark that was made, which I think was inappropriate to the manner in which I presented the suggestion. I would say, however, that while witnesses may have been brought here, the question of their not being heard until this afternoon is not comparable with the necessity of the elected representatives of the people of Canada hearing two of the most important discussions that will come before the house during the current session.

Mr. Maybank: Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that every member of the radio committee would desire to be present during the discussion that is about to take place in the house. Certainly I would desire to be here. After considerable discussion a special witness from Toronto has been brought before the radio committee, a citizen who urged the committee to hear him. That was arranged, and the committee began to sit at ten o'clock this morning. It adjourned for the purpose of allowing members to come into the house for the orders of the day. Judging from the way the evidence of this gentleman has gone so far, in my estimation it is impossible for the examination of the witness to be concluded in a short time. Therefore I feel that, while every member of the radio committee would certainly like to be present in the house, it is their duty under the circumstances to attend the radio committee, and I feel it is my duty to be there. That is the situation confronting a good many members. I do not know whether there is any divergence of opinion between the leader of the opposition and myself on this point, but I think that Liberal members of the radio committee at any rate have enough confidence in their colleagues to trust them with the handling of the matter now before the house.

Mr. Picard: Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the public accounts committee I think I should be permitted to say that, in answer to the demand generally expressed by the house that the committee should carry on its work in a thorough manner this year, we have held quite a number of meetings. We sat earlier this morning and adjourned at eleven o'clock with the intention of resuming our sitting as soon as orders of the day were taken up. We have witnesses before us. I know they can be called on another day, but the number of days before the end of the session is limited. We have undertaken to examine a certain matter thoroughly, and we are doing it. Therefore I do not think it would be fair to the committee if we accepted the motion of the leader of the opposition. Furthermore, this afternoon a meeting of the public accounts committee is being held to discuss its first interim report on a matter that has occupied fourteen meetings of the committee. The present session is nearing an end, and it is desirable that the report of the committee should be prepared and presented.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to suggest that a simple solution of the problem would be for the government to agree to defer the debate on the motion of the Secretary of State for External Affairs—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Knowles: —and the debate on the defence supplies bill until a time that might be arranged by agreement among the various parties. There is plenty of work to do today in committee of supply.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is nothing further that I can do about this matter. The house has heard what has been said by the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition, and the committee chairmen. We will now proceed with the consideration of the motion moved by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, in submitting this motion to the house for approval I should like to make a brief statement concerning it. I think it can be brief, because on February 27 I made a statement to the house with regard to the Niagara Diversion treaty, on the occasion of its signing in Washington, and I have not very much to add to what I said then.

Hon. members will recall that the purpose of this treaty is to provide for the permanent regulation of the diversion of water from the Niagara river for hydroelectric power, and to ensure the preservation of the scenic beauty of the Niagara river and Niagara falls.

The earliest regulations for the diversion of water at Niagara for power were contained in article V of the Boundary Waters treaty of 1909. By this treaty the United States was permitted to divert 20,000 cubic feet of water per second, and Canada 36,000 cubic feet per second. Although Canada was thus allowed to use more water than the United States, exports of power from Canada have resulted in a fairly equal division between the two countries of the use of Niagara water.

The growing demand for power during the second world war made additional diversions of water necessary. Canada was accordingly authorized to use a further 13,000 cubic feet per second, and the United States a further 12,500 cubic feet per second. These authorizations were made on a temporary basis only. Canada also undertook to divert 5,000 cubic feet of water per second into the great lakes system from the Albany river watershed through Long Lac and the Ogoki river, and was accordingly authorized to use this additional 5,000 cubic feet per second at Niagara. After the war the demand for hydroelectric power kept increasing. A permanent agreement on the use of Niagara river water was needed to permit the maximum development of power consistent with the preservation of the scenic spectacle of the falls. Discussions which were held in Washington last December resulted in the preparation of the Niagara Diversion treaty which was signed on February 27, 1950.

Previous agreements on the use of Niagara water simply specified the total amount of water each country could divert. Any water remaining would flow over the falls. In this treaty the procedure is reversed. Article IV reserves definite quantities of water for flow over the falls and through the rapids; and article V authorizes the use of all remaining water for power purposes. This method of approach provides for the most effective use of whatever water is available at any time, and for an appropriate division of that water between scenic and power purposes.

Article VI provides for equal division between the two countries of the water available for power purposes. This does not apply to the water that is added to the great lakes system through the Long Lac-Ogoki works; this water will still be used exclusively by Canada. Since Niagara water is for the first time to be divided equally, the United States government has been informed that when facilities have been constructed in the United States to make use of the full United States share of water, Canadian export licences then in effect will not be renewed unless circumstances existing in Canada at that time make such a course desirable.

Since the volume of water in the river fluctuates from time to time, and since definite amounts of water are reserved for scenic purposes, it is impossible to say just how much more water this treaty will make available for power generation. It is expected, however, that both countries will normally have the use of more water than before.

More important for Canada, perhaps, is the fact that the existing temporary arrangements are being superseded by a permanent agreement. This will make possible the construction of new power plants of the latest design, making more efficient use of the available water. For these two reasons this treaty is expected to result in a substantial increase in the supply of power at Niagara.

A thorough study of the scenic aspects of Niagara falls was conducted some years ago by a special international Niagara board, established by the United States and Canada. In its final report, in 1929, the board recommended the construction of remedial works to enhance the beauty of the falls by distributing the waters so as to produce an unbroken crestline on the falls. Some of these works were built during the war. Article II of this treaty provides for the completion of the works when suitable plans have been drawn up by the international joint commission and approved by the governments of the United States and Canada.

This treaty is of primary interest to the province of Ontario, and in its preparation we were greatly assisted by experts from that province. The chairman of the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario and the chairman of the Niagara parks commission participated in the discussions in Washington, and helped us to conclude a treaty which meets with the approval of the government of Ontario.

On the Canadian side, the object of this treaty is to provide more power for Ontario, and it has been recognized by the province that any financial commitments that may be involved should be met by Ontario. The agreement between this government and the government of Ontario, which was signed on March 27, accordingly provides that Ontario will construct and pay for the Canadian share of the remedial works and satisfy any valid claims arising out of damage or injury to persons or property in Canada in connection with the construction and operation of these works. The government of Canada undertakes to consult the government of Ontario before giving approval to the recommendations of the international joint commission as to the nature and design of the remedial works. The government of Canada also promises to authorize the government of Ontario to divert the water made available to Canada by the treaty when it comes into force.

It is our hope, Mr. Speaker, that the Niagara Diversion treaty will be ratified in the near future by the United States, in order that the redevelopment of the power facilities at Niagara may be started as soon as possible.

[Mr. Pearson.]

I wish to emphasize, however, that this redevelopment at Niagara will not in any sense take the place of the power that we expect to obtain from the St. Lawrence river. We must have additional Niagara power now, and St. Lawrence power as soon as we can get it. For that purpose we should all be glad to see appropriate and early action taken in Washington in regard to the St. Lawrence power development scheme.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that the business of the house might have been so arranged that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), who has had wide experience in matters having to do with power development, and particularly in connection with this scheme, could have been here to make some observations which I am sure would have been interesting and helpful with respect to the resolution that has been presented by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). At this time I have no intention of doing more than indicating the approval of our party of the proposed resolution.

I should like to re-echo the hope expressed by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) from time to time in his addresses in the republic to the south, and reiterated by the minister of external affairs this morning, that the United States government will make a concerted attempt to see that the St. Lawrence waterway is developed in the near future. This should be done not only from the standpoint of the power needs of the provinces which would be contiguous to that development, but also because of certain other considerations which need not be mentioned at the moment but which are of vital importance to both nations in this critical period in international affairs. I believe it should be indicated that not only is the government anxious that the St. Lawrence seaway be proceeded with, but that it is the unanimous wish of this parliament that that should be done. I believe it is time we indicated to our great friends to the south—and they are great friends—that that is the wish of our people, not only in our own interests but in the interests of both countries, working toward the common goal of peace.

I have no intention of taking up the time of the house further in this connection, because the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson), who has made a close study of the matters which are mentioned in this resolution, will make some observations with regard to them. I shall therefore terminate my remarks at this point and leave the discussion of the subject, so far as our party is concerned, in the capable hands of the member for York West.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that this is another of those occasions on which there is not an opportunity to put questions to the minister. Once this motion passes at this stage, that is the end of it. I believe the minister does have the right under the rules of the house to speak at the end of the debate, and if I ask a few questions while I am speaking I hope the minister will take advantage of that opportunity to answer those questions, along with others that may be put by any speakers that follow.

Generally speaking, I want to indicate our support of this treaty, and I also want to add my word to what has already been said concerning the St. Lawrence river power development. I should like to express the hope that the voice of Canada in this regard is being heard by our friends to the south, and that it will not be too long before that project is undertaken. I could not help but wonder while the minister was speaking —and this is one of the questions I shall put to him—whether, had the St. Lawrence power project been undertaken, it would have been necessary to get this additional power at Niagara. I should be glad if the minister would deal with that when he speaks. Would it have been necessary to get any additional power under those circumstances, or might it still be necessary to get additional power but not to the extent as now seems to be required?

In connection with a matter of this kind we laymen have to take the word of the experts. I have in mind in particular the balance that I take it is being sought between the power needs and the preservation of the scenic beauty of the falls and the Niagara river and rapids. One can only hope that balance is being achieved by the figures that are set out in the treaty. When I read, for example, that there is to be reserved for the daylight hours, for a period of seven months of the year, water going over the falls to the extent of 100,000 cubic feet per second, I should like to know the present rate of flow in cubic feet per second. In other words, could we be given some idea of the extent to which the flow is cut down if the flow is reduced to the minimum figure suggested in this treaty? As I say, we have to take the word of the experts that they have found this to be a proper balance between these two aims. We certainly need the power, but I think all members will agree it would be a tragedy if our interest in and need for power were to lead us to the point of spoiling in any way one of the greatest scenic wonders in North America.

Is it so that under the terms of the treaty the reduction to 50,000 cubic feet per second can be made during the hours of darkness for the seven months referred to and for twenty-four hours per day during the other five months? I should also be interested in knowing whether or not plans have already been made to make use of the water surplus to the 100,000 cubic feet per second during the time specified, and whether power developments have been made for the use of the water surplus to the 50,000 cubic feet per second to which the flow can be reduced during the five winter months as well as during the hours of darkness in the summer months. The house should also be told how much additional power will be made available by the use of that extra water. What is the relationship between that additional power and the amount of power now being developed at Niagara?

I do not wish my questions to be interpreted as indicating that we are against this treaty. We are in favour of it, but it is only proper that we should indicate our concern that the balance referred to will be achieved. After all, it is our responsibility as members of parliament to be concerned about these matters. By asking these questions I believe I have indicated the difficulty with which we are faced when presented with a resolution which goes through only one stage. I hope the minister will solve that problem for us by answering the questions when he closes the debate.

With that, Mr. Speaker, and with my own endorsation of what has been said about securing early action on the St. Lawrence project, I wish to indicate our support of this treaty.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, I believe it is fitting that this resolution should be introduced today because, as I understand it, today marks the opening of the Tunnel power plant. I believe the first two units will be put on the line today. The Des Joachims power plant, which is nearing completion, is, next to the Niagara power plant, the largest development in Ontario. It is not as large as the Shipshaw but it is the largest single plant outside of Niagara on the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission system. I think the significant thing is that this house should realize what this means. The Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario have under construction not only the plant at Des Joachims but several others which will be put into operation this year or early next year. I will not go into the details as to the size and the number of kilowatts, because they are all given in the hydro electric power commission's report and have been frequently commented upon by Mr. Saunders, the chairman of that commission. The significant thing for this house to realize at the moment is that, despite the full utilization of all the power plants now being constructed, the province of Ontario and the central part of Canada will again face a power shortage in the year 1957. Less than seven years from now all the available power in Ontario will be fully used, and unless our development in the central part of Canada is to be arrested, steps must immediately be taken to begin the construction of the St. Lawrence power project.

I want to deal briefly with the Niagara situation. The resolution does two things. First of all, it preserves the beauty of the falls. By a series of underwater weirs the flow of the falls at Niagara is made continuous from one edge of the river to the other. The geological history of Niagara falls has been that a great volume of the water was concentrated in a comparatively narrow trough, and the edges of the falls were beginning to be left a little bit bare. This had an unfortunate effect, in that as the volume of the water over the narrow trough increased, there was erosion of the central part of the falls. The centre part of Niagara, particularly the Horseshoe falls, was eating back at the rate of many feet a year, and intensifying the percentage of water which went over the narrow central trough. For that reason alone the work envisaged by this resolution is desirable, because the work to be done will not only stop the increased erosion but will preserve the beauty of the falls from now on. For that reason alone it is important.

There is, however, another reason. With the desperate shortage of power that there is at the present time, or that there will be in the comparatively near future, the efficiency of Niagara must be increased. As hon. members know, the head at Niagara itself is approximately 167 feet, whereas the head at Queenston, farther down the river, is 305 feet. In other words, the efficiency of a cubic foot of falling water is in the ratio of 167 to 305; or it produces at Queenston almost double the amount of electric power that it produces at Niagara falls. That fact in itself is an important consideration.

One of the unique things about the Niagara system is the evenness of flow. I have not before me the figures for the maximum and minimum flow, but the variation of flow in the Niagara river and in the St. Lawrence river—which is of course part of it—is about fifteen per cent to twenty per cent from the maximum to the minimum. The mean flow is about 300,000 cubic feet per second. The flow is amazingly constant. Those doing the work can count on this constant flow, and the engineers can design the structure with a great deal of accuracy. On other rivers, or on the average river, the flow in the springtime, in the freshet, will be sometimes ten, fifteen or twenty times the normal low water flow. To give you a small example of the variation, the Amazon, over a length of I think about 250 miles, where the river is a minimum width of 17 miles, rises sixty feet over the distance in the flood season.

As to the destruction of the beauty of Niagara, there is no possibility of that through this resolution. There is, however, something which I think must be emphasized. As I have mentioned, we are facing a power shortage of considerable magnitude in Canada today, despite the tremendously important new works which have been recently constructed. The St. Lawrence deep waterway is an integral part of the whole great lakes system, and the discussion of this resolution must also involve consideration of the St. Lawrence waterway and power project.

It is estimated that some 800,000 horsepower will be added to the Niagara system by the more efficient use of the water, as set out in this resolution. That, I suggest, gives some idea of the importance of electric power. At the same time however there is at this moment 2,200,000 horsepower going to waste on the St. Lawrence. Despite the fact that we have utilized the water in the purely Canadian Beauharnois section of the St. Lawrence, there is still between 2,000,000 and 2,500,000 horsepower going to waste on the St. Lawrence.

I do not want to introduce the other question specifically, but I have on the order paper a resolution which, I believe, I should read at this time. It is as follows:

That in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration the advisability of approving the application of the state of New York and the province of Ontario to proceed with the construction of hydroelectric works on the St. Lawrence river, with the proviso that such works be constructed in such a manner that should agreement between the United States of America and the Dominion of Canada ever be reached on the deep waterway, navigation facilities could be subsequently installed without interference with the continuous generation of electric power; that furthermore the design of structures would permit the continuance of the present 14-foot shallow draft navigation, the cost of such works to be met by the state of New York and the province of Ontario.

In the submission of the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario to the international joint commission the agreement for continuous navigation was made by the Ontario Hydro Electric, who were willing to see to it that the structure should be such that the present 14-foot navigation would continue.

In the opinion of the engineers it would not be difficult to construct generating works so that the installation of a 27-foot or even 30-foot navigation would be comparatively simple.

I do not propose to discuss the navigation issue at the present time; but I do want to say that, despite the tremendous addition of power, we shall be forced to consider generating electricity by coal and by steam unless the St. Lawrence deep waterways project can be proceeded with in the comparatively near future—and by that I mean this year or next year. It is estimated that a kilowatt-hour can be produced on the St. Lawrence deep waterway system for 2·58 mills, whereas the cost of producing and delivering the same killowatt hour by coal would be 7.7 mills. In other words the cost of generating electricity by coal is approximately three times that of generating it by water.

If our industry is to be able to compete with industry in the rest of the world, then the one thing we must have is cheap electric power. To burden our industry now with an increase not of fifteen or twenty per cent but of possibly one hundred per cent, is going to level a very crippling blow against the whole Canadian economy. I emphasize this because hon. members should realize how tremendously important and serious this question is.

I have studied the manner in which this question has been handled by the United States Senate over a period of some years. Every president since President Hoover, and every major political party at every national convention, has gone on record as approving of the development of the St. Lawrence river. This was stressed by the late President Roosevelt, and was adopted at both the Republican and Democratic national conventions the year before last. Up to the moment it has been a major point in President Truman's policy. However, despite the overwhelming pressure for this development the political machinery of the United States Senate makes it virtually impossible to get this measure through. I do not want to be a pessimist, but I do feel that a small group in the United States Senate can and will hold up the development of the St. Lawrence deep waterway project, and the electric power resulting therefrom, for a considerable period of time. With the political complexion of the United States we must realize that there is no likelihood of having this development approved before we are faced with a major power shortage. There is no use waiting another two or three years, because we are going to need more power in seven years, and it takes from six to eight years to carry out the construction. Our time is running out.

I suggest to the government that they take this stand with regard to the development of the St. Lawrence deep waterway: If by such and such a time, setting a definite deadline, ratification is not forthcoming, the Canadian government will approve the development of this great project by the state of New York and the province of Ontario. The problem is not one that we can afford to let go much longer; the problem is one of immediate and pressing urgency.

Today Ontario has enough power, but with the increasing acceleration of the load caused by industrialization that power will run out about 1957, or possibly before. The generation of electricity by coal costs three times as much as it does by water. If the new iron ore discoveries and our primary steel industry are to be developed, we shall need even more power, I believe, than we estimate at the present time.

This is not only a matter of commercial importance; it is something that affects the economy and virtually the security of the North American continent. If we are to have a great steel industry it must be situated where it will be safe from enemy attack. We cannot afford a long ocean voyage for cargoes such as iron ore. I envisage the great developments in Quebec requiring the smelting be done in the upper lakes, and that would be impossible unless the St. Lawrence waterway is proceeded with. The whole development of that iron ore will be in jeopardy unless it can be transported to the upper lakes.

Mr. Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth): Send it to Nova Scotia.

Mr. Adamson: I am not going to speak about the Nova Scotia industry and the great difficulty in obtaining ore from Newfoundland.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It seems to me the hon. member is getting out of order.

Mr. Adamson: An hon. member mentioned Nova Scotia. I do want to emphasize the importance of the government taking action in the near future. This proposed development will produce 800,000 additional horsepower, but that will be used up in seven years. The development of additional power and the provision of navigation to the great lakes should be proceeded with immediately. Having observed the strange method by which a small minority in the United States Senate can block legislation, not for one or two sessions but for twenty years, it seems to me that there is not much likelihood of this measure getting approval. I suggest to the government that they state definitely that we in Canada want this scheme to go through, and that if we are blocked continuously we propose to act with the state of New York and the province of Ontario and proceed with the development of the St. Lawrence.

Mr. H. P. Cavers (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, as I represent one of the areas most vitally affected by the treaty before us today, I should like to express approval on behalf of the people on the Niagara frontier of the great development that is to take place in this area. As the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) has said, this development will not detract in any way from the beauty of Niagara falls; in fact it will enhance it. This fact must be kept before us, because many tourists come to this area, and we should continue to develop that tourist business.

We should develop all the power potentials in this locality. More power is needed in Ontario, particularly along the Niagara frontier. In the past few years we have known of power shortages. We are told that we shall have more in the future. We need the power that will be developed by reason of this treaty. Since 1939 the area which I represent, and in addition the county of Welland and the area extending as far as the city of Hamilton, has experienced a great industrial development, possibly greater than any other part of Canada. In the years to come we shall be able to make use of the additional power that can be developed at Niagara.

I have read the treaty which is under discussion today, and my interpretation of it is that there will be no diversion of water for power purposes between Niagara falls and lake Ontario. In the district in which I live the opinion seems to have been formed that a diversion will take place somewhere near the village of Queenston in order that the flow of water may be used twice—in the Niagara river and in a diverted stream. It may be there are some technical difficulties in the way preventing this policy from being carried out. I am sure that many citizens of Canada, particularly of the Niagara area, would be interested to know whether there are technical difficulties, or what the reason is for the provision that no diversion shall take place between Niagara falls and lake Ontario. I am sure that the development at Niagara can be proceeded with immediately, and in addition to the great power development that will take place along the St. Lawrence river. We need both projects.

I desire to commend the stand taken by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and the great efforts he put forth in Washington to bring about the treaty.

Mr. F. S. Follwell (Hastings South): Mr. Speaker, as I am chairman of the utilities commission of my home city at the present time, and have had a great deal of experience with power shortages during the last few years in the province of Ontario, I feel I should be remiss if I did not rise at this time and congratulate the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) on the way in which he, on behalf of the government of Canada, has proceeded to bring about this treaty between the Dominion of Canada and the United States.

We were told that the power shortages were due to lack of water, but apparently we are not going to lack water from now on. From what has been said I understand that all the water will be used, other than what is necessary to retain the beauty of the falls. As has been pointed out by previous speakers, that will provide a great deal more horsepower for the use of the people of Ontario. I should like to congratulate the government and the minister, and I sincerely hope that the treaty will be made effective at the earliest possible date.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there seems to be unanimity in the house as to the desirability of the treaty. There is little that I need add to what I have already said, but one or two questions have been raised, and possibly I should try to answer them before approval is given.

The hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) was good enough to bring his expert knowledge to bear on the matter, and I think he has dealt with some of the questions raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). The hon. member asked whether in the opinion of the government the treaty would have been necessary if we had been able to carry the St. Lawrence waterway negotiations to a successful conclusion. As has been indicated already by the hon. member for York West, the answer is yes; in our opinion it would have been necessary, not only because the power would be necessary irrespective of the other development, but also because the primary purpose of the treaty is to preserve the scenic beauty of Niagara falls.

As to the power aspect of the question, one must remember that if and when—and I prefer to emphasize "when"—the St. Lawrence negotiations are carried to a successful conclusion, the 5,000 cubic feet per second which are now diverted from lake Ogoki into the great lakes system, and which can now be used by Canada, would have to be given up under this treaty. We would lose that quantity of power resources. It would also be desirable in other ways to have both treaties.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre expressed the hope that the treaty under discussion would not do anything to prejudice the scenic beauty of the falls. I can assure him—and other hon. members have already so stated—that this will not be the case. We hope the contrary result will be achieved, and that the treaty will make more secure and enhance the value of what is after all a great national asset in which all Canadians take pride and from which we also derive some profit—the scenic beauty of Niagara falls.

The hon. member also inquired as to the present flow of water. I am informed that it is between 110,000 and 115,000 cubic feet per second after existing diversions are taken into account, depending on the season and the level of the lakes. It will of course be known to hon. members that article IV of the treaty deals with the question of the flow of water over the falls and its relation to scenic beauty. The period from April 1 to October 31 is the main tourist season at the falls, and for this reason the flow over the falls and through the rapids is to be 100,000 cubic feet per second in the hours of daylight. This is the flow which the special international Niagara board in 1929 considered to be the minimum essential for an adequate spectacle by day in the tourist season. In this treaty we have attempted to safeguard that position. Less water is needed at night because the beauty of the falls when artificially illuminated does not depend to such an extent on the volume of water as long as the flow is fairly evenly distributed across the width of the falls. From September 16 to October 31 the hours of daylight are appreciably less, and consequently the flow may be reduced at 8 p.m. instead of 10 p.m.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre also asked me whether plans had been made for the use of water in excess of 100,000 cubic feet per second in summer or 50,000 in winter. The answer is that plans have been made by the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario which will presumably use as much of this water as their plants can take at any one time. At this point I might express again the government's appreciation of the co-operation which we have received from the commission in the negotiation of the treaty.

A question was asked, and indeed an answer was given, as to how much additional power would be made available by the treaty. It has been suggested that it might be as high as 800,000 horsepower. I would not like to be as definite as that; I should think the answer will depend in part upon the plants the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario decide to build, and in part upon the level of water in the Niagara river at any given time. One estimate I have heard is 500,000 horsepower, somewhat lower than that of the hon. member for York West, but in my statement I said that in our opinion there would be a substantial increase, which may be somewhere between those two figures. We hope it will be as great as possible.

In the discussion of this resolution it has been suggested that we as a government should once again bring to the attention of the United States authorities the very great political and economic importance to our two countries of proceeding with the St. Lawrence development. Certainly there does not seem to be any difference of opinion in this house on that matter. Personally I think that political and economic developments in recent years have made this matter of greater importance than ever before; and if any such assurance is needed I can assure the house that this government has taken every possible step to urge the government of the United States that action be taken without delay. At this time I do not think I need go into the details of this urging, because they will be apparent to hon. members. We still feel that way about it, and we hope that our feelings —and by "our" I mean not merely the government but this parliament and I believe this country—will be appreciated in Washington and action taken. I am not as pessimistic in that regard as the hon. member for York West. We hear a great deal these days about international point four programs for technical development, and they are important; I hope Washington will very soon show a realization of the importance of this point one program in the economic and political relationships between our two countries, and that action may soon be taken.

The hon. member suggested that if such action is not taken within a reasonable space of time we might indicate to the United States authorities that we should approve a power development alone on the St. Lawrence between the state of New York and the province of Ontario, to be carried out in such a way as not to prejudice any later navigational developments which it might be possible to bring about. As I have said, I am not as pessimistic as the hon. member in regard to action being taken on the larger scheme and I doubt whether it would be wise formally to take that stand at this time. I would remind the house that even if we did, that would not remove the obstacle, if it is an obstacle, of federal authorization and approval by Washington of any action the state of New York might wish to take with the province of Ontario. I understand the state of New York has already approached the United States federal authorities with regard to this matter, and has not yet been able to secure their approval for a state-provincial power development alone on the St. Lawrence. Therefore unless approval could be obtained by the state of New York from the federal authorities in Washington, any expression of opinion on our part would be more or less academic.

Before resuming my seat I want to reiterate the importance we attach to the larger scheme, and our feeling that in ratifying this Niagara Diversion treaty we are not in any way minimizing the importance of the other scheme. As a matter of fact this gives us an opportunity to emphasize the great importance, politically and economically, we attach to the St. Lawrence seaway development.

Mr. Adamson: I should like to correct one statement by the minister, if I may. It is not the government of the United States that is holding up the St. Lawrence deep waterway. It is a group of—I hesitate to use the word—"maverick" senators who have continuously blocked this development, and apparently are prepared to go on doing so.

Mr. Pearson: There should not be any doubt as to what I meant on that point, because it is a matter of our relationship with the United States. Whatever may be the position behind the scenes, the fact remains that the Senate of the United States, which is an important part of the government of that country, for reasons which in its own opinion may be very good, has not yet seen fit to ratify the agreement.

Motion (Mr. Pearson) agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION TO MEET CERTAIN EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES AND INDEBTEDNESS

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to issue securities not exceeding $24,582,489 in principal amount to provide the moneys necessary to meet capital expenditures made or capital indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1950; to authorize the governor in council to guarantee the principal and interest of securities issued by the company for the purpose aforesaid; to authorize the making of temporary loans to the said company secured by such securities and not exceeding $24,582,489 in principal amount to enable the said company to meet such expenditures and indebtedness; with authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the said national system and to authorize the Minister of Finance to place at the disposal of the national company or the Trans-Canada Air Lines, such amounts as may be necessary to enable them to pay operating and income charges if at any time before the first day of July, 1951, the available revenues of the national railway system or the Trans-Canada Air Lines and subsidiaries, respectively, are not sufficient to pay such charges: provided that all such amounts shall be reimbursed to the minister from the recipients' annual revenues in so far as such revenues are sufficient, any insufficiency to be provided for by subsequent deficit appropriations by parliament.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been informed of the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): My understanding is that this will be the Canadian National Railways bill—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): This is only the formal stage of the resolution.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): My understanding is that this is in the ordinary form, so we shall reserve any comments we have until the next stage is reached.

Mr. Speaker: The motion before the house is not debatable; it is that the house go into committee of the whole at the next sitting to consider the resolution.

Motion agreed to.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL

TABLING OF SUMMARY MAY 1, 1950 TO MAY 31, 1950

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if I may have consent to revert for a moment to motions, I should like to table a summary of the orders in council passed from May 1 to May 31.

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND SALT CODFISH—DISPOSITION OF 1949 STOCKS—REPORT OF INVESTIGATORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Fisheries whether the investigator sent to Newfoundland to ascertain the quantity of 1949 salt codfish still on hand has reported, and, if so, what is the position.

Mr. J. W. MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): The group of experts sent to Newfoundland to gather information as to the quantity of salt codfish left over from the 1949 catch and other relevant information have returned.

They have not yet been able to put their information in the form of a report for the prices support board, but they are working on it at the present time and probably it will be ready in a day or so.

DEFENCE SUPPLIES

PROVISION FOR PURCHASE OR ACQUISITION, STORING OF MATERIALS, ETC.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 302, respecting defence supplies and projects.

Mr. Green: Is the minister not making a statement?

Mr. Howe: I made a complete statement on the introduction of the resolution, and have nothing further to say at this time.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, this bill, which is to be known as the Defence Supplies Act, was described by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) the other day as a peacetime bill. The suggestion was made by opposition members that perhaps this bill was being introduced because a condition of emergency existed for Canada. Several times during the discussion, however, the minister denied that was so. I propose to refer to two or three of his statements to that effect.

One statement will be found at page 3480 of Hansard for June 12, 1950, where the minister interjected this remark during the course of a speech by the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell): "It is a peacetime bill." On page 3489 of the same volume of Hansard he said:

> If there were an emergency, we would not be passing this bill.

Incidentally, he indicated that in the event of a war being declared the government would bring down some other measure which it has in reserve. On the same page the minister said:

> . . . we believe that peacetime is restored to the extent that wartime powers should now be given up and replaced by peacetime powers.

On the next page, 3490, he said:

> But I repeat that what is before parliament now is a bill to govern peacetime purchases.

There cannot be the slightest doubt that the minister, on behalf of the government, presents this bill as a peacetime bill, and it must be considered as such. In doing so he claimed that instead of taking powers which were excessive, the bill divested him of power. When this particular minister starts to divest himself of power that will be a day that should be proclaimed a national holiday. There will be a blue moon in the sky. The very fact that he made that statement, having regard to the way in which he has accumulated powers during the last few years just as a ship accumulates barnacles, is sufficient to make the members of the opposition stop, look, and listen, and give careful study to the bill in order to ascertain how it happens that this minister is presumably divesting himself of any power.

The minister claims that this great divesting is of powers given to him under the Department of Munitions and Supply Act. Let us look at that act for a few moments. It was originally passed in the short war session in the fall of 1939. Members of this house who were here then will recall that we thought the bill, whoever was to be the minister, gave extremely sweeping powers. Even the government realized that, because a provision was written into the act that it should only be in effect for a period of three years. It was a wartime measure and nothing else. No legislator in Canada at that time believed that drastic powers of this type should be given to any government except under war conditions. The act was not actually proclaimed law until about six months later, on April 9, 1940.

In the fall session of 1940 an amendment was made to the act giving wider powers than those contained in the original bill, but again the restrictive time limit of three years was retained. In 1943 further amendments to the Department of Munitions and Supply Act were presented, and at that time the time limitation was wiped out. There is not the slightest doubt, however, that even in 1943, in the midst of the war, this measure was still regarded as a purely war measure.

It should be pointed out that the department of munitions and supply was in reality a part of the war department of Canada. The Department of National Defence gave the lead in one part of our country's war effort, and the department of munitions and supply co-operated with the defence department. I suggest that actually the defence department had the dominant role, quite properly, and the department of munitions and supply was merely helping the former department.

Mr. Knowles: It was really three departments.

Mr. Green: Yes; the Department of National Defence had three ministers at that time. The position is entirely different today. The Department of Trade and Commerce has not the same relationship to the Department of National Defence in any way, shape or form.

Then, let us trace what happened to these drastic wartime powers which were given to the department of munitions and supply. In 1944, when it was obvious that the war was drawing to an end, further power was taken by the government for the reconstruction period. This power will be found set out in the Department of Reconstruction Act, which was passed in 1944. Again that act was to be in force for a limited period. One of the sections defines the reconstruction period as the period from April 1, 1944, until some time in the year 1949, depending on the date on which the house was called into session during the latter year. The same minister who is now the Minister of Trade and Commerce and is introducing the bill we are debating was named minister of reconstruction in October of 1944. Speaking of powers, he was given powers under this act which are worth looking at today. In section 5(b) we find that he had this power:

(b) to co-ordinate the actions of other departments and agencies of the government of Canada for the purpose of ensuring that the transition from a wartime to a peacetime economy shall be effected as quickly and as smoothly as possible.

He was made a superminister at that time, and continued also with his powers as minister of munitions and supply.

In 1945 the department of reconstruction and supply was set up under another act. The new minister was to have these powers under section 6:

The minister shall have and may exercise and shall perform all and every of the rights, powers, duties, liabilities and functions which were, immediately prior to the coming into force of this section, by any act, order or regulation, vested in, or required to be exercised or performed by the minister of munitions and supply or the minister of reconstruction.

The same minister was sworn in as minister of reconstruction and supply on January 1, 1946. The department of reconstruction and supply continued until last fall, when it was abolished and the Department of Resources and Development set up, with powers more in line with what is proper in peacetime. In the meantime, on January 1, 1948, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce was appointed to that portfolio. Powers under the Department of Munitions and Supply Act were then no longer being used for current transactions. They may have been used to clean up old war transactions, but they were not being used for current transactions. Instead, for the last three years or more a government company known as the Canadian Commercial Corporation has been doing the buying for the Department of National Defence. When the minister spoke the other day he explained that position in his statement which is to be found at page 3490 of Hansard. Referring to the setting up of the Canadian Commercial Corporation, he said:

It was established about 1943 for the purpose of assisting foreign governments to purchase in Canada. It was not until 1946, I think, when the minister of munitions and supply—

Which was himself.

—was attempting to wind up his department; and, as this agency was working efficiently, it seemed logical at that time to transfer responsibility for the purchase of military materials from the minister of munitions and supply to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

I emphasize the fact that the minister himself then stated that the work of the department of munitions and supply was being wound up. In 1947 an amendment was passed to the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act, giving that corporation power to act as a defence procurement agency. These powers given under the Department of Munitions and Supply Act to purchase defence supplies have therefore not been in use. The minister himself said that the other day, as reported at page 3489 of Hansard, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), referring to the Department of Munitions and Supply Act:

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Has it been availed of recently?
Mr. Howe: We have not been invoking it recently.

Nobody ever intended that those powers should be used in peacetime. Nobody in this parliament or in the last parliament had any idea that those drastic powers were being used; and as a matter of fact they have not been used for the last several years. Hence this talk by the Minister of Trade and Commerce of divesting himself of powers under this bill is misleading talk, because those powers have not been in use.

Mr. Howe: But the wartime powers have still been there. They have still been in the statutes since 1939.

Mr. Green: But they have not been in use. The question whether or not they have been in use is the main point. For the minister to try to justify the bringing in of this present bill with these far too drastic powers, by saying, Oh, there is an old law on the statute book and therefore I am giving up a lot of my powers, but I am taking on these new peacetime powers, is just evading the whole issue and is deceiving the house and the Canadian people.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The statute is as dead as Queen Anne.

Mr. Howe: Is that so?

Mr. Green: For over three years the Department of Trade and Commerce has been the procurement agency of the Department of National Defence, and apparently the work has been done without any difficulty. There has been no indication that there has been any inefficiency in this method and nobody can have any quarrel with the Department of Trade and Commerce doing the buying for the Department of National Defence. But now this government in peacetime is asking for powers which are excessive, unreasonable and dictatorial.

Just look at the powers taken under this bill. I am referring now to the government, because the government must stand behind this bill, although actually all those drastic powers are placed by the bill in the hands of this minister alone. There is the power of priorities. Where the government has a contract with a firm in Canada the minister can step in and say to the firm: Here, you may have a contract with somebody else, but you have got to break that contract with the other Canadians and supply the Canadian government first. There is the power to require the delivery of supplies that is contained in section 3 (1)(f) of the bill.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It might be better if the hon. member did not refer to the sections at this time.

Mr. Green: Very well, Mr. Speaker. But there is power taken to force anyone in Canada to sell defence supplies to the government; and defence supplies are so defined that they cover practically every kind of goods produced in Canada. There is wide open power to step in and force anybody in Canada to supply goods. Then there is power to get information, to go to any business firm in Canada and say: You must give us full information about what supplies you have and everything in connection with those supplies.

Then to cap it all, just in case something has been forgotten, in the last paragraph of this particular section there is power to——do such further things as may be authorized by the governor in council in regard to the procurement and disposal of defence supplies and projects.

There is power both to acquire goods and to sell them. The minister is taking the power to buy goods and then to turn around and sell them again—to buy and sell—governmental powers unheard of in peacetime in Canada. As I have said, they are all exercised by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Knowles: One o'clock.

Mr. Green: I should like to finish with this point now if I may. These are not powers for a short period. These are permanent powers, to remain on the statute books of Canada indefinitely. They will remain there until there is a new government which will repeal them. It is not a question of temporary powers; and all these powers I have mentioned are quite outside any control by the Department of National Defence. That department has no right whatever to interfere with the exercise of any of these powers.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, when the house took recess at one o'clock I had been pointing out our objection to this defence supplies bill, on the ground that the government is seeking excessive, unreasonable and dictatorial powers which are to be exercised largely by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I had concluded that phase of my remarks by pointing out that the exercise of these powers was quite beyond any control by the Department of National Defence. I should like to go on now and place before Your Honour and the house several other serious objections to the bill.

I believe the Department of National Defence should either be in control of or at least associated in the exercise of any powers granted under the bill. Instead of that this war department is treated as though it were of secondary importance and merely incidental. We found in the resolution preceding the bill that the first powers mentioned were those far-reaching powers to be given to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, without any reference at all to the Department of National Defence. Then there was this further provision:

Also to empower the minister to buy or otherwise acquire defence supplies and construct or carry out projects required by the Department of National Defence.

In the bill itself this same treatment is meted out to that department. We find that after the chief powers have been set out in the bill, section 4 gives the Minister of Trade and Commerce exclusive power to do all the buying for the Department of National Defence. In effect the Department of Trade and Commerce, by reason of this bill, emerges as the supreme authority in connection with all defence purchases. It may be that that is one reason why the estimates of the Department of National Defence are worded in such an indefinite way this year. Perhaps the poor unfortunate Minister of National Defence does not know yet what the Department of Trade and Commerce is going to spend in buying defence supplies or erecting defence projects. The very fact that those estimates are worded in such a wide and indefinite way means that there is just that much wider power given to the Minister of Trade and Commerce to spend money being voted for the Department of National Defence.

Another grave feature is that the bill is built around an individual minister, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce. That, I suggest, is both unwise and dangerous. The House of Commons should not enact legislation based upon the character and qualities of any one individual minister. Permanent legislation of this kind should not be concerned in any way with the personality of a minister. Yet this bill is obviously drawn for the present Minister of Trade and Commerce. Those powers are not given to him because he is Minister of Trade and Commerce; it is not because he holds that office; they are given to him because he has been exercising dictatorial powers for a long time, and that is the type of power he always requires to carry on business.

There will not be a future minister of trade and commerce who will want to have powers of this type in the purchase of defence supplies. Only a minister who had exercised wartime powers would ask in this time of peace for the powers contained in this bill.

Mr. Fraser: Or would have the nerve to ask for them.

Mr. Green: Yes, or would have the nerve to ask for them. The Minister of Trade and Commerce showed his attitude when he was speaking as reported at page 3473 of Hansard. At that point he was praising the Canadian people for having co-operated so well during the war. He said they really did not need much compulsion, but then went on to say this:

> Nevertheless, even with the best good will and co-operation on all sides, circumstances may still arise where some mandatory powers are needed.

In other words he wants to have a whip, and this bill provides him with that whip.

Not only is there unreasonable interference with the Department of National Defence, but this bill also enables the Minister of Trade and Commerce to interfere with the business of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier). Hon. members will notice the wide powers given by the bill to deal with the construction and even with the repair of ships. That is the business of the Minister of Transport; he is responsible for shipping and shipbuilding policies. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has no business to step into that field at all. Yet, here he is getting into it, in just the same way that he retains control over Trans-Canada Air Lines. That air line should not come under his department at all. It is a subsidiary of Canadian National Railways; yet while the Minister of Transport is responsible for the railway, we find the Minister of Trade and Commerce hanging on to the power over Trans-Canada Air Lines.

Another very serious matter is that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is the minister of elections of this government. He is the chief of staff of the Liberal party. In this bill we find him being given arbitrary powers over thousands and thousands of businessmen in this country. With the minister holding such power, naturally those men will hesitate to do anything which would offend the government. It is giving the Minister of Trade and Commerce power politically which no member of any government should possess.

Already the Minister of Trade and Commerce has tremendous power. I need only mention that in addition to his department he has control of the atomic energy control board; Canadian Patents and Development Limited; dominion coal board; Eldorado Mining and Refining, Limited; the national research council; Polymer Corporation, and as I have already mentioned, Trans-Canada Air Lines, and goodness knows how many other branches of government.

Mr. Howe: And doing very well.

Mr. Green: He seems to be responsible also for the administration of the combines act, or at least to think he is responsible. The next thing we know he will be telling the minister of external affairs what is to be done.

Mr. Knowles: Probably he has already.

Mr. Green: Instead of divesting the minister of power, this bill in effect is nothing more nor less than a refusal to give up wartime powers which should have been given up long ago.

If there are to be in peacetime these wide powers of requisitioning, they should be exercised by the cabinet and not by one minister. I would refer hon. members to the provisions of the Public Works Act, section 36, which incidentally is one section that the minister partly gets away from by this bill. That section reads:

> Whenever any works are to be executed under the direction of any department of the government, the minister having charge of such department shall invite tenders by public advertisement for the execution of such works, except in cases
> (a) of pressing emergency in which delay would be injurious to the public interest; or
> (b) in which from the nature of the work it can be more expeditiously and economically executed by the officers and servants of the department; or
> (c) where the estimated cost of the work is less than five thousand dollars and it appears to the minister, in view of the nature of the work, that it is not advisable to invite tenders.

Then there is another subsection which reads:

2. Whenever in case of any work tenders are required to be or are invited, the minister having charge of the department concerned shall submit all tenders received therefor to the governor in council and the contract for the work shall be awarded under the direction of the governor in council.

Those are the general provisions covering the letting of contracts by departments of the Canadian government. This bill gives far wider powers than are contained in the section I have just read. For example, the minister does not need to comply with that section of the Public Works Act if he thinks that a disclosure of the terms of a contract would be prejudicial to the interests of defence, or if the contract is to be exercised by one of the many crown companies, or if the contract is for the construction or repair of a ship; or—this is another blanket clause—the governor in council can say that any contract is exempt from these provisions.

The minister is also given powers under this new bill to enter into contracts on his own without any approval whatever by the government. For example, if he thinks a contract should be entered into immediately it does not need to be approved by his fellow members of the cabinet, or if the estimated expenditure does not exceed $15,000—hon. members will notice that the figure in the Public Works Act is $5,000—or if competitive tenders have been obtained and the lowest tender accepted involves an expenditure not exceeding $50,000. In those cases the minister is given this extra leeway.

I suggest that other members of the cabinet have a grave responsibility in connection with these defence contracts. They are not accepting that responsibility by allowing a bill of this kind to become law. Other members of the government are running away from their responsibility to the Canadian people.

By this measure the Canadian people are being asked to surrender part of their freedom in peacetime; at a time when the Minister of Trade and Commerce has insisted that there is no emergency. If we were in wartime or in time of emergency the attitude of the official opposition would be different. No matter what else may be charged against the Progressive Conservative party of Canada, no one can charge us with failing to stand behind every measure for the proper defence of this country. This is brought in as a peacetime measure, and the most serious aspect of the measure is that it takes away some freedom. During the war the Canadian people gave up their rights without question, but in peacetime the taking of these drastic powers is an unjustifiable interference with the rights of the Canadian people. This bill goes a long way toward establishing dictatorship in Canada.

Mr. McIvor: Of the right kind.

Mr. Green: The hon. member for Fort William says it is the right kind of dictatorship. He has been here a long time, and I have never yet seen him fail to spend most of his energies in the house in backing up anything the hon. member for Port Arthur, who is the Minister of Trade and Commerce, wanted to do or say. The hon. member even backed him up when it meant piping oil to Superior, Wisconsin, instead of to the lakehead in Canada.

This bill shows the arrogance of the present government. If the House of Commons were more evenly balanced the government would never dare bring in a measure of this kind. It is only because the House of Commons is so lop-sided that that is done. One reason for that situation is that during the election campaign the Minister of Trade and Commerce failed to tell the people facts which were facts, and several other ministers did the same thing. They got great support by reason of the misrepresentations that were made, or the failure to make any representations.

I repeat that the government would never have dared to bring in a measure of this type had the house not been so overwhelmingly Liberal. It is an indication of the trend toward a one-party state for Canada. One has only to read the speech delivered by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) last Saturday before the National Liberal Federation to realize that he thinks that there is only one party in Canada. That is a dangerous frame of mind and bodes ill for the Canadian people. This measure can fairly be described as a menace to democratic government in Canada.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I have no apology to make for saying this was the right kind of dictatorship. The former minister of transport, the former minister of munitions and supply, the former minister of reconstruction and supply and the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) have given service to Canada that is second to none. This debate boils down to one thing: Can we trust the Minister of Trade and Commerce? We trusted him during the war, and he has grown since that time. At the close of his war work he could stand up in the house and defy any man to show where a dishonest dollar had been made, and that is the kind of dictatorship we want in Canada. Which is safer, Mr. Speaker, one man to buy for the Department of National Defence or half a dozen men? There is no overlapping. If I wished I could give you an example of how the Minister of Trade and Commerce would not allow anybody to make a dishonest dollar.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) should say that we want any form of dictatorship. On the other hand, I was not surprised to hear the hon. member speak as he did because, so far as I can see since I have been in the house, his principal function has been to sing the amen chorus for the Liberal party. In rising to take part in the debate on this most important bill, I want to say before proceeding that I rise not only as a member of the house and of the C.C.F. group but also as a veteran who served Canada in the first world war, volunteered to serve in the second world war and who is willing to serve at any time in the necessary defence of this country.

Section 1 of the bill says that the act may be cited as the Defence Supplies Act, and the explanatory note reads as follows:

> The purpose of the bill is to repeal the Department of Munitions and Supply Act and the earlier Defence Purchases, Profits Control and Financing Act, 1939, and replace them by the Defence Supplies Act restricted to provisions that are necessary for defence purposes in peacetime.

Parnell, the radical Irish leader in the parliament of Great Britain, when he rose to speak on one occasion on a bill in connection with the Irish question, had this to say: "I smell a rat. I see it hovering in the air. I will nip it in the bud." In brief that illustrates the attitude of the party to which I belong as to the bill now before the house.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Was it not Sir Boyle Roche who said that rather than Parnell?

Mr. Knowles: It is the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) who is saying it now.

Mr. Herridge: I think I am correct. What is the attitude of Canadians generally at this time? This is an important measure so far as they are concerned. I listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). He placed great emphasis upon the powers given to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) under the bill. I am going to approach the bill from a somewhat different point of view, and I trust I will not repeat the arguments of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. The great majority of the Canadian people are most anxious to see peace in the world today. The great majority are loyal to our country, and if necessary would give their utmost in its defence. The great majority of the Canadian people know that wars of the past were, and wars of the future will be, caused by one of two things or both of them, the struggle for power and/or the struggle for possessions.

I believe the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) are men who seek and desire peace. I believe they sincerely hope that the United Nations will function, and that somehow or other we can develop peaceful relations betwen the two great opposing forces in the world today. Nevertheless I am sure that if they are going to convince a considerable number of sincere Canadians of their sincerity in this regard they have got to do certain things that have not been done to date, and that are not provided for in one instance in the provisions of the bill. In order to convince the Canadian people that the government is doing all it can to work for world peace, I believe it has to demonstrate more fully that it is working to secure the implementation of article 2 of the Atlantic pact. I also believe that for the government to convince the vast majority of the Canadian people that it is working for peace it must make certain that no one shall profit out of preparations for the defence of Canada in the future. What is the attitude of the party to which I belong?

An hon. Member: You tell us.

Mr. Herridge: I will tell you. On January 31, 1949, my leader, when speaking in the house, placed on record the official policy of the C.C.F. with relation to the present international situation. At that time he had this to say, as recorded at page 92 of Hansard:

> The C.C.F. however, insist that such a pact should be based upon the broad principle so clearly stated in the Brussels treaty. It must provide for the fullest possible economic co-operation, aim at a high standard of living and increasing democracy in all participating countries, and thus give the western world the dynamic democratic leadership which is the only real answer to communism.

Further on he had this to say:

> The probable cost of the military and other commitments to this pact make more urgent than ever the immediate introduction of the C.C.F. policy to place the burden of taxation on those best able to bear it. It also emphasizes the need for measures of control over industry and production, which would allow for the effective planning and use of our resources to meet all our obligations and at the same time to develop a higher standard of living and social security for all our people. The C.C.F. affirms again that the best defence against communism and all forms of totalitarianism rests not on military might but on social justice.

On March 28, 1949, my leader had this to say, as reported at page 2074 of Hansard:

The proposed treaty, in article 2, pledges the parties to contribute toward the further development of peaceful and friendly international relations by strengthening their free institutions, by bringing about a better understanding of the principles upon which these institutions are founded, and by promoting conditions of stability and well-being. They pledge themselves to try to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and to encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them. Indeed, in the opinion of the C.C.F., as it was of those who formulated the United Nations charter, plans for military aid and security are of little value unless based upon a determination to build by mutual agreement the positive social and economic conditions of peace which involve wide measures of international planning for the common good.

Every proposal to increase and distribute food supplies and other necessities of life is a proposal to remove the causes of discontent which, in turn, cause men to grasp the promises of dictators whether they are of the fascist or of the communist variety.

At page 2076 of Hansard for the same date he had this to say:

Then, too, because of our own geographical situation, our military preparedness would be a crippling burden to us. As a part of the North Atlantic fraternity both our danger and our burdens should be lessened. But whatever burdens in the field of defence are involved—and let me say this to the government with all the emphasis that I can give it—no one must be allowed to profit in the production of instruments of war. We urged before the last war that all munitions industries should be nationalized. We reiterate that now and demand that profiteering in related industries must be eliminated by every means at our disposal.

That is the attitude of the C.C.F. towards preparations for defence and the deficiencies exhibited in the bill. We are not alone in that; leaders of all parties have expressed their desire to see armament industries nationalized and to see the profits from the production of defence materials reduced. That view has been expressed by representatives of all great parties. The people of Canada have had experience in two major wars, and if this government is to convince them that we are sincere in our efforts to preserve world peace and that our preparations are purely on a defensive basis, in the opinion of this group we must do three things. First, we must do more to implement article 2 of the Atlantic treaty. Second, we must build social security in Canada more quickly. Third, we must take the profit out of preparations for defence.

Now I am going to quote some of the great leaders of the Liberal and Conservative parties. First I am going to quote the late Right Hon. William Ewart Gladstone, the great Victorian leader of the Liberal party in Great Britain. I am quite sure that even the anaemic descendants of that party in this house will still pay some attention to the words of that great statesman. I am quoting from the "Life of Gladstone" by John Morley, volume III, where Gladstone said:

. . . But one inevitable characteristic of modern war is that it is associated throughout, in all particulars, with a vast and most irregular formation of commercial enterprise. There is no incentive to Mammon-worship so remarkable as that which it affords. The political economy of war is now one of its most commanding aspects. Every farthing, with the smallest exceptions conceivable, of the scores or hundreds of millions which a war may cost, goes directly, and very violently, to stimulate production, though it is intended ultimately for waste or for destruction. Even apart from the fact that war suspends, ipso facto, every rule of public thrift, and tends to sap honesty itself in the use of the public treasure for which it makes such unbounded calls, it therefore is the greatest feeder of that lust of gold which we are told is the essence of commerce, though we had hoped it was only its occasional besetting sin. It is, however, more than this; for the regular commerce of peace is tameness itself compared with the gambling spirit which war, through the rapid shiftings and high prices which it brings, always introduces into trade. In its moral operation it more resembles, perhaps, the finding of a new gold field, than anything else.

Then I believe the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) referred to the debate on a bill which was introduced in this house in March, 1939. I want to quote in part what was said by the late Right Hon. Ian Mackenzie when introducing that bill, as it appears at page 1767 of Hansard for 1939:

The government is determined that in peacetime, where private industry must be utilized, there shall be the strictest possible regulation of profits both in the interest of the taxpayer and in deference to public abhorrence of profits made from products which involve destruction of human lives and misery among nations.

It is obvious that in introducing this bill minus the restriction of five per cent on profits the government has forgotten the words of Right Hon. Ian Mackenzie on that occasion. Then speaking in the same debate the late Hon. R. J. Manion, then leader of the Conservative opposition, had this to say at page 1774 of Hansard:

It is suggested I proposed that there should be no profits at all in the manufacture of munitions in Canada; but a remark of mine quoted by the minister showed that I was open to conviction in the matter, because I pointed out the danger of the idea not working out, and I left a door open. I do not believe that we could eliminate profits one hundred per cent; but if the personnel of the munitions board is well chosen and endeavours to carry out the provisions of the legislation along the lines indicated by the minister, eliminating all but five per cent—which is eliminating ninety-five per cent of profit—that should satisfy the people of the country to a large extent.

There the leader of the Conservative opposition, speaking for that party, indicated that it would like profits on munitions and defence supplies limited to five per cent. Now I come to a quotation from the speech made during the same debate by the present socialist Progressive Conservative member for Vancouver-Quadra at page 1787 of Hansard:

Sooner or later we shall have to face the question of how we are going to obtain these armaments. I suggest to the government that before they proceed any further with the present policy they should reconsider the whole question. They should arrange to use the dominion arsenals as Australia and the United Kingdom have done. I do not believe the Canadian people approve reliance being placed exclusively upon private firms for our armaments, and I do not believe they will tolerate, let alone approve, armament rings and armament trusts, which are likely to spring up as a result of the government's policy. On the other hand, I have no doubt our people would be solidly behind a policy such as that adopted by Australia and the United Kingdom, even though this policy required in the beginning a heavier capital outlay than does the present policy; the government have at hand the means of raising the money under their new plan for financing capital expenditures on a ten-year basis. I suggest that in dealing with this very important problem the government show a little more of the foresight and initiative and courage of the individual Canadian.

Today the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra largely confined his remarks to a very justifiable criticism of the enormous powers given the minister, but I noticed that he did not suggest there should be some socialization of the armament industry or of the industries producing defence supplies.

Now I should like to conclude my references, and my support of the argument we advance in this connection, with a few quotations from an article that appeared in Maclean's magazine of August 1, 1931. The article is headed, "Salesmen of death. The truth about war makers, by Lieutenant Colonel George A. Drew." In this article I find the strongest arguments in favour of the C.C.F. approach to the munitions problem that have been given in printed form by a member of any other party in this country. The subheading reads, "A plain-spoken denunciation of an armament industry which makes wars to make money . . . 'this Frankenstein monster must be smashed or it will smash civilization.' ". The article goes on:

Strangely enough, in all the discussions which have taken place in anticipation of the conference which is now but a few months away, the outstanding lesson of the last great Geneva—the naval disarmament conference of 1927—had apparently been completely ignored. That lesson, which is of the utmost practical importance in preparing for the next conference, lay in the disclosure that behind national competition in armaments and navies lies a vicious commercial competition of armament and shipbuilding companies which seek to promote international ill will for the purpose of preserving a ready market for the death-dealing equipment they produce. The lesson of that conference was perfectly clear; that private profit in the production of armament furnishes one of the most active sources of international friction, which can be removed only by some form of national ownership which would eliminate the personal advantages resulting from sales.

It was only to be expected that a very definite limitation should be placed on the possibility of personal profit from this enormous national demand, and in 1915 all armament factories were placed under government control by the Munitions Act, and the public assured that the profits of the industry were strictly controlled by the newly created ministry of munitions which had been placed under the dynamic leadership of David Lloyd George.

It is vitally important, for the purpose of understanding the sinister possibilities of private interest in the production of arms, that the public know what an utter sham this supposed control actually amounted to. True, the profits were controlled, but only to the extent that they were not to exceed twenty per cent, which was the average profit of the English armament companies in the years prior to the war. What this profit amounted to may be appreciated by remembering that the artillery ammunition alone shipped from England to France during the war had a value of over $4 billion. The profits on this one item amounted to something like $800 million. The story was very much the same in all the warring countries except that in the United States the percentage was even higher.

Who received the benefit of these enormous profits? Primarily, of course, it was men like Zaharoff who emerged from the war probably the wealthiest man in Europe. But this rich harvest was also shared by bishops, cabinet ministers, members of parliament, and men prominent in all walks of life. These were the financial results. What of the causes?

Further along the article continues:

Several years before the war, when Sir Frederick Borden, then minister of militia in the Laurier government, and Hon. Louis Philippe Brodeur who was later minister of naval affairs, were in London, they were lavishly entertained by officials of Vickers Limited. At dinner in the Carlton hotel one night, Mr. Brodeur was astonished at a remark made by their host who had been complaining bitterly of Premier Campbell-Bannerman's attitude toward disarmament. "Business is bad," he said. "How could it be otherwise with a man like Campbell-Bannerman in office? Why, we haven't had a war for seven years!" He made a similar comment later to Sir Frederick Borden and two of his colleagues in the cabinet, both of whom are still living, saying that the government were a hopeless lot, and that the empire was going to the dogs as there had been no war for several years and there was not even one small war in prospect. These conversations made a profound impression on Sir Wilfrid Laurier to whom they were later repeated, indicating as they did with such surprising frankness the attitude of one of England's greatest armament producers towards the disarmament proposals of Campbell-Bannerman.

Before proceeding to read another extract or two, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that Campbell-Bannerman was a Victorian Liberal who practised Liberal principles to the full. As I said before, I am sure that if some of the anaemic descendants of the great Liberals of the Victorian period were to follow more closely in the footsteps of their ancestors, this house would be presented with bills different from this one.

I continue to quote from the article:

An examination of this summary shows that while the production of the forty-eight allied companies covers an extremely wide field, most of the things they produce are necessary equipment for the modern war of machines either at the front or in the complicated supporting organizations. Significantly enough, armaments and shipbuilding occupy first place. Most other armament companies throughout the world are similarly interlocked with apparently peaceful enterprises.

This presents a real difficulty that must be faced. Any suggestion of the nationalization of armament production will undoubtedly be met by the owners with the argument that these great corporations are essentially makers of peace and not war material, and that the severance of their interdependent interests would threaten the financial security of industries upon which so many thousands of workers depend for their livelihood. Probably the reorganizations necessary would entail some hardship, although it is not suggested that the armament factories be confiscated but only that they be expropriated under proper terms of compensation. But no matter what temporary inconveniences be involved this is merely a matter of detail that should not in any way be permitted to obscure the main issue, which is simply whether it is, or is not, advisable to permit the manufacture of arms and armament by companies whose selling policies are determined by the desire for profits and not in any way measured by actual national requirements.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that we are glad to have the support of the leader of the Progressive Conservative party for the nationalization of the armament industry, and the nationalization of industries producing defence supplies.

Then he goes on to say:

It is not suggested that national ownership of the armament industry throughout the world is a panacea which will cure all international strife. There are national prejudices and age-long suspicions which will always be difficult to overcome, but these suspicions and hatreds can be overcome by education in time if they are not constantly brought to the boiling point with insidious propaganda spread by those whose business would disappear if anything approaching an effective agreement to submit to international arbitration were even achieved. Just so long, therefore, as these companies continue to be operated for profit will they continue to employ the methods of persuasion in high quarters which they have found so effective.

At another point the article states:

One serious obstacle that must be overcome in convincing the people of the world that disarmament is everybody's business is the cynical attitude which is all too common that war is an inevitable evil and that the most we can do is to postpone it as long as possible and, when the time does come, hope to be just a little better armed than our enemy. Hand in hand with this attitude is the belief that we maintain peace by being better armed than our neighbour and thus preventing attack. An excellent example of this point of view is furnished in the following extract from an editorial in the Canadian Defence Quarterly of April, 1931:

"The world today has prohibited aggressive warfare but defensive wars are permitted; therefore, the nations still regard the use of armaments as the ultimate instrument of national security. So long as this condition remains, human nature decrees that each nation will strive to be armed with armament superior in quality, and if possible quantity, to that of other nations. It is doubtful, therefore, if nations would forgo the abundant benefits which result from private enterprise in the armament field."

It is interesting to note in this article from the Canadian Defence Quarterly that even the defence department is aware of the abundant benefits which result from private enterprise in the armament field.

The article concludes with these words:

Words like these have been repeated so often that they have acquired general acceptance without any appreciation of their full import. No one, yet, has been able to demonstrate the "abundant benefits" resulting from private enterprise in the armament field, unless they be the enormous increase in the casualties to all combatants, or the huge profits acquired by men like Zaharoff, Krupp, Schneider and Grace.

Mr. Speaker, the present leader of the Progressive Conservative party has written an article of great interest at this time. I quoted the article to indicate that at least when he wrote it he believed in the nationalization or public ownership of the armament industry, and those industries producing defence armaments. There is no question about it; I believe that other governments have done better than Canada in this regard. For example, the government of Australia, as mentioned by the member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), has advanced farther in the public ownership of certain armament industries. In Great Britain much more has been done in that direction.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the explanation given by the minister for dropping the former five per cent clause respecting the limitation on profits. I believe the minister's explanation was the clearest and most logical explanation we have heard of that clause. I quite agree with the reasons for dropping the clause when the clause was phrased as it was, and one had to take into account the capital used in the production of the armaments or goods supplied. We in this group would like to see an amended clause inserted in the bill clearly restricting the profits on defence supplies to five per cent.

In general, Mr. Speaker, this group believes in the principle of public ownership. While we believe there are certain major industries that should be brought under public ownership in the near future, we certainly believe that any industry producing armaments or war supplies directly should be brought under full public ownership at this time. At least if this government is going to convince the Canadian people that groups of people in this country are not going to profit largely from the supplying of these armaments and goods, there should be introduced into this bill a five per cent limitation on profits.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in criticizing this bill we in this group believe first of all that the bill gives the minister too much power. I am not going further into that matter. We do not criticize the amount of power given to the minister on quite the same grounds as those mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). But when one looks at the bill and sees the powers given in section 3, on reading that section carefully one realizes the enormous powers given therein to one minister of this cabinet.

If this bill is to create in the minds of the Canadian people confidence in the desire of the leaders of this government, and of this government itself, to work for world peace and to prevent the building up of profits from the supplying of defence armaments and supplies, we believe there should be a clause limiting at least the profits on those armaments and supplies to five per cent. I am sure that nothing less will satisfy the Canadian people in this respect. Nothing less will give them confidence in the policy of this government and nothing less will be keeping faith with our affirmations, our beliefs and those of the Canadian people.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): When one reads a bill of this kind, Mr. Speaker, he is lead to exclaim, as a good many people throughout the country are now exclaiming: What is happening to our democracy? I draw to the minister's attention an article which was published in Maclean's magazine on the 15th of this month, in which his own picture appeared and in which certain statements are made with regard to the fate of democracy in Canada, and I would ask him to consider that article not as something facetious, not as having merely entertainment value but as being the consolidation of the opinions of a great many people throughout this country.

When the resolution preceding this bill was before the house I said that I was surprised that the minister would allow himself to be brought under the criticism which would inevitably come to him if this bill were to be introduced. My reasons for saying that are these. I want to assure the minister, Mr. Speaker, that I have regard for him and for his ability and that anything I say here today is not said by way of personal criticism of the minister at all. What I want to assure the house about is that I am opposed to granting to any minister, I do not care who he is, the sweeping economic powers which this bill proposes to grant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). My reason for opposing the granting of such sweeping powers is that it is not in the interest of democracy in peacetime to do so. We must believe in democracy. Otherwise we are a bunch of hypocrites. We talk about it enough and we try to act as if we are operating a true democracy. But when the government brings before parliament a bill of this kind, proposing to grant to any single individual sweeping powers, the extent of which I shall recite briefly in a moment, then I say to you, Mr. Speaker, there simply cannot but be the shadow, and a mighty thin one at that, of true democracy.

Why do I say that there are sweeping powers proposed in this bill? I heard the minister say the other day, speaking on the resolution, that this bill proposes to reduce the powers that he already had under certain other acts, including the Defence Purchases Act, the Department of Munitions and Supply Act and so on. That may be so; it probably is so. But that is no argument for granting at this time the powers that are included in Bill No. 302 unless, as I said the other day, the minister is prepared to show to the house and to the country that we face a real emergency.

I thought that the minister would give a statement to the house on motion for second reading of the bill in order further to clarify the situation as a result of the request that some of us made the other day about this business of an emergency. To take a look at the bill for one moment, and without dealing in detail with any of the specific clauses of it, here are some of the powers that it is proposed that we should grant to the minister. Under different types of circumstances, we propose to give to the minister the power to requisition or to expropriate anything that he sees fit to requisition or to expropriate and which he, in his opinion, feels would be necessary for the defence of this realm. That does not exclude anything, including the suit on your back or the machinery you may have in your shop.

Mr. Howe: That is going to extremes.

Mr. Low: I will admit that that is carrying it to the extreme limit; I agree; and perhaps the minister would not do that. But just the same, we are giving him the power to do that. If we are giving him the power, then there is nothing that he could not do if the proper occasion arose or if the proper combination of circumstances came about. Not only are we giving him the power to requisition or to expropriate in any way he desires or to buy anything that he thinks is necessary for the defence of the realm, but we are also giving him the power to do it at a price which he himself sets; and there is no recourse against his decision, except perhaps a costly reference to the exchequer court.

Mr. Fulton: On such terms as the minister may decide.

Mr. Low: Yes, on such terms as the minister himself may decide. That is not democracy. That is far too sweeping a power to give any man in peacetime. By the way, those who wish to get evidence of the truth of the things I have just said, have only to refer to clause 3 of the bill, with its various subdivisions.

Then there is another thing. This bill proposes to give the minister the power to compel any manager of a factory, or any board that is operating in this country a factory, an industry or a business dealing in defence materials or materials which may be required for defence, to give to the minister any information he may desire; and the only undertaking that the minister has to give is that he will not tell anybody about it. I think that is carrying the powers of any man to lengths which should never even be dreamed of in peacetime. It is all right in wartime, where we are facing real dangers, and where things have to be done quickly, for us to clothe our ministers of the crown with power to get things done, and to get information when they desire it. Certainly so; but in peacetime a minister of the crown ought to depend upon the natural processes of voluntary information, and not clothe himself with power to nose into things, when he thinks it is necessary for him to know about the business of any corporation in this country.

Through the power given the Minister of Trade and Commerce in this bill he can negotiate any contract of any kind for defence purchases, without consulting even the members of his cabinet, and certainly without consulting members of parliament. Well, if that is not a dictatorial power, I have never heard of one. Why should any minister be granted power of that kind in a time of peace? Why should all that power be vested in one man?

Of course the minister will claim he will not do it alone, and that he will have a board, perhaps, or that perhaps he will have the help of the governor in council. Provision is made in the bill that the governor in council may appoint assistants; but it does not say that they shall, or that it is necessary, or that the minister cannot negotiate contracts, make purchases or requisition materials without consulting the cabinet or without consulting parliament—not by any means.

That carries the thing absolutely too far. Section 4 of the bill states that the minister shall have exclusive right or authority to buy or otherwise to acquire defence supplies, and to construct or carry out projects required by the Department of National Defence. That clothes him, alone, with that authority; and it cuts out any other possibility of consultation or assistance. No one else can possibly run any competition—not even the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), who is supposed to be running the Department of National Defence for the people of Canada.

I believe that defence purchases, just in the same manner as any other purchases, made by a government or for or on behalf of any government, ought to be made through a purchasing or requisitioning commission. I do not think any one person in any government should even ask for those powers. In years gone by a good deal of suspicion has gone along with the concentration of purchasing power in the hands of one or just a few individuals in the government. Everyone knows about the suspicions that always attend such things. In years past most governments that have valued their standing, and that have been anxious about the operation of true democracy, have set up purchasing commissions that were independent of political interference, to do their purchasing, so as to shun the very appearance of evil.

Well, I am surprised that the Minister of Trade and Commerce would allow himself to be put in a position where the appearance of evil goes stalking after him, and will accompany him every step that he goes, so long as this measure is in force, and his name is set down as the exclusive authority for the purchase of defence supplies.

I believe the wise course in any event is to set up a commission and to clothe it with the necessary powers to make purchases—to do it quickly, to do it properly, and to render accounts as quickly as possible both to the cabinet and to members of parliament. We had a perfectly good corporation for doing that sort of thing. I understand the Canadian Commercial Corporation has been doing a good deal of purchasing of defence supplies for the government. When the other day we were discussing the resolution preceding the bill, I asked the minister to tell the house wherein the Canadian Commercial Corporation had failed to do its job, and why it was thought that that corporation was not able now to do the work efficiently.

I must say that although I reserved my decisions with respect to the bill, I said the other day that I would withhold any decision, and until such time as I had heard the minister reply to some of the questions asked, or such time as he had made a statement satisfying me, I could not possibly say whether I could support the bill. Having reserved my decision, and having now read the bill, and having heard nothing whatsoever to allay my fears, I cannot do anything but say that I most certainly oppose the bill with all my strength—and I am speaking for this group.

I believe in true democracy. I believe that in peacetime or any time other than a time of emergency, we should not clothe any man or any small group of men with authority to do arbitrarily what they alone think ought to be done for the defence of the realm or in any other way. I believe every man must render account to the representatives of the people; no man can set himself above the law. Every official of government and every minister of the crown must concede that he cannot or should not, under the rule of law, do anything except that which the will of the people demands that he do.

I am asking the minister now if he has any requests from the people of Canada to clothe him with this power. If he has not, then I ask him by what right he is bringing in this bill to clothe himself with these powers. I ask the government and his colleagues to come to his defence and to show any good reason as to why the Minister of Trade and Commerce ought to have or ask for such sweeping powers as are contained in this bill. And until such time as the people of Canada have asked that such wide and broad powers be given to him, I can only assume that they have not desired it and, for that if for no other reason, I would oppose the bill.

I do not intend to enter into any debate on the philosophical aspect of defence procurement, or anything else. I said the other day that I still have faith in private enterprise and in its ability to produce as, when and where required for the defence of the realm. But I do say that where private enterprise has failed in the past to produce and to deliver as, when and where required, it may be necessary for the government to set up some enterprise such as was done at Sarnia for the production of synthetic rubber. I think that that is all right. But I certainly oppose the government's acquiring all those industries in Canada that may contribute materials for defence or other purposes.

I shall have to say without qualification that we are in opposition to the bill, and cannot in any way condone the request of the government to clothe any one man with such extraordinary and sweeping powers.

Mr. H. A. Hosking (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in the debate I should like to assure hon. members that it is not my intention to take up much time. I rise only to ask one question and to make one point.

[Mr. Low.]

I would ask the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) who comes from British Columbia if, when he was stating the policy of national defence for the C.C.F. party, he was stating the policy of the national party or that of the British Columbia party. I believe there is a great divergence of view as between the different parties. In fact, many hon. members of this house would say that their views are at right angles to each other. I think it will be found that their views are completely opposed. I do not believe that members of such a group have the right to criticize a party that is united.

In making my point as to what is the proper method of making purchases for the Dominion of Canada I would suggest to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) that it is well known to all hon. members that a lawyer is generally the best person to defend a guilty party because he is most voluble and eloquent. I suggest to my hon. friend that he was most voluble and eloquent in trying to make his point.

Any business firm of which I have any knowledge has only one purchasing department. I am glad the Liberal party is carrying out a businesslike policy of having only one purchasing department, and I am more than pleased that the Right Hon. C. D. Howe is the man chosen to head up that purchasing department.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, this is a measure for the setting up of arbitrary power, the kind of power which in other states brought about the beginning of the destruction of the type of freedom we live under. This is being introduced in peacetime, at a time when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), who is sponsoring the bill, says that there is no emergency. This is a measure which should be utterly repugnant to anyone who believes in or has any understanding of Liberal principles. I am quite sure that I could find in the speeches of ninety per cent of the members of this house most eloquent passages declaiming against this kind of thing. As I say, it is entirely repugnant to the whole genius of our constitution.

It is difficult to speak about this because I am afraid there are a lot of people, both inside and outside the house, who think that this is just a lot of abstract nonsense being uttered by some of us who ought to know better, who ought to be practical men and not delay the house in talking.

Mr. Howe: Hear, Hear.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am going to thank the minister because at the moment he seems to be listening. I realize quite well that everything I say will go off his back just like water off a duck's, but nevertheless it is something that for the moment he is listening and seems to be interested in what I am saying. The minister is a practical man and perhaps he will think that anyone who puts in his time worrying about political theory could have employed it to better advantage. But not everyone in this house thinks that way. I know there are members of the government opposite—and some not sitting opposite today—who have not always thought that, who have been very eloquent—when I say eloquent I mean eloquent—in their objections to arbitrary government and in their belief in the rule of law. Perhaps they will be interested if I read a sentence or two from an authority which some of them know much better than I. I am going to quote from what is perhaps the greatest living English authority on the law of constitution, and I refer to Dicey. I shall quote from page 202 of the ninth edition. If hon. members will be kind enough to follow what I read I think they will come to the conclusion that if what I read does not cover this bill, then there is no such thing as making a clear statement that will cover the bill. Speaking of the rule of law he said:

It means, in the first place, the absolute supremacy or predominance of regular law as opposed to the influence of arbitrary power—

Does any sane man contend that this bill does not give arbitrary power? I am not discussing for the moment whether the minister will use that power correctly. We all know the minister is a sensible and capable man, but that is not the point. This is arbitrary power and in giving arbitrary power to a man you must consider that while you may give it to a man you believe is a good man, that power may get into the hands of a man you might not consider to be good. You might even find that a good man is somewhat corrupted by power, but we shall not deal with that. I read on:

—and excludes the existence of arbitrariness,—

Does anyone doubt that there is arbitrariness in this bill? The minister can ask a man to do something and if he refuses he can have him fined $5,000. That is the effect of this bill. If the minister and that man do not see eye to eye, he may be fined and have no recourse. I continue:

—of prerogative, or even of wide discretionary authority on the part of the government.

Does anyone doubt that all those things are deeply embedded in this bill? I quote again:

It means, again, equality before the law, or the equal subjection of all classes to the ordinary law of the land administered by the ordinary law courts—

Is that what this bill provides?

—the "rule of law" in this sense excludes the idea of any exemption of officials or others from the duty of obedience to the law which governs other citizens or from the jurisdiction of the ordinary tribunals:

By this bill the minister is excused from obedience to the law; he is put above the law. I should like to quote at this time something which many of you have seen day after day if you have the judgment, whether it is good or bad, to read the Globe and Mail. This is what appears at the head of the editorial page:

The subject who is truly loyal to the chief magistrate will neither advise nor submit to arbitrary measures.

If this bill is not an arbitrary measure, I should like to know what it is. I want to make this point as clear as I can. I have said that there is no emergency. I said the other day, and I repeat what the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) has already said, that if there was an emergency nobody would be readier than we on this side to give emergency powers. But we have been told, and we are entitled to rely on that, that there is no emergency. After saying that we were ready to give the powers if they were necessary, I went on to say, as reported on page 3483 of Hansard of June 12:

I say that before we can be asked, or should be asked, to give any such powers as these we should know exactly what kind of difficulties are facing the minister at the moment. What are the things that cannot be done under the powers of the Canadian Commercial Corporation and the other authorities which do exist? Nothing has been said yet to indicate that.

Then I went on to say that I and those with whom I was associated would be only too ready to act if there was an emergency. I will say this about the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He has contact with and a status with the business community of this country which the rest of us might envy. I do not begrudge him the fact that he has built it up perfectly properly. I contend that without all these additional powers to which I so strongly object the minister could carry on with the existing organizations. The minister has great influence now. I will not say that I like it all and I will not say that I like some of the measures which have given it to him, for some of those measures do give him a considerable amount of power.

Of course the minister's answer to my question was no answer at all. He gave us a hair-splitting statement that this measure was really taking power away from him—and in a narrow technical way he was correct—because he told us that the Department of Munitions and Supply Act which was widely used during the war was still on the statute books, and that under it he had greater powers. I think that is quite true except as I said when I interjected this morning—and I say it again—to all intents and purposes in the last few years that act has been as dead as Queen Anne. The fact that the minister, who is pretty good at using power, did not invoke the act so far as I know, and certainly not to any great extent, proves to my satisfaction that it was really in the discard.

As to the measure we have before us, I am not going to take much of the time of the house to discuss it. I would ask members to read section 2 in order that they may see the range of it, how much it covers—it will fairly take your breath away—and then read the other clauses and see the power that is given. I am not going into detail on that because my point is to argue that here we have an arbitrary measure which is not needed, that the existing law is perfectly adequate, and that no attempt has been made to satisfy us that the existing law is not adequate. Yet we are asked to pass the bill, and I suppose the majority will vote it through.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I assure my hon. friend that the existing law is much more than adequate.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Oh, yes, you mean the munitions and supply act.

Mr. Howe: That is the existing law under which purchasing is carried on.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If you want to split hairs you are quite right.

Mr. Howe: I am not splitting hairs.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): You are quite ready to do so. I will repeat my point, and members will have to judge for themselves. The Department of Munitions and Supply Act has been on the statute books, and is like a lot of other statutes which they have forgotten to repeal. I think the minister will not deny that it has virtually not been availed of, and what I am interested in and what we are all interested in is not what is in the munitions and supply act but what is in the bill before the house.

Mr. Howe: If my hon. friend thinks the munitions and supply act is not being invoked, let me point out to him there are a few cases before the exchequer court where the appellants really believe it has been invoked.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If the minister wants to go back into ancient history—

Mr. Howe: They are over there now.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Cases often stay quite a long time in the law courts, and I expect if one looked into this matter the same thing would prove to be true. Let the minister talk about the munitions and supply act if he wants to. What I am interested in is the bill now before us. At any rate the minister will agree that the bill before us will replace the Department of Munitions and Supply Act. I want to deal with the bill for a minute or two. Of course the powers are very wide and involve stockpiling, making contracts and, as has already been pointed out, stepping into the shipbuilding industry. As I said, I do not need to go into any more detail. I want to say, however, that it was put to me by a man whose judgment I respect very much, and could not possibly disregard, that the things contemplated to be done under the bill need to be done in order to get on with the business of our defence. I told him that I think I am just as anxious as anybody is to see the business of our defence proceeded with, but that nothing has been said to indicate that the powers presently existing under the Canadian Commercial Corporation and the defence department, which will get their votes, are not sufficient to make it unnecessary for us to have this measure.

A question occurred to me but I think I have answered it to my own satisfaction already. I take it that the bill is not ancillary to the vote that we will be passing for the Department of National Defence, that no attempt is being made to get further moneys in this way, and that everything that must be done by way of purchasing must be done under the estimates relating to the Department of National Defence. In other words, this is not an indirect way of getting what should be got directly.

There is one point that should be mentioned. There has been a rather feeble and childish attempt to say in the bill that if there is a disagreement on price then the matter may be referred to the exchequer court. I should like to ask the minister what he would have thought when he was in business of fixing prices before the exchequer court. I venture to say that the minister would have said, "What, go and spend months and months before a court!" He would have settled the matter then and there one way or another. I think it is a most unmeaning provision which is put in there as a kind of gesture to try to lessen the appearance of arbitrariness which sticks out everywhere in the bill.

I have tried to express my view on this question. What disturbs me most is the manner in which the bill has been received. One hon. member told us this afternoon that this is the kind of dictatorship we want. Many foolish things may have been said in the house but I wonder if anything more foolish was ever said. I hope nothing so foolish will ever be said again during my time in the house as "that is the kind of dictatorship we want." One might have hoped that among the serried ranks of the government supporters, 190 members, there might have been somebody to speak out against the bill. One is almost tempted to call the roll of some of the ministers who, one knows, cannot possibly like this kind of thing. Apparently, however, they have allowed themselves to be lulled to sleep in some way or other, or they believe, like the hon. member who spoke a little while ago, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce can do no wrong, which has really nothing to do with the matter anyway.

I cannot expect the Minister of Trade and Commerce to be interested in these remarks. I am surprised that he has remained in the house because he must regard it as an utter waste of time to talk about political principles. The minister is a man of action, and indeed I think he regards the House of Commons as a rather foolish place. I think when we ask him questions about the business he is conducting he regards it as a rather unwarranted intrusion on private life. I thought so the other day when he said quite frankly that the Polymer Corporation was not a public enterprise but was his enterprise, and I think I know the way he meant it. It was said in all good faith, and there was a considerable measure of truth in it. As I said a moment ago, one might have expected something different from some of the other men in the cabinet. There was a time when I would have thought that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) would have taken this kind of thing seriously. As I have said, there are other men in the cabinet who I know would have taken it seriously at one time, but I do not think anything is to be gained by conducting a poll.

I cannot take my seat without expressing the hope that there will be at least one among the 190 members of the government side who will say a word in favour of what I believe to be freedom and against what I believe to be the extremity of arbitrariness. If that is not to happen, if there is nobody in the majority, about which we are so often reminded, who will speak out in that fashion, then I can only hope that the voices of those who are objecting will be heard outside the house, and that church and educational institutions and people everywhere who understand that freedom is a delicate plant that needs constant cherishing will give voice to that feeling in order that this measure, which I regard as arbitrary and evil, may not be passed in its present form. I shall vote against it, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, because I feel this legislation is so charged with terrible consequences I find I must not only vote against it but speak against it when the bill is before the house with Your Honour in the chair. This type of legislation always presents members with a serious dilemma. We are told that the international situation is such that we are called upon to take strenuous and unusual measures to arm and equip ourselves, to build up stockpiles and so on, in order that we may be prepared for an emergency which we all hope will not actually arise but which unfortunately might arise. When it is put upon the basis that what is to be done under the new bill is in the best interests of the country, you are placed in a very difficult position when considering whether or not you should oppose it. Having given the matter that consideration, however, and being fully aware of the seriousness of what the minister said when he indicated that he needed these powers, I find I cannot agree that these powers are necessary, and have come to the conclusion that the bill is fraught with more harmful consequences than the good that may be done under it.

I want to make it clear, Mr. Speaker, that we are not objecting to the things that are to be done under the bill; that is, the stockpiling and so on. As other speakers have said, if we were convinced that this was the only way in which those precautions could be taken that we want to see taken, then I suppose reluctantly we would have to agree to this legislation. But I am not in the least convinced of that. I cannot see why the minister needs this tremendous, sweeping power for which he is asking, in order to carry on defence purchases, in order to instruct the Canadian Commercial Corporation which already exists and is already authorized to act as the defence purchasing agent. I hope the minister will explain that to us, for I cannot see it.

I wish it were not always the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) who is concerned in these things, because sometimes I am sure he must feel that we have a personal antipathy to him. That is not the case, but it seems all these matters concern the same minister, and he is the minister we have to criticize all the time.

Mr. Mitchell: He has not done a bad job for this nation.

Mr. Fulton: I do not know why the government keeps repeating that. It is readily admitted that during the war he did a good job for the nation. Let us analyse the power we are giving a minister; let us call him

Minister X. We are asked to give him power to control not only the plants which directly manufacture the materials of war but everything which may enter into a defence project. The mining industry, the lumbering industry, the clothing industry; every conceivable element of our economic life that could possibly enter into the manufacture of anything which might be needed in connection with national defence, directly or indirectly, is to be under the complete control of one minister. Not only has he power to set the price, to compel people to make delivery within a certain time, and so on, but there is no appeal from that arbitrary power except a very limited and, as the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) has said, a really nugatory appeal by reference to the exchequer court as to the matter of price. And I think it is important to note that any such reference must be on terms laid down by the Minister of Justice. That is provided in the bill. A man has not the right to take his case before the exchequer court as he sees fit; it will be presented to the court on the terms contained in a reference drawn up by the Minister of Justice, and then only in reference to the price. What about the other matters? There is no appeal. The minister can set a time limit just as unreasonable as can be conceived. There is no appeal. It may be a physical impossibility to conform to that time limit, and because a man is unable to do so he may be liable to a penalty of $5,000.

I think it is fair, too, to observe that we have not been told of the proximity of this emergency which is said to justify the granting of these powers. By one minister we are told that nothing has happened at the recent conferences to change the picture as far as we are concerned. Then we are asked by another minister for powers which I think it is correct to say have never before been taken by a government in peacetime, when we have not been told that an emergency is imminent.

Having been told by one minister that nothing has happened to change the outlook as far as we are concerned, I cannot vote for a bill which gives another minister these undemocratic powers, when we have not had any further explanation as to the real necessity for them.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it seems particularly strange that when a bill of this kind is before the house for the first time in printed form the minister should not consider it necessary to explain the bill in detail when hon. members would have an opportunity of following what he had to say with the words actually before them. He gave a broad statement when the resolution was before the house, and when that resolution was in the committee stage he replied to certain points that had been raised. As yet, however, he has made no attempt to explain this extremely important bill, to analyse its effect in relation to the other legislation that is integrated with it, or to give hon. members one solid reason why we should be called upon to confer these extremely wide powers in peacetime.

Mr. Howe: I overrated the intelligence of the opposition. If I were starting again I would give a more comprehensive explanation.

Mr. Drew: I should be very glad to resume my seat and continue later if the minister is prepared to give an explanation, as long as he would not close the debate.

Mr. Howe: I am afraid that procedure would not be parliamentary.

Mr. Drew: I have examined the bill, and I am convinced that far from being more restricted, in many ways this legislation goes much further in peacetime than at least one of the acts which it repeals. The Department of Munitions and Supply Act, which is being repealed, is written in considerable detail, making it possible to understand exactly what is intended, what procedure is to be followed, and what actually are the powers of the minister. One of the well established principles of all legislation of this kind is that words appearing in an act must be read with the continuing meaning of those words right through the act; and in the Department of Munitions and Supply Act the words used relate very largely to munitions of war. It is perfectly obvious that in peacetime munitions of war are limited. Therefore I suggest that far from being narrower, when the new legislation refers to everything required for defence purposes it has a very much wider application than the munitions and supply act, which is still in effect and which is based largely upon the requirement for munitions of war.

I recognize, though I do not think the minister has clearly explained it, that some legislation is required to carry on the activities of the Canadian Commercial Corporation if the Department of Munitions and Supply Act is to be repealed, as undoubtedly it should be repealed having regard to the words I mentioned and the obvious fact that it is a wartime act. Nevertheless it would seem to me that the simple and proper way to deal with this, to the extent that such a change in legislation may be necessary, is to add any amending sections that are required to the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act. Failing that, if for any reason it is not thought the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act should be continued, then the Defence Purchases, Profits Control, and Financing Act, 1939, which was a peacetime act, could be continued; and whatever amendments are regarded as desirable as a result of experience in intervening years could be made.

Let us see exactly what this particular act does. Here is an act which, if the members will only fully examine it, places practically the whole of our economy in the hands of this minister; that is written in four pages, and a considerable part of it is the definitive part of the act. Brevity is always highly desirable where brevity serves a useful purpose. When you are handing over to a minister the powers that are conferred by this act brevity, to the extent that it does not in any way bring any measure of control over the activities of the minister for the protection of the public or even for the protection of the government itself, is brevity of a dangerous kind.

Let us examine what this act does. It gives to the minister, according to section 3 (a), the power to:

> buy or otherwise acquire, exchange, process, develop, repair, maintain, store and transport defence supplies;

What are "defence supplies"? Defence supplies are defined in section 2 of the act, and this is the definition:

> "Defence supplies" means arms, ammunition, implements of war, vehicles, mechanical and other equipment, watercraft, amphibious craft, aircraft, animals, goods, wares, merchandise, articles and materials of all kinds required for any project or otherwise for the purposes of defence;

The only limitation upon the all-embracing effect of those words I have read, which embrace every conceivable thing which is available for our use in this country, is that it be for defence purposes. In addition to all the wide specific terms used in that section, it says, "articles and materials of all kinds." Surely, that is wide enough. We have been told that defence means the strength of the whole nation. What single thing is there that cannot be interpreted as for defence? It may be interpreted as necessary for defence to take over any part of the animal population of this country. It may be regarded as necessary for the purpose of defence to operate all the railways; it may be regarded as necessary for the purpose of defence to take over the control of production of all wood products; it may be regarded as necessary for the purpose of defence, having regard to the fact that our economy is in itself such an essential part of defence, to take over the control of the banks and other financial institutions. Do not let anyone say this is too wide an interpretation. As indicated in the Atlantic pact itself, all these things are regarded as part of the strength of a nation to defend itself. It is still within the scope of these wide powers for the minister to declare that those things are necessary for defence.

Under this act the minister can buy and sell, and generally deal in all these various things that may be embraced by such a definition. Let us look at section 3 (b). It reads:

> acquire, store and maintain stocks of strategic materials, and other materials or articles entering into the manufacture of defence supplies or the construction, development, repair or maintenance of projects, and sell or otherwise dispose of such materials or articles and use the whole or any part of the proceeds for the acquisition of further such materials or articles;

Mr. Speaker, once the step has been taken to declare that any particular segment of our economy is an essential requirement to our defence, this may become a great national trading organization exercising its influence directly over the whole of our daily activity in this country. Granted that the minister goes rather far today, granted that the minister has extremely wide powers under other existing acts; but this goes further than anything we have had before. It goes farther than one of the acts it repeals, the Department of Munitions and Supply Act.

Let us consider section 3(c), which reads:

> construct or otherwise acquire, carry out, develop, repair and maintain any project;
> (d) arrange for the performance of commercial and professional services;
> (e) require any person who is obligated by any contract to deliver any defence supplies . . .

and so on. Under section 3(e)—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but as he knows, he should not refer to specific clauses of the bill on second reading. That can more properly be done in the committee. At this stage we are discussing the principle of the bill.

Mr. Drew: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall proceed to state what it does do. This bill makes it possible for the minister to require any person who produces, deals in, or has in his possession or control, any materials or articles needed for the completion of a contract, with respect to which a requirement has already been established, to give certain priorities. As outlined by the minister the other day, another provision of this act is that the minister may require any person to furnish such information respecting defence supplies dealt in by him, or projects of a type executed by him or respecting his production and other facilities relating thereto, in such time and manner as the minister may specify.

Where is the rule of law? Where is the defence of the rights of the individual? We have been hearing a lot about a bill of rights, both in the international and in the domestic field. Where is the right of any individual if a minister, no matter who that minister may be, may require information of this kind? There is no definition as to the type of information that is wanted, nor is there any measure of restraint excepting the discretion of the minister himself.

Then the act does provide for the employment of the Canadian Commercial Corporation. There is also a provision that the minister may do further things, and mark the extent of this. In case these powers are not wide enough, and I would not have thought there was any doubt about that, then the minister may do any other such thing as may be authorized by the governor in council in regard to the procurement and disposal of defence supplies and projects.

What is a defence project? During the war one defence project of great importance, and one which was completed with commendable speed, was the great power plant at Arvida. But what we have before this house at the present time, in peacetime, is the power to do that sort of thing in this time of peace. If that was actually a part of our defence requirements in war, it certainly is a part of our defence requirements in peace; and this bill is wide enough for this minister to construct anywhere in Canada, quite outside the scope of any other legislation that this house has adopted, any power project for the purpose of providing power which he might think necessary for the potential defence of this country. Those are the realities. Any one of those things I have suggested is not in any way a straining of the actual, clear and explicit meaning of the words of this bill that is before us.

Then again the bill has the effect of repealing the Defence Purchases, Profits Control, and Financing Act, 1939, which has already been referred to. In the explanation given by the minister, which he has not followed up and which he says must be taken as the full information that we are to have from the man who is to be declared a dictator under this act, it is interesting to note that he nevertheless did not even bother to explain to us why it was necessary to repeal the act known as the Defence Purchases, Profits Control, and Financing Act, 1939. That act has this interesting feature. It was a peacetime act based upon certain experience which demonstrated the necessity of preventing profiteering in defence supplies in peacetime. That act imposed certain restraints that were regarded as wise by this government as a result of disclosures which had been made as to the profits which were resulting from some of the preparations then being made for defence, such as those which are contemplated under this present bill. Why should we remove all those restraints and all those protections which are contained in an act which was brought into this house with such acclaim?

With regard to the Canadian Commercial Corporation, we also know that this has been described to us as a highly efficient means of obtaining the defence requirements of this country. The last statement made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) during the last session of this house refers to this organization and its place in the procurement of our defence requirements. At the time that act was introduced, on July 2, 1947, the then minister of trade and commerce, Mr. MacKinnon, had this to say, as reported at page 4948 of Hansard of that date:

> The government, in deciding to continue a single civilian purchasing agency for the services, was anxious to take advantage of the efficient organization that had already been built up and was functioning under the Department of Reconstruction and Supply. Many of the key personnel involved in these activities during the war are now carrying out duties as employees of the Canadian Commercial Corporation, and handling procurement problems for foreign governments and UNRRA.

As one reads on in that speech, it becomes quite clear that it was intended that the Canadian Commercial Corporation should be the peacetime procurement agency for our defence requirements. Then the Minister of National Defence himself, as reported at page 4959 of Hansard of July 2, 1947, in referring to this act said this:

> It is not a wartime show because it is not wartime, but this carries into peacetime in the person of Mr. W. D. Low and other senior officials the experience and the knowledge and the files and the contacts with industry throughout the country which the Department of Munitions and Supply built up over six years.

That quotation leaves no doubt that the house was being informed that this Canadian Commercial Corporation, as the civilian procurement agency for the Department of National Defence and for the government, was carrying forward the experience of the six years' activities of the department of munitions and supply; and that, as the Minister of National Defence stated, the expert staff of the department of munitions and supply were being transferred to the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

Then also to emphasize that this was a body that was doing the things which had been done by the Department of Munitions and Supply Act, the Minister of National Defence said at a later point in his remarks:

> As I pointed out, these are exactly the same people who had this continuous association through the Department of Munitions and Supply with the suppliers of munitions during the war.

That was the idea that the house had. It has actually been the role of this Canadian Commercial Corporation.

Mr. McIlraith: And it still is.

Mr. Drew: Then again the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) had this to say on July 2, 1947, as reported at page 4964 of Hansard in referring to this same organization:

> It was felt that some central agency of government other than the Department of National Defence could do defence purchasing. When the Canadian Commercial Corporation was created a large portion of the personnel of the purchasing branch of munitions and supply was transferred to that department.

This bill that is before us has the effect of establishing on a new basis the powers of the minister. If the courts today were called upon to interpret the powers under the Department of Munitions and Supply Act, which uses terms that indicate that war is actually under way, the courts of this country, under well-established legal principles, would give an interpretation to the sections of it, bearing in mind at all times that these sections were drafted in time of war and were intended for war purposes, and therefore would give as narrow an interpretation as could reasonably be given to the extension of any powers conferred in that act. But if a court is called upon to define this present bill, the judges will properly say, under established principles of legal interpretation: This act was passed in peacetime; the parliament of Canada, knowing that there was no war, gave this tremendously wide power and therefore, having regard to the width and breadth of the terms, we must interpret this act in the broadest way. For that very reason, Mr. Speaker, I submit that this bill, as it stands now, gives infinitely wider powers to the minister than those which he has under the Department of Munitions and Supply Act, an act which is much longer and which goes into a great deal more detailed explanation. But certainly the repeal of the act which limits profits is one which should be examined carefully; I refer to the act known as the Defence Purchases, Profits Control, and Financing Act, 1939. I am aware that during the time I was out of the house this afternoon the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) quoted something that I had written some time ago in regard to the manufacturing of munitions of war or, rather, of defence supplies.

I certainly believe, as I believed then, that where industry is called upon to produce something under the dreadful necessity of arming this country, and where they have not all the problems of competitive selling, but rather only the simple fulfilment of a contract handed to them by the government, with a certainty of payment and a certainty of profit, those profits should be strictly limited, and that the needs of the country should not be the basis of extravagant profits at any time.

But I certainly would be most reluctant to see this House of Commons so casually and so callously disposing of this act, which does still make it possible to prevent profiteering from the demands created by danger to our freedom. If anything, I should like to see this act amended and brought up to date. I do not in any way change the views I held before. On the contrary, all that has happened since then has impressed more firmly upon my mind, even than it was at the time I wrote the article "Salesmen of Death", that there should be the most effective possible control over profiteering at the time that the dreadful threat to our freedom necessitates the expenditure of enormous sums of the people's money, resulting in heavy burdens of taxation for Canadians now and in the years ahead.

Hon. members appear to feel that there should not be debate even upon this vitally important subject. They would like to take the view expressed by one member, and say, "We trust the minister, so let her go. Don't bother about the act. Don't bother about the powers. The minister is a good fellow. Parliament doesn't need to know. We are sure he will do everything all right, no matter what power he has." It is something like the old saying, "Don't shoot the man at the piano; he is doing his best."

But this goes further than that. The man at the piano may be doing his best, but there are faulty notes that have been struck, and it would be well for us to examine this piece a little more carefully before we are satisfied that this is the best we can do. Because, after all, we are the ones who have to assume the responsibility—not the government.

In this particular case I would recommend to many hon. members, and particularly members of the government, that they read from Hansard of March 10, 1939, beginning at page 1751, where the then minister of national defence explained the reasons for introducing this legislation to control profiteering. In that speech he took occasion to quote the then prime minister of Canada, whose views, even while he still lives, have been given something of a measure of sanctity by members of his party. At least they profess that those views have particular force. And, no matter what political opinions might be expressed otherwise, many of his views were extremely sound.

On this particular occasion the then minister of national defence quoted the words of the then prime minister, as they appear at page 1753 of Hansard. These are the words of the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King:

> I share the hon. member's abhorrence of anything in the nature of profiteering. I cannot imagine a more contemptible means of seeking to make one's fortune than by doing so at the expense of the lives of others. . . .
> If there are to be no profits, I cannot think of any way in which industry can be carried on other than by its complete nationalization.
> . . . The choice lies between state monopoly and private industry, or partly the one and partly the other. . . .
> Guns and shot and powder are not the only materials required for war. They are not the only materials that present a temptation in the matter of profits when war occurs. . . .
> Are all these things to be procured only under a government owned and controlled system which will not permit of profits being made? All that could result from a policy of that sort, if it were possible, would be the creation of a non-profit socialist island inside a competitive economy. But I doubt very much if we could get that far in Canada in a great many years, and, even if we did, whether it would be a good thing for the country. . . . I am afraid that for a long time to come we would not recover what in the interval we had lost in the way of individual initiative and freedom. . . .
> Government manufacture may be desirable in regard to certain kinds of essential supplies which we require continuously.
> I think private industry, where it is engaged in the manufacture of munitions and war materials, has to be watched closely to see that excessive profits are not made. . . .
> We should seek most carefully to control private industry, but I cannot see how, in a system of competitive industry, you can totally eliminate the possibility of some profit being made. As hon. members of the house know, there is a great variety of special articles required as war supplies and equipment. It would be going much too far not to expect these to be obtained at least in part from private concerns which would expect to make some profit. Where, however, private industry is permitted to undertake the manufacture of munitions and war supplies, I believe there should be very strict government supervision. All contracts should contain provisions which will ensure that there will be no opportunity for other than a reasonable profit. I may tell my hon. friend that this whole matter has been given very careful consideration by the government. So far as any contracts with which we may have anything to do are concerned, every effort will be made to prevent anything in the nature of undue profits being secured by those who obtain the contracts.

Those words of Mr. Mackenzie King were offered as the basis for the argument put forward. Hon. members did not say then, as one hon. member said this afternoon—and I am sure sincerely—"Well, certainly, we want everything done properly. But we trust the minister; so let him go ahead. We do not want any details as to how it is to be done." But that was not the way it was done then. And it was this very government—this very government—which at that time, having stated the needs, did not say, "We rely on this minister", or that minister. On the contrary they introduced the Defence Purchases, Profits Control and Financing Act, 1939, in peacetime, and passed that act for the purpose of doing the very thing they said should be done.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this government certainly is not the one to tell us, and to tell the people of Canada, that that practice was unsound, that we are to abandon any measure of statutory control over profits, that we are to abandon any of the restraints that were imposed in peacetime—in 1939—because of the disclosure of certain profiteering that had taken place at that time. It would seem that this is the government which in the light of the experience of the years should say, "We are going to strengthen that act." If this government were prepared to say, "We think at this stage that the Canadian Commercial Corporation, as procurement agency for the government for defence supplies—"

Mr. Howe: The Canadian Commercial Corporation is not; it has never been the government procurement agency for the Department of National Defence. I have said that three times in this debate.

Mr. Drew: If the minister said that three times in this debate he said something three times that is the direct opposite of what the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) has said. The Minister of National Defence has said that it is the procurement agency and the quotations from Hansard I have just given indicate that at the time the bill was introduced the house was informed that it was to be the procurement agency for the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Howe: Nothing of the kind.

Mr. Drew: In fact it is the procurement agency for the Department of National Defence at the present time. It operates as the procurement agency for the Department of National Defence under this device: By an amendment the Minister of Trade and Commerce was made the minister responsible for the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

Mr. Howe: Not at all.

Mr. Drew: The minister was also given the power to avail himself of such provisions under the munitions and supply act as are required for the carrying out of the duties of the Canadian Commercial Corporation as the agency. The statements I have read by those who introduced that act have absolutely no meaning, more than that they were insincere and improper and misleading, unless they were intended to convey, and did convey, the impression that the Canadian Commercial Corporation was to be the post-war civilian body set up by this government as the procurement agency for the Department of National Defence.

Having done that, if the government thinks that its powers should be widened, if the government thinks that some of the provisions of the munitions and supply act which are being employed in connection with the activities of the Canadian Commercial Corporation should be widened, then it would be a simple thing to bring in an amendment to the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act. If the government decided that, instead of having two acts, there should be one, it would be possible for them to introduce an amendment to the provisions of the Defence Purchases, Profits Control, and Financing Act, 1939. Then we would have in one act an up to date, effective and understandable piece of legislation dealing with the procurement of the defence requirements of this country.

At this point let me make one thing perfectly clear. The experience and service of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) in war as in peace demonstrate his unusual ability to discuss this whole subject, and what he has said leaves no doubt whatever that we want the most effective, the most efficient and the most up to date procedure that is available for the purpose of giving to our armed forces on land, in the air and at sea the finest type of equipment that human ingenuity and our productive capacity can produce. That is what we have been urging.

When we were urging the Minister of National Defence to tell us what we need under this new agreement which was settled in London only a couple of weeks ago and which the press of the world has hailed as a history-making agreement, we were really asking him to tell us frankly what kind of equipment our forces need. We were asking him to tell us how we could support him in giving to these men in uniform, whether it be khaki, light blue or dark blue, the very best that a great industrial nation could give to them with the backing of parliament which represents the people. That is what we have been asking.

I am only putting this forward in the belief that we should have an act which retains in the hands of parliament those appropriate controls which are the responsibility of parliament in peacetime. This bill should provide legislation which will give the most effective possible productive opportunities in this country to provide those things that we really need, and it should also retain whatever restraints there should be and introduce whatever new restraints there should be so that this cruel demand which has been enforced upon our taxpayers so shortly after another war for hundreds of millions of dollars for our defence shall not be the means of profiteering now or in the future.

This present bill, far from being restrictive, is the broadest possible piece of legislation imaginable. It is true that it does not say in explicit terms that the minister can force any industry to do anything, but the minister can buy or otherwise acquire, exchange, process, develop, repair, maintain, store and transport defence supplies. He can acquire those things in any way which he himself deems advisable with the support of the government.

Let us see what this bill does and does not do. With the other acts repealed, under this bill no tender need be called for at any time. If hon. members of this house are so gullible as to believe that there is no danger in a provision of that kind, then they have not been following the examination of the public accounts even during the present session. There are no safeguards of any kind which the parliament of Canada, the supreme representative body of the people, could exercise to protect the people's interests.

The board provided by the Defence Purchases, Profits Control, and Financing Act goes. There is to be just one man. Of course that man has the warm and high commendation which has been given to him by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), but even if all of us shared that warm admiration, I still think that with all that admiration—

Mr. McIvor: May I ask the leader of the opposition if he believes in dictatorship?

Mr. Drew: Most certainly not.

Mr. McIvor: If you are a married man, you do.

Mr. Drew: I do not believe in dictatorship and I shall be sufficiently personal to say that I am very happy in my marriage and do not regard it in any way as a dictatorship. What I said in regard to the hon. member for Fort William was sincere because I am sure every hon. member loves his warm and genial spirit. But I am not saying anything offensive when I point out that what he has said has in it the very essence of the possibility of dictatorship, although I know he never meant that.

I can remember quite distinctly when those in Germany who were supporting the regime that came into power in January, 1933, said, "We trust this man, we leave it to him." The same thing happened in Italy and they said, "We trust this man, we leave it to him. We do not want any legislation talked about because after all he has done such a good job in building roads and making our trains run on time and no legislation is required." Then in Russia there were people, many of them quite sincere, who said, "This man is doing a good job. He has built a nice subway for us here in Moscow and we do not want any talk about legislation." And so it was in Germany. Instead of debate and discussion they simply said: "Here is the man. Heil Hitler!" In Italy people said: "Here is a man who has done a good job. Viva Duce!" In Russia they said: "Here is a man who has done a good job. Tovarich!" And so it went. Many very bad things resulted from that point of view. It would be most unfortunate indeed if we should forget today that many of the people who supported Hitler and Mussolini—

Mr. Howe: Among them my hon. friend, as I remember.

Mr. Drew: That is as utterly untrue as other statements that have been made. As a matter of fact, if the hon. member would bother about being a little more accurate and careful he would find that I was one of the first to warn of the danger of the threat of German arms, to urge the rearming of our country, and to try to impress upon this government the necessity of bringing our defence forces up to some state of efficiency. I did that in different articles, and particularly in one which some of the members of the government did not like very much, entitled "Our Bow and Arrow Army". It was written for the purpose of meeting the threat of dictatorship I described which was emerging in Europe at that time. The fact is that those who have seen these things are likely to realize perhaps a little better the extent to which sincere people can be carried away by what they see.

Like everyone else who saw it I pointed out the way that people in those countries were impressed with the efficiency that appeared, with the fact that, as I said before, railways were run better, roads were better, and a lot of other things were better. Anyone who was not blind would have said that, and anyone who reported that was not supporting the regime.

Mr. Howe: You spoke very well of Hitler at the same time.

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. Drew: Never at any time. That is the most preposterous falsehood I have heard. Mark you, I did not go over and call on Mr. Hitler, as your prime minister of that time did, and then come back with a fine report of what he thought about him.

Mr. McLure: Give him another solar plexus blow.

Mr. Drew: This merely indicates of course the kind of device that is employed at all times to divert attention from the really serious considerations before the house. We are being asked to remove wise restraints that were introduced by this very government at a time when some of its members understood the real and fundamental principles of democracy. We are also being asked to repeal other legislation without even having information as to why some of these things are being done. We are being asked to repeal two acts under the present bill without any explanation why the Canadian Commercial Corporation cannot carry forward the work that it was intended to do. We are also being asked to repeal the existing restraints on profits without any explanation as to why it would not be wise to carry them forward.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) takes very much to heart any suggestion that we should examine these things on the basis of parliamentary practice and established procedure. The fact is that as many free parliaments have been destroyed by sincere men and women doing the wrong thing without realizing that what they were doing was wrong, and really with the hope of improving the efficiency of government, as have been destroyed by force of arms. People forget that in Germany, Italy, Russia and other countries there were many sincere people who really thought that it was worth while to do away with ordinary parliamentary rights so that one man could act quickly without waiting for parliament to approve. Many people who thought that had no sinister motive. Of course many who did and many who supported that form of government had the most sinister motives.

I am not imputing sinister motives of any kind, but I say that the passage of this measure in peacetime, which will be read by the courts with the knowledge that these emergency powers were conferred in times of peace, without any restraints on profit or any of the other restraints imposed by one of the acts to be repealed, is opening the door to dictatorship. The only restraint on that is not one that can be exercised by parliament but is a restraint which will remain in the hands of one man and the government around him.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. The hour is later, and I believe the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) wishes to deal with one or two bills. The threat seems to be made from all sides of the house that this legislation will be defeated. I will say at once it is all right with me if it is defeated because I will at least get full marks for having tried to remove from the statutes legislation that is far too dictatorial and stringent for peacetime. I have tried to retain from the existing legislation only those powers which are reasonable peacetime powers for carrying out the procurement duties involved in the defence of Canada. Even in peacetime provision for the defence of our country is important business. I believe that the defence of Canada even in peacetime is the most important business carried on in the country. If it is not, certainly the budget is badly distorted, since a considerable part of the taxation levied in this country is being spent on national defence.

We will concede that it is perhaps the most important business of the country. Therefore who can object to its having priority over other business in the matter of procurement? The power of priority is the only arbitrary power retained in the act. True we have taken power to compel a contractor to carry out a contract that he signs of his own volition. In wartime we had the right to go to a factory and say: You must make this. It is needed for defence. You have the facilities and you must make it. We are dropping that power, but if a contractor accepts a contract of his own volition to deliver defence supplies or munitions, then we are taking the power to say that he must carry out the terms of his contract and give his defence contract priority over other contracts he may have taken before or since.

We all know that there is no machinery in most government contracts to compel the contractor to carry out the work on time. We used to include penalty clauses, but I think they have been pretty generally done away with. It may be important, and usually is, in connection with a defence contract that the work be carried out according to the terms of the contract. Therefore we are reserving the right to demand from the contractor priority over contracts that he may have for less essential work. If any material is needed for defence we have power to requisition it. We are being criticized because the power of requisition carries with it the power to fix prices, subject to revision by the courts. Well, without the power to fix prices the power to requisition means nothing. Suppose I were to requisition from a stockpile of copper. I suppose copper today is worth about 23 cents a pound, and I say to the owners, "You must deliver it." The owner may reply, "We will deliver it, but the price is 60 cents a pound." That effectively stops the requisitioning from a practical viewpoint. We simply take the position that if we offer the going price of the day the copper must be delivered. If there are any circumstances that have not been taken into account in fixing that price the owner of the copper can go to the exchequer court, present his facts and have his contract revised.

If those are arbitrary powers, then we are taking arbitrary powers. We have those powers today, and of course we have powers that go far beyond them. Today we have the power to order a man to take a contract, to fix the price at which he will carry it out, to renegotiate our agreement at any time, and to revise the price. Today we have all those powers which in my opinion are not peacetime powers. Therefore we are asking that they be rescinded.

Now I come to the point raised by the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) and echoed by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), that we should have an arbitrary profit limitation. The difficulty there is in framing limitations that would take account of all the conditions that apply to production. A contract carrying a profit of four per cent in certain industries could make a fortune for the owners. A highly mechanized industry might do very well on a profit of four per cent. An industry that is not mechanized, that depends upon handwork for its production, might be very likely to go broke on a profit of ten per cent. That is a condition of manufacturing. To set up arbitrary legislative limitations that would cover the great range of manufacturing going into the production of munitions, even in peacetime, is a task that I do not think any parliament could undertake and carry out satisfactorily.

Mr. Coldwell: Then what about a tax on excess profits?

Mr. Howe: How can we impose a tax that does not apply to all production? Take the Canadian General Electric Company, and I mention this company because it is one of our big corporations, manufacturing a wide range of products. Five per cent of their factory might be devoted to the production of war materials and ninety-five per cent to the production of peacetime materials. How could you apply a tax there? No; we think our best protection is the experience of our purchasing agents in placing contracts with companies at profits that are reasonable.

I suppose it is quite needless to say again that responsibility for the procurement of defence supplies is the responsibility of the minister, not of the corporation. That was the case when the Department of Munitions and Supply Act was passed in 1939. It has been the position ever since, and is the position today. I have heard more kind words in this debate about the Canadian Commercial Corporation than ever before, and I agree with everything that has been said. But I cannot understand the desire to substitute a bureaucracy—for certainly the Canadian Commercial Corporation is a bureaucracy—for a minister who carries his responsibility into this House of Commons. It has always seemed to the government that responsibility for defence purchasing should rest directly upon the shoulders of a minister. That was the position throughout the war, it is the position today, and will continue to be the position under this new legislation.

I do not think I need say much more. Perhaps the house would be interested in the size of the operation we have been discussing. Hon. members may think that defence purchasing does not mean very much in peacetime, but in 1949 the minister was responsible for placing 84,632 separate contracts having a value of $197,445,808.22. In addition there were 19,561 amendments to contracts, resulting in additional expenditures of $24,092,-871.37. I just point out that the 104,193 separate transactions for which the minister was responsible represented over 350 transactions per day for the three hundred working days of the year. It is all very well to say that the minister should have no latitude and should obtain the approval of parliament for every separate transaction. I venture to say that parliament and even the government would have some trouble in approving 350 separate transactions every working day in the year. Therefore I think the limitation involved in the review by the government of transactions having to do with defence purchasing is reasonable.

A great deal has been said about this legislation being built around the present minister. Nothing could be more nonsensical. For his sins, the present minister was made minister of munitions and supply throughout the war years, from 1939 to 1946. At the end of that time it seemed that the department had served its purpose. However, a number of continuing functions had to be carried on, and the minister recommended to the Prime Minister that the responsibility of procurement for the armed services should be turned over to the minister of trade and commerce, who at that time was my colleague Hon. J. A. MacKinnon. It was turned over to him, and I thought that was the last I would see of procurement for the defence services. However, it happened that a few months later Mr. MacKinnon retired from the government, and I was appointed Minister of Trade and Commerce. It was purely a coincidence, and nothing in this legislation would be changed by one iota whoever happened to be minister. The minister has experienced advisers who were through the war with him, in the heads of the Canadian Commercial Corporation. During the war they were members of an organization that purchased over $13 billion worth of munitions and supplies within something like five or six years. I doubt whether anywhere in the world can be found a group with wider experience in purchasing defence materials than is to be found in the Canadian Commercial Corporation, who are the advisers of the Minister of Trade and Commerce of the day, as far as the purchase of defence supplies is concerned.

I have a number of notes here, but if I followed them I am afraid the debate would take rather a frivolous turn. I believe I have stated the facts. If there are those who believe it would be preferable to retain the wartime powers and use them in peacetime instead of those suggested in this legislation, they would be quite justified in voting against this bill. Those who believe we should have a peacetime act for a peacetime period will, I believe, find little justification for voting against this bill.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Howe) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Mitchell: I was paired with the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth). Had I voted, I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. Catherwood: I was paired with the hon. member for Kent, Ont. (Mr. Huffman). Had I voted, I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. Howe moved that the house go into committee on the bill.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Howe: I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, two bills were passed in the Senate, one to amend the Trust Companies Act and the other to amend the Loan Companies Act. I spoke to representatives of the opposition parties earlier today. If by consent they could be given first reading, they could be distributed and could appear on the order paper for second reading, after which I would hope they could be referred to the banking and commerce committee. They are Bills 307 and 308.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

TRUST COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO ORGANIZATION, OFFICERS, ETC.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the first reading of Bill No. 307 (from the Senate) to amend the Trust Companies Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Loan Companies Act

LOAN COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO ORGANIZATION, OFFICERS, ETC.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the first reading of Bill No. 308 (from the Senate) to amend the Loan Companies Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Tomorrow we might have second reading of these two bills in order to refer them to the banking and commerce committee. Thereafter we shall proceed with Bill No. 302, which we have just been on. Then we shall take the notice of motion dealing with the financing of the Canadian National Railways and advance that one stage. After that, we shall go into committee of supply, taking up the Departments of Citizenship and Immigration, Labour, Public Works and Secretary of State.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, June 15, 1950

The house met at eleven o'clock.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. E. T. Applewhaite (Skeena) moved:

That the report of the joint committee on the library of parliament, presented on June 6, 1950, be concurred in.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Before this motion passes I should like to say a word about the committee business of the house. Yesterday we heard the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) complaining about his lack of ubiquity, but he himself asked for the formation of many committees, and he has been caught in his own trap.

Motion agreed to.

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

EXTENSION TO EMPLOYEES OF COMMISSIONS, ETC.—APPLICATION TO OFFENCES COMMITTED OUTSIDE CANADA

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 309, to amend the Official Secrets Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, the bill will provide four amendments to the Official Secrets Act. First, it will extend the expression "office under His Majesty" to include employees of commissions, corporations and other agencies of the crown. Second, it will give an extraterritorial effect to the act by making it applicable to offences committed outside of Canada by Canadian citizens, or to persons who in another country have communicated information which they obtained during the time that they owed allegiance to Canada. Third, it will increase the penalties under the act, and fourth, it will also remove any doubt that persons charged under the act for offences against the act under part XV of the Criminal Code relating to summary convictions may be fingerprinted.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

INCOME TAX ARREARS

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. What was the total amount of arrears of income tax due, by provinces, as of March 31, 1950?

2. Of such amount, how much was in arrears respectively for (a) 1 year to 7 years inclusive; (b) 8 years to 15 years inclusive; (c) 20 years; (d) over 20 years?

Mr. McCann:

1. As of the 15th March, 1950, the latest date to which collection statistics are available, the arrears of income tax by provinces (individuals and corporations) assessed and unpaid were as follows:

Province	Total Arrears
Prince Edward Island	$ 912,417
Nova Scotia	2,980,103
New Brunswick	1,977,567
Quebec	21,214,662
Ontario	31,590,932
Manitoba	3,395,417
Saskatchewan	2,975,696
Alberta	5,204,980
British Columbia (including Yukon)	11,653,369
	$81,905,143

2. Collection statistics of the taxation division are not maintained in such a manner as will permit specific answers being given to this part of the question. The following information is, however, furnished:

Amounts in arrears less than 1 year:

Prince Edward Island	$ 295,108
Nova Scotia	1,396,517
New Brunswick	968,406
Quebec	12,967,175
Ontario	14,548,270
Manitoba	1,685,901
Saskatchewan	2,075,540
Alberta	3,223,042
British Columbia (including Yukon)	7,314,200
	$44,474,159

Questions

Amounts in arrears from 1 to 5 years:

Prince Edward Island	$ 615,584

HEALTH AND WELFARE—"DIETARY DITTIES"

Mr. Smith (Calgary West):

1. Who writes the feature in Canada's Health and Welfare known as "Dietary Ditties?"

Specifically, who wrote No. 37, in volume 5, No. 8, of May, 1950, which reads as follows: "When work piles so high you can't see and you feel you've been shoved up a tree, you won't lose your wit, or fly into a fit, if you're eating your vitamin B?"

2. What did this poetry cost, including the cost of the accompanying cut?

Mr. Martin: "Dietary Ditties", a little humorous device for teaching simple nutrition lessons, appears regularly in Canada's Health and Welfare. It is written by members of the staff of the nutrition division, usually in their own time.

The cost of each illustration is approximately $20. It is impossible to estimate the cost of printing because it represents a very small fraction of the cost of producing a single page of the magazine by offset lithography.

Numerous requests have been received by the department for permission to republish "Dietary Ditties". For instance, the United States national publicity council for health and welfare services called attention in its monthly bulletin to this feature as an interesting way of teaching simple nutrition lessons; this resulted in a great many requests for use in house organs and health education publications. In Canada "Dietary Ditties" is being used by a large number of weekly newspapers and house organs, such as Confederation Life Bulletin, Toronto; Hydro News (Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario); National Labour Journal, Ottawa; the house organ of the Rubberset Company Limited, Gravenhurst, Ontario, etc.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES—USE OF U.S. AIRPORTS IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Higgins:

Are landing fees charged Trans-Canada Air Lines planes for the use of Harmon field, the United States air base at Stephenville, and the air field at the United States naval base at Argentia, Newfoundland?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes. Landing fees are charged in accordance with tariffs established by the United States armed services and/or the Canadian Department of Transport.

NATIONAL PARKS—VISITORS IN 1949

Mr. Matthews:

1. What was the number of visitors to each of the four largest Canadian national parks for the calendar year 1949?

2. What was the number for each park in each month, June to September inclusive, 1949?

Mr. Prudham:

1.

Jasper	84,292
Banff	454,902
Prince Albert	52,403
Riding Mountain	294,693

2.

	June	July	August	September
Jasper	10,210	31,469	26,944	9,808
Banff	57,537	140,570	90,755	47,750
Prince Albert	8,727	22,221	13,931	3,661
Riding Mountain	40,884	106,103	84,100	28,773

JAPANESE PEACE TREATY

INQUIRY AS TO MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH REPRESENTATIVES IN LONDON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Press dispatches indicate that the conference of eight British commonwealth nations held last month in the United Kingdom to discuss the terms of a peace treaty with Japan has now been concluded. Can the minister tell us when it will be possible for us to have a report on the results of the conference?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The conference to which the hon. member refers was not so much a conference as a meeting of commonwealth representatives in the form of a working party to continue the discussions carried on at Colombo of what might be included in a Japanese peace treaty. The meeting took place in London, and was attended by a Canadian representative, our alternate on the Far Eastern commission. It has been completed, and possibly I may be able to make a report on some aspects of the discussion when my estimates come up in the very near future.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he can tell the house what further legislation the government expects to bring down during the present session. I noticed that another bill was introduced today.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I think we now have everything we have in mind either before this house or in the other place. I should not like to make a firm commitment, but I think that is so. At this moment I do not remember anything we have considered that is not already before this house or the other place.

TRUST COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO ORGANIZATION, OFFICERS, ETC.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 307, to amend the Trust Companies Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, yesterday afternoon the house was good enough to give unanimous consent to first reading of this bill, and a companion bill, 308, to amend the Loan Companies Act. My reason for asking for that was that the banking and commerce committee is now sitting, and I am anxious to have these two bills referred to it, as was done with the bills amending the insurance law.

In the case of the bill amending the Trust Companies Act, now before the house, while that act was rather extensively revised in 1947, a few further amendments appear desirable at this time in order to bring the investment powers of the trust companies in line with the amendments made in the case of insurance companies. Some further technical amendments are also required. It also appeared appropriate to clarify or correct some of the existing provisions.

Perhaps it might be convenient if I dealt with the Loan Companies Act now in my explanatory statement. It is a companion bill, and here again the amendments are very similar to those made to the Trust Companies Act. They relate to the investment powers, and the purpose is to bring them in line with the amended powers to which I have referred. As in the case of the insurance company bills, the superintendent of insurance will be available before the banking and commerce committee to give detailed explanations of the proposed amendments.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the suggestion of the minister is a wise one. I understand that the amendments have been prepared in conjunction with officials of the department, and that we shall have the advantage of having them available before the committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

LOAN COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO ORGANIZATION, OFFICERS, ETC.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 308, to amend the Loan Companies Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

DEFENCE SUPPLIES

PROVISION FOR PURCHASE OR ACQUISITION, STORING OF MATERIALS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Wednesday, June 14, consideration in committee of Bill No. 302, respecting defence supplies and projects—Mr. Howe—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Green: How will the money be obtained that is required to carry out the operations under this bill? Will it come from the estimates submitted by the Department of Trade and Commerce, or from those of the Department of National Defence?

Mr. Howe: Since the inception of civilian buying the practice has been that the requisition is accompanied by a certificate of encumbrance on the estimates of the armed services. In other words, we get a requisition to procure a certain supply, and at the same time we get a certificate of encumbrance from the Department of National Defence making the cost of that supply a charge on the defense estimates.

Mr. Green: Then the amounts would appear in the estimates for the present fiscal year under the Department of National Defence?

Mr. Howe: That is right.

Mr. Green: Certain power is also taken in connection with the construction of ships for other departments. How would that money be provided?

Mr. Howe: It is provided in exactly the same way; that is, any requisition on the Minister of Trade and Commerce for the procurement of any supply has to be accompanied by a certificate of encumbrance charged on the estimates of the department making the requisition. The funds of the Canadian Commercial Corporation are used in connection with transactions where payment is made on delivery—that is, transactions on behalf of foreign governments, or for stockpiling purposes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wonder if the minister would now be good enough to answer the question I have asked previously. Would he give us an illustration of a case where he could not carry out the requirements of the defence department with the ordinary powers he now has, and in which these new powers are needed? I have been asking for that, but I have never got it.

Mr. Howe: If there were any new powers under this legislation I could give the explanation, but no power is contained in this bill that the Minister of Trade and Commerce or his predecessor the minister of munitions and supply has not had since 1939.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not think the minister should go on singing that old song. We understand each other, I think. I understand what the minister means when he says he is not getting new powers, but in point of fact the powers contained in the munitions and supply act have been hardly availed of at all in these last years, as the minister in effect has admitted. I am now asking what there is the minister cannot do without the powers under the munitions and supply act, which would make this new legislation necessary. In other words, why can he not go into the market in the ordinary course of business and with the ordinary powers with which he is clothed? Why are these new powers necessary? I hope the minister will give me an answer and not fall back on that old hair-splitting device he has used. He is much too big for that.

[Mr. Howe.]

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Could we not discuss the powers of the minister under section 3?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Well, I do not know that I care very much whether the discussion is on section 1 or on section 3, but I thought section 1 was the place to ask general questions, and I have already asked this question once or twice. I am sure the minister would just as soon answer it under section 1, and he would be just as unwilling to answer it under section 3 as he is now.

Mr. Howe: What my hon. friend is asking is why the purchase of defence supplies requires any powers whatever, other than the power to make the purchase. I think that is what he has in mind. He speaks of new powers, but there are no new powers contained in this bill. I wish he would see eye to eye with me on that, because as a matter of fact the powers contained in this bill have been in the legislation under which the appropriate minister has been operating, and they are the only authority he has or has had for defence purchasing.

Mr. Green: You mean the Department of Munitions and Supply Act?

Mr. Howe: Yes. Let us say we will depend upon the ordinary purchasing technique, and place a contract for a very urgent unit of defence. The position will be like any contract placed by the Department of Public Works or any other department; there is no way to compel delivery on time. Perhaps my hon. friend is not as familiar with government purchasing as I am, but I can assure him that there is a tendency on the part of contractors to feel that the government is a very good and kind client and will not be too rough if he does not finish on time, whereas the same contractor may have a private buyer who is pretty rough, so he will do the last mentioned job first. In other words the government is apt to take second place to private contractors if we do not have this power to demand priority. The same situation exists with respect to supplies. At the moment supplies are fairly easy and this legislation probably would not be needed at this time. If this market tightens up much more, however, it may be very difficult to carry out defence purchases unless we have the power to requisition raw materials.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am interested in what the minister has just said, and I took down his words. He said probably the legislation would not be needed at this time; is that right?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to be sure I am quite correct. In other words the minister tells us that what was railroaded through yesterday is not necessary at this time. We told him yesterday that when we were satisfied there was an emergency and it became necessary we would be prepared to vote for it.

Mr. Howe: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend speaks of railroading. He seems to think that when anything is put through the house with which he does not agree, it is railroaded. As I remember the vote on second reading of this bill it was 127 in favour of the bill and 44 against. Is that railroading, or is that the will of the majority of the members of this house?

Mr. Ross (Souris): It is the will of the government whip.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I think the minister is quite right, and I will take back that word. I will say it was passed.

Mr. Howe: I appreciate that.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I come back to the first point. The minister has said this is not necessary at this time, but I need not go over that again; as he says, the bill was given second reading yesterday. However, I do want to comment on the answer just given by the minister in which he said government contracts might be left until the last, and just completed when it was convenient. My comment on that would be, first, that I do not believe and I do not think anyone else in this house believes that anyone contracting or dealing with the Minister of Trade and Commerce would be inclined to proceed in that way, because the minister is a fairly forceful fellow, and he has a good deal of power. The second point, which I want to make as strongly as I can, is that if it were clear that the requirement of the minister was in connection with national defence, nothing would make me believe that there would be the difficulty which the minister represents. I want to repeat, and I hope the house will take note of the fact, that the minister says this legislation is probably not needed at the present time but that it may be needed at some future time. At some future time we would have been ready to vote for it, when it was needed.

Mr. Howe: Let me straighten out that matter. I said the power to demand priority is needed at the present time. I said the power to requisition probably is not needed at the moment, but that we are moving into a tighter market and it might be needed at any time.

Mr. Pouliot: I should like to know who, if anyone, might be called upon to substitute for the minister in handling these matters.

Mr. Howe: If a substitute is needed it will be the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce appointed by the Prime Minister for that purpose.

Mr. Pouliot: The Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Pouliot: I can tell the minister that I have had unpleasant experiences with the Canadian Commercial Corporation, and I wondered if that corporation would have anything to do with it.

Mr. Howe: The Canadian Commercial Corporation assists the minister in carrying out the provisions of this act, but the minister has the responsibility.

Mr. Pouliot: I know that, but my complaint is that we do not know the salaries paid to the officials of crown companies. I should like to have a chart showing the salaries and functions of the various officials of the Canadian Commercial Corporation as well as other crown companies. I am not an opponent of the government; I am a supporter of it. During the war and since, it has always been my stand in the house that the salaries paid these officials should be made known. We vote the money here, and we want to know how it is spent. These gentlemen may or may not be good, but at least we should know the amount that is paid to them by way of salary, or whatever it is called, and the amount that is paid for their travelling expenses.

I did receive a chart of another crown company showing the names of the personnel and their functions, but not their salaries. Why is it impossible to obtain that information? As a member of parliament representing a constituency in Canada I believe that all the members should be informed as to the amounts paid to civil servants, high or low.

Mr. Low: And presidents and past presidents of railways.

Mr. Pouliot: I shall tell my hon. friend that I am a member of the railway committee, and when that matter came before the committee the members would not insist on having the information. That applies to the members of the hon. gentleman's group as well, because they did not insist on having that information. I am bound therefore by the decision of my colleagues who were members of that committee.

Mr. Knowles: Surely that does not bind the rest of us in this house.

Mr. Pouliot: It does not bind the rest of the house, but as a member of the committee I am informing the house what happened. It is all public knowledge. The members are free to ask whatever questions they desire, but in this matter I do not want anyone in the civil service to do otherwise than respect our parliamentary institutions and parliament as a whole. There seem to be two categories of people, members of parliament whose salary is mentioned in the newspaper as being too high, and men rendering a public service whose salaries are not disclosed. I am not attacking them, but it is only fair that we should know how much they cost the country. I am asking the minister if he will be kind enough to give us a chart of the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, it has not been the policy of the government to disclose the salaries of employees of crown corporations engaged in commercial enterprises. Such corporations are working in a competitive field, and to disclose the salary of a first-class man is usually to invite competing firms to bid for his service and overbid the government corporation. This rule has been applied for years to Canadian National Railways with the endorsation of this House of Commons. Certainly in an enterprise such as the Polymer Corporation, which is in a highly competitive field, it would be unwise. Canadian Commercial Corporation has its own sources of revenue. The money paid to its employees is not voted by parliament but is earned through the activities of the corporation. For that reason I believe the usual practice should be followed, and the salaries of the employees not disclosed.

Mr. Pouliot: I am sorry to disagree with the minister. He cannot complain about my intentions, because some years ago I paid him the greatest tribute ever paid to anyone in the House of Commons. I have a personal admiration for him, because I know he is a man of action. But with regard to what he has said, the work done by the Canadian Commercial Corporation was previously handled by the Department of Public Works. The salaries of the various officials of the Department of Public Works are made known in the public accounts. If the work was done previously by civil servants of the Department of Public Works, whose salaries were made public, I do not see why the same thing could not be done now that we have another organization that is working in mystery. I am against that sort of mystery with regard to finance. It was the stand of my great-grandfather, who voted for the ninety-two resolutions for the establishment of responsible government. The stand of my grandfather and of my father has been my stand, that we should know how the money is spent which we are called upon to vote. There is no man so important that he should live in a cloud of mystery.

I shall tell the minister something else, and in a most friendly manner: it is the members of parliament who are responsible for what is done by these crown corporations. If any one of my constituents comes to me and asks how much the president, general manager, or anyone else in the Canadian Commercial Corporation receives, and I am not in a position to answer him, I shall be remiss in my duty. It is because I do not want to be remiss in my duty that I am insisting upon this information. I know the minister has his own views on the matter, but I shall tell him that he can be sure the men who work in the Canadian Commercial Corporation will no more leave their jobs than those who work in any other government department, and whose salaries are mentioned in the public accounts. I believe that is a fair statement, and I do not make it to embarrass the minister. I am merely expressing a deep personal belief, that we should know all about the expenses. This prevents abuses. How many crimes are committed in the darkness of the night? Few are committed in daylight. When parliament does not know the amount of an expenditure, there may be abuses. People will not know about it, and it was for that reason I asked for the reform of the public accounts. It took me about two years to get it from the then minister of finance, Mr. Ilsley, but some amounts were not mentioned in the public accounts at that time. I insisted on that information, and finally the then minister of finance said he would give it to me. My demand was supported by Mr. MacNicol and Tommy Church. I pay tribute to my friends who are no longer here, but we did a good job in having the public accounts straightened out.

I am not opposed to the government; I support the government. I tell the minister that it is time to stop these crown companies; it is time to have responsibility. If we read the act we find it is the minister who is responsible, and he is responsible to the House of Commons. But if the Canadian Commercial Corporation does something, who will know about it? If the Bank of Canada does something, we have a report that means nothing. I have nothing to add, because I have expressed myself clearly on the subject.

Mr. Gibson: Will the minister explain how the provision works out in the event that he exercises his authority to demand the delivery of certain products? Unquestionably these suppliers will have commitments to private concerns, and it is possible that these private concerns would be occasioned a loss in a transaction of that kind, where the minister stepped in. I suggest it is quite proper the minister should step in where defence supplies are concerned, but is any provision made to take care of these private customers if a loss is actually occasioned?

Mr. Howe: If the government intervenes to prevent the delivery of a contract, that constitutes a force majeure, which is a good defence in any private contract. That defence was invoked during the war a good many times, and the defence was always upheld, when the delivery was prevented by the government's requisitioning of the materials.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to ask the minister a question in connection with a statement which he has repeated several times, to the effect that this act, rather than adding to his powers, reduces them. Is it not a fact that the powers which the minister had and exercised under the Department of Munitions and Supply Act were due to a large extent to the fact that the War Measures Act was in effect, that the War Measures Act enabled the minister to exercise fully or completely the powers which were outlined in the Department of Munitions and Supply Act; that when the War Measures Act came to an end, the various safeguards and so forth provided for in the act which this present bill proposes to do away with, the Defence Purchases, Profits Control and Financing Act, 1939, came into effect and that when the War Measures Act ceased to be operative, the various safeguards provided for in the Defence Purchases, Profits Control and Financing Act, 1939, materially limited the powers outlined in the Department of Munitions and Supply Act? If that is so—and so far as I can see, it is—when we abolish the Department of Munitions and Supply Act and the Defence Purchases, Profits Control and Financing Act, 1939, and substitute this new act for them, it seems to me that in effect we have really given a considerable increase in powers.

Mr. Howe: The Department of Munitions and Supply Act is an act of the parliament of Canada. It has exactly the same validity as the War Measures Act, which is also an act of the parliament of Canada. The Department of Munitions and Supply Act has never depended on the War Measures Act for its validity at any stage.

Mr. Harkness: It was not a matter of its depending for its validity on the War Measures Act. My question was this. Was it not a fact that the existence of the War Measures Act made it possible for the minister to exercise, you might say, fully or completely the powers laid down in the Department of Munitions and Supply Act? And when the War Measures Act came to an end, then the limitations imposed by the Defence Purchases, Profits Control and Financing Act, 1939, came into effect once more and served thereby to limit those powers.

Mr. Howe: If my hon. friend will read carefully the Department of Munitions and Supply Act, I think he will find that the provisions are made valid regardless of any other statute of the parliament of Canada.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Chairman, I have forgotten something. It is that there are many Tories in the Canadian Commercial Corporation. They are there; they enjoy the office and they run the show. I challenge the members of the Conservative party to support my stand to have disclosure made of the names and salaries paid to these people. They will not move. They will not say a word because they are their own friends. They are not Liberals. They are Tories to the core, and this is why we have so much trouble from them.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Pouliot: I will just be another minute, if I may have your indulgence, Mr. Chairman. I will not insist any more upon my point, but I will only say that if the minister fires the Tories from the Canadian Commercial Corporation and from the other crown companies, the country will then be able to breathe freely.

Mr. Graydon: May I accept the challenge of the hon. member for Temiscouata with great pleasure and ask the minister if he will not produce to this committee the salaries and the names of these men in the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

Mr. Howe: We will not.

Mr. Graydon: After all, because a man happens to belong to any particular party I do not think that fact gives him any reason to hide behind any kind of legislation. I agree with the hon. member for Temiscouata; I think that information ought to be produced to the committee. If the public pays a man a certain sum of money to do a job for the public, I do not think there is any reason under the sun why the public should not know who the man is, first of all, and, second, how much the public pays.

Mr. Pouliot: I thank the hon. gentleman. Now I challenge the C.C.F. group and the Social Credit group, because there are some C.C.F.'ers and some Social Crediters in those crown companies. I want them fired. I want only Liberals to enforce Liberal policies in those crown companies. Let us fire the Tories, let us fire the C.C.F.'ers and let us fire the Social Crediters so that we may have a real Liberal administration.

Mr. Hodgson: I quite agree with the hon. member for Temiscouata. I happen to be the member who put on the order paper these questions asking for the salaries and the expenses of the officials of the crown corporations, and also of the C.N.R.; and I am the man who was refused the answer.

Mr. Knowles: The challenge that the hon. member for Temiscouata has thrown out is not one that anyone in this part of the house needs to respond to, because we have been asking for that sort of information all along. But I am interested in the barefaced admission by the hon. member for Temiscouata that he wants political patronage in the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

Mr. Pouliot: I will tell the hon. member that he is greatly mistaken with regard to patronage. We have no patronage.

Mr. Hodgson: Oh, yes; you have. You have admitted it.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Pouliot: On a question of privilege, I will tell the hon. member that the work that the supporter of the government does in any department is a burden; it is done not to his personal advantage but to the advantage and satisfaction of his constituents at large and to maintain peace and order in the community. There is no pay of any kind.

Mr. Hodgson: Mr. Chairman, I resent the remarks made by the hon. member for Temiscouata, to the effect that there is no patronage in the corporation under government control. There is patronage; it is done right in my own town of Lindsay, and I can prove it.

Mr. Fulton: He wants more.

Mr. Pouliot: I told you before that you were an exception.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The bill before us is Bill No. 302, and we are dealing with clause 1, which reads:

1. This act may be cited as the Defence Supplies Act.

Shall clause 1 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Graydon: Is the hon. member for Temiscouata not going to press this thing to a conclusion, or is he just going to let it be dropped?

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. Pouliot: I have said what I have to say.

Mr. Graydon: No. You have not said nearly as much as you have said on other occasions. Keep after him.

Mr. Pouliot: I have said enough.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Graydon: You have our support. Don't let it drop now.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Graydon: You can't let it drop now.

Mr. Pouliot: I fight to the last.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Graydon: Surrender.

Mr. Pouliot: I have fought—

Mr. Graydon: Retreat.

Mr. Pouliot: Never.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Pouliot: Don't tell me that. I cannot accept it.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I do not think that this sort of amicable discussion should be carried on. All hon. members should address themselves to the chair, and should rise when they want to speak. This Canadian Commercial Corporation discussion is not quite in order on the first clause of this bill. I think it could more properly take place on item 423 of the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, under whose jurisdiction the Canadian Commercial Corporation comes. I would therefore ask hon. members to make their remarks as relevant as possible to the clause which is under discussion.

Mr. Rowe: We have had a lot of humorous banter back and forth, but I listened with keen interest to the hon. member for Temiscouata. I have been impressed by many of his remarks in this chamber. I know we all respect the long tradition of his family in parliamentary service. I listened intently to his remarks. I think they were well taken. I find myself in agreement with him a hundred per cent. If he had not risen to withdraw his earlier remarks, I would have thought it was only in keeping with his—

The Deputy Chairman: I will have to ask the hon. member to speak to the first clause of the bill. This has to stop somewhere. When the discussion goes out of order at one time or another, one hon. member must set the example and put the discussion back in order. It is difficult to decide at what time or at what point a discussion is completely out of order. I think hon. members will agree that the discussion on the Canadian Commercial Corporation has been carried on too long and has been out of order. At this point I would ask hon. members to discuss clause 1 of the bill.

Mr. Rowe: Surely, Mr. Chairman, it is not out of order to suggest that the hon. member for Temiscouata is correct in asking that these records be tabled. In that connection I do wish to point out that while he referred to the opposition as not being too keen—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. On this first clause it is my duty to point out that it is out of order to ask that the records and salaries of the officials of the Canadian Commercial Corporation be tabled. That would more properly be done on the estimates. Under item 423, the first item of the Department of Trade and Commerce estimates, a general discussion can take place. The Canadian Commercial Corporation falls under that item; therefore its affairs can be discussed under that item, but not under this clause.

Mr. Pouliot: Thank you, Dufferin-Simcoe; you are an antidote to the poison of Peel.

Mr. Rowe: I am sorry if the hon. member for Temiscouata, who has been here slightly longer than I have been, was out of order along with myself. I only wish to add that I hope the committee has taken cognizance of the fact that he said he wanted all the Conservatives on the crown corporations fired and all the Liberals retained, regardless of their efficiency.

Mr. Green: Earlier in the discussion I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce from what sources the money would be obtained for goods purchased, and he intimated that in most cases it would come from the money allotted to the Department of National Defence and, of course, in a minor degree from other departments, such as the Department of Public Works, and the Department of Transport, for which the minister could order ships and ship repairs. Are there any types of purchases in which the appropriation is from the minister's own department; in other words, instances in which the initiation of the purchase comes from the Department of Trade and Commerce? If so, of what types are those purchases?

Mr. Howe: The Canadian Commercial Corporation is the purchasing agent for the Department of Trade and Commerce. Anything the Department of Trade and Commerce buys is paid for by that department to the Canadian Commercial Corporation under the appropriate item in the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Green: I am referring to defence supplies. Will there be any defence supplies purchases which will be initiated by the Department of Trade and Commerce, either through the Canadian Commercial Corporation, or in any other way originating with the Department of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. Howe: I do not know that any idea originates with the Department of Trade and Commerce; but stockpiling and purchases are made from the funds of the Canadian Commercial Corporation. The funds are placed at its disposal by parliament. For instance, we have purchased tin, antimony and a few other items, for stockpiling purposes. These were paid for first by the funds of the Canadian Commercial Corporation which were later replaced by vote of parliament.

Mr. Green: Apparently certain goods are being purchased for stockpiling by the Canadian Commercial Corporation. What particulars does parliament get of these purchases, both as to the goods themselves and as to the amounts paid?

Mr. Howe: The item appears in the next departmental estimates. The money is refunded to the Canadian Commercial Corporation from a vote of parliament, usually after the event, because the need for stockpiling cannot always be anticipated.

Mr. Green: At what stage are we told what goods are being stockpiled? Are we given particulars of the amounts spent for this stockpiling, or is that simply included in the money appropriated for the Canadian Commercial Corporation, without any particulars being given?

Mr. Howe: The moneys at the disposal of the Canadian Commercial Corporation are a revolving fund to be used only for meeting the immediate needs of the Canadian government, and to be replaced from some source in due course. I have reported to the house purchases of tin and antimony, and the exact cost of the purchases, and the exact quantity purchased.

Mr. Green: How is that reported?

Mr. Howe: In the estimates.

Mr. Green: In the minister's estimates?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Green: Can the minister give us any statement now as to the stockpiling that is being undertaken by the Canadian Commercial Corporation?

Mr. Howe: I can obtain the information; it is not before me at the moment. We have a fair amount of tin and a fair amount of antimony, and I think one or two other items. I do not know that there is any secret about it. I will get the information.

Mr. Green: Where does the Department of National Defence come into these stockpiling operations? I should like to know which department decides what goods must be stockpiled. Apparently the stockpiling is done for war purposes. I should like to know who decides what should be stockpiled, and, in particular, what part the Department of National Defence plays in the stockpiling.

Mr. Howe: The Department of Trade and Commerce is the procurement agency for the armed services. If the department expects difficulty in carrying out its duties through shortages of raw materials, the Department of Trade and Commerce initiates the requisition for stockpiling. The treasury is always consulted to obtain its concurrence, and I feel quite sure that the Department of National Defence is consulted to obtain the concurrence of that department. It is quite easy to obtain that concurrence since it does not cost that department any money. The initiative comes through the Department of Trade and Commerce as the procurement agency.

Mr. Green: That is one situation which should be covered in the legislation. A person would think that the Department of National Defence should have the authority to decide what goods are to be stockpiled, or at least should be formally associated with the Department of Trade and Commerce in that decision. But apparently the decision is made by the Department of Trade and Commerce, and I suppose in effect by the Canadian Commercial Corporation officials; and then the cabinet finds out about it. The minister says that the Department of National Defence would naturally not object, because they are not going to have to pay for the goods. I can see that there is some good judgment of human nature in that statement. Does the minister not think it would be wise to provide in this measure that the Department of National Defence at least be associated with the Department of Trade and Commerce in the purchasing of these goods? Apparently the only case in which the Department of Trade and Commerce acts on its own initiative is in connection with stockpiling, which is done through the Canadian Commercial Corporation. I understand that in connection with all other purchases there is a requisition from the Department of National Defence. What would be the objection to having the legislation call for a requisition from the Department of National Defence in the case of stockpiling?

Mr. Howe: I do not know that there is any great objection, except that stockpiling involves far more than the direct needs of the armed services. If this country cannot obtain tin, it is not only the production of munitions that stops; the production of anything made from steel or alloys of steel stops also. It is the duty of the Department of Trade and Commerce, as the procurement agency, to procure in a manner that anticipates shortages. The Department of National Defence should not have to decide what materials are involved in an item that they may ask the Department of Trade and Commerce to obtain. That is the business of the procurement agency.

Mr. Green: This bill deals only with defence supplies; it is called the Defence Supplies Act. I realize that goods must be stockpiled for other purposes, but where we have a bill dealing only with defence supplies there should be a provision written into it that the Department of National Defence must be associated in all stockpiling for defence purposes.

Mr. Howe: I do not agree with my hon. friend. For instance, if the Department of National Defence requires so many uniforms a year, we know that in advance. The pattern is definite. It is part of the duty of the procurement agency to see that it is in position to get the cloth that is necessary. We know from experience that it is much easier to procure cloth in quantity than it is for individual items. We anticipate the needs of the services in procuring cloth as a temporary expedient. That is the ordinary business of a procurement agency. If we had to ask the Department of National Defence for permission to buy the ordinary things involved in procurement operations, I do not know just who in that department would be able to advise us on the matter.

Mr. Green: Drastic powers are provided in the bill for the requisitioning of supplies and for the establishing of priorities, and where those powers are used, surely the Department of National Defence should be made partly responsible. What is the objection to writing into the bill that the Department of National Defence must be a party to such requisitions?

Mr. Howe: It is not an objection; it is a lack of purpose in requiring concurrence. As I said, certain supplies are necessary to carry out the ordinary procurement duties of the department; so why should we ask anyone in the Department of National Defence whether it is wise to obtain them.

Mr. Green: You have the power now to make ordinary purchases in the regular business way, but I am referring to the special powers being conferred on the Minister of Trade and Commerce without any reference whatever to the Minister of National Defence. I suggest that it would be some safeguard of the people's rights if the Minister of National Defence were associated in the exercise of these drastic powers.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): A moment or two ago the minister said that it was easy to get the concurrence of the Department of National Defence because it does not cost that department any money. I think he was then referring to stockpiling. When the minister used that phrase, did he mean that at the moment they did not pay any money, or that the time never comes when they would have to pay? If he meant that, would the minister indicate the origin of the money that would be used to pay for these?

Mr. Howe: Any long-range stockpiling is paid for by a vote passed by parliament. With month to month stockpiling, such as that in anticipation of an order for uniforms, the Department of National Defence would pay for the cloth when they pay for the uniforms. I would not think of requiring the permission of the Department of National Defence in connection with a purchase of cloth for uniforms. The two departments work closely in procurement matters, and the Department of National Defence would likely know that we are taking those steps; but to get formal permission is another matter.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I understand that there is a revolving fund for the use of the Canadian Commercial Corporation, but I have forgotten whether it is set up in the statute.

Mr. Howe: A fund of $10 million is set up by statute, and is drawn on as required. The Canadian Commercial Corporation does not keep the $10 million in the bank; it has a drawing account on the treasury up to $10 million.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Does that operate like the transport stores act? That is to say, to the extent that purchases are taken up by the department under their estimates, the fund is used?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

Section 3—Powers of minister.

Mr. Fulton: Yesterday, when answering comments on the second reading, the minister said that the power to require deliveries within a certain time applied, as I understood him, only to those who had contracts for the supply of materials.

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. Fulton: That was not my interpretation of this section.

Mr. Howe: What section is my hon. friend referring to?

Mr. Fulton: I am referring to section 3, paragraph (f). Under that paragraph the minister would have power to compel deliveries within a certain time limit, even though the person to whom he goes has not a formal contract for the supply of the goods.

Mr. Howe: That is quite correct. My reference to contracts was in connection with paragraph (e), which reads:

> (e) require any person who is obligated by any contract to deliver any defence supplies or to construct or carry out a project or to furnish any services, to perform that contract in such priority to that person's other business and within such period of time, not shorter than the period, if any, stipulated in such contract, as the minister may specify.

That concerns priorities, but a requisition may be made on anyone who has stock in hand.

Mr. Fulton: But when you exercise that right you also have the right under (f) to set a time limit within which he must deliver the goods which are being requisitioned; is that correct?

Mr. Howe: The requisition would refer to a stock in hand, and it is assumed that the requisition would be complied with immediately.

Mr. Fulton: I want to get that clear. The minister says that the requisition would only be in reference to a stock in hand, but I want to get a clear understanding of just what power the minister has. As I read paragraph (f) the minister has the power to go to someone who has a stockpile, or has in his possession or control goods which the minister desires to possess or use for some defence contract, and he can say to that person, "I make you an offer of a specific amount for those goods, and you must deliver at that price and within such and such a time."

Mr. Howe: Yes; that is correct.

Mr. Fulton: You have that power under (f).

Mr. Howe: That is right.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Subsection 1 (c) of section 3 reads:

> Construct or otherwise acquire, carry out, develop, repair and maintain any project.

In the preceding section "project" is defined as meaning a building, airdrome, airport, dockyard, fortification, road or other work required for the purposes of defence. Will the minister suggest a limitation of any kind on that? The minister may say that there are certain financial limitations, but is there anything to prevent the minister from making a contract involving very large commitments for the government?

Mr. Howe: No, there certainly is not. If we have a requisition to create a project for the Department of National Defence, and the requisition has come to the minister in the normal way, it does not matter whether it is for $1 million or $50 million; the duty of the procurement agency is to go and procure the project.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am not quite clear on this. My understanding is that this is a direct power to the minister. Did I understand the minister to say a moment ago that the projects would be only such as came from a department and within the limitations of the funds of that department?

Mr. Howe: Certainly.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then what is the distinction between that and what we were talking about a few moments ago, where the minister's department went ahead on its own? Was that merely with regard to stockpiling?

Mr. Howe: That is all.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then these other projects are all projects within the four corners, so to speak, of the estimates of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Howe: That is right.

Mr. Green: Subsection 1 (c) of section 3 certainly does not restrict the minister to projects which are required by the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Howe: Then what does clause (d) of section 2 mean? Will my hon. friend read that?

Mr. Green: Section 2 (d) reads:

"Project" means a building, airdrome, airport, dockyard, fortification, road or other work required for the purposes of defence.

The defect is that there is no provision that it must be requisitioned by the Department of National Defence. There is no provision that this power can be exercised only upon requisition by or with the concurrence of the Department of National Defence. The minister has already said that he does not have to get the concurrence of the Department of National Defence for stockpiling, and under this clause he does not require the concurrence of the Department of National Defence for the construction of a project. Is it the intention that the Minister of Trade and Commerce shall be able to go ahead with a project without the concurrence of the Department of National Defence?

Mr. Howe: The funds must be voted by parliament in some department. I do not know that there is anything to prevent the minister or the Canadian Commercial Corporation from proceeding with a project that is voted in his own department. As I said before, the minister and the Canadian Commercial Corporation are agents of the department in all procurement matters. One of the duties of the minister is to procure for the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Green: That is only one of them?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Green: Then the minister makes it perfectly clear that the Department of Trade and Commerce can initiate and carry through a defence project without any request from or concurrence by the Department of National Defence?

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, to carry out any project involving money the Department of Trade and Commerce has to get an order in council of the government of Canada. The Minister of National Defence is a member of the government, and I assume if it were a defence project we could hardly get approval unless it had the endorsement of the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Green: I think the minister's answer to that question makes it perfectly clear that the Department of Trade and Commerce is intruding on the work of the Department of National Defence, and is assuming responsibilities which should be assumed by the Department of National Defence. I suggest to the committee that there certainly should be a provision written into the legislation that defence projects can be entered upon only with the concurrence of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to add a word on this point. It seems to me that the minister is very ungenerous in not realizing that we are trying to help him to improve this bad measure.

Mr. Howe: Amateur help.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wonder if the minister does not agree that it would be sensible to have something in the act to indicate that these projects come from the Department of National Defence. From the point of view of anyone reading the measure and not having the benefit of all this conversation and discussion, there is certainly no limitation on the face of it. I would have thought it would be desirable in the definition clause, section 2(d), to have something to indicate that these projects, which he distinguishes from stockpiling, would come from the Department of National Defence. I would have thought it very sensible to have that written into the act.

Mr. Green: In effect the Minister of Trade and Commerce decides what is a defence project, and I submit that is none of his business.

Mr. Howe: To tell the truth, I do not think it is any of your business either.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to raise a point having to do with the power to requisition and compel delivery within a time and at a price that the minister specifies. You will notice that subparagraph (ii) of paragraph (f) of subsection 1 of section 3 provides that there may be a reference to the exchequer court with respect only to the matter of price, and that the court shall not have power to extend the period of time for delivery. That seems to me to be a very harsh provision. I can appreciate the feeling which probably lay behind the making of that provision; if power were given to appeal to the exchequer court as to the time within which deliveries must be made, then the delivery of some essential and vital material might be delayed pending the outcome of an appeal. Let us remember, however, that section 8 provides:

> Every person who contravenes or fails to observe any provision of this act or of any regulation or order is guilty of an offence and is liable upon summary conviction or conviction upon indictment to a fine not exceeding $5,000.

It may be that the requirement made by the minister as to the time within which delivery must be made is unreasonable. Nevertheless in his view it is essential to secure the material. He issues an order for delivery within ten days, and it is next to a physical impossibility for the order to be complied with. Every effort may be made to comply with it, but it may be that the material is delivered not in ten days but in two weeks. That man has committed a contravention of an order made under this act and is liable to a fine of $5,000, but there can be no appeal to the exchequer court on the question of time. The only appeal is on the question of price.

It seems to me to be a most unwarranted provision to put in the act. The minister is taking sweeping powers. I do not propose to prolong the debate on that point, because we had it on second reading and the house decided yesterday by its vote that he should have these powers. The bill gives him sweeping powers, and it may be that they will be exercised arbitrarily in what the minister conceives to be the interest of the country and in the interest of procuring the supplies quickly. I can quite see that that may happen. This man against whom an order for delivery within a time limit has been made finds that it is a physical impossibility for him to comply with the order, and he is guilty of a technical breach thereof and liable to a fine of $5,000. He cannot go to court and say that it was impossible for him to comply, because the exchequer court has no right to make any order or finding with respect to the time of delivery. I ask the minister if it would not be possible, without seriously interfering with his right to compel delivery within such time as he specifies, nevertheless to permit an appeal to the exchequer court to embrace the question of time, so that, delivery having been made, at least a man could defend his liability to a penalty by establishing in the exchequer court that the time specified by the minister was not reasonable under the circumstances.

Mr. Howe: Well, Mr. Chairman, it is unfortunate, but the defence of a nation sometimes requires a government to be harsh. In England it is harsh to the extent of taking young men out of the normal walks of life and putting them in the army for a period of time. That has not been thought necessary in this country, for which I am very glad; but if the government had to be harsh and take material away from a man a little sooner than he would like to deliver it, that is just too bad, but it does not disturb me in the least. I have been administering this act for the last ten years, and I have not been harsh to an extent that has caused any great repercussions in the country. But we have been firm; if we needed something for defence we got it, and we got it when we needed it. That will continue to be the policy of the government, in spite of my hon. friend.

Mr. Fulton: Let me make it quite clear, Mr. Chairman. I said I accepted the fact that the minister held the view that he must have power to compel delivery. In spite of the insinuation the minister has attempted to convey, however, I am not objecting to the fact that it is necessary to insist upon deliveries. As the minister says, sometimes it is necessary to be harsh when the defence of the country is at stake. All right; he has taken power to compel delivery, but I say he should not go further and take away from the man against whom the order is made any right of recourse to the court in connection with the penalty he may incur because he has been physically unable to comply with the order. The order has been complied with as soon as possible, but not within the time limit laid down. The difference may be only a few days, in spite of the best efforts of the man to make delivery on time. Nevertheless that will involve him in liability to a penalty of up to $5,000, and he has no right to appeal to the court on the question of time. I distinctly asked the minister if he did not think that, without cutting down his power to compel delivery, he could grant the subject the right to appeal to the exchequer court after delivery had been made, on this question of penalty, and that was all I said. I do not think it is necessary for the minister to insinuate that we are trying to make it impossible for him to obtain materials vitally needed for national defence.

Mr. Howe: Well, Mr. Chairman, I am a layman, and my hon. friend is a lawyer, so I will ask him this. Does he know any way of collecting a penalty or a fine except through the courts?

Mr. Fulton: No, I do not know of any way to collect a fine except through the courts, but the exchequer court is precluded from making any finding with respect to the time of delivery, whether or not the time fixed by the minister was reasonable. A man may exceed that time limit by one day; if he does, he is liable to a penalty of up to $5,000, and the exchequer court is specifically excluded by subparagraph (ii) of paragraph (f) from making any finding with respect to time.

Mr. Howe: Then may I ask my hon. friend, as a lawyer, another question? How much of a fine does he think a court would assess against a man for being one day late in making delivery?

Mr. Fulton: I do not care if it assesses a fine of only $1; the principle is there. The man may be two weeks late, but the court cannot go into the reasonableness or otherwise of the time limit; it is precluded from doing so.

Mr. Howe: I can assure my hon. friend that it is their custom to do so.

Mr. Fulton: Not when the statute specifically says the court may not make any finding with respect to time. I am quite sure the minister does not intend to suggest that the court would deliberately ignore the terms of the statute. However, I have made the point and raised the question, and apparently the minister thinks there is nothing to it. I have asked whether he did not think, without limiting his power to obtain delivery, he could nevertheless permit the subject to appeal to the court on the question of time with respect to the penalty he might otherwise incur.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Howe: I submit that in order to have a fine imposed a man must be brought into one of the courts of the land. The department makes out its case against him, and he presents his defence. I have never known a Canadian court to impose a fine when the person before the court had a reasonable defence, and I do not think my hon. friend has known of that either.

Mr. Fulton: But there is no defence under the terms of this statute. His defence is taken away from him.

Mr. Green: This is the key section of the act, and it might make for more progress if we took it up clause by clause. I want to ask a question about section 3(1)(d), which reads:

. . . arrange for the performance of commercial and professional services.

That would seem to be a power which can be exercised in the normal course of business. Can the minister give us examples to indicate the necessity of having that provision written into the act?

Mr. Howe: Well, Mr. Chairman, I am not suggesting that the machinery would not function without that section, but the desire is to make perfectly plain what are the powers of the minister in connection with procurement for the armed services. We wish to make it clear that it is within the power of the minister to obtain commercial or professional services if they should be required. Commercial services might be the storage of material. Professional services might be an independent opinion on a design problem, or various other services.

Mr. Green: That means power to go out and hire somebody to do a special job; is that it?

Mr. Howe: That is it. The transportation of personnel would be a case in point.

Mr. Green: Then in connection with paragraph (f) there is this provision:

. . . require any person who produces, deals in or has in his possession or control any materials or articles needed for the completion of a contract with respect to which a requirement under the authority of paragraph (e) has been issued, or needed for completion of defence supplies or a project being constructed or carried out by a government department, the Canadian Commercial Corporation or any company to which the Government Companies Operation Act applies . . .

That would appear to be a good deal wider than simply giving the Minister of Trade and Commerce power to carry out a defence project. Why is the provision worded in such a broad way? It says, "project being constructed or carried out by a government department," which might mean any one of the various government departments. Why is the terminology so broad?

Mr. Howe: Other agencies take part in procurement. For example, Canadian Arsenals are a very important factor in procurement. Today Canadian Arsenals are making all the guns used by the army, and various other munitions; and the act should properly apply to them. If they find it impossible to carry on their work through lack of supplies, they should be able to requisition supplies through the minister. It applies to various crown companies accustomed to take part in the procurement of defence supplies. The Department of Mines and Technical Surveys has a part in it as well. It usually procures the minerals. In the last war they made certain optical instruments in a factory that was operated by that department. This clause is built to fit the machinery that was found to be necessary to carry out the defence procurement duties in the last war.

Mr. Green: In clause (e) there is a provision that if the supplier of the goods does not agree to the price set by the minister, the dispute can be referred to the exchequer court. Under the Department of Munitions and Supply Act, as originally passed in 1939, disputes were settled by arbitration, which is the normal peacetime way of settling disputes of this kind. I suggest we should now go back to the arbitration method of settling the price, rather than put the person who has been compelled to supply these goods to the expense of fighting the case in the exchequer court. I believe this exchequer court provision was put into the Department of Munitions and Supply Act in 1940 or 1943, and I am confident that the result of that change was that very few, if any, people would go to the expense and trouble of going to the exchequer court. It seems unfair to put that burden on them. Why would it not be better to use the ordinary arbitration machinery?

Mr. Howe: It is not usual in government contracts of any kind to use arbitration machinery. The public works contracts do not provide for arbitration. The usual method of collecting a claim against the government is to refer it to the exchequer court. I can say to my hon. friend that, so far as requisitioning is concerned, if any contractor has a case that will stand up in exchequer court, it is unlikely that he will find it necessary to go to the court to get proper compensation.

Mr. Green: I do not think it is fair that in peacetime people should be put to that expense. Why not use the simple system of arbitration? The government is not going to be hurt very much by arbitration. It is certainly much more desirable from the point of view of a person who has been forced to turn over those supplies. It is not a case of ordinary purchases, and there is no difficulty about such transactions. This section applies to a case where the minister has forced the person to supply the goods. It does seem that where drastic power of that sort has been exercised, the person against whom it has been used should be given every reasonable opportunity to have a fair price set by the simplest method. Going to the exchequer court is a complicated business, for example, for any firm in British Columbia. It may not be so difficult for a firm in Montreal, but for firms in the distant parts of the country an exchequer court action is an expensive procedure. I do suggest that the minister should give some consideration to substituting the arbitration procedure.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, if that were done it would mean instituting a new practice.

Mr. Green: That power was given in the original Department of Munitions and Supply Act.

Mr. Howe: Yes, but we changed the act as soon as we realized how we were differing from ordinary government practice. It was changed in the first revision of the act. It would have established a new procedure for the administering of government contracts.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): One of the things for which we gave the minister credit was that he adopted a lot of new procedures. Speaking seriously for a moment, I think there is great force in what the member for Vancouver-Quadra has said. I put it to the minister that when he was in business the last thing he wanted to do was go before the exchequer court. That court is familiar with tax matters and things of that sort, but not with this subject. The sensible course would be that advocated by the member for Vancouver-Quadra. I see no reason why we have to follow slavishly the established practice and the minister has not done that; he has been a pioneer. I hope the minister will consider the suggestion, because I do know the same view is held by businessmen.

The minister made an answer, which he felt was a fair answer, to the member for Kamloops, about the conviction. The member asked whether anyone charged with dealing in goods would get a fair hearing in court. The basis upon which the member for Kamloops and I make that suggestion is the understanding that under the wording of section 3 (f) all the court will have to be told is that the minister said this was fair and reasonable, and the man did not carry it out. Would it not be fair to let this section stand and ascertain from the Department of Justice whether or not that is their interpretation of it? If they take the minister's view, then this section will not be as bad as we thought; but if they do not take his view, then the ground is cut from under what the minister said. After a man got into court, the minister seemed to feel he should have a fair run for his money. We believe that is not the meaning of this paragraph (f).

Mr. Howe: The Minister of Justice has already passed on this act, just as he passes on every act that comes before the House of Commons. What does my hon. friend think is the meaning of the act? The crown carries no more weight before a court than the other party to the dispute. The court is there to see that there is equity as between the crown and the subject.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): But that is cut down under the statute.

Mr. Fulton: The court cannot do that when the statute itself says by implication that that defence is not open to the subject. Then the ordinary equitable jurisdiction, if you like, of the court is removed because it is bound by the terms of the statute.

Mr. Howe: Yes, but what is it bound to do? It is bound to impose a fine not exceeding $5,000. It can impose a fine of one cent technically, if the court thinks conditions warrant it. I may say that from the experience we have had in trying to enforce penalties under orders of this kind, that is about what the court usually does.

Mr. Harkness: Paragraph (g) of this section states:

> (g) require any person to furnish such information respecting defence supplies dealt in by him or projects of a type executed by him or respecting his production and other facilities relating thereto in such time and manner as the minister may specify.

It seems to me that this paragraph gives the minister power to require from any dealer in goods any information of any kind. Last week the Minister of National Defence told us that the army alone holds something like 170 million or 180 million pieces of equipment of one sort or another. The equipment required by the defence department covers practically every business which one can imagine existing in the country. It would seem to me that under those circumstances any business in the country could be required by the minister to furnish any information he wants to secure. Perhaps that is the intention of this section; I do not know. Will the minister tell us whether that is the intention of the section, and if not, what the intention is?

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

Mr. Howe: The intention is that all information that is needed in connection with defence preparations shall be obtainable. In other words, if the government wishes to make an inventory of any material to determine how much is held in the trade, it is their privilege to do so. If the government wishes to make an inventory of manufacturing capacity, as they did prior to the last war, it is the privilege of the government to require that information to be furnished by any firm. It is a reasonable provision, and a provision that is included in any defence act I have ever seen.

Mr. Harkness: I take it the effect of that answer is that the section is designed to give the minister the power to secure any information he wants from any business in Canada.

Mr. Howe: That is right.

Mr. Harkness: It seems to me that that is unnecessarily wide power to be given, particularly in view of the fact that when we come to subsection 2 we have there provision that this information can be given out and used under certain circumstances, and so forth; I shall have something to say about that later. But it does not appear to me that the thing should be as wide as it is. Paragraph (g) says "respecting defence supplies"; but when we come to the wording of it in connection with projects and other facilities that the people have, nothing is mentioned in connection with defence at all. It might be anything.

Mr. Green: Does the section mean that the minister could send his representative into any business in Canada and get whatever information the minister wanted? As I read the section, it goes that far, regardless of whether that firm has anything whatever to do with the government of Canada. It may have no business dealings with them whatever, yet the minister can send a man in and demand any information that the minister sees fit to demand; in effect, that means any information that the officials of the Canadian Commercial Corporation see fit to demand.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is exactly it.

Mr. Green: Furthermore, the section is wider than that because it applies to a project, and "project" is defined as covering a building, aerodrome, airport, dockyard, fortification, road or other work required for the purposes of defence. That means that the minister can send a man into any roadbuilding firm, any shipbuilding firm or any one of the construction firms; he can get particulars of the internal workings of any firm which deals normally with projects of that kind, again regardless of whether or not that particular firm has had anything to do with any government.

The minister says that every country has provisions such as this. Yet Canada never had a provision of that kind until the war. There was never a provision of that kind in the Canadian law until 1939; and it was written into the Canadian law then because of the war and, as we thought, for war purposes. I think this clause is the most objectionable one in the whole bill. It is purely dictatorial, with no limitation on it whatever. I do not see how the minister can justify asking for such powers.

The Deputy Chairman: Hon. members generally have been discussing each paragraph individually. Perhaps we would make better progress if we considered the paragraphs separately. We are now at paragraph (g).

Mr. Green: It was paragraph (g) that I was speaking to.

The Deputy Chairman: Yes. Can we therefore proceed in this way: can we carry paragraphs (a) to (g) of subsection 1 of section 3? Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Harkness: On paragraph (g)—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Before we do that, let us start over again and see where we stand.

Section 3, subsection 1, paragraphs (a) to (e) inclusive agreed to.

On section 3, subsection 1, paragraph (f).

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am sure the minister would co-operate with me in anything that would prevent me from saying anything more on this paragraph. But the minister has not answered the question I asked, except to say that the Department of Justice in a general way is familiar with this bill. But being familiar with the bill does not necessarily mean that you have considered every question that arises. It is now twelve minutes to one o'clock. I suggest to the minister that he could at any rate satisfy me with regard to part of my question if he would put it up to the Department of Justice and let us know the result at three o'clock. I think that is a reasonable request, and I am sure the minister thinks so too.

Mr. Howe: With so many lawyers in the committee, I should think that the Department of Justice would be entirely superfluous. Will any hon. member in the house give us his opinion? I think my hon. friend is a lawyer.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I refrained from giving a legal opinion, but I was interested in the minister's legal opinion, although I am not entirely satisfied with it. I am asking him quite seriously if there is anything unreasonable in asking the Department of Justice for an opinion on the matter.

Mr. Howe: I think that those who require the opinion should ask for it themselves.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Stand. The minister has only smiled at me. He has not given me an answer to that question.

Mr. Knowles: He told you that the Department of Justice was superfluous.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister allow paragraph (f) to stand until this afternoon, at any rate, and consider that suggestion? Perhaps he will feel better after lunch.

Mr. Howe: I feel fine now. Let it stand, if you like.

Paragraph (f) stands.

On section 3, subsection 1, paragraph (g).

Mr. Harkness: In view of what the minister has said, and as I read this paragraph, it seems to me that it gives him power, for example, to send a man down to my farm to ask me how many pigs I am raising, how many I am figuring on raising in the next six months, how many cattle I have, how much grain I have, and so forth. He can ask me about any of those things. They are all necessary for defence. The defence forces eat a great deal of pork, beef, and so forth. It does not seem to me to be reasonable that the minister should have the power to send people into any business whatever in this country, and require the man running that business to answer any questions that may be put to him. It particularly does not sound reasonable to send these people out amongst the farmers. I do not suppose they would ever do that; nevertheless the power is there to do it, as I read the subsection. It seems to me that this provision should be amended to limit the powers to projects, let us say, which are specifically and necessarily used in defence preparations.

Mr. Howe: Will my hon. friend please tell me what clause in this bill allows the minister to count the pigs on his farm? Paragraph (g) reads:

require any person to furnish such information respecting defence supplies dealt in by him—

Mr. Green: That includes pigs.

Mr. Howe: That is a defence supply?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): You mention animals in one section.

Mr. Green: Animals are considered now as defence supplies.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Ask the troops for their opinion.

Mr. Howe: If we need to know it, why should we not obtain the information?

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the paragraph carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fulton: On division.

Mr. Howe: All right; on division.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready to carry the clause?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No. I think the minister is all wrong about this, in spite of his legal opinions. Surely this would go quite far enough, especially when you read the extraordinary wording of paragraph (a) of clause 2 which says:

> (a) "defence supplies" means arms, ammunition, implements of war, vehicles, mechanical and other equipment, watercraft, amphibious craft, aircraft, animals, goods, wares, merchandise, articles and materials of all kinds required for any project or otherwise for the purposes of defence.

I come back to this point under paragraph (g).

Mr. Howe: If my hon. friend will agree that we would not look into pigs until we call up pigs for defence, I think that we might agree. I think it means horses.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am not going to pursue the question of pigs. I really am more interested in something else. Under this provision it seems to me that the minister, and, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra said, a whole lot of other people who are acting for the minister, are entitled to go in and ask for information. Let us be realistic about this. Quite true, it is the minister's authority that is behind it; but actually there are a number of officials who are entitled to go in, I take it, to get all the information about patents and processes of any kind, things which may be very injurious. Again let me say that if this is all going to be done by the minister personally it might be—

Mr. Green: Bad enough.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Well, bad enough, or good enough, but at any rate this is a very different thing. I think we have to be realistic about this. Surely (g) does do exactly what the hon. member for Calgary East said. It opens the door wide, and it lets you get any information, secret or otherwise, confidential or otherwise.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend would divide industry into two parts for defence purposes: those who are willing to co-operate with the government in giving information that the government requires to make a survey, and those who are not willing. As to those who are not willing he would say: We will not question those; they need have no part in defence; we cannot bother them; we will just deal with the willing ones, and the survey will represent what the willing people will say they can do in defence; with regard to the unwilling people, we will just count them out; they will not be a factor when there is a war. Well, when there was a war I do not recall that we made much distinction between willing people and unwilling people.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister says that when there was a war we made no distinction. We have said again and again, until I am sure the minister is tired of it and we are tired of saying it, but apparently it is necessary to keep on saying it, that the whole basis of our objection is that this is peacetime. What we are worried about is that these powers, these extraordinary powers are now apparently a commonplace in peacetime.

Mr. Howe: Unfortunately even in peace, for the defence of the country, some people think it is necessary to take harsh means. Now, if this represents harsh means, this country believes it is necessary to take this step.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I want to support what the hon. member for Calgary East has said. I take great exception to the last remarks of the minister, that we are dividing this country up into those who are willing to support the defence—

Mr. Howe: No, I did not say that; I said those willing to give information, and those unwilling to give it.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Those willing to give information and those unwilling. I can take the minister to many people who in the last war ruined their health in the performance of services for the country. Many of these people object today to this type of legislation being introduced by a government in peacetime. I tell the committee that they are very patriotic people. If there were another war, or if this country needed defence measures, these very same people who did so much that they ruined their health in producing food and so on, for the armed services, would be willing to do it again. They do not think that we should have this type of legislation in peacetime.

I lost an opportunity to speak yesterday because I was called out of the house on something else. I cannot refer to that now, but I did vote against the bill. I would have liked to have an opportunity to speak on the bill, and speak on behalf of many people whose views I represent on this type of legislation in peacetime. It does not fit in at all with the day after day criticisms that we have made in trying to get information out of the Department of National Defence. It is in absolute opposition to anything that we have got from the Minister of National Defence. I want to say that that clause is something foreign to democracy as we have it in Canada.

Again to go back to many of our producers who are just as patriotic in the defence of this country as the minister or anybody else, they disapprove of this type of legislation. I cannot be too emphatic about that. I present the words "dividing up this country" which the minister put on the record a few moments ago.

Mr. Pearkes: I have said very little on this bill, but I believe that there is a fundamental change in the necessity of preparedness in peacetime from the conditions that existed many years ago. Years ago, as I have pointed out many times in the house, Canada had ample time after the outbreak of war to build up her material and equip and supply her troops. I have said time and time again that I believe those days have passed. It is necessary for us to take measures in order to prepare our forces for the defence of this country such as we have never had to take before.

Mr. Sinclair: Bring on the colonels.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We are very proud to have someone in our party who is independent and who does not always follow the party line. It does not worry us at all. I wish you had a few in your party.

To go back to (g); the minister has been kind enough to say he will have a look at (f). I want him to have a look at (g). I want to remind him of what he said a few moments ago, namely, that perhaps we do not need this legislation yet. I hope the people of Canada will come to know this. We talk about being harsh. What does harshness mean? It means, as the hon. member for Souris said, he assumes that there is a division, as he indicated a few minutes ago, between the willing and the unwilling. I think that is an insult to the people who are considered unwilling. I say again that he has not been able to give us a single instance to show that this power is needed, to show that there is anyone unwilling. I told him yesterday—and he ought to take this as a compliment—that he had very great prestige in the manufacturing community and that I believed he could do this without all these extraordinary powers. At any rate we now come to (g), and you have this inquisitorial power which, it seems to me, is foreign to everything. I wonder if all the men who voted for this so blithely yesterday read these things through, and whether they consider it is good. Are they prepared to have this inquisitorial power almost without limit?

Mr. Jeffery: I have not heard any suggestion from any member of the opposition of any practical amendment that could be made to this section. I have heard the appeal of a lawyer on a previous subsection. I have heard the opinion of a lawyer in the house, and I do not think there is any lawyer in this house or in Canada who could make an amendment to this paragraph which would be practicable in the working of the act.

The officials cannot walk in and make these inquisitions unless it has been directed by the minister that they make them. The minister himself is responsible to the public if he makes inquisitions. If they are unreasonable he will not be a minister very long. Therefore I say there is nothing we can do about this paragraph.

Mr. Ross (Souris): You have not been here very long; you do not know.

Mr. Harkness: This paragraph makes possible the setting up of what might be called an industrial gestapo. It does not seem to me that it is necessary for the working of this act to have powers of that kind, power on the part of the minister to require all this information from any individual who is engaged in industry. It is completely against the liberties of the individual which we have always looked up to and protected in this country and which I think everyone in this country wants to have continued. This paragraph should be deleted or amended in such a way that the wide powers will not be there.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Ross (Souris): At one o'clock we were discussing paragraph (g) of section 3. First of all I want to say that there is absolutely no difference between the hon. member for Nanaimo and myself in our desire—

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): He will vote for it.

Mr. Ross (Souris): That is rather meaningless. There is no difference right now between us in our desire to see all the branches of our defence forces properly equipped and cared for. But this is peacetime. There is undoubtedly a right and a wrong way of doing this thing. We differ only as to the procedure. Why one minister should have all these dictatorial powers in peacetime I fail to understand. I am just as eager to see proper methods of defence in this country as anyone else. The present minister, who is now asking for these dictatorial powers, during the calendar year of 1949 insisted that the government should disregard and ignore the law of this land. At that time the Minister of Justice, who was sworn to observe and respect the law of the land, apparently lacked the courage to insist upon carrying out the law of the land or in turn to offer his resignation as any of his predecessors in that high office I think would have done.

Mr. Dechene: Who wrote that one?

Mr. Ross (Souris): I wrote these notes myself. If you know my writing you can check it and find out.

Mr. Dechene: Read it if you like.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I am not reading it.

Mr. Dechene: The hon. gentleman is reading every word.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I will move down to the next seat and leave my notes for you. I have been here twelve sessions, and I have never read any speech in the house other than one prepared from notes of my own. I feel keenly about this matter. I was referring to the Combines Investigation Act and the flour milling report. I know something about conditions in this country. Surely the Minister of National Defence should have some responsibility in the matters covered by this present measure. He and other cabinet ministers are dodging their responsibilities.

The Deputy Chairman: I must remind the hon. gentleman that we are dealing with paragraph (g)—

Mr. Ross (Souris): Under which great and wide powers are given to the minister.

The Deputy Chairman: —which deals with information which the minister can ask to be furnished.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I was referring to what the same minister has done in the past calendar year, and now we are being asked to give the same minister much wider powers. As I pointed out before one o'clock, some people with whom I am personally acquainted are just as patriotic as any others and care just as much about the defence of this country. They disapprove of this legislation. I think there is a greater feeling about national defence in this country at this time than there was at any time in previous history. During the last great war there were differences of opinion in this country; there were those who believed, with the best of intentions, that no troops should leave our shores. They felt that our energies should be confined to production. I am not criticizing their view, but there was that division. Today it is realized that if there is another war this country may be the Belgium of that war. The result is that there is a much more united feeling about matters of national defence. Irrespective of what we think about its being a privilege to serve in the armed forces, there is no lack of concern in any corner of this house about national defence or a desire to see that all members of our armed services are properly equipped and cared for in every respect.

It is an entirely different thing to give one minister all these powers, especially those provided for in this paragraph (g). I know it has been said that this is being made a personal matter, but I contend that no minister should be given that power. It should be a matter for the cabinet to decide and surely the Minister of National Defence should have responsibility in these particular matters.

As I have pointed out before, we have spent days discussing the estimates of the Minister of National Defence, and so far we have not succeeded in getting anything that would lead us to believe that there is a need for legislation such as this in peacetime. There certainly is no argument about the desire of any of my colleagues to grant authority in the proper way. I have pointed out that there is a united feeling about national defence in this country, but there are many people who are just as patriotic as anyone in this house who disapprove of this legislation being passed in peacetime.

Mr. Sinclair: What about the hon. member for Nanaimo?

Mr. Ross (Souris): The hon. member for Coast-Capilano asks, "What about the hon. member for Nanaimo?" I made it very clear at the start that there is no member in this House of Commons for whom I have more respect than that hon. member. I pointed out that there was no difference between us about national defence and the providing of proper equipment and care for our troops. It was probably only a matter of the detailed methods about which there might be some difference. I respect the hon. member because he has had much more experience than I have had.

I will go further. I have been pointing out that the Minister of National Defence should have some concern about this. The other day the hon. member for Mackenzie made some remark about colonels and so on and said that he and the Minister of National Defence had served as buck privates. I would remind him that some of those colonels were originally buck privates. I do not think it can be said to be against them that they became colonels after serving as buck privates. I know that some of those colonels refused promotion for some time, men who have debated this matter in this house.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): What are you discussing?

Mr. Ross (Souris): I am discussing national defence. Has my hon. friend any objection? It may even be that some of the brass hats would rather have a buck private as Minister of National Defence than a certain major general to whom reference has just been made. We have freedom of thought.

I repeat that we have objection to any one man being given the powers granted by this bill.

Section 3, subsection 1, paragraph (g) agreed to.

On section 3, subsection 1, paragraph (h).

Mr. Green: Paragraph (h) deals with the construction and repair of ships. It gives the minister power to specify, subject to the approval of the governor in council, to what shipyard this business will be sent. As I read the paragraph it covers more than ships for the Department of National Defence; it would include shipbuilding for any department of the government. That would seem to be an unnecessary addition to the Defence Supplies Act. I ask the minister whether it would not be ample for the purposes of the act to have the power limited to ships to be constructed or repaired for the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Howe: The purpose of the paragraph is to divide government ship contracts of all kinds among shipyards in an equitable manner so that we may be able to keep in operation the shipyards that we believe we would require in war. During the last war our shipyards were expanded tremendously. If contracts for ships were let on the basis of tender, as required under the Public Works Act, you would have a situation where dog eats dog, and in my humble opinion you would only have three shipyards left in operation. You would have one on the west coast, one on the St. Lawrence and one on the east coast, and the others would be bankrupt. I think that is inevitable because the yard that is best able to get the initial business and keep its overhead low is bound to get any following business. In the interests of national defence I think it is not desirable to see our major operating shipyards reduced in number from eleven to three. For that reason, on the advice of the Canadian maritime commission—and I must say anything the department does in connection with the allocation of shipyard work is done on the advice of the maritime commission—we are taking the power in the act to allocate not only work required by the naval services of national defence but also any departmental work that a department may wish to have allocated. I remind hon. members that we allocate nothing unless we are asked to do so by the department directly involved. We can allocate on requisition from a department of government. Some departments will probably prefer to call for tenders as they must do under the Public Works Act. If other departments can be persuaded by the Canadian maritime commission that it is desirable to allocate their work, and they wish to make a requisition on the Department of Trade and Commerce to undertake the allocation, then this paragraph in the bill gives the department the power to do just that.

Mr. Green: Has the minister any power to allocate the construction of new shipping without approval of the governor in council?

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. Green: The section is not quite clear whether the power to act without the approval of the cabinet is limited to the repair of ships as distinct from the construction of new ships.

Mr. Howe: It is limited to urgent repairs the estimated cost of which is not more than $50,000. The only emergency power the minister has concerns an urgent repair, or in any event a repair not costing more than $50,000. Otherwise allocation can only be made by the governor in council.

Mr. Green: What is the objection to keeping the figure at $5,000 as set out in the Public Works Act?

Mr. Howe: The objection is that a boat may run aground, and commitments may have to be made exceeding $5,000 before it can be hauled off the reef. It is thought that $50,000 will likely cover emergent salvage operations, and therefore the figure is placed at that amount.

Mr. Green: As I read the section, the ceiling of $50,000 also applies where the repair is not of an emergent nature; to ordinary repairs as to which time is not of such importance. Is it the intention that all ship repair contracts under $50,000 should be allotted by the minister without the approval of cabinet, or is that power supposed to be restricted to emergency repairs?

Mr. Howe: What does the bill say? It says, is urgently required.

Mr. Green: It says, "is urgently needed or does not involve an estimated expenditure", and so on. It may be that the word "or" should be "and". It makes a great difference in the coverage. What was the original intention?

Mr. Howe: I imagine that the people who drafted the bill intended it to be as it is, "or".

Mr. Green: Then the way the bill reads it covers both cases. Any work up to $50,000, even though it is not of an urgent nature, can be allocated by the minister without the approval of the cabinet.

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Chairman, I agree that the questions put by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra at the present time are perfectly in order, but I want to make a necessary distinction about secrets. There will be secrets about matters concerning strategy and no secrets concerning expenditures. When we heard the leader of the opposition speaking so much about strategy I presume he was voicing the views of the Tories of the general staff of the Department of National Defence, and to that I am opposed. There shall be no discussion of strategy in the House of Commons, but a full discussion of expenditure. I hope the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra will tell that to his leader when he returns to the house from attending the meeting of the standing committee on public accounts.

Section 3, subsection 1, paragraph (h) agreed to.

On section 3, subsection 1, paragraph (i).

Mr. Green: This paragraph gives the minister power to employ the Canadian Commercial Corporation, or any company to which the Government Companies Operation Act applies, to exercise under his direction such of his powers under this act, other than those under paragraphs (e), (f) and (g), as he may specify. What other corporations has the minister in mind as likely to be used for the purposes of this act? Why does he not include in the powers which cannot be assumed by the corporation the power as to shipping? It seems to me that paragraph (h) should be added to paragraphs (e), (f) and (g) as one where the minister himself should be responsible.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. Howe: The minister is responsible for the operation of every clause in the act. He has the power to delegate except for the three clauses mentioned. In other words, if it is a case of demanding priority the minister authorizes that personally. No other signature is good. If it is a case of requisitioning it must be the minister's signature. If it is a case of applying for information it must be the minister's signature. As to the allocation of ships upon the advice of the Canadian maritime commission, there is no reason why that power should not be delegated. It is a routine power. The minister has the responsibility for it just as in the case of all other clauses, but it is a power that he can very well delegate.

Mr. Green: What about my first question concerning other government corporations?

Mr. Howe: As to other government corporations, Canadian Arsenals is the principal one. It is handling about $40 million worth of business today, which is delegated to it by the minister. The Polymer Corporation might very well be called upon to assist in stockpiling rubber. Any crown company that can do a job more efficiently than a government agency may be called on for that purpose.

Mr. Pouliot: The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has just referred to the Canadian Commercial Corporation and the maritime commission. I challenge him to denounce the Tories who are in those crown companies.

Mr. Green: The hon. member for Temiscouata is full of challenges today. I do not know whether he is looking for a fight or trying to be funny.

Mr. Pouliot: I am not trying to be funny; I am very serious.

Mr. Green: I did not know there were so many Tories in Canada as he has mentioned today. I am glad to learn that we have such extensive support, and I hope we can find more. I am trying to do business with the Minister of Trade and Commerce at the moment.

Section 3, subsection 1, paragraph (i) agreed to.

On section 3, subsection 1, paragraph (j).

Mr. Harkness: This paragraph provides that the minister may——do such further things as may be authorized by the governor in council in regard to the procurement and disposal of defence supplies and projects.

I would like a little information as to why the word "disposal" is in here. So far everything has been in connection with procuring supplies for defence purposes, but apparently this paragraph gives the minister power, when authorized by the governor in council, to dispose of any supplies or projects. I thought the normal way that was done was through the War Assets Corporation, that these supplies were automatically turned over to them for disposal. Is it proposed to have some different procedure with respect to the disposal of surplus defence supplies and projects, or what is the reason for this provision?

Mr. Howe: Occasionally the department gets a requirement from another government for certain supplies. The need may be urgent, in which case, after it has been cleared by the Department of External Affairs, reference is made to the armed services to see whether they would prefer that we deliver existing stocks to the customer and replace those stores with new material. In some cases the answer has been in the affirmative. My hon. friend will appreciate that ammunition particularly is subject to deterioration and very often the army prefers to deliver ammunition from existing stocks and have it replaced in due course with fresh stock. In that case sales are made; the money is put in escrow and used to pay for the replacement of the store through Canadian Arsenals.

Mr. Harkness: From what the minister has said I take it that the word "disposal" is put in here so that this provision will be complementary to the paragraph in the National Defence Act which was passed last week and which provided that with the authorization of the governor in council, articles which were not surplus could be disposed of; and it was explained at that time that it was to permit them to be disposed of to foreign powers. I take it the only reason for including the word "disposal" in this paragraph is that materials may be turned over to other powers, and that the ordinary means of disposal will be followed otherwise.

Mr. Howe: That is a correct statement.

Section 3, subsection 1, paragraph (j) agreed to.

On section 3, subsection 1, paragraph (f).

The Deputy Chairman: This paragraph was allowed to stand, and perhaps it can be disposed of now.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister allowed this paragraph to stand, though I do not know whether he did so in order to follow my suggestion and supplement his own legal knowledge.

Mr. Howe: Being a layman, and not being very clear as to just what was my hon. friend's point, I asked the Minister of Justice to attend. If my hon. friend will state his point now I have no doubt the Minister of Justice will be glad to deal with it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I appreciate that. If the Minister of Justice will have regard to the terms of section 8 as to the imposition of a fine; then if he will have regard to the terms of section 3 (1) (f), he will see these words:

—who having received an offer that, in the opinion of the minister, is fair and reasonable, has refused delivery of such needed materials or articles, to deliver them—

In the first place, when queried as to section 8, the minister said under that section a man would get just as fair a trial as he would get in any other legal proceeding, but the view was put forward that actually the court would be restricted by the terms of section 3(1)(f) because the determination there was the opinion of the minister, and anyone indicted under section 8 would come before the court having refused to do what the minister said and would be faced with paragraph (f), which, as I see it, makes the opinion of the minister conclusive on the court.

Mr. Garson: Conclusive as to what; as to the time for delivery?

Mr. Fulton: As to the reasonableness of the time.

Mr. Garson: Subparagraph (ii) contains these words:

—such reference—

That is, to the exchequer court as to price.

—shall not extend the period of time for delivery specified by the minister under subparagraph (i).

Is that your point? From a cursory reading of this section I would say that what it had in mind was that the minister would specify the time and price. If the price were unacceptable it would be settled under paragraph (f)(ii) by the Exchequer Court of Canada, which would determine the current market price. Then if there were an alleged breach of this section which was required to be prosecuted under section 8 I should think the court—which incidentally would be an altogether different court than the Exchequer Court of Canada, since such a prosecution would be carried on in the ordinary criminal courts—upon considering the charge that the accused to comply with the reguisition which would be able to consider whether there was a reasonable opportunity on the part of the accused to comply with the requisition which the minister had made. Take an extreme case, in which the time specified by the minister was perfectly satisfactory and reasonable, and still was not complied with. If the accused could come along and show that he had been hit by a car at the time he was preparing to comply with this request, and so had a good and reasonable excuse for not having done so; it seems to me that that would constitute a good defence. This is not like the adulteration acts, for example, where a man selling some kind of food product has no means of knowing whether or not it is adulterated because it is only handled by him in the ordinary commercial way. Yet it is necessary to impose upon him an absolute, outright obligation that the product be pure, and if it is not, he is guilty whether or not he has any guilty mind. From a casual reading of this statute now before us, I should think it would be necessary for the crown to prove mens rea. Then, if the crown were able to establish a prima facie case, the accused could come along and show that there was an absence of mens rea by proving the facts of his defence.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have no desire to prolong this discussion, but I want to make the point perfectly clear. I am going to read some particular lines to the minister and ask whether in his opinion it is open to the court to review the decision of the minister in this connection. If the Minister of Justice will look at lines 16, 17, and 18, he will see that they refer to a person having received an offer that is, in the opinion of the minister, fair and reasonable, and has refused delivery. My question is, will it be competent to the court to review the decision of the minister, and reach its own conclusion as to whether the order is fair and reasonable?

Mr. Fulton: May I just follow that up before the minister replies? Surely that is the main point, those words in lines 17 and 18 to which reference has been made by the member for Greenwood. They must be read in the light of the subsequent provision that the exchequer court is precluded from taking into consideration or making any finding with respect to the time at which delivery was to be made. The whole implication of this paragraph is that the minister has the absolute right to set the time, or first to make an offer which includes both the price and the time of delivery. If the person to whom the offer is made fails or refuses to deliver, then the minister has the right to make an order compelling him to deliver. Under the words of the section read as a whole there is, by necessary implication, an absolute right conferred upon the minister to make a decision as to time, and the words "fair and reasonable" are part of that right. Any requirement which he makes as to time, therefore, must be considered as being fair by the court when interpreting the statute by virtue of the provisions in the statute. I believe it is open to serious question whether the court can go behind the words of the statute and make its own inquiry, or indeed receive evidence on the question of whether the time limitation fixed was fair and reasonable.

It should be borne in mind at this point we are not asking that the exchequer court be allowed to prolong the time within which delivery may be made so as to defer delivery. That is the point the minister does not want to allow. We are referring to the proceedings in the ordinary court into which a man may be haled for the imposition of a penalty, in spite of having done his best and having failed to comply with the terms of the act.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, is not the point this, that offences generally, as I indicated a few moments ago, for the purpose of the present discussion are divided into two groups. There are those offences, and I think this covers the great majority, in which it is necessary to prove mens rea as an ingredient of the offence, or that the accused had, in relation to the alleged offence, a guilty mind, an intent to commit a breach of the law. Then there are offences, and I believe this constitutes the minority of offences, such as those relating to the adulteration of food. In the public interest it has been necessary to dispense with any proof of mens rea in such cases, for it is necessary that you find a man guilty who is selling an adulterated product, regardless of the fact he may have had no knowledge whatever that that product was adulterated.

I cannot find anything in the present statute, just in a casual perusal or upon hearing the point raised by my hon. friend the member for Greenwood, to indicate that the offence which is created here falls into the second category. If it does not fall into the second category, then it would be necessary for the crown to prove mens rea, that in relation to this matter the accused did have a guilty mind. Let us say that my colleague, in a manner which would certainly not be characteristic of him, made a demand which was absolutely unreasonable as regards time for delivery—that his demand could not possibly be complied with. I certainly cannot imagine any court, upon the accused being brought before it, under section 8, that would ever refuse to receive the evidence which the accused would adduce to show that this demand was unreasonable, and that the accused could not comply with it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I repeat that I am not going to drag this out, but I wish the minister would read again the words of section 8, which is to the effect that every person who contravenes or fails to observe this act is guilty of an offence. Is the minister still prepared to say that this section only contemplates an offence where there is a guilty mind?

Mr. Garson: Yes, I think so, because if my hon. friend will look at almost every section in the Criminal Code, or the Official Secrets Act which we sought to amend today, he will see this phrase repeated time and time again: Every person who contravenes this section shall be guilty of an indictable offence, or an offence punishable upon summary conviction. The point I am making is that it is not spelled out in the section of the statute which creates this sort of offence that it imports the idea of mens rea. Yet the idea of mens rea is there, and if the accused can show, in relation to any statutory offence, which does not fall within the second category of offences, that in point of fact he did not have a guilty mind to commit a breach of the act, then that is a good defence.

Mr. Jeffery: I believe there is probably a weakness in this section which has not been noticed. Apparently the offence would be a refusal to deliver, and that would be a direct act. It does not say that if a man does not deliver he is guilty of an offence, it says if he refuses to deliver then he is guilty. I believe, so far as the minister is concerned, that he has a weakness in the act which he has not recognized. In other words there has to be a refusal to deliver, not a failure to deliver within a certain time, or he cannot be guilty of an offence.

Mr. Knowles: All this legal language seems to be adding to the confusion. As a layman may I set out the facts as I see them. In this particular instance I happen to be on the minister's side. Subparagraph (ii) of paragraph (e) gives the subject the right to go to the exchequer court if the subject is not satisfied with the price offered by the crown.

Mr. Howe: Correct.

Mr. Knowles: The member for Kamloops, who started all this, wanted the subject to have the right to go to the exchequer court if the subject was not satisfied with the time allowed by the minister's order?

Mr. Fulton: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has misunderstood the point of my remarks which did not have reference to the right of appeal to the exchequer court for an extension of time, but merely the right to raise a defence in proceedings to enforce a penalty that the time given was not reasonable. My argument was that, by virtue of the expressed provision of the bill as it stands now precluding him from raising any argument with respect to the time, he would be precluded from raising that defence in any court in an action for the penalty.

Mr. Knowles: Whether the interpretation I placed upon the member's remarks in the first place or the interpretation he now places before us is correct, I submit that what I am going to say still applies. Still speaking as a layman, it seems to me that the only subject that comes before the exchequer court is the question of price. The other subject does not go there at all. The only way a man gets into court, because he did not obey the time element in the minister's order, is on the basis of the crown taking the subject to court, but not to the exchequer court at all. Am I not right?

Mr. Garson: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: It seems to me that is the basis of it. If a man does not comply with the order, and if it is only one day, the Minister of Trade and Commerce will certainly overlook it. Look what he did for the Minister of Justice with regard to the combines act last year; he gave him ten months. It is only in the case of an obstinate refusal to carry out a reasonable order that the crown takes the man into court under section 8. It seems to me that in that instance when the man got into a criminal court or a civil court—or wherever he would be taken—

Mr. Garson: He would start with the police court.

Mr. Knowles: All right. It seems to me that in that court it certainly would be a defence that the order of the minister was unreasonable and that the man had done his best to comply with it.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Howe: I want to thank my hon. friend for that explanation. In the absence of the Minister of Justice, it is becoming more and more obvious that the house must depend on laymen to interpret the law.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I think we should entirely agree with that statement and thank the Minister of Trade and Commerce himself.

Section 3, subsection 1, subparagraph (f) agreed to.

Section 3, subsection 1, agreed to.

On section 3, subsection 2—Non-disclosure of information.

Mr. Fulton: In view of the last remarks, I hesitate to raise another point, but I must say that I am more impressed with the argument of the Minister of Justice in this case than I was with the argument of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, although by that I do not intend to detract from his knowledge of the rules of this house, for which I have the greatest respect. The point I wish to raise here is a question with regard to paragraph (c) of subsection 2 which it seems to me again gives to the minister the right to disclose information or rather to make available information gathered under paragraph (g) of subsection 1; it seems to me to give the minister the right to disclose that information in any civil action or proceedings, without any limitation being imposed on that right. Again it may be argued that obviously this right will never be used in an unfair or prejudicial manner; but I would ask the Minister of Justice, since he is here, if I am not correct in my opinion that there is no limitation, as the result of the working of this clause, on the right of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to disclose the information which he has acquired, in any action whatsoever, or proceedings whether or not they relate directly to the operation of this act or whether they arise out of any contracts or negotiations entered into under this act. In other words the minister, with the broad words that are in this paragraph (c) of subsection 2, has the right to disclose that information in any proceedings whatsoever. Subsection (2) reads as follows:

> No person shall disclose any information furnished under paragraph (g) of subsection one without the consent of the person from whom it was obtained, except
> (c) with the consent of the minister, in any civil action or proceedings.

My question is this. Are not those words so wide that the minister could consent and thereby authorize the disclosure of that information in any action or proceedings, even although that action or proceedings did not relate directly to any contract or negotiation made or arising under or by virtue of the operation of this act?

Mr. Lesage: Read paragraph (g) of subsection 1 carefully.

Mr. Fulton: While the minister is considering the point, might I make this additional elaboration. I can appreciate the fact that in certain civil actions arising out of the operation of this statute, it would be desirable for the minister to be able to authorize disclosure of the information obtained in connection with the act. It might be desirable to disclose that information in civil proceedings, but surely only in proceedings having relation to the contract, negotiation or order made under this act and not with respect to any other civil proceedings even though not involving, or not arising by virtue of that act. That is what I am interested in. I am interested in seeing whether we cannot find some words to exclude the right to give this information in civil proceedings not connected with the operation of the act.

Mr. Garson: First of all, I want to make absolutely certain that I understand my hon. friend's question properly. Section 3, subsection 1, reads:

> The minister may—

Then going down to paragraph (g):

> —require any person to furnish such information respecting defence supplies dealt in by him or projects of a type executed by him or respecting his production and other facilities relating thereto in such time and manner as the minister may specify.

That is, the minister may go to this man who is dealing in these goods, seek this information from him and presumably get it. Then the section goes on in subsection (2) at the top of page 3:

> No person shall disclose any information furnished under paragraph (g) of subsection one without the consent of the person from whom it was obtained, except
> (c) with the consent of the minister, in any civil action or proceedings.

I think that the question that has to be answered there, and which can only be answered I presume by the minister himself, is as to whether that provision in the act is not required to meet the needs of the case. If it is, surely it is a protection to the person who has given the information in the first place, is it not?

Mr. Fulton: It may be. I think we can divide the types of cases into two: first, a civil action or proceeding involving or arising somehow out of the operations of this act as out of an order, requisition or contract made as a result of this act. I can well imagine that in that type of case it would be desirable to have the information obtained under paragraph (g) of subsection 1 disclosed in that civil proceeding. But the type of civil proceeding in which that information may be disclosed with the consent of the minister is not confined to the type of case to which I have just referred. There are no limiting words on any civil action or proceeding. My question therefore is this. Surely that information could be disclosed with the consent of the minister in any conceivable civil action or proceedings whether or not they had any reference to anything that was done under this act.

Mr. Garson: I wonder if my hon. friend and I have two different opinions as to the way in which this legislation functions. As I understand, it works as follows: Suppose the minister wants certain information connected with defence supplies. He goes to John Doe and says: Mr. Doe, will you give me information in relation to your production? We will say that it is of some kind of military equipment which may be of a highly confidential nature; that is, confidential not only as regards Canada but also as regards John Doe, because there may be involved processes that he does not want his competitors to get hold of.

Mr. Fulton: Exactly.

Mr. Garson: All we are concerned with in this connection, as I understand it—and I hope the minister and the parliamentary assistant will correct me if I am wrong—is this. Once this information has been obtained by his department, then subsection 2 is put in the bill to protect John Doe against some kind of improper disclosure, by officials of the department, perhaps to John Doe's competitor, Richard Roe. Therefore they say: No person shall disclose any information furnished —by whom? By John Doe. To whom? To the minister—under paragraph (g) of subsection 1 without the consent of John Doe—it is his information—except in the case of a civil action where they had been subpoenaed, where you have got to respect the dignity of the court and the processes of the court, and that they then can do so but only when they have first obtained the consent of the minister who is head of the department. What could be more reasonable than a provision of that sort? It seems to me the provision that you have to go right up to the minister before any employee of the department can disclose any of the information which has been communicated in confidence is an excellent one, and the very sort of provision that needs to be here to protect John Doe who has imparted a lot of confidential information for his country's benefit.

Mr. Fulton: If we want to protect John Doe all you need to say is that no person shall disclose any of the information obtained under paragraph (g), subsection 1 of section 3. That protects him. This is too restrictive, because it is possible that other departments will require this information. We will say the information is obtained by an official of the Canadian Commercial Corporation properly in the exercise of the powers of the minister under paragraph (g) of subsection 1 of section 3. The minister said that, to enable him to obtain an inventory of the defence supplies to the country, right now that authority has been granted to the commercial corporation in making an inventory; and they are making investigations into the methods, the accounting practices and the cost of producing the stuff. That is allowed. It is provided by paragraph (a) of subsection 2 of section 3, which we are considering, that disclosure may be made in certain cases. I am sorry, it is provided by subsection 2 of section 3 that:

> No person shall disclose any information furnished under paragraph (g) of subsection one . . .

That protects John Doe. That is an absolute protection. Now it is desired to provide for disclosure in what are conceived to be proper cases. The first proper case is paragraph (a) of subsection 2 of section 3 which reads:

> To an official of a government department requiring such information for defence purposes.

There is no question that that is a proper case. Then we come to (b) which reads:

> In any prosecution for an offence under this act.

I presume again there is no question that that is a proper case for disclosure of the information. Paragraph (c) reads:

> With the consent of the minister, in any civil action or proceedings.

In other words, you are allowing this disclosure in any civil action or proceedings, although you are confining such disclosure to occasions when the consent of the minister is given.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend is a lawyer. He must realize that when actions are brought in the civil court or when proceedings are taken in the civil court under the respective statutes, for the most part provincial statutes which set up these courts, they are empowered to issue subpoenas calling upon people such as Mr. John Doe to appear, and upon oath to make disclosure of whatever information within the possession of these people may be relevant to the issue that is before the court.

Mr. Fulton: The minister did not let me finish.

Mr. Garson: I am sorry; finish your statement.

Mr. Fulton: In the case that the minister envisages where the official getting the information was subpoenaed to give evidence it would be a complete answer to the requirement that he give evidence to say: "I am prohibited by the statute which says that no person shall disclose any information", so that the person getting the information would not be allowed to give it under the very terms of this clause that we are considering which says that no person shall give the information which he has received. But then you take away the protection. You say that in any civil action or proceedings he may be allowed to give it if he has the consent of the minister. My point is that you have taken away his protection and he can be compelled to disclose the information in a civil action or proceedings with the minister's consent, even although that civil action or proceedings may have no reference or relationship whatsoever to anything which has taken place as a result of this legislation. I do not see why we should open the door that wide.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will forgive me for saying so, I think he is under a misapprehension about opening the door. One of the effects of this subsection is that we are closing the door. Subsection 2 of section 3 says:

No person shall disclose any information—

Without the consent of the minister. That will refer to any official in the minister's department. The matter is of sufficient importance, as indicated by this subsection, that before any official of the department upon, we will say, being served with a subpoena calling upon him to appear, and adduce this as evidence, or testify as to it, can do so, he must take the matter to the minister of the department, who presumably will go into it very carefully; and if the minister says, "No, I will not consent", that is the end of the matter. That is protection. Surely ministers are continually exercising judgment on matters at least of this importance, I would say, day after day.

Not only is that so, but for the protection of the government in respect of these defence matters no person—in this case, in other words, John Doe—can give evidence with regard to what he told the minister without the minister's consent. That is the part of it that is the closing of the door. Now this is a matter of opinion. I admit that my opinion differs perhaps from my hon. friend's, but it does seem to me that ministers are exercising discretion every day on matters more difficult and more important than the question whether this information should be disclosed. It is not getting the minister an unreasonable privilege when his consent is required before this information is given.

Mr. Green: What I cannot understand is this. Paragraph (g) of subsection 1 of section 3 gives the Minister of Trade and Commerce very drastic power to force an individual to give information. It is only used where the individual has to be forced to give information. Once he has given that information surely the government should not, neither the government nor the minister, have the right to give the information to any civil court. I can quite understand that it might be all right to give the information to any department for defence purposes under section 3, subsection 2, paragraph (a), or in any prosecution under this particular act which, of course, would be in a criminal court; but I do not understand why the minister, or any other government official, has the slightest right to give that confidential information in a civilian court without the consent of the person from whom it was obtained.

The Minister of Justice has said that that may be a protection to the man from whom it was obtained. Surely that is not the situation. If the man from whom it was obtained was involved in a lawsuit he would be subject to the rules of the court before which his action was brought. He would have to give that evidence if the rules of the court provided for such being done. But I cannot understand what right the government has to give out this confidential information obtained by force without having the consent of the person from whom it was obtained when it is being given in a civil action. I do suggest that paragraph (c) of subsection 2 of section 3 should be struck out.

Mr. Garson: Does it not depend pretty largely upon how far we individually and as a house are prepared to grant ministerial discretion? I myself would have no hesitation at all because it seems to me that the minister is exercising discretion over matters much more difficult and complicated than this one here. I think it is necessary that it should be possible to produce this evidence in a civil action in certain cases without the consent of the minister, because you may have a set of circumstances which are difficult to foresee where in 1953, we will say, it is highly in the public interest that information should be disclosed to the courts in civil proceedings which the minister had received in 1948 from a corporation—and most of this information will come from corporations—that by 1953 may be completely defunct. If the consent of that corporation is required then owing to a special combination of circumstances that information may never see the light of day in a manner that might be very definitely against the public interest.

If in the course of the working out of this arrangement between John Doe and the minister, without any great fault on either side, a dispute develops and litigation in the courts ensues in relation to that very matter, surely to goodness the minister can give consent in order to get the facts into that action which would be a civil action in the exchequer court. Surely we are not going to say that because of some statute we have passed the very information upon which the whole cause of action as between John Doe and the crown hinges is going to be locked up in the bosom of John Doe and not be available to the judge to decide. For my part I think there are many cases where we have given a minister power that is more widespread than this.

Mr. Green: In a case of that kind between the government and John Doe the rules of court would provide for compelling John Doe to produce the documents and to give evidence. But this is a case where the minister steps in and forces John Doe to give information for the purposes of this act. Why should that information which is obtained for the purposes of this act be made available for some civil proceedings having nothing whatever to do with the act unless John Doe consents to that being done?

Mr. Harkness: What I was going to ask the minister before all this legal business came up was what situation he foresaw which would make it necessary that this should be there at all?

Mr. Howe: We have been through about ten years of the application of the munitions and supply act and the minister is frequently asked if certain information can be released for a legal proceeding and at times the minister has to say "No." It seems to me far better that the minister should say "No" than for a witness to go on the stand and say that he cannot give the evidence because the law will not allow it.

Section 3, subsection 2 agreed to.

On section 3, subsection 3—Public Works Act.

Mr. Green: Does this subsection 3 fit in with section 6 (e)? This subsection 3 exempts certain types of contracts from the provision of the Public Works Act which prescribes that tenders must be called. As I read section 6 (e) it also exempts the minister from the provisions of the Public Works Act in a wider field. Can the minister state whether both of these provisions cut down the effect of the Public Works Act, or just what is the relationship between these two subsections and that act?

Mr. Howe: The former act provided a blanket exemption that it would govern regardless of any other statute, but this act does not do that. Where there is a departure from the provisions of another act that departure is written out in detail. There is no general departure from any other statute. The Public Works Act provides explicitly that every contract shall be let by tender, and certain exceptions are set out here.

Mr. Green: The same is true of section 6 (e).

Mr. Howe: That is right.

Section 3, subsection 3, agreed to.

Sections 4 and 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Requisitions.

Mr. Fulton: Paragraph (e) of this section provides:

> (e) a contract may be entered into by the minister without the approval of the governor in council if—

Then three alternative requirements are set out and the paragraph continues:

> —but the minister shall make a report to the governor in council in respect of any contract involving an estimated expenditure exceeding five thousand dollars and entered into without the approval of the governor in council.

Is there anywhere in the act a limitation as to the time within which that report must be made to the governor in council?

Mr. Howe: There is no provision in the bill, but they are customarily made monthly. Each month a report is submitted to council setting out the contracts that have been made and which do not require approval of the governor in council. Those are contracts under $5,000 or contracts made in time of emergency. If it covers an important matter of emergency the order in council is submitted at the earliest possible moment and the matter reviewed by council.

Section agreed to.

Sections 7 and 8 agreed to.

On section 9—Repeal.

Mr. Knowles: I have a few remarks I should like to make and I also intend to move an amendment.

Mr. Fulton: A legal amendment?

Mr. Knowles: Yes. It is perfectly in order. There are two subsections in this section. Subsection 1 repeals the Department of Munitions and Supply Act with the proviso that certain sections of that act will continue to apply to certain contracts specified in the subsection. One can have no quarrel with the repeal of the Department of Munitions and Supply Act for it is being replaced by the powers set out in the bill now before us.

Subsection 2 repeals the Defence Purchases, Profits Control, and Financing Act, 1939, and thus wipes off the statute books the only bit of legislation which places a limitation upon the profits to be made out of defence and war supplies. I realize that section 7 of the Defence Purchases, Profits Control, and Financing Act, 1939, which placed a limitation on the profits, was overridden by the Department of Munitions and Supply Act, but under subsection 1 of this section that act goes by the board. Without getting into too much of a legal argument, it seems to me that if section 7 of the Defence Purchases, Profits Control, and Financing Act of 1939 remained on the statute books, it would now apply. My point, if I may state it again, is that the statute that overrode the 1939 act is repealed by the provisions of subsection 1 of section 9 of this bill. That leaves the 1939 act alive, at least for the time being. I for one feel that section 7 of the Defence Purchases, Profits Control, and Financing Act, 1939, should not be wiped off the statute books.

Reference has been made during the course of this debate to some of the things that were said when that act was brought before this parliament during the first session of 1939. The late Ian Mackenzie, who was then minister of national defence, introduced the measure and made many references to the feeling in the country that profiteering in war supplies was abhorrent to the people of Canada and something to which the government wanted to put a stop. At page 1767 of Hansard for March 10, 1939, the late Ian Mackenzie said:

> The government, if I may speak for them, believe in the principle of equality of sacrifice; that in wartime men should not be required to offer their lives and limbs while those who provide the weapons of destruction have even the possibility of reaping undue profits.

He also said on the same occasion:

> The government is determined that in peacetime, where private industry must be utilized, there shall be the strictest possible regulation of profits both in the interest of the taxpayer and in deference to public abhorrence of profits made from products which involve destruction of human lives and misery among nations.

I would remind hon. members of the quotations the hon. member for Kootenay West made yesterday from articles written in years gone by by the present leader of the opposition. I would also remind members of the quotation that the leader of the opposition gave us yesterday from a speech made by Mr. Mackenzie King in years gone by. We are all together; we all say the same thing, that we do not want profits to be made out of the manufacture of war materials.

The particular formula or provision set out in section 7 of the Defence Purchases, Profits Control, and Financing Act, 1939, may not be the best way to achieve the aim of limiting the profits to be made out of war materials, but until something better is produced I for one do not like to see that formula and the principle behind it wiped off the statute books of the country. As I have already said, it is the only take-the-profit-out-of-war provision on our statute books. I have heard the explanations made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce on a number of occasions as to why the government found it necessary to override the provisions of section 7 of that act in the fall of 1939. Maybe the explanations are acceptable and maybe they are not, but whether they are acceptable explanations or otherwise it seems to me that the mere statement that one particular formula was not satisfactory is not a sufficient reason for doing away altogether with the principle of taking the profit out of war. I would go further and say that I think 5 per cent is too much profit to be made out of producing war materials; I think all profit should be taken out of war, and then perhaps we might get rid of war itself; but at least we have that kind of provision on the statute books now, and I do not think we should take the retrograde step of doing away with it.

I believe the course that parliament should follow at this time is to retain that provision on the statute books. Then if the government feels that that particular formula is not the best one for doing the job let them bring in an amendment to provide another formula. In the meantime let us not wipe out the only piece of take-the-profit-out-of-war legislation that we have. I am sure that that provision is the least that the Canadian people want. I may say to the government that the Canadian people have not forgotten the fact that the 5 per cent clause was overriden in 1939 by the Department of Munitions and Supply Act. I know there was a good deal of feeling about it. I know that if the committee makes the decision now that that legislation is to go by the board for good, many Canadians will wonder just what it is all about.

The surest way to give Canadians confidence that our defence policy is clearly a defence policy, and that we have not yielded to the greed involved in profits made out of war supplies that was mentioned by the former prime minister, Mackenzie King, the leader of the opposition and others, is for the committee to say today that we are going to keep section 7 on the statute books at least until something better is provided. Toward that end, Mr. Chairman, I move:

> That clause 9, subclause 2, be amended by adding thereto immediately after the word "repealed" the following words:
> "except for section 7 of the said act, the provisions of which shall apply to all contracts made under this act."

So that it will be clear on Hansard what the effect of the amendment will be, may I say two things. First of all I should like to read section 9, subsection 2, as it would read with my amendment. It is as follows:

9. (2) The Defence Purchases, Profits Control, and Financing Act, 1939, chapter 42 of the statutes of 1939 (first session), is repealed, except for section 7 of the said act, the provisions of which shall apply to all contracts made under this act.

The other thing I should like to do is to indicate briefly what is contained in section 7 of the Defence Purchases, Profits Control, and Financing Act, 1939. It is a rather lengthy section with nine subsections and one of the subsections has three subparagraphs. But the gist of the section is contained in the first two subsections, which I should like to read. They are as follows:

7. (1) The maximum net profit received by any person in respect of any contract to which this section applies shall be limited to an amount equal to five per centum per annum on the average amount of capital of such person employed in the performance of the contract.

(2) There shall be levied upon and paid to His Majesty, by any person who is a party to a contract to which this section applies, a tax equal to the amount by which the net profit in respect of any such contract exceeds an amount equal to five per centum per annum of the average amount of the capital of such person employed in the performance of the contract.

As I have already indicated, there are seven more subsections, making nine in all. The others give details as to how the principle of this section is to be applied. I should like to point out that if my amendment carries it would then make the provisions of section 7 of the Defence Purchases, Profits Control, and Financing Act, 1939, apply to contracts made under the bill now before us, which is known as the Defence Supplies Act. I feel very strongly that we should not wipe out section 7. The remainder of the Defence Purchases, Profits Control, and Financing Act, 1939, can go. Those provisions have been replaced by other provisions, but until something better is produced section 7—the only take-the-profit-out-of-war legislation we have—really ought to stay on the statute books of Canada. I hope that the committee will support my amendment.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I can shorten the discussion by pointing out the objections. It has been found in practice that the clause in question is entirely unworkable. For example, milk is one of the supplies bought in large quantities. How would my hon. friend determine the capital employed in producing milk? I suppose it would be the value of the cow. Under that clause the government would be limited to paying a price for its milk that would return 5 per cent per annum on the cost of the cow. You can multiply that example by any number, but the one I am giving obviously meets the situation. There are a great many. The worst is where the production is a very small fraction of the output of a certain industrial plant, and it is quite impossible to determine the amount of capital employed in the production of the article in question.

I might point out also that I believe when that act was passed the tax on corporate profits was 5 per cent. Today it is 38 per cent in all provinces except Ontario and Quebec, where it is 40 per cent. Suggest for example the profit margin be written down from 5 per cent to 3 per cent. If the total profit a man may make is 3 per cent of his capital, he would be much better off buying dominion government bonds, which yield about that, and sitting back collecting his 3 per cent without producing anything at all. That would be the course of prudence, because in that way he could not lose. My hon. friend is not making any provision to take care of losses; he is just eliminating profits. If a man is interested in profits, the kind of man my hon. friend is trying to curb, he would certainly find a sure way of getting profits and of avoiding losses. I just mention these things to show how utterly unworkable that provision is; therefore it is quite unacceptable to the government.

Mr. Knowles: If I may just have a word before the leader of the opposition rises, as the minister probably knows, in the latter part of section 7 there is an exception respecting contracts for which there is competitive bidding or tendering, whatever the phrase may be; I did not take time to read the whole section to the committee. I would assume that some of these products which are supplied by a great many people, such as milk, would come under that exception. It seemed to me quite clear from reading the whole section that the kind of supplies it would clearly apply to would be direct war supplies, with particular reference to munitions, as was the intention of the government in 1939.

As to the other question and the minister's reply to it, I simply say two things. I have spoken to at least one chartered accountant who tells me that it is possible, on a cost accounting basis, to meet the provisions of this section. The other comment I make is that I am not now asking the committee to accept something I have devised. I am simply asking the committee to agree to retain on the statute books something that was put there by this Liberal government, that was worked out by this government and which the minister, in presenting it, said was really the best that had been done in the field of limiting profits on war materials.

Mr. Howe: And it never worked.

Mr. Knowles: It was never tried.

Mr. Drew: This is the last section of the bill. It is not necessary to review the discussion that has taken place, but before this section is carried I do think it appropriate to examine what really is happening through the repeal of the two acts mentioned in this section and their replacement by this single act. One of the difficulties hon. members have encountered in discussing this whole subject was not that of understanding what had or had not been done, but rather understanding exactly why this is being done and why it is necessary at all. The minister has just given an illustration of the difficulty we find in knowing when to take him seriously, in his illustration of what he views as one of the difficulties in restraining profits under one of the acts that are to be repealed. He says that since milk might be required for these purposes, probably the only way you could determine that would be to find the cost of the cow and then take five per cent of that capital investment. The minister may have considered that a humorous illustration, but he knew perfectly well that neither he nor any other minister is going to be dealing with people who are operating individual cows. If they should be getting milk they will get it in bulk, from people who keep accounts—as undoubtedly the Minister of Finance will see that they do—and so far as that operation is concerned there would be very little difficulty in determining the exact situation.

Nevertheless I recognize the point made by the minister, and there may be practical reasons why a fixed limit is not satisfactory to cover the over-all field. However, by the very fact that he illustrated his point by referring to milk the minister emphasized that the legislation now before us is intended to have very wide application, beyond ordinary defence supplies. That is exactly the point we have been trying to make.

The statement has been made already that the Canadian Commercial Corporation is able to perform these duties and that it has been regarded as the agency to purchase in the place of the department of munitions and supply, and to carry out the functions related to the munitions and supply act. In that connection I would like to place on record what the minister had to say in regard to the Canadian Commercial Corporation on another occasion. On March 24, 1949, when an amendment to the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act was before the house and the minister was speaking in support of that amendment, he had this to say at page 1946 of Hansard for that year:

> It was set up that way at first, but since it has become the purchasing agency for the Department of National Defence, since it has taken the place of the Department of Munitions and Supply, if this amendment passes it will be a continuing agency.

In case there were any doubt as to what kind of agency was meant, on page 5 of the report of the Canadian Commercial Corporation presented to the minister for the year ending March 31, 1948, I find these words:

> During the year the corporation, acting at the request and in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, continued to fulfil the minister's obligations as exclusive purchasing agent for the Department of National Defence.

That is exactly what we have been saying; that this corporation has been the exclusive purchasing agent of the Department of National Defence and, to use the minister's own words, that it has taken the place of the department of munitions and supply. I do not think anything has been said here by the minister to suggest any reason why the Canadian Commercial Corporation should not continue as the exclusive purchasing agent for the Department of National Defence without the need of eliminating some of the safeguards which already exist. Surely it is possible to continue the Canadian Commercial Corporation, to strengthen it and facilitate its operations in every way by any amendments that may be found necessary.

On one point I do not think there is any real difference of opinion in this house. I believe all hon. members are equally desirous of having effective procedures followed so that the defence forces of this country may be supplied with the most advanced, most efficient and most effective equipment of all kinds, and I am satisfied that every hon. member will support what he believes will carry out that objective. One thing, however, that I think should be borne in mind is that the design of weapons, the design of defence equipment, rests now and will continue to rest with the Department of National Defence. The passing of this act does not change that situation. By passing this bill we are not changing the procedure by which the most effective and efficient design may be obtained. This is a procurement agency for the purpose of obtaining defence supplies. The Canadian Commercial Corporation has been regarded as efficient for that purpose, and for that reason I believe it should be continued, with whatever amendments may be suggested as desirable.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, I should like to know whether what the leader of the opposition is saying now has to do with the amendment which is before the committee to limit profits?

Mr. Drew: Just this, that I am speaking directly to the fact that I see no reason why this section should be passed amending the act which has already been referred to in the section.

Mr. Lesage: But the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has moved an amendment to the effect that profits should be limited. I do not see how the remarks of the leader of the opposition now could be related to that amendment.

Mr. Green: Leave it to the Chairman.

Mr. Lesage: I am leaving it to the Chairman.

Mr. Drew: I am pointing out that section 9 deals with the Department of Munitions and Supply Act, and repeals the Defence Purchases, Profits Control, and Financing Act. What I have said is directly relevant to this matter.

Mr. Lesage: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I insist on having a decision. We are on the amendment to section 9, and I believe we should discuss the amendment and dispose of it. Then, the leader of the opposition could make his remarks.

The Deputy Chairman: I have heard enough from both sides to enable me to arrive at a decision. There is no doubt that at this stage the discussion must be relevant to the amendment that has been moved by the member for Winnipeg North Centre. Therefore, I should like the general discussion to be delayed until after this particular amendment has been disposed of. Furthermore, the scope of section 9 is quite broad. There is also an opportunity for a general discussion of the bill when the title is called.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, in regard to the amendment in the form that it is before us, I would point out that while it leaves section 7 of the Defence Purchases, Profits Control and Financing Act operative, if it were accepted it would still be possible for the Minister of Trade and Commerce to concur in any further amendments in regard to the amounts named which might meet with what he would regard as a practical provision, or even if actually naming a figure is out of the question a simple amendment could be moved to provide a procedure by which the profits could be controlled. Personally I believe it is a mistake to repeal this act without bringing into legislation some of the features of this act which we have before us, because in addition to section 7 there are other sections of considerable importance, particularly the section requiring the calling of tenders wherever that is practical. So for that reason, Mr. Chairman, I would strongly urge the minister to consider the retention of those safeguards.

I recognize that, whatever the views that have been expressed in the house, this act is going to pass in the way that the minister indicates it will. Therefore, whatever expression is made on this section at the present time, one can do no more than to place on the record views which conceivably may have some influence on the operation of this act. I am speaking now to this amendment which is, in itself, not complete, but in raising it for the purpose of discussion I think it has served the purpose. Once again it brings before us the fact that we are doing away with an act that was introduced by this government, and hailed by this government as a progressive piece of legislation to avoid any abuse in connection with the production of defence equipment. In addition to the provision for the reasonable limitation of profits, there were other safeguards such as the calling for tenders. Those safeguards now disappear. I think this is a retrograde step, and in addition I do not believe we have been given any sound reason for the introduction of this legislation in this form.

Mr. Gillis: I want to get my own mind clear on this subject. The measure before the house now not only repeals the Department of Munitions and Supply Act, but if section 9 of the bill passes it repeals the Defence Purchases, Profits Control and Financing Act which contained a provision for the limitation of profits. Unless we are prepared to amend section 9 of this bill as suggested by the member for Winnipeg North Centre, then we are not only wiping out the Department of Munitions and Supply Act but we are also wiping out the Defence Purchases, Profits Control and Financing Act. That is one thing we want to understand. This one measure is replacing two that had some merit.

With regard to the argument of the minister that the limitation on profits was not carried out because, as set out in that act, the formula was not workable, it is my honest opinion that the formula was not tried out. I cannot see any reason why it was not workable. In trying to let contracts at that time the minister might have done his best, but I do not believe that the people with whom he was dealing accepted their responsibility during wartime. I believe that the events which transpired in the latter part of the war with regard to plant and equipment bear out that statement. The minister says it would be difficult to work out a formula to get the capital invested in any given project. I do not believe he was serious when he made his comparison with the cow. I may be simple-minded, but simple-minded people are honest, and I believe that anyone with an honest approach could work out a formula. There would be little difficulty about it.

In the event of an emergency the minister might want a munitions plant put up, or he might want the Canada Car and Foundry to extend its peacetime plant to build aeroplanes. I do not think there is ay difficulty in determining the cost. All the Canada Car and Foundry has to do is to allocate a certain portion of its plant to build aeroplanes and retool it. The only capital invested in the particular project is the cost of stripping the plant of its peacetime machinery, and retooling to go into the production of aeroplanes; that is the capital investment. Then, of course, there is the cost of constructing the aeroplane. There is no difficulty if you decide the profit limitation under a war contract is going to be 5 or 10 per cent. If the person who is going to manufacture war materials is interested in the war, is interested in the principles you are fighting for and in the maintenance of your institutions—democracy, freedom and all those things—he should not worry too much about making a whole lot of money. I do not think that those who manufactured war materials tried very hard to apply that formula when you consider that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who was minister of munitions and supply at that time, said that they did their best but that they could not let any war contracts with that profits limitation provision in them.

I am also not unmindful of the statement that was made by Right Hon. Arthur Meighen who was in the Senate during the time that this controversy was fairly hot. He said that hundreds of his business associates—and this statement may be found in Senate Hansard—were resting on their oars because there were not any profits to be made; and if there were no profits in war, there was nothing to fight for. That is the actual quotation as I remember it. The hundreds of those business associates were not trying very hard, on the basis of patriotism, to work out that formula of limiting profits on war contracts.

As one member of this committee who has listened to these discussions a good many times, I do not accept the suggestion that that formula of limiting profits is not workable. I think it is easy to work. I do not say whether you should draw the line at 5 per cent, 10 per cent or 20 per cent; that is immaterial. But before we close this discussion I think that we should at least retain in that defence purchases act the principle of profit limitation in the event of an emergency. If we do not accept the amendment now before the committee, we are not only wiping out the Department of Munitions and Supply Act but we are also wiping out the defence purchases act. This act is one of the statutes passed in 1939, and it contains that principle. Despite the fact that it has been there since 1939, it was overridden by the Department of Munitions and Supply Act. No attention was paid to it and millions and millions of dollars of the money of the Canadian taxpayers were spent in building during the war, plant and equipment which was written off at accelerated depreciation. It was not a matter of making profits during the war but it was a matter of getting millions of dollars' worth of plant and equipment that was written off in three years under that accelerated depreciation plan. Nobody suffered.

I think we should benefit by the experience we had just a couple of years ago, and that every one of us should seriously consider not throwing the whole responsibility on one minister. This particular matter is one for every member of the committee. It is not a government matter at all. It is a matter of principle. I am seriously suggesting that we should understand what that amendment proposes to do. It merely proposes to retain in the defence purchases act the principle of profit limitation. If and when it is necessary to fight a war, and I hope it will never happen, then at least you have the principle there; and in the event of an emergency, someone has authority, under the terms of the act, to sit down and work out some kind of formula with regard to the limitation of profits.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Knowles) negatived: Yeas, 31; nays, 60.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 9 carry?

Mr. Drew: For the reasons that I have already indicated, Mr. Chairman, I move:

That section 9 be amended by deleting subsection 8 thereof.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Drew) negatived: Yeas, 34; nays, 62.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 9 carry?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Section agreed to on division.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Mr. Drew: On division.

Mr. Green: This morning the minister said that he would give us an answer with regard to the stockpiling plans at the present time. Is he prepared to do that yet?

Mr. Howe: I am told that we never have given out the exact figures. I think I prefer not to give the figures. It is not customary. The United States does not give them. The amounts that have been expended have been included in the estimates. My hon. friend can find them by looking over the estimates of the past. I would not care to give the quantity.

Title agreed to on division.

Bill reported, read and the third time and passed on division.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION TO MEET CERTAIN EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES AND INDEBTEDNESS

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to issue securities not exceeding $24,582,489 in principal amount to provide the moneys necessary to meet capital expenditures made or capital indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1950; to authorize the governor in council to guarantee the principal and interest of securities issued by the company for the purpose aforesaid; to authorize the making of temporary loans to the said company secured by such securities and not exceeding $24,582,489 in principal amount to enable the said company to meet such expenditures and indebtedness; with authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the said national system and to authorize the Minister of Finance to place at the disposal of the national company or the Trans-Canada Air Lines, such amounts as may be necessary to enable them to pay operating and income charges if at any time before the first day of July, 1951, the available revenues of the national railway system or the Trans-Canada Air Lines and subsidiaries, respectively, are not sufficient to pay such charges: provided that all such amounts shall be reimbursed to the minister from the recipients' annual revenues in so far as such revenues are sufficient, any insufficiency to be provided for by subsequent deficit appropriation by parliament.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is the parliamentary assistant going to make a statement?

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Chairman, this is the resolution which is presented each year to introduce a bill to provide for the financing of the Canadian National Railways. Each year the Minister of Transport presents to parliament the annual report of the Canadian National Railways and the budget for the coming year, which is then referred to the sessional committee on railways and shipping, owned, operated and controlled by the government. That was done this year on March 23. The committee had 22 meetings, and presented its final report to this house on May 11, at which time they had adopted the budget of the Canadian National Railways and the Trans-Canada Air Lines for the coming year.

The Minister of Transport then turns to the Minister of Finance to introduce a finance bill to provide for the capital expenditures which are included in this budget. This present resolution is identical in terms with the resolutions of previous years with the exception of the actual amounts involved and the deadline. It actually falls in three parts: First of all, the authorizing of the Canadian National Railways to issue securities, in this case not exceeding $24,582,489 in principal.

The second part is that the government is empowered, on the security of these securities, to make advances to the railway against its capital expenditures until such time as it is judged opportune to float a bond issue.

The third part authorizes the government to make advances to the Canadian National system in case their current revenues are not sufficient to cover current operating expenses and income charges. It is here that the only change in this resolution occurs. Always before the deadline for such advances has been March 31 of the year ahead. Last year, for example, the resolution had the deadline March 31, 1950. However, the lateness of the presentation of the report this year has got us in this position, that we are now past that deadline. Since March 31 the government has had no authority to make such advances to the railway, and as this will probably happen again it was thought best to advance this deadline to July 1, 1951. I expect that to be carried on in future years, so that the parliament will have passed this bill and the authority for such advances thus made before the July 1 deadline.

I do not think there is anything else that I can say here. I have here a great mass of detail on the bill which I suppose may best be discussed when the actual bill is before the committee.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to make a few brief comments on this. In the first place it is a little like discussing the affairs of the railway in a vacuum when we are so close, or hope we are so close, to the report of the royal commission which has been inquiring into the railways and which is charged with the heavy responsibility of making recommendations which may go a very long way toward changing the situation which we are dealing with now. It is very desirable that that report should come down as rapidly as possible. I hope it will be comprehensive and effective when it comes, because at the present time we seem to be in the very unfortunate position that these great public institutions, our two great railways, through no fault of their own, have aroused a certain amount of irritation in the public mind by reason of events that we are already familiar with. I do not propose to take further time on that.

I should like to ask a few questions for the purpose of elucidating some of the points which arise in this resolution. The parliamentary assistant has pointed out first of all that we are asked for the authority to issue securities not exceeding $24 million odd to provide the money necessary to meet capital expenditures and indebtedness incurred, and to authorize the government to lend money against these in the interim. These are described as principal amounts to meet capital expenditures. I take it that is for the Canadian National and subsidiary companies; that is to say the whole system. The relationship to the Trans-Canada Air Lines, as I understand it, is different. It does not include public expenditure for the Trans-Canada Air Lines. Am I right?

Mr. Sinclair: No. The Trans-Canada Air Lines is regarded as part of the national system.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes, but the Canadian National as the owner of T.C.A. is, I take it, in the position where it is called upon to make and does make advances to the T.C.A. from time to time.

Mr. Sinclair: Quite right.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What limitation, if any, is there on that? That is no part of the $24 million? Does that come in where it speaks later of "authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies" or will the assistant explain just where that money for T.C.A. would come from and just what limitation there would be on it?

Mr. Sinclair: Perhaps my answer could be given better on the bill when we shall have people from T.C.A. here. T.C.A. is regarded as just one of the companies of the national system as far as these finances are concerned. There is no more limitation on them, so far as capital expenditure is concerned, than on any other of the units of the Canadian National system. All of these proposed capital expenditures, of course, were in the budget of the Canadian National Railways and the Trans-Canada Air Lines when it was submitted to the sessional committee. The large items are given actually in the bill, in the second section of the bill. If there is any interest I could put them on the record now. They are also in the report of the sessional committee. The Canadian National Railways is the organization which comes forward under this bill for the authority to issue securities up to this amount.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I think this information could be obtained just as well when we have the bill, but I think we should be a little more clear as to the distinction which apparently does exist between the relationship of the Canadian National Railways to its constituent companies in one group, and to the T.C.A. which is set out separately.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Fournier, Hull (for Mr. Abbott) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 310, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures made and capital indebtedness incurred by the Canadian National Railways system during the calendar year 1950, and to authorize the guarantee by His Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

SECOND REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

Mr. Sarto Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, if I may have leave to revert to routine proceedings, I desire to present the second report of the special committee on the Dominion Elections Act, 1938.

BANKING AND COMMERCE—FIFTH REPORT

Fifth report of standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Cleaver.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO VOTING RIGHTS OF ESKIMOS AND INDIANS, ETC.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago the chairman of the special committee on the Dominion Elections Act presented its report, and I should like to have the consent of the house for leave to introduce a bill based on that report. This wish on our part was made known to the leaders of the parties opposite and as far as I know they are agreeable. If the bill is given first reading now, it can be printed overnight and be in the boxes of hon. members tomorrow and they will have an opportunity to consider it over the week end before it is called for second reading.

With the consent of the house, therefore, I would move for leave to introduce Bill No. 311, to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1938.

Mr. Graydon: Was the report of the special committee on the Dominion Elections Act concurred in? I understood that it was merely presented.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): It was not concurred in. It was not intended to be concurred in, because the government is adopting the terms of the report.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Lesage in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

48. Departmental administration, $90,620.

(Translation):

Mr. Gagnon: Mr. Chairman, immigration is so closely linked with all forms of civil, economic, social and religious activity in this country, it has such far-reaching effects on the present and future life of this nation, that the solution of this problem affects our whole social structure.

The working classes are most concerned with immigration such as it is practised by the present government. It worries them a great deal, since it provides dangerous competition. The workingman is fully cognizant of the fact that the unscrupulous employer may thus find a pool of cheap labour into which he may dip at will, and which will allow him freely to regulate his employees' wages and, consequently, their standard of living.

Whether we like it or not, and with all due deference to my honourable friends, may I be permitted to say that immigration is and will remain a source of unemployment in Canada, as long as we are not in a position to take more active care of the newcomers, as long as the opportunities for farm settlement in Canada remain limited.

However, it is not my intention to deal with this very complicated question in all its implications and from all angles, but I simply want to make known the views of my constituents on this matter.

As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) recalled in his budget speech on March 28 last:

> Total labour income, in spite of the one per cent fall in employment, has continued to increase, and its monthly rate at the end of the year was about five per cent above the same months a year earlier. Average weekly wages rose about three per cent during the year, while the cost of living advanced barely one per cent.
> While the decline in employment as a whole has been small, the increase in unemployment has been greater, due, of course, to the fact that the total labour force continues to grow. The outlook for 1950 seems to be that the volume of employment will increase moderately, but it is possible that it may not catch up with growth in total labour supply.

These words, besides indicating unequivocally that the problem of an ever-increasing labour supply is disturbing the politicians who, during the last war, promised that there would be no unemployment after the war, clearly indicate that industry this year will be unable to cope adequately with the demand of those seeking employment to allow them to secure the necessities of life and, especially, to face the high cost of living.

If unemployment was anticipated—in fact, the government did not believe in it since this evil had befallen us long before the minister made in the house the statement to which I have already referred—why then persist in bringing to this country immigrants who are apt to glut an already overstocked labour market?

The position of the Canadian economy is such that it cannot absorb such mass immigration as we have had since 1945. On the contrary, present circumstances would seem to call for a complete halt in immigration until jobs have been found for all our own people.

> During 1949 the civilian labour force of Canada, including Newfoundland, averaged approximately 5,200,000, a gain through natural increase and net immigration of 110,000 over 1948. Employment averaged 5,055,000, an increase of 80,000 over 1948. Unemployment, defined as those wholly unemployed and looking for work, averaged 145,000 in 1949, an increase of 30,000 over the previous year.

Those statistics, taken from the budget papers, show that in spite of the vastness of our territory, the extraordinary wealth of our resources, the rapid expansion and constant progress achieved by our country during the past fifty years, excessive immigration is disrupting our economy. Commenting upon those facts, Le Devoir wrote as follows on April 30 last:

> If unemployment is on the increase, it is not because our economic activity is decreasing, but rather because the number of jobs does not increase as rapidly as the number of workers. This can be demonstrated mathematically. During the year, the number of workers increased by 110,000, while the number of jobs available increased by only 80,000. There is a difference of 30,000. Thus, there are exactly 30,000 more unemployed. The equation is perfect.

Unfortunately, the white paper does not distinguish between the contingent of new workers supplied by the normal increase in population and the net contingent afforded by immigration. Possibly, the shortage of 30,000 is about equal to the number of workers who have migrated here. In round figures, some 360,000 immigrants have come to Canada from the time the war came to a stop to the end of 1949. As the percentage of workers was high among these immigrants, they must have numbered over 200,000. And we had 145,000 jobless.

Now, in mid-June, hundreds of thousands of workers are still unemployed.

In my constituency alone, the latest reports indicate that a few thousand people are still looking for work, but to no avail.

What will happen next winter when insurance benefits are exhausted?

On the other hand, we are told that so far the government has favoured a selective immigration policy. I should like to know in what way it has been selective.

Did the government try to bring into Canada immigrants of Anglo-Saxon origin only or Jews expelled from every country in Europe? How has the government chosen between English, French, German or Spanish immigrants? Has any preference been shown for any one race, language or creed? If so, for which race, language or creed, and why?

Did the selection apply only to moral, health and political standards? I don't know. But I do know that miners, domestic servants, labourers were brought in, as well as a great many people who are neither technicians nor experts and who, consequently, are likely to be unemployed at the first sign of a recession.

If we need highly skilled craftsmen, scientists, men of learning, it is not only a good thing, but a desirable and necessary one to facilitate their coming to this country. But Canada must not be considered by other countries as the natural outlet for their surplus population. Canada should not be made a ghetto or a back-door to the United States.

An editorial on this subject, which appeared in the April 4th issue of Le Soleil, the Liberal party's official paper in Quebec, makes interesting reading. It is entitled "Against mass immigration." The writer says:

[Mr. Gagnon.]

One of the natural consequences of the neighbourly relations between Canada and the United States is that a great many earnest workers are prevailed upon to leave the poorer country and move to the wealthier and more favoured one, in the hope of bettering their lot. That unfortunate situation has arisen everywhere borders are easily crossed. This loss of the very blood and sinews of this country has had its effects on every class, even among refugees and immigrants. In spite of these losses, our population is increasing, as well as employment opportunities, but in unequal ratio.

And it is surprising to learn that unemployment is also growing when employed workers are more numerous than ever. In view of these circumstances, for what practical purposes does the government still want to admit thousands of foreigners for whom there is no need generally in the professions, in industry and in business? The only reasonable explanation for this policy is that, first, the country will need more mouths to use up our agricultural production and more hands to defend our shores in case of an invasion. A reason less readily admitted is the device of using D.P.'s as return cargoes on our otherwise empty ships. Before these newcomers are able to bring returns to the nation which extends hospitality to them, they are dependent on the poor as on the rich, on private charity as on public relief, on large families already overcrowded in small accommodations as on the owners of magnificent residences. And each immigrant finding employment takes a potential job away from the student or the apprentice seeking to settle in his own native country.

We, the people of Chicoutimi county, want to keep Canada for Canadians. The pioneers of this country have indefeasible rights, of which our government is not free to deprive them for the benefit of certain promoters of immigration. Instead of spending millions to bring over from Europe fur merchants, ladies' wear manufacturers and dealers in ready-made garments, we should think of our wage earners, of the humble folk, of all those of our people who falter under the heavy burden of taxes and the high cost of living, and use a few of those millions to alleviate their distress and suffering, as well as to provide jobs for them.

(Text):

Mr. Henry: Mr. Chairman, it would be difficult for the member for Rosedale to remain silent in this debate upon the estimates of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. The population content of the riding is such that it is important that I place before members of the committee certain views on the important question of immigration. We have in Toronto-Rosedale unity in the midst of diversity from the standpoint of the various racial groups in the community. We have the usual groups which are found in the majority throughout Canada. I refer to those of English, Irish, Scotch and French origin. They are in the majority in the riding but we have several important racial groups in the riding constituting a strong body of new Canadians. They are proud of their traditions and the great things that make them what they are.

I should like to mention the Hebrews, Macedonians, Poles, Ukrainians and Italians in particular. They are citizens who are proud to be Canadians. Right within the riding of Rosedale they demonstrate a spirit of tolerance second to none in Canada, and they live in harmony as true Canadians beside their fellow Canadians of the majority group. Despite diverse racial origins and creeds there is great harmony and a spirit of community building amongst us. This is genuine democracy and true Canadianism.

I may say I was much impressed with the speech made the other evening by the hon. member for Vegreville. He demonstrated to the house the fine motives which actuate these new Canadians in coming to make homes in our land. These new Canadians are very grateful to the minister for the sympathetic consideration he has given to their submissions placed before him from time to time. Nevertheless, like all people who desire new immigrants for this country, they do not receive all they seek from time to time, and they have thoughts they wish put forward in the house as to how the immigration laws of Canada can be improved.

Naturally the problem of immigration brings forward extreme points of view. I was not in the house when the hon. member for Spadina made his speech, but from reading Hansard I gather he made a rather sweeping indictment of the government on the subject of its immigration policy generally. From reading that speech it seems to me the hon. member for Spadina was saying that the government had no policy or, in the alternative, that what policy it had was an echo of oft-repeated principles devoid of substance.

With this view I cannot agree. I go back to the policy of the government as stated by the former prime minister; and I say that policy, enunciated in May, 1947, in my opinion remains the soundest policy for Canada. Let us examine it as I summarize it under three heads. The first point of the policy was and is that the government does not seek to alter the fundamental ethnic character of Canada. Right-thinking Canadians agree with this, and I believe the majority of the people throughout Canada approve this principle. The second point of the policy is that immigration shall be related to the absorptive capacity of Canada. Who will disagree with this fundamental point, which I believe has the approval of our people generally? The final major point of the immigration policy of our government is that there shall be selection of immigrants with care, to the end that those we bring here to share our freedom and our political institutions shall be loyal to the spirit of freedom and to those institutions in Canada.

Having in mind this policy, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the day for mass immigration has gone, if ever there was one. Those words "mass immigration" form an ominous phrase with an ominous connotation. Visualize, if you will, hundreds of thousands of immigrants coming to our country from the four corners of the earth. They descend upon our cities, towns and villages. Let us assume they are unprepared for gainful employment and absorption into the life of Canada; they may even be unfamiliar with our skills. If they come in too great numbers we can be sure they will have no practical means of livelihood in Canada. Care must be exercised. Is it any wonder, then, that organized labour has placed on record its view that there shall not be mass immigration into Canada but that in effect there should be selective immigration. We do not want to undermine the labour unions. We do not want to bring such a great number of immigrants to this country that their labour may be used as a means of depressing wages. Immigrants are brought to this country to build Canada and bring new skills, to the end that there may be production of new wealth. Let us take this view of immigration and we will be on sound ground. Let us stimulate the production of consumer goods; we will have nothing to fear if our immigration policy is designed toward this end.

The policy I have stated has been applied to a preferred group in a very careful manner. We have given preference to those of English, Irish, Scottish, French and American origin; and I do not think anyone in this committee would quarrel with that preference. After all it is the people of the British isles to whom we owe the great ideas of government which prevail in this parliamentary democracy. The French explored the great rivers and vast spaces of this land in the beginning, and in one province we have their civil law. The United States has always been a great factor in the economic life of this country, and we welcome people from that country if they choose to come here. We do not labour this point, because it is obvious.

On the other hand there has been a more restricted outlook as to the people of other countries; but I do not blame the government because within the last few years immigration has fallen off. Other factors have been responsible for this, and over these factors the government has had no control. I mention that in western Europe an export ban has been in effect on capital, which has had much to do with the falling off of immigration into Canada. I say, too, that we must not blame the government for refusing to go headlong into some over-expanded program of subsidies for transportation costs, loans against frozen assets and other financial assistance to aid immigration. I take it the departmental officials have kept in mind that about twenty years ago we had what was known as the British empire settlement scheme. Mark you, I am not an expert, but from what I am told that scheme was not so successful as to invite repetition in this year of 1950.

I do not criticize the policy of the government, but I say that its application can be extended at this time, and in that connection I have a few suggestions to put forward. Let us have more immigration agreements with countries abroad. Through such agreements we can regulate gainful employment here for the immigrants who may come, and we can seek some financial assistance from the countries abroad. An example of this is the Dutch agricultural scheme, which has worked very well in bringing Dutch farmers to Canada. Is it not possible for us to implement agreements of this kind with countries such as Great Britain, Ireland, Scotland, France, Switzerland and, let us say, the Scandinavian countries? Perhaps we cannot negotiate such an agreement with the United States, but by other means we can stimulate immigration from that country if we go about it in the logical way.

In the end, therefore, those countries not mentioned in my remarks up to this point remain to be considered. What are we going to do there? Many of them are behind the iron curtain, and in those cases immigration becomes very difficult. Many of them have displaced citizens in those countries of western Europe I have mentioned. In my view we must look to the regulations. Let us consider, and let the minister through his officials consider, the abolition of what I call rigid, artificial, inflexible rules. There is the country of origin rule, which in effect blocks out whole groups of worthy immigrants. There is the degree of relationship rule; many people are not near enough in degree of relationship to those who sponsor them. Can we not do something about altering this rule? Let me sum it up in this way. Let us judge the value of each immigration application on its merits, through some administrative tribunal within the department, and let us have an honest evaluation of the merits without artificial regulations hindering immigration.

Finally I wish to say a word about what I call selection. That is important to all of us, because we know that the matter of security is paramount to Canadians. We do not want to bring immigrants here to build up the economic side, if they be the wrong type from the standpoint of security and undermine us on the political side. We have to allow for human error, and human error will prevail to a certain extent. Let us, Mr. Chairman, make our regulations in such a way that there will be security screening, just as strictly as possible, from the standpoint of keeping communists from immigrating to Canada.

I speak with confidence as I stand here today to conclude my remarks. My confidence is all the greater because of the minister who occupies the post of citizenship and immigration. He is known to us as a lawyer, as well as a soldier of distinction. It was a personal loss to the Prime Minister when he placed him in this post so important to the government of the day. As parliamentary assistant to the Prime Minister he served with distinction, and we know that his talents will be well employed in this important field. Just as he served before the bar of international public opinion, he will serve at home and solve these problems which we are considering. May I say to him that, as he is a great Liberal, let him liberalize these immigration regulations in accordance with his personal qualifications. The result will be a good one, I think; immigration with justice and moderation.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I think it is significant that so far in the discussion of the estimates of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, practically every speech made has dealt with the subject of immigration rather than the other matters falling under the jurisdiction of the same department. It seems to me that indicates there is the greatest concern on the part of the members of the house, as well as throughout the country generally, about this important subject. That is not to say that the others are less important, but it is difficult to imagine any subject where there is more potential good for the country than in a properly applied and vigorously pursued policy of immigration.

It is also significant to note that, although there have been two or three statements from the government side of the house, practically every speech made has been, to a greater or less degree, critical of the policy of the government, and more particularly of the application of that policy. While I should like to say that I agree with the member for Rosedale in the soundness of those parts of his remarks applying to the necessity for maintaining adequate security precautions in connection with our immigration, in connection with not disturbing the ethnic balance of our present distribution of population, I cannot agree with him that the application and pursuit of the policy of immigration by the government has been so successful as to deserve any commendation whatever. I join rather with those who, while realizing the difficulty of this problem, nevertheless feel that the steps taken so far are disappointing, and that this house should leave no doubt in the mind of the government during the discussion of these estimates that it feels we have been sadly lacking and must do better in the future.

In studying this question of immigration, it is quite significant to find that there are comparatively few books or papers or treatises on the subject of immigration as a whole, particularly as applied to Canada. I should like to bring to the attention of the members of the committee one of the few available reports or studies. It is a study instituted in the province of Saskatchewan in 1930, and the findings are contained in the report of the Saskatchewan royal commission on immigration and settlement presented to the government of Saskatchewan in 1930. I am not going to devote any time to a lengthy analysis of its recommendations, but I should like to lay before this committee some of the considerations discussed in that report, as well as some general considerations which I propose to make the basis of a motion I intend to bring before this committee.

One of the first recommendations made, and which seems to me has application at the present time, is that any scheme of immigration must be worked out in conjunction with the provinces because it is to the various provinces of this country that the immigrants will go. It is under the jurisdiction of the provincial governments, and through close contact with the people in the welfare fields, that the new settlers will be raised. I think that no time should be lost in convening a group to study that problem alone. I do not believe it is sufficient to say we are having a dominion-provincial conference this fall. I believe that conference is to be concerned with entirely different matters. It is essential that a conference should be convened to study this matter; and, to start with, a meeting of the departmental officials of the various governments who would be concerned should be held. There should be a meeting of the officials from the provincial departments of lands and resources with their opposite numbers in the federal government, to work out at the official level a basis for a joint program or a joint submission to the joint governments for an immigration scheme.

Then other considerations follow with respect to the importance of immigration generally, and the reason why we must set about bringing into Canada a substantial number of immigrants. The various considerations laid out in the study to which I have referred are still of the most urgent and practical application, even though the report was made twenty years ago. Certain other considerations have arisen since. One of the most compelling is the need of national defence. An area which is as large as or larger than the continental United States, an area which would undoubtedly be the prize possession of any other country, is not capable of being defended by a nation of only thirteen million or fourteen million people. While we are fortunate in being assisted in defence schemes by the United States of America, and in being able to rely upon them to assist us in the joint defence of the North American continent, I do not believe any hon. member will think we can escape our responsibility for the defence of this part of the North American continent, this Canada of ours. I doubt if any hon. member would disagree with me if I were to say that in the world of today, Canada almost certainly cannot herself defend her territory. It would be shirking our responsibility if we failed to face the fact that, without a substantial increase in our population, we will not be able to discharge our primary responsibility in that regard.

Then there is the consideration concerning the importance of one of the principles found in population studies over the years, population and economic studies, to the effect that it is necessary for the population of a country to reach a certain level numerically in order for the country to be able to maintain its high standard of living. It must be admitted that, so far as my study went and so far as the report of this commission went, there are no figures available for Canada. Nobody has yet worked out the actual optimum population level for this country. But I feel again that no hon. member will disagree with me when I say that it is certainly questionable—in fact, I think it is almost impossible—to expect that we should continue much longer to be able to sustain the standard of living which we now enjoy, and which we properly expect, with a population of only thirteen million people and with budgets at the present time running at a level of two and a half billion dollars and quite conceivably growing to three billion dollars in the immediate future, particularly as defence requirements and social security and similar commitments grow, as the government undertakes further responsibilities.

With a static or virtually static population of only thirteen million people, with the tremendous problems which this country imposes on us with respect to communication, with respect to the development of resources, by its very area and the very size and difficulty of the terrain, it is almost impossible to expect that, in a world of increasing standards and of increasing requirements, we should be able to maintain the present standard of living let alone raise it, unless we increase our population and therefore considerably expand our productive capacity.

Then also there is the question of the loss of population which occurs through the economic attraction of other areas. It has been alleged in the past, and I think it has been established—although the figures vary—that we suffer a substantial loss of population from year to year by the attraction of the generally higher standards of income enjoyed in the United States. Hence, in considering the question of increase in population, we have to reckon not only with the fact that, by the normal increase involved in our excess of births over deaths, not only would our increase be slow on that account, but the increase itself is made less speedy by the fact that we lose each year a certain number to the United States.

In considering this and other factors, the Saskatchewan commission came to a conclusion which I think is sufficiently important to be read in its own original words at this point. As reported at page 18, they said:

> For these reasons we conclude that it is desirable that no unnecessary checks be placed on population increase by immigration.

They go on to deal with the fact that certain checks are necessary, but they come back to their original contention that no unnecessary checks should be placed on population increase by immigration.

I should now like to turn to one other aspect of this matter, and that is our particular relationship with Great Britain and with the British commonwealth. I have said that I agree with the hon. member for Rosedale that it is important that the ethnic balance of population in Canada be not disturbed or distorted by any over-enthusiastic policy of immigration. Our traditional connection with the United Kingdom, together with the present situation of the United Kingdom, seemed to me to indicate that we should make a special effort to obtain suitable immigrants from that country. I shall have something to say in a moment about the necessity of obtaining immigrants from other countries, a matter which I think is equally important, but I wish to deal specially with the question of British immigration.

I believe that one should approach this matter without a limited horizon. One should remember what has taken place over the last couple of hundred years in connection with the concept of the British commonwealth and the relations that those countries bear one to another. One should remember that Great Britain has not only exported standards of living and sent people to every part of the world, but has also exported the great idea embodied in what we call British justice and the rule of law. Then it seems to me that we should devote at least some thought and some part of our ideas and aspirations towards preserving that concept and preserving a continuity of that relationship. But no country and no group of countries can stand in the face of history or of development. History is that the centre of influence, the centre of population, or the centre of power shifts. I believe that fact has to be accepted and realized by all countries in the British commonwealth if we are to maintain intact, and to preserve from undue stresses and strains, that friendly relationship which we have had in the past.

I should like to see that relationship as close as or closer than it has ever been. My concept is of no change in our affection for or attitude towards one another but simply a recognition of, and acceptance of, and indeed an assistance to, the course of history in shifting the centre of the British commonwealth from the United Kingdom to the various member nations of that commonwealth.

I believe that Canada's resources, potentialities and political maturity all have such an important bearing on this matter that, viewed in their proper light, we can without exaggerating look forward confidently to the day when we shall be the centre of the commonwealth, the centre of a tremendous group of world powers. That involves a readiness on our part to accept, and admittedly a readiness on the part of the United Kingdom to permit, a considerable flow of emigration from the British isles to this country.

I think that perhaps it would be well if we could have with the British authorities that consultation which the hon. member for Rosedale referred to, from that point of view, and say: Do not stand in the way of history; do not place impediments in the way of free movements of people as you are doing now by restricting the people from the United Kingdom in their coming over here; do not place those impediments in the way of the free movement of people because, if you do, you are standing in the way of history.

I do not want to overdevelop this thought. What I have in mind is this. Surely it is no longer logical for us and for other countries to continue to export raw materials and food over thousands of miles to places where they may be manufactured and re-exported back here. Surely it is much more logical, and surely it is the proper course of history and development, to see that people come to where the raw materials and the food are, bringing with them their industrial know-how, and the same traditions and ideals which we share and which, in fact, have inspired the growth of the commonwealth. The movement of population from the United Kingdom to Canada, under that concept, would be part of a logical, natural process; part of the growth and the preservation of that commonwealth which we value so much. But just as we say to the United Kingdom, you must not place impediments in the way of the free movement of people, so must we also be prepared to encourage and to assist in the movement of people from the United Kingdom and other countries to this country. I cannot be satisfied that we have made every effort to assist in British immigration. I myself have letters, I have discussed the matter with other members and with other individuals in Canada who have spoken to people with similar experiences; that is, experiences of difficulties when they applied to Canadian authorities in the United Kingdom, difficulties placed in their way, or at least a lack of all-out enthusiasm, help and assistance in ironing out the difficulties which stand in the way of those people coming into this country. I believe that Canada could do much more to assist immigrants from the United Kingdom. I believe that Canada must do much more to assist that immigration.

Before I leave this general idea that I have been dealing with may I say I think it significant that this Department of Citizenship and Immigration follows almost immediately the estimates of the Department of Agriculture. In the last day and a half of the discussion of that department we were dealing with the difficulty of marketing Canada's tremendous agricultural production. I have said already it seems illogical to ship our raw materials and raw food thousands of miles, have them manufactured, and then shipped back again. How much more logical it would be to have the people come to where the food and raw materials are. That should be one of the conscious thoughts behind the immigration policy; that the long range solution of our agricultural problems—while we may adopt floor prices, support programs and programs of encouraging or discouraging this or that aspect of agricultural production, which are necessary so long as we have such an imbalance in our economy—rests upon bringing more people to this country to consume the food that we produce.

I have found, too, that very few studies are made of the number of people that would be necessary to produce a balance in our economy in that respect. But I did hear one very eminent authority discussing this matter, Dean Clement of the department of agriculture of the university of British Columbia, who has since retired, say that his estimate was that if we would bring to Canada, or if our population were increased by, five million people we would have a practically balanced economy, from the point of view of there being sufficient people in Canada to consume the things which we produce with the exception of one crop, namely, wheat. With respect to apples, pork, beef, and almost every other agricultural commodity that you could name, with the exception of wheat, it was this expert's calculation that an increase in our population of five million would practically solve that problem of the imbalance, of our dependence upon the export market.

These, Mr. Chairman, have been pretty general considerations on a general subject on which, as a matter of fact, there is general agreement, namely, the necessity for a conscious and an active immigration policy in so far as this country is concerned.

What I want to turn to is some of the shortcomings in our policy. I regret very much that what I have to say should be said at a time when a new minister is occupying the position of Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, because no member of the house, be he a new member or one with the longest experience here, cares to make a sharp criticism of a new minister. Therefore I ask the minister if he will—and I am sure he will—regard this simply as a criticism of government policy and in no way arising simply because he is new to the office.

Mr. Fraser: He will get it next year.

Mr. Knowles: After all, he is in the government now.

Mr. Fulton: The figures with which I have been furnished indicate a very disturbing and sharp decline in the flow of immigrants to this country over the past two and a half years. We all thought, after the Prime Minister made his statement on government policy on May 1, 1947, that we could expect to see, if not in the year, at least within the next year and the year after a constant and steady increase in the flow of immigration until finally it reached quite sizeable proportions. These expectations have not been realized. We remember the interest—and I think I would not be going too far if I said the enthusiasm—with which the statement of May 1, 1947, was received. I well remember the headlines in the press across this country, hailing this great new immigration policy, as it was called.

My main criticism of it is that while the principles laid down are sound enough, not only have they not been applied, not only have no positive steps been taken to apply the principles, indeed nothing was said at the time to indicate how they would be applied, and nothing has happened since to indicate that there is any serious intention of applying them and of bringing in the large, increased and increasing number of immigrants which was then forecast.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Fulton: Before six o'clock I was outlining some of the general considerations which should apply to any immigration program we might adopt and indicated the necessity of taking active steps to increase Canada's population by immigration. I should like to turn now to some of the shortcomings in government policy and particularly to the failure of the government to take steps to implement the immigration policy which it has laid down. It is convenient at this time to refer to a statement made by the Prime Minister on May 1, 1947, and which gave rise to such hopes that we would in fact have an immigration policy for Canada productive of results. These hopes have totally failed to materialize. The Prime Minister is reported on page 2644 of Hansard of May 1, 1947, as having said:

> The policy of the government is to foster the growth of the population of Canada by the encouragement of immigration. The government will seek by legislation, regulation, and vigorous administration, to ensure the careful selection and permanent settlement of such numbers of immigrants as can advantageously be absorbed in our national economy.

The figures on immigration which we have obtained since that time indicate that the policy has failed totally of implementation. I do not recall any legislation that has been introduced which is of far-reaching moment in regard to this matter. With regard to regulation, it was pointed out by one of the members of the government party speaking this afternoon that the main effect of the regulations seems to be to restrict rather than to encourage immigration. With regard to vigorous administration, figures which I shall quote in a moment show that the main effect has been that while the inflow of immigrants has declined by some fifty per cent, the cost of administration has increased by some twenty-five per cent.

The Prime Minister then went on to outline the short-term program and the long-term program of the government. The short-term program was related to the situation as of May 1, 1947, when, as he pointed out, we were confronted with a serious shortage of shipping and, therefore, it would not be possible to bring large numbers of immigrants to Canada. But with respect to the government's so-called long-term program the Prime Minister laid down basic principles which are to be found on page 2645 of Hansard as follows:

> Let me now speak of the government's long-term program. It is based on the conviction that Canada needs population. The government is strongly of the view that our immigration policy should be devised in a positive sense, with the definite objective, as I have already stated, of enlarging the population of the country. This it will seek to attain through the development and energetic application of productive immigration measures.

Then a few sentences later on:

> Apart from all else, in a world of shrinking distances and international insecurity, we cannot ignore the danger that lies in a small population attempting to hold so great a heritage as ours.

Before I give the actual figures of our present immigration I should like to refer to a speech made in Ottawa on Saturday, May 27 last, by the present minister. Remember that we have a country with a larger land area than the continental United States and with a population of only 14 million people. At one time this country absorbed between 500,000 and 1 million people a year. There were certain disadvantages that accrued during that heavy inflow of population but I submit that their causes have largely disappeared with our reaching a relatively high degree of development in the present populated areas of Canada and with our high degree of industrialization.

Speaking in this city on Saturday, May 27, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration said that in the view of the authorities at the moment Canada would be capable of absorbing a population which on a certain mathematical calculation turns out to be 140,000 a year by way of immigration. I submit that that is much too low a target for our immigration policy under the circumstances in which we find ourselves. Yet that is the only indication we have had as to what the government thinks should be absorbed and even that target, if it be a target, is far in excess of the number that are being brought in today.

I have spoken already of the desirability of a large flow of immigration from the British isles, and I should like to refer to some of the other countries from which we should receive immigrants. At the present time the inflow of immigrants from continental Europe is seriously restricted by the regulations. I know that one cannot go too far in relaxing regulations against those who were our enemies five years ago, but I maintain that the interpretation of the regulations is far too restrictive, and so is the classification of enemy aliens.

We all know that there has been a tremendous upheaval on the continent of Europe. People whose only offence is that they happened to live in countries which were overrun by the nazis and were caught up in that turmoil and swept into Germany or into countries which had been overrun by Germany are now classified as enemy aliens, and are now excluded, except those who are in a very limited category with regard to relationship to Canadian residents. In many cases they are the relatives of people who are most admirable citizens, people who came here with very little and who have built up a livelihood for themselves and a stake in this country, people who are now prosperous and substantial citizens in the best sense of that word. Yet their relatives are prohibited by the regulations from coming in at the present time. This is a matter on which positive action by the government is required to relax those restrictions and allow these desirable settlers to enter the country.

What is the government going to do to encourage immigration from the United Kingdom? As far as one can make out, virtually nothing has been done up to the present. We are told that the currency restrictions stand in the way. What we need is a bold approach to this matter. The government should be prepared to adopt means by which we could offer to prospective immigrants from the United Kingdom an extension of currency privileges in this country based upon the security of assets guaranteed by the United Kingdom government. Without something along these lines, so long as the artificial restriction of currency barriers continues we will prevent people from coming here because they cannot get the funds out to this country from the British isles. I ask the minister to tell us what discussions have taken place on that point, what is the intention of the government in that regard, and what representations or offers they have put forward to the British government in that respect.

Finally I want to come to the question of the figures of present-day immigration. In answer to a question which I asked, information was given, as recorded at page 1902 of Hansard, that the average monthly number of immigrants entering Canada from Europe, including the United Kingdom, for the calendar year 1948 was 9,352. In 1949 it was 6,966, and in the first three months of this year it has fallen to 4,823. So that our flow of immigration from the continent of Europe, including the United Kingdom, has fallen by 50 per cent since 1948. If you look at the estimates, Mr. Chairman, you will find that during the same period the cost of the domestic administration of the Immigration Act has risen by 25 per cent. For the year 1948-49 the domestic cost was $3,403,000; for 1949-50, $4,191,000; and for 1950-51, $4,482,000, an increase of $1,079,000, or 25 per cent during the period in which our intake of immigrants was falling by 50 per cent.

That is the outcome of the government statement which was so widely hailed on May 1, 1947, that we were to embark upon a policy of fostering immigration by legislation, regulation and vigorous administration. The only result is a 50 per cent decline in the intake and a 25 per cent increase in the domestic cost. It is true, and no doubt the minister will point out, that the cost of overseas administration has declined. I suggest that if we are going to have a policy of immigration, overseas is the very place where we should be spending more money in order to assist immigrants to establish their nationality and to assist them to solve their transportation and currency difficulties. That is one place where an increase in expenditure would be justified, but I submit that an increase in expenditure as to domestic costs is entirely unjustified during a period when our intake from overseas has been declining by 50 per cent.

I am quite sure you will agree with me when I say that I have probably detained the committee long enough, but in view of the matters which I have laid before the chamber, and particularly the facts to which I have just referred, I think I am justified in moving a motion by way of censure. Unfortunately under our system the salary of the minister is statutory and cannot be reduced by a motion of the house. I am not saying that when we get to the details there will not be other matters which could be attacked and where specific reductions might be moved. We do not in any way bind our hands in respect to their reduction, but at the present time and simply in order to register a protest against the inadequacy of the present policy of immigration I will confine my attention to item 48, departmental administration, and I move:

That item No. 48 amounting to $90,620 be reduced by one dollar.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Lesage): Before I put the motion I must say that I find the following in Beauchesne, third edition, citation 484:

Amendments moved for the reduction of a grant are proceeded with under the general rules governing amendments.

Further on in the same citation there is the following:

The reduction must be of a substantial and not trifling amount . . .

In legal language, if we were in court I would be bound to say that it is a frivolous motion. I find the same principle enunciated in May, fourteenth edition, at page 698:

The reduction of a grant or item must be of a substantial, and not of a trifling amount.

Therefore I rule the motion out of order.

Mr. Fulton: Mr Chairman, if you say your ruling is final then you will not hear further argument, but I should like to raise a point of order in the hope that you will reconsider it. May I point out that Beauchesne's rules—

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Lesage): Order.

Mr. Fulton: —are subject to the ordinary rules of interpretation. The amount of $1 is not a trifling amount because, as you will appreciate, whereas a cent or a farthing would be a mere token, when we are dealing in terms of the opportunities afforded to members to register a protest by way of moving reductions in the estimates, and particularly on the first item a reduction of $1 cannot be regarded as a trifling amount. I make that suggestion for this reason. Consider the situation if we had to reduce—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Lesage): Order. I do not believe that I can entertain the argument of the hon. member. The chairman has made his ruling and has considered it very carefully. As to the practice in England, I find in May, fourteenth edition, that a chairman has declined to put the question on a reduction of five pounds, which is now about $15 in our currency. The ruling must stand because I cannot consider one dollar a substantial amount.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Chairman, I intend to speak only briefly on this subject. When speaking before six o'clock the hon. member for Rosedale referred to the factors which govern the immigration policy, and he urged that the basis be broadened. The hon. member for Kamloops also referred to the need for encouragement of an increase in British immigration. With both these arguments I am in complete accord.

What I should like to refer to is a rather narrow feature of the whole matter. In so doing I should like to deal with a few of the factors mentioned by the hon. member for Rosedale. He referred, for instance, to health as being a governing factor, and said that there could be no quarrel with the government for insisting that all immigrants have good health. Of course that is a matter for the medical services to determine. He also mentioned absorptive capacity. I might mention as an illustration the workers brought in a few years ago for the pulp and paper industry. Rural members from Ontario, Manitoba and other western points will recall that some years ago sufficient workmen could not be found for the lumber camps. Recruiting went on to get every farmer's son who could be spared for that work, and at the same time a drive developed to bring in displaced persons as immigrants for work in the woods. Now, within the last year or so, our absorptive capacity for these immigrants has been reached, and there has been no further need for a policy which would encourage the immigration of workers for the lumber camps and pulp and paper mills.

I propose to deal briefly now with a very narrow phase of immigration which would not conflict with either of the two factors I have singled out. I want to suggest one kind of immigration which I believe has been greatly neglected; that is, immigrants to go into domestic service in this country. I would not care where those people might be recruited from, whether it be Great Britain, France, Holland, Belgium, Denmark, Germany, Italy or any other suitable European country; I am sure all hon. members will agree that there is a great shortage of domestic servants in this country. That being so, no one could object to their entry on the ground that our absorptive capacity was not great enough to take care of them. They are needed badly. I know that figures are rather dull, but in this connection I want to quote a few. At page 3029 of Hansard answers were given to questions I had placed on the order paper as to the number of displaced persons brought to Canada in 1947, 1948, 1949 and up to April of 1950. These figures indicate that 10,000 displaced persons came to Canada in that period of time and accepted employment as domestic servants for at least a year. The answer to my next question, on the same page, shows that the number employed in domestic service has dwindled rapidly from 1931 down to the present time. According to this answer, the number of people so employed in 1931 was 146,000. By June 1, 1948, that figure had dropped to almost half, or 74,000. About that time there was a slight increase, which I believe could be largely explained by an answer given to another question I asked having to do with the percentage of the population employed in domestic service. In 1931 that figure was 1·4 per cent. By 1947 it had fallen to 0·4 per cent, but the following year there was an increase to 0·6 per cent. In other words if we take the 7,200 displaced persons who came to Canada in 1947 and 1948 and undertook domestic service for a period of one year, I believe it would be fair to assume that the small increase of 0·2 per cent could be attributed almost entirely to that immigration. On that basis it would take about 28,000 domestics to make up the percentage deficiency today as compared with 1931.

I do not suggest that my argument is air-tight, nevertheless I think in the main it is sound. So I suggest that the department give some consideration to the decrease in the number of domestic servants in Canada, and the possibility of making up that deficiency through immigration. I heartily agree with what the hon. member for Kamloops said about British immigration, but I doubt very much whether our domestic servant situation could be very much improved in that way, because I understand that in Britain they find it just as difficult to get domestic servants as we do. I believe the same condition prevails in France, where I read recently over seventy thousand Germans are doing essential work under the supervision of the French government. We have been getting a large number of immigrants from Holland, and they are very suitable, as are the Belgians, the Danes and others.

Now I should like to mention two other sources; that is, Germany and Italy. Although, as has been pointed out, they were recently enemy countries, nevertheless they possess a great reservoir of people who would be suitable for domestic service. I know from experience that girls and women in those countries are thoroughly trained as workers, and make good domestics not only in the city but also on the farms. I should point out that female help for the farms is a very serious problem with many people in Canada. It is almost impossible to get domestic servants to work on the farms. These people, I believe, could be obtained if a determined effort were made to get them. I am sure the reservoir is there, and the benefit that would accrue to this country if they could be brought here could hardly be measured. Therefore I would urge that the government give consideration to some method by which domestic servants from suitable European countries might be brought to Canada to relieve the great need, in fact the real distress, that is being felt in many parts of the country.

Mr. MacKenzie: I should like to make a few observations while this subject is under consideration. I believe everyone in Canada was well pleased when the government decided to create the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. I am also satisfied that the people generally, and not only government supporters, were pleased when the present minister was chosen for this portfolio. We all agree that citizenship and immigration are of vital importance to the development and progress of our Canadian people. I am sure that it is a subject that requires careful study, because it is so vital to Canada. I am sure that in due time a vigorous, strong, and aggressive immigration policy will be announced for this dominion of ours. Most Canadians agree that we should have more immigrants in this country. Most people also agree that the number should be controlled, carefully screened and selected. Everyone agrees that we could not throw the borders of Canada open to mass immigration, because we could easily take in more people than we could assimilate. It is a well-known fact that when an enemy invaded China, the Chinese people soon assimilated the invader and they were all Chinese again. I believe it is vital that we have a studied immigration policy announced, and it should be fairly selective.

We only have a population of approximately fourteen million people. In view of the past records of our Canadian immigration policy, the number of immigrants should be arrived at by the departmental officials. I would say that from 100,000 to 200,000 would be a fair number at the start. Preference should be given to certain localities and certain races. We all agree that the British isles, France, and the United States should be considered, even if we have to subsidize those people to come here. We could help them with transportation and help them to settle. It might be worth while in the long run. I think we should bring in people who have, to some extent, the same ideals that we have; the same conception of a standard of living. In the riding which I have the honour to represent, Lambton-Kent, we have many representatives of the various races. In the early settlements there were Dutch, Belgians, Danish, and Ukrainian. These people settled in the Wallaceburg-Dresden area where they have raised certain special crops. They grow sugar beets and tobacco, and have made a great contribution to our welfare. Later other Europeans came in from Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, and Poland, and they have developed our country in a very good manner. I must say that, in my opinion, some of these people are among the very best citizens we have. They are loyal and patriotic.

Only last Sunday some of the people from the section south of my own home came to see me. They wanted to put on a big picnic in order to do something for the relief of the flood victims in Manitoba. The proceeds from this monster picnic will go to the flood victims. This is only an example of what happens all the time, so I say without any hesitation that these people who have come here have become exceptionally good citizens. I must say, and I think everyone will agree, that there is no master race in this world. There are good and bad in all races. I must confess that the United Nations organization with which I was for over two years found some of our own people, as well as people from other races, that were certainly not a credit to the organization. We cannot say that the ones who have been established here have not become good citizens.

I want to say a word or two in connection with the displaced persons, because we had a lot to do with trying to get people back to their homeland and placed in some situation where they could rehabilitate themselves. The UNRRA organization carried on a program of helping displaced persons until late in 1947, when that duty was taken over by the IRO. Among the various classes of displaced persons, the one that appealed to me particularly was the Russian. We knew them very well because, in many cases, we had them keeping our books and looking after our warehouses and supplies. They were people who had fled Russia in 1917 at the time of the revolution. They came to China, but did not want to take out citizenship papers in the Orient. They could not go back to their homeland. Late in 1947 an announcement was made that if these people went back to Russia they would be forgiven and full citizenship would be restored under the present regime. They would not take a chance on that. I remember one of the chaps particularly, who kept the records of our department, and he did want to go to Canada or some place like that. I believe these people are entitled to a great deal of consideration.

There is one more matter I should like to take up briefly. One of the problems that repeatedly faced me in China was that the Chinese people would say, "We like Canada pretty well, but Canada has always discriminated against our race." I said I did not think that could be correct, but they went on to tell me how they had been discriminated against. I looked up some of the data on immigration into this country, and this is what I found out from the immigration department: From 1880 to 1890 many Chinese were brought into Canada as labourers for railway construction and other development work. From 1890 to 1900 some control of immigration was maintained by charging the Chinese $50 per head. This did not retard immigration, and in 1910 the head tax was raised to $500 each. That was continued until 1923 when the head tax was repealed, and an act was brought in called the Chinese Immigration Act. It became law, so it was impossible from 1923 on for any Chinese to come to this country, unless they came with shipping companies in the regular course of trade and commerce or came here as students attending university. This was the only immigration legislation that was ever enacted in Canada which applied to a particular race.

I well remember in 1947 when the announcement was headlined in the Chinese papers, both those printed in English and those printed in Chinese, that Canada had at last relaxed her immigration regulations and was allowing Chinese to enter. Upon making inquiries of the Canadian consul, I found it was not so great a step as had been reported, because all that had been done was to repeal the Chinese Immigration Act and put the Chinese on the same status as other Asiatics. Now the Chinese who have become Canadian citizens can bring in their wives and unmarried children up to the age of eighteen. From 1923 to 1947, or approximately twenty-five years, practically none of them came to this country. Very few Chinese had taken out citizenship papers. No purpose was served by taking them out, because a Chinese person could not go back and forward; so for the moment this relaxation did not do them very much good. Something else that was brought to my attention indirectly is that during all those years, from 1923 to 1947, the Japanese were allowed entry into Canada on an agreed or quota basis. In many cases they were admitted on the basis of up to 400 or 500 a year. This of course looked like discrimination. In view of the former discrimination against these people, I would suggest to the minister, as a good will gesture, that he at least allow the Chinese to bring their wives and unmarried children into Canada regardless of their age.

Mr. Graydon: Will the Reds let them out now?

Mr. MacKenzie: This would not be a large number. It would be only a comparatively small number that would be affected.

May I say that I had to go to a foreign land before I fully realized what Canadian citizenship meant and what Canada should mean to the people here. I was asked many times what state I came from and when I said that I came from Canada, without hesitation and without any variation at all, these people all said that they would like to come to Canada, that they knew of no place in the world they would rather go. I think I said before and I say again that I do not believe there is any country in the world that stands in as high regard among the nations of the world as does Canada today. If we threw the regulations open we would have such a mass immigration here, if currency could be provided—and currency difficulties will clear away—that we could not possibly assimilate the immigrants. In my opinion most countries of the world appreciate Canada and what Canada has to offer more than do Canadians themselves. I would suggest to the minister that the policy we adopt for immigration into Canada must be a selective one. It must be carefully screened if we are going to maintain the high standards that we expect will be in effect in Canada in the years to come.

Mr. Herridge: Because of the interest of a good number of my constituents in the question of immigration and citizenship, Mr. Chairman, I want to make a few remarks under this item, and I hope the committee will be tolerant of me. I see some of the Liberals opposite regarding me with a rather strained look on their faces, but I want them to be tolerant.

An hon. Member: We like to hear you.

Mr. Herridge: First of all, Mr. Chairman, I must say that I heartily approve of the formation and the structure of this new Department of Citizenship and Immigration. I think it is one of the most logical moves the government has made with respect to organizing a department. Immigration, citizenship and Indian affairs are all branches that deal with human resources and I think this reorganization will mean more effective immigration, better administration of citizenship and, I hope, more for the Indians of Canada.

Before proceeding I must extend sincere congratulations to the minister on his appointment to this important office. I am quite sure that any new immigrant landing on the shores of Canada, if met by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, would say: This must be a fine country; there are some good-looking chaps ahead of us.

The minister has youth, but with that youth he has a considerable amount of civil, military and legal experience; and many of us in this chamber are looking forward to a vigorous immigration policy and a more vigorous training in citizenship throughout the country. I shall have a few remarks to make on citizenship at some other time because there happen to be in my constituency quite a number of people who have not become Canadian citizens in the full sense of the word; but I will speak on that question on other estimates.

Before proceeding, I must express my personal appreciation of the work that the officials of the minister's department have been doing. It is work that is not spectacular and it is not seen; but I am quite sure that during the last five years the officials of the immigration department have had a heavy task on their hands in trying to sift and sort the multitudes that were being brought to Canada and to satisfy the needs of Canadians generally. It is my personal opinion that the officials of this department during the last five years have performed an excellent service under most trying conditions.

I want to criticize to some extent the lack of policy with respect to immigration on the part of the government; and as a previous speaker said, in doing that I am not criticizing the minister because he has only recently taken over this new department. As far as I can understand from the speeches that have been given on this item, it appears that the majority of the members of this committee, whether they are Liberals or members of the opposition, realize that there is not a strong, concrete immigration policy being put forward by this government. I think the hon. member for Spadina and another Liberal speaker mentioned that feature, as well as other speakers on this side. We hope that situation will soon be corrected by the new minister.

I personally do not believe that it is one of those subjects about which you can lay down hard and fast rules. You cannot distribute human beings as you distribute freight, lumber or materials. Dealing with human beings requires a more flexible policy than dealing with natural resources. I do not underestimate the difficulties; they are great; but I think we could have a more concrete, specific and definite policy than we have at the present time. So far I can see, to date our piecemeal policy has been to bring individuals into Canada as individuals and to relax the regulations from time to time without any co-ordination between federal and provincial governments and other agencies, or without any relationship to the over-all economic development of Canada. I think that is the greatest weakness of the immigration policy or lack of policy on the part of this government to date. I want to illustrate that point by one or two cases that have been brought to my attention in my own constituency. First of all, I might say it is illustrated by the fact that up to the present time this work has been done by two departments. It has been done by the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and by the Department of Labour. I firmly believe that immigration should be confined within the fold of one department. In addition to that, there is no co-operation between the federal government, as I see it, and the provincial governments and the local agencies.

To illustrate that fact, in my constituency a family of d.p.'s was sent from Ontario somewhere. They had been kept in Ontario for some time. They were sent tourist class to my constituency to a farmer—the whole family—at the public expense. They were sent to the city of Nelson, and transported another sixty miles at public expense to the farm. The farm is an excellent farm. The farmer is an excellent farmer. But this family, when they got there, felt lonely. The house provided by the farmer, and it was an excellent house, was a quarter of a mile away from neighbours. After staying for a week or so, this family became discontented and did not want to stay there any longer. There were numerous phone calls by the official in our district or by the Vancouver office to Ottawa. There were numerous telegrams at public expense. Finally it was decided that nothing else could be done but to transport these people back to Nelson at public expense, transport them in a taxi to some point overnight at public expense, buy passages back to Ontario, buy tourist sleeper accommodation back to Ontario for the whole family, and bring them back to Ontario so that the government could start out again to locate this family which was not satisfied. In my opinion that situation would not occur if there were satisfactory co-ordination between the federal and provincial governments, with like co-ordination between the province and local agencies. There is not a local agency to appeal to to deal with these questions or to offer assistance and to find out if employment could have been found at some closer point rather than to incur what to me appeared to be quite a large amount of expense in finding employment for one immigrant to this country. In addition to that, I had brought to my attention one day the fact that on a provincial public works project in the southern interior of British Columbia a large number of displaced persons were employed. I am not blaming these men; they were seeking work, but it shows a lack of understanding, a lack of direction of labour to proper channels. These displaced persons were employed on that public works program by the provincial government of British Columbia while local veterans who fought for this country, who went overseas, who were born in the district, who lived in that district all their lives, could not obtain a job. I am not blaming the displaced persons, but I do say that if there had been co-ordination between the federal and provincial government and local agencies these single, displaced persons who were quite capable of going to a mine or a lumber camp without inconvenience, or to some greater distance than these married veterans, would have been employed at work that was necessary and required, and the veterans also would have been employed.

As far as I can see with respect to our immigration policy, Mr. Chairman, there is not even a minimum objective as to numbers. I think we all realize that in this vast land we have a duty to ourselves to share this land with the people of other countries. We have a moral obligation to those who require opportunities for settlement, opportunities for employment, opportunities to make a new life. I think most Canadians recognize that we benefit from those who come to live in Canada and who become citizens of Canada. We benefit by their labour on our natural resources, and in our industry, by their taking advantage of our transportation services, our highway services and all other services and costs provided by provincial and federal governments.

In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, unless we have a planned immigration policy integrated through our national economic development we are not going to serve the best interests of Canada, or the best interests of the immigrants concerned.

In passing I want to draw the attention of the committee to a few things that have been done by the Commonwealth of Australia. It was my habit, Mr. Chairman, when I proceeded to do something that I had never done before—I think it would be the habit of most ordinary intelligent people, and I am considered normally intelligent by most hon. members; I think at times some hon. members to my left would doubt that, but I do not mind that—it was my habit, I say, to try to find out what others have done, what their experience has been, and so forth. I do want to draw to the attention of the minister certain things that the Australian commonwealth has done, which I think would be well for him and his officials to study: they with a population of 8 million and we with a population of 13 million. I am just going to give some figures before proceeding with that. These are immigration figures for the year 1949: Net immigration to Canada, 95,217; net immigration to Australia, 168,527. There were 200,000 British immigrants in 1949 to commonwealth countries. Australia absorbed 87,504; Canada, 55,095; South Africa, 39,093; New Zealand, 16,188.

I want to call the minister's attention to this little pamphlet which was issued by the Australian government. I should like him to read it. It is headed: "Twenty million Australians in our Time! Statement of immigration policy by the minister for immigration, the Hon. Arthur A. Calwell, M.H.R., to the House of Representatives, September 8, 1949". This statement lays down the principles upon which immigration is to be carried on in Australia, the need for immigration and how the immigrants are to be brought in and how they are to be distributed and so on. It is a complete policy of information for the people of Australia. I think that this government would be well advised to consider a pamphlet of this sort, the way it is drafted, and so on.

I just want to quote briefly from an immigration policy statement made by the minister for immigration on September 8, 1949, to the Australian parliament. This is what he has to say. I like the definitive nature of the statement. It is not woolly; it is not abstract. It says:

> Most Australians now living should survive to see their country inhabited by twenty million people. May Providence ordain it so. This will indeed be a tremendous accomplishment; it will be population increase on a scale never before attained, and hardly ever dreamed of in our land. It will match, and probably exceed, the great influxes of people that have attended gold rushes and the opening of rich territories in this and other parts of the world in the past. It will be all the more remarkable because it will take place in modern times. The days when immigrants would submit to herding aboard crowded and uncomfortable ships like human cattle are long past. The times are over when new settlers of any desirable kind would take their wives and families far from the comforts and amenities of life and allow their children to grow up without education or opportunities. Nobody could regret the passing of such conditions less than I do, but, of course, the modern necessity to bring immigrants in comfort to new lives of civilized usefulness makes our tasks immeasurably more complex and difficult than they would have been in earlier days.
> The social and economic consequences to Australia of this great population drive will be vast. However desirable the immigrants may be, and however eager to welcome them the people of their new country may be, problems of absorption and assimilation can become very serious if there is not wise and careful planning in advance to solve or minimize them. I and my department, in close collaboration with other commonwealth departments, the governments of the states, and private industry, are now devoting an increasing amount of attention to such matters.
> For instance, Australia must make a more vigorous approach to the development of regions outside the metropolitan areas.

I might say in that connection, Mr. Chairman, they have had exactly the same experience in Australia as we have had in Canada. We want our immigrants largely to settle our untilled spaces. We do not want to till the cities. Personally, I think the cities are the curse of modern civilization. We want our immigrants to go into the country places. We want them to go into the smaller places; but even in Australia where they have made every effort to distribute population in the rural districts, they have found them drifting back to the cities in greater numbers than they would wish. It seems today as if the modern city were the attraction for the modern human being. I think we find that same situation in Canada. I continue with the quotation:

> Recent censuses have shown that our major increases in population for some time past have been absorbed in the cities. Growth in population has fitted in with the existing patterns of employment and industrial location, and without proper planning an increase of the magnitude now expected would probably swell the already swollen capital cities at the expense of broad national development. We must make the most determined efforts to ensure a better general distribution of population throughout the commonwealth, and this will mean a powerful drive in the direction of decentralization and regional development.

I want to deal briefly with the plans they have laid to stimulate this regional development by bringing in all the agencies possible to work with the federal government. The immigration planning council of the community plans the absorption of migrants into the life of the community. The Commonwealth of Australia includes in its immigration committees representatives of the federal government, representatives of the state governments, representatives of labour, representatives of industry and representatives of other bodies, such as veterans and so on. They have now a system of planning immigration and co-ordinating immigration that enmeshes a wide section of the interested population in the whole scheme, working together in co-operation with governments. I suggest that there is something in that for the government of Canada to consider.

In connection with the necessity for planning I might say that this was a news letter published in Australia March 1, 1950. It coincides exactly with the ideas of the group to which I belong. I ask the minister, if he should reply to any of my remarks this evening, not to refer to me as the acting leader of the C.C.F.

An hon. Member: Why not?

Mr. Herridge: My move forward is strictly a movement in space, not a movement in rank. I want to read this statement dated March 1, 1950.

An hon. Member: Horizontal, not vertical.

Mr. Herridge: Horizontal, not vertical. This reads:

A huge national development scheme is now being prepared involving an expenditure by the federal government and private investors of about $560 million (American) $616 million (Canadian) a year. It includes $112 million (American) $123 million (Canadian) to provide homes and basic communities in rural areas, and other large sums of money for the development of the Callide coal deposits and the Burdekin river hydro-electric and immigration scheme in Queensland. Development Minister Richard G. Casey said the proposals would include the importation of earth-moving equipment from British, American and other companies, and would mean the employment of large numbers of migrants. Overseas firms would be particularly welcome to participate in the program if they were able to provide men and equipment as well as prefabricated homes for their staffs to live in. Mr. Casey warned that the dollar problem might interfere with the program to a certain extent because the United States was the only country which could produce some of the equipment needed. However, steps were being taken to try to obtain machinery from America without spending dollars.

My point in quoting that is to indicate that in Australia they realize that if they are going to have a successful immigration policy, that if they are going to absorb immigrants as they arrive in the country in a systematic manner, they must be brought in in relation to a planned economic development.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): What date was that?

Mr. Herridge: March 1, 1950.

I should also like to bring to the attention of the minister some of the publications put out by the Australian government. Here is a monthly entitled The New Australian which informs the Australian people about what is being done by the new immigrants to Australia. It keeps them informed from month to month as to what is happening so far as the development of the immigration policy is concerned. I recommend that publication, and others that they publish, to the minister for his consideration.

Another interesting item in regard to the immigration policy in Australia is that all new immigrants are known officially as new Australians. There is no question of their being d.p.'s or immigrants of this type or immigrants of that type; the Australian government has appealed officially to the Australian people to consider all immigrants as new Australians. They refer to them in that way in all their literature and pamphlets and regulations.

Reception hostels are set up in co-operation with the state governments where single men may go to live for a period of two or three weeks or a month or so in order to become adjusted to the community or during the period when they are looking for satisfactory work. Assisted passages are provided for veterans emigrating from Great Britain. I should like to see this government provide assisted passages for British veterans who desire to migrate to Canada. We could well emulate the example of Australia in that respect and other types of assisted passages could be provided.

I suggest to the minister that at least early in the next session he present to the house an over-all concrete statement on immigration. I believe that if we are going to have an effective immigration policy it must provide for the fullest co-operation between the federal and provincial governments, between labour and agriculture, between the Canadian Legion and other veteran groups, between industry and other representative groups in the country, so that there may be co-operation in this matter on the broadest possible base. It is only in that way that I believe we can develop an immigration policy that will make it possible to absorb, not masses of immigrants but a constant flow of immigrants into the Canadian scene and into the Canadian economy.

I do believe that we should have one department handling immigration. The postwar period is practically over and the Department of Labour should hand over the functions it is now performing to the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. I think in that way we would have a more efficient immigration because I would expect more efficient immigration from the youthful, alert and active minister who is now heading this department. If the government presents a policy to this house then there will have to be a program of educating the Canadian people so that they will have the opportunity, which I am sure they will seize without question, to co-operate with the governments at all levels in order to build a greater and greater Canada.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, for the sake of those who are tired and weary I shall state that I will be quite brief. I should like to take a moment or two to indicate my support of what has been said by other hon. members, notably the hon. member for Kamloops, about the great need for immigration and about our disappointment, which we do not fasten upon the shoulders of the minister, that the policy seems to be wanting. There are three main reasons that can be given for want of immigration in this country.

One may be on a rather high level which perhaps we do not urge very often, that we have a fine land here and we should not be so selfish as to keep it for ourselves. Some will regard that reason as being rather vague and I shall follow it by giving two reasons which are more definite and more self-regarding.

The second reason is that we need more people to help us pay for running this country. If he were here I am sure the Minister of Finance would agree with that because he has told us that our present expenses are at a practically irreducible minimum. Indeed he might have gone further and told us that they are going to rise considerably, as in all probability they will when we have dealt fully with the defence estimates. None of us is very happy about the taxes that must be paid at the moment and I am sure we would all welcome having a larger number of people in this country to help to carry the load.

The third reason is one which has been given quite often and it usually presses in on us more strongly as the years go by. This is that there is a military danger to all people who are occupying a land which may be coveted by others. That seemed remote years ago but now that the world has become so small we know that it is a thing that may happen.

I should like to take stock, as it were, of what you might call the composition of our population at the present moment. I suppose it is true to say that up to the beginning of this century we had the Anglo-Saxon and French streams moving side by side in Canada. It was not until the beginning of the century that we had any other very considerable element in our population. It is pleasant to reflect that as the years have gone by, particularly these last years, we have been making far greater progress in understanding each other. Perhaps that is due to the fact that in Europe the difficulties which used to separate France and England have been removed and they have been co-operating with each other with the fullest understanding for many years.

It is important to go back to the time just over fifty years ago when the Fashoda incident occurred in Africa. It might be interesting to recall an incident that occurred in the French chamber. A debate was going on to decide whether they should take steps against Great Britain in connection with this Fashoda incident. Tempers were running rather high when one witty member said, "After all, what is Britain? She is just a colony of France that did not succeed very well." It should be remembered that when we go far enough back we find that the Anglo-Saxon and Norman strains came from the same source. I do believe we can take it that as the years go by we are learning to understand each other very much better. We are learning to speak each other's language to a greater extent although we Anglo-Saxons have lagged behind in that regard. Nevertheless we are making progress and shall be able to do better.

There were one or two speeches on immigration the other evening to which I should like to refer. There was the speech of the hon. member for Portneuf who gave us some wise advice on the matter of immigration. We had the speech of the hon. member for Vegreville which I read with particular interest because he spoke about the new Canadians. I would remind the hon. member for Kootenay West that perhaps the Australians got the name "new Australians" from us because we use the phrase "new Canadians". I read the speech of the hon. member for Vegreville with particular interest because it had many wise things to say about the way in which new Canadians should be integrated. I should like to point out how fast and how successfully that is going on. When I look at the field of sport, whether in the universities or outside, I am constantly struck with the number of names of obviously new Canadians. We know that the same was true in the army, and we know that they are very rapidly taking their part in our lives.

Mrs. Fairclough: We are all new Canadians.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The hon. member for Hamilton West says that we are all new Canadians, which is true enough. The other day I met a Canadian of French origin in the Department of External Affairs who told me that his family had landed in Canada in 1608. That is a good deal earlier than most of us, and he was able to tell me that the first marriage that took place on this continent was between a member of his family and a member of the Hébert family. Most of us, however, do not go back as far as that.

I should like to say a word about the duty of those of us who are at any rate less new Canadians to those who come here as new Canadians. I hope the minister will say something to us about the attitude of the department. We have a certain number of immigrants coming every year, referred to the other night as d.p.'s, who have been through terrible experiences in their own countries, and who when they arrive here perhaps need a certain amount of gentling, a certain amount of consideration and patience before they can fully take their place. Leaving that aside, I hope when the minister comes to answer the many questions which have been asked him he will say something to us about what he is able to do in his department to smooth their way into our country. We all recognize that education after all is the only answer in the long run. We all know that education is a matter for the provinces, but nevertheless I hope the minister will have something to say to us about the measures which are taken by his department to assist these people over the difficult early days.

Reverting to the speech of the hon. member for Vegreville there is one other thing I should like to say. He referred to the melting pot theory whereby we would bring in new people and try to obliterate all their characteristic features, and as I understood him he was against that. If that is so I agree with him that we should try to preserve their distinctive arts, crafts and knowledge. It seems to me that one of the great dangers of our modern urban civilization is the wiping out of everything that is distinctive and reducing us to the dead level—I do not like to say of mediocrity because I hope it is higher than that—where distinctive features are apt to disappear.

I wish to carry out the promise I gave to be brief, Mr. Chairman, and I hope you will think I have carried it out. I hope the minister will speak to us at some length and give us a picture of what his department is doing now and what it hopes to do. I imagine it is not possible to ask him, so recently installed in office, to give us the immigration policy in full detail, but he is a man with a mind of his own and I hope he will be able to give us some indication as to where we are going. I noticed a compliment was paid him earlier in the evening. I do not dissociate myself from it, but I would put it a little differently. If I may, I should like to say that I would feel the new minister was a man of such physical proportions that it would be much better to have him as a friend than as an enemy. I hope that the physical characteristics which are so apparent may be equally apparent in the decisions which he will have to make.

Mr. Graydon: I should like to add one question to the number which the minister is no doubt prepared to answer at an appropriate time. On the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation news round-up last night I heard a reporter from London say that there was some indication in the British House of Commons either yesterday or the day before of a relaxation of some of the rather stringent financial conditions surrounding emigration from that country to Canada. At the appropriate time I should like the minister to indicate what information the government has on that point. While apparently nothing was said in the British House of Commons to indicate the extent to which relaxation was about to take place, the emphasis placed on the matter by the reporter would appear to indicate that there was something in the offing. I believe Canadians generally would like to know whether or not something is going to be done.

Mr. McLure: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to follow the other speakers who have taken part so well in this debate on immigration and immigration policies. First of all I should like to congratulate the minister on the honour that has been conferred on him by his appointment to his new position. After all the instructions he has received tonight about different immigration policies we will look to him to formulate something that will be most satisfactory to the country. At this time I wish to draw attention to a few items having to do with administration.

The minister is asking us to vote $20,555,166 for his department so that he may distribute it in different ways to the various branches. Out of that amount $3,639,140, or 18 per cent of the total, is for temporary assistance. It is true there is a little better break-down of that amount than we used to have formerly. The number of temporary employees is now given. The total number of employees in the department is about 3,100 of whom 2,200 are temporary, 839 permanent and 100 casuals. I think we should have a further break-down although I am not asking the minister to give it at this time. As to the $3,639,140 paid to temporaries, we should be told the number who are receiving $5,000, $4,000, $3,000 and so on; or are they all on the same basis and making an average of $2,000 each? I mention this because from time to time the matter comes up, and we would all like to know what the money is being voted for. We have to vote the money for the minister, and I think in the future he should give us the fullest details as to how it is going to be spent. There are other matters I wish to take up, but perhaps I had better leave them for the minister to explain when we come to the particular items. In addition to the other activities for which he is responsible I see he is in charge of fur conservation, which no doubt has particular application to western Canada. From reports I have received I understand that this activity is responsible for a large part of the revenues of this department; so when the minister gets down to that item I think we should have some statement as to the net revenue from fur conservation. The other matters I shall leave until we come to the individual items.

Mr. Harkness: When these estimates were up on April 21, and again the other day, a number of questions were asked to which answers have not yet been given by the minister. I think we should have those answers before we go on to the next item.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Well, Mr. Chairman, I have said twice if not three times that I would be prepared to answer all the questions on the appropriate items, as we come to them. The only question I have been asked on the general departmental item is that which was asked a moment ago by the hon. member for Queens, and I shall be glad to give the answer in due course. If we pass on, however, I will undertake to answer all the questions of which I have a note on the appropriate citizenship, immigration or Indian affairs item.

Item agreed to.

Citizenship—

49. Citizenship registration branch, $193,035.

Mr. Fair: I should like the minister to answer the question which was asked the other evening as to the position of some of our Canadian citizens who lost their citizenship rights by marrying people from other countries.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The hon. member for St. Paul's and the hon. member for Battle River are inquiring about the difficulty in which some of our Canadian girls find themselves with respect to their citizenship after having married, particularly during the war years. The answer is that amendments to the Canadian Citizenship Act were introduced in the other place today, I believe. At any rate they will be discussed there on Monday next, and after they have been passed will come here. I believe that problem will be solved if the house adopts those amendments.

Mr. Harkness: The minister said that when we came to the individual items he would answer the questions that had been asked. I remember that the hon. member for Lake Centre made a speech on the matter of citizenship during the course of which he asked some questions, and I should think this would be the time to answer those questions, as well as one or two others that came up.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The hon. member for Lake Centre made specific reference to two points. In the first place he asked whether it would be desirable to issue a certificate to a person who filed a declaration of intention to become a Canadian citizen. I have looked into that suggestion and find that a receipt is issued to the applicant three months after he files his declaration of intention in the county or district court. That receipt is quite clear on its face that it is a receipt for a declaration of intention to become a Canadian citizen, and we feel that document should be sufficient for the purposes mentioned by the hon. member.

Then the hon. member suggested that in Canada we might adopt the idea of the freedom train, which they had in the United States. As he said, the freedom train cost something like $1,300,000, and that might be beyond the capacity of a department which gets only some $20 million odd to cover many services. However, the thought behind the freedom train is something I think we might very properly use in this country to increase the interest of our people in Canadian citizenship. We had a more or less minor experience of that kind with our own plan for the national capital which has gone around the country and in which our people have shown a great deal of interest. We are going to examine the possibility of arranging a collection of historic documents, much the same as they had in the United States, and other matters which should be drawn to the attention of the Canadian people in such a way as to create, not only in the newcomer to our country but in our own citizens as well, an interest in our history and traditions.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar made some mention of films, which perhaps we can deal with when he is in the chamber. In the citizenship branch we do issue a good many films and film strips, of which apparently he was not aware. There is an increasing demand for these, which we are supplying to anyone who asks for them. It is true that the hon. member made particular mention of a longer film dealing with our history, the cost of which according to our records would run to $10,000 or $12,000. We are concentrating rather on short strips for use in schools and other organizations, which in fact could be used almost anywhere. If it should happen that our estimates are increased certainly we will consider a film of considerable length at the cost I have mentioned, to present certain aspects in connection with citizenship.

I do not think there were any other questions, but if the hon. member for Calgary East has any of his own I shall be glad to answer them.

Mr. Harkness: I suggested that a good deal more might be done in the matter of teaching citizenship in our schools; I thought that was one of the best ways of accomplishing something definite in this connection. I wonder if the department is taking any steps to obtain material which could be used in the schools to teach citizenship, and to get it into the hands of the teachers.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I did intend to refer to what the hon. member said in that connection. The citizenship branch is now publishing a number of booklets on the history of Canada and its institutions, more particularly designed for use in classes for newcomers. However, the booklets have been of such value and have created such interest in educational circles that the demand for them is increasing all the time. As the hon. member knows, schools and the like come under the provincial government, and we feel we should not enter the field unless by invitation of a particular province. I am happy to say that our relations with all the provincial governments and their educational branches are the very best, and at their request we do supply these booklets and will continue to do so, I hope in increasing numbers. As for the actual exercises in schoolrooms, we feel that is a matter for the provincial departments to control in their own way. I believe the hon. member is aware that this year we did begin certain exercises with respect to citizenship in relation to May 23. Again, however, those were wholly in the nature of an offer of assistance to the provincial departments of education in connection with the programs they might follow that day. This committee can take it for granted, Mr. Chairman, that we are only too happy to give any assistance through the citizenship branch for these purposes.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Has the minister received a communication from the Canadian Club in Winnipeg concerning citizenship, and the granting of citizenship certificates?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I have received representations from several Canadian Clubs, not only in Winnipeg but in other centres, with respect to the observance of the granting of citizenship certificates, the kind of training which might be given to persons seeking citizenship, and the like. I appreciate very much these representations because we are anxious to assist the voluntary organizations, and particularly those in Winnipeg who, I might add, are very active in this respect. We will do what we can to accommodate our organization to the best facilities which can be given to the newcomer.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Can the minister give the committee an indication of his reply, or has it been embodied in the answer he has given?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, I wrote to several of the persons who communicated on this subject, and I agreed with them that we should try to work out an acceptable method of dealing with the newcomers in the examination and granting of certificates. But I did point out that, beginning with the schools as I said before, we leave those to the provincial governments. In the courts, of course, the judges are in control of whatever procedure they wish to adopt. I would not care to say now what I said in my reply, because I have not got it here. I know what the hon. member has in mind, and we do hope to find a system whereby all the persons interested in the new citizens will be able to work together to carry out these programs in the best way.

Mr. Adamson: I should like to say a word in appreciation of the Ontario Association for Adult Education, and what they have done in connection with displaced persons. The work has been almost entirely voluntary, and I know that in the district from which I come a school was taken over for two nights a week. A great deal of useful information was given, not only on the responsibilities of Canadian citizenship but also necessary information dealing with home economics and the problems of running a house. Having had in my employ a couple of displaced persons, may I say that the work being done in this connection was of tremendous assistance to these people. I strongly commend the work that is being done by this and other organizations.

Item agreed to.

50. Citizenship branch, $233,585.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, first I should like to say that I was glad to hear of the work that is being done so far as distributing information is concerned. I notice that the largest division under this item is for educational and informational material, $108,000 this year. I presume it is under that particular division of this item that those educational pamphlets and so forth, to which the minister referred a little while ago, were published. Can the minister tell us more about the material that is put out? I believe there are members who would be interested in getting copies of that material to send out to the various people in their constituencies. Of what does this educational and informational material consist?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, it consists of a great number of publications, some of them in large numbers and some in smaller numbers.

Mr. Harkness: So far as I am concerned, it would be satisfactory if the minister had permission to put a list of those pamphlets on Hansard, without taking the time to read it.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that the minister have permission to put the list on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The list is as follows:

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I should like to confirm what the member for Calgary East has said. Last session when this item was up we had difficulty getting information as to what it was all about. The present minister was not handling the item at that time. Later the director of the branch that had to do with this material was good enough to come and let me see some of this literature. I must say that I was so taken with it that I am glad to see the item is larger, so that more of this kind of material can be printed. Having secured a number of copies of these pamphlets, a list of which has been placed on Hansard, I sent some of them out to school principals and other people who might be interested. In all cases I received a most appreciative response. I believe the suggestion of the member for Calgary East is a good one, that members of parliament generally might at least be told of the availability of this material so that they can assist in sending it out to people who would welcome it.

Mr. Harkness: One other small point: I see there are only twenty-eight people in this department now, and there were only twenty-two last year, of whom ten were permanent. They include a messenger and several clerks. The travelling expenses, however, amount to $7,000. I know that a messenger and, I presume, most of these clerks, do not travel. I was wondering who required the $7,000 in travelling expenses.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, the persons requiring the travelling expenses are the people whom we call liaison officers. We have appointed them for the purpose of keeping in touch with the newcomers in the period we have been discussing, namely, after they arrive and before citizenship is granted. There are a number of these officials, and this item is intended to cover their travelling expenses.

Mr. Harkness: They appear amongst the temporary assistants, I suppose?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Some are temporary, some permanent. They are civil service appointments. May I add one word about the tabulation which has been put on Hansard. You will find that the total amount of money is $114,000, and I hope you will not question why it is that instead of $108,000 as in the previous item. It does not add up.

Item agreed to.

Immigration branch—

51. Administration of the Immigration Act, $750,425.

Mr. Roberge: I should like to ask the minister if the contract labour laws have been changed or cancelled. I received representations from someone in my constituency about some people who came in from the United States to do some work. Where labour was available, they refused to hire these people as they had their help, and it caused a lot of dissatisfaction.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Is the hon. member referring to people coming into Canada?

Mr. Roberge: Yes.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Perhaps if the hon. member would give me the instance I could answer the question much better on another occasion. I am not familiar with it.

Mr. Roberge: My point is that some United States citizens were brought in to work on the farm. There were two boys, and the people would not hire the boys. They had a little discussion over it, so I thought I would bring the matter up to see if any change had been made in the contract labour laws. Have they been abolished completely?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Yes; as I recall, they were suspended three or four years ago.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I should like to ask the minister a question about Count de Bernonville. I believe the security department recommended he be deported; the officials of this department recommended that he be deported, and two committees recommended that he be deported. There is now an appeal to the minister against the deportation order. Can the minister tell us the status of this case now?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The situation is that the appeal is before the minister and has not been decided yet.

Mr. Knowles: Can the minister now start answering some of the many questions that he has before him? If I might suggest one, it would be the subject which I raised on April 21, and about which several other members have spoken, including the hon. member for Lambton-Kent today, namely, the question as to P. C. 2115.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre spoke about P. C. 2115 in the debate about a month ago. The remarks he made were not those with which I might entirely agree, particularly when he refers to the misunderstanding which occurred over the repeal of the Chinese Immigration Act; because I do not agree with him that the statement made at that time was in any way misleading, although he and others perhaps did misunderstand it.

The present P. C. 2115 is an order in council passed, as I recall it, in September 1930 and it applies to all Asiatic people. In that connection, "Asiatic" refers to a geographical area lying roughly east of the Mediterranean, and within that area it provides that the only persons who may be admitted to Canada are the wives and unmarried children under eighteen of Canadian citizens. I realize that the hon. member thinks that this P. C. should be broadened to permit the admission to Canada of wives and children of persons from that area who are not Canadian citizens. I also realize that he and others have made representations that the age limit of eighteen for children might be increased. The present policy of the government, however, is to observe the order in council as it is, with one exception with which I think the committee is familiar; that is, an exception is made for a child to be brought forward up to nineteen if he or she is the sole remaining one of the family abroad.

The argument is made that this P. C. is discriminatory against those Canadians of Chinese origin. I must repeat that it is not a discrimination against them. They are covered by the same P. C. as other Asiatic peoples; and it is not correct to say that that is a peculiar discrimination against these people.

Perhaps I might give some figures to the committee. It must be remembered that, in the years before 1947, the Chinese Immigration Act did apply; and without going into the history of Chinese immigration into this country, as did the hon. member for Lambton-Kent tonight, we can start with 1947 and say generally that only 20 or 30 people of Chinese origin had been entering this country per year up to that time. The figure last year was just one or two over eight hundred. Up to the end of April this year something like four hundred have come in. At the same rate the figure for the whole of this year might reach twelve hundred. I think the committee will agree with me that until we see the limits of the movement to Canada of people of Chinese origin, we might well leave the P. C. as it is and consider if necessary a revision of it when the full facts of the movement are apparent.

Mr. Knowles: I must say, Mr. Chairman, that the figures the minister has given certainly put the government in a better light with respect to this matter than was formerly the case. The numbers used to be what one could count on the fingers of his hands. These figures of a few hundred seem to be a little bit more humane. I use that phrase particularly in relation to what should be our interest in family formations. Nevertheless, I hope the basic order will yet be changed.

Although I do not wish to pursue the argument with the minister at this time, in view of his statement that there was no reason for misunderstanding the position taken by the government back in 1947, I feel that I should put on record again at this point the statement at that time which was attributed to Mr. King, in a press release of January 27, 1947:

> Mr. King said that, at an early stage of the session, the government intends to introduce a bill to repeal the Chinese Immigration Act which is regarded by the Chinese government as an exclusion act and in the nature of discrimination on grounds of race against a friendly and allied people. The effect of the repeal will be to remove all discrimination against the Chinese on account of race and to bring Chinese persons under the general provisions of the Immigration Act and no longer under legislation applying exclusively to persons of Chinese origin.

I see the minister nodding his head. In other words, he thinks that we both have a case for the position we are taking. I submit that the ordinary person, reading those words, would take from them the meaning that our Chinese Canadians took when that press release came to their attention in January, 1947, namely that the effect of the action to be taken by the government at the 1947 session of parliament would be to remove all discrimination against the Chinese on account of race. But we found that the latter words in that statement, which were to the effect that they would no longer be under legislation applying exclusively to persons of Chinese origin, had the effect of putting them under an order in council which, it is true, does not apply exclusively to persons of Chinese origin, but it does apply to persons of Asiatic origin. This is where our Chinese Canadians and other Canadians who are interested in this matter feel that they were deceived. It cannot be said now that all discrimination against the Chinese on account of race has been abolished, as many Canadians feel it should be.

Mr. Thatcher: I should like to ask the minister a question with regard to Chinese students. Can Chinese students still come to Canada? I have in mind particularly doctors who want to interne in this country. I believe that formerly they could come to Canada, and I should like to know what the present status of that class of people is.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): So far as the Canadian government is concerned, the situation is the same as it has formerly been. Chinese students may come to Canada, to go to university. But there is this difficulty. At the moment one is not certain whether they can get the appropriate documents from the Chinese government so that they might return at the end of their period of education here.

Mr. Thatcher: What would be the position of a citizen of Hong Kong? Would he be able to come over here without this present difficulty that the minister mentions?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): We took cognizance of the fact that there are a great many people in Hong Kong, commencing roughly last fall, and we did cut a certain amount of the regulations in the way of travel documents; but there are still some needed. If they obtain those, they can come forward; and in fact, they are coming forward from Hong Kong.

Mr. Thatcher: Can a doctor who has graduated from a Chinese university and wants to interne in Canada come to Canada at the present time as a citizen of Hong Kong?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Subject of course to the documents, yes.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Can the minister tell us how the process of screening of potential immigrants is conducted in Europe?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I think the committee will understand the answer I am going to make. This is the kind of information that I do not think should be made public.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): A most unsatisfactory answer.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I realize that.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I am willing to admit that for security reasons certain things ought not to be told. In the past I have complained about a certain type of screening. I refer of course to those who have come into this country with false passports. I have tried to find out how these people's backgrounds were checked into because the passports were false. The only answer I am given is that it should not be made public. I think the answer is utterly absurd.

Mr. Decore: I was wondering whether the minister was in a position to make a statement with reference to the possible admission as immigrants of a certain Ukrainian group now in the United Kingdom and who formerly went under the name of "division Halychyna." This group as a military unit was originally formed during the war on Soviet territory. It was motivated by a desire to form a nucleus of a military group around which other military units would centre for the creation of an independent Ukraine. They wanted to break away from the soviet tyranny. In the turmoil this military division found itself under German jurisdiction. That they detested the nazis as much as they hated the communists is indicated by the fact that immediately upon contact with the allies they surrendered to the United States army. They then became prisoners of war and were taken to England. After staying in England for a while they were released to work as free citizens. I understand that a lot of them are anxious to reach the shores of Canada and to settle here. I am sure they would make desirable citizens if they came into this country.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The Ukrainian persons mentioned by the hon. member for Vegreville had the history he has given. When they were taken prisoners of war by our troops in Italy it was recognized by the allied commander that there were special circumstances in connection with that division because they were not treated entirely as other prisoners of war were. They have been in England since the spring or fall of 1945. We have investigated not individuals but the group as a whole, and we are quite prepared to accept them provided they come within the ordinary rules with respect to immigrants; that is, they might be agricultural workers, settlers, and the like. May I express the hope, since it may be the only opportunity I have to refer to the speech of the hon. member for Vegreville, that their sons might turn out just as he has.

[Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North).]

Mr. Hansell: I believe we are on item 51; at least we are talking about that item. Tuesday night I asked the minister whether he would tell the committee what the government's present policy is in respect of immigration from Italy, and whether it is expected that the policy may be changed in the near future. Can the minister make a statement now?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Immigration from Italy is on the same basis as it was prior to the war, since we have a peace treaty with Italy and have restored the normal relationships. Italians may come provided they are close relatives within the description found in P.C. 2743, and also agricultural workers and settlers.

Mr. Fulton: Can the minister make a statement with regard to the position of Germans? I understand the governing factor is that we have not yet got a peace treaty with Germany. I must say that that seems a bit hard on a number of Germans, and people who are now classified as German nationals although racially they are not Germans. It seems a bit hard on them because it is hardly their fault. A number of them would make good citizens. I hope the minister will understand that I am not suggesting a complete relaxation of all the investigations and safeguards which now exist against the admission of people of nazi tendencies and symptoms. What I am suggesting is merely that the fact that we have not yet been able to complete a peace treaty with Germany because of Russia should no longer be allowed to prevent these Germans and other Europeans, who would make desirable immigrants in accordance with the present security standards, from coming into this country. Can the minister say anything with regard to that?

Mr. Thatcher: Before the minister replies, perhaps I might ask a supplementary question. I hold a newspaper clipping in my hand dated June 5. It was taken from the Toronto Star and it says that Germany asks Canada to take 500,000 Sudetens. This dispatch is headed "Bonn, Germany", and says that mass settlement of 500,000 Germans in Canada is being sought by the west German government.

I should like to know if they have made a formal application to the Canadian government to take that number. If so, has the request been considered in any way? What has been done about it?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): No such request has been received. I read the item referred to, but we have not heard of it, apart from that.

With respect to the question asked by the hon. member for Kamloops, I made a statement in the house on March 28 in which I covered the question of German nationals, and said that we would now admit German nationals who were first degree relatives in accordance with P.C. 1606 of this year.

I also covered the question of the persons who are non-Germans, but known as Volksdeutsche, in the same announcement. The fact that there is not a peace treaty is one factor which I agree with the hon. member should not necessarily stand in the way of immigration from that country.

Mr. Adamson: What is the difference between Germans and the Volksdeutsche?

Mr. Thatcher: Has the minister at his fingertips the number of Germans who have come into Canada since the regulations changed?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): No, because that was in March. I can give the April figure, but that is all I can give.

Mr. Thatcher: What was the April figure?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): In the meantime I will answer the hon. member for York West. The Volksdeutsche are persons of German ancestry who, by my description at any rate, were living outside the limits of Germany prior to the war, persons in Poland, the Baltic states, Czechoslovakia, and the like.

Mr. Adamson: I just wanted that on the record.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I have a special case to refer to in my constituency of Cumberland. German settlers came to that county after the first great war, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Woock. They have proved themselves to be the highest type of citizen. They settled on a farm and enlarged their acreage. They have recently enlarged it by another eighty acres, and have made a success of farming operations. They recently became Canadian citizens. He was conscripted in the first great war and served as a German. There are no children. They have a nephew who served in the last great war in France, and he is still in France. They have made application that he be allowed to come to Canada to assist them on the farm. They wish to make him their heir. This is a special case that should have the sympathetic consideration of the department.

I should like to know if the policy of the department has been changed in order to permit such an applicant to come to this country. Has the minister the authority to give such special permission or would it be done by order in council? The uncle and aunt who live in Cumberland have been ready to advance the necessary funds for his passage and other expenses, but they were not accepted by the steamship company and he has not yet received permission to come. These settlers in Cumberland have proved to be excellent citizens and they have certificates as being the best citizens in the community. They have evidence of their high standing as citizens from the manager of the bank and I think it would be most desirable that in this special case permission be granted so that this boy can come to Canada.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Without going into the details of this particular case, a nephew would not be admissible. It is only close relatives who are admissible and that does not extend to nephews unless they happen to be orphans. If my hon. friend will speak to me later about the case I shall look into it and give him a firm answer.

To answer the question asked by the hon. member for Moose Jaw, there were 641 persons of German origin who came in in April. Those would not all be from Germany as it is the racial origin, not necessarily the place whence they came, that is indicated.

Mr. Harkness: There have been a number of speeches on immigration since these estimates were first introduced in April and I had hoped that the minister would make something in the nature of a general statement and answer the considerable number of questions, either direct or implied, contained in the speeches. I think in almost every case the tenor of the speech was disappointment that the number of people coming into this country as immigrants has been steadily falling during recent months or during last year as compared with the year before.

Nearly every speaker wanted to know what means were going to be taken to reverse that trend and to increase immigration into the country in pursuance of the policy announced back in 1947. We have not had anything so far along that line. It has been impossible to ascertain what there is in prospect to increase the number of immigrants from the British isles, which number has been decreasing materially during recent months owing to exchange difficulties particularly. We have not been told that there are any prospects of overcoming those exchange difficulties. Is the minister prepared to make a general statement in reply to the general criticism from all parts of the house, and will he indicate whether any specific steps are in prospect to reverse this trend?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, I think perhaps I might avoid making an extended statement, but a number of specific questions have been asked at various times which I shall be glad to answer. The hon. member has just mentioned one which was asked by the hon. member for Peel in regard to exchange difficulties. As I have said, and as I think everyone in the committee knows, this question must be settled before we can expect an increase in immigration from the United Kingdom. This is known and appreciated in the United Kingdom. There was a debate on this question in the House of Lords on April 27 which makes interesting reading but I shall not put any of it on the record. However, in the press of yesterday there was a report of a discussion in the House of Commons at Westminster which was referred to over C.B.C. last night. Perhaps I should read a part of this report, as follows:

> Patrick Gordon-Walker, commonwealth relations secretary, said the government would have to decide not only whether to encourage emigration to the commonwealth, but whether it should take steps to discourage migration to non-commonwealth countries?
> Earlier the secretary referred to the £1,000 ($3,100) allowance, spread over a four-year period, which British emigrants can take to Canada.
> "I cannot promise, on behalf of the government, to give absolutely top priority to this as the dollar situation eases, but we will give very high priority to it, and I will discuss with the chancellor (Sir Stafford Cripps) whether it would not be possible to allow a larger section of the £1,000 to be carried in the first year."

I do not think that anything need be added to that. The minister has been considering from time to time what steps might be taken to overcome this difficulty, but no conclusion has been reached and no good purpose would be served by my trying to discuss it. Should we come to a conclusion I am quite sure that it will be given to the house at the earliest possible moment.

The other questions raised were all specific and I think they can be disposed of quickly. There was some suggestion of a lack of interest, or rather our declining interest, in the persons coming forward under the IRO. We are and always have been carrying our weight in the IRO and have through that organization brought to this country about 90,000 people. Contrary to what has been said in this house, these are not limited to agricultural workers. The complaint has been made that we were not bringing in brains, that there seemed to be objection to bringing in people with high educational standards. That is not so. If the committee will look at the annual report for last year of the Department of Mines and Resources they will see the details of these people set out according to their occupations and the like.

There has been some discussion about subsidizing the transportation of immigrants to this country and the hon. member for Kootenay West gave us the details of the Australian plan to assist immigration. Recently, at any rate, this country has not provided subsidized transportation as is done in Australia. I have read the booklets and other publications which are published in Australia in the interests of obtaining immigration, which were referred to by my hon. friend.

The Australian government is spending quite a considerable amount of money in advertising, but I repeat that the crux of the matter is the exchange difficulty. People will come here if they can bring their money, and until that problem is solved there is no point in spending large sums of money on publishing booklets and distributing them to people who could not react to them in any event.

When the leader of the opposition spoke in this debate a month ago he went into considerable details about the difficulties in London in connection with applications, processing and so on. With a good deal of what he said I am in complete agreement. It would be desirable to have all these various activities under one roof so that the intending immigrant could come to town and perhaps in one day get through most of the necessary work under the one roof. We hope to improve our facilities in the very near future in London and other parts of the United Kingdom. I do not believe there are any other specific questions, but if I have overlooked any I shall be glad to discuss them.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Can the minister supplement the reply he gave to the hon. member for Macleod as to the number of Italians who came in under this regulation during January, February, March or April of this year?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Up to the end of April there were 2,294.

Mr. Murphy: There is one point on which I should like to have the minister express his view. It has to do with the service at the border points. I raise this matter because of an item in the press some two years ago about several hundred United States cars being turned back at a border point in British Columbia. This action of course affected a great many people and also affected our tourist dollars. What I have in mind is that I understand that at certain border points at some times the United States combine the customs and immigration officers, and one man takes the responsibility for discharging the duties of both in order to expedite the entry of the person or car as the case may be.

I feel rather keenly about this matter because it is quite important that when our United States friends come to Canada they should not be unnecessarily delayed for any unusual length of time with the result that a lot of them turn back and do not come into Canada because of the delay at the border. We depend on the immigration and customs officials a great deal to boost our tourist industry because they are the first Canadians whom the Americans contact when they enter our country. We expect a great deal of them, and I have never been satisfied that those at the border points are being compensated sufficiently for the responsibilities that they have to assume and what is demanded of them. I should like to have the minister comment as to whether or not in the rush seasons we could introduce something along the same line as they have on the other side in order to expedite the entry of United States people into Canada.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, the mixing of customs and immigration officers that the hon. member has mentioned is on an experimental basis in the United States at the moment, and we are keeping in touch with the situation to see if it is satisfactory. We do of course put on extra help during the summer months, and particularly when a large number of tourists are expected. Nevertheless I agree with the hon. member that we should give the best reception to these people that we possibly can. I think I mentioned in my earlier statement that we checked into Canada something like 39 million people last year. Of course a great many of them were commuters and the like, but if there are any opportunities for improving the facilities for receiving these people, particularly in my hon. friend's riding, I shall be glad to consider them. At any rate I can assure him that during the summer months I am going to visit some of these points myself to see if we can improve the facilities.

Mr. Fraser: In the details for immigration on page 103 there is an amount of $242,000 for overtime, which is the same as last year. Was that amount actually spent last year, or was it just an estimate, and what is the situation this year?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Is the hon. member objecting to the fact that we are not spending more?

Mr. Fraser: No. I was wondering how the amount of $242,000 for overtime was made up and why you call it overtime. Is it for overtime work, is it allowed in place of leave, or what is it?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): At the immigration points the staff work overtime to complete the week's work, and we pay them on a pro rata basis in the same manner as we have in previous years. This represents the same amount of overtime, perhaps with a larger staff, but we prefer to do it that way rather than to put on extra staff for the small amount of overtime that must be worked.

Mr. Fraser: I wondered why it was exactly the same as last year.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): That means we have the same staff.

Mr. Knowles: Are they paid at overtime rates of pay?

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I should like to ask the minister whether any special effort is being made to encourage migration from the United States, particularly from the middle west. We have large areas in the Peace river country and elsewhere in the north, and settlers from Iowa, Kansas, Ohio and the middle west seem to do very well there with the cheap land that we have in the northwestern part of Canada. According to one very good authority I am told that we can finish a hog in the Peace river country at 5 cents per pound.

Mr. Hodgson: Let us cut the price of bacon right away.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): You can see the possibilities in the use of that land by men who know about hogs and corn, how to put the two together and how to develop prosperous mixed farming projects. It is all very well to talk about bringing in men from Denmark. Among the best settlers we have had in Canada, and particularly in Alberta, were dairymen from Denmark who came here and assisted in developing co-operative creameries, cheese factories, and so on. We have had good men from Sweden. I can point to a good many people all through the northwest with prosperous farms, and some of them right in this house tonight, who originated in Sweden.

We have had good men from Norway, but after all we want our own Anglo-Saxon stock to be given an opportunity in the northwest where these new areas are waiting to be settled. We want Englishmen, Irishmen, Scotsmen, and let us not forget our United States friends. We had 90,000 Americans on the Alaska highway to build a lifeline to the Alaska perimeter, and we did not do anything about giving them any land. If I had been in the position of the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King I would have given each of them 160 acres of land in that country, but we did not do it. The land is there, the opportunity is there, and we should invite settlement of those areas. The French Canadian people of the province of Quebec should be invited to go to northeastern British Columbia and northern Alberta. I regret that the people of Ontario refuse to turn their attention to the possibilities of that great country. United States people are well qualified to settle there. They know about tractors, and they know the mysteries of hog farming. They understand the mysteries of hog raising; they know how to build silos; they know how to clear land. Let us get as many Americans as we possibly can to come in along the Alaska highway and into these new areas.

Mr. Murphy: Has the minimum wage scale been increased within the last two or three years? In other words, at what rate is a new employee engaged, and how much higher is that rate than it was last year or the year before?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The immigration officers are in the same position as other civil servants. They have received their annual increases and the special increases which have been granted civil servants from time to time. If my hon. friend has any particular appointment in mind I shall be glad to give him the precise figure.

Mr. Murphy: Let us say you take on a man, a novice, as an inspector at a port. I assume he is paid a minimum wage, and that is the amount I should like to have.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The minimum is $2,280.

Mr. Murphy: And what was it three or four years ago?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I will have to look that up and let my hon. friend know.

Mr. Adamson: Mr. Chairman, just briefly I should like to pay tribute to the director of immigration, Mr. Jolliffe, who has held that position for a great number of years. Certainly in all the dealings I have had with him and all the dealings anyone else I know has had with him he has gone to the greatest trouble to settle our problems. The number of people who are in Canada today through the humanitarian efforts of this notable servant of Canada is very large, and I wanted to pay this small tribute to him at this time.

Now I want to ask the minister how the IRO is going to be supported next year, after the funds are exhausted. I understand that officially the IRO will wind up next year, or even within the present fiscal year. I have several questions to ask, but the first is, what is the policy of the government concerning the operations of the IRO?

My next question has to do with the displaced persons' camps in both the American and British sectors of Germany, where there are still large numbers of people. These unfortunates are perhaps in an older age group than those who emigrated to Australia and Canada in the last few years, but we cannot consider them an indigestible group. Something must be done to solve that problem before the major question of a peace treaty with Germany can be worked out. On our responsibility as belligerents, and our responsibility from the humanitarian point of view, we must realize that there are in Germany today many thousands of people for whom work cannot be found there; but there is work for them in Canada. They are not like the young, virile people we have received from the displaced persons' camps in years gone by; still there is work for them, particularly in our large institutions. For example, I understand that a short time ago the Toronto General hospital was so short of assistance that a great many rooms had to be closed. They had not enough nurses; they had not enough ward assistants to service that great institution completely. To what extent that was true I cannot say positively, but certainly I was told of someone who could not get in the hospital because, while the rooms were available, the service could not be provided. In these camps are many people who could do ward work and the various other duties that have to be performed in these great institutions. In addition there is still a great unsatisfied demand throughout Canada for domestic servants, and I am sure that many of these people, who are perhaps in their fifties, could give satisfactory service. I believe it is our responsibility to see that something is done about them.

I now come to the people whom the Netherlands are so anxious to send to Canada for farm work. I want to ask the minister whether any special scheme has been worked out with specific reference to citizens of the Netherlands for farm work in Canada. I remember that some years ago there was a system of assisted immigration for citizens of Switzerland who came to Canada, and particularly to Manitoba. That scheme was extraordinarily satisfactory. As a matter of fact I believe the chief surgeon of one of the principal hospitals in Winnipeg is the son of a man who came out as one of those Swiss immigrants.

I repeat that the problem of the displaced persons is not solved. I am free to admit that we in Canada have done our share and perhaps more, certainly as compared with the United States, but the problem still exists. There is no use shutting our eyes to it, because it is still there. Before any satisfactory solution of the problem of Germany can be worked out some solution must be found to the problem of the refugees who have flooded into that country. There is work for those people in Canada today, of the sort I have suggested. Perhaps they would not be able to do active work in construction jobs or on the farms, but there is work here for people who would be prepared to help with the domestic work involved in operating our great institutions. That is one thing. With regard to the question of importing brains, I might say that if there is one thing that was done that was not so advantageous, it was the bringing to Canada of a number of displaced persons who were extremely well educated. A great number of professional people, such as university professors, surgeons, doctors, and other highly skilled people have come to Canada and gone into domestic service for one year. After a year in domestic service, or the first service they entered upon coming to Canada, they left that service. That is quite understandable.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Does the hon. member know of any of them who stayed the year?

Mr. Adamson: Yes, they stayed a year, but not one d.p. couple stayed more than their contract year. I suggest there is still a demand for this type of labourer, but the displaced persons whom we brought out did not stay. They all went into other, perhaps more remunerative work than that for which they first came out. I suggest to the minister that is a problem that is still unsolved. There are many men, women, and in many cases children, who are still in these camps. Something will have to be done about them. They cannot remain where they are. I feel that through the continued operation of the IRO, or some other international organization, we should co-operate in every way possible. I do want to suggest to the minister that there are great opportunities for displaced persons in Canada, particularly in those fields in which we are short of labour.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has asked a specific question as to what we are doing about the continuation of the operation of the IRO. Of course the IRO is not under my department.

Mr. Adamson: I realize that.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): There is a vote under external affairs, item 84, which provides for about $2 million as our contribution to the IRO. This organization was to wind up on July 31, but I believe it is being continued for some months in view of the difficulty my hon. friend has mentioned. A representative of the IRO was here early in the winter, and we discussed with him some of the problems. I think I can assure the hon. member that, as I said before, we shall continue to take an interest in these people, and to share in the solution of the problem he has stated.

With respect to the Netherlands question, I think I covered that and I do not want to quote myself.

Mr. Adamson: There are so many committee meetings that I missed what the minister said.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Earlier in this discussion I said that there were about 3,000 Netherlands citizens who came here in 1947; 7,000 in 1948; 7,000 in 1949; and approximately 4,500 to this date this year. In almost every instance they are agricultural workers coming to this country under the Netherlands foundation. I might add that we are particularly pleased with this movement of Netherlands citizens, and we hope it will continue.

Mr. Bryce: I should like to ask the minister how many persons Canada deported last year.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I shall look that up and let the hon. member have the figure.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): With respect to displaced persons, I hope I may give the house some information regarding an experiment which was made about ten years ago in bringing German settlers, that is displaced persons from the Sudetenland area to Canada. Those people were placed in my riding at Tupper Creek, which is near Dawson Creek. Some three hundred families in all were brought to Canada. They received from the British government approximately $1,500 in funds which were locked up in one of those countries from which they came—I mean their credits were standing in Britain and their money was in Czechoslovakia or some of the other areas. Those people came to Canada. They received $1,500 per family and took up land which was not considered by the average Canadian as very good land.

They have been in Canada ten years. They did not know our language. They knew nothing of our laws or our customs. What has been the result over the ten years? A community of happy, prosperous people who have contributed a great deal to the economy of that part of Canada. They have gone into dairying; they have cleared land; they have built homes. Those Germans, although many of us would say they are aliens, and possibly enemy aliens, are today part of our Canadian citizenship. They are giving a good account of themselves. I suggest to this house that is a test tube experiment. It is our responsibility to work out, on a much larger scale, that successful experiment which has been carried out at Tupper Creek and Dawson Creek.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, as indicated some time ago, the thing which chiefly concerns me, so far as immigration is concerned, is that the number of immigrants has been steadily dropping. I believe the same view was expressed by many other speakers. The minister has indicated that some plans are under way to try to solve the exchange difficulties which prevent more immigrants coming to this country from the British isles. Can he tell us if any plans are under consideration, or if the department has any other ideas as to how this downward trend in immigration could be stopped and an upward trend started? I think that is what most of us want to know so far as immigration is concerned.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, I do not think I can say it differently than I did a moment ago. The exchange difficulties consequent upon the depreciation of the pound are, in fact, the problem which has to be solved. As I indicated before, I do not feel I should try now to explain my own thoughts as to how it could be done because they are not crystallized. But I assure the hon. member that should we come to a solution we will announce it at once.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to ask a question or two, and put a suggestion before the minister with respect to these regulations we are discussing which stand in the way of the admission of certain European nationals in the hope that he might consider the relaxation of at least one category of relatives. In many cases the husband has been a war casualty, and the brother of a relative in Canada. The wife and children of the man who was the war casualty are not admissible to Canada, and the children particularly are not admissible unless they are orphans. In this case the wife is not a sister but a sister-in-law, and I wonder if the minister would consider the relaxation of the regulations, at least to the extent of including, in the admissible class, sisters-in-law and their children, who would be blood relations to the people in Canada.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I would be glad to consider that. I take it the hon. member means that the applicant in Canada would be able to provide satisfactory settlement?

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I shall be glad to give consideration to that. The hon. member for Selkirk asks about the number of deportations. There were 416 for the fiscal year ended March 31.

[Mr. Murray (Cariboo).]

Mr. Bryce: You have increased your staff. Is there any reason for that? You have increased them from eight to nine. Four hundred and twenty do not seem to be many people for nine officers to handle. Do they do anything else? Is their sole job that of throwing people out of Canada? I could throw 420 out myself.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Lesage): Shall the item carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Bryce: Tell me something about it. I want to know.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Lesage): Order.

Mr. Harkness: I have one particular question with regard to the details. I see that for publications and advertising the amount is $158,000 which is up from $85,000 last year. Can the minister explain what the reason is for that and what these publications and advertising consist of?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): They actually provide for the advertising which we hope to do should we overcome the difficulties we have just been discussing. In particular we propose to make a number of motion pictures depicting scenes in Canada which would be attractive to prospective immigrants and also two publications which are known as "This is Canada" and "Canada Descriptive Atlas." The purpose is to increase the interest of persons who might come to this country.

Mr. Fulton: Is the minister able to make a general statement covering information to which reference was made earlier, that the number of immigrants has declined over the last three years by nearly 50 per cent and the cost of administration in Canada—that is, in the first two items I quoted, departmental administration and field inspectional service in Canada—have increased in the same period by approximately 25 per cent?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The increase in staff is largely due to the necessity of having inspectional service in Canada. The requirements of inspection have been increased in the last two or three years and for that reason the staff has been increased accordingly. As the hon. member pointed out, there has not been an increase in the staff abroad; but I think he will agree with me that a good base at home is desirable before we launch into the other branch of attracting immigration.

Mr. Fulton: May I just point out that the same provision, or the same type of inspection facilities and charges by the labour department under this heading is also increased, so that the two departments are sharing the costs of follow-up and so on and investigation in Canada; and I cannot see any justification as yet for that substantial increase in costs when at the same time our immigration is falling and facilities overseas for arranging for immigration are apparently being reduced, if one can judge by the reduction in the estimates there. If the number were increasing, I would agree with the minister; but unless he can show that we are preparing for a program of increased immigration, I cannot agree with him that there is justification for that increase.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I have no hesitation in saying that we are; and I have just given an indication of the increase in one particular item.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Have any studies been made by the department as to the capacity of Canada to absorb immigration?

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): As to the question of publicity, I suppose that the hon. member for Kamloops refers to advertising, does he, and propaganda?

Mr. Fulton: I have not mentioned it.
